LORD: These are technologies that we would export that could be used for either military or civilian purposes, and the issue is that if you export it, you have got to make sure that it is used for the reasons it is supposed to be used for. I do recall that we were constantly trying to expand the list of exports we thought we could safely export to make more money for Americans and more jobs without endangering national security, including a looser definition of computers because computers have advanced so far that we felt that some could now be safely sent to China. I don't recall any of this being a huge issue. We did point out to the Chinese that our exports of dual use technology were related to their performance, and this echoes today, of how they were dealing with Iran and Saudi Arabia on missiles. There was an implicit tradeoff that we managed on one of Shultz's trips or Secretary of Defense Carlucci's trips.

Q: Carlucci was Secretary of Defense.

LORD: To loosen up on certain areas of exports, not on national security items under export control, but rather dual use items in exchange for better Chinese performance in sending missiles to the Middle East. It did not have the kind of controversy that we have now in the 1990s.

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: You mentioned several times and I didn't bring it up earlier, but the co-question of missile proliferation in the Middle East. How did you go about dealing with the Chinese on that very difficult issue?

LORD: As I recall, there were two major issues here, again we won't be precise on chronology. One was they sent Silkworms to Iran. That was a significant problem, and we worked very hard on it. We finally got them to agree not to send any more. They claimed they never had sent any, but we got them to agree that while they never sent any, they wouldn't do so again! Shultz worked hard on this, and we worked very hard on this over time, but I don't have any precise dates. That was one area. Then there was another area when their Foreign Minister, Wu, was visiting Washington in the late '80s, and even as he was there, we got reports of their sending missiles to Saudi Arabia, and we got them to clamp down on that. There was also still ambiguous activity with Pakistan with respect to the nuclear program. That was why a nuclear agreement we negotiated with China was never sent forth to Congress until last October (1998) when Jiang Zemin visited the United States. The other issue that has some resonance now was Chinese rockets launching American satellites. While I was there the Challenger blew up, an American tragedy.

Q: It was an orbital shuttle.

LORD: That was a tragedy obviously in personal terms, but also a setback for our whole launching capabilities. Our satellite industry wasn't able then, even as it is not today, to have enough launches of American capability so they could get their satellites up. Plus we felt in general orbiting satellites for communications purposes would feed into the whole communications information revolution and it would have a positive impact on China. Above all, we wanted to help our satellite makers, but we also had to work out certain limits so we wouldn't unfairly hurt our own satellite launchers. They could still do some. We had certain quotas we were shooting for with the Chinese. This was a major agreement we worked out when Secretary Carlucci visited China, I'm quite sure in 1988. We are hearing about it today (1998) for Chinese rockets to launch American satellites. We had several conditions we worked on even after the Carlucci visit. One was the number of launches so we wouldn't hurt American industry. Another was tight controls and inspections so there wouldn't be any security breach. I think there were one or two other conditions.

On missile proliferation, generally we had serious problems on Iran and Saudi Arabia as I mentioned. Along with Tibet which heated up while I was there - we will get back into that - those were probably the most serious issues we had while I was there, as well as the general Chinese restraints on political and cultural freedom.

Q (Bernkopf Tucker): What kind of arguments did you make to the Chinese to try to persuade them not to do this?

LORD: It is not unlike what we have been doing in recent years on proliferation issues. You use a combination of sticks and carrots. We didn't have in place as many sanctions then as we do now, so we didn't have any sanctions we could impose as I recall. The Chinese were interested in getting more technology, including dual use technology. For commercial reasons we were interested in this as well, so we would use that, saying in effect if you behave yourself on missile proliferation, we can do more on exporting dual use technology. So there was that trade off. We also tried to appeal to their geopolitical interests, saying instability in the Near East and the Persian Gulf was not in their interest either. Now that argument has much greater weight today when they have to import oil themselves. They want stability. We also made the point that arming Iran with Silkworm missiles that could hit American ships was a serious problem for U.S.-Chinese relations in terms of American domestic and congressional opinion. Resentment over this could seriously set back the U.S.-China relationship.

So the incentives were more economic and technological cooperation, avoiding the dangers of hurting American domestic support for the relationship, and geopolitical arguments. Now, that had to be balanced off with their need to make money, the PLA in particular, and their desire to have an influence in the region. It was not easy going. There was a lot of tough work over many months by us at the Embassy and in Washington, but we did make progress on both Iran and Saudi Arabia.

Q: The PLA is the People's Liberation Army.

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: Was it more difficult to argue the case about Saudi Arabia since that is an American ally? Did you have to approach it differently than Iran?

LORD: I guess it was somewhat more difficult. I remember we hit them when foreign Minister Wu was in Washington in '87 or '88, around that period. Shultz had a barbecue at his house in Washington. We took this up with Wu. It was the first time this had come up, just before Wu had arrived. He got hit also by the National Security Advisor, Colin Powell as well, not only that evening I believe, but in his office the next day. I think Reagan also referred to it but not as precisely as Powell. I don't recall. We had to appeal to different interests. On the one hand the Saudis were an ally. But we thought it was destabilizing to have missile proliferation in the Middle East generally. And of course, we had the Israeli connection which we were concerned about. Even then the Chinese had some contacts with Israel including military supplies and this grew all the time. So, even though they had a position in the Middle East, interests with the Palestinians and the Arabs, they had some fish to fry with the Israelis as well. We appealed on instability in the region and the impact on American opinion.

I'll move on to some other elements in our relations. One specific thing that I was very happy with, and that I worked very hard on, was the Peace Corps. Before I went out to China in 1985, I remember agreeing with the director of the Peace Corps, Loret Ruppe, that this would be a goal. I just felt it was a great program generally and it would be very helpful to get it into China. I worked hard on that for my entire tenure. The Chinese still had residual suspicions that the Peace Corps might be a front for spying. It had, they thought, some historical baggage, and they didn't even want the name Peace Corps name to be used. It had to be, from the Chinese translation, "American Volunteers" or something like that. I worked very hard on this for several years. One of the last things we accomplished was to sign an agreement letting American teachers go into Sichuan Province just before I left as part of a 3-3 ½ year effort.

By the way, I took Chinese lessons my first few months in China and picked up some phrases for evidence of my efforts. But it was impossible, part-time, to make real progress.

Another major objective of mine was to build up support in the United States for the relationship, in a hard-hearted way and not coming across as being infected with clientitis or being naive about the Chinese. I was stressing concerns about human rights and missile proliferation and Tibet, whatever the issue was. I worked hard to get not only government officials who were already generally committed to this, but also members of Congress. I was anxious to get as many of them to China as possible, particularly conservatives and skeptics of the relationship. They could reinforce our positions to the Chinese with their own points. And they could learn more about the benefits of our relations. Indeed the very first high level delegation to China after I arrived as Ambassador included two or three Senators who had voted against my confirmation (the vote was 87-7). They subsequently became strong supporters of mine, e.g., Senator Hatch of Utah.

I would go back to the U.S. every few months. I think Ambassadors as a matter of policy should do this for a variety of reasons. One of course, is to push issues along in the bureaucracy that are hung up and you can only get it done by lobbying directly at high levels in Washington and moving things along. Second getting the mood back there, getting a sense both in the government and generally the political mood of how things are going so you can relay that to the Chinese and also keep them in mind as you operate back in China. I would see as many congressmen and Senators as I could when I got back. They are always tough to get appointments with. I would get with the academic experts and compare notes with them, talk with a lot of business people and get their perspectives on doing business in China and how we could help them. What their frustrations and goals were. I would also relay my impressions of China to various audiences. Give speeches to various groups outlining our goals with China and building up support for the relationship as well as backgrounders with the press and on the air interviews. I remember on one trip, I did a real blitz because it was the anniversary of normalization of the Shanghai Communiqué or one of those dates. I remember interviews with the New York Times and the Washington Post. I was on the McNeil-Lehrer Show, and NBC Today when I went back.

Another objective was to keep in touch with the American scene, move the bureaucracy along on issues, also plan upcoming trips. I'd be back before Shultz coming over, or the Secretary of Defense, and try to strategize the trip, and to keep in touch with America and what was going on. Also I went back several times to accompany high level Chinese visitors. I already had lots of cabinet and other people coming to China and eventually President Bush toward the end of my stay. In turn, we had high level Chinese visitors going to the U.S. I accompanied them to not only Washington and New York but to other places around the country. Several high level Chinese included a couple of Vice Premiers, Foreign Minister Wu (February 1988), and soon to be president Yang Shangkung (May 1987). We went to various places like Minneapolis, New Orleans, North Carolina, Texas, and California, not to mention New York and Washington. This was very useful. It was fun to see America through other eyes, traveling with the Chinese. What they saw had to impress them with our strengths. It gave me a chance to have access continually with these high level leaders and establish relations with them and try to influence them, to try to make some points and get American perspectives and interests advanced in our discussions with them. It was useful to go back there and advance the relationship in these ways. On one of these trips, sadly, in May 1986, my father passed away in Florida. I had skipped a meeting with Secretary Shultz, with his blessing, to see him a last time a few days earlier.

Q (Bernkopf Tucker): Can I interrupt for just a second because it follows from what you were saying. Were you able during this period to form personal relationships with the Chinese leadership. How approachable were they? Did you only see them in these formal occasions?

LORD: I will go over some of the Chinese leaders and my impressions. First a couple of other points.

I have said that my three and a half years were the best ever since the 1971-2 opening in terms of bilateral relations, and that's true. But, of course, we had problems all the time in this mixed relationship. Probably the rockiest time was the last three months or so of 1987. We hit the Chinese hard on their giving Silkworm missiles to the Saudis and on Tibet. They hit us on Tibet and a Congressional Record resolution and canceled some exchanges. In my usual year end personal review cable I set forth a strategy, including visits and exchanges, for improving the situation. I also planned to step up my own travels around China. In early 1988 the situation improved.

One thing I put great stress on was personal cables, not overdoing it, but setting out in writing every few months my own impressions of what was going on in China as well as key issues and how to advance them. So I would do this and make sure it got to the Secretary and National Security Advisor and others. I took great interest in doing this personally as well as working carefully on the usual Embassy scene setters. I did this personally to prepare visitors on key trips as well, either editing drafts of my staff or doing them personally. So I spent a lot of work on some of these personal notes. You did it selectively so you wouldn't wear out your welcome. I got some very good feedback on that.

We took very seriously visitors from Washington whether executive branch or congressional or actors like Gregory Peck and Charlton Heston or Billy Graham or top level business people. It didn't matter who it was, we went out of our way to give them as good briefings as we could. Particularly when American government leaders came we would give them specific scene-setters. This was standard in our Embassy. I put great stress on it both to help them do a better job when they got to China but also frankly to burnish the reputation of the Embassy. I think, without being self serving, we got a very good reputation with our briefings once they got there as well as our scene setters in advance. We took very seriously briefing these visitors in advance as they set out to do their business and frankly both in writing and verbally we did very thoughtful briefings.

Finally as Ambassador I was concerned about staff morale. I did believe in working people hard and pursuing excellence as the main goal, but we had a variety of ways to engage the staff and help morale. We had monthly staff meetings at the house where spouses would be invited. Very small lunches with junior or mid level officers that you don't see in the normal course of events. Tremendous engagement with Marines even to the point of playing basketball every Saturday and softball every Sunday. We had our Marines picked as the best unit in Asia a couple of times running out of all detachments out there. I would make an effort to write personal notes to the staff on cables to show I was keeping on top of what they were doing. I made sure that my secretary or staff would keep me posted on any personal developments so that I could weigh in whether it was a birth or death in the family or whatever. We took that quite seriously as well. Now, these are some of the objectives I had as Ambassador.

Related to this was my attention to our four consulates - Shanghai, Guangdong, Shenyang, and Chengdu. I visited all of them several times. I, of course, would meet with the American and Chinese staffs and have personnel accompany me in meetings and travels. I sought their views and paid attention to morale, just as I did of the embassy. I worked hard, together with my deputy and others, to improve the poor working conditions, housing, the security, the schooling, etc - both at the consulates and in Beijing. We pressed the Chinese hard on this and travel restrictions and I/we spent much time on these and property issues and made some progress. I also met frequently and Bette and I socialized with our Chinese employees in Beijing and elsewhere. Their morale was important to us.

Another thing I should mention is human rights. Human rights has been a thorn in our side ever since we opened up with China. It has become more acute, most people agree, since Tiananmen Square and the images we had of that massacre. Even in those days though, it was one of the big problems in our relationship. I felt then, as I do now, that this is an important issue in and of itself and in terms of building American and Congressional support for the relationship. But I also felt there were many other interests in China and no one issue can hold the whole relationship hostage. That has always been my view. I raised human rights lots of times. We took it seriously, we raised it, and we pressed it, whether it was freedom of expression or Tibet. But, it was not as high profile an issue as it has been in the 1990s. It did get quite high profile in Tibet where there was tough repression of demonstrations. It was a problem, but it was not the dominant issue. I will get back to this later because I want to give a real vignette about the experience Bette and I had on democracy at Beijing University. While we were there human rights was a continuing problem, but it didn't dominate the relationship. It wasn't as high profile as it is today since Tiananmen Square.

One problem, it's not strictly human rights, but having to do with journalists an issue that came up on several occasions. For example, I was at Chengdu with my wife and son. We were about to launch on a brief summer vacation traveling through Kunming and Guilin. My first day there I got word that John Burns who was a New York Times correspondent although he was a Canadian citizen actually, had been detained by the Chinese because he had traveled in areas that he didn't have permission to travel in. My instinct told me this was a possible bombshell since he was a New York Times reporter although he was not an American citizen. I immediately dropped my vacation and raced back to Beijing and worked very hard with the Chinese. We were visited by Abe Rosenthal and another man from the New York Times editorial board on this issue. It was very tense because there was some concern they might actually charge Burns with trespassing or violating security. In the Chinese so called justice system, once you are charged, you are guilty. So, if he would have been charged, he probably would have been jailed. He was being detained. We worked extremely hard, much harder than the Canadians did.

Q: I was going to ask about the Canadians.

LORD: Well, we tried cooperating on this but they were nowhere near as concerned about their own citizen as we were. We got a lot of credit with Rosenthal and others for the efforts we made. I pulled out all the stops and we finally got Burns expelled and not detained. In the process, of course, we lost a tremendous observer of the Chinese scene. Ironically he was writing an article for the Times that was positive about Deng's reforms in the countryside. But, in so doing, he was deliberately going to off limit areas without getting permission. He was on a motorcycle accompanied by a young man named Ed McNally, a very bright lawyer from Yale who helped me with some July 4 speeches.

Q: What arguments were you using with the Chinese authorities?

LORD: The main argument was of course the impact on our relations. You take the premier American newspaper, you jail that reporter, it is going to have a devastating impact. Secondly, he clearly wasn't spying. I don't recall how we fuzzed up how much he knew about restrictions, but he could not have been not spying. His motive was journalism. I made the point that he was telling, he was in fact about to write a positive story about what was going on, and he just wanted to see as much of China as he could, the innocence of what he was doing. He limited his self confession; he violated certain restrictions, but this was for journalistic reasons, not spying reasons. So, we worked very hard and successfully on that.

There was another American with the AP who was kicked out a few months later from Guandong. The journalists generally were always frustrated by the surveillance they had in China. The longer they stay there, the more cynical they get about the Chinese and human rights in general. In fact, they were nervous about making contact with students or dissidents or intellectuals because they might get them in trouble. Their phones and probably apartments were bugged, and they always had to get permission to travel places. There were a lot of frustrations there. It was a tough place to do business even though it was fascinating in terms of substance. There were several meetings where I met with them both Americans and correspondents in general, and they were pressing for even stronger U.S. actions including retaliating by kicking out Chinese reporters from the U.S. and so on. I think they felt I lobbied as hard as I could with the Chinese on restrictions of the press and specifically on these cases. This was a source of tension. I just mention this in the general area of human rights although it was not exactly the same thing as Tibet or dissidents. I'll do Tibet a little more later.

In addition, I spent a lot of time with resident, as well as American, journalists, mostly on background to explain our policies and impressions of China. Every few weeks my key officers and I would meet with the resident journalists to brief them and answer their questions.

Among the vivid memories Bette and I have of our China tenure. The first American ship visits to China since 1949 - October 1986 in Qingdao. Going to a Chinese Catholic church on Christmas Eve, 1986 I believe - it was totally packed. I introduced the Superbowl on Chinese television on March 9, 1986 - sadly a lopsided, dull victory for the Bears over the Patriots. Honor guards for high level American military visitors. Countless banquets in the Great Hall of the People and the Guest House. Travels all around the country. Parties at the residence with Chinese friends. Bette and I won a diplomatic tennis tournament and my son, Win, and I got to the finals of men's doubles. I also won a men's doubles diplomatic tournament. The prize was a week's vacation in Yugoslavia which I never took.

XIX. AMBASSADOR TO CHINA - CHINESE LEADERS, POLITICAL ISSUES (1985-1989)

Q: You were going to talk about your impression of the Chinese leadership both individuals and its collective ability, how you appraised it at that time, because its collective ability was tested just after you left.

LORD: I had really very good access to Chinese leaders in the sense that we had so many visits and high level visitors during my period, and they would always see most of the top Chinese leaders. It is the Chinese style when they host people of cabinet level or above that the American visitor should not only see the Foreign Minister and his/her cabinet counterpart, but also Vice Premiers, the Premier himself, the Party Secretary or the President or some combination. I had a lot of impressions from those meetings and I had meetings of my own. We had other high level visitors like Kissinger coming back, old friends, e.g. Jimmy Carter, who would also have meetings with these people.

As for Deng Xiaoping I don't remember how many times we saw him but of course he was less frequent. Even then he wasn't as accessible as some of the others. I must have met him a dozen times at least, probably more, while I was there. I had seen him on many other occasions before I was ambassador. I saw Zhao Ziyang frequently. He was premier and then Party Secretary while I was there. He took over the latter job from Hu Yaobang, who was kicked out in early '87. I probably saw Li Peng as much as any. He was the Premier from '87 onwards. He would see American corporate executives who were visiting as well as American leaders, so I saw a great deal of him. Jiang Zemin I saw as mayor of Shanghai. He didn't have an important role in Beijing by the time I left so I don't recall seeing that much of him after the Shanghai tenure of the first couple of years that I was there. I saw quite a bit of Yang Shangkun, who became the President of China. Also Zhu Rongji, who was the mayor of Shanghai the last couple of years I was there, so I only saw him in the Shanghai context. I also met Hu Yaobang on a couple of occasions, once with Brzezinski. And, of course, I saw the Foreign Minister and other Cabinet officials countless times, also governors and mayors in the provinces, many of them future leaders in Beijing.

The interesting thing is that we are now talking about 10-15 years that have passed and many of these players remain central. Jiang Zemin is President and Party Secretary of the country. Zhu Rongji is Prime Minister and Li Peng still has an important role as NPC Chairman and just left as Prime Minister. Zhao Ziyang is under house arrest. Yang Shangkun has essentially departed from the scene. Now some impressions. You have got to remember that working since the Kissinger-Nixon years I was used to Mao Zedong and Zhou En-lai and they were tough acts to follow. I said in an earlier transcript Deng Xiaoping was not that impressive in our first encounters in 1974-'76, but was certainly more impressive by the time we had breakfast with him, Kissinger and myself, in 1979 when he visited the United States. We saw him together when we visited China a few months later. By then he clearly was an impressive human being.

There were some constant themes in the meetings with him. He was pretty consistent. First, very self confident and lively. Not as stiff as many Chinese leaders. His general habits are well known. He would smoke a great deal and occasionally use a spittoon. He was very short, you know his feet hardly reached the floor, but he was a commanding presence. He always wanted to talk about big issues, geopolitical as well as the bilateral relationship. He would never get down into details. He felt that was not consistent with his position. He had given up all his titles. Even then he was grooming his successors. He was clearly in charge, number one, but on a day to day basis and on greeting people he wasn't that involved. He was already phasing down some of his active involvement. He was Chairman of the Board, strategist. He would give the general lines of policy and leave the details to his subordinates, the Party Secretary, the Premier, etc. Generally during most of the visits where you had a visiting cabinet official like the Secretary of State or Defense or from economic agencies, he would come toward the end and would usually be the good cop. If there were mixed messages to be sent in the course of a visit, some of the tougher ones would be sent by the Premier or the Foreign Minister, whereas Deng generally would emphasize the positive. He seldom gave us unpleasant news; it was usually a very cordial meeting. His strategic discourses depended on the skill of his interlocutor. With somebody like Kissinger of course, they would clearly be on a geopolitical plane. People usually felt good about him and his relationship because he was usually playing a positive role in his meetings. I'm sure he orchestrated the meetings so if there were some tough messages to get across, he would have made sure it would have been done by then by subordinates, and it would be done. It wasn't his role.

He was very much dedicated to U.S.-Chinese relations. He had a lot to do with improving them and clearly wanted to keep that moving ahead despite tensions. He wanted to emphasize that in our meetings, and he always did. He wanted to look ahead as well as backwards, and he always used a historical and strategic context. In almost every meeting there were cracks by him against the Russians and usually against the Japanese as well. I remember my final meeting with him was with President Bush in February, 1989. He talked about Russian and Japanese history and what they had done to China. Clearly he was making a point that whatever China's near term improvement in ties with those countries, as he looked ahead, they were still strategic concerns for China, and therefore major reasons for maintaining good relations with the U.S. So, on geopolitics, he was very skillful and interested in that. He always thought in a strategic and long term context, and he was very strong on the U.S.-Chinese bilateral relationship but wouldn't get into detail. He would talk a good deal about Chinese economic reforms and opening up to the outside world. His formulations on human rights would be minimal, but emphasizing as all Chinese leaders did, the need for stability which was a code word for them for political control or even repression, as they opened up generally to the outside world and they moved ahead with economic reforms. It was the traditional Chinese communist excuse that they need more control to maintain stability in this vast country and the challenges they faced.

As for my own record on him, I actually wrote a pretty good piece when he died; I got it done too late to get it published. I think there will be a mixed historical verdict on him. I have a mixed verdict on him. The good news is, of course, and none of this is overly revolutionary, he was the architect of the opening after the Cultural Revolution, opening China to the world and what all that means, including economic reforms and moving them into a freer economic society. Secondly he was crucial in improving U.S.-Chinese relations, from normalization all the way up. Even when there were tensions, he kept emphasizing the positive. He has helped the material lot of many Chinese citizens. For all this he deserves considerable credit. He was a tough customer who rebounded several times from tough experiences and came back from the Cultural Revolution, and other setbacks. These are positive items and he deserves credit there.

There are clear black marks as well. He was always conservative on the political level, even though at times even when we were there, things were loosening up somewhat. His general pattern was one of firm control on politics. After all he sacked Hu Yaobang, the party Secretary General in early 1987, partly because he felt that Hu was too liberal on political reforms, too liberal on issues like Tibet. Maybe also he didn't like Hu's freewheeling, self-confident style. There was also the element of feeding him to the conservatives who were upset about the student demonstrations in Shanghai in December-January of 1986-87. So, Deng fed Hu Yaobang to the wolves as a result of that unrest to maintain a collective balance to his leadership. He also did it out of concern for Hu Yaobang's liberal instincts on politics and his freewheeling style. After all, Deng Xiaoping had been the henchman for Mao in the anti-rightist campaign way back in the late '50s. With all his positive aspects on economic reform and opening to the world and U.S.-Chinese relations, you get a consistent trend of political conservatism and repression. He not only dumped Hu but also his successor as Party Chairman, Zhao Ziyang, in 1989 because the latter was too friendly toward the demonstrators at Tiananmen Square. Li Peng was the heavy during the 1989 massacre because he declared martial law; he was out in front. The fact is it was clearly a Deng Xiaoping decision to attack, fully unwarranted in my view. We will come back to that. And he sacked Zhao Ziyang in the process, so that is two political reform-type party secretaries that he dropped.

Peng will be remembered for the Tiananmen Square massacre and general political repression as well as for the positive things and will come out with a mixed verdict.

Hu Yaobang and I met only a couple of times, and the portrait of him that is in my wife's book Legacies, however brief, is very vivid of him. He was unpredictable. He was somebody who really was spontaneous and he wasn't scripted. A very active and physically small person. I think he was the only one who was smaller than Deng Xiaoping. Clearly, although we probably elevated this in retrospect, he was for a looser political system. I have talked to many Tibetans who felt he was very enlightened on Tibet and indeed he was trying to loosen up the repression in Tibet. There is documentation for that. Clearly he felt the need for political reform as well as economic reform. He was pushing the envelope. The reason he was sacked by Deng on January 16, 1987 was the feeling among the conservatives that he was encouraging these trends.

Zhao Ziyang now looks very good to reformers and those of us who want to see a better political system in China, and he was in the Tiananmen Square episode arguing for restraint, not using the Army, meeting the students halfway. He was sacked for this. He has kept up on occasion from his house arrest his drumbeat for the need for political reform. He has come out dramatically twice in the last six months on the eve of summits with letters to the leadership calling for a reversal on the official verdict on Tiananmen Square. When I was there he was trying to separate the party from the government, trying to loosen up the political system, not dramatically, but pushing the envelope. So, you would have to put him on that side of the spectrum along with Hu Yaobang. Zhao was very intelligent, very smooth, very impressive in his meetings, generally on the friendly side in dealing with Americans, private citizens or official visitors. He gave a sense of great confidence. He was a good example of the new kind of leadership in China where they earn their leadership credentials as technocrats, economic experts, pragmatists. They get things done, particularly in the economic area. He was proven in the provinces because he had been governor of Guangdong and Sichuan. He was impressive in many ways.

Li Peng is everyone's scapegoat. Li Peng deserves a negative verdict from Americans. There has been enough proof in his demeanor, the way he has acted in meetings, from intelligence reports, and from reports from other Chinese, that he is generally more suspicious of the U.S., more conservative on economic reforms, certainly very tight on political issues. He not only declared martial law but believed in putting down the students and others in Tiananmen Square. Generally he has caused us trouble on issues. Therefore, he has not been a positive force in U.S.-China relations. On the other hand, he is enough of a pragmatist to recognize that China needs the U.S., particularly for technology, trade, investment etc. He is an engineer by background and clearly sees the need for the relationship for those reasons. Nevertheless, with his Soviet background and his general suspicion of the U.S., particularly our human rights policy subverting their political system generally, he has been a restraint on U.S.-Chinese relations. Probably tougher on Taiwan and some other issues and conservative on economic reform, certainly very conservative on political issues.

Q: What was his position while you were there, and what is his position now?

LORD: I guess he was Vice Premier when I was first there and became Premier. I don't have the timing on this. He was Vice Premier when Hu Yaobang was sacked in early '87. Zhao Ziyang had been Prime Minister until then. Zhao moved up to be Party Secretary and then Li Peng was appointed Prime Minister. He was Prime Minister about the last year and a half while I was there.

Q (Bernkopf Tucker): I think maybe, I'm not sure, but when you first got there, he may have still been with the state education commission.

LORD: He might have had a cabinet level position on the economic side. He was an engineer, there is nothing wrong with engineers, but he was not one for conceptual discussion, geopolitical discussion. He would sort of take practical stands on issues. He would sometimes lecture us on human rights or Tibet or Taiwan or perhaps our building up of Japan as dangerous. These kinds of negative things would come in. Generally he was the bad cop and Deng and (recently) Jiang Zemin were good cops. It doesn't mean Li was totally hostile and there were some meetings where he was friendlier than others. But generally visiting business people, or high level people from previous U.S. governments or cabinet level officials from the current government, most of them came away not enamored of Li Peng, either his personality or the substance of his thoughts. He could be quite rough. This continued during the Clinton years when we had dealings with him.

One example of his rather limited approach. I was initially impressed that he arranged to have Lee Iacocca (the chairman of Chrysler Corporation), who then was a big hero bringing Chrysler back, to a small dinner at a restaurant. In terms of protocol he didn't have to do this. It was the kind of guy he would see in the Great Hall. But he invited him to have a small dinner, just Lee Iacocca, myself, and a couple of the Chinese. I thought, maybe I have misjudged this man. He knows enough to look at a person like Iacocca who has got all this experience particularly in a market economy, and bringing a failing company back, and to see how it could apply to China. Almost the entire evening, however, was devoted to Li Peng's talking about Chinese advancement and in particular the transportation area, citing the number of kilometers of roads that were being built and the number of automobiles they would have one day and other items like that. He just wasted the evening. He didn't draw Iacocca out on anything of significance. So, this sort of demonstrated Li's limits. Now, having said that, the man obviously had more staying power than I gave him credit for. After his martial law and direct negative involvement in Tiananmen Square in 1989, I didn't think he would last very long. But he served as Prime Minister until the Constitution made him retire just a year or two ago. He clearly is head of the conservative camp and with Jiang Zemin's and Deng's general approach to a more collective leadership and the need for balance plus his own bureaucratic alliances he maintained his position, much to my surprise.

Yang Shangkong became President of China. We first of took notice of him when he came to the United States. We had visitors going back and forth. We would have the Secretary of State or Defense or others come, but we also moved to get Chinese to go to the U.S. I mentioned earlier the four trips that I went on, one of which was with Yang. At some point, we wondered who would be the next visitor. We weren't at summit levels at that point, at least visiting the U.S. We were running out of Vice Premiers, and the Chinese suggested Yang who was a military man. In fact, he had been Mao's Chief of Staff, been on the Long March, across the grasslands three times. His wife of almost 60 years had just died a couple of years beforehand. She had been on the Long March with him. I think he was Vice Chairman of the Military Commission at the time; he wasn't President yet. When he was suggested as the next visitor by the Chinese, we didn't oppose it, but we were puzzled. They went out of their way, the Chinese and the Foreign Ministry and their Ambassador back here, to explain how important this guy was and to be sure he had a good trip. We didn't quite know why, but it turned out he was very close to Deng, going back to the Long March. He was to become President. He was a major political figure and remained that for several years.

I got along with Yang extremely well when I accompanied him back in the United States in May 1987. He asked me for advice on the various audiences he would deal with, whether it was meeting with the President or a business group or the press. I would ride around in cars with him as well as be with him between meetings. After meetings, he would ask me afterwards how he did on questions and answers. Very appreciative of my advice, had a good sense of humor, spoke movingly about the Long March. We could never quite figure out where he came out on some of the issues. He clearly backed Deng Xiaoping and the reforms and the opening, but to this day it is not clear what his position is on political reform. It is probably fairly conservative. People aren't quite sure where he came out on Tiananmen Square; certainly he didn't oppose the use of force, but there is some feeling that he wasn't in the forefront on that like say Li Peng.

Jiang Zemin is obviously the most important today as we speak. He was not that important when I was there and as I say as mayor of Shanghai was much less impressive than his successor, Zhu Rongji, who is now Prime Minister. He did not strike us then as a man of tremendous gravitas. He was friendly, he was jolly, and he would like to show off his English and his affinity for some Western culture and classics, but didn't seem entirely serious. I would not have picked him as the future leader of China. But he has lasted, and he has been on a roll for the last couple of years - his visit to the U.S., Clinton's visit to China, the 15th Party Congress solidifying his position, has been in power now for many years, first de facto then de jure, and the return of Hong Kong. He has done quite well and is clever enough to have someone like Zhu Rongji out there doing the hard economic reforms. If they work, Jiang basks in success. If they fail, he has a scapegoat. He has balanced off the conservatives and the moderates. He has been quite impressive, but none of this I would have predicted.

Q (Bernkopf Tucker): Doesn't he get launched in part because of how well he handled Shanghai during the Tiananmen period in '89? Also maybe you could comment on the importance of Shanghai for producing political leaders.

LORD: That is a good point. When Zhu took his place as mayor of Shanghai, Jiang moved up to be Party Secretary and was in charge during the Tiananmen Square demonstrations. There was a bloody outcome in Beijing. There were very large demonstrations in Shanghai, but no blood was shed there and Jiang and his cohorts did handle this skillfully. I don't recall offhand whether Zhu was involved in this skillful handling or not, but Jiang certainly gets the credit for having defused very tense and large demonstrations in Shanghai without the kind of bloody put-down that you had in Beijing. That did capture people's attention. It also protects him somewhat about a reversal of the verdict on Tiananmen Square. Although it may not happen anytime soon, it will happen in my view. I think that did help move him.

Clearly Shanghai has been a source of Chinese dynamism and leadership for good or for ill for many decades. That is where the Cultural Revolution started. You have, of course, Jiang from Shanghai, the number one guy. Now the number two guy Zhu from Shanghai. The Foreign Ministry for decades, not so much now, but certainly when I was there during the '80s was dominated by key people from Shanghai, at least the American handlers. In any event, this has been a source of Chinese leadership. It's got a history, of course, of being China's most dynamic and forward looking city. It also produced some of the Gang of Four and has a history of radical currents.

Q: I wonder if you could talk about how, again we are talking about the '85-'89 period when you were Ambassador. You and the Embassy were looking at how all these people fit together. In other words a little bit like criminology. How were decisions reached? How effective was the government at that time?

LORD: Well, on the whole we thought the government was pretty effective in the sense they were moving ahead on economic reform. Most of the time you had the feeling that the envelope was also being pushed somewhat on political and cultural issues, but there was certainly tremendous control still. There was more a sense of the ability to publish more and somewhat freer cultural activity particularly outside of Beijing. Some lively journals like the World Economic Herald in Shanghai which was subsequently shut down. Some of the things Bette was able to do in our cultural exchanges. People pushing the envelope like Liu Binyan, the reformist reporter, in covering corruption. You even had in some of the universities including Beijing University some beginning to speak up for political reform. On the whole we felt that things were moving in a generally positive direction but there were swings back and forth - e.g. the sacking of Hu Yaobang by Deng in 1987. We were still very concerned, particularly about Tibet and the continuing holding of dissidents and repression. With respect to the leadership, of course, we were rooting for those like Hu Yaobang and Zhao Ziyang, who thought it was in China's own self interest as well as to improve our relationship to be more moderate on the political front than, say, Li Peng. We knew that Deng was rather ambivalent and would go back and forth, but on the whole, conservative. As we were there, there were attacks on spiritual pollution, on bourgeois liberalization even as the envelope was being pushed.

On the whole we thought the government operated quite effectively. Deng, I have already given my impressions of. He obviously was very able, although we were unhappy with some of his political and cultural instincts. We could see even then that he was trying to groom people to come after him which in a communist society is a useful innovation. He was clearly number one even as we left, but even then, by the late '80s, he was beginning to delegate responsibility in meeting with foreigners and day to day decisions of operating the government, all of which we thought were useful. Now clearly we saw trouble signs twice while we were there and just after, where his successors, Hu and Zhao, were dumped by him even as Mao dumped his heirs or successors. Deng was falling into a pattern of dumping his. He got rid of two, both of whom were more liberal in a political sense than he was. There was room for some concern as well when these campaigns that would take place like the Four Cardinal Principals, stressing socialist ideals as well as anti-spiritual pollution and anti-bourgeois liberalization. On the economic front we felt they were making progress, and we thought the leadership was generally quite effective. They were beginning to promote people now based on merit and economic performance rather than revolutionary credentials or military exploits, probably because they had gotten to the point where most of the Long Marchers had passed from the scene or were too old anyway.

Also I was impressed with some of the younger leaders coming along. I made a big effort to travel throughout China, usually with my wife. It was fun and interesting and she could give insights that I couldn't do by myself, and she was a great ambassador. I traveled widely, partly to show the flag, sometimes to advance our economic interests, partly because it was fun, partly to report back to Washington about what was happening around the country, and partly to meet upcoming leaders. I could see that the mayors and the governors were going to be the future leaders of China. Whether it was the mayor of Tianjin (Li Ruihan) or vice governors elsewhere. I remember Sichuan in particular and Guangzhou and Zhu Rongji in Shanghai. I was impressed with the pragmatism, the desire for good relations with us, certainly the economic reforms, that I found in these people. You couldn't tell so much on the political side. On the whole I felt there was a pretty competent group. That was true of the Foreign Ministry, e.g. Qian Qichen (the Foreign Minister) and Zhu Qizhen (the Vice Foreign Minister). Now in decision making, it was clear that Deng was calling the shots on the important issues, U.S.-Chinese relations, U.S.-China-Russia relations, relations with Japan, basic economic reform decisions, Taiwan. These were determined by Deng pretty much on his own. Day to day operations, details, and secondary issues including running the economy on a detailed basis, he would delegate.

Q (Bernkopf Tucker): Did you have any sense, from the outside it may be impossible to say, was some of this independent decision making on Deng's part a result of negotiation with Li Peng or others who might have been more hard-line or liberal, or was he really just making up his own mind?

LORD: The honest answer is you can't be sure, because to get back to one of your earlier questions, it was still a fairly opaque society and system even then, though much less than it had been in the '70s. We had much more contacts, more travel, and more reporting. Despite all that, an area that we were not strong in despite all our best efforts was decisionmaking. Certainly our impression was that Deng had an absolute veto. There was no important policy that could be promoted if he opposed it. That's a given. The basic lines, clearly, were supported by his subordinates. It wasn't as if he were enforcing it. Most people wanted to have better relations with the U.S. These people were convinced, although some were more cautious like Li Peng and others, of the need for opening and reform on the economic front. There would be debates on the political side on issues like political reform and Tibet. I think Deng was clearly first among equals, much more in charge than Jiang Zemin today, not having to check so much as Jiang would have to check, although he has solidified his position. Deng, however, was much less a one man show than Mao Zedong. He was somewhere in between, but clearly a dominant figure at that point. He knew enough to know that he wanted to keep both conservatives and moderates happy. He would basically vote by conviction, not just power balance. But he would not veer too much in either direction and was particularly back and forth on political liberalization. Just when we were there, there were two or three periods when politics was getting looser and then it got tighter again. That is clearly where the internal debates were taking place, most vividly demonstrated when Deng had to sack Hu Yaobang to appease the conservatives. So, he didn't want that to get too out of kilter with others, but he clearly was in charge on all the key issues. At heart, throughout his career - and shown again during the June 1989 Tiananmen massacre for which he was responsible - he was very conservative politically.

Q: While you were making these trips out in the country and all and also in Beijing with our officers also out and about, what was your impression of revolutionary Marxist fervor? The cultural revolution wasn't that far away. It had gone completely sour, but the point being that you had almost a billion people running around as revolutionary as you can get.

LORD: Well, first, on my previous 11 trips to China before I was Ambassador plus my time in that post, by the time I left, I had been to 24 or 25 provinces out of the 30 or 31 depending on how you count Taiwan or Hainan. I was missing Anhui and Ningxia and Guizhou and Hainan for example. I really got around quite a bit for all the reasons I mentioned. Second to answer your question, there was none of the Marxist fervor. Still a lot of people didn't want to talk about, and there was a lot of bitterness about, the Cultural Revolution. Also people whether officials or non-officials were cautious in their conversations. The same is true today. People can speak somewhat more freely when they are alone with you. They can't get up and make speeches that are unsettling to the Party, and they can't organize opposition or distinct parties. In the late '80s, some students and intellectuals might loosen up a little on political issues. Nobody was trying to spout Marxism or revolutionary fervor, to answer your question. They would talk with some bitterness about past excesses, but nobody was going to be criticizing the government or promoting political freedom. The clear exception, with Bette's help, was the circles we had a lot of contact with, students and others in the cultural, academic, and artistic communities, where there was a call for greater political and cultural reform. Even there they would be somewhat cautious. We had a lot of these people to our house. And embassy officials would talk to reformers. Bette went often to people's houses including Liu Binyang and Fang Lizhi. She worked hard on the official front as well. But she stayed in touch with these people to be on the cutting edge. This probably excited some concerns by members of the Politburo. But overall Marxist ideology was pretty dead. Even then people were focusing pretty much on economics and what worked.

Q: How about the kids in school or in college. Did they have to take compulsory Marxism, the works of Mao Zedong and that sort of thing?

LORD: I think we are talking about a trend here. They were pretty much getting away from that; they were getting more pragmatic. But surely there were still ideological parts in their curricula.

Q (Bernkopf Tucker): I remember in the summer of 1987 at one of these informal lunches that you talked about earlier that you would have with them and the staff, that I was there and...

LORD: You served six months as an intern.

Q (Bernkopf Tucker): Yes, and we talked about what was happening in China ideologically and the sense that communism was no longer a very useful tool to rally support for the government, but in those days nationalism still had not risen. If you were analyzing what was happening in China and trying to explain to the State Department and the White House where the Chinese people were, where were you putting your emphasis? What were you telling the United States about the Chinese people ideologically?

LORD: Well, we were somewhat humble and not generalizing, clearly. Obviously we felt that people would be more concerned about these political issues if they were urban dwellers than in the countryside. There was no longer any faith, as you say, in Marxism ideology as an approach and a lot of cynicism given that the wind had shifted so many times in China about what is ideologically correct, leaders going up and down, all of that behind them. Nationalism, although anti-Japanese feeling was clear even then, on the whole didn't rise as naturally as it has today when they have grown so much stronger in power. The authorities increasingly substitute that for the loss of ideology. We reported that the people, certainly in the artistic, intellectual and academic communities, had a real desire for more political reform and a feeling they needed that for economic development as well as to meet the aspirations of the people. So in those circles, we would report considerable ferment and a pushing of the envelope, but without exaggerating their power yet. Frankly, we did not predict Tiananmen Square. I don't think anybody did in terms of the massive demonstrations that did take place not only in Beijing but in over 200 cities. Now those weren't only for democracy, they were against corruption, they were against inflation and for education needs and so on. Basically even then I think we felt the people's basic preoccupation was having a better economic existence, a better life and getting away from the horrors in the past. At least they were close enough to the Cultural Revolution to reach some happiness, some contentment that they at least weren't suffering as badly as they did in the Cultural Revolution. It was early enough in the economic lifting in their lives that they were perhaps not quite as concerned about political issues with the exception of the circles I mentioned. I think we were basically saying there were tensions rising on the political front and some of the elements that were most important and most influential were pushing the envelope. But the broad contacts, encouraged by Bette, made this clear. We didn't realize it was quite as fermenting as Tiananmen Square proved.

Q: Again, looking at China with a cold eye and trying to look at the future particularly in light of what happened within a few years to the Soviet empire where the nationalities thing split it up, were you looking at nationalities within China? I mean sort of 20 years 50 years down the thing will China hold together or not?

LORD: Well, my basic view I'm sure then, I know it is now, was on the whole I felt China would hold together. That was our basic view in the embassy. Tibet was the most serious issue, and that flared up a couple of times while we were there, with some riots and killings. I was the first Ambassador to visit Tibet, very concerned about it. It was a hot issue through much of my stay there. Xinjiang didn't seem to have much unrest then. It was hard to get to know, and we tried to get reporters out there. In the southern areas where there were minorities or Inner Mongolia, there also didn't seem to be much unrest. In the long historical sweep, we knew about Chinese history and warlords against the emperor, going back and forth between tight central control and splitting up the country. We knew there were those dangers. We also knew already and we reported on it, the tensions between the provinces and Beijing about taxes, about foreign exchange, about autonomy, about how much did they need permission from Beijing to approve joint ventures, what levels, so there was already tension on the economic front between central control and the provinces. We felt, however, this was in a safe framework of unity within the country. There was no real evidence or prospect that China was going to split apart.

For a variety of reasons I believed - before we knew about the Soviet Union breaking up - and I believe now in retrospect that China has advantages in holding together that the Soviets and Russians did not have. First of all, 93% of the Chinese are Han, whereas in the Soviet Union they were 50% Russian and 50% non-Russian. Secondly in the Soviet Union, certainly there was an empire; the Baltic States for example, parts of Central Asia, and some other places were clearly only recently or loosely part of the Soviet Union. Whereas, in China - again, Tibet is a more complicated example - on the whole the present territory of China most people would argue has been Chinese for a considerable period of time. So it is not so much an empire like the Soviet Union was in that sense. Thirdly the Chinese have always had a tremendous advantage in overseas investment, including Chinese, in helping their economy, and the Russians never had that. Fourthly, the Chinese are more self-confident based on 5,000 years of being number one, more a feeling they will be number one again than the Russians, who are less secure. Finally, there is a good deal of Chinese nationalism.

So for all these reasons at the time I felt, and I still feel, that chances are China will be able to hold together. Furthermore, those who are taking power at the center are generally coming from the provinces or cities and therefore they have some of the perspectives of the outlying areas they could bring to Beijing and some empathy and sensitivity on how to handle this. Having said that, even as we were there, there were considerable tensions between Beijing and the provinces, economic autonomy and who gets the taxes and who gets the foreign exchange and who accrues investment. A good example was Shanghai where in those days it had to pay very heavy taxes to Beijing. Shanghai felt it was the most dynamic part of China; Beijing was reaping the benefits and they weren't. Indeed in recent years with the help of Shanghaiers like Jiang and Zhu there was a great shift and Shanghai has surged ahead as a result.

Q: Can we talk about Tibet?

LORD: First, more on political issues. As I said, on the whole, during the period I was Ambassador, China with fits and starts was moving to become somewhat more open politically and culturally as well as economically. There were obvious tensions and some periods of setbacks both within China and in our own political and cultural relations. For example, we got there in late '85, and up until late '86, on the whole they were moving in a somewhat more liberal direction in terms of artistic and political expression. I do not wish to exaggerate. But, in December, '86, actually while I was back on home leave, there were large scale demonstrations by students in Shanghai and considerable angst within the Politburo that these were not controlled faster and better. Partly as a result of that Hu Yaobang was ousted and indeed a period of some retrenchment on political and cultural freedoms set in. Not only was Hu kicked out as Party Secretary, many of his friends and intellectuals either were repressed or rounded up. There was a campaign against bourgeois liberalization, an emphasis on the four Cardinal Principles. Don't ask me to repeat what they were. Four of your socialist principles. The conservatives generally in this area were on a roll and the reformers were on the defensive. Now having said that, it wasn't a complete rollback.

Let me give you the reasons Deng dropped Hu. I have already mentioned it, but just to put it here again. He had an unpredictable style that might have annoyed Deng. Deng thought Hu was a little unpredictable and wasn't fulfilling his vision of what a future leader of China should look like and maybe shouldn't be a successor. More fundamentally, Hu's instincts on political reform and issues like Tibet were much more liberal than Deng's were, which were always instinctively cautious. Hu was clearly alienating some of the conservatives on some of these issues and Deng always had to maintain a balance even though he was clearly in charge. Therefore partly out of conviction that Hu was a little bit too liberal, partly because he thought that Hu had helped to cause this unrest in Shanghai, partly to maintain his balance in the Politburo and appease the conservatives, he dropped Hu. As I say, they went after some of his cohorts as well. I said that Zhao Ziyang was also, although not as dramatically, pushing the envelope on political reforms like Hu. Clearly he was also interested in greater political reform, but he was not only maintained as Premier for a while but also made Party Secretary. On the one hand, Deng removed those the conservatives disliked the most. But he didn't do a clean sweep and get rid of Zhao as well or put Li Peng more fully in charge. Zhao wore both hats for a while - he was acting Party Secretary until he became confirmed and then when he became that, at that point Li Peng, who was more conservative, took over as Premier.

Other incidents occurred at this time. As I said earlier, another American newsman from the Associated Press was kicked out. Some overseas Chinese student had come home for the holidays and was arrested. There was a Chinese journalist in Sichuan sentenced to seven years for counter revolutionary activity and so on. I remember sending in, in early February, a think piece to the Secretary on this whole issue. It was quite serious, and there was a considerable rollback taking place. I was more alarmist than my colleagues. They tried to water my cable down. I didn't let that happen. Other sackings at this time included Liu Binyan who was this very outspoken journalist who attacked corruption and has since become a major dissident living here in the United States. Some other Shanghai writers, some officials at the universities and the Chinese Academy of the Social Sciences, and the rather moderate propaganda head were all sacked. This clearly was a period of retrenchment. I remember feeling at the time that this was tarnishing Deng's reputation. He was once again showing that it is tough having an orderly succession when he was dumping his successor, killing all political reform, at least temporarily, maybe even having an impact on economic reform, hurting China's international reputation, creating considerable fear and anger among the intellectuals. It so happened it was about the 30th. anniversary of the anti-rightist campaign. All this at a time when Gorbachev was beginning to gain momentum and an international reputation, for reform including on the political and cultural side in Russia. Of course, this was the classic Chinese dilemma. The leaders wanted to have economic reform without political reform. They were ambivalent about foreign influence, needing outside help but worrying about spiritual pollution. How do they get western technology without western influence?

Q: Did you get hit with you say spiritual corruption, American movies, American films. I mean the things the French and other people rage about. Did this come up to you at all as far as our youth culture and the whole thing?

LORD: Never conceptually, but there were incidents - I mentioned this National Portrait exhibit. Somewhat later, more related to Bette personally, near the end of our tour, Bette's book finally got a good translation, Spring Moon, but when the Chinese edition came out on the news stands, I guess this was late 1988, you couldn't get it anywhere in the bookstores. She went to a book signing, but the only people who were there were the owners of the store, no readers. As soon as she left, the books were put away. That might have been her personally - her contacts with reformers - because there is nothing really revolutionary about Spring Moon. Certainly when you get into spiritual pollution campaigns, that has the overtones of American cultural influence and American political influence. This would ebb and flow during this period I'm talking about. Early 1987 was clearly an ebbing of any political and cultural freedom. We got a lot of feedback from our artistic, intellectual, and academic friends who were concerned. We had people in the Embassy keeping contact. I don't mean it was just Bette by any means, of course not. We had a lot of good people in the Embassy doing this as well. As I say some who were rounded up and released were intimidated. The foreign journalists reflected this as well. I told you the AP guy had been kicked out. The Burns episode before that. Forty-three of them signed a petition to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. Twenty of them came over to my residence, and they felt the U.S. Government hadn't been strong enough generally, I held a backgrounder with the press every month. I made a practice of keeping in touch with journalists generally when we got back to the U.S. meeting with editorial boards, etc. I thought that was useful in terms of our own interests and getting the word out on what we were trying to do there. This was generally a period of some malaise. Right after that, Secretary Shultz came in March and moved the U.S. relationship forward. We can get back to that at some other point.

The Tibet issue flared up a couple of times while we were in China. In the fall of 1987, I have already mentioned how in that year, particularly in the spring, there was a clampdown particularly on political and cultural expression. Whether or not related, things began to heat up in Tibet. The Dalai Lama went to the U.S. in the middle of September, 1987. On September 27, and the next few days there were considerable riots and demonstrations in Tibet. I gather from the few notes I have, there were about 20 deaths and hundreds injured. The Congress passed a resolution 98-0. Tom Brokaw had just been there for NBC and did a piece on China, including on my wife. It was basically positive, but he went to Tibet and said some nice things about the Dalai Lama. The Chinese weren't too happy about that. As I said the Congress sent letters to Zhao, several Congressmen or Senators did, and they passed a resolution 98-0. The media generally was saying we were a little bit too soft on this. We tried to monitor the situation and made representations about torture and repression and putting down the demonstrations in Tibet. We had a political officer that happened to have been there from Chengdu and we kept him there. We tried to get our political counselor in there. It was very difficult. They were making it hard for us to have access, but we smuggled out reports. Again journalists during this period generally had problems. You had to give Beijing 10 day notice to travel anywhere. I think it is fair to say this general period was difficult, with the Tibet problems and human rights more generally, our media and Congress getting more upset, and I believe the Iranian missiles, Silkworms, issue at this point. So when you put all this together, it was a difficult period.

Q (Bernkopf Tucker): On the Tibet stuff, you have the Dalai Lama in the U.S. and then you get demonstrations and riots in Tibet. Some specialists on Tibetan affairs, Americans, have suggested that one of the things that was happening was the Tibetans becoming more sophisticated on how to play to American public opinion. Was this a concern in the Embassy that there was an effort to circumvent the diplomatic corps and get to Congress directly.

LORD: No, I don't think we had that feeling. I think you are right. I think there was some synergy between the Dalai Lama's visit in the United States and the demonstrations taking place a few days later. Our reaction was not one of how dare the Tibetans express their views. We were really upset about the Chinese reaction. Now obviously, without suffering from clientitis, we didn't want the Tibet issue any more than any other one issue to wreck our whole relationship. I pushed the Chinese on it, but we would also try to keep the overall relationship going.

As I said, I went to Tibet, Bette and I went, the first American Ambassador to ever go there, and it may be the first foreign Ambassador of any country who went there on his own, not in connection with some high level visitor. We went from August 4, to August 10, 1988. By now, as I said, I had visited about 24 provinces out of 30. Obviously Tibet continued to be an issue and concern, and I thought one way to get at it was to show the flag by going to Tibet, both to convey our concerns to the officials running Tibet as well as back in Beijing. Show the American flag for whatever that might do for the morale of Tibetans and to show the Congressional and domestic audiences that we cared. The Ambassador went personally out there. This stirred a couple of Congressional visits. Among the issues I pushed for was access for our consular officers to visit there. It was covered by Chengdu, we don't have a consulate itself in Tibet. And I pushed for more media and journalists to get in there and outside groups in general, Congress and the press, even human rights groups. I had the most comprehensive talks up to then on Tibet that any American official ever had with the Chinese. I can't say I got very far. I pressed the human rights situation there generally, the suppression of Tibetan culture and people. They gave their familiar defense of how Tibet had been a feudal enclave there before and very badly in need, enduring slavery under the Dalai Lama, how much better off the Tibetans were now. On access I did make some progress. I did get more consular visits and some journalists in there. On prisoners all I got were some numbers, official numbers, and general assurances on treatment, but I could see no breakthroughs there. I wasn't able to visit a jail; they made some vague commitments maybe in the future. We did take a trip across the country to Xigatse. It was spectacular. We continued to treat this issue throughout our stay there.

Q: Did you have the feeling, it's almost I don't want to sound too cynical, but that served as a good rallying flag for particular conservatives who just detested our China policy and this gave them a cause, or did Tibet run deeply in your opinion in the American public?

LORD: Well, the province of Tibet is so remote it is hard to get coverage of it and know what is going on. There is the inherent problem of really knowing what is going on and conveying that to the American people generally. I do think people in Congress and other human rights groups were absolutely sincere in their concern for Tibet and the extinguishing of Tibetan culture, the treatment of nuns and monks and the roundup of prisoners and the put down of demonstrations. Clearly those who were suspicious of China for human rights generally would also highlight this issue for that reason, but it was born out of a genuine concern for what was a genuine problem. I would say it probably was a higher level profile in human rights than anything else we had then, even prisoners or anything else while we were there. It doesn't mean there weren't lots of prisoners.

I mentioned how generally while we were in China the political and cultural atmosphere was loosening up somewhat back and forth, and I mentioned how we had a tough period particularly in the early part of 1987 and even the latter part of it. As an Embassy, and personally, we raised human rights issues, not just Tibet, of course, but also all the other human rights issues, the need for political reform. But, it was not as high profile as it has been the last few years. Beyond that we tried to have an impact by having philosophic and relatively candid discussions with Chinese officials on the need for political reform and loosening up, including when they would come to our house for meals and round table discussions with American visitors. In addition, I personally and the Embassy generally, with my wife at the center of much of this, spent a lot of time with intellectuals, artists, academics, reformers etc. We wanted to do this partly to report to Washington what was going on in those areas and partly to push the envelope. We could do that culturally in some ways more than we could politically of course. Partly to establish ties with what we felt would be future Chinese leaders. A lot of these people were very bright - the best and the brightest and the younger, and we felt this was important for U.S. national interests as well as being inherently interesting.

Q: You know we spent a great deal of time dealing with the Soviet intelligentsia, and they turned out not to be very important I gather in what happened in Russia. They gave the impetus and then sort of faded out. When you think of the Chinese culture as being centered on scholarly work and all, did you feel these people would be an important power source?

LORD: Not only I thought they would be, they turned out to be in Tiananmen Square, in and around it. The jury is still out and the history is still being written about the future of China on this front. Even then many were important. I'm not just talking about dissidents although we were in touch with people like Fang Lizhi and Liu Binyan, my wife in particular. But, also people in think tanks, many of whom reported directly to Zhao or Hu with ideas on reforms, both economic and political. These are the kinds of people we had for discussions at the Embassy and so on. So, people already in positions of power although young, in their '30s and '40s, in terms of ideas and think pieces, and the debates going on in China on the need for more political reform. And the cultural side with enlightened people like the cultural Vice Minister Ying Ruochen, the famous Chinese actor, as well as Bette's dealings with the Chinese cultural community, the promoting of a famous opera singer, now in the United States, working with them on the Caine Mutiny Court Martial, putting on Chinese performances at the Embassy and the residence and so on. We felt these people were already important in the internal debates and would be important to future leaders of China.

Now, as part of this general effort, I would take stock, usually at the end of the year or the Spring Festival in February, of our goals and my goals, personal ones, for the coming year or six months, in addition to sitting down at the Embassy and doing strategy for the year and pursuing our interests and having game plans and so on. We would do this rigorously.

For the last couple of years I decided, and Bette agreed, that we would make a more concerted effort to continue what we were doing as I have said with the intellectuals and artists, but to get out more to Chinese universities and think tanks in Beijing, Shanghai and other cities more systematically. Even as we carried on all of our official contacts and everything else, we sought to have more interaction with the younger generation, the think tanks, to show the flag, to get their mood and to try to modestly encourage reform efforts.

So, over a period of just a few months, we each went individually to the National Defense University. It was very unusual for Bette to do that. In fact, I was the first Ambassador there, I believe, and she certainly was the first spouse of an Ambassador. We went out to Beijing University a couple of times with smaller groups. I'll get back to the key one later. We met with a law class and we went to a graduation party. We also went out there with high level visitors. Bette spoke at the People's University. We both spoke at the Foreign Affairs College. We both spoke at the International Business and Economic University. Some were joint appearances including questions and answers. I visited universities in Xiamen and Chengdu. I had a few others later on that either weather or political complications canceled. I visited many think tanks in Beijing, Shanghai and elsewhere. This was all in the period of a few months, so we made a concerted effort to get out there with these groups.

Now part of that, and this is where the story gets interesting, we were invited to come out to Beijing University, June 1, 1988 is when we actually went, to meet with the students outdoors on the lawn. I don't know if it was known then, but in retrospect, it was known as Democracy Salon. The students, among whose leaders included Wang Dan, the famous dissident that has gotten out of jail with U.S. efforts and was exiled to the United States, invited various people to come and speak to them about China and its future, including political reform and the concerns of young people in informal settings. Not for speeches but to sit on the grass and hold conversations. It turns out we were the fifth in a series. One of our predecessors had been Fang Lizhi. I have a story about him later. Bette and I agreed to go out there. Frankly, at the time, perhaps naively - we would have done it anyway - we didn't realize just how sensitive this was for the leadership, for whom we now know in retrospect this whole operation was very sensitive, the students having people like Fang and now the ambassador and his wife. We made no attempt to hide that we were going out. We couldn't anyway because we were bugged all the time and people were following us anyway. I even told - not for purposes of clearance, just courteously or casually or by chance - one of the Foreign Ministry types that by the way I'm going out to Beijing University. Certainly our driver knew it ahead of time and a lot of the local people. There was no question they knew we were going out there, and of course, no one ever complained, at least before the event.

So we went out there. It was the biggest audience they had ever had. It started at between 300-500 and kept growing while we were there. We arrived at 6:45 and we went on until it got dark at 9:30. A very agitated, excited, enthusiastic crowd. It was no speech, just questions. Many of the questions were personal. What is it like to have an inter-racial marriage in America.? How did you two meet? How does your marriage work? Things that were almost forward. We didn't mind that at all. We were happy to talk about it.

Some questions on foreign policy and U.S.-Chinese relations, but a considerable amount on the domestic situation. I was very struck, even though we had been tracking this and thought we knew what was going on, at the degree of unhappiness, impatience, frustration of the students. Tough questions about the need for political reform, even that the leadership wasn't doing a good job. I was really struck by the openness and the fervor of this group. I, of course, knew there would be security people in the crowd hearing every word. Partly for that reason, knowing I'd be heard, partly as Ambassador, you shouldn't be overly provocative, partly out of conviction because I thought on the economic and opening front, Deng Xiao-ping was doing positive things, and partly so the students wouldn't get in too much trouble, I was very careful. We were very candid about personal things. At times, I found myself almost defending Deng Xiao-ping against the students saying, "Look, he has done a lot of good things and reform will be coming. It is an inevitable process." I even had a quote that ended up in a Hong Kong newspaper on the front page with my picture, something to the effect that he was one of the more impressive world figures, something very positive. I just mention all this as a matter of fact but also because of what happened next. It was a very exciting, dynamic event. I frankly didn't understand just how sensitive this was for the leadership. I was struck by how excited this crowd was. There weren't just students; there were older people there as well. I assume some teachers, security types, and officials. There was a lot of cynicism among the Chinese students including on corruption, backdoor influence, inflation, future control of their lives. They wanted their leaders to be more accessible and engage in the kind of exchange that they had with us. Anyway, it was a very exhilarating experience.

We wrote a couple of careful and quite good telegrams back to Washington. By very unfortunate coincidence, the very next day a student was murdered by hooligans. As far as we know it was totally unrelated to any of this, but demonstrations broke out at Beijing University. This was the day after we had been there. They were basically demonstrations on the need for greater security so students wouldn't be murdered by hooligans. It spread to meetings and to wall posters and a march on Tiananmen Square that was aborted and so on. This was quickly controlled by the security people with warnings to the students, plus it quickly died out because many of them realized the '86-'87 protest hadn't helped. In fact, it resulted in Hu Yaobang's having been kicked out. I think many of the students felt that though they were in favor of reform, and they wanted to go faster, they realized that if they got too out of control, they would give the conservatives ammunition.

Obviously the leaders were very antsy about this, generally, our going out there and meeting with the students at the Democracy Salon and there were demonstrations the next day, although it was because of this hooligan murder. They knew from the '86 demonstrations and just generally that there was increasing concern about corruption and inflation. Not just the students but the workers as well. The leaders would always be concerned about the students and the workers linking up. It is one thing in a communist society to have students and intellectuals unhappy, but if you have in a Marxist society the workers unhappy - and they have got the same dilemma today - then you really have a problem for social stability. Clearly they had been watching what had been happening in Poland and Hungary and Yugoslavia, lots of unrest even then in the USSR. There had been a heavy Reagan emphasis on human rights in the late May/June Moscow summit. For all these reasons, the Chinese leaders were obviously antsy. I was out there, as was Bette, to maintain ties with the younger generation, get a feel for what was on their minds, and generally show the flag. We were not there to cause any trouble, obviously, but we did feel this was an important part of our job, also very interesting.

On June 8, Liu Huaqiu, who was then Country Director for American affairs (he later was Vice Minister and National Security Advisor), called me in to talk about the upcoming trip by the Secretary. This would have been Shultz's second trip. This was a little bit out of line on protocol. Ordinarily he would be dealing with my DCM. I don't know if this was purposeful or not. On the way out after talking about the trip, he took me aside and suggested in friendly fashion that in the future I notify the authorities in advance so that they could make proper arrangements for meetings like this. He casually shrugged it off. I lightly explained why we went out there without being defensive, described some of the subjects we talked about. I said usually when we go to a University or think tank we have to work through authorities just practically, but in this case there was no problem. We just got in touch with the students and went out there. We didn't need help.

I was in Tianjin on June 9. A new Vice Mayor, new that week, and I guess the Foreign Affairs Director made a friendly warning about a visit to Nankai University that afternoon. Some people were worried about our appearance, but they knew I was an experienced diplomat who would do nothing to disturb stability. We went to the University. I think it was both of us, Bette and me. We had a long session before our speech with the officials that sort of cut off our time with the students. We started later than scheduled, and then there were long and friendly introductions. They made me use translator which cut down the time allotted, even though the audience all spoke English. The questions were written and screened obviously rather than from the floor. All of this was contrary to the way we had operated before where we had informal talks and simultaneous translation, lots of time for questions and answers. The session actually went very well, especially the questions and answers, and the officials did allow it to run over the allotted time by 20 minutes. A big enthusiastic crowd. But we were somewhat rushed.

I got back to the residence, and then I was about to go to Shanghai for a trip and again I could see a pattern, and we knew this was related to what had happened. We learned the students we were supposed to meet with in Shanghai at Jiatong University, my father-in-law's alma mater actually, were suddenly too busy on their exams to see us. We were also supposed to go to Fudan University, and that didn't work out either, in this case perhaps innocently because the Polish Premier was there on Friday and they couldn't get a big student audience on Saturday. I asked for two substitute appointments to take place, one with the World Economic Herald, this progressive newspaper, and one with the Shanghai Academy of Social Sciences. Both of them were too busy to meet me. I met with a Herald reporter at the hotel and made my unhappiness known. Then I met with the Shanghai Mayor, Zhu Rongji, and after some friendly talk about American investment and so on, I said I wanted to meet others and promote cultural and academic links. I was disappointed I couldn't meet people. He said I should come back and would then clearly see people. I don't know how much he knew at the time. The investment climate had greatly improved as I said. We went to a performance of an O'Neill play that evening to open a big festival in Shanghai. Before the show we had a half an hour with the Vice Mayor and others. We purposely, literally sat for half an hour silently, and Bette and I absolutely refused to say a single word to the Vice Mayor for the whole time. We were showing that we knew what had happened to us in Shanghai and we didn't like it. I, of course, went up on stage after the show and congratulated the performers; it wasn't their fault.

Then during the following week we got reports of displeasure over the Beijing University appearance. There were reports of displeasure about it at a Politburo meeting. I don't recall how we got these reports. They were secondhand, but I think, reliable, probably Embassy contacts.

The banquet was at Beihai Park in Beijing. As I was walking in, the Ambassador to Washington - Han Xu his name was, he was called back to China for consultation - asked me to step outside. I had known him ever since the first trips to China. By now so many things had happened this past week, I figured what the subject was going to be about. He said something of the following. The Chairman, Deng Xiaoping, respected me greatly and in a friendly and private way he suggested that I be more prudent with students.

I went back very toughly. Han Xu was an old friend I had known since the Kissinger days. I knew he was going to be the messenger, so I wanted to make sure. I was clear and firm. I said I was astonished and upset. I wasn't rude, but I made clear I was mad. I pointed to the South China Morning Post from Hong Kong which said that I had said that Deng Xiaoping was one of the most impressive leaders in the world. I had, out of sincerity, certainly said nothing negative and behaved myself with the students. Someone was misinforming the Chairman; I was deeply saddened about this. In any event I don't understand and I can't accept this. I was very surprised and deeply displeased. How would he feel if we told him he had to coordinate every meeting at an American university in the United States and we restricted his movements. I explained my reasons for going out there. How would he feel if Ronald Reagan sent a message through me to him saying you can't go to Yale University without checking with us and so on. He didn't respond. We sat next to each other at the banquet. I repeated my messages during a very stiff time. I wasn't friendly, but I wasn't discourteous. He was an old friend.

Then I asked him to step outside afterwards and said please convey my message to the Chairman. As I was driving away in the car, he ran up and tapped on the window to catch up with me to be sure he got the message right. I think he was a little taken aback, so he wanted to make sure I would go over it again. He got an envelope and wrote it down. I basically said I have deep respect for the Chairman. I told the Beijing students he was one of the most impressive leaders I have met. I was very sad that someone was misinforming him about the encounter. We should straighten this out. I just don't understand because there is no better friend of U.S.-China relations. I have worked on it for 17 years. I was surprised and sad. Then I added the other themes, I have every right to do this, and what is going on and so on. Han Xu was clearly upset. I reported all of this in close held cables. I had my Deputy go in and basically repeat the same themes to Liu Huaqui the next day. Washington's comment a couple of days later was a bit ambivalent. It is great you guys are getting out and talking to all the students, thanks and we applaud this. But I thought there was a little bit of softness there because Washington also asked, "Do we really need to have such a high profile at this point?"

Q: That's typical, you know, don't rock the boat.

LORD: Sometimes it is the other way around, with the Ambassadors saying don't rock the boat, and it is Washington wanting you to be tougher. So this is backwards you know. However, I think my message back to the Chinese did have some impact because without going into great detail, they began to be quite friendly again. At the banquet the next night, the Vice Premier was extremely friendly, said he wanted to play tennis with me. This also came from the mayor of Tianjin who wanted to play tennis. The Vice Minister of Public Security was friendly. Several high ranking people came to a Nabisco joint venture opening when they had absolutely no reason to do so. Liu Huaqui told the DCM to tell me not to worry at a dinner a few days later. All the contacts were very friendly. It just shows you their paranoia and their collectivity. It shows you how they all act together canceling things and postponing things on the one hand, and then you get tough and they back off and they get all friendly again. I really laid into them, and of course, all of this has much greater resonance now when we think of Democracy Salon, Tiananmen Square, Wang Dan and everything else.

Q: No, this is very interesting. Now, other times you were saying what was said at the salon of democracy, but how about when you are talking at think tanks or students prior to this? Were you getting good solid questions?

LORD: That is a good question. It would vary. I mean there were times when you'd go to think tanks, and you could usually have very good discussions on U.S.-Chinese relations, on international issues, you know the Middle East or Russia. Taiwan you'd get the party line. You wouldn't raise that yourself unless they did, and they usually didn't. When it came to the Chinese domestic scene, not much problem, even some debate on economic reforms. But, I never felt there was much loosening up either in these joint sessions or even one on one on political issues. Despite the fact the envelope was being pushed open, people were still very cautious, including my best friends in the government as well as think tankers certainly about talking in front of others with any degree of candor about political issues and even alone. Occasionally we'd have working dinners at our house with a mixture of officials, semi-dissidents, reformers. We were always trying to keep this debate going and hear about it and participate. People would venture modestly into more controversial issues. The only frank discussions would take place when some of our Embassy contacts who could speak Chinese were alone with people at times, and certainly Bette and her conversations in her circles.

The universities always gave very enthusiastic receptions. I think it was genuine, they were pleased to have an Ambassador and his spouse come out and they like America generally. The questions were always clearly either softball easy ones or ones designed to put you a little bit on the defensive. I'm sure they were all screened.

Q: Be true in the United States, too.

LORD: No, I don't think so. I don't think in the United States we would do what they did to Clinton in Beijing (in 1998) where they had the questions orchestrated and the students weren't even allowed to stand up when he came in. Even today they control events, let alone back then. I have no illusions that our meetings with the students were anything but carefully scripted (except for Democracy Salon). No student is going to ask a question that would get him in trouble. But often they asked personal questions or interesting questions on other issues. But never much engagement on political issues with the exceptions I talked about, particular circles and particularly courageous individuals like Fang Lizhi and Liu Binyan.

Q: This is really on the same theme, but I was wondering for somebody reading this a couple of centuries from now, some historian will be ruffling through this. To get a feel for the role of the United States you conceived I mean in the world, Did you feel that what you were doing in a sense in the American Embassy, you were alone or were the French Embassy, the French Ambassador, the British Ambassador, were others out there pushing these same themes, or were we pretty much on our own?

LORD: Pretty much on our own. That is true even as we speak. Certainly in any official government policies on human rights we were generally on our own. The others gobble up the contracts and hold our coat so to speak, while we take on the tough issues. The Japanese, partly because of the guilt feelings of what they did in Nanjing and elsewhere in World War Two, partly because they worry about making money, the Europeans because of money. There were some exceptions, the Australians, occasionally the Canadians, sometimes the British or the Europeans would weigh in. With respect to Ambassadors, I can't be sure about what every Ambassador or Embassy was doing, but I don't know of any that were getting out to the students or the think tanks like I was. I know there was nobody anywhere close to the kind of contacts that we had thanks to Bette with the reformist, cultural, academic, and artistic communities.

Q: But as a mission, we in a way, I mean besides due to your wife you had these contacts, but I mean you felt you had as part of the mission of the American Ambassador to push these things.

LORD: Yes, and I also...

Q: These other ones were not particularly pushy.

LORD: That is absolutely right. Whether it is specific issues like Tibet or prisoners or whether it is generally getting engaged in debates on political reform. Now I want to be accurate here and not self-serving. I don't want to pretend that we were vigorously leaping up and down and beating the drums and pushing the envelope in aggressive, obnoxious ways. We were somewhat circumscribed. Human rights was less of an issue in the average cabinet level meeting than it would be today or at least it was when I was serving in the Clinton Administration. You cannot have a cabinet level meeting today or even a working level meeting without these issues coming up. That was not the case in the late '80s. Not because we didn't care, but it wasn't quite as high profile. This was still during the Cold War and before the Tiananmen massacre, so don't want to exaggerate our pressures. Having said that, compared to other countries and other embassies, we certainly worked on these issues, and certainly Bette in particular and also I personally worked on these issues.

We did so for a variety of reasons. First, human aspirations and justice, some of the human rights issues, freedom of expression, that man or woman doesn't live by bread alone. Particularly as you build up a middle class and you have economic advancement, people are going to want this. Improvements on human rights and freedom would greatly build up support in America for an engagement policy and conversely setbacks made it more complicated - in the interest of our bilateral relationship and therefore in China's interest as well. A feeling even then, although it is much clearer now 12-15 years later, that as you open up to the outside world and develop your economy with the help of outside investment and technology, and as you begin - it was not that clear then - to have computers and Internet and fax machines, that you've got to have a freer flow of information. You can't develop a modern economy without greater dissent, greater debate, greater openness, greater ability to express your views, greater pluralism in the political system. As you move toward a marketplace, you have less control, all of these things are important. And a feeling, again I felt then and I do now, that as the President said on his recent trip, that stability requires freedom. China was - and is - undergoing the pain of transition from one kind of economy to another with unemployment and all the other problems, corruption, inflation, etc. The Chinese people must be able to express views peacefully. If they don't have those avenues of peaceful dissent, the other alternative is to take to the streets. All of this opposed to the argument of the Chinese authorities, that is self-serving, that one needs repression for stability, I felt and still feel that you need more openness for stability. You can't get at the problem of corruption without a free press, and you can't get, attract and maintain investment without the rule of law. You can't debate about top economic decisions without the free flow of expression and information and a free press. You can't have stability unless people can let off steam through peaceful means. By virtue of the American relationship and support for our ties with China, by virtue of justice, by virtue of China's self-interest, I felt that this was part of our mission.

I also want to make it clear that I felt very strongly that we needed to move ahead with China despite its clear imperfections and the problems of human rights. Because of our strategic, economic, and political interests, we spent an awful lot of time promoting these other elements of our relationship, indeed the bulk of our time. Bette, for example as well as I, spent the overwhelming part of her time with officials, in addition to pushing the envelope with some of these other groups.

XX. AMBASSADOR TO CHINA - 1989 EVENTS AND GENERAL COMMENTS (1989)

Q: [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: I don't know about where you are on things. Do you want to talk about the Bush visit and Fang Lizhi?

LORD: Yes, because that is an interesting story, too. This will be about President Bush's trip to China in early 1989 in the home stretch as my tenure as Ambassador. Let me say that I greatly looked forward to this trip as sort of a capstone of my tenure there. I had made clear before the November 1988 election that no matter who was elected, as much as I loved this job and it was the best job I had ever had for enjoyment, that I was ready after three and a half years to move on. Washington ought to think of a successor.

Bush I had known for a long time. I had played tennis with him on occasions. I had seen him almost every time I went back to Washington, talked to him about China when he was Vice President. I briefed him on behalf of Nixon and Kissinger when he went out to head up the Liaison Office early in his career. I had what I thought was a very good relationship. He was a newly elected President. He was going to Japan to see the Emperor, but he was going to come to China on an official visit, but not on a full state visit.

As an old friend of China, one who had worked on the relationship, he was looking forward as was Mrs. Bush to return home and see all their old friends. As we got ready for the visit, it couldn't have been a better lead up. To make a long story short, we went full speed, and we were good at this frankly, my Deputy Tomsen and my whole team working with the advance team to get ready for this trip. The head of the advance team who had been working on trips for more than a decade said it was the best Embassy he had ever worked with. I was the most involved Ambassador he had ever worked with. This is not to be self-serving but to set up something later on. Indeed we just beat our brains out, for a President, a new President. Everything was going terrifically well, logistics, even though it was going to be a 48 hour short trip. The advance team was ecstatic. We sent in the usual think pieces. I personally wrote some personal ones for the President and made sure they got to him. I got word back that he very much enjoyed them before he came out including two portraits of Deng Xiaoping, one with what he had accomplished generally in Chinese history and the challenges he faced and secondly a personal portrait of Deng, his family, his background, his history and how to deal with him. And we had other scene setters. The Chinese had gone out of their way to make this a friendly visit. The Chinese media play was the warmest for any visit I had seen. Again, our relations were fully on track after Shultz's visits and the Secretary of Defense and many others. We were moving along pretty well, although we had continuing problems. He was a new President and an old friend. Everybody wanted to see him so the problem was sorting out who got on his schedule on a brief 48 hour visit. The Chinese agreed to have him go on live television. The first time I believe any foreign leader, certainly the first time any American President, had addressed the Chinese live, well before this Clinton visit (1998). They also worked with us, very unusual for them, to stage a "spontaneous" photo opportunity in Tiananmen Square. He'd get out of his car and mingle with the crowds. Indeed he got a great picture with Tiananmen Square in the background. It was on the cover of Time International. So everything was going swimmingly. I had visions of a perfect capstone to my tenure there, going out with a successful trip by the new President, and we were very excited about it.

As part of the trip, there was to be on Sunday night, he arrived on Saturday, his return banquet for the Chinese in the Great Wall Hotel. We had instructions from the White House to make it a big banquet, include all walks of life, old Chinese friends but all parts of society, reach a broad audience. They asked us for guest lists. Let me just sum up the experience I had, and then I'll tell you what happened. Mao Zedong once said that a revolution is not a dinner party. Well, this turned out to be a dinner party that turned out to be a revolution. In order to draw up a guest list that we had to have approved by Washington, we asked each section of the Embassy to come up with suggestions as to who should be included. We came up with a full list which we sent into Washington a couple of weeks before the visit, soon after they had asked for it. It included all kinds of people, officials, American businesspeople, Chinese, academics, you name it. It also included a few dissidents, depending on how you define dissidents, at least pro-reformers, several of them, one of whom was Fang Lizhi, who had been at Hefei University. He was outspoken on political reform, going around giving speeches that the Chinese authorities were not happy with. He had lost his job there, but was still an official research worker for the Chinese government in Beijing. So, he was still officially that. Although clearly pushing the envelope on political reform, he was not some wild eyed radical trying to overthrow the government, but obviously was someone of some controversy. At the same time, he was a widely respected scientist, a world class astrophysicist. Three different sections of our embassy individually recommended Fang be on the list.

Our view was the following which we explained in a cable we sent back with the guest lists. We pointed out the several reformers/dissidents with explanations of all of them on the list. We said the Chinese won't like this but frankly we did not expect an explosion in the reaction. We said we thought it was important that the President demonstrate his overall concern with human rights as part of our engagement with the Chinese, out of principle, to lift the morale of reformers, to try to help the China situation and to protect himself with his domestic audience and Congress back home. If we had a separate meeting with dissidents - after all, Reagan had done this in Russia - if we had a separate meeting with dissidents, generally or with Fang in particular, this we felt would be overly provocative to the Chinese. Particularly in such a very short visit with so many friends, so many Vice Premiers and others were disappointed not to see him. To say he couldn't see Vice Premier so and so, but then he sees dissidents, we just felt this was going too far. But we thought it was important that he show some demonstration of concern for human rights for all the reasons I mentioned. Thus we had him visiting a church on Sunday morning, which he did. We had him refer to human rights although much more gingerly than we do now. There were related elements in his remarks on TV. We had Secretary Baker raise the issue of human rights as well.

Q: Baker being Secretary of State.

LORD: We felt the other way to do it was to include a few dissidents in the banquet which after all was huge. Not have a separate meeting. This was a nice balance. We sent the list in to Washington. Given the usual inertia you usually get on those things, we got no response approving the list. We were running out of time because we had to issue the invitations. Actually in putting together the list, we got suggestions from three different sections, the political section, the science and technology section, and the USIA section, press and culture. Each suggested separately several dissidents including Fang. I would have added him if he wasn't included. Three different sections told us we should do this. I mention this partly because there was a New York Times article a few weeks later which said that Bette Bao Lord, this known radical, had inserted Fang on the guest list which caused trouble at the summit. Or, maybe it was said approvingly by the human rights people. Whatever way it was said, it was totally inaccurate. I had her go over the list too, because I welcomed her judgment. The point is even before we got to the list, three different sections independently had suggested him and other dissidents.

So, we sent it to the White House and the State Department, the whole list on February 10. As I say, we had a few dissidents, and we specifically foresaw some problems. To be fair we did not see there would be an explosion. We got no reply, so we sent a moderately changed guest list with some additions and some deletions on February 18, but no changes among the reformers. Again I made sure we flagged Fang in particular for Washington. By now we are running out of time; the President is arriving about a week later. We pressed the advance team to help us.

Q: You were saying you were consulting...

LORD: We are talking about the Fang Lizhi banquet incident. Finally, the top White House advance man called the White House and got approval on the phone for the whole list. We had to move fast on the invitations. We had one of our Chinese local employees (who report to the Chinese security service all the time) call the Academy of Sciences to extend the invitations orally to those at the academy including Fang. We did a lot of invitations by phone to alert people, and then we were going to follow up with a written invitation. We heard the next day on February 22 some confused report about somebody saying Fang wasn't actually on the list. It turns out later that a protocol person from the Foreign Ministry called over to the Academy later and said Fang wasn't invited after we had invited him. We then got the invitations out. In many cases we had to hand carry them to many places; we had such short notice. We had somebody from the Embassy hand carry the invitation to Mrs. Fang for both of them. We did this in many other places because of time constraints.

That evening at an advance team banquet, a protocol guy complains, taking us aside. It wasn't a huge complaint but it was the first warning we got. We said relax, big crowd, diverse. Don't get so upset about this. We're inviting Fang as a world renowned scientist. We immediately alerted Washington to this. This could be trouble. We want you to know they reacted to the Fang invitation.

Then for the next 48 hours, getting closer and closer to the President getting there, we didn't hear anything from the Chinese, so we began to feel pretty good and figured this wasn't going to be a problem. We kept wondering if we were going to be called in and they were going to escalate this. We hadn't heard anything, so we began to feel pretty good. Meanwhile, somehow the French press runs with something in Taiwan about how we invited Fang and some idiot in our Embassy on background said, yes, we did this to make a statement. The Chinese would have reacted anyway, I'm sure. Throughout this, however, a tremendous warm reception was building for Bush and very warm friendly media coverage continued to go forward. We kind of figured we were pretty well home free.

Then at 6:30 on Friday, February 24 (the day before the President's arrival), the Vice Minister, a guy named Zhu Qizhen, said he wanted to see me. I get a little nervous; I wonder what this is about. I think I probably know what it is about although I thought we were home free. So I go out to Daoyutai guest house for a final thank you to the advance team and then to the Foreign Ministry. I don't remember the exact chronology. Zhu said this is a real problem for the Chinese, their leadership. I don't have this exactly right, but it was, I believe, around 9:00 Friday night. We had the roughest meeting I have ever had with the Chinese. With Zhu I went through all the arguments about how they shouldn't blow this out of proportion. It is just one person at a banquet. He is being invited as a renowned scientist, etc. I, of course, when I first heard their complaints, just on my own said to the Chinese, I will report this. I said, I can't speak for Washington but I am sure they won't want change to the guest list. I couldn't imagine, particularly after it had leaked, that we could back off from this. The President would have gotten massive criticism. Because there was so little time, I didn't want the Chinese to have any illusion that we were going to back away. I said, of course I'll report and consult. I immediately sent a message to Korea and Air Force One. It was less than 20 hours before the President's arrival. I kept sending messages in. I mention all of this because it comes up later about whether I kept Washington informed.

Scowcroft in response to my cable calls me in the middle of the night and tells me to go in for another appointment. We both knew the Chinese were listening in so we made points about not causing controversy for their benefit. I go in at 9:30 that Saturday morning to try to turn this around again. Another tough go around.

Q: Scowcroft is the National Security Advisor.

LORD: Again I send another wire to the plane. Then at 12:30, the President is landing four hours later. The Vice Minister calls me again. This is a message from President Yang Shangkun to President Bush, basically saying if Fang Lizhi comes to the banquet, Yang is not coming and nobody else is coming from the leadership. By now I know I have a disaster on my hands. With each development I sent a cable either by NIACT [Night Action] or Flash, which is almost like a nuclear war, to make sure the President's party on the plane knew exactly what was happening. The last one they didn't get because it was so shortly before they landed in Beijing. The last Yang message, Bush didn't get that until he was at the guest house. He was well aware of the problem, but he had not realized it had escalated to this point.

I went up on the plane to greet the President which you usually do. He was distinctly unfriendly. You could tell he was mad at me about how this whole thing had come up. I rode in with Baker and I said I still thought there was a chance that either the Chinese would relent or Fang would decide not to cause trouble and not come. Something might happen.

We proceed with the trip. Perhaps it was like Mrs. Lincoln at the play, but the rest of the trip went extremely well. The whole time Bush was nervous, as we all were, about how this was going to come out. It would be a clear debacle to have a return banquet and no Chinese leaders there. It would not have gone unnoticed by the press. Throughout the Chinese are keeping us hanging. Their official position remains the same. We go through the rest of the trip. Bush has a meeting and a working lunch with Deng that goes very well. He gives Deng some boots and Deng gives him a bicycle. He meets with the Embassy staff, and now, he and Mrs. Bush are not all that friendly to us. They figure we had gotten them into this trouble. In his remarks to the Embassy employees, he barely mentions the Ambassador or his wife which a week earlier would have been unthinkable. He has meetings with all these other people and they all go well. I won't go into all the details. He was given a warm welcoming banquet. All is going very well in substance. There is one meeting which is running late that we are nervous about because he is due to go on live television. He races there and goes on at the last minute, and that goes well. It is a very productive, good trip, but this incident is hanging over us, and obviously keeping everyone on edge.

Let me segue for a minute to show the edge. My wife, of course, was in charge of Mrs. Bush's itinerary. She had known her well and favorably in the past. For several weeks she had sent messages back to Mrs. Bush, to her chief of staff, with schedules and plans and never got any response. To this day we don't know if it was total ineptness or unfriendliness or what. Literally no guidance on what to do with the First Lady. We would call and send messages, just a black hole. Bette had prepared and recommended some very interesting and imaginative events for the First Lady, none of them in the least controversial.

Q: This, of course, is before...

LORD: Before they ever took off. This is totally unrelated to the Fang issue. We think it was just plain incompetence in Mrs. Bush's office, but who knows? It was impossible for Bette. Anyway she came up with a spectacular series of events. I don't want to sound self-serving for my wife, but it happens to be true. She got an old place opened up that hadn't been open for years, and arranged a session with top Chinese women of all walks of life, none of whom were radicals. They were artists and academics and working women and wives of leaders. She had special tables and entertainment. It was totally cultural, not political. It was a beautifully thought out event for Mrs. Bush, all of which Bette had to do without guidance because she hadn't gotten any guidance. During the rest of the trip everything went well; the usual things Mrs. Bush wanted to do. The Bushes went to church Sunday morning. We were very moved by the whole affair, the very idea of this church again in China. It went back to when Bush was in the Liaison Office. He sat next to a 90 year old woman who had tears in her eyes and hadn't been in church in decades. All of us were moved by this. I come out and I am with the President.

Mrs. Bush gets in another car with my wife and starts screaming at her literally at the top of her lungs about the next social event Bette had planned. Why did you get me into this affair with these Chinese women? I don't want a lot of political controversy. Why can't I go to the Summer Palace? Bette, of course, said she wouldn't do anything to embarrass her. I think you will enjoy this, she said. She was quiet about the fact that she hadn't had any guidance from Mrs. Bush. This incident made clear to me that Mrs. Bush's public appearance is not quite the same as her private personality. She was unbelievably rude to my wife. It turned out the affair was fantastic. Mrs. Bush enjoyed it and she hugged Bette at the end and so on. It was something we didn't forget. By then that particular episode was reflecting the tension of the Fang problem, obviously. I still don't understand why we didn't get any guidance before then.

Anyway, back to the main drama. Finally at the President's meeting Sunday afternoon with Zhao Ziyang, the banquet being Sunday night, we get a note passed to me from the Chinese that the Chinese leaders have now agreed to come to the banquet. We are throwing our hats in the air and figure everything is fine. They didn't say anything about Fang not coming; they just said they were coming. The Chinese said they don't want any press conference about Fang at the banquet or him at the head table. We said obviously we are not going to do that; we are going to treat him as a regular guest. Then the tension is relieved; it is going to be a great trip. Even though we had been on edge for the last 48 hours, it was going to have a happy ending.

We had this big Texas style barbecue at the Great Wall Hotel. We had all friendly people at Fang's table but made sure his table wasn't in direct line of sight of the leaders. We were trying to be as sensitive as possible. We go through the banquet. I'm feeling great. We are having good discussions and the toasts are great, and everything is terrific. I can't see Fang's table from where I am sitting at the head table. I'm just assuming he is there. I don't see anything. We all assumed that. At one point Bette got a note passed to her during the banquet saying an academic - they got the name wrong but something that rhymes with Perry Link - wants to see you. Bette didn't know what that was about, and said I'll see him later or something. It turns out as the history books now know that it was Perry Link who was with Fang and his wife. They had gone to the hotel and were turned away by the Chinese security and weren't allowed to attend.

None of this we knew until I got into the car after dinner, feeling euphoric at the end of this trip. My economic counselor lets me know that Fang is at the Embassy. He couldn't go to the banquet; he had been prevented by Chinese authorities. My heart stopped. I knew the press was going to get a hold of this. It turned out to be a disaster beyond my wildest dreams. We get back to the guest house and Fang holds a press conference at a hotel. That's all the press cares about, nothing else about the trip. It is all down the drain.

Meanwhile, I should point out for the history books that Scowcroft had told me beforehand on Saturday that first this was just a fantastic job of getting ready by the Embassy for the President. Secondly he volunteered the Fang problem, which is still up in the air, was certainly not the Embassy's fault. He was mad that it hadn't been brought to his attention or Baker's attention, that lower level people had cleared the guest list. I immediately said, I don't want them to get burned, that it is nobody's fault. None of us could have predicted the Chinese would be so unreasonable.

Back to the unfolding disaster. I had to take a sleeping pill to get to sleep. It was a low point in my career; I can tell you that. You know you don't want to see a presidential trip go down in flames particularly when you are in the middle of it. The U.S. side is having breakfast the next morning in the guest house, the top of the American team. I am purposefully, obviously not invited to the breakfast with the President, Baker, and Scowcroft. It was highly unusual, the Ambassador not being there, having a skull session on what to do. They decided to have the President say he complained to the Chinese before he got on the plane at the airport, and they would issue a stronger statement once they were airborne, not on Chinese soil.

The President does this at the airport and I am sent in to Zhu to complain as well. I spend the next couple of days madly working on the press, sending cables to the party, playing up the positive side of the visit. The Chinese are beginning to relax about it and cooling off about it and playing up the positive themes. I am urging the White House to do the same. It was clear that Bush was so pissed off at what had happened that he wasn't hearing much of this. The whole idea was to put a positive spin on the trip, which had the virtue of being true. It was important for a variety of reasons, and the Chinese were willing to play ball at that point. We were making some progress; this thing was quieting down.

Then there was a backgrounder in the press that was given by Scowcroft. It was clear at the time it was either Scowcroft or Sununu, the Chief of Staff. It appeared in the Washington Post and the New York Times, and was picked up by papers all over the place, Taiwan, Japan, Hong Kong, American papers. The backgrounder was by a senior White House official effectively saying the Embassy had screwed up the President's visit, it hadn't kept the Washington team informed about the Chinese being upset, and it had invited Fang Lizhi on its own. All of which is totally untrue of course. That is why I wanted in this history to go into details in terms of clearing the list. We hadn't predicted the time bomb, but nobody did. We did point out probable Chinese irritations. I still think it was the right thing to do obviously. We kept Washington fully posted. The White House and State had cleared the list, including Fang, etc.

My Embassy colleagues were about ready to lob nuclear bombs on Washington. I immediately called the entire senior staff together and said no one is to talk to the press. We are supposed to support the President and show a united front. This is a stupid backgrounder and it is unfair to the Embassy and not in American interests but I don't want any stories coming out of here. Keep your mouth shut. Nothing came out of the Embassy. So there was total discipline by the outraged Embassy staff.

Over the next two days with the help of Tomsen and my wife, I drafted a secret message to Scowcroft with a copy to Baker. I knew Scowcroft had done this, but I didn't want Baker to think, no matter what the subject, that I was communicating with the National Security Advisor without keeping the Secretary of State informed. Baker was in Vienna; Scowcroft was in Washington. I had it double encrypted and sent by the CIA through the White House Situation Room, hand delivered so no one else would see it except Scowcroft and the same procedure in Vienna with Baker.

I rewrote the message about 10 times. I wanted to keep it professional and cool. I basically said the following. I pointed out the President's trip had gone well and we should otherwise accentuate the positive. I said I'm a professional, I have been around for 30 years. There are times when you need a scapegoat for the national interest or the President, and an Ambassador or someone else should take a fall. I don't have any problem with that principle. I think that's time honored and sometimes useful. But, leaving that aside, first, of course, you will remember the chronology - I did clear the list, I did keep them posted and so on. I did it just clinically. Then leaving that aside, let's just look at it from the U.S. national interest. What has this backgrounder done besides being totally inaccurate? Number one, it revived the whole issue, just when the Chinese and the American sides were letting it die. So, it overtook any positive play. Number two, it looked weak to the Chinese, having the President look defensive and embarrassed about inviting somebody who was not a bomb thrower at a banquet with 900 people. Reagan had gone to Moscow and met separately with dissidents. This backgrounder made it look like we are so sorry we hurt the Chinese feelings. That is not the way I said it in my message, but it is the thrust of my message. We looked wimpish and weak to the Chinese which is not a good idea at any time with any country particularly not the Chinese, and particularly not for a new President of the United States starting out a new relationship with the Chinese. It is just a bad way to begin with these guys. Thirdly, it was wrong. It is the Chinese who should be on the defensive. It is the Chinese who screwed things up, not the U.S. Their reaction was totally out of bounds. It was the Chinese who had misbehaved.

Fourth, even though the trip was said not to have gone well, the President at least was getting credit with Congress and the press and human rights groups for inviting dissidents to his banquet. They were saying at least he has the guts to do this. So the background undercuts all his credit with the human rights and congressional types by making clear that he was sorry this guy came to the banquet and he hurt the Chinese feelings. Finally, and this was the least important because I was leaving anyway, he had destroyed any possible influence I could have in my remaining tenure as Ambassador. In effect he was saying to the world and the Chinese this Ambassador is out of control, did something on his own, didn't tell us about your reaction, and ruined my trip.

Anyway, I sent this message to Scowcroft whom I had known for 15 years, who was a relatively good friend and working colleague, who had praised the trip as being sensational, etc. To this day, I have never had even an acknowledgment of the message or explanation. Not one. I know he got it because I had the CIA confirm to me the exact time they handed him the message in the Situation Room and the exact time they handed it to Baker. Scowcroft didn't even have the courtesy to say he got my cable and let's talk about it, or you're wrong for the following reasons, etc.

Let me just finish by saying I have had a lot of bad moments in my career as well as a hell of a lot of good ones. The Laos statement in 1970. The failure of the Vietnam negotiations in October of 1972 when we went to Saigon and felt we had an agreement, and President Thieu turned us down. I think this Fang affair ranks at the bottom with those events, the combination of angst, disappointment, anger at the Chinese and our President and his National Security Advisor, just generally leaving a sour taste in my mouth.

This issue faded as time passed. The Chinese got extremely friendly toward the end of my stay - I left two months later. I am sure, however, because of Democracy Salon and now this incident and this backgrounder, that Deng and others had ambivalent feelings about me as well as Bette. By the time we left, Bette and I got an incredible sendoff. For example, on the same day, I saw the Secretary General, the Prime Minister, and the President. I had special meals in my honor and special toasting and messages sent to me. The same with Bette. So we got an incredibly warm sendoff by the Chinese. Also, back in the United States, I figured most people knew the White House misbehaved, and were pissed off at them, not me. I was a semi hero, beyond what I deserved, with the human rights and congressional groups. I mellowed out more generally. But having said that, obviously for the sake of the United States and the sake of President Bush, and for my own reputation, I would have much preferred a glorious Presidential trip to end my tenure in China.

Q: Just to put this in perspective, this is very early in Bush's term.

LORD: That's right, a few weeks after inauguration.

Q: You also have George Bush who is probably has as good a résumé in foreign affairs including going to China. It wasn't a Bill Clinton of Arkansas. Then, Scowcroft who had been around the NSC for a long time, but in a way it sounds very much like a brand new administration with new boys on the block who don't really understand the game and so if anything happens you have to blame somebody. It sounds like something out of the first couple of months of the Reagan White House, also the first couple of months out of the Clinton White House.

LORD: I want to try to be as detached as I can. First, Scowcroft claimed and I believe Baker claimed to me at some point, that nobody in their departments had brought to their attention the list and the possible controversy. By the way, Stape Roy was a hero in this. He was Deputy Assistant Secretary, one of the top diplomats we've ever had. He stuck his neck out and backgrounded to the press, talk about sticking your neck out, that the White House was all wet, but, in fact, the list had been vetted by the White House and the State Department, and he knew that Lord was not to blame. So Stape was a hero on that.

First of all, we all underestimated the Chinese response. To this day I am surprised by it, that with Fang to be at a big banquet at some obscure table, they'd get this excited. Also, if I had to do it all over again, I wouldn't do it any differently. If you have a separate meeting, it is more provocative. If you don't do anything, you are vulnerable back home, and you are not sending the right signals to the Chinese or the Chinese people or the reformers whom you are trying to help and give support to. Even if it were brought to the attention of Baker and Scowcroft, they would have been told, as we suggested, the Chinese would be unhappy about it, but the payoff is much larger than this, and it will be under control essentially. We made clear that the dissidents in general might be a problem. By the way, there were other dissidents in this controversy, clearly people pushing the envelope that the Chinese never mentioned. Obviously Deng Xiaoping had a particular thing for Fang.

Part of the Bush reaction might have been that he felt he had not been informed. Having said that, you would think, not that I wanted it to be this way, that the President would get mad at his subordinates in Washington rather than his Embassy if he feels he has a right to be mad at all which I don't think he does. Moreover, I'm not even sure Bush, Baker, and Scowcroft didn't know. There was a Camp David session with outside China experts before the trip. To this day I have never gotten it straight. At least one or two of the participants told me that the Fang invitation which as I say, had leaked by then, was a topic of conversation among the outside experts. Who were at Camp David? Baker and Scowcroft, at least I believe they were there, and the President. To this day I don't know whether it came up in front of the President, if he knew, actually did know about this, let alone Baker and Scowcroft. So, there is a little confusion.

Anyway, trying to be detached about it, here is the President. He is a brand new President. He has a particular soft spot for China. Going there he expects a triumphant homecoming which he got in every other way. He expects it to be a wonderful personal experience for him and his wife, going back there, and a big media plus, and getting off to a great start on foreign policy and generally on his image, and instead this happens. You can see why I'm trying to be detached about this. I just have to assume that he felt that we should have predicted this more. What bothers me the most is he didn't get mad at the Chinese for ruining his trip. He got mad at his own team. Now, I don't think it reveals lack of experience in foreign policy which they both had, the two people you mentioned and Baker, but frankly a clear softness on human rights, and a feeling that we shouldn't do anything to ruffle the Chinese. The President, in fact, did not raise human rights directly in his meetings with the Chinese at all. He got Baker to do it the first night, but the President didn't raise it. Marlin Fitzwater, the press spokesman, confirmed to the press that the President didn't even raise human rights. We had to scramble and say he was going to church and speaking about it on his radio and TV, and Baker raised it the first night. Clearly, this softness was shown by the President's tepid response later to Tiananmen Square.

Q: I think so, too, with Scowcroft...

LORD: Yes, Scowcroft going over there secretly after the Tiananmen Square massacre. So this is just a preview of their view on this subject.

Q: [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: Given this terrible experience, it is not very long thereafter when you begin to get the demonstrations in the Square of the students. Did this experience influence in any way the way the Embassy understood what was going on and reported what was going on with the students? Because obviously you couldn't have known what was going to come to begin with on Tiananmen night. Was there a concern that there was an unwillingness in Washington to hear about this? Does it have an impact do you think?

LORD: We didn't pull our punches on reporting. That didn't affect our reporting. Now, we couldn't predict Tiananmen Square. We clearly were made even more aware by the Fang affair than we had been how sensitive Deng and the leadership were to the human rights question. We clearly kept our eyes and ears open even more for that. We did as we had done all along during my tenure, kept reporting on the pushing of the envelope by the reformers. We kept in as much touch as we could on that. I don't believe there was any direct correlation of any magnitude between the Fang banquet issue and Tiananmen Square. It was just a symptom of the sensitivity of the Chinese leadership and their repressive attitudes. Also Deng's annoyance at Fang personally - I believe Fang had talked about corruption under Deng.

Q: [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: You are not getting anything when you are making these early reports on what is happening in the Square, you are not getting any responses from Washington that suggested you guys are doing it again?

LORD: No, absolutely not. Just to make it clear, I left one week after the Tiananmen demonstrations began. I left during the first big demonstration on April 22, 100,000 people at Hu Yaobang's funeral. He had died on the 15th. In the intervening week there had been posters and wreaths to Hu. The sentiment was growing, and then they used the funeral as the first big occasion. We were reporting this. I certainly did not think it was going to grow to the dimensions it did, I don't know anybody who did. It grew to extraordinary dimensions, of course. When people think of students in Tiananmen Square, what they forget is in the first place there were seven weeks without a single incident of violence, without a single death. If anything, the traffic ran better than ever. It was the most orderly, responsive, disciplined crowd. Not one accident, not one incident in seven weeks with a million people sometimes in the Square, absolutely extraordinary. Furthermore, it was not just students. It was journalists, academics, party members, military, business people, farmers, peasants, workers, all kinds of people demonstrating, not just students. Now it wasn't just about democracy. It was about inflation, corruption, nepotism, poor conditions, physical and mental at the universities. There were a lot of different sources of angst. It was in over 200 cities - not just Beijing - which was extraordinary. None of which the scope of which we predicted.

Q: But to take Nancy's question... I mean after all, an Embassy essentially just consists of Foreign Service Officers who are looking at foreign governments and trying to sense who are they, where are they going, and what are they doing. It is so hard to turn that ability off when you look at your own government. Here is a brand new government. Here is George Bush who sometimes had the view of not being quite serious, you know, sort of a dilettante. He did this and he did that, and saying you know, this is not that strong a President.

LORD: Look, the Embassy and I personally were extremely mad at the President and Scowcroft, although I am proud of the discipline we showed. There was never one leak out of that Embassy complaining about Washington. The angst was confined to my back channel messages which never got a response. Yes, we were mad, but first of all he was the President. Number two, he was not a dilettante about foreign policy. He was quite serious about it, knew a lot about it, had extensive experience, and did some good work as the Gulf War showed. None of us thought he'd suddenly become a lightweight. I didn't encourage a lot of griping and whining at staff meetings. I can't tell you what went on around the water cooler. We maintained discipline at staff meetings:

look, we are going to show a united front. I know how some of you feel. I know how I feel. It is unfair, but we've got to serve the national interest and serve this President. That is all I would say in front of others. With my wife and my DCM and one or two others I was more frank one on one. I was hopping mad. No, our job was still, and I really think I am being accurate on this, to not pull any punches either way in our reporting, try to serve the President. I kept trying to stress - I worked hard on this for a matter of weeks despite my other unhappiness - to put as positive a spin on the trip as I could in terms of substance and perception and kept urging Washington to do the same. Of course it was overcome by this event; it never really recovered. So, it didn't really affect our reporting. I and others were very angry and disappointed that the President would get mad both inaccurately and just wrong in substance at the Embassy and have his Security Advisor tell the world, as opposed to being mad at what the Chinese had done to him.

Q: Was it ever proposed that after this thing happened, I can see somebody else reacting saying well why don't we have tea and cookies with Fang at some point. You know if you are sticking it to me I mean talking to the Chinese, why don't you come over and we'll have a midnight snack or something like that, or did that even come up?

LORD: Well, later he had to get refuge in the Embassy when my successor Jim Lilley was there. I immediately saw Perry Link who was with him and went over this with him and expressed our concern about Fang's well being. I think he was surrounded and under house arrest by this point, so we could never get at him, but I can't reconstruct what happened to him at that point. Basically he was hemmed in. We didn't make any effort to have a high profile meeting with him. I immediately went and made sure I saw his buddy and sent word to Fang about how concerned I was. I met with Perry Link, the professor who had been with him, but I didn't meet with Fang.

Q: [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: Do you have a sense in the Bush administration, Bush himself considered himself somewhat of a China expert because of his experience in China. Were there any other people at the very top that had any interest in China, Scowcroft and these other people, or were they mostly Europe oriented?

LORD: That is a good question. Scowcroft was more arms control and Russia, but he had been a generalist. He had been National Security Advisor under Ford after all, so by definition he was a generalist, including China. He wasn't without background on China certainly. Baker hadn't had much dealings with Asia generally I believe or with China. There were plenty of good people like Stape Roy and others back there working on it. I don't think there is any need to go through the other parts of his trip. We hit some of the positive stuff. We followed up. I was instructed immediately after the President left to go and ask for an explanation and complain about what had happened, in addition to a statement issued from the airplane.

Q: [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: Were there other key policy issues Bush was trying to resolve during the visit?

LORD: Resolve may be too strong a word. By the way, there was another positive element in the lead up to the trip. They allowed the President to use his car whenever he was riding without a Chinese official in it. For security reasons, they never had allowed that before. It is just another little example of how they went out of their way to be hospitable. In terms of the agenda, it was the usual suspects, and the talks went very well. There were discussions on Russia, on Japan. The Chinese raised Taiwan but not very vigorously. A discussion of Chinese reforms and where they were going. Reminiscing about Bush's days in China. Baker raised human rights and Tibet. When I say it went well, partly it was because the reception was so terrific until that last incident, all these other factors I've mentioned. The President also did address the Chinese people which in those days was significant. They did have good discussions at the beginning of the President's term sketching the future of U.S.-Chinese relations and our common interests and talking about issues like Japan where he had just come from, and Russia, and some of the other areas. There may well have been some further movement on exchanges in bilateral agreements, but remember we only had about a three weeks advance notice on this. He was a brand new President, so the purpose was not to make breakthroughs, but to establish a positive tone to the beginning of the relationship as he came into office.

Before this, under Reagan, Secretary Shultz visited China a couple of times during my tenure as did almost every other cabinet official. It was a sign of the times and a fortunate window of opportunity we had during those years. We had three different CIA directors coming in black hats. We had a couple of Secretaries of Defense. Shultz was there twice. Almost every other cabinet level economic type, not to mention directors of USIA and Peace Corps and all kinds of Under Secretaries, Assistant Secretaries, Congressional delegations which I encouraged. High level visits from everyone from the Stock Exchange to President Carter to Billy Graham to Kissinger to Gregory Peck, Charlton Heston. A great variety. It made it a lot of fun and also helped to expand our relationship and our bilateral links. Probably the single most positive visit and the most important one was Secretary Shultz's trip from March 1 to March 6, 1987.

LORD: Anyway, it started out in Guilin on a boat trip, and he came to Beijing where he met the Foreign Minister, Li Peng, the Vice Premier, the Defense Minister, President Yang, Zhao Ziyang, who at that time was Party Secretary. Of course he met with the Embassy staff. Deng Xiaoping. A couple of press conferences and speeches and so on. He went up to Dalian and visited this U.S.-sponsored institute training people in business and management. I pushed hard for that visit, even though some were trying to drop it. Then he went on down to Shandong and visited Mount Tai where you climb to the top and Qufu, the birthplace of Confucius, and then out through Shanghai. It was a pretty long trip for a Secretary of State in those days, about six days, March 1-6, 1987. Indeed after the trip, even though it got extremely positive coverage, there was some inquiry and carping about the expense, the number of people, and how long he had been there. It's peanuts compared with other entourages since then, but at the time it was a very minor flap, and we had to explain how important it was.

I had been back in Washington that January to help script the trip. If I do say so we were pretty good on these high level trips, scene setters and think pieces ahead of time and careful work by advance people, advice. I was with Shultz every step of the way, helping him on this, as my wife was with Mrs. Shultz. It was an important time, because as I pointed out earlier there were the Hu Yaobang sacking and some tightening up and some other developments in our relationship. There was less momentum, a slowing down in our relations before this trip. I think this was an important one in terms of resuming that momentum. It was the first trip as I say after Hu was sacked. On our domestic scene, we had the Iran-Contra issue flaring up. Each side's domestic scene was a little shaky. The strategic purpose of the trip, against the backdrop of these domestic events, was to make sure that we moved forward again in our relationship and our agenda on the bilateral front and to have in depth discussions on the international issues which included Russia, Afghanistan, Indochina, Korea, the Iran-Iraq War. Then a lot of emphasis on the economic agenda both in the discussions and the meeting at the Dalian Institute and the McDonnell-Douglas plane factory in Shanghai and so on. Also he saw many parts of the country. He gave a couple of important speeches and toasts, including on American values like Reagan had done at Fudan, and I stressed that was important to do. Also a careful formulation on Taiwan which in effect said we would welcome any progress between Taiwan and Beijing. We had some formulations. They were not dramatically new. They didn't upset Taiwan, but they gave some encouragement to the Chinese about our position. I did recommend that he not do this on Taiwan at the beginning of his trip in Beijing. It might get so much attention that it would dominate the rest of his trip, but rather do it in Shanghai toward the end.

Since there was some obvious debate going on in China among the leadership on political reform given what had happened in preceding months, I warned the Secretary not to be snowed by what would inevitably be a show of unity and solidarity by the Chinese leaders. I pointed out the tensions in the wake of the Hu fall. I urged him, and he did do this much more than Bush was to do later, to state carefully both in his public speeches and his private remarks, that the gathering repression or the falling back on the liberalization however modest, was not good for China, and also wasn't good for American opinion. It was important to the relationship, discussion among the media, academics, and Congressmen. Many of the latter, Congressmen and academics, were beginning to send letters on treatments of intellectuals and artists. There was a contrast in China to the developing positive events in Russia under Gorbachev. The Secretary did raise some of these themes.

The Chinese didn't react negatively.

I had a lot of talks with the Secretary privately about the Washington scene. At another time, by the way, the Secretary was in the middle of the Iran-Contra debate. As you may recall, at some point Poindexter had been fired and the Tower Commission had been set up. Also we listened to the President's speech on this issue, on the train between Shandong and Shanghai. But at one point, there were rumors that Shultz was thinking of resigning, and I had sent him a private very personal message, literally personal. It must have been through CIA close hold channel urging him to stay on and why I thought it was important and his contributions and so on. Obviously, I didn't turn him around myself, but I know he appreciated that. It was important to send such a message.

So, I felt this trip did provide new momentum in the relationship. Both sides could say that despite our somewhat uneasy domestic scenes, we can and we will move ahead. We agreed with the Chinese on new contacts with the North Koreans through our respective Embassies in Beijing, trying to encourage north-south dialogues. We began to preview how we might begin to liberalize some exports of technology, again if Beijing behaved itself in other areas. We agreed to a PRC Consulate in Los Angeles. We got some movement in reciprocity issues of interest to us. Shultz gave a good rundown on U.S.-Russian relations. We relayed to the Chinese Foreign Minister and economic ministers and others our concerns about business, trade, and investment problems. None of this is necessarily dramatic, but it gave substance as well as logistic smoothness to a very complicated trip. One of the Secretary's secretarial staff said it was the most complicated Secretarial trip they had. I was really proud of the performance of our embassy and consulates.

Let me now return to the end of my tenure as Ambassador.

In the wake of the Bush trip and for the remainder of my stay, there was still obviously continuing ferment for political reform and dissent. I don't want to exaggerate this, but clearly the debate was continuing and we were reporting on this. Nobody I'm aware of either inside or outside of China predicted or could have known of the size of the demonstrations that were about to come.

As we were saying our good-byes, we had a tremendous sendoff, lots of parties and the usual speeches and so on. We had one party for Chinese at our house on April 15, a week before we were leaving. We heard at that party that Hu Yaobang had died. This is in Bette's book, Legacies, at the beginning. Little did we know that was to be a signal for a major event in Chinese history. Hu had always been known as someone unpredictable and spontaneous, feisty, unlike most stodgy Chinese leaders, and had been liberal on political reform and Tibet and related issues. In retrospect he was built up as even more of a liberal hero than was actually the case. In any event, Chinese intellectuals and students saw him as someone who was hopeful. They were unhappy to say the least about his having been sacked a couple years earlier, as well as the continuing lack of real political reform in China. Thus, starting relatively slowly but building up quickly, people reacted to his death by circulating poems and posters and wreaths to his honor, and people began to demonstrate in Tiananmen Square in relatively modest numbers. A state funeral was ordered for Tiananmen Square on April 22, the day Bette and I were leaving China, by coincidence. On that day there was a huge, very big crowd of roughly 100,000 people with the excuse of paying tribute to Hu but also beginning to demonstrate on behalf of greater freedom and democracy, against corruption, against nepotism, for better conditions in school and universities etc. We were reporting this fully, of course, but I felt as I left, although this was very significant obviously, I had no idea that it would mushroom and get to the point that it did. Let alone the massacre a couple of months later. Indeed Bette and I went on from China, had a stop in Singapore, and were invited to a private dinner around his pool by Prime Minister Lee Kwan Yu, who I had known favorably off and on. He asked me in this private dinner with all his leadership what was going to happen in China. I said that I thought it was significant, but controllable and manageable - showing how prescient I was.

Q: Well, I think we really are talking about something that even at the time, to me it was fairly obvious as an unknowledgeable person about the thing, that this was something that a moderately apt leadership could deal with. You know, you see some people; you do some things. You could have turned this thing off.

LORD: Absolutely. One reason I was so outraged by the massacre was that it was unnecessary. Particularly in the early part of this, the first couple of weeks, the actual requests by the students and others were very modest, essentially to have a dialog with the government. There were some stunted dialogue with Li Peng and others, but basically they were not asking for anything revolutionary. There were occasional signs that were insulting, but basically it was obviously very peaceful. As I said earlier, no violent incidents or death in 49 days. And it was all walks of life so clearly it was important. A leadership that had its act together and was moderately inclined could have defused this thing. I remain convinced of that to this day. Obviously there was debate in the Politburo. They were paralyzed as to how to respond. There were those, probably Li Peng and some of the military from the beginning who felt that any demonstration however peaceful in the center of Tiananmen Square with all its history was either inherently dangerous or symbolically dangerous. They ought to squash it right away. There were others like Zhao Ziyang and some other generals including a former Minister of Defense who wrote to the leadership saying don't use force. They thought they ought to meet the students part way. They were paralyzed, and when Gorbachev came, they felt particularly insulted because they couldn't greet him at Tiananmen Square. They had to greet him at the airport. What was supposed to be a major rapprochement with Russia was overshadowed by the demonstrations. In front of worldwide media attention. That made them mad. They held off until Gorbachev's visit because they didn't want to make a big incident beforehand. They began to tighten the screws after that. The history is familiar to everyone. I don't have to go through it.

Personally, it turns out by coincidence my wife had to double back to China. A few months earlier when we knew we were leaving, Don Hewitt of 60 Minutes visited China and knew then that Gorbachev was coming in May to see the Chinese which was a major event that CBS and the other networks were going to cover. So, they asked my wife, knowing we'd be gone by then, whether she would come back and be a commentator on television on the Gorbachev visit, essentially giving background pieces on Chinese culture and history and so on. We checked this out carefully with the White House and the State Department to make sure there was no problem with the wife of a former Ambassador doing this. It was clear from the beginning that she wouldn't be identified as such. She would just be identified as a Chinese-American author. They said fine. We thought it would be a totally conventional nice puff piece type of thing, and she'd come back to China for that.

Well, by the time we left, this thing had heated up and CBS wanted her back right away. She had made the commitment, but she had no idea she would be covering such an historical event. So, after Singapore, she went back to China and I went back to the U.S. She was a commentator on CBS until late May when she left thinking the crisis was over. The numbers in the Square were dwindling, getting down to a few thousand. The authorities clearly could have declared victory and gotten out, but they wanted to move in a show of force. People know the history. She was there commentating almost every day, and she was there when the Chinese pulled the plug on the feed to CBS. She acted as interpreter for Dan Rather and stalled as much as she could until he got there; they did have to deal with him rather than a producer. She did a fabulous job as commentator, but always identified only as an author.

Meanwhile I went back to Washington and was deluged by the media once I left the State Department. I appeared on all the major TV, radio shows, in which I supported the Administration. In support of the demonstrations, I expressed the hope that the Chinese government would act with restraint and meet the students and other protesters halfway with their reasonable demands, but of course, was very tough in my statements after the massacre. Having said that, I still felt we ought to stay engaged with China as I said in an earlier interview. Over the summer I wrote, and that fall, I published in Foreign Affairs magazine an article called "The Big Chill" which was very tough on the Chinese on Tiananmen Square and the lack of political reform, but also pointed out why political reform was in their self interest and not just a favor to us. Then I made the case that while pressing human rights we should continue to engage China and move ahead with the relationship.

As I have said elsewhere there were tremendous exchanges of delegations and visitors and negotiations and agreements throughout my period as Ambassador. We were lucky to have this positive window. Without trying to give an exhaustive list of any kind, let me give an example of a couple of months period. In the spring and summer of 1987 the following happened. These are just the major events, not Assistant Secretary and below level or other events. In a two to three month period we had a ministerial level meeting of the Joint Commission on Science and Technology; a visit by CINCPAC; a visit by former President Carter; a visit by the Attorney General, Ed Meese; Henry Grunwald, the editor in chief of Time magazine; Pam Harriman leading a delegation; Brent Scowcroft, former National Security Advisor; Henry Kissinger; Charles Wick, head of USIA; Senator Cranston; several other congressional delegations; the U.S. Air Force Band; Ambassador Walters, our UN Ambassador; Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor; former Ambassador Anne Armstrong for security matters; Tom Brokaw in an NBC special on China; and a few other assorted events. This gives you an example of the kind of pace that we had and the interesting and positive exchanges.

[Kennedy] Today is August 7, 1998. Nancy Bernkopf Tucker is with us and will be asking some questions concerning filling in on China. Could you explain what the student demonstrations were, when they happened, and then how you dealt with them?

LORD: We actually covered a great deal of that, but not with any great precision, partly because of my memory and partly because, by coincidence, I was actually in the United States at the time. So just to go over it and at the risk of some repetition I should say that at the end of 1986 there were demonstrations in Shanghai by students. As I recall, these dealt with the typical student issues of greater academic freedom, corruption, and inflation, probably political issues as well. These demonstrations were thought to have been partly inspired by Fang Lizhi and other scholars who were debating these issues at the time. As I recall, there was no bloodshed, but there were widespread demonstrations. I only remember their taking place in Shanghai. By coincidence, I was in the United States on vacation at the time. I kept in very close touch with this development in case it developed into something more serious.

However, what was most significant was the fallout in terms of Chinese domestic policy. Hu Yaobang was then Secretary of the Communist Party of China. He was known even then and, of course, has been known, in retrospect, to have been more progressive on political reforms than most Chinese leaders. As a result of these student demonstrations, there was debate in the Politburo of the Party on responsibility for the unrest. As a result, Deng Xiaoping sacked Hu at some point in the succeeding months.

We in the Embassy, of course, covered these demonstrations at the time as matters of great significance. In retrospect, they were something like a tremor in advance of the earthquake in June, 1989, which none of us, as I've said elsewhere, would have predicted would occur on such a large scale. Again, as I recall, the earlier demonstration in 1986 was fairly peaceful.

Of course, the sacking of Hu Yaobang was very important because he was the heir apparent to Deng, as the Secretary of the Communist Party. Deng had already taken himself out of day to day operations, though he was still the number one person in China by far. There were several reasons for the sacking of Hu. First, Deng had always had a balancing act of including more progressive people like Hu and Zhao Ziyang in the leadership as well as more conservative people like Li Peng. Deng had to watch the balance. Deng himself may have felt somewhat vulnerable from the conservatives, because of the unrest. Therefore, he threw Hu to the wolves. We felt that that was one element in play.

Secondly, Deng was convinced, to some degree, of the dangers of liberalism. This was not just opportunism to protect himself. Deng had never been notably in favor of liberalization of the regime. He was very conservative on this front, even as he had been very receptive to economic reforms and on the opening to the outside world. Thus, Deng probably felt that Hu had gone too far. Deng himself had been concerned about the unrest. After all, he was Mao Zedong's right hand man in the anti-rightist campaign. He was to be, in fact, the author of the Tiananmen massacre.

Thirdly, Deng was probably a little uncomfortable with Hu's style. Hu was spontaneous and feisty and said what he believed. He was much more colorful and unpredictable than most Chinese leaders. This had led to some complaints among the Chinese leadership.

So I think that there was a mix of reasons for sacking Hu Yaobang. Also in the succeeding months, it was not just a question of sacking Hu; there was a general process of tightening up under way. As I said earlier, in this period of the late 1980s there was considerable discussion among academics, scholars, students, and writers, many of whom we met in the Embassy, and particularly through my wife's contacts as well as those of the Embassy, about political reform and about the need to open up on that front. There seemed to be more tolerance on these issues in China. So there was that kind of ferment at the time.

However, in the wake of these Shanghai demonstrations, not only was Hu sacked but they undertook some of these conservative, ideological campaigns. I believe that these campaigns included the "Four Cardinal Principles." Don't ask me to repeat these socialist tenets, but that was one thing that they did. There were also campaigns against spiritual pollution and bourgeois liberalization, guarding against peaceful evolution, which was their code word for Western and foreign ideas undermining Marxist and Communist political principles. There was a tightening up in the cultural field, as well, during this period. That campaign lasted for several months.

Q: [Bernkopf] Could you say anything about what some American leaders thought about China, but not of other countries? I'm thinking particularly here about former Secretary of State George Shultz. Do you have any sense of what his views were and how important he thought China was, particularly in terms of China versus Japan?

LORD: Yes. Secretary Shultz was clearly in favor of engagement with China. He recognized the strategic as well as the economic importance of dealing with China. He recognized that in the next century China will be increasingly important. He saw the impact of China on regional and global issues, as well as the very extensive, bilateral interests we had in China, including the economic area, which is of particular concern to Shultz. Like any responsible, American leader, he didn't like the Chinese political system and felt that human rights were a legitimate part of our agenda. However, he also didn't feel that the Chinese-American relationship should be held hostage to this issue. Therefore, he would raise it and we would raise it and press on it, even as we hoped for progress. We thought that this was in China's own self-interest, involving economic reform and opening up China to the outside world, with the U.S. and others encouraging this trend. We realized that we would have to move ahead with an imperfect regime because of our other interests to promote this broader agenda.

So I would say, in terms of the current debate, that now he should speak for himself. However, I believe that Shultz would be closer to the Bush and Kissinger viewpoint, and now the current Clinton viewpoint. He would differ from those in Congress who would attach a higher priority to the human rights dimension. He would not ignore human rights but he would stress the need for engagement with China.

Q: [Bernkopf] He had trouble with other members of the Reagan administration over Iran-Contra issues. Was China ever such a contentious issue?

LORD: I don't recall that China was ever an issue for debate during the Reagan administration during my time of service. There were periodic debates on China policy during the early part of this administration, which other persons can document. Reagan came into office as being pro-Taiwan and, obviously, a first-class anti-communist. Al Haig came in as Secretary of State, after having worked with Kissinger on the opening to China. He clearly pressed Reagan in a more positive direction. I am sure that there was a lot of debate in the Reagan administration over the Shanghai Communiqué of 1982, which defused the arms sales question. The Chinese put the heat on this issue during the early part of the first Reagan administration.

You will recall that around the end of 1985 I arrived in China as Ambassador, following my previous position as President of the Council on Foreign Relations. By the time I arrived in China, we had signed the 1982 Communiqué and President Reagan had been to China. He had spoken very firmly on values but also urged the development of the Chinese-American relationship. The atmosphere eased greatly, both in bilateral terms and even, to a certain extent, within China. By then there was unanimity within the Reagan administration on China policy, although there may have been some disagreement on particular, tactical issues or negotiations. However, on the general strategy of engagement, even though we kept in mind our values, I don't recall that there was any real dispute on China policy at any time.

Q: [Bernkopf] I remember that I worked in the Department of State at that time. The way we described the Chinese-American relationship was that it had matured to a point where we anticipated that nothing could derail it again. So I think that this was a period of great optimism for those of us who were working on Chinese affairs.

LORD: I think that, as I've said previously, it's not that we didn't have problems with Chinese policy, tough negotiations, or some problems with human rights in China or Tibet. However, on the whole, during this period we were greatly expanding our contacts and our constituencies regarding the relationship on both sides. There were high level visits and negotiations. So it was the most positive period in our relations from the Nixon opening right up to today.

Q: [Bernkopf] Along those lines, and you may already have answered this question, but just to be specific, what was the attitude of Paul Wolfowitz, who has emerged more recently as a critic of Clinton administration policy toward China? I think that he left the Department of State in 1986 or 1987.

LORD: He was Assistant Secretary for East Asian Affairs during the first part of my tenure in China as Ambassador. Then Gaston Sigur was Assistant Secretary for East Asian Affairs after that.

Q: [Bernkopf] Could you talk about both of them in terms of their views on China and maybe then any differences in operating style?

LORD: First, it's only fair that they speak for themselves, of course.

Q: [Kennedy] I have interviewed Gaston Sigur but I haven't interviewed Paul Wolfowitz.

LORD: Let me say right off, and this is not to show happy collegiality, that I don't recall any distinctive, real debates with Paul Wolfowitz or Gaston Sigur. Sometimes, Paul and I would tangle on personnel matters or things like that. However, I had very good relations with both Wolfowitz and Sigur. They are both very bright and both in favor of the opening to China. I think that both of them put a great deal of emphasis on geopolitical, security, and strategic aspects of U.S. relations with China, and not just the economic aspects. At the time the economic aspects were of growing importance but nowhere near as important as they are today. Both Wolfowitz and Sigur were concerned with human rights, but, again, although these were an important part of our agenda, they were not enough to hold up the development of our whole relationship with China. So I don't recall any significant differences with either one of them or with the views of either one of them.

I think that both Wolfowitz and Sigur were concerned at all times that we should not undermine Taiwan. I know that they were both firm on that front, as I was, as well. This is not a very interesting answer, but I believe that it is accurate.

Q: [Kennedy] I don't recall your mentioning it but, for the record, I recall that both Wolfowitz and Sigur were Assistant Secretaries of State for East Asian Affairs.

LORD: They were Assistant Secretaries of State during the first and second parts of my tenure as Ambassador to China.

Q: [Bernkopf] Were there any significant differences between these two men in operating style that are worth noting?

LORD: Nothing that really jumps out at me. They are obviously different personalities. Paul Wolfowitz is a more dynamic and blunt type. Gaston Sigur is more soft spoken and gentlemanly, but that doesn't mean that he doesn't have strong views. In terms of dealing with the Embassy in Beijing, on a day to day basis, and this is natural and correct, our work with the Department was most often either with the Country Desk or with the Deputy Assistant Secretary in charge of Chinese Affairs, who in this case was J. Stapleton Roy, who did an outstanding job. He was a solid supporter, as I was of his in the mid-'90s when he was Ambassador to China and I was Assistant Secretary.

So, on a day to day basis, I would deal most often and directly with Stape Roy. This was only natural, as the Assistant Secretary himself has to cover the whole East Asian region. I dealt with Stape Roy more than with either Gaston Sigur or Paul Wolfowitz. I couldn't have had a better back up than Stape Roy, in terms of intelligence, loyalty, openness, and deep knowledge. In addition, I had very cooperative and solid backup in the Pentagon led by Rich Armitage, who was Assistant Secretary of Defense for International Security Affairs. Jim Kelly, and others were also helpful. I would consult closely with all of them when I was home, and we all worked together very well.

Q: [Bernkopf] You mentioned Taiwan. I just wanted to say, and perhaps this is the last thing I would want to mention, that this was the beginning of a period of tremendous change in Taiwan. That is, it was the beginning of the process of democratization and of real change. This was a change which, one can even argue, completely altered our perspective on Taiwan. Suddenly, Taiwan became what we always wanted it to be, with an open, democratic process.

How skeptical were people in charge in the State Department and you, as Ambassador to China, about these changes in Taiwan? How much of a surprise were they? How much of an impact did they make in terms of your view of the balance between China and Taiwan?

LORD: I can't speak for others, but my own view was, first, that I was not skeptical of these changes in Taiwan. On the contrary, I was encouraged by the changes in Taiwan. Chiang Ching-kuo was followed as President of China by Lee Teng-hui.

Chiang Ching-kuo had started in the right direction. He was able to do that because he had the mantle of his father, Chiang Kai-shek, so he could hardly be accused of doing anything against him. In a sense, Chiang Ching-kuo opened doors on the political process. It was easier for him to do this because he was part of his family. Therefore, this protected him against opposition and legitimized the great, further steps that his successor, Lee Teng-hui, took. It also made it possible for someone born in Taiwan (Lee) to be the leader of the country. So, Chiang Ching-kuo's contribution was very significant. I forget when he died, but his contribution was very meaningful. Although they weren't close to open elections in Taiwan while I was Ambassador to China, the Taiwanese were clearly moving in the right direction.

I was not skeptical about the changes in Taiwan. I was encouraged. I also felt, even as I do today, that these changes, if not inevitable, were predictable. In my view we have seen economic progress in Asia and the aspirations of the middle class reflect the universal principle that man or woman does not live by rice alone. This process has been at work in Taiwan as well.

I was consistently in favor of maintaining strong, unofficial ties with Taiwan and not giving in to unreasonable Chinese demands, even as we balanced off our interests with mainland China. So my own views certainly didn't change. I felt that we had a moral and historical connection to Taiwan in any event and that we should stand by our friends. If anything, of course, their movement toward a freer political system reinforced my view that we should strongly support Taiwan even as we moved ahead with China. I believe that six American presidents of both political parties have done very well in carrying out this balancing act.

I don't recall now the impact the changes in Taiwan had on China. These changes didn't affect our policy. We have pursued a consistent policy which had been set out by previous administrations, in which I served. Taiwan has always been a key issue with the mainland Chinese. There is no way that you could have a high level meeting with the mainland Chinese without the Taiwan question coming up.

My recollection of that period when I was Ambassador to China is that the Taiwan issue was not as hot as it is today or was, when we opened diplomatic relations with mainland China or during the early years of the Reagan Administration. The Taiwan issue was always there, but the mainland Chinese were already deploying troops away from the coast facing Taiwan and were concerned about the Polar Bear to the North [i.e., Russia] and the Vietnamese to the South. As I recall it, the rhetoric concerning Taiwan was obviously unpleasant but not at a very high decibel level. Taiwan was not an issue that they kept beating us over the head with at our various meetings. Taiwan has always been and will continue to be a key issue in our relations with China. However, I felt that throughout this period it was quite a manageable matter.

Q: [Kennedy] I would have thought that you belonged to the Kissinger school of realpolitik. In this context Taiwan, as a rather small area, has really been screwing things up with China by doing exactly what we would want and would aspire to have them do. However, the gap between what Taiwan has been and what it is becoming has been growing. It's going to be harder and harder for the United States and the world to refuse to accord recognition to Taiwan. I would think that, in terms of policy planning and looking at the matter with the cold eye of what's in it for us, this, in a way, would be a disturbing development. Did you find this to be a consideration?

LORD: No, not at all. I really felt that the changes in Taiwan were - and are - an encouraging development. They are good for the people of Taiwan. Initially, we didn't have as extensive a debate as we have had in recent years on universal versus so-called Asian values. This is a phoney debate and Taiwan's move toward democracy proves that. I think that these changes in Taiwan are not only good for Taiwan itself but are a good example generally in the world, in Asia, and to show that Chinese people want freedom, too - a strong message to the mainland.

I don't recall Congressional sentiment bubbling up about a need to be more pro-Taiwan and anti-mainland China because Taiwan was becoming freer, and mainland China wasn't. I don't think that the Taiwan issue really complicated our policy toward China while I was Ambassador. Above all, speaking personally, I've always set great store about promoting our values. I've been insistent on that. Clearly, I also have geopolitical instincts since I worked for Kissinger and I think that these are legitimate. However, you have to balance off these considerations. My only reaction to these changes in Taiwan is a feeling of pleasure for the people of Taiwan. If anything, these changes might encourage political liberalization in China, at least in a modest way. Now of course you could argue that Deng Xiaoping and others who are more conservative might see developments in Taiwan as a threat to their position. However, I think that they were looking more particularly at what was happening in mainland China.

It is hard to judge the impact of what has been happening in Taiwan on the people in China. I suspect that Taiwan developments didn't have much of an impact on them in the past. You should recall that when I was Ambassador to China the authorities in Taiwan were loosening up, but they had by no means reached the point of free elections. So the situation in Taiwan had by no means approached the dramatic point which it reached by the early 1990s.

Q: [Bernkopf] I would like to raise one more issue and that is the situation in Korea. This was also a period when the Chinese were moving toward developing diplomatic relations with South Korea. I was wondering to what, if any, extent the mainland Chinese have tried to bring the American Embassy into this process in terms of how you saw it and what you thought the implications were, as well as whether you worried about what the North Koreans would do in the event of normalization of diplomatic relations between China and South Korea.

LORD: I would like to make a couple of comments on Korea. First, South Korean diplomacy was very skillful. Events started moving toward improved relations with China toward the latter part of my tenure as Ambassador to China. I think that in this context one of the key events was the Olympic Games in Seoul in 1988. Both mainland China and Russia agreed to attend the Seoul Olympic Games. The Eastern European countries agreed to attend as well.

Basically, by that time the economic performance of South Korea was terrific, and the poor economic performance of North Korea was becoming clear. South Korea was eclipsing North Korea after starting out, perhaps behind it in the 1950s or even in the 1960s. South Korea was being recognized by more and more countries. Sometimes this involved dual recognition and sometimes it involved recognition just of South Korea. In particular this involved communist countries. The Seoul Olympic Games brought a major breakthrough, both in terms of general prestige but also in achieving attendance at the games and furthering diplomacy behind the scenes with the Russians, the Chinese, and the Eastern Europeans. So this was just the beginning of the mainland Chinese exploring better ties with the South Koreans.

Both the mainland Chinese and the Russians were very careful about their North Korean flank at this point, although North Korea was clearly unhappy about mainland Chinese and Russian attendance at the Seoul Olympic Games.

The other side of this situation was that the U.S. was exploring improved contacts with North Korea as well, in close consultation with South Korea. My view is that South Korea ought to take the lead in this process. We had some initial contacts in Beijing through our political section. I believe that Ray Burghardt was the key contact with the North Koreans. These contacts never really got anywhere, but they were the first contacts that I can recall taking place. These initial contacts probably took place in 1988, although I would have to check that.

On our way to the airport on April 22, our second faithful Chinese driver gave Bette and me a photo album of demonstrations for Zhou En-lai in Tiananmen Square in 1976, with preserved leaves included. He asked us to keep this gift secret. Our first driver (also for Bush) had been retired by the Chinese the year before. He cried on his last day. He died soon after. The Chinese didn't allow me to go to his funeral. For further personal accounts of our stay in China, I recommend "Legacies - A Chinese Mosaic" by my wife.

The day before I left Beijing (April 21), I sent a final cable which I personally drafted summing up the state of U.S.-Chinese relations. I enclose here the full text.

Farewell Cable From Ambassador Lord on April 21, 1989

From Ambassador Winston Lord to Washington and key posts.

1. (Confidential - Entire text.)
2. I depart Beijing tomorrow with both a solid sense of progress and an awareness of fresh challenges in the relationship between the United States and the People's Republic of China. These are the themes sounded in my farewell meetings with China's top leadership, notably an April 19 tripleheader with the President, the Premier, and the General Secretary. Much of the progress is due to world events, Washington policies, USUN efforts, the private sector or just plain serendipity. The Chinese, of course, have made their own great efforts. This embassy and our consulates, I believe, have also played their part. The challenges - and indeed some tension - will be perpetual as befits two such contrasting nations. But some of our new problems flow from past success. And they will be resolved or managed if the Chinese and we act wisely, recognizing that our common interests clearly outweigh our inevitable differences.
3. This message will focus on the concrete and programmatic in our bilateral relations. For my analysis of China's foreign policy and domestic scene, I refer the interested reader to the personal scenesetter I wrote for President Bush's February visit (reftel). In that paper, I stated that China was prospering in the world while floundering at home. There weeks from now Gorbachev and Deng will clasp hands. In a few hours as I head for the airport there will be a memorial service for Hu Yaobang near Tiananmen Square, filled for days with protesting students. Progress.
4. Since November 1985 Sino-American relations have greatly advanced and further matured. The foundations have been broadened and deepened in a wide variety of fields. Highlights and recommendations include the following.
5. Visits.

A steady two-way stream of high-level and working-level visitors, most notably President Bush, has provided impetus, enriched perspectives, nurtured personal links, and strengthened domestic support for a positive relationship. Such exchanges, including distinguished private citizens, will remain crucial. In particular we should continue to encourage congressional delegations, given the many issues involving Capitol Hill.

6. Political dialogue.

Our discussions with Beijing on international topics have changed the PRC position on Silkworms, generated greater Chinese responsibility on ballistic missiles, and substantially modified their approach to the Khmer Rouge in Cambodia. The Chinese, in turn, (along with Japan and South Korea) helped to improve our posture on the INF agreement. We have closely compared notes on the Soviet Union and provided mutual reassurance. We have enhanced collaboration or CONFIDENTIAL Section 02 10 Beijing 11017.

Comprehension in other areas such as Afghanistan, the Gulf War, and Korea, where the Chinese have facilitated our dialogue here with the North Koreans. The Chinese have somewhat moderated their Third World rhetoric and become more cooperative at the United Nations. They have relaxed their positions toward some of our friends, such as Israel and South Korea. On Central America Beijing has been more sensitive to our concerns and even tossed a bouquet at our latest initiative. We have successfully managed the Taiwan question.

7. In some areas, of course, it has been hard going or worse. Prominent examples include Tibet, population policy, and human rights generally. On others there are promising beginnings, such as dugs and arms control, or potential for initiating exchanges, such as on terrorism and the environment.

8. Overall, as the President and Chinese leaders recently agreed, we need to make our dialogue on international topics even more systematic at the working level.

9. Economic cooperation.

Nowhere has our growth been more impressive. Annual trade has leapt 100 percent the past three years, exceeding $14 billion in 1988. Agricultural sales have risen from negligible levels to $1.2 billion this year. We are China's second largest export market and, with $3.4 billion committed, the leading investing country. Our export controls on technology have been significantly eased in recent years and yesterday we reached agreement that will include China in our distribution system. We have continued to implement the trade development program, over 25 percent of whose budget has been dedicated to feasibility studies for major Chinese projects. During the past three years we have forged new agreements on civil aviation, taxes, textiles and maritime cooperation.

10. The record is mixed at best on other economic fronts. The investment climate has been substantially improved since 1985, symbolized by opening ceremonies I have attended ranging from one of the world's largest coal mines to the world's largest Kentucky Fried Chicken. But major obstacles and frustrations remain for American business. The current credit and liquidity crunch of domestic retrenchment is having a significant adverse impact. Longer term problems include Chinese practices, soft loans from our competitors, and residual technology controls. We have gotten nowhere on a bilateral investment treaty. In the past year we have moved intellectual property rights from almost footnote status to the very top of our bilateral economic agenda. We have been intensifying our education campaign. The Chinese remain serious violators; and this issue could be among our most troublesome near-term problems in bilateral relations. We have consulted thoroughly on China's GATT application, but its trade reforms must be advanced in order to avoid a heavily safeguarded admission. We need to reinvigorate the JCCT and JEC. On the former we have now agreed with the Chinese to flesh out our proposal for working groups to effect more concrete progress.

11. Science and technology programs.

Our thirty protocols constitute the largest bilateral program either country conducts. We face the continuing challenges to improve the balance of mutual benefits and the commercial applications. And we have correctly hinged the five-year renewal of the umbrella accord on satisfactory Chinese assurances on protection of intellectual property rights. After intensive negotiations we reached a major agreement on satellite launches with the Chinese which will marry Chinese rockets with American satellites on a case-by-case basis.

12. Our military ties have been substantially enriched over the past three years, notwithstanding a temporary pause induced by the missile issue. Virtually every top military leader on both sides has recently crossed the Pacific and a heavy schedule of further trips will unfold during the remainder of this year. Meanwhile working level delegations expand our professional links. One of the most dramatic events of my tenure was the first visit ever to the People's Republic by American naval ships in the autumn of 1986. A year later the U.S. Air Force Thunderbirds performed over Beijing. Earlier this month I saw off the first PRC warship ever to visit the West. More American vessels will steam into Shanghai while Gorbachev is in China, perhaps in Shanghai itself. We have been implementing $800 million worth of defensive weapons sales and are exploring possible new items.

13. We will need to continue measuring our tread in our military cooperation. It projects useful symbolism and enlists constituencies in the PLA which could play a key role in Beijing's future orientation. But as China grows stronger, so will apprehensions among its Asian neighbors about its intentions and possibly our involvement.

14. Educational and cultural exchanges.

These have mushroomed since 1985, due to one of the most fertile USIA programs anywhere and the proper, expanding, indispensable role of the private sector. American campuses welcome more than 35,000 Chinese students, over half of all those abroad. Increasing numbers of American students and teachers are coming to China, including 25 Fulbrighters at fifteen universities. The world's largest international visitors program has sent almost 300 present and future Chinese leaders to the U.S. VOA reaches and affects tens of millions of Chinese, from ordinary citizens to the highest leaders. We have recently installed a TVRO and are stepping-up direct trans-Pacific dialogue through WorldNet as well as placing programs on Chinese television. President Bush was the first foreign leader to address the Chinese people live on television. I was the first American Ambassador to be interviewed on the Chinese screen (or, to introduce the “Barbarian” Superbowl). Our book program has translated and published fifty-nine titles on American life.

15. Especially young Chinese are beginning to appreciate our culture as well as our technology, thanks to a continual flow of American artists, performers, troupes and exhibits. These range from Ailey to Joffrey, Peck to Heston, Disney to the Redskins, “The Music Man” to the “Caine Mutiny Court Martial,” which is having a remarkable impact here.

16. We can never do enough in these areas. For our most profound challenges include promoting mutual understanding and reaching the younger generations of Chinese. Whenever I succumb to temporary pessimism about China’s future, I need only recall the warmth and enthusiasm in overflowing university auditoriums greeting Mrs. Lord and me - or, more accurately, America.

17. With occasional blips, cultural exchange has progressed despite the periodic clampdown on intellectuals and expression in China. A potentially dicey area is official nervousness about our access to campuses. If this translates into significant obstacles I believe we should consider reciprocal actions against Chinese diplomats in the U.S., while recognizing the dilemmas presented by our free society.

18. Three weeks ago I signed an exchange of letters which will pave the way for the first Peace Corps volunteers ever to serve in a communist country. This is the fruit of four years of strenuous effort. No fruit has tasted sweeter; few programs hold more potential for Sino-American friendship over the long term.

19. Working and living conditions.

Major improvements have lifted both morale and efficiency. Comprehensive reciprocity talks yielded good results on housing and travel, though we are now stalled on almost every front. The separation of negotiations on housing and selective retaliation hopefully will enable us to resume a positive course benefiting both sides. During the past three years we have built a snack bar, swimming pool, and tennis court as well as additional office space. We have moved the international school to spacious new quarters, allowing steady expansion. We have vastly improved our security posture but are still highly vulnerable on the technical side; we urgently need Washington funding to shore up our defenses. We have managed the burgeoning bilateral relationship sketched in this message with no net growth in our personnel ranks since 1985. Our future substantive performance would be enhanced, and our budget greatly reduced, if we required three year tours here of all but junior officers.

Challenges.

20. These areas illustratively document the basically sound and growing nature of our bilateral relations. Much more than in the 1970s this relationship now stands on its own, regardless of our changing ties to other nations. We have multiplied the constituencies on both sides of the Pacific which have a stake in positive bonds. When serious issues surfaced - such as missiles, expulsions, or satellites - each side strove to insulate frictions from the core of our relations, to maintain overall momentum even as specific initiatives might be put on hold.

21. While we can therefore take comfort on broad foundations, we can hardly be complacent. Coming years will bring demanding tests we cannot now foresee: four years ago I would have been amazed if told that Silkworms, Tibetans and dissidents would cause more angst than Taiwan. Our most fundamental challenges, however, are already taking shape. I outlined these in my late 1988 San Francisco and New York speeches and in my farewell remarks these past few weeks. Current headlines symbolize the three broad areas: Gorbachev is coming to town; our traders and investors are being squeezed by retrenchment; and there is palpable Chinese nervousness about domestic dissent.

22. The political challenge.

The international framework for our bilateral relations is changing rapidly. The world of the 1970s has been radically altered; so has the world of the mid-1980s. Washington will have a more comprehensive view of this than those of us here. The underlying trends toward multipolarity and interdependence accelerate. The decline of Marxism and Stalinism, the spread of the market and democracy, are ever more apparent. The age of technology and information has already arrived. Gorbachev seeks to transform the Soviet Union, and Moscow's relations with the United States, China, Eastern and Western Europe dramatically evolve. (Can Japan be far behind?) China grows stronger and more assertive on the world stage.

23. We have coped reasonably well with the impact of these changes on our bilateral relations - whether concerning approaches toward Moscow, regional conflicts, missiles, or satellites. We have every reason to be positive. We can take in stride the coming media blitz over the Deng-Gorbachev summit. The history and geography of Sino-Soviet relations will not change, nor will their long border and overlapping ethnic populations. As the Chairman made amply clear to the President, China will need the United States to balance the Soviet Union - and Japan. China's overwhelming preoccupation with modernization must orient it toward the West for capital, management, technology and trade.

24. Our central task - for our China as for our global interests - is to act responsibly and purposefully around the world. So long as we do, our relations with Beijing should flourish. Early in the next century, when China can project its power and our Asian friends consequently project their concerns, we may have to review the bidding. But a stronger China is much more likely to be responsible - and responsive to us - if we have fully engaged it on international issues and participated in its development.

25. The economic challenge.

As our overall relationship with China matures, so must our economic ties. We have come a very long way from our mutual illusions in the early years after the opening. Our business people - eyeing China's size, population, natural resources, inexpensive labor and needs - held exaggerated visions of the huge China market. Many got burned. The Chinese, in turn, assumed that eager outsiders would pour capital and technology into this country. They were somewhat slow to recognize that they had to offer profits and compete with other markets for foreign attention.

26. Both sides have learned a great deal, often at the cost of considerable frustration. Americans are more realistic about near-term gains and adept at trading and investing in this opaque and bureaucratic environment. Despite well-publicized setbacks, few have gone home. Most are playing for the long-run. And many success stories unfold unnoticed behind the media glare on problems.

Meanwhile the Chinese have substantially improved the investment climate, though its quality varies greatly from one province or city or sector to another. As a result our trade statistics have shot up dramatically the past few years. So have the number of investment projects, though the value remains modest.

27. We have only begun to tap the potential of our economic cooperation. The next two or three years will bring a substantial slow-down overall, and some backsliding in certain areas. The negative effects of the current retrenchment are already being felt. The Chinese clampdown on foreign exchange, credit, construction, and local autonomy will kill or delay many promising deals. One can only hope this period of tightening will be brief and that momentum toward reforms and the opening can be effectively regenerated. If China settles into long-run stagflation or, worse, reverses field back toward central planning and protectionism, then our commercial ties will be seriously affected. So in turn might the stability of China and its overall relationship with the West. I do not believe this will happen, but prudence suggests that it could.

28. Assuming we move through and beyond the retrenchment phase (as we have before), we will still face the more fundamental challenge of reconciling our two very different systems. The mutual imperative will be to loosen up and open up. The United States should increasingly “normalize” its economic relations with China as we have done on the political front. (See the recent Nicholas Lardy report published by the National Committee on U.S.-China relations). This requires further relaxation of strategic controls on technology, consistent with national security. Our anti-dumping approach toward China calls for revision. Protectionism in general needs to be resisted. And other steps, like unconditional MFN and GSP, should be considered in tandem with China’s willingness to free up its own system.

29. If we are to consider such movement on our part, the Chinese must take reciprocal actions. As China becomes more fully engaged in the world economy, it must assume a more open stance. If it wants to gain admission to the GATT, it must liberalize its trading regime. If it wants more technology, it must protect intellectual property rights. If it wants more investment, it must make it profitable. This imposing agenda will demand much of both sides, officials and entrepreneurs alike, during the coming years. The stakes, for our political ties as well as our commercial benefits, are very high.

30. The cultural challenge.

The newest, and perhaps most prickly, problem in our relationship flows from the intermingling of our societies and values. As with our other challenges, the stage has been set by success. The explosion in educational and cultural exchanges, most of it in the private sector, is a major positive force. It enriches both our countries and greatly expands personal networks that will buttress our overall relationship in the future. But Chinese officials resist the intrusion of certain ideas. China has always been particularly wary of foreign cultural contamination, whether because of middle kingdom arrogance or its century long humiliation by foreigners.

31. Several factors have now joined to make the issue of human rights especially sensitive:

The serious economic and corruption problems that have surfaced since last summer have created disaffection among the people and malaise among the leaders. The latter currently place their premium on stability (as Deng and Zhao told the President). They see the free expression of ideas as leading to instability rather than helping them find answers to complex questions.

Dissident activity, traditionally restrained in China, is picking up, including the signing of petitions for amnesty for political prisoners.

As Deng fades from the scene, the jockeying for succession has intensified, adding to political tensions.

Thanks to Gorbachev's "Glasnost" political and cultural reforms in the Soviet Union have outpaced those in China. Chinese intellectuals and artists have been unfavorably comparing their lot with that of their Russian and Eastern European colleagues. Political developments in Hungary and Poland also have caught their attention. Meanwhile, Chinese leaders look with apprehension at the unrest in the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe caused by political reforms.

We have made human rights a prominent part of our agenda with the Soviet Union and achieved some success. The American domestic audience has increasingly questioned the disparity with China. The question I have been most frequently asked in recent public appearances and backgrounders is why we practice a "double standard."

Tibet has emerged in the past one and a half years as a major human rights issue.

The question of U.S. funding for the UNFPA program will focus attention in coming weeks on China's population program.

The death of Hu Yaobang is fueling fresh demonstrations and protests as the 70th anniversary of the May 4 movement looms.

32. Against this backdrop the Chinese are currently defining "stability" in very narrow terms, i.e., the suppression of dissent. So far the smothering of expression has been confined to the political arena and has not appreciably affected cultural life, but it would not be surprising to see it spread there as it has in past campaigns. During the past decade Beijing has generally affirmed that intellectual ferment and creativity was needed to help China find the answers in its perplexing quest for modernization. Political reform was needed alongside economic reform. "Let a hundred flowers bloom." These themes are largely absent today. To be sure, Chinese policies, even when misguided, on the whole show relative improvement. Dissidents are ostracized, or (sometimes) allowed to leave the country, rather than locked up. Continued employment may be allowed even as Party membership is lost. But steam is building up in intellectual circles. Official nationwide campaigns are increasingly difficult to mount because the people won't support them. The Party's image continues to deteriorate. Cynicism is rampant.

There is a feeling that the CCP has lost its ideological bearings and flounders in uncharted waters.

33. It is arrogant for the outsider to judge how best China can balance progress and stability, how fast it can move toward a freer society. But we can hope that China will soon resume again the generally positive course it has pursued since reforms began; that Chinese authorities will make distinctions, for example, between free expression and instant multi-party democracy; that "stability" will be given a more sophisticated definition. For the long run I am hopeful, as younger generations - exposed to Western ideas - seize the reins.

34. For our part we will need to strike a balance in our human rights policy toward China, as we do elsewhere. We should project our values, maintain contact with activists, and register our disapproval concerning abuses. But we must also weigh our strategic, political, economic and other interests. We must employ approaches - sometimes public, sometimes symbolic, often private - which can have a positive impact on China's future course, not just make us feel good.

35. We should maintain an appreciation of the awesome challenges China faces as it seeks to move from one century to another, from one system to another, in a few short decades. We need to have some sense of what is feasible, either in terms of pace or cultural context. We should use carrots as well as sticks, welcoming positive moves and helping the Chinese to develop a legal framework for human rights. We should keep an eye on overall trends, not merely take snapshots.

36. We can hope, but should not expect, other democracies to make human rights a multilateral issue, not just a Sino-American bilateral one. The recent European posture on Tibet has been helpful, but our allies in Europe and Asia will generally let us take the lead - and take the heat. The Soviet Union will try to exploit this issue to its advantage. Some Chinese leaders will be prone to contrast Soviet restraint with American meddling.

37. The Feng Lizhi banquet incident was an unfortunate but minor blemish which did no damage to the relationship. But it was a harbinger of serious tensions to come in the human rights arena. As time passes from the wisdom of our symbolic gesture will be increasingly clear. The Chinese were entirely to blame for their needless escalation. They are geniuses at making foreigners feel guilty and dividing them. One very important lesson to be learned from this episode is not to let them succeed.

Conclusion

38. I am delighted with President Bush's appointment of Jim Lilley as my successor. His broad experience, outstanding career, and closeness to the President make him a superb choice to strengthen our relations with China. I will do all that I can to help him.

39. I conclude with expressions of gratitude to the following:

President Regan for having appointed me.

Those in Washington who have supported me and our mission in China.

The members of this embassy and our consulates during my three and one half year tenure for their talents and their tenacity in the pursuit of excellence. Overall they have formed the best overseas team I have seen in decades of service.

40. For Mrs. Lord and me it has been a joint venture and a joint adventure.

Lord.

End of message

Q: [Kennedy] In the first place, could you explain what you had been doing and how you were tapped for this job of Assistant Secretary of State? It was under a completely different administration and so forth.

LORD: I put together some notes on this and some dates. I left China as Ambassador on April 22, 1989. It was one week after the Tiananmen demonstrations began. It was the date of the funeral of Hu Yaobang. There was a major turnout for the funeral, which perhaps 100,000 people attended.

On my way back to the United States I stopped off in Singapore and had a small dinner with Lee Kuan Yew. I brilliantly predicted that the demonstrations in China, although very important, were manageable by Beijing, as far as I could tell. Even then I was not aware of the magnitude of what was coming.

I got back to the U.S. and spent a lot of time on television and with the radio and print media. Did we cover this?

Q: [Kennedy] I'm not sure, but go ahead.

LORD: I spent a lot of time with the media, commenting on unfolding events in Tiananmen Square, even as my wife had circled back to China as a commentator for CBS Television. This is probably repetitious. I'd better get it straight.

Q: [Kennedy] You talked about her role.

LORD: She was recruited for commentary on Gorbachev's visit to China by Don Hewitt of "60 Minutes." I'm pretty sure that we've been through all of that. Then we went out to Jackson Hole, Wyoming, for three months. During this period my wife wrote a book called "Legacies," which was another best seller, I might add, and chosen by Time magazine as one of the 10 outstanding books of the year. It covered true stories of her family and Chinese of all walks of life, set against the backdrop of Tiananmen Square.

I wrote a long article for "Foreign Affairs" on China policy, looking to the period "Beyond the Big Chill" and the impact of the Tiananmen Square events. In effect, I was very tough on the Chinese regarding the Tiananmen Square incident and on human rights in general. I also made a strong pitch that we had to stay engaged with China and get through this period. That article was published in the fall of 1989.

Q: [Kennedy] I wonder if you could explain how you perceived the role of articles in "Foreign Affairs" magazine at this particular time, because this is important. How were articles like this used within the foreign affairs establishment?

LORD: Keep in mind that I had been the President of the Council on Foreign Relations, which publishes "Foreign Affairs," although the magazine itself is independent of the Council. In fact, to demonstrate that, William P. Bundy, who was the editor of "Foreign Affairs" during most of the time that I was President of the Council, once rejected an article by David Rockefeller, who was then Chairman of the Council's Board of Directors. That demonstrated the real independence of the magazine. To Rockefeller's credit, he never took it out on Bill Bundy. In fact, he admired him for his courage, if not his judgment.

So I think that it's fair to say that, although sometimes people leave copies of "Foreign Affairs" on their coffee tables - the magazine was not as sprightly as it is today - nevertheless, it is among the elite publications reviewed by members of the think tanks, Congress, administration, and media. It is purely concerned about foreign policy and probably has about as much influence as any one magazine can have. It published the famous "Mr X" article on containment [in 1947] by George Kennan. It has published many other distinguished articles.

So I felt that my article and its placement were important in terms of the debate on U.S.-China policy in the wake of Tiananmen Square. Given my credentials and long involvement with China and having just been U.S. Ambassador to China, I felt that this was an appropriate time to set forth my views on the current situation in China.

The article had two elements to it. I was much tougher than the Bush administration on Deng Xiaoping and what the Chinese were up to. Then, having established my credibility on that front and saying that human rights are still very important, I then went on to say that we have great stakes in a better relationship with China. I said that we have to get beyond the big chill in our relations with China. I laid out the reasons for the broad agenda we have with China as we look to the future. I needed the space that a long article like that could give me. I had time to think about this subject when we were out in Jackson Hole, Wyoming, so I put a lot of care into the article.

I checked the article out with Dick Solomon, a predecessor as Assistant Secretary of State for East Asian Affairs, and the administration, without giving him or them any veto on its content. I didn't expect him to make any changes but I wanted to make sure that I didn't have anything inaccurate in the article. I welcomed his views, as an old colleague, going back to the Kissinger days and in recognition of his qualifications as a scholar on China. As I recall, Dick Solomon had some helpful suggestions to make on the article, although they were not really of major significance. He was not uncomfortable about the article. It had not been my purpose as to whether he was uncomfortable with it. I wanted to be sure that I had not left anything out of it or made any inaccuracies. I also believe in the principle of not blindsiding colleagues, especially old friends and coworkers.

I can't judge how much impact the "Foreign Affairs" article had. However, I felt that it was important to express my views.

Q: [Kennedy] Do you think that this article was picked up by people who eventually were going to form the Clinton administration?

LORD: No. This article appeared in the fall of 1989, about three and one-half years away from the entry into office of the Clinton administration. The article was very strong on human rights in China. I note that in succeeding years there were increasing charges that President Bush was too soft on China or that China was too nasty in the field of human rights. The article also had a lot of emphasis on maintaining our engagement with China. I have no way of knowing whether the article had any influence on those who read it. Probably, Warren Christopher read the article. He was to be Secretary of State during the first Clinton term as President. He had been a member of the Board of the Council on Foreign Relations. Probably Tony Lake (to be NSC Advisor) and others in the Clinton administration read it, too. We can come back to this matter later.

During this period I wrote some Op Ed pieces [articles which appear on the page opposite the editorials in some newspapers]. I kept in touch with the media as a commentator on China in particular. I testified before Congress on occasion, essentially on China. I was deposed and testified at some length on the POW/MIA [Prisoner of War/Missing in Action] issue in Vietnam. I believe that I testified on this matter in the summer or fall of 1992. I gave lengthy testimony on the Vietnam Peace Agreement [of 1973], with emphasis on the POW/MIA issue, before Senator John Kerry, Senator Smith, and others. As I said, I gave speeches, either for money or pro bono. I joined the Board and became Vice Chairman of the International Rescue Committee [IRC], the largest, non sectarian organization which both helps refugees abroad and resettles them in the U.S. A few years later, I became co-chairman of the IRC. I became a member of the Board and then Chairman of the National Endowment for Democracy, which promotes freedom and democracy around the world. I was an active member of the Council on Foreign Relations and also worked on projects in other think tanks. I was a member of other groups, like the Trilateral Commission, and on the Board of Advisors for the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy. I have cited other affiliations elsewhere.

Then, for about a year or a year and a half I worked for and with Ambassador Morton Abramowitz, who was then President of the Carnegie Endowment, on a major, national commission on U.S. foreign policy, in the wake of momentous events, including the move toward freedom in the world, globalization, and all of the other elements that you are familiar with. I was Chairman of this Carnegie Endowment's National Commission on America and the World, which put out a report on foreign policy in 1992, looking to the time when the next administration would enter office. This job took up a great deal of my time. This Commission was a very distinguished group. We can go into more detail on it at some other point, if you like.

So I kept up my interests, my work, and certainly my visibility on foreign policy, including on China.

ROBERT GOLDBERG
China Affairs, Mongolia Desk Officer
Washington, DC (1986-1988)

Mr. Goldberg was born and raised in Baltimore, Maryland and educated at Gettysburg College and the University of Chicago. He accompanied his Foreign Service wife on her assignment to Tokyo before entering the Foreign Service in 1983 as Foreign Service Officer. A Chinese language specialist, Mr. Goldberg served both in the State Department of State in Washington, DC and abroad dealing primarily with Economic and Chinese affairs. His overseas posts include Tokyo (as spouse), New Delhi, Hong Kong, Guangzhou and Beijing, where he served twice, once as Deputy Chief of Mission. Mr. Goldberg was interviewed by David Reuther in 2011.

Q: The next job that you get in the summer transfers of 1986 is the China Desk, EAP/CM [Office of China, Mongolia Affairs, Bureau of East Asia Pacific Affairs]. How did you get that job out of the OpsCenter?

GOLDBERG: Well, I knew Dick Williams who was then the desk director. I also knew Chris Szymanski who was Dick's deputy. I went down and interviewed with them. I interviewed for a couple of other jobs – including the Japan desk - but I want to get back into China. So I decided on the China desk, but did not get the specific on the desk that I really wanted - the external political job. That went to Ken Jarrett - a good friend whom I met when I was on the desk. We subsequently served together a couple of times in Beijing - in the late 90s – and then Ken was CG [Consul General] in Shanghai when I was CG in Guangzhou. Probably the better person got the job. They ended up offering me one of the econ jobs on the desk, and there were at that time two econ officers and a deputy director for economic affairs whose job, the first year I was there was Joan Plaisted. She later became Ambassador to the Marshall Islands and continues to do some stuff for EAP, including, for a number of years, the EAP coordinator at the UN.

The other person on the desk who was a real economist - also named Robert Goldberg. The two "Bobs." And lots of confusion. When people called up and asked for Robert Goldberg, they would ask either for the trade Robert Goldberg, or the investment and science and technology Robert Goldberg. Even then people were talking about a bilateral investment treaty. I noticed just the other day the Chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, Dave Camp asked why we hadn't negotiate a bilateral trade and investment treaty with the Chinese. And at that point, in 1986, the Chinese were also starting to make a major commitment to the design and operation of the Three Gorges dam. There were discussions about the role that the Army Corps of Engineers might play.

But it wasn't as interesting or fulfilling a job as I thought it might be, and so I took on a couple of other things. I was my default choice as control officer on the desk when Winston Lord who was Ambassador in China would come back and for Peter Tomsen who was Win's DCM. Also I assisted in putting together books of briefing papers for seventh floor principals who were heading out to China. Standard grunt work that any junior officer does, and I was of course a relatively junior officer. But you learn a lot. You learn about the Department clearance process, which still remains overly cumbersome as far as I'm concerned. You learn about what seventh floor principals need. Control work of that sort has not changed terribly much over the last 25 years. I liked it because it kept me busy when so few of my own issues were in limbo. It was an opportunity to learn from some more experienced professionals.

Q: Now the Embassy was reporting at great length at this time on China's economic reforms. Who was following that, and what was the view in Washington of how China was doing?

GOLDBERG: The three of us, Joan, Robert, and myself would follow those issues. Others on the desk – and elsewhere in the interagency community – were far more interested in the political dynamics of what was happening. Even then, we were trying to engage the Chinese in broader strategic discussions about what was happening in East Asia. You have to recall that this was a key period of political reform in China – many analysts thought party reform was inevitable. Not that China would be democratic, but it would have a different system out of necessity, i.e., giving a voice to those who had none. The DOD had a very wide-ranging series of discussions with the Chinese, which led us to consider selling advanced weapons systems to the Chinese. All that was brought to an end, that sense that China was moving in a direction that would converge with U.S. interests, in Tiananmen in June 1989. And our discussions haven't again approximated the sense of possibility that existed in the relationship in the late 1980s.

Anyway, we did look very carefully at issues of economic reform. The desk is fundamentally operational. We do briefings, which are more descriptive than analytical. We might do analysis if they ask, but for the most part, writing about, thinking about economic reform, those were still being done in places like INR, the [Central Intelligence] Agency, which has a pretty good cadre of analysts; although today they seem to be younger and younger and lasting for a shorter period. I think that is probably just my old age talking.

I think the important take away here is that there was a sense of possibility in the relationship, a sense of not operating on parallel tracks, but in a way that suggested there was an increasing convergence.

Q: Now the Assistant Secretary for Asia Pacific at that time was Gaston Sigur. How did the front office look to the China desk? Were they particularly interested? Who was the Deputy Assistant Secretary that your desk was reporting to, the atmospherics at that point.

GOLDBERG: The key person really was Stape Roy. Everybody admires and respects Stape for his analytic skills. Stape was not a mentor to me, but I have always considered him one of those legendary figures in the Foreign Service. He knew how to get things done; he got them done in ways that did not leave ill feelings behind. If you went up against Stape and you had a counter argument, you not only had to have all of your facts straight, you had to have enough allies to carry the day. Very rarely did it happen to Stape.

Q: What kinds of issues would come up in this way?

GOLDBERG: At this point in the Reagan administration, the central policy conundrum was how far did you go in terms of working with the Chinese. As I said, for most people who focused on China in my generation, the sense of possibility lasted until Tiananmen or a bit earlier, with the demonstrations that took place in China in February, March, April of 1989, when the first President Bush went out there. We kept asking and Stape kept asking: to what extent are they changing. How much reform is actually going on; what can we do to move China in the right direction – probably not the best question since China was going to move in a direction of its choice. The real difference of opinion at the time was the pace – accelerate or keep it steady - and what we actually thought we might be able to accomplish.

Q: In the 1980s the administration as a whole, and the Department in part, started to become distracted with Iran/Contra scandal. So I would suspect that decisions on China policies floated down to Stape's level and Gaston's.

GOLDBERG: But we did have the sense that we had good and experienced who could handle those issues.

Q: At the time you were on the desk here from 1986 to 1988, did any particular Taiwan issues of note arise?

GOLDBERG: I mean Taiwan was always an issue in terms of Taiwan lobby. Arms sales were a perennial. Some still thought of Taiwan as an unsinkable aircraft carrier in the Pacific, so if our China relationship did not work out, we could always use Taiwan as a bulwark against a resurgent mainland. During the time I was on the desk, until in the early 80s, Taiwan was not front and center in U.S. relations with China. Of course, the Chinese were disappointed over continuing arms sales, and I can't believe they ever really expected that arms sales would "wither away" so to speak. There were similar threats similar to the ones we see today in the aftermath of arms sales where the mil-mil relationship is downgraded.

Q: Now you are describing the desk as very operational. During this period, were there any particular Chinese delegations you got involved with or major U.S. delegations going out to China?

GOLDBERG: Someone looking at papers that are being thrown away on the desk or archived is a better person to answer that question. It's one thing to put together books as a low level junior functionary, another to be asked to do high -level briefings. Delegation handling was at several levels above my pay grade as a relatively junior officer.

Q: Did you have any frequent contacts with the Chinese Embassy?

GOLDBERG: It was very different Embassy at that point. They didn't socialize aside from the sort of holiday events they might have – a national day or army day, for example. Chinese diplomats were less outgoing, less confident about their ability to interact. Few officials at my rank did any outside activities. It really wasn't until the mid to late 90s that the Chinese started coming out of their shell a bit. Some of it is recognition that they had to do things differently so there would be lunches with political counselors, DCMs with the Assistant secretary, Deputy Assistant Secretary and ambassador with his counterparts. At the time, the Chinese really pretty much kept to themselves.

Q: My impression was that they were pretty thin on English speaking officers too.

GOLDBERG: That is a very good point. The more experience that they have had over the last decade or so, the better the overall officer corps has become. I think they took a leaf out of what other Asian countries like the Japanese and the Koreans have done, sending their junior officers off for training abroad after doing language training at their Foreign Languages Institute. So they are more professional today and better educated and more confident in their interactions with us. As either deputy or as desk director, I would see my counterparts on a fairly frequent basis, not just when they came in to demarche on an issue that was contentious. Over time, the Chinese became more relaxed with regard to demarches, and they started doing them over the telephone rather than schlepping all the way from the Embassy to the Department. On the most consequential matters, however, they always insisted on coming in.

GOLDBERG: I was preparing to go to Taiwan in the summer of 1989 for a year of language study, but before that June 4 Tiananmen took place and I spent about a month on the Tiananmen task force group, doing talking points, drafting papers, and stuff. Dick Williams, the Chinese desk director, was the director of the Tiananmen task force group and again was my boss when we finally got to Hong Kong.

Q: What was the job of the task force?

GOLDBERG: Basically to provide real time information on what was happening in China. The task force started as a small working group and grew, as we sought not only to brief principals but to account for all Americans in China at the time. We kept asking where do we go from here. I recall Jeff Bader who was the deputy director on the China Desk at that time putting together a paper about actions we could take to show the Chinese how serious we were about condemning the massacre – that's what we called it then and some people still do today – in Tiananmen. So we adopted sanctions that we thought would be short-term, but which – in a number of cases like riot control equipment – exist 22 years later and limit some of the things we could do to enhance bilateral cooperation. Tiananmen had a negative impact on a whole generation of China specialists such as myself, but we understood right away that we needed to find a way to talk with one another. For the Chinese, the conversation was often when are the sanctions going to be lifted. For us, it was seeking an accounting for those who had died during this period.

Q: Who manned the task force when it was going?

GOLDBERG: Dick and Jeff were the day-to-day leads, with Stape, who was still EAP DAS at that time. As in other task force groups, we had consular affairs officers engaged to respond to American citizens, military coordinators who needed to plan in case something of a more serious and ominous nature occurred. But for the most part it was EAP and the China desk that staffed the task force. I was really an add-on. I had some time in between the end of the Econ course and the time we departed for Taiwan for language training. It was a good experience in terms of crisis management.

Q: Your next assignment is to Chinese language training, but my recollection is you only go to language training if you are already assigned to a slot. So you had already been assigned to Con Gen Hong Kong.

GOLDBERG: Well I had studied Chinese before, but as I liked to say I was such an outstanding performer at the Stanford Center so many years ago, that one and all recognized how helpful it would be to have another year. And it was helpful in terms of doing my job in Hong Kong – that was one of the two slots in the mainland watchers unit. That unit was eliminated when Hong Kong returned to Chinese sovereignty in 1997 and we lost a significant amount of contacts that were helpful in rounding out our analysis of what was going on in the mainland. During the year in Taiwan, I had four or five hours of class a day and then three or four hours of study - listening to tapes, reading articles and things like that. It was a very good program. Tom Madden was the director of the language center at that time and is today director of the program in Beijing.

Q: In the early days of the relationship with China the hope was we would establish a number of consulates and if we are going to man all those consulates we are going to need a large Chinese-speaking cadre so the number of people going through the program by the 80s grew steadily. How big was your class, do you recall?

GOLDBERG: I don't think it is more than 20-25. We actually had a couple of people from other countries there. One Australian and one Brit, and we had people from other agencies who were not going to serve in China. So the total number who were going to be doing China-related jobs was probably 15 or 16.

Q: In the early days of FSI in Taipei there was always a concern that when they taught simplified characters used on the mainland this would present a political problem on Taiwan. Had that sensitivity been resolved?

GOLDBERG: More or less. When I started learning Chinese in Taiwan, I studied traditional characters, so my reading was always better than my spoken ability. For me the trick was matching the simplified and the traditional. On Yangmingshan, which is where the language school is, outside of Taipei, we had access to simplified character articles and books and we were able to take them home and read them. My wife was also a language student for the year. It was a very demanding year as you know from having studied difficult languages.

Q: Part of the curriculum at FSI was field trips from time to time. Did they still do that?

GOLDBERG: We didn't really do field trips. We did practicums. Those were practical exercises where for a month, usually December and into January, you would find an activity and you would work in a company or an NGO. I had met someone, a Chinese American, who worked at Metropolitan Life and so I worked at MET Taipei for a month. One of the things they wanted me to do was to help edit English language versions of Chinese language reports. So I was able to use my reading ability to check and polish translations – all in a Chinese-language speaking environment where you picked up a lot of street talk. My wife worked at an NGO that was involved in historical preservation. She had less of an English language component to her practicum than I did. Her association with that group was deeper and more meaningful and longer lasting than mine was with MET. I found it refreshing to get out of the classroom, take a bus, walk around, meet a lot of different people. A lot of the people I worked with were quite generous because their English was far better than my Chinese but they were willing to help educate me.

Q: Excellent. Who else was with you in the class?

GOLDBERG: Steve Young who is currently Hong Kong Consul General, which is chief of mission status. Steve Schlaikjer, who subsequently was econ counselor in Beijing and my boss on the China desk when I was the deputy for econ affairs, one of my many incarnations there. Mort Holbrook a good friend who was consul general in Shenyang for three years and with whom I have stayed in contact for many years.

Q: While you are in language training changes are taking place in China. You have got Tiananmen Square, the European and American reaction. Scowcroft makes two trips to China to try and coordinate how the two countries are going to work their way out of this. So by the time you are in Hong Kong then as econ officer, Hong Kong reporting is probably pretty important to try and figure out what is happening in China at that time from let's see, you probably arrived in June of 1990.

GOLDBERG: That sounds about right, June or July 1990. My predecessor was Bob Wang who was my successor in Beijing as DCM and who is there now. That is an interesting story in itself. Scott Bellard was the senior China Watcher. I worked for him; and Gil Donahue was the political/econ chief. We didn't have that many people doing reporting. Starting in the mid-80s, much of what was coming out of Hong Kong was commentary on what was going on in the mainland – we weren't first with the story, but we were pretty good at providing texture to the story.

I had some interesting contacts. The most interesting one was the secretary general of Xinhua, the news agency which was running Hong Kong for Beijing. He was reputed to be China's spymaster in Hong Kong. At my first meeting with him, he came right out and said, "A lot of people think that I am a spymaster. That is not the case." These meetings were always very interesting because he spoke in a very thick Cantonese accent which was very hard for me to understand, so he brought along a very polished person whose mandarin was impeccable and who at times had to translate from accented Cantonese Mandarin into Mandarin and occasionally slip in an English word. A lot of the work I did wasn't really mainland watching per se but was looking at the mainland's penetration of Hong Kong. So I did a series of reports on mainland companies in Hong Kong and what they were actually there to do. We had the ability to actually go in and talk with directors in the companies. Scott and I would go out together and meet with people who traveled to the mainland frequently and wrote prolifically like Willy Wo Lop Lam and Ching Chung. Ching had been red guard cultural revolutionary in Hong Kong, and he was then editor of one of the more interesting magazines being published there. He was subsequently arrested on the mainland for spying or getting access to information that he shouldn't have. I guess he was imprisoned for three or four years.

Q: We were talking about contact work. Contact work is the bread and butter of any post overseas. When you arrived did you have a hand off with your successor?

GOLDBERG: Bob Wang was very generous in terms of introducing me to a lot of his contacts. I understood these people had their own agendas in terms of dealing with us, and one in particular was kind of interesting, given his association with Wang Yungching of Formosa Plastics who was thinking about building a major plastics project in Fujian province. I spent a year or so meeting with this guy every couple of weeks to talk about what was going on. That project never came to fruition.

Another major area of interest was what the Taiwanese in Hong Kong were up to and how they were facilitating economic contacts on the mainland. I was close to people who in Taiwan business associations in Hong Kong and spent a fair amount of time chatting them up. At that point Hong Kong was also moving all of its textile factories to the mainland and the Taiwans were cooperating with Hong Kong companies to access mainland labor, land etc. We couldn't compete with what was being churned out on the mainland, but we had some significant areas where we could make a contribution in terms of understanding south China economic integration.

We talked with a lot of American companies as well. The Amcham or American Chamber in Hong Kong was a very important window for many American businesses seeking access to the China market.

Q: You were saying that the Chinese companies were coming in to Hong Kong. Was this also the time that Chinese provinces set up offices?

GOLDBERG: Oh sure. Some of them had been set up before I got there, so I spent a lot of time with Guangdong and Guangzhou company enterprises, Fujian and Fuzhou enterprises; provinces and cities I traveled widely in when I was Consul General in Guangzhou. These companies were pretty successful in Hong Kong. None of them could compete with China Resources or China Merchants that had been in Hong Kong for many years.

Q: My impression was that one of the reasons for having the provincial offices in Hong Kong was to begin to educate the provinces in what was available and how the trading/capitalist system worked.

GOLDBERG: You would like to think that was the case. Maybe it was, but when I would have conversations with these companies it was all about the deal and about the money. Twenty years on, there is obviously a lot more sophistication about how you talk about these things. But 20 years ago, we were dealing with a lot of fairly unsophisticated people who clearly didn't understand how markets worked.

Q: Now were you there when Deng Xiaoping made his southern trip which is always described as the first time that reform had gotten back on track.

GOLDBERG: Yeah, I was in Hong Kong. Anytime Deng appeared somewhere and made pronouncements, it was noteworthy and you took a close look at it. We talked with our contacts in Hong Kong and their message was: watch this page carefully and see what happens.

Q: Could you give a broad brush coverage of the depth and breadth of the contacts you were meeting with during your time there?

GOLDBERG: Well, as I said, Chinese companies based in Hong Kong were a very significant part of the portfolio. The Taiwan companies and Taiwan associations gave us some pretty good insight into what eventually became a major concern of the Taiwanese companies and the Taiwan government's concern about the hollowing out of Taiwan's manufacturing. Before I even started my job at the Hong Kong consulate, after language class was over and before my family was settled, I went back to Taiwan for three weeks and did a paper on Taiwan companies going to the mainland; I met with a lot of the companies that I subsequently dealt with in Hong Kong. Contacts that I first made in Taiwan carried over to the mainland. There were obviously American business companies with which we talked. We always went to the left leaning magazines because they were far better than the right leaning magazines on mainland policy. We would see Wen Wei Bao journalists who were mainland directed. We also talked with Ming Bao reporters who were pretty objective. Apple Daily was pretty good but reported a lot of rumors that were made up out of whole cloth. Then I made several trips to Guangdong Province and Fujian.

Q: Now when was that? When did you do that trip?

GOLDBERG: The first one was in 1991 and took several days. The second in 1992 sometime. The 1992 trip was from one side of the Pearl River delta trip to the other, from Zhuhai up to Guangzhou and then to Shenzhen. Nowadays you can drive from Shenzhen to Guangzhou in three hours or take the train to Hong Kong in 2 ½ hours. The highways and the infrastructure are superb today, obviously designed so manufacturers can get their goods to ports or railroad stations.

The 1991 trip actually was more important than the 1992 trip because I met someone at the Taiwan Center at Xiamen University who put me in touch with the Xinhua source that was so important in my reporting.

Q: And I would think the PAO has another set of contacts with journalists, movie...

GOLDBERG: Absolutely. Later on as we moved closer to reversion, decisions were made that the real value-added in Hong Kong was the story of emerging Hong Kong democracy and Hong Kong's ability to retain its independence.

Q: When did the reversion discussion start? I forgot.

GOLDBERG: The British discussions? In the early 80s. The final decisions were made in the mid-80s. The Brits had always sent out as Governor of Hong Kong a Mandarin type who had significant China background. When we got there David Wilson was the senior British official, and then the last year I was there Chris Patton arrived and totally changed the conversation with the mainland. You may recall Patton saying he would not go to Beijing before he gave his state of the Colony or State of Hong Kong address and that really angered mainland officials. It took them a long time to get over it. They saw Patton as a latecomer who after a hundred years of British rule in Hong Kong was now insisting that Hong Kong deserved more democracy. The Chinese accused him of being anti-Chinese.

Patton rarely backed away from his efforts at pushing the envelope on democracy. I went as note taker to Dick Williams, our Consul General, on his first interview with Patton. It was fascinating. You were just bowled over by the intellect of Chris Patton, and Patton was happy to talk – and be admired. He was probably as smart as he thought he was, but he could have done a better job of stroking Chinese sensibilities. Regrettably, Patton didn't do that. I saw Chris Patten one other time, again as a note taker for some delegation. They too bought into the Chris Patton line about democracy and how we had to further democracy in the run up to reversion.

Q: The Chinese thought they were inheriting a colony and Patton turned it into a Trojan horse.

GOLDBERG: The Chinese thought that the “one country two systems” was the solution to all ills. And I think they understood that they approached reversion, people would recognize the need to accommodate Beijing's needs and requests and they would even start self-censoring so Beijing did not have to do it itself. But the couple of times I had serious discussions with people in Hong Kong after I left, they told me that they were wary of discussing their private worries publicly.

Many Chinese we talked to saw a British betrayal of an implicit contract with Beijing – to be stewards of Hong Kong and turn it over pretty much as it was, not with a fervor for promoting democracy over the last four years before reversion. You have to remember David Wilson and the people who preceded him were well acquainted with China's way of doing things and were just in a waiting pattern for reversion. Patton's mission was different; it was how do you provide some sort of representative government infrastructure that allows the people of Hong Kong to have a voice. It was too late. It really was; it was far too late. Again, I think the Chinese believed Patton did not understand China's broader national interests. Part of that was the desire for one China, two systems to work and be seen in Taiwan as a way of eventual reunification.

Q: Now you were in Hong Kong and the administration in Washington changes. Did that have any particular impact on staffing or...

GOLDBERG: No, not really. Staffing wise we have always had a professional as the consul general in Hong Kong. When Dick Williams left, Richard Mueller came in as consul general, but I was there for only a couple of months before heading back to the states. Everyone was thinking about what size staff and what issues we needed to consider with reversion – the creation of the modern Hong Kong Consulate, if you will, came with Richard Boucher who made the key decisions about issues the consulate should report on. Staffing-wise, the eventual drawdown wasn't really as great as you might think. By the time you get to 1997, we had gone from a defense attaché system to a liaison office staffed by military out of uniform. People in other agencies who watched China out of Hong Kong were starting to move those slots to the mainland. But that was a gradual process that took place over a decade. When I was desk director and making decisions about eliminating jobs in Hong Kong and putting them on the mainland, I experienced how bitter and drawn out these bureaucratic fights could be.

Q: Now wasn't the senior military person assigned to Hong Kong while you were there a naval officer?

GOLDBERG: Right because in Hong Kong, the main military function is to handle ship visits. Hong Kong is a major port of call for R&R [rest and recreation]. We used ship visits to attract Chinese officials to vessels for tours. It was a fairly substantial office, but after 1997 it was reduced in size. Our defense people in Hong Kong were also actively traveling to the mainland to look at the south China military regions. They had to notify the Chinese about the places they planned to visit; the Chinese followed them pretty closely. The information they collected didn't strike me as particularly significant – lots of license plate numbers, ships in harbor, but I suppose that information in the aggregate was significant to make certain judgments.

Q: Now you had an interesting turn in your own career to the extent that you go from an economic officer in Hong Kong back to Washington in the summer of 1993. How did you get that job?

GOLDBERG: I wanted to spend a year doing something other than State Department work and had heard that the [U.S.] Trade Representatives' office was a pretty good place to learn about negotiations and legislation. At the time, State had a couple of details to USTR and I was fortunate to land one of them. I made contacts that stood me in good stead for the remainder of my career. Some of the civil servants at USTR are still there, others have moved to the private sector. All in all, they were very savvy about how to get things done.

When I got there, Hank Levine, whom I had met ten years before when we both were doing part time work for the National Committee on U.S.-China Relations after I returned from Japan, was still in the ag [agricultural] office but preparing to move over to the APEC [Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation] office. I inherited his portfolio.

Q: Can you put USTR into a policy framework? Who does it report to?

GOLDBERG: It is a part of the President's office. The trade representative Mickey Kantor, at the time, was a member of the president's cabinet. As was his successor Charlene Barshefsky, with whom I worked on China's WTO accession. USTR was the lead on trade negotiations writ large and the coordinator of trade policy. Interagency decisions and recommendations were routed to the White House through the chief of staff or his designee. It was a small agency, maybe 20 people then. You had an awful lot of authority in terms of chairing meetings and having the pen to write papers that represented the sense of the interagency community. What I learned was that no matter the economic rationale for doing something, the politics was always going to win out.

Q: USTR would be a major player then when G-8 summits came up?

GOLDBERG: Mickey Kantor was very close to Bill Clinton. He subsequently went on to be the Secretary of Commerce after Ron Brown was killed in a plane crash. Kantor was quite influential – and very full of himself given his connections. I had hardly any direct dealings with him; I sat on the back benches in meetings he chaired. I had more to do with Charlene Barshefsky in her role as the Deputy USTR handling Asia Pacific, and to a lesser extent with Rufus Yerxa, the Deputy who handled Europe, Latin American, and other parts of the world. There was also a third US Trade Ambassador in Geneva, and there still is one there today.

I really think USTR was far more influential at that time than it is today - Kantor had pushed through the NAFTA negotiated in the previous administration and was heavily involved in the Uruguay Round end game. He had ceded the China portfolio to Charlene who worked closely with a couple of deputy assistant USTRs – Lee Sands and Deborah Lehr. I had less to do with China at that point, though did work the last ever Section 406 action under the Trade Act of 1974, which assessed countervailing duties on imports of Chinese honey [Ed: published in April 1994]. I also worked on getting Pacific Northwest red apples into Japan and on fair market access for tobacco products. U.S. beef – an issue then as it is now – was also high on our trade agenda as other countries were using non-tariff barriers or NTBs to limit our access to their markets. Of all the issues I worked on, I guess I was least happy about helping write administration policy on leveling the playing field for American tobacco.

Q: Won't your USTR duties have allowed you to work with Treasury, Agriculture, and Commerce departments?

GOLDBERG: Treasury is another story, because Treasury is always jealous of its prerogatives. Treasury was less consequential on trade issues except when you are talking about financial services. So most of my contacts were with Agriculture, Commerce, and the State Department, which regrettably many years ago ceded commercial work to Commerce. I see where Secretary Clinton would like to wrench that back. The NEC [National Economic Council] had people sitting in on these trade policy discussions. CIA was an active participant in terms of providing analysis about specific negotiations based on information that they had collected.

Q: Now was that supposed to be a one-year assignment?

GOLDBERG: Yes. Some people extended for a second, some even ended up leaving State because the work at USTR was more interesting and you really were more actively involved in directing negotiations and were a more consequential part of the policy making. If you are an economic officer at State and are interested in trade, you really can't do any better than spend a year at USTR to learn how decisions are made.

Q: Now, there was an APEC meeting in July 1993. Would USTR have gotten involved in APEC issues? Did they send anybody?

GOLDBERG: Oh sure. I don't remember. I arrived at USTR after the meeting. In subsequent years, USTR has played an important role in APEC in terms of programs and outcomes.

Q: Now you were if I understood you, you were sort of characterizing the USTR as the NSC [National Security Council] of economic policy. That is a pretty high level.

GOLDBERG: At that point there was an NEC and Bob Rubin was head of it. Kantor and Rubin worked pretty closely together.

WILLIAM LENDERKING
East Asia and Pacific Affairs, USIA
Washington, DC (1986-1988)

A native of New York, Mr. Lenderking graduated from Dartmouth College and served a tour with the US Navy in the Far East before joining the Foreign Service of the US Information Agency in 1959. As Public Affairs, Press and Information Officer, he served in posts throughout the world and in Washington, D.C., where held senior level positions in USIA and the Department of State dealing with Policy, Plans and Research. Mr. Lenderking was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2007.

Q: Well, you went over to USIA and worked from '86 to '88, was it?

LENDERKING: It was '86 to '88. We had big programs in all the countries of East Asia and the Pacific except for Vietnam. And the area office is what backstopped those programs, supervised them and got involved in everything; what the programs were, what the personnel issues were; if there was a problem the area office was responsible for supervising and resolving it. We had a couple of personnel issues where guys had to be transferred and that sort of thing, those things come up. But the area office was the overseer for the area, and also represented the area to the director, who was Charlie Wick.

Q: From your perspective, talk about Charlie Wick.

LENDERKING: He could be very charming but he was also very demanding. I always hoped to be an area director, but there were many days I was glad I wasn't one because whenever Charlie Wick traveled, and he traveled a good deal, he would always take along the area director with him, who was basically the minder and chief baggage handler and responsible for seeing that Charlie Wick was treated in the manner to which he thought he deserved. And this required an enormous amount of handholding and making arrangements and using up all kinds of goodwill chips to make sure that he got access to the most important people and all the other things that people with huge but fragile egos and elevated senses of entitlement require. In other words, he was extremely high maintenance, in modern parlance. A good friend of mine, who was area director, once said it was "unseemly" for adult human beings to be forced to behave in this way.

Now, the bright side of the coin, and Wick's detractors have to recognize this, he did have rapport with the President Reagan, mainly because his wife May Jane and Nancy Reagan were close friends. Through this association, Mr. Wick got us more resources than we otherwise would have had, in good measure. Sometimes you could reason with him; he had a lot of good ideas, and Worldnet was one of them. That came out of his brain not fully formed but he just carried it forward and developed it and refined it until it was a success and the naysayers were proved wrong. There were a lot of people who were scoffers, initially, and I was one of them. I came to realize that this was really something pretty good and he was on to something worthwhile. He had a temper; he would get red in the face if he didn't like something or when he was tired. So it was important to keep him happy on a trip, and I am glad I never had to go on one with him.

I also have to say that he could be very charming, full of wise cracks, some of which were so funny you couldn't help but break out laughing. He could play the piano very well, and probably could have done OK as a barroom piano player. I was at one meeting in Sao Paulo where he had all the area directors and a lot of high level Brazilians in, and we'd taken a large meeting room in the hotel for a reception after the day's meetings, and someone had arranged for a piano to be wheeled in and he sits down and starts reeling off cocktail music. He was really good, playing and adding witty commentary – it was genuinely entertaining.

Q: Were there any either personnel or other issues that you were particularly concerned with?

LENDERKING: Oh yes. They were constant. Let me touch on two of them that perhaps illustrate the kind of regime that we had under Charlie Wick. A perennial issue for USIA was what guidelines we had for our speakers who went overseas for us, often from academic and policy related fields. Given that the Reagan administration was a strongly ideological one, what people said about the U.S. and the administration while they were overseas on a USIA-sponsored trip mattered a lot. Some of the people we chose, who almost always were respected mainstream leaders in their fields -- we didn't recruit people with extreme views of either right or left -- on a number of occasions criticized current foreign policies. Sometimes they made headlines and the cry would go up, "Why are we sending these folks overseas on taxpayers' money to criticize the administration?" In a couple of cases Charlie Wick would get heated enough to either demand that the speaker stop his criticisms or we would abort his trip. Of course, that would have been counterproductive and some of the senior guys would have to try to calm him down. So this issue often arose, but I also can't remember a single instance when Mr. Wick actually carried out his threat to abort someone's trip, but there were a couple of close ones. Our guidance to PAOs overseas was that if someone really got up on a soapbox and delivered a strong policy attack on the U.S., it was up to the PAO on the spot to work out a corrective, either by getting up and saying something like "Mr. Smith has just expressed his views, which he is entirely welcome to do, but American policy is that..." I had to do that a number of times, overseas, and I think it was the right tone to take.

Now, that example was on the problem side. On the good side, one of the most interesting projects I was involved in -- and it was due to Charlie Wick's contacts, was getting Gregory Peck to go to China-

Q: The movie star.

LENDERKING: - yes, and take some of his best films and talk about them. And we showed the movies and we had him there with all the trappings, with very high level, influential people, and it was an enormous success. We got Ford Motor Company – it was probably Charlie Wick who made the contacts – he knew a lot of people -- and a couple of others to pick up some of the expenses because a person of that level of prestige demanded, and rightfully so, to travel at a certain level of comfort. His wife – Veronique -- went with him; he had to have a really nice car and first class accommodations and comfortable treatment all along the way. So Ford contributed a brand new luxury car – I can't remember the model – and Peck and his wife also believed that separate bathrooms for husband and wife held the key to a happy marriage, so those accommodations had to be guaranteed at every stop, and that added to the cost.

Now, I have to point out; he did this pro bono -- he didn't get a cent for this. It was his time and considerable effort that he was donating because he believed in the project of opening doors to China and he was proud of most of his films. He was also an extremely gracious person to deal with. I talked to him a few times on the telephone, but it was a terribly difficult project to put together because people who were in Hollywood, that he trusted, were always whispering in his ear, you know, you cannot trust USIA because it is the U.S. Government and that sort of thing. Some of them were seeking personal advantages for themselves, in the time-honored way of Hollywood. So we would be moving ahead, thinking things were on track and we had all the players in Hollywood, Washington, and Beijing working together, and someone would get to Peck or something else would happen and we'd be confronted with a potential train wreck. Here's just one small example: Peck himself chose the films he wanted to showcase – I think there were about six of them. But locating them proved very difficult. Obtaining rights to show them was even more difficult. Arranging for their safe transportation and storage, deciding how to present them was another. I think we decided against a simultaneous interpreter, and arranging subtitles would have been very costly and there wasn't enough time, so we just went with the films and relied on Peck and others to explain what was going on to those who couldn't handle English. At least that's my recollection.

Gregory Peck himself I think had liberal leanings and was sympathetic to the goals of USIA, and he didn't have any big distrust of government but he wanted the thing to go right and he didn't want any Washington bureaucrats to be messing up his program. He was very proud of those films and rightly so. Well, with all the headaches we had, the program, which involved about a week of public appearances in China, with Peck introducing his films and answering questions, going to official receptions, and all the rest, the entire project was marvelous – really precedent setting. It was a real breakthrough, sort of symbolic of the highly visible emergence of a major world power from decades of being a tyrannical closed society, and it was very exciting. High level Chinese of all kinds clamored to see the films and meet Peck, and the Embassy feasted on the new contacts and introductions made for years. Something like that could not have happened without Charlie Wick's contacts and input, and the months of hard work we put in to make it work were totally worth it.

Q: Well, of course too, ,at that time, our relations with China and China's relations with the outside world were not that great, and to get these films, which were major films, into China and somebody of the stature of Gregory Peck, who was well known among the Chinese cultural literati, to talk about them was quite an attraction.

LENDERKING: It sure was. I was not in China but I had a lot to do with it on the Washington end, and the people that we were able to contact and establish ongoing relations with just opened the doors throughout the Chinese world of intellectuals, ideas, and culture. The payoff was enormous and I'm sure we benefit to this day from what that program started.

Q: Did you get any feel in your office about our exchange program and visitors program? Let's talk about China first. If I recall correctly, this was a period of tremendous exodus from China for those who had the wherewithal to get their kids to go to American schools and pursue university studies.

LENDERKING: True. It was a time of ferment in China and some of the barriers were coming down, not without struggle, so it was a stimulating time of opportunity for us. We had a gifted American staff in China, people who could speak Chinese and were willing to commit significant portions of their working lives to getting to know this extraordinary country, and who could take advantage of this sudden blossoming.

One example of that occurred on my first trip to China. I was calling on the president of a major university in Beijing and I was very flattered and pleased when not only did he say he would be pleased to receive me on what I thought was just a courtesy call, but he would like to invite me for lunch. And for him I was just a faceless bureaucrat from an agency he probably didn't know much about and not at all equal to him in the social hierarchy, and he turned out a rather large lunch with a lot of his senior faculty present, and I was the guest of honor. At the appropriate time he gave some remarks in Chinese, which were translated. He started talking about the Cultural Revolution and he said, basically, this must never be allowed to happen in China again, and we are depending on you, America, to help us on this. And wow, I was floored. I mean, this was the president of one of the most powerful universities in China saying this, right out there in front of his faculty. So that was the kind of era that we had and it was pretty exciting, considering all the years when China was a closed and hostile society.

Q: You know, to my mind probably the strong right arm of our diplomacy has been our exchange and visitor program and the great number of students that we attract here. And any tampering with that process would be an enormous blunder...

LENDERKING: During this period Johns Hopkins University opened a branch in Nanjing and a lot of good things flowed from that, and continue to do so, although I'm not up on current developments. The State Department was behind it, USIA was behind it and the White House was behind it and a lot of really positive things happened.

Q: You were doing this until about 1988, right?

LENDERKING: Yes.

Q: Well, in '88 whither?

LENDERKING: By 1988, it was time for me to leave that job and go overseas again. I'd been in Washington for six years and that was longer than usual, at least for USIA officers, even though this was only my second tour in the U.S. after 30 years in the Foreign Service. So I was named to be Paul Wolfowitz's public affairs officer in Indonesia. He was by now Ambassador there, an apparent concession to his wife who had a PhD in Indonesian studies and was enraptured by the country and its culture. What's interesting here is a little side story: when I was in Thailand, Ambassador Mort Abramowitz was named as ambassador to Indonesia for his next assignment. However, there was some mischief making by the disgruntled CIA station chief in Bangkok and some political allies who apparently disliked Mort's liberal views, even though he was a really tough-minded person. I say apparently, because I do not remember all the aspects of this, and wasn't privy to them at the time. Anyway, a few scurrilous articles appeared, and some senior Indonesians who might have believed that as good Muslims they should oppose Jews on every possible occasion, put a stop to Mort's nomination, that is, they did not issue agrément. But a few years later, when Paul Wolfowitz was nominated, I believe he sailed through without a breath of opposition.

Anyway, I was assigned to be the head of the large and important USIS effort there, and it was a great assignment. But for personal reasons involving probable family separation for about six months – my wife was working in a demanding job in the White House and needed some help with our young children, and she also had some health issues to resolve -- I didn't feel I should leave the family for that long. So I used up whatever goodwill chips I had and broke the assignment although I was disappointed not to go to Indonesia and work for Paul because I had so much respect for him. I wrote him a letter and said I was disappointed, and that was true, but also I felt I'd spent so much of my career in East Asia, which I loved, I also wanted to have some experience in another part of the world because I could see I was getting to the final years of my career. So that was another motivating factor.

Anyway, I broke the Indonesia assignment and there were very few openings available. But I learned of a staffing shortage up in New York at the U.S. mission to the UN, to which they always send extra guys for the General Assembly session that lasts for four months every fall. That's when all the heads of state and other dignitaries come and make speeches, and it's an extremely busy time because all kinds of political business is transacted on the sidelines of all that ostensible speechmaking. So I went up there as the political advisor for East Asia and Afghanistan for the USUN during the 1988 General Assembly. I reported to the minister counselor for political affairs and I was part of the political section.

Q: You did that from when to when?

LENDERKING: It was September to December of 1988.

Q: How did you find that situation, the UN?

LENDERKING: I thought it was fascinating and it was something totally new for me. I had never worked in a political section, although I'd worked at the State Department before. But during the UNGA session I thought it was the hardest working mission of any embassy I'd been in and I have been in some pretty big and busy ones. People stayed late, worked late, worked hard. The difference I think lies in the difference between multilateral and bilateral diplomacy. It is more like, say, dealing with the House of Representatives or something like that than dealing with just your bilateral counterparts. So you had a much more layered, complex, and nuanced political situation to deal with, with political alliances being formed and dissolved every day depending on the issue and circumstances. Lots of horse trading, trying to build winning votes, and all that goes with that. There were some guys in the Mission, Civil Service guys who had been there for years who were really godfathers to people like myself who didn't know all that much about the workings of the UN. And my boss was an old comrade from Japan days, Bob Immerman, who was a Japan hand and also had had many years at the US Mission. So he was an expert on the UN, how it worked or didn't work, who was important, and how to get things done. In fact, during his entire career he served only in Japan and at the UN, with the exception of one early tour in Guatemala. How he managed to have a career like that I don't know, but he did it and he was one of the reigning experts on both Japan and the UN. Bob knew what had to be done and how to do it and I was very pleased to have him as a supervisor. I learned a lot from him and it was an intense, albeit short, experience.

Q: Were there any particular issues that engaged you at that time?

LENDERKING: There was one that I still smart about to this day. That was the seating of the Khmer Rouge as the legitimate government of Cambodia. And it was U.S. policy that the Khmer Rouge was the legitimate government because they had been overthrown by Vietnam, which we still considered to be an enemy, and they had committed an act of aggression. Every year the Cambodian resolution came up for a vote and we lobbied very hard to make sure the Khmer Rouge continued to be seated regardless of who was ruling in Phnom Penh. And Chuck Schmitz, a Foreign Service colleague also seconded to the political section for UNGA, and I worked very hard on this issue. After several weeks of lobbying other delegations, when the vote was taken, it was the highest it had ever been in our favor. It amounted to an overwhelming vote in favor of the U.S. position of keeping the Khmer Rouge as the legitimate representatives of Cambodia and secretly I thought this was shameful. I had no particular love for the communist government of Vietnam, which was still keeping hundreds of thousands of its own citizens in re-education camps, but as awful as that was, it did not compare to the atrocities of the Khmer Rouge. Further, in geopolitical terms, I believed it was time to start working with the Vietnamese to encourage them to loosen up, time to start trying to wean them away from the brutalities of their system. At this time, I believed they no longer represented a threat to our friends in Southeast Asia, such as Thailand, Malaysia, and Indonesia, and they were also a potential bulwark against China.

Q: Yes, I realize this is awful.

LENDERKING: Yes. So, at the end of the vote we got a congratulatory telegram from Gaston Sigur, Assistant Secretary for EAP at the time, effusively praising us for the superb lobbying job we had done on behalf of a policy I thought was wrongheaded.

Q: Well, what was the reaction from your Asian colleagues at the UN when you came around?

LENDERKING: Well, I think they understood that American policy was evolving; it was an election year and the most vocal domestic group on Vietnam were the MIA folks who would have been very unhappy at anything that let the pressure off Vietnam for even a minute.

Q: Yes. Now, we're moving into 1989 and where did you go next? Oh -- I have a question to ask and I don't know if we're covered it. You mentioned your wife was from Australia. How did you meet her?

LENDERKING: I met her at EXPO '70. As someone who had been an exchange student with Japan, she was selected as a guide – they were called ‘hostesses’ – at the Australian Pavilion, which was right next door to ours. The Commissioners General of our pavilions became good friends and we helped each other out on many occasions. So our Commissioner General, Howard Chernoff, wanted to throw a party just for the Australian staff by way of thanking them for their cooperation. As chief of protocol I was in the receiving line and I introduced the entire staff to Mr. and Mrs. Chernoff. When Susan came through I said hello, nothing more, but I ran into her from time to time just being there at EXPO. We had coffee a couple of times, gossiped about doings at EXPO, and when the exposition was over in September I returned to Washington and she used her EXPO savings to go on an extended trip to East Asia, Latin America and the U.S. with a friend from the UK pavilion.

By the time she arrived in Washington about six months had passed and I wasn't sure I'd remember what she looked like. My marriage had not survived the problems of two years' separation in Vietnam, and I was now a bachelor again. Susan and I hit it off well, and eventually married, in the fall of 1971.

ROBIN BERRINGTON
Director, Junior Officer Training
Washington, DC (1986-1989)

Mr. Berrington was born and raised in Ohio and educated at Wesleyan University and Harvard Universities. After service with the Peace Corps in Thailand, he joined the Foreign Service (USIA) in 1969. During his Foreign Service career Mr. Berrington served at posts abroad in Thailand, Japan, Ireland and England, variously as Public and Cultural Affairs Officer. He also served several tours at USIA Headquarters in Washington, DC. Mr. Berrington was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2000.

Q: Were you able to sort of turn the spotlight on to the Soviet Union and to Communist China and point out what was happening there?

BERRINGTON: Not really. I mean not because we were unable, but it was because we didn't need to. I mean the Japanese were very much aware of what was happening in China. The Russians, I mean to this day most Japanese don't like the Russians. In any poll of public opinion in Japan, whenever they talk about who are the most beloved foreigners and who are the most hated foreigners, when it comes to the hated foreigners, the Koreans and the Russians always come out on top. They sort of vie with each other for the top position. So we didn't really have to say or do anything about the Russians to convince the Japanese that they were the bad guys. The Japanese have always had a mixed attitude toward the Chinese. I mean they see the Chinese as the sort of mother civilization of that part of the world, so there is some feeling that they should be closer and more understanding with the Chinese, but then we all know about what happened in WWII in China, so there is some lingering ill will there with the Chinese too. You know the excesses of the Mao's cultural revolution and all that were frequently reported so we didn't have to play that up. Besides I think that would have been less useful anyway. Our program in Japan was more of a positive program pointing out the benefits to the Japanese of maintaining the security relationship, of close political and economic ties with the U.S. and stressing those positive things rather than working on the negatives of China or Russia or anyplace else.

Q: Was it pretty well accepted there that you could have fun twisting the lion's tail while accepting the security protection the U.S. relationship offered? That basically saved their own kids from going into the military and saved budgetary resources. Was this pretty much an accepted good thing?

BERRINGTON: Oh most Japanese are very happy with that. First of all again a little bit of Kabuki, everything about Japan is. There were what they called the self defense forces. There was a naval self defense force, a land self defense force, the air self defense forces, and they were in effect the Japanese army, navy, and air force. But the self defense forces were quite limited in what they could do. This has been one of the ongoing debates internally in Japan, just how far could the self defense forces go in pushing their mandate, in pushing their function. In those earlier years when I was in Japan, the self defense forces were really almost used primarily for disaster relief, that sort of thing. You know, a flood comes along and they were sent down to take care of it. Most of the kids that would go into the self defense forces were not your high fliers. They were the ones that didn't do very well academically or maybe didn't complete school, or farming kids that were very conservative in their outlook, and maybe still thought of the military as being a worthy profession. But for most people it is off to a good school, while for most of the country the self defense forces are really a kind of second rate operation. As a result they were very happy to have the umbrella of protection from the United States rather than having to rely on their own forces which not too many years before had caused the grief and tragedy of WWII. Everything when it comes to Japan still today, you know the two absolutely crucial events were the closing of the country during its Tokugawa period and WWII. Those two events really inform so much of Japanese attitude, behavior and still have formed much of what they say and do.

Q: This is a time of considerable activity on the part of President Nixon and Henry Kissinger and all. How was this playing down where you were, or did it? I was wondering about the opening of China while you were there. Did you have that Nixon shock too?

BERRINGTON: Well, yes, there were two major body blows to the U.S.-Japan relationship. One was the oil shock which was basically a problem of oil prices and oil supply from the Middle East. The other was the so called Nixon shock which was the opening of China. In both of these cases, the U.S. did not give the Japanese the kind of advance notice or any kinds of consultative briefing that they expected to receive and that they thought they deserved as our so called leading ally in the whole east Asian area. So particularly the China visit was a very humiliating experience for the Japanese leadership because we had not given them the kind of advance word that they expected they would get. We were constantly trying to explain that and deal with that, and that unfortunately for the Japanese was a bad thing. You can hardly make a good thing out of a bad thing.

Q: So we didn't have to hammer away at that. It just was there.

BERRINGTON: No. Seldom did we have to say or do anything about the Russians. Now, do you remember the shoot down of Korean Air Lines Flight 007 by Soviet interceptors on 1 September 1983 over the Sea of Japan just west of Sakhalin Island? The shoot down initiated a major PR offensive by us. Much of it handled personally by Rick and Jean Kirkpatrick. With all kinds of materials being put out. As in the case of anything we got in Japan we would translate into Japanese before giving them out to the Japanese, video tapes. It was a worldwide offensive on our part to expose the Russian duplicity on that. That was something that was certainly an incident that marked a period of time. Again we didn't really have to do that much. In fact, there were times I felt like we were going at carpet tacks with a sledge hammer. The Russians were just hanging themselves. There wasn't that much we had to do, but still it was a major offensive by us at the time.

The issue which probably, when I think back in terms of long term difficulty, the issue that probably has caused us the most, I mean apart from the trade issues which were a constant thorn on the side. But the issue of China, how to handle China; the Japanese have always looked on China as a kind of mother country. I mean in the same way that England looks on the continent as where so much of their civilization comes from, the Anglo-Saxon background. Japan looks on China in the same way. A mixture of respect and slight condescension because China is the source of the language; that is where Buddhism came from, much of the art and culture, Confucianism, all of that is from China. Nevertheless, by the 20th century, look where Japan is, a major industrial world power. Look where China is, still backwards, still split by competing forces with a population in some part starving. Clearly Japan could look at China and say maybe we got everything from you, but look where we are today compared to you. So it was with very mixed feelings how they regard China. But as China developed some nuclear weapons, and after the death of Mao and some of the struggles that went on there, and as China started to figure out its own world view vis-a-vis the U.S. or Taiwan or Korea or whatever, we could not always count on Japan to be right behind us on everything as much as we might have wanted it. There was no question that part of the Japanese differences with us had a racial element to it. You know, very much like Vietnam, they saw China as another Asian brother, and in fact if anything it was more like an Asian mother or father than brother. So for the western powers to deal with China in the way they did sometimes caused problems within the Japanese, particularly the media. There was the occasional thorny issue for us, and still is today.

Q: Did Tiananmen affect our relations with the Japanese? I mean did it appear from embassy reporting that the Japanese had the same reaction that we had or were they a little more in a way sophisticated?

BERRINGTON: I think deep down inside the Japanese were horrified at the loss of life. I mean the Japanese would do anything to avoid confrontation and that kind of supreme confrontation was seen as madness, especially because students were involved. And I think the Japanese were horrified.

Clearly to the Japanese it was a break down of social order. Officially they don't like to offend China. You have got to keep in mind there is a huge Japanese business investment there, a lot of trade with China. They really bend over backwards to accommodate the Chinese in so many things. Tiananmen was a big embarrassment to the Japanese in that respect, so there was backpedaling and some kind of silence in some areas to avoid any further difficulties. Unofficially of course, it was just about the worst thing you could imagine. It didn't poison the well for them as it did for us, but it certainly was a problem in their relations.

DAVID G. BROWN
Washington, DC (1986-1989)

David G. Brown was born in Boston, Massachusetts in 1940. He graduated from Princeton University in 1964 entered the Foreign Service. His assignments include Taipei, Saigon, Yokohama, Tokyo, Vienna, Beijing, Oslo, and Hong Kong. Before retirement in 1996, he served as Director of the Office of Korean Affairs. Mr. Brown was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on January 28, 2003.

BROWN: Right. In January of 1979, we had recognized China and derecognized Taiwan. This was shortly after I had left the Office of Republic of China Affairs in '78. We set up an unofficial organization to represent the American people in Taiwan called the American Institute in Taiwan. AIT had a headquarters office in Washington and an office in Taipei and another one in Kaohsiung in the southern part of Taiwan. We had a small office within the State Department building whose job was to develop policy and provide instructions to AIT.

Q: Well, now which one did you belong to?

BROWN: I belonged to the policy office within the State Department. The office of the Taiwan Coordination Staff.

Q: Now in the State Department did this function in all aspects as a desk?

BROWN: Yes, except that there was no other desk that had an unofficial organization in Washington to conduct liaison on its behalf. Whenever a prominent visitor from Taiwan arrived, it was the chairman of the American Institute in Taiwan office in Washington, D.C. who was responsible for greeting them and going to dinner with them and chairing unofficial meetings for those visitors with people from the administration.

Q: It sounds like a term that is used in illicit relationships as a beard.

BROWN: Or a front group.

Q: A front group. However, that did not mean we were cutting Taiwan loose. American interests in Taiwan changed little.

BROWN: Absolutely. If you look back at decade of the 1980s after de-recognition, this was a period of great success and development for Taiwan. Relations with the U.S., though unofficial, were quite stable and strong. In short, Taiwan continued to enjoy the stability that it needed to prosper and develop.

Q: Okay, in 1986 when you went there, what was the situation on Taiwan economically and politically in 1986?

BROWN: Well, there were the two big economic issues in U.S.-Taiwan relations then. Taiwan enjoyed huge trade surplus with the United States in the mid-1980s. One issue was should Taiwan continue to benefit from our general system of preferences (GSP) when they were a remarkably powerful export economy. At that time, Taiwan's GDP per capita was around $10,000. Should Taiwan be graduated out of a program that was designed to benefit developing countries?

The other issue involved the valuation of Taiwan's currency, the new Taiwan dollar. Their currency was very carefully controlled, and Treasury was convinced that Taipei was using their currency control system to maintain an undervalued new Taiwan dollar. The undervaluation was seen as a major reason for their massive trade surplus with the U.S. The Treasury Department and we on the desk cooperated in pressuring the Taiwan government into appreciating the currency. There were some interesting unintended consequences of doing this. What Treasury did was to persuade Taiwan that its economy had matured to the point where Taiwan could afford to remove some of its currency controls and allow people in Taiwan to move currency in and out more freely. The by-product of this was that after these currency reforms were put in place Taiwanese started to invest overseas. They invested in the U.S., in Southeast Asia. However, the big thing that no one had anticipated was Taiwanese started to invest in China. That began to open up relations between the island and the mainland.

Q: What about the result of this sort of freeing the Taiwanese to invest where they will? Was anybody looking at this in the East Asian bureau saying this is a good thing? In fact, it probably was one of the greatest determiners of the China-Taiwan relationship. If China gets too huffy, it may jeopardize all the nice investment.

BROWN: We were thinking about it, but I certainly didn't anticipate the extent to which Taiwan's investment in China would take off. We knew that President Chiang Ching-kuo had made a major decision to allow people from Taiwan to travel to the mainland. It happened that he did that some months before with the 15th anniversary of the Shanghai Communiqué. We knew that this opening up of travel to China was a very important thing that would have long-term consequences. Secretary Shultz took the occasion of the 15th anniversary to make a statement in which we said that it was U.S. policy not to get involved in cross-strait negotiations, but to encourage an environment in which such cross-strait contacts could develop. We understood there was a process going on that was very important. However, I for one certainly didn't understand that what we were doing with Treasury to open Taiwan's exchange rate system for the purpose of correcting our trade deficit would have the side effect of stimulating massive foreign direct investment by Taiwan and that a good portion of that foreign direct investment would go to China.

Q: You didn't have to go through the resignation process or something like that?

BROWN: Well, I was working in the State Department, so no, I did not. People who worked for AIT, whether they were working in Taipei or in Washington, had to go through a process of resignation from the State Department and employment with the American Institute in Taiwan.

Q: Could the AIT people come at will to the State Department?

BROWN: Yes. However, Taiwan's representatives and visiting officials could not come to the State Department. The American employees of AIT came to State like any other government employee. They had their own State Department badges. What was important was that appearances were changed. They were publicly called AIT employees. The appearance or form of our relations with Taiwan changed, but the substance did not change much. As for AIT employees, they continued to get their paychecks in exactly the same fashion they'd gotten them before from the Department. Every one of them had employee evaluations. When I was on the coordination staff, some AIT employees received State Department awards.

Q: What piece of the action did you have?

BROWN: Well, it was policy guidance. How was the relationship with Taiwan conducted? This was a big part of our role in the exchange rate issue. Normally Treasury doesn't let State have anything to do with exchange rate negotiations. An ambassador is lucky if he knows that they're even taking place. But because Treasury was aware that they couldn't send their senior officials to Taipei, they had to come to us to work out ways to deal with Taiwan. Treasury did not let us in on the substance of their discussions, but we worked with them on the process, and that proved to be quite important. Who in Taiwan should Treasury deal with? Where can Treasury talk to them? Under what arrangements can we deal with them? What form can an agreement or understanding with Taiwan take? Those were issues on which we got involved. Also, Treasury had important relationships with China at the same time. They were very much involved in U.S. economic ties with the mainland. So, they didn't want to jeopardize those relationships any more than State wanted to. So, one question was: do you want to deal with exchange rates by sending a lower ranking official? If so, State could help make Taiwan understand that this person came with considerable authority if not rank. Did Treasury want to work this issue by inviting more senior officials from Taiwan to meet in San Francisco under some private guise? If so, State could help ensure that it was arranged quietly in a way that would not create problems for either Treasury or State in their dealings with Beijing.

Q: What about Taiwan? During the time you were dealing with this, were their intelligence efforts a problem, I mean looking at the overseas community? Because they messed around a bit in New York, I mean in Los Angeles I believe. How did we see it at that time you were doing it?

BROWN: The really egregious thing that happened took place two years before I came back to work on Taiwan. This was the murder of Henry Liu, a Taiwan journalist who had moved to the United States and had written a critical biography of Chiang Ching-kuo. Someone in the Taiwan intelligence chain of command decided that the way to deal with somebody who had criticized Chiang was to have him eliminated by gangsters of the so-called bamboo gang. Intelligence officers hired the bamboo gang to murder Henry Liu. It took a while for this to come to light. The U.S. had evidence on the involvement of intelligence officers in the murder, and this forced Taipei to address the issue of responsibility. The former head of Taiwan's intelligence service in the U.S. was convicted of involvement. It still is not clear how high up people were involved in the incident. President Chiang was acutely embarrassed. He eventually made very significant changes in his intel services. The murder was a huge black mark for Taiwan.

Now there were other things that they were doing, none of which were as egregious as that. Taiwan continued to surveil Chinese students in the United States. They had intelligence operations going and efforts to acquire restricted arms technology that we were not authorizing for sale. The most serious example of that was a program to get inertial guidance for long range missiles from the U.S., technology that we had denied them. Taiwan arranged to have some of their scientists come to the U.S. and get training and then they picked up the designs. That had to be dealt with while I was on the desk. I recall we also put them on the FBI watch list for hostile foreign intelligence organizations. They got the message and over time changed the pattern of what they were doing.

Q: Well, let's take getting the long-range guidance system. You said that had to be dealt with, what did you do?

BROWN: Well, I recall that the most important thing we did was to terminate visas for all the scientists that were involved in the training program, send those people back to Taiwan and force the university that was running the program, which I recall was MIT, to terminate those programs which were inconsistent with U.S. policy.

Q: Were you allowed to have contact with the Taiwanese staff here in Washington?

BROWN: Yes, but not in the State Department building, I had frequent breakfasts, lunches and dinners with them. When circumstances required, AIT would arrange for a negotiation or signing of an agreement. We had no problem dealing with Taiwanese political groups that would come to the United States. We'd simply go to see them in a restaurant rather than in the State Department.

Q: It sounds like one would eat very well on that job.

BROWN: During much of that time, I was working for Gaston Sigur who was the Assistant secretary. Taiwan's representatives in Washington were Fred Chien and later Ding Mou-shih, both of whom went on to be foreign ministers. Whenever they had a meeting with Gaston, it was usually held over breakfast at the Four Seasons Hotel. We ate well and had a lot of pretty heavy conversations to go along with the fare.

Q: What was your impression of the nationalist Chinese representation here in Washington?

BROWN: We were fortunate to be dealing with quite sophisticated individuals. As would be expected, we were under steady pressure from them to make the relationship more official. For example, they would propose changing the kinds of license plates their offices and officials could use. Diplomatic plates were not possible, so they pressed local jurisdictions to create special plates for them. Taipei was always trying to get a pseudo official status for their offices. Could they fly their flag outside their office or just inside the office? What titles could their officers use? This was a period of booming trade between the U.S. and Taiwan. Many U.S. states wanted trade offices in Taiwan. Taiwan would be as generous possible in providing benefits and special privileges for those state representatives in Taipei, and then they would turn around and go to the state's governor and say they would like similar treatment in the U.S. Lacking formal diplomatic recognition, Taiwan had a deep desire for the most formal treatment they could persuade people to give them. Dealing with this, and coordinating with local governments was a constant challenge. It wasn't done in a mean spirited way, but we had to hold the line on the unofficial nature of our relationship.

Q: What about consular protection? I'm thinking of all the Taiwanese students in the United States and visitors and businessmen and the normal thing is you need I'm in trouble with the police or something, call you consul.

BROWN: We had the American Institute in Taiwan represent us in Taipei. Taipei had an organization with a convoluted name called the Coordination Council for North American Affairs (CCNAA) to represent Taiwan in exactly the same way in the United States. They had an office in Washington and about 11 or 12 branch offices in American cities. In one of the more mean spirited aspects of switching relations, we told Taiwan, a country which had more consulates, formal consulates as opposed to honorary consulates, than just about any other country in the U.S. that several of these consulates had to be closed. This was one of the things that would have to change with the termination of diplomatic relations. So, we squeezed them down from 16 to 12, I recall. Nevertheless they retained a very extensive network of CCNAA offices around the country that operated exactly like consulates except that they didn't have consular status. Their personnel enjoyed privileges and immunities similar to those accorded consular personnel. We had similar needs in Taiwan, so we wanted the arrangements to work effectively for both sides.

Q: When I interviewed Nat Belocchi and Nat was saying that if you think that the Israelis have a lobby or a network in the United States, wait until you run across the nationalist Chinese. How did you find it sort of business everywhere? Was this a pretty significant group?

BROWN: They were and are extremely active in cultivating good feelings amongst Americans toward Taiwan. They considered themselves a very vulnerable society and they recognize that the U.S. was their principal supporter. Hence, they did everything they could to cultivate friendship among Americans. I'm excluding from this the intelligence operations, and talking just about legitimate diplomacy. Under our international visitor program, we would bring 15 or 20 people a year from Taiwan for month long visits to expose them to American society, just as we did everywhere else. Similarly Taipei was targeting people who would 20 years later be in leadership positions in the U.S. But, Taiwan had programs, which were much larger than ours. They were bringing hundreds of people to Taiwan every year, through every conceivable kind of arrangement. At one level they were inviting members of congress. They had an extensive program of congressional staff visits. They did the same thing at the state level working through their local offices. They were inviting state legislators, staff members of state governments, staffs of governors around the country. They had an operation with the democratic and republican parties where political parties in Taiwan, mainly the KMT, would invite delegations from those party organizations at the national levels and at the state levels to Taiwan. They had visits from professional groups; they had visits from academics. Then when the visitors came back, CCNAA would follow up, maintain contact and seek these people's help. Their friends are never forgotten. They are always invited to lunches and dinners and parties when visiting delegations come the connections are kept up so that a massive effort to cultivate good will and support in this country for Taiwan because Taiwan is so dependent on American political and military support. Then when help was needed, Taiwan was not shy in asking for it.

What was and is different is that Israel had a large and active domestic political lobby in the Jewish community. While the Chinese community in the U.S. was growing, it was not politically active and was split between pro-Beijing, Pro-KMT and Taiwan independence groups.

Q: Did you find a sense of unease in the East Asian bureau? Were the people dealing with China per se because I mean just looking at it from the outside, here is this active office doing this thing making cultivating, also the fact is that Taiwan was turning into a democracy. When you say democracy, this rings all sorts of bells in the United States and it was not a fake one. I mean this is a real thing and yet you know, you had China, which wasn't going in that direction at all. Sort of almost a frustration or something of the Mainland China hands within our State Department kind of wishing you'd go away or something like that?

BROWN: We'll things were different in the mid-1980s. I think the phenomena you're describing are of the '90s. Why do I say that? First because in the mid-'80s the democratic transformation in Taiwan was only just beginning. There still were political prisoners from the Kaohsiung incident in jail. There were more congressional hearings on human rights in Taiwan. The real process of political reform in Taiwan began actually in 1986 but wasn't completed until much later with the first direct election of the Taiwan president in 1996 and the first transfer of power to the opposition in 2000. In '86, '87, '88 this process was just beginning. On the mainland, it was a period when economic reform was seen in this country as promising. There were student demonstrations in China in 1987 that were significant enough to cost party Secretary General Hu Yaobang his job. So, the contrast between what was going on in the mainland and what was going on in Taiwan wasn't as stark then as it was later.

Q: So, when you were dealing with it both countries sort of seemed to be on a mild trajectory toward the better?

BROWN: You could say that before Tiananmen.

Q: Did you feel, was there still this almost coterie who had participated in the opening to China who identified so much with mainland China that they tended to be dismissive or forget about Taiwan? I mean was that still an attitude or did this work itself out?

BROWN: At that time, the Republican administration had good relations with Taiwan and quite positive attitudes toward the island. Taiwan felt that it was well connected with the Reagan and subsequently with the Bush establishments in Washington. Holbrooke had been dismissive of Taiwan, but the Republican administrations were not. The first person I worked for was Jim Lilley who had been our representative, the head of AIT in Taipei. He believed that if you wanted to manage the U.S.-China relationship as a whole correctly you had to take very good care of your ties in Taiwan. If one didn't take good care of the ties in Taiwan then the Taiwanese were going to use this network that they had cultivated, most importantly in the congress, to put pressure on the administration to do things that would not be in the U.S. interest.

Q: You were there at least in the beginning of the transition between the Reagan and Bush administration and you know, often within an administration between two different parts of the same party the transition sometimes gets a little bit rocky. How did this one go regarding your area?

BROWN: From my perspective there were no serious problems.

Q: How about arms sales? Was this something you were dealing with all the time?

BROWN: All the time, and we were going through all sorts of shenanigans you might call them to provide Taiwan with the weapons it needed in ways that did not provoke the PRC and also, to the best of our ability, could be seen as consistent with the language of the communiqué that had been negotiated with the Chinese in 1982. The August '82 communiqué on arms sales said that there were limits on the quantity and quality of arms we would sell to Taiwan. So, we had to try and live within that framework, but the framework was being stretched beyond credibility by technological change. Taiwan's weapons systems were becoming obsolescent and had to be replaced and the only way you could replace them was by providing newer more capable systems. Subsequently, after I left, we bumped up against the quantitative ceiling as well as the quantitative one with the sale of F-16s. The F-16s clearly were a more capable system, and they were so expensive that there was no way they could be provided within the quantitative limitations either.

Q: Was there somebody sitting there or some bodies sitting there in the Pentagon figuring out what the mainland Chinese had in the way of aircraft, navy, etc. and what the Taiwanese had and making sure that the Taiwanese were able to have a credible defense?

BROWN: Sure. Studies were done of the military balance in the Taiwan straits. State, DOD and NSC had to weigh what could be sold that would meet Taiwan's legitimate defense needs and how to do it in a way that would not create problems in our relations with the PRC. One key was to keep what we were doing out of the public eye. Appearances were important to the PRC. Consequently, what systems were called was important. For instance, Taiwan wanted the M-60 tank. We sold them an equivalent but called it a hybrid M-48, the M-48H. I'm using an army system here as an example, though it was not the most important weapon we were selling Taiwan. I could have used the frigate that we had agreed to sell. In that case, we devised a program whereby Taiwan could manufacture in Taiwan new frigates that were better than the old World War II vintage ones that were being replaced. Clearly this would involve a qualitative improvement. Rather than selling them these ships outright in a way that would be seen as a violation of the arms sales communiqué, we worked out an arrangement to provide the plans and build the ships in Taiwan. These ships would then be outfitted with modern weapons systems. This met their defense needs with less strain on our relations with China.

Q: What about other countries on this arms thing? Could you say the French and all, were they and other countries, were the Taiwanese shopping around?

BROWN: Taiwan was out looking all the time, but very few countries were prepared to sell to them. The Israelis would provide some things. They got some systems from the Italians, and believe it or not from the Swedes. The sellers would try to handle the sales in a way that didn't attract publicity or create problems for their relations with China. The really big third country sale again came after I left. This was the French decision to sell frigates and 60 mirage fighters to Taiwan.

Q: Things were beginning to happen in the Soviet Union. Gorbachev was coming. Did that change the equation or was that felt?

BROWN: That didn't really have any impact.

Q: How about the Japanese? Did we see them as a rival or a supporter or how did we see the Japanese?

BROWN: Well, as an economic competitor in Taiwan. For a variety of reasons, Japan did not have any defense ties with Taiwan. Certainly on the political level, they kept a very low profile and were determined to avoid problems in their relations with the PRC.

Q: During this '86 to '89 period did you find, had the balance shifted from the mainlanders to the Taiwanese and speaking within the political system?

BROWN: In that context, the most important thing that happened followed the death of Chiang Ching-kuo in 1988. Lee Teng-hui, the vice President, succeeded him and became the first Taiwanese to reach a real position of power in Taiwan. This was a revolutionary change. Most people at that time thought Lee was a lightweight who would not last. It was similar to the way people thought about Jiang Zemin when he was appointed General Secretary in Beijing.

Q: Or Anwar Sadat.

BROWN: Yes. Well, Lee transformed Taiwan politics and is still having a major impact now as a former president. However, in the years I was on the desk, he started very cautiously. He had to be careful because even though he inherited the presidency, he did not inherit automatically the chairmanship of the Nationalist Party. That was the really powerful position in the political system at that time. The first thing Lee had to do was to get himself appointed acting chairman of the party and that was in fact opposed by Chiang family loyalists, including Madame Chiang Kai-shek who was then in her late 80s. She had returned to Taiwan, in 1986 I think, out of concern that Chiang Ching-kuo might go too far in liberalizing the political system. She was there when he passed away. She, her son Chiang Wei-kuo and some others tried to prevent Lee from being given the title of acting chairman of the party. Reform elements in the party blocked that effort and Lee became acting chairman. Lee had to consolidate his position and prove to people that he was going to be around for a while. He moved forward with Ching-kuo's program for initial political reform and subsequently carried that process much further in the 1990s.

Q: Was this looked upon with favor in the United States?

BROWN: Oh, definitely. Washington's positive response went back to 1986 when Ching-kuo was beginning to signal his willingness to conduct political reform in Taiwan. His biggest signal was when opposition politicians defied the ban on new political parties and announced the formation of the Democratic Progressive Party (DPP). KMT conservatives urged Chiang to arrest them, but he told the conservatives that times were changing and this had to be accepted. So, that was the big signal that political reform was coming. Ching-kuo terminated martial law the following year and Taipei passed a civic organization's law that legalized new political parties. They also ended the ban on new newspapers, which had been used as a control mechanism of the press, opening up a much freer press environment. The process went on to a number of other steps, but led to in 2000, 14 years later, to a peaceful transfer of government from the KMT to a president representing the opposition DPP.

Q: Were there sort of a Taiwanese, I mean there must have been Taiwanese watchers in the mainland government at the embassy here. I was wondering whether you were picking up from your colleagues who were working with that embassy how they were viewing things in Taiwan.

BROWN: They were trying to figure out what this political transition meant. Did having a Taiwanese president mean that Beijing was going to face demands for Taiwan independence? How do you interpret the freer expression of opinion and the fact that Taiwanese were now free to advocate independence? What did this mean? Yes, there was a lot of interest. The Chinese Embassy was talking to various people around Washington, including those on the China desk. Occasionally either people from AIT in Washington or we on the Taiwan Coordination Staff would meet with Chinese diplomats. We didn't want to do it too often because our job was to deal with Taiwan, and Taipei was very sensitive about our contacts with the PRC. Nevertheless we did meet to make sure that the channels of communication were open and that the PRC accurately understood the way we saw what was happening.

Q: Were you seeing at this time a really positive direction towards everything or was this, did you see that probably the KMT would eventually be if not phased out, be having to compete for jobs and things like that?

BROWN: Yes, we foresaw that. However, it appeared that the KMT position remained strong. There was a debate among analysts about whether the KMT was going to be in effect another version of the Japanese Liberal Democratic Party, a permanent government party within a democratic system because the opposition could not get itself organized effectively to compete with it. The democratic transition had gone far enough by the time I left in '89 that that kind of debate was taking place.

Q: While you were dealing with Taiwan, were we ever called upon to steam the fleet or something from the seventh fleet up and down the Formosa Strait and that sort of thing?

BROWN: This was not the period of military confrontation in the Strait. I mean we had issues that we had to deal with because the Taiwan military and the PRC military were occasionally coming into close proximity of each other in the strait. In the mid 80s, the Taiwan military was still quite confident. They had higher quality systems and they would sometimes try to fly too close to the mainland and provoke the PRC. At times we had to warn Taiwan from doing that sort of thing.

Q: Quemoy and Matsu which were household names back in the '60s, what was happening with them?

BROWN: Very little. I mean there was some talk, in the context of Taipei's decision to open up travel to the mainland, about what role the offshore islands might play? Can something take place in terms of travel back and forth there? Intriguing questions, but in 1987 when travel to the mainland had just begun, it was too early for such a major change on the offshore islands.

Q: Were there ever any problems with mainland students and Taiwanese students at UCLA or where have you, what have you, at one of the universities?

BROWN: Not that I can recall. That was a period when PRC students were coming to the U.S. in large numbers, and there have long been thousands of Taiwanese on campuses as well, but I don't recall any significant problems.

Q: Did Taiwan make any noises during the 1988 election between Bush and Dukakis I guess it was about political contributions or anything like that?

BROWN: I don't recall a problem on that.

Q: You probably would have if there had been. When did you leave in '89?

BROWN: In July or August.

Q: How did you, you left just after the whole Tiananmen thing?

BROWN: That's right.

Q: This is tape five, side one with David Brown

BROWN: Yes, I had observed the drama of Tiananmen while still in Washington. The students in the square, the mass demonstrations of a kind that had never been seen before in Communist China, many ordinary citizens joining in, delegations from different ministries participating in the demonstrations. For a while, I believed this would lead to some very significant change. Then martial law was declared and the military suppressed the demonstrations.

In Taiwan, there was a lot of optimism that spring that real reform might occur in China. Then of course, when the crack down came, this bubble burst and the usual attacks on the communists resumed. What happened to cross-strait travel, trade and investment during this period is very interesting. Businessmen went to the mainland, business continued, investments continued, it was rather remarkable. After Tiananmen, when most of the world was reducing contacts and there was reluctance by many in the West to invest in China, to everyone's surprise Taiwanese investments just kept going pretty much as though nothing had happened. It was motivated by business opportunities and most of the investments were in the southern coastal part of China, which was not heavily affected by what was going on in Beijing.

Was Taiwan intelligence involved in trying to support the democracy movement in China during that April May period? We didn't have very much information on that at that time. Most of the external support from overseas Chinese seemed to be coming out of Hong Kong rather than Taipei. But how much came from Taiwan wasn't clear at the time.

Q: Were we, how did we feel about Taiwanese investment in China? I mean was this a good thing?

BROWN: A good thing, yes.

Q: So, we weren't concerned that they were making another competitor for us?

BROWN: No. You have to remember that this started slowly. There had been a certain amount of unacknowledged trade going on indirectly before the travel ban was lifted in '87. The volume was still modest and not in the high tech area. It was textiles and shoes and sportswear and products like that. Today if you look at the cross-strait trade it's a very different picture. It's a huge factor both for China and for Taiwan. It is very much tied into global IT trade.

Q: What about Taiwanese versus mainland diplomacy in Africa and other places? Was this at all sort of a battlefield while you were there?

BROWN: The diplomatic struggle was a constant phenomenon. I can't remember who lost and who won what in that particular period.

Q: Well, then, when you left there after Tiananmen, where did you go in '89?

BROWN: Before we leave, let me just come back to one other issue that was very important in those days and about which there have been reports subsequently in the public record. That is the question of non-proliferation in Taiwan.

Q: You're talking about non-proliferation?

BROWN: Well about the Taiwan effort to acquire nuclear weapons, which we talked about earlier when we discussed the period when I was on the desk in the '70s. We went through another bout of this. It was reported at the time that Taiwan formally shut down and disabled its research reactor in 1988. This was the reactor they had purchased from Canada in the 1960s. The other information in the public media was the defection to the United States in early 1988 of one of the deputy directors of the Taiwan Atomic Energy Commission. The circumstances were never very clear in the media under which this individual ended up in the United States, but the fact that he was here was reported at the time and it is in the public record now. Dealing with this issue was one of the most important things the U.S. did in this period. It was in a way cleaning up after our own mess. I say that because the impetus for getting back to an interest in nuclear weapons by the Taiwan military came after we switched relations and their sense of insecurity became very real. Things developed to the point that we had to discretely tell Taiwan that this reactor had to be shut down and disabled. That reactor was the core of the problem because it could be used in a weapons program. In the '70s we had agreed Taiwan could continue to operate it under IAEA safeguards and it just became apparent that that wasn't the smart policy.

Q: Well, how did the Taiwanese react?

BROWN: Well, there were only a very small number of people in Taiwan who were aware that this was an issue. They essentially were persuaded that their relations with the United States, with the Reagan and Bush administrations, were more important to their security than anything they might be thinking of doing in terms of developing a weapons capability of their own. The people who were involved in it saw that the better part of wisdom would be to shut down this reactor. This took place around the time that Chiang Ching-kuo passed away. The only thing known to the public was that the deputy director of the Atomic Energy Commission and his family had disappear from Taiwan and it was rumored gone to the United States. We were fortunate enough not to have congressional hearings on this, thanks to some careful briefings of key members, so there was no sort of public discussion of it in the United States either.

Q: When this director and family left, what was behind it?

BROWN: Well, I think I better leave it at that because I don't want to go beyond what is in the public record. I think you could put the pieces together you could assume that something he told us was significant in terms of our understanding of what was going on.

MARK S. PRATT
Guangzhou (Canton) (1986-1989)

Mr. Pratt was born and raised in Massachusetts and educated at Harvard, Brown, Sorbonne and Georgetown Universities. Entering the Foreign Service in 1956, he studied Chinese and was posted to Hong Kong. Throughout his career Mr. Pratt dealt with Far East and Southeast Asian affairs, serving in Taichung, Hong Kong, Vientiane, Paris, Taipei and Guangzhou (Canto), where he was Consul General. His Washington assignments also concerned Southeast Asian matters. Mr. Pratt was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1999.

Q: Well, now, in 1986, you left this containing-the-problem job, and you went where?

PRATT: I went to Guangzhou as consul general, and Guangzhou is, of course, formerly called Canton. And so this was the principal consulate outside Peking itself, because we handled all the immigrant visas there, and therefore it was the largest American diplomatic mission in China, except the embassy in Peking.

Q: Well, now, you were there from 1986 to when?

PRATT: From 1986 to 1989.

Q: This was your first time in the place that had always been over the horizon.

PRATT: Well, except for when I was there in 1947, when I was a little boy. So yes, however, it had been so much on the periphery of or, shall we say, involved in what I was doing, so I can't say it was an anticlimax, but nonetheless it wasn't quite going home either, but it was certainly neither strange nor totally familiar.

Q: Was there at all a sort of problem from the Mainlander China group within the State Department sending you there? I mean, if you were seen as pro-Taiwan, or something like that.

PRATT: By that time, we had basically very congenial persons who realized that I had been very helpful for them in many areas and always completely consulted with them about anything we were doing which could have an impact on what Peking would think. And so we worked very closely together. Also at that time we had Paul Wolfowitz as the assistant secretary, and he was very staunchly supportive of the Taiwan side and those of us who were working on it. I had also, here in Washington, because of my handling of the Taiwan side, been cultivated by the people in the Peking Embassy, and that maintained, really, even after I came back from Guangzhou. So they have always had me in their sort of card file as somebody whom they may not be too happy with some of the things I was doing, but somebody with whom they'd keep very much in touch. So I had had close contacts with the other DCM (Deputy Chief of Mission) here, and before we went off to Guangzhou, my wife and I were invited there to their house for dinner, and other people I would see periodically - either the DCM or the political counselor - and we really had very good relations because they knew the limits of what they could expect to accomplish.

This is another thing which I think was very much a part of what was doing with Taiwan, and that is how you do things vis-à-vis Peking is often more important than what you do. That again, is a very Asian aspect. So long as you don't hit them in the face, so long as you do things in the right way, they may not be too happy about it, but you're not going to really incense them. And of course you do have to be constantly aware of where their interests lie, overall national interests and also the interests of the particular organization to which they belong, because China is no more totally unitary than is the United States. And while it doesn't break down the same way between Congress and House and Senate and State Department and so forth, nonetheless, there are very important different constituencies, and they are not always getting along that well. You've got to know which ones to deal with and how.

Q: Well, now, Guangzhou, when you went out there in 1986, what was, as you saw it, the situation there, the government, how things were going in Guangzhou? Talk about the greater area.

PRATT: Sure. Our consulate covered four provinces. It started out being three provinces and then the island of Hainan was made a province, so in the end there were four provinces. Each one was very different, but they all were part of the greater south and, shall we say, the more economically inclined area of China. Early on in his career Deng Xiaoping had established special economic zones, of which the original ones, there were in Guangdong Province, and one was in Fukien Province, and therefore all four of them were within my consular district.

And these were ways that Deng was using to break from the centralized planning and centralized ownership and control system that was in place when he came in. He sent people to canvass how economies were run in Hong Kong, Taiwan, South Korea, and Singapore, and to compare all these notes and then submit a proposal about how they could get some of these methods which appeared to work in these areas and to establish those in special economic zones in the southern part of China, where they could be sort of cordoned off and made sure that if they developed any kind of "bad habits" they wouldn't spread elsewhere in China, but the major thing being that they would be test areas to figure out what could be done on the Mainland, based on what Deng considered the Chinese-type policies, the Confucianist background and all the rest of it, that South Korea, Taiwan, Hong Kong, and Singapore had found was compatible with the Chinese character.

So this was a very interesting approach, and he pioneered in many of these areas methods which subsequently were found to work and some of which they found didn't work and were abandoned and so forth. But this is very much part of the pragmatic approach of Deng Xiaoping, which of course is not at all a Leninist approach, and therefore this was the beginning of what has turned out to be the way in which China has taken almost a whole coastline and transformed it to what are often called capitalist principles, but aren't really capitalist. They are still much more bureaucratic capitalism or a whole range of things, but nonetheless where the economics is important. And that's where it's different from, say, the Stalinist and even the Leninist principle, which was that you do it regardless of what the cost in mere money is. And from the point of view of these other people, though, money is merely the means of finding out what it does cost you.

Q: What were our concerns in this area?

PRATT: Well, our concerns were that this was the area which was advancing most rapidly. I'm sure you know of Ezra Vogel's book, the two of them, on Guangzhou, one in 1964 and one later on which he was editing. He was completing his second book while we were posted there in Guangzhou. [Ed: Vogel, Ezra F., Canton Under Communism (1969) and The Four Little Dragons: The Spread of Industrialization in East Asia (1991), both Harvard University Press]

And therefore, this was from our point of view economic events in Guangzhou seemed to be pointing to the future. And making work economic rationality and the various aspects of this, but the primary thing was beginning to know what things cost so you know what's worth doing and what isn't.

Q: Were we concerned as this developed that maybe the Chinese might turn into another Japan - in other words, milk our money and send us stuff? We have a very critical balance of trade problem. We've had it for some time, and during this period we had it. Was this a concern, Mark?

PRATT: Oh, yes. And of course one of the principal purposes of our commercial attaché was to make sure that we did the most we could to try to expand U.S. sales in China. However, we did consider that the Chinese had a very different economy, after all, from the Japanese. The Japanese could sort of mount an export focused economy without necessarily being aware that they had so many consumers back at home, whereas nobody in Peking can consider that they have no consumers back in China. They've got 1.2 billion of them. Therefore this is not so easily done. Secondly, of course, Japan Incorporated - perhaps a rather accurate term to refer to the way in which a government business and so forth all work together. That was never the case in China, and of course I was there in south China, where things are run very differently from the way in which they are run up in the Shanghai area, which is again different from Xinjiang and Mukden [Ed: in Chinese, Shenyang] in Manchuria. We could see that there were a lot of different things going on. It was nothing like Japan.

Secondly, many of the goods which were being produced for the U.S. market, which were beginning to be produced in Guangdong Province, had previously been produced in Hong Kong or in Taiwan or occasionally in South Korea, and therefore this was merely a transfer. This was not a net increase, and therefore the trade deficit with China, which of course developed basically after I left - I mean, it was important by the time I was leaving, but even more important afterwards - nonetheless, this was based on a decrease in the deficit with Taiwan and with Hong Kong, because goods were nominally being produced in China and being carried on ledger books as coming from China, even though the company that may have been producing the stuff either was an American company which had previously produced the stuff in Taiwan or maybe a Taiwan company which was producing it on the Mainland. So you're merely shifting it from one étiquette to another; it's not a net increase.

Thirdly, China was far more open to joint ventures. Admittedly, we had problems with some, and often different problems in different parts of China, and we had the fewest problems perhaps in Guangdong province. In part, that was due to the experience of the Hong Kong people who had started many of these ventures or the Hong Kong partners who were involved with the Americans doing it, so if the Americans were running something they often would make sure that they would get somebody whom they knew in Hong Kong who would know the right people to try to handle in Guangdong Province, and sometimes the Hong Kong people would then pick people from Bangkok who were related to the people in part of Guangdong Province, the northeastern part, who would be able to line up political support.

And so what you get is basically very much a, say, rational economic proposal which would pass muster in the banks of Bangkok and in the money houses and export people and the design people and so forth of Hong Kong and getting the more rationally minded figures, which included some of the party types in Guangdong Province. So this was economic rationality, and down in that area we were able to benefit from it.

Q: How successful was your consulate general in promoting U.S. trade? Were Chinese entrepreneurs coming to you and saying, "What have you got in the line of toilet covers or air conditioners?" - or what have you?

PRATT: No, it was handled a little differently. Guangdong had a big exposition hall, and they had their annual trade fair for the promotion of Chinese goods, and Americans had previously come in to look at things at this fair and try to get an idea of what they wanted to buy. For sale of American products, we occasionally had shows which were run by the Commerce Department, generally focused shows of a particular type. We had one wine tasting, for example, which was not going to be doing very much for selling California wines, but in general the Americans would go out there and scout out the market and figure out what it is they could do. And they often would go in through joint ventures. So you had Beatrice, the food corporation. You had Heinz.

PRATT: Another big food one. And you had Procter and Gamble coming in for shampoos and things of that sort. They of course had to work out what it was they thought might sell in China, and of course, initial estimates were all very, very pessimistic about the level of consumption of people of China because people were really not doing a very good geographic examination of China to determine that the economy was very different in the coastal area from what it was in the interior, and therefore beauty products and things of that sort could be sold very easily in the more prosperous city areas of the coastal part of China. And so that's when they found that Head & Shoulders and other things of that sort could sell at prices comparable to the U.S. Also they had not really looked at the Chinese. I mean they knew what their monthly wages were, but they didn't realize that if they had an apartment the rent of which cost three-quarters of what the electric bill was and they were only allowed to have one 25-watt light bulb per room, then you realize that you're dealing with people getting so much as a monthly income, this is almost what a teenager would get who's living at home. It's available for such things as shampoo and beauty products and things of that sort. So China was developing a market much more rapidly than people had thought at first, and therefore baby food, for example, which Beatrice was doing and Heinz was doing, and a number of other things were being produced which could be sold on the Mainland as well as having things exported to Hong Kong and other areas in the region.

So that was part particularly of what we were doing in Guangdong Province. Continental Grain, for example, came in to produce feed grains for raising shrimp and chicken and pigs and so forth, and they were able to find ways of getting the grain stuffs from the northeast through military connections, and they, for example, got the backing of the agricultural head because they named his brother a member of the board and therefore he was getting money out of this, and they had the okay of the party secretary because his brother was connected with the banker who was brought in from Bangkok. So you know, when you've got these various factors together, you could get something going which could rely on American management and American expertise and gradually permit us to train other people. We did not try to do things as advanced as, for example, the Peugeot factory. The French established a factory for manufacturing automobiles in Guangdong Province, but they were piggy-backing on an old company that used to make buses and so forth, and they had all the kinds of usual problems with the Communist Party organization within the enterprise and the labor organizations which made difficulties. Most of the Americans coming in were able to establish an organization where they could make sure they got on the right side of some of the right people there, and some of these right people, no doubt, were getting paid off. And of course, as we found in the case of the Soviet Union, a little bit of corruption sort of get wheels moving. When you get a lot of corruption, then you get a falsification of the economic system.

Q: Speaking of corruption, I would imagine this would be one of the things you'd be monitoring rather closely, to see what it was doing to the system.

PRATT: Well, obviously, one of the problems we have is the American law which does not permit Americans to engage in the kind of corruption which others do.

Q: The Foreign Corrupt Practices Act.

PRATT: The Foreign Corrupt Practices Act is not something which the French or the Japanese and so forth have ever adopted. So we had to look at this and sort of see that, well, probably they were having their partner in Hong Kong do the payoff.

Q: I was thinking more not so much on the American economic side, but looking at basically the political system in this 1986-89 period. Were you seeing the corruption as being a major factor in sort of the politico-economic life of China?

PRATT: Well, when I arrived in '86, the primary corruption was still political. In other words, the Communist Party membership gave you many rights and privileges, many of which were not financial, many of which were that your children would be able to get access to the better schools. They could go into the faculty of the school that they wanted to go into. They could get the degree they wanted. They could then go on to graduate school where they wanted to go. They then would not be sent out to the boonies but would get a job in some of the central enterprises and so forth. This was the kind of political corruption which was most offensive to many of the younger people there, particularly since, of course, that corruption often favored political figures who were not from the province. And therefore the carpetbaggers, from their point of view, would be the ones who were favored. They would get the better housing. They would be able to get all the perks. When they retired they would get much better housing and they would have a car and driver assigned to them and so forth. So that's the kind of corruption which I think is most common in Communist systems.

Let me give you an illustration of the sort of things that I suggested. When Vaclav Havel was able to open things up in Czechoslovakia, he spread the news about the special facilities for high party figures, all of the special resort areas, all the special housing, all the special clubs, and all the rest of it - to show that Czechoslovakia was not, shall we say, a workers paradise. It was the party's paradise. Well, this was very true in Guangzhou. The whole area, you may be aware of, is this whole area in which Mao used to go because they liked to go south during the winter, and his wife had her special place which was very palatial. They had special trains which would transport them from the north. So this is the kind of privilege of the party figures which from the point of view of the people there was the most annoying aspect of corruption. Monetary corruption, of course, was still, shall we say, in early stages because there wasn't much you could do with money. If you got a lot of money, what could you do with it? If you couldn't get it out of the country into a bank account abroad so that when you were abroad you could either gamble at Las Vegas or buy something for your children who were studying in the United States, what was the sense of having the money? You could get everything you needed through power.

Q: How about your reporting work, your contact with the governments of your four provinces? What was your interest concern, outside of sort of keeping a finger on the pulse?

PRATT: Well, of course, one of the key things we were always interested in was economic development and then the potential role of the United States, either in investing or in selling things there for a certain project which they were interested in. And for that, we did find that the economic zones were often the areas in which we would have the greatest success because these were where people who were sort of the entrepreneurial types from all over China might gravitate, because they made the first - and particularly Shenchén, near Hong Kong - this was the first sort of real Chinese city composed of people from all over China. In other words, it was not Shanghai and all Shanghainese, and it wasn't Peking with a lot of bureaucrats plus a few people from Peking. This was the children of some of the top leaders all over the country converging on Shenchén and making an overall-type Chinese environment, which again was very open, particularly to Hong Kong, but then also open to the U.S., because Hong Kong is certainly very open to the U.S. So we would go around primarily to be seeing those places where there was some economic venture which they could want our assistance for or we could facilitate. For example, I went down to the opening of an automobile showroom in Hainan, and there weren't going to be many American automobiles, but it was an American-connected venture, through Hong Kong. And so I think in the end, probably from one of the aspects of corruption that was important there, because Hainan Island had had special import arrangements, and this had resulted in one of the biggest scandals just before I got there of their buying automobiles through this special privilege and then shipping them across the water into Guangdong Province. And one of the more gifted economic figures was finally coming back to Guangdong after being disgraced as the party figure in Hainan Island.

Q: Were you running into the problem that I've heard of - of cars being stolen elsewhere, particularly in Hong Kong at this particular time, being taken into China and then the army higher-ups were picking them up at margin rates?

PRATT: Yes, well, this happened near the end of my stay, because the smuggling . . . Well, they recently had a very important clamp-down on smuggling in Fujian Province in Xiamen. And prior to that, of course, there was a great deal of smuggling into China from Hong Kong, including, as you mention, very high-quality cars being nabbed down there and then peddled on the Mainland. However, a lot of the cars in Hong Kong, of course they drive on the left-hand side of the road, and therefore they were readily noticeable when they suddenly turned up in, say, Chengdu, because who would get the left-hand drive for Chengdu? So there were certain limits to this. The better way of doing things is when they falsified what the customs declaration said, so that it would come in as one thing when it really was another, and a different duty would apply.

Of course, smuggling out of the country was also a key thing I was interested in, as you can probably gather from looking around here. I bought a lot of Chinese things over my career, and those stacks of boxes there contain porcelain I bought mostly inside China, but that one, for example, is a piece which was smuggled out of China, and I bought it in Hong Kong. So there was a very active market for Chinese antiquities, lots of them dug up in western China at a time when they were putting in airfields and roads, including one major road for the rocketry and nuclear testing area, where they farmed out the land just ahead of the road builders, and the various smugglers would come in and dig up what they wanted and get assistance from the military in getting it down to Guangdong Province, from which it was then shipped across to Hong Kong. So indeed, there were aspects of corruption of this sort, but one of the things to keep in mind, as I say, is that when the president, the head of a country, Deng Xiaoping, would boast of having a salary of $240 a month, you realize that how is he going to get private trains and private planes and all the rest of it based on that. Well, at some point also maybe he's going to want to have actual money, and this is one of the things, for example, which was addressed at one of the conferences we had with the education people. Deans of colleges would have housing provided. They would have servants provided. They'd have a car provided. But with the prosperity which was growing in their part of China, they would get as monetary reward far less than a taxi driver or a waiter at a joint venture hotel. And therefore, they could have all these perks, but how could you transform these perks into the common currency which would permit them to decide if they wanted to buy more cigarettes or if they wanted instead to buy a painting. All of this was -

Q: Or pass on to their children.

PRATT: Or pass on to their children, because they couldn't pass the housing, they couldn't pass the car and driver, they couldn't pass the cook in the kitchen. So indeed, the perks, which were fine under a Communist system and of course went way beyond what many other people would get, are not something in the end which even satisfies the people who get the perks - if you permit economic development at the same time, which then permits some people to get money. And this was where we got the animosity against economic development, because the people who were getting the money out of it were not the people who benefited from the political perks. In addition to that, one of the person whom we knew was the vice-chancellor of the University of Xiamen, who was a very gifted economist, had studied in Europe, and he also ran the Taiwan and the Southeast Asian special departments because he was an economist and then he worked on economic matters, too. And he said a lot of his professors in the economic area were also called in as advisors, consultants for the special economic zone there in Xiamen. He said, "What can a professor of Confucianism or a professor even of Marxism-Leninism - what can he go to offer somebody to be able to get monetary reward which is basically three or four times what he gets as his salary as a professor?" So these dislocations in the society which are produced by economic reforms had, indeed, contradictions which were making for political and other problems. They tried to raise salaries and they tried to equalize these things, but one of the most difficult things is their collecting their taxes. One of the very interesting things about Guangdong Province is they negotiated a kind of overall fee from Guangdong Province to pay to the central government, and once they came to that negotiated figure, it would remain the same for five years. While an economy which is growing 20 per cent a year, you could figure out that whatever figure you worked out of this year, five years later it was awfully low.

Q: Did you at this point, this 1986-1989 period, was Marxism dead, I mean, as far as a belief in your area, or not?

PRATT: Well, shall we say, it was like many state religions: you can't be sure how many believe it, but you know that you dare not attack it. And what was more important was that fear of the thought police, the government, the party - well, not the government so much, but the party - had diminished following Deng Xiaoping. Deng Xiaoping had broken the back of the great fear mechanism, where everybody was so constantly paralyzed with fear. They had, shall we say, sensible caution about what might happen if you said the wrong thing or if you did the wrong thing, but you didn't have an all-pervasive fear of, my God, what can happen next? - which had, of course, existed during the anti-rightist movement, the Great Leap Forward, and the Cultural Revolution. So people no longer had the same fear. Now they knew that they had to be careful, and they also knew that there were certain people to protect them from others and there were other people who they would need protection from, so it was beginning to be a more complicated society, and Marxism was no so much the question as the state religion and being able to go to your catechism class and to learn how to say it. However, after 1989 and the Tiananmen incident, they tried to go back to the old system of having party hacks go in and lecture students and try to do what they did during the anti-rightist movement, where they had nuclear physics professors who had read Marx in the original German and Lenin in the original Russian be lectured by soldiers about Marxism-Leninism. So you know, this kind of system they could not go back to because the students laughed them out of the room. They only had to go sit there, and for days they had to discuss the terrible, terrible evens of Tiananmen - their version, namely that this was an anti-party and counterrevolutionary movement - and they were required to do this in such simplistic terms that university students just found it ludicrous. And they sort of let, therefore, the teachers know that it was ludicrous, and of course the teachers knew it, too. So there had been a lot of change since the Cultural Revolution, and Marxism, you know, was never quite what people think it was. Mao Zedong - what did he understand of Marxism? Even when he moved to Yenan and was already head of the party, he had read in translation only two documents connected with Marxism-Leninism: The Communist Manifesto and Imperialism: The final Stage of Capitalism, of Lenin. So he knew very little. He finally ordered them to translate more of these works into Chinese. There's a question whether he read very much of them. So Marxism I think has been always a big problem. If you call them traditional and Confucianist, that doesn't make much sense either, but certainly you would have to be far more complex in the discussion of what they are. The attitudes, indeed, were anti-imperialist, but that's often xenophobia, and what has xenophobia got to do with Marxian internationalism?

Q: Yes. When you were dealing with this, did you find that Marx's slogans were given to you by party people and all that, or was this kind of a dying thing?

PRATT: Well, this was dying, and when people came in from the north and addressed formal gatherings and they referred to "comrades" at one point, this was something which the local people would sort of shake their head at because they were losing that term and were using "gentlemen" and "ladies" instead, going back to their previous locution. So a lot of these words which were introduced, for example - they used the word lover as the word for wife, instead of the more formal tai tai. Well, by the time we were leaving, tai tai was back, and airen was not being used. Now admittedly there's a certain influence from Hong Kong, but also it's the fact that many of these people there were rather conservative and had never really liked some of the more barbaric terms which the Communists tried to introduce.

Q: Did you find, as somebody who dealt for so long with Taiwanese affairs, that you were getting genuine questions on our Taiwan policy and all that, or was this a burning issue?

PRATT: It was not a burning issue because, of course, they couldn't care less. Taiwan was farther north and was connected with Fukien Province, but even in Fukien Province they were interested in Taiwan, they wanted to know what I thought was going on there, what I thought was happening, but it was very objective. They were not sort of trying to convince me that they knew what Taiwan was about and the Americans were mainly causing the problems. And in fact, many of them figured that the big power factor in maintaining Taiwan separate from China was Japan, not the U.S., and they said, "That's the trouble with you Americans. You're very trusting and naïve and you don't realize how devious these Japanese are. They are using you to preserve their role in Taiwan. After all, they ruled Taiwan for 50 years, and they have people who really have fond memories of Taiwan as part of Japan and wished it would become part of Japan again, and therefore you Americans are merely serving Japanese interests." So that's the framework in which they would occasionally approach it, but not just lecturing me, you know, "You've got to turn her over or else we'll bomb Los Angeles." I mean, that's something which they will say for people up in Peking who could be that heavy-handed.

Q: What about visas? This was your principal stock in trade in a way in Guangzhou. Was this something you could turn over to your consular section and let go, or did visas impinge on your work?

PRATT: Well, not too much, much less so that probably in Hong Kong in the good old days. But it was, after all, it was a relatively small number of people who would try to come in to apply for either student visas or business visas. So these non-immigrant visas were rather limited, and they, of course, would be - you'd have to get all the documents which the government would give, and the government was more concerned about who went off to study in the United States than American universities were. Therefore, most of these were pretty much straightforward. It was not like Taiwan or Hong Kong, where many people wanted to go to the United States to be able to get out, and they could still get passports to get out. In China they couldn't get passports to leave unless they had fulfilled their military requirement and graduated from the proper university and were going for the proper course of study in the U.S. and all the rest of it. So those were not so much of a problem.

Then, of course, the rest, the biggest number of visas were immigrant visas, and those, of course, were done basically pretty much by rote, and therefore with any good consular section you handled that without much trouble. The one exception was when we got a few people - it was a small number - who were trying to get out of China after the Tiananmen incident because they themselves were implicated in the Tiananmen incident.

Q: You were there after the Tiananmen incident.

PRATT: Oh, yes, and up until October and so forth, all the fall out from that we were very much exposed to. And we therefore had a number of people who had been on the staff of Zhao Ziyang, for example, who were able through friends and other ways of getting down to Guangzhou. However, if they were going to get into Hong Kong, it would greatly help them if they already had in their passport a visa for the United States, so in a number of cases we facilitated giving visas without excessive concern about what their bona fides as a bona fide non-immigrant were. We would sort of say, "Non-immigrant? Well, they might qualify for political refugee, political asylum in the U.S." And therefore we could conclude that we were giving them visas on the proper grounds. We got basically an okay from Washington to do that because we were the last position on the underground railroad before they finally got out to Hong Kong or elsewhere, and in order, as I say, to be able to get by in Hong Kong and not be turned back it was much easier if they had a visa for them to go on to the United States. They did not all go on to the United States. In fact, one went directly to Paris, because once they got to Hong Kong, they were able to contact the French consulate general and get a way of getting out there, but they didn't have a French consulate general in Guangzhou at that time.

Q: Well, then, let's talk about Tiananmen Square. This is what, June or May of 1989?

PRATT: Well, the whole incident really started in April of 1989. One should keep in mind that 1989 is after all the 200th anniversary of the French Revolution, and the French Revolution was very, very important in the thinking of many of the Chinese political movements of the 20th century. They went back to the French Revolution as much as to the Russian Revolution of 1917. Also it was the 70th anniversary of the May 4th Movement of 1919. In addition to that, it was the 40th anniversary, 1949-1989, of the establishment of the People's Republic. So there were three very important anniversaries coming up, and in particular there was an interest among many students to do again what students had done for the May 4th movement. In other words, they had gone against their elders and were in the forefront of pushing nationalist and other important issues. So even before the deaths on April 14th or 15th of the former party chairman - it will come to me during the course . . . Even before his death, you had already had students coming in from the United States and elsewhere to make plans for a big demonstration on May 4th. And when he died, one of the key things they had was a memorial service for him, and this is when they had the first of the big demonstrations, because he was considered somebody who had pushed for some of the reforms and had been ousted as party secretary because of his interest in reform. There are other reasons, I'm quite sure, and I've heard a number of them, but certainly from the point of view of the students, he was one of the few "good guys" in the top party organization. And so they demonstrated very forcefully in his favor, and this was somewhat along the lines of the demonstrations which Deng Xiaoping had been involved in with the death of Zhou Enlai. So this, again, was harking back to previous political events, and therefore the symbolism was not lost on the Chinese in general. And so these things went on, these demonstrations, regularly, and one of the big problems, of course, for Deng Xiaoping was he had wanted to have the business of Gorbachev go smoothly -

Q: This was the first visit since Khrushchev.

PRATT: That's right, the first visit since Khrushchev.

Q: So it was sort of reopening that tie to what was still the Soviet Union.

PRATT: That's right, but also obviously a Soviet Union which had greatly changed and one where Gorbachev was certainly prepared to make sure that there was no hectoring from Moscow to Peking. He was going to be open and placating and not necessarily say that China was the older brother, but he wouldn't say that Russia was the older brother either. So this was going to be a very different relationship, and it was very important for Deng Xiaoping because he had been the focal figure in the Sino-Soviet split some 20 years or more before that - 1957, I guess it was.

PRATT: So 30 years before that he had been the key figure to say very tough, nasty things to Moscow. And here was going to be an occasion for sort of a love feast. Now one of the key things which Deng made his point to tell President Bush when they met before the Gorbachev visit - and perhaps I'll say a few words about that Bush visit later - but one of the few things he said was that this is, however, not going to be a new alliance; it's not going to be something that is aimed at the United States, and so on. But the only message he was really trying to get across to Bush, which shows the importance he attached to the Gorbachev visit and how annoyed he was to find that he could not even greet him in the Tiananmen. They had to meet elsewhere, near the airport, and not go through the streets of the city and so forth. Now this, for a Chinese autocrat, was a great loss of face.

Q: I think for all of us who were watching this thing, were wondering. First it seemed interesting, but it kept going on and on, this camping, and it seemed like the Politburo was paralyzed. I mean, here you were, a Chinese hand of long experience, and from your colleagues in Guangzhou, were people wondering what the hell is happening here? I'm talking about Chinese, too. I mean, why aren't they at least making nice to the students or wiping them out or doing something?

PRATT: See, the perspective, when you mentioned the Politburo, it's a very important point. This, however, is not what was coming out of our embassy, and it was not what people in Washington were talking about. But it was what people in Guangzhou were talking about because they saw this as an example of quarrels within the top. In the first place, Hu Yaobang (the name came to me), the party secretary general who had been removed-

Q: He's the one who died.

PRATT: He's the one who had died. But he had been thrown out a little more than a year before that, and so that showed a division because Deng Xiaoping had said he was basing his succession on two figures, Hu Yaobang and Zhao Ziyang, the one taking over the party, the other taking over the government administration. Well, one of them was out, and then, of course, Zhao Ziyang was told to pick up the party position, a position in which he had no real deep roots, and he had to give up the State Council, the premier position, in which at least he had some important roots - colleagues, person whom he'd put in there, people who had served with him in a variety of positions where they knew each other and had shared interests. Got him over to the party, sorry that's not where he had any of these advantages. So people down in Guangzhou were saying Zhao Ziyang had been the major protector of Guangdong Province and its rather central economic past because he had been down there in Guangdong province in the late 1940s and '50s. He had been a principal assistant to the head of the political movement in Guangdong province, and from their point of view it was someone like Zhao Ziyang who would be defending them. And indeed, one of the key economic figures was the senior governor, and a couple of times I was going to Peking he would be on the same flight because he had to fly up to Peking to find out what it was that his friends and the friend of Guangdong Province wanted them to do, because he didn't trust the bureaucracy in between and he didn't trust the communications. So this was very clearly a demonstration of these problems which existed within the top leadership. And we heard that this indeed was paralysis. Zhao Ziyang was party general secretary, and he had been sent off to Korea just as this was boiling up and just when they were having some of these really hard-liners, the ideologues, draft a big editorial to the effect that the demonstration in Tiananmen were not only anti-party but were counterrevolutionary. And this, of course, was a criminalization of this demonstration. Poor Zhao Ziyang was off in Korea when this was taking place, showing, I think, that they were not at all unhappy to have to govern out of the way because they knew that he would be opposed to this. He sent a pro forma statement back okaying the editorial, but the minute he got back he tried to fight against it and to have the demonstrations characterized by far more gentle terms, hoping, of course, to be able to defuse it because there were many of the objections which the students were coming up with which were so similar to the ones which had been used during the May 4th Movement, that they struck very strong chords within the minds of many of the Chinese people, and as you probably saw at the time, there were banners outside a number of the ministries, including the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, supporting the students. And they began to get workers supporting the students. So there was no question that the tenor of the population in Peking was very much favorably disposed towards the students, because in general students in China are, I can't say coddled, but in any case they're respected because everybody hopes that their son will turn out to be bright enough to get into one of those prestigious central universities. And therefore they have this esteem for intellectualism, and of course Mao had a great deal of contempt for it. But the average Chinese continued to believe that the students could be the saving grace of China.

Q: While this was going on, could you say, as it started, what were you getting from the embassy and were you all wondering was this the beginning of the great revolution or not? I mean, were you looking at it or were you seeing this as another blip?

PRATT: Well, we were, of course, getting a certain amount of characterization of the events and facts about those people who went and talked to people in the square, but down in Guangzhou, this was viewed as basically the sideshow, that the real fight was going on within the councils of the central leadership. They said, you know, "Don't look at what's going on in the square because, although that is significant and what all the people are seeing, that is merely the outside of what is really going on, which is going on inside the very closely . . ." You know Peking's geography - Zhongnanhai, which is where all the top leaders lived, and that basically had one gate which goes almost directly on to the Tiananmen Square. So it's all very close together. But they said the real struggle is going on in the top leadership. And they are not in agreement, and they don't view it the same way, they don't know how to handle it, and this is therefore a typical Chinese event with something on the surface that everybody is paying attention to, but it means that they are not looking at what the real drama is, and that, of course, was the effort to get rid of Zhao Ziyang. And one of the things which they told me down there in Guangzhou was that it looked for while as though when Zhao Ziyang was in the square and when he told the students, "I have come perhaps too late," and he apparently even had tears in his eyes, terribly impressing some of them as being very emotional and sympathetic, that this sort of showed the degree to which he knew that he would rise or fall based on what went on in the square because he was under attack.

Subsequently there has been other information out. Xu Dao Zhin [Ed: ?], who had been party secretary in Hong Kong, apparently a good friend of Zhao Ziyang, they tried to see Deng Xiaoping during this difficult period and Deng's office shut him off and let them go. So they went to see Yang Shangkun and asked him to tell Deng that they would like to see him because they would like to explain what they thought was really going on with the student demonstration and what was going on behind the scene with those trying to take a tough line towards the student demonstration. Subsequently, I guess they learned that Yang Shangkun had already gone over to the other side, those opposing Deng, and certainly opposing Zhao Ziyang, and he never passed this message to Deng.

So it's this kind of internal efforts which have been so typical in Chinese dynasties around the emperor, and this was apparently what was a spin-off into what was going on with the student movement because, of course, as you can imagine, if you get that number of students together, and you can get a lot of people of security services right out there as well, because they have always had very strong security services in all the universities anyway, because students are one of the elements that they are most concerned about and have the greatest difficulty in sort of having confidence that they will do the right thing because they are often very bright and they will do what they think rather than what they're told to do. In any case, we heard afterwards that there were many agents provocateurs there, who were trying to make sure the students couldn't come to an agreement on anything, so that when they were saying, "Zhao Ziyang says he will listen to us but wants us to get off the square, so let's do that," they could not get people together to get a consensus, and they could not do anything without having a consensus. And so this is when these agents, who were trying to make sure they couldn't do anything except what they were told by their own bosses to do, were very successful, and afterwards one of the student organizers whom I knew said, "Well, you know, we have made several big mistakes. One, we accepted a consensus rule rather than a majority of a committee, which would be feasible and could take decisions." Well, in addition to that, almost all these people, of course - or many of them - were children of some of the top leaders, and so they knew that there was a squabble going on in the central office there, and instead of trying to work with those people who would have been closer to their side against the others, they were trying to oppose both of them. And that's when Wuer Kaixi and the others who said to hell with all of them, to hell with Li Peng, to hell with Zhao Ziyang, without considering that if you're in favor of Zhao Ziyang, you've got at least one ally against Li Peng. So this was another big failure which he said they'd made: they did not understand that the enemy of my enemy may be at least in part a friend.

So this was a big failure on the part of the students to be able to figure out what was going on around them, to be able to manipulate and to be able to adapt to the squabbles which were going on. You know, some of the military were asked to participate and found that they were busy or . . . One of the ones I knew went to the hospital to be able to say, "Sorry, I'm in the hospital and cannot attend this meeting."

Q: Well, now, were there comparable demonstrations in Guangzhou, or was this not a student area?

PRATT: Well, there were demonstrations, but they were beautifully controlled there because everybody was agreed as to how to handle them and to make sure that they could go on without a big confrontation. They only permitted a bridge across the river to be blocked for one short period so that people could still get across by boat and by the other bridges. So they did arrest a few people, but they said they had arrested people who were "outside agitators," not students from Guangdong Province. They had a meeting every afternoon in the governor's office, looking down on some of the principal areas where they were demonstrating, and all of the aspects of the government - the party and security services and so forth - were there, and the governor had sufficient clout with the military to make sure they didn't do anything prematurely. Though they were told they should get tanks ready south of town, he made sure they were never brought in and that no real military were ever brought in. In addition to that, they had agents within the students, and of course we had our consulate people out there talking with both the students and the other people around there. And so it was handled in a rather kid gloves way, with due respect for the students and their concerns, and none of the real confrontation which existed in some other places. Shanghai was handled pretty well, and that's one of the reasons shy Zhang Zemin is now in power. He was considered to have played at least a skillful role in making sure the demonstrations did not get out of hand in Shanghai. But they went even more smoothly in Guangzhou.

Q: Today is the 14th of March, 2000. Mark, let's talk about the Presidential visit. This is George Bush, who came there in February of 1989, is that right?

PRATT: That's correct.

Q: And you were called up to help?

PRATT: Yes, all the consuls general were there to assist because there many protocolarities as well as other things to be done, and since we were often the old China hands there in the country, it was useful to have us there because we spoke the language and knew the cast of characters and so on. And there was, of course, quite a bit going on. The Presidential visit was set up rather hastily in that it was originally designed for Bush to attend the services for the death of Emperor Hirohito, and therefore originally this was supposed to be in Japan, the visit, and then when they added on, obviously that could not be done in advance of the emperor's death, so of course the timing of this was relatively short for most presidential visits, and particularly short for the visit to China.

I think I've mentioned earlier the fact that one of the problems was that the President himself, of course, had been head of the liaison office in Peking. He had met many of these persons during that particular period, which of course was still very early. It was, after all, before Deng Xiaoping was really in power. But nonetheless, he felt that he had maintained an awareness of what was going on in China through subsequent postings such as head of CIA and so on. And he certainly had a great deal of interest in this. He had obviously, during the period of Reagan, been one of the persons who was fielded whenever they had an important Chinese matter. So indeed, he considered that he was still very much a China hand, even though it was a very strange career for a China hand. But it did make for certain problems in that it was very difficult to get information through to him and be sure that it was going to go, because everybody was very antsy along the way about what they would try to tell the desk officer for China. Baker at one point apparently told people not to expect him to raise any matter of concern to China with the President because that was the President's area, not his. So we had a bit of a frustration in that, with the visit set up so soon before it took place, we were concerned about getting the President aware of what had evolved in China since he had been able to keep hands on, because after all as President, he didn't really have enough time to be a really good desk officer.

So there had been, of course, starting in 1986, the attack on Hu Yaobang, and this had resulted in his being eliminated from the hierarchy. And then of course, there was the fact that Zhao Ziyang had been made secretary general over his own objections, and his arguments with Deng were that he had no real strength to have any real force in that area. So it was clear that there was a big struggle going on in China trying to limit what Deng could do, particularly how Deng could create his own succession program. But this would be very difficult to get across, and indeed it was. What was sent from Guangzhou would not be easily signed off on to be going to Washington by the embassy because they were not anxious to say something which would not be well received. There were obviously questions of all kinds of programming, and I'm sure you are aware of the big fight over Fang Lizhi and how he was going to be put at the dinner that the President gave, and yet we were told that the Chinese side would not be very happy to have him on the guest list. And for the most part, we were letting the Chinese prepare their own guest list. So this was going to be a problem. There's a big dispute as to whether this proposal was something which was or was not signed off on by Washington.

Q: Winston Lord took great umbrage. He felt that he had warned them about this dissident being on the list, but the political consequences one way or the other. It wasn't an either/or. But he said after it got blown up even more, the White House, which may or may not be true. . . but what usually happens is the White House staff had to blame somebody.

PRATT: Sure, and it was Win Lord -

Q: And it was Win Lord who took it, and he was, to use the diplomatic term, pissed off at how they had done that.

PRATT: That was, I think, emblematic of the problems of real communication between China and the President, because nobody knows whether they actually raised this with the President and whether Bush and others, when he had gone to the Soviet Union, had insisted on seeing dissidents and therefore this was viewed by Win Lord as something which they would be expecting to do, either to see him there, or at some point to do deal with somebody as prestigious as Fang Lizhi. And I think if you have a chance to interview Doug Paal -

Q: Who is this?

PRATT: Doug Paal. P-a-a-l. He who was in the Bush White House [Ed: NSC], and he has some rather nasty things to say about Win Lord and the way in which they viewed the whole operation of the American Embassy. Doug is a very intelligent and very capable officer, and he now is in private business here. But a very good observer and a very sharp mind, very competent. In any case, this was part of the difficulty we felt, in that we were trying to get word, and you had so many filters, because the embassy was not anxious to present stuff to Washington which they thought might upset people there. When it got to the State Department, they were upset about how they could present stuff to go all the way up to Baker, and then Baker himself was not anxious to be trying to tell the President what to do on a matter concerning China. And Doug Paal was, I think, a very competent person there, and how this slipped by I don't know. But it was, as I say, very clearly a part of the problem of trying to get the President to be aware of what he would run into when he got there. And as someone commented to me who was involved and attended many of the meetings and knew what had happened, almost all the position papers which had gone to the President distorted or, rather, did not prepare him for what it was he ran into.

We, of course, had never been very fond of Li Peng. Li Peng made a visit to the United States, escorted by Jim Lilley, who I think made sure that other people realized that we were dealing with somebody who was not either a friend of the United States nor somebody who would be easy for us to deal with. So he, of course, was in Zhongnanhai, and they wanted to have merely a protocolarity exchange with Li Peng and not to try to do anything of real substance. They wanted to discuss the economy with Zhao Ziyang, the premier, who was basically one of the sharpest economic minds in China, and they wanted then to discuss a number of other things with his old friend Deng Xiaoping. Well, it turned out that Deng would discuss only one thing, and that was the visit of Gorbachev and the fact that this did not mean that there was going to be a resumption of any strong ties between China and Russia - in other words, allaying any presidential fears in this regard. And Zhao Ziyang was not permitted to discuss the economy. The only thing he was trying to present was the need for a greater control over the political side, and therefore this was a kind of neo-authoritarianism which he had been associated with, which was designed, of course, in his mind as a reformer, to be able to say we're not going to have the old, stupid type of the old timers still in power; we intend to have a much more flexible way of dealing with this and moving toward political reform as well, be it that any political reform matters on his agenda. But he was able to discuss only a very small range of that, and almost all the other substantive conversations were ones which Li Peng had been charged with handling. And of course, on the American side that means the last person he wanted to talk to about anything we had which was substantive.

So this made, I think, for a visit which was, I think, very revealing for the President because it was far less of the, shall we say, ability of the old friend of China, George Bush, to be able to do things the way he wanted to with people whom he had previously known and whom he thought he could really be friendly with. I think you're aware of the fact that he was very, very much - I shan't say an egotist - but he was very much a person who believed in his own persuasiveness and himself, and took up the telephone and talked through interpreters, to people all around the world when he was President and thought that was one of his really important accomplishments. And indeed, in most cases it was. Certainly, the way he was able to muster support for the Gulf War was -

Q: And the fall of the Soviet Union.

PRATT: Yes, the fall of the Soviet Union as well, and indeed, obviously, the current President believes in soft-soaping people his own way as well. I mean, it's part of, I guess, the ego satisfaction one gets from being the head of the United States. But in any case, he wasn't able to dictate what happened there, and therefore, as we tried to say subsequently, this should be a good illustration of why it is we ought to be concerned about what might blow up next, because China was obviously going through a period of considerable problems. If Deng Xiaoping himself could not sort of respond openly and have a free-ranging discussion with our President, then obviously he must be having trouble with other people in his country, even though he was supposed to be the paramount leader.

So in this framework we were stirring around, and I was in charge of escorting people to the room where they had the cocktails before the dinner began. I sat at the second table after the high table, which was a nice long one with people arranged in protocol order, and I was going to have at my table Ji Pengfei, who had been foreign minister, and I had seen him in Paris in 1973, at the Paris conference, and had chatted with him there, so I was looking forward to finding out what he was doing. And of course, he was, although out as foreign minister and nominally not a person of high position, still very, very influential as one of the people who still had his own special office and was really a top coordinator of foreign policy matters for Deng Xiaoping. So indeed, he was a considerable figure, and he was whipped away to take one of the seats at the high table after one of the persons who did have high position either was told to move down below because Ji Pengfei really outranked him, or something else occurred - we don't know exactly because the Chinese handled their own side pretty much.

But over in the corner was the corner was the table at which Fang Lizhi was supposed to be, and my commercial consul was going to be the head American representative at that table. She was the granddaughter of Sun Yat-sen, and therefore she knew loads of people.

Q: What's her name?

PRATT: Sun . . . Nora Sun, as it would be pronounced. And Sun Fei-feng is her Chinese name. In any case, she is now living back in Shanghai. She's left the Department of Commerce and is in business of her own. But as I say, this was a dinner which we had hoped would move rather smoothly, and but for the Fang Lizhi incident, I guess it did move pretty well, as the rest of the visit did. But the major point was that for those of us who were old China hands, we saw that there were indeed many strains, and it was not as though Deng was the full-scale emperor able to command everything, and therefore it was indicative of the troubles which we saw still coming.

Q: Did you see this at the time as being - I won't say a paralysis - but maybe a government put on hold as far as relations with the United States? With what happened, did it pertain to the United States - sort of freeze us out - or was it more just the internal workings that they weren't able to deal with, a major foreign country?

PRATT: Well, obviously there are certain foreign policy matters in which relations with the United States cut into high-level quarrels within the Chinese leadership. One, obviously, is Taiwan. It's up again, and it has always been and will continue to be a major issue where you cannot separate fights within the leadership from the relationship with the U.S. Also aspects of economic development are tied in with that. Zhao Ziyang had been very open to suggestions from the United States about various ways of reforming their economy. Now reform, of course, basically is far more than just a tinkering with little things around the edges, when you're dealing with a command economy on the Stalinist approach, and you're dealing then with the determination to marketize it and also to break down the threads of control which this authoritarian system used primarily through the economic side of things. He was trying, for example, to free up housing. Housing is one of the things which they used to dominate their population. If you had housing of your own, then of course you at least had that much freedom from what you had to look forward to when you go home tonight, because you've got a house to go home to tonight. But then they can at any moment cancel that if they have the system which they previously had. Same way with retirement and, of course, also education and health care. These things were all tied in with their state-owned enterprise economic system with the strong role of the party committee within these state-owned enterprises.

So the whole reform question was one which was getting a lot of attention, and this of course was one of the reasons why many of the people were trying to get rid of Zhao Ziyang, and the attack on Zhao Ziyang had already started, even at this time. It was early in this, but we had already heard that there was a clique - and of course Chungyin [Ed: ?] was considered to be the top figure behind it, and he was using his old buddy Bo Yibo to attack Zhao Ziyang and his policies, and of course he was in a much more vulnerable position as secretary general than he had been when he was in the state councils as premier. So we saw this, and of course the fact that Li Peng was the one who was delegated to speak for everybody and Li Peng being renowned as the person who is most suspicious of the United States - he, for example, was very much opposed to having too many students go to the United States to study, especially graduate courses, despite the fact that this was one of the key points that Deng was in favor of - so he had Li Peng, who was known to have positions which were known to be very much opposed to those of Deng Xiaoping being the person who was supposed to be talking with us. It meant that they felt that they had to keep us at arm's length and keep the people who did understand what we would be saying from talking about these things and just having Li Peng, who could be most relied upon to keep us at arm's distance.

So yes, it did have a connection with U.S. relations. However, even more important than that was, of course, when you had the actual end of this affair, with the Tiananmen incident, the internal political side also had a great deal of impact upon American relations through human rights questions and through the fact that this was on everybody's television screens on a Sunday morning, when there's nothing more interesting to look at than to see what was going on in Tiananmen. And this is one of the things which we were trying to tell both the ambassador, Win Lord, and other people in Washington - that what happens inside China can also have an impact on U.S.-China relations. These persons felt that we could insulate the two. All we have to pay attention to is just how we stroke the Chinese on our own relations; we don't have to worry about what happens within China. We felt that that had been what had taken place, and even Mao Zedong had been willing to have relations with us. But those were rather extraordinary circumstances. That was a time when he was terribly worried about the Soviet Union, and therefore he would compromise, in the minds of anybody who had been following what it is he had been writing all those years, his own principles by joining with the United States to try to have a joint program against the Soviet Union. So that was not a typical aspect of how China would deal with the United States. We were in a much more typical way when we had Deng fighting to be able to maintain at least some shreds of a good U.S. connection.

Q: Well, do you think Bush and Baker caught the spirit of what was happening? You know, you have these visits, and they're busy and then they move on to something else. Did Baker and particularly Bush come away feeling disappointed that it hadn't worked very well?

PRATT: I think he did. However, of course, he then had to move on to something else. But I think that the most important aspect was that he did not know why this had happened, and he didn't ask anybody why the trip had gone this way.

Q: Do you think that too much emphasis had been put on the - I'm going to get my pronunciation wrong - Fang Lizhi incident, as opposed to something much more basic?

PRATT: Yes, I think that scholars and op-ed writers felt that that as an incident, [it] was far more important than it really was, and they felt that therefore it was all our fault, too. And the fact that it should be structural problems within China, which is not our fault but their fault - or rather, their system, if not their fault - was far more important. And the whole Fang Lizhi incident was just a facet of that. And this was not just that Deng Xiaoping was annoyed that the U.S. should try to see Fang Lizhi - because I don't think Deng would have minded that much - it was that there were other people in the security services and the good old conservative ideologues who were annoyed, and they were able to use this with Deng against the U.S..

Q: For the record, Mark could you give a brief summary of who Fang Lizhi was and what was the incidents because it's mentioned in other accounts, but I think we'd better put it on this one, too?

PRATT: Very well, when Deng came in, he had four modernizations, and the military was the last of them. It was basically agriculture, to start, then industry, science, and national defense. And part of the young students were very interested in the fact that there should be four modernizations - which of course meant reforms of various kinds - but they wanted to add - democracy, political reform, as the fifth modernization. And of course, he was immediately thrown in jail for that. Well, Fang Lizhi was a far more prestigious figure. He, after all, was an astrophysicist who had been vice president of the University of Science and Technology in Anhui Province. He later had been part of the, shall we say, ferment which was used to get rid of Hu Yaobang as party general secretary in 1986-87. And he was then later on in Peking when they thought they could keep a closer eye on him, but he also was involved in saying that there needed to be reform in politics as well and that until you did get political reform you could not really even expect the economic reforms to work. So he was obviously far in advance of what the top leadership was prepared to accept at that time. And even Zhao Ziyang, with his neo-authoritarianism, had a program to placate the top old-timers, hard-liners, Maoist types, and therefore had to be in opposition to Fang Lizhi. And so Fang Lizhi was clearly, openly seen as somebody who was not only going far beyond what was acceptable to the hard-liners, but even what the softer-liners, who knew they had to try to get an improved program including political reform, were prepared to condone at that time. So he was not persona grata to any of the top people because they had a big fight over how they could handle this, and as far as they could move was Zhao's position, and Zhao's position was also anathema to many of the old timers. And Zhao was already under considerable attack.

So to include him in a guest list was indeed something which, as others said, "Well, at least you should go to the Chinese side, tell them you're doing it, and find out if they'll accept it; and if they won't, then drop him - before you contact him." However, that's not what apparently the procedure had been when they had thought this up, and so they had sent an invitation to him through an American scholar who was working with him in Peking at that time, and that scholar had said he would both take the invitation and then accompany him to the door, in any case, of the dinner. So this was how it was arranged, and of course since he was under police surveillance, they were able to intercept the car and make sure it did not get to the banquet hall. If he had gotten through the front door, then he probably would not have gotten by the security people because they had found out about it, and therefore they were waiting for him and, of course, would make sure it didn't occur. There were, however, other dissident leaders who were not so prominent who did get through and sat at the table with my friend Nora. And so, indeed, the point had been made, and certainly the point had been made also about Fang Lizhi that it means that we ought to be able to talk to those persons who were not, shall we say, personae gratae to the top leadership. And as you may remember, he took refuge later in the ambassador's residence, and we finally were able to negotiate him out. That was Jim Lilley's accomplishment.

Q: Well, we've talked about Tiananmen Square in Shanghai, but not the aftermath. We've talked about the immediate what happened, but you had some other points you wanted to talk about, didn't you?

PRATT: Yes, one point which, of course, emerged from this was the fact that it was very difficult to have Americans believe that there are internal politics in other countries which can, indeed, in the end have an impact on our own relations. And this was part of the real struggle there, starting with, of course, the President's visit and the internal fighting that had an impact on who would talk with him about what. But then, of course, this meant also who was up, who was down, who was half under attack, and who was going to be perhaps even forced out. And this is the background for the events of Tiananmen.

This incident was one which I shan't say was totally predictable, but nonetheless it was clear that something was happening, and the question would be just when and how. It had a greater impact on how we did things in China than we think it needed to have, but that was because having it take place on American television on a Sunday morning meant that the reaction that Bush and particularly Baker would feel was the domestic impact here in Washington. They immediately felt that they had to respond by distancing themselves from what had happened in the square.

Students, who used to be a privileged class in China (and this is why this was such a bad incident from the Chinese point of view), but also young people in the United States, students or not, have a great deal of resonance with the general body politic and particularly journalism. So, of course, it was very difficult. They felt that they had to take actions which made no real sense in the China framework but made sense from the point of view of what you felt you had to do in the United States. And this is something which we felt caused some of the less intelligent reactions. I think Jim Lilley has probably told you about the problems when the Department refused to give permission for dependents who wished to leave to leave. They said no, you must make a country-wide decision, and it will apply to everybody, and it's a single bureaucratic, administrative fiat. All dependents, not those who wish to leave, but all dependents. Don't give anybody any chance to do what he thinks he ought to do or what seems to make sense under the circumstances. They all have to leave, and they have to leave from every place in China, even though some places had no problems whatsoever - such as Guangzhou. We had no problems of security or anything of that sort. And therefore, this was the administrative fiat, which they said they can only do it on a country-wide bases, and if so, people in the department ought to have their heads examined, because if you have a country as large as China and you're removing dependents because of a flood, well, you don't remove them from the desert areas. So I can't imagine that this is really what they really had to do under law. But they were telling us that under the laws and regulations, if you get the money from Congress to be able to get people out for any one place in the country, you had to be able to say you were doing it for everybody throughout the country.

So he lost, for example, in Peking. We had enough problems in Guangzhou, but they lost, of course, their local employees. We didn't really lose ours in Guangzhou. Things were moving pretty much as usual. But it meant that they had nobody to man telephones except some of the Chinese wives of some of the American employees. Well, they were suddenly told they had to be whipped out, and this was a time when we had received instructions also to assist people throughout china to be able to get out in case they felt they should - that is, scholars and businessmen and so forth. And they had nobody to answer the phones to be able to make contact with some of these people and to try to help make some of the arrangement to get people out. It was very, very complicated, very difficult. And this, of course, was part of the bureaucratic approach which was made. Also, of course, this was made, and they were trying to say that this will bring the Chinese Government to their knees.

And my wife, of course, was forced out to go to Hong Kong, and they wanted her to go back to the United States, and then, of course, they were going to say she couldn't go back to post and help me to pack up to move out because it was too close to my actual departure and so on, so she was going to stay in Hong Kong regardless of whether they paid for it or not. So she, of course, being a little bit irreverent, said, "Yes, there's nothing which is going to make Deng Xiaoping come to his knees quicker than to learn that I have been sent from Guangzhou to Hong Kong."

Q: Yes.

PRATT: This is part of the silliness, when you look at it from the point of view of what you say you are trying to do. And this is what Baker, of course, was trying to make sure the press, the media, and the Congress got, and that is, "We'll show these Chinese that we can be tough on them: we'll take all of our dependents out." Well this was, I think part of a game of the way in which combines between the political appointees and the, I think, excessive concern about American media and public which can always be educated. I mean the media may be difficult to educate, but the public, I think, can generally be educated if you tell them why you're doing something, if you're doing something which makes sense.

And of course, the administrative side, which is very much interested in doing things in a hectoring and dictatorial fashion whenever they get a chance, because I think that they are so much smartened by the fact that they didn't get to be ambassadors and therefore they were very much resentful of people saying, "Listen, this is what foreign policy calls for us to do."

Q: Well, how long were you in . . . or were there some other points?

PRATT: Yes, one point I wanted to raise was the security side of things, because while I was there, Anne Armstrong, who was the head of the Special Intelligence and Security Group at that time, made a visit to Guangzhou with the Special Committee, and she was looking at the basic security situation in the Chinese posts. And we learned certain things which we had sort of expected that any security officer in the embassy could and should have told us. For example, we had a storeroom to which local employees had access on the floor directly below our communications area, and apparently you're supposed to have 10 feet of secure space around your communications equipment. I've forgotten what they call it, but there's something like this zone. And we could immediately improve that situation, as we did. We moved my office down there and had that as a space which was not open to local employees unescorted. So this sort of pointed out, one, the interest in security, which indeed we all should have and as you know most people who are in the political and economic side are well aware of the importance of security. Certainly American business is often very concerned about its security. But admin, of course, is not always understanding what real security is and what some of the problems are. They only have a rather mechanical concept of a piece of paper which has something stamped on it which is left out. And so we found that Anne Armstrong had some very tough security people with her who had previously worked, I guess, with the Congress, and of course, they were, I think, anxious to point out the inadequacies which most of us were well aware of and talking of standards which, of course, would perhaps never be possible in a place that we would occupy in China. Obviously the problems of Moscow were very much in people's minds. That was after the 1987 problems with the embassy in Moscow.

But it pointed out the problems, the kind of security which we really thought was important was often what people were telling us, because that would be what would cause problems for those people. Many aspects of communication such as a lot of secret cables had information which was fairly secret but information which was given to us by the Chinese Government and therefore it was secret but secret for the Chinese, too, and therefore they weren't going to be annoyed because they had told us.

But it was those things which were told to us which were not done with authorization which we had to be concerned about, and we found it very difficult to have some of the people, including the administrative officer in my consulate general, who was of course acting security officer, and he hadn't the foggiest notion. He would discuss the most sensitive matters in areas which were clearly bugged by the Chinese side. But because it wasn't a piece of paper with something stamped on it, it didn't really strike his security consciousness.

Well, this again was part of the problem we had when we were trying to get the premises because DS (Diplomatic Security) was becoming increasingly - how should I say - professionalized. These were not persons who served sometimes as a personnel officer, then they served as a security officer, then they became an admin counselor or something of the sort; but it was becoming more of a professional group. And of course it was recruiting increasingly from the FBI, and it was indeed more and more within an FBI framework. They had approved the arrangements at our premises in Guangzhou, and the last thing they wanted to do was to let us move to any other place, because from their point of view it might be better, but the last thing they wanted was something which they would have to sign off on under new and more rigorous requirements, because it was somebody else who had approved where we were at that point. So every time we were thinking of trying to improve anything, we would run into those who said, "Listen, we would have to approve that, and we can't do it because it doesn't meet our standards, and what you have now is even farther from our standards, but we don't care about that because somebody else previously approved that." And this meant the perfect being the enemy of the better. We finally found that this was broken through only by a very, I think, gifted and very determined real estate developer type named Nicholas Salgo, who had been ambassador to Hungary [Ed: a non-career appointee who served as Ambassador in Hungary from November 1983 to August 1986].

Q: I've interviewed him, yes.

PRATT: You have? Very interesting and, I think, very helpful for all aspects of China security and premises. He, of course, was able to get through this only because he had the backing of Whitehead, who was Deputy Secretary of State.

Q: John Whitehead.

PRATT: John Whitehead - because only through that could you face down the determined opposition of the security people, because they of course could bamboozle any head of M (Bureau of Management) who was merely a career officer or even someone who was not a career officer, like Dick Moose. So I think that we sort of saw at that time that the diplomatic security element . . . Of course, it used to be SY, and then it became DS, and as usual when you change your initials often, you change what you actually feel you can do. And it was becoming far more important and far more, shall we say, difficult to deal with. Another aspect was that the FBI was getting greater inroads in that area, and then, of course, when they established OFM, then, of course -

Q: What does OFM mean?

PRATT: Office of Foreign Missions. Then, of course, that became a new bastion of the FBI in the State Department. And it was interesting that this was all taking place just as our major adversary, the Soviet Union, was in at least the beginning stages of its collapse. I think that the security side has become even more oppressive in recent years. I, of course, have been away from it since 1989, but from what I have heard, it is increasingly a problem, and it's enlisted people in the Congress and enlisted in the press, including David Ignatius (I think it's he), who has been writing a series of articles pointing out how the State Department is totally unconcerned about security and you've got to believe these people from the FBI who have moved in on this problem that the great difficulties are still there. Well, obviously, Kennan had a very sharp response to that, as well as Art Hartman, if you've talked to him, he had a lot of problems when he was ambassador because, of course, the security people would be perfectly happy if everybody were withdrawn from abroad because we could keep better tabs on them here in Washington - so let's pack up our embassies and pull them in.

Q: Well, anyway, I want to come back to your time in Guangzhou. Did you see a change? You left there in what, in 1989? Was the personal computer having any impact at all at that point, because in away this is a much more freewheeling form of communication - interest groups can get together and all - and I think it was probably in its infancy even in the States at that time; but were you seeing any beginning of change?

PRATT: Well, the big beginning of change was the use of the cell phone, which of course was less high-tech, and the introduction of the fax machine, because both of these meant that communications could be facilitated, and the fax machines were used to great effect during the Tiananmen incident. Many people in the United States sent fax messages to every known fax address in China, which of course blocked a lot of things which were going on inside China and also got information to people in China, until the security services began cutting off all the fax machines. So this was, I think, a precursor because the computers were then relatively limited because there weren't any real PCs in China at that time.

Q: A PC being a personal computer.

PRATT: Personal computers. Except those the Americans themselves brought in. And the Chinese were, of course, just fascinated by them and liked them very much, but their computers . . . I mean, they had enough difficulty getting the airlines to have decent computer service between airports and so forth, and when people traveled there, you could have your reservations, but you got to the next place and you couldn't make a round-trip reservation because their computers weren't set up for it. So when even airlines and travel agencies had computers in such a sad state that you really had to rely on telephones for almost everything, it obviously was not an environment in which the PC was that important. Now when I've gone back to China since that time, in 1995 and 1996, then of course that had changed considerably, and people were getting their computers, and using the Internet. The nodes was difficult, but the thing is it's moving, and my Chinese friends here in the United States, for example, the one problem they have is that some of their friends in China are still very sort of nationalistic, and they want to have all of it go on in Chinese. And of course, English is so much . . . you can type the thing with just 26 letters and so forth. If you've ever seen a Chinese word processor . . . but it's a job to get any . . . They've improved the programs enormously, so if you type in the sounds for something or other, often the computer now can fill in the proper characters just from knowing what this would sound like if you were speaking. And so eventually, when they get the computers which will hear clearly, this will perhaps improve things considerably. But it's a long hike, so English is very much, again, the rich national computer language in China as well.

Q: Well, did you find that the fact that you represented in Guangzhou an English-speaking country a tremendous asset. I mean, were the younger Chinese focusing on English as being a tool that they really needed to have? I mean, those who were thrusting ahead.

PRATT: Yes, it was very clearly the international language, and of course many of these persons had contact with Hong Kong, where English was, of course, even more pervasive than inside China. The government had also, in the late 1950s, dropped Russian as the principal foreign language and had not even considered Japanese but had moved to English. So English was indeed considered the most important language, and even those persons who had done their studies in Russia in the '40s and '50s, they realized that if they were going to move ahead they would have to know English rather than just staying with Russian. And of course the top leadership to this day, Li Peng and Zhang Zemin - these are all persons whose Russian is a good deal better even than their English. I don't think Li Peng's English is very good at all, but Zhang Zemin speaks pretty good English, but then his Russian is better.

Q: How about the overseas Chinese ... Were they playing any role as far as you saw in what was happening?

PRATT: Yes, because many of them were working for American firms. They often had been, well some of them, of course, had been naturalized American citizens, but some were native-born American citizens but of Chinese origin, and they had learned enough Chinese so that they could be of use to American companies, so a lot of even top managers were ones who were sort of being selected to make these programs work in China, and of course, many of them, if they were from Hong Kong or Guangdong Province and so forth, would know Cantonese often as well as Mandarin, so that they performed as a very good cadre for American companies to work from. And of course, in addition to that, the Taiwanese were beginning to invest in south China, not just in Fukien Province opposite the island but also in Guangdong province. And they, of course, or many of them, were relatives. Shall we say, they were the owners who remained in Taipei, but the cousin who had gone to the United States and studied engineering would be the person whom they would pick to go work in China for a Taiwan firm. So indeed, yes, overseas Chinese were going back in considerable numbers, and the expansion of investment and trade with China had, shall we say, an increase in presence of overseas Chinese which was about keeping pace with the very rapid expansion of trade and investment.

Q: As a consular officer, I've dealt with Greek-Americans, Korean-Americans, Yugoslav-Americans, et cetera, et cetera, who go back to their country of origin - either of birth or of origin - and often, I mean, they're a special breed. I mean they're often 110 percent American - and German-Americans, too, I've had - and sometimes a bit contemptuous or at least they don't always mix too well with the people of the country because, by God, they're not doing it in the American way and all that. Was this a problem? Did you see this with the Chinese?

PRATT: Yes, occasionally, and more frequently what we would find is that they would be confused by the Chinese system because they had so learned the American concept of business, it's the bottom line, and if it makes economic sense you do it, and so on. And the fact that these people have a different environment in which bureaucracy is very important and nepotism is very important and corruption is very important - these were all things which occasionally they could not understand. We had one, for example, American Chinese - I mean he was originally from Hong Kong but American citizen - who took the longest while to see that he had a big problem. He had a joint partnership, and this joint partnership included two elements of the Guangdong provincial government, but the two elements were under two separate vice-governors. One was open, and that was the trade vice-governor, and the other was one of the most backward aspects, namely agriculture, which was closest to the party structure. And the two partners hated each other's guts, and one of them got the American partner to fire the accountant who happened to be the brother of the other partner, and this chap could not understand why they were having so much difficulty and why they could go to one vice-governor and he would say, "Well, this is very difficult." I mean he was the senior vice-governor. Why couldn't he tell the junior vice-governor to go to hell? Well, he couldn't because of the nature of the Communist system. And this was something which was very difficult sometimes, because it wasn't as though they were dealing with real businessmen. They were dealing within a political framework, which, of course, is part of the current difficulty in China. One of my friends there was an American journalist in Peking who had written a book on the Beijing Jeep [Ed: Jim Mann, Beijing Jeep, 1997] problem and the difficulties of dealing with the municipal government and all the other aspects of the bureaucracy.

The biggest sort of factory we had in the Guangdong area was a French joint venture building Peugeot cars, and their stories, of course, were fairly illustrative of the great difficulties of dealing with the established political order there, much worse than most of the American ventures, which were plugged in at different levels and to different types of things without the same kind of deep roots in the labor movement and the Communist Party. So yes, Guangdong province was about the most advanced and economically oriented and able to make the most sensible decisions of any place in China, but even there it was very, very difficult.

PRATT: I retired out there in Guangzhou, timed, as it happened, just before the end of September so that I could avoid having to take part in the October 1st event.

Q: The October 1st event was the - PRATT: The national day of Communist China. So we left and went to Hong Kong and spent some time in Hong Kong and Macao because I wanted to go to Taiwan afterwards, but I wanted to avoid Double Ten in Taiwan.

Q: That's the -

PRATT: That's the Taiwan national day. So we sat it out in Hong Kong and Macao, a very pleasant little backwater, until we went to Taiwan, where I compared notes with my friends there, including telling them how I found that the people in south China responded on the Taiwan question. And then Japan as well. And finally from Japan we moved to California.

Q: Well, what was the reaction in Taiwan that you were getting from your friends and colleagues about the Tiananmen incident? How did that play, from what you were hearing?

PRATT: Well, I found it still very typical of the reaction I had noticed earlier, shall we say, when I was in Taiwan or working on Taiwan affairs. Almost anything to do with the Mainland was of concern only to the Mainlander side of Taiwan. Now this is changing, but at that time it was still the case. I got there and found that one of the dinners where I had thought people would be discussing the Mainland and what Tiananmen meant or how people on Taiwan viewed the prospects of political, even shall we say, interchange with the Mainland, but they weren't interested, because one of the women, for example, whom I had known well, was campaigning to be magistrate, and she had just come back from her place where they had burned down her house. And so, of course, the internal politics, the internal real fight between the Mainlanders/Kuomintang, and the Taiwanese and the dissidents or the oppositionists was still the major thing of interest. Peking and all problems of Peking were all very far away.

I think that this is changing now. I mean certainly when I talk to some of the people here now, it's a much closer thing, but they still don't understand Peking, and they basically are not that interested in Peking. From their point of view, if they can just manipulate the United States, they can get us to handle Peking for them. In fact, I've been told specifically, even as recently as 1996 when I was there. "China is a big country, and therefore something which we can't really do much about because we're just a small country. It's you Americans who've got to take care of China because you're a big country and China is a big country, and it's your responsibility to take care of China for us." So I think this is, indeed, part of the real problem we have, in that we keep trying to say, well, we've got to make sure that these people in Taiwan don't declare independence because we'll be caught up in the middle of it if they do, when of course we ought to realize that they are really expecting us to take care of this, and no matter what we tell them, they're going to say, "You're a big country. What can we do? We can't do anything which is big." So, you know, this is not our problem, that's your problem.

Q: Fascinating.

PRATT: And we keep trying to tell them, no, it's your problem, you have got to learn how to handle Peking.

Q: But also at this point there is talk . . . the Mainland Chinese have just very recently talked about there have got to be serious talks and all that between the two parties, yet if this is the attitude, why have serious talks, because we're not going to do it, it's you Americans?

PRATT: Well, that's partially the problem, but I think the other thing is that the reaction to the white paper has been quite overblown-

Q: This is the very recent white paper.

PRATT: The recent one of February - because it really doesn't promise anything specific, and it's certainly a good deal better than what they did at the time of the prior elections in 1996, when they had a combined operation and launched missiles near the two harbors, north and south, of Taiwan. So if this is the best they can do in Peking, it's not bad at all, and when they say "We cannot wait indefinitely..." well, good Lord, in the late 1970s, Deng Xiaoping declared that resolving the Taiwan questions was one of the key tasks of the 1980s. Well, we're 20 years later and it's still-

Q: In Chinese terms -

PRATT: And it's still indefinite, and even someone as savvy as David Dean was telling me the other day, "Well, now we really have got to do something and make our position very clear because it looks as though they are going to be pushing for something very, very soon." So he wanted us to change our policy, Hal Sonnenfeld fortunately saying, "Well, why change our policy - it seems to have worked pretty well - provided we just limit ourselves to the basic principle that whatever resolution there is, let it be arrived at peacefully." That means if Peking says it's not going to accept the total independence, well, then that won't be done peacefully. If Taiwan says we don't want to have Peking come over and establish their government here, then it won't be done peacefully. We've got a system which is working now, and let's leave it at that. Hal's an old, most basically Soviet hand, but nonetheless, I was really surprised to find David Dean saying, oh, now we've got to move in and solve the thing for them.

Q: That's very American.

PRATT: It is very American, yes, because it's very hard for us to keep our hands off something.

THOMAS R. HUTSON
Mandarin Language Studies
Taipei, Taiwan (1986-1987)

Chief Consular Officer, American Institute in Taiwan
Taipei, Taiwan (1987-1990)

Thomas R. Hutson was born in Nebraska in 1939. After receiving his bachelor's degree from the University of Nebraska in 1962 he served in the US Army from 1962-1967. His career has included positions in Teheran, Belgrade, Winnipeg, Moscow, Lagos, Taipei, Belgrade, Bishkek, and Mazar-e-Sharif. Mr. Hutson was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in April 1999.

HUTSON: So I took my second year of training on Taiwan. I found the language school there to be very good. Neil Kubler, who ran it, was superb. He was replaced by another dean who was also very good. The only problem of studying Chinese is that the Chinese are convinced that foreigners are "big nosed" people who could never learn their languages. So they humored us students until we hit the 3-3 level when we could get our bonuses for having survived. I always thought that non-Chinese should teach basic Chinese first so that the students could gain enough confidence in their ability to learn it and use it. After that, the students could be put in the hands of native Chinese speakers; by then the students would be assured that they could use this strange foreign language and not be put off by the Chinese attitudes. One of the major aspects of learning new languages, particularly those so different than western ones, is the confidence factor. If you think you can use the language, then you probably can. If you have teachers who deep down feel that you will never be able to use that language, it makes doubly tough to learn it.

Q: You were in Taipei from 1987 to 1990 at the American Institute. You were essentially the chief consular officer.

HUTSON: Correct, although my official title showed absolutely no relationship to consular matters. It was the largest “consular” section I had ever managed. We had eleven consular officers and fifty locals; it was a huge operation.

Q: How were our relations with Taiwan at the time?

HUTSON: They were quite good. The director of the Institute was David Dean who was the first director. He was a legend and a wonderful human being. He had a sensitivity to Chinese concerns that gave a tone to the Institute and to our relationships with the government which made matters work quite smoothly.

Q: What was your job?

HUTSON: It was essentially a management function. While I was there, an inspection report was written which criticized me heavily for being too strict on internal controls. That meant, in my mind, that I did my job extremely well. When I arrived, there were no controls over the visa issuance process. Some were being sold for $10,000 each on the streets of Taipei. There was no control to monitor this process. It took me six months to get control of the process. I had to threaten to fire all the local employees; I even threatened to shut down the operations. I didn’t do either; had I done so I probably would have been fired myself. Every Chinese employee in the visa section was either “on the take” or knew someone who was, but were too scared to report the transgressor. They felt that if they had reported on someone, their lives would have been in danger. We were talking about big money and a very profitable criminal enterprise.

That was my first introduction into Chinese corruption, which is a major aspect of that society. It is a sophisticated, cosmopolitan corruption; I could have had anything I wanted—money, women, etc. I found it easier to do my job right. I spent a lot of time instructing my staff on how to do “visa referrals.” We drove the refusal rate from 23% down to 6% during my tour. I much preferred issuing visas to people who walked in the front door and went through the process as they should, rather than buying them in some alley in Taipei. Scott Halpern, who was the deputy director of the institute, said to me after I stated preference for the “front door process”, that some people just wouldn’t take “Yes” for an answer.

I was delighted with the drop in the refusal rate. I wanted to issue visas. We did not issue visas to children because we found that too many of the children were taken to the U.S. and were left there. There had been tens of thousands who were left in California. I assiduously tried to get the Taiwanese authorities to deal with this problem, but got no cooperation; they were interested in having their kids dropped off in the U.S. One could tell very early on in a child’s educational process whether the child would be accepted by a prestigious institution as Taiwan National University—or a good high school before that. If the child did not seem to perform up to those standards, then the parents felt they had enough money to take him or her to the U.S. where they could finish their education - in a grand style in most cases because they worked harder than American students. Not only would the child then have a better foundation for life than what he or she might receive in Taipei, but they would also serve as a potential “foot in the door” should the parents wish to emigrate to the U.S. It was a very difficult issue, but I finally decided that no child would travel legally to the U.S. - i.e., no visa. We did make some exceptions, but they were rare indeed. This was perhaps an extreme policy, but under the circumstances, it was the only defensible one.

HUTSON: We told those sources that we had no control over whether these children would return to Taiwan or not. We said if the state of California would help us to deal with the problem, we would take another look at the policy. We never did get any offers to help us. I tried to engage American authorities in a dialogue on this problem, but without success. Our approval rate was so high (99%) that we just stopped interviewing these young people. They just sent in their passports with the necessary documents. They were not happy; they wanted to be interviewed to get their visas. But I found in the case of university students that the process was so pro forma that it was the waste of our time. But when I was asked whether any of them had returned to Taiwan, I had to admit that it was too early to say. That situation has changed dramatically because these students were now getting better job offers in Taiwan than they were getting in the U.S.

My gut feeling was that applying Section 214 (b)—which is the presumption that an applicant is an immigrant rather than a student—was very subjective. One of our great exports is our educational system and we should not resent foreigners taking advantage of that opportunity as long as they abide by provisions of the immigration acts.

Q: You were in Taipei from 1987 to 1990 at the American Institute. You were essentially the chief consular officer.

RICHARD W. CARLSON
Director, Voice of America, USIS

Ambassador Richard W. Carlson was born in Boston in 1941. His father died when he was 11 years old. After twice being kicked out of high school, he joined the navy at the age of 17. The last year of his enlistment was spent at the University of Mississippi. He then became a reporter in California. In the fall of 1985, President Reagan appointed him to be head of the Public Liaison Office for USIA, and subsequently as Director of the Voice of America. In 1991 he was appointed ambassador to the Seychelles. Ambassador Carlson was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on March 2, 1993.

Q: You were talking about your Mandarin Service as being one of your premier Services. It appears that the Voice of America got very much into the whole "abortive revolution". Could you explain a little bit of what Tiananmen Square was and developments maybe before that from your perspective of how we were covering these major events in China?

CARLSON: The student demonstrations began in Shanghai a considerable time before they concluded in Tiananmen Square with the death of students.

Q: This was in 1989.

CARLSON: The Voice of America happened to have a correspondent, who was Mandarin speaking and in Shanghai when this happened. He was actually attached to the bureau out of Beijing, but had gone down to Shanghai. He was present when they had this demonstration in the center of Shanghai. They went beyond what would have been anticipated. It was interesting. We had the only on the scene coverage from foreign correspondents in Shanghai. He was pursued by thousands of students that found out that he represented the Voice of America. They weren't pursuing him hostilely they were all kissing and hugging him. The poor guy was almost trampled to death. His reports were the only reliable news out of Shanghai when those demonstrations began. And, of course, they were of interest to the American press and were used as a basis for some coverage. But the real interest was that they were broadcast back into China, of course, in Chinese. No matter what the New York Times does or says, or whatever is broadcast at NBC, it is irrelevant to these hundreds of millions of Chinese. It doesn't come to them in their language and doesn't get to their ears, and the Voice does. So we stepped up our coverage beginning with those demonstrations and, I think in retrospect most people would agree that what we delivered to the Chinese was very sophisticated and very well done.

We had a Chinese Service that was preparing in essences for this for many years. They were au courant with China as much as one could be with a closed society. They had sources and people who were willing to give them information in China as the Chinese loosened up economically and allowed more telephone calls to be made out of the country and into the country. When they allowed faxed machines to be used for commerce, they couldn't shut it down. It was amazing. Our Chinese Service when the demonstrations really started rolling in different cities would receive phone calls from China by the dozens if not the hundreds daily from people who listened to the Voice of America and who were in cahoots with an operator somewhere who would let them use the telephone that was used by some government office that was closed at the moment to call the Voice of America. Every day we received hundreds of phone calls from throughout China with people volunteering information.

The opportunity for provocation, of course, was pretty good because it was difficult to cross reference information. So we never relied on anonymous voices coming to us from China, but we used those as contacts and background. In fact, in almost every instance it was believed that they were not provocative.

Q: You were probably ahead of the Chinese Secret Service. Everything was moving too fast for them.

CARLSON: Yes, they couldn't get control. Even though the Chinese security apparatus is very sophisticated and not noticeable and just pretty good, it is funny that right up until Tiananmen Square you could feel...I was in the Chinese Service every day and as the events unfolded up to Tiananmen Square, you could watch the Chinese government finally get its hands around this leakage. The phone calls began reducing and reducing. The last phone call that came through was from the city of Wuhan. Somebody was calling from a phone overlooking the bridge, in a building of some kind, and the operator said in Chinese that this is so exciting, we have a woman on the line who wants to tell you what is going on and this may be our last call. And it was the last call. We never got any phone calls after that. They had succeeded in squeezing off all the lines.

But the impact in China of these broadcasts was enormous. It did in China what it had done in the Soviet Union for many years what Radio Liberty, the BBC and the Voice had done. It brought news of dissident activity from one person to another, other than through underground information. And it told people that there were others like them and thinks like them who have taken some courageous measure publicly in another town. It clearly kept alive the democratic hopes of these people.

I traveled to China a couple of times. I was told then, and we kept abreast of this through the American Embassy and other sources, at the time that the Chinese students would record the Voice of America broadcast, would use them often for the basis for wall posters. Or would record them on cheap tape recorders and when the electricity went out at night, which it did regularly in the universities, people would sit by candle light and replay the Voice of America broadcast.

There were in fact people who were sentenced to severe prison terms for calling the Voice of America. I forgot to mention that to you. There was a person who received 10 or 12 years in a re-educative effort for making one of those calls. He got caught making one of those phone calls to the Voice. Somebody recognized him on the phone and tracked him down.

Q: While this was going on...the role of the Voice of America...1956 must have hung heavily. There were accusations that the United States, not necessarily the Voice of America, were calling on the Hungarians in 1956 to basically revolt. Here you are talking about the most populous nation in the world and you are talking about something that could have been the mother of all revolutions going on. It was aborted, but the Voice of America was obviously a key element in this. No matter what you did you were adding fuel by just giving news. Could you talk a little bit about what you were doing and what the pressures were? People must have been saying, "For God's sake." You were in the middle of a fire.

CARLSON: We took no policy direction from State Department over this, nor was any offered other than that we had a great concern that we not purposely throw fuel on the fire. Clearly, philosophically, any kind of coverage of this kind of tumultuous event in a closed society tends to spur the thought in others that they might emulate the behavior that is being discussed. That is a byproduct, in a neutral sense, of news coverage. The only thing that we did, and we do this normally anyway, we were damn careful to err on the side of conservative description. We didn't omit information because it was per se provocative. It was such a provocative event anyway.

But we felt that we had to be extraordinarily careful anyway so as to not unnecessarily inflame people. The inherent, inflammatory nature of all of this was such that we felt...these were people who live in an environment where punches are pulled all the time. Nobody ever tells them the truth. Everything is sugar coated and sort of spruced up to look different than it really is and that is not what we are there for. We are there to give them a fair and impartial view of what is going on in the world, and in this case their own country. We really played the role of a surrogate broadcaster which we don't normally do. There really are no surrogate broadcasters in China as there were in the Soviet Union through Radio Liberty, for instance. But we ended up being the surrogate broadcaster.

One of the things that I did do that I thought might be useful was to put a television camera in the Mandarin studio. We were broadcasting live on radio as opposed to the Chinese who put everything on tape and had a committee involved which would take a week to get it on the air. We put a TV camera in the studio from which we were broadcasting Mandarin and we scrolled across the screen the Mandarin copy that was being read in live time by the newscaster. So on the screen you would see, if you were looking, a Chinese broadcaster who was static and reading the copy and it would be scrolled across the bottom about where their chest was. We then transferred this by satellite and sent it down to satellite receiving dishes throughout the People's Republic of China.

Those dishes were all controlled by the government, of course, and in the control of the military in great measure. In military bases they invariably had satellite dishes that would receive transmission signals on behalf of their own government. We sent those signals into those dishes.

The idea that we had was that the troops, themselves, would probably not be listening to the Voice of America because it was forbidden to do so, but that it would be useful to these military units and their leadership to be able to get a photographic image with the copy. We found out later that in fact wall posters were made out of photographs that were taken from the dishes.

There are so many of the dishes in control of the military and government, but not all of those people are interested in shutting off information. We probably offered some stability to remote...we like to think we did ...military units. There was considerable talk, as you remember, about the Chinese government bringing in troops from outside.

Q: The first troops obviously couldn't control it so they had to bring in sort of peasant troops from out in the countryside who had no love for the city folk. At least that was the story.

CARLSON: We thought it would be in the interests of all of them to have at least an honest representation of what was happening with these student demonstrations as opposed to what they would learn or not learn from government broadcasts.

Actually the Voice had relationship with some Chinese broadcasters. For many years the Voice had published...during the worse times in China, too, during those years of the cultural revolution...the Voice had published in conjunction with the Chinese government tens of millions little pamphlets about how to learn English. They used the Voice of America as a basis. The Voice broadcast in something called Special English. It has about 12-13,000 word vocabulary and if you understand those words you can understand any news story that is read in Special English. It is also read at about a third of the normal reading speed. So we would take those scripts...they were called words and their stories and it was English slang like "talking through your hat," or "carrying a big stick." What do those mean? We would print them in conjunction with a script that was read in conjunction in turn with the Chinese government and they would sell them for about a penny a piece.

Although they disliked the US and the West, they on their other hand had a commercial interest in people learning English. It was amazing, with all their anti-Western views at the time of the cultural revolution, they still continued to print in conjunction with us, probably by the billions, these little pamphlets. Special English was a powerful tool.

Regardless of the discomfort between the governments, the Voice had established relations with Radio Beijing, which kind of dominated people's radio in the PRC. I had gone over a couple of times and met with the woman who was the head of Radio Beijing. Actually she came to the United States, too, and I gave a dinner party for her at the house. We came to know some of the broadcasters there. One of them went on the air during the Tiananmen Square event, when the government crushed the students, with a plea to the West to understand what was really going on in China in English. This was in their overseas service. He was taken off the air and he actually said that he was going to have to leave the air now...it was broadcast to Western Europe...and then he went off the air after this. He basically in about three minutes described what was going on in Tiananmen Square. He went to prison I was told. He had actually been in my house at one time. Anyway, it was all quite dramatic.

Q: George Bush had been our representative in China and knew the leadership and was considered to be closer to the leadership which was doing the repressing than he should have been. Were you getting any emanations from the White House on this?

CARLSON: No, actually we were not. Contrary to what people I imagine would expect we actually had none. If there was any contact with the White House it was minimal and it would have been through the National Security Council but there was never any attempt to impose on the Voice, and in turn its Chinese Service, any policy perspective or any spin or stress on certain areas with a lack of attention to other areas. There was none of that.

The Chinese Service was very well run, by the way. It was run by a Foreign Service Officer whose name was Tony Sereeti. He was of Italian descent and one of the finest linguist I have ever known. He spoke Chinese perfectly. He spoke Mandarin so well that Chinese thought he was Chinese on the phone. That is not an easy thing. He also spoke Cantonese. And he speaks Russian. He is an amazing guy.

I traveled with him in China. We were in Shanghai and went into a workingman's hotel one night and talked to the desk clerk about two in the morning. We just wanted to see what the place was like. No Westerner had ever been in side according to the woman. She went around to each room, where there would be 10 or 12 people and wake everybody up. They would all sit up and she would introduce me...we gave her Voice of America pins and she had one on...and she introduced me as the head of the Voice of America and Tony Sereeti as the chief of the Chinese Service. Well, they couldn't believe it. They were jumping all over the place talking to us. Sereeti was a fantastic guy.

Q: He must have been sitting rather heavily making sure the Service didn't get too excited.

CARLSON: Of course. This was not an easy thing. You have broadcasters with very strong emotional and intellectual and cultural ties to the area and they are angry at this and the government. And they were angry at each other, they have internecine conflicts which are so complex you could never get to the root of them all. Keeping them under control and insuring that there are safeguards to prevent a person from doing all manner of things that are limited only by your imagination is very hard. We always made it a very clear point that the people who wrote the copy didn't deliver the copy. There was also a producer in between. This was live, of course, and most people sitting around could understand what was being said. But, in fact, we very seldom had a problem.

In turn, the people who were employed by the Voice had a great sense of mission and usually a great sense of decorum. They had been there a long time and recognized the potency of what they were doing and the importance of precision and care. The most potentially difficult areas were the Soviet Services, Chinese, Lao, Cambodian, the Afghanistan languages, places where there were conflicts and people had strong emotional feelings about what was going on in the country that they often came from. Those would be the most problematic situation. And even then we didn't have any systemic problems, really.

Q: What about the aftermath, after the Chinese authorities had suppressed the students and all?

What happened to the Voice of America at that point?

CARLSON: We had problems with our correspondents. Of course they kept throwing them out of the country. We had a correspondent, Al Poissen, and he was expelled. They were always being accused of intelligence activities. I can tell you they didn't engage in that. It would have been stupid. The Voice of America correspondents weren't spies, they were reporters, but unfortunately in the kind of society with the rigidity of the People's Republic you end up doing your things covertly simply because you can't do them in any other way.

Q: From a practical point of view if you are from the other side, a Voice of America correspondent is far more dangerous than a spy.

CARLSON: Oh, yes.

Q: Who cares what the Chinese military is doing, but if you are reporting the truth to the Chinese people...

CARLSON: I will give you an example of how they tried to compromise a correspondent. We had a correspondent there, a young man, who went into a club one night, some sort of a Chinese club. He was sitting with some friends when all of a sudden a Chinese girl came and sat in his lap. Suddenly a man took a photograph of this. The girl hopped off his lap. She seemed to be a transvestite. It was not totally clear, but he thought this was the case and since the happening was so strange he reported that this had happened to the Embassy security people.

Ultimately he came back to the United States and was working at the Voice newsroom and was going to be going to another country. He was walking down Independence Avenue when a fellow came up to him and started talking to him. He was a Soviet diplomat. They had a friendly conversation. About a week later he was sitting in a restaurant in Adams Morgan and the same fellow and another man came up to him at the table and laid the photograph from China of the apparently transvestite sitting in his lap.

At this point this fellow had married. He thought it was almost funny, this crude way to get him to cooperate, and then, in turn, he reported it. But there was obviously considerable collusion in Services, I guess.

Q: It was sort of amazing considering the distance and relations.

CARLSON: Of course, it could have been set up by the Soviets in the first place.

Q: Did you have a security problem with your correspondents?

CARLSON: Yes. Not necessarily with correspondents. They were harassed in China by the security services. Of course we had no correspondents in the Soviet Union at all. We didn't have a bureau in the Soviet Union until 1989 when I opened the bureau in Moscow. No VOA director had ever been in the Soviet Union in the past. They wouldn't let them in. We were jammed by the Soviets off and on for years.

But we did have a problem in some areas at the VOA with penetration attempts by foreign intelligence services. In my experience during the time I was there, they were directed at the Soviet division, at various of the language services and some of the Eastern European Services. Bulgaria was one that was a problem. A problem in a sense that it seemed to be of interest to the Bulgarian Secret Service. The Cuban Services were an ongoing problem. Radio Marti initially and then Television Marti, which we had responsibility for legislatively. The Afghan Services in Burma seemed to be a problem as well. Seemingly they were targets of penetration.

I would say that we had a counterintelligence allegation once a month...12 to 15 a year. These often took the form of...people who come from these closed societies grow up differently. Their life experiences are different and their methods of accounting for behavior and conduct and outcome are different.

Q: They are often justified.

CARLSON: Yes they are. They can't all be dismissed as paranoia. But it would be typical for me to get phone calls at home from someone with a pronounced European accent who didn't want to identify himself except that he worked in the Voice and knew that so-and-so worked for the KGB or often a Eastern Europe intelligence outfit. We would get letters to that effect.

Often we would get contacted by the FBI saying that in fact they thought there was something going on with such and such. We had a couple who actually fled a couple of steps ahead of the Bureau and who had been employed by us for some time. One was a man and his wife...the man worked for us the wife didn't...but they fled. They were stopped in the street and taken into the Bureau after having met with some intelligence agent. They were interrogated and denied everything and were due to be reinterrogated the following Monday or something and fled the country. There was never any publicity about that. But we had that kind of problem. These were agents of influence, I assume. There were a lot of things you could do. If you believe that the Dari Pashtu Service had an influence in Afghanistan then it would make some sense since I suppose, and it would be pretty cheap, to infiltrate a sympathizer with the intelligence service into one of those Services to find out what exactly who is doing what to whom and maybe have some effect on it. I think that was primarily the reason that they did it.

At Marti we had a definite problem with it. We had a Marti employee who also defected...that is redefected. He was actually a DGI agent and showed up and held a news conference in Cuba wherein he made a lot of accusations against Radio Marti, etc. So the intrigue level was rather high, actually.

DAVID G. BROWN
Washington, DC (1986-1989)

Deputy Consul General

Hong Kong (1989-1992)

David G. Brown was born in Boston, Massachusetts in 1940. He graduated from Princeton University in 1964 entered the Foreign Service. His assignments include Taipei, Saigon, Yokohama, Tokyo, Vienna, Beijing, Oslo, and Hong Kong. Before retirement in 1996, he served as Director of the Office of Korean Affairs. Mr. Brown was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on January 28, 2003.

Q: Today is the 8th of April 2003. David, you've gone in 1986 to deal with the Republic of China or what did we call it then?

BROWN: Well, the government calls itself the Republic of China. We call the office that we set up in the State Department to deal with them after derecognition the Taiwan Coordination Staff.

Q: You were there from '86 to?

BROWN: '89.

Q: '89. All right, well, what I think it behooves you to explain a bit about how we dealt with Taiwan at this time.

BROWN: Right. In January of 1979, we had recognized China and derecognized Taiwan. This was shortly after I had left the Office of Republic of China Affairs in '78. We set up an unofficial organization to represent the American people in Taiwan called the American Institute in Taiwan. AIT had a headquarters office in Washington and an office in Taipei and another one in Kaohsiung in the southern part of Taiwan. We had a small office within the State Department building whose job was to develop policy and provide instructions to AIT.

Q: Well, now which one did you belong to?

BROWN: I belonged to the policy office within the State Department. The office of the Taiwan Coordination Staff.

Q: A front group. However, that did not mean we were cutting Taiwan loose. American interests in Taiwan changed little.

BROWN: Absolutely. If you look back at decade of the 1980s after de-recognition, this was a period of great success and development for Taiwan. Relations with the U.S., though unofficial, were quite stable and strong. In short, Taiwan continued to enjoy the stability that it needed to prosper and develop.

Q: Okay, in 1986 when you went there, what was the situation on Taiwan economically and politically in 1986?

BROWN: Well, there were the two big economic issues in U.S.-Taiwan relations then. Taiwan enjoyed huge trade surplus with the United States in the mid-1980s. One issue was should Taiwan continue to benefit from our general system of preferences (GSP) when they were a remarkably powerful export economy. At that time, Taiwan's GDP per capita was around $10,000. Should Taiwan be graduated out of a program that was designed to benefit developing countries?

The other issue involved the valuation of Taiwan's currency, the new Taiwan dollar. Their currency was very carefully controlled, and Treasury was convinced that Taipei was using their currency control system to maintain an undervalued new Taiwan dollar. The undervaluation was seen as a major reason for their massive trade surplus with the U.S. The Treasury Department and we on the desk cooperated in pressuring the Taiwan government into appreciating the currency. There were some interesting unintended consequences of doing this. What Treasury did was to persuade Taiwan that its economy had matured to the point where Taiwan could afford to remove some of its currency controls and allow people in Taiwan to move currency in and out more freely. The by-product of this was that after these currency reforms were put in place Taiwanese started to invest overseas. They invested in the U.S., in Southeast Asia. However, the big thing that no one had anticipated was Taiwanese started to invest in China. That began to open up relations between the island and the mainland.

Q: What about the result of this sort of freeing the Taiwanese to invest where they will? Was anybody looking at this in the East Asian bureau saying this is a good thing? In fact, it probably was one of the greatest determiners of the China-Taiwan relationship. If China gets too huffy, it may jeopardize all the nice investment.

BROWN: We were thinking about it, but I certainly didn't anticipate the extent to which Taiwan's investment in China would take off. We knew that President Chiang Ching-kuo had made a major decision to allow people from Taiwan to travel to the mainland. It happened that he did that some months before with the 15th anniversary of the Shanghai Communiqué. We knew that this opening up of travel to China was a very important thing that would have long-term consequences. Secretary Shultz took the occasion of the 15th anniversary to make a statement in which we said that it was U.S. policy not to get involved in cross-strait negotiations, but to encourage an environment in which such cross-strait contacts could develop. We understood there was a process going on that was very important. However, I for one certainly didn't understand that what we were doing with Treasury to open Taiwan's exchange rate system for the purpose of correcting our trade deficit would have the side effect of stimulating massive foreign direct investment by Taiwan and that a good portion of that foreign direct investment would go to China.

Q: You didn't have to go through the resignation process or something like that?

BROWN: Well, I was working in the State Department, so no, I did not. People who worked for AIT, whether they were working in Taipei or in Washington, had to go through a process of resignation from the State Department and employment with the American Institute in Taiwan.

Q: Could the AIT people come at will to the State Department?

BROWN: Yes. However, Taiwan's representatives and visiting officials could not come to the State Department. The American employees of AIT came to State like any other government employee. They had their own State Department badges. What was important was that appearances were changed. They were publicly called AIT employees. The appearance or form of our relations with Taiwan changed, but the substance did not change much. As for AIT employees, they continued to get their paychecks in exactly the same fashion they'd gotten them before from the Department. Every one of them had employee evaluations. When I was on the coordination staff, some AIT employees received State Department awards.

Q: What piece of the action did you have?

BROWN: Well, it was policy guidance. How was the relationship with Taiwan conducted? This was a big part of our role in the exchange rate issue. Normally Treasury doesn't let State have anything to do with exchange rate negotiations. An ambassador is lucky if he knows that they're even taking place. But because Treasury was aware that they couldn't send their senior officials to Taipei, they had to come to us to work out ways to deal with Taiwan. Treasury did not let us in on the substance of their discussions, but we worked with them on the process, and that proved to be quite important. Who in Taiwan should Treasury deal with? Where can Treasury talk to them? Under what arrangements can we deal with them? What form can an agreement or understanding with Taiwan take? Those were issues on which we got involved. Also, Treasury had important relationships with China at the same time. They were very much involved in U.S. economic ties with the mainland. So, they didn't want to jeopardize those relationships any more than State wanted to. So, one question was: do you want to deal with exchange rates by sending a lower ranking official? If so, State could help make Taiwan understand that this person came with considerable authority if not rank. Did Treasury want to work this issue by inviting more senior officials from Taiwan to meet in San Francisco under some private guise? If so, State could help ensure that it was arranged quietly in a way that would not create problems for either Treasury or State in their dealings with Beijing.

Q: What about Taiwan? During the time you were dealing with this, were their intelligence efforts a problem, I mean looking at the overseas community? Because they messed around a bit in New York, I mean in Los Angeles I believe. How did we see it at that time you were doing it?

BROWN: The really egregious thing that happened took place two years before I came back to work on Taiwan. This was the murder of Henry Liu, a Taiwan journalist who had moved to the United States and had written a critical biography of Chiang Ching-kuo. Someone in the Taiwan intelligence chain of command decided that the way to deal with somebody who had criticized Chiang was to have him eliminated by gangsters of the so-called bamboo gang. Intelligence officers hired the bamboo gang to murder Henry Liu. It took a while for this to come to light. The U.S. had evidence on the involvement of intelligence officers in the murder, and this forced Taipei to address the issue of responsibility. The former head of Taiwan's intelligence service in the U.S. was convicted of involvement. It still is not clear how high up people were involved in the incident. President Chiang was acutely embarrassed. He eventually made very significant changes in his intel services. The murder was a huge black mark for Taiwan.

Now there were other things that they were doing, none of which were as egregious as that. Taiwan continued to surveil Chinese students in the United States. They had intelligence operations going and efforts to acquire restricted arms technology that we were not authorizing for sale. The most serious example of that was a program to get inertial guidance for long range missiles from the U.S., technology that we had denied them. Taiwan arranged to have some of their scientists come to the U.S. and get training and then they picked up the designs. That had to be dealt with while I was on the desk. I recall we also put them on the FBI watch list for hostile foreign intelligence organizations. They got the message and over time changed the pattern of what they were doing.

Q: Well, let's take getting the long-range guidance system. You said that had to be dealt with, what did you do?

BROWN: Well, I recall that the most important thing we did was to terminate visas for all the scientists that were involved in the training program, send those people back to Taiwan and force the university that was running the program, which I recall was MIT, to terminate those programs which were inconsistent with U.S. policy.

Q: Were you allowed to have contact with the Taiwanese staff here in Washington?

BROWN: Yes, but not in the State Department building, I had frequent breakfasts, lunches and dinners with them. When circumstances required, AIT would arrange for a negotiation or signing of an agreement. We had no problem dealing with Taiwanese political groups that would come to the United States. We'd simply go to see them in a restaurant rather than in the State Department.

Q: It sounds like one would eat very well on that job.

BROWN: During much of that time, I was working for Gaston Sigur who was the Assistant secretary. Taiwan's representatives in Washington were Fred Chien and later Ding Mou-shih, both of whom went on to be foreign ministers. Whenever they had a meeting with Gaston, it was usually held over breakfast at the Four Seasons Hotel. We ate well and had a lot of pretty heavy conversations to go along with the fare.

Q: What was your impression of the nationalist Chinese representation here in Washington?

BROWN: We were fortunate to be dealing with quite sophisticated individuals. As would be expected, we were under steady pressure from them to make the relationship more official. For example, they would propose changing the kinds of license plates their offices and officials could use. Diplomatic plates were not possible, so they pressed local jurisdictions to create special plates for them. Taipei was always trying to get a pseudo official status for their offices. Could they fly their flag outside their office or just inside the office? What titles could their officers use? This was a period of booming trade between the U.S. and Taiwan. Many U.S. states wanted trade offices in Taiwan. Taiwan would be as generous possible in providing benefits and special privileges for those state representatives in Taipei, and then they would turn around and go to the state's governor and say they would like similar treatment in the U.S. Lacking formal diplomatic recognition, Taiwan had a deep desire for the most formal treatment they could persuade people to give them. Dealing with this, and coordinating with local governments was a constant challenge. It wasn't done in a mean spirited way, but we had to hold the line on the unofficial nature of our relationship.

Q: What about consular protection? I'm thinking of all the Taiwanese students in the United States and visitors and businessmen and the normal thing is you need I'm in trouble with the police or something, call you consul.

BROWN: We had the American Institute in Taiwan represent us in Taipei. Taipei had an organization with a convoluted name called the Coordination Council for North American Affairs (CCNAA) to represent Taiwan in exactly the same way in the United States. They had an office in Washington and about 11 or 12 branch offices in American cities. In one of the more mean spirited aspects of switching relations, we told Taiwan, a country which had more consulates, formal consulates as opposed to honorary consulates, than just about any other country in the U.S. that several of these consulates had to be closed. This was one of the things that would have to change with the termination of diplomatic relations. So, we squeezed them down from 16 to 12, I recall. Nevertheless they retained a very extensive network of CCNAA offices around the country that operated exactly like consulates except that they didn't have consular status. Their personnel enjoyed privileges and immunities similar to those accorded consular personnel. We had similar needs in Taiwan, so we wanted the arrangements to work effectively for both sides.

Q: When I interviewed Nat Belocchi and Nat was saying that if you think that the Israelis have a lobby or a network in the United States, wait until you run across the nationalist Chinese. How did you find it sort of business everywhere? Was this a pretty significant group?

BROWN: They were and are extremely active in cultivating good feelings amongst Americans toward Taiwan. They considered themselves a very vulnerable society and they recognize that the U.S. was their principal supporter. Hence, they did everything they could to cultivate friendship among Americans. I'm excluding from this the intelligence operations, and talking just about legitimate diplomacy. Under our international visitor program, we would bring 15 or 20 people a year from Taiwan for month long visits to expose them to American society, just as we did everywhere else. Similarly Taipei was targeting people who would 20 years later be in leadership positions in the U.S. But, Taiwan had programs, which were much larger than ours. They were bringing hundreds of people to Taiwan every year, through every conceivable kind of arrangement. At one level they were inviting members of congress. They had an extensive program of congressional staff visits. They did the same thing at the state level working through their local offices. They were inviting state legislators, staff members of state governments, staffs of governors around the country. They had an operation with the democratic and republican parties where political parties in Taiwan, mainly the KMT, would invite delegations from those party organizations at the national levels and at the state levels to Taiwan. They had visits from professional groups; they had visits from academics. Then when the visitors came back, CCNAA would follow up, maintain contact and seek these people's help. Their friends are never forgotten. They are always invited to lunches and dinners and parties when visiting delegations come the connections are kept up so that a massive effort to cultivate good will and support in this country for Taiwan because Taiwan is so dependent on American political and military support. Then when help was needed, Taiwan was not shy in asking for it.

What was and is different is that Israel had a large and active domestic political lobby in the Jewish community. While the Chinese community in the U.S. was growing, it was not politically active and was split between pro-Beijing, Pro-KMT and Taiwan independence groups.

Q: Did you find a sense of unease in the East Asian bureau? Were the people dealing with China per se because I mean just looking at it from the outside, here is this active office doing this thing making cultivating, also the fact is that Taiwan was turning into a democracy. When you say democracy, this rings all sorts of bells in the United States and it was not a fake one. I mean this is a real thing and yet you know, you had China, which wasn't going in that direction at all. Sort of almost a frustration or something of the Mainland China hands within our State Department kind of wishing you'd go away or something like that?

BROWN: We'll things were different in the mid-1980s. I think the phenomena you're describing are of the '90s. Why do I say that? First because in the mid-'80s the democratic transformation in Taiwan was only just beginning. There still were political prisoners from the Kaohsiung incident in jail. There were more congressional hearings on human rights in Taiwan. The real process of political reform in Taiwan began actually in 1986 but wasn't completed until much later with the first direct election of the Taiwan president in 1996 and the first transfer of power to the opposition in 2000. In '86, '87, '88 this process was just beginning. On the mainland, it was a period when economic reform was seen in this country as promising. There were student demonstrations in China in 1987 that were significant enough to cost party Secretary General Hu Yaobang his job. So, the contrast between what was going on in the mainland and what was going on in Taiwan wasn't as stark then as it was later.

Q: So, when you were dealing with it both countries sort of seemed to be on a mild trajectory toward the better?

BROWN: You could say that before Tiananmen.

Q: Did you feel, was there still this almost coterie who had participated in the opening to China who identified so much with mainland China that they tended to be dismissive or forget about Taiwan? I mean was that still an attitude or did this work itself out?

BROWN: At that time, the Republican administration had good relations with Taiwan and quite positive attitudes toward the island. Taiwan felt that it was well connected with the Reagan and subsequently with the Bush establishments in Washington. Holbrooke had been dismissive of Taiwan, but the Republican administrations were not. The first person I worked for was Jim Lilley who had been our representative, the head of AIT in Taipei. He believed that if you wanted to manage the U.S.-China relationship as a whole correctly you had to take very good care of your ties in Taiwan. If one didn't take good care of the ties in Taiwan then the Taiwanese were going to use this network that they had cultivated, most importantly in the congress, to put pressure on the administration to do things that would not be in the U.S. interest.

Q: You were there at least in the beginning of the transition between the Reagan and Bush administration and you know, often within an administration between two different parts of the same party the transition sometimes gets a little bit rocky. How did this one go regarding your area?

BROWN: From my perspective there were no serious problems.

Q: How about arms sales? Was this something you were dealing with all the time?

BROWN: All the time, and we were going through all sorts of shenanigans you might call them to provide Taiwan with the weapons it needed in ways that did not provoke the PRC and also, to the best of our ability, could be seen as consistent with the language of the communiqué that had been negotiated with the Chinese in 1982. The August '82 communiqué on arms sales said that there were limits on the quantity and quality of arms we would sell to Taiwan. So, we had to try and live within that framework, but the framework was being stretched beyond credibility by technological change. Taiwan's weapons systems were becoming obsolescent and had to be replaced and the only way you could replace them was by providing newer more capable systems. Subsequently, after I left, we bumped up against the quantitative ceiling as well as the quantitative one with the sale of F-16s. The F-16s clearly were a more capable system, and they were so expensive that there was no way they could be provided within the quantitative limitations either.

Q: Was there somebody sitting there or some bodies sitting there in the Pentagon figuring out what the mainland Chinese had in the way of aircraft, navy, etc. and what the Taiwanese had and making sure that the Taiwanese were able to have a credible defense?

BROWN: Sure. Studies were done of the military balance in the Taiwan straits. State, DOD and NSC had to weigh what could be sold that would meet Taiwan's legitimate defense needs and how to do it in a way that would not create problems in our relations with the PRC. One key was to keep what we were doing out of the public eye. Appearances were important to the PRC. Consequently, what systems were called was important. For instance, Taiwan wanted the M-60 tank. We sold them an equivalent but called it a hybrid M-48, the M-48H. I'm using an army system here as an example, though it was not the most important weapon we were selling Taiwan. I could have used the frigate that we had agreed to sell. In that case, we devised a program whereby Taiwan could manufacture in Taiwan new frigates that were better than the old World War II vintage ones that were being replaced. Clearly this would involve a qualitative improvement. Rather than selling them these ships outright in a way that would be seen as a violation of the arms sales communiqué, we worked out an arrangement to provide the plans and build the ships in Taiwan. These ships would then be outfitted with modern weapons systems. This met their defense needs with less strain on our relations with China.

Q: What about other countries on this arms thing? Could you say the French and all, were they and other countries, were the Taiwanese shopping around?

BROWN: Taiwan was out looking all the time, but very few countries were prepared to sell to them. The Israelis would provide some things. They got some systems from the Italians, and believe it or not from the Swedes. The sellers would try to handle the sales in a way that didn't attract publicity or create problems for their relations with China. The really big third country sale again came after I left. This was the French decision to sell frigates and 60 mirage fighters to Taiwan.

Q: Things were beginning to happen in the Soviet Union. Gorbachev was coming. Did that change the equation or was that felt?

BROWN: That didn't really have any impact.

Q: How about the Japanese? Did we see them as a rival or a supporter or how did we see the Japanese?

BROWN: Well, as an economic competitor in Taiwan. For a variety of reasons, Japan did not have any defense ties with Taiwan. Certainly on the political level, they kept a very low profile and were determined to avoid problems in their relations with the PRC.

Q: During this '86 to '89 period did you find, had the balance shifted from the mainlanders to the Taiwanese and speaking within the political system?

BROWN: In that context, the most important thing that happened followed the death of Chiang Ching-kuo in 1988. Lee Teng-hui, the vice President, succeeded him and became the first Taiwanese to reach a real position of power in Taiwan. This was a revolutionary change. Most people at that time thought Lee was a lightweight who would not last. It was similar to the way people thought about Jiang Zemin when he was appointed General Secretary in Beijing.

Q: Or Anwar Sadat.

BROWN: Yes. Well, Lee transformed Taiwan politics and is still having a major impact now as a former president. However, in the years I was on the desk, he started very cautiously. He had to be careful because even though he inherited the presidency, he did not inherit automatically the chairmanship of the Nationalist Party. That was the really powerful position in the political system at that time. The first thing Lee had to do was to get himself appointed acting chairman of the party and that was in fact opposed by Chiang family loyalists, including Madame Chiang Kai-shek who was then in her late 80s. She had returned to Taiwan, in 1986 I think, out of concern that Chiang Ching-kuo might go too far in liberalizing the political system. She was there when he passed away. She, her son Chiang Wei-kuo and some others tried to prevent Lee from being given the title of acting chairman of the party. Reform elements in the party blocked that effort and Lee became acting chairman. Lee had to consolidate his position and prove to people that he was going to be around for a while. He moved forward with Ching-kuo's program for initial political reform and subsequently carried that process much further in the 1990s.

Q: Was this looked upon with favor in the United States?

BROWN: Oh, definitely. Washington's positive response went back to 1986 when Ching-kuo was beginning to signal his willingness to conduct political reform in Taiwan. His biggest signal was when opposition politicians defied the ban on new political parties and announced the formation of the Democratic Progressive Party (DPP). KMT conservatives urged Chiang to arrest them, but he told the conservatives that times were changing and this had to be accepted. So, that was the big signal that political reform was coming. Ching-kuo terminated martial law the following year and Taipei passed a civic organization's law that legalized new political parties. They also ended the ban on new newspapers, which had been used as a control mechanism of the press, opening up a much freer press environment. The process went on to a number of other steps, but led to in 2000, 14 years later, to a peaceful transfer of government from the KMT to a president representing the opposition DPP.

Q: Were there sort of a Taiwanese, I mean there must have been Taiwanese watchers in the mainland government at the embassy here. I was wondering whether you were picking up from your colleagues who were working with that embassy how they were viewing things in Taiwan.

BROWN: They were trying to figure out what this political transition meant. Did having a Taiwanese president mean that Beijing was going to face demands for Taiwan independence? How do you interpret the freer expression of opinion and the fact that Taiwanese were now free to advocate independence? What did this mean? Yes, there was a lot of interest. The Chinese Embassy was talking to various people around Washington, including those on the China desk. Occasionally either people from AIT in Washington or we on the Taiwan Coordination Staff would meet with Chinese diplomats. We didn't want to do it too often because our job was to deal with Taiwan, and Taipei was very sensitive about our contacts with the PRC. Nevertheless we did meet to make sure that the channels of communication were open and that the PRC accurately understood the way we saw what was happening.

Q: While you were dealing with Taiwan, were we ever called upon to steam the fleet or something from the seventh fleet up and down the Formosa Strait and that sort of thing?

BROWN: This was not the period of military confrontation in the Strait. I mean we had issues that we had to deal with because the Taiwan military and the PRC military were occasionally coming into close proximity of each other in the strait. In the mid 80s, the Taiwan military was still quite confident. They had higher quality systems and they would sometimes try to fly too close to the mainland and provoke the PRC. At times we had to warn Taiwan from doing that sort of thing.

Q: Quemoy and Matsu which were household names back in the '60s, what was happening with them?

BROWN: Very little. I mean there was some talk, in the context of Taipei's decision to open up travel to the mainland, about what role the offshore islands might play? Can something take place in terms of travel back and forth there? Intriguing questions, but in 1987 when travel to the mainland had just begun, it was too early for such a major change on the offshore islands.

Q: Were there ever any problems with mainland students and Taiwanese students at UCLA or where have you, what have you, at one of the universities?

BROWN: Not that I can recall. That was a period when PRC students were coming to the U.S. in large numbers, and there have long been thousands of Taiwanese on campuses as well, but I don't recall any significant problems.

Q: Did Taiwan make any noises during the 1988 election between Bush and Dukakis I guess it was about political contributions or anything like that?

BROWN: I don't recall a problem on that.

BROWN: Yes, I had observed the drama of Tiananmen while still in Washington. The students in the square, the mass demonstrations of a kind that had never been seen before in Communist China, many ordinary citizens joining in, delegations from different ministries participating in the demonstrations. For a while, I believed this would lead to some very significant change. Then martial law was declared and the military suppressed the demonstrations.

In Taiwan, there was a lot of optimism that spring that real reform might occur in China. Then of course, when the crack down came, this bubble burst and the usual attacks on the communists resumed. What happened to cross-strait travel, trade and investment during this period is very interesting. Businessmen went to the mainland, business continued, investments continued, it was rather remarkable. After Tiananmen, when most of the world was reducing contacts and there was reluctance by many in the West to invest in China, to everyone's surprise Taiwanese investments just kept going pretty much as though nothing had happened. It was motivated by business opportunities and most of the investments were in the southern coastal part of China, which was not heavily affected by what was going on in Beijing.

Was Taiwan intelligence involved in trying to support the democracy movement in China during that April May period? We didn't have very much information on that at that time. Most of the external support from overseas Chinese seemed to be coming out of Hong Kong rather than Taipei. But how much came from Taiwan wasn't clear at the time.

Q: Were we, how did we feel about Taiwanese investment in China? I mean was this a good thing?

BROWN: A good thing, yes.

Q: So, we weren't concerned that they were making another competitor for us?

BROWN: No. You have to remember that this started slowly. There had been a certain amount of unacknowledged trade going on indirectly before the travel ban was lifted in '87. The volume was still modest and not in the high tech area. It was textiles and shoes and sportswear and products like that. Today if you look at the cross-strait trade it's a very different picture. It's a huge factor both for China and for Taiwan. It is very much tied into global IT trade.

Q: What about Taiwanese versus mainland diplomacy in Africa and other places? Was this at all sort of a battlefield while you were there?

BROWN: The diplomatic struggle was a constant phenomenon. I can't remember who lost and who won what in that particular period.

Q: Well, then, when you left there after Tienanmen, where did you go in '89?

BROWN: Before we leave, let me just come back to one other issue that was very important in those days and about which there have been reports subsequently in the public record. That is the question of non-proliferation in Taiwan.

Q: You're talking about non-proliferation?

BROWN: Well about the Taiwan effort to acquire nuclear weapons, which we talked about earlier when we discussed the period when I was on the desk in the '70s. We went through another bout of this. It was reported at the time that Taiwan formally shut down and disabled its research reactor in 1988. This was the reactor they had purchased from Canada in the 1960s. The other information in the public media was the defection to the United States in early 1988 of one of the deputy directors of the Taiwan Atomic Energy Commission. The circumstances were never very clear in the media under which this individual ended up in the United States, but the fact that he was here was reported at the time and it is in the public record now. Dealing with this issue was one of the most important things the U.S. did in this period. It was in a way cleaning up after our own mess. I say that because the impetus for getting back to an interest in nuclear weapons by the Taiwan military came after we switched relations and their sense of insecurity became very real. Things developed to the point that we had to discretely tell Taiwan that this reactor had to be shut down and disabled. That reactor was the core of the problem because it could be used in a weapons program. In the '70s we had agreed Taiwan could continue to operate it under IAEA safeguards and it just became apparent that that wasn't the smart policy.

Q: Well, how did the Taiwanese react?

BROWN: Well, there were only a very small number of people in Taiwan who were aware that this was an issue. They essentially were persuaded that their relations with the United States, with the Reagan and Bush administrations, were more important to their security than anything they might be thinking of doing in terms of developing a weapons capability of their own. The people who were involved in it saw that the better part of wisdom would be to shut down this reactor. This took place around the time that Chiang Ching-kuo passed away. The only thing known to the public was that the deputy director of the Atomic Energy Commission and his family had disappear from Taiwan and it was rumored gone to the United States. We were fortunate enough not to have congressional hearings on this, thanks to some careful briefings of key members, so there was no sort of public discussion of it in the United States either.

Q: When this director and family left, what was behind it?

BROWN: Well, I think I better leave it at that because I don't want to go beyond what is in the public record. I think you could put the pieces together you could assume that something he told us was significant in terms of our understanding of what was going on.

Q: I got you. Well, then '89, whither?

BROWN: To Hong Kong.

Q: You certainly were on an East Asian circuit weren't you?

BROWN: It's a wonderful part of the world.

Q: We used to have trouble. I know when I was in Saigon it was something known as China coasters. These were sailors who spent all their time; they wouldn't leave ships anywhere. I mean they just kept going up and down the China coast with literally a wife in every port. You were almost a China coaster then?

BROWN: Well that's an interesting way to put it. I wonder what my wife would say about that?

Q: You were in Hong Kong from when to when?

BROWN: '89 to '92.

Q: Interesting time.

BROWN: Very.

Q: What were you doing?

BROWN: I was the Deputy Consul General.

Q: Who was consul general then?

BROWN: At the beginning, it was Don Anderson and in the second two years it was Richard Williams.

Q: Richard?

BROWN: Williams. Dick Williams. You really ought to interview him.

Q: Well, Hong Kong '89. You know Tiananmen had happened. The takeover was not that far away. What was the operative date?

BROWN: 1997.

Q: But it was a date that was well, everybody had it on their mind.

BROWN: Right. There were a lot of important negotiations going on between the British and the Chinese during this period. The most important being drafting what is called the Basic Law, which was the mini constitution that set the framework of how Hong Kong would run after its reversion to China.

Q: When you arrived there the aftermath of Tiananmen must have been... Things had been almost euphoric before. You weren't in Hong Kong, but coming there, this was a dose of communist reality, wasn't it?

BROWN: Right and the city was very nervous. You saw this in a variety of ways. You saw it in the growth of the Democratic Party in Hong Kong, which was just getting started. It was very much motivated by people who were determined to do as much as they could to protect Western values, civic society and promote democracy in Hong Kong, move it along as far as you can get it before the turnover, to provide some kind of a base of democratic politics in Hong Kong before the handover took place. You saw it in our own staff at the consulate, which was very nervous.

Q: You're talking about the Chinese staff.

BROWN: Yes, Chinese at the consulate. After reversion in 1997, if they were still working for the consulate, would they be considered as spies because of what they had done at the consulate? How were they going to be protected? You saw it in many different manifestations.

Q: Well, in a way well, I don't want to put words in your mouth. I mean what were we, the Hong Kong and the premiere observing spot of China, but now we have an embassy, we have the consulate generals. What was Hong Kong doing at this time?

BROWN: Well, we still had a mainland reporting unit as part of a combined political economic section. There were four people from the State Department component reporting on China. We had a large defense attaché office, though it didn't have that title. Their focus was on the PLA in China and what could be learned about it both from sources in Hong Kong and by traveling around China in the guise of being tourists. Once in a while they got in a bit of trouble from what they were doing, but nothing egregious. Then there was a CIA station there, which was very heavily focused on what could be learned from Hong Kong about the mainland.

Q: Obviously were we at the time when we were looking at what the British were up to and you know, and also we're beginning to lay plans for what are we doing about Hong Kong? We might not be a player, but had our staff and everything else. What were we thinking about?

BROWN: In early '92, which was five years before the transition was to take place, at Washington's request, Beijing and Hong Kong did a joint study of what should the U.S. presence in Hong Kong be after reversion.

Q: This is our post in Beijing?

BROWN: Yes, our post, Embassy Beijing. Stape Roy, the ambassador at the time and Dick Williams, the CG, were the ones who oversaw the collective inputs as to what the nature of the relationship should be. Our recommendations were then sent to Washington. No decisions were made at that time, our recommendations were later largely followed when reversion occurred. Interestingly enough, there was no big difference of opinion between the Embassy and Consulate. It was agreed that the United States would have an interest in supporting the "high degree of autonomy" that Hong Kong was supposed to get and that therefore, the type of organization the U.S. should have in Hong Kong should be consistent with the concept of Hong Kong having a high degree of autonomy, i.e., it shouldn't be just another consulate in China. But a Consulate with more autonomy from the Embassy than is usual. Embassy Beijing agreed even then that the person who was in Hong Kong should be seen within the State Department as a chief of missions.

Q: In other words certainly we report directly to Washington.

BROWN: Yes, On all things that had to do with Hong Kong's autonomy, and simultaneously have a close liaison relationship with Beijing, but not be treated by Beijing in the same way that Shanghai, Guangzhou and the other consulates were treated.

Q: Well, this of course to somebody who isn't familiar with this extremely important because you could have a chief of mission in Beijing who would want to.

BROWN: Exert control.

Q: Exert control and all of a sudden a lot of disquieting reports came out of Hong Kong it would be tempting to sit on those or to do this. This way by just this reporting channel meant that you would be getting a certain analysis that did not have to go through the venting of the embassy. I mean this happens. We always have this problem if you have supervision. I mean that close supervision. So, it was really a very important decision.

BROWN: Yes. Right. When they made the decision at the time of reversion, that's the way it came out.

Q: Well, now, what were the things you were particularly concerned with?

BROWN: Well, one was to do everything we could to try and make sure that when the transition took place there was a basis for continuing to treat Hong Kong as an autonomous unit in terms of U.S. policy. There we had the cooperation of the Congress and particularly Congressman Porter who was on the House Human Rights Caucus and Senator McConnell.

McConnell and Porter took the lead in passing the Hong Kong Policy Act which essentially said the United States has a strong interest in Hong Kong's continuing autonomy under the Basic Law arrangements worked out with China. It will be U.S. policy to support that high degree of autonomy at the time. We will continue to deal with Hong Kong separately on things like immigration and customs and IPR.

Q: IPR?

BROWN: Intellectual property rights and export controls, textile agreements, all of these kinds of things would remain in place. Rather than reaching a pessimistic assumption about what would happen after reversion, this legislation said the opposite. We're going to treat Hong Kong separately so long as it has real autonomy. That was very important. In the process of doing that we also dealt with our employees' concerns in the sense of getting special provisions put into legislation. If at the time of transition any employees in the consulate wanted to, we would work out expeditious naturalization for them to get a visa on the basis of their employment at the consulate without waiting for the normal 30 years. It was a special set of provisions so that any member of the consulate who felt threatened could get a visa and go to the United States as an immigrant. In the end, very few people in the end took advantage of that provision, but the option was very important to our employees.

Q: What about were we getting good information from the British on how things were going?

BROWN: The British were pretty good. There was a debate in Hong Kong at that time as to whether the British were really looking after the interests of Hong Kong or whether they were simply being narrow minded British and only caring about British commercial interests. I happened to be one of the people who thought the British were doing a reasonably good job of looking after Hong Kong's interests. Of course, that gets you into the whole question about how you view of Chris Patten, the final British Governor.

Q: He wasn't there at your time?

BROWN: He came just as I was leaving. David Wilson, a career British Foreign Service officer as the governor when I was there, but just as I was leaving Patten replaced him. He had a very different approach. Anyway, we in the Consulate thought that the British were doing a pretty good job of ensuring that the provisions of the Joint British- Chinese Declaration were accurately translated into the new domestic Chinese legislation, the so-called Basic Law for the Hong Kong Special Administrative Region. The British were pushing the Chinese to consult to a degree with the people of Hong Kong about what the content of what that law should be. The Chinese organized a basic law drafting committee, which had mainly mainland Chinese on it, but included a number of people from Hong Kong. These Hong Kong representatives were chosen by the Chinese, not by the Hong Kong people or by the British. There was an effort to pressure those Hong Kong representatives to stand up for Hong Kong and to have an open process where the texts of draft law were known not just to the British but also to the Hong Kong people and were debated in public. The British played a role in setting up that process. Some people it as only a sham consultation process because the Chinese appointed the members and others thought that this limited process was better than not having any role at all for Hong Kong. I was in that latter camp.

Q: Were we looking at that time did we want was Hong Kong as sort of an economic dynamo important to us? In other words, were we interested say beyond the fate of the people in Hong Kong, but just to have that, was that a good thing for us to have that there?

BROWN: Oh, definitely. It was not a perfect free market economy by any stretch of the imagination

Q: Under the British?

BROWN: Yes, under the British. Hong Kong gets a lot better marks for being a free market economy than it deserves. It gets those marks because in terms of the trade in goods it's a very open economy. In the services area, however, it was very carefully controlled by the British. Our problems in the trade sector with Hong Kong were largely in the services area. What could lawyers do? Doctors, people who were involved in various parts of the financial sector, what could they do and what couldn't they do? How do you regulate telephone services? How do you open up the port operations to other country's firms? Who would get the services contracts at the new airport that they're building? The Hong Kong economy was very important to the United States because there was a lot of American investment there, a lot of American companies there, but more importantly it was because of the impact that that economy was having on South China. There was a very symbiotic relationship between Hong Kong and the parts of China that were reforming economically the fastest and so the ability of Hong Kong to promote economic reform in China was seen as a big plus. It was something that you would want to keep going. Reform has gone so far in the 21st Century that Hong Kong's impact on China is less than it was at that time, but roughly 70% of all foreign direct investments into China in the years that I was in Hong Kong came in through Hong Kong. That meant technology, the foreign know-how, the ideas were coming in through Hong Kong, and keeping that going was important. For me seeing democracy develop in Hong Kong as far as it could possibly go was an important thing as well, not just for the sake of the people in Hong Kong, but because of the demonstration effect on the rest of China. Democracy hadn't gone nearly as far as one would like it to have gone. So it's not having as much of a demonstration effect as one would hope, but Hong Kong is still the only city in China where there are any members of a municipal council who are directly elected by the citizens. The democratic process there is flawed in many ways, but it's way ahead of the democratic process for the people of Beijing or Guangzhou or Shenyang.

Q: Were you aware or anybody else aware of mainland Chinese officials coming in and looking over the property, slamming the car doors, kicking the tires?

BROWN: Well, China was becoming a bigger part of the Hong Kong economy while we were there. There was a process of adjustment by the old British firms in which they realized that they didn't have to keep their relations with London and the governor greased as much as they had to keep their relations with Beijing and the incoming Chinese economic entities greased. You saw companies bringing in Chinese investors. You saw Cathay Pacific, the British invested airline in Hong Kong, spinning off a joint venture airline with some Chinese counterparts called DragonAir that would handle a large amount of the flights between, not all of them, but a large percentage of the flights between Hong Kong and the mainland. Cathay Pacific was an investor in DragonAir along with the Chinese. So, you saw this kind of positioning going on. Not by American companies because the American companies didn't have the inside track with the British. It was mainly the old-line British firms trying to adjust to the new masters. Some British firms tried to avoid this. Jardines, one of the oldest firms, moved their headquarters offshore so that it wouldn't be subject to control in Hong Kong. Its total business was in Hong Kong, but the headquarters would be in the Cayman Islands, I recall. However, most of the British firms went the other way finding ways to get along with your new masters.

Q: Were American firms still coming into Hong Kong?

BROWN: Oh, yes, very much so. The American chamber there was one of the biggest in the world and it was growing in those years despite Tiananmen.

Q: Was this a matter that it was a comfortable place in a way for a corporation to work into China? I mean English speaking.

BROWN: Yes and lots of local Hong Kong businessmen were doing the same thing. So American firms could operate on their own or cooperate with local partners.

Q: How did we relate to our consulate general in Guangzhou?

BROWN: They were two separate organizations with distinct purposes, but overlapping interests because of Hong Kong's intense economic ties with south China.

Q: I would think that you would sort of bump into each other?

BROWN: There was some bumping in not just with Guangzhou, but also with all the China post because of Hong Kong's reporting responsibilities on China. Hong Kong provided unique perspectives on China that didn't always jibe with views from within China. And our defense attaches are given responsibilities to travel throughout China. I remember a good friend who was the naval attaché took a trip to Tibet and then out from Tibet to Nepal and down to India.

Q: You have to for fleet connections there. You'd been in and out of there before of course, but was there a beginning of reluctance to talk to Americans within Hong Kong by the Chinese and all?

BROWN: No, not at all. We had I would say quite a bit of contact both with the representatives of China in Hong Kong and with the Chinese business there. It wasn't intimate, but a fair amount of contact.

Q: Were you getting any reflections there from Vietnam?

BROWN: We had a big problem with Vietnamese refugees in Hong Kong. We were caught between Washington then under the first Bush administration, which did not want to force any Vietnamese back to Vietnam and the UNHCR and the Hong Kong government that wanted to carefully distinguish between economic migrants and political refugees and send back to Vietnam those who were economic migrants. For Hong Kong, returning migrants was to be a deterrent against a continuing flood of people into Hong Kong. The numbers were quite large. It was a huge political issue within Hong Kong. All the money that had to go into building camps and providing police and health services and education in the camps and all this cost the Hong Kong taxpayer a lot. So there was pressure on the government to get the Vietnamese out. The Chinese Government frequently reminded Hong Kong that this problem should not exist in 1997. Clean it up; get rid of these people. was Beijing's message. And Washington was saying in effect don't send anyone back to Vietnam. Washington wanted liberal criteria for determining political refugee status. Anybody with the slightest reason for political refugee status should be given every opportunity to prove his or her case in Hong Kong.

Q: Were we putting our money where our mouth was as far as taking the refugees?

BROWN: Yes, quite a few people were coming to the States. By the end of the time I was there, we'd interviewed extensively and taken everybody that we wanted to take. There were criminal elements among the remaining Vietnamese. People who either had a criminal record that you could identify back in Vietnam or who had committed crimes in the camps. So how to evaluate the remaining Vietnamese was a very controversial issue.

Q: Were there any other issues there, a lot of fleet visits and things like that?

BROWN: Yes. And the fleet visits were one aspect of our efforts to build a foundation for post-reversion relationships. We wanted to make sure that we had all of this working smoothly and in a way which had a chance of surviving because the use of Hong Kong as an R&R destination was very convenient for the navy. We didn't want to do anything that would jeopardize that. The basic law was very specific that defense matters were a central government responsibility. Ship visits by naval vessels were an issue to be decided in Beijing and not in Hong Kong. Most of the period since the handover we've been able to have our ships visit Hong Kong as we did before, but there have been a couple of times for instance after the Belgrade bombing and after the EP3 incident when the Chinese temporarily stopped giving approval. It's worked reasonably well. What we were trying to do was position ourselves. We had an office within the consulate that provided support for ship visits. They had some facilities around town and we were trying to get these relocated in commercial locations so that we could have a very small number of people in Hong Kong handling visits, but the support structure would be there.

We did some other things. We reorganized the USIS library operation that conceivably could be seen as propaganda by a communist China. Partly for those reasons and partly for budgetary reasons we relocated the USIS library to Chinese University and made it a cooperative undertaking between Chinese University and the consulate so it could be embedded in Hong Kong. We renegotiated our air agreement with Hong Kong so it would be an agreement not between Britain and the United States, but between Hong Kong and the United States. The same thing was done in the area of law enforcement. We were negotiating agreements with Hong Kong on legal assistance and extradition. We got it negotiated but didn't actually get approval by the Senate until much later. Our objective was to have a basis for continuing law enforcement cooperation.

Q: How about congress? Did people, a lot of congress people coming by and all?

BROWN: We had a lot of them; some seriously interested in Hong Kong and some came just to shop.

Q: I was going to say, I was wondering whether Mr. Lee was still turning out his suits. When I went to Vietnam you know, we all stopped and got your _____, but there was one major tailor. You walked in and you walked out two minutes with your measurements.

BROWN: Many from Congress came because of the Vietnam refugee issue. There were some like Senator McConnell and Representative Porter who came because they were really concerned about Hong Kong and what's going to happen to the six million people there.

BROWN: Yes.

Q: How did you feel about the situation? I mean did you think it was going to come out moderately well or not?

BROWN: I was quite optimistic. Optimistic because we saw a lot of resilience in the Hong Kong community. The British were beginning to allow Hong Kong Chinese to have significant positions in the administration, five or six years in advance so that they would be positioned there to keep the civil administration going. We didn't know how the political arrangements were going to work out, but the arrangements were very explicit on one thing and that was that there weren't going to be people from Beijing running things. It was going to be people in Hong Kong, ultimately chosen by Beijing, but people in Hong Kong. And I thought they would stand up or be pushed by the Hong Kong people to stand up for Hong Kong.

Why would one be optimistic? One reason was the resilience of the Hong Kong community. The second was that the international community would be watching. The international community has I think a number of guises, but one of the most important is what you would call international markets. Hong Kong was important to the Chinese economy because of the investment flow, and the Chinese would have its self interest in making sure that Hong Kong remained a vibrant economy and an entry way for the benefits of international trade which were still heavily coming through there. The third reason that gave one some confidence was the Taiwan factor. Everyone knew that the mainland wanted to move on from dealing with Hong Kong to dealing ultimately with Taiwan and talking it back into the fold. If Taiwan concluded that Beijing had not implemented its deal with Hong Kong, then no one in Taiwan would risk making a deal with Beijing. Therefore, the PRC had an interest from that angle as well of living up to the terms worked out with the British in order to have credibility in trying to deal with Taiwan. So, there were reasons for Beijing to adhere to its agreement to give Hong Kong a high degree of autonomy. It wasn't a lost cause, and the U.S. should do its part in encouraging the deal to work.

Q: What was the feeling? I must say I was sort of surprised, because I had never followed Hong Kong at all, to see that the British were opening Hong Kong up to more Hong Kongese into the government and all that. I would have thought that that would have been done a long time ago. Was there a feeling that the Brits really should have done this a long time ago?

BROWN: Definitely. They should have done it years earlier. They should have had a political process going on in Hong Kong in the '70s and '80s, but they made some decisions early after the Second World War and repeated them I think in the '60s at the time of the cultural revolution of China, that by gosh Britain was going to keep control of things. Yes, there was a legislative council for the city as a whole, but until 1984, the year of the Sino-British joint Declaration, every single member of the legislative council was appointed by the governor. It was a selection process, not an election process. The British began rapidly after '84 moving to put in place representative institutions. What was the Chinese view of this? The Chinese view was that Hong Kong was to be turned over the way I had been in 1984. So introducing representative government after 1984 wasn't something Beijing had agreed to.

Q: They had a point.

BROWN: They had a point. Beyond the Legislative Council, there were a large number of Hong Kong people working in the administration, but very few of them made it up to the senior levels. There were large numbers of Brits not just as the head of departments, but as the head of sections of departments and deputy section heads who were still British civil servants running Hong Kong up until the late '80s.

Q: It seems so almost atypical of what was happening everywhere else, I mean you know, one always hears about the Belgian Congo was the great thing. They had about three educated people and here you're talking about a highly sophisticated city. I mean were you talking to the, was there sort of a colonial attitude among the British?

BROWN: Yes. There was an end the empire mentality among some of them. The official government view, the British government view was that we've got a pretty good deal and its' going to work and we're gong to be proud of what we're doing, we're not ratting out and abandoning these people. But there were a lot of civil servants who sort of said, oh, you guys will never be able to run it. Moral will collapse and corruption will return. That was the end of empire mentality among some of the British civil servants. They were the Brits who left at reversion. Yet today, there are still many Brits working in second rung positions in Hong Kong government, even now six or seven years after Hong Kong's return.

Q: Well, what did this mean for us? How did you see this? What did this mean we were doing now?

BROWN: First, we weren't undoing anything that the U.S. had in place. We were preserving our alliance relationships. We were cooperating as I said with other allied governments in the region who thought this was the right thing to do. So, we saw this as adding something else on top of what we already had, our alliances, adding something that was compatible with those alliance relationships. We thought over time dialogue might help reshape the way countries in Asia had dealt with each other. We were conscious that there were long term historical animosities at work, the Chinese and Vietnamese, the Chinese and Japanese, and that there were short-term issues that divided countries. The Vietnamese had at that point in time just gotten out of Cambodia. While this issue was being debated, the North Korean nuclear issue was blowing up in the northern part of Asia. So, there were lots of contemporary issues. We believed that the U.S. had nothing to lose and potentially something to gain over the long term by getting people together and seeing if they couldn't build "habits of cooperation" as we put it then. To talk about security issues, to understand each other's concerns and fears and build habits of cooperation where they had not existed before.

When you had looked at the military organizations of most of the countries in Asia, you saw they were very closed inward looking organizations. Part of what we were aiming for was to find ways of breaking those barriers down and building linkages and establishing relationships. This was a bit of a trick because, even though the U.S. brought along DOD colleagues, almost no other country that showed up at the initial planning meeting brought anyone from their militaries along. Once the thing had been established, one of the early U.S. goals was to get the military officers, particularly younger military officers, engaged in the work of this organization, working on things that were common problems, that were not controversial, but would begin to establish some personal relationships. Believe it or not even within ASEAN, which had created a huge pattern of cooperation amongst almost every part of their governments, there was little direct contact between military officials.

Q: I would think one of the things that you'd think up there would be to work on piracy, the naval.

BROWN: Yes, that was in fact an area that everyone was talking about as something that the ARF might get involved in once it got started. It's gone about it in a very delicate way because the question of piracy is very politically sensitive.

Q: Why is that?

BROWN: It is politically sensitive along the China coast because it implies that China is not able to control its own maritime borders and politically sensitive in Southeast Asia particularly in Indonesia for the same reason. So in the Malacca Straits, are you going to allow well-organized Singaporean police to chase pirates into Indonesian and Malaysian waters? So, piracy was too sensitive an issue for a fledgling organization to deal with at the start. In fact, arrangements were worked out on a trilateral basis between the Indonesia, Malaysia and Singapore on how to improve policing in the Malacca Straits.

Q: I think all of these countries though of us as the camel that was sticking its head under the tent, into the tent or something. I mean we travel with our military. I mean they're part of our calculation and have them say let's all get together and they'll take one look at the seventh fleet or something like this, you can see an awful lot. I would think it would be very reluctant.

BROWN: Well, it took a while. Let's put it that way. It took six or seven years before the pattern of everybody bringing defense officials, whether they were civilians or in uniform, along got established. But here I'm looking into the future and not talking about '93.

Q: Well, at this time in '92 ASEAN was a pretty good regional economic entity was it?

BROWN: Yes, it was six countries and they were all doing extremely well economically. They had in this same period '91, '92, '93, been working very successfully on the Cambodian peace agreement. The peace agreement wasn't something that ASEAN did on its own. It was a combination of ASEAN and the members of the P5 at the UN, the U.S., France, China, Russia, all playing important roles. They put this altogether and got the UN to come in on a major new peace keeping operation in Cambodia. So, because of its economic success and its diplomatic contribution, ASEAN was quite highly regarded in that period.

Q: How did you find, I mean, you came in between, you came in under the Bush administration? How did you find the transition from your optic went from your responsibility?

BROWN: I think it went quite well. Again I'm just speaking of the East Asian Bureau. Bill Clark a real professional passed things over to Winston Lord who had worked in government for democrats and republicans at different times. I think Lord had endeared himself to Clinton because he had taken a hard line on China's human rights policy, advocating the linkage of trade and the human rights. But he had worked in a republican administration before. And so, it was one professional turning things over to another professional. It was a sharp contrast with Dick Holbrook's arrival in the Carter years. Dick didn't want to listen to a single thing, his predecessor Amb. Hummel had to say. Winston was the exact opposite. He was willing to talk to everybody. He consulted endlessly with people. So, there was a much easier transition. There wasn't a wholesale scrapping of people. There were some changes. Winston brought in Peter Thompson who had been his DCM in Beijing to be the principal DAS and made him responsible for China. Peter was not a particular popular choice amongst his professional colleagues, but he was a professional.

Q: Did in _____ and all, how about the China card, how were things changing there or did you see that?

BROWN: The new administration, including Lord, came into office with the Clinton campaign rhetoric criticizing the Chinese leaders as "the butchers of Beijing."

Q: We're talking about the aftermath of Tiananmen Square?

BROWN: That's right. Clinton had criticized the Bush administration for working so hard to keep the U.S. China relationship going after Tiananmen. Because of that, Clinton had advocated, partly I think at Winston Lord's urging, a linkage of trade access to the U.S. markets on favorable terms to progress on human rights. That became the administration policy. Winston was at one time administering the trade-human rights linkage in bilateral relations with China and at the same time, on the multilateral level, he was working to include the Chinese in the ARF.

Q: Was it a matter of Warren Christopher saying you get East Asia, take it or was the hand of Christopher?

BROWN: His hand was light, but there were certain issues that the Secretary had to be involved in. Winston's work with him on China was probably the best example of that. The Secretary also had to be involved in endorsing what we were doing with the ARF. Christopher went to the Foreign Ministers meeting in Singapore in 1993. This was a meeting of the foreign ministers of ASEAN and their so-called dialogue partners, the U.S., Japan, Canada, Korea, Australia, New Zealand. It was that group that decided to set up the ARF and to announce that the next meeting in '94 would include the foreign ministers of the other countries as well, Russia, China, Vietnam and so forth.

Christopher was also scheduled to attend the actual first meeting of the ARF that took place in Bangkok the following summer. However, at the very last minute Christopher decided not to go because of a hastily arranged meeting at the White House between Arafat and Rabin. Christopher decided that it was more important to be at this Middle East peace summit than to go to Bangkok's inaugural meeting of the ARF. To put it in a less attractive light, Christopher's public image wasn't particularly good. He had the image of a cold fish. It didn't appear that he was terribly centrally involved in important issues, and his public affairs handlers said, he's got to be seen as involved in something that's important and that's the Middle East peace process. Even if the president was doing all the real work, he's got to be there in the photographs. So he's not going to Bangkok.

Then there was the issue of who would take Christopher's place in Bangkok. The Secretary's initial inclination was to send Peter Tarnoff who was the Under Secretary for Political Affairs in theory the third ranking person in the State Department. But Tarnoff had not been involved with Asia policy and was not seen as a politically important figure by Asians. Winston had to race around and get the Secretary to change his mind and send Strobe Talbot, the Deputy Secretary. Strobe went. He had more rank and was just the right kind of person for the job, an intellectual who thought strategically and understood the importance of the event. He accepted the job with a certain amount of relish.

Q: In looking at this during your '93 to '95 period and even earlier when you had been in your other job, how would you, I won't say rank the countries, but were there countries within this that were pains in the asses and other ones that were from our perspective sort of on the right road or prima donnas or anything?

BROWN: Well, I would say that the basic dynamic of this group was between countries that wanted to see the organization develop and become meaningful and others which were very concerned that the organization not do anything whatsoever that infringed on their national sovereignty. Foremost among the defenders of sovereignty were Indonesia and Malaysia. The Chinese were the other ones acting as a break. The ARF operated by consensus, which pretty much meant that even one country could block agreement. That was the main question. The other subtext was between the ASEAN countries and the non-ASEAN members. The ARF was the ASEAN not Asian regional forum. The ASEAN countries were absolutely determined that they were going to remain the "driving force" behind this organization. They were not going to let the big boys, the Chinese, the Japanese and the Americans, dictate to them what this organization should do. So this was the other underlying dynamic. Our approach was to seek working arrangements which allowed both the ASEAN and non-ASEAN members would have an equal ability to contribute to the work of this organization.

Q: Speaking of the military, a power that was not mentioned was becoming stronger particularly the Indian navy, but India.

BROWN: India was not considered in the beginning. However, after I left and I can't remember if this was '96 or '97, the issue of India joining was addressed. While I wasn't directly involved then, basically the U.S. was reluctant to see this happen because we were afraid that if you brought India in you would have to bring Pakistan. If you brought Pakistan and India in, that would mean importing the Indo-Pak controversy into the organization, which already had too many internal problems to deal with. So, the U.S. resisted that, but once again it was the Singaporeans who were pushing this and in the end the overall consensus in the group was to one invite the Indians in and to reach an internal consensus that there would never be an invitation to Pakistan. The reason many countries wanted India in was to act as another counter weight to rising China. One of the things on which there was a general consensus in the region was to try and constrain China by embedding it in regional organizations. This was never said but it was a subtext in all of this. Southeast Asians saw India as a player in a larger game of trying to build a network that would constrain China.

Q: Well, India makes a great deal of sense because of their military power in the Indian Ocean and sort of like Japan on the other side, that whole crescent there.

BROWN: One other thing before we move on that was interesting was the Mischief Reef incident.

Q: The what?

BROWN: Mischief Reef is the English name for a reef in the South China Sea, which is within the 200-mile economic zone of the Philippines. It was an uninhabited reef, claimed by the Philippines, by China and I think by Vietnam.

Q: This wasn't the Spratlys was it?

BROWN: Yes.

Q: I mean, yes I can remember.

BROWN: In the spring of 1995, without any advance notice, the Chinese built what they called a fishermen's assistance facility on Mischief Reef. From pictures, it was a cement buildings built on pilings. The construction was done by the Chinese military as part of China's effort to assert its rights in the South China Sea. This really concerned the Philippines and provoked a general reaction in Southeast Asia. This action led the U.S. Government to develop a new statement of its policy on the South China Sea.

It also became a major issue in the summer of 1995 in the preparations for the ARF ministerial meeting in Brunei, a country with 250,000 people that was in the chair of ASEAN. China with 1.2 billion people had just occupied a reef, maybe 400 miles from Brunei. It was Brunei's responsibility to coordinate the ARF's response to the Chinese action. On one side of the issue you had countries that were concerned saying we've got to put some pressure on the Chinese. On the other side, China was opposed to putting the issue on the ARF agenda and at one point threatened not to attend the meeting if Mischief Reef would be an issue for discussion. The U.S. and Australia took the position that for the ARF to have credibility as a security forum it would have to address the issue. This was a very tricky issue and Brunei eventually having consulted widely went to the Chinese and said, ministers are going to talk about this whether we put it on the agenda or not. As the chairman, Brunei's foreign minister will have to summarize the discussion that actually takes place in the written statement issued at the end of the meeting. We want you to understand this. In the end, the Chinese came the meeting. There was a discussion, and the Chinese presented a new statement of their policy on the South China Sea in which for the first time Beijing committed to resolving issues in accordance with the Law of the Sea Treaty. Our interpretation was that the Chinese decided they couldn't afford not to be at the ARF and that, if they were going to come to this meeting, it would be advantageous to issue a conciliatory statement. I think this was one of the things that convinced people that having the ASEAN Regional Forum was a useful forum. The ARF couldn't challenge the Chinese, but it could put a certain amount of pressure on the Chinese and force the Chinese to take opinions in the region into account in ways that the Chinese wouldn't have had to do if the organization didn't exist. Winston and Christopher were all really very pleased with the way this worked out. One year after its creation, the ARF was serving as a significant forum for discussion.

Q: Because that area, I remember it was an area of contention back when I was in South Vietnam in the '70s. But Vietnam and the sort of peace in China always claimed to, the thought being that there might be oil around there.

BROWN: Yes, that's correct. On the Vietnamese side of the South China Sea there are some exploration blocks in the Vietnamese exclusive economic zone where oil has been found and it's being produced.

Q: On this issue, the reef issue, were we being very careful to take a back seat or were we?

BROWN: To my disappointment, the answer to that is yes. That spring I took the lead in drafting a new statement of U.S. policy on the South China Sea. I hoped it would include a clear statement of U.S. opposition to military moves that would threaten peace in the region. Winston Lord's view was that the Chinese would see this as a challenge and that the U.S. already had enough problems in our bilateral relations with China. The U.S. should not be out in front on the Mischief Reef question. Yes, we have interests, but we shouldn't be out there leading the charge to challenge the Chinese in this area. We should leave that to the claimants. So, when we worked out this new statement of U.S. policy, it represented some advance from earlier very general statements, but it did not assert in any way that the U.S. was going to play a role of trying to diffuse tensions.

Q: You said you were disappointed. Did you feel that we should have played a more aggressive role?

BROWN: Yes, I thought that we were dealing with a dynamic in the South China Sea in which all of the claimants, the Vietnamese, the Filipinos, the Chinese, the Malaysians were taking actions that provoked the others to respond. The situation could easily get out of hand and require some response by the U.S. This had happened in the Paracels in the 1970, when the Chinese attacked and drove the Vietnamese out of the islands, with considerable casualties. Rather than waiting, it would be better to encourage the claimants to work out some rules of the game. The actual idea our office was advocating was that there ought to be an agreement by all of the parties not to occupy any new territory nor substantially reinforce existing positions. We thought that the U.S. ought to be much more active particularly working with the Indonesians which as the biggest country in Southeast Asia had been active on these issues. Winston said, no.

This would essentially mean organizing people to resist the Chinese and we don't need to do that. Let them do it on their own.

Q: Of course, out of this whole issue raises the question that has been around for a hell of a long time and that is the expansion of China. I mean everybody has been watching China. Are they really planning to exert their influence? I mean it's an empire that's sort of grown and contracted and grown and contracted. This was one place that, it may be a small reef, but it still was representative of aggression.

BROWN: If you look around the periphery of China, there are a couple of places where there are minor territorial disputes. However, there is no evidence that the Chinese are seeking territorial aggrandizement. The South China Sea is a sensitive area because there are unresolved competing claims to essentially uninhabitable areas unless one builds artificial structures. This is a very unique area and one shouldn't draw conclusions about general Chinese behavior from what they will do in the South China Sea. After Mischief Reef, the Chinese didn't expand their footprint in the area.

Q: Which results in having a group of people, a group of nations getting together and looking at this in the cold light of day and making certain actions sort of unacceptable. Which if it was just between one country and another, particularly if one country is China, it's a little harder to face it down.

BROWN: It didn't happen on my watch, but subsequently the idea of no new outposts has in fact been worked into the code of conduct in the South China Sea, which was adopted in 2002, I think.

Q: I've had two contacts one with Korea, one was an airman second class in sitting off Chodo Island, sitting on Chodo Island up in North Yellow Sea and then later as consul general in Seoul in '76 to '79, but was there the perception that an attack could come anytime? I mean, you know, we've had, it's been 50 years now of tension on the border, but except for forays from time to time, the blue house raid and a few other things, its nothing major has happened. What was the feeling?

BROWN: If you went for a briefing at U.S. Forces Korea, they would emphasize the threat posed by the North. They would be able to talk to you about the kind of training the North had been doing and show you the number of new artillery pieces that they believe had been placed in caves along just north of the DMZ. They would talk about our intelligence on chemical weapons and so forth. So, USFK portrayed a picture of the North, which was still consistent with the idea that at some point they might attack the South and try to unify the country in keeping with their propaganda.

At the same time if you looked at the balance between the North and the South, you would recognize that the North's economy had been in decline and for at least five years, that their sources of support in the Soviet Union and China had dried up, that the military looked like a decrepit organization. The North was balanced against South Korea, which was the 11th largest economy in the world. It had just been admitted to the OECD as a member developed world and had an army of 650,000 people equipped with some of the best equipment that the U.S. could provide them, well-trained on their own and with the American armed forces. My judgment and the judgment of others who weren't directly involved in the U.S. forces Korea was that the South Koreans could probably handle the North Koreans pretty much on their own. If we weren't in a confrontation with the North over the nuclear issue, I believed the U.S. really should be involved in withdrawing a substantial portion of the American military from Korea because it wasn't needed anymore.

Q: Did you get any feeling at that time for something which seems to be a considerable concern on the part of China and that is anything happening in North Korea would mean an exodus of umpteen million poor, starving Koreans into China and this means that the Chinese don't want any change.

BROWN: Yes, you saw that. The Chinese didn't talk much about their bilateral ties with North Korea, but it was pretty clear to us through various intelligence channels that in the early '90s the Chinese had substantially scaled back their aid to the North and done away with friendship pricing on goods sold to the north. Then when the famine occurred in North Korea, the Chinese were clearly beginning to reassess what they were doing vis-à-vis the North. Even though they never gave any aid to the world food program, we were convinced that they became the largest donor to the North of food assistance. They are the principal supplier of petroleum, i.e., energy supplies through Northeast China. The Chinese reversed their policy in '95 and '96 and decided that this famine was undermining stability in the North and that they would have to provide substantial aid to avoid instability.

Q: Well, you talk about it, an awful lot of countries that really despise this regime are doing everything they can to keep it going. The Japanese, the United States, the South Koreans, the Chinese. How about the Russians?

BROWN: They don't have much capability in terms of resources to make a meaningful contribution, but you're right. In some ways, providing aid is repugnant because this regime is as brutal and as inhumane towards its own people as you can imagine. It was and is a government that is prepared to see its own people starve while putting substantial resources into its own military establishment and threatening the rest of the world with weapons of mass destruction. It is repugnant. My view as the director of Korean Affairs was our policy was not to overthrow the regime but to encourage change. I saw the Agreed Framework as a vehicle for encouraging change because, as I said, if the North Koreans were going to implement it through to the end they were going to have to open up their society.

One key issue was how to tie the new reactors into the power grid. The power grid in North Korea was dilapidated. It couldn't possibly handle the power that would be produced by two nuclear reactors. The North Koreans tried to pressure KEDO into agreeing to build a new electrical grid for them as part of the reactor project. KEDO said, no. The way to get the grid is to go to the World Bank. The north didn't like that answer because they knew that would mean they would have to open up their whole economy to the scrutiny of the World Bank. They still haven't agreed to do that, but what we were trying to do was not just deal with an immediate non-proliferation problem, but to bring about fundamental change in North Korean society through the vehicle of the agreed framework. We saw the humanitarian food aid as another way for doing this. We were prepared to invite the North Koreans into the ASEAN Regional Forum. It didn't happen on my watch. It happened later. There were other things we were prepared to do, but the North hasn't followed through on many of them.

Q: National Security Advisor.

BROWN: National Security Advisor. Lake went to Seoul with a message, which said, if you would agree to an initiative to get North South dialogue started, the president will come and visit South Korea. This initiative put our office in a tricky position. For reasons that never explained explicitly, the president wanted Lake to handle this relationship through his contacts with Kim's national security advisor rather than having my boss, Warren Christopher, be the point man on this issue. Perhaps Lake wanted some credit for an initiative. Anyways, Lake and his deputy asked our office for some help in drafting their telegrams to Seoul but insisted that we not inform Christopher. Nevertheless, I discreetly informed Winston Lord what we were doing, and got his agreement. My deputy Dick Christiansen, who knew a lot more about Korea than I did, was involved in this process, too. We were writing the telegrams for Lake to send to Seoul to work out the presidential visit.

The focus of the presidential visit was going to be the announcement of what we called the four party peace talks proposal. The Americans and the South Koreans on one side, the North Koreans and the Chinese on the other side. We would start a process of dialogue about peace on the peninsula. This was a cover essentially for finding a way to get the North and the South to talk to each other. All this was worked out without in the end any bad blood that I could detect between Christopher and Lake.

Q: What about the Japanese?

BROWN: They were not happy with this because they weren't one of the four. They were U.S. allies, which China was not, and they were paying a billion dollars for the KEDO. They were not happy, but they were told about it in advance and chose not to object publicly.

DAVID DEAN
Taipei, Taiwan (1987-1989)

David Dean was born in New York City in 1925 and graduated from Harvard. He entered the Foreign Service in 1951. He served in numerous posts including Kuala Lumpur, Rotterdam, Taichung, Hong Kong and Taipei. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1998.

DEAN: In early January 1987, I went to Taiwan as Director of AIT's Taipei office. Earlier I was talking about some of the developments which I had taken part in when I set up AIT in '79 until '87.

Q: We'll stop it right now at '87. At that time in '87 when you moved to Taipei just when you were going or during the mid-'80s, were you seeing a change, or foreseeing a change in Taiwan from being a Kuomintang dictatorship, with a centralized government to one where the native Taiwanese would essentially assume power takeover and that democracy would come in. Did you see this?

DEAN: Well, yes. In fact, I would go to Taiwan from 1979-87 at least annually, sometimes twice a year, and have talks with President Chiang. He had already announced in '86 to Katherine Graham, the publisher of the Washington Post, that he was going to abolish martial law, that he was going to allow the formation of opposition parties, that he was going to reform the Legislative Yuan, which meant retiring all the elderly legislators and holding elections for new legislators.

Q: They never had an election did they?

DEAN: Most of these elderly legislators were elected in 1947 on the mainland. But Taiwan had elections for the lower levels, mayors, and magistrates, city councils, village chiefs, etc. The KMT won most of these because there wasn't an opposition party. There were only individuals who might run as independents. So CCK's announcement was a major departure from the past, and Chiang Ching-kuo told me that he would have done this much earlier but there were serious problems at home and abroad. I am sure he had it in mind to move toward a democratic form of government because he realized that the mainlanders who had come over with his father were only 15% of the population. The other 85% were represented by locally born Taiwanese, and they were beginning to push very hard. There had been serious political problems in Korea and problems with Marcos in the Philippines. He knew that in the future, if he wanted to preserve stability and progress on Taiwan, that he would have to move toward representative government. He was already bringing in Taiwanese to the lower ranks of the party and encouraging them to join the lower ranks of the civil service; then into the mid-ranks, and then into the higher ranks. His vice president was Li Teng-hui, who now is president. He had appointed him Mayor of Taipei, and then Governor of the province of Taiwan. He appointed him Vice President. He was grooming him for the future, and many others too, not just Lee. So when President Chiang told me that he had in mind to move toward these political reforms, the break in relations with the U.S. had set back his timetable. He said he had to postpone the elections for the Legislative Yuan.

There were several other very difficult things, like the '82 Communiqué that we just have been discussing, which were a big blow. Then there were the murders in the Lin Yi-hsiung family in the Kaohsiung incident. Lin Yi-hsiung's mother and his twin daughters were murdered in early 1980 by some unknown assailant, but everybody knew it was political. Cheng Wen-jeng, a professor at Carnegie Mellon University, had been thrown off the roof of a library after being interrogated for 13 hours by the garrison command. Henry Liu, a journalist in Daly City, California, had been murdered by a hit squad from Taiwan on the orders of the Ministry of Defense Intelligence Bureau Chief.

These events all caused a big furor in our Congress and in our government. President Chiang was trying to cope with that. He announced shortly after, that no member of his family could succeed him. Although he had succeeded his father, it was quite clear to me that he had not trained any member of his family to succeed him. There was one, the middle son, who wanted to and was trying to manipulate things on the side. It was thought that this son might have been involved in the Henry Liu murder, too.

Q: Well, looking at these murders, it sounds like kind of a rogue operation.

DEAN: Yes. I think they were people within the security apparatus who were very right wing and intent on having their own way. But, President Chiang had to deal with all different opinions within his own country. He was quite a remarkable person to try to do this and yet move forward. He didn't just make a decision to move forward into these reforms. He had gone around and gotten everybody's opinion, if not their agreement. At least he had given them the courtesy of long and repeated discussions of the pluses and minuses of moving in that direction. So when he did it, it wasn't a big shock to the establishment. They knew he was going to do it. Gradually things were implemented; martial law was lifted. The plans were underway for the new elections, and then he died. If he hadn't put these things in motion, I don't think his successor would have been able to fight the diehards in the KMT Central Standing Committee, and Taiwan would not be where it is today.

Q: Well, I thought we might have one more session, okay? So, we quit in 1987 and you were off to Taiwan to be the director of our office there.

Today is August 17, 1998. David, what about going there? This is the equivalent to being an ambassador, but it is not. I was wondering about the Senate and confirmation. There are a lot of political currents going around, so I wouldn't think anybody would say this is a routine assignment.

DEAN: The Director of AIT was chosen by the Department the same way an Ambassador was, that is the Deputy Secretary's Committee, where the Director General of the Foreign Service and the Under Secretary for Political Affairs and a few others sit in on it, and they would have to get White House clearance as well. So, in the fall of '86, George Vest, who was Director General of the Foreign Service then, came to me and asked if I would be willing to go to Taipei. I hadn't thought of another overseas assignment at that time, so I consulted my wife. My wife has been the mainstay of my entire Foreign Service career. In fact, what little successes I had in the various posts were due in large part to her and the friendships she had made with an astounding variety of people in Hong Kong, Beijing, and Taipei. It seemed to me that I had to ask her first if we were going to go. Sort of reluctantly, we both agreed and things were set in train. Usually the AIT Director had a meeting with the President. Mary and I had a photo opportunity with Ronald Reagan although we weren't official representatives and our appointment did not have to be confirmed by the Senate.

Q: You were there from '87 to when?

DEAN: I started out in January of '87 and I wound up in December of '89, so that was a three year tour. When we saw Ronald Reagan, he said that he had been to Taiwan several times when he was Governor and was very interested in what was going on there. I told him that I would keep everyone informed. He said that is fine, and that was it. That was in December. and I arrived in Taipei in early January. The first opportunity I had, I met with President Chiang Ching-kuo. I had known him for many years, and he was pleased at the appointment, primarily because someone you know is better than someone you don't. He was very helpful to me. He made sure that some of his senior advisors who really were not too keen on meeting with the Americans would meet with me. For instance, Shen Chang-huan, who was the Secretary General of the President's office, and who had been foreign minister. I tried to invite him for lunch or just to tea, or possibly just a meeting, but he was always busy. I mentioned to the President that I would really like to see Shen and to see a few others. It was very clear that the President spoke to them because very shortly thereafter, they called me up and said, "Let's get together and see each other." I tried to touch base with almost all of the top party and government officials as well as the oppositionists. Then I spent a-lot of time with the American business community because I felt that this is where we could make our biggest contribution, helping them to the best of our ability. I met with various businessmen. There was a new airline to be set up. I met with the chairman of that airline together with McDonnell-Douglas people and Boeing people to introduce them and get them to focus on American aircraft rather than on the airbus which was their original intent. Eventually they did buy mostly McDonnell-Douglas and Boeing aircraft. They didn't buy any airbuses at that time. That is EVA Airlines. Similarly with China Airlines and the Taiwan power company, which intended to build some more nuclear power plants. General Electric, Westinghouse and other American companies were interested in getting the bid on the rapid transit system rather than the French or the Germans. I spent a lot of time opening various exhibits, going to trade shows, doing all sorts of other things, making innumerable speeches. I must have made five or six speeches of one type or another every week. So, I traveled all over the island to universities, to trade fairs that were opening or to various functions of one type or another, environmental meetings, university meetings. I was quite busy doing all that.

Q: Did the reluctance of some of the party people, the foreign minister and others, because we had recognized mainland China and reduced relations so they were sort of saying to hell with you, or had they gotten over this?

DEAN: Some of them had not. Some of them were ultra conservative, traditional in the Chinese sense that they had not gotten over the break in our relations. They also felt that the U.S. was not trustworthy. In the '49-'50 period, we had abandoned them and then the U.S. had broken relations in the beginning of '79, and we had the August 17, 1982 Arms Sales Communiqué with the mainland which gradually reduced the quality and quantity of arms sales to Taipei by the U.S. They didn't trust us. Also we had been trying to work very hard in getting Taiwan to stay in the Asian Development Bank. The Chinese wanted to come in, and the usual scenario was for Taiwan to be voted out. Taiwan was a founding member, and we felt that they should stay. Shen Chang-huan was Foreign Minister then, before he became Secretary General to the President's office. He resisted to the nth degree any change in Taiwan's name, any change in its status in the Bank. He really fought to the very end. President Chiang overruled him, so he was feeling put out by that experience as well. There were lots of things that he could point to that he didn't like.

Q: While you were there, was this Asian Development Bank issue resolved?

DEAN: It was resolved before I got there in '84. Shen left the Foreign Minister's job and became Secretary General of the President's office. In that capacity, it wasn't necessary for him to meet with any foreigners that he didn't want to. He was a close and influential advisor to the President. I thought that we should have some dialogue and some opportunity to look into these things and see where the problems were and see if we could try to reach a common understanding. I met with Shen a lot later on, and also with John Kwan, who was a very bright and able Deputy Secretary of the KMT. I met with him, and we became good friends I think.

Later on, of course, I met with many of the opposition people. I had gotten to know them during the time I was in Washington and would come out to Taipei. Many of them were wives and relatives of those prisoners who had been arrested after the Kaohsiung riot, and they were trying hard to get their husbands and relatives out of jail. I was trying hard to do that, too. Congress was interested, the administration was interested. We kept trying to urge President Chiang to commute their sentences or to shorten their sentences. I kept arguing, as I said earlier, to Chiang during the time I was posted in Taiwan, urging more and more moves toward democratic reform. That was the best way to bring the American society and the Taiwan society closer together. I think he saw the value of that.

I think I mentioned earlier that he started his reforms or at least announced them in the fall of '86 to Katherine Graham of the Washington Post. He spent '87 gradually implementing them. In July of '87, he announced the lifting of martial law. That was quite a remarkable fact because martial law had been in existence ever since the Generalissimo had brought over his army and the civil servants and the rest fleeing from the communists. So, it had been in effect from '49 to the summer of '87 when Chiang Ching-kuo lifted it. It meant that a lot of cases that would ordinarily be tried in military courts would be tried in civilian courts. It was a great relief to many people. Military law was not accompanied by armed soldiers on every street corner or by tanks rumbling through the streets. I don't want to give that impression. Yet the courts could summarily sentence people who were brought before them, without what we would consider to be due process, for oppositionist activities, for gathering together in groups of more than twenty, for forming a political party or writing articles in magazines that were derogatory or against government policy. All of these things could be tried in military court, but with the lifting of martial law, that was no longer the case.

I think I established a good rapport with President Chiang. He used to send me messages before various actions would be made public. In the case of martial law, he told me when it was going to be lifted, a few months before. As in the case when he decided to allow old servicemen who hadn't been back to the mainland for something like forty years to go back and see their families. This was a major break in policy. He sent me a message, I think it was in the summer of '87, and he told me through his secretary, Ma Ying-Jeou, that he had decided, for humanitarian reasons, to lift the restriction on people traveling to the mainland so those old soldiers could go and see their families. Of course this was a major breakthrough in the relationship between Taipei and Beijing. He wasn't just telling me out of friendship; he wanted Washington to be informed about this major policy change so they were prepared for it and put it into their own calculations. Well, needless to say, Washington was very pleased about this development. Anything that would voluntarily reduce tensions between both sides was good. They were quite pleased; I told him the reaction I had gotten. He went ahead with this policy, I think in the fall, October or November. Subsequently, literally hundreds of thousands of people started traveling to the mainland. They forgot the distinction that it was supposed to be old soldiers, and everybody went. I think that as of this date something like thirteen million visits have been made from Taiwan to the mainland since 1987.

Q: Was there anything the other way?

DEAN: Very little, because Taiwan is still quite restrictive. They were frightened of a flood of visitors, and their security people are still quite tight. There were just tens of thousands who had come from the other way. I don't have a figure. I would guess it wouldn't be more than 70,000.

Q: How were the two Chinas communicating with each other?

DEAN: They communicated in all sorts of ways. There was a major defection for example. A China Airline pilot flying one of China Airlines planes, (I think it was a cargo plane if I am not mistaken), instead of coming back to Taipei from Southeast Asia, flew to White Cloud Airport in Canton, and he landed there. This was quite unusual because Taipei had been the recipient of many Chinese air force planes with pilots defecting. This was a case of a man who had serious debts and marital problems. There was a negotiation to release the plane. That was carried out between China Airline representatives who went to Hong Kong and the Airline Association in China, CAAC. The two negotiated for the release of the plane, and that went very smoothly. Other negotiations, like fisheries disputes, were just settled informally. Later on, through the Red Cross, if one fishing crew had been seized and taken ashore by one side or the other, or if storms had sent ashore fishing boats, they would help repair the boats, give the crew food and cigarettes and send them on their way. Both sides were doing this, so it wasn't a vicious type of confrontation. There were all sorts of unspoken rules. I think when the air patrols from the Taiwan side mistakenly went over some mainland territory, the mainland always kept their patrols the same distance away so they didn't converge and accidentally have combat between the two sides. They kept pretty careful track of what was going on. There were lots of people who came over on fishing boats from the mainland to get jobs in Taiwan. Tens of thousands of people at one time were working in the construction industry illegally because they could make in Taiwan in one month what it would take them a couple of years to make on the mainland, and they would send money home. Taiwan security was always picking these people up at construction sites and trying to deport them. That is where the Red Cross came in and tried to help handle the flow.

So, there was a lot of relationship back and forth, and something else that I didn't find out about until later, but about which I was curious. At one time President Chiang told me, I thought it was in the fall of '87, he had received a very courteous message from Deng Xiaoping. I said, "From Deng Xiaoping?" He said, "Yes, he wished us well on the Reversion day holiday, "which was the date the Japanese turned Taiwan back to China. I didn't think too much more of it, but then reflected on it later. It is likely that Lee Kwan Yew had been acting as a conduit back and forth between Chiang Ching-kuo and Deng Xiaoping, not necessarily negotiating but carrying messages back and forth hoping to reduce tensions between both sides and to increase understanding between both sides. That was pretty interesting. I think it will come out in Lee Kwan Yew's memoirs which are going to be published soon. Anyway, Chiang Ching-kuo kept a pretty careful eye on what was happening, on the mainland; on the oppositionists, who were now given permission to form opposition parties; on the military; on his own die-hard stalwarts in the upper ranks of the KMT, and the people. He had a very nice way of going around and consulting people and asking for their opinions, and trying to find out what their views were. Even if people disagreed with him and were unchinese enough to let him know, he still had given them the opportunity to express their views, so when a policy decision was taken, it did not come as a surprise. Instead it came as, "I knew he was going to do that," so they accepted it. The political reforms, the opening to the mainland, all of these major things, at least to Taiwan eyes, proceeded very smoothly and quite successfully. During the time I was there, I had opportunities to talk to him about his plans and these developments. I think our overall relationship was very good. He told me one time that he felt relations with the United States were better than they ever had been. This was interesting because he was referring back to quite a long period of time. Although the U.S. didn't have formal diplomatic relations, we really had quite friendly relations.

So, the U.S. relationship with Taiwan has thrived. Trade, for example, quadrupled. The visa activity at our American Institute in Taiwan had gone up from 40,000 in '78 to something like 130,000 in 1989, so all of our relationships had deepened, had become more meaningful, had become more valuable to both sides. The fact that Taiwan was fast becoming a democracy did make a difference. Before, everybody had admired Taiwan's economic progress, but now they were making a great deal of political progress. I think this gave Taiwan much more public support in the U.S. and Congressional support than if it had remained an autocracy. It changed the equation a great deal.

Q: Had Chiang Ching-kuo understood this?

DEAN: Yes, I think so. This was part of our discussion over the years from '79 onwards, that if they moved toward more political relaxation and more political participation, and in effect more democracy, that it would be the one thing that would really strengthen ties with the United States. I think he understood that very well. I think it was one of his motivations. Preserving stability, providing for the succession, and allowing the Taiwanese majority gradually to take over was part of his vision of the future. He was a very farsighted and intelligent man, and a very careful man. He wasn't a showy person at all. He wasn't the charismatic figure his father was. His father would come into a room, and everybody would pay attention. Chiang Ching-kuo just had a friendly, homely look. He talked to people in a very equal way. I think he never accumulated any money of his own, unlike Marcos or the Korean leaders or the Indonesians. When he died, the state had to take over paying for his wife's hospitalization and for a place for her to live, because he had left no funds. He wasn't a grasping, accumulating type of person. He was willing to share political power, which was a very interesting thing. Sadly, after I had only been there for a year, I went home for Christmas. It must have been at the end of '87, I went on consultations and took some Christmas leave, and before I got back, President Chiang passed away. He had suffered over some years from very serious diabetes, had a pacemaker, and other things wrong with him. His vision was going because of the diabetic problems. He had trouble standing up, and for the last few months, he had to be in a wheelchair. So he was in quite bad physical shape. He was working even from his bed until the very end.

Q: How did your office, I mean one of the games must have been what is going to happen after he leaves. What were you thinking about in terms of what happens?

DEAN: He had hand-selected Lee Teng-hui, a Taiwanese, as his Vice President. He had brought him up in many different roles: mayor, governor, Vice President. I thought there would be a constitutional succession. And since Chiang Ching-kuo had already gotten the political reforms started, I felt there was no going back on it. Some people in the Department and the INR felt the Taiwan military would not allow Chiang Ching-kuo's successor to have as much power as he had, or give him as much scope, they would circumscribe him. They thought that the stalwart higher ranks in the KMT would also not allow Lee Teng-hui to have as much power. I didn't believe that. I didn't believe that the military would intervene and try to control things. I didn't believe that the elders in the party would be able to do so against the forces of modernization. I was one of those who felt that Lee Teng-hui would inherit the power.

As it turned out, this was correct. I had gone back very hurriedly to Taiwan after President Chiang's death, in early 1988. First I had met with President Reagan and some of his advisors, Colin Powell and others, in the White House. I had a message to give to Chiang Ching-kuo, but Chiang Ching-kuo died, so we changed the message to Lee Teng-hui. I went back quite soon after Chiang Ching-kuo's death, I think in January. I called almost immediately on Lee Teng-hui at his home and gave him President Reagan's message, together with condolences. There was of course, a lot of infighting going on. Lee had been sworn in as president. But, Madame Chiang Kai-shek, who was in residence at Shih Lin, was trying to intervene in the chairmanship of the KMT party. She wanted the party elders to rotate the chairmanship until the July party congress. However, one of the young party functionaries, James Soong, sort of shamed the standing committee into voting for Lee Teng-hui for chairman because James Soong, who had been one of the private secretaries of CCK, said that the president had explicitly said that he wanted Lee Teng-hui to become chairman of the party as well as President. So, no one dared to intervene, and Lee Teng-hui was appointed chairman of the KMT. This gave him the two reins of power, and it prevented anyone else at that time from trying to usurp part of his authority. This put some of the old guard's noses out of joint, but eventually even they understood. Lee Teng-hui was really effective in promoting CCK's policies of political reform.

Q: CCK is...

DEAN: Chiang Ching-kuo. We always called him CCK. Anyway Lee Teng-hui was going along and the military supported him. There was an incident just at that time. The newspapers all had to treat this rather delicately, but the newspapers said that the Deputy Director of the Institute for Nuclear Research had disappeared, had left his post, and later was seen in the streets of the U.S., in Vienna, Virginia. Gradually the story came out that he had informed the U.S. about what Taiwan was trying to do in the nuclear weapons field. After considerable conversation and pressure from the U.S. side, Lee Teng-hui and his new government stated that they had no intention of producing nuclear weapons even though they had the capability of doing so. That chapter was awkward because the press claimed that the CIA had paid this deputy director for years, and he was a plant there, and he kept them informed of what was happening. Now just at this crucial time when Chiang Ching-kuo had died and Lee Teng-hui became the president, all of this story came out. It was a hot potato for Lee Teng-hui to handle, to say nothing of ourselves. He did very well by it, with dignity. I think he was caught by surprise, just as Truman might have been caught by surprise after Roosevelt's death about how far we had gone in this field. Lee agreed that Taiwan would not embark on this program and made sure that this was the case.

Q: It is obviously our policy not to have this happen, but here you are this private entity. What were you doing? Were you essentially getting instructions to weigh in heavily on this?

DEAN: Of course, oh, yes. This was part of the message I was carrying. There was no question about that. Even earlier we had gotten them to agree to send back to the U.S., and this is public information too, the spent fuel from their Canadian heavy water experimental reactor. One of the AIT agreements signed with Taiwan and reported to Congress was the agreement on the shipping of this spent fuel. Subsequently we shipped the other fuel rods and the whole plant back, the part of it that wasn't made inactive. Anyway, there was a great deal more to the story than this. I have given you a rundown of what appeared in the press, but it did cause a lot of ripples beneath the surface in Taiwan. One has to give credit to President Lee Teng-hui for being very firm against his own military and scientists and others in closing down the program.

Q: What was your responsibility? I mean we have besides the CIA, which we mentioned had rather close ties with Taiwan over the years, but we also had our military. I mean you name it; we have these, and here you are in this peculiar position of being a private corporation. Was your responsibility equivalent to that of being an Ambassador?

DEAN: We never really argued about the AIT director's authority. Everybody worked together. What we did really was the product of our office back in Washington and our office in Taipei. They were working together; they weren't working at cross purposes with each other. They understood our policy and they did their best to help carry it out. So we didn't have any arguments. I was given a lot of latitude on how I would carry out my duties, and I did it to the best of my ability using primarily the contacts which I already had. Some of them were very good indeed. We would have raised this issue with President Chiang Ching-kuo quite readily had he been alive. As it was, I had to raise it with President Lee. But I had known Lee Teng-hui for some time when he was mayor, when he was governor, and vice president, so I had known him for many years. We knew each other very well. When I was in Taipei, I invited him for Thanksgiving dinner along with his wife and some of his close staff. He'd invite me to his house. I had easy access to him anytime I wanted to see him or any time he wanted to see me, I was there. It wasn't that we were standoffish or at odds with each other. It was a period of time when Washington had built up very good relations, even though they were not diplomatic, with Taipei. At the same time, we had very good relations with the mainland. This was the period between, let's say, '82 and '89, before Tiananmen. So, there wasn't as much contention between Taipei and Beijing at that time. In fact, tensions across the Taiwan Strait were at the lowest they had been since 1949 and cross-Strait trade was rapidly growing.

Q: Were things pretty quiet on those offshore islands?

DEAN: Yes, things were quiet on the offshore islands. There was talk of reducing the troops there. As I mentioned to you, Chiang Ching-kuo was using Lee Kwan Yew as a bridge to the mainland. All sorts of people were traveling there, businessmen, investors, visitors. Factories were beginning to move over to Fujian. Before I get ahead of myself, I want to mention one of the things that Lee Teng-hui did. I was discussing with him Washington's concerns about the trade deficit. We had a trade deficit that year, 1987, with Taiwan, of 19.4 billion dollars. Just with a tiny little island, 250 miles long and 90 miles wide. That was a huge trade deficit. Washington was very exercised about it. The Treasury, Commerce, the State Department, all wanted to do something about it. So, I had several talks with President Lee. I was trying to get them to work out some form of timetable where they could bring down their trade surplus gradually. Finally in 1988, Rostenkowski and several other very prominent Congressmen came to visit. In the middle of the visit, President Lee drew out this plan from his coat pocket and said, "I worked this out myself". It was an outline of a trade action plan to reduce the deficit primarily by seeking new markets or expanding existing markets outside the U.S. and by importing more goods from the U.S. Lee said that he was going to give this plan to the various ministers involved and have them flesh it out and in two months time, they were to report back to Lee, concerning the plan's implementation. Well, it worked to a very large extent. Treasury at that time was pressing very hard to get Taiwan to appreciate its new Taiwan dollar. They pressed and pressed, and finally the pressure was so intense that Taiwan did change the value of its dollar and appreciated it from 40 to one to 28 to one. Treasury itself felt that this would be the best way of reducing our trade deficit. I'm not sure if that in itself did the trick. I personally think that diversifying markets and importing more U.S. goods was equally, if not more important, than forcing up the value of the NT dollar. In any case all of these things did happen and the trade deficit was reduced. In 1995, it was down to about nine billion dollars. However, it has been going up since then. At any rate that is a substantial reduction from the earlier 19.4 billion. So, we were quite active on that front. We were also active on the intellectual property rights front, all the copying of tape cassettes, CDs, and video cassettes, home movies everything.

Q: Computer program software.

DEAN: Everything you can think of.

Q: It exploded in that decade.

DEAN: It was a major problem for us. We had negotiation after negotiation trying to get Taiwan to draw up laws, pass them, and then enforce them against these abuses. They had all sorts of gimmicks. They had Henry Hsu, a businessman and a good friend of mine, who headed the businessman's campaign to stamp out piracy. He'd get a great big steamroller and run it over pirated video cassettes, things like that. The government was very much like the government on the mainland on these same issues. It was very difficult to get them to make any effective moves. They would agree, but then to enforce these decisions was very difficult. They had a lot of little storefront places where people could go and see rented videos for a very small amount of money. They were a bit like social clubs. You could bring in the whole family or a whole group. They were all showing pirated movies. There were thousands of them in every city. It was hard to close them all down. The police weren't willing to get into confrontations all the time with the people about these things. Every block seemed to have one of them. But, eventually they saw the light because they wanted to preserve copyrights for their own software. They were beginning to get into that in a big way, and they were getting into their own CDs and so on, so they wanted to protect their own. Stiffer laws were passed and the problem was brought down to manageable proportions, but it kept everybody busy going back and forth to negotiate. USTR would come out to Taiwan or Taiwan would send a group to Washington. Then we had problems about fisheries. We were trying to save certain species and also to outlaw the use of these huge mile and a half long drift nets that would catch everything in the sea. Taiwan had a large fishing fleet. They really didn't want to limit their efforts at catching fish; it was very lucrative. They would send these ships out. There would be a mother ship. They would put their catch on ice. It was very profitable. They were fishing in waters they weren't supposed to be fishing in and all sorts of things. We wanted an agreement where our Coast Guard and other search vessels could board their vessels and see if they had made any illegal catch. They claimed this was an infringement on their sovereignty. There were demonstrations and arguments on the radio and in the universities about this effort to curtail their sovereignty. We had a lot of speeches, debates, conversations about issues like that, too. It was quite an active period with all these things going on. I think we solved them reasonably. We did persuade the Chinese about the fisheries issues, and they did pass laws allowing their ships to be boarded. We did persuade them on the intellectual property rights. We did persuade them on the value of the NT Dollar and other trade issues. Sometimes they would complain that they felt behind the eight ball because of our military sales and other things, they relied on us so much that they had to do what we asked in these other areas. I think they protected their own interests as well as anybody could have regardless of this dependency. Certainly when we brought up an issue, they didn't say right away we will go and do it. It took years of argument, negotiation, and persuasion to get them to agree. They were very similar with negotiations we had with the mainland on similar subjects.

Q: Was there much contact between your office and the Peking Embassy?

DEAN: Not a great deal. Most of the things we were dealing with, although they had policy implications, were not explicitly Taipei-Washington-Beijing relations. Things were quite calm during that period on both sides of the Strait. The American Embassy wasn't complaining about what Taiwan was doing, and Beijing wasn't complaining about it either. Things were fairly, I don't like to say harmonious, but without crises such as we had later on. That period which one looks back on with a certain amount of calmness came to an abrupt halt in 1989 on June 4, when the Chinese military used weapons and tanks to drive the protesting students out of Tiananmen.

Q: Were you in Taiwan?

DEAN: Yes, I was in Taiwan then.

Q: We'll come back to that, but before we get to that, what about the military equation? Were military sales, training of troops, some of the issues you would get involved with?

DEAN: Yes, all of them I had very close relations with General Hau Pei-tsun, who was the equivalent to the chairman of our joint chiefs of staff, and all of his top military commanders. I met with them regularly. I had known them for some years. I had not agreed with Washington that General Hau might try to usurp power after President Chiang died. I thought of him as a loyal and good soldier who would obey commands. He later became premier. At any rate, I felt that he was loyal to his government and his constitution. It may well be that he had earlier conversations with President Chiang Ching-kuo, and Chiang Ching-kuo let him know how strongly he felt about the necessity of protecting the government and the constitution. I think the military cooperated with us. There were five points, if I can remember them. They said that they would play everything in low key. They would not have publicity about the arms sales. They would have patience, persistence and preserve the confidentiality of these sales. Of course, we had to report them to Congress, so eventually they all got out, but Taiwan's military weren't blowing them up out of proportion in their press, and they weren't writing press articles about the annual talks we had with them in Washington on military arms sales, where decisions were made about what types of weapons and what quantities of weapons would be sold. They seemed to be willing to work within the confines of the relationship. We had a small retired military component in our Taipei office. They kept in touch with the Taiwan military quite well, one for each service. We weren't having trouble with the military. The former political oppositionists or dissidents had now become a growing legal political party. There were other parties too. We had very direct interaction with them, carrying on the ones we had before. Things were not going badly at all in terms of U.S.-Taiwan relations. It is true they were unofficial, but you would never know it, except by the fact we didn't fly a flag outside of our office, and they didn't fly a flag outside of their office here. Their representatives here were seeing virtually anybody they wanted to see. They couldn't go into the State Department or the National Security Council, but they saw some of these people outside of these buildings. They saw others, congressmen, senators, State Department people. They seemed to be forging ahead, and we seemed to be doing the same in Taipei, and Beijing was not objecting. We were playing things in low key. We agreed to play things in low key, particularly the military issues, and the government was playing things in low key with us, too. It was only later, some time after I left, that we had problems. We will get into that later.

Q: What about whatever passed for the diplomatic corps? Did they cause problems?

DEAN: The Taiwan government kept on trying to push us in with the diplomatic corps, but I just didn't go to any national days. I didn't go to any diplomatic events. I had a few friends, of course. The Japanese director of their unofficial office established in 1972, the Interchange Association as they called it, had been the former DCM for the Japanese Embassy in Taipei when I was in our Embassy. We were close friends. He had worked with my brother in Prague and we were together in Hong Kong, so we had known each other for a long time. We saw each other frequently. Mostly we would have a private supper or he would come to my office or I would go to his office and we would talk about things. If there was a dinner party, which we had occasionally, too, we couldn't talk as much. The Japanese had very close relations with the Taiwanese businessmen and with the oppositionist businessmen or oppositionist party, but also with the KMT. Mr. Hara was an unusually well informed, well plugged in person, an excellent representative. The others diplomats I didn't cultivate. It was a great relief not going to national days.

Q: I was just going to say it was a load going to diplomatic receptions. It is not exactly a punishment.

DEAN: No, it is not a question of not being allowed. They would have been delighted if we had gone there. The Chinese on Taiwan were trying to encourage the impression that our office was the same as the other embassies. But I didn't go because I didn't have to go and it saved a-lot of time. I didn't have to go to the airport whenever the foreign minister came in or went out. I didn't have to go to all the national day functions. I have been to those in many other places. They are really time consuming. Instead, I could see some American businessmen or invite some Chinese officials whom we really wanted to influence to dinner or to a luncheon. I must have had a luncheon every single day, usually with just one person or possibly two. I would meet at breakfast every single day, normally with groups, and certainly dinner every night, receptions for business leaders and others. There were a fair number of congressional delegations that came through in spite of our break in diplomatic relations. They were always welcomed by the Chinese and called on the President and everybody else. Usually, we would go along if the delegation wanted us to, and we briefed them all beforehand, business delegations, congressional delegations, other types of visiting delegations, scholarly groups like the Stanford Business School, the Whiffinpoofs, everything you can think of. Anyway, I think we had a very good office with excellent hard-working qualified personnel. We tried to bring the language students from the school we had moved from Taichung up closer to Taipei into some of these events also. All in all it was a very busy time. I was busy; my wife Mary was even busier than I was. It is difficult in the Foreign Service today. Yesteryear everybody sort of rallied around and all the wives helped a lot, but now that is sort of old-fashioned.

Q: How did Tiananmen Square hit you all?

DEAN: Well, it's very interesting. The Chinese on Taiwan were shocked by it like everybody else and dismayed by it like everybody else and they were disappointed by it, but they weren't really taken by surprise like we were. Because they knew through harsh experience that the communists would use force to preserve their power and to knock down dissent. They expected them to use force to do this, so when they did, it wasn't the same as in the U.S. where we thought that Humpty-Dumpty had fallen off the wall and it was the end of the world. There was only a brief pause in Taiwan before they resumed their increasing number of visits to the mainland. Increasing numbers of factories moved over to the mainland to establish themselves there, and increasing investments. There was an enormous amount of that type of activity going on in spite of Tiananmen; whereas, we froze our relationship with the mainland. It was a very different sort of reaction. I think our reaction was vastly overblown, partially because of our own analysts and academicians earlier were acting as though Deng Xiaoping was a reformer and not a communist, you see. They thought reforms were heading toward a bright blue democracy in the future.

Q: I would have thought there would have been a lot of speculation just as an outsider knowing nothing about China, I found myself wondering what the hell is happening in China, not because of the crackdown because that seemed inevitable, but the fact they allowed this thing to fester on and on.

DEAN: Of course. That's because there was serious argument within the high command in China itself, in Beijing. There were arguments on how to cope with it. If they had just dragged the students out of the square and put them on busses and sent them back to the university shortly after the very beginning, that would have ended it. Or if they could have left them in the square to bake in the hot sun of the summer. Believe me, Beijing in the summer is really hot, and if they had forbidden the townspeople to bring them food and water, they would have baked them out. But to use the troops was a crazy demonstration of power. I think they were worried the protest would spread, and it did, to Shanghai and some of the other cities, and they were afraid they'd lose control. That is the worst thing they could think of, that chaos would spread over the land, so they were really up tight. But in Taiwan, I think the harder heads thought that they would use force.

Q: Among your Chinese friends on Taiwan, was there much debate about what's going to happen, because this did not happen all of a sudden; it was a rather long drawn out affair.

DEAN: It was a matter of a few months you see. The thing is the press and TV revealed these developments to every one because just before Tiananmen, just before the students went in to Tiananmen to protest and to stay, Taiwan's Minister of Finance Shirley Kuo led an Asian Development Bank delegation to Beijing where the annual meeting was being held, along with about 100 TV and newspaper men from Taiwan, because this was the first time a minister from Taiwan had ever gone to the mainland since 1949. It was a big event.

These newspeople stayed on to film what was happening in Tiananmen Square. Then came Gorbachev making the Chinese face fall even more. Then the argument built up within the top leadership. When you have arguments like that in the top leadership, they are not always evident at the time to people who are on the fringes of Tiananmen Square watching what was going on. But it was very clear that Zhao Zeyang, the Chinese premier, tried to get some agreement with the students and was prevented from doing so because Li Peng and other hard-liners felt it was giving in. It is also clear in the final analysis that Deng Xiaoping was responsible for ordering the army in. If Zhao Zeyang had been able to get an agreement with the students and had kept his position as premier (at least he wasn't a far right communist, he was more toward the center), then China might have moved much more rapidly and the relationship with the U.S. might have blossomed. They might have avoided Tiananmen and made progress toward a different type of society. Sadly, that didn't happen.

Q: Was there a certain amount of shock on the part of the Taiwanese seeing the United States being so disappointed in what happened?

DEAN: They would say something like this, that the U.S. didn't realize the true nature of the communists and now they are seeing it for themselves. We knew it all along. We weren't taken aback by this. We knew they would do something like this whereas the U.S. foolishly thinks they can get a nice chummy relationship, and they don't take the nature of the communist beast into effect. The leopard never changes its spots, that type of argument. The whole point is Taiwan, after a momentary pause, continued to build up its investments, its trade, its visits to the mainland. It went on until 1995 when President Lee made his well-publicized visit to Cornell. Then the Chinese on the mainland went up like a rocket. It wasn't just the visit.

The visit had been preceded by a series of moves by Taiwan. In the early part of the Clinton administration, the administration was paying much more attention to domestic policies. They really weren't paying any attention to Taiwan although they had set in motion the Taiwan policy review, which took a year and a half to come out, and it produced very little. The U.S. also wasn't paying attention to the mainland. Washington was busy focusing on domestic affairs or Bosnia, but not on China, so President Lee felt himself deserted by the U.S. or ignored. Therefore, instead of maintaining the low key foreign policy which had been so productive, he decided to embark on a new high visibility policy which he called pragmatic diplomacy. He went down to Southeast Asia to play golf with heads of state. He made more visits abroad to countries that did recognize Taiwan, especially in Central America. Taiwan was pressing very hard to be the host of the Asian Games. President Lee was pressing very hard to be invited as a head of state to the APEC meetings, that President Clinton had elevated to head of state meetings. He wasn't able to do any of these things. He didn't get the Olympic nod, didn't get invited to the APEC meetings, so had to send his economic minister. Then he coopted the oppositionist party's program of rejoining the UN, and he tried to get the 29 countries that had diplomatic relations with Taiwan to raise the issue of Taiwan before the UN rules committee, to get it on the agenda, but he was unsuccessful. Finally, President Lee's 1995 visit to the U.S. was for the same reason, to raise Taiwan's international visibility and persona and to persuade the U.S. and other countries that Taiwan had a right to international representation, as much right as most of the members of the UN. All of this activity just infuriated the mainland and finally the trip to Cornell set them off. We had assured Beijing that Lee Teng-hui would not come to the U.S. Secretary Christopher had told Foreign Minister Chien that, "No, we will not permit Lee Teng-hui to come." Our Embassy in Beijing had told the Foreign Ministry, No, he will not come. We understand your concerns." So at the very last minute Congress voted overwhelmingly to welcome him, I think with only one exception, and President Clinton changed his mind. The Chinese reacted by withdrawing their Ambassador. They embarked on a series of military exercises, surface to surface missile firing and live firing exercises in the Strait. They vilified Lee Teng-hui. They broke off the cross-Strait talks that had been started in 1993 between an unofficial entity from Taiwan and an unofficial entity from the mainland, copying our own model. They broke those talks off, and things were really at a hiatus. They got worse, because they kept on claiming that Lee Teng-hui was a secret sympathizer of Taiwan independence and he really wasn't for unification, even though he said that was the government's policy. Finally in an effort to drive home their opposition to Taiwan independence, the Chinese embarked on another huge scale military exercise in the Taiwan Strait in the early part of March '96, just before Lee Teng-hui's election for president, which he subsequently won, partially because of these exercises. The Chinese fired missiles over Taiwan very close to the port of Keelung and then short of the port, so they were bracketing Taiwan with these missiles fired from the mainland. Then they had huge exercises in the vicinity of the offshore islands of Matsu and Quemoy. Things were very tense. We dispatched two carrier groups to the waters near Taiwan. You might think this was a plus for President Lee, but it didn't turn out to be. Because of this crisis, high level attention was finally given to China policy, and the administration made a deliberate effort to improve relations with China. This resulted in Jiang Zemin's visit in October of '97, and it resulted in President Clinton's visit to China in the end of June this year, '98. I think in retrospect you have to think that President Lee's visit to Cornell and the high visibility foreign policy and the activity in the Strait has been a turning point in improving U.S.-China relations rather than putting those to one side and improving relations with Taiwan. We don't know where the future is going to lead us, but at any rate, let me get back to '89 and talking about Taiwan's reaction to Tiananmen. We were certainly talking to the Chinese on Taiwan about that. They acted in a much cooler and rational way than we did. Eventually my tour ended in December of that year. I had been in Taipei from early 1987 until the end of 1989. President Lee asked me four different times to stay, but I did not relay his request to the Department. The Department doesn't like personal requests like that and I knew it, so I said I couldn't. I was getting old and had to leave. Of course he is a couple of years older than I am, so he kept on asking me to stay.

MCKINNEY RUSSELL
Public Affairs Officer, USIS
Beijing (1987-1991)

McKinney Russell was born in New York, New York in 1929. He graduated from Yale University in 1950 and served overseas in the U.S. Army from 1951-1953. Mr. Russell's career included positions in Germany, the Congo, the Soviet Union, Brazil, Spain, and China. He was interviewed on May 10, 1997 by G. Lewis Schmidt.

Q: How did you find Beijing at that time? Was it still pretty closed, or...?

RUSSELL: It was closed, but it was open in a lot of interesting ways. There was always in existence a Fulbright program under which the Chinese accepted 25 American professors to teach in their universities. Also, there were a lot of academic interchanges between China and the United States. The Chinese had at that time about 20,000 students studying here. Unlike the Soviet Union, the Chinese had always felt that they gained more for letting their young people study here. After the end of the Cultural Revolution in the mid-'60s, there was a big explosion in travel abroad by Chinese students. The Chinese diaspora is very important, you know. If you're Chinese living in San Francisco and your grandnephew is a bright kid of 18 or 19 who wants to come to study in California, you come up with the money and he can get an exit visa, and can go abroad to study. The academic side of things was quite important.

The notion of being able to have real outreach in China was steadily growing. Until the crackdown in June 1989, the Chinese Government had been more and more open to expanding relationships with the United States. It was quite surprising. The Chinese Academy of Social Sciences, for example, invited me to give a series of talks about the American elections which were coming in the fall of 1988. It looked as if we were going to be able to open cultural centers, and sure enough, we were able to open the first one in Guangzhou (Canton) in the south, about a year after I arrived. I made several trips down there to find and negotiate for a location, because it seemed to us exceedingly important in China that there be access in the major cities to American books and ideas, films and television, and speakers, and so on. During the time that I was there, we opened up a cultural center in Guangzhou and one in Shanghai for the first time, and we were set for the opening in Beijing about 6 months after I left.

The China years were very sharply marked by the events at Tiananmen Square because many hopeful things fell apart in its wake. The day before the students started marching, the Ambassador had signed the agreement to bring the Peace Corps to China, on April 14, 1989, and the students started marching on April 15. For the next 6 weeks, it got bigger and bigger by the day. I used to go most days, afternoon or evening, down to the Square to talk and to listen and to find out what was happening.

In the middle of May took place the most interesting political time in my career, because Gorbachev came to make party peace with the Chinese on May 15. He was in meetings with the Chinese at the same time that the demonstrations and the excitement grew bigger and louder and louder and bigger. You had this double story going on at the same time, and Gorbachev had brought with him a tremendous journalist corps. Hundreds of people came with him and once they were there, they didn't leave because of the unfolding story of pro-democracy demonstrations. We were very, very much involved in that, in organizing briefings for journalists when the crackdown came. There was a period of 4 or 5 days when the Ambassador and I were there, practically the whole time, exposed to the press, dealing with the students, getting Americans out of the country, arranging for the families to leave. It was a very intense time.

Once that had passed, in the fall of '89 and in the fall of '90, I had two very interesting experiences because I could spend more time outside China because so many of our programs had stopped short or cut back. There was no Fulbright program, for example, for a whole year. My wife and I made a very interesting foray into Mongolia in the fall of 1989. We went for a week by train from Beijing. 42 hours. It was a marvelous trip. I had set the task of finding out what a future USIS in Mongolia would look like. I did an analysis of the university, the cultural scene, the media. I found it interesting and it was helpful when shortly thereafter democracy did come to Mongolia and so did a U.S. Embassy and a USIS. We have a PAO there now who is very active. Back then, it was a great fun to be the first officer to go and talk to people to find out what opportunities there would be for us when it did open.

Q: Did you find in Mongolia considerably greater openness than there was in China itself?

RUSSELL: Oh, yes! It was already changing rapidly and in December of that year, for reasons that I don't recall exactly now, there was a kind of backing away from power on the part of the communist party that had been in charge. Great pressure was brought up for changes and they happened very rapidly. The following fall, 1990, we made a similar trip to Tibet to assess the prospects for USIS activities there. Those two fall trips were extremely interesting for both of us, especially since my wife and I could make them together.

Q: Did you get any reaction from the Chinese on your Tibet effort?

RUSSELL: They were very careful but not overtly suspicious. We had to get clearances from fairly high up, I assume, and I had to be careful about who I talked to. As a result of it, the trip we were able to set things up so that we were from time to time able to send speakers and others into Tibet. In China, at the time that I was there, we had 4 branch posts, Chengdu in the far west on the way to Tibet, Guangzhou or Canton in the south, Shanghai on the eastern coast, and Shenyang (which used to be called Mukden when we were kids) up in Manchuria. We had Americans in charge in all four places.

Q: I went to Mukden when young, in 1938.

RUSSELL: It's still an interesting place. I am sorry I never got farther north. I made 3 or 4 trips to Shenyang, but I didn't get up closer to the border. In any case, early in 1991, I had an urgent call from Gene Kopp. My tour was going to end that summer, and he said that he wanted me very much to come back and take over as Counselor of the Agency. Mike Pistor, at that time, had been on the job for 2 years, and was in line for an Ambassadorial post in Africa. He had been offered and he wanted to take on Malawi. So we left China a little early, probably 3 months in advance, in March of 1991, and I came back and took over as...

Q: Who was the Ambassador in China?

RUSSELL: Very interesting and contrasting individuals. The first two years it was Winston Lord and the second 2 years it was James Lilley.

JAMES A. LAROCCO
Economic Minister-Counselor
Beijing (1988-1990)

Ambassador James LaRocco was born in Evanston, Illinois in 1948. He graduated from the University of Portland and holds a master's degree from the School of Advanced International Studies at Johns Hopkins University. He joined the Foreign Service in 1973 and has served in Jeddah, Cairo, Kuwait, Beijing, Tel Aviv, and as Ambassador to Kuwait. Ambassador LaRocco was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2011.

Q: You were in Beijing from when to when?

LAROCCO: From July of 1988 to July of 2000. I served there as the Minister-Counselor for Economic Affairs.

Q: What was the situation when you arrived?

LAROCCO: At the time of my arrival, Deng Xiao Ping had presided over ten years of reforms and these reforms were starting to bear fruit. The economy was beyond take off and moving at a startling pace. I found myself in charge of an economic section far larger than any in the Middle East. We had 12 of us. What an extraordinary group of people. It was truly an honor to lead such a group, almost every single one of whom had more experience in that region than I did. I approached my job with confidence, determination and high expectations for all of us, but I also had the humility of a newcomer.

I would stand our reporting during those two years against any other post's reporting at any period. From a bold, comprehensive energy report that forecast China's situation and outlook for the first time, to nothing-held-back labor reporting that required the highest standards of diplomatic contact and reporting skills, to reporting on China's financial situation, myriad trade issues, intellectual property rights...the list goes on and on and on.

The report that stands out above all others, however, is the one I am most proud of. We all came together to produce a report that forecast what America's trade deficit would be with China in the ten years ahead. Now...keep in mind that when we wrote this report, our annual trade deficit was only $2 billion. As you might imagine, this drew scant attention in Washington. In our report, we presented a chart projecting annual deficits over the next ten years, with our trade gap surpassing $100 billion, a 50-fold increase. The shock in Washington was profound, with many dismissing our report as sheer fantasy. But some were deeply disturbed, recognizing the financial, economic, job-related, investment and technology concerns.

For our record of reporting and analysis, we received a group Superior Honor Award. I cherish that award more than any others I received in my career.

Another "honor" that I cherished almost as much as that award involved our Post Inspection by a team from the Inspector General's office. As part of the inspection, each section of the embassy was asked to rate other sections. The inspectors, conveying their final conclusions, told me that our section received nothing but perfect 10's from every officer in Beijing. They had never encountered anything close to this. They themselves found the work of our team outstanding without any exceptions; all our officers were first rate, we worked closely with all the other sections in the mission as well as the consulates, and our work as one team was seamless.

Our team also was constantly engaged in negotiations on a variety of issues. The most important and high profile were talks related to China's accession to the GATT, now called the World Trade Organization (WTO).

Q: The Global Trade Organization.

LAROCCO: Exactly. The 'General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade' it was called then. I'm not sure whether it ever became public knowledge, but we actually reached an agreement with the Chinese. Timing, however, could not have been worse. The talks took place during the period known as the Beijing Spring, and an agreement in principle was initialed in the study of my apartment in the area of Beijing known as San Li Tun. The day after the agreement was initialed, we were scheduled to meet again at the Ministry of Foreign Relations and Trade, not far from Tiananmen Square. We never got there. The demonstrators had come out in force and the roads were blocked. Buses were burning and it was clear that the situation was rapidly deteriorating. We turned our vehicle around, swung by the airport and got the U.S. team out on the first plane available. Because of the impact of Tiananmen on our bilateral relations, those talks did not resume until well after I departed Beijing. That agreement, painstakingly reached, sat on the shelf.

Q: Let's stick to the trade thing. What were we after, what could we do about this growing trade disadvantage and all?

LAROCCO: That was all contained in the agreement. It was a very elaborate agreement that required them to obey the rules of the GATT/WTO, that there would be dispute resolution, that they would adopt a clear commercial law, that they would adopt all kinds of transparent, enforceable and enforced regulations and procedures that are consistent with standard international practice. This was truly far reaching for a nation not governed by the rule of law.

It represented, in my view, a dagger in the heart to Communism as an economic philosophy if carried out. I am sure the Chinese understood this, but saw this as the key to a bright future. Communism as ideology was already something from the past for so many Chinese.

Whether or not they would actually carry out what they promised is another matter, but it laid the framework for what I thought to be an effective transition period. There was also a grace period, recognizing that you can't just turn around a massive aircraft carrier like China overnight, and there was sequencing and a timeline that was a part of this agreement, basically a ten year transition period which I thought was reasonable. All this, nonetheless, would require some very difficult, bold and risky decisions on the part of the Chinese leadership.

Q: Who was the ambassador while you were there?

LAROCCO: Winston Lord was my first ambassador. He left as Beijing Spring unfolded, and was replaced by Jim Lilley. These were very, very different people with markedly different backgrounds. They were both an honor to work for.

Q: I had a very long interview with both Winston and with Jim Lilley.

LAROCCO: They were two of the best ambassadors I ever served, two of the most different people I ever served, both wonderful bosses, incredibly bright, very, very different styles, totally different experiences. Winston Pillsbury Lord was an heir to a fortune and was classic upper class, intellectual, best and brightest, who chose public service as truly a service. He did not need to work, but he did so with a clear view to serving his country. As you know, earlier in his career, when I was on my first assignment, he made a name for himself as Kissinger's policy planner. He was the youngest person in the inner circle by far, but his intellect was recognized early on and throughout his career.

To be frank, many if not most of the embassy staff found him aloof, hard to relate to and not particularly engaged with embassy and staff. He was, in all honesty, operating on a different plane of existence than the rest of us. And his wife, Bette Bao Lord, was a star in the limelight even more than he was.

He was a sports buff, however, and this provided some common ground with him for a number of us in the embassy.

One story in this regard: it was the time of the Olympics in South Korea, and Lord did not want to miss some key events which were shown on TV. One evening, he hosted at his residence a dinner party with 180 guests, with the guests of honor a visiting American group of young business leaders.

The dinner went on, and at one point, I was called away from my table to see the ambassador. I was escorted upstairs, and there he was in front of the TV. I was incredulous. Mr. Ambassador, I commented, I can't believe you're up here. I have seen you present downstairs throughout the dinner. Did you just come up here now?

He said no...he had been upstairs watching the Olympics all evening. He said his trick was not to have a head table and not to seat himself anywhere. During breaks in the action, he would come downstairs and circulate throughout the area, greeting guests, doing grip and grins, offering toasts. Everyone, including myself, thought he was sitting somewhere out of our line of vision. It worked. The dinner party was a complete success, everyone was happy, and Lord did not miss the Olympics prime time action.

Q: My interview with him went beautifully. How did you find his wife, Bette Bao Lord?

LAROCCO: She wrote Spring Moon. She was brilliant.

I must confess that one of the things I enjoyed the most in my foreign service career was when an embassy put on a major representational event. Betty Bao wrote the book on unforgettable events, and I observed her at work carefully, learning as much as I could.

When she laid the plans for the celebration of the 10th anniversary of U.S-Chinese bilateral relations, most of the people in the embassy were aghast. It sounded like Barnum and Bailey meet Kung Fu Panda. Hardly the stuff of professional diplomats. I was enchanted. People dressed in panda outfits danced in procession to kick off the events, there was a ping pong match involving the ambassador and foreign minister, a professional Chinese ping pong player and me. I volunteered, never afraid to embarrass myself. That was the point. The Chinese were meant to win. Again...it was the image. A lot of people thought we were crazy. It was a smashing success.

This event paled in comparison, however, to what I consider the best single public event overseas I was ever involved in. Under the leadership of one of the best USIS officers I ever met, McKinney Russell, the grand ballroom of Beijing's only first class hotel at the time, The Great Wall Sheraton, was furnished with giant screens for the Presidential and general election of 1988. The event ran around the clock, and thousands upon thousands of Chinese, eager to witness democracy in action, arrived to be handed a sample ballot and a folder in which they could follow the election as it was being tallied. I cannot describe the look of wonderment and excitement in their eyes. They were tasting democracy and they loved it. To this day, I am convinced that this one event was an important spark in the Beijing Spring that followed not long afterward.

Another spark was something my wife and I talk about to this day: the staging of "The Caine Mutiny" in Beijing. Think about that plot: mutiny against authority. Chinese flocked to see it, glued to the dialogue and the plot. You could see how troubled and uncomfortable they were by the play as they filed out in silence. But their wheels were clearly spinning. This was exposure to the world of ideas outside their comfort zone. And they liked it.

I was particularly grateful to Winston Lord, because only two weeks after my arrival in Beijing, and despite the fact that I was a newcomer to the region, he appointed me in charge of the annual conference of key officers at China posts: Beijing, Shanghai, Guangzhou, Shenyang, Chengdu, with participation by Hong Kong, which was an independent mission at that time. I was stunned and honored. I recall walking into the conference room facing more than 200 years of China experience, me with only two weeks. I sat at the head of the table, welcomed everyone on behalf of the ambassador, and introduced the topics for discussion. It was a baptism of fire, and oh so useful for me for the rest of my tour. I got to know all the key officers, a good share of the best Sinologists in the business at that time, and they all knew that I was blessed by the ambassador. When an ambassador has your back, you have instant credibility. I was in the China Club, thanks to Winston Lord.

Q: Was there any transference between your Arabic experience, your experience in the Arab world and China?

LAROCCO: Only on a personal basis, not on a professional basis. In those days China had absolutely no interest in the Middle East. Even their oil relationship was still kind of a budding relationship. Arabs to them were just completely alien so it was personal.

But just like in Kuwait, I decided to do a project. While I was studying Chinese, I had written a monograph on “Muslims in China” (zai Zhongguo de huajiaotu). I had been surprised how little had been written about the estimated 40 million Muslims in China, and I decided to do some first-hand research during my tour. My interest was handsomely rewarded, as from Guangzhou to Xian to the far western reaches of China, Muslims had been present for over a thousand years. I encountered some beautiful mosques, Qurans and other representations of their religion. But most fascinating to me was the mixture of Arabic and Chinese calligraphy. Two of the greatest calligraphic traditions and arts came together in Xian. I was in awe.

Q: Was the Chinese leadership as opaque as the Soviet one had been?

LAROCCO: Yes. I developed an appreciation of why so many of the Sinologists were regarded as tea leaf readers. They had to micro analyze every statement that was made, every movement of one official from here to there. It was extremely opaque.

We had some brilliant analysts in the political section in those days, including the legendary Don Keyser. They were so steeped in the intricacies of Chinese leadership dynamics that I marveled whenever they spoke or wrote. They could take one event or movement of seemingly a minor official and come up with all kinds of implications.

Don was trained in the CIA, and he never gave up his love of his manual typewriter. He rarely spoke, so we all had to wait patiently for his think pieces to emerge. He would sit down at that typewriter and pound out a 40-page piece of analysis at one sitting. I never encountered anything like that in my Foreign Service experience.

The ambassador and DCM left Don alone to do his work. No one would dare bother Don when he was absorbed with his thinking or writing. On the interpersonal side, Don was challenged, and I have always lectured young officers that this skill set is the most important in the Foreign Service. It was Don’s interpersonal deficiencies that eventually stopped any rise in the ranks of one of our finest analysts.

I always chuckle when I recall the annual reporting requirement, which in those days was worldwide, of identifying young, up and coming leaders. It was a mission-wide exercise, and our internal specialist, Lauren Moriarty, made some valuable contributions. I chuckle because in those days, young and up and coming in China meant leaders in their 70s and even in their 80s. I think the youngest on our list was 59. That was China back then.

So yes, it was extremely opaque. There were lots of educated guesses as to what was going on in the hidden chambers of governance. There was no way to become a serious educated guesser without decades of trying to decipher this puzzle. So I kept my mouth shut and read what others wrote. It reminded me of when I was a first tour officer in Jeddah and each weekend, we would go offshore to scuba or skin dive in the Red Sea, anchoring at a reef perhaps 10 miles out.

I recall the first time I went shelling, that is looking for shells. I searched and searched for hours and came back to the boat each time with nothing. Our ambassador, Jim Akins, was an experienced sheller, and would finish each dive with bags of marvelous shells. It took me a full year of shelling before I instinctively knew which rock to turn over to find the beautiful cowries, which coral to look behind to find the spider conches. You simply had to have the experience. This was clearly the case in analyzing Chinese leadership dynamics.

There are so many similar examples throughout the world: experience matters. This is why I believe so strongly in a professional foreign service in which regional experience is melded with the experience of tradecraft. There is no substitute for this experience and skills, no short cuts. We deny this reality at our own peril as a country.

Q: How did you find relationships with Chinese officials as contrasted say with Arab officials?

LAROCCO: There is no comparison. Arabs are accustomed to dealing with every type of human being. They dwell at a crossroads of world culture and they themselves have the blood of just about every race flowing through the veins. They have survived these millenniums by their social skills, and moving into the Arab culture is so easy it can be off-putting for more introspective Americans. The first time you meet them they not only ask every possible question about you and your family, but even such things totally off limits in conversations between Americans like how much money do you make. They don't care about our way of measuring a person: education, job experience, etc. They dive deep into your being, your heritage, your family, your beliefs...right to the core of your soul. It can be discomfiting to many Americans, and I would estimate that at least 50 percent of embassy personnel at each of the posts I served at in the Arab world avoided contact with Arabs as much as possible.

Before going to my first overseas post, I received excellent area orientation on Arab culture, including learning appropriate answers to the inevitable question, "Why have you not embraced Islam?" The two acceptable answers are: "My father is Roman Catholic, and I cannot dishonor my father." I found most Muslims seem to consider Roman Catholicism legitimate and orthodox, true People of the Book, although not true believers. At the same time, their respect for fathers is well known. The other acceptable answer is: "when Allah chooses to call me..." They are disarmed by this response, because there simply is no rejoinder. It is not for any human to second guess God.

It was very different with Chinese in those days. There was a huge wall, not even a glass ceiling, more like cement Great Wall that I could not get past, blocking more than an acquaintance relationship with any Chinese. This was one of the reasons I actually was relieved and happy to leave China and go back to the Middle East, where all races and colors are accepted. If you didn't look Chinese or have their habits, you were a barbarian or a foreign devil (or better put, ghost. You simply aren't real.)

It was hard enough to talk to them, even in Beijing in those days, because they simply could not accept that this big nose, hairy foreigner could speak their language. I recall going into the Beijing Friendship Store, not far from Tiananmen, and noticed that they had Mao Tai on the shelf. That's their high end liqueur. One never knew what would be available in the Friendship Store. I went to the counter and said in slow, clear and I'm sure totally understandable Mandarin, "I would like to buy two bottles of Mao Tai." The lady gaped at me. I repeated my line. She just stared. After a long pause, she found another lady and I could hear her say to the other, "I think that big nosed foreigner said to me, I want to buy Mao Tai. Can you believe that?" They both stared at me, and then walked away. I ran after her and asked again. In exasperation, she replied that they didn't have any. I pointed to the bottles on the shelf; she stared back at me, and responded again that they didn't have any. I left in total frustration, but this wasn't the only time something like this happened.

Beijing was beginning to be accustomed to foreigners in those days, but the hinterland was not. I recall that I made the mistake of wearing shorts when I went biking in south China with a friend. We were cycling through the city to get to the White Mountains. When we stopped at a red light, a young Chinese came up to me and plucked a hair off my leg. Ouch! I cried. He just stood there staring at the hair on my legs. He was incredulous. I never wore shorts ever again in China, regardless of how hot it was. Even in Nanjing, a very large city, I found myself looking at a store front window. When I turned around, I saw a large group of peasants, obviously in from the countryside, gathered and staring at me. I am sure they talked about this strange being as the highlight of their day in the big city. I wonder where they thought I came from. China has leaped forward from their isolation as the Middle Kingdom, although I imagine there are still huge rural areas of China that have not seen many foreigners.

My professional relationships were excellent, and I found the Chinese easy to deal with during negotiations. I once asked a Chinese official, who understood foreign culture well and had a good comprehension of English why this was. He said there is an old Chinese proverb: one Chinese is a dragon, three Chinese are a mosquito. The second part of the proverb is that one Japanese is a mosquito, three Japanese are a dragon. The message here is obvious, he said. Despite what you may think, we Chinese are individualists, like you. Bring us together and we have to settle for the lowest common denominator. The Japanese, in contrast, are impossible to negotiate with except when you get them alone.

Speaking of the Chinese as a people, one of the most memorable events I had during my assignment to China was when Jim Lilley asked me to join him for a special evening with Armand Hammer, arguably the most high profile interlocutor between the West and the Communist world for half a century. He was in Beijing and was being feted by the Chinese leadership. Only Jim and I were allowed to join. The small banquet and entertainment, a young Chinese dancer, was like nothing I had ever experienced. It was the top of Chinese cuisine and culture, and I never would have enjoyed this without this invitation.

Later in the evening, we went back to the Ambassador's residence for a night cap. During the conversation, Jim asked Hammer how he felt the Soviets and Chinese would fare over the years. Hammer replied that Russian character was such that their ideal was a table, a deck of cards, bottles of vodka and good friends talking philosophy and politics. Their future was limited and we should not fear their ever truly being our competitors. On the other hand, the Chinese ideal was a plot of land to grow crops, a shop to sell wares, a job to put their heart and soul into. The Chinese would shock the world with their industriousness, and they would become the drivers of economic growth and development. That said, he also saw nothing to fear from the Chinese. They have a hard enough time holding their country together. They simply don't have the will or capacity to be overly expansionist. I never forgot those words, and they still serve as a useful guide nearly 25 years after they were spoken.

We had three children which always drew a crowd whenever we ventured out. Three children, and the Chinese considered them little dolls (similar to how many westerners consider young Chinese). Everywhere we went people would crowd around. My little boy, taking after my wife, had blond hair and hazel eyes. He was always the center of attention. He was pawed so much but never complained. Our youngest was only two weeks old when we came to Beijing. Since we all had to take Chinese names, she was named Lu Meihua. The meihua had a double meaning, combining the words for America and China on the one hand, while also meaning beautiful flower. She had almost almond eyes, which do run in our family, so unlike the rest of us, was more readily accepted. Just as in Egypt with our first born, every Chinese was a parent for her.

My wife learned Chinese so quickly, spending a great deal of time in the shop where Beijing opera costumes were sewn, joining the seamstresses. When we left Beijing, we left with a magnificent collection of dresses she was able to procure, including classic costumes.

We attracted so much attention as a family of 5. The Chinese were clearly envious that my wife and I had three children. Of course, they could only have one. At the same time, one thing that eventually drove us up the wall was the constant surveillance on our family. Our phones were permanently monitored, and we couldn't even get a dial tone until whomever was doing the monitoring got himself engaged. We knew this was going on, and one time I got so exasperated waiting for a dial tone, I screamed into the phone that my daughter needed immediate medical attention and I must call a doctor now. Give me a fricken dial tone! For the first time, I heard a voice on the other end. Mary's sick, he said? I said yes. Not only did I get a dial tone, but a bunch of Chinese showed up out of nowhere to assist. I honestly feel they loved our family, and I truly pitied them for living in such a police state.

One time, when they were really angry at me because they suspected I had something to do with a Chinese dissident, they surgically removed the fan belt from my car. It was actually quite well done. When I came downstairs to drive to work, I turned on the engine and the light came on signally trouble. I opened the hood and saw the fan belt was missing. I then noticed that it had been thrown into the bushes nearby. I could tell you all kinds of stories of Chinese harassment of embassy officers during this period. It was annoying, it was exasperating, and definitely not worthy of a great nation and people. I understand this kind of harassment took place in the Soviet Union as well.

Q: You didn't find yourself people going after you and wanting to know about the United States?

LAROCCO: During Beijing Spring, it was constant. My son and I would ride our bikes around town, and we passed group after group of people sitting and talking about what was going on.

Q: When was Beijing spring?

LAROCCO: Beijing spring took place essentially between March and June, 1989. It was a period of about two and half months in which Beijing completely opened up to discussion and ferment. It was so refreshing, so unexpected and so quickly crushed.

Q: How old was your son?

LAROCCO: My son was 7 years old.

The two of us would go out and ride all around all the neighborhoods and occasionally we would stop. I would see a group of about 30 people sitting around talking and they would be talking about what is democracy. I remember some of the conversations.

The most painful one was when we stopped our bikes and there was a bunch of young people. They said, "You're an American?" and I said, "Yes, I'm an American."

"Please explain your judicial system to us."

I thought oh, my God. I can't do it in English. How can I possibly do this in Chinese? Our judicial system is extremely complex. I would never think of myself as being able to explain it in English. You really need a constitutional lawyer, you need a practitioner. You need a panel of legal people to really explain our judicial system, not even just one person. But certainly for me as a non legal person, it was painful.

What I tried to do was basically not talk so much about our judicial system but to talk about our Bill of Rights. I spent some time trying to develop a presentation about our constitution that I could talk to people on the streets. This was so exhilarating and so amazing to see these people so genuinely interested in democracy and participation and freedom of expression, freedom of being able to do all sorts of activities. They were still very much interested in order, no question about that. Order and stability are very big to Chinese because how else do you hold a country of a billion people together? But they clearly wanted more say about their lives and they wanted more freedoms. They were feeling this was possible and it was very encouraging. We did this every night for months. I must say that the weather that spring was delightful, perfect for outdoor congregation.

I remember the Sunday before the Tiananmen crackdown. Our whole family went to the Square and we spent several hours talking with the students in their makeshift tent community. I filmed it, and I cherish that film, always troubled by what may have happened to those eager kids with such high expectations.

At that time, you could feel the tension nearing boiling point. Something had to happen.

Q: Prior to the Tiananmen crackdown, what was it like in Beijing?

LAROCCO: It was increasingly tense. Initially, it was this euphoria of Beijing Spring. It was sort of like the initial euphoria of Arab Spring, so to speak, but as things went on it was very clear that something was going on behind the scenes. There were clearly in the upper levels some major clashes taking place. We weren't sure if Zhao Ziyang, who was the seeming standard bearer of the demonstrators, could succeed or not. But as always, it was opaque.

Q: Was the political section coming back and saying, how the hell do we know?

LAROCCO: You know how the Foreign Service is. We never reply how the hell do we know? We do the best that we can and I think our political section and our other sections did the best we could recognizing the lack of access to the inner halls, the lack of a probing media, domestic or international, the lack of anything resembling what we have today in the world.

Our guys did the best they could at documenting the tensions, laying out the possibilities, doing this with literally both hands tied behind our backs.

Q: That's what they wanted.

LAROCCO: Of course.

I had certain third country nationals that I worked with who were in the business community who really gave me a lot of insights which particularly the year after Tiananmen I was able to do a tremendous amount of reporting that nobody else could do.

Q: Why would they have something that we didn't get?

LAROCCO: Because they had a presence throughout the country. They had a longstanding presence that we didn't have. They had people everywhere. These people from a third country, which I must leave nameless, and with whom I developed a very close relationship were able to feed me tremendous amounts of information which I believe to this day is what helped me to cross the threshold, to join the senior Foreign Service. My reporting was eagerly gobbled up. Keep in mind that in the period after Tiananmen, we were almost totally cut off from contacts with Beijing officials.

At this time, our ambassador was Jim Lilley, one of the best of the best and it was very hard for him. One of the good things he did after Tiananmen was to tell us to get out and about the country because the rest of the country was not like Beijing. They had not felt what Beijing had felt and while we were shunned in Beijing. Many of the people who just by the very fact of knowing us, coming to our houses and talking to us, were banished to the West, which was very painful to us. Just by knowing us they were punished severely. That's hard to handle, and I will always be troubled by this.

We went out to the provinces, where indeed it was a very different story. We were welcomed with open arms and feted. They had heard little about what happened in Beijing, and if they did, they simply didn't associate with it. They were eager to get to know us better, to do business and to expand relationships. This people-to-people, face-to-face diplomacy made us all ambassadors of our country. It was exhilarating, especially in view of the total cold shoulder we were experiencing in Beijing. It also generated pioneering reporting on key areas of China that were previously only touched on in cursory manner.

Q: You arrive in China, you get to know people and then Tiananmen and then China spring, and Beijing Spring is beginning to bubble. Was the embassy aware? Were you saying something is going on? Was your radar, the embassy radar focusing? What the hell is this all about?

LAROCCO: Our radar was totally focused on what was going on. We couldn't avoid it. It was right outside our doors, whether at home, while shopping, in the parks or at the embassy. At the same time, I would say that we were a bit naïve. On the day of the Tiananmen crackdown, we had Boy Scouts camping out at the embassy. They were there as tanks rolled down the street just outside the compound. While I and others faulted the RSO and our intel, I must confess that the notion that a government would run over and deliberately shoot down its own people was very difficult for us to comprehend. I can only speak for myself, of course, but keep in mind all the terrorism I had experienced. While most of expected a crackdown, we did not expect the killing and harsh actions on the scale that took place.

For all the terrorism I had been around in the Middle East and doing everything I could as I told you to protect my children from this, they saw and heard firsthand the crackdown taking place from our balcony and it has affected them the rest of their lives like nothing else they experienced in all their years overseas.

There was nowhere to escape so we saw the tanks going down the streets. We saw people thrown onto the backs of trucks and taken off. We saw people shot at. We heard gunfire all the time.

All of our local employees left because they were actually employees of the PSB, run by Chinese security. So all of our 300+ local employees were gone. With our families evacuated, we Americans were on our own.

Q: Was that a Chinese order or American?

LAROCCO: A Chinese order. We were outraged because these were people who we really depended on to keep the embassy operating. All of them were ordered to go home. I can tell you certain stories of certain Chinese who in fact, defied that order, but I don't want to do that because I can't be sure that even to this day they would be safe from recrimination.

Q: I can understand but I am wondering why? Was this sort of stick it to us?

LAROCCO: Yes. And it wasn't just this. The PLA – Chinese Army -- shot as many as 600 rounds into an apartment complex where our Americans lived. I don't know how much of that story ever came out. We were truly outraged, but the message was clear: get out. There was a Chinese 'ayi', as she was called, a maid who saved the lives of American children by throwing her body over them as the bullets raked across the room above them. We moved the families out as quickly as we could.

I have never told anyone this before, but I must confess that I simply could not resist going down to Tiananmen and seeing what was going on in the city. The night the Tiananmen crackdown started, I was hosting a dinner at my home. We got the word that the military had moved into the square. I immediately ended the event and drove one of the guests home. I drove as close as I could to Tiananmen, seeing everywhere I drove burning buses, fires, tanks and people running. It almost reminded me of the scene in Gone with the Wind driving as Atlanta was burning.

The following morning, I and some other officers were summoned to the embassy for a meeting with the ambassador. I took a roundabout way, skirting Tiananmen, going around it but coming right to the edge of the square. At the first roundabout west of the square, twisted, charred, burning buses were literally piled up, bulldozed into this strange sculptural Tower of Babel. It was scene I will never forget.

Beijing was the turning point in the handling of crises and evacuations by the U.S. government. To begin with, Washington just didn't know what to do. We were playing it by ear. They told us to refer to the Emergency Action Plan, but this was a massive, unwieldy document written in unintelligible bureaucratize. You might as well be reading the phone book. It was useless. Things were happening so quickly, and we simply had to make it up as we went along. Washington did not understand. They said the Swiss got out quickly, as did the Japanese. Of course, the handful of Swiss in the country pulled up in their Mercedes and boarded a plane. The Japanese, so orderly, all came to their embassy with two bags, boarded buses and were hauled out of the country in waiting Japanese charters.

Americans? We don't behave this way. We don't like to be ordered around, especially if danger is not readily apparent. We're tough, right?

All of us at the embassy took our turn at the phones, pleading with Americans to assemble at this place or that so we could get them out of the country. Let's face it: Americans don't want to be told what to do and so many said they felt safe and they didn't want to leave, especially if they had to pay to get out. So often only a handful of Americans would be there at the pickup point. And so often, hours later we would get frantic calls from those who did not show saying that there was gunfire around them. Please get me out. At that point, streets were blocked and we could not get through. But here's the bottom line: No Americans were killed, despite the confusion and what seemed to us (and the Americans we served) a very painful operation.

I am so grateful to this day that Jim Lilley was our ambassador. He was a man who had run unpredictable and risky operations for decades. He knew immediately what to do. He was always calm, in charge, and always knew exactly what to do. He called in about a dozen of us, said we would be his team during the crisis. We looked at each other, detecting immediately that we weren't the recognized hierarchy of the embassy. But Jim knew each of us well, our strengths, our character, our reliability, and to be frank, we all knew and trusted each other to do our part.

Jim put me in charge when he went back to our apartment for the night to catch sleep. I would be there all night and well into the day before I could go home for a few hours' sleep.

In those days, we had to have the phone off the hook 24 hours a day for Washington to talk to us. They constantly peppered us with the same questions: what's the body count? Is the resistance holding up? How many Americans have you evacuated? How many Americans are still left? This constant quest for information at times proved exasperating as we were working tirelessly to get people out of harm's way.

One evening, late at night, when it was impossible to gather any data, I became truly exasperated at the list of endless questions and the demand for immediate answers. I held the phone up to the window, then pulled it back and barked into the phone: did you hear that? It's tank fire. And it's right outside our compound. You can expect no further answers for the time being. We will let you know when we have any. I then took the phone and shoved it into a desk drawer and closed it.

I give a lot of credit to Robert Kimmitt who was the undersecretary at the time and was running the operation back in Washington. He was a level head and made sure we got the help we needed, especially charter aircraft to get Americans out. After the crisis was over, he ordered a full after action report which resulted in a new, more user friendly manual and procedures. It was the first usable template for crisis management in the modern era and served well in future crises. All of this was under the always helpful leadership and guidance of James Baker. When I reflect back on the crisis, we had the perfect individuals in charge: Baker, Kimmitt and Lilley.

I would like add a footnote to all this because I think it says something important about the Foreign Service. To many, the image of a Foreign Service officer is a man in a pinstripe suit wearing wingtip shoes sipping a martini at a gala reception of elite. That may have been common in days gone by, but it was far from the reality of the Foreign Service I was a part of. From Beijing to Beirut, Cairo to Chongqing, the Foreign Service was demanding, challenging and conducted often under the most difficult working and living conditions. This is not a complaint. I loved this environment. But it was not at all reflective of the image I thought the Foreign Service was before I joined, and not the image my friends and relatives back home had.

Then came Tiananmen. I must admit that I joined the Foreign Service for adventure, excitement, travel, crisis, cross-cultural experiences. When Tiananmen started to happen, my juices went into overdrive. I truly felt alive. I believed that all the training I had received, throughout my life, prepared me for this moment. Perhaps Jim Lilley saw this in me and others he chose as key members of his team. He had himself been in countless situations like this, and he was truly unflappable, ready for anything.

What I learned during the Tiananmen crisis is that our basic instincts come to the fore during a super high intensity crisis like that one. Some of our finest officers, especially Chinese speakers, froze in place, unable to move. I recall the most fluent Chinese speaker with years of experience in China before joining the service, an Ivy League education, all the right training and background, whimpering in my office. I was stunned. I wanted to say, "Get a grip. We need you. American citizens in distress need you. Our country needs you. This is your time. Snap out of it. Let's go!" But I didn't. So many thoughts flashed through my mind, of Patton in Sicily, of stories of soldiers excelling during training only to freeze and drop their weapons when thrust into battle, of those in sharp contrast with little to commend them stepping forward and performing heroic acts.

While I would never presume to compare Tiananmen with the heat of battle, it prompted basic instincts to show themselves. Some underperformers in the day-to-day work of economic reporting and contact work leapt into action, pulling us all forward with them. On the other hand, some of our embassy stars in the normal working environment went missing, holed up in their apartments, not answering our calls.

The Foreign Service is a profession, but one that needs all types of personalities. We need the tea leaf readers as much as we need the crisis managers. We need the masters of traditional tradecraft as much as we need the intrepid "expeditionary diplomats." The martini-sipping, reception-going smooth as silk diplomat, a master prier of information from the European elite, is a needed FSO as is the civil affairs diplomat in a helmet in Kandahar. We are all FSOs, and we are all needed.

As for the person whimpering in my office, I consoled and had him/her escorted to the airport to be evacuated with the families. I never reported that behavior, and this person returned to post after the crisis and performed admirably as one of our finest reporting officers.

Q: What was happening in Guangzhou and other major cities?

LAROCCO: Not much. They were basically quiet. The only other city that had unrest was Shanghai. But Shanghai, in sharp contrast to Beijing, had a very enlightened and charismatic mayor who took a very different attitude. He did not clamp down, but he maintained order. He later became a hero for his handling of the situation there. The rest of China, for the most part, was shielded from the events of Beijing. Hong Kong, of course, was a very different matter, but that was outside our purview.

Q: Looking at it, say when the shooting had died down and the revolt or whatever you want to call it had been suppressed, what did this tell us about the leadership of China?

LAROCCO: The leadership of China was determined to preserve the Communist Party at all costs. Full stop. That has always been uppermost in their minds, and it remains so to this day. They were determined to preserve the Communist Party and they saw this as a threat and they were going to put it down at whatever cost. How many people died, I have never seen an accurate figure. How many people were exiled, I have never seen an accurate figure on that either. It was brutal and meant to punish severely and leave a lasting lesson. They replaced a number of leaders in their usual quiet way. Keep in mind that these leaders were also Communist Party members. So it was done mostly outside the spotlights. This led then to all kinds of dissidents who either fled the country or went to prison, some of whom became symbols of the repression. They have always received our morale support, and have always been a wedge in our relationship with the Chinese leadership. You may recall Hillary's troubles regarding a dissident during her visit to China.

I would like to mention one other key event that took place during the Beijing Spring. Winston Lord was still ambassador. Near the end of his tour, President Bush came to China. We had meetings and I was the note taker for the meeting with Li Peng who was unintelligible in any language. In those days, we were required to write up the meetings as verbatim as possible. After the meeting was over, I went back to the embassy, despondent over my task of trying to make any sense of what Li Peng said. Even though I was invited to the gala banquet for Bush, I had to skip it. I was the only officer at the embassy that evening.

I was deep in thought tapping out my report when I got a call from the Marine at Post 1. "There is some guy here at the gate, some Chinese guy and he needs to talk to somebody." I went down there. I thought, what do I do? I don't want to blow this thing. I invited him in. It turned out to be the well-known dissident Fang Lizhi. He showed me his invitation to the dinner, and I knew he was on the list of invitees. He then told me he had repeatedly been stopped by Chinese security officers and prevented from reaching the dinner. He wanted to lodge a formal protest on the one hand, and requested an embassy escort to the dinner as well.

We didn't have reliable cell phones in those days. I tried to reach people and I couldn't. It was in the middle of the banquet, and I assumed phones were turned off. I sat with him for a period of time, which turned out to be the right thing to do. I listened carefully to his protest, his desire to attend the dinner, but I had no vehicles that could transport him to the dinner and I had no idea even at what point the dinner was at. I said, "I need to get your story. Stay here." He was smoking cigarettes endlessly and very, very nervous. "Just stay calm." I sat there and talked with him until I finally was able to contact a political officer at the dinner who knew Fang. He rushed back to the embassy. By that time, the dinner was over, so Fang was extremely disappointed.

As it turned out, Fang Lizhi ended up staying with us as a guest of the embassy, as both we and he feared for his safety. He was hidden from view, and we did a damn good job confusing the Chinese as to where exactly he was. He was with us for a full year. Bill Stanton was his guardian, and I don't know whether Bill has ever written anything about his year with Dr. Fang.

There were plenty of recriminations after this event and it became a cause celebre of the media back in the U.S. Some in our government blamed us at the embassy for inviting dissidents at all to the formal state banquet. Why did we do this? We let Washington handle the press inquiries, but we made it clear to Washington, quietly of course, that there were no secrets here. Everything was clear. I was at the meetings in which a suggested guest list was prepared. A decision was made by our country team to recommend including some notable dissidents. This was sent to Washington and fully approved. Ambassador Lord took some unfair heat for this incident, but he handled it deftly.

Midway through my second year in Beijing, Jim Lilley called me in and said he had developed a great trust in my management and judgment, and hoped I would stay in the China field. These were important times and my experience in Beijing would be helpful. I was honest with him: my heart was really in the Middle East. Jim wouldn't take no for an answer and arranged with his good friend, Stan Brooks, then director of AIT in Taipei, for me to return there as Deputy Director. This would be my first real DCM job, and I had just crossed the threshold. It was indeed too tempting to pass up. So I accepted.

I left Beijing after two unforgettable years. Despite the drama, I believe it was also very much on the positive side for my kids. They got to see so much of China, from the Harbin ice festival to the Karst Mountains of Guilin, the far western ancient crossroads of Kashgar to Nanjing and Shanghai. My wife was adored; the Chinese consider Audrey Hepburn, with her angelic face and small features, a goddess. They said my wife looked just like her. My kids were beloved everywhere they went. Cute aliens, I guess. And my children had matured overnight via Tiananmen.

Q: I want to go back to China now. Let's talk about the commercial relationship. Were we concerned that we were delighted in China opening up and all but my God. These guys may be our great commercial rivals.

LAROCCO: Not in those days, no. We sent in long reports on this, signaling that this was going to happen and we should seize the reins now to seriously discuss all this with the Chinese or we were going to be swamped with imports in the decades ahead. How can you compete with 20 cents an hour labor? And the quality of their products was rising every day.

But American companies seemed hypnotized by the thought of a billion consumers, even though the purchasing power of those billion was far less than that of the people of one American city. Our government viewed China more as an opportunity than a challenge. And all those American companies who were flocking to China to manufacture products for the American market were raking in millions in profits.

At the same time, we could see Chinese reverse engineering our technology and stealing everything they could get their hands on, from technology to processes to intellectual property. Once they made it their own, they cut out our companies. It was not long before the combination of this, their burgeoning exports and their closed market to our products sent the trade deficit soaring. By the time we really faced up to the challenge, their holdings of dollars was unprecedented. This was long after I left Beijing.

Q: Were other countries seeing the same thing?

LAROCCO: The Japanese saw it in spades, but there was little they could do about it except to limit the pain. The Japanese were rushing in to invest and diversify. They saw that their days were numbered as manufacturers so the only way they could continue with their standard of living was to invest. As we now know, the standard of living of Japan hasn't changed in 20 years. They have been okay in terms of standard of living because they were not expanding in their population, but they were not okay for the long-term future because they were not expanding their population. Too many old folks, not enough coming in behind them. China faces that same prospect, as I will talk about later.

Q: With the Chinese picking up manufacturing, reverse engineering, was there something within the Chinese society that wasn't producing new products? After all, you think about paper and fireworks and etcetera which they had done centuries before but it doesn't seem to be LAROCCO: There was very little innovation in China. They were master copiers of everything. The Communist ideology had really beaten down a lot of individual initiative in terms of innovation and was not encouraging it. There was nothing to get out of it. If you personally came up with an innovation, it was immediately taken away from you so you got no benefit out of it. So why do it when copying was easy and profitable?

Recall that conversation with Armand Hammer. He didn't say they would innovate. He said they would produce. This is exactly what's happened. Since they have been unleashed economically, they are producing on a scale almost unprecedented in history. They have brought more people out of poverty than any country ever. It is amazing, the hundreds of millions they have brought out of poverty. But they are not yet innovators, and I think many of those who are innovators are fortunately coming to America which is good for us.

Q: Did you see any profit to the United States by the flow of Chinese students and many are staying?

LAROCCO: It had started already back then. The Chinese saw this as win, win, win for them. They saw it was a win if these people went to America, got a really good education and came back. They thought it was a win for China if they stayed in America, because they consider Chinese overseas their bridge to these nations, their "Huaqiao." That's what they are called in Chinese. These are bridging people so they saw them as Chinese transplants, people who would always be Chinese first in their hearts. They also saw them contributing to the American economy, and that was eventually going to help them too.

There are Chinese students who are absolutely the backbone of so many of our universities. I recently heard the figure of 200,000 Chinese studying here. I have no idea if it's true, but I wouldn't be surprised if it is.

Q: What about Americans? As economic counselor did you still, were you covering the commercial side of things too?

LAROCCO: No. My predecessor and the commercial counselor had a very bad relationship, but I developed an excellent one with Lyn Edinger, my commercial counterpart. Keep in mind that I had worked for USDOC as commercial attaché in Saudi Arabia, so I knew his line of work. We agreed on what he would stay out of and what I would stay out of, how we would cooperate in overlapping areas, and it worked seamlessly. Our section advised countless business people, but it was solely on financial, investment, macro and micro economic issues. We steered clear of any advice regarding selling their products. To be clear, we strongly supported American business and our commercial interests, but we did so hand in glove with the commercial section.

A good part of being head of the economic section or having an economic section is in fact business support. There is a difference between supporting business and business promotion. Really what the commercial section is engaged in is business promotion. We were really not that. We were giving business support. We were giving companies a kind of analysis that they needed to make informed judgments, whereas the commercial section was introducing them to partners, promoting their products, doing all that sort of stuff.

Q: I was wondering if you were getting a sample of the American attitude of business people coming over to China looking for markets or for production and all.

LAROCCO: We got involved when they ran into problems because if there were problems, it was our job to negotiate those problems. If they had problems with intellectual property, that's when we got involved. If they had problems with various commercial laws and disputes, we got involved in that, all kinds of investment problems and things like that so, yeah. We were acutely aware of the obstacles and the difficulties that they were facing in China. It was a very tough market. China was not a society governed by rule of law, and the very notion of resorting to law for redress in a commercial dispute was an alien concept.

On the other hand, if you just came in and said I want to build a Nike factory and I want to employ 12,000 people, wow. They treat you like a king. It was all jobs growth; it was all producing, bringing in hard currency. They loved direct investors who brought in money to build plants.

What really angered me as an American was, for example, selling them airplanes. They wanted offsets. Well, if we buy your airplane, then you must invest in producing this or that here and, oh, by the way, you must buy eight million pairs of surgical gloves. Say what? This is how the Chinese bargained. It was the price of doing business there. It was maddening for many U.S. firms.

Q: Were you able to use congressional visits to point out to Congress what was happening to them in their home districts and all?

LAROCCO: Yes, but we did not get as many congressional visits as I would have liked. That I found very disappointing. I don't know what it is like today, but I would say a good share of the congressional visits in those days were related to just getting to know China or were focused on human rights. Very few, if any that I can recall, were focused solely on economic issues.

Q: So often it's said that it is a unique experience for government officials to sit alone in a car with a congressman for hours, maybe and have a chance to talk to him and explain the situation.

LAROCCO: I agree, and that certainly was the case during my assignment to Cairo. But once again, my work with Congressional visitors was limited during my two years in Beijing. We had a handful before Tiananmen and very few the year after.

Q: How did you find Chinese officials when you raised human rights questions?

LAROCCO: Extremely defensive. They basically said we didn't understand. We didn't understand how important stability was for them. We didn't understand how this was their mission and their goal and their responsibility to provide what they said were the real human rights. Real human rights were not what we said. The real human rights were the right to a job, the right to eat. They said in your culture you define human rights as letting people starve to death as long as they can speak out freely. We don't see it that way. We feel that real human rights are economic rights, not civil rights.

So there was a fundamental disagreement about how you even define human rights with the Chinese. The Chinese were very, very consistent in saying that. How much they believed it, I am in no position to judge. Having listened to them, I can see why they hold their views, since if they don't feed those billion people, heaven help us all.

I am trying to characterize their point of view. For myself, China will never become what it aspires to until full rights are granted to all, especially in the area of freedoms and political participation. I could foresee the death of Communism Party rule, but what would replace it? We still don't know the exact answer, but I have always believed that political participation would have to open up over time and rights promulgated and enforced.

Q: One last question; did you see China sort of shaking off Tiananmen, was there any lesson there for the Chinese adjusting or was this just something they put down and went on their merry way?

LAROCCO: Tiananmen will never be forgotten. They have tried every way they can to bury it, but it is always there. I think it is something they know has always been latent.

I eventually was ostracized by the China club because I concluded that China would never forget Tiananmen, would open up to political participation, but could not do so as one entity. As had happened before in its long history, I predicted that China would break up into several entities by 2050. Political change would be one factor in this break up, the differences between regions, which can be profound, demographics, relationships with the outside world, etc. This notion was completely anathema to Sinologists at that time, and I suspect is still so today. But I stand by my prediction.

Let's be frank: Once you give people sustenance, they want more. Once you educate them, their eyes are opened. Once their eyes are opened, they want more rights, more say. They indeed have something to say. The path China is on makes profound change toward more political participation in governance inevitable, and I feel it fits the Chinese character and identity so much more than Communism did. Communism was an aberration, a denial of the Chinese character as described by Armand Hammer. Their identity has been tampered with for nearly a century. It will not be denied much longer.

Now, let's be clear: what I am saying may also be a forecast for the kind of change that is unstable. I think we need to be prepared for that. I don't think we are.

Q: Well, too we are looking at technology and the fact you can't suppress things. God knows the Chinese are probably more wired than any other group sadly in the use of this. We are talking about cell phones and the various ways of communicating which can no longer be controlled by a central government.

LAROCCO: You can't control ideas. The ideas are all there. Try as they as hard as they try, they can't do it. It is inevitable the change is coming.

WILLIAM PRIMOSCH
Office of Chinese Affairs
Washington, DC (1988-1991)

Will Primosch was born and raised in Ohio and attended the University of Notre Dame and George Washington University. He served in the US Army and entered the Foreign Service in 1975. His assignments abroad included Belgrade, Bangkok and London. In 2001 Charles Stuart Kennedy interviewed Mr. Primosch.

Q: How did you find George Washington as a place to go for a graduate degree?

PRIMOSCH: Overall, I thought it was a good program. They had several very good professors. One of the things that they stressed in the courses that I took was research and writing. So we did a lot of papers and that was a great opportunity to refine my writing skills. Acquiring good writing skills really helped me later on in the State Department. Several of the courses I took I also found to be very useful later on at the State Department. I took courses in international trade and economics, and some courses in international communism. We did a lot of reading on China, Russia and Eastern Europe. As it turned out, my first assignment at the State Department was in Belgrade, Yugoslavia. I found myself very well prepared academically for that kind of work.

Q: What was the role that China was playing, particularly in the economic sphere?

PRIMOSCH: China was trying to project more influence in the whole region at the time. My impression was that they were rather clumsy at it. The Chinese did participate in the UN regional organization. They were rather friendly to other representatives there. The Russians were also there. But I didn't get the impression they were all that effective. The Thais, however, are very astute at judging power relationships and had launched a number of initiatives to try to improve relations with China. They were very wary of offending the Chinese in any way. Even when we pushed them to take some hard stands on issues, you could tell they were reluctant to do that because this was a small neighborhood and the Chinese were the big boys in the neighborhood.

Q: Did you get a feel for the Thai economy as it contrasted to Singapore or Malaysia? How did you see it adjusting to the changes in the world economy?

PRIMOSCH: Thailand was generally considered even at that time to be one of our success stories for economic development. After World War II, it was a rice-growing economy. There was no industry there to speak of. The Thais were generally very pro-market in terms of their approach to economic development. The government didn't get involved in a lot of things. You saw a lot of very interesting dynamic economic developments in Thailand as a result. Thailand had a very well developed agricultural sector. It used to be just rice. But Thai farmers were so flexible and responsive to the market that they began growing many different types of crops. Anything they could grow in a tropical climate, they would grow. All kinds of interesting fruits and vegetables and corn, and other crops that we grew in the West. They were very entrepreneurial. It helped that Thailand had a strong Chinese immigrant presence. Many Chinese immigrants has been there for 100 or 200 years, so it's not as if they were recent émigrés. Most of the business sector, as it is in much of Southeast Asia, is controlled by Chinese immigrants. They're very entrepreneurial. Thailand was considered to be a strong and growing economy at the time, although there were still a lot of poor people. Most of the farm sector consisted of poor farmers, but you could also see very visible growth there. The Thai economy was considered rather successful, although not as successful as Singapore, which was the premiere economy in the region. Malaysia was also considered to be very strong. Then probably Thailand after that.

Q: Did you have family there?

PRIMOSCH: Yes, I had my wife, who gave birth to our third child there. I had three children in Thailand with me.

Q: How old were they?

PRIMOSCH: I think they were six, four, and then my youngest was born over there.

Q: You didn't really have to worry then about the pernicious influences of Thailand which hit some of the teenage kids.

PRIMOSCH: No. That wasn't a problem. I understand that drugs had been a big problem, particularly before I had arrived. Someone told me that a couple of teenagers had died from drug overdoses at the international school. Even after I had left, one family had to be sent back because their teenage children got involved in drugs. The drugs and the sex, massage parlors and bars, was pretty wide open. So, if I had teenage children, I'd be very concerned about the influence of that.

Q: You left in '88. Where?

PRIMOSCH: Then I went over to the Asian bureau. I got a surprise call from the China Office asking if I would like to serve as their deputy for economics and trade. I didn't know much about China. I had served in Thailand. They wanted someone who knew something about the economy, international economic policy and trade and debt. So, I was asked to serve there in the China Office of the East Asia Bureau. At the time, Stapleton "Stape" Roy was the Deputy Assistant Secretary for China.

Q: Let's do it prior to Tiananmen, which was June '89. What was our stance economically towards China?

PRIMOSCH: It was very similar to what it was toward Eastern and Central Europe a decade earlier. The strategy was to try to encourage China to have more contacts with the West. There was almost a missionary fervor in thinking that if we could just bring the Chinese at all levels into greater contact with the West, if we could expand trade with the West, that this would stimulate internal change that would be more liberalizing and might encourage democratic yearnings and a democratic transformation. This was very much the thinking that we had in Eastern Europe in the '60s and '70s. It was a very similar kind of policy only it was much more comprehensive because we were trying to deal with the Chinese at almost all levels. For example, I was also involved in trying to promote the science and technology cooperation. This was also a major effort. There were a lot of U.S. scientists visiting China, and a lot of Chinese scientists coming to the States under a joint science program. We negotiated a new science agreement when I was on the desk. We also had a big joint economic commission with China where we met at a high level. The Secretary of Treasury was involved and the Secretary of Commerce. It was very similar to what we did with Eastern Europe only on a much bigger scale.

Q: China has the potential for being such a major economy that it would do to us what the Japanese had done to us, use us as a market and there wasn't much of a return for us...

PRIMOSCH: No, I don't think it was so evident at that time. Actually, it was looking the other way in which many American corporations are still optimistic about the potential of the Chinese market. "There are 1.2 billion people who need to buy Cokes and hamburgers and tractors and machine tools, and if I can just get into that market, I'll be on easy street."

Q: There was a book that came out in the '30s called "Oil for the Lamps of China." If we can only do this... I recall someone wanting to sell caskets. He thought, "Wow, what a market for caskets."

PRIMOSCH: I think that in essence was the mentality of a lot of American businesses at that time and still is. If somehow they could crack that market, they would have enormous sales opportunities. The China market has developed much faster than we had thought it would 11 or 12 years ago. When I visited there, you could see the beginnings of market economy develop, and the Chinese had a great interest in Western technology. A lot of companies were starting to go there. But China was still also a very backward place.

Q: Did you get involved in either backstopping or dealing at any level in negotiations with the Chinese?

PRIMOSCH: Yes, we were involved in a couple of different negotiations. One involved China's membership in the WTO, which started back in the late 1980s. We had two or three rounds with the Chinese before Tiananmen Square. It's rather interesting that because of the desire to have better relations with the China, the Chinese at that time could have gotten had a very easy deal that required few concessions. We were making almost minimal demands. The Chinese, though, were smart by a half. They always thought that they could get a better deal with even fewer commitments. Ten years later when the Chinese finally resumed negotiations, they had to make extensive, comprehensive commitments to reform their economy and open up markets. If they cut a deal back in the late 1980s along the lines that USTR was proposing at the time, it would have had to make very little in the way of commitments. So, their delay was costly in some respects, although their commitments are going to help promote the kind of reforms that they want to do anyway. However, it's going to be very painful.

Q: Did you get a taste of the Chinese as negotiators?

PRIMOSCH: Yes, a little bit. I traveled three times to China when I was on the desk. A couple of times we had to cancel out. I was supposed to go there a week before Tiananmen, but it looked like situation was going to worsen, so we decided not to go.

But there are a couple of interesting things about their negotiating style. Their overall approach to dealing with foreigners was to win friends. The Chinese can be very charming to deal with. If you ever go to dinner with the Chinese, you're going to have fun. They're good jokesters. They're friendly. And they like to tell stories. They're a lot of fun to be around. We went many times to the Chinese embassy for dinner. They're very good entertainers. They treated everyone well, from the lowest person on the office staff up to the ambassador. Their approach was to win friends. Their thinking was: "We want to have people all over who are friendly to China." Of course, they're going to try to use that friendship. It's a very clear strategy of trying to win friends, and they can be very charming at that.

The other thing I found very strange in the Chinese mentality is, they have this notion – and I saw this in the newspaper recently with regard to the downing of the U.S. spy plane in China– which they repeatedly referenced and which just sounds so bizarre to Americans. If we did something the Chinese didn't like, their way of trying to put us on the spot was to say, "Well, you have to understand, this hurt the feelings of the Chinese people." I don't know how many times I heard that. I think it was the Chinese ambassador who said almost the exact same thing about the aircraft. "You hurt the feelings of the Chinese people and now we have to make amends."

Q: Of course, our mantra is, "We'd love to help you, but we have Congress to deal with." After Tiananmen, what did you do, just fold your tents and twiddle your thumbs?

PRIMOSCH: In some respects, while there was a huge amount of work to do after Tiananmen, mainly just to preserve the relationship because there were those in Congress who wanted to retaliate in various ways against China, most importantly by trying to take away their most favored nation (MFN) trade status. This had to be renewed every year for communist countries under the Jackson-Vanik provisions (of the Trade Act of 1974). The requirement stays in effect until China becomes a member of the World Trade Organization (WTO), in which case we have to provide it on a permanent basis. We spent a lot of time trying to manage the relationship, prevent further damage and get the Chinese to do something to show that they weren't brutal dictators. We also had an incident at the embassy Beijing. There was a Chinese physicist, Fang Lizhi who was an outspoken human rights advocate and who had secretly sought refuge in the ambassador's residence during the Tiananmen Square protests. A very delicate negotiation went on for months to get Chinese permission to have Fang Lizhi leave the country. There was also some concern during that time that the Chinese might even try to break into the residence and snatch him. So we also had in mind the potential threats to the security of the ambassador that such an occurrence might involve. The two years after Tiananmen were very busy and very difficult in terms of dealing with the Chinese.

Q: In '93, you did what?

PRIMOSCH: In '93, I ended up going back to the Department for a short time in the Asia Bureau. I was working on China's most-favored-nation trade status renewal and spent a short time working with Winston Lord, the Assistant Secretary for Asia and Pacific Affairs, on that issue. We were still dealing with the fallout from the Tiananmen Square massacre, and relations with Congress over China's trade status was very sensitive. There were expectations, which proved to be unrealistic, that China would make some gestures towards human rights and internal relaxation as a condition for MFN approval. The Chinese, however, were very resistant to that. In the end, we had to try to convince the Congress that, "Even though we told you we thought the Chinese were going to do certain things internally on human rights, they're not going to do it, but it's still worth renewing China's trade status."

***

Q: What happened? Were you doing much work for them?

PRIMOSCH: It was kind of slow. Again, I think it was the sense of the political team wanting to keep control of the important work. I didn't have a heck of a lot to do at that time. One issue that I helped to negotiate that actually turned out to be rather significant had to do with Russia's interest in using their former military rockets to launch U.S. communications satellites. At that time, the U.S. was the only country that made the whole range of communications satellites. Satellites happen to be on the U.S. Munitions List, which means it's a militarily controlled item. So, any country that wanted to launch a U.S. satellite had to get a license from the State Department. The Russians came to us for help. This was at the time of their political transition. The hard-line communists had fallen from power. The new government asked, couldn't we help them by allowing them to use their rockets to launch our satellites, which made perfect economic sense. From a foreign policy sense, it would have helped the Russians. But our rocket launch industry was much opposed to that because it turns out that we had expensive rocket launchers which are geared mainly to military uses. They were the "gold plated version" of what it takes to put a satellite up. We had to negotiate an agreement with the Russians that would enable them to launch only a limited number of satellites a year. We had a similar agreement with China that I also helped to negotiate. So successfully concluding those negotiations and the interagency deliberations involved was one of my concrete accomplishments at the NSC. I was the intermediary for negotiating the position among the agencies as to what the terms of this agreement were going to be. It was eventually signed before I left.

KENNETH YATES
Chinese Language Training
Washington, DC (1988-1989)

Deputy Public Affairs Officer

Kenneth Yates was born in Connecticut in 1940. He served overseas in the U.S. Army from 1969-1962 and received a BA from the University of Pennsylvania in 1967. After entering USIA in 1967, he was posted abroad in Seoul, Kabul, Tokyo, Reykjavik and Beijing. Mr. Yates was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1997.

Q: Today is March 20, 1997. This is an interview with Ken Yates being done on behalf of the Association for Diplomatic Studies and Training and I am Charles Stuart Kennedy. Ken, could you tell me when and where you were born and something about your family?

YATES: I was born in New London, Connecticut on the 10th of November, 1940. I began with the Second World War. My father was a salesman. He had the eastern part of Connecticut for Sunshine Biscuits and sold cookies. At the time I was born, my mother was not working, but when I got a little older, she entered the workforce and we became a two-income family. I grew up in Mystic, Connecticut, which is a small seaport town.

Q: Whaling town.

YATES: Yes. The whaling museum was right across the street from where I grew up. I used to go over the railing and wander around the museum. It was almost abandoned and wasn't much then. They had the Charles Morgan, an old whaling ship. As a child, my father played on the Charles Morgan when it was a derelict wreck in New Bedford harbor, so we had a family tie to that boat. The Mystic Marine Museum consisted of a reconstructed shipyard with supporting buildings, including a rope-walk, a ship's chandlery, a sail loft, church, apothecary, school, and a variety of other period buildings including homes. Each building had been disassembled at its original site, the pieces numbered and recorded, and then reassembled in Mystic. For example, the old original New York Yacht Club Building was brought to Mystic.

Today, the educational facilities have been expanded but the basic museum was there at the time. Now it costs a high price for a ticket, but then nobody cared if the locals went in and out. I wandered around for many hours. I suspect my interest in Asia became firmly rooted at this time. The collection included a lot of Chinese artifacts, because the whaling ships left the east coast and sailed around the Horn and up into the Pacific where they spent years in the whaling grounds there. China was a coaling station and a place for water and fresh vegetables, so I learned a little bit about history and got a little sense of the rest of the world by jumping over the fence. For example, the ships had rocks in the bottom of the hulls for ballast, but when in Canton (Guangzhou) or similar Chinese ports, they took the rocks out and substituted blue and white pottery which was cheap in China but brought a good price back in New England. A lot of the blue and white Chinese ware that shows up in antique shops in the area probably made its trip to America as replacement ballast.

Q: What were you getting about the role of USIA at that time in 1967? What was the spirit and role and goal of USIA then?

YATES: I mentioned that as a GI in Japan, I had taught English in Sapporo at the American Cultural Center three times a week. One of the things that I learned from that experience was that the Japanese, at least, didn't have much of an idea of what Americans were like but had an intense desire to know more. Save for the American Center, there was really no place where they could easily come to a clear understanding.

In Hokkaido, there is a famous story of a man named William Clark, which I guess influenced me as well. William Clark was a government employee with the Department of Agriculture back in the 1800s who was assigned to a team to go to Japan to give advice to the Japanese. Characteristically, the Japanese were not interested in such unsolicited advice, so when he got to Tokyo, they had no interest in him and sent him away to Hokkaido, Japan's frontier. He went to Sapporo and essentially had nothing to do. Dissatisfied with wasting his time in a job that went nowhere, Clark set about making a personal contribution.

What he did was to found a university on the basis of what a New England college looked like. Today, the campus of the University of Hokkaido looks like a New England town, because the buildings, the layout, and the concept of the university owe everything to William Clark. He also taught English while he was there. He had a class of 18 students, as I understand it, that he taught for only about a year.

His class was all males, of course, and they were young and ambitious. He was in Japan for only about 18 months, but he taught English, founded the University of Hokkaido and had an influence on the thinking that went into laying out the city. It was, on its own merits, a remarkable record of accomplishment. Thus, Sapporo was one of the few provincial capitals of Japan that was laid out in a regular way except what was destroyed in the war and rebuilt later. His short stay at an end, he left Sapporo and hiked back south to get a boat to the main island of Honshu and then back to Massachusetts. He left his students in a little valley called Hiroshima Dani, where today there is a little statue of him. His parting words to his students was "Boys be ambitious." That has come down in Hokkaido folklore to this time.

A few of them really were ambitious, or at least took his advice to heart. Of the 18 students to whom he taught English, four became very senior officials in the Japanese government, senior advisors called ginro. According to the folk tales, they were among the few who strongly advised against the Japanese adventure in China. They vehemently opposed Japanese actions in the Pacific against the Americans. Had there been one, two, or three more William Clarks in Japan at that time and had there been more ginro that had strongly urged against the Japanese aggressiveness of the time, there might have been no incursions into Korea, Manchuria, or China or at least involvement of a significantly less aggressive nature, and we may not have fought the Second World War in the Pacific.

The story encouraged a conviction that if you had enough people to talk about America, not selling an image but accurately telling people about America, much difficulty might have been avoided. If the Japanese in the 1930s and 1940s had understood about this country, they probably would not have fought against us, probably would not have attacked Pearl Harbor, nor would they have directly drawn us into the war. What that would have done to history I can't say, but it certainly would have saved a lot of lives. That convinced me, at least, that there was something valuable in maintaining contact with other people, even on a casual basis, because a person who understands another person and his culture probably won't shoot at him at some point later.

Q: I would like to do each chunk at a time. How did you find studying Korean? You say you have trouble studying languages.

YATES: I was one of the older people in the class, having been to college for one year, three years in the army and six years getting a four-year degree at Penn and then going into graduate school after that. So I was getting on. I was in my late '20s, but others in my class were younger. Language isn't easy at any age, but it sure does get an awful lot more difficult as you progress down life's path. Japanese was basically easy for me since I had lived in Japan and had studied it at Penn. I got my 2,2 and got out of it. But when I switched to Korean, it was back to zero again. Japanese helped a little bit, but even then, Koreans didn't use Chinese characters very much. I had enjoyed Chinese characters a lot. While I was in Chitose with the Army and not otherwise teaching English in Sapporo, on my other off-duty-hours, I took some classes in "sosho," (grass) writing of Japanese characters in a special style. I learned a lot about Japanese discipline, esthetics, and culture in those classes.

Unfortunately, Korean at the time was taught in Roman character equivalents. I guess the theory was that thick-skulled Americans couldn't understand squiggly little writing or something equally indefensible.

Q: Actually there are only 28 characters, so it is not that big...

YATES: It is a syllabary, not an alphabet actually. It is grouped in these clusters of syllables, so you get syllables forming words instead of the single "kana" pronunciation in Japanese. It is more difficult. Phonetic values change, based on their relationship to the following syllable, making it more complicated to learn. At the time, Korean was, and still is I guess, considered the most difficult language for an English-speaking person to learn. The reason for that is, it has Chinese characters and a very complicated grammar. Someone once told me there were 2,000 separate verb forms for each verb. Whether that is true or not I don't know, but the multiplicity of verb forms is one aspect that makes the language more difficult.

For example, newspaper language is different from the spoken language, and within the spoken language, there are different levels. If you are my classmate, I speak to you one way. If you are one class ahead of me in school, I would have a slightly different twist to my verb endings. At home, you speak to your child one way; to your father, another way; your wife, a different way; and your brother, in a fourth way. There are different levels of language. That doesn't mean they are completely dissimilar, but there are enough differences so that you can make errors very quickly. English-speaking missionaries who spent their entire lives in Korea are famous as the butt of Korean jokes, because they would make errors that sounded all right to foreigners but to Koreans gave rise to a great deal of amusement. I don't know anyone who is not a native Korean who really speaks Korean. Perhaps that is true for most difficult languages. You have to limit your expectations when you begin such a study.

Q: He was in the Japanese army wasn't he?

YATES: Not quite, he was in the Manchurian army which was run by the Japanese. I know a fair amount about Park, because when I went back for an MA, I did my thesis on him. I fault our intelligence services for not devoting the time and energy to do a better job of looking at foreign leaders. It was always a source of frustration to me that our senior leadership did not have the benefit of careful biographic data on their counterparts. What I had seen was mostly the most cursory impressions, much like what you read in news accounts. More important is a better understanding of the elements of the training and experience that serve as the foundation for attitude and prejudice.

Park Chung Hee was a country boy, basically a teacher who was given a break by the Japanese. His later biographies are not very good. He was recruited into the Manchurian army. At that time, Manchukuo was a Japanese state in Manchuria. The basis of the state, as the Japanese promoted it, was a gathering of the five nations that comprised Manchuria. The problem for the Japanese was that in order to sustain the image of a real nation of five nations, they had to have input from all of the member groups, including Koreans. Park Chung Hee was picked as a Korean who could be trusted. He was very good at martial arts.

Evidently his martial arts teacher was Japanese, and saw something in Park that they wanted. He went up to the military academy operated by the Japanese in Harbin (the present day Changchun), graduated, and spent another two years in Zama at the Japanese academy where he had more classes. He then went back to Manchuria and became a lieutenant, fighting bandits in north China. When the Japanese lost the war, Park Chung Hee somehow got himself to Beijing and was then repatriated to Korea. He then went on the rocks for a while. Opposition folk claim that he turned into a drunk and a wastrel, but I doubt that, given his character. He was always fond of drink, even the otherwise lower class Makkoli, a sort of rice beer. His brother was active in the communist movement and Park Chung Hee was eventually arrested and was sentenced to death by court.

Q: Would this have been under the Syngman Rhee government?

YATES: Yes. He was sentenced to death for collusion with the enemy who were the communists of the time. His brother died fighting some place (actually, he was executed). Park Chung Hee had been known by a Japanese name during the period when the Japanese had forced all Koreans to adopt Japanese names in an effort to forcibly integrate Korea as a province of Japan. Chung Il Kwon, a general in the new Korean army that emerged after the Second World War, had also been in the Manchurian army. Like Park Chung Hee, he had served in the Manchukuo Army but had studied for four full years at the Japanese Military Academy in Tokyo. He pulled Park Chung Hee out of the fire by arranging an agreement for him to cooperate. He allegedly turned over the names of everybody who was among the conspirators on the communist side to save his neck. Again, that is a little bit out of character, but possible. He became part of the civilian intelligence apparatus of the Korean army and because of his Japanese military background, he later entered the Korean military academy when the academy got underway. He was in the fourth class.

Q: What were you trying to do?

YATES: The mission had a variety of aspects to it. The major one was to interpret American policy. For example, towards the end of my tour in Kwangju, Nixon visited China, and the Koreans were absolutely convinced that Nixon had sold them down the river. The Shanghai Communique was the only thing we could point to with clarity to convince them we had not. Videotape was a big part of my program and was key to the solution of this special issue.

We copied off-air from Japanese television a tape of the Nixon-Zhou En-lai toasts, the banquet, and the speeches and translated them doing a voice-over. I had a transportable video unit consisting of videotape recorder, a transformer, and a television set. One of my local employees, a driver, and I would show this video at every possible university, business club, school, civic organization, governmental organization, and anybody else I could find, if I could gather three or four in a room together to see that tape. This was to discredit the Korean government's version of what we were doing in China. That was direct support of policy and was one of those rare instances in USIA where we had a clear and unambiguous problem on policy that we could do something with. After about two weeks of very intensive programming around the country, we essentially discredited the Korean government's persistent claim that the U.S. government had ignored Korea and was making secret agreements with the Chinese about policy on the Korean peninsula.

Q: One talks in Japanese terms about the Nixon "shokku". How did the opening of China go down when word came out that Henry Kissinger had gone to China?

YATES: That was what I was talking about. That was a shock. The Koreans weren't involved and didn't know about it. It was as much a surprise to them as it was to everybody else. The shokku that occurred in Tokyo had reverberations in Seoul as well. But what we had to do was, quickly and without any kind of hesitation, put out information on exactly what had happened; that was effective. The repercussions of the disinformation from the Korean government did not last very long. I don't know what happened in Japan.

Q: Yes, the outlook.

YATES: Absolutely. Kwangju is traditionally the opposition capital of Korea. Korea historically was divided into three parts. Korguryo in the north, the hunters and gatherers, as it were, and Paekche and Silla which are the two southern principal kingdoms during the highpoint in Korean culture. The region containing the Cholla provinces was called the kingdom of Paekche. Paekche had close ties to Japan and was considered a cultural capital of the larger Korean society. It also had ties to China. If you look at a map, you will see how close the Shantung Peninsula of China is to the Korean coast.

The southern part of Korea was especially affected by China, for some reason. When I traveled in the southern Chinese city of Guangzhou, the language there sounded like Korean, but of course wasn't; it was Cantonese. The Paekche and Silla people did not get along. At the time I was in Kwangju, there was a sign above a tunnel that goes through the Chiri mountain range which divided Honam (Cholla Namdo and Cholla Pukdo), the old Paekche, from the

The language, of course, is all Korean, and the nation is supposed to be the most homogenous country in the world, but there are a lot of differences there. There is the difference in attitude and language among other things. The Honam provinces of the southwest provinces traditionally have felt discriminated against. They spoke a dialect which was not standard. The Kwangju revolt of 1918 was one of the first civil revolts against the Japanese. The Tonghak rebellion found its roots in Kwangju and the Silla area. The most prominent people of the opposition today are from the southern area, including Kim Dae Jung who is from Mokpo, the port city southwest of Kwangju.

While I was there, they built the first four lane limited access highway from Seoul to Pusan. It ran through Taegu, which is in the Kyongsando region. It came down through areas outside of the Honam region. Therefore, much of the intense industrial development of the time occurred on the east coast of Korea because of this new highway. This was much to the chagrin of the people in the Honam region who felt they were being ignored. They finally put through a double lane “limited access” highway down to Kwangju and then over to Pusan. When I first arrived, all roads outside of Kwangju and a couple of the other larger cities of the region were gravel, unimproved gravel. I spent lots of time on the road between Chonju, the capital of Cholla Pukdo, and Kwangju, where I lived.

Q: I would think so, because I recall one of the young women in my file room came to me and wanted some advice. Her brother was going to go abroad to school, he was an engineer, and she wanted to know which ones he should apply to for scholarships. One school was called MIT and the other was Cal Tech. I said that they were the two top schools in the United States, probably in the world, so either one would be fine. I was impressed, because I had run consular sections in other parts of the world where the students were often going to what I would call rinky-dink colleges which were designed really to take money from foreigners. But these were first rate. But it was in the sciences.

YATES: The Korean system of education, as with Asian educational systems which use rote memorization in general, is more attuned to the kind of mathematical proofs and memorization that is necessary in order to be successful in the sciences. Many don’t know English, but your skills are as good in Korean as in English when mathematics is concerned. You don’t need a lot of language. There is a special international argot, anyway, to the discipline that you probably will pick up in your country. But when you get into reading historical treatises, expressing opinion, doing original research on a topic, those methods were not common in Korea. The Korean system was not to take a Korean student and show him or her how to learn. It was to teach the student what he or she should know, and when they became professors, they would take that knowledge and expand it more. They would have to learn the fundamentals from their predecessors first.

Of course, the Asian tradition of instruction also had good points that are too often overlooked in the West. For example, when I was in Kwangju, I had a good friend, Huh Baek Nyun, whose pen name was Yi Jae. He was an artist, a living national treasure of Korea. He produced magnificent work based on classical Chinese Southern Sung Dynasty principles of art. I would chat with him occasionally in his studio and once in a while, would take a new book on American art. He had long fingernails and would turn the pages very slowly. He would stop and look longer at a particular example, and you could tell he felt that particular picture was good, and usually it was. He had a very fine eye.

He was running an art school and had two sons. The younger son was a doctor and the older was with him to be trained by his father. I asked him how his students were? "Oh," he said, "they are not very good." "Why not, no talent?" "They are too impatient," he offered. "Young people don't understand. They think that you can take a brush and make art. They are wrong. It takes seven years to learn how to make a straight line with the brush. Seven years how to make a dot. After you have learned those two crafts, then you can learn how to make clouds that flow through the mountains, and that is another seven years. So after you know how to make a straight line, and after you know how to make a dot, and after you know how to make the clouds that run through the mountains, then you can begin to create art."

Q: What I got some years later was that Park Chung Hee had made a very wise decision, sort of social engineering, in that he was not going to make the mistake so many dictators do and that is milk the farm of everything in order to make bread or rice cheap in the capital city. He was going to make sure that the farmers were receiving basically fair pay for what they were producing. Was this true?

YATES: I think that is a fair statement. Park Chung Hee was a product of a rural environment. His father was a middle level bureaucrat, but the former President was a small town boy who probably felt some of the traditional resentment of a villager against those sophisticated from the city. However, he was a great reader and that was one of his principal strengths. He read about other strong, authoritative leaders. Kemal Ataturk of Turkey was one of his idols, a strong leader. Nasser was also someone he had a favorable opinion of. There was also talk about de Gaulle as being among his pantheon, but that was less clear. I think it was unquestionable that he had a great deal of respect for Kemal Ataturk. Those are people who had agrarian reforms in their basic programs.

Park Chung Hee spent a lot of time on farm issues. He saw himself as a farm boy, and I think he understood, as Mao Zedong did in China, that the fundamental part of the country is agrarian. Of course, possibly owing to that prejudice, the industrial worker didn't do too well. Korean labor was generally underpaid for a long time and essentially was the way Korea made its economic leaps forward. There were vertically organized monopolies in Korea, the Chaebol, that dominated the country for a long time.

The Koreans are basically tough people. They have had a difficult history, having been walked on by the Chinese and Japanese and had to tough it out all along. Americans appeared on the scene after the defeat of the Japanese and became a presence in their society but were not going to be there permanently. Koreans expect the departure of the Americans will come at some point, although they don't want it right now. President Carter was going to pull us out, but the Koreans got upset about that.

Q: I was there at the time and it was a difficult time—Yankee, don't go home just now!

YATES: An unusual message. The Koreans are not only tough but reluctantly understand to varying degrees that a lot of their chestnuts were pulled out of the fire because of the American willingness to fight against the communist North. Younger Koreans forget that, they don't learn much of their own history, particularly history starting with the Japanese occupation. Psychologically they want to forget that period of subjugation. It was an embarrassment and a terrible time that they would like to see go away. Iceland has the same feeling about the Danes and won't even talk about them because they were in control and that was an embarrassing period in their history. So the Koreans are reluctant to think much about the Japanese occupation period.

They don't like the Japanese for the suffering they received at the hands of their overlords for almost half a century and will continue to dislike the Japanese for the foreseeable future. In this, they are somewhat like the Chinese. The Japanese haven't quite got a clear understanding that such a feeling persists to the extent that it does, but none the less, that is the way Koreans feel. So they are missing an important part of their recent history, a basic part of their formative years as a modern nation.

Most Koreans blame the U.S. for the division of the peninsula. We ran into this all the time. Many think that the U.S. has a responsibility to put it back together again. That question is open to argument based on the post-WWII negotiations that began in Yalta, but I feel that is basically a false reading of history. The naked truth would reveal that nobody thought about it. Perhaps, that is an even worse insult: that nobody bothered to give serious consideration to Korea; it was an after-thought.

With the Japanese surrender, the American military was very reluctant to get involved in Korea. General Hodge was in the Philippines at the time and was deeply reluctant to accept the direct order to go to Korea. Americans knew little about Korea, and apart from a few missionaries, we had almost no expertise in the language or culture. In our post-war innocence, we had much to learn about the complexities of the responsibilities we inherited with the victory in the Pacific. Hodge rounded up as many experts, mostly missionaries, as he could find, and flew to Kimpo to receive the surrender from the Japanese who were fearful of having to surrender to their long-time rivals, the Russians. The story of that decision, to get to Seoul in response to pleas from the defeated Japanese, is one of the interesting side lights of the end of the war. Evidently the basic decision was made in the White House, with a few relatively junior policy makers and military (Dean Rusk, Marshall Green...) carrying the day.

I don't know whether that was a hurried and ill-considered decision or not, but had we demurred, it is likely that all of Korea would be communist today. Mistake or fortune, we were ignorant of Korea and its problems and really did not want to get involved. There was an effort in 1948 to unify the country with a UN vote, but the North pulled out of it. I don't think too many tears were shed in the South when the North pulled out. Korea is not a unified country, despite all the propaganda which says it is the most homogenous people in the world. They have very deep, historic antagonisms. The Paekche/Silla thing is only part of it. The Northerners have always been Northerners.

The split is something similar to divisions in the U.S. between the Yankees and the Dixiecrats. There is a split there, and it is going to take a couple hundred years for things to cool off. The Korean War didn't help it any. If we had fought the Civil War four or five years ago, maybe we would be able to understand the emotional scars more clearly today. I do not believe that the Koreans themselves fully understand these emotions, but they have this emotional thing in their stomach—yes, we must be united, we are all one nation, but not today. During most of the divided period, it was forbidden to teach about or study the North. Collections of materials about the North were kept under lock and key, and anyone attempting to learn about the North was subject to severe penalties under the National Security Law.

Q: What was the impression of who did what to whom?

YATES: The Afghan politics of the time were complicated. The previous king was living in Italy. A prince of the royal family, Mohammed Daud, was serving as President at the time of the coup and was summarily executed. There were a lot of people who were similarly killed at the time of the coup, including people I knew and had worked with. For example, Daud's son, who was a really quiet and shy man with a beautiful wife and two young children, was a television producer. I had worked with him on programming cultural events, such as "Clark Terry and His Jolly Giants," live on Afghan Television. As a producer, Daud's son had worked with us several times on cultural programs. These programs had even included a live performance of a U.S. Air Force band, the first such appearance of an American military band in Afghanistan. He had no interest in politics. If the subject of politics came up, he always politely and quietly demurred. His only concern was his work at Afghan TV and his family. Later, I heard that he was executed, along with his wife and two kids. They wiped out the family. The Foreign Minister under Daud, Waheed Abdullah, with whom I had many visits to bring in guests or reporters, was executed in his office. A lot of people whom I knew from my work were either killed or driven out during that time. Some went off into the hills and crossed over the border into Pakistan.

The source of the revolution was partly ideological but more factional than anything else. The Parchamists and Halquis were the two big major communist factions involved in fighting the government. They feared that the government was becoming more and more Westernized, and each had a particular vision of the fate of the country and, of course, of the leadership which was to assume control. The revolution was not founded on religious differences, even though the communists, for the most part, were atheist, and the Muslims were essentially on the previous government's side. For a long time, the communists had complained about the privileged elite and the clear influence the royal family still had in the affairs of state.

How much direct influence the Soviets had on the event of the revolution is not clear, although their agents thoroughly permeated every part of the military, academic, and administrative sectors of society. Afghanistan was among the poorest nations in the world, according to UN figures on per capita income, and strong willed members of the communists placed blame for continued poverty on those in charge.

Supposedly, the Parchamists had strong ties with Beijing. In fact, I don't think anyone ever proved conclusively that there was this kind of ideological tie. The Chinese were certainly more friendly with one faction than with the other. The Halquis, either by conviction or default, were considered more on the Soviet side. But it wasn't very clear, at least to me. To me, both sides were of the same coin.

After the Saur Revolution, questions began to emerge about which faction would take control. An effort toward a coalition government faltered and then fell apart, as the several factions continued to squabble with each other. This constant internal strife continued on during the later Soviet invasion and is evident today, although with different players, even though the Mujahedeen ultimately defeated the militarily stronger Soviet forces. Today the Taliban are at odds with their former allies, as the unifying effect of a common front against the hated Soviets was lost with victory. Afghanistan has always been infected with factional fighting. The Afghans do things differently from other nation states. They use the Koran as basis for conducting and resolving their conflicts. That meant they had strict rules to their fighting.

There is a little town that you can visit as you pass through from Kabul to Peshawar in Pakistan. I drove back and forth to Peshawar several times through the Khyber Gorge, a spectacular natural wonder that is unparalleled for rough scenery. In contrast, the touted Khyber Pass is little more than a bunch of rolling hills that had the good fortune to become the outermost limit of the British empire and thereby was romanticized by generations of British writers. In three frustrating wars, the British tried to subdue the Afghans and thereby, prevent Russian influence on the subcontinent. Each time they were soundly defeated. That defeat was perhaps as much from the difficulty of the terrain as from the fighting effectiveness of the Afghans, but the result was the same, the humiliation of the British Army.

You have to go north through the Khyber Pass to reach the narrow roads and multiple switchbacks that add a touch of adventure to the spectacular views. It is as though one could drive up and down the mule trails in the Grand Canyon. Particularly in the early or late hours of daylight, the canyons and rills were particularly beautiful, even if the winding switchbacks were dangerous from erratic busses and overloaded trucks plying back and forth to the border and from falling rocks and an occasional herd of goats.

A short distance outside of the Pakistani city of Peshawar to the south of the Khyber Pass, there was a gate which was closed at dusk. It was a gate with no fence flanking either side of it, and the road ran directly through the gate. The act of locking the gate at sunset was symbolic rather than practical, as the Pakistanis did not control the area next to the border, and it was a no-man's land after dark. A small village at its midpoint was a bandit village called Landi Kotl. It was said you could buy anything there that you wanted. You want a DC10 tire? Next Tuesday they would have it. You want the latest refrigerator? They would bring one in. Everything was smuggled.

Young Ne and I visited the town on one of our trips, escaping Kabul for the cultural change from southwestern Asia in Afghanistan to the subcontinental life of Pakistan. In Landi Kotl, people walked around the streets with bandoleers similar to those you can see in the old western movies. All they needed were sombreros, and they would fit right into the archetypal horse opera. They bristled with guns of all sizes and shapes. Rumor held that if you could find a picture of a gun in a magazine, a gunsmith in Peshawar could fashion a reasonable likeness that performed something like the original. It was quite a place. The Wild West in the middle of Asia.

Everybody was armed in Afghanistan, and when the different factions would do battle, they would always go to the mountains. It was against the rules of Afghan warfare to fight in the villages or involve women or the children or the elderly. The rules went so far as to stipulate that you never even involved cattle. You never killed somebody's cow. You never fought in a person's home. So if you were invited to an Afghan's home and he hated your guts because you had killed his brother, he would be a wonderful host. As soon as you left his gate, watch out, because he probably will put a knife between your ribs. But as long as you were in his home, you were a guest. They have very strict rules.

When the fight that swirled about the Saur Revolution spread outside the capital, there was an incident in a mosque in a village south of Kabul. In the aftermath of the struggle, into the village mosque strode a young, bright-eyed communist cadre who pronounced, "All you old men get out of the mosque. This is going to be a museum. We are doing away with religion." The old men attending the service got themselves up, grabbed him, cut his head off, and threw the body along with its severed head into the river. Those in the revolutionary command in Kabul evidently decided that they had to teach this village a lesson to intimidate others who might have entertained similar measures to inflict on the new leadership.

Although I never had the full story, the commonly accepted version that was passed from person to person was that the new revolutionary government in a fit of anger dispatched jets to strafe the village to teach them a proper lesson. Afghans at the time refused to believe that an Afghan pilot was at the controls and guessed that it probably was a Russian pilot, for only a kaffir (non-believer) could commit such a heinous act. Once the carnage became known, it was as if an electric shock passed through the country. The purposeful killing of villagers, women, children, elderly, and cattle was not done by even the fiercest Afghan warrior. It was completely outside the code. It was not Afghan. It matters little now just who sat at the controls of the offending warplane, for the die had been cast, and the course of the eventual fight against the new leadership and their atheistic supporters irrevocably determined.

I had a young man on the staff who we knew was a communist. He was a very talented graphic artist and a generally pleasant person who appeared to be eager to learn and produce quality work for us. On that basis, I hired him. I didn't care what his politics were as long as he produced the quality of graphics we wanted. He would go to his political meetings and probably reported what he saw and heard at work, but we didn't mind, since the messages we were sending were intended as much for his coterie as they were for those who generally sympathized with the West. On one of the mornings following the revolution, we had managed to get the office back to semblance of order and one of my staff came to me and reported that the young man was in one of the back rooms crying and feared to be close to violence. None of the Afghan staff could get him to quiet down.

The reason was that, as a bright young college graduate and a nationalist to the extent that an Afghan can be a nationalist, he had taken pride in the communist revolution which he saw as taking back control of the country from the royalist elite. That morning, he had been coming to work when he saw on the street what he recognized as a Russian soldier in an Afghan army uniform. He became distraught with the realization that this was not what they had fought for.

Their idealistic struggle had not been to turn it all over to the Russians. This was a revolution upside down. He and others in his group had put their lives on the line for those Russians! It destroyed the very fiber of his convictions and violated his sense of justice as an Afghan. Through his tears he wailed, "This is not what we fought the revolution for!"

Afterward in my office, I asked the Chief of my print shop what he thought was going to happen if the things the young graphic artist saw and the stories of the jet strafing a village turned out to be true. He wordlessly shrugged his shoulders and just stood there with his head cocked to one side, looking pained. I pressed, "What are you going to do if the Russians stay; how are you going to handle the Soviet pressure?" The Print Shop Chief who was also a head-man in a small village in the outskirts of Kabul looked up and quietly drew his finger across his throat in a silent threat to the Soviets who had violated his religion, his tradition, and his people. He turned, and without further explanation quietly left my office. For me, it was an encapsulated prediction of what would take years of fighting and bloodletting on both sides to accomplish. But that is essentially what happened.

The foreshadowing of the tragic Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, the slow bleeding of the Soviet forces in an unwinnable war, and the ultimate cutting off of the head of the "Kaffir" Russian troops were summarized in the silently shrugged shoulders and the finger across the throat. To my Print Shop Chief, it was obvious. The Afghans have a creed: if you are wronged, you must redress the injury, an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth. If you were wronged by any member of another family or clan, the wrong must be avenged by a member of the injured clan or family. The injury might be to someone you had never laid eyes on, a distant cousin, but someone of the same blood had a debt of honor to repay the wrong. When the Russians strafed that village, everybody who had relatives who were killed, maimed, or injured was committed, regardless of their politics, to redress the act. The effort to avenge the sin inflicted on Afghanistan had to continue as long as one Afghan had the breath to continue the fight, and fight they did to the everlasting regret of their Soviet tormentors.

Q: Were the Russians involved?

YATES: While the incidents I recounted involving members of the Soviet military were beginning to occur, the Soviet role at the time was on the sidelines, supplying arms and giving moral support to their supporting faction. The Chinese were also in the role of supporting the revolution, but either distance from the action or a general wariness evidently kept them from a more direct role.

Q: I was just across the pond in Korea about this time, and we were just experimenting with a WANG computer there. It was pretty primitive.

YATES: That time was very interesting. One of the other things I had to do, because of my computer connection, was oversight responsibility for our mail system, addressing, which in USIA is called "DRS," the Distribution Record System. I had control of that in Tokyo. One of the problems with our DRS was addressing. In Tokyo, we had to use Chinese characters (Kanji) that are commonly used in Japanese addresses, particularly for names. People would use the phonetic syllabary, "kana" in combination with Kanji for everyday Japanese text, but because of the large number of homonyms in the Japanese language, the kana system is used primarily for inflections on verbs and simple connectives. For such things as names and addresses, you need Kanji, which are based on ideograms, and therefore carries a much more complex meaning than the kana. At that time, Kanji-based language was beyond the relatively simple machinery of the Wang VS-100, at least in addressing programs, and therefore made it necessary to contract our address system out. We had no Kanji printing capability in the embassy itself. I discovered, though, that computers were starting to come into their own, and there were some programs available back in the U.S. that might be able to handle our printing needs from there.

In particular, I found a connection to a GE node in Beltsville, Maryland that was being operated by the Japanese advertising firm, Dentsu, and they had a multiplexed connection to Tokyo working 24 hours a day. What we would have been able to do was to dial up a local number in Tokyo and get access to the GE computer in Maryland. This would have been much like the Internet operates today. In turn, they would connect us with our USIA headquarters here in Washington, and we would be able to exchange data plus use the large variety of programs that were online in Beltsville. They had a Kanji printing program that Dentsu was already using.

The basis of my concept was to do the processing in Beltsville and then, download a print file to us in Tokyo where our address labels would be produced. The advantage of this was economic, since the Japanese contractor was rather expensive and through this process we would have full control in the embassy in Tokyo. International computer connections were a relatively new phenomena, and the Dentsu network was not being used that much. The whole process promised to be a lot cheaper than the contracted services then in use, and we would have the added benefit of all of the software that was otherwise not available to us in Tokyo. As it turned out, we ran into all kinds of problems.

This seems silly now, in light of the vast amount of personal data that is available on the Internet, but at the time, we were worried about transborder flow of information on individuals. We had a name list that, at the time, included what we were sending them, when those materials were sent, plus a record of when a given person attended a program with us. This enabled us to maintain contact with our audience and have a better grasp about our effectiveness. The target audience in Japan, at the time, was broken down into different pieces. At the center, was a small group of about 300 whom we spent a lot of time working with. These were key people in the media, economic institutions, and the government that we wanted to talk with about U.S. policy or simply to mail background material to them.

Beyond that, we had a much larger group of individuals that we would invite to programs and send materials to but would not devote much personalized time to. These included junior professors, younger reporters, people who were coming up but had not yet arrived. They were not members of our "core audience" but were important to us, nonetheless, and certainly were a part of the audience we had to maintain contact with. So we included them on name and address lists. Altogether, we had about 15,000 in the data base for those sorts of individuals throughout Japan.

The operation of the DRS systems always was a controversial topic. Our local staff members helped but were sometimes suspicious, believing that we probably were feeding data collected about individuals back to Washington where it would be used in intelligence or other conspiratorial needs. Of course, nothing of the sort was done, but the more efficient the system and the more productive it was for guidance, the higher the level of local suspicion and anxiety. Some felt uncomfortable with the possibility that personal data on Japanese was possibly being passed outside the country. For most, it was generally all right to keep such information in Tokyo where our local employees had their hands on most of the processes. Efficiencies, such as those offered by the Dentsu arrangement, were understood, but the discomfort was palpable. Technically, it was feasible, and essentially, we had it all set up. All we had to do was sign the contracts to implement a system which, in a limited fashion, would have looked like the Internet does today. Of course, few show much concern about trans-national flows of information today, but at that time, it was a serious problem.

Q: I am interviewing Steve Solarz now, mainly on Africa. His way of operating was to go to a place, have people lined up for him, and then he would also talk to other people. He would vacuum up everything. During the period I am interviewing him for now, he was chairman of the subcommittee on Africa; then he went to the subcommittee on the Far East. But he could talk with tremendous knowledge, because he talked to everybody and did the things you are saying. So he was able to draw on real data and real contact. Sometimes he could be a pain in the ass, because he wanted to be everywhere, but I think he was also respected, because he did what you are saying.

YATES: Although I spent a lot of time in the Foreign Service, I had only the slightest contact with American Congressmen. Solarz, with his evident hunger for straight data, was an exception. Of course, the reason was that I had the data he was interested in. I did have respect for Solarz, although there were a number of CODELs that I had no respect for.

One such instance occurred while I was in Afghanistan. Lester Wolf from New York came to Kabul. An interesting man. My recollection is that he was only there about six hours. He was interested in drugs, illicit narcotics. The embassy had made several discoveries in the area of interdicting narcotics and had come to an arrangement with the Afghan government on the means to handle such investigations. They held announcement of the new arrangements off, to wait for his arrival so that he could attend a show and tell about the progress that was being made. At the news conference, he said, "I came to Afghanistan, and despite all these bureaucrats, I broke the log-jam in the narcotics problems here in Afghanistan." Such a grab for the glory that was based on the hard work of others did not endear him to the hearts of the people who had done so much to make it possible for him to be a part of the final success while he was in town.

That kind of offhand treatment of Foreign Service and other officials working abroad is something that happened very, very often. I saw congressmen and even their staffers coming through, using embassy resources and then spitting on the people who had done so much to help them and made sure their visit was successful. Following an overseas visit where every effort was made to make their visit productive and comfortable, members of the Congress would turn around and criticize imagined standards of living abroad or such things as the "booze budget," the funding needed to provide receptions and food to visitors on such occasions as the Fourth of July. They simply were feeding stereotypes at home to make it appear that they were champions of stringent budgetary guidelines, but the cost of one CODEL far exceeded representational events where real governmental business was transacted to the benefit of American business or the taxpayer.

Of course, there were people in the government who were not like that. In the Carter administration, there was Jodie Powell, whom I had some association with while he was at the G-7 in Tokyo. Normally, when a presidential visit would occur, we would have to supply materials, and everybody in the embassy would take a different part of responsibility. In USIS, one of our responsibilities was to prepare Wireless File materials, a news service we provided to the mission. Included in the Wireless File were summaries of public opinion in the host country and of world events in other areas. The basic service was to keep the presidential party abreast of what was going on and what the local press was saying about the visit. Naturally, USIS would also handle incoming foreign press and briefings and interviews.

Powell was particularly good, because he was accessible. Each day, I would put together the local media reaction plus wireless file materials and get it over to his office. He worked in the basement of the Okura Hotel, which was a hotel next to the U.S. Embassy, so it was easy for us to access. He had a windowless office in the basement, about 7 feet by 8 feet. A very small office, it had just enough room for a desk and a chair. He was always in this office reading. The rest of his people often were pushy and insufferable. But he was smart, capable, knew what he was talking about, didn't waste time, and was always respectful of people who were trying to help him. That was very important for those of us who were grinding out the information.

On the other hand, some of the advance people, in particular, were not very smart. Political advance teams that come out, even for presidential visits, are not always the best and brightest. They were often campaign workers who were given an overseas trip as a reward for their campaign work. I recall one member of the advance team for the Carter visit to Japan that was supposed to be at the airport at a certain time; embassy officials couldn't find him. They were supposed to go to the airport, bring him in, brief him, and get him set up for his work. He had disappeared in Tokyo. After an exasperated search, they finally discovered him in Tokyo.

The story was he had gotten to Narita, gotten off the airplane with his backpack, and went into the terminal to find transportation into the city. Not knowing that he would be met, and evidently not appearing to be of presidential advance team caliber to those who were tasked with meeting him, he checked the cost of a taxi to Tokyo, which was astronomical, and the fare for the airport bus, which was evidently too much as well. So he hitchhiked along the expressway back into Tokyo. He put out his thumb out and got a ride. The great amount of effort spent to track him down because of his ignorance of how things are done created much frustration, a quick spreading story, and did little to encourage respect for the incoming presidential advance team.

There was another incident with the Carter advance team at the time of that visit. As usual with such trips, the President had one schedule and Rosalyn Carter had another. One of the things she was going to do was visit Kyoto and one of the gardens there; I believe it was Ryoanji. The young lady responsible for that part of the trip traveled to Kyoto to set up the visit. She took one look at the stone garden and said this would not do. She wanted carpeting put on the rocks, so that when Rosalyn came and walked out into the garden, she wouldn't slip on the rocks. It took a lot of tall talking to get the advance team to understand that this would not be something that would be possible, because of Japanese sensitivity to the aesthetics of the location. The advance team fought long and hard on that principal, but finally relented when it became evident that the Japanese and the embassy, would not budge.

During the visit, Carter was to make a major speech on economics. Somebody in the bowels of the White House wrote the speech. I don't know who it was, but he or she knew nothing about Japan, its culture or its sensitivities. Luckily, we got an advance copy, took one look, and knew it wouldn't fly. In the last hours before the speech was given, we had to literally rip the whole thing apart and rewrite from sentence one, because it was so crudely written. One wonders how the government manages to keep things connected at home. On the road, it is evident that things fall apart quickly.

When we have had important officials abroad, more than a few times the saving grace has been some poor guy sitting out in the brush who knew the situation and could say, "No, no, don't do this. You are going to screw it up." As we downsize and shut facilities, as we remove people, there are fewer and fewer experienced people to do this, and the logic would be that we are going to make more and more mistakes, as, I guess we did, on the recent trip to China.

Q: You were there from 1982 until when?

YATES: Until 1985: three years. Iceland is technically in Europe but is positioned about half way across the North Atlantic—a very critical place and why public relations are so important there. During the Cold War, much of the Soviet strength was in the Kola Peninsula which sticks up north of Europe. The only outlets from the peninsula without crossing other national boundaries are either by air or by sea, right past Iceland. That meant if we wanted to keep track of Soviet surface, air, and sub-surface activity in the whole Atlantic region, Iceland was the right place to do it. The U.S. military felt that it probably was the single most important military outpost outside the continental US, except, of course, for Hawaii. It was the base they valued the most outside the United States, because it controlled the whole access to the North Atlantic. The Soviets could come out via the Mediterranean, of course, but it was harder because they had to go past all those countries and get through the Straits of Bosphorus and Gibraltar.

A special problem for them was their very large nuclear fleet. Virtually all the Atlantic Soviet nuclear submarine force was based on the Kola Peninsula. It was from there that they could threaten the entire eastern seaboard of the US. When their air flights would go to Cuba, for example, the bombers flying on missions for armament supply or communications, they had to fly right by Iceland because they couldn't overfly Norway or other parts of northern Europe. They had to fly over international waters which meant past Iceland. When they came around the top of the Kola Peninsula, the Norwegians would pick them up on their radar and scramble interceptors to escort them, and then they would pass them off to the U.S. Navy in Keflavik, a base outside of Reykjavik. Keflavik would watch until they, in turn, passed them off to the Brits who would then carry on the monitoring of the flights until they were well along into the Atlantic. U.S. commands would pick them up again when they got closer to Cuba. By then, they were well identified, and we knew exactly who they were and where they were going.

The submarine activity was the most important part, because they were missile boats which would be stationed off the east coast of the United States and a direct threat to our society. They had to pass by Iceland through a rather narrow channel. They were watched by U.S. technical means.

Another aspect of the security situation was that Iceland was also one of our most important points of contact with the Soviets during the Cold War, because of the large Russian fishing fleet that was out there. They were always getting themselves into trouble. The North Atlantic is treacherous water and difficulties for fishing fleets are not uncommon. If you are bent on finding difficulty, that is probably where you will find it.

The U.S. Navy had based an air and sea rescue unit with the “Jolly Green Giant” helicopters at Keflavik. In 20-30 minutes, they could be over almost any spot in the region. They were always rescuing Icelandic fishermen who fell overboard or were injured on a boat. They would go out and pick them up and bring them back to a hospital. We lived in a house in a valley just south of Reykjavik, and just up the hill was the main hospital where the helicopters would take people. At all hours of the day and night, you could hear the chop, chop, chop of the incoming helicopters. Because it was a service that was used often, for Icelandic fishermen the base at Keflavik was a very important benefit. Others in the society found the Keflavik Search and Rescue Teams a great comfort as well, since many of them were related to fishermen. They had sons, husbands, whatever, out on the water and in constant danger out there because of freak storms. You couldn’t survive very long out there in the cold North Atlantic water. You had to get out quickly. You can’t do that by boat, you have to do it by air.

We had incidents where Russian submarines ran into trouble under water and had to surface. At those times, people may have been injured, or there was a fire on the boat, or something happened to cause casualties. The U.S. Navy would go out, pick them up, and bring them to the hospital. Usually, the Russian ambassador would then come over and present his appreciation to our ambassador for the act of assistance. It actually made for quite a happy relationship there between the Russians and the Americans in Iceland.

One of the more curious aspects of the security situation in Iceland was the position of the Chinese Embassy accredited to Reykjavik. The Chinese Embassy in Iceland was one of their largest, and the Chinese ambassador never failed to get any American he could find in a corner and lecture him or her on the importance of NATO. It was a strange phenomenon, to have one of the major communist powers in the world lecturing the head of the democratic bloc that they had to maintain strong defenses in the North Atlantic. But our presence in Keflavik and effectiveness in keeping an eye on possible Soviet adventures in the North Atlantic was important to the Chinese, because it bottled up a major portion of the Soviet forces that might otherwise be positioned against the Chinese.

So Iceland was a very important place in terms of security concerns. On the other hand, Icelanders are very independent. They are an island people, and fishing is a tough and often solitary occupation. In this country if you know New England well, you will understand the breed of independent and tough-minded people. If you are a foreigner in Iceland, you are not considered very desirable, you are an interloper who is often left alone unless there is specific business to be dealt with. Therefore, the presence of about 5,000 Americans just outside of the capital was irksome to many. One said to me once that, in terms of proportions, it was as if a quarter million Germans or others were to be quartered just outside of Washington DC. How would we Americans feel in such a situation?

So they sometimes were uncomfortable with the American base at Keflavik. There was a strong communist movement in the country. Physically, Iceland is quite large. If you look at it on the map and locate the major population centers, it is very much like Afghanistan in some ways. There is a mountainous range in the middle and around the edge along the coast is where everybody lives, whereas in Afghanistan they would be arrayed along their landlocked borders. Reykjavik had a population of about 860,000 people when we were there; not a very big city, but it contained more than half of the country's population.

Of course, there were small towns and villages scattered along the coast line. These generally isolated communities were a hot bed of communist activity, particularly within the trade union movement. It is a little hard to measure Icelandic political involvement; because the country is so small, it has more of the characteristics of a village or small city than it does of a major power.

However, this small country is a member of NATO and the UN. Its voice is important in world affairs. But the Foreign Ministry is very, very small. All of the government staff could probably fit into a not-so-large auditorium. This intimacy can lead to surprising situations. When we first arrived, for example, we were in town for two or three days when one of my staff came to me and asked if I would mind going over and having a session with the president. I said that it was unusual for a Public Affairs Officer to be invited by the president of the country to have a chat, one on one. "Oh, yes," was the reply, "please bring your wife."

Vigdís Finnbogadóttir was president and probably still is. We replied, of course, we would go whenever she wanted us to appear. We went to her modest office and spent about 45 minutes in her office, chatting about where we had been, what we had done, what our plans were in Reykjavik, and about ourselves. She is a very engaging woman who was a French teacher, yet spoke very fluent English, like 99 percent of her countrymen, it seemed. Their intonation is strangely American, which is odd, since they have such a strong influence from the continent. Television, for example, is virtually all BBC.

The president's office shares a house with the prime minister's. You walk into the center corridor of the house, and on one side is the president's office and on the other, the prime minister's. Literally, you could walk along the outside of the building, tap on the window and wave to the president as she worked at her desk. More than likely, she would wave back and return to her duties without another thought. There was absolutely no security. By law, no guns are allowed in Iceland except a few hunting rifles which were very carefully controlled. So there was a very low physical threat, although we did have a bomb threat at my center.

That incident was rather strange and came at a time when we were preparing for the visit of then-Vice President Bush. Although he was stopping only as a courtesy and for a brief rest after an official visit to Moscow, the Icelanders were excited and our small staff were working flat out in support of the incoming mission. One afternoon just after the visit began, we were all working in the third floor offices of the American Center building when someone discovered a suspicious package on the stair landing. No one had been seen coming in or leaving the building, and no one could account for the package. It was innocuous enough, but had a message scribbled on the top of it saying something like “for Israel.” Well, that was enough for me; we evacuated the building and called embassy security to deal with our problem.

That was not a welcome notice. Our American Center was across town from where the Vice President was housed, and even the press center at the hotel was several blocks away. The Vice President’s security did not want to deal with the situation, since there was evidently no direct threat to the Vice President and his party. Of course, we could not resume work and had to find a way to remove the offending package so that we could get back to work. I could not allow the staff, or anyone for that matter, to re-enter the building. We went back to the phones to insist someone take some action. Finally the Icelandic police were called in and embassy security showed up.

Although Iceland has no military, it does have a police force, and there is a special unit in the police that is formed to deal with emergencies. With their jaunty berets and special equipment, that force would, from time to time, practice emergency storming of our building as a part of their emergency training. They were always fun to watch during their drills, but most usually did so with a sense of humor since no one really believed that they would ever be called upon. Yet there we were standing outside of our Center building when the Icelandic version of a Swat Team arrived. All agreed that it probably was a fake, but no one could be sure. That meant that they could not just go in and pick it up, and there were none of the special devices available to go and fetch bombs that you see on TV. The fire department, which had also arrived to our growing scene of excitement, suggested that they take a hose and use it like a water cannon to blow it down the stairs. With visions in my head of the general destruction of our library from a high pressure water stream destroying much of what we had built in a plain but very attractive American library, we tried a bit of negotiation to find a less violent way.

Ultimately, we decided on a fishing technique. With a large fishhook and some strong line, we snagged the package and with the line running down two floors of stairs and out into the parking lot dragged the hooked package outside. Bouncing down the stairs shredded it fairly well without the feared explosion, and it was discovered to contain only animal feces. A bit of a smelly let down after all the excitement, but still a relief and the limp conclusion allowed us to get back to work in support of the visit.

Iceland is a fascinating place with a complicated set of political and national allegiances. If I remember correctly, three times in recent history, the Althing, their parliament, passed a resolution dis-inviting the U.S. from Keflavik. The American Naval Air Station there was noisy, and the local folk did not appreciate it any more when jets took off at 3 in the morning. So there were some base-community relations problems. The communists each year staged a march over the approximately 30 kilometers from Keflavik to downtown Reykjavik. They would drive or be bussed out to the base and then march back to Reykjavik with banners flying as a show of solidarity that the base should go. That was an annual, nettlesome problem for us. The communist movement, however, didn’t have much else to talk about. That was essentially their issue around which to rally their supporters and demonstrate to others in Iceland their relevance to an issue that most people harbored some degree of frustration.

At the time, the country had very high inflation. It was so bad that they even despatched a team to Israel to see what could be done. Israel had a very successful program in controlling inflation, and it was thought that they might be able to provide answers for the Icelandic problem. To those of us who lived there, the problem was seemingly less complex than it was being made out. Iceland had a socialized system where there was free medical care, free education including university, and so on. The problem was that all those free items were very expensive. I would have debates over this with my staff. For example, I would come in at the start of business and one of my staff people wouldn't be there. I would ask where she was. "She isn't coming in today, she has gone to the hospital." That worried me. "The hospital, that's terrible," I fretted, "what's wrong?" "She has a headache," was the response. That puzzled me. "Why go to the hospital for a headache?" "Why not just take some aspirin and come to work?" With a wave of the hand my concerns were dismissed, "No, she will get something from the hospital."

Sure enough, a couple of hours later she came in. She had been to the hospital, and they gave her aspirin. I asked why she went to the hospital when all it took was a couple of aspirin to solve the not very complicated problem. Her response was, "because it is free." "But," I protested, "it is not free, it costs money." She took time away from the office, she had taken her own and the doctor's time, time consuming paperwork was done, and there always was the "free" aspirin. My point was that somebody, somewhere has to pay for it.

And pay they did. Taxes were outrageously high, as they are in most socialized countries. It was very difficult to get them to understand that it wasn't free and that they paid for it through their high taxes which they didn't like and went to great lengths to get around. So there was a constant state of tension between the people and the government on paying taxes, but the people liked the idea of free schools, free college, and free medical treatment.

Q: During this time, did you work with people at the naval station? It seems to me if you have 5,000 troops there, it is quite a difficult mass to deal with in a small country.

YATES: Yes, it was, and that is what caused most of the friction. Community-base relations was an important part of the bilateral political relationship. There was a U.S. Navy Base Public Affairs Officer who was charged with trying to strengthen ties, but my office held responsibility to monitor the situation for the embassy. One of the major problems for the base was the annual march the anti-base groups in Iceland would mount as a demonstration of their desire to have the base removed. They would march from Keflavik back to Reykjavik, about 30 kilometers.

At times, the political forces in Iceland would make a bold statement and vote to dis-invite the Americans at Keflavik. In each instance, the internationalists would jump into the fray and raise popular sentiment to keep the status quo. It was the effect of public affairs relations that would come to our rescue and protect an important defensive outpost and a multi-billion dollar U.S. taxpayer investment. It was a petition drive, not done by us but by Icelanders who felt strongly that we shouldn't go. We were not only important in the defense of Iceland, which has no army or other defensive means, but we were also important to the people who live in Iceland for rescue and other things.

There is a famous story that illustrates this special relationship. One of the volcanoes off the southern coast of Iceland erupted, I believe in the '60s. At that time, the lava flow threatened a fishing village on an island in the Westmanjar group off the southern coast of Iceland. At that time, the U.S. Navy brought in tug boats and pumped salt water up on the lava, cooling it enough to slow it down and form a natural dam north of the village. There was some controversy whether this was the initiative of the U.S. Navy or whether an Icelandic actually thought of the idea, but it was effective.

Anyway, the Westmanjar people, who were fishermen and exposed to the dangers of the North Atlantic, felt very strongly that the American Navy was a very positive thing to have around and any time the question of dis-invitation was raised, they lobbied strongly for us to stay. Consequently, when the Althing passed the resolution to ask the American Navy to leave, a petition drive would start around the country, and a lot of people would sign, putting pressure on the Althing to reverse itself.

In this environment, public affairs played a critical part in maintaining the base's presence. It wasn't a Marine base, like we have in Okinawa, it was a technical base, Naval Air. You did not have ships pulling in, with crews coming ashore on liberty. These were pretty settled people, with families resident at Keflavik. They were pilots and technical people. The educational level of the average U.S. military person at the base was much higher than would be expected at other military installations. Keflavik also benefitted from its status as a remote tour, an assignment that all careerists had to accept at one time or another. Yet, although it was technically remote, families could be brought along. At most other remote sites, you had to be apart from your family for a long period. That meant, despite the weather, Keflavik was a relatively attractive posting for career Navy people. This also meant that the relative stability of the base was higher than other locations.

It also meant that entertainment was more contained on the base than it was at other places with a lot of unattached young males who had off-duty time on their hands. For example, it meant that there was no street of bars immediately on the periphery of the base. Many of the personnel went home from work, had dinner with the family, and spent the evening at school functions or watching videos. Iceland was a relatively liberal country, with less rigid mores about co-habitation among those who were not married. While this attitude in other locations would lead to an explosion of U.S. military setting up house with local women, there was not much fraternization in Iceland. The Icelanders preferred it that way. The base at Keflavik was very much an island apart from the rest of the society. The capital of Reykjavik was only about 30 miles to the north, but the quirky weather and the stand-offish nature of the Icelanders conspired to keep most of the roving lovers on-base.

Still, there was friction. Unavoidably, there were younger people that had the normally active hormones of youth, and since the Icelandic's view of sex was relaxed and Icelandic women tall, blonde, and blue-eyed, the attractions were still strong. Icelanders were famous for enjoying a drink or two, and alcoholism was a national disease. Reputedly, the largest nightclub in Europe, the Broadway, was located to the southeast of Reykjavik, and partying was constant.

The noise of military jets and the usual activity of a major military installation was the source of other strains. There were fishing villages near the base, and the sudden scrambling of fighter jets in the middle of the night to intercept one or another Soviet appearance from the north got many from their beds. These negatives made base-community relations a bit prickly at times. Of course, there was the usual exercise of base tours and Fourth of July celebrations to which the locals were invited, but the strains persisted.

We had to devise programs that siphoned off as much of the resentment as possible. One of those devices was the NATO tours that we ran from the USIS Post in Reykjavik. Usually reserved for more senior members of the government who were part of the decision making process in the capital, the tours were a staple in our programming. The NATO tours consisted of an occasional program of sending Icelanders to other NATO members in the region to receive briefings on the reasons for NATO and how the base at Keflavik fit into the mix of defenses that protected Europe as well as the US.

We especially liked to send the Icelandic NATO tours to Norway. There, the Norwegians, the linguistic cousins of Icelanders and their closest cultural relatives in Europe, did not do any verbal sparring on the subject of defense and gave the rationale for the U.S. naval base at Keflavik in the bluntest terms. In the northern reaches of their country, the Norwegians had a border with the Soviet Union and had nasty memories of the Second World War to encourage them as strong proponents of NATO. There remained Norwegian animosity toward the Soviet Union, and it was not leavened by the even closer geography that Finland had, despite a similarly bad wartime experience. The Finns have a longer, more southern land border with the Soviet Union and face them directly across open water.

So we could always send a NATO tour to the Norwegians, just drop them off, and let the Norwegians take over and give the Icelanders the straight story with much more credibility than we were able to muster. This was especially good, since it showed them that the base was not “American imperialism at work,” as it was characterized by some of the local opponents, but something that others all over Europe had a common interest in.

One of the key elements at Keflavik, and one of the major noise-making offenders at the base were the P3s, the picket aircraft. They would go out and sit on station for a long time, looking for naval or air activity in the defense sector surrounding Iceland, such as Soviet bombers and the surface and subsurface fleets. These aircraft had to fly all hours. Although they were not too noisy, if they found something, they were the trip-wire alarms that would cause fighter aircraft to scramble for an interception.

This sudden blast in the middle of the night would wake everybody up in the villages surrounding the base. Therefore, there was a lot of animosity toward the base, not only because of the presence of the Americans and the beastly noise that stirred their sleep, but also, the main airport for Iceland was co-located on the base. If an Icelander wished to travel to Europe or the US, he or she would have to pass through U.S. base security posts to get to their own airport. For the fiercely independent Icelanders, this was particularly galling. A new airport separate from base security was being built while I was serving there, but this expensive work went slowly and every Icelander who used the airport to travel in and out of the country was pointedly reminded of the American presence.

Naturally, the Americans also were uncomfortable with admitting the general population onto one of the most sensitive intelligence-gathering bases in the world. The situation was made even more stressful by the fact that members of the Russian, Chinese, and other eastern bloc nations would also have to use the airport/base to move in and out of their assigned country. There were numerous occasions when traveling to the base I could see Russian, East German, and even Cuban transport aircraft lined up on the tarmac only steps away from one of the most sophisticated U.S. military intelligence outposts in the world. For all, it was a most uncomfortable relationship.

It was therefore incumbent on the USIS operation in Iceland to take on the public relations difficulties at the base and come up with innovative ways to take some of the pressure off. Icelanders have a very traditional social structure. For example, the elders of the village had a lot to say about what people think in the town and how they consider outsiders. Their opinions were more important than most. So using this social characteristic as a stepping off point, we organized a special NATO tour for the elders around the base. This would involve the most significant opinion makers in directly experiencing why their discomfort was for an important cause. Although we could do little to relieve the occasional roar of aircraft, we could bring them to understand why that was necessary in the larger scheme of the defense of Iceland and her neighbors.

Unlike the usual NATO tours, we flew them on P-3s, one of the aircraft that were often flying over their heads. To get permission for civilians to fly in military aircraft, we had to go to great lengths to convince the legal minds at the Pentagon that it was necessary for the success of the program. We had to go all the way up the line as far as Defense Secretary Casper Weinberger for approval to carry civilians. We were in a period in which the civilian use of military aircraft was being severely criticized, so we had to get approval from the highest level. Yet it was considered important enough, because we were having serious troubles around the base.

Selecting a number of the most senior officials from the villages surrounding the base, we put them on the P-3, took off, and let them experience what the P-3 does. They were taken on an unclassified mission, flying low over the water and learning how those planes intercepted surface activity. The detection of sub-surface activity was classified, and they had to settle for tracking Soviet warships on the surface. Then they flew them to England and Scotland and let them talk to people.

It worked magic. It took much of the steam out of the complaints from the communities surrounding the base. These respected elders could go back home and tell their families and neighbors what was happening when those noisy machines took off in the middle of the night. They could re-live for others their first-person experience of what it was like and relate why it was so important to keep track of the military activity that threatened them, as well as the rest of Europe and North America. They were still wakened but now had a more visceral and intellectual understanding of why. That program was very successful in taking a special problem and taking much of the sting out of it, even though the basic cause of the difficulty could not be removed.

I had other duties to manage in regard to the base, but mostly they involved staying in touch with the base information officers and monitoring their programs to insure that they were fully consistent with overall policy and offered no unintended damage to the delicate balance of the larger Icelandic public opinion. The base information program was perhaps more intensely aimed at troop morale than it was at off-base problems, and I had nothing to do with the base newspaper or the other morale and recreation activities conducted there. The only time I was brought into the picture was when their activities moved outside the base and affected Icelanders.

It was not only the problems of the base that bothered the Icelanders. U.S. policy in other parts of the world often intruded into the Icelandic consciousness, many times with negative results. Iceland was upset, at the time, with American policy in Latin America. This was the time of conflict in Nicaragua and Guatemala, and things were not going very well for us in Central America. We were getting hit domestically on our policy in that region, and many Icelanders were really upset, particularly Iceland's university students who identified with small nations evidently being pushed around by a superpower. There was a special nest of post-sixties radical students on the University of Iceland campus, and they were hitting us hard on Latin America. We were getting much bad press, and a barrage of critical articles appeared. Even the newspaper that was most often supportive of U.S. policy was giving us a hard time. Of course, the American press itself was highly critical, and the Icelandic press was simply picking up much of their copy from their usual sources. The result was an alarmed and antagonistic people, upset with our policy.

At that time, we also invaded Grenada, and that simply added heat to an already hot issue. One of my most difficult times in Iceland was to go on Icelandic state television for a half-hour interview about Grenada and getting hardball questions thrown at me. What was the purpose of our presence there? What does all this mean? Is this an example of continuing American imperialism? Is this "manifest destiny" in operation? Such questions were of the "have you stopped beating your wife" kind. I am not sure I convinced a lot of Icelanders, but I think the program helped to pour a bit of oil on the roiling waters.

More effective was a program we brought in from the US. A woman, a former nun who had married the Nicaraguan minister of labor after leaving her order, had very strong feelings about what was going on in Nicaragua at the time. She came to Iceland under our auspices, to bring a first person account of the Central American problem to Icelanders. She was not a strong fan of American policy and found much to prompt criticism. Yet she wasn't terribly bitter about it and knew from her own direct experience what was going on there. She understood that the fundamental problem was locally generated and did not have a great deal to do with the Americans. We just got caught in this web.

Her husband had been incarcerated, and she had had a very bad time of it. The first person account and her church training in presenting a story in the most human terms made everyone who heard her come to a new, more complex, understanding of the virtually unsolvable problem of Central America. We brought together many of the people from the university, our strongest critics, younger people, and some of the older radicals in town. Most of the people who came to the meeting were communists or inspired leftists. They were a group who were not among our usual crowd at the USIS Center programs and library. Many were highly suspicious of our motives and came to scoff.

Yet the topic had enormous drawing power. They had such deeply held feelings, they had to be present for the discussion. The program had a stunning effect on them. There were people in tears during the meeting. The empathy that the former nun was able to develop with these people was just incredible. She reduced all the coolly distant press coverage down to the most human terms. Her credibility was high and her presentation effective. Almost overnight, the drumbeat of criticism of our Central American policy stopped in Iceland. Icelanders still did not agree with us on the principles and remained suspicious of our big-power motives, but they began to become more sophisticated in their thinking and more aware of the real situation.

A student leader from the university, the one who was the spearhead of this whole effort on campus, was at the program. After the program was over, he walked into my office alone, sat quietly on the couch, and said, "I want to make sure you understand. I am not a supporter of American policy in Latin America, but I didn't realize how much I didn't know. I am going to have to go back and study more." That was a great victory. What it meant was that, for the first time among the left in Iceland, reason and intelligence was being applied to the problem. It essentially knocked the stuffing out of support for radical opinions on the motives for US' Central American policy. It is rather unusual for a USIS programmer to see the direct results of a specific program so starkly. It also was one of the times that confirmed an emotional commitment to the work and offset all the times that "evidence of effectiveness" hadn't seemed to surface. So much is usually taken on faith when a particular grantee returns from a month's international visitor program in the U.S. or a visiting lecturer comes and goes, seemingly without a ripple, yet the cumulative effect builds unseen and unsung. This experience, however, was different and most satisfying.

Q: You say there was a communist party in Iceland. Was this a Soviet controlled party?

YATES: The Soviets didn't control it, although I think they would have liked to. I think they were smart enough not to try. My USIS Center was in a separate building in Reykjavik. The only other thing that was in the building with us was a post office downstairs. Once every month, the Russians would mail out their propaganda. They outproduced us by a wide margin. It was clear that our budget for direct mail materials came nowhere close to what they were spending. We could always tell when the Russians were mailing, because downstairs the trash cans would get filled to overflowing. The reason for this was that, since Iceland was very small, a lot of the residents of the west end of Reykjavik had post office boxes in the small unit downstairs. People would stop into get their mail and find their box stuffed with the Russian product. Like junk mail everywhere, it was immediately tossed aside, unread. Much of this offal ended up in the trash bins in the Post Office, so they did not have to carry it home.

The Icelanders must have done marvelously well with their recycle of paper. We were delighted to see all this trash, since it represented a failure of the competition and made our relative dearth of similar materials easier to bear. Nonetheless, the Soviets persisted in their big effort. Part of their lack of success probably came from the fact that Icelanders are very independent. They are feisty people. "Don't tread on me" is something that could be used in Iceland, as well as for our "in your face" forebears. The communism we saw in Iceland was not the communism that we would see in China or the Soviet Union. The Icelandic communists were "social" communists, a wish for a utopian communalism rather than the Moscow tied communism we were combating in Europe.

It was awfully hard to get people to understand this distinction. The awareness of a difference was particularly a product of having to work with those who would probably define themselves as "communists" but who would be hard pressed to explain their beliefs in the manner Americans would find convincing. I served in China, Iceland, Afghanistan, and Japan, and all had communist parties, but they were all distinctly different. While there was a worldwide movement (there was no question about that), and a worldwide threat from the Soviets and from the Chinese to some extent, it never caught fire. Even then, it was clear that their economic system was not working in any one of those societies that professed to be the "wave of the future." Other nations, as they became more sophisticated, began to realize the thing called communism sounded good to some of their people but did not work in practice. It caused severe economic problems.

I think the Icelanders recognized that. During the time I was there, they began to get a handle on the tax problem. They began to make noises about charging people tuition at colleges. They were openly worried about students who would attend school but not study. Why should they? It was "free." There was nothing there of value for them to learn. So as the realization that the "free" aspects of society the communists offered were not really "free," as someone in the society would have to pay the taxes to support those "free" activities, public attitudes drifted away from communist dogma.

Still, the communists in Iceland were able to maintain a semblance of influence through the strong ties they maintained with several labor organizations and other public groups. In particular, the labor movement in Iceland was a strong part of the communist movement. For a USIS program in Iceland to be effective, it had to address the very labor groups that were the backbone of the remaining communist effort.

One of the successes of the USIS program in Iceland was the invitation to the head of the carpenter/plumbers union to go on a special program that was run by the AFL/CIO here in the US. The plan was to talk about what the American labor movement is, what its themes, goals and practices were. This was a man who was at the forefront of the anti-base movement, or at least his organization was one of the major funding supporters. Needless to say, he was highly suspicious of the United States. I remember when I invited him to come into the office and talk about his visitor grant. He initially said that he did not want to go and would not have gone except that the AFL/CIO was a labor movement and he was a strong unionist. He just could not resist getting together with other labor union types and was curious. Yet he was really suspicious. He returned to my office to pick up his tickets and was very uncomfortable. Although he was a highly intelligent person, he simply picked up the tickets and left without saying much.

About a month and a half later, he returned. He had on a necktie and white shirt, had lost the Leninist cap, and appeared full of cheer. I asked how things went on his trip. Now talkative, he responded, "Very interesting." I pressed for more details. He said, "Well, I didn't realize that the AFL/CIO is a real union." He had thought that the AFL-CIO was just a puppet organization. But he was really surprised when he discovered that it was a genuine, and very feisty organization. That recognition turned his concepts upside down and resulted in a re-evaluation of his own priorities. One month of traveling around the U.S. looking at different union activities expanded his horizons greatly. As I noted, he was very intelligent and had clearly been misinformed.

After this experience in the US, he gave a lot of thought to the direction and emphasis of his own organization. Whether it was a direct result or not, is not really clear, but not long after his visit, his union pulled out of the consortia of unions that were the financial underpinning for the communist movement in Iceland, including the anti-base march. His union was the most affluent of the unions, so when it pulled out, they lost a major portion of their financial backing. Subsequently, the communists lost their office that had been located in the Carpenter/Plumbers Union building and were unable to muster enough financial or popular support to sustain the large anti-base marches that had for so long bedeviled bilateral relations. While it would be an over-simplification to credit all of the change to a simple international visitor experience in the US, it would be equally unrealistic to ignore the obvious effect on the union and its leader.

Another aspect of the gradual loss of influence of communism in Iceland can be found in the activities of our ambassador. Marshall Bremant was one of the best US experts on Russia. He spoke Russian and was very familiar with the communist movement and its efforts, having served in Moscow. As U.S. ambassador to Iceland, he began a program of social interaction with the communists that was very controversial among those who considered themselves our traditional friends. Conservative Icelanders felt that the ambassador had gone too far in coddling the communists and their leftist sympathizers. That really rankled them. They expected the U.S. ambassador to take his usual role of strong anti-communism and not have anything to do with the group they despised.

Those who considered themselves generally conservative would attend embassy functions and would be elbow-to-elbow with communists. The political divisions in Iceland at the time were so severe that if two opposites were walking down the same side of the street, one or the other would cross the street rather than pass by his or her opponent on the street. I had people come to my office and say, "What is the ambassador doing? These are communists at his party. Doesn't he know that?"

We even had a case where one of the communists I knew came to a reception at the embassy and during the conversation said, "Will you excuse me a moment please?" Clutching the drink he was socially nursing, he walked down the stairs from the ambassador's residence, went out the front door, crossed the street, and joined the crowd where his band of fellow communists with anti-American signs were. He kept the drink in his hand, while participating in the cheering against the US. When the cheering was over, and the small crowd disbanded, he walked back up the stairs and into the reception with his drink still in his hand and full of his usual good cheer. Evidently he did not see any particular contradiction in his conduct.

What prompted his demonstration of a split personality was the efforts of the ambassador to incorporate these antagonists into a reasonable dialog. That relationship gradually expanded, with leftists and those who might be considered “social” communists, slowly drawn into what would have been condemned by their peers as a compromising situation not many years before. This effort, coupled with more formal programs such as the NATO tours, the international visitor program, and the constant visits of speakers in USIS programs, all added to the gradual weakening of the intellectual commitment of many to leftist opposition to U.S. policy. It contributed greatly to their gradual diminution as a serious force, either against the base at Keflavik or against America as a nation.

The ambassador did a marvelous job of accelerating that process, but I do not think he ever got full credit for that from State or from the conservatives in Iceland who constantly grumbled over his unusual practices. Because of his controversial personnel policies that affected all within the embassy community, he later suffered a loss of confidence that never was repaired. While he almost singlehandedly disemboweled the communist movement in Iceland, he was not to enjoy the fruits of his victory with the accolades of the bureaucracy. Instead, he came to be roundly criticized and eventually hounded out of the service.

The conservative Icelanders harbored very strong opinions about dealing in a civil manner with leftists or communists. In USIS, we sponsored periodic delegations of Icelanders on the NATO tours I already discussed in relation to the problems of the base. There was a particular correspondent on Icelandic state television who the conservatives in Reykjavik thought was a closet communist or at least a strong leftist. They didn’t like him and resented his growing prominence on Icelandic state television. One of these tours came up, and I selected him to join it. He was smart, affable, young and probably had a good future ahead of him in the Icelandic electronic media. So I picked him and he readily accepted.

I got a stiff call from some conservative Icelanders, saying I couldn’t do this and they would not cooperate with us if he were to go on the trip. They argued that he would not be suitable for a NATO briefing and tour. In fact, the Icelandic ambassador to NATO in Brussels said he would not have this man in his room, never mind allow him to visit NATO headquarters as a guest.

This was quite a dilemma. The NATO tours were specifically aimed at demonstrating the value of NATO in protecting the security of Western Europe and the US. They were very effective, as I knew. But could we afford to antagonize our Icelandic allies in a confrontation over principles, even if we were convinced that we were right? There was nothing to be done except follow through with the trip, but the Icelandic ambassador at the NATO Headquarters in Brussels had refused to consider the possibility. After wrangling a bit, we decided to go forward with the trip, but skip the NATO Headquarters in Brussels. This time we would send the group to Berlin and see first hand what the confrontation was all about.

That change in plans neatly sidestepped the Icelandic ambassador’s ability to interfere with the trip, since it was fully U.S. funded and we needed no blessing from Icelandic diplomats on what we could or could not do. We meant no confrontation but felt simply that the value of the NATO tours was that people like this television personality could experience a different point of view.

We had to proceed without allowing anyone else's political agenda from restricting our judgement of what was best and in the U.S. interest.

So the trip went generally as planned, save for the visit to NATO headquarters. Some felt that was not much loss, since the briefing in Brussels was seen as very dry and uninspired. Some advice we received was that skipping Brussels was not much of a loss. The group went on to West Berlin instead. They visited the Wall, which was still in existence. The Wall was always a sobering experience. There was almost religious in actually confronting the police state across the small no-man's-land that divided the two halves of what had been the German capital. Something also happened to our special grantee upon witnessing the reality of the Wall. The watchtowers, the concertina wire, the Wall itself covered with the graffiti of hundreds of Germans who hated its reality and its symbolism.

He returned from the NATO travels a changed person. In no way could he be considered converted from his vague socialist or leftist beliefs, but he now more resembled a liberal American Democrat than a Russian communist. He had a sort of epiphany at the Wall. He just could not conceive of what he saw. The grimness of the Wall was beyond his wildest imagination. It communicated to him the communist style of oppression that so many people around the world had known and lived with for so many years. He had never viscerally felt that before. Iceland is an island, a nation apart. For a short period, the Danes had occupied Iceland, but there was never oppression of the Soviet brand. Icelanders prefer to ignore their colonial status as an aberration of history, something to be forgotten as a bad dream that has no relevance to life as it is lived. The visit to the Wall brought up short any illusions of the benefit of the Soviet system.

To some degree, the visit pulled away some of the dust of illusion from around his eyes. I can't say he turned into a new conservative, uncritical of U.S. policy and accepting all that we offered, but he certainly became a very important contact for me at Icelandic state television. In fact, he was my interviewer at the time of my Grenada interview, which was from my point of view a very positive thing, because it allowed me about half an hour of Icelandic state television air-time to explain the U.S. point of view to everyone in Iceland. No amount of other effort could duplicate that opportunity. I never again had any contact with the Icelandic ambassador to Brussels, but we resumed our NATO tours, including the normal stop at the Brussels headquarters. Perhaps the briefings continued to be dull, but it was important to have people see the headquarters and get a sense of the cooperation which was at the root of the NATO organization. I wished that all could visit the Wall in Berlin, but it was slightly off the main topic of the tours, and I had to satisfy myself that, at least in one instance, it did make a difference.

Q: What were you doing?

YATES: Two things. The first year I spent in the Office of Management. I wrote a study of USIA's efforts abroad to keep track of our audiences, understand who they are, where they are, and how well we are in touch with them. For the other three years, I went across the street to the Voice of America where I was a Special Assistant to the Deputy Associate Director for Modernization. He was in charge of all the relay site improvements around the world. It was a major program. There was $2.8 billion dollars worth of work to be done around the world to upgrade our Voice of America facilities. We were still using vacuum tubes in our transmitters in many places around the world, including some of the major sites in the U.S., and that meant that our facilities were antiquated. My participation in the modernization program lasted from 1986-89. Then I went into language training for Chinese, continuing on to Beijing at the end of 1989.

Q: Tell us something about your work at VOA.

YATES: The Voice of America had a modernization program to upgrade its aging facilities. I was a special assistant which meant I was the right hand man for the person who was heading up the program, Mort Smith. I had known Mort many years before when he was the Deputy Public Affairs Officer in Seoul and I came in as a JOT. Our connections went deeper, for my first post in Kwangju was once his post. He was Area Director for East Asia when I was in Japan. He then had taken over the modernization program of the Voice of America and asked me to join him. The program was involved in making treaties with the various countries abroad where we could build new relay stations and then stations which would eventually be turned over to the broadcasting side of the house to operate. At the time, we were working on a relay station in Israel. It was in the treaty stage. There was one in Morocco which was under construction. One in Sri Lanka, which was in the final stage of planning and construction. And one in Thailand which was also gradually coming together. We were looking at some of the islands in the Pacific as a possible location for future facilities. Tinian was among the most important of them. While I was at the Voice, my job was to coordinate these things, pull them together, and give assistance to Mort in any way I could.

For example, we had about 200 engineers at the Voice of America doing the technical work necessary to support modernization, to design and build the relay stations, and keep the plant running. Before you built a station, you had to have some idea how it could propagate the signal. Shortwave radio doesn't operate like medium wave, it skips between the ionosphere and the surface of the earth. In some places, it comes in loud and clear, but in others, it may not be heard at all. Under certain conditions, the signal can bounce between the ionosphere strongly enough to allow it to be heard from a long distance. You probably can't hear it within 50 miles, but you can hear it 500 miles away and multiples of miles further, depending on the strength of the signal.

The problem is, where does this thing skip to, because the ionosphere rises and falls based on the time of day, the temperature, humidity in the lower levels, and happenings totally out of control on earth such as when there are solar flares. A lot of magnetic and technical changes can affect the height and the transparency of the ionosphere. Radio waves are energy. You broadcast the waves out and hope they bounce at the right spot to hit where you want people to hear you. There is no point in transmitting from the Philippines, where we were also trying to modernize, in the Chinese language and have it land in Korea or in Russia, but not in China. So the idea is to pick the right frequency, inclination of the antenna, and the distance from the broadcast point so that the skip comes down where you want it to and your energy is focused on that area where they speak the language of your broadcast.

That is a pretty complicated set of dynamic variables. You need a big computer to do enough calculations to maximize the possibility that you will broadcast as efficient a signal as possible. The problem was that the Voice of America years before had bought a large VAX computer built by Digital Equipment Corp. It was a main frame computer with enough power to meet the need, but it was never installed. Instead, it had been placed in storage. The reason was security. The security gurus said we could not use it, because in order to meet the needs of security, VOA would have to build a special room with lead lined walls to keep emanations to an acceptable level. The system would be processing classified information up to the level of secret, so that brought everything to a halt three years before. Since there was no funding to do the expensive work of building a special room complete with lead lined walls, a raised floor, ramps up to the raised floor (in compliance with OSHA handicapped rules), special air conditioning, heavier electrical wiring, and a multitude of other requirements for a mainframe computer, the project was stymied. The Voice had spent about $500,000 for a computer that it could not use.

Mort Smith asked me to figure this out and get it installed somehow. Security was adamant; it could not be done without the prohibitively expensive building modifications. The key to the problem obviously was security. Searching about for another opinion on the security question, I got in touch with a new operation that had just been activated by the National Security Agency. Because of the large number of civilian agencies with computer security problems, NSA had put together a special staff to consider the problems from the point of view of security. Their responsibility was government wide. The person in charge said he would be willing to bring his people over and take a look and see what he could do with it.

We wanted to put the computer on the third floor of what is now the Cohen Building. That location was close enough to the engineers and the propagation people to be useful. Security's original concern was that if the computer was too close to a public area, even the street outside, an uncontrolled person or organization might be able to infiltrate our security by installing sensors close enough to intercept emanations from a running computer. Some felt that equipment was available that might even be parked in a van outside the building to keep a watch on the classified material we were processing.

Yet our third floor location was in the middle of an old, heavily constructed building several floors above ground level. The concept that a large enough installation of equipment sensitive enough to monitor our equipment could be placed either in other offices of a controlled government area or on a street two floors below and at least 75 feet from the internal room seemed a bit far-fetched. The National Security Agency team came to the reasonable conclusion that it was quite beyond possibility that the Russians, the Chinese, or some other group interested in such arcane information would park a large semi just outside our building to try to listen in on the hours long propagation programs running on the new mainframe.

So as we started to strip the problems away, they couldn't find anything as long as we didn't go to a top secret level of information. No one could conceive of such a possibility, so there was no particular reason why we needed a lead-lined room. I asked for and received a letter from the NSA team for the USIA Office of Security; it confirmed their finding that there was no problem. That was enough to allow the project to get back on track. We simply gutted the room, put some paint on the walls and cleaned up the general mess to ready the room for the new installation.

After three years in storage, however, the VAX was so old that DEC asked if we would accept an equivalent replacement, one that the company was still making replacement parts for and could ensure that its operation would be reliable in terms of the warranty. The upshot was that the Voice of America got a brand new main frame computer at no additional cost and was able to install it in a simple, flat floored office environment. Finally, we were able to do our projections and plots and even classified work on the needed computer. It took us about three months to get it in. As far as I know, it is still running.

Another of my responsibilities was to handle relations with Congress through congressional staffers. Since the modernization program involved several billions of dollars in very long-term construction projects, the annual budget review in Congress always targeted the VOA program as something to chip away at. The very young people who were tasked with taking a look at the program for Congress did not have much experience on large scale projects such as the modernization program, yet they had the power to screw things up in federal programs. Even then in the mid-'80s, we had very strong restrictions on funding. They would say, "What do you need this money for?" "You have not even spent the money in last year's budget." "Why should we give you more?" Similar questions were leveled at us from OMB (Office of Management and Budget) whose staffers were often young people with fresh degrees in economics but little field experience.

Of course, the reason was that such long term construction projects required the commitment of large blocks of funding in advance, to be paid out as the work proceeded. These were often ten-year contracts with substantial funding committed in one year and not "obligated" until the year the work was completed. You had to commit money to a contractor to start work. You could not "obligate" (i.e., commit) it until you were satisfied with the sufficiency of the work, but no contractor would begin work if there was any doubt that the money was available. The Congressional and OMB folk said that we had 200 million dollars we hadn't used yet, so we should only come back when that was fully used to request more.

It was very difficult for them to understand anything beyond the near term of next year's funding. So we had to agree that we had earmarked funds for two or three years of several hundred million dollars that was sitting there and hadn't been spent yet, but that money was "committed." Trying to convince these young people of that logic was an interesting and sometimes very frustrating experience. We really needed a steady flow of adequate funding to maintain progress and keep ultimate costs as low as possible. For example, if we are going to build in Sri Lanka, we need to have the money up front to be able to build this station right now, although we are not going to spend the money for three years. It was very hard for them to understand why we had to have additional money.

One of the more enjoyable duties I had during my tenure at the Voice was to accompany Dick Carlson, the then Director of the Voice of America and the person who was in charge of VOA News, to Europe to take a look at the facilities of Radio Free Europe (RFE) and Radio Liberty (RL) and to see what they had and how we might be able to more fully utilize them. I went along as the modernization person and as a bag carrier as well. It was a lot of fun. The trip took our small group to Munich, Bonn, Cologne, and other places, examining equipment and office facilities as well as paying a call on Deutsche Welle, the German radio corresponding to the Voice of America. So the job was not all hard work and sweat at the Voice.

Q: Okay. We will pick this up next time in 1989 when you were taking Chinese.

YATES: All right.

Q: Today is May 14, 1997. Ken, you have some thoughts about working in Washington versus working in the field and also working with Congress.

YATES: I think the experience at the Voice of America put me in a unique position, because I brought with me a fair amount of field experience. I came back to Washington, first spending a year in the management side of things doing a study of our audience records system. But the Voice of America gave me a different kind of exposure. There, I was working with people who were principally Washington budget people, contract people, engineers, and congressional staffers. What I found in that experience was in some ways disconcerting, because not all the people fully understood the purposes for which they were working. They were working very hard, but many of the staffers had never been overseas and did not completely appreciate the end results. They did not have a sense of what was going on in the field, the “why” of what we were doing.

Budget people, people handling congressional relations, and the people who were interpreting USIA Washington to the funding organization, Congress of course, really did not have a very firm grasp of the principle objectives in the field. Some of these people had worked for USIA for a long time. Many others, however, were political appointees who came in from being campaign workers or had experience in business or some other part of government. Those who were the “talent” in the broadcast studios often came from the societies to which they were broadcasting, but even they had only part of the full picture.

The consequence was that Congress, OMB, and other elements of the U.S. government that were intimately involved in our budget process really didn’t have a clear picture of why the money was being spent. Worse, they felt they did have the needed understanding, and could become quickly resentful if confronted by a Foreign Service Officer who had just come in from the field. That resentment was deeper since Foreign Service people serving in Washington simply were putting in time at the “home office” while looking for another assignment abroad. If the FSOs assigned to the Voice were in responsible positions with supervisory duties, resentment was deeper since they were seen as interlopers who were taking positions that should be available to domestic employees who sought advancement.

As a result of this resentment, FSOs generally avoided an assignment at the Voice, since the hostility you had to survive overwhelmed the possibility of deriving a real sense of satisfaction from taking a very responsible position. Some thrived on the challenge, but more often than not, FSOs avoided assignments at the Voice. I did not suffer as much as some, since I was working in a position not in the usual ladder of promotion for domestic employees (although I was replaced by one), and many of the people I worked with were engineers not threatened by one so far removed from their own pecking order.

At the Voice, with the exception of a smattering of overseas correspondents and technical people at a number of the relay stations abroad, the policy people, the broadcast talent, and the people doing the writing and program creation were principally domestic employees. And many of them, particularly on the broadcast side, were foreigners who came in under a variety of contracts, stayed, and later became American citizens and broadcasters at the Voice of America. Again, some of these were very fine people, very smart, competitive and had a true mission as they saw it. The missions did not always coincide with the definitions that were laid out by the posts in their individual country plans.

Often the disagreements between the field and the Voice became strained, but since the Voice was administratively apart from the areas and other administrative portions of USIA, they could figuratively thumb their noses at USIA and do essentially what they wanted. USIA lacked the capacity to listen to all of the broadcasts, much less to translate all those in foreign languages or read the texts.

The VOA charter realistically demands that the news section of the Voice operate without influence from the policy concerns of the rest of the government. This is as it should be. There were "VOA editorials" which were identified expressions of U.S. policy that were cleared both through USIA and State, yet, as we all knew in the field, there was much latitude for inserting troublesome copy that gave posts fits of frustration.

In the field, you had defined goals and worked hard to achieve them. At one time or another, the Voice would carry items or features that would confound our program efforts and confuse our audiences. To citizens in another country, often where controlled media were the rule, inconsistency in the point of view between the USIS post and VOA did not signify a vibrant democracy but rather a confusion of goals in a government that could not keep all of its parts in sync.

The consequences of this confusion have been worsened by USIA's merger with the Department of State and the Voice being made totally independent under the supervision of the Broadcasting Board Governors (BBG) in 1998. In my way of thinking, any move to make the Voice more distinct from official channels is a disservice both to those who work there and to the taxpayer who should expect an efficient and purposeful American voice abroad.

I suspect that the people who were involved in the changes and the people who were making budgetary decisions were not very well versed on what we are doing abroad. Not that it was secret, but it was difficult to find anyone who could put subject and verb together on the topic of U.S. information abroad. We were supposedly communicators, but we could not communicate at home. Part of that is Congress, because like other federal agencies, USIA cannot not use taxpayer funds to "lobby" Congress as we were enjoined against doing that. Again the law has a good purpose; to ensure that a government in power could not propagandize the citizenry using their own tax dollars. Yet this meant that the people who were paying the bills could not really understand what their taxes were being used for. It was a clearly understood rule that we were not to broadcast to audiences in the US.

Superficially, it sounds fairly simple. You put up an antenna, hook it to a transmitter and a microphone, and you are on your way. But in fact, you are not. Even with years of experience abroad and a fairly good knowledge of the receiving end of VOA broadcasts and their impact, I was surprised at the complexity of the operation. There were two hundred engineers on the staff, and they all worked hard, because moving a reliable signal from broadcast booth in the U.S. to a listener, often in a denied area abroad, was a very difficult problem. Mistakes in propagation cost the American taxpayer a lot of money. You have to burn fuel to put a signal in the air. If the signal doesn't land where you want it to, the money you spent on fuel is entertaining turtles, a common metaphor of the time.

There were charges, for example, that in Central America where local topography and the politics behind the choice of a location meant our relay station in Costa Rica essentially broadcast into a lake. Other parts of the country could hear the signal, but large amounts of energy was spent pumping a signal into the water. They were the most well-informed turtles in the world. The only way we could tell how well our signal was getting through was from responses back from the field. Our monitoring of programs were not very good, because we lacked sufficient funding to hire people to listen and submit accurate reports. Often we had to rely on roving monitors who would move around the world, sampling the signal in varied locations and conditions. At other times, we were able to convince a bored housewife from the embassy community or a patriotic Fulbright scholar to take on some of those duties. Volunteer work can save a lot of money, but results can be uneven. Bureaucratically, however, economies had to be made somewhere, and monitor payrolls most often came up short.

An example of our reach was in Guangzhou in China. China was then and still is, I am sure, one of the more important customers for the Voice of America. We have a Cantonese service which absorbs a lot of time, money, and energy. The heart of the Cantonese speaking region is Guangzhou, the old Canton. But there was a great controversy over whether or not the people in Guangzhou could actually hear the Cantonese Service. Some people said, "Yes, no problem." Other people said, "No." There was not a large volume of mail from the area.

Q: During this period did we have a consulate general in Guangzhou?

YATES: Yes, we did. The Branch Public Affairs Officer there was among the people who were telling us they were not hearing the Voice of America. We would send an engineer out from Hong Kong with a radio, and he would sit in a hotel room or ride and bus and try to listen. The reports that he would bring back were not terribly encouraging, they were confused. Travelers from the embassy and other visitors with other business would volunteer to report on the reception of the Voice while in town. Often, they would say that the English service and the Mandarin Chinese service could be heard, but Cantonese was nowhere to be found. Still, that reporting was admittedly not reliable. The problem was getting Cantonese-speaking volunteer monitors to make the effort.

Reception is not easy when you are abroad with an international radio. It is not the same as turning on the old reliable FM or AM station in your home town. Shortwave radio is subject to variations in clarity, signal strength, natural and man-made obstacles, and interference from both intentional and random sources. You have to tune it in carefully and keep adjusting the tuning as the signal fades or interference blocks out a clear signal. At times, you can hold a weak station for a while, only to lose it as atmospheric or local conditions change. It is difficult to listen to.

Sometimes you can find the desired signal, but it is not comfortable listening. The loss of a signal may have involved antenna orientation, time of day, the frequency that it was broadcast on, or the position of the sun. The only broadcast facility that we had close enough to expect a reliable signal into the Guangzhou region was in the Philippines, a long way from the Chinese coast. The Philippines carried the burden of broadcasting to East Asia and China in particular. We had a transmitter site in Thailand, but mainly medium wave. Beyond that, there was nothing much else. There was Sri Lanka, but that was even more remote. The skip on each hop is 500 miles and every time you get further away, the wave loses energy. As distances increase, the reliability of the signal diminishes proportionally. Some sites in the world are remarkable, and a signal from there gets almost anywhere. Unfortunately, most VOA sites are the result of political and economic compromises, and the engineers have to try to do their best in very difficult conditions.

Earlier I talked about the installation of a computer. That computer used a program that was created by another agency in the government to approximate propagation around the world based on the magnetic field, the conditions of the ionosphere, the time of day, the position of the sun, etc. You dump all of these variables into a computer, and it is supposed to tell you how strong a signal is in a given area at a given time. There are more variables, the type of antenna, the amount of power you are putting behind the antenna, etc. and these things cost an awful lot of money.

There is only one place in the world where it is thought that conditions are almost ideal, and that is in Ecuador. There is a particular mountain in Ecuador from which you could reach almost any point in the world with a shortwave radio. That is why a lot of Christian broadcasters have located there. But for us at the Voice of America, locating a relay station was a political question. What government in its right mind, even our close and strong allies, would allow a foreign government to come in and broadcast from its soil. Very few. And only in those places where we had special situations, like the Philippines, could we get permission. Even then, our flexibility is very closely circumscribed. We could only broadcast in languages that were not native to the country. We had to promise we were not broadcasting to the natives of that country. And of course, we had to pay a lot of money up front for facilities on the ground and training engineers and staff and hiring the local people. So it gets very complicated.

Another example of that problem is the experience of Radio Free Asia. Where do you put it in Asia? You can't get there from California, although we had one of our stations in Dixon, California broadcasting to Asia and to Latin America. Latin America is a better shot, but they tried to get to Asia and it was not very successful. They had the same problem. You put a lot of energy behind a signal, and it bounces and loses some more to the turtles. Every time you bring it back up again, varying conditions in the ionosphere mean a longer or shorter hop, so the computer would plot the hops and try to tell you with a fair amount of accuracy whether or not you are going to hit what you want. Another problem was a signal that was excellent one day would be terrible when a sun spot storm appeared. It is an engineering nightmare.

Try to explain that to someone in Congress. It is hard enough to do that here when I have the time and a patient listener. Imagine what it was for a harried, frenzied, busy, "I want it on one page" kind of staffer from the Hill. Therein was the rub. My boss, Mort Smith, was working very hard at trying to negotiate some of these deals like Morocco. The king of Morocco was a great help to the Voice of America, and we were building a relay station there. It turned out we were building it in a watershed area which tended to flood every year. So what they were doing was building up a station on what were small islands above the usual flood crest. For most of the year, they were in a dry sea, but this was the only land that was politically expedient. I was told that the Morocco station construction was the largest earthmoving project in the history of man. This was long before the Chinese began the large Yangtze dam, which may replace the Morocco station for “biggest” honors.

At great expense, we put antennas, facilities, and power equipment on tall dunes, which we were building to try to stabilize them. VOA was able to get permission from the king for the site, but the construction costs amid a flood plain made the cost of the station much larger than most. Those were the kind of real problems that faced the Voice of America’s engineers. If you found a country agreeable to a relay station, it was not always the best place in the world from which to broadcast. The best countries were not always accessible to us.

We had great trouble in Israel, for example, putting in a relay station to broadcast to the Arab world. This was a place where you would think it would be fine, politically. The difficulties were military and environmental. The place in Israel that we were negotiating to use was up near the border with Jordan. The Jordanians also had a little problem with this construction. Not only was there a fear that transmissions from the station would cause political embarrassment to the government, the area in which the station was to be located was on a fly-way for migrating birds, and Israeli and Arab environmentalists just ripped the project plans apart. They said the birds would be injured by the wires in the tall towers that would be necessary for the transmission equipment. That alone put the project on hold for a long, long time.

Israel was also afraid that Israel fighter jets and military helicopters might be affected by the high energy levels put out by the transmission facilities. There was a suspicion that the emissions would interfere with the “fly-by-wire” control systems of several models in the Israeli inventory. Engineering tests over similarly powerful short wave transmitters in the U.S. confirmed the manufacturers’ assertions that there would be no problem, but the Israelis were suspicious nonetheless. The area available for Israel to maneuver modern, high-speed aircraft is very limited and every square mile of the country is a part of their exercise area. The upshot was that the project was indefinitely stalled, while things such as the environment and military questions were sorted out. Politically, it got impossible to overcome such difficulties, particularly, I suspect, since it was also strong Israeli sentiment that the station would eventually be an embarrassment, so even as strong and dependent an ally as Israel could not stomach the positioning of a VOA relay station on its territory. The bottom line was the Israeli station could not be built and never will be. So we lost that one. Part of the need for that station was to improve the quality of the signal broadcast into the southern part of the then Soviet Union. But it took so long to put together that the politics of the moment and the dissolution of the Soviet Union took precedence, a very expensive, very long-term, very difficult agreement that Mort Smith had negotiated eventually had to be reversed.

A new relay site in troubled Sri Lanka was under way, and in Thailand we were converting what was a medium wave facility into a larger facility with a powerful shortwave capability. Still, we were searching for other locations. Korea was looked at, but politically it wasn't good. The Korean government felt they would find it difficult. They were just beginning to open ties with China, and they felt any major location of American propaganda radio on the shores of Korea would interfere with the smooth building of relations in the area themselves. Therefore, another stalwart ally got cold feet about cooperation with the U.S. on international radio. Besides, such a large scale project of construction would have set up a frenzy of land speculation in Korea, which the Korean government felt would be inimical to its plans for the reconstruction of the country's economy. So that one also went down the tubes.

We had been negotiating with the Philippines at the time, reworking the agreement with them. Those were the years of turmoil, the end of the Marcos era and beginning of the Aquino age in the Philippines. The Filipinos were beginning to be much more independent of the U.S. Even the ones who were strong friends of the U.S. would counsel against any major change in what was going on there, because they would be looked at as "American Boys." We couldn't go to Taiwan, because that would interrupt our own connection with China. That would be too blatant an insult to the Beijing we were struggling to keep in a moderate frame of mind, despite the recurrent MFN deliberations in Congress.

Q: It is a hard one. Did you run into the argument that the BBC is taking care of it anyway?

YATES: You can't hear the BBC in every place around the world either. China was one exception, because they had a very fine facility in Hong Kong. Don't ask me what is going to happen after reversion. The BBC previously used an island off Hong Kong where they had chosen to place their transmitter. From that point on, they were "5 by 5," as radio technical people say, with a very, very strong shortwave signal into China and, I guess, medium wave in Cantonese into nearby Guangzhou and its surrounding Cantonese-speaking area. In any event, the BBC does not explain the United States of America. It's not in their charter.

While you may get the news, which may be close to the way we might report it, the British radio does not explain us, and that is what is intended to be the principal responsibility of the Voice abroad. We were not out there, single-mindedly fighting communism, although that was certainly the rationale which was paraded on the Hill every time we went there for our budget. When the Soviet Union dissolved into its constituent republics, there was an open question about how much of the change was based on information or ideas derived from the Voice of America. I cannot shed any empirical light on the question, but it is just common sense that almost half a century of broadcasting likely had a special effect.

The basic economic system of the Soviet Union was no good, so it probably would have fallen eventually, no matter what the Voice of America said, but VOA probably had something to do with speeding up the process. A little bit of an investment in information goes a long way in removing a need for the much larger necessary investment in defense if the communist system had continued to spread. So we were hoist on our own petard. We became known as the commie fighters, fending off the red menace, but we had a much larger role in representing the U.S. to millions upon millions who probably never will visit the U.S. themselves.

USIA's essential role, its chief purpose for being, was the promotion of the US; building understanding for its policy, culture, and society; and stimulating an environment for trade. One of the larger part of these responsibilities is our educational exchange programs, such as the Fulbright scholarships and educational counseling. The education programs have been the basis for much of the understanding that we have developed with other countries over the years. Similarly effective is our international visitor program where we provide visits to the U.S. for people that our posts identify as potential leaders over the next decade or so. The multiplicity of program tools that USIA has been able to bring to bear on misunderstanding and ignorance is misunderstood.

The Voice of America, however, is a very different tool from the standard USIS programs that are used abroad. It is a passive tool in comparison with the intensely individual efforts that overseas posts make. You throw things into the wind and hope somebody will tune in. Someone has to turn you on and someone has to listen, sometimes at great danger to himself. In China or the Soviet Union, it was dangerous to do that. But people did and I think VOA provided a special service that was different from the other services provided by the USIS operation at the embassy. The USIS operations in any one country had a more personal approach. That meant leaving the desk and getting out into the university and sitting down in professors' offices, and talking to deans and students or visiting media where placement was always an objective. The question is, how many students can you talk to? These universities have tens of thousands of students. We try to talk to the students who are the best and probably the future leaders of the country, those who will be able to pass along the information we impart to them. So we put a lot of effort into defining our audience.

We have talked about that to some extent before when I discussed Japan. It is something that was an important part of our work. By focusing efforts on a smaller number of communicators, however, our numbers began to decline. The more efficient we got in identifying our audience, the smaller the number of select people we were addressing in a given country. Whereas the Voice of America could claim millions of people listening, we could claim only hundreds on a personal contact level. That doesn't necessarily mean one is better than the other. In fact, personal contact would likely have to be considered much more important. The one-on-one relationships that developed because of exchanges had much greater impact, I believe, partially because of a greater credibility and the selectivity involving one or several individuals that will probably have significant responsibility in the future affairs of their country. VOA serves a different purpose and, therefore, must be judged by a different yardstick.

One of the attributes of the Voice of America that is politically important in Washington is its utility as an emergency network for Americans abroad. Almost every traveler listens to the Voice of America, but originally it was not intended for Americans, but for a foreign audience. Yet until CNN became almost omnipresent in hotels around the globe, when you traveled abroad, about the only way to get American news was the Voice of America. Newspapers were late, if you could get them. Local media often had little or no interest in American affairs—neither did BBC for that matter—but you could rely on the Voice of America. News people and American travelers abroad were well served by the Voice of America. Each time there was an attempt to reduce programming, those folks would rise up in support that became an important part of VOA's justification. But that was not the justification for USIA efforts abroad in the embassies.

So we had parallel tracks but very different constituencies and very different purposes and particularly different tools.

Q: Were you up against pressure groups, Cuban-Americans, Irish-Americans, etc.?

YATES: Absolutely. There was no question that was one of the most nettlesome, yet most advantageous support the Voice had. Every time we would come up with a budget cut, small services like Lithuanian would come under fire. You can't imagine the strength of the Lithuanian community in this country until you try to cut the Lithuanian service. They felt it was an important link to their homeland. It was a strong post to lean on in times that the Russians were trying to subsume the Lithuanian culture into the greater Russia. How many Lithuanians live in Cleveland, for example? You would be surprised to find out. They would all get together and write letters to their local congressman. There was a devilish cry of pain on the Hill every time we tried to cut any of those small services. It meant that all of the constituents would come out of the walls onto the congressional backs, and we would get rockets from the Hill saying we could not even think of such a move. They would earmark funds in the appropriation bill to make sure that didn't happen. So this sort of earmarking was an incredible bat with which to beat the Voice of America. You can argue that is a good thing, but at the time, something else had to give. You had to reduce Chinese or get rid of somebody else or some other service that we were doing.

One of the most important services of the Voice of America over the years, was the special English program. This was a program in which only about 1200 English words were used. This was like what the Reader's Digest does to ensure that its magazine is readable for all. All text is limited to those 1,200 words except when certain terms must be used to be clear. In such cases, the new term is fully defined in the vocabulary of the approved 1,200. This practice gives somebody who doesn't speak native English a much better grasp of what is being discussed. It allows them to practice their English without struggling to deal with the expanded vocabulary most often used by educated speakers of English. Special English is spoken very slowly, so that every word is pronounced clearly and distinctly, giving a non-native speaker of English a better chance to comprehend. Sometimes, it can become boring for an American native-English speaker to listen to, but it is very effective for English-as-a-second-language people and if there is heavy interference, a weak signal, or fading, the broadcasts in special English can be a relief even for native speakers who have a better chance of following the thought.

One good example of the utility of special English can be found in China. After I got there, it was clear that the Voice of America was being listened to with the blessing of the authorities. It was a practice that was followed even in the middle of the Cultural Revolution. On the face of it, that does not sound reasonable. But on examination, this remarkable permission made complete sense. The Chinese understood that their students would have to learn English to be competitive in world markets, and so they had to have the facilities such as language laboratories and native speakers to make their training effective. But China didn't have the money to spread a lot of English teaching resources all over the country.

However, the Voice of America special English broadcasts were free to them. Schools would assign their students to go listen to the Voice of America in English, not Chinese which was forbidden. Entire classes would listen to VOA at night and come into the class next day to review the lesson they had heard. It was remarkable. Often the content of special English programming was stories about America, the founding fathers, etc. To this day in China, there are people who know more than a lot of Americans do about Lincoln and Jefferson and Washington. They have learned it from the Voice of America and discussed that foreign history in their own schools as part of their language lessons. That simple program concept is a marvelous tool in getting this country more understood.

The payoff is when the political forces become realigned and there is an opening, a great welling up of interest in America. This is a very positive thing in international relations because of this vast groundwork that was done through Voice of America broadcasts to places like China in special English.

Yet there was a serious problem. When reductions had to be taken and earmarking prevented the reduction of one or several of the smaller services, then budget cuts had to be made on the programming side. News was the heart of the program, so that was sacrosanct. The natural instinct would be to take cuts in the special purpose programming such as special English. You can't cut Lithuanian, and you can't cut Latvian, and Tibetan is a new service that the Congress has mandated. Radio Marti, over the objections of many, was going full force and sucking money away as fast as it could. TV Marti was even worse. Yet the budget was going down. Where do you take the cuts? Very, very important programs like special English had to take a cut and that was tragic. Such cuts meant that we were not using our money most efficiently and effectively. If you were a good Lithuanian from Cleveland, you had very strong feelings about the importance of Lithuania and you were probably right. But when you have limited resources and unlimited demand, where do you put on your brakes? I think many times we put on the brakes in the wrong places.

You mentioned Cuba, and particularly in Florida, the vote down there. Cubans are very strong in Florida. The log-rolling that goes on in Congress, of course, made a careful analysis of the broadcast effort to Cuba almost impossible. The principle of "you vote for my thing and I will vote for yours," meant that the Congressional delegation from Florida could jam an earmark through and force funding of a program that many felt was not cost effective. Radio Marti was a sacred cow and, more foolishly TV Marti, which has never had an audience, quickly followed in that tradition. The whole thing was a Looney Toons arrangement. You perhaps remember the aerostat balloons that they were going to put up to broadcast television into Cuba. Fidel Castro said that if the U.S. insisted on beginning such transmissions, he intended to increase the power of one of Cuba's AM radio stations that would interfere with U.S. radio stations deep in the U.S. heartland.

With sufficient power, particularly in the evening hours, medium wave exhibits some of the same characteristics as shortwave. Once the sun goes down, the ionosphere comes down to a point where medium wave radio signals no longer penetrate that layer of the ionosphere. That is why we have laws that restrict broadcasting on certain frequencies. Some stations could broadcast from dawn to dusk, but at dusk they had to power down or get off the air. The reason was that they could easily interfere with a broadcast station on the same frequency that presented no conflict during the day when distance alone kept them apart. AM signals, usually receivable only within a small radius about a urban area, could be heard 200 miles away after sundown.

Anybody who ever lived in New England can remember tuning in to WWVA in Wheeling, West Virginia almost as soon as the sun went down.

Q: Okay, let's move on. You took Chinese. Can you tell me a bit about Chinese training? It was from when to when and what was your impression of the course?

YATES: I am not a great linguist to start with. The irony of my situation is that my three languages are Japanese, Korean, and Chinese. I had studied Japanese in University of Maryland courses while I was in the Army. I spoke enough of that to get along. My Korean was pretty good by the time I left Korea in 1972. Chinese, however, was a different animal. It is a very different language, not related to either Japanese or Korean, which have, in fact, a distant relationship between themselves. The Chinese is tonal and in word order and grammar resembles English more than it does Japanese, except for the characters that the Japanese picked up from the Chinese. The ideographs are one of the big problems for an English speaker, as he has to learn a whole different concept of written language.

There is no phonetic alphabet in Chinese. They have created a Romanized equivalent system called "pinyin," which is supposedly a crutch for foreigners, but in fact, may even get in the way. Some linguists have tried teaching only the Chinese characters, the ideographic approach. That is almost impossible, because if you are a well versed Chinese scholarly person, you would have at least 10,000 of those "drawings" under your belt. The Japanese have a limited set of about 1450 they call Toyo Kanji which allows you to read most sentences in newspapers, without the names of people and places that require a specialized vocabulary of their own. But one important difference between the Japanese and Chinese writing systems is the phonetic system the Japanese use to represent inflections and other mechanical parts of their language not present in the Chinese.

That phonetic system is called "kana." It is broken into two separate subsystems, "hiragana," the style of the usual inflections and language parts, and "katakana" the system that is used to phoneticize foreign names. The problem with the utilization of Chinese ideographs with the Japanese language is the dramatic number of homonyms that were forced into a language with only 50 sounds to represent the tens of thousands of Chinese characters. Since the Chinese ideographs carry the meaning in the visual presentation and were created for a language with different tones that can be applied to each phonetic group, the problem of homonyms is not as great. When the Japanese, who do not have a tonal system, adopted the Chinese characters as part of their writing system, they carried over close equivalences in sound, but without the tonal distinctions. Hence, the great difficulty with homonyms.

The kana, on the other hand, allow you to keep on reading when you hit an unknown Chinese character and still get the gist of the sentence. You may have to substitute a verb or noun, but the basic structure of the sentence is clear. Korean is even more consistent in the use of phonetic representation. Hangul is their name for a phonetic representation, and there was a time when most government documents had no Chinese characters at all. Yet without the certainty of a Chinese character, there is still some possible confusion in written Korean. The Korean government has relented on that and Chinese characters have been re-introduced in government documents and into the educational system. They never were really removed from the names of people and places, but in normal language their use had been cut dramatically. So you can read Korean after you have a command of Hangul, which is a syllabary more than an alphabet, for it is represented by symbols grouped into representations of sounds.

So Chinese has many problems for the student. You have problems with the tones. If you misuse tones, you are unintelligible in Chinese. The second problem in Chinese is that you have a lot of dialects. If you go to Shanghai speaking Putonghua, which is the standard Mandarin, they could figure out what you were talking about, but the two dialects are not like Spanish and Portuguese, they are much more different. In either Shanghai or Beijing, people can read anything written by the other.

Still, writing with Chinese ideographs is a greater hurdle than reading, because it is an art form as well as a means of communication. You recall Mao Zedong and his little red book. Why a little red book? The reason was because Mao Zedong could not be understood by 90 percent of the people who lived in his country. His Hunan dialect was so strong that even people in Beijing could not understand what the devil he was saying. That is why he never gave speeches. If you have seen the newsreels of the time, you rarely heard Mao Zedong speaking. He might be filmed giving a speech, but it would be voiced over even for the Chinese audience. He gave few public speeches, for when he did, people often laughed at him. His country roots showed. Hunanese is different from other dialects and made him appear a “rube.” Traveling even short distances in China will bring you to a wholly different dialect. Mandarin is now the national standard, and most educated people have no problem with it. Yet if you go into the countryside, it is possible to find those who speak no Mandarin and do not understand its spoken form.

I entered the fray off schedule. I wanted to go to China because my wife, after taking Chinese studies at George Washington University, had just gotten a degree and was interested in going to China. I had bid on the job as PAO in Taipei, but that didn't work out. However, the spot as Deputy PAO suddenly became available in Beijing. I was picked for the job, and it meant I had to go into language training immediately, because the incumbent was leaving. This meant I was off-cycle from the usual startup of classes at the Foreign Service Institute, then in Rosslyn. Because of my Japanese and Korean background, they sent me to ICLS (the International Center for Language Studies) to try to use the extra time to brush up on my earlier study of Chinese characters. ICLS was a private school near the Treasury Building on 15th Street in downtown Washington. I think it is gone now.

The way ICLS worked was to hire mostly students studying in the Washington area who would agree to work a certain number of hours a week to support themselves in their studies. They were not really trained language teachers. I went there and started trying to get some of my Japanese Kanji and some of my few Korean Hanmun converted into Chinese characters. While the systems are similar, they use different techniques in writing. The Chinese use a simplified version of characters that the Japanese no longer use. The Japanese have simplified some, but simplified them differently. So you have the three languages. Korean is somewhere in the middle, using some of the older, more complex characters which the Chinese have now simplified. So you have simplified Chinese, you have the traditional Chinese which is used in Hong Kong and Taipei, and then you have the Korean style and the Japanese style. So it is a mishmash of stuff. The pronunciation is sometimes related, but while it is close enough to readily confuse, it is not always close enough to be understood. So you can't speak Japanese in China. It doesn't work. You can't do it in Korea either.

I was confronted with that and spent a couple of months of struggle. Then I shifted over to FSI and started basic Chinese there. I came into my basic Chinese studies with one foot half in and one foot half out. My spoken Chinese was almost zero, but my written Chinese was getting along pretty well. So it made for much confusion. My instructors decided to emphasize my written abilities, but that didn't work out too well. Finally, in exasperation, I went back to ICLS to try to sort out my unique set of problems where I did not have to march to the beat of other students. Then Tiananmen occurred.

Q: Will you explain what Tiananmen was?

YATES: Tiananmen was the student movement in Beijing in 1989. At the time, Gorbachev was visiting Beijing, and there was a large number of American and other international media there. An uprising of students in Tiananmen Square in central Beijing quickly got out of hand. It was broadcast virtually live to the world, because of the foreign media presence. I was in Washington trying to study Chinese with distraught Chinese instructors who had family, friends, and neighbors involved. I would go to school in the morning, and we would sit and watch television coverage in Tiananmen Square. So I didn't learn a lot of Chinese at ICLS at the time.

The incident, however, certainly brought home to me some of the emotional and cultural problems of the younger Chinese generation that were related to the incident. The uprising was broken up militarily and with cruelty that was shocking to the viewers abroad. The decision to do that was obviously a hard one for the Chinese government. I think the Chinese leadership did not really understand how much of this was getting abroad, and when they finally came to a realization of how much was getting out, they tried to pull the plug. There was that famous incident where the Chinese authorities confronted American technicians from CNN in a hotel room and ordered them to pull the plug on the camera. It was quite a dramatic scene in international press history. But that sort of excitement really screwed up my Chinese study. Consequently, I did not gain much proficiency in the language. I studied Chinese for less than a year and then went off to Beijing.

Q: What was your job?

YATES: I was Deputy Public Affairs Officer. It was an interesting time to be in that position. I went into China through Guangzhou, also called "Canton." I flew there through Hong Kong, leaving my wife to spend some time with her family in Korea, because the evacuation order had not been lifted by that time.

The Deputy Public Affairs Officer in China had responsibility for all the USIS branches. We had four: in Guangzhou, Shanghai, Shenyang, and Chengdu. At the time, we had no branch in Beijing, but we did have our headquarters there. That was later rectified. However, coming in through Guangzhou was important to me, because I had spent time on a couple of occasions before in Hong Kong. When you went to Hong Kong in those days, you would go up to the border and look across. So that part of my introduction to China was fun. I took the train in and was first struck by the lack of transition between the modernity and the expected antiquity of Guangzhou. It wasn't as shiny as Hong Kong, but it certainly wasn't so far away in terms of appearance. I looked for the "blue ants" but could not find them.

Q: Blue ants being?

YATES: The stereotypical concept of the Chinese people, marching in lines all wearing a blue uniform with a red star on the cap. It wasn't that way at all. Guangzhou was a bustling place in 1989 and was exploding with economic activity. The place was a mess with construction. We had a USIS Center at the Garden Hotel with a residence for the Director at the White Swan Hotel, at one time, the most elegant hotel in Guangzhou. It had been quickly overtaken by the building of magnificent new hotels. The White Swan was right on the river, next to where they were putting a tunnel under the harbor. The hotel had been used by an American oil company for years, so right next door was a petroleum dump which was probably dangerous, and certainly unsightly. It was on an island in the Pearl River, slightly off the mainland. You had to cross several bridges to get to it. That location was probably chosen in earlier days when foreigners were looked on as a threat to the Chinese social order. On an island, the foreigners could be contained.

If you recall the Japanese history of Nagasaki, they put the Dutch on an island called "Dejima," apart from the rest of Japan, so they could essentially stand by the bridge and make sure the nasty Dutch didn't get into the real country. The Chinese probably had something like that in mind for the intruding Americans. Because the White Swan Hotel was on an island, it made the process very difficult for people to get to and, of course, made it very easy for the Chinese to control who got in and who got out. Nonetheless, it was a reasonably comfortable life for the people who lived there.

The most striking thing about Guangzhou when I went in was the accessibility of the people. On my first couple of days, I took a walk with the Branch Public Affairs Officer there. He knew where there was what they call an "English Corner" in the city during the weekend. We visited and I spent two or three hours standing and talking with students about anything that came into their heads. The Voice of America, what America was like, was the Washington Post really a "government" newspaper, and all kinds of interesting and sometimes surprisingly sophisticated questions. These were students who just wanted to practice English, but the substance and tenor of their questions had an edge. There were informers among them. You could see that every once in a while, they would look around to see who was listening and who wasn't. Most of them just didn't care.

There in the park in Guangzhou I found a feisty Chinese spirit which I was a little bit surprised to see. Maybe I should have known better, because I had been in Korea, but the Chinese also are very independent-minded people. They are certainly not the "Blue Ants" and probably never were. That image, one of the "Scratches on Our Minds," came out of our MovieTone version of Chinese history. Peasants and people in the countryside who are not generally affected by these political tides may be willing to go along with the emperors in Beijing. The old Chinese saying, "Heaven is high and the emperor is far away," was probably one of the most characteristic things about the country, at least in Guangzhou. And the people in Guangzhou certainly were open. We talked freely about a large number of issues in that short period of time on a Sunday afternoon in the park in Guangzhou.

The questions flew. I stood in the middle of a big circle and the Branch PAO stood in the middle of another circle. There were not very many Americans running around China at the time, so we were centers of much attraction.

Q: When you arrived at Tiananmen, were you under any U.S. government constraints? We were pretty unhappy with the government of China for what they had done there and China was being made a pariah at that point. Were there any instructions on how to deal with the Chinese at this point?

YATES: Not in that sense, no. I had been in the Foreign Service for a long time and didn't have to be told to be careful when living abroad. You don't get out in front of things, and you are a government official regardless of your personal feelings. But my job and the job of the people I worked with, was not to pull the covers over our heads and sulk in the corner. I was there to find out what was going on and to find out whom we could talk to, to make solid contacts, and find a way to make them continue.

For example, the Chinese had at that time put the squash on the Fulbright program. Most of the Fulbright grantees had left out of concern for their own safety. Many of the American English teachers had left. At the time, the Chinese accused us of plotting this, that the Fulbrighters had been told to leave by the American government and the Chinese really believed that. It was not true and we knew that, but they were not willing to accept our word on that issue as truth. Their view was not a matter of dogma. In their society, if the government doesn't want something to happen, it does not. If the government does want something to happen, it does. Most Chinese officials generally assumed that in the U.S., it works the same way. Since all of the Fulbrighters decamped, as well as many of the private English teachers, the assumption was the U.S. government orchestrated it, particularly since the U.S. had arranged for evacuation flights that were available to the people who wanted to leave Beijing.

The Chinese understanding of this was that we were ordering Americans out of China, but it never was required. We can't morally tell an American where to go. We can advise and make it possible for them to leave. In fact, the jets that were chartered did not always leave full. There were a lot of people who stayed in China and did not want to leave. The Chinese should have looked around a little bit and done a bit more inquiry, but they were very unhappy with the way the American government had carried out the evacuation and were not shy in expressing their displeasure. The Chinese were also very unhappy about the role of the Voice of America in Tiananmen.

Q: When you say the Chinese in that context, you are talking about the about Chinese government?

YATES: Yes, certainly the Chinese government. But you also have to understand something that is characteristic of other parts of Asia as well. There are a lot of people in China who are what we would call patriotic, the Radical Right, who are true-blue, flag- waving, nationalistic people who believe in the dogma that we find so reprehensible. Our image of that dogma is colored by our own understanding of it, and it is not always very clear. Remember back in the John Stewart Service days after the Second World War, when we went through this whole business about China? He and other American diplomats in China had seen in China something that others, particularly the American media, either didn't see or were not willing to admit.

They understood that China was a communist nation and the communists were in control, but the Chinese were still Chinese in feelings, outlook, and prejudices. It must be recalled that the American government in its actions following the Second World War was not very well informed about what was going on in China. When Foreign Service folk like Service tried to shed some light on it, they were soundly and swiftly booted out under charges of all kinds of dark motives and as being closely sympathetic to the "red" cause. That action caused much trouble for the American nation in the years following, for not only was it bad scholarship, it was bad faith in the very American principles the long Second World War had been fought over.

The attitude of the Chinese people had to be divorced from that of the government, but the Chinese shared a perception of the U.S. which is not always what we would understand. We think of the masses in chains as a kind of concept that represents an oppressed people. As soon as you unlock the chains, they are going to run free. That is not the case. In fact, that happened during the Tiananmen incident. One of the fundamental rationales that was used by the Chinese government in suppressing the students was the prevention of anarchy. Any student of Chinese history can look back and see an incredible amount of anarchy in the past which has destroyed the nation, or at least led to darkness many times. Many regimes fell because of disillusion among the people and resulting chaos. That is the basic reason so many of the people in the countryside did not support what the students were doing in the city.

Seventy percent of the Chinese people live in the country. It doesn't take a rocket scientist to figure out that if much of that seventy percent didn't like what was going on, it would not be long before an effort was made to turn it off. If you have thirty percent of the population, that is most of the urban, educated Chinese, in support, you can make a big dent. And they did. But it wasn't enough to prevail, and it had no chance of being enough. Remember again in Chinese history, Mao Zedong's revolution occurred not in the city but in the countryside. It was his ability to organize the peasants that made the revolution possible. It was Mao Zedong's use of that technique which made it successful. In Shanghai, where the communists really started in the early part of the century, certainly after the 1918 revolution in Russia, the movement there was city-bound. It had no success whatsoever in China. There was a lot of politics, a lot of running around, but there wasn't any real success until Mao Zedong came onto the scene and organized the peasants. When those peasants were brought together, that was the first time that their movement stood a chance. If you don't bother the peasants, the Chinese government will continue. The demonstration in Tiananmen Square was not a mass revolt.

To say China was in chains is a metaphor that comes readily to hand, and there certainly were economic chains, but I am not sure you can say there were political chains. After about three years living and working in the country, I certainly do not have enough information to draw firm conclusions, and most media do not either. The political chains in effect were most evident in the cities. The countryside was still much like the old China, with the old attitudes. The farmers did not like collective farms, and that was clearly an episode in Chinese history that made the countryside unhappy, but that was the first thing to go under the reforms. The old rural collectives are essentially gone, transformed into private plots or coops where there are not enough resources to support smaller farms.

It was not until Deng Xiaoping freed the farmers to do their own thing, sell their own produce, and invest their own accumulating capital that the countryside began to prosper relative to the cities. That is where capitalism started in China, not in the industrial zones or in the urban areas. The large state-owned industries were dead in many cases and some still hang on in a morbid state of preservation. It was in the countryside where the farmers began to produce their own goods and foster the return of capitalism to Chinese soil. Deng Xiaoping and his policy was in the Mao Zedong tradition of looking at the Chinese peasant as the source of change in China. He was also probably accurate, in his terms, that the rebellion in Beijing had to be put down, because it would have engendered chaos, a loss of confidence by the large rural population in China. In 1989 when Tiananmen occurred, even some of the students were in agreement that the demonstrations had to be shut down. The question was, how far could the government let it go?

When the industrial workers, the media, and some of the government agency people began to march in the square, the glove had been thrown down. Probably from the standpoint of the demonstrators, that was the mistake that destroyed the movement. Lacking the support of others in Beijing who were largely government workers, the movement was dying. Things were fizzling, because it was wet out in the square, it was cold, there were hunger strikers, and things were not good, they were beginning to fall apart. It was not until some of the major elements in Beijing, workers groups, got involved for a variety of their own reasons that the troops were brought heavily to bear. If you remember, when the first advance of troops tried to enter the square, they were turned around by the citizens of Beijing, as it were, simply getting in the way.

A lot of these first troops lived in the city. It wasn't until they brought troops from elsewhere, troops not related to the garrison around Beijing, that they were able to put full military force on the students. And even then, you remember the line of tanks with a single student waving his book bag; he stopped the whole line until the driver popped out of the turret and said "Get out of the way." The tank tried to go around him and could not, so the whole column stopped. A famous picture.

Why did the column stop? This was a fly in front of them compared to the events surrounding the square. What prevented the commander from running over him and continuing to the square, like all tyrants would have done? They stopped. American television made much of the courage of the student. There was no question he had a lot of courage and was a strong individual. But don't forget the soldier who had the controls in the tank and stopped and the tank commander who said, "No, don't run him over." What possessed that tank commander? I believe the reason was that the Chinese have an ethic which runs deeper than the roots of communism and military training and transcends all else, bringing the column to a halt. They do have respect for the individual. There are billions of individuals. That is not seen very much in our media concept of the Chinese.

Q: I think we should come back to your time. What was your impression of the consulate general in Guangzhou?

YATES: As I mentioned, it was isolated. At that time, the Chinese had cut off most relations with Americans. We had been shut out. You couldn't get meetings with people, you couldn't move around. There were all kinds of excuses: "I'm busy. It's inconvenient today, maybe some other day," etc. But the bottom line was, you didn't get meetings with people. We were building a Guangzhou USIS Center at another hotel, the Garden Hotel, apart from the consulate. It was largely finished by the time I arrived. The Branch PAO and I looked at the place. The installation had some flaws, but it was well located. It was essentially in a store front inside the hotel on the mezzanine level. The problem was, it was not downtown on a street corner, so it meant rag-a-muffin students would be uncomfortable in that place. Yet it was good for young professionals, intellectuals, and people who had some cachet in the government and who found it an interesting, clean, and different place to go. So it probably was as good as we could have obtained, given the political situation of the time.

In the new USIS Center at the Garden Hotel, we were not confined to the island, where we were apart. Although there was a great effort to "save" some undefined resources and move back onto the isolated island, that move would have been disastrous for a public affairs program. The Garden Hotel was expensive, but given that it was the only chance we had to get to people, that was a good move.

On several occasions in my trips to Guangzhou, I participated in a series of programs in which the Branch PAO was bringing in Americans who lived in the town to meet with Chinese. The reason was ostensibly to study English, but the young professionals, doctors, business people, graduate students, and even a couple of lawyers all had very wide interests. They were not a large group, 15-20, maybe 30, people at a time. Their English was fair, and they wanted to know about America. The Chinese are always interested in your personal life. On a later occasion, I was one of the Americans who went down there and sat with a group of young professionals and talked about life in America, politics, what Americans think about, freedom and liberty and all those good things which we never dreamed the Chinese would be allowed to talk about. Because it was a foreign environment, they felt a little bit more at ease, although there were obviously people among them who were reporting back on who was saying what and what questions were asked. That was deemed to be acceptable to the participants, perhaps because the "watchers" were relatives or friends.

I think those programs went a long way in helping to reach people who we would later call agenda setters. The branch in Guangzhou was important. Guangzhou is different from the rest of the country. People there were not interested in politics. It is a culture with a different language and culture. Guangzhou was the source of a lot of people who came to the US, so many people there had relatives in America in one place or another. That gives Americans, I guess, a special entree. But at that time, it was difficult for us to program speakers in Guangzhou, because they didn't want to talk about politics. They would talk about business. You could bring in an economics speaker and have wall-to-wall people. You would try to bring somebody in concerned with politics, and you wouldn't get anywhere. So we had to confine ourselves pretty much to economic questions in Guangzhou.

From there, I moved up to Shanghai on my initial trip to Beijing. Shanghai is a different city and had a different kind of clientele. As Deputy PAO, I had responsibility for a book-translation program that, interestingly enough, was started by John King Fairbank back in the late '40s.

Q: He later became a "father" of Chinese studies at Harvard.

YATES: He is the grand old man of Chinese studies in the US. He wrote one of the best books on Chinese history available to American students. In the '40s, he started a book translation program. There were 18 titles in his original program, and the process was essentially to pick titles, translate them into Chinese, and pass them out. I inherited a variation of that program in Beijing and had a fair amount of dealings with various publishers across China. In Shanghai, there were several large publishing houses that we were doing business with, so I became much more familiar with Shanghai than I did with some of the other cities.

Shanghai is to Beijing about what New York is to Washington in the US. It is the commercial capital of northern China. Guangzhou is the commercial capital of the south. Shanghai has the biggest port and the strongest connections with the West. That city was home to a large number of expatriates prior to the Second World War, and the famous Bund is exemplary of a European colonial seaport street. Most people would remember that Shanghai of the old bank buildings, the customs house, and the old colonial appearance that provided the live set for period movies. It was in the cosmopolitan atmosphere of Shanghai that the communist movement found its origins.

The Branch PAO in Shanghai has probably as much responsibility as most small country Public Affair Officers in the world because of the strength of the community and the size of the problem we deal with. It was the place where we had our last U.S. military ship visit, for example, before our relations fell apart. Those visits, by the way, have just started again. There was a burgeoning opening in a Shanghai that was under restraint, but nonetheless possessed the latent possibilities for a very productive program since there was such an enormous interest in international affairs and trade.

That is also where I met a number of Chinese lawyers who thought they had a chance of making a dent in the Chinese legal system, which essentially did not exist. China doesn't have a system like we have. They have no tradition of a rule of law that we would recognize and that is so sacred to our own way of living. In China, society is ruled by fiat or something resembling a Germanic code. If somebody has to make a decision on someone doing something wrong, it is done by judge, not by a jury of peers. Equality before the law is not a concept that is common in China. So lawyers have a problem. There are laws, but they are aimed at regulating process in the society rather than to moderate social actions by individuals. Most people are untouched by laws other than traffic regulations and a few political dicta. Otherwise they are not generally aware of a concept of equality before the law. As law becomes more of a way of operating both business and social discourse, legal people become more important. Shanghai is where that effort is beginning.

We had problems in Shanghai because our USIS office was on the consulate grounds. One of the problems of all consulates in China is that they are surrounded by guards. After Tiananmen, steel helmeted, automatic-weapons-equipped troops were stationed about every 15-20 feet in a ring around the consulate compound. It wasn't something that would encourage people to come in to participate in public affairs programs.

We also had a problem with being part of the consulate, because it attracted enormous numbers of people just wanting visas. Shanghai is the business center of the north, and there were always a lot of people wanting to get visas. Every morning, there was a long line outside. It was like a railroad station every day. It was not very easy for distinguished people to come in and go to a program at the USIS Center. Our facilities at the consulate were in a "shed" at the back of the property, literally above a large storage space. They were totally unsuitable for us. To get to our offices, staff and guests had to walk through the consulate gates, past the main building, and down through the consulate garden. This route, of course, drove the security people wild. Arriving at the USIS offices one had to go through a portal where there were sheets of plywood lying around, a fork lift vehicle, and other items used to maintain the embassy. Then you had to walk up a flight of stairs, above one of the storerooms into a kind of "garret" arrangement where we had our program facilities and a library. Having the library in that sort of situation was not very smart, since nobody ran such gauntlet to visit a library.

So we had to get offices outside. As soon as I arrived, it was abundantly clear and the Consul General at the time agreed that we had to have different facilities. So we started our search for quarters. We did find something pretty close to the consulate, but in an independent building with no overbearing security control, at least not with automatic weapons and tin hats.

Q: Was the security control designed to discourage Chinese from coming to the post?

YATES: That and more, for it was also, I believe, designed to keep us in. To keep an eye on us. The Chinese were very suspicious of Americans in China at the time. They weren't protecting us because nothing dire happened in China without official blessing, so if our "protectors" wanted to turn their weapons on us, we had no security at all. If they wanted to come in, they would come in. It was clear that if the Chinese government (à la Iran) decided that the students should give the Americans their comeuppance, we were naked there in the wind. They were not protecting us much. Perhaps because of the very severe penalties for robbing or harming a foreigner in China, we were not bothered much by burglaries or other criminal threats. It was at once secure and not secure.

On the other hand, the Chinese forces surrounding us were there to control Chinese access to us. Every Chinese person who approached the consulate was stopped by the Chinese guards and asked what they wanted. Their names and "danwei" membership was recorded. A "danwei" is a work unit. Their unit identification was looked at, and it was reported back to their superiors what they were up to. So it wasn't easy for a Chinese citizen to walk up to the consulate and go in unless he had an official reason to do so. Usually they required an official letter from us and official approval from their danwei to make a visit. So they had pretty strong locks on their citizenry. It wasn't always successful in keeping people out, and we tried to the extent possible to make it easier for people to enter. Yet being at the consulate really kept us out of the mainstream.

So we had to move out. Once I had looked into the issue of the book publishing program in Shanghai, I was free to begin to look into the access problem.

Q: How were books selected?

YATES: That was a program I ran after I got to Beijing. When I arrived, it had close to a 100 titles in process of some sort or either—under consideration, had been published, or were in the process of being worked on. The process was a little complicated. We did the translations in Beijing itself. The basic principle of the program was to put the best of American writing in the hands of Chinese in a manner that most educated people could access. We didn't have a lot of money to use for the project, but what we could offer the Chinese was an ability to find good materials that were worthy of translation and assist them in bringing a translation to print. We would buy the first 2,000 volumes of the resulting Chinese edition, hard bound. This was not a big money-making operation for publishers, but it did provide U.S. dollars, hard currency, which most of them put into Hong Kong accounts.

We had about 32 Chinese publishers who were in the program. Among them was the People's Liberation Army Press, and this caused me a bit of surprise. Particularly in the aftermath of Tiananmen, what was the People's Liberation Army Press doing publishing USIS selected American titles in Chinese and selling them in the market? The Chinese, on the other hand, saw nothing amiss, but did prefer to stay solely on military biographies and military issues.

One of the characteristics of this program was that we would provide the material and buying the translation rights, if needed, through USIA in Washington. Once we had the rights, we would enter into a commercial contractual arrangement with the Chinese publisher, giving them an up-front payment for about 2,000 volumes. This didn't amount to much money, because in China books are pretty cheap, thirty to forty cents a copy. Sometimes we would contribute to the translation costs, but not very often. We tried to make it as much of a commercial operation as possible.

The company would translate the volume with people we approved as translators, give us a manuscript of the translation. We would then send it to Hong Kong where Chinese who were not communists would take a look at it to make sure it was a good translation, the language was appropriate to the text and that it was done in a manner we could put our name to. Not all of them got through. As a matter of fact, about half of them didn't. They were heavily edited in Hong Kong and sent back to the publisher through us for reworking. When a final approval of the manuscript came back from Hong Kong, the publisher would publish the book and we would take our copies. The other copies of the book would then be put on sale in the Chinese market, with all profits going to the Chinese publisher. In the case of the Peoples' Liberation Army Press, we expected most copies would be handled through military channels, but that was fine with us since the military was the most natural audience for the kinds of things put into translation. Commercial publishers put a fair number of the titles out through the Chinese commercial distribution system. One might suspect that the publishers simply pocketed the hard dollars we paid and dumped the rest of the run, but we did random checks of book stores and government outlets to see if our titles were making it out.

And, that happened. I was in Nanning a couple of years later and took some extra time to wander in the local bookstores. That was one of my habits as I traveled about China. Nanning is way down by the Vietnamese border, far off the beaten track. There were not even very many tourists there, certainly not very many Americans. I was down there for a conference. If time allowed, I would would prowl around the bookstores and look for our titles in each city I visited. And, sure enough, I found one of our translated titles on American nuclear policy in a bookshop in Nanning. That to me was very gratifying. It showed the books were getting out and were available to the Chinese to buy if they had the money.

Usually the publisher would put out a hardback edition as the first 2,000 or so copies that we purchased as part of the publication agreement. We used those copies for presentations when we made visits to Chinese offices. In most of Asia, people have a great deal of respect for the printed word. If you can give a person a gift of books, that is a compliment to them, because you are acknowledging that they have the intellectual prowess to have an interest in serious work. They often would place them in a prominent bookcase in their office or take them home to enjoy in private. Always they were appreciated. Books on the shelf of one's home were the mark of an intellectual man. So the 2,000 copies that we received were used by our Beijing Officers and Branch Officers as gifts. The rest of the print run, however, usually was prepared in paperback binding because they were cheaper for the individual to purchase.

We had about 100 titles which were chosen by us. My role was to select titles, approach publishers who might have a special interest in that subject matter, and make an offer to have the title published. In regard to the selection process, we gathered ideas from various sources. For example, we had a Fulbrighter who was working up in Shenyang at a university. She was in Beijing for a visit and said one of the things that surprised her a lot in teaching about America was the enormous interest in the American West and American Indians in particular. The Chinese seemed to take to this idea of a frontier mentality. Possibly it was the romance of the noble Indian that attracted them. So out of that comment grew the idea to put together a series on the American West in translation into Chinese, which we did. Everything from Larry McMurtry right back to some Indian writers, Indian poetry. The Fulbrighter agreed to help compile a short list of titles that would appeal most to her students. Her final list was edited a bit and then shown to a number of publishers who were asked if they would be interested in doing a series. In Asia, as in many other countries, people like to collect things in series. This was to become a series on the American West. A publisher was selected and the series got under way. As far as I know, it was completed. I think there were 12 volumes in all. It encompassed a wide range from the Lewis and Clark diaries, and "The Virginian," through the expansion westward. Part of the appeal of the American Indian to the Chinese was the chance to read about the freedom and spirit, particularly the Indian philosophy of identification with nature. That made a lot of sense to those steeped in the teachings of Taosim which has a similar point of view.

Another series we did later on was on American law. In the U.S., there is a book publishing company which specializes in notes for law students, "The Nutshell" series. It is intended to provide a student in an American law school a quick review of a particular subject like tort law, civil law, commercial law, or human rights. In this series, there also were about a dozen volumes. We were able to get this series published, and they sold out very quickly.

One of the most popular books that we had in the program was a book by Len Bernstein, "The Joy of Music." That one the publisher couldn't keep in print. There was another volume on American dance, which wouldn't sell here at all; it vanished overnight in the bookstalls in China. Some of the stuff didn't move fast, volumes on policy and other deeper subjects didn't move very quickly, but other things they liked.

I mentioned the People's Liberation Army Publishing House. I arranged a meeting with a representative of the press. That was a difficult process, since you could not call to an Army number directly. You had to go around a long route and pass a verbal or written message to the person you wished to speak with and get that person to call you. The telephone exchanges in Beijing are not interconnected. I found out later that it isn't in North Korea either. The military has a separate exchange, its own system. So if you want to talk to the military, you essentially have to send a letter, because they can't call you. They have to go to some place outside the military compound to call you. Anyway, I made an arrangement with the publisher. I could not go to his military compound for the meeting, so we arranged to meet for lunch at a hotel.

At the lunch, there was a Senior Colonel, the equivalent of a brigadier general in our parlance, myself, and a couple of his people. I told him that this was post-Tiananmen, and I could understand his reluctance to continue with this program. I offered that we might postpone it for a while. I would leave it up to him. He said, "Not at all. We want more titles and I have some specific ideas." He wanted to do books on Eisenhower, on Marshall, and biographies of other military leaders, obviously for training reasons. That was okay. The military is an important audience for us in our efforts to communicate with possible future Chinese leaders. They were willing to go along, so we continued. We did books essentially on American military subjects. With the Peoples' Liberation Army Press, we had plans to do several longer books on American naval history, but we hadn't gotten started on that by the time I left.

For most publishers, we tried to select books that appealed to a wide spectrum. "Habits of the Heart," for example, is a book on social issues. The most important series that I worked on was the "Library of America." In the US, I don't see much of it advertised any more, but it is a basic collection of 40 or 50 volumes of American writing, most now in the public domain. It is the collected works of Lincoln, Thoreau, Poe, Hawthorne, the big presences in American culture. It is a very respected series, because they picked the best of those writers and did very careful editing. I got the best publisher we had in Beijing to gradually work through that series. These volumes are about 1,200-1,500 pages each. They are printed on non-acidic, very thin paper so that it can fit on your bookshelf, but they are massive volumes of collected writings. There were the collected works of Mark Twain, Faulkner, etc.

The publisher very much wanted to do the series with the same level of quality and seriousness. So we made an arrangement with the Library of America in New York, a non-profit organization devoted to encouraging an appreciation of the best of American letters. That program worked. It is still in progress. They use the Library of America logo and it is promoted as the Library of America. Financially, it is probably a great loss to the publisher, except that they get some foreign currency from the ones we buy and have their logo on a very prestigious series. Nonetheless, the program, itself, is a deficit operation for the publisher since each copy in the final version costs about $3, but while that is less than 10% of the U.S. price, it still is too expensive for the usual Chinese consumer. Yet the publisher wanted to do it because it was a prestige item for them. This was the best of American work in a very scholarly format that would present American thought and ideas, Thoreau, for example. Emerson was in one of the volumes first published.

A little side note on the volumes of the Lincoln papers that we had selected for inclusion in the series. When I selected a list of titles for possible translation, I would send it back to USIA which would then buy them and send them out for a complete review prior to offering them to a publisher. I had received a two volume set on the Lincoln writings which included his speeches and letters, etc. I had them in the office and had already set up a time to consult with a publisher when I received a call from the ambassador's office saying, "We hear you have two volumes of Lincoln." I said, "Yes." "We need them this afternoon." "Why?" It turns out that the ambassador was going to see Jiang Ze Min.

Q: The head of state?

YATES: Yes. Jiang Ze Min is a Lincoln fan. He has great respect for his writings, so the ambassador wanted to present him with the most distinguished set that he could quickly lay his hands on. That was the set that I had planned to use with the Chinese publisher that afternoon to begin the process of its translation into Chinese. I had to give it up, and as far as I know, my two volumes of Abraham Lincoln are sitting on Jiang Ze Min's bookshelf today. This underscores again the importance of literature and books. Jiang Ze Min has a favorite habit of quoting to visiting dignitaries small portions of the Gettysburg Address or other utterances of American notables like Lincoln. It floors people who come to see him. Lincoln has an incredible following in China.

Q: Did you find that the "Federalist Papers" rang any bells? The reason I mention this, is in an interview I was doing yesterday. We talked about how, when Helmut Schmidt was chancellor of Germany, he used to quote the "Federalist Papers" in the Bundestag and most people would respond. They had read it. You didn't have to say this was an American thing. He would just say in the "Federalist Papers" number 3, etc. This was the guts of American government.

YATES: Of course, Germany has a federalist system and maybe there is more direct connection there. The Chinese don't have a federal system. I can't honestly tell you that the Federalist Papers have a strong resonance in China. Certainly not to that degree. But I think it is fair to say that the Chinese have a great respect for the writings of our founding fathers, at least those they know.

Where we have a better shot with the Chinese is from people like Thoreau. The idea of civil disobedience is, of course, a hot one in China, but a more fundamental concept that is popular with the Chinese is Thoreau's thoughts about man's relationship to nature. This is similar to the attraction to the philosophy of the American Indian mentioned earlier. If you look at Chinese art, that same relationship between man and nature has been exhibited for many centuries. So the Chinese find resonance with this kind of thing more than the overtly political thought that is represented by the Federalist Papers. Maybe now with the new legal movement in China, there is a possibility that some very important people will find that kind of connection with American thinking. So an important part of the book program was to have this kind of intellectual spread. Within the book program was art, a dose of literature, letters with a strong smattering of American political philosophy (Lincoln, Jefferson and Hamilton), etc.

Q: You were saying that Edgar Alan Poe was included.

YATES: Yes, that was a surprise to me. Certainly he is an important writer in American literary history, but my feeling was there were more important writers to include. It was a case of concession to the publisher. The publisher felt that Poe would be a successful volume. He thought that he could sell Poe even at a high price because of the high Chinese knowledge of that writer. Recall that in Chinese history, our first point of contact was the missionaries who had a penchant for forming schools. There are still a fair number of Chinese intellectuals out there in the woods who were schooled in these American missionary-run schools. What the missionaries taught were things that they knew about, and that included a lot of American authors. So Faulkner, Hemingway, Poe, all are authors that the Chinese have followed over the years. If they haven't read them, at least they know about them.

Mark Twain also has a big following there. The Tom Sawyer adventures, of course, are well known. Other popular titles, things like Gone With the Wind are well known to Chinese readers. When I was there, we weren't involved in titles like that, but remember when the sequel to Gone With the Wind was published? It was called Scarlet, and, I guess, it did not have a very good reputation in the American market. I haven't read it and wouldn't have anything to do with it as part of our translation programs. However, one of the publishers was deep into it and translated the entire volume of Scarlet in a very short time. He had an over-night best seller which sold out as soon as it hit the bookstores. The second printing was also immediately sold out. It was a great commercial success.

Although we had no program interest in it, the Chinese reading public was eager to get it even at the great price it commanded in the market. It also gave me the clue that there was a willingness to part with money if the book were really desired. The market, like most things in China, is vast and the publishers stand to gain a lot of money if they have something that even a very small percentage of the Chinese public finds of interest. So our primary publisher in Beijing that handled the Library of America, for example, knew that once he got it, he would still have it when the market matured. He was the man on the spot with an approved translation which was co-sponsored by the American Embassy, as it were, and would then be able to take the premier leadership, like Hollywood. The first one out gets the worm.

Q: Looking at strategy, when you were at the embassy during this difficult time, 1998-92, when relations vis-a-vis the Chinese mainlanders were in the deep freeze more or less, what was the strategy? Did you sit down and figure out that this was what we should do during this particular time?

YATES: Yes. The approach following Tiananmen in 1989 was largely keeping body and soul together. The Chinese had systematically cut USIS out of much of the discourse that was going on between the two countries and there was official antagonism. That antagonism wasn't very deep, however, and it was possible to penetrate this kind of official wall they had built around us.

As I mentioned before, they had put guards around all of our installations. They never interfered with an American coming and going, unless he or she were a Chinese-American, but they did interfere with our visitors and Chinese staff. So our main business at that time was to hold the organization together and keep the American morale up. Branch PAOs, who had access to many people before, could no longer see them. Telephone calls were not returned. Attempts to visit schools or make office calls were shunted aside. The Fulbright program was flat. Candidates for the international visitor's program could not get approved.

They have a system in China called the Waiban. He is sort of a gatekeeper for foreign visitors and relationships with foreigners. The Waiban has to approve any kind of contact. Beyond that, each individual work unit, or "danwei" as they call it, has to discuss it with the individual and they have to have their work unit approve it first before the contact is made. Then it has to go through the Waiban and the appropriate ministry. You can imagine in a bureaucracy the size of China's how difficult this was. The upshot was that we were not getting anywhere. We had no Fulbright program, no exchange program, and people generally would not come into our facilities. We had to start from zero again.

We were lucky, because we had a large group of local employees who could get access. We could get out of the office and where the Chinese had a particular interest, like the publishing program, they were happy to continue the relationship. Publishers, for example, gave very firm assurances that nothing important would change. They would continue, but we must be discreet about how we did business. They didn't want trouble, but they didn't want to kill the golden goose either.

Q: When you tell about being discreet, did you also feel that we should be somewhat discreet because of public and media pressure in the United States that we don't want to be too cozy with these Chinese because of Tiananmen?

YATES: That may be a factor in the relations between the political, economic, and other sections of the embassy, but our USIS business was not so influenced. Our business is establishing ties. That doesn't mean coziness but enough contact to get the word out. Our business is communication, not locking doors. So while we assumed there would be some in Congress or parts of the U.S. who would be very unhappy with our attempts to try to find ways to communicate with the Chinese, I think most people would agree that this was an important thing to do. We had to maintain ties with those who were our friends in China, those who were most inclined to understand and possibly sympathize with our point of view. We had to sustain that kind of contact discretely, always with the awareness that we could not place any of these contacts in jeopardy with the authorities.

More dangerous than our problem with Congress was their problem with their own ideologues. So someone who was a professor and interested in American studies would have to be very circumspect in his contact with us and we had to be circumspect in our attempts to maintain contact. So that was an important constraint on our ability to act. What we always had to keep in mind was not only how much this would affect our political relationships at home, but, more importantly, how our actions would affect that person's relationships with his or her own leadership in Beijing or other parts of China. It was hard, because for a time right after Tiananmen, there was virtually no contact. At work, we kept the lights on and tried the best we could but, in fact, were rebuffed on most occasions.

When I first arrived in China, one of the first things I did, like any Foreign Service Officer going abroad, was to make a round of “courtesy” calls. You go in and say “Hi, I am so-and-so and am here to do such-and-such. Glad to meet you” and then go home. With my books under my arms for presentations, I went around to the branch posts and made these calls on as many Chinese officials as I could cram into schedules of several days in each city. My visits also gave the Branch Public Affairs Officers a reason to call their contacts and say that there was a visiting fireman in town from Beijing and he would like to bring him around for a “courtesy” call. This would give the BPAO a chance for a new or repeat contact which he or she otherwise would not have. My presence was a commodity to be marketed.

One particular incident occurred was when I visited Shenyang and our branch office there.

Q: Shenyang is where?

YATES: It is in the north eastern part of China, up near North Korea.

Q: Is that the old Daren?

YATES: No, Daren is a port down on the coast. It is the old Mukden. It was a Chinese rail head and became an industrial center during the Japanese occupation of Manchuria. It is a dirty, tough town. It is an industrial city and pollution is extremely high. There are Mexico City-levels of pollution there. I understand that it hasn't changed much in the years since I left. I just spoke with someone recently who had just came back and said it is as bad as ever. This was a person who had bronchial troubles while there, the air was so bad. Just breathing was a definite health hazard, particularly to our people who are there for a long term. There is also a morale problem.

I had to go up there relatively often, because the Branch Public Affairs Officer is one of a small number of the official American community and the sole representative of USIS. Shenyang has only a very small consulate and a connected apartment building. Living is not terribly luxurious. One of the difficulties is that food supplies are limited and you have to get a lot of what you need from Beijing. Particularly before we arrived there, China was famous for its limited supplies of food, especially in the winter when most fresh vegetables disappeared. People in Beijing frequently ran out of things, let alone people who lived in Shenyang. So, traditionally, it was a tough place to work.

I made a visit there and saw the local provincial head of the Waiban, the person with responsibility for all international contacts, including, of course, Americans. The visit with him was typical of the visits that I had all around the country. I remember this one because it was so graphic. I drove up with the Branch PAO to the front of the provincial capital and went into his office which was on the second floor. It was a nice office, large with upgraded furniture. He was a fairly high ranking person. After greetings, we sat down and one of his assistants was called in with a notepad and sat in the corner off to our side. He began taking notes of our conversation. The provincial chief really laid me out about the Voice of America which he termed was an affront to the Chinese people. It had insulted the feelings of the Chinese people by aiding and abetting the Tiananmen protesters. It was an incident that was an embarrassment to everybody, etc. He went on and on and on. It was a very well rehearsed speech that I had heard in other places. He went on with his diatribe on the Voice of America, the inequities of the American government and how it has done such terrible things in history, for six or seven minutes. It was quite a show.

Then the note taker closed his pad and put his pencil down, and then we got down to business. We then spoke about why I was there and he was very personable. He asked me where I was from, what was my experience, how he would like to get to know me, and other pleasantries common to such occasions. At that time, I presented him with the books which he accepted with a big smile. It was quite a stack of books. There were a number of books on the U.S. in Chinese and a boxed set of three books on the US. They were paperbacks but collected in a nicely framed box. We went through the pleasantries and promises of cooperation and help. I noticed that the note taker wasn't taking any more notes. He was just sitting there, listening and smiling and being very pleasant.

After about 15 - 20 minutes of that, he cleared his throat, the note taker opened his book, and I got another blast on the earlier subjects. I sat and listened. It is hard when you are being roasted as if you were in court being charged with heinous crimes. Anyway, the Branch PAO and I sat through another five minutes or so of the diatribe while the note taker recorded every thought. When the Waiban finally ran out of steam, that was the end of the meeting. We shook hands amiably and were escorted out of the office and down the hall, with the BPAO and me in the lead as customary. As we proceeded down the hall, I turned around to say goodbye as we approached the stairs and observed the note taker and my new friend, the Waiban, had the gift books opened and were absorbed in animated conversation with big smiles. Their attention was so intense that I had no opportunity to offer preliminary goodbyes, so just turned and walked down the stairs.

To me, that was an illustration of what you have to be careful about in judging Chinese rhetoric. If you listen too carefully to the argument, you get a distorted view of what is going on. In this visit, the Waiban was really happy that we came. He was overjoyed with the books because they are hard to get. He was pleased with them and saw some value in them, because he carried them under his arm. He followed me down to the car outside, the note taker had long before stopped taking notes and was all smiles. With warm handshakes, we said goodbye beside the car. It was a very personable and valuable visit. However, if we had argued with him or taken offense at what he said, we would have gotten nowhere, and the visit would have been a disaster. I had learned that lesson the hard way in previous conversations with Chinese officials. We now had his cooperation and pledges of help in getting our visiting speakers into the city, placing our Fulbrighters and speakers at the university, and making sure we had the right contacts for the book program with publishers who would be able to take our materials. All of these were things we wanted to get out of the visit.

We met our objectives by simply closing our ears and minds during the time of the note taking. He had to record his speeches in those notes so that they could be reported back to his own hierarchy in the political system. They said, "Look, this is what I told those nefarious Americans." He had the notes to demonstrate his resolve and support for the strident policy and the note taker to confirm what was said. Everything was fine. On the other hand, he also was able to do his business and get what he really wanted. He wanted a Sister City relationship between an American city and Shenyang. We promised and later made every effort to locate a city willing for the tie up. Ultimately, we were not successful, but the demonstrable effort was there. There is a glut of these formal relationships and American cities are reluctant to step off into new ones. The Waiban's motives were, of course, his desire for commercial connections with the US. For that, he was very affable. Those notes, I am fairly confident, were not part of the official record. If you gave them space to do what they had to do, you could come up with very workable and very positive relationships with the Chinese, even the seemingly intractable ones.

Some of the more affable Chinese, the most warm, the ones who would put their arm around you, were the ones to be most wary of. They often were the strongest ideologues. A sort of reverse radish; white on the outside but very red on the inside. They were often the very ones who had been trained as handlers of foreigners, especially Americans. Naturally, not all enthusiastically friendly Chinese were like that, but one had to choose friends carefully.

Another vignette. On one occasion I visited "Diaoyutai," the official residence of the leadership in Beijing. It is located immediately to the west of the Forbidden City. It is a beautiful compound. My wife and I were seated for most of the dinner next to one of those Western handlers. As is the custom in many Chinese official banquets, we were drinking mao-tai, a strong-flavored Chinese drink that is highly alcoholic. It is not bad if you are eating heavy or greasy Chinese food, but it can get to you pretty fast. The Chinese officials attending, like most Chinese government workers, were not rich, so these banquets for foreign dignitaries were wonderful times to eat a lot and absorb as much as they can of the strong drink. This bureaucrat kept pouring down the mao-tai, and it was fascinating to watch the metamorphosis, the butterfly turned into caterpillar. As the evening wore on, he became stripped of his inhibitions about talking about his beliefs and turned into a real communist very quickly.

This was one of the nicest, warmest, most affable and most understanding and Western type Chinese we had ever had contact with in Beijing. But underneath a lot of that was the other side of the Chinese, a real dyed-in-the-wool ideologue. There was no point in arguing with him, because his opinions were rooted as religious commitment to his interpretation of politics. You had to be careful. Those who looked like ideologues often turned out not to be, and those who didn't look like ideologues very often turned into the worse kind. You had to be selective in what kind of relationships you had with people, because you could set yourself up for things as well.

Q: Let's stop at this point. I will put a few things here so we will know where we start next time. We have talked about your arrival, your book program, the problems in Shanghai, the fact that you had to deal with a deep freeze situation, but you could get through to some people if you were willing to listen to an ideological prelude before you got down to business. A couple of things I would like to ask in the 1989-92 period. Were you seeing any impact or monitoring what the Voice of America was doing? Was it having any impact in China, good, bad, or indifferent? Also your impression of American, but other correspondents, who were in China during this time of immediate post-Tiananmen. Also about the ambassador and your impression of the embassy. Do you have anything you would like to put in?

YATES: It will probably emerge. We haven't talked much about Beijing and the conditions while I was there. We haven't talked much about Chengdu, which was another one of our branches or, for that matter, Shenyang. Each of them presented a separate problem that confronted me there. Other things in Beijing that deserve mention would be our attempts to make some breakthroughs in terms of communicating with the Chinese, not face to face, but electronically. And some of the telecommunication problems we had within the country itself. Something about life style in the country, the diplomatic community at that time. The main thing I think we should discuss is the state of the exchange program, one of our major efforts in China, and secondarily the Fulbright program.

Q: This is May 15, 1997. Ken, maybe we ought to start with Beijing and life there, the diplomatic life style and what you observed there.

YATES: When I arrived in 1989, Beijing was a city under internal siege. Security forces still held much of the city in strict control. Traffic was difficult mainly because of bicycles. During the commuter hours, the city was a sea of bicycles. There were separate channels on major roads for bicycles only, so there would be an island in the road for the vehicular traffic and a rather wide bicycle paths on both sides. That helped a lot in channeling them, but when the two clashed at intersections, there were a lot of problems, and the bicycles clogged up traffic quite a bit.

It was a pretty quiet city, dusty and very badly polluted. At both ends were large power generating facilities and much of the heavy industry was located to the west. This meant that every time the breeze blew from the west, the prevailing wind, it brought all the soot and pollutants right over the city. To keep a house clean was a major problem, because with the windows open, there was always dust and black soot drifting in. So Beijing at that time was not a very healthy place.

Food in Beijing, despite much ado about Chinese cooking, was not very good. You could go out to restaurants to eat, but sanitary conditions were not the best. The quality of the foodstuffs, themselves, was not very high. If you depended on the local market for edibles, you were in trouble. There were private markets where you could shop, but selection was not always extensive and who knew what made the greens grow. If you knew enough about the city, could get around a little bit, and had some Chinese, you could shop in those markets and do all right. At least in the private markets, you could pick the goods out yourself and take them home to cook. But that took a lot of time and is a lot of work. As in most traditional Asian societies, the wife of a family starts early in the morning to prepare the day's meals and works all day long on them. Unlike dropping down to the Safeway here, you didn't go down the street and pick up a few things on your way home from work for dinner. You had to really work at it and prepare it in advance. You bought live, un-plucked chickens and things like that. But even in the early '90s, things were getting better very quickly for the Chinese, as well as for the expatriate community.

Prior to the late '80s and before Deng Xiaoping instituted the reforms which led to the opening up of the peasant market, just about all of the markets were collectivized. All of the produce was handled by the government, and people in Beijing were reduced to little more than cabbage and tea in the winter. There was rice, but it was not always plentiful; cabbage always was.

So that meant that things were better by the time we arrived. The meat was better, but you had to be careful when you bought it on the open market. Many of the foreign community would shop at what were called “Friendship Stores” which were run by the Chinese government for hard currency. So if you had green dollars, you could go in and buy international brands of things like frozen meat, sodas, booze, and some goods like suitcases which came out of Hong Kong. The standard of living was not terrible, but it certainly was Spartan.

Yet, things were changing awfully fast. Major hotels in town were sprouting up like weeds all over the place. They were international class hotels and they had pretty good restaurants. They were outstanding when compared to the standard (and for the most part very much cheaper) fare you had available downtown. There were a number of famous restaurants in Beijing. For example, the Beijing Duck restaurant, which I did not like. The duck was greasy and greasy duck in one week was enough to last for a couple more weeks. As residents, we did not go there very often. Those were “banquet” restaurants, aiming at formal dinners and the tourist market. There were some Korean restaurants in town, a couple of which we liked. Others were not very good and had to settle for the quality of ingredients similar to that one could get on the open market. So it was kind of a hit or miss situation on food.

Entertainment was limited. Chinese television did not have anywhere near the selection you have these days on American television. For news, you could listen to the Voice of America which most people did in the mornings, or BBC or Radio Australia. Chinese television programs tended to be pretty stale and not very interesting. It was interesting to watch CCTV dramas occasionally to get a glimpse of Chinese life, but as a standard diet, they soon paled.

Travel was fascinating if you had the time and patience. The problem was, China is an enormous country, the size of the U.S. end to end. Near Beijing, there were the Western Hills on the outskirts and the Summer Palace and various reasonably close sights such as the Great Wall and the Ming Tombs. Once you have seen the Great Wall, however, there is no reason to go back there. There are a lot of old wives’ tales from travelers which were always fun to talk about. The Great Wall is not a Great Wall after all. It is a lot of pieces of little walls all over the northern part of China. That image of a single wall was hard to get people to let go of.

We had an incident, for example, of a well known woman runner from the U.S. who came out to China to “run” the Great Wall from one end to the other. She was all equipped with special gear and obviously had made a lot of preparations. We had to gently but persuasively convince her that there was no such thing as “the” Great Wall. She would not be able to start on one end and make it through to the other in one long trot. Since they were scattered all over the area and many were in various stages of disrepair and some were long gone, her mission was truly impossible.

There are common myths about the Great Wall. For example, it was said that the Great Wall was the only man-made object the astronauts could see from the moon. Despite that claim appearing in more than several official tourist brochures, it is completely false. The wall is not very tall in many places. It is impressive, but only about 4 stories tall. You couldn’t see a four story building from the moon, so you didn’t have much of a chance to see the Great Wall either. You can’t see it from the moon, not even with good equipment. But, nevertheless, the Chinese were very proud of saying that.

Despite the misconceptions, China was a feast for a tourist. Many parts of China were worth visiting. Shanghai, of course, was interesting just because of the importance of the city in antiquity and as the most cosmopolitan of the mainland urban areas. Chengdu, which is in the center of the country in Szechwan province, was the old western capital of China and at the terminus of the silk road; the eastern most point, it is a fascinating place with outstanding food. It takes a very long weekend to get there, do something and get back to Beijing.

As time went on, things got steadily, and in some places rapidly, better. That was true also for the multiplying hotel restaurants in the franchised establishments often invested in by various Chinese official organizations, including the military and the police. There was an Indian restaurant that appeared at a Holiday Inn on the western side of Beijing and was a delightful place to eat. It had pretty good control of the quality of the food which I think was imported through the hotel.

I drive an older BMW. When I took the car to China, I was told I was out of my mind. Firstly, I would not get any parts, and secondly, it wouldn't run on the available gasoline which, of course, was leaded. There were going to be all kinds of problems. In reality, I had no problems. I discovered a semblance of a dealership in Beijing which was in the process of becoming established and was managed by an expatriate Yugoslav. By the same measure, all of these old tales I tell you of life in Beijing are certainly now outmoded by far, because things are changing so rapidly.

As the hotels developed in their sophistication, they also started bringing in foreign amenities like supermarkets. Beijing was growing in commercial importance and therefore attracted a much larger number of international folk, all of whom needed some sort of support like what they were accustomed to at home. They also were willing to pay a premium for it. There was the Watson group out of Hong Kong, which moved in to take advantage of the new and rapidly growing market. You could go into their market in the arcade of one of the major hotels and be surprised at what looked like a real supermarket, with rows and rows of canned goods and frozen Australian beef. The meat was pretty dry, but nonetheless, it was a great leap forward compared to what was available for the expatriate community.

Housing was lousy in Beijing but much better than it had been. Everything depends on the development of the country. Previously, people who worked at the American Embassy had to live in hotels. That was the first stage. Then the Chinese put together an expatriate community not far from the American Embassy where many people lived. But that was run down. The Chinese tended to build buildings that looked and operated as if they were ten years old when they opened. This owed much to the indifferent construction. Cement, I guess, was thin, elevators would not work reliably, and painting was mainly whitewash and not the kind of durable stuff that we are accustomed to. This meant every time someone walked down the hall and bumped into the wall, there was a mark. It didn't take very long, given the situation there, to turn a new building into a slum. It was a difficult place to live in.

We moved into a brand new apartment when we arrived, and we felt very fortunate. When the embassy put the carpet in, it looked fine. The problem was, it had been stored somewhere uncontrolled for a couple of years and was infested with brown moths. Thousands of them. Every night, these things would come out and swarm on the walls. When I took my problem to the General Services Office, they said it couldn't be anything they had done and must be coming from outside. "How were our screens?" Of course, there was nothing wrong with the screens; the problem lay under the carpet. The padding underneath was infested. Ultimately, we had to rip up the entire carpet and replace the padding, which is difficult after you have moved into a wall-to-wall carpeted apartment. Even today, from some of our goods that were packed in Beijing and not opened until we got back to Washington, I swear I can recognize some of those brown moths emerging.

Those were the living conditions we faced in Beijing. Every once in a while, the elevators wouldn't run, and if you lived on the ninth floor as we did, you had a major problem. It was okay if you were home when they stopped, but if you were outside coming in, you were in trouble. Luckily, each building had two elevators and if the one for your side of the building was out, you had to take the one on the other side. When you got to your floor, you had to take a sort of catwalk on the outside of the building across to your side of the building. That was unnerving if you suffered from even mild vertigo and it was a windy day. We would have to walk outside of the ninth floor level to get to our side of the building.

Also, in the part of town where we lived, the new Australian Embassy was being built. In Beijing, with good reason, they kept all trucks off the streets during the day. Trucks could only run at night. That meant that the noise on the streets was highest in the evening when trucks were running back and forth delivering gravel and cement. You had the beep-beep-beep noise that goes on when trucks back up, and this went on all night from about 11:00 to 4:00 in the morning. All this was accompanied by the intermittent crash of gravel being dumped on the ground, so it didn't make for a very pleasant existence.

Another little quirk in the Chinese system usually occurred in June when they would turn off the hot water. The philosophy was that you don't need hot water because it was June. It was warm. This was probably true, but you want to take a shower and cold showers are just about as cold in June as they are in December. That meant no hot water for anything in the apartments. Some embassies rented hotel rooms so people could take a towel, a bar of soap, and go down to the hotel and use the shower at least a couple of times a week. So this was not gracious living in the sense I am sure members of Congress would see life in the Foreign Service. It was not easy in a whole variety of ways. For example, you could not drink the water, which meant you had to drink bottled water. You could either take what the embassy provided or use the tablets they gave you and make your own. In the more remote parts of China where the embassy didn't have a supply of bottled water, they had distillers. Each embassy apartment was provided with one, so you could distill your own water. If you have ever had to drink distilled water, you know it does not taste very good. Once you distill the water, you have to aerate it and in aerating it, of course, you then introduce the possibility of more of introducing those things that you were distilling out. Anyway, it was not easy.

We had a resident doctor in Beijing for the many ills and problems that were likely to occur. A psychiatrist visited from time to time to try to soothe the pressures from the day-to-day existence. Security remained a worry for many people. The wife of the Public Affairs Officer was threatened with a knife in the market one day. There were then, and I am sure there still are today, people in China who don't like foreigners and essentially insist that you leave one way or another. That made life nerve wracking, especially for wives who were not working and who had to make other things interesting for themselves like shopping or moving around the city. That was hard and sometimes dangerous. There were a couple of knifings while we were there. Mostly teenagers who would get into trouble. For children, there was not much to do, and this meant additional pressures on families. We didn't have kids, so it wasn't much of a problem for us, but those who had them found there were a lot of things they did not have for their children that they wished they had.

But life was still interesting, because you could move around China and learn much. You could go to some place that was old and different. Because you could exhaust the major sights in Beijing rather quickly, you probably did not go back very often. How many times would you want to go through the Forbidden City, for example? It is interesting, and every time you go there, you find something different, but it pretty much stays the same. There were museums that would change their exhibits now and then. But in many ways, it certainly was not a world class exhibition city. So you found your interests where you could. People who worked, of course, found it in the work, which was remarkably interesting because of the constant challenges at that time. But for the diplomatic community, it was like a ghetto. You lived with other diplomats from all over the world.

There was not an American ghetto or African ghetto, it was all mixed up. But that meant you probably had people living next to you who had kids who didn't have any money. That was particularly true for the diplomats from the smaller nations in Africa or the third world countries that Beijing had cultivated for so many years who had no salaries to speak of and had to innovate to get along. The Chinese had simply given them space for embassies to maintain those relations. So they were living check-by-jowl with people who were relatively rich and that led to temptations. In one of the compounds, there was something that could loosely be termed as gangs comprised of the youth of some third world countries. I guess you could say that most of the danger from theft or burglary probably was from other foreigners. If something happened, the Chinese police would say it was a foreign problem and had nothing to do with them. We didn't get much help.

In the residential areas, the security was not pervasive. You had privacy, but there was a strong probability that all the apartments were bugged. We were on the ninth floor, the top inhabited floor. Above us was a very large area where the heating pipes and elevator machinery was located in the center of the roof and on the two sides was a flat area of roof. You could get up there, but there were parts of that section that were locked up and there were Chinese employees, rather intelligent looking people, running up and down the stairs there often, so that was probably where the listening devices for the buildings were located, in those locked rooms next to the elevator machinery. In the summer when it got hot, they would open the doors and you could see people going and coming, although some of them had air conditioners, which was very rare in China. I guess if you are one of that kind of person, you tend to get what you want.

I had an incident driving home one warm afternoon. As is my habit in warm weather, I had my arm out the window and was driving beside the construction site of the Australian Embassy. A bicyclist rode up beside me, grabbed a hold of the car and threw something into the car and then rode off. He then stopped his bike and turned around and looked back at me. I stopped, got out of the car and chewed him out for endangering himself and my control of the car. Without a word he turned, got on his bicycle and left. I found out later that what he had tossed into the car was a folded up piece of paper saying, "I want to meet you." It gave a place and a time. He was fairly well dressed. Clearly not a student. He looked to be in his early to middle twenties. He had a white shirt on and looked like a bureaucrat. Of course, you never know what complex things you encounter. Entrapment was a common danger. People are approached by all kinds of things. I threw the paper away in the parking lot and then reported it to the security people for a couple of reasons.

If I kept the paper, I was subject to being picked up for possibly aiding and abetting somebody and, if this was a setup, putting myself in jeopardy by walking around with that piece of paper in my pocket. If they found the piece of paper, there was no incriminating evidence on it for anybody, so I didn't feel I might be putting somebody in danger. I suspected that, given the nature of the person and the place of the incident, it was a setup planned for some reason by the security forces. All took place not far from one of the security huts that surrounded the foreigners compound. The location was in full view of that post. There were plenty of other places around town where somebody could have left the paper without being in view of a security post. So to me he was either very inept, and somebody I wouldn't want to have anything to do with anyway. Just why he had stopped his bicycle after tossing in the note was a mystery. If he had been a dissident, he should have kept going out of fear of being discovered by the security person at the compound. Another question was why, after I had stopped and yelled at the bicyclist, no security guard approach or inquired what the problem was. Of course, if it was a setup by a security group they would have stayed away, not wanting to interfere in that operation. Just why he stopped I will never know. I never heard anything more about it from security. Those are the kinds of things you were subjected to.

In the back of our compound at USIS, we had the residence of the Ambassador and the embassy's Health Unit. That compound once served as the entire liaison office and so had several support buildings that were used to support the much smaller staff of the time. It was in the health unit that Dr. Fang Li Zhi, the very famous astrophysicist dissident was in "hiding." Of course, the Chinese knew exactly where he was and likely had the place zeroed in with all types of detection devices. Every day I had to go to work in my office not more than 20 yards from where Dr. Fang and his wife resided. He had come to the residence during the period of Tiananmen, and since diplomat compounds are legally the territory of the resident embassy, the Chinese were not allowed to enter. If they wished to, they could have walked in at any time, using only a small amount of force; there is no real protection, only diplomatic convention.

So we had super special Chinese surveillance around the compound. Across from the sole gate to the compound sat a Mercedes Benz with four security personnel at all times. They consisted of a driver, one female security agent, one apparent supervisor, a male, and one who was obviously a simple muscle man. We also had a Chinese security motorcyclist who always hung out with them. They would play cards in the car with all the doors open. They were bored stiff. I actually felt sorry for them. I would often drive my car into the compound on weekends to wash it with the hose on the shady side of the building. Of course, it was close to the building and not within easy sight of the security people monitoring the building. I would drive in, possibly do some work in the office, and then go out and wash the car. On leaving the compound, I would be followed every time by both the Mercedes and the motorcycle because they were suspicious that I might be spiriting away Dr. Fang, his wife, or both. Of course, another Mercedes would take the place of the one following me from the compound.

I was followed no matter where I went, shopping, picking my wife up for lunch at a hotel somewhere, etc. When we would get out of the car, lock it, and walk away, one of the security people would approach it to check out the back seat for anything suspicious. Often, one would stand on the rear bumper and jump up and down to see whether or not something heavy was in the trunk. They were always careful not to damage anything and never tried to break in, but they sure made a mess of my rear bumper.

Sometimes, I was very happy to have them escorting me, because in Beijing traffic, you are always subject to getting into an accident from a bicyclist who rides right in front of you without any chance for me to stop. If you hit the person, possibly causing injury, maiming or death, the consequences can be very difficult. Crowds gather quickly at any accident, and the foreigner is always considered guilty. The courts always seem to find that guilt goes with the ability to pay. People at the embassy had those kinds of incidents too frequently during the time I was in Beijing. If you do, you have real trouble that may lead to your being forced to leave the country or even physical injury from the crowds that can easily be stirred up.

Anyway, having the security car right on my tail meant I probably would have had plenty of witnesses if I had gotten into any kind of problem. Because the security car carried no license tags, it was easily spotted for what it was by the normal Beijing citizen. No one would want to tangle with the security division, so that alone might have dissuaded those curious that would otherwise run to check out an accident. In a way, the following chase car was a strange comfort.

I was talking about the problem of security forces following me in Beijing. This practice led to a variety of interesting circumstances. Traffic was always heavy and crowded. If you pull up to a traffic light just as it was changing yellow, the light would turn red before you could get completely through the intersection. Usually the cross traffic would begin to jump the light as it turned yellow, so a chase car, if it was several lengths behind would possibly get caught by the cross traffic. This would mean the chase car driver would either lose you or be forced to do something dangerous like forcing his way through the light. Most of the time, they did just that. However, in certain circumstances such as a blocking bus, the car would be caught. That would show the function of the motorcycle, which would also be a part of the cavalcade. If the car got caught in traffic, the motorcyclist could then take over and follow the car until the Mercedes could catch up again. He would travel down sidewalks to make sure you were not lost. The possible loss of Fang Li Zhi was that serious an issue to them.

After a while, you began to know these people, because they were the same people all the time. If the light looked as if it was going to change, I made it a habit to slow down to make sure I didn't get through the intersection in time. After a while, the driver of the chase car began, I think, to understand what I was doing. I never had any problems with chase cars. Knowing I would not cause them trouble, they would not tailgate, and although they had to follow me, they were always polite and never abused their authority. I never had any difficulties.

Some others who got their kicks from losing the chase cars did have trouble. We had one younger officer who had a pickup truck, one with a camper body on the back. It was easily identified. He had good Chinese and traveled all over Beijing. He knew some of the dissidents. Like the rest of us, he was routinely followed by the security forces. Unfortunately, he saw it as a game. He would cut down some hutong, which is an alley in Beijing, and make a quick turn down another one. He knew his way around Beijing and sometimes could lose the security car. He did so on several occasions which he thought was a terrific experience and some kind of minor victory. Yet it was a pyrrhic one, for he found one morning that all four tires were slashed flat. The Chinese security forces came over and looked and said, "Gee, this is terrible. Must be one of these foreign kids, a Chinese kid wouldn't do that." That probably was true, a Chinese kid didn't do it. I think it was a pretty obvious warning that if you are going to fool with the security forces, you are not going to be driving. So take your choice, either no tires or the security people. So I think he learned his lesson at that point. This was their country, and if they wanted to do something, they would. You buck them at your own peril.

That is a little glimpse of life in Beijing. There wasn't much social life, of course, although there were diplomatic parties all the time where people got together for conversation, trading of stories, and something to drink. They were not very elaborate, and Beijing was not a place where there was a very heavy social world. If you wanted to go to parties, you could, because most embassies would have national days. With all the countries represented in the Chinese capital, there was almost always someone's national day you could go to. But it was the same crowd all of the time and not very interesting. You got sore feet, didn't get fed very well, and if you did not drink, it was not much fun. I did not drink much, so I did not find much interesting unless there were contacts you could meet there.

If there were Chinese officials invited, it was worth going to receptions just to make contact, because you couldn't go to their offices very often. One of the problems of working in Beijing, particularly right after Tiananmen, was that all Chinese contacts shut down. You couldn't get through to anybody. The most frustrating thing was, you were supposed to be a Foreign Service Officer contacting people of the country, and you couldn't do that unless you got outside of Beijing. That is why my trips to the USIS branches were always so important.

Q: Who was the ambassador and how did he operate?

YATES: When I arrived, Jim Lilley was the ambassador. He had come in from Korea. He was actually born in China and, I think, had a very strong personal identification with the country. He was nice, smart, capable, and well liked in the embassy. He was a little stiff sometimes but nevertheless a warm human person. Yet despite his personality and early ties with China, he had a hard time. More than any other person in the embassy, the ambassador is the one who does the contacting or hobnobbing with officials. He could not get to see anybody. Even the mayor of Beijing was not available to him for a long, long time. In fact, the first breakthrough with Mayor Chen Chi Tong was something that I became involved in.

As Deputy Public Affairs Officer, I inherited many of the invitations that were passed to the Public Affairs Officer but which he did not want to attend. The embassy sent over an invitation it had received for a reception in connection with the publishing of a book, an event that was not a very exciting opportunity for most. The book was a Chinese encyclopedia commemorating the Olympics of 2000. This was the beginning of the Chinese campaign to be selected for the 2000 Olympics. It was essentially a travel book about China and Chinese things. Of course no one wanted to go, so it was passed along to me, the book guy. I was reluctant but decided to go, since we didn't get many invitations and somebody should represent the United States.

As expected, it was a very dry ceremony in a big room with a lot of people, mostly Chinese. I was seated in the front middle, as befitting a representative of the US, but I was a bit uncomfortable since it was expected to be an unfortunately long ceremony with lots of speeches. On one side, I had a Yugoslav representative who didn't speak any English and I spoke no Serbo-Croatian, so I ignored her. On the other side of me was seated an older lady, whom I took to be the mother of a writer or somebody like that. We struck up a simple conversation in Chinese; she spoke no English. We talked about all the inane things you talk about at a gathering like that. Isn't this nice and what the book was about, etc. Out of the blue, she asked me at one point if I thought the ambassador would like to meet the mayor? I was a bit taken aback. Strange things routinely happened in China, but this was in a league of its own. I knew the ambassador had long wished to pay a call on the mayor but had been rebuffed by the hard-nosed Communist. Mayor Chen Chi Tong was implicated in the middle of events that took place at Tiananmen, but as leader of the capital city was an important, "must meet" for the ambassador.

The ceremony was beginning, and people were making speeches, shouting into the microphones, and walking around the room with flowers, making presentations. I responded, "Why, of course. Why do you ask?" She replied, "Well, if you think the ambassador would be interested in meeting the mayor (who was later removed from office because of corruption), I think I can arrange it. Give me a call when you get back to your office." I said, "Fine, I will do that." Then, for the first time, she gave me her card. She was Beijing's Waiban. As I noted before, the Waiban were responsible for handling foreign affairs within their jurisdiction. Every major governmental area has a Waiban and she was the one for Beijing. Evidently she was a Russian translator years ago, used by Mao Zedong in his contacts with Soviets. Madame Gan was in her early-sixties when I met her, and evidently had been given the post as a reward for her good service to the late chairman.

When I got back to USIS, I called the ambassador's office and asked what they wished me to do. They asked me to follow up. So I called Madame Gan back and asked what she had in mind. I was still a bit dubious since my Chinese never was stellar, and there was small worry that I might have gotten the wrong impression. I inquired about what exactly she had in mind. She simply asked, "When would the ambassador be available?" I said, "Name your day." He had never even shaken the hand of the mayor of Beijing and would find a way to make time at the mayor's convenience. Finally, we worked out to go to one of the older world class hotels in Beijing for lunch. It was to be a small group, just the mayor, the Ambassador, several aides, Madam Gan, and myself. It turned out to be all very pleasant. We sat and talked about not much, but there was contact, and that was the formal opening of contact with the city of Beijing.

We always had a lot of administrative problems with the city and having direct contact with the mayor would be very helpful. In China, “guanshi” or “connections” made all the difference. Politically, the mayor was a very important man in the party in Beijing, a senior elder in the communist party in China, and somebody who the embassy should be in contact with. If we didn’t like him, we could still be in touch with him because he had power.

The Chinese, themselves, did not have a very good mechanism to talk to us, never mind us with them. It worked both ways. It took that kind of a low level contact to get the ball rolling, but once it did, the Chinese were very forthcoming. This was the kind of thing the ambassador was faced with as head of the American mission. He had very limited contacts with the foreign ministry. When you went into the foreign ministry as an embassy delegation, you always were led to the same room, not someone’s office. It was always the same reception room where you sat in the same old chairs. You were served tea, they came in and presented their position, and you presented your position. The meeting ended with their thanks for your coming. “It was nice seeing you,” they would say as they helped you out the door to your cars. It was a very formalized, not very productive relationship.

After Tiananmen in 1989, that was the way it was for a better part of a year. However, it gradually changed. One of the interesting stories that came up, was on how this change started. We always had steel helmeted, automatic weaponry equipped, tall security guards stationed every 18 - 20 feet around the compound. This was to intimidate us and to intimidate the people of Beijing from coming through our gates to see us. Former President Nixon came to China on a goodwill visit. This was long after his presidency; he was doing something for Pepsi Cola. He came to China to see Deng Xiaoping, because Nixon opened American relations with China and the Chinese never forgot. They see Nixon as something of a demi-god. They didn’t understand the business of Watergate, but they did understand that Nixon was the first to make the breakthrough to China, opening China up to the rest of the world.

So Nixon came back to China. While in Beijing, Nixon was to come to the embassy to meet with employees on the occasion of the July 4th celebration. As the conversation with Deng Xiao Ping was later related, Nixon said, “I am going to go to the American Embassy later this afternoon to say hello to all the people who work there. I understand there are security guards all around the embassy with automatic weapons and steel helmets. That looks awful. When I go there, I don’t want to see those guards.” Miraculously, no more than twenty minutes after those words had tumbled out of his mouth, those guards disappeared and never came back. At least not during the time I was there, and as far as I know, never did. They just disappeared. In their place were apple cheeked, young farm boys, obviously out of the far provinces such as Gansu. They obviously did not know much about the big city. They had little side arms, sloppy uniforms and stood around, embarrassed at having nothing to do. When Nixon came to the embassy that afternoon, there were no steel helmeted, automatic-weapon-equipped guns around. Evidently, Deng Xiaoping simply told the security forces to knock it off. That was all it took.

In addition to the motorized security forces at our USIS compound, the Chinese also had every intersection in the diplomatic quarter equipped with television cameras. Ostensibly, they were for traffic control, so that the traffic engineers could keep control over where the traffic was and how things were working, but, in fact, they were observation cameras pointed at us. So they kept up their observations and the chase cars, but the threatening posture of the security forces diminished greatly after the Nixon visit.

Q: You talked about a number of the posts. Shanghai, Canton and Mukden. There were others weren't there?

YATES: The former Mukden is now called Shenyang, the capital of the northeastern part of China. Shenyang is a rail head and a major center for heavy industry in China. Because of its role as a center of industrial activity, it is heavily polluted. Also, because many of the heavy industries in China were the last on the list for privatization, they are the ones closest to or actually in bankruptcy. That leaves the economy of Shenyang a bit weak. Weaker still is the remarkable city of Changchun just to the north of Shenyang. It is an agricultural city, a poor city. It is one of the few places in eastern China where you can see beggars on the street and people in rags. But the city is magnificent. The boulevards are wide and all the major buildings that the Japanese built are magnificent. They intended it to be a major capital. It is a beautiful city, but, of course, it is no longer used for that. I had a chance to visit once and shall never forget it.

Q: Where were our consulates?

YATES: In Shenyang, Chengdu, which is out in Szechwan province - the capital of the west - Shanghai and Guangzhou.

Q: Was Chengdu where you were having some problems?

YATES: We had a problem out there, because the facilities were no good. However, Chengdu was extremely important as a major cultural and political center in China. In terms of population, the Chengdu consular district included as many people as the whole of the U.S. The consulate was on one floor and USIS was on another floor of a major hotel in the center of the city, but visitors to either had to enter through a separate entrance in the rear so that the Chinese could control who was coming and going. Living quarters were on the third floor. That meant you lived above the store, and it was known, at least, in one case that there were Branch Public Affairs Officers there who hadn't been out of the building in more than four months. There was a restaurant below and a shop where you could buy cereal, fruit, and things like that. If you brought in a lot of meat in a big freezer, and people did, and bought rice, you could go in and close the door and stay there for months.

Psychologically, it was a bad situation for people to live in. It was dirty and dark, with electric power that would go out all the time. In these days of computers and other electronic gadgets that are necessary for the modern office, it was very, very difficult to maintain a reasonable operation in such a situation. So, the Federal Buildings Office in Washington some years before had contracted with the Chinese to build a new consulate on the edge of the city. In fact, they did build the building, but FBO came back to look at it and said it wasn't suitable. It was built to Chinese standards and had no real relevance to our needs. Since they had not followed our requests, there was a big hassle. This went on for years.

At the time of the construction, FBO shipped in things like refrigerators, air conditioners, freezers, furniture, and rugs and stored them all. Over a period of about five years, these things began to rust. They hadn't been installed but the building was still sitting there, so after long and difficult negotiations, they got the Chinese to agree to rehab the brand new building and make it into a building that would first meet our needs and secondly would meet our codes for fire, power, plumbing, and other usual standards. In fact they did, but it took us a long time to get in there. There was a great controversy among the staff, because for USIS, operating downtown in the hotel was better. You could get to places quickly to meet people, go to a coffee shop, etc. The new consulate was way out of town. Although it was closer to one of the universities, it was a lot further from the center of the city. So, there were good and bad things and that was a major problem in Chengdu at the time.

Chengdu also had another role. It was the gateway to Tibet. It doesn't look like it on a map, but if you were to fly to Tibet, you had to stop in Chengdu first, stay over night, and then get the plane to Lhasa, if you approached from inside China. So that meant that people who were on their way to Tibet would have to go through Chengdu and that meant that Chengdu provincial authorities had a good deal to say about who went and who did not. If you didn't have permission to go, you could not get on airplanes, get hotel reservations, or move. These things all required clearances. For example, for citizens in China, you couldn't stray more than five miles from the point where you were assigned without getting permission. You had to apply for permission.

There were certain cities in China that were considered open to diplomats and tourists. The consulate cities were open, and you could travel there without advance permission as long as you took public transport, mainly air. You couldn't drive. They knew when you were going to go, because you told them by buying a ticket. For other cities, you had to apply for separate permission and justify your plans. They could choose to let you go or restrict your travel. It was the same for their diplomats in the US. We had been able to add to the number of open cities, apart from those with consulates, by negotiation. All aspects of open cities and travel was by reciprocity. If we had a trip that was turned down by the Chinese, then through the reciprocal arrangement, we would turn down a trip the Chinese had requested in the US. Say they wanted to go to Atlanta. We would say no, because the Chinese do not have a consulate there and it may not have been on an otherwise open list. The State Department might grant permission to travel as long as the Chinese would permit us a similar right in China. So if you wanted to go to some place in China that was not an open city and the Chinese said no, then we would deny one of their people here in Washington permission to go to some place that was not an open city. An interesting set of circumstances.

I previously mentioned that I had visited Nanning, a city near the Vietnamese border. That is not an open city. We were going to have a Fulbright conference down there, and in order for me to go to Nanning, I had to apply for permission and had to have it granted by the Chinese. Normally, they did grant such requests, as we did for them here. They wanted to go to Huntsville, Alabama to visit the rocket site there. We could let them go, but that meant we had to go to some place like Nanning. The process was quite complicated. One consular officer made quite a reputation by keeping very, very close tabs on that whole process. Every time any slip occurred at all in China, reciprocal actions were taken in the U.S. with the Chinese. It was a real game, making life a little more difficult for everyone.

Normal travel arrangements were also difficult. If you wanted to travel, you could not simply go to the airline counter and say, "I would like to go to Shenyang" and buy a ticket. All airlines of China were controlled by a single ticket office so as to allow maximum security control. Also, because communications were relatively primitive and because the separate Waiban offices had control over foreigners outside of Beijing, you could not purchase round trip-tickets. If you got a ticket to go to Shenyang, it was confirmed that you had a reservation and a seat. To get back home, however, you had to make arrangements for a ticket after you arrived in Shenyang. If there were no seats for your desired flight, a common occurrence, the answer was "no." You were stuck. And many an American tourist was just that, stuck. Some found their way back on trains which were frequently very long and uncomfortable trips. The airlines were jammed-packed full all the time in China, because of the development that was going on in the country. So it was an interesting experience to travel in a country that presented so many difficulties. Are you interested in more about travel in China?

Q: No, I don't think so. I assume you were monitoring VOA. What were you getting out of VOA?

YATES: There were two problems with VOA in China. First off was the skip problem and getting into the locations intended. The second thing was jamming of the Chinese language VOA broadcasts. They were not jamming English because English was a resource to them as I described earlier. You couldn't receive the Chinese language broadcasts in Beijing due to the jamming. If you went to a particular western part of the city just before you got to the area called the Fragrant Hills which was a range of low mountains that ringed the western part of the city, there was a military compound with very large antennas. We were pretty sure those were at least some of the antennas used for jamming. But the problem with jamming is that it is a lot harder than broadcasting, because it doesn't skip, it is a direct line. A well designed directional antenna will render it useless or filter it out to permit an audible signal. The only way to render the incoming signal inaudible is to make it powerful enough to overcome the incoming signal from any direction.

For reliability's sake, effective jamming transmitters must be located near the city. All jamming is simply broadcasting on the same wavelength as the incoming signal with another so strong it will obliterate an incoming signal, even for directional antennas aimed at a signal coming from a relatively high angle of attack as it rebounds from the ionosphere. But that takes a lot of oil and energy. I noted before that shortwave broadcasting is an expensive business. Jamming is more so even at a short range and in a limited area. There were about eight known jammers around Beijing in order to make sure the city was not exposed. Yet it becomes more expensive still. Since each frequency must be jammed by all transmitters to be effective, a broadcaster need only simulcast on several frequencies to penetrate a jammed area or at least significantly raise the cost of the jamming.

A radio wave can often be blocked by buildings, mountains, hills, etc., so an incoming shortwave signal bouncing off the ionosphere would be coming down onto the city from above, but the jammers would be broadcasting horizontally across the city. If a person got behind a building where there was a radio “shadow” and put up a simple antenna, he could hear the VOA Chinese signal that could not be heard in other areas exposed to the jammer. So that meant the jammers had to be arrayed in a ring around Beijing to make sure that signals were not getting through certain sectors and to eliminate any “shadows.” Of course, you could get yourself in a car or get on your donkey and ride out to the remote regions of the city and hear VOA Chinese language broadcasts because the Chinese, themselves, could not afford to jam everywhere all the time.

It was clear that the VOA Chinese language broadcasting was getting through. We knew that, because we would get postcards from people telling us they had heard us on such-and-such and ask a question, enter a contest, or something like that. We were getting mail from China clearly indicating that the Chinese language broadcasts were getting through, but they certainly were a lot more difficult to hear than the English broadcasts. Whenever I would travel, I would take a shortwave radio with me, and in the hotel room or wherever I was staying, I would try during the night to hear both English and Chinese VOA signals. We also paid expatriates to do monitoring for us. That gave feedback to the engineers about what frequencies, what times of day, and what the conditions were when that person was listening. The problem was, many of our monitoring radios were of a higher quality than the radios the Chinese, themselves, were using. So it wasn't always a clear guarantee that we were getting through.

Q: Because we played a prominent part in the Tiananmen incident and there were a lot of dissidents who were in the United States during this time, students who felt they couldn't get back and there was a lot of news about people being unhappy with China, were we having to pull our punches at all?

YATES: I don't think so, but there is a fine line between pulling a punch and being careful how you do things not to damage your own interests. The finesse of all that is determining what your own interests are. Obviously a paramount interest we had was to prevent any kind of outbreak of war or conflict in Asia. So you can't poke a stick constantly in somebody's eye and expect him to think well of you. So we had to be a little bit careful about that. In somebody's eyes, that would maybe mean we were pulling punches, because you don't always call foul every time there is a transgression of human rights, for example.

One of the problems we had in China was this question of human rights. It was politically powerful back here in the U.S., and it was politically correct to say the right things about human rights. Few would question the motivation of defending human rights. They should be defended. Obviously, this is a basic tenet in American philosophy, the American way of government, and what we are putting forth abroad. On the other hand, if you want progress on human rights, what is the best way to promote that effort in China? A good argument could be made that the best way to get it would be to work to some degree with the system, itself, to try to improve the conditions. Incrementalism, perhaps, is the best word to use, and it is not always a positive phrase. You get two steps forward, one step back in Chinese policy. I think we made a lot of progress on that score. What it meant, however, was you didn't frontally assault them on the question, because they would freeze up on you.

China still has an authoritarian government. This is not a government of the people, by the people, and for the people. We have to be careful, so that if we want to make sure that human rights are expanding in China, we may have to take a different set of steps rather than to defend every infraction of human rights as we see them. The question is one of balance but always keeping the objective in sight. Whenever there is a loss of human rights, someone is affected in a very personal way. Can we afford to look away when the offense is committed, even when it may mean that other, future transgressions might be avoided? What are the basic limits on the question of human rights? If someone is held without bail, is that a basic transgression of human rights? Not even in this country is that a basic transgression. It is possible to hold someone without charges, when releasing them might jeopardize others. There are strict limitations on that police power, but it is not a simple, black or white situation. There must be legal process.

The Chinese don't necessarily always observe the law as we would see it. But, again, it has never been so in China. China is not a democracy. They do not have the same law. While there is a seed of democracy in their system, it has never been a democracy. The question is how far must they compromise their own system before we feel comfortable in accepting them for specific relations such as trade. So it becomes a very complicated equation, and I don't think we had all the answers while I was there. But I do think that we were careful. If we went into a place where somebody gave you a hard time, you tended to listen and keep your mouth shut until they were finished or wore themselves out talking and then make your points, if you could. You had to use a certain amount of tact and a certain amount of understanding of where the Chinese were coming from, a certain amount of delicacy to avoid embarrassing the people who have the same goals as you do, but not always the same road map to get there.. That's always a difficult thing to measure.

We had special problems with CODELs, because some of the congressional delegations would come into town with one thought, to expose the human rights violations in China. They would make speeches and do things that were not in our larger national interest. I remember a very graphic example of that. Since I was Deputy Public Affairs Officer in Beijing, I would be in charge whenever the Public Affairs Officer was absent. During one of those interregnums, I got a big CODEL in, with four members of Congress and a whole phalanx of others. The delegation was led by Nancy Pelosi, the member of congress who was leading the charge on the question of human rights in China and particularly on granting most-favored-nation status to China. It was a hot potato in Congress then, and to some extent still is. Despite an initial reluctance to grant them visas, the moderates in the government had prevailed over the hard-liners, and the delegation was granted visas. It was clear that some parts of the Chinese bureaucracy did not want that particular delegation to enter, and there was a lot of sensitivity about their presence in Beijing. However, the argument was made that it would be best to allow them to see conditions directly, and they were received with politeness and dignity.

On the last day of their visit, they held a press conference at the USIS center which I arranged for them. They came to the press conference after a surprisingly uneventful visit and said that they had come to China, did not agree with the Chinese, found many areas of disagreement, but at least were talking. They continued that they had completed the trip, and everything was reasonable. They had learned a lot and were returning to Washington. That was all right. We finished the polite and unremarkable press conference, and I took them out to the bus. We had a fairly large group of American and international press, CNN, CBS, etc. On the way out, I asked Representative Pelosi and several other members of the delegation if there was anything else that we could do for them. The answer was, "No, we are very tired. We have been traveling a lot. We are going to go back to the hotel and rest and maybe take a little bit of a walk. Then we are going to get on the airplane and go home. Thank you very much." Everybody shook hands and boarded the bus. I turned on my heels and went back into the building, satisfied that all had been done as required. The bus drove off.

About 20 minutes later I got a call from Mike Chinoy, the CNN correspondent, saying, "I think you ought to know about something that is going on." I said, "What?" He said, "You know the delegation didn't go back to the hotel." I said, "Really? Where are they?" "Well, they are in Tiananmen Square, and they have unfurled a banner protesting Chinese human rights. They were all wearing the small white flowers which they had on before and in solidarity with the students are making speeches and carrying on. There may be some trouble." He was worried about his own people, who had gotten out of the square, but he wasn't sure what the repercussions might be. Security forces were moving in on the square at that time.

The whole thing, of course, became a blowup. That addresses the same question you have been asking. This is what you call tactless. Here the Chinese had hosted this group, and they were soiling the nest before they left, so to speak. I am sure that looked great in San Francisco or in Georgia, or in Washington state where they were from. One particular congressman in the group was in a hard fight in a gerrymandered district, and evidently needed the newspaper columns which he was getting, but at what cost? In the aftermath of this, it was going to become very difficult to get people in who really needed to know about what was going on in China, because the Chinese would no longer accept them, out of fear of the same sort of stunt. Those people in the Chinese bureaucracy who had argued to let those people in to start with, now were under a cloud. Their advice had turned out wrong. They had been bitten by the very people who they were assisting in learning about China. Was the statement of support for human rights worth the lost credibility of the embassy and that of the rest of the U.S. diplomatic community had in Beijing? I would argue that it was not.

Q: Yes, it didn't further any particular cause because it only furthered the cause of the United States, you might say.

YATES: It only furthered the cause of several politicians from the United States. I don't think it furthered the cause of the United States. In this case, the cause of the United States was to see an improvement in human rights in China, not to make speeches. This ran counter to that effort. What it did was to make it more difficult to bring in the kinds of the people from the U.S. who would make the case for human rights to the Chinese and give them a better understanding of how congress was approaching the problem, what the American people felt about the problem and why it was necessary for them to make changes in the way that they treated their own people. Why this was good and why this was healthy and would benefit them in the long run. That message was lost in the political showmanship of the moment, and that is too bad.

Q: What was your impression of the Western, particularly the American, reporting on China and the correspondent corps at that time?

YATES: Like every group of people, they varied. We had some very, very good people out there who had spent long years in Asia, who knew China and spoke some Chinese but had enormous difficulties in maneuvering around. Mike Chinoy is a good example of that. He had been in town for a long time and could speak Chinese and get around. However, at every turn they were watched and harassed. We had VOA correspondents in Beijing, of course. The Voice of America was thrown out of China for a long time, because the Chinese specifically blamed the VOA for their turmoil in Tiananmen. If they didn't start it, at least they abetted it as it progressed. So the Voice of America was under particular pressure in China. That meant if they were going to cover any stories at all, they had to press all the time for equal treatment with the rest of their colleagues. They had to make a special effort all the time for contacts with China so that they could develop their stories. One of the problems of the U.S. media, and those from other foreign media as well, is that the people whom they spoke with were subject to harassment, pressure, incarceration, or worse because of their contact with the West. The Chinese did not appreciate their own citizens getting in touch with media people, particularly Americans. Many of the media people in China were not Americans; they were Brits, Australians, and others who came to China and were working for American news organizations.

One of the problems with correspondents in China was their editors back home altering a story. The editors were interested in the sensational or striking, but not as deeply interested in the why of what was going on. Hot facts were always more of a story than careful analysis. That meant a lot of the deeper coverage of China was lost. I think that is a disservice to the American reader, but that perhaps reflects the interests of the reading public as much as it is dependent on editors.

Q: You mentioned that the Fulbright and exchange programs had been shut down after Tiananmen. Were there any changes in their status during your time there, 1989-92?

YATES: In the beginning, no. The Chinese were miffed. In their view, we had unilaterally canceled the Fulbright program, and they said we had reneged on an international agreement. Our position was that we had not and could not, since we could not force American citizens to do anything they did not want to do. When the so-called "incident" of Tiananmen occurred, many of them picked up and went home because of personal decisions they had made. They felt the security in China was not good enough for them. Some of the English teachers, those who were so-called "foreign experts," stayed, but all the Fulbrighters left.

The problem was, how could we get things back on track. The Chinese felt that if we could simply call off an international agreement at a whim or just because people get discomfited, the agreement obviously wasn't worth anything. They essentially stopped work on the Fulbright program for a couple of years. We pushed very hard to get that program reestablished. Another part of that difficulty was that Chinese Fulbright grantees who had gone to the U.S. rarely returned. One of our basic interests in China was the teaching of American studies in Chinese universities. We had a fairly good group of people teaching American literature, culture, and economics in Chinese universities. Those were naturally the ones who often would be selected as Fulbright grantees to come to the U.S., because they spoke some English, were in the academic environment, and had topics that needed direct experience and study in the U.S.

We would go to a university, as I did in Shanghai, and sit with the university dean to discuss the problem. At one point, he said, "Look. We love Fulbrighters. We have always had Fulbrighters here and have a long history of foreign teachers, but our people are not coming back." In the Chinese system, when a grantee left China, his position at the university would be kept open for his return. The grantee may have intended to come back, but because of the turmoil or other things, he didn't. That meant the American studies programs throughout China were decimated. The trained instructors had all left. By their own rules, the Chinese universities couldn't fill the positions until they either returned or notified their universities that they would never come back. They could not make such a notification, for that would mean that they would have to change their visa status from student or visiting scholar to that of immigrant, something that most could not or would not do. That meant there were all these empty spaces, and there were no teachers to teach American studies.

Younger American-studies scholars who were qualified and promising could not accept Fulbright grants, because they could not get permission to travel until their predecessors returned. The Chinese official interest in these programs dried up. American studies programs were faltering badly throughout China because of a lack of people to teach.

We wanted to bring American Fulbrighters into China to do the same thing, to teach American studies. But we couldn't get them in either, because the Chinese said if they could not send Fulbrighters out, they were not going to allow any more Fulbrighters in. They essentially laid their cards on the table, saying, "Until you solve the problem of getting our people back, we are not going to talk to you." That was a pretty difficult situation. Another of my interregnum duties when I was Acting Public Affairs Officer was to sit down with the minister of education and try to work out a negotiated agreement, to get the wheels moving again so we could start grantees moving back and forth. We discussed an endless array of options.

The one I had favored was where we would send Chinese Fulbrighters to the U.S. for six months at a time, instead of a full year. One of the problems was, if you send a Fulbrighter to the U.S. to study for a PhD, that ends up as at least four years, an awful long time to be away from home. Therefore, we would allow them to take their wives. In four years, a man and his wife will produce an American citizen. Once they had a child or two, the equation changed. Besides, American universities are warm hearted places, so that if an intensive, personable, and talented researcher is working hard on a subject and gets a PhD, he immediately wants to start post-doctoral research. In four years, they became quite settled in the American university environment. They may have accumulated lots of American friends, probably an apartment, a car, maybe even a green card, depending on how they worked things out, and very often an American citizen in the family.

Now, they have a problem. He goes to his dean and says, "My child is getting older and we want to give him or her opportunities and education. I like working here, your people seem to like me, and I'm doing good work and would like to stay on." The wise faculty member will say, "Well, of course, we will do what we can." And they did. They would write their Congressman, the Immigration and Naturalization Service, make all kinds of appeals, and guarantee a supporting income by giving the “temporary” Chinese Fulbright grantee a job. So now it is six years and counting. Now the little American citizen is getting bigger and close to school age. They are really interested in this because now they can get a free American education for their children, but if they go back to China, what is their situation? The child doesn’t fit in. He or she speaks English. What do they do with the kid? The humanitarians among us would say, “Of course, we should make sure that the child can stay and build his future.” Many of them put down deep roots, and it is not very likely they will ever go back.

So where does that leave the Fulbright program in China? No where, essentially. It was a very hard sell. The Chinese felt there was nothing in it for them. We send their best scholars to study in the U.S., and they do not go back. In return, they receive a group of temporary scholars who come in for six or seven months and then immediately go back to the US. That is a brain drain that a developing country can ill afford. In addition, many of the U.S. scholars that enter China are not always the best in their field. Sometimes, they could not adapt readily to the life style on the Chinese campus, and most often could speak no Chinese. Consequently, some of the Fulbrighters became glorified English teachers and thereby became frustrated. Those that were acquainted with the Chinese culture and language usually were China scholars, interested primarily in research, not teaching. Even if they could teach, the Chinese do not need foreigners teaching them their own history and culture.

Of course, if you look at the personal side of things, many of the Chinese Fulbrighters had a tough time making the choice to return. Faculty members in China often do not have their own apartments and have to live at home with their families of six or eight people in a two bedroom apartment. If they are lucky, they have running water at the end of the hall. Their living standard would take a tremendous nose dive by going back. They can live in a run down section of town in Washington and be four times better off than they would be in Beijing. So it becomes very, very hard to say to somebody like that, you must go home. Consequently, what was suggested at the time and almost got adopted, was a program by which university exchanges would occur, not in PhD programs but for six month segments, without spouses or children, after which the grantee would return to the sending school. Following another semester or two teaching in China, the grantee would then have the option to return to the U.S. under the same conditions for another six months to continue the program started earlier. Another facet of the program would be that two schools would participate as sister universities in the exchange. U.S. Fulbrighters would be the “sponsors” of the Chinese Fulbrighter while they were in the US, and perhaps would become return U.S. Fulbrighters to the other school on the Chinese side. These internal linkages would militate against the earlier problems, since on each side, there would be responsible to keep the door revolving.

We eventually did work out something so that a limited number, I think the first year it was 12 Fulbrighters, were exchanged, principally Americans going to China. The reverse flow did not really get underway. One of the problems was in China finding someone who was up to the business of going as a Fulbright grantee to the US, language being among the principal problems. If they were going to be an engineer, then it was easy, because the Chinese are whizzes at math, physics, chemistry, etc. and any American university would kill to get a qualified, highly competent Chinese mathematician, chemist, or physicist. They are great. So that meant if they got them, they would never let them go. It doesn't take very much research to find Chinese names in almost any of the disciplines such as computers, math, etc. They are all over the U.S. and very widely respected. Our argument was that eventually, they probably would go home, but a return within the original expectation of four years probably would not be met. We could understand that as part of the program and still argue that China would eventually benefit much from the knowledge they acquired in the US. The Chinese needed their skills immediately, as their own industry was growing rapidly and they needed a strengthened base of qualified intellectuals. But despite the problems, the program did get started again and as far as I know is prospering. It is a good program.

That raises one of the problems for Americans operating as diplomats in China. You do not have much opportunity to go where people live or to see somebody at home. While I was in China, only once did I have that opportunity in three years of living in Beijing. That was the director of a publishing house that I was dealing with on contracts. He was a university professor, a publisher, an entrepreneur. He was in business. He invited me to come to his house, which I did. This man was the president of his own company, a noted scholar, an author of a dozen books, and had many business connections. He lived in a third floor walk-up, a small dark apartment in Beijing. He had a television set and a small rug. His wife and mother and kids were all around, and it was crowded. I never found out if they had separate toilet facilities or not. Obviously, they were of very limited means. If he had the same job here in the U.S., he could have been living in McLean or some similar place with a fancy house, a lawn, and probably two dogs.

But in China, he had nothing. He was a smart man, a capable guy with a lot of dreams and ideas about how to reform the publishing business in China, particularly on the sales and marketing side. We had long conversations about marketing techniques and how to move a product and promote it on the Chinese market. He was an education to me. But again, his living standard was very, very low. It is hard for Americans to understand the pressures on people in China and how much commitment to their country it takes to stay at home. He could have jumped ship. Although he wasn't rich, he was rich enough to be able to get himself out of the country if he wished, but he stuck it out. Perhaps there is a form of patriotism that we have lost in the U.S. with our open and free government and comfortable style of living.

You had to have respect people who either had such strong ties to their family or their community or their nation, for that matter, to take the loss of what they knew was better. Many of them have relatives in the U.S. and know what the situation is here. You get mixed feelings after a while, living in a culture like that and a lot of respect for the people who are there. So when human right advocates come by and say, "Shut down trade with China, kill it. If they are not going to do what we like, we are going to stop it," who are they hurting? They are not hurting the government, for it is going to survive, whatever we do. But they are hurting those people who are trying so hard to make a living for themselves and build their own technical competence to make something better of life. I am not sure that heavy speeches on the floor of Congress are going to help those people much. But some real support in terms of slow incremental work probably will have a good effect in the long run.

Q: One last subject. You mentioned that contacts were very difficult and had been cut way back during the time you were there.

YATES: Yes, they were very hard. There was one technique that was important and probably the only technique that was useful. Like the people of most nations, the Chinese like to eat. Because food was not terribly good in quality or quantity in Beijing during the time we were there, one of the best ways to get people to come out to something was to invite them to dinner or any sort of meal; lunch, dinner, snack, it did not make much difference. It was not really possible to entertain Chinese at home, for they could not come to your home very easily. It was too uncomfortable for them, because they would have to go through security lines to get there. That would get them on lists to be watched and make their lives and those of their immediate family suspect. Certain Chinese such as many of those in the Foreign Ministry and those in international trade probably had been cleared for such contact, because they had a more sophisticated understanding of foreign living. But normal contacts, particularly among my publisher friends, would not enjoy such easy relations. In any event, hotels were available.

A Chinese guest could be taken to a hotel restaurant fairly easily, since there was almost no security in Chinese hotels and, particularly in the period immediately following Tiananmen, Chinese citizens were allowed to enter the hotels freely, because many of them could not depend on foreign tourists or businessmen to support their existence. In that lean economic period, the up-scale Chinese business kept many hotels afloat solely on their Chinese restaurant patrons. People, therefore, could go and come at will. Sometimes, there were security people around, but they were far, far less intrusive than they would have been in a diplomatic compound. That meant my contacts, in many cases publishers, would be delighted to go to lunch with me, especially if I was going to pick up the tab at an expensive foreign hotel. Relatively speaking, a lunch at a tourist hotel did not amount to a lot of money, but it made an enormous difference to me in my ability to meet with some of these people in a casual, yet businesslike, setting.

Office visits were difficult, because if you went to a Chinese office, that meant that person had to get clearance from his Danwei, his work unit, to allow you to come in. You can't just walk into an office in China. You have to go through a gateway where a person in uniform sits and asks, "Who are you and what do you want?" "Well, I am so-and-so and I am here to see such-and-such." "Have you made arrangements?" If you have not been cleared and approved beforehand, you are not getting in, even if the person wants to see you. So it was very difficult. That gradually began to break down as time went on. As I was more known to some of the publishing companies, I think I could have walked in off the street, although I never did, because that would put them in an awkward situation. The Chinese, of course, don't always live in gracious surroundings and would be embarrassed if you walk in on them in their shirt sleeves or even shirt off and in their underwear in the summer time, sitting in front of a fan, because there was no air conditioning. This doesn't lend itself to gracious living or gracious contacts. So you would go through all the formalities in making arrangements.

But feeding people was almost always good. The problem with feeding people was the activity came under what the U.S. government calls representation, which has very, very strong limitations on it. This is what is called by some members of congress the "booze budget;" in other words, American diplomats are abroad spending American taxpayers' money on booze, which was nowhere near the situation. Nonetheless, Congress didn't like it. This meant we were very, very circumscribed, unless we did it out of our own pocket. Beijing may not have been a world class city for food, but it was a world class city for price, and that meant that none of us could afford to go out and keep contacts using that technique out of our own pocket. So it put a significant crimp in our ability to operate.

However, we did have some resources, which were carefully and wisely used. Mostly, we took people to lunch, because the prices were cheaper. It was cheaper to take some one to lunch than dinner, because they expect less and the hotels were not as crowded either. This meant you could talk for a couple of hours over lunch and really get into things pretty well. I did most of my work with publishers at lunch. Toward the end, before I left in 1992, many of the publishers were beginning to get enough cash flow to feel able to reciprocate. Then we would go to some other restaurant, Chinese usually, where they had an account or something. They were happy with that. It meant they could use their official funds for food, and they always ate very well at these occasions.

YATES: From China I went to Hawaii. A change of pace.

Q: Why don't we do that next time?

YATES: Have we done everything on China? I haven't said much about the ambassadors. Stapleton Roy followed Jim Lilley, and while he was a very different kind of Ambassador, he had the same sort of pressures on him. Where Lilley was more intuitional, Stape Roy was more cerebral. I guess that is one way to make a comparison. Lilley had instincts and still does, and most of the time they were very good. I think he used those as his guideline as much as he did intensive analysis. Stape Roy, I think, was more of an analytical person and relied less on instinct. I think Roy was a little more distant from his people than Jim Lilley, although they both were very much ambassadors, apart from the rest of the crew.

Like Lilley, Roy was born in China and spoke Chinese with a Szechwan accent which caused amusement and wonder among the Chinese staff and the Chinese people he would meet. His Chinese was so good that he would just blow them away. I think the Chinese had a lot of respect for Roy, but I think he had the same problems as Lilley in terms of making and maintaining contacts. I think Roy enjoyed a better set of working contacts in the business community, because business by then had prospered to the point where Americans were much more accepted in China, and there was less fear on the Chinese side of somehow being coopted by contact with the Americans. We had not reached full confidence in that regard, and we still have not. I think it still is a long way off.

One aspect of the Chinese which is important in the context of East Asian relations is cultural. By comparison, Japanese and Americans have difficulty getting along at times, because Japan is an island and always has been an island with a distinct culture and cultural variances from Americans that makes contact difficult. The distance they maintain from people in social discourse, for example, is very different from the continental Asians, including Koreans and Chinese.

The Chinese language, because of its patterns and sounds, also makes their accented English more comprehensible to an American. If you had a Japanese speaking English and a Chinese speaking English with equivalent abilities, the Chinese would probably be more easily understood by an English speaking person. On the cultural level, the Chinese have a better sense of “give and take” that is more characteristic of a continental society. China is more cosmopolitan than Japan in terms of multi-nationalities, so you get a different set of vibrations there. The potential for improvement in relations with China is enormous. We have a big hangup, of course, on both sides in terms of politics. However, on the basis of person-to-person relationships, the Chinese have an advantage that leads to an opportunity for improvement that other Asian groups may have greater difficulty with.

Q: How did you get the job?

YATES: That position, like many other non-mainstream positions in USIA, had been cut by decision of the Area Director for East Asia, as he felt that he wanted to keep more of the available resources in the field. The advisor’s position in Hawaii was considered a “domestic” position, of course. Such domestic jobs stuck up like sore thumbs when people were pressed by downsizing and wanted to keep as much manpower in the field as possible. Yet there were countervailing arguments. The advisor’s job in Hawaii was essentially to keep the U.S. command in the Pacific tuned to the special needs of its overseas presence.

The military, itself, was going through a downsizing process, and still is. At that time, they were cutting back on everything except what they called “war fighting capacity.” In other words, if you drove a ship or a plane, that was fine. But if you were in uniform and were doing things like thinking about cultural ramifications and popular opinion ramifications of our military presence abroad, you were not considered as essential as those who actually had fingers on triggers. This is probably a reasonable distinction. If you have to give up on one or the other, the “war-fighting” capacity will have to take priority. The military role is to defend the U.S. and its people and the question is relative, I guess. In any event, that meant that the U.S. military in its presence abroad was not being served very well, because the lack of cultural and political sensitivity to the special conditions of operating overseas in the Pacific region cost a lot of efficiency.

If you are a commander from a base in the middle part of the continental U.S. and suddenly are transferred to the Pacific, how do you operate in Guam or Okinawa or some other place in Asia where your presence isn’t welcomed or at least you are not considered an essential part of the local culture. You are a guest. The only office that really existed within CINCPAC to put that in context in a cultural way was the USIA advisor’s office. When I came available and was looking around for my next assignment, I was asked if I would go and fill in for about a year, because they really didn’t have an onward assignment for me at that time. This was an alternative to returning to Washington without an ongoing assignment, so I went to Hawaii.

People would say, “Gee, Hawaii. Aren’t you lucky!” There wasn’t as much luck in that as it might seem. Hawaii is a magnificent place. It is beautiful, the weather is gorgeous, and everything was terrific when certain kinds of conditions all come together. If you are a tourist with a lot of money and can travel around the islands and laze on the beach, it is magnificent and probably unparalleled in the world. But if you have to live there, you get a different perspective.

For one thing, Hawaii is very isolated. Many in the military had this same problem. It is a “rock” two thousand miles away from the nearest significant land mass. In Hawaii, people had all the advantages of the American system of goods and material things, but they were very, very much more expensive. When we arrived there, a box of Wheaties was seven dollars or something along those lines. It soon became very clear to us that Hawaii was going to be a very expensive place to live.

Rents are astronomical. During the time of the Japanese “bubble economy,” when the Japanese had lots of money to invest everywhere, including Rockefeller Center, they bought up much of Hawaii, especially golf courses and real estate. The stories were legend of Japanese businessmen coming to Hawaii with a pocket full of cash and saying, “How much is that?” “Oh, about a million and a half.” He would reach into his pocket and peel off a million and a half dollars and then ask, “What else do you have to sell?” There were no arguments, no negotiating. They were famous for paying whatever was asked. The immediate effect of that was skyrocketing housing costs.

That is okay, I guess, if the Japanese could afford it, but for Americans living there, Hawaii became a very, very expensive place to move to. Those who had owned houses for a long time and continued to own were not directly affected so much, I guess. If you were going to continue to live in Hawaii and sold your older house at a great profit, you had to turn around and buy something equally expensive. On the other hand, many people cashed in and sold at high prices before running off to the mainland where real estate was cheaper.

The weather was magnificent when it was nice. When the “trade winds” are up and the sun is shining, it is grand. When the trade winds drop, the weather immediately turns hot and sticky and you can recall that it is in the South Pacific. Because of its location, Hawaii is vulnerable to typhoons. Traffic is terrible. Hawaii is one of the most congested places in the world in terms of traffic. And of course, there are an awful lot of tourists adding to the congestion. So that was a problem. Nonetheless, the work at USCINCPAC was fascinating for a Foreign Service Officer. It was somewhat like living at a foreign post. The military had their own language, own social set, own conventions.

When I walked into the job, I was confronted by an older man who was head of the CINCPAC Public Relations Section. He also handled Congressional Relations, and rather well I was told. He had the office across from me on what was called the “Bridge,” which was the center of command for the Pacific area. On that floor, they had the admiral of CINC (Commander in Chief) of CINCPAC; the Deputy Commander of Pacific U.S. forces (DCINC); Jim Wilkinson, the Political Advisor (POLAD), who had ambassadorial rank, (who as far as I know, retired in Hawaii); and the older, rather crusty gentleman who was congressional liaison as well as the public affairs guru. By virtue of my position, I was automatically at loggerheads with him, because while he was very knowledgeable about Congress, he didn’t know very much about foreign affairs. There were no other command parts on the “Bridge;” that was it.

The command structure conformed to the usual military relationships, but both the POLAD and I as USIA advisor were add-ons. Because both the POLAD and I were outside of the other parts of the chain of command, it was possible to include us on the “Bridge” since there was office space there and it would not otherwise show favoritism among the other components, which fell under five basic categories, each represented by a number following the letter “J.” J means “joint” since CINCPAC was a joint headquarters. The numbers stood for the usual categories in the military J-1 for administration, J-2 for intelligence, J-3 for operations, J-4 for legal, and J-5 for policy and plans. For the most part, I worked with the J-5 people who handled all of the command relationships and had the greatest need to understand foreign relationships. The J-5 section included all the area offices. Although the U.S. military had begun heavy cuts in personnel, J-5 still had a lot of area offices: the Japan desk, the Philippines desk, the Russian desk, etc.

The Pacific Command (PACOM) was the largest U.S. military geographic command in the world. It ran from the west coast of California all the way to the island of Madagascar. That includes the Indian Ocean as well. It was a key player in the Middle East, because it provided ships, materiel, and aircraft to other commands during the Gulf War and any other insurgency that came about. Such assignments always involved the Pacific command, because it comprised such a large part of U.S. forces. There were about 100,000 in the Pacific command then on duty in the Pacific, of which about 30,000 were in Japan and another 37,000 in the Republic of Korea. That is an awful lot of Americans overseas. Many of these soldiers and sailors were on ships floating around the Pacific or Indian Oceans or in submarines. All were under the general command of PACOM, although there were some “dual hats” in Korea, where the same forces comprised a large part of the UN Command and both the U.S. Forces/Japan and the U.S. Forces/Korea had much autonomous authority.

Such “dual hatted” arrangements led to difficult relationships at times. Whoever was U.S. commander in Korea felt rather independent of the Pacific Command, and this arrangement could make smooth relationships a problem. For me, this meant some trouble in obtaining cooperation when that was important in program planning or developing a cohesive approach to a given problem.

My function at USCINCPAC was essentially writing advisories for the CINC and participating in meetings to monitor what was going on in terms of public relations with allies and other countries in the “area of responsibility.” Other facets of my work were developing an annual briefing program for Pacific military leaders, consulting on the preparation of the command’s magazine, “Asia-Pacific Defense Forum,” and sometimes participating in war games, a kind of think-tank exercise where members of the command and invited experts sit around a table and think deep thoughts about options in certain situations. The war games, at times, considered questions which were a bit far afield for a Foreign Service Officer who normally confronts only the real and present situation abroad. For example, “If Japan or China or another country becomes the enemy, what does the U.S. do and how does the military act to preserve U.S. interests?” Other times, the questions were more specific, such as a consideration of possible nuclear incidents. It was an interesting thing for someone like me to come out from the environment of the Foreign Service and walk into this very different military system. It took a while to become adjusted.

My advisories sometimes brought me into a bureaucratic struggle with the Public Affairs chief across the Bridge hall. He insisted that all of my memoranda to the Admiral be cleared by him before going to the CINC. While this might seem to be common sense, it proved to be a real roadblock. Certainly, he should be informed of my advisories on foreign public relations, but my feeling was that I was assigned to CINCPAC and not to his public affairs office. So I proceeded to direct my advisories straight to the CINC with info copies to him. That led to a number of occasions when he fired up strong dissents to my recommendations. While our relations were civil, he clearly was uncomfortable with my active role in providing advice to the command.

He finally retired, forcibly it turned out, since I was not the only one with a functional problem in dealing with such a strong personality. Nonetheless, the constant sniping on matters he had little knowledge of was debilitating to the orderly progress of discussion within the command on matters that were important to its function. Jim Wilkenson, the POLAD, was a strong supporter and had had working experience with USIA. He was a great booster in this internal struggle to provide the CINC with as candid and comprehensive advice as possible.

Q: Were the Chinese included in this?

YATES: Yes. They were one of my principal objectives when I arrived in Hawaii and began work on the SEAS program, since I had just come from China. It was perfect for the Chinese. We worked very hard on that, and it took a couple of years to get it started, because the Chinese were very suspicious of our motives. However, they were also hungry for the program, because it meant we would be taking senior Chinese military officials into some very classified areas of the U.S. military, giving them the chance to talk directly to military commanders and make contacts not only with the U.S., but also with senior military people we had brought together from all over the Pacific. The Chinese clearly saw that as an advantage to them and could not resist.

The first Chinese to participate was Major General Lee Zhi Yun, one of their finest. He was a marvelous man. A consummate diplomat and a cool headed negotiator. He was the head of the Study of Foreign Armies at the Beijing Military Academy. His job was to teach senior military commanders about foreign militaries. Students had to have stars on their shoulders to attend the classes. He came and was a sensation.

Part of the trip to Hawaii was a visit to ships, both the Aegis class cruisers and submarines. We had a major general of the Chinese army for the first time, I think, in contact with a wide variety of the newest and best of American military tools. Real ground was broken, taking him down into the guts of a Los Angeles class attack-sub where he was in the control room that had big signs on the door "Restricted Area Do Not Enter." He sat in the chair where people would sit when the submarine was underway, and he could observe the mechanisms that would control SOSUS cables and other devices that would track other ships and detect submarines. This just blew his mind away. We also took him on an aircraft carrier in Japan. Yokosuka is the home port for the U.S. Pacific fleet, and there usually was an aircraft carrier there, most often the Independence. That was always a remarkable visit for the Chinese. I only had two years of tours with the Chinese on board, but that participation in the SEAS program was a fine example to the Chinese of the American approach to “transparency” as a basic principle of stable military relations.

With some trouble, we also brought the Russians in. It took years to get them in because of the infighting in Moscow. The Russians were very suspicious of the program and several times accepted initially and then dropped out of participation. However, they had an interest in participating for the same reasons the Chinese did.

The first Chinese participant, Major General Li Zhi Yun, and I had a chat in Singapore before he went back to Beijing. When I went into his room, he had a stack, which must have been an inch or 2 inches thick, of very carefully kept notes in the middle of his coffee table. So he really had an eleven course meal of security relations in the Pacific. The most striking part of the trip for him, as well as for the US, I think, was in Korea when he went up to the DMZ. There was a major general of the Chinese army going up to look at the North Koreans from the other side. He never mentioned it, and so as not to embarrass him in a situation where his understanding was more important than my curiosity, I never asked, but he was certainly of the right age and rank to have fought in the Korean War.

One of the show pieces that the Koreans use on the DMZ is the infiltration tunnel that was discovered a number of years ago and is now open for tourists to clamber down into. You may recall a number of years ago when the South Koreans discovered the infiltration tunnel. An engineer who had designed one of the tunnels defected to the south and told the South Korean military where the North Koreans began to dig, and on a piece of paper drew the direction the tunnel was heading. In that indicated area, the South Koreans drilled a number of holes in the ground. They knew the North Koreans were digging along the line, but trying to find where was pretty difficult. But with the engineer’s plans, they were able to intercept the tunnel with a bored hole. Down the hole, they lowered a camera with lights and looked around. It was all dark, and the North Koreans claimed it was a coal mine. When they finally were able to complete an intercept tunnel and actually climb down, the South Koreans discovered that the North Koreans had coated the walls with lamp black, which would make the walls look like coal.

That was the little story we, like other tourists, were told before we went down into the tunnel. Out of some concern for his relatively advanced years and with some admitted excitement to be on hand when the encounter was to take place, I followed MG Li down along the long staircase through the intercept tunnel. Sure enough, when we got down to the bottom and entered the North Korean infiltration tunnel, the first thing Major General Li did was to press his hand to the wall. It came away black. He walked around for awhile and then we returned up the long flights of stairs to the surface. When we emerged from the tunnel, the Chinese general was still holding his hand stiffly out with all the black stuff on it. I sat next to him on the bus and asked, “What is that?” He responded, “Can you believe this?” I said, “What do you mean?” He said, “Look at this?” I said, “Your hand is dirty.” He said, “Can you believe that anybody would be so naive as to think anybody at all would believe this?” His incredulity was a stinging rebuke to his North Korean allies who had made the original claim.

On each of these SEAS trips, we would take escorts along from the U.S. military. At that time, there was a member of the USCINCPAC J-5 group who was very knowledgeable about Korea.

He was Mark Shoemaker, a U.S. Army Colonel who had been assigned on the DMZ for a long time. He sat with Major General Li in the bus going up to the DMZ and was able to explain the military sights along the way. There was a tank trap. Over there, you can see a camouflaged fortified position, etc. He gave MG Li a full explanation that very much impressed him. When we later arrived in Singapore, MG Li told me, "Look, I am a professional military man with more than three decades of professional service. I found the trip in Korea very interesting." He continued, "It is an article of faith in the Chinese People's Liberation Army that the U.S. and South Koreans are in an offensive posture in the south and are waiting to pounce on the North Koreans. But, I know a defensive position when I see one."

That was a remarkable observation from a senior member of the PLA. There are a number of obvious features that supported that conclusion. When you go across the Imjin river on the southern edge of the DMZ, the bridge is old and about ready to fall down. It was pointed out in the lecture on the tour that the bridge has charges underneath it, so it will drop immediately if there is any indication that the North is beginning to come South. Obviously, the UN command was not building reinforced invasion routes to the north.

MG Li said, "Seeing is believing." Being able actually to see the condition of the South was convincing to him. He cautioned, "However, I am a professional military scholar who observes foreign militaries as part of my responsibilities. If I were a line commander and went back to Beijing, I could never say a word about what I saw. No one would believe me, and all that I would accomplish would be to bring harm to myself and my reputation. But I am an academic. I teach. My business is to tell what I see. I can tell them, even though no one is going to believe me. They will think I have been brainwashed here, that I have been co-opted by the enemy. But the facts are there and gradually over the years - it will take a long time - the Chinese military will come to understand what the situation in Korea actually is."

To me, that was a telling moment of this particular program, because it represented a senior set of eyes from the Chinese Peoples Liberation Army looking at a situation from a new and different point of view. I suggested to Major General Li that after he got back to Beijing, he make a point to go to the North again and look at the same view from the Northern side for comparison.

While we were on the way up to the DMZ near the Imjin River, there is a rest stop just before you cross the bridge to enter the DMZ. It is the last point that casual tourists can get to from the south. In the back of the restrooms and souvenir shop, there is a small park with some of the weapons from the war. In the park, there is also a train with the tracks cut to the north of the northward headed engine. This is the train ready to go north when unification is accomplished, or so the story goes. It is a symbol of reunification. While we were walking around there with Major General Li, there was an older farmer sitting over there smoking a cigarette and just sort of watching tourists.

Q: He was over sixty years old?

YATES: I am sure he was easily over sixty years old. He was obviously a local, and probably a resident in the area long enough to have been there during the Korean War. He must have seen a lot happen.

Anyway, we were standing there and, of course, Major General Li was in civilian clothes - like an elderly gentleman of Taiwan - and I was obviously a long-nose American. He smiled. I asked him to come over, so we could get a picture. He obliged us long enough to pose with MG Li in front of the engine and then, with the usual friendly and hospitable Korean gusto, shook hands with MG Li and me. So I now have a picture of a major general of the Peoples Liberation Army of China, standing with a Korean farmer, all smiles. I don't know what the man would have said or done had he known who this particular Asian gentleman was.

We had another incident up in the north which I think revealed some of the value of the trip. Indonesia for many, many years has been a non-aligned country. We had Indonesians on the trip, particularly one very smart, capable, acerbic professor of security affairs. One reason she was there was because she taught in the military academy in Jakarta. Part of the general tour of the DMZ was a visit to the site of negotiations at Panmunjom. When you go into the small quonset hut where negotiations are actually held, the other side must be out. However, the northern military remain outside of the building looking in through the side of the building that resembles a long tube cut in half. When the tour group enters, they close the doors at both ends and you can mill around inside, and actually "cross into North Korean territory" (the other side of the table) while the UN command representative gives a little spiel about the height of the flags and all the cute vignettes they have about negotiations with the North. While we were standing there, the North Korean soldiers were outside the building looking in, taking pictures and scowling. They always do that, perhaps to show a kind of disdain for the imperialist forces or whatever.

The problem for them at this time was that this lady was from Indonesia and considered herself non-aligned and a person of dignity. While I was hanging in the back, she came over to me and said, "Why are they doing that?" I was puzzled. "Doing what?" "That," she said, indicating the windows where the Northern Koreans were glaring and staring at our group. She said, "Why is he looking at me like that?" Finally catching her point of frustration, I responded, "You will have to ask him, I don't know." "But that is rude," she sputtered. She was so upset, she could hardly speak. In an Asian sense, the North Koreans were being disrespectful to her. They perhaps did not understand who she was, but nonetheless, she recognized herself as a person who was offended by the clear rudeness she was being subjected to from a fellow Asian, and worse, a national of a nation her own country had often given international support to. It was a rudeness that Americans would likely just look at as part of the show. But to an Asian from a non-aligned country, this was extreme rudeness, and she couldn't get over it. She carried that image with her at least as far as the last days of the symposium in Singapore.

I recall when we were in the process of de-briefing our participants on the conduct of the symposium in order to get some feedback to be used to strengthen subsequent SEAS programs, she again brought up that incident in Panmunjom. How could it ever be the case that someone who they had supported for so long could be so rude to one of them? It was inconceivable to her. I would guess that she carries that image with her to this day.

The second thing that was evident to Indonesians on the trip was the relationship between the Koreans and the Americans. This was particularly important and was demonstrated at Osan Air Base, outside of Seoul, where Korean pilots fly the same equipment as American pilots, go to the same training, have the same mess halls, obviously know each other and play golf together on weekends. Coming out of an environment where the Dutch had for so long held Indonesia as a colony, this was a remarkable kind of relationship. Filipinos don't think about these things, because they have been for so long in association with American military forces. But to somebody out of Indonesia with the Dutch tradition of colonialism, it was very striking. One did not have to explain everything. They could easily see the state of the relationship, and it was apparent that this was a different environment.

A different kind of thing was seen by a Malaysian general during his first visit in Hawaii. As part of the Honolulu visit just to soften things up a bit, we would go to a luau run by the Hale Koa Hotel. The Hale Koa Hotel is a military rest-and-relaxation facility. On a tranquil evening walking back from the luau to the Ilikai Hotel where the group was staying, the Malaysian brigadier tugged at my sleeve and said, "I have a question." "This place, is it for officers?" "No, it is for anyone in the military," I responded. "You have enlisted people there?" I explained, "Most of the people probably are enlisted." He said, "They are staying together?" It was very difficult for him to understand, having been accustomed to the old British concept that a mixing of the ranks was not appropriate. But to see everybody able to sing together, carry on together, eat together, to have a good time together, without any regard to rank or station, was to him quite a revealing experience. Again, it was an example of a very American kind of thing.

The luau at the Hale Koa was a seminal place for observing Americans and their culture. Because it was a military R&R stop, elements of patriotism were more visible than they might have been at a comparable hotel or night club in the civilian community. I remember the Chinese major general was with us the second year I took the group to the luau and there were 200-250 people out on the lawn enjoying dinner, drinking, and the show. In the show was an MC in a white suit who sings and carries on a constant dialogue with the audience. Of course, there was the standard bit where the audience participates in a hula, and other kinds of "where are you from?" questions to the group which usually came from all over the US. Because we were a relatively large group, mostly foreign, the MC (master of ceremonies) would recognize the several tables where we sat. Usually one or more of our members would be asked to attempt the hula, and almost always one of the more outgoing types would volunteer, with much jeering and hooting from our tables. This helped to bring the group together.

At the end of the program, the MC had a standard routine that was used to close the program. Since the Hale Koa Hotel not only accepted active military but retirees as well, there was always a large contingent of older Americans on vacation in Hawaii. He would ask, "Anybody here from the Spanish American War?" There would be great laughter. "Anybody here from the First World War?" Sometimes there would be an old frail hand rise in the back, possibly from someone seated in a wheelchair. That was kind of remarkable and a sense of wonderment would spread through the audience. Then he would go on listing the conflicts right down through the Second World War, the Korean conflict, Vietnam, the Gulf War, and all the different incidents when the nation was at war, particularly in the Pacific. People would stand up, and everybody would applaud. The MC would say, "I finally want to give some recognition to the veterans of these different conflicts, because so often it is not given." All would applaud loudly.

Even for an American, watching all of these people stand up gives one a sense of reality to some of the stuff you see in the movies. It gives you an internal buzz when you realize that there is so much history collected together in one place. Our foreign military group was thunderstruck by this, because for them most of the wars and military actions were the stuff of history books or newsreels. Often they had seen those actions as American imperialism with malicious intent. To see the real people who actually had been in those conflicts, some of them obviously injured or disabled as a result, was an incredibly powerful experience.

Following the recognition of the veterans, everybody stands up, links arms and sings God Bless America swinging back and forth. Here we had non-Americans from 20 or so different countries all linking hands, including the Chinese major general, and singing at the top of their lungs God Bless America. To an American, it is a sight that is as unbelievable as it was profound. Some of those lustily singing with the rest were on the other side of the line in those conflicts. In all the SEAS groups I participated in, there was never a critical word said about the experience. Just the reverse, the luau evening spoke volumes on a subject that would have been difficult if not impossible to explain to our diverse group of foreign military. The emotion of the evening and the human warmth of the event made it one of the most important elements of the SEAS program.

I had a hard time justifying a luau on our official expenses, but we were able to do that by bending a few things such as subsuming the cost under the allowance given to each grantee for board. Without doubt, it was worth the effort. What they were taking out of the experience said a lot about the American spirit and the attitudes of the American military. The social event also cemented relationships within the group that were to be very important in subsequent days as very delicate national issues were discussed and contrasted. It was far more effective than anything we could ever have accomplished in a week of serious lectures. So the SEAS program had a lot of facets.

Another important part of SEAS was the "kick-off" session on the first day. Everybody came in and sat around tables arranged in a square with all seats of equal prominence. Of course, the group was drawn from nations that often have been at odds. The Japanese and Chinese, the Singaporeans and the Malaysians, Japanese and Koreans, etc. For example, every time they would come in for this first session, the Japanese would sit on one side of the room and the Koreans would sit on the other. They wouldn't talk to each other or look at each other. By the time we got to Singapore, they were drinking buddies.

At that first session, we gave time to each national representation, sometimes it was two, sometimes only one, to stand and give a five minute presentation on the security situation in their country. There was not enough time to be very comprehensive, but the occasion required each person to stand and say something to the entire group. It was a fascinating seminar in Asian relations, because you went from a Nepalese brigadier who lambasted all his neighbors for interfering in his country and causing trouble, to a Japanese who would give a very comprehensive overview of the Japanese economic situation in the Pacific, to a Korean who didn't share the Japanese view of the situation in the region, to someone from China who felt beset by everyone. Gradually as the SEAS symposium progressed and after three weeks of eating together, arguing together, sleeping together, traveling together, the group formed remarkable bonds. It was something like what happens at camp among children who spend several weeks together during the summer. We now have a very strong alumni association from these SEAS seminars. We have a newsletter which comes out every year and indicates where former participants are now, what their titles and addresses are, and what the experience was of the immediately preceding SEAS program.

In most countries in Asia, there is a very strong tradition that sharing an educational experience with someone makes you a life-long friend. That same bonding was very active in the relationships among those participating in the SEAS program. The professional connections established in the program was one of its primary goals. If there comes trouble between two nations that prompts a confrontation of arms, it would be useful to the cause of stability if a senior officer on one side of the line were able to give a call to a similar ranking officer on the other to see if the confrontation might be worked out bloodlessly. The bonding that occurs in the SEAS symposia may be adequate to accomplish the task.

Recognition of the importance of the program was given in the attention paid to SEAS in each of the capitals it visited. Usually the U.S. Public Affairs Officer hosted a reception at the embassy, attracting not only the presence of the U.S. ambassador and many of the senior members of the mission, but also the military attaches of many of the countries represented in the program. It was relatively rare that an essentially military group was assembled for a social event. Spin-off benefits of the reception included more frequent contact between U.S. military attaches and their counterparts in that capital, but also the chance to "rub elbows" for each of the other countries' attaches as well. It is common in Asian cultures to build strong bonds with those with whom you study. If a person has been a student with another, there is a life-long bond. This principle transfers to a variety of military programs. For example, the Army Command and Staff College at Ft. Leavenworth in Kansas trains a lot of foreign military, and they highly value the training as a mark of a "fast burner" in their own military societies. When the SEAS group moved from capital to capital, it was common for those who were Leavenworth graduates to search out fellow graduates of that program and, once found, make great efforts to get together. Remarkable interconnections run throughout many foreign armies. The SEAS program became a very important coalescing point for each of the posts we visited, in terms of bringing their military contact people together in a situation where we could talk about something relevant to post objectives.

By the time we finished in Singapore with each of these groups, the consensus was very clear. The U.S. military posture in the Pacific is one of maintaining stability. We were keeping people apart, maintaining a commonly desired sense of stability even though there were times that national interests among the Pacific Rim nations were in conflict. To some, this smacks of "playing policeman," but for most, this was not the sense that prevailed. They, instead, saw the U.S. as a benign presence, a buffer which separated the conflicted nations, giving them time to sort things out short of outright conflict. There was no "arresting" or "judging" on the part of the US. Just "being there" made all the difference. That, of course, also meant that the U.S. was not a welcome player in the internal conflicts of these nations. As long as we minded our own business and simply hung around the neighborhood, we were welcome. If we crossed the line and interfered, the mood was entirely different. Singapore was a prime example of this principle.

In Singapore, each of the SEAS groups would visit Paya Lebar, a Singaporean airbase and important strategic military location for the city state. On one of the SEAS trips, we included a Malaysian flag officer, and as far as anyone knows, he was the first Malaysian flag officer ever to visit that airbase. Over the years, Singapore and Malaysia maintained a wary distance from each other. This visit of the Malaysian flag officer, if it did not really break new ground, at least served to strengthen a needed communication and a building of trust. Again, the U.S. played a benign, but central, role in improving that military situation.

Another example of the precedent-setting role of SEAS occurred when we took a Chinese major general to Korea for the first time. I had a devilish time trying to get him a visa from the Korean Ministry of Justice. Korea and China had just opened diplomatic relations, and here was a senior member of the Chinese Peoples Liberation Army wanting to visit. They tried but could not get a visa for him in Beijing, even though there was a Korean Embassy there. I implored the Korean Consulate in Honolulu to process a visa after he arrived in Hawaii but had no success. Each time the embassy or consulate pointed down the road. So we flew off to Tokyo without a visa for him for Korea. In Tokyo, I called the Korean consulate and said I urgently needed a visa. The answer I got was "Well, it may be difficult." "Look," I said, "This officer is coming with a group which is sponsored by the U.S. government. We are bringing him to Korea on a study mission of the military. Your foreign ministry people are involved in this, as are your defense people." Of course, because it was the Justice Ministry in Korea that handles immigration and consular affairs, they evidently had no directives on the visit of ranking military officers of the service that is the "blood ally" of their sworn enemy.

In desperation, I took a car from the American Embassy and went to the Korean consulate with Major General Li Zhi Yun's passport, visa application, and pictures. Finding the visa section, I asked for the consul and sat down in his office, saying that I would not budge until I was got a visa placed in MG Li's passport. We had to leave for Seoul the next morning, and if he did not get a visa, there would be a major embarrassment for both Korea and the US. This presented the benighted consul with a huge problem. After fretting a bit, but unwilling to risk a bit of effrontery with his country's major ally, he got on the phone and passed the hot potato up the chain to Seoul. The poor man really sweated this one out. There were successive consultations with his superiors. Each time he would hang up, glance at me - perhaps hoping I would somehow simply disappear - look desperately downcast and quietly remain behind his desk, sweating. Finally, after one of the wearying calls, he dejectedly reached down and opened a drawer of his desk, took out a stamp, gave MG Li's passport a stamp and a quick signature. Passing it to me with a weak smile, he said that he hoped that would be sufficient. I thanked him well and departed.

Of course, the real test of the forcefully obtained visa was at the entry point at Kimpo airport on arrival. I made sure that MG Li was immediately behind me in the immigration line. To my surprise, there was not even a blink or pause from the official clearing my group. I was certain they must have been fully briefed on his entry and played their roles well. MG Li was, I expect, the first high-level PRC military official to visit Korea outside of the formal diplomatic mission and was a sensation, but everyone was cool, almost blasé. So that was a good start.

Everywhere we went with MG Li, we broke new ground with that man, because it was so sensational. Yet the most common reaction from both official and non-official Koreans was perfect disbelief. When we arrived at one of the senior think tanks in Seoul for discussions, the printed guest list included MG Li as from the Republic of China. I would have to say, not the Republic of China but the People's Republic of China. I would get a blank look. Respectful, but blank. Obviously the foreign guest, me, was sorely confused. They would look at me deeply, perhaps scanning for other less obvious signs of dementia, turn away and simply ignore my correction. They could not understand where this man was from. Those who did understand the import of the visit were discrete.

As in other aspects of the program, the mad Americans were indulged, but the purpose of the visit was accomplished. MG Li went to the Republic of Korea. He was treated well and was respectfully included in the discussions, along with those who were also allies of the Republic of Korea. I have to believe that it had a refreshing effect on those who met and discussed issues with MG Li. He was articulate, forceful, and obviously well briefed on the PRC position. However, the discussions were not exercises in name calling or polemics. Rather they were polite encounters where the participants did not see eye to eye on important issues but still could treat each other as respected members of the common human race. A small, but important victory.

It was incidents such as these that made the SEAS program so important for us and important for those who participated in the program. Although it was expensive because of the touring that was necessary, the food and transportation costs, it was by far the cheapest thing we could do in terms of impact for the taxpayers' dollar. We were able to consolidate an understanding among all of these nations in the Pacific of what we were about, why we were there, what our intents were and more importantly, why everybody else thought it was important for them to have us there. This message was communicated directly to those in their military organizations who were looked to for the development of strategy or intelligence. They were the intellectuals who were an essential part of the modern army, the thinkers who had much to say about the development and direction of security policy in their own nations.

There were many of these vignettes in each of the SEAS programs. I remember several times when we would go to the Japanese Foreign Ministry, sit around a table, and have a briefing by one of their very articulate people on the policy of self-defense and the role of U.S. forces in Japan. Someone of our group would ask, "Why do you allow the American military on your soil?" They would get the answer, full blast. Essentially, "Because it is important to us and in our national interest to have them here. We are not being nice to or cowed by the Americans. We want them here, because they are important to us and they sustain confidence in the region that we are not going to get involved in something in the rest of Asia again." That was a good and powerful message. They might have gotten a different answer had we gone to Okinawa, but in Tokyo, the official view was important.

I think most understood it in the military sense, because when they got to Singapore, it was also apparent to the SEAS group that Singaporeans had the same feeling. Lee Kwan Yew, for example, offered Singapore as a way-station for American forces in Southeast Asia and was soundly criticized by the Southeast Asians at the time, but I think now in retrospect, they agree with his initiative and he is benefitting by it commercially, because of contracts. These messages were reinforced, because representatives from Japan, Korea, and Singapore were traveling as members of the SEAS group and other members could grill them for confirmation and details as they traveled from stop to stop. Since they were becoming fast and trusted friends, the responses were credible and accepted. This reinforced the message that in other situations would have been very difficult to make convincing.

Q: You were working out of Beijing then?

YATES: No, I was working out of Seoul. It was an interesting concept, because the North Koreans are so prickly about anything that deals with the South. Yet they agreed to this arrangement. They knew what was going on. They knew where we came from, as we had made no attempt to hide our southern residence. But the big problem was getting enough Korean speakers to go in. It was not a popular thing for people to do. Some would be intrigued by the opportunity to enter a country that was different, even exotic, and the chance to go where so few outsiders had trod was generally exciting. But their ardor quickly cooled when they discovered the living conditions at the nuclear site and the dangers that were involved, not only from the North Koreans in a security sense, but because the site offered radiation threats that were not under the same safety controls common in the U.S. and elsewhere. The North Korean technology to deal with matters of health and safety at the site were not as sophisticated as they would have been in other regions.

However, the North Koreans are very good engineers, and from my conversations with our engineers, most held very positive impressions of their skills and safety consciousness. They didn't have much in the way of equipment, but they were very sophisticated in their craft. That, I think, gave rise to a certain degree of mutual respect that over a period of time was very positive.

On the other hand, the North Koreans are very difficult to deal with. On my first trip into North Korea, I was surprised to find that the conditions there and the attitude of the people was remarkably similar to what I had found in the deepest part of South Korea on my first tour many years before. I had been in Kwangju in the late '60s, and the South then was more advanced than the North is today. Yet North Korea had problems of a magnitude not seen at the time in the South. When I began to travel to the North, the controversy had already begun about the failed crops and the threatening famine. Flooding had already occurred before my first visit. So when I went in, part of what I had to do was look to see if I could gather some insight into what was happening in the North. I traveled from Pyongyang to Nyongbyon where the reactor site is located. It is about sixty miles north of Pyongyang. At the time I arrived, we had to take back roads to get there, and it took about three and a half hours of driving over very poor roads. North Korea must import all of its oil, so they chiefly use cement on the roads. Cement is a local product. They also have severe winters. Anybody who lives in New England would have recognized the damage done to cement sections of road from frost heaves. The road was all broken up in places, and it really made a hard, difficult ride.

We would spend from two to three weeks in Nyongbyon, drive back to Pyongyang with the rotating engineering crews and then fly back to Seoul via Beijing. You could not get to North Korea directly from Seoul, and there was no other service except from Moscow. I guess that was only once a week. So the two flights a week, on Tuesdays and Saturdays to and from Beijing, were the best way to get in and out. You were very, very isolated. Communications were not very good. Telephones worked sometimes, and if you were in the Koryu Hotel in Pyongyang, things were not too bad, but if you were in Nyongbyon, telephone communication was very difficult.

IAEA had a guest house there which was built for their needs by the North Koreans. There are IAEA members who stay there on rotational duty monitoring the nuclear site. They also revolve in and out on a similar schedule of two to three weeks each time. There is always an IAEA representative present to monitor the nuclear site, including the reactor from which the fuel was removed.

When I first arrived, there was no real connection between the IAEA people and the American engineers, although after a while, that dissolved a bit, because they were living in the same spot; in such a unique and closed environment, after a while you get to know each other. But officially, we were not supposed to talk to each other or associate, because it was thought any warmth shown by Americans toward the IAEA people would indicate to the North Koreans that the IAEA was a handmaiden of American policy. We were bending over backwards to be cool and distant from these IAEA representatives who were usually third world people from Mexico, Nigeria, Egypt, and places like that.

The guest house, itself, wasn't bad. Actually the food there was much better than it was in Pyongyang at the hotel. They had a cook who was able to get fair quality materials from somewhere, possibly China. Everybody was paying hard currency, and probably we were able to get anything we wanted. Nevertheless, the cook at the guest house did a marvelous job of creating what his vision of Western food was. He obviously had a cookbook somewhere, because he would come up with amazing things. Some of his creations tasted a little different, but others were really quite good, almost at a gourmet level. The fixings were not dependable, however. Sometimes there were good mushrooms, a variety of vegetables, and lots of chicken. The trouble was, when he found something fresh, you ate it for a week. We had cucumber salad every time, all the time I was there. If he found some tomatoes, you had tomato things; if he had onions, there were onions in just about everything you ate. Breakfasts were not very good, and of the three daily meals, the American breakfast is not very well understood in the rest of the world. There was no orange juice or special items like that. You could bring in your own fixings or condiments, but you could not bring in perishables, because you never knew when you were going to get in.

The rotating engineers would bring candy, M&Ms, Snickers, and favorite snack foods to keep up the sugar levels that were generally low in Korean cooking. You could bring in material to read, but you couldn't leave it in places where North Koreans would be able to see it. If one or another of the North Korean managers at the rest house came across something offensive, they would confiscate it and argue with you and tear it up in front of your face or demand that you store it away; otherwise you would be accused of attempting to propagandize the people of the North. By general agreement, however, the engineers were allowed to do almost anything on the second floor of the guest house where most of the rooms were. The situation even improved to the point where they were able to borrow a videotape machine from the IAEA people and bring in some movies, although sometimes those got into trouble if the subject matter was deemed inappropriate. The only available recreation at the guest house was a pool table and a lonely basketball hoop outside. If you wanted to use that, you had to bring your own basketball.

The guest house was on a corner outside the nuclear city. The old city of Nyongbyon is a small walled town, one of North Korea's oldest settlements. The only industry there, is a silk factory which recently had not been selling much silk. The town was poor. Arriving at the site, you had to drive through the town, cross the river, and then approach a whole new city, also called Nyongbyon, on the other side of the Nine Dragons River, after which the guest house is named. The new city is not walled in like the old but is surrounded by barbed wire and several rings of guards. There were a series of security areas, one within another, sort of like those nested Russian dolls. In the center of these zones is the nuclear building and reactor. Around that was a military compound. It resembles a treed college campus. It had been built in the early seventies to be the North Korean nuclear research center.

The North Koreans brought in a lot of their researchers who evidently were trained abroad, probably in Eastern Europe, and who essentially stayed in this compound. They were kept apart from their own society. Their life-style distinguished them from their compatriots in other parts of the country. For example, almost all of their houses and apartments had television antennas sprouting from the roofs. That could not be seen in other areas apart from the special cadre housing in Pyongyang. Inside the secure city, they had their own factories which processed food from their own farms. They even had a Korean rice wine factory. They had begun construction on a new cultural center for films and art. Most of what they needed to exist was provided within the compound. There were schools for the children and playgrounds. Connections with the surrounding communities seemed tenuous. There was a bus that ran through the guard posts, but few people other than soldiers seemed to ride it. Most appeared to be farm people going to fields outside the perimeter. Yet despite its isolation, it appeared to be a fairly sophisticated town compared to the other cities that could be seen while traveling back and forth to Pyongyang.

As a foreigner at this unusual city, there were special disadvantages. As a foreigner, you could not live within the city. That would have created too many problems. So they built a guest house outside the security perimeter, near the Nine Dragons River on a bluff. Behind the guest house was a military installation and in front was the river and the guards. At night time, you could go out of the house, but you couldn't walk very far. You could walk down to a big tree where Kim Il Sung had once stopped to give "guidance" to the people and then return, as long as the round trip was done during daylight. In the winter with long work days and short periods of daylight, that meant that there was little opportunity for exercise. It was like being in prison. When you came back, they closed the gate behind you. It wasn't locked, but there was an armed guard at the gate holding you in. There were rice fields around you. There was not much of anything to do at all.

If you wished to be by yourself for a while, you were permitted to climb to the top of the small bluff behind the guest house and look over the river. It was pretty. There was a bench up there that you could sit on. But that was the extent of the recreational facilities. On the second floor landing was a pool table where the North Korean staff were permitted to go. It was the only point where some sort of social contact was allowed with the North Korean staff at the house. I am not really sure that it really had official blessing, but outside of a television set in the lower lobby, which never seemed to carry much programming, there was not much for our North Korean minders to do either. Several of the North Koreans got very involved in playing pool, and the friendly games got very competitive. If too many Americans got involved, however, the North Korean staff became uncomfortable and usually left.

The process involved with the “minders” is one of the aspects of living in North Korea that is kind of controversial. If you read journalist accounts of North Korea you will see a lot of commentary on the watching and “minding” that goes on with foreigners.

North Koreans have a bad reputation, sometimes it is well deserved, of closing people in. Americans always seem to enjoy a sense of conspiracy. This often leads to dramatic exaggerations of the North Korean suspicions. For example, I was told they will not allow me to walk outside the hotel, and you are controlled and watched every waking moment of the day. There will be cameras in your room and the halls. Indeed, there are large mirrors built into the walls in the halls of the hotel we were in, and it is likely, as it is in Beijing, that halls and public areas are monitored. We always seemed to be placed on the same floors of the Koryu hotel, although this could have easily been explained by the relative lack of other customers and the high cost of fuel to heat in the winter. Indeed, when there was a sudden flush of visitors and we had to take alternate rooms, the rooms were usually cold and not made up as well.

On the first night of my initial entry into Pyongyang, I decided to get some air after the long trip to Pyongyang and take a walk. The minders congregate in the lobby of the hotel near the front door, the only way out. Mine intercepted me and said, “Where are you going?” “Well, I am going to take a walk.” “You can’t do that,” he responded. “Why not?” “You could hurt yourself, it is dark.” I was adamant and a bit stubborn perhaps, because I had been told I would be restricted and wanted to test the theory. “Well, it is not too dark, and I only want a short walk,” I claimed. “I will just go out and walk a couple of blocks.” My minder insisted that I stay in the hotel - “it is not advisable.” Finally, I got them to agree if someone went along with me. I thought that was a reasonable compromise. Off we went, myself and two guides, or minders. It turned out they were right. It was really dark. There are no street lights even in the center of Pyongyang, and the only light you had was an occasional passing car - and they were very occasional. To make things worse, the sidewalks are not in very good repair. There are potholes, cracked concrete, and things to stumble over and break your head on. You could walk into a tree and not even see it. It was really dark. People who are accustomed to cities do not understand how dark it can really be in a city if there are no lights. Perhaps a country boy who grew up under the stars might scoff, but in a polluted city there are no stars to guide one.

It was after 8:00 p.m., but since I was hungry, I invited my stalwart but stumbling minders to go with me to a restaurant where we might get something to eat. I got only a worried response that everything was closed. Naturally, I disbelieved, thinking they just wanted to get me back to the controlled hotel, but after stumbling around a few corners, I began to become a convert. Maybe they really knew more about Pyongyang after dark than I was ready to allow. Yet I still wanted to try to find something. They thought a restaurant down the street might still be open. We stumbled off in the dark, made it to the restaurant, and indeed, it was closed. We had to stumble back to the hotel, and I ended up with them in the lobby bar, buying them a beer.

The point of that little story is that, in fact, the guides probably had my best interests in sight. It was dangerous for an American to go stumbling around in the dark. First, you probably would get lost and, second, you could really hurt yourself. Should you bring harm to yourself stumbling about in an unfamiliar city in the dark, they would be blamed for your misfortune. So reports of the deviousness of the “minders” are exaggerated and may be misleading. Of course, they want to keep track of you and do not want you fraternizing with people.

In addition, there is the myth of the “Potemkin Village” demonstration for VIP guests. Foreign accounts of travel in Pyongyang are replete with vignettes of stores stocked, but not open, and activities ostensibly only for the benefit of curious foreigners. No doubt, there are some restaurants and other establishments that are off limits. For example in Pyongyang, there are some department stores which will take foreign currency, reputedly for the convenience of tourists and foreign diplomats, and others that will only take the local currency. But there are a number of other stores, ostensibly closed, that will accept foreign currency despite the confusing instructions about restrictions. So the confusion about restrictions does not make much sense. Walk into any one of the several “foreign” department stores that are for foreign currency, and they are packed with North Koreans. Many of them are just looking around, but some people are buying and carrying things out of the store. The bottom line is that a lot more observation is needed before conclusions can be drawn.

I wanted to go to department store #1 and was told it was off limits for foreigners. But it was featured in North Korean tourist brochures, and I wanted to get some souvenirs to take back to the South. That seemed to be the convincing argument, because I went several times to department store #1, sometimes with groups of American engineers in tow. I went through all its floors. They had a whole corner of the store devoted to stuffed animals and birds and oddities like that. You could buy foreign liquor there and shortwave radios, which I thought was interesting. North Koreans don’t have much money. It is not a monetized economy. It is apparent that most of the citizenry are not accustomed to a monetized society. They receive chits for rice, free housing, free education, and free medical care, so they don’t need money except for cigarettes and beer, both of which are extremely cheap. You can buy a great big bottle of Asahi beer for about two dollars.

Q: Asahi beer is a good Japanese beer.

YATES: Yes, and the North Koreans love it. It is very cheap, far cheaper than it would be in Japan. It is obviously subsidized. You can buy cheap cigarettes in North Korea also. They make cigarettes. I don’t know where they get the tobacco; perhaps it comes from the U.S. via China or Hong Kong. So a foreigner who likes to smoke and likes to drink is in good shape in North Korea. Almost everything else is by chit provided by the government. This means that as a North Korean, you don't need money to exist. It is only for nonessentials that you use money. So their low wages are essentially disposable income.

Another commonly accepted theory is that of the "Potemkin Village." As I noted before, it is claimed that they put on a big show for foreigners. The stores are not really stores. They will have goods stacked up neatly, but nobody ever touches it. You go in and look around, and nobody is there, and as soon as you leave, they close it up. You ride down the street, and you see all these stores, and they are all closed. So there are no stores, nothing for the North Koreans to buy.

That is not quite true. While it would be hard to define North Korea as a consumer society, they run things differently in their society than we do. A store here in the U.S. might open at 10 in the morning and stay open until 10 at night. Not in North Korea. They won't open in the morning. They will open at lunch time which sounds to an American like a crazy system. But as was explained to me, the theory in North Korea is that everybody is a worker and after breakfast you go to work. If you opened the stores in the morning, there would be no customers, but at lunch time when there is an hour off, there are many people on the street and, sure enough, when I checked at that time, the stores were all open. These goods are all lined up neatly in the morning, because the workers have nothing to do but make them neat until lunchtime when they sell them and then afterwards straighten them all up again.

Perhaps the stores are not crowded as we would expect in our own society, but you do see people standing in line in front of stores waiting to get in. The stores in North Korea are operated, as we would recognize in the old days, as general stores where you walk up to a counter and say, "I want a sack of flour, some lard, and crackers." They then go and get your flour, lard, and crackers and pass them across a counter in exchange for your money. That is the way stores operate in North Korea. You stand in line to get to the counter. When you get to the counter, you order what you want and you take it home. It is a little different than the walk-around-the-supermarket-with-a-cart experience we have. Foreign observers, glancing at the empty stores on their way from the airport to the hotel and back, are not learning much about the system.

A second myth that turned out to be fiction was that there are no such things as gas stations in North Korea. You can ride around Pyongyang for hours without seeing a gas station. The reason is, North Koreans think gas stations are dirty, which I guess has some point to it, and they put them down back alleys. Sure enough, once you know the code, you ride down a street and see a little blue sign up in the corner with a little arrow on it. That is the petrol sign. You go down that alley, and the station is in the back somewhere. There are very few cars anyway, although the numbers are growing. I was in a traffic jam in Pyongyang only once. They have mostly Russian and East European bloc cars, although a fair number of Volvos, which is interesting, and a lot of Mercedes. The North Koreans or someone in North Korea deemed the Mercedes as the best car in the world and decided to build them. So for a time, there was a North Korean Mercedes that was being built. The products of that effort look like Mercedes, except that there is a five-pointed star on it instead of the usual Mercedes three-pointed star. The five-pointed star, of course, is their red star. The paint tends to be runny, and the wheel covers tend not to be the magnesium type that you are familiar with. So it is a little different, but looks like a shabby Mercedes about ten years old. I don't think they are making them anymore.

I know they never paid for the Volvos. That is one of the problems with the North Koreans; they buy things and never pay for them. When I was there, they had a Swedish delegation trying to arrange for the payment of about $350,000 worth of Volvos that the Swedish taxpayers had paid for, because their government had guaranteed the export arrangement. Volvo got its money, but the Swedes did not. The Swedish government is trying to recover it. That is one of the problems with the North Korean economy; they do not have any money. Because it is a non-monetized economy, they do not benefit from the multiplier effect in the economy. If the multiplier effect is not working, then money is not being generated as it moves through the economy. Without generating money they can't buy anything. So it is a "catch 22."

Our U.S. engineers would go in, in groups of about eight and usually a head engineer or the vice president of the company. There were several U.S. companies involved under contract with the Department of Energy. In fact, all of my expenses and escort expenses were funded by the Department of Energy. I was a USIA officer, working for the Department of State being funded by the Department of Energy. It was a strange arrangement.

But we would go in, if we could get in. One of the problems of getting into North Korea was that you had to have a visa, but North Korea doesn't give visas like normal governments; they give you a piece of paper with your picture on it, which they stick inside your passport. But even that wasn't good enough to get you into security places. For example in Nyongbyon, we had to get a separate pass to allow us to get through the different parts of the guard structure - the municipal guards (police), the local army guards, and the security apparatus around the nuclear center itself. When I arrived for the first time in the fall of 1995, army troops occupied mounted machine gun nests at the access points around the compound of the nuclear city. By my third visit, about a year later, those emplacements had been removed, and there did not seem to be much of an explanation why. Security in the nuclear compound had appreciably diminished.

Still, every time you went in and came out, you had to stop at every guard point, and there were four of them to go through to get into the reactor site. Every morning, we would have to go through the four posts. If you went back for lunch, you had to go through all four posts to reach the guest house outside the perimeter. Going back to work meant going through the four posts again. You had to come to a full stop and show all your documents at each stop, every time you went in or out. They didn't inspect the drivers or the guides. The drivers had a very unique position. First, they commanded the cars, but they also probably had more authority than drivers would in other parts of the world, because they were part of the intelligence establishment.

Q: Were you there during the death of Kim Il Sung?

YATES: No, I was there after that. However, I was there during the 50th anniversary of the Party. The problem at Nyongbyon was that there was nothing for the engineers to do, so we tried to figure out things that might provide some recreation. They worked on Saturdays, so it meant only Sundays were free. We could take a car and drive to Pyongyang. We could go to the hotel, get a room, and sit in the bar. It was at least a change of scenery, and there were sights to see.

One of the weekends on my first trip on October 10, 1995 was the 50th anniversary of the founding of the Korea Workers Party. Some of the guides knew we were interested in doing some touring and asked whether we would like to see the show, if they could get us some tickets. Most of the engineers thought that was a great idea. I told the guides that, if we could be given firm assurances that we were not going to be put into a compromising position, that we wouldn't go to any of the places we otherwise would not go to like the memorial to Kim Il Sung, for instance, we could probably go. However, if anything happened that I thought was wrong, then I would take the engineers out immediately. We would stand up and leave, possibly embarrassing our hosts. If they understood the conditions and understood that we would walk out if compromised, we would accept the offer to see the show.

Off we went. It turned out that the apparatus in North Korea is not very well put together. It is a small country but incredibly bureaucratic. The guides had lots of trouble getting us tickets, but we were finally given admission tickets to the foreigners' stand for the ceremony at the Kim Il Sung Square in the heart of Pyongyang.

We left about 7:30 a.m. and got to the square around 7:50. There were no seats, just wide flat concrete areas, arranged amphitheater style, flanking the platform where the leadership stood to wave at the masses below. On one side was the Party cadre, and on the other side, the military, and below that, the foreigners' stand for ambassadors and people from embassies on the right hand side of the podium. So we got shunted off to the right. I had dark glasses on and a hat. The only way you could tell I was a foreigner was because I was differently dressed than the rest of them. But you couldn't tell who I was. Our instructions to the engineers were not to associate or talk with people, to just watch, no politicking.

There were a lot of diplomats there, Bulgarians, Russians, etc. We were also put together with the Party faithful from abroad: the northern Chinese who are adherents of the communist way and some Japanese from the Japanese communist party who had come for the celebration. We were all together, milling about. Things started to move at 8:00 in the morning and lasted until almost noon. It was hot, and it was long. However, it probably was the most spectacular thing I have ever seen in my life. All the citizens of Pyongyang were spread out before us.

We had one representative of the institute managing the project for the Department of Energy who was not interested in the show. He was a jogger and said that he was going to jog. The guides became very upset. "What do you mean, you are going to jog? You can't jog." The DOE rep was adamant. "I want to jog." "You can't jog," responded the guides. "Why not?" insisted the American. "Because you will be arrested if you do." "I am an American and can go anywhere I want," he persisted. "No, you can't. Nobody in Pyongyang can go anywhere they want. The city is shut. Anybody who lives in this city will be at the square by order. You don't have an option. Anybody not in the square this morning will be arrested, you included." So very reluctantly, he was dragged along with the rest of us. The celebration consisted of about half of the people of Pyongyang in a parade with floats and cheering members of work units. The other half of the citizenry was in the square waving plastic flowers, red and pink and some yellow. They choreographed these flowers into signs and symbols. Whenever they mentioned Kim Il Sung, they showed the sun. Whenever they mentioned Kim Jong Il, Kim Il Sung's son, there would be a star. The parade of silk banners was a marvelous thing to see.

The first thing in the morning was a formation of the military, which filled the square. The military leadership made speeches. They had just appointed four new marshals in the North Korean command, so those marshals were there and reviewed the troops in these very long black Zivs, big Russian cars, and a Lincoln and a couple of other Western cars. They rode in circles, reviewing the troops, and then the troops marched off. There was no brandishing of arms. Few of the assembled troops had arms at all. After the troops had marched out of the square, the mass of citizens who were “hanging in the wings” behind the buildings flooded into the square in this mass of pink. The women were dressed in a modified, shorter, version of the traditional Korean Hanbok and the men wore suits and ties. It was quite an amazing show. This continued until all had arrived at their proper place, and then the parade started.

After the military speeches and the review of the troops, Kim Jong Il came in, no more than 50 feet from where I was standing. He leaned over the edge of the baluster there and waved at all the foreigners. We were told that no pictures were allowed, and all of us respected the request. But it was remarkable to see him so close. He didn't look as sick or disheveled or as monarchical as he does in some of the Western press photos. He went off to receive the accolade of the crowd and stood there for hours, waving. He did evidence considerable boredom, and perhaps it is understandable, given that the parade went on for almost four hours and everyone had all eyes on him.

After Kim Jong Il arrived, the parade started. There were thousands of people with floats, lots of silk flags. After the four hours standing on the cement flats, we were impressed but relieved that the marathon was over. We were told we were going to take a break for lunch and then in the afternoon were the gymnastics. We went back to the hotel for lunch and then went out to the Kim Il Sung Memorial Stadium where just about all of the student population of Pyongyang was assembled. They did marvelous things with card flipping. They would make entire pastoral scenes and then a picture of Kim Il Sung, and then a picture of his son, a lot of slogans and things. Hundreds of these were done by all these school kids about 13, 14, 15 years old under direction from the ground. They had cheerleaders down there. I do not remember seeing more than one or two mistakes made in the several hours of constantly changing pictures. There were thousands of these kids.

After the sloganeering and marvelous pictures of the card flippers, the gymnastics started with an incredible display. I had seen a fair amount of Chinese gymnastics while stationed in Beijing, but the kids in the stadium gave nothing to the Chinese in their display of skills. Much of the display ran with multiple activities in different parts of the stadium simultaneously, a “multiple ring circus” that somehow all fit together into a seamless whole. People tumbling in the air, ground vaulting, and all sorts of juggling, all taking place at the same time. Kim Jong Il was there also. We were seated further away. We certainly weren't given very special consideration up in the stands, off on the side. We could take all the pictures we wanted of the gymnasts, but couldn't turn the cameras on the leadership podium.

Our minders carefully observed the ground rules of our attendance. The extent to which the minders were careful about the instructions I had laid down before we had agreed to go, was illustrated during the morning celebration. The TV cameras were constantly roving over the crowds and the displays of adulation, but during a lull in the celebration, began to pan across the crowd of foreigners, obviously showing the foreign dignitaries who were attending the celebration. At the time the camera came very close to where I was standing, one of the minders saw it coming and stepped between me and the camera and stood there until the camera left. I wouldn't have cared so much, because with my hat and sunglasses, nobody would be able to tell me from any other European, but nonetheless, the point was, he kept his word which was much more important to me than any possible photography.

I found all the way along that the North Koreans were very careful about the agreements that were made. If the agreements were broken, either they had a very good reason, or they did not feel they themselves had broken them. We had one incident during my first visit when I wanted to visit the East German compound to see the Swedish representative who handled American affairs in Pyongyang at the time. I wanted to meet him, say hello, and set up procedures to be used if we had problems in Nyongbyon. Because the Swedes provided some diplomatic protection, the assistance of this Swedish representative could be invaluable in times of emergency. It was getting dark, but that was not of concern to me. I said that I wanted to take the car and go over and see the Swedish consul. My minder of the moment said, "Does he expect you?" I said, "No, but I would like to knock on his door and say hello." "Well, it may be a problem." "Why?" "Well, we don't know where the German Embassy is." That was one of the largest embassies in Pyongyang and our foreign minders didn't know where it was? That was unbelievable. I said, "I really have to go. I want to do this." "We will see what we can do," was the response.

It was about 4:30 in the afternoon, and it gets dark in Pyongyang in the winter time pretty early. They worked for half an hour and then came back and said, "We can't find it. We have called the foreign ministry, and we just can't locate the German compound." I said, "Well, what are we going to do?" They suggested that we take the car and try find it, so we all piled into the car I had rented and rode off into the mists of Pyongyang. We crossed the river into the diplomatic quarter where we stopped here and there, asking security guards where the East German Embassy was. In Seoul, I had seen a map with the general location of where it was but had nothing else to guide us. We took a few wrong turns but eventually did find the place. By that time, it was dark and there was a guard out in front. I got out of the car, a Westerner, and approached the gate. "Who are you and what do you want?" I was asked. "I want to see the Germans." The guard's response was a simple, "Okay." My minders had to stay in the car, since they were not allowed to go into the embassy, but I could.

I had one of the engineers with me, and the two of us went into the compound which was already completely dark. We felt our way along and saw a light in an apartment building toward the back. Europeans don't keep hall lights on very often to conserve energy. We went up some stairs and banged on a door with light showing under it. I don't know what the occupants thought, I never did find out, but they came to the door; getting a bang on the door in the middle of the night in North Korea from people you don't expect must be quite sensational. It turned out they were newly arrived, a young German diplomat and his wife. Nobody that I wanted to speak with was at home, so it was not a very successful visit. But at least I had gotten into the compound, met somebody, and gotten back out. The important part of the story is that my minders worked very hard to locate the German compound when they could have made their lives a lot easier by simply denying that we were able to go. They were really embarrassed that they did not know where the compound was, when first asked. The North Korean bureaucracy is very compartmentalized, and as I gradually learned more about that unusual government, I more fully understood why my minders had such a problem.

I have another tale that also speaks to the purposes of the minders. When I was getting close to leaving North Korea after my first trip, I wanted to take some kind of candy back to Seoul as a souvenir for my instructors at FSI and others in the South. I was unable to find anything suitable. I mentioned this problem to my minders, and they scurried off. Two hours later, they came back and said, "We have checked all over town. The only place we can find to buy something resembling what you want is up in the hotel bar." Sure enough, upstairs in the bar tucked behind the counter were some boxes of candy. It tasted terrible. But nonetheless, that was North Korean candy which I could take back to the South. But they had worked the better part of the morning, trying to locate the source of my desired souvenirs. I think their spirit of conscientiously trying to do something right is pretty strong.

I later had a different experience while on a negotiating team in my last visit. I was the State Department representative for a negotiating team that was run by the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency and headed by Norm Wolfe, an Under Secretary at ACDA, to negotiate some of the final parts of the spent fuel arrangements. The canning operation was ongoing, but there were some problems with the details of the work schedule in the final stages of the canning process. Some of the positions of the North Koreans that we thought did not have any merit turned out to be based on things of which we had no understanding. That happened a number of times in my North Korean experience.

You may remember in the press a couple of years ago, we had accused the North Koreans of siphoning off the fuel oil of the first shipment and diverting it to other purposes. Their tally of how much had been taken in was different from ours. Their's showed less and ours showed more. We said, "Aha!" The press had a field day, saying that they were stealing the fuel.

It turned out that our technology was overly sophisticated and had given us incorrect readings. We used technology utilizing sound waves to measure the flow of the heavy fuel oil, which meant we did not have to put anything into the fuel flow itself. It was an acoustic process by which you could tell the rate of flow by, I suppose, the doppler effects on the reflected sound. The North Koreans were adamant that their figures were correct. They used an old propeller system directly in the flow of the oil. The number of times it went around indicated the amount of fuel flow. What happened, as it turned out, was that the fuel going through the line was at a colder temperature than we expected. Since the acoustic properties of the fuel change under those conditions, we had to re-calculate our own totals. In fact, the North Koreans were right and our figures were wrong, despite all of our high tech equipment. Nonetheless, the American press had made much ado about the possible fraud, but made much less about our foul up of the data.

A second incident of the same kind occurred when the North Koreans wanted to stop work on the canning of the spent fuel. We said, "Ah, dragging their feet." This was a charge that was leveled at them regularly. The crane was broken. They had a holiday. Their men were sick. Or the radiation is too much over the pool. They complained that the American engineers were coming and going in the replacement shifts, but their people were staying and working in the same conditions month after month. The American engineers were working 12 hour days, from 8 in the morning until 8 at night over the pool and for them it was all right, because we had these very fancy, and expensive, dose meters, which were cumulative in determining the amount of radiation that an individual was receiving. They assigned one to you on arrival, and you wore it all the time. Additionally, all American engineers were examined with a full body count done periodically to make sure they did not exceed the Department of Energy's standards for allowable levels of radiation exposure.

However, it turned out that the North Koreans didn't have any of that fancy equipment or sophisticated exams. All they had were the film badges which only indicate when too much exposure is received over a brief period. They had nothing showing the actual cumulative exposure. The way they measured total possible accumulated exposure was by taking a Geiger counter and placing the sensor out over the pool containing the spent fuel while taking a reading. A "health physics" technician would then multiply that by the number of hours the crew was above the pool. The problem was, if you do that, you are not taking into account the shielding of the platform and other obstructions from things above and surrounding the pool. Our crew with the dangling badges would have an accurate reading, but the North Korean crew's accumulation estimates were an average based on the sensor reading taken directly over the pool. That meant if an engineer was suspended directly over the pool for that amount of time, that was the amount of dosage they would receive.

Of course, nobody would be suspended directly over the pool for that length of time, because they walk back and forth for tools, take breaks, etc. Our argument was that there was plenty of space for that, but they were adamant that, because of their health concerns, the exposure of their crews over the pool was high. Finally, we got the idea that the only way they had to determine dosage was to assume the maximum. By doing so, it meant they were spending too much time over the pool and greatly exceeded Department of Energy standards.

It took a long time to wrangle that down to where we understood what they were talking about. They had a good point, and once it was recognized, we were able to come to an agreement on time to be spent over the pool. Although we were happy to have our engineers in over the pool for longer hours, the Koreans absolutely refused. They said that if we gave them the equipment so they could test in the same manner as we did, then we could talk about it. These things are $500-$600 a piece, and we weren't about to start handing them out like cookies to all the Korean workers and people who were in the pool area. But in fact, they were being very careful in a dangerous situation with their people. I think in retrospect it was something very difficult for us to argue with. Their intransigence was not so incomprehensible when you began to understand it from their point of view.

One of our major problems in dealing with the North Koreans was that the Americans did not speak Korean. Even in the negotiations I spoke of, we did not have a translator. The only American who had any Korean language was me. The only place the negotiating team could go to converse was out in the street. We had to call for a recess in negotiations and all trundle downstairs and walk around the block. I would tell Norm Wolfe, the head of the delegation and a lawyer, that they didn't understand what we were talking about. First off, we should not use any legal jargon that is popular in the US, for their translator did not understand it and could not render an accurate translation. My impression was that the translator was guessing a bit and thereby throwing negotiations off the track when our points did not make any sense to the North Korean side. Secondly, the North Korean-supplied translator in translating from Korean into English was doing things that were extremely annoying to Norm Wolfe.

For example, every time they would refer to Wolfe, instead of saying “him” or “you,” he would say, “Mr. Norman Wolfe,” using his full name. That drove Wolfe crazy, because he thought they were needling him. He was not being needled; it was simply a case of the translator trying to be too fussy. The translator was trying to be polite, but he was doing so in a very irritating fashion.

We also saw in the negotiating team an apparent bureaucratic division, almost antagonism, within the North Korean government. The chief negotiator for the North Korean side was an engineer, Director Lee, the Director of the Atomic Energy Bureau, a very senior position in the North Korean government. The North Korean Foreign Ministry was represented by a slick looking gentleman with a silk suit, and clearly not held in the highest regard by the people from the Atomic Energy Bureau. He was a quintessential bureaucrat, one of those Foreign Ministry wonks who just get in the way. He would make caustic speeches, mentioning all sorts of inappropriate and tangential points that would cause Wolfe to get impatient and upset. Obviously, Lee could see that this interloper was causing all sorts of trouble in his negotiation. Actually, there were two foreign ministry representatives, a lawyer who kept his mouth shut most of the time and this other, political type. The talkative representative of the Foreign Ministry was kind of chubby, which was also unusual for a Korean. Those from the Atomic Energy Bureau on the negotiating team were rail thin.

The comparison probably rankled Director Lee. The man in the silk suit would scribble notes all during the negotiations and suddenly rip off a page and pass it to Director Lee. Director Lee was obviously not interested in his scribbled observations, for he would receive the passed notes, hardly look at them, and place them face down on the table beside him. At some time during a break in translation, he would turn up a corner and take a look at the notes and then lay it back face down again. He was doing the absolute minimum to not be completely disrespectful to this person, but certainly not to listen to what he had to say. The man in the silk suit was really upset by this, because he was continually bobbing back and forth in his seat to see what had happened to his brilliant suggestions. You could see him growing visibly ticked off with Lee for not paying attention to his diatribes. It was always the same stuff.

The failure on our part was that we did not have a competent Korean translator on board who was an American and who would understand what we said, even with the ill-advised legalisms. When Wolfe would use lawyer terms, the translator did not know what he was talking about and would guess. Sometimes Director Lee, whose English was obviously better than he would admit, could straighten things out in his own mind or understood the logical stuff, but many times he could not. This prolonged the negotiations to a considerable extent. Finally, we got to an agreement, although it didn't look like we were going to for a long time. In true North Korean style, they would say “absolutely not, absolutely not,” until three seconds before you break and then they would say, “Well, maybe.”

One last thing. The North Koreans had put together a welcoming banquet which was very elegant at the hotel. The meal was well served, and it was excellent food. To be polite and respectful, we had to reciprocate. A bunch of Americans in the heart of Pyongyang had few options. We could not have it at the hotel, because the dining rooms were all booked. I took my minders on a field excursion to see if we might find a place suitable for a concluding banquet hosted by the Americans. We ended up in the Diplomatic Club, which is a kind of curious, run-down, end-of-the-road operation across the river in the diplomatic area. I went over to look at the place to see whether or not it could be suitable for our gala affair, but it clearly was not. It was a dump. It didn't smell good, and it was dank and dark. I had visions of eventually spending cold winter nights downing suds at the bar and listening to bad stories from drunk foreigners once we were finally here with the Liaison Office.

We were ushered into a reception room with plastic flowers. It was really more suited for a funeral parlor than for a banquet. But clearly, we had no choice and would have to make the best of it. After some long negotiations, we finally decided on a menu for the banquet. I asked them to make some changes in the room, to take out some of the junk that was useless like the TV sets, plastic flowers, etc. With a heavy heart filled with trepidation I returned to the Koryu Hotel to break the news to the delegation.

The upshot was, when we had the meal, although it was a little different than many banquets I had been to, it was fairly good. It was, in fact, quite nice in some ways. They had taken out all of the junk and dressed up their waitresses in the North Korean version of the traditional Hanbok. All appeared dramatically different from the polyester-clad bar hostesses I had seen in the afternoon and even the grim room appeared almost cheery. We were brought in through a side entrance, and did not have to walk through the tawdry bar. The North Korean manager did a nice job. Wolfe was obviously pleased, particularly since the total cost came in under the paltry sum available in the ACDA budget. The party was a success and the American taxpayer did well on that one.

By offering that kind of convivial banquet reception, the U.S. side neatly tied up the negotiations on an upbeat note. It really made a difference, because the North Koreans, like their South Korean brethren, really like a good time. They like to drink, to pass the glass around, and play little parlor games, like singing, making speeches, toasts, etc. They got very convivial. These were the hard nosed, brittle negotiators of the earlier afternoon who suddenly now were drinking buddies in the evening. I have heard the same story from academicians and others who have traveled in the North or have had relationships with North Koreans. They take off the official mask, set it aside, have a good time, and put the mask back on the next morning.

I found also one of the great lessons of all this was, if you begin to work with the North Koreans and put aside politics, they become very helpful, very warm, and in some ways very candid. It also means that you can begin to make progress where there was none before. Suddenly doors open. Things are not as much of a problem as they were once thought to be. If they trust you, the whole relationship develops and changes and they begin to rely on you in many ways for counsel on what they should do. It becomes a whole different equation.

Much of our negotiation so far has been handled by people who have no experience in Korea, do not speak the language, and do not know much about Korean history or culture. They go in there with their American eyes and American ears, and they hear things that they think are right and in their terms are correct, but are not the facts based on the way that Koreans see them. In turn, the Koreans believe they have been wronged, or worse insulted, but the Americans think it is obvious and they are simply being stiff. In the classic sense, both sides do not understand what the other one is talking about, so we cannot get agreement. I think that has been the crux of our problem with North Korea all along. By the same token, they have the same problem with the Chinese and Japanese. It is not just us, it is everybody. I think if we had the presence of mind to be able to put together negotiating teams that have the language and the culture background as well as the technical expertise required of the negotiations, we would have much greater success with North Korea.

There were a lot of other parts of the North Korean experience that I think are interesting. There were a whole host of observations and things, but I'm not sure they are germane to what you are looking for.

Q: One of the things that you read in the paper about North Korea is the adulation for both Kim Il Sung and Kim Jong Il. Did that come through to you?

YATES: Oh, sure. I think over the three times I was there, the whole situation changed. I was there in the beginning when there was still the mourning period of Kim Il Sung's death. In the parade given in celebration of the 50th anniversary of the Party, for example, Kim Il Sung was at the center, the son was not. Kim Jong Il was mentioned occasionally, and each time, you had a star that would be shown. He is called the star of Paektu San, the sacred mountain up on the border with China where Korean civilization traditionally came from. There is some controversy about that. As a matter of fact, it is known that Kim Jong Il was not born on the flanks of Paektu San but near Khabarovsk when his parents were living there. None the less, everywhere you go in Korea, there are portraits and squares commemorating Kim Il Sung and to some extent, too, Kim Jong Il, his son, but his son was clearly a secondary deity. In each government building, they would have portraits of the president, vice president, and council somewhere on the wall. What they would have in the foyer was usually a slogan or something said by Kim Il Sung, or Kim Jong Il, for that matter. When one or the other visited a facility, they would take a quote from the visit and carve it on the wall. This is hallowed ground to them.

Engineers are pragmatic, and it is often bone chillingly cold, so they want to get their work done as quickly as possible. We had a shipment driven in from a port, and they tore it apart getting out tools and equipment. The spent-fuel pool room was getting pretty dense with packing material and equipment, but the space in the foyer was empty. So the Americans put down saw horses and began to disassemble the shipment in the foyer until Chief Engineer Lee, suddenly spotted this and exploded. I was in one of the back rooms and was called out. He demanded, "Do you know what is going on out front?" "No," I responded in surprise and promised to take a look immediately. Of course, they had the whole place covered with trash and equipment was all over the place. He said, "I want you all to understand [meaning us Americans and engineers] that this is an important place to us and the actions of the American engineers is very, very rude.

Furthermore, the canning work will not continue until this is straightened out.” We had offended their sensibilities. This was like running around without a shirt or pants in church.

Taking the lesson to heart, the American engineers got the place even cleaner after they finished than it was before they started. To their credit, the engineers understood the problem and were helpful in cleaning the place up, even giving the North Koreans wide tape to tape down wires and make the place look better than ever. The North Koreans got over their pique, accepted the apology, and allowed work to resume without apparent grudge.

At another time, we had a crisis of a different sort. We brought in equipment, and it was cold, the winter was coming on, and there wasn’t any heat in the building. Once the reactor was shut down, there was no hot water, and with no hot water, there was no heat. The reactor even had been used to heat the entire community. So we had to bring in kerosene heaters for the offices where we did the water chemistry and another room that was a sort of commons for the American crews. It was really cold. You haven’t really felt cold until you have had to sit in a concrete building in a very cold place for a very long time. Then you feel a depth of cold that reaches into your bones. The engineers had put in an emergency request for space heaters. In good government fashion, the request was put out for the low bid, and after purchase, the new kerosene heaters were air shipped over.

They were fine and serviceable heaters, but they were made in South Korea. Labels on the boxes and on the heaters said “Made in Korea.” As soon as we got them out of the packing crates and put them on the floor in the boxes, all the North Koreans disappeared. I got called in again by Chief Engineer Lee and asked him what was the problem. He said, “The problem is, we will not work with those boxes in our building. Burn them, destroy them, but get rid of them. And the heaters as well.” I was alarmed. “But we need them; it is cold.” We finally arrived at the conclusion that the offence was the “Made in Korea” labels. So we got our jackknives out and went out and cut out of the boxes all of the stamps that said “Made in Korea.” We took the stuff out and scraped off all the little “Made in Korea” decals. We examined everything scrupulously to make sure nothing said “Made in Korea.” I went back to the Chief Engineer and said, “I think we have solved the problem. Won’t you come out and look?” He went out to look and found nothing with the offending “Made in Korea” labels, so all was now acceptable and we got our heat. The fact they had been made in South Korea was not the important thing. It was the fact that they said “Made in Korea,” to them taunting our North Korean co-workers.

The same thing happened when the first shipment of rice aid arrived in the northern port. Remember when the North Koreans became exercised over the South Korean flag flying on the back of the ship? That was the same syndrome, only written in a different size. The North Koreans were extremely sensitive to that. Whenever we would drive by car through the center of the nuclear compound of Nyongbyon, like in the city of Pyongyang, there was a Kim Il Sung square with his portrait on a billboard as the centerpiece. All cars were expected to slow down and go at a crawl in front of the portrait. You could then speed up (even when crossing in front of the portrait of Kim Jong Il) to continue along to the next check point. That occurred almost everywhere we traveled. It resembles a religion rather than politics or political control. And if you begin to think of it as a religion, you may not become a believer, but you can at least understand it as a religion and then much of what they do becomes understandable.

Kim Il Sung was seen to be a man but revered as a god. Everybody knew he was not god, but nonetheless, he became the symbol of the state, the central image around which the identity of the nation is built. Wherever you traveled around North Korea, there are plaques, pictures, and commemoration tablets that are standing where Kim Il Sung visited and gave “guidance” to the workers of the time. You can laugh at that, but like a good ward politician, he visited every little hamlet in the country. Everywhere you go, there is a plaque where Kim Il Sung stood and gave advice to the farmers or to the workers or the citizens. Wherever he made a pronouncement, there is a picture. There is a wealth of paintings of Kim Il Sung. It is a religion with its own myths and faiths. The images and portraits are the icons of the religion. There is a book of his writings that the believers can cling to. Now, of course, he is dead, and there is the ethereal part of the religion. The son has not, to date, been able to assume the same level of divinity.

I had the chance to watch a fair amount of North Korean television on my several trips north. Since there was not much else to do at the guest house once you tired of pool, it was possible to watch North Korean television. Based on the number of programs I saw, the North Koreans like to show soap opera type programs. This is done all over the world to much the same rapt attention. At least that was the habit of the guest house staff who watched the stories on the one set on the lower floor in the lobby. The most common plot line was usually stories of some hero defending the faith of the party or following the guidance of Kim Il Sung. In fact, they are interpersonal fights, melodramas. We used to enjoy movies with a girl tied up on the tracks, and a speeding train is on the way while a man in a black hat stands by, twirling a handle bar mustache. It is the same stuff all over again. We went through that in the ‘30s and ‘40s. They have their villains and usually they are rightists, or something like that. There is still the black hat and mustache and the girl tied up on the tracks. It is the same story. The hero has muscles and the chiseled jaw like we used to have. The same stuff. That is what they watch and enjoy. The news shows and documentaries generated only boredom until the next drama.

Like all people, if the North Koreans are given a chance to enjoy something different or exotic, they usually take it. An example of this is taped music played in the cars. Most North Korean music is written in North Korea, of course, with generous nods to themes that coincidentally may have appeared in familiar western music. However, if you are in a car with a driver who got sick of the same stuff all the time, what he plays is tapes which are essentially Western music done by North Korean orchestras. That is acceptable, I guess, because they would have Western music which you couldn’t recognize or thought it sounded vaguely familiar but different. Nonetheless, it sounded a lot like what we would recognize as Western classical music. They have a light band which plays on television all the time. They get singers and sing folk songs and things like that. So there is some variety. I bought some of the music. Some of it is very good; Koreans love to sing.

Q: Yes, we really are talking about Koreans who can take an awful lot.

YATES: They have taken a lot. They talk about a famine in the north. It is a famine, but they have had some degree of famine for forty years. It is clear that the communist system they have does not work. There are numerous instances around the world of economic failure in communist systems. This is the last of the breed. They know what failure is. The problem is, will they be able to accept the consequences of that failure in the face of the obvious luxury and wealth of the south at the same time. If the barriers are dropped, what will they do?

The southerners expect them to enter into a mass migration south for jobs. In fact, the South is importing labor now for some of the menial jobs they no longer wish to fill themselves. This is the same kind of thing the Germans had experienced. The question is, would the northerners take these jobs from the foreigners the South were bringing in. Would the southerners also be able to provide the indicated labor force needed for the kind of industries southerners no longer do, like shoes. The south has already moved a lot of its manufacturing base offshore. The investment that went into Korea in the late sixties and early seventies, textile manufacture, shoe manufacture and things like that, are no longer in Korea. Now they are going high tech and much of the stuff they did before has gone off to China or down to Malaysia or Vietnam.

Q: Did you find yourself being used by the North Koreans because you would be the only one who knew South Korea in this group? Were you feeding their curiosity about South Korea or were they pretty careful?

YATES: They were pretty careful. I think they don't want to talk about it, because that would easily corrupt them in the eyes of their own system. Generally speaking, they did not talk about it much. After a while when you got to know people, you began to get a little bit more of that. You had to be very careful, because if you tried to push it, then they would push you out. So you did not bring it up. If they wanted to talk about it, you would be happy to do so. But you had to be careful. If they wanted to talk about it, they were probably baiting you or something akin to the games the Chinese intelligence service played. But if you backed off a little bit and took a quiet road, I think you built more confidence among them.

I had a lot of political discussions with my North Korean handlers. In the beginning, they would all give speeches, particularly if a superior was within earshot. If you ride in a car with one of their superiors next to you, the guide in front would launch into a long tirade against American inequities and the duplicity and colonization of the South, etc. They would get tiresome. More than once, I had this happen to me, but not with the same person more than once. Once they had done it, that seemed to complete a check box in the report they had to file on you. Once you are past that, particularly if you are willing to buy the beer or cigarettes, they are willing to sit down and talk about other things. I had a long conversation once about the American civil war, which North Koreans have virtually no knowledge of.

The guides that we got were not political types; they were technical people. It was a strange thing. Political types never studied English, technical types did, because it was a language that allowed you to learn about something technical like nuclear energy or math. A lot of information on nuclear energy is in English or German. So they had linguistic talents but were chemists, physicists or mathematicians. There was one of the guides who was a mathematician interested in a wider range of things. One day, we got talking about the Korean war. I mentioned the U.S. also had had a civil war at one time between the North and the South. He seemed interested and curious, with a wish to know more about it. I suggested that he read The Red Badge of Courage to get an idea of some of the feelings of Americans on the front lines during the civil war.

Steven Crane's seminal work was the first time that war as a terrible thing got into the literature. To Crane, it was not a noble cause but an intensely personal experience that called into question many things otherwise assumed. War not as a valiant thing, as it was portrayed in the North very often. The war on a personal level and how much it cost people, the wounded, and the suffering that was brought about by the war. It would also give the Northerners an understanding of how the suffering occurred in the South as well and how much people there suffered because of the war. It wasn't any longer a question of which side you were on, it was a question of the effect of the war that was the same on both sides. So I suggested he get the book. He said he could not get it and asked if I could give him a copy. I promised I would and in fact took a copy with me back to North Korea the next time but unfortunately never had an opportune time to give it to him. I could not put him in the position of accepting it.

USIA had put together 5,000 volumes, each in North Korean style Korean. We had it specially translated and printed in the Philippines, ready in Seoul to go north with me. Each time I would go north, I would take some volumes with me to leave around if I could. I could not leave them in Nyongbyon, because it was against the rules and would have caused trouble for everybody. But I did leave them in Pyongyang with the Swedish representative to give to people who he thought would know about them and understand them and would be able to accept them without causing political difficulties.

I had a long discussion once with one of our guides' bosses in Pyongyang about the American Congress. At that time, Congress was really in an anti-North Korean mood. Part of the reason was that the North Koreans had denied a visa to Rep. Jay Kim who was an ethnic Korean in the U.S. Congress from California and who had applied to visit North Korea. He was turned down by the North Koreans as, I guess, a person they did not want to see. My point to them was that not granting a visa was a foolish move, because the very person who they could have counted on to have a better understanding of what went on here was kept out. And that was not a good idea. This very educated, very astute, and relatively speaking, well-read man, had no idea who Jay Kim was. The problem for me as a USIS person was, here was an obvious example where a little knowledge would have helped a very difficult situation.

I think in the U.S. we see the North Koreans as monolithic. That somehow the knowledge that one has, everybody has. In fact, they are very badly divided in terms of being super compartmentalized. I mentioned before the division between the public energy bureau and the foreign ministry. This is true throughout their society. It is true in China. You give something to one man in the Foreign Ministry in Beijing, and the person at the next desk likely will never see it. We ran into this in Beijing, trying to get our Wireless Files into the Foreign Ministry. You would talk to one man, and he would say, "I would like to see those." "Gee, we give them to so-and-so who is in your same section." He says, "That is his copy; I don't see it."

In China, as in most places, information is power. So if you go to a meeting and say, "I know what the Americans said," and the other guy did not, who gets the leg up in the Foreign Ministry? It becomes one of these internal rivalry things. Chinese just do not pass messages around very easily. North Korea is the same way. That means you have to get people who trust you in each of these areas; otherwise you may have the trust of one segment on one side, but two desks over, the bureaucrat thinks you are dirt, because he does not have any idea who you are or what you do.

That is why it was so important for us to have a liaison office in Pyongyang. We can talk until we are blue in the face about our trust and agreements and the fact that the North Koreans did renege on their agreement to cross the border, that is absolutely true. But the fact is, we would have gained far more in the placement of a Liaison Office in Pyongyang than North Korea would have gained by the placement of a Liaison Office in Washington. There is no comparison, because the systems are so dissimilar. It would have been important for them to learn more than it would have been important for them to instruct more. In terms of Pyongyang, the reverse was true. It would be an important learning point for us, but by far it would have been an opening to the society in creating understanding who Americans are and what their intentions are in the world. Now, it is ignorance that dominates things. Gradually, as the North Koreans move around and learn more, this will change, but it will take a lot of patience and time.

A couple of years back, the first North Korean delegation went to Hawaii to CINCPAC to talk about the recovery of remains. That I think was badly mishandled on our side, because we took it as a negotiation instead of what it should have been, an explanation. A similar event had occurred with the Chinese before. I had taken it on as a personal crusade to push that because the Chinese had come to CINCPAC while I was there. Using civilian clothes, military Chinese took a look at our remains identification laboratory, which is called CILHI (Central Identification Laboratory, Hawaii), and is located at Travis Air Force Base where all remains from all deceased veterans who are exhumed around the world are brought for DNA testing and whatever positive identification can be made. The North Koreans had a very simplified view of that, as did the Chinese. We brought the Chinese in quietly, no press, no negotiations, but just come as guests and stay in a hotel and be shown what we are doing. We were not asking for any promises or favors. We wanted them to just come and understand.

When that was done with the Chinese, it had marvelous consequences. We got the first American military teams into China to recovery sites in southern China where pilots from Vietnam had crashed. We wanted to investigate those sites and were able to do so in a way that was scientifically sustainable. We could send teams in, working with the Chinese and look at sites at a fair price and exhume the remains where they could be found. We had controlled the situation, so that we had firm assurances for the families back here that those remains were in fact their son, father, uncle, etc. and they could be assured of this when they had that casket back home and in the ground. In North Korea, we didn't get any of that, because the North Koreans came as negotiators, not as tourists as it were, and the effort failed. They tried to do it again in New York a couple of weeks ago, and we made, I guess, some little progress, but it hasn't gone very far. Had we gotten off our political stump and just stood down and said, "You come, you look, that is all we are asking," then we probably would have been a lot further down the line in North Korea than we are now.

MARK E. MOHR
Deputy Director, Political Selection

Beijing (1988-1990)

Mr. Mohr was born in New York and raised in New York and New Jersey. He was educated at the University of Rochester and Harvard University, where he studied the Chinese language. After service in Korea with the Peace Corps, he joined the Foreign Service in 1969, and served abroad in Taipei, Taichung, Hong Kong, Tokyo, Beijing and Brisbane. In his service at the State Department in Washington, Mr. Mohr dealt primarily with Far East Affairs. After his retirement he worked at the Department of Energy on Nuclear energy matters. In 1997 he was recalled to the State Department, where he worked as Korean desk officer. Mr. Mohr was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2009.

Q: So then what did you do?

MOHR: By the time the INF treaty was ratified, it was the summer of 1988, and I really wanted to go back to doing something involving China. I was fortunate. I secured the job as deputy director of the political section in Embassy Beijing. The only drawback was that, at the time, there was no English language school in Beijing. State would have paid for my children to go to an international school in Japan, but my wife and I decided it would be least complicated if they all remained in the U.S. and I went to Beijing by myself.

Q: So you went out to Beijing when?

MOHR: In August of 1988. I remembered that the night before I was to leave, the basement of our house flooded, so we were up most of the night mopping up.

Q: You were in Beijing from when to when?

MOHR: From the summer of 1988 to the summer of 1990. In those days, Beijing was a two-year tour, because there were none of the amenities that there are today, such as the world's largest McDonalds.

Q: So you were there during 1989.

MOHR: Oh yes, I was an eyewitness to the entire Tiananmen Incident.

Q: When you got out there who was the ambassador?

MOHR: During my first year, Winston Lord was the ambassador. His tour, of over five years, ended in the spring of 1989, just as the events were taking place which would lead up to the Tiananmen Incident of June 4, 1989.

Q: I have interviewed Winston Lord.

MOHR: That should have been interesting. I think it would be good to stop here, and continue next time. Is that all right?

Q: Absolutely. So we will pick this up in 1988 when you are off to Beijing.

MOHR: Excellent.

Q: Today is December 3, 2009, with Mark Mohr. Mark we were going to pick this up as you were arriving in Beijing.

MOHR: Yes, without my family, to take up my new job as deputy director of the political section in Embassy Beijing.

Q: How long were you there?

MOHR: Two years. I arrived the summer of 1988. I had just arrived when we were hit by a veritable blizzard of senior level visits. As I recall, there were four Secretary-level visits in six weeks. I was responsible for coordinating all the meetings and the reporting.

Q: Let's talk a bit about in 1988. How were relations with China?

MOHR: They were getting better. With regard to living in China and being able to do our work, things were improving markedly. For the first time the Chinese were agreeing to accept invitations for lunch or dinner at our homes. So we could actually talk to them in social settings, ask questions, and get some answers. Things were warming up. So under Ambassador Winston Lord, things were getting better. We had the usual trade, non-proliferation, and human rights problems, but they were being managed. There was just less tension. There was a feeling that we were just beginning to get somewhere, that we were on the verge of a real breakthrough in relations. Then President Bush came to China in February 1989, and things took a turn for the worse.

The visit had been going well until the February "return" dinner in Beijing, which is the one given by the U.S. side following the dinner by the Chinese side. One of the guests the President had invited was Fang Lizhi, an astrophysicist who had been critical of the regime. The year before, in an interview in Hong Kong, Fang attacked the Chinese leadership for nepotism, singling out the special positions of the children of key leaders. Nevertheless, despite such criticism, Fang had been allowed to keep his job and to talk to foreign journalists. So we invited him to the Bush dinner, as a symbol of a regime critic. But apparently Fang was particularly disliked by Deng Xiaoping, and Deng ordered that Fang physically be prevented from attending the dinner. Fang was blocked by Chinese police about a block from the hotel where the banquet was taking place. It was a strange situation, and the embassy and the White House drew much subsequent criticism for inviting Fang. Yet, as I stated above, he clearly was not one of the most punished regime critics. The only sanction against him was he was not allowed to attend physics conferences overseas. Within China, he was not being punished. If Deng disliked him so much, why weren't there more sanctions against him? And why did the regime wait until the last minute, until Fang was about a block from the banquet hotel, to deny him entrance? These are questions still to be answered.

Q: In the Soviet Union, in totalitarian regimes, you get this sometimes when relations are getting better, you have essentially the security forces on their own going out to screw things up. I mean this happens again and again. This is power within power. I was just wondering was this a possibility?

MOHR: That is a very good point. Well certainly it is a possibility. The situation certainly was a mess, because the Chinese deliberately embarrassed the president of the United States. More importantly, it revealed to us in the Embassy that “something was rotten in Denmark.” It indicated a kind of weakness in the leadership, perhaps controversy over the state of the U.S.-China relationship amongst elements in the Chinese government, to which you just alluded. We in the political section, with the support of the ambassador, decided to fan out and press all our contacts in Beijing about the sensitive topic of what was going on within the Chinese leadership. To beef up our analytical efforts, we also recruited a Chinese political expert from within the USG in Washington. Our deputy chief of mission, Peter Thomson, didn’t think the Fang incident was all that big a deal. Embassy political counselor Ray Burghardt, economic counselor Jim Larocco and I disagreed with Peter. We had many lively debates. We gleaned over the next few months from our Chinese contacts that something was indeed wrong, but frustratingly, no one would offer any specifics. Then, on April 15, 1989, former Chinese party chief Hu Yaobang died, the students started protesting, and events were put in train that eventually led to the shooting of the students on June 4.

Q: Had you learned any details of the problems within the political leadership?

MOHR: There was a split in the leadership. A few years before, Deng Xiaoping had purged Hu Yaobang as head of the Chinese Communist Party. Zhao Ziyang moved from premier to party chief, and Li Peng took over as premier. Hu had favored an opening up of Chinese society, and was particularly beloved in academic circles and by the students. Deng put a lid on Hu’s attempted reforms, and Li Peng kept the lid on. So Li was not popular. When Hu died in April, the students began expressing their aggravation that a good man had died, while in their opinion a bad man (Li Peng) still lived. They expressed their protest in rallies and in posters in the days following Hu’s death. Of course, this was incendiary stuff. The students all camped out in Tiananmen Square. They took over the running of downtown Beijing. Finally on May 20, the regime declared martial law in the area around Tiananmen Square. Troops were brought in. And sometime after midnight, June 4, they fired on the students, killing many. The shooting, courtesy of international television, whose personnel had been brought in to cover the visit of Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev to Beijing May 15-18, was broadcast around the world. The reason that the situation had gotten to the point of violence, again, was that the party was split on how to deal with the students. Party chief Zhao Ziyang, who was politically a moderate and in favor of many of the positions that Hu Yaobang had taken, wanted a dialogue with the students. Premier Li Peng wanted to deal with the students harshly, taking a typically old-line communist party position. Li had the support of Deng Xiaoping, so eventually Zhao was marginalized and the troops were given the order to use lethal force.

Q: It really seemed incredible.

MOHR: Yes, I was an eyewitness to the events of June 4 around Tiananmen Square, although from the vantage point of a hotel room located on the 15th floor of the Beijing Hotel. How did I get to the 15th floor of this hotel? Let me explain. Once martial law had been declared in May, it was very difficult to report from the square. Cell phones hadn't been invented yet, so you had to go to the nearest public phone, located in the lobby of the Beijing Hotel, and call in whatever you had to report from there. But there were only a limited number of public phones at the hotel, and all the reporters wanted access to them as well, so you had to wait your turn on line. Then I suggested to the ambassador that we rent out a room in the Beijing Hotel, so embassy officers could go to the room and use the phone there. They could also shower, or take a nap. The ambassador approved. The room, as I noted above, was on the 15th floor, and had a view of the main avenue, Chang'an Jie. It did not look onto the square, but from the room, you could see the entrance to the square.

On the day of June 3, I was one of the members from the Embassy assigned to report on events from Tiananmen Square. I arrived during the day, and was still there towards midnight. Sometime after 11 p.m., we could hear gunfire coming from the westerly direction off the square. A few minutes later, a group of students came to us and said that army troops were moving toward the square, and it would be best for our safety if we left. We agreed, and departed the square. As we were crossing Chang An Jie to get to the Beijing Hotel, an amazing thing happened. Now you have to picture the scene. Tanks were moving towards us from our left. Although they were still a few hundred yards away, we were trying to get across the street as soon as we could. Suddenly, a man on a bicycle swerved and cut us off. He stopped his bike, looked at us, and asked, "Change money?" He was actually a black-market money changer, and despite all that was going on around us, wanted to know if we were interested in changing dollars into Chinese currency. In retrospect, it was clearly a sign that the Chinese entrepreneurial spirit was alive and well. At the time, however, we just wanted to get across the street to the safety of the hotel, so we declined his offer and moved on.

Once we got to the room, as I mentioned above, you could not see what was going on in the square itself, but you could see the troops and tanks coming down the street, and then turning into the square. This was nighttime, so visibility was not optimum. But you could clearly hear the tanks moving and the gunshots. One particularly heartbreaking thing was that I could make out a long phalanx of bicycles, the main means of transport for the Chinese people at the time, moving in the opposite direction, that is to say away, fleeing away from the main tank column. This was of course quite logical. However, one thin line of bicycles was moving in the opposite direction, directly toward the advancing tank column. I assumed these were people who had simply snapped. They were so angry at army troops firing live ammunition at citizens that they just decided to drive their bikes into the tanks. It was suicidal, and all I could do was watch. Again, visibility was poor, but I could make out the gunshots and the sounds of bikes tumbling over. I was deeply moved and very upset, but there was nothing I could do except mumble silent prayers that the "bike column" turn itself around, and move away from the troops. After a certain amount of time I just couldn't watch anymore. There were other embassy people in the room, and I was exhausted, both emotionally and physically, so I went home.

Q: Well, you knew something had to happen.

MOHR: Actually most observers, including myself (but not Ambassador Lilly), predicted that the Chinese military would never use lethal force against unarmed students. Lilly had grown up in China. His father was an oil executive, so he had a better “gut” feel for Chinese actions. He predicted the June 4 massacre. The rest of us saw the events unfolding, but we rationalized the situation. I had one luncheon conversation with the Polish deputy chief of mission, whose last name was Goralczyk. He was regarded as the most astute observer of the Chinese political regime among the east Europeans. Goralczyk had studied at Beijing University in the 1950s, had married a Chinese woman, spoke Chinese fluently, and had spent about two decades in China.

He began the luncheon by lecturing me (in a friendly manner), explaining the difference in a communist state between the army and the police. The army, he said, fights foreigners. That is to say, the Chinese army is geared to fight the external threat, which at that time was the Soviet Union. It is the job of the police, Goralczyk maintained, to deal with dissidents and protests. Goralczyk concluded that I could inform Washington that the Chinese police would clear the students out of Tiananmen Square. I didn’t have to worry about the Chinese army, he said, because they would never fire on the students.

So I reported this conversation. I thought I had done a brilliant job, and I noted in my report that all the foreign contacts I had spoken to agreed with Goralczyk. I sided with Goralczyk, and predicted to Washington that the Chinese would not use guns against the students. Events were to prove both Goralczyk and I spectacularly wrong. As I said, the ambassador wrote his own cable, and his prediction turned out to be the correct one. I recall the conversation I had with the ambassador after he read my Goralczyk cable. He said, “What is this?” I replied, “It’s what Goralczyk said.” He went on, “Do you believe him?” I said, “I want to believe him.” He said, “That is the trouble with you people. You want to believe. But that’s not good enough. They (the Chinese army) are going to shoot them (the students).”

Q: So let’s talk about how this was developing. Were you and your officers in the political section of the embassy able to go out and talk to students?

MOHR: Oh yes. I was in charge of the duty list. We had at least two officers per shift, from throughout the embassy, on duty at Tiananmen Square. There were three eight-hour shifts per day, so we had 24-hour coverage. We instituted the duty roster at the start of martial law, in May. I personally pulled many shifts, and overall must have spoken to hundreds of students. Their spirit was very inspiring. When they found out I was from the Embassy, they often asked me to autograph their shirtsleeve. They all approved that the Embassy had given political asylum to Fang Lizhi.

Q: Was this sort of Tiananmen business as it was developing as amorphous as it seems, just happening as a conjunction of forces?

MOHR: Well, the students were fairly organized, but no one knew where events would lead, so those events did have an amorphous quality to them. One of the fundamental mistakes the students made was that they didn’t tap into popular support, especially from the workers. Chinese society has deep class division between educated and uneducated people. The students had a traditionally negative view of the workers, so they did not think it necessary to bring them on board. Had they done so, in my opinion, they might have succeeded in toppling Li Peng.

However these were college students, so it is not surprising that they were not terribly politically astute. Also, the main student leaders on the square began to take on characteristics of the Chinese leadership. They were always at meetings, and if you asked to see one, the reply would be, “The meeting place is secret.” (All students at the time lived and met on Tiananmen Square, so they couldn’t have been too far away.)

Q: Did you feel the students had a real goal?

MOHR: Well, they said they wanted more freedom, a more open society, and they wanted to put an end to political corruption. These were all noble goals, and the students were predictably idealistic and naïve. It was a mistake, in my opinion, to declare one of their goals as democracy, and buttress this with the erection of a statue which they named the “Goddess of Democracy.” While the statue was wildly popular with the western media, the statue and the advocacy for democracy only made the leaders more paranoid and certain that the United States was behind the movement. In any case, I believe that if Zhao Ziyang had won the policy debate, he could have diffused the student protest. But he lost the debate—and his position—and was placed under house arrest, where he remained until his death.

Q: When this movement started, how were you in the political section seeing it before it really gained momentum? Were you seeing it as this is another little episode that would be blown away?

MOHR: We knew something was wrong at the time of President Bush’s visit in February 1989, because they acted so awkwardly to prevent Fang Lizhi from attending the banquet. The trigger for the student movement was the death of Hu Yaobang on April 15, and you can’t foresee someone’s death. At the beginning of the student movement, there weren’t all that many students on the square. Then the regime, in its ham-handed wisdom, issued an editorial in People’s Daily April 26 denouncing the students for their protests and occupation of the square and questioning their motives, which only angered the students and added momentum to the movement. After the editorial, the movement grew rapidly, to the point that there were hundreds of thousands of students occupying the heart of downtown Beijing. Still the regime did nothing. We knew something was very wrong, but we had no idea what the divisions were within the leadership, or who was arguing with who.

Q: Was there an equivalent there of a criminal element who might have been taking advantage of the situation? Was there any evidence of that?

MOHR: No, it was a movement clearly led by college students.

Q: Well I remember watching it on TV. I also recall that at the time of the Gorbachev visit, seeing Gorbachev sort of being hustled into the back entrance. It was rather remarkable.

MOHR: Gorbachev’s visit was to be the crowning achievement in Deng Xiaoping’s career in terms of foreign policy, the foreign policy equivalent to his domestic policy achievement of reforming the economy and moving it forward. But the students ruined Gorbachev’s visit. They were out on the square protesting, the international media was broadcasting the images to the world, and it looked like the Chinese leadership had lost control of the downtown of their capitol city. In Chinese cultural terms, the students made Deng Xiaoping lose face, and he was furious. I believe that the student movement having made a mockery of the Gorbachev visit was one of the reasons that Deng decided to use lethal force “to teach the students a lesson.”

One ironic fallout from the student movement vis-à-vis the Gorbachev visit was that the USG “worry quotient” was greatly ratcheted down. From the time of the announcement of the visit, the U.S. government’s public stance was that no one was worried. In fact, they were extremely worried. We at the embassy were told to devote all reporting resources exclusively to the visit. I was put in charge of coordinating these efforts. I was told that Gorbachev’s visit was to be the biggest event for the embassy that year. Clearly, Washington was concerned that the strategic winds were about to shift and that the rapprochement between the Soviet Union and China would mean some kind of net strategic loss for the United States. In the event, the death of Hu Yaobang and the rise of the student movement totally marginalized Gorbachev’s visit. As one example, I recall that the front page of the People’s Daily on the day of Gorbachev’s visit devoted only a tiny article in the bottom right hand corner of page one to it. All other space on page one of the paper was covered by pictures and stories of the students massing on Tiananmen Square.

The Tiananmen Incident occurred on Saturday-Sunday, June 3-4. On Tuesday, amidst the chaos, I received a call from the Chinese foreign ministry, informing me that if I was still interested, I could be briefed on Gorbachev’s visit the following Saturday. What would have been the most important report of my tour in Beijing now would be only a side show. I called Washington to see if they were interested in my going to receive the read-out. I was told to go and write up the report, but the person on the other end of the line said: “Of course, you realize no one is going to read it.”

Q: Well I can imagine, you couldn’t not do it.

MOHR: So true.

Q: What about during the time Gorbachev was there, could you attend?

MOHR: No, it was a bilateral visit. We were not invited.

Q: There was no great meeting with the diplomatic corps in the Great Hall of China, with toasts and all of this?

MOHR: Not that I recall.

Q: Probably at the Chinese restaurant around the corner.

MOHR: Well, the banquet was in the Great Hall of the People, which is right in Tiananmen Square. To get there, you had to go through all the students. It was a mess. Kids were running around, jumping, screaming and protesting. As I said, it was a big loss of face for the leadership, and incredible when you think all of this was taking place under the governance of one of the most tightly controlled communist parties in the world. But as I said, the leadership was deeply divided as to how to handle the situation, so for many weeks there was paralysis, and the students did their thing.

Q: Were you, and when I say you I am talking about the political section and all, picking up anything, of course it would be the Soviet embassy at the time about this?

MOHR: There were all sorts of rumors in April and May that the visit was going to be postponed. We would go to the Soviets and they would say that the visit was going to take place. I mean that was all we would get out of them.

Q: Returning to the night of June 4, what I have heard is that first they tried to use troops of the Beijing garrison, and that they weren't reliable and they had to basically go out and get peasants or something.

MOHR: Unreliable is putting it mildly. The military leaders of the Beijing Military Region refused to carry out the orders to fire on the public. It took Deng Xiaoping about six weeks to find troops from other regions who were willing to carry out the order to shoot the students.

Q: Well let's talk about when you first arrived in Beijing in the summer of 1988. Were you getting any people talking about the Great Leap Forward or the Cultural Revolution, basically all these horrible things that happened to just about everybody.

MOHR: Chinese officials would never talk about such things, but shopkeepers and taxi cab drivers, ordinary people would. You realized almost every Chinese person had a "story," and almost all of them were of sadness and suffering. One thing I learned in the weeks after I arrived was that although Mao had been extremely popular with undergraduates and leftists in the U.S., almost no Chinese had a good word to say about his rule from 1949 to 1976. Actually, the stories people told me were so sad that it got to the point where I just got exhausted hearing about them. And then Tiananmen happened.

Q: Well at the time after the shooting and all, were you looking to see what was happening in the rest of China, in Shanghai for example?

MOHR: Of course. We have consulates in Shanghai, Guangzhou, Shenyang and Chengdu, and the reporting from those posts was excellent. There were student movements in all the major cities. Shanghai's was the largest outside of Beijing, but no one was shot. They never used lethal force. They somehow successfully got the students dispersed without any loss of life. Ziang Zemin was the leader in Shanghai. I believe after it was all over, the reason why he was appointed to be head of the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) was because of the way he successfully handled the student movement in Shanghai. So in the provinces there were a lot of copycat movements to mimic what was going on in Beijing, but they never got totally out of hand. It seemed that the provincial leadership, especially in Shanghai, did a much better job of handling the student protests so they didn't escalate into violence. Nonetheless, my theory is that lethal force was never necessary in Beijing either, but Deng had suffered so much during the Cultural Revolution, which was powered by students, and he was so angry with the students over the fiasco of the Gorbachev visit, that he wanted to use lethal force so that the students, and anyone else in Chinese society so inclined, would never ever again be tempted to protest against the regime like that.

Q: We are talking about students they were essentially the Red Guard weren't they?

MOHR: During the Cultural Revolution they were the Red Guards. During the Tiananmen Incident, they were just students. They organized themselves into a form of government around Tiananmen Square, but they had no special name. They were just college-aged kids.

Q: The Red Guards were young kids too, but they had proved to be sort of under the tutelage of Mao to be as nasty as you can imagine.

MOHR: Exactly, and the students of 1989 reminded Deng of all of those unpleasant experiences of the Cultural Revolution. After all, one of his brothers was killed, and his son was thrown off a building and crippled for life. This was all at the hands of the Red Guards, of students. So I believe Deng wanted to use lethal force, even though it was not necessary. The regime of course insisted that it was necessary. However, I was a witness to the events. At the height of the student movement, sometime in May, there were hundreds of thousands of students at Tiananmen. They filled the entire square. But by the beginning of June, enthusiasm had waned, and I estimated the number of students at Tiananmen Square on Saturday morning, June 3, at no more than five thousand.

Then something curious happened. Loudspeakers around the city began telling people not to gather around the square that evening. All day long, the loudspeakers blared: "People, do not come to Tiananmen Square this evening." So naturally, thousands of people came to Tiananmen Square that evening, and once again the square was filled with people. But these were just observers, not student squatters. However, the regime could now claim that once again the square was filled, and that no regime could let the heart of its capital be controlled by an unruly mob. They insisted afterward that because of the great number of people who had taken over the square, they were compelled to use lethal force to regain control. But this claim was bogus. The real number of people by the night of June 3 occupying the square was far closer to just a few thousand. Twice as many police, with clubs, could have cleared the square. But the regime wanted to clear the square with the army, using rifles, and live ammunition.

Q: OK, the shooting takes place, what happens then? Did everything shut down as far as we were concerned?

MOHR: Yes it did. For a day or two afterwards, there was not even any place open to buy food. One of the secretaries had a huge jar of peanut butter. That's what we ate for two days, until the owners of the food stores and restaurants came back later in the week. Our apartments also didn't have water, so the embassy rented out a hotel room at the Jianguo Hotel, within walking distance from the Embassy. There was a sign-up sheet at the embassy for the hotel room, in order to go there and shower or bathe.

Q: What about after Tiananmen? Was the Chinese government almost closed off to the embassy?

MOHR: It was almost totally closed off. Since the PRC official line was that China didn't do anything wrong, and that all sanctions against China, including those from other foreign governments, were originated and orchestrated by the U.S., we were not very popular with the Chinese government. So every Chinese government agency was closed off to us. This lasted several months. The only contact we had was a once-a-week meeting at the foreign ministry. The ambassador was called in to be lectured to on how bad we were, and why the sanctions needed to end. (U.S. sanctions, imposed by President Bush, included an end to all military cooperation and a ban on high-level Chinese visits to the U.S.) I was the note-taker at the weekly meetings between the ambassador and the senior Chinese foreign ministry official, Liu Huaqiu. Otherwise, there was nothing to do. Many of us worked out in the newly opened health clubs, and the Chinese language officers studied Chinese. It was most strange. We were an embassy, but the host government would not talk to us.

Q: Could you get out into the countryside or travel?

MOHR: To go anywhere outside of Beijing, even in normal times, required permission from the Chinese government. In the months after Tiananmen, we couldn't go anywhere.

Q: The same thing was happening to our consular officers?

MOHR: Yes, in terms of travel. Another thing that really bothered the Chinese was that we gave political asylum to astrophysicist and dissident Fang Lizhi. He lived on the ambassador's compound. They registered their dislike about that. But with the man-in-the-street, we were extremely popular. People would walk up to me on the street and ask if Fang was at the embassy. When I would reply that he was, they would give me the thumbs up sign.

Q: How about other embassies?

MOHR: That is a good question. I think we were the only ones who got the cold shoulder. I remember the Japanese having a parliamentary visit about a month or two later. The visiting delegation had a meeting with Chinese Premier Li Peng, and this is where Li gave a most interesting explanation of the Tiananmen Incident. Li said that China had 40 years of uninterrupted peace since the communists took over in 1949, so they had no water cannon or rubber bullets to deal in a non-lethal way with massive crowd control/unrest. (This was of course a huge lie: millions died during the see Great Leap Forward, and the Cultural Revolution saw over a decade of violence and upheaval.) Li continued his remarks to the Japanese, assuring them that China was acquiring water cannon and rubber bullets, so next time would be different. I interpreted Li's remarks as the closest we would ever get to the Chinese government admitting they had made a mistake, but of course that was not enough for President Bush, who was demanding the Chinese apologize publicly before we would lift sanctions. I think the French may have gotten the cold treatment as well, because the French were particularly upset. Tiananmen occurred while they were celebrating the 200th anniversary of the French Revolution, and the French gave political asylum to many of the student leaders.

Another noteworthy point was in those days, China really had little knowledge of how the U.S. worked. Now with all the thousands of returning students from the U.S., they have a lot more sophisticated view of us. But in those days, many of the leaders, and many within the Chinese government, really believed that somehow the U.S. was behind the student movement. And we could not convince them otherwise.

Q: All right, but were you trying to analyze things, like what was going on in the politburo? When one looks at 1979 in the Kremlin and saw their actions in invading Afghanistan, was there a feeling that this was something similar, a last stand of the old guard?

MOHR: Well, it certainly was an overreaction on the part of Deng Xiaoping, and we didn't know whether or not the leadership would be able to maintain its rule, because the people were certainly outraged. But the only thing we could do was observe and see how things would play out. What we didn't know at the time was that the moderates had completely lost out, and the hardliners were in firm control. Deng was an aged leader, but there were many hardliners like Li Peng, who were only in their 50s or 60s.

Q: Was there certain feelings of being let down among the China hands? I felt this and I was long out of it after five years in Yugoslavia. You know the Serbs are the sons of bitches that let me down by how awful they were, and I will never feel the same. I was wondering how this affected you.

MOHR: Well, the Chinese people didn't let me down. The Chinese government was less than ideal, and it was the government which had demonstrated the lengths it was willing to go in order to retain power. It was a communist government. Mao had put the people through decades of suffering, so no one should have been too surprised. It's just that we didn't have relations with China during Mao's bouts of political madness in the 1950s and 1960s, so no American was on the scene to witness and record the events at that time. Furthermore, as I said, no one believed China's rulers would actually shoot the students. This was a function of our naiveté, our lack of understanding of Deng and the other leaders. In hindsight it was clear, given the amount of suffering Deng had endured during the Cultural Revolution and the weeks of humiliation the leadership suffered while the students had control of downtown Beijing, especially during the Gorbachev visit, that the leadership might feel it necessary to shoot so that no one in the society would ever take to the streets again to oppose the regime.

Q: Did you get any feedback from your people in the consular section about Chinese students in the United States? Were they ordered back, or what was happening there?

MOHR: Yes, in general the Chinese were smart enough to leave students in the U.S. alone, and when they returned, they weren't hassled. At least, we never heard any stories from the students in the U.S. or those returning to China that they were being given a hard time.

Q: Well when you left there were things in still sort of a stand down?

MOHR: The Chinese government started reengaging with us in the fall of 1989, and the man responsible was Richard Nixon. He came out for a visit. I believe it was in November. The day before he was to visit the embassy, he told Li Peng that he was going to visit the embassy, which he understood was surrounded by armed militia. He wanted the Chinese to withdraw the militia immediately. Now these militia were put there after Tiananmen, supposedly for our safety, but they were really there to hassle us. They were young and untrained. Often they would point their rifles at us. Presumably, the rifles weren't loaded, but it was still creepy. Ambassador Lilly asked the White House to protest, but for whatever reason, no one did. However Nixon did, and since Nixon had met with Mao in 1972 and had normalized relations, he had tremendous status. So Li Peng had to grant his request. The militia was removed, and shortly after Nixon returned home, the Chinese started reengaging with us. By the time I left, I think it was May 1990, relations had improved somewhat. But as they say, when things hit rock bottom, they have no place to go but up.

Q: Well there was quite a controversial visit probably early on, was it Scowcroft?

MOHR: Ah, yes, the Scowcroft visit. He was head of the NSC, and Bush sent him to China, I think it was around the time of their national day, in October 1989, to try and see if relations could resume. Scowcroft made some routine toast to the health of the leadership, but these were the people who still had the blood of the students on their hands. We in the embassy were livid about Scowcroft, but there was nothing we could do. Speaking of people who made us sick, there was always Alexander Haig. What he did was far worse than what Scowcroft did. He attended Chinese national day celebrations on October 1. The celebrations were at Tiananmen Square, and that year, they celebrated the "victory" of the forces of law and order over the students. And Haig sat there, watched the "celebrations," and saluted the leadership. It made us all at the embassy very hostile to Haig. This of course was the same person who, seven years before, thought it would be an excellent idea to negotiate with the Chinese to end U.S. arms sales to Taiwan. I might add that shortly after Haig left office in 1982, he wanted to broker an arms sale of the most sophisticated U.S. helicopters to Taiwan. (It was refused.) So you can see that Haig was never one of my favorite people.

Q: Oh yes, he is still alive.

MOHR: Well I am sure his company is successful, and has many financially rewarding ties to China. (Note: Haig passed away on February 20, 2010.)

Q: Well that is in general what I am talking about; there has always been this fascination almost adoration of China in America and in Europe.

MOHR: That is why I went into Chinese studies. I was fascinated by China. I really like the Chinese people, although even now, they have a really terrible form of government.

Q: Did you find this sort of screwed up things sort of from our policy view, I mean the fact that so many cabinet members wanted to come and go to the Great Wall and so on?

MOHR: Yes, I am glad I went into Chinese studies, but I try to remain objective. These visitors, senior U.S. officials and otherwise, just seemed spellbound by the Chinese. Now, I think there is a lot we can learn from China, especially in the way they organize their society and their social values; for example, how they react and cope with discomfort, suffering, personal setbacks, and their tight family structure. It is true that this traditional kind of society is breaking down as the Chinese become more industrialized and westernized. But I believe that the way Chinese society is organized is worthy of our respect. On the other hand, their governing system is just ridiculous. It is a communist dictatorship. It lacks popular backing, the people have no interest at all in communist ideology, and if the regime didn't produce great economic gains year after year, they would be in political trouble.

Q: Well one of the things that interests me is the question, does the writ of Beijing go out into the provinces or are there dukedoms out there or what?

MOHR: In the early part of the 20th century, there were warlords or dukedoms, so to speak. But not now. The Chinese Communist Party (CCP) did a decade-long study after Tiananmen as to why the Soviet Union collapsed in 1989. One of their conclusions was that the Soviets let the provincial party structure atrophy, so the CCP has spent a tremendous amount of time, energy and money to bolster provincial and lower levels of the party, including having them study things like management training. There is a wonderful book by Professor David Shambaugh of George Washington University, China's Communist Party: Atrophy and Adaptation, which documents all this.

Q: Well did you find that communist ideology still permeated the system, because I have talked to people who served in Poland who said by the time martial law was declared there may have been three or perhaps four communists in the whole country. Was that going on?

MOHR: After the Tiananmen Incident, in a country of one billion people, there were perhaps three or four who still believed in communism. Actually, no one believes in communist ideology any more. But party leaders certainly believe in the CCP as the only organization capable of governing a country the size of Europe. From an ideological point of view, all Mao's campaigns turned people off, and the Tiananmen Incident sealed it. People believe in the opportunity to get rich, and the party has been successful to date in delivering an improvement in the people's economic well-being, year after year. So long as the party accomplishes this goal, the people will allow themselves to be governed by the party. Communist ideology plays no role in this. Ideology is gone.

Q: Well what about while you were there in 1988?

MOHR: Ideology was pretty much gone by 1988 as well, but as I noted, the Tiananmen Incident really completed the people's dislike of the Chinese Communist Party and its ideology.

Q: Do Chinese universities still teach courses in Marxist ideology?

MOHR: I don't really know. The party certainly gives courses in Chinese-style Marxism. Current party chief (and president) Hu Jintao was head of the party school for 10 years, in the 1990s, so courses in Marxist thinking are still being given. But basically, no one really believes in them. I think Hu believes Marxist thinking is useful, but he is one of the few.

Q: Marxism has always been a favorite academic exercise and it is taught in the States at our universities.

MOHR: The appeal in China is long gone. In the early 1990s, Deng Xiaoping said it is glorious to be rich. That is now the people's anthem. It is sort of like 19th century U.S. frontier capitalism.

Q: OK, well you left in May 1990. Where did you go?

MOHR: I went back to be deputy director of the China desk. I felt that in the aftermath of Tiananmen, the China desk just didn't support the people in the field to the degree I felt they should. For example, when people inquired about their personnel assignments, often there was no response from Washington for days or weeks. So, I wanted to be in the Department and support the troops in the field, so to speak. Ambassador Lilly told me to take the job as deputy director of the Korea desk. He said there were sensitive issues going on with North Korea's nuclear program, and if I took the job on the Korea desk, chances were I would be promoted. He said all I could do on the China desk was keep the relationship from collapsing, and unfortunately, promotions are usually geared to something positive happening, not from preventing something from getting worse. Lilly proved to be correct. In the two years following, while I was on the China desk, no one there got promoted, but people on the Korea desk did. However, I was comfortable with my decision. I made sure that any inquiry from the embassy was answered within 24 hours, even if it was only an interim reply stating the reasons why a definite reply could not be made.

Q: So we will pick this up next time in 1990 when you are on the China Desk.

MOHR: Yes, the chaos of the China desk.

Q: All right today is January 4, 2010.

MOHR: That is right. Tomorrow is my birthday and I will be 65 and eligible for Social Security. I am very happy.

Q: Well Mark, happy social security. I have been on it. I am 81 now, so I have been hanging on to the government for many years. Well where are we now?

MOHR: It is 1990, and I am returning home from China.

Q: Ok, but let's talk a little more about the year after Tiananmen, from 1989-1990. Let me ask something. I know how important the foreign service national staff is in so many countries. Frankly this is where your continuity comes from. I know in Yugoslavia these were people who had been around and could say we have done that before and they have the connections.

MOHR: I agree. The foreign service nationals (FSNs) provide the continuity.

Q: How important let's say prior to Tiananmen were they?

MOHR: Well unfortunately China, being a communist country and somewhat of an adversary, was different. No Chinese FSNs were allowed in the political section. The FSNs in the embassy worked only in the non-classified sections, helping out in consular and administrative work. The only FSN I do remember was in the administrative section, doing travel. We later found out that he was a senior official in the ministry of state security, which wasn't a surprise. Because of his position, he could get tickets on any plane flights, or if the planes were full, he could bump Chinese people and get our people seats. Needless to say, this was invaluable during times of Congressional visits.

Q: Was there any feeling that an awful lot of our work is not secretive, and what you want to do is say how do you think this will play or something like that? Was there any thought of let's get somebody whether they are high ranking or not so we can use them to play the system?

MOHR: Not in political or economic work. Our phones were bugged, our phones at home were also bugged. The technology was fairly primitive at the time. Often, when you picked up your phone, you would hear a loud click as their tape recorder went on. China was just too closed a society at that time. The best source of information, outside of our Chinese contacts, when they were talking to us, was U.S. journalists. They often spoke Chinese, and had excellent contacts among the Chinese students at the various universities, including foreign students at the Chinese universities. I remember particularly a group of Hungarian students were particularly helpful, as were a few American students.

Q: What about your own internal political section?

MOHR: My job was deputy director of the political section, and also chief of the external section. So I was responsible for reporting on China's foreign policy. Because of the Gorbachev visit, I was very busy devoting all my time to that. China's internal political scene had been quiet for several years, so internal reporting was not a priority, and those doing it really didn't have good contacts, and almost none among the Chinese academic community.

Q: How about the other embassies, the British?

MOHR: The British, Japanese, and others were all taken by surprise by Tiananmen. As we said, the ones with the best contacts on the scene were the American journalists, particularly Dan Southerland of the Washington Post, David Schweisberg of UPI, and Mike Chinoy of CNN. It also didn't hurt that David and Mike were personal friends of mine. I am mentioned several times in Mike Chinoy's book, China Live.

Q: Did you all sort of get together pretty often and see what the hell was going on, or were things going in a way rather calmly and so there wasn't much concern over what was going on?

MOHR: Before Tiananmen, things usually proceeded rather calmly. But the Fang Lizhi incident during Bush's visit of February 1989 stirred things up, and after Hu Yaobang died in April, all hell broke loose. We began getting together to talk on a daily basis. Then martial law was declared, and Gorbachev came, and it got even more hectic.

Q: After it was over did it have any lasting effect?

MOHR: Gorbachev's visit?

Q: Yes.

MOHR: No, nobody cared in China at the time. The regime was too busy trying to maintain stability. As I mentioned, it probably added to Deng Xiaoping's motivation to use lethal force against the students. In subsequent years, though, the Chinese and the Russians seem to have put most of their differences behind them, so perhaps Gorbachev's visit was indeed significant.

Q: You previously mentioned Congressman Steven Solarz, whom I have interviewed, by the way. China has always been a place that seems to attract congressmen; China seems to appeal to Americans. It is a drawing card; the celestial kingdom and all that.

MOHR: So true.

Q: How did you find these Congressional trips to China? Were they fairly brief?

MOHR: In the year before Tiananmen, they were fairly frequent. I believe they had value. Contact between members of Congress and the Chinese government are important.

Q: And did they seem to come back sort of impressed by the beauty? The Chinese can put on a good show. Did you feel these visits were in a way almost counterproductive?

MOHR: No, not really. The Chinese know how to put on a good show, and make a favorable impression. One thing about the conservatives used to irritate me. They would speak critically of China to us, for example criticizing the administration for not putting enough pressure on the Chinese to have a more even playing field with regard to bilateral trade (we always had a big trade deficit with China), but then when they were with the Chinese, all they would say is, "Thank you for this delicious tea." In other words, they were reluctant to criticize the Chinese to their faces. Solarz was a bit different in that he was like a knowledge sponge. He was very serious, and was relentless about asking questions. He clearly learned something from his visits.

Q: He was a unique case.

MOHR: Almost too much so. I recall one luncheon with a Chinese official on Tibet. Solarz asked so many rapid-fire questions that the official didn't have time to eat. His aides had to feed him.

Q: Yes, I have talked to people about what Solarz did in Africa. He would go and he would have a huge schedule.

MOHR: Morning, noon, and evening. He would go until he was exhausted.

Q: Returning to the aftermath of Tiananmen, were Chinese students still going to the States?

MOHR: I didn't work in the visa section, but I assume the Chinese government still allowed students to go to the U.S. It made sense; if there were any dissidents, better they should go abroad, where they didn't have any contact with the Chinese people. Also, we had no reports of any returning students being hassled. This is one thing you've got to give the Chinese credit for. In this area, they were being intelligent.

Q: Did you get anything about the Chinese students maybe going to America and getting infected by Americanisms and coming back and having a difficult time?

MOHR: No, nothing of the sort. The Chinese students may have been "infected" by a dose of democracy while in the U.S., but they also had seen what happened to their fellow students during Tiananmen. It had the desired chilling effect.

Q: You had mentioned in the months following Tiananmen the Embassy was surrounded by rifle-bearing militia. How did that affect the morale of embassy wives?

MOHR: They had a difficult time in the immediate days following Tiananmen, and were evacuated. So in subsequent months, they weren't there. They were evacuated. When things calmed down, the families returned.

Q: I may have asked this question before, but I will ask it again. Were we looking for control strings within the Chinese apparatus, for autonomous activities in the provinces, or was everything pretty much in Beijing?

MOHR: I was just totally focused on the central political forces in Beijing. Outside of Beijing, I think the worst protests were in Shanghai, but they were managed without resorting to lethal force. So it didn't seem like there were any serious problems throughout the country. China is almost the size of Europe, so it is a pretty big place. The real problems were in the upper echelons of leadership of the communist party, not in the regional apparatus.

Q: There is similar public unrest and shootings in Iran right now. One of the things that is always significant is that when a regime has to shoot its own people in a crowd, that often is the indicator that things are going down. In a way Iran looks like the fundamentalist regime might be in its final days. China seems to be one of the few countries that has been able to get away with this.

MOHR: Again, I would refer you to Shambaugh's work on this subject. It describes how after Tiananmen the CCP studied, for over 10 years, every socialist and other kind of long-standing political party, including the Soviet Union and Singapore, and analyzed all the good points and bad points. Then it took a look at what it felt were the weaknesses within its own system, and drew up a plan to right the wrongs. It seems to have worked. Many regime critics outside of China predicted the demise of the CCP after Tiananmen. But they're still there.

Q: Well when you talk about that part, are you talking about in a way about something not at all communist?

MOHR: They are a communist party in terms of their organization and rigid control of the political system, but nobody, including probably most of the leaders, believes in the ideology. However, they all believe that the CCP is the only institution that can govern China. An interesting thing to note is that there are over 70 million people in the Chinese Communist Party. So the CCP is bigger than most countries.

Q: But were you seeing even before Tiananmen a diminution of sort of the ideological explanation of things.

MOHR: I think by the time Mao died in 1976 there was great relief, and a diminution of ideological fervor. Mao and his constant political movements gave ideological fervor a bad name. When Deng started to institute his pragmatic economic reforms a few years later, the Chinese people breathed a collective sigh of relief.

Q: Well then let's pick up this discussion from the time you left China. When exactly did you depart?

MOHR: In May 1990.

HORTENSE F. FIEKOWSKY
Representative for the Department of Labor
Tiananmen Square (1989)

Hortense F. Fiekowsky worked for the Department of Labor for twenty years, and had the opportunity to represent the Department of Labor on its trade negotiations. Her career in international trade began in 1969, and she was mainly stationed in Washington DC. She was able to travel to Asia on several occasions, and happened to be in China during the Tiananmen Square incident in June of 1989 where hundreds of peaceful protesters were killed. While Ms. Fiekowsky was able to get out of the city before she was in any danger, she remembers the event vividly and describes the events below. Ms. Fiekowsky was interviewed by Daniel F. Whitman in 2010.

Q: In terms of the things that happened, the people you knew, your own work, does anything stick out?

FIEKOWSKY: Tiananmen Square was the most exciting thing because we did not know what was going to happen.

Q: Why were you there?

FIEKOWSKY: We were there because we were going to negotiate a free-trade agreement with China, finally, because China was dying to get into it, in 1989.

Q: So it was a coincidence that you were there in June of 1989, and suddenly this huge event happened?

FIEKOWSKY: Usually I was in Japan, but it was very exciting that we finally got China to negotiate.

Q: Now you said that this is the most interesting thing that you observed?

FIEKOWSKY: So we finally got to negotiate with China, which was exciting because it is a big market to let in U.S. goods instead of just shipping things to us. Trade imbalance was a big problem. So we would start negotiating, and go across the street from our embassy, and we would come back and the ambassador said "We may have to leave. The soldiers are gathering outside of the city."

Q: So the foreign ministry was at Tiananmen Square? Were you physically by the square?

FIEKOWSKY: Yes, right by the square. At this time, Beijing was a small city. People mostly only had bicycles, they did not have cars. So that meant that the railroad station was very important; if you didn't have cars, the railroad station was the hub of the city. So I was in a hotel across from the railroad station, and we would go over to their Ministry of Foreign Affairs and we would have a list of issues. Meanwhile, the students were coming into the city on the train. It was a quiet little city, and then all of a sudden, these students were coming in. They would march to the square.

Q: So this was before Facebook, how would they know to come at that time?

FIEKOWSKY: It was just a network. You knew somebody that knew what you wanted to know. So somebody had a phone and would relay the information. If you were interested in politics, and you knew this was an issue, like if you knew you were a devout communist or whatever, they would tell you what to do. So because my hotel was right across from the railroad station, I could see all of these students coming in.

Q: We remember Tiananmen Square as a massacre, but what was it that the students came to do?

FIEKOWSKY: They came to get more rights for freedom for students.

Q: Why at that time?

FIEKOWSKY: I guess they felt that now China was talking to the U.S. So it had to do with our presence. Maybe they felt that now there was a chance they could get more intellectual freedom, instead of being taught the party line in their schools. It was very restricted. But the colleges weren't good, which is why they would send their diplomats abroad to learn the U.S. way.

Q: So your delegation being there, was a very high-profile thing?

FIEKOWSKY: It was a very high-profile thing. In fact, most countries had left because they knew there was some trouble coming. They did not want to be in the trouble. So we were the only negotiations. The ambassador told us that mostly all the other countries had left. We are the negotiators.

Q: What is the time frame here? A few days? A few hours?

FIEKOWSKY: A few days.

Q: So the event, was it triggered by your arrival?

FIEKOWSKY: It had a lot to do with it because then they felt that there was a chance that they would get something. The students did hand-lettered posters in Chinese and put them on the wall, which they were not allowed to do. You are not allowed to put posters up in China because that might cause trouble with the government. But at the time of Tiananmen, there was a certain breakdown of civil order; the police were unable to control it.

Q: So this is a situation that the Chinese government was not prepared for?

FIEKOWSKY: No. They were worried when the students started being restless, then they got nervous. They were afraid that there would be a revolt of the students, and there was. They were nervous about it at that time. They wanted to negotiate with us and get this agreement.

Q: So the government had a lot to deal with that week. They wanted to deal with you, but they wanted to somehow control the students.

FIEKOWSKY: The students were polite and were not like U.S. students. They were polite and orderly; they were quiet, disciplined and civilized about their revolt. I mean, they couldn't be too disorderly, they did not want to be conspicuous or if it didn't work, they could be taken to jail.

Q: So somehow, at one point, something tipped and the control was lost. By the way, what happened to your negotiations at that point? Were they halted or did you get to finish them?

FIEKOWSKY: We never finished them because at that time at Tiananmen, we thought we had an outline for a trade agreement, and we were very happy about it. After Tiananmen the ambassador said "It's all off, we can't agree to this under these conditions." He told the Chinese that we cannot negotiate until this was solved. We also had spies there, and they told us that the soldiers were gathering outside of Beijing, the Chinese soldiers were ready for war. The Chinese are very casual about life in general. I had a Chinese colleague in Commerce and I said "How can you stand it when they kill so many people?" and his reply was "There are so many of us."

Q: So this was in June of 1989 and everything happened within a few days and it didn't take long. The government must have been nervous.

FIEKOWSKY: Yes they were nervous, but they wanted to have the negotiation. So they had a team with them to negotiate, though they weren't the same team as the soldiers.

Q: Did you have a certain camaraderie with the team you were negotiating with?

FIEKOWSKY: Yeah. But they were all careful. They knew they would all be spied upon. I could get away things in the U.S. but if they did it they were “dead meat.”

Q: So they were friendly but cautious?

FIEKOWSKY: Yes. We would talk about our families and where we went to college, but we were not going to discuss politics.

Q: So at one session or something you got a message that said, “Stop the talks.” Is that right?

FIEKOWSKY: It was not at the session. We would speak at night to the U.S. and ambassador due to the time difference. I was very careful in talking with Labor because you never know who is listening. We could talk to our own team and local U.S. officials.

Q: So then this big crisis came. Did you actually see what was happening?

FIEKOWSKY: We could see it happening because we were there. The soldiers came. The ambassador said “The soldiers are outside the town, you should leave now.” This friend of mine from State and I said, “Well we aren’t leaving.” So then we were on our own.

Q: Did others in the delegation leave?

FIEKOWSKY: Most of them left. So it was just the two of us.

Q: So you stayed because of curiosity?

FIEKOWSKY: Yes. I wanted to see what was happening.

Q: What did you see?

FIEKOWSKY: Well, I saw the gathering in the square. They would put up posters that they could not put up before, even in the department stores, and all of a sudden there were posters. I could not read them, but you could still tell that they were not official. They were student posters defying the regime. They weren’t really posters; they were like hand-written signs. We then went to the square at night to see what was happening, and we saw the students gathering. It was just a few blocks to walk down to Tiananmen Square, and we saw that they had a camp and a little statue of liberty. It was very impressive. There were a lot of students there, and they were very orderly. They weren’t like American students that would be rowdy and drunk and drugs or whatever. They were serious; I think they realized they had a lot on the line: life or death.

Q: So they knew there was a risk of being hurt or killed?

FIEKOWSKY: Not only that but they knew their whole family could suffer. If they knew the name of the student, they could go to the family and say “Your son is a spy” or whatever they want to call him.

Q: So things got very bad very quickly?

FIEKOWSKY: Yes, very quickly until they gathered in the square. They would then sing the Internationale which was interesting. I knew that because I was a former socialist/communist. I like that song; it’s a good song. So the students were basically just asking for freedom in general. The Internationale is a song of communists, and they knew that song. It was probably a Chinese international song.

Q: So they did not think of the more repressive aspects of communism, I guess, when they sang that song.

FIEKOWSKY: No. In fact we did not even know about it ourselves; it was all coming out more about the repression. More and more was coming out. But to them, Internationale was a song of freedom. I used to feel that way when I was a young socialist. I loved that song. It is a very emotional song. I mean, I believe in freedom and I believe if you are repressed that you should rise.

Q: The emotions in songs, is emotion .It’s not ideology it is a conveyer of feelings. So you went in the evening and the students were there, and they were orderly, and they were singing the Internationale.

FIEKOWSKY: Yeah. They also had the statue of liberty and everyone was so happy because everyone thought that China was going to be free. It was so exciting to be there when this was happening. If you didn’t know what was happening, I could go to my hotel room and there would be reporters and I could watch T.V and the reporters would send the stuff back. So I found out a lot on T.V from CNN. It is ironic because I was there but I could not find out a lot of things directly. CNN is very good internationally and it still is.

Q: So you saw some of the events eye-witness and some of it you saw on T.V?

FIEKOWSKY: Yes and we saw reporters in the hotel.

Q: So the reporters must have been in reporter-heaven because there was this big event and a lot of action. So when did things go wrong?

FIEKOWSKY: So this was going on. The ambassador said we should leave, and he left, so just this woman and I were there. There was finally a point at which we could not do anything. We could just see the students there.

Q: So there were two of you. You were there by yourselves.

FIEKOWSKY: Yeah and we had a good time. We could go around the Chinese palace and there were these little houses, these little huts, where people were living and there was no plumbing or electricity. Nothing has changed for the Chinese at this time. It was just like it always had been. So we could get the feeling of what it was like to live there in these cute little houses, but with no plumbing and electricity.

Q: So you were in the hotel throughout I guess.

FIEKOWSKY: I stayed in the hotel, but we were out observing.

Q: So you were never hassled by one side or the other?

FIEKOWSKY: No. But then this woman left, but I was still there. Because she was a State Department person.

Q: So you were the last person?

FIEKOWSKY: I don't know, one of the last. I did not really check on who was still there. But at that time our negotiation had fallen apart, the Embassy was not open for business. There must have been somebody there; they wouldn't leave it alone with all the materials. So I just got to see how people were, and how happy they were. I then had to leave at some point. I felt that I should go. At this time some of the big important Chinese people were leaving too. They had a lot of their possessions that they were taking with them because they did not know what would happen.

Q: Were people thinking Tehran 1979? A total change? Was there some echo of students taking over the embassy in Tehran, 1979?

FIEKOWSKY: It wasn't the students. It was just the feeling that everybody, if they had the whiff of freedom; the Chinese are orderly people. They were brought up to be orderly. If they could get free, they would try to use their freedom. They weren't against the Americans. They liked Americans because we were friendly to everybody and the ones that wanted to get away, wanted to learn English. For instance, I would go to a park, and a student would say "I am studying English, will you speak English with me?" They had ideals of liberty. They associated those ideals with America, because we were the main country that was negotiating. A lot of countries would not negotiate, but we did up to a point.

Q: When your negotiations broke down, did you have mixed feelings?

FIEKOWSKY: Yeah, because we thought we had the agreement. You thought you had it in your hand. This was a good agreement, and we thought we would bring it back and get it approved. Then the revolt and the ambassador from the U.S. said it was all off. This isn't the same circumstances that we negotiated for.

Q: Were you also swept up in the wish for freedom for the Chinese people?

FIEKOWSKY: I was hopeful that the Chinese would get their freedom.

Q: Did they get any freedom at all?

FIEKOWSKY: When they were in the square... the department stores were all still the same. But the students thought they would have freedom, but they were also worried.

Q: We know that bad things happened. Any idea of how many people were killed? There had been a lot of discussion.

FIEKOWSKY: No. When I was there nobody was killed. See when I was there, they were just in the square and everybody was excited that this was it; we finally got rid of that government, and we'll have something better. You felt this had to be better, but who knows.

Q: So they felt that they had done regime change, but it was not so?

FIEKOWSKY: No. But the actual government wanted to keep their jobs and their status in the government, naturally. They had the soldiers and an army, a chain of command. No matter what the soldiers thought, they were being told what to do. They were outside the town just waiting and watching.

Q: What was it that helped you decide when to leave?

FIEKOWSKY: Well, a lot of people were leaving. So I had to get a reservation to go back and the station, you had to take a train to the airport because it was out in the country. So everybody in the station was with suitcases and talking and buzzing of activity, and at one point I put my brief case down to check my ticket, then all of a sudden I could not find my brief case that had all of my papers. I am looking at everybody because I did not see it. So I thought, "Maybe somebody took my bag" and they let me go back down the shoot to baggage center to look at the bags. But I didn't see my bag there. So I came back but I still didn't know where it was. So then I was just waiting in the station and I see a group of people with a bag like mine. So we just got our bags mixed up. They had my bag, so I got the bag. So that was a little minor crisis. Imagine going back with your bag stolen with all of the papers in it. But in fact, it wasn't taken. In all the chaos it was accidentally taken.

Q: So that was on your way in the train to the airport? You left just before the actual conflict?

FIEKOWSKY: Yeah, because then I got home and I saw it on T.V, the shooting.

Q: It sounds as though you decided to leave at just the right time, because bullets don't always go in the right direction.

FIEKOWSKY: I didn't really think about that. Trouble is I don't really worry about things that way. I mean I am not a cautious person.

Q: Remarkable. What can we say about China now? Looking back, was that turning point a fail to turn?

FIEKOWSKY: Well they have more freedom now because of the internet and all kinds of information that they couldn't get before. But they have T.V so China can't say the rest of the world is evil, and we are the only good people because they could see. It was no longer a totally controlled information environment.

Q: People had to die for that to happen, or they did.

FIEKOWSKY: Not many of them died, it was a peaceful revolution because most of the country was not involved, it was just Tiananmen. I mean considering it was an unusually—I don't know the statistics—but I would say it was some kind of Prague revolution in which one person was killed.

Q: So comparable to the Prague spring? So you remember it as a positive moment in China's history?

FIEKOWSKY: Yes. I mean it wasn't costly and it gave people hope that things could happen. Up until then, they had no hope. It was just the way it was that it would remain that way. It is not what it used to be though; there are more sources of information now, and the Chinese cannot control the information that comes through—the cell phone, for instance.

Q: Now the negotiations that you had conducted and which were halted, were they resumed at a later time?

FIEKOWSKY: Eventually. By that time I was probably out of the government. If I had been in the government, I would have been in it. But by that time-- I retired in 1996.

Q: How long did it take before trade negotiations were resumed? Do you have any idea?

FIEKOWSKY: I have no idea. It was more than a few months. It was a big bridge. Then the revolt spread from China to Hong Kong. I had to change planes in Hong Kong, and then saw the revolt there because they had gotten the word. At that time, Hong Kong was sort of half free-half Chinese. But everybody felt like me when it happened. I mean thank goodness it's over, I mean it's not over, but may be freer.

Q: Oppression is now partially gone for good, is that what you are saying? So you stopped in Hong Kong on your way home, was it more than a plane change? Did you stay for a while?

FIEKOWSKY: Yeah. I was there a little bit. But I always stop in Hong Kong; I used to like to shop there. By the way that was against the ambassador's orders because we should not have been there officially.

Q: He suggested that you leave, but he did not say "Don't come."

FIEKOWSKY: We were there negotiating with China, we thought we had a deal, and we were euphoric. But then that night, the students were coming in at the main train station in Beijing right across from our hotel, and I would watch them get out of the station and march in a very orderly way to Tiananmen Square. There they set up camp. They didn't have tents because it was summer; it was warm. But they just figured out how they could sleep in sleeping bags or whatever they did. It was June. We were still euphoric. We thought the chains are broken; China is free, and we all thought that. I am sure some people were unhappy people about it too, the government or something. They could have lost their job or been killed, you don't know what is going to happen. So then we were told to leave because it wasn't safe and soldiers were out in the outskirts. The Chinese soldiers, because nowadays they admit that we had spies. Tiananmen is one of those days that people just do not forget.

Q: So when you say a day that will always be historic, you were saying that there was some ambiguity. It looked like there was euphoria, but then the euphoria came to an end; what was the meaning of it?

FIEKOWSKY: Well as far as the public and most people, they were concerned. They were very happy that they were free at last, so to speak.

Q: Did they really believe that this was going to happen? That there would not be a military...?

FIEKOWSKY: Well, there were a lot of people that went to the square, including the students and people that would walk up like I did. There was sort of like an encampment right on the square and around the sidewalk there would be people with posters.

Q: When you say, "The way I did" do you mean as an observer? As a curious person?

FIEKOWSKY: Well they weren't just curious people, they live there. They were going to be effected.

Q: So you think that anyone who was present was a part of this event?

FIEKOWSKY: Most of them were. They could have been people, like the embassy, a diplomatic enclave and somebody must have been there; you don't leave the whole place. Just the basic staff.

Q: So you left hours or a day or two before the intervention?

FIEKOWSKY: I left about a day before the shooting. It was close.

G. PHILIP HUGHES
Executive Secretary of the National Security Council, The White House
Washington, DC (1989-1990)

Ambassador Hughes was born and raised in Ohio and educated at the University of Dayton, Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy and Harvard University. His career with the US Government included service at the senior level with the Congressional Budget Office, the Departments of State and Commerce, and the White House, where he served two tours with the National Security Council. In 1990 he was named US Ambassador to Barbados, where he served until 1993. Ambassador Hughes was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1997.

Q: We've really covered the NSC. Unless there is something that occurs to you at our next meeting we're going to talk about how you left the NSC and how you got an embassy.

Besides picking up the Barbados thing, off mike we realized that we had forgotten completely about China and Tiananmen Square and the perceptions there of dealing with China during that year.

Today is the 27th of October 1997. We were sort of doing a tour of the horizon and we did not cover Tiananmen Square, China and all of that.

HUGHES: I was of course then Executive Secretary at the National Security Council and I think it is fair to say that we watched with interest, both through reporting and the vivid news coverage, the growing protest gathering in Tiananmen Square, the students who sat in in 1989, as I recall, who built a Statue of Liberty model in the square and protested for democracy for several days. We watched also in horror as the Chinese authorities moved in the armed forces. We got reports of movements in the Beijing area just before the armed forces basically put down the student demonstrations in that bloody and fiery nighttime raid. We saw the same thing that everybody else saw, the dramatic footage shot from the Beijing Hotel of one lone student standing in front of a tank moving down Chang'an Avenue.

Both the protests and the aftermath of the protests put the Bush Administration on, it seemed to me, the horns of a dilemma about what to do. With the protest I think that there was sort of a silent hope in many breasts that maybe this would lead somehow to a liberalizing reform by the Beijing government. But at the same time I believe that in the minds of the Presidential policy advisors that I was aware of, there was sort of a hope or a belief that the liberalizers wouldn't go too far or that the government itself would never go too far in compromising with them. Far from this being a revolution it would certainly not end up being the end of the communist government but rather maybe some kind of reformist accommodation would be worked out by the Chinese government and the student leaders. That was what I thought I saw people around me imagining as the furthest things could go.

Once the Chinese government cracked down on the protest and put an end to it, then the Bush Administration was, it seemed to me, in a very serious dilemma. There were forces in Congress, Nancy Pelosi, a Democratic Congresswoman being one of the most vocal, who were very vocal. Partly for partisan reasons, partly because of their sincere convictions about democracy in China, and partly because they I think recognized that President Bush's ties to the Chinese government and friendships with people in Beijing would make it difficult for him, in fact it would be quite contrary to both his advisors' advice and to his own principles, to sever relations with China, to sanction China strongly or brutally, to sever trade ties with China, or to take some other drastic action as a result of Tiananmen. They felt that he might be vulnerable on this issue, and therefore to push for trade sanctions or trade embargo or something like that would be advantageous.

In any case it was clear that the Bush Administration realized they had to react somehow to Tiananmen but yet they regarded the China relationship as so important and fundamental that we couldn't overreact. I would say that avoiding overreaction was something of a hallmark of President Bush's approach to crises like this. Fashioning a response then that was a reaction to this stunning worldwide event and yet not an overreaction that would be misread or misunderstood by the Chinese authorities or in turn overreacted to by them in some way that brought a spiraling down of our relations, was the task of the day for our China people.

Q: Did you have the feeling that George Bush having been our representative in Beijing not too long before, was taking an active role to try to craft something to deal with this?

HUGHES: Yes, I very much had that feeling. I can't point to specific indicators at this stage. Actually he had been the head of our liaison office in Beijing, in a sense quite a while before because it was at that stage at least 12 years and possibly 14 or 15 years ago. I don't have specific actions or directives that he gave that come to the top of my mind but this was not policy that would be made without his active involvement. I'm sure his judgment certainly help set the limits of what we could do and what we wouldn't do in response to Tiananmen.

CLARKE N. ELLIS
American Institute for Taiwan
Rosslyn, Virginia (1989-1993)

Clarke N. Ellis was born in Boston in 1939. He was raised in California and attended the University of Redlands in Redlands, California. He entered the Foreign Service in 1962 and was assigned as a Junior Officer to Munich. He later served in Italy, Eritrea, Austria, Switzerland, and Taiwan. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1998.

Q: You went to the American Institute for Taiwan in Rosslyn, is that it? You were there from 1989 to 1993?

ELLIS: Yes, it was for four years.

Q: Could you explain what that was?

ELLIS: AIT was set up according to the Taiwan Relations Act to handle relations with Taiwan on a non-governmental basis. Since I served once with AIT in Taiwan, once here in the U.S., and also because I married in the 1960s a non-American, I ended up resigning three times from the Foreign Service during my career. The first time I submitted a resignation with my request to marry a non-American and the resignation was not accepted, and I was able to marry my wife.

Q: She was what nationality?

ELLIS: She was Italian. Then, I resigned in 1981. It was just, of course, a formality to go to AIT in Taipei, and then I had to again in 1989 when I went over to AIT in Rosslyn.

Q: In this 1989 to 1993 period, what was your job?

ELLIS: I went over as the number two with the title of deputy managing director. The managing director of AIT Washington at first was David Laux, who was a political appointee who had been on the National Security Council staff during the Reagan administration. Then, for the last part of the time that I was there, it was Nat Bellocchi, a career officer and retired ambassador.

As the number two over there, and apart from being the deputy, I was responsible for the financial and investment side of economic relations plus all scientific relations with Taiwan. I was not so much involved in the trade. Since we didn't have any official relations with Taiwan yet it was a very important and growing economy—I think it was our 13th largest trading partner - we were very interested in negotiating various agreements with the Taiwan authorities. They, in turn, were interested in negotiating agreements with various U.S. agencies.

To do this, the agreements had to be laundered through AIT. In other words, there would be an agreement between AIT and its counterpart organization, the Coordination Council for North American Affairs. Whether it was on cooperation of nuclear energy, weather forecasting, or agricultural matters, or you name it, during the time that I was over there, I negotiated the agreements. I think I negotiated some 50 agreements with Taiwan. When I left AIT, Taiwan's National Science Council honored me for my contribution to U.S.-Taiwan scientific and technical cooperation.

Now the basic agreements, of course, were frequently done by the U.S. agency involved but we had to go through them with a fine-tooth comb, change who the agreements were between, strike out references to any officiality, and work out reimbursement arrangements. A lot of these agreements were reimbursable because the Taiwans basically wanted technical assistance.

For example, I negotiated an agreement between the National Weather Service here and the meteorological authorities in Taiwan that provided for the U.S. Weather Service to set up a computerized forecasting center in Taiwan, together with all the hardware and software that came along with it. I went out to the National Weather Center in Boulder, Colorado, with the negotiators from Taiwan to talk about this agreement. Of course, we had to massage these agreements. There were a lot of tricky issues that would come up, particularly with regard to handling money so that money could be passed to the U.S. government agency after being laundered. In effect, I used to engage in money laundering for the U.S. government!

Q: Congress usually oversees these agreements even though they are not treaties. How did that work?

ELLIS: We would have to report a lot of these agreements to Congress. Also, whenever there were negotiations of economic or other matters, an AIT officer would have to chair the negotiations on our side, and they would have to have a nominally unofficial person chair their delegation on the other side.

Q: Did you find it in a way overly complicated by this time, or had everybody gotten used to how to do it?

ELLIS: Well, there were questions sometimes as to whether we could do an agreement or not. It wasn't always completely straight forward or easy to do. For example, one thing that was decided that we could not do, at least while I was there, and I don't think it's been done, was an extradition agreement. We talked about it, but it was, I think, finally, decided that an extradition agreement is normally done as a treaty. You can't have a treaty, it was decided, with a non-country.

There were problems that came up. I was at AIT during the Uruguay Round Trade negotiations and the issue of Taiwan and our trade gap came up. After thinking about it a long time, it was decided that, yes, it was possible for Taiwan to apply for GATT membership. In fact, the Taiwans didn't submit an application as the Republic of China but rather as the autonomous customs territory of Taiwan, Pescadores Islands, Quemoy, and Matsu. There were precedents for non-sovereign autonomous territories being members of GATT - Hong Kong is an example - so that we couldn't object to Taiwan applying.

Q: How did you find dealing with the Taiwanese here? Any problems with them?

ELLIS: They always, of course, were interested in trying to get as much officiality into the relationship as possible. We always had to back off on that and try to encourage them to look to the substance and not to the form in relations. That was a continual battle. That came to a head later with the U.S. visit of Li Teng-hui long after I left.

Q: I would have thought that you would find the relation with Taiwan representatives, particularly during this time - post-Tiananmen Square - was one where really the veil had been stripped away from this what we felt was a benign, evolving democracy in Mainland China into a hard-nosed regime. This must have given the Taiwans a certain amount of encouragement and a bit of a see-I-told-you-so.

ELLIS: Yes, I think there was some of that attitude. Certainly, they were pushing for more officiality and more extensive contacts but, at the same time, it wasn't just a one-way situation for them because good relations between the U.S. and China frequently meant there was going to be less pressure on them on the part of the Mainland. If relations between the U.S. and China were bad, then they would be making more of an issue of our relations with Taiwan. Then, there was a feeling that we might sell them out. They weren't necessarily happy that the Mainland regime had been shown to be a pretty tough, undemocratic government.

Q: Were we concerned at this time about the operations of the overseas intelligence security apparatus of the Taiwans?

ELLIS: Yes. We were concerned about that and efforts, for example, to get consular license plates in several states where they had representative offices. At the beginning of the period I was here and during the period when I was in Taiwan, the Taiwan security services were very much active in trying to keep tabs on the Taiwan independence groups here in the United States.

That was a source of some concern.

Q: Was the institute playing the role of policy planning, or of reporting on what was happening in Taiwan? Was it apparent that Taiwan was headed towards becoming a real democracy and becoming more Taiwanese that the Mainlanders were dying out? Was this all sort of out there?

ELLIS: Yes, you could see even from the time that I was in Taipei that, although they had to move slowly and cautiously for the most part, it was a gradual evolution toward democracy. Probably the most striking event was when Chiang Ching-kuo, Chiang Kai-shek's son, was elected president and chose Li Teng-hui as his vice president. Li was a Taiwanese and became president when Chiang died. I think the fact of a Taiwanese running Taiwan instead of Mainlanders alone marked the clear transition that would take place. That was certainly a clear sign that Chiang recognized that the Taiwanese would take over the government and the ruling party, the Kuomintang. So the Kuomintang didn't disappear, it was just taken by the Taiwanese.

Q: In your relations with East Asian Bureau and, particularly, the Mainland Chinese hands, did you find that the culture was different or anything?

ELLIS: Well, the Department made clear that, basically, the policy toward not only Mainland China (The Peoples Republic) but also Taiwan would be determined by the Department. We were an executing agency rather than a policy determination agency. Nevertheless, we tried to have some input into the policy process. There was not always agreement on how far we should go with the Taiwans in granting this or granting that or whether this official of the deputy assistant secretary rank was really necessary to lead a trade delegation to Taiwan or not. So, there would be discussions on things like this that would come up. The Department, I think as a general rule, tended to be more cautious or conservative on things than we would have been at AIT.

Q: Looking at it from some distance within the Foreign Service culture, were there Taiwanese hands and Mainland Chinese hands within our officer corps?

ELLIS: Things were pretty well mixed up. The second year of the language school was at Taipei. Officers would be expected to serve in both places. There wasn't a separate category of Taiwan officers. You stand where you sit. The other interesting thing, of course, was since AIT is not a part of the government, we had to get our own funding. The only way to do that was as a contractor to the State Department. We had to justify our budget requests to the Hill as a separate line item, as a contractor in the State Department's budget.

Since we weren't getting enough money, we started something which has now gone world-wide, and that was a visa processing fee. In other words, not being a consular post, we couldn't issue visas. In fact, we did. We had consular officers there who would interview people, adjudicate their cases, and stamp the visas in the passports. But the visas, when I was involved, said "Hong Kong" and, nominally, they were issued by the consulate general in Hong Kong. In fact, they were issued in Taipei. Now, they no longer can say Hong Kong. I think they say the Department of State, Washington. In order to be consistent with the fact that the visa didn't cost anything, we presented the argument that, since we had to process these visas which were really being issued by Hong Kong, we could charge a fee for that. We had to supplement our income with this visa processing fee.

Q: Particularly thinking of Taiwanese young people going to American universities, was there any attempt to change the exchange? Was this a pretty steady flow?

ELLIS: Oh, it was a huge flow. Taiwan was either the second or the third largest, I think, in terms of foreign graduate students in the U.S., and we had a very great interest there. Also, as the deputy managing director, I had to try to find good people to serve out in Taipei. By the time I was the deputy managing director there, I think most people knew what it was. When I went out to Taipei in 1981, I didn't know what I was getting into. Resign from the Foreign Service? I didn't know. There was real concern.

Nevertheless, I was disappointed when I was over at AIT that there were still some loop holes in the Taiwan Relations Act, which caused some problems. For example, like most Foreign Service posts these days, we had some spouses locally engaged in Taipei doing things such as family liaison officer. Most of the staff were either Foreign Service or Civil Service officers who were separated and under the terms of the Taiwan Relations Act, and they could retain their benefits as if they were employed by the government during the time of their service at AIT. There were some people who were not in that category. The director, for example, was considered a political level position and was not covered, therefore, by the pension system. And, the Taiwan Relations Act said that employment with AIT whether in the United States or in Taiwan is not considered employment for the Social Security Act. So people who are employed directly by AIT, such as the secretary that we employed here, wouldn't even get Social Security for the time they were employed by AIT.

Now, you can say, "Why in the world was that done?" Well, that was done since AIT was set up in 1979. That was before they had the new Foreign Service and Civil Service retirement systems. The provision was put in the act to prevent the Social Security Administration from coming around to these people who were separated and saying, "Hey, now you have to contribute to Social Security." At the time, it was meant as a protection for the people who were separated to serve with AIT but it did create some problems. A pension system was set up, first for the director only and a couple of the officers of the corporation, and then it was extended to all AIT employees who weren't otherwise covered by another pension system. That proved to be costly, and the Department had problems with it. I'm not sure what happened but they weren't interested in the alternatives either.

Q: What about dealing with the Taiwanese-American community? I interviewed Nat Bellocchi at one time, and Nat was saying that the Chinese Taiwanese group really was well established and had a very solid lobby.

ELLIS: Oh, yes, it's a very strong lobby.

Q: How did this play? Were they monitoring what you were doing all the time?

ELLIS: Not so much us but they knew what was going on in U.S.-Taiwan relations, and they wouldn't so much come to us as they would go to the Hill. That's where they knew the power was. It was the Congress that really strengthened the Taiwan Relations Act more than it would have been. We broke relations in 1978. It was the power of the Taiwan lobby that the strong Taiwan Relations Act was passed. They have very well-funded lobbyists on the Hill. I think they recommended the non-binding resolution for the Senate to allow Li Teng-hui to come to the States. The vote was something like 90-something to nothing. That's an example of the Taiwan lobby's influence on the Congress.

Q: I would have thought that, because of the way the AIT was put forth and done reluctantly on the American government, in many ways you would have looked more than any other bureau to Congress as being your supporter or your mentor just in the back of your mind.

ELLIS: We had to look to Congress for money. We had to go, basically, through the State Department. We couldn't lobby Congress on our own.

Q: But you know there's lobbying and lobbying. Some of the guys who were with the staff of the House were saying, "We are disgruntled because we are not getting anywhere with certain things."

ELLIS: I don't know one way or another whether the managing directors at the time did that but I certainly didn't.

Q: Was the Bush-Baker combination a continuation of how it had been under Reagan? You arrived just about the time they did and were there through their period.

ELLIS: It was pretty much the same.

Q: How about the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait and our desire to get money back in? Did you get involved in that?

ELLIS: No, we didn't really. It was decided that it was rather difficult to get Taiwan mixed up as an official supporter of that effort because of the political ramifications.

Q: Were there any major issues that you had to deal with during this 1989 to 1993 period?

ELLIS: Probably apart from the various trade issues that came along, the major issues were arms sales issues. We had a retired army colonel who handled the military issues. Not just with regard to my duties but, I think, the toughest issues that we were dealing with were those regarding military sales to Taiwan.

Q: During the election of 1992, didn't Bush announce that he was going to send something like 150 F-16s?

ELLIS: That was very hotly debated.

Q: Did AIT play any role, or was this a political thing?

ELLIS: In the final analysis, it was a political decision but in terms of looking at what was going to be sold and what the Taiwans wanted and all of that, everything had to be done, again, through AIT to the State Department and the Defense Department. In other words, we didn't have a policy vote on it but we did pass on the requests and had to analyze the requests somewhat in terms of what it meant and that sort of thing.

Q: Did you find that you were hearing screams from the Mainland Chinese types in the East Asia Bureau? I'm talking about the Americans who take our relations with Mainland China seriously.

ELLIS: They were certainly opposed to selling the F-16s. Apart from the various agreements that I had to conclude, there were, for example, the annual military meetings in the U.S. and in Taiwan. I organized annual meetings dealing with scientific cooperation. There was a meeting with the National Science Council here every year that had to be organized. Organizing these meetings was a very significant part of my work.

DENNIS G. HARTER
Guangzhou (1989-1993)

Mr. Harter was born and raised in New Jersey and educated at Georgetown University, Seton Hall and American University. He joined the State Department in 1966 and was assigned to the CORDS program of USAID in Vietnam. He subsequently studied Chinese and served in Taiwan, Hong Kong, Guangzhou, and Hanoi, where he was Deputy Chief of Mission (1997-2001). In his Washington assignments Mr. Harter dealt primarily with East Asian matters. He also served as Director of the State Department's Press Office in Washington and as State's Representative to the Washington Council on International Trade in Seattle. Mr. Harter was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2004.

Q: So the next assignment was the Consulate General at Guangzhou? From when to when?

HARTER: I got there in the early fall of 1989 and stayed there until January of 1993.

Q: What was the situation - well you arrived just after Tiananmen Square didn't you?

HARTER: Yes. The Tiananmen demonstrations lasted from April to June in 1989.

Q: What were you getting from your colleagues and all, just before you went out, about Tiananmen?

HARTER: We had a very confrontational relationship with the Chinese, because of the Tiananmen events. During the weeks of the student protests, we were strong supporters of the students. We were urging the Government to meet some of the protestors' demands. The U.S.

was an outspoken critic of the Chinese crackdown in June, and for the next year our relationship was complicated by the fact a prominent Chinese dissident scientist and his wife were living in the US embassy. Fang Lizhi and his wife were finally permitted to leave in June 1990 and they went to the US under our protection where they were given asylum. At about the same time, the former head of the New China News Agency in Hong Kong, Xu Jiatun, escaped from China and also “defected” to the United States. Xu had been deposed as head of the NCNA in January of 1990 because he was seen as too close to the students and too much an advocate for Hong Kong interests during the early stages of the Sino-British negotiations. So, yes, I would say it was a very negative relationship at that point. We had a new Ambassador, Jim Lilley, who just recently published an autobiography on his China experiences [China Hands: Nine Decades of Adventure, Espionage, and Diplomacy in Asia], who had replaced Winston Lord.

Winston Lord [Ed: served as Ambassador from November 1985 to April 1989] was very upset, because the Tiananmen demonstrations arose just as he was getting ready to leave and I don’t believe he anticipated them becoming so dramatic an issue. He had been working to promote a more open relationship with the Chinese and both the demonstrations and the eventual crackdown surprised him and everyone else at the Embassy. Talking with Winston, I think, in a sense, he saw these events as reflecting on his handling of the China relationship. Jim Lilley [Ed: served from May 1989 to May 1991] came in after the first few weeks of the demonstrations in the midst of public U.S. criticism of the Chinese handling of the demonstrations. The demonstrations intensified and the relationship only got worse with the crackdown in June. The continuing asylum situation with Fang Lizhi at the Embassy added to the negatives. We had limited communication with the government and there were large numbers of Chinese troops outside the Embassy.

The Tiananmen demonstrations were of course, not strictly confined to Beijing. There were student demonstrations and some outbreaks of violence in all of the major cities throughout China. In Guangzhou, the demonstrations were among the least confrontational simply because the southern Chinese didn’t let politics get in the way of managing the issues. The provincial government and party leadership had a more collegial interaction with the public (the masses in communist terms) and the students. The party apparatus organized a couple of big demonstrations cooperatively with the students, ensuring roads were kept open for the marches and transportation was provided, etc. And, of course, after the crackdown by the PLA forces in Tiananmen, many medium and high-level officials in southern China helped the leading dissidents from the North escape to Hong Kong or to Macao. From there, they subsequently went to the United States, sometimes to Europe, but mostly to the United States. The southern leaders were a much more receptive audience for the students’ issues, particularly as they applied to a lessening of central control and authority. The people in Guangdong Province were quite happy to have Beijing otherwise occupied and not restricting local efforts to expand their economic market activities.

Q: Was this sort of almost the traditional cultural dividing line at the Yangtze River, I mean the Cantonese-Mandarin, I mean the whole business of China being split.

HARTER: Yes. The Cantonese were much more progressive politically and economically than those in the north in Beijing. When Deng Xiaoping set up the Special Economic Zones with public infrastructure money to experiment with market run economic programs built on private investment, the Cantonese took the ball and ran with it. From the ordinary people to the top Party leaders in that region, they pretty much all bought into the program. Party ideology took a backseat to economic prosperity and development. During the time I was in Guangzhou, I liked to argue that the Communists could run open elections in Guangdong where anyone could run for office against the existing government and party leaders and that the Communists would have won the elections, because they basically were all popular figures. Everybody generally liked the people running the government and party there, because they had a much more open attitude toward the economy, self improvement and education and all the rest of these so-called “basics” that were of concern to the ordinary people.

Q: Well, I imagine you were looking at this. How did this come about? Was there almost the equivalent within the party of almost the elective process or was there just something in the spirit or what?

HARTER: Well, when Mao took power there was a fair amount of mobility in the political system. High level cadre would quite often be sent to their home areas to work but there were quite a few who were sent from one geographic region of the country to another. Over time, local cadre rose through the system and stayed in the system locally. They weren't moved around. During the political campaigns – the Great Leap Forward, the Cultural Revolution – there was a bit more mobility at the top, particularly when the PLA was sent in to take over party and government positions after the major disruptions of the Cultural Revolution. But, in fact over the years the local administrations tended to remain localized.

In the south, the local party and government leaders thought the same way as the people who wanted to do business like their cousins across the border in Hong Kong and Macau. The whole focus in Southern China was to be as much like Hong Kong as you could be. This feeling was obviously centered in Guangdong Province – home of the Cantonese who populated Hong Kong and Macau. But it was also true in Fujian Province, the home province of most of the émigrés in Taiwan and Singapore, and second only to Guangdong among all overseas Chinese communities. Guangxi Province was a province dominated by minority peoples and so it didn't have the same widespread entrepreneurial drive. Hainan, the island which made up the fourth province of the Guangzhou consular district took capitalism and stretched it to the extreme. Where Guangdong and Fujian had small special economic zones with a few square miles of land in which to experiment, the entire island of Hainan was declared a special economic zone. And, with that incentive, the Hainan leaders opened up the biggest land and commercial speculation China had seen since the Kuomintang ruled in China. The Hainan authorities in their haste to show progress in the modernization of the island managed to get on the wrong side of just about everything. What I'm referring to is largely speculative activity, using government funds, for example, to procure and import luxury goods through tax and tariff free Hainan which were then resold to other parts of China at high mark-ups. Top level provincial party, government and military cadre were all involved. Bribes and payoffs were the foundation for wild business deals and land development schemes. Many properties were bought and flipped for a profit without anything ever being developed or produced because everyone wanted to get in on the prospective riches. Prostitution and gambling were open activities in Hainan's two cities. The Governor was personally involved in a luxury car import scheme that brought duty free luxury cars to Hainan and then arranged their re-export at a big profit to the local military and political figures in other parts of China. The Hainan fiasco almost scuttled Deng's entire SEZ policy experiment. Only some very careful critique of the Hainan Governor's "excess zeal" to earn profits for the State managed to keep his actions from spilling over into the zones in Guangdong and Fujian.

Q: Were these stolen cars?

HARTER: The stolen cars were part of the wide open speculative and corrupt practices that were going on at that time, but the Hainan Governor's activities were a separate activity. What you are referring to is the contract stolen car operations that were conducted between southern China and Hong Kong and Macau. Occasionally the thieves went as far as the United States and Europe to get their merchandise. With the sudden rise of approved wealth accumulation in China there was a lot of pent up demand for the kinds of luxuries one found in the west. But China was not permitting the expenditure of money to open up those sorts of markets in China. So southern Chinese criminal elements opened up their own supply system. Specific cars could be ordered and they would then be stolen in Hong Kong or Macau and brought across the border through a number of different smuggling routes. Hong Kong has probably more luxury cars per capita than any other city in the world. I know for certain they have more Rolls Royce and Bentley automobiles per capita than any other country in the world. But, the thieves were also picking up big Mercedes sedans as well as Ferrari, Jaguar and even Lamborghini sports cars. You would see these autos being driven on the highways and local city streets in southern China with provincial Chinese license plates – including official government plates – and you just knew where they came from. The Customs Office people and the military, particularly those along the border areas were all taking money to allow this to happen. Periodically there would be a crackdown or somebody would get lucky and intercept the smuggling boats before they reached Chinese territorial waters, but these were exceptions to the rule. The smuggling techniques became increasingly sophisticated. A stolen car in Hong Kong would be stowed inside a large rubber bladder and then towed behind a fishing boat to a coastal spot in China where it would be unloaded. Kept under water, and unlikely to sink because of this big rubber bladder, the car was undetectable. Only the slow movement of the towing vessel tended to give away that it was transporting a heavy load. Sometimes the smugglers would just bring them in on an ordinary car carrier vessel, mixed in with other cars that had been legitimately acquired.

I said this was a period of considerable confrontation between the US and China. When I got there the interaction between myself and the Consulate, with Guangdong government and party officials had already started to improve. The nadir of our interaction with the Chinese officials had never reached the depressed levels it had in Beijing and in Shanghai. And we were also the first to restore our level of activity to pre-Tiananmen days. The provincial authorities were also making a lot of money out of the fees they collected to support emigrating Chinese who pretty much all lived in the Guangzhou Consular District. I mentioned earlier, since 90 plus percent of U.S. citizen Chinese traced their origin to the Guangzhou Consular District it was decided to place all immigrant visa processing there. While the Chinese officials in Guangzhou originally objected to this arrangement, the local authorities eventually saw this operation as a way to obtain lucrative earnings. I believe this gave us some additional influence with the local authorities and influenced these officials to keep the relationship with the United States more open in Guangdong and not as restrictive as it was in Beijing. For example, when I first arrived in Beijing to start this tour the atmosphere outside the embassy was as bad as it was at the time of the incident I described to you in 1975 with all the guards around the U.S. mission buildings. In fact, it was probably a bit more rigorous in 1989. You had to go through three or four check points before you got to the actual gate to get into the US compound. There were guards at each end of the street who would check documents of any Chinese proceeding down the block toward the US mission. There were patrols walking in front of the buildings and then there were stationary guards in front of the buildings. At the Consulate General in Guangzhou, there were no street-side guards and usually only one or two guards near the entrance to our part of the hotel where the Consulate was located. Once we moved to our new location, we went for several months before there was any local guard set up outside our facility even though we had constructed a small guard post for them to occupy.

When I came to Guangzhou in 1989 the U.S. Consulate was still in its original 1979 location, a Chinese government-owned hotel. Its placement there is an interesting story. After the normalization of relations and the opening of Embassies in the two countries, the US and the PRC both wanted to open Consulates. We were looking to open in Shanghai and Guangzhou, two big economic centers along the east coast. (The Chinese wanted Houston and San Francisco.) And, as we've noted before, Guangzhou is the capital of the province where most Chinese-Americans come from. Vice President Mondale was about to travel to China and everyone wanted him to have a "deliverable", something he could do that would have a tangible result. The answer turned out to be "opening the Consulate General in Guangzhou." New hotels were being built and lots of business activity suggested there would be some choices if the USG had decided to wait. But there were no other identifiable "deliverables" and so the US decided to open the Consulate General in a Chinese Government-owned hotel which had been in business in Guangzhou since the 1950s. Although it has been expanded and modernized several times in the intervening years, in 1979 it was still very primitive compared to western style hotels. We took a large space in one wing of the building on the first floor for our consular section and then converted a number of hotel rooms on the upper floors to establish the rest of our offices, including our communications center. It was clearly insecure. We had an open elevator shaft – which we did not control – running right up through the office space and adjacent to the communications shell. The offices were of course, all converted hotel rooms and the living quarters for the Consulate staff were also converted hotel rooms. Because each new "apartment" – a combination of a several hotel rooms – had more bathrooms than anyone could use, wooden planks were installed on top of the tubs to create shelves and storage space. I had stayed in this hotel during my 1975 travel to China and I can't say it had changed significantly by the time I arrived there as the Consul General in 1989. There were certainly more modern parts of the hotel, but we were not in those parts. The hotel did, however, have one big advantage, it was located directly opposite the fairgrounds where the semi-annual Canton Trade Fair was held. So, the hotel still had a great deal of business that kept it going. It was very convenient for us to provide services to all of the Americans who came to China each spring and fall to attend the fair and do business. The consular section was in the worst area because on the first floor they were subject to rat infestations and there were cats in the ceiling who urinated and defecated up there creating odors, health concerns, and occasional leaks through the ceiling and into the consular work areas.

Guangdong province was the heart of China's post-1979 modernization. Excluding the island of Hainan, which had originally been part of Guangdong province, three of China's four special economic zones were in Guangdong. The economic experimentation, which had originally been confined to the zones, was quickly expanded throughout the Pearl River Delta which extended from Guangzhou southward to Hong Kong and Macau. Farm land was quickly being developed into new factories, new zones, and new transportation links tied these areas to Hong Kong. New hotels controlled by outside foreign interests in partnership with Chinese entities were being created to provide services to the entrepreneurs who were coming in from abroad to do business. At one point Guangzhou had four, five-star hotels while there was only one in Beijing and one in Shanghai. The money and the investment and the visitors were clearly all down in the south. Foreign involvement in business and commerce was all centered in Guangdong. After the central authorities created the special economic zones to open up the economy there had been some additional decrees from Beijing which created broader areas for development in the country along the major river networks. But in Guangdong, the province began to make its own decisions to expand the zones. The special economic zones had the most liberal regulations to promote investment, but the Pearl River Delta towns just gradually sucked those special conditions closer and closer to Canton. In effect, you had swath of land and towns several miles wide that ran northward from Shenzhen to Guangzhou for about 150 miles. It was this area that established China's basic light industrial and textile exports to the rest of the world. Of course, Americans were very interested in getting involved in such business opportunities. After Tiananmen had stalled activities in the north, American businessmen saw the more relaxed attitude in Guangdong as a real opportunity to expand their involvement in China. In fact, Guangdong business activity never really closed down during the Tiananmen disturbances or the crackdowns. Some Americans in Guangzhou diminished their day-to-day activities in the immediate aftermath of the crackdown, but very few Americans actually left Guangdong for an extended period of time after Tiananmen. By contrast, all the business people evacuated Beijing and Shanghai after Tiananmen and they did not return for extended periods.

Q: I was going to ask, had there been the equivalent to, I mean was this - they left because of the atmosphere or they leave because of pressure in the United States, don't do business with these people.

HARTER: It was a combination of those two. The crackdown in Beijing made people feel it was unsafe to be there – largely the military action and presence around the capital, plus the hostile attitude that persisted toward Americans after the Tiananmen events. That hostility was due to Chinese Government propaganda targeting the US for interfering in China's internal affairs – human rights criticism, sanctuary for the Chinese scientist in the US Embassy, and asylum for student dissidents able to flee the country. To a certain extent that hostility toward Americans also carried over into Shanghai and some of the other big population centers and Americans and other business people took that occasion to leave the country. Once they were out, they were then more subject to the pressures in their home countries where people saw the Chinese totalitarian regime as oppressing its citizens. Businesses based in the U.S. and in Europe that were active in the China market were under pressure not to do business with these “bad” people.

Q: When you arrived there, when in 1989? I assume you made your normal calls, was there a Governor of the Province and then the Mayor and this sort of thing?

HARTER: I arrived about November, more than six months after Tiananmen started and a few months after it ended. Yes, I started my official calls right off. The Governor was the son of one of China's top Generals and a long-time power in the province.

Q: Were the people you were talking to saying OK, we've had a rough patch let's get on with it down here. Were you able to discuss the situation and all that?

HARTER: Yes. They were very pleased with the way things had progressed in the south after 1979 and they were very anxious to continue domestic growth and foreign investment. Provincial authorities in Guangdong had reached an accommodation with the students and there were no real social disruptions. The leadership did not agree with the crackdown – I should note that Premier Zhao Ziyang who had supported the students and who had been dumped after he criticized the leadership policies had been the Governor of Guangdong many years before and had close ties to the leadership there. You had a feeling Guangdong Governor Ye Xuanping and the top leaders of the party and the government there knew lower level officials were helping dissident students to escape and the provincial leaders let it continue because they too believed it was the proper thing to do. Guangdong was at the forefront of this effort to support the escape of the students but people in Guangxi and Fujian were also involved.

Q: Were you getting remarks about those jokers up North?

HARTER: Yes, you would get a certain amount of that -- certainly from middle level and lower level officials. Some of them would make those negative references toward northern officials in very informal conversations. And, that was again one of the advantages of being in the South, everything was a much more informal and relaxed when it came to interactions between the foreign community and the local government institutions. Sure we had some formalistic encounters and some difficulty from time to time getting meetings or getting cooperation to do things. But, overall, you had a much better opportunity to talk with these people and meet with them than you did in either Beijing or Shanghai. Now, the highest ranking people in the province were certainly less accessible than others at lower levels. In that sense, I would say my access to the Governor was probably the same as the CG in Shanghai had access to the Mayor there. I was not able to see the Governor very often, but I could see one of the three or four Vice Governors several times per year. Guangdong had two Governors during the three plus years I was there and I probably met with them on only three occasions.

Q: I mean, how did the Shanghai and compares politically? I mean how did they look at each other for and sort of from the Consulate's perspective?

HARTER: Well, the two cities are real competitors. In the 1930s and 1940s, Shanghai had been the center of China's expatriate business activity and after 1949 under the communists it was one of the major investment centers for the PRC. Shanghai's state-owned enterprises were major tax contributors to Beijing but they were also the primary focus for state investment. Guangzhou was more backward and a lot less developed from that time up to the start of the reform and opening policy in 1979. In the 19th century, the situation had been reversed, because initially the only open ports for trade with the foreigners were in Guangdong. Then, the only foreign factories were on Shamian Island which was also the site of the foreign legations after the 1840 Opium War. My predecessor, Consul General Mark Pratt, had negotiated a lease with the five-star White Swan Hotel to take over its former staff building on Shamian as the new Consulate General site. Actually the White Swan had never used the building for its staff because Esso had leased it for its headquarters and residence soon after it was constructed. In 1986, Esso had decided to relocate to Zhuhai in order to be closer to its drilling sites in the South China Sea and so the building became available. So it was as though we were coming back to where the first American consuls had operated.

By the 20th century Shanghai had clearly surpassed Guangzhou and the other coastal cities as a commercial center with the pre-World War II era being its golden age. Shanghai was also very important after the Communist takeover in 1949, because many of the top leaders around Chairman Mao, particularly during the Cultural Revolution, came from Shanghai. But, Shanghai got a bloody nose with the death of Chairman Mao and the purge of those people around his wife -- known as the Gang of Four -- all of whom had come out of Shanghai. Under the communists, Shanghai was the most ideological city in all of China, especially during the Cultural Revolution. I always sort of felt that Shanghai's communist intellectuals were the most ideological, because they felt guilty about how bourgeois and capitalist the city was. To compensate for this capitalist excess, these intellectuals articulated an excess of leftist, radical communism ideas.

Q: Well, Shanghai was actually a fairly new city wasn't it? I thought it was established almost as one of the port cities back in the early 19th century or so.

HARTER: It was not as developed as the southern ports, but I believe it did have a business center in the latter part of the 19th Century. You are correct though that the really big expansion was in the 20th century, especially in the decades between the First and Second World War. It was probably in that time period that Shanghai became a much bigger and more important commercial center than it ever had been before and the foreign section of Shanghai was virtually autonomous from the rest of the city where the Chinese lived.

I think there was a rivalry relationship between the two regions. Beijing was pleased with the effectiveness of the new reform policies and the growth of Guangdong cities and the revenues they produced for the central government. But conversely, they were also concerned that the significant investments which the central authorities had put into Shanghai were not producing the same positive results. After the reform movement in 1979, Beijing was getting huge tax returns from Guangdong and the southern Chinese. But, they were also losing a lot of control over economic developments and that gradually was also restricting Beijing's ability to dictate policy to the local authorities. Part of the reason was simply because Guangdong would provide extra money through loans to the central authorities. This money was beyond what the province would normally provide in revenue share and taxes. Guangdong would periodically provide an extra couple hundred million dollars worth of loans to the Central government. During these years, Shanghai was still a cash draw. It's economy still was dominated by all of those state-owned enterprises that weren't doing anything.

In this time period, in the early 1990s and particularly through the rest of the decade, the Central government made a conscious decision to re-make Shanghai as its most important commercial city. And, they decided to do it in a way that preserved Beijing's control and oversight. They didn't directly downgrade Guangdong and the SEZ areas but they made Shanghai the center for re-directing national investment, particularly in infrastructure, as a way to encourage greater foreign investment to the Shanghai area. Shanghai's "privileges" under the state-run investment program rivaled the investment incentives offered in the zones but they came with greater clout in Beijing. It didn't hurt that Shanghai cadres were once again manning top positions in the Central Government and Party structure. With the combination of foreign investment and government infrastructure development funds, Shanghai took off. Shanghai, I just saw in the paper yesterday, now has a train that goes from their new airport to the outskirts of the city at 287 miles an hour. They say it's the fastest train in the world. The Germans built it. So, a lot of the modernization effort put in Shanghai I believe is a direct result of Beijing seeking to undercut a growing economic independence in Southern China that Beijing feared could potentially have political repercussions. Guangdong's link to Hong Kong, that territory's new special region status after 1997, and its preservation of a capitalist economic structure would only strengthen perceptions that Southern China was a separate entity. Moreover, as Beijing sought to entice Taiwan to a closer association with the mainland it was conceding political and economic independence for Taiwan within that association. In combination, Taiwan and Southern China and their powerful economic muscle could pose quite a challenge to Beijing's control over the country's economic system. Ultimately, Beijing could not risk this economic power becoming a destabilizing element, and thus, the leaders created Shanghai as the regime's counterweight to the free enterprise, foreign investment dominated southern areas.

Q: What was your staff like there? What were you doing?

Harter: First of all, there was no deputy position in Guangzhou and so traditionally, that function was assumed by the head of the Political/Economic Section, a three person unit. The head of the unit was John Tkacik, a career Consular officer who had been in the Hong Kong Consular Section part of the time I served there and who technically was the head of the Economic Section. When I started in Guangzhou, the head of the Consular Section, our largest unit, was Tony Leggio, and he was later replaced by Bernadette Allen, a consular cone officer whom I pushed for a stretch assignment to the section chief's job. She did an outstanding job overseeing the large staff at a time when our immigrant visa load was expanding rapidly, particularly with the growth of a very busy adoption program. Brent Miller was the head of our Admin operations and that was a major job because of our move from the old Dong Fang Hotel facilities into the new building next to the White Swan Hotel on Shamian Island. He was constantly working with FBO on the plans for the conversion of office space and the refurbishment of apartments in the building as well as with the Seabees who did the installation work for our communications operations. We experienced a less successful stretch assignment with Brent's successor. His short foreign service tenure and limited experience – only GSO work – did not give him enough background to be the ADMIN officer as well as the RSO and Personnel Officer for the Consulate and I had to spend more time on these issues myself than I had when they were under Brent's direction.

We had an outstanding young FAS (Foreign Agricultural Service) officer, Phil Shull, an experienced USIA officer who was very active, Rich Stites, and two FCS (Foreign Commercial Service) section heads, Todd Thurwachter and Denny Barnes, who consecutively ran that two-man shop. Prior to my arrival there, these three agencies had been permitted to operate in their own independent facilities without any agency commitment to re-assemble the units once we got better facilities. This produced a lot of coordination problems in agencies that traditionally liked to do their own thing anyway. Of the three, however, it was only FCS that proved particularly stubborn in coordinating its activities with the rest of the ConGen staff. USIA also had a couple of interns who came through as fill-ins while the USIS officer was on leave and they turned out to be very creative and dynamic additions to the team.

As I mentioned, because the Consular Section handled all the immigrant visa work in China, we had a very large Consular section -- I would say roughly a dozen officers. Beijing had only five and the other Consulates had one or two officers to handle non-immigrant visas and American Citizens Services. We had a local staff supporting the Consular Section of probably 35 or 40 Chinese. We had one political officer and two economic officers. In addition to the three agencies I mentioned earlier, INS and Customs personnel would come in to Guangzhou to assist us or occasionally to conduct special investigations. They worked with us as much or perhaps even more than they worked with the Embassy in Beijing. This was due to our large immigrant and adoption work as well as South China's production of export goods for the US market. I guess, all totaled up, we had a staff of around the low 30s. We didn't have any Defense Department attachés and no Marine Guards in the Consulates.

Q: Could you get around easily?

HARTER: Yes. Access and travel opportunities were pretty good throughout the Consular District. The district covered four southern coastal provinces, the four Provinces had, I don't know, maybe 140, 150 million people.

Q: What were the Provinces?

HARTER: Guangdong Province was the biggest and the consulate offices were in its capital in Guangzhou. Guangxi Province is adjacent to Guangdong in the southwest and it was the province home of the Zhuang minority which dominated the administration there. Fujian Province is north of Guangdong along the coast and sits opposite Taiwan. Hainan Province, is a large island, south of Guangdong that had originally been part of Guangdong Province but was made a separate Province and a special economic zone in its own right.

Q: So your consular district covered the Provinces that bordered Vietnam?

HARTER: Guangxi Province shared part of the border with Vietnam but the rest of the border on the China side is in Yunnan Province. Yunnan is part of the Chengdu Consular District along with Sichuan Province and Tibet. Sichuan Province, with Chengdu as its capital, is the largest Province in China. A single Province with well over a hundred million people at that time. Chengdu probably is the largest city in the province, or it may be behind Chongqing. Chengdu probably had five million people. So, it was definitely not "the sticks" in that sense.

When we started out in 1979 with our Consulate General, there was no way to have a separate stand-alone building. The only existing buildings that were developed enough to give you facilities and to give you something reasonable to work with was in the hotels. As I said earlier, we had a hotel-based Consulate and our staff all lived right in the building. My three immediate predecessors spent a lot of their time looking for a piece of property on which to build our own independent facility. The first properties they were offered by the Chinese government were all inside the city but in areas that were a bit out of the way of the ordinary flow of the city. Subsequent options proposed by the Chinese appeared to be too far outside the city – at least at the time they were offered and we also turned them down. While there was a feeling among the ConGen staff that we needed something a lot better than we were working in, there was little likelihood we would be funded for such a project until the Embassy in Beijing had been replaced, because they too were shoe-horned into facilities in the capital. So there wasn't as much pressure to make a decision and find a piece of property as their might otherwise have been if we were the only truly disadvantaged facility in China. Later on in my tour there, I did spend some time looking at property sites and I did find one that was eventually approved by the Department's Property Negotiator, Ambassador Nicholas Salgo. But I don't think anything has yet been done to begin construction, even though we do have lease title to the land we want to build on.

After I had been in Guangzhou for some months, we moved out of the hotel and into a high rise where the lower three floors were reconfigured as office space and the upper nine floors were the residences. The building became available when ESSO, the old Rockefeller oil company, decided to join other oil companies in the Shekou Section of the Shenzhen SEZ which was where all of the oil exploration activities were centered in South China. Mark Pratt, the Consul General at this time, convinced the Department to take over the lease. It was a great decision and has provided us with a facility we use even today. I spent the remainder of my three plus years in Guangzhou dealing with the rebuilding and reconstruction of that particular facility. It was a terrible experience.

Working with FBO (Foreign Buildings Operations) is probably one of the most trying things I've ever had to do in the Foreign Service. When I had been in Hong Kong on my second tour, I was asked by the Consul General to head a group to evaluate a building that had recently been built for occupancy by the Consulate staff. It had been one of the properties in Hong Kong that had been constructed when FBO traded a number of US-owned sites to a local developer in return for some additional buildings being constructed for our use. This new apartment building I went to look at was one of the oddest buildings I'd ever seen. None of the rooms in the apartments had only four corners. Each room had some extra angles which created very difficult space in which to fit furnishings. Moreover, the rooms were all so small and there was so little closet space in the bedrooms that we had to downgrade each apartment by one bedroom so that people would have a place to store things.

In addition, the designer who had been selected by FBO to plan the building had no experience with tropical weather or typhoon type storms which hit Hong Kong most every year. The building had small mosaic tiles placed all along the outside of the building. Unfortunately they leaked when it rained and it took several additional months of reworking the exterior of the building before it could be occupied. That building was bad enough, but FBO also made another big mistake in agreeing to lease a 79-unit apartment building that was supposedly going to be turned over to the USG after twenty years of rental payments. This building, however, had no setback from the street, was totally surrounded by bigger buildings and thus was totally incapable of being protected from potential terrorist activities. Congressional oversight committees roundly criticized this transaction as well. The Consulate was fortunate to be able to get out of the lease, though we had certainly lost almost all of our USG owned properties.

Q: I was thinking it was FBO and Chinese bureaucracy?

HARTER: FBO was absolutely terrible, unable to make decisions, inadequate planning, equipment and materials improperly ordered, no concept of a “schedule.” Then, to make it worse, I had the same experience once again when I was in Hanoi. Twice in my career I ended up working in a construction site. What made Guangzhou worse than Hanoi is that we were living in the same building in which all the construction was taking place. At least in Hanoi Embassy people had a chance to leave the work zone and retreat to a proper residence. Of course, a lot of the heavy reconfiguration of office space in Guangzhou was completed before we moved in and began operations, but there was still a lot to be done and continuing issues with communications and classified equipment that had to be installed after we moved in. To make things more personally disagreeable, we also had to move out of our apartment in the building so FBO and the Department’s interior designers could come in and redo the CG’s (Consul General’s) residence as an “official residence.” Some of the items they came up with and the patterns and fabrics they selected were unbelievable. It was not an enjoyable experience.

Q: How about your contacts with the government people? What sort of things would you work with them on?

HARTER: A lot of things we dealt with involved investment. We occasionally had discussions of a political nature, talking about Chinese domestic policies and their implementation, but almost all of the political issues were handled in Beijing along with Sino-US bilateral relations and foreign policy issues. Our political officer and I would try to analyze political dynamics within the Consular District and report on them but we were not “involved” in political activities per se. Sometimes when the Embassy was directed by Washington to make a particular demarche to the Chinese on a bilateral issue, the Embassy in Beijing would direct me and the Consul General in Shanghai to go in and talk about the same issue, but that was pretty rare and I can’t say that I can recall any specific issue I might have had to raise that way. But, because of the business-oriented focus of the region, by and large I probably did more commercial support work than anything else. I certainly got involved in some of the Consular issues, particularly as we tried to sort out policies to handle adoptions and a rapid growth in immigrant visa issuances. I was also involved in trying to cut into the surge of illegal immigrants coming out of the district and into the U.S. But, I tried to stay out of the day-to-day consular issues and avoided making referrals and recommendations for others to get visas. As I mentioned before, the head of the Economic unit was a long time consular officer and on a number of occasions I had to get him out of the Consular Section operations. He was constantly getting involved in trying to adjudicate cases or making sure people he referred were getting their visas. And, of course, my main task was to make sure all of our people got the support they needed to do their jobs effectively.

A lot of what I had to do was also ceremonial -- U.S. businesses opening up an exhibit; U.S. businesses opening a factory, all that required my “presence.” I helped to dedicate or break ground for all kinds of different buildings and facilities. Pabst Blue Ribbon, which used to be a popular beer in the United States, brought in a U.S. factory and set up their own brewery in China while I was there. I think at one point it was the only actual Pabst Blue Ribbon factory still in independent production with all of the U.S. produced beer under that label being made in other companies' breweries. They were the first American beer to come into China and they were very popular across the Consular District and then across much of China because they had that "American" cachet. Several young entrepreneurs got their start by buying Pabst in Guangdong and taking it off by train or plane to other parts of China to sell at a higher price than they paid in Guangdong. The Pabst people did terrific things within their locale to support their local partners and their community and they were a great help for our representation activities and Fourth of July events and everything else where we needed support from the American business community.

Following a process begun by one of my predecessors as Consul General, we also helped introduce McDonalds to Southern China. When I arrived, McDonalds was just being permitted to open in the Shenzhen SEZ. But, every year on the Fourth of July or occasionally for some other special events, we got local government permission to allow McDonalds to bring food up on the train from Hong Kong. Hong Kong McDonalds sent some of their staff and we set up locations for them to prepare and assemble the food and we'd have a Fourth of July with McDonalds hamburgers, french fries and apple pies. We also got Kentucky Fried Chicken introduced the same way and we were able to rely on support from the Pepsi and Coke factories that had also opened in Guangdong to provide us beverages and snacks – Frito Lay is part of Pepsi -- so all of this made for a big draw for our July 4th events. Fortunately, these companies were all anxious for the exposure and so our limited representational budget did not take a hit when we had several hundred people come in for the Independence Day activities.

While I was in Guangzhou, the city hosted the first ever women's World Cup Soccer Championship. The American team was one of the favorites and ended up winning the tournament. In fact, they have remained a top contender in each of the following quadrennial contests.

Q: The Chinese had a team?

HARTER: The Chinese had an excellent team, yes. But, interestingly the other perennial top competitors have always included Norway and Sweden. How those two countries with their relatively small population base would be out there competing with the United States and with China and their much larger populations seems incongruous. Moreover, they're probably got to deal with snow and frozen turf for close to half of the year which limits their outdoor play experience. I think it's quite phenomenal. Anyway, the Consulate General did a special McDonalds event for all the members of the team and their parents. Unfortunately, McDonalds hamburgers and fries were not part of the approved diet for the athletes so they couldn't partake of the food. Another locally based US food manufacturer was an official sponsor of the competition and M&Ms chocolate candies from the Mars Company were also part of our celebratory events.

Q: These are candies?

HARTER: Yes, the candy manufacturer. So, we had good opportunities to highlight American products and to use them for special events. M&Ms made special promotional items, including hand-held fans and signs with team cheers and the M&Ms logo for the soccer event. I recall taking all of the parents and the coaches out to dinner at one of my favorite street-side Sichuan restaurants near the Consulate and for a group of fifteen people I think I spent all of about $25 of my representation fund to entertain them with local beer and spicy Sichuan food. Unfortunately that was again something the team members had to miss.

But, we did a number of those kinds of promotion events to give U.S. businesses and artists opportunities to interact with the Chinese community. One of the things I did in Southern China that pleased me the most was to get Agriculture, Commerce and USIA to work together to do joint programs under the auspices of the Consulate General that were directed toward their own target audiences. We actually did a number of promotional events, involving all three of those agencies, which turned out very well. We had a commercial food products show opening in one of the Chinese department stores organized by either our Agriculture or our Commerce unit. I got the other one to participate with representative US products and then convinced USIA to spend some of its funds to bring in a U.S. rock band that was performing in Hong Kong to appear at the grand opening. We set the band up in the parking lot of the department store with all of its sound equipment and we had the parking lot filled to capacity and the construction site next door to the location was filled with workers and others who climbed up onto the building to get a better view. When the concert was over, the crowd piled into the store and many of the US products were sold out very quickly.

On another occasion, the Agriculture Officer was doing a New Orleans style food presentation for our landlord, the White Swan Hotel, with a chef from New Orleans preparing traditional foods for both lunch and dinner menus. One of the Commerce Officers was from New Orleans and I got him to contact some of his friends to see if we could find New Orleans musicians who might be willing to come to China for a couple of weeks. Once he found them, I got the USIA office to get this Zydeco band invited under USIS auspices. I got Commerce to work with United Airlines to get the musicians free transportation to China in return for United publicity material being placed at the White Swan Hotel. United was agreeable because they were trying to get rights to fly to China and in the meantime were still taking a lot of U.S. bound passengers from China through their operations in neighboring Hong Kong. We worked with the White Swan Hotel to give the musicians free rooms and meals in return for their performances at the hotel dining room events. And, during the daytime we were able to get the musicians over to the local university music department to offer classroom instruction on Zydeco and other traditional New Orleans music. It ended up being a multi-dimensional, multi-agency operation that was very, very successful and each of the three agencies contributed to making it work for themselves and for the others as well. And, the Consulate General was the big winner because all of the Chinese entities involved were satisfied with what they got out of it. So often overseas these agencies operate in their own little worlds and never, never try to do anything with one another. In the worst cases, they are each trying to outdo one another as though it was some sort of competition.

Q: When an American business person would come to talk to you, what would you tell them in setting up? What were the good things and the bad things at that particular time?

HARTER: Well, of course the pressures for payoffs and under-the-table payments and things of that sort were very heavy in southern China. And, Americans of course had to be very careful of both the US laws and regulations on corrupt practices as well as local laws. Relationships with local partners also took a lot of cultivating and many a company foundered because it didn't do due diligence in selecting its partner. Much of what I talked about with American businesses related to these issues. I also spent a lot of time explaining how the signing of the first MOU was in fact, just the beginning of the negotiation with a Chinese entity.

A Memorandum of Understanding, a cooperation agreement, is an agreement to cooperate between a Chinese entity and a U.S. business firm which set out the basic target of a business. It was difficult to get the businessmen to understand the Chinese hadn't really started to bargain or work on a partnership at all until after that MOU was signed. MOUs really meant nothing. They were just a significant showing of interest and willingness to proceed with a lot of other, often very difficult negotiations.

I can remember one Massachusetts company's multi-month conversations with a local municipality that would have provided modern equipment and technical management expertise for the city's power plants. I had briefed the U.S. businessmen each time they came to China and gave them my thoughts on how to proceed with their discussions. On a trip back to the U.S. on consultations which also included some public speaking engagements, I stopped at their headquarters and again talked about how their deal was progressing. Finally, everything seemed about to be finalized. Even though the U.S. company team had been there for more than a week and had already engaged in a number of different sessions with the local officials, the municipality authorities balked on some last minute arrangements and postponed a couple of "final" discussions that were to take place before the actual agreement was signed. Now I should point out, all of this was taking place toward the end of December. It was either 1990 or 1991 and the Americans were all anxious to get home for the holidays with their families. "Reluctantly" the Chinese agreed to one more meeting, scheduled at 6:00 pm just before a small banquet dinner which was now scheduled for Christmas Eve, ensuring the Americans would all miss out on their holiday at home.

I agreed to sit in with the businessmen to demonstrate USG interest in seeing the two sides reach agreement and to provide any last minute suggestions to help the Americans. The Chinese officials knew what they were doing, they knew exactly what they were doing. They knew the American team wanted to get out of there and wanted to go home for the holidays, but they had strung them down to the wire. The senior US businessman made the last little concession the local officials felt was needed to make the municipal government satisfied and we concluded the agreement somewhere around 8:00 pm and adjourned for dinner and a few well earned maotai toasts. The U.S. businessmen didn't get out of town until Christmas Day and by the time they were back in Massachusetts they only had the New Year's Holiday left to enjoy with family and friends. But, that was the way the Chinese would work and do business to exploit their leverage.

And, it didn't make any difference whether it was Americans or other nationalities coming in. They played the same tricks with Overseas Chinese who would come in to negotiate business deals. Because I had worked in Hong Kong previously, I knew a number of these Hong Kong entrepreneurs – Li Ka Shing, Gordon Wu, Henry Fok – who came to arrange major investments, primarily in the Guangzhou consular district provinces. The Chinese Merchant Steamship Navigation Company, for example, developed the entire Shekou District of Shenzhen. Gordon Wu had brokered and then built a major power plant to supply the electrical needs of all of the towns and factories in the Pearl River Delta. Then he came to the local authorities to pitch the construction of a super-highway from the Hong Kong border and the Shenzhen Special Economic Zone (SEZ) all the way to Guangzhou. Once that leg was completed, he then planned to build a parallel route that would go down the other side of the delta to the Zhuhai SEZ opposite Macau. When I first heard the idea during my early 1980s tour in Hong Kong I thought this was a ridiculous idea, because there just wasn't enough traffic to justify that kind of expenditure. I used to tease Gordon that he just wanted to get on a big road away from all the traffic in Hong Kong so he could open up the speed on his big Mercedes sedan or on one of his family sports cars. And I suggested the only money he would make would be by ensuring his friends and their high powered Lamborghinis could get out on the road and have a good time. But he was truly prescient. The road concept proved to be a phenomenal success and a big money earner. Gordon negotiated, as part of his concession, the right to collect the tolls for a period of time, as well as the right to develop land at the interchanges and so he then became the new developer for a slew of satellite towns and factories along the edges of this new highway.

HARTER: The plan was a fantastic achievement. Gordon was a Princeton educated architect engineer. He was a pioneer in Asia's development of build/operate/transfer power plants. He would sign a contract to build a large power plant and for his investment would receive the right to sell the electricity for a period of time until the contract called for the plant to be turned over to the local authorities. His success on the big plant in Guangdong gave him entree to do similar projects in Thailand and the Philippines. And, his timing for the project coincided with the big burst of growth in the Pearl River Delta with its export-oriented factories and its SEZ investment areas.

Q: Any more stories, did Hong Kong capture southern China or vice versa?

HARTER: Li Ka Shing's investments were in land development, industry and hotels. His Hong Kong holding company, Cheung Kong Holdings, was the largest Chinese enterprise in the colony and it dominated land development, warehousing, and hotels. The Hong Kong Hilton down the street from the ConGen was a Li Ka Shing enterprise that the Hong Kong ConGen used all the time to put up visitors. Li rebuilt and modernized the hotel while I was there and then eventually took it down to put up an even larger commercial building because of its prime location adjacent to the Bank of China and the Hong Kong-Shanghai Bank which was the old British standby. Li had come to Hong Kong as a refugee and made his first fortune producing plastic flowers in a small factory in Kowloon. As a refugee from the Communist takeover of China, he might have seemed an odd businessman for the China operations, but Li was above all a businessman and he knew where money could be made.

Henry Fok, on the other hand, had been a long-time supporter of the communists and he had made a good deal of money smuggling items into China during the Korean War. He was on the U.S. blacklist during the war and for some time afterward. I met him while I was in Hong Kong and had numerous subsequent meetings with his son. All of the top Chinese businessmen ran their enterprises as family businesses with the children expected to follow in the father's footsteps. (At that time, Gordon was the exception because his children were still not even teenagers.) Henry Fok was the investor who built the White Swan Hotel and who did a lot of investment in Fujian Province, his original home in China. Because he also spent time in Guangzhou, he built a whole new wing on the municipal hospital with a cardiac center equipped with all of the latest equipment and foreign-trained Chinese doctors who could take care of all the geriatric Chinese businessmen and investors who were constantly in and out of Guangzhou. The local doctors there were contacts of ours at the Consulate and they were very helpful when we had American tourists with medical problems – the kind you suggested in an early session that became known as “death by duck.” On one occasion I had to take my wife there in the middle of the night because she had developed a terrible case of hives. We wandered around a number of wards in the old section of the hospital before we could find anybody to get us into the more modern cardiac section and it was a real lesson in contrasts. Thereafter, we made sure we had regular contact information for the duty doctors in that part of the hospital.

Q: American Business comes in and sets up operation there. I'm talking about during your time. And, they finally after a lot of very difficult negotiation set up things. Was that just the beginning of trouble or had the Chinese learned that you don't keep trying to; you know I'm talking about bribes. You don't get labor, you don't, I mean all sorts of things can happen.

HARTER: Well, for the most part, one of the key elements of my in-briefing for the new businessmen was, be sure of what your partner can do; make sure your partner has some capabilities, not just connections, but capabilities. But, if you decide you're going to have a partner who has no intrinsic-to-the-business capabilities and you only intend to use him for his connections to get things approved, then make sure your agreement restricts his ability to get involved in the management of your enterprise. Finally, make sure the percentages of shared responsibility and profits reflect the work to be done, that you can repatriate profits in hard currency, and that you have an acceptable means of settling disputes. If the partner was a facilitator rather than a participant in the business, it was best to limit his involvement to his collection of a percentage of profits and appropriate fees for his facilitation work. I also warned the businessmen who were taking on partners with existing factories that they had to be firm about hiring workers. The first thing a Chinese partner wanted you to do was to absorb all of its workers. That was a recipe for disaster because most of the workers had very limited skills and didn't do much of anything on the factory floor. Chinese factory workers were way in excess of the needs for any given factory's operational requirements and the amount of redundancy could be as high as 50 or 60 percent. The American businessman had to make sure he had a say in hiring and to emphasize he wanted a new batch of people to train for the new work styles involved in modern manufacturing.

Proctor and Gamble did one of the best investment development programs I've ever seen and I used their experiences as a model and lesson plan for a lot of others. P&G had gotten started before I arrived, though they had not yet started production of the P&G shampoo product that was to start their overall line. They initially partnered with a local soap company and upgraded the local company's facilities so they could begin producing for the local market, getting their brands more well known, and developing an understanding of how the local market operated. At the same time they were starting to build a factory that would enable them to then produce their own products under better conditions – like a more open plant floor with mechanized conveyor belts moving the product through the production and bottling and packing phases of operations. They had a really good working relationship with this particular partner. The partner got his products upgraded as part of the deal and he helped P&G get permission for local sales of the P&G products. This was a very tricky issue with the Chinese Government because it was always trying to insist on the foreign investors agreeing to export their products in order for China to earn foreign exchange. The Chinese were often also very restrictive on the repatriation of profits. At the beginning this was not a big issue for many of the investors as they were trying to expand their businesses and using up their local currency to do that expansion and pay for factory construction meant corporate money wasn't being spent. But eventually, they all wanted to bring home the bacon and the Chinese made that difficult. I can recall learning of stories of companies buying Chinese products with their excess local currency and then trying to market those products abroad. One big seller during that period was Chinese carpets and I think even P and G at one time or another purchased Chinese carpets as a way of getting profits out of China.

I tried to get other investors as they came in to look at how P and G had set up its investment and to look at how the partnership agreements were worked out. And, Proctor and Gamble was generally pretty good about that. They were willing to let other people know how they had actually gone about doing business. So, they were a big help for people like Avon and Amway when they came in and tried to start their own manufacturing operations. I was there when P and G's first products came off the line in the partner's factory and I was the U.S. official who participated in the new factory dedication with P and G's CEO and other top American officials from the company. I later watched them roll off new product lines including bar soaps and Pampers at the Huangpu factory site. I also spent a lot of time with delegations from GE that were evaluating a variety of investment opportunities for different operating divisions from small appliances and light bulbs to bigger sales promotions for turbines, engines and other such items. When GE finally inked its first deal, Jack Welch came to town with the Italian GE Vice President who succeeded him and we spent some time together discussing business operations in China. I also had the chance to work with a small business investment group that included former Cabinet Secretary Elliott Richardson among its members and I had several sessions and trips to factory sites with him and his partners during this tour.

Q: Avon is cosmetics?

HARTER: Right, right. This was another real tremendous breakthrough, because Avon was allowed to do what it has done traditionally in the United States, door-to-door, sales and marketing where individuals basically ran their own operations. Although the original sales operation was to be restricted, initially Guangzhou and a couple of adjacent areas in Guangdong, it spread very quickly through individual initiative. What was most important, it provided a tremendous opportunity for women, and all of a sudden there was a great deal of upward mobility for women in south China.

Q: As you say this, I can think of a horror of allowing Chinese women who are not known for being passive really when they get going in business things to turn that loose on their fellow ladies.

HARTER: It was absolutely unreal in terms of how fast they grew. When Avon started out the company brought into Guangzhou what it thought would be a six months supply of products. At the beginning, Avon could only produce a few of the products so they had to bring in supplies from outside to get started. The “six month supply” was gone in a week and a half. The company had to bring in huge quantities of products from other factories outside the country – I think it was mostly from the Philippines – in order just to be able to meet the explosive demand as they tried to get their own production capabilities expanded and producing at a full capacity right from the start. This was very expensive for Avon because it had to pay all the duties on the imported products, exactly what it had hoped to avoid by setting up its own production facilities in Guangdong. But they just couldn’t keep up with demand, particularly after the Chinese ladies decided they could determine the sales zones on their own.

Q: Well, you’re talking about something that has been a dream of entrepreneurs from outside.

HARTER: Right. Sell an aspirin or a bottle of coke to every Chinese and you’ve made a million dollars.

Q: It use to be oil for the lamps of China and all this stuff.

HARTER: What you had initially for the Avon ladies was a group that was recruited, interviewed and hired by Avon representatives who came out from the states. But, thereafter, the ladies who went out to sell from this first tranche were picking their own sub-dealers and other intermediaries. They had sales staff networks where some ladies at the top of the chain were making as much as three and four thousand U.S. dollars a month from their commissions and sales. These ladies usually did some sales of their own but for the most part they were running a series of other people down below them. I’m not sure this ever would have passed muster with Mao Zedong and Marx and Lenin were surely already rolling in their graves.

Avon, as I said, was originally designed to focus on the Guangzhou area and the Pearl River delta regions down to the Shenzhen and Zhuhai SEZs (special economic zone). So the sales area was originally confined to only a part of Guangdong Province. But, once they were in business, these Chinese ladies went out and bought an airplane ticket and got on a plane with their samples boxes and order forms and all of a sudden they were in all of the big cities of China. Avon products were turning up in Western China among the Muslim tribal areas. Avon products were available in Shanghai almost over night. Avon products were in Beijing, simply because these ladies said, “Why do I have to stay in Guangdong? There’s already a whole bunch of ladies down here selling these products, I’m going up to Beijing where there’s nobody else selling it.” Before long, Avon, was one of the biggest enterprises in all of China. They became so successful that a few years later the Chinese decided this arrangement was getting out of hand as a kind of pyramid program and they forced Avon to sell out, though I believe Avon was able to return and resume operations without the direct sales approach. Basically, I think the pyramid scheme argument was a mask for a Chinese Party decision that there was too much “independence” and lack of control in a direct marketing program.

Others came to China and started this same kind of pyramid door-to-door sales program. The two college classmates who created Amway and the combination of detergent and cleaning products as well as personal care products also came in and set up a factory to produce their product lines and then recruited a sales force to market door-to-door. They had less of an appeal than Avon, because there was a real lack of local competition for the Avon products. For Amway and its detergents and cleaning products, they ran head on into Proctor and Gamble and the big British Unilever group.

Q: Did you run across problems, I'm not sure where they started, but you know, I think of the triads and the criminal type things wanting to edge in and all that.

HARTER: Yes, that was a very significant problem but in a different way. You didn't have them trying to get into the business world or trying to extort money for protection. The big item was smuggling luxury goods into China. And then, during the time I was in Guangzhou we had the real start on a large scale of Chinese being smuggled into the United States. There were all sorts of routes and systems involved. Some groups went through Europe or Latin America, with the latter coming up and across the Mexican border. There were groups who came to Canada on transit visas, left the airport and were walked or driven across the Canadian-U.S. border. There were groups brought across the Pacific in cargo containers and then smuggled out of west coast ports. This also meant a big upsurge in false documents, passports, visas, stamps and seals and photos. Government officials connived in the process and for a fee they produced documentation that prospective students would use to submit to U.S. universities in order to gain admission. Faked papers from U.S. universities would also be submitted and the volume of applicants at the windows was such that people got a very short screening. Over time, the consular section interviewers' presumption was that most of the documents they were looking at were fraudulent and the basic interview starting point "prove to me you are not an intending immigrant" had an even more negative take in Guangzhou.

For those who were going to go to the U.S. on a more direct route, this was the way to go. You had to get documents good enough to make it on the plane. Once on board, you simply destroyed the documents or passed them on to a handler who would then recycle them for future use. Then the document-less Chinese would stand in front of the immigration desk and ask for political asylum, just as they had been coached to say when they were preparing to come to America. On the United States end, the enforcement system was, and largely still is, farcical. Someone would be stopped as an undocumented alien, an illegal immigrant. Once they claimed political asylum, they were under the protection of the U.S. courts and they had to be given a hearing. Detention facilities for the illegal aliens were over-crowded and couldn't handle the influx so the illegal alien would be told to return for an interview and hearing in three or four months. At that point, they were gone. They didn't return for the interview and INS didn't have the personnel to go out and look for them.

Since all of this had been arranged for a very healthy fee, most of these individuals became sweat shop slaves, working to pay off their transportation and facilitation debt. Because they were also being charged for their room and board, their debt tended to increase rather than decrease. Young attractive women were recruited or forced into prostitution and drug running. Strong, aggressive males were recruited for drug running and as enforcers to help control the large numbers of people in the system.

I spent a lot of time talking to people in INS and State and other agencies and for the longest time everybody said, “You can’t do anything with this. There’s no way we can stop it; we can’t turn people around; and we’ll just have to do something different.” I said, “That’s unacceptable. We cannot allow trafficking in human lives. We cannot accept this as a norm. You need to try and take out the criminal element that is making money on this process.” And, I actually made enough noise and objections that INS and the Department convened a regional meeting in Hong Kong for the very first time sometime in 1992 to try to determine how to slow if not stop the process. I personally could never understand why the US Government automatically extended the protection of the U.S. Constitution to an intending immigrant who had no documentation just because he or she had managed to reach a US airport. To me, the fact they arrived without documentation indicated they had already committed a crime and therefore should have been immediately subject to deportation. We could have created some system that would have permitted the human rights victim to be screened out of this direct deportation arrangement. But even then that screening system might not have been used very frequently because the human rights activists had usually been successfully interviewed abroad at a US embassy or consulate.

I decided it was simply a question of having to go back to the source of the smuggling efforts and in southern China, the source was generally Fujian Province, the northernmost province in our district. The smugglers were working with relatives from Taiwan, across the Taiwan Straits, because most of the people in Taiwan were of Fujian ancestry. There were Chinese in Indonesia and Malaysia and Singapore who were also originally from Fujian and they were part of the intermediary points that moved the Chinese in stages to the U.S. I took it on myself to start putting pressure on the government authorities in Fujian Province. We started by having the Consular section question the people the Fujian government was sending down to us with recommendations for visa issuance. We scrutinized local Fujian government documents and found many of them were fraudulent. We started putting pressure on them to do a better job of screening the people before they were sent to Guangzhou. The Fujian Government operation was probably the most corrupt of any that I have ever had to deal with. Government officials were getting kickbacks from individuals who wanted to get to the U.S. and they were also working with the people smugglers because many of those being smuggled were Fujian residents. Fujian Province officials invited us to come to the province to work with them and I took the Consular Section chief and sometimes others from that section to Fujian to talk about the issues. Over the course of long meetings, long banquet dinners with myriad liquor toasts, they tried to get us to simplify our scrutiny and to accept their recommendations and referrals but I would not budge and we regularly rejected visa applicants who had been recommended by the provincial authorities.

Actually this reminds me of some local color stories associated with our trips. On one of the early trips I had brought the Consular Section Chief, Bernadette Allen, and the newly arrived Economic Section Chief, Steve Spangler, to Fujian with me to meet with the provincial officials but also to go out into the countryside and see some of the local areas where there were issues of interest to both of those sections. For both Bernadette and Steve, this was their first foray into the Chinese provincial banquet circuit. On this particular occasion, as I noted just a moment ago, the provincial authorities kept us at the toasts and drinking Chinese liquor for some time. When all the courses had been completed, they took us off to the hotel's karaoke lounge and a private room where we could continue to drink and, of course, sing. Then as the evening wound down, the Chinese officials proposed that I go off with them to write up an agreement on visa issuance procedures. Needless to say we did not reach or even work on such an agreement that evening or at any time during the visit. Aside from the copious amounts of liquor, our hosts had provided us with a rather standard set of dishes for our banquet meal. That was not the case however when we left Fuzhou and went out into the mountainous region to the west of the city. There we were entertained with snake bile liquor, snake soup and a variety of other unmentionable or unrecognizable animal ingredients. Both Steve and Bernadette managed to "hang in there" and upheld the honor of the U.S. side but they remained amazed that this was what I usually encountered on my provincial travels and that I still continued to make the trips.

Q: In a way there are two different things. One is the fake papers which Hong Kong had been dealing with for, all of a sudden now you are able to get to the villages where these people say they're from. Was the INS able to get in there and your people get in there to the villages. Use to have these books on where was the well of such and such a village and all that.

HARTER: We actually did get some of our people in there. Sometimes it wasn't quite so easy for the Americans to go and we had to send some of our local employees into more remote areas where the appearance of a foreigner would be a lot more suspicious. We ended up having to do the exact same thing when I was in Vietnam later on, because we found the same smuggling enterprise developing in Vietnam that we'd had a decade earlier in China. The INS people who were in Vietnam in the late '90s and their local employees ended up having to do a lot of those investigations.

One of the issues that we got involved in in Guangzhou, and one that was later to be paralleled in Vietnam, was the start of agency promoted adoptions of Chinese babies. This was another one of those situations where fraud and mismanagement and corruption crept in. There were agencies and individuals in the United States who were unscrupulous. There were government officials and local hospitals and both Chinese and American adoption facilitators who were "buying" and "selling" babies and some were passing on babies that had illnesses to unsuspecting American parents. One of the worst things you can imagine dealing with is someone who has just started to bond with a baby and then is told the baby can't go to the United States because of bad documents or procedures.

Q: Oh that's terrible!

HARTER: We had a couple of those cases while I was there. Some of them got nasty and involved lawsuits and Congressional interventions. We also had situations where adopting parents had bonded with the baby, and the baby died in their arms after only a couple of days while they were in the midst of processing the paperwork.

Q: Where were the babies coming from?

HARTER: Mostly from the rural parts of Hunan, an inland province, next to Guangdong, but also from Guangdong and Fujian provinces. Sometimes people would get babies from the North, but most of them were coming out of the South.

Q: Almost all of them girls weren't they?

HARTER: They were occasionally some boys, but most all of them were girls, that's right.

Q: I was in Seoul in the 1970s, Consular General there and we were processing about 5,000 adopted babies a year. However, it worked. I mean, we had anti-fraud procedures in place which seemed to be pretty good checks. The kids were healthy kids for the most part.

HARTER: Well, you had a different operating environment in Korea. You're able to get around a lot more; you're able to deal a lot more openly in Korea as an American government official than you are in China. So, it was a lot harder to do some of those checks and to verify the paperwork and procedures in the adoption facilities or the hospitals. And, we just simply didn't have the manpower to be able to go out and cover a country as vast as China.

Q: What about doctors for visas, particularly for the children, but for the others too? Were you able to have a fairly good medical screening system?

HARTER: Yes, we did. We did pretty good medical screening. We used the provincial facilities in Guangzhou and even did some of our work through the doctors in the special cardiac center I mentioned earlier. They had all the latest equipment and a number of western trained doctors.

Q: Were you seeing any reflection of all the Chinese who went to the United States to get educated? Were a significant number coming back?

HARTER: No, not at that time. No, significant numbers were not coming back. The original tranche of students were the so-called "cadre kids," children of the leadership in the government apparatus and the Communist Party. Many of them came back because they were being groomed for Party and Government positions based on their parents' status. After that group of students and as the numbers grew significantly most of the student did not return. I'm not sure that the students intended to stay permanently, but I do believe they intended to spend a significant amount of time in the US after their university studies were completed. At this particular time, there was still not a lot of opportunity for the well-educated Chinese student to succeed in China and so staying abroad meant greater options and the ability to send money back to the family. It was only later, probably around the turn of the century, when the Chinese economy began to generate its own momentum that these Chinese began to return home and the recent graduates of that era didn't stay as long in the US after graduation.

Q: How about the Taiwan connection in your area?

HARTER: The Taiwan connection was very big. We had a lot of Taiwan businessmen who came in to work both in Fujian and in Guangdong. They were investors in a variety of seafood enterprises in particular, because they had markets that they had developed in Taiwan to supply Japan. They came in and they set up eel farms, and fish farms, and shrimp farms to raise and process these foodstuffs for Japan. We had a number of Taiwan business people who worked with Americans to help develop projects. That was also a good cooperation, because the Chinese had certain access on one hand, but then could use the Americans as the intermediary for dealing with the government in a way that, you know, use the influence and the power of the United States. So, it was a good combination between the two. This was particularly evident in the shoe industry, the athletic shoe industry with all the top U.S. brands at one point moving out of Taiwan and South Korea and almost entirely into southern China.

I can recall a particular visit to the Shantou SEZ which is in the northern part of Guangdong just south of the border with Fujian. This was another area that was the home for a significant number of Overseas Chinese and thus a natural area for China to set up as a Special Economic Zone to attract Overseas Chinese investors. On this visit, I was meeting with a Communist Party official who had been in the area for a long time. He was explaining to me that the local farmers outside Shantou were no longer producing rice and they were importing the rice from across the border to meet their needs. I questioned him about this because I knew that farmers liked to produce rice at least for their own consumption because they often thought that the “local variety” of rice was just a bit better than what was produced elsewhere. He agreed, but said it was more important to make money out of the land. He then sketched for me the evolution of the recent year’s investments in different land utilization practices. He said that vegetable production had been the first stage of the farmer’s evolution into entrepreneur status. Those farmers living closest to Shantou or closest to the main highway were the first to make the change. But then when lots of people got into the vegetable business, some of the more prosperous farmers decided to invest in orange trees and other forms of fruit trees. This was good because it brought both a higher return in the local sales market, but it also opened up opportunities for international sales, to Hong Kong and Japan. He didn’t make the obvious mention of Taiwan sales but we both knew that Taiwan was also a buyer of the local fruit. Then, once these farmers were in the international market, they drew the attention of Taiwan and Japan investors who came in and convinced them to convert their fruit tree groves to eel and fish farms, particularly eel farms. This was totally for export and almost exclusively for Japan. While I was there I visited a number of the eel farms and saw how the live eels were shipped in plastic bags of water and air on the flights out of Shantou airport for Japan. There were also a couple of farms which set up their own factory production facilities so that they killed, cleaned, and roasted the eels in a special soy sauce and then shipped them in hermetically sealed pouches direct to the supermarkets of Japan. This was even more profitable than just shipping the live eels to Japan. But I digress, the main story I wanted to tell was how surprising it was to hear this long-time Communist party member talking about ordinary farmers giving up their rice paddy fields for entrepreneurial activity to make more and more money. He never once indicated that this was somehow out of step with communist economic theory. He was just proud of how the people in his district were prospering

Q: Were relations with Taiwan and Japan, they seem to go up and down. I was wondering whether that was reflected in the business or did that sort of have a life of its own?

HARTER: During this time period the relationship, I think was pretty stable. There were no big incidents, there were no major defections of pilots and aircraft along the coast, there was no test shelling of a rocket here or there. All of that came much later. Taiwan was only slowly easing out of its Kuomintang domination period into a more pluralistic political system. The mainlanders were still in control and so Beijing was not so worried about a political system that looked like Taiwanese running Taiwan for the Taiwanese and looking to have an “independent” status for the island. I don’t believe there was any incident or difficulties during that time involving the Japanese. The big disputes about textbooks and the Japanese Prime Minister visiting the shrine to the war dead came at different times.

Q: What about us on the Consular side, Americans getting into trouble. Was that much of a problem?

HARTER: We had some, minor issues with Americans in jail or under investigation – usually regarding a business complaint – but nothing significant. Nothing, nothing of major consequence that I can recall, not even anything like the Lisa Wichser case I was working when I was on the China desk.

Q: What about, say an American gets into conflict with his Chinese partners or something?

HARTER: That was definitely complicated. There were certain circumstances where Chinese businessmen absconded with certain funds or factory equipment just disappeared. They were also similar cases where the American wasn’t exactly above board. I got complaints from Chinese officials and Chinese business people about a particular American who had promised something and collected the funds for it and never delivered it. We had a few issues like that. But, these were issues where the Consulate and even the US Government had no control and we had to just simply tell the Chinese that it’s a question of caveat emptor, the buyer’s got to be aware of what he’s making an agreement to buy and with whom he is dealing.

Q: What about, I mean were any Americans in jail?

HARTER: A couple of times, I can recall where we had an American in jail. I can’t remember anybody being in jail for anything terribly significant. We didn’t have any murders; we didn’t have any rape cases or things of that sort. It was usually drunk and disorderly I guess or bad documents, or expired documents, things of that sort. So, we did have some cases where Americans in jail and our American Citizen Service officer had to visit them periodically.

Q: Was there much in the way of American men, usually older men arriving to find a bride and that sort of things?

HARTER: This wasn’t a big industry like it is in some other areas in Asia or Eastern Europe. It was more often elderly Chinese from the U.S. looking for younger Chinese women. But, it was not the same sort of thing you’d have in Thailand or as it would later be in Vietnam. There you had both Overseas Vietnamese from the U.S. seeking a younger, less Westernized woman as well as older Caucasians seeking young brides.

Q: And some of these were very fake. I mean these were guys that arrived, fall in love at the airport with a young lady and come in the next day to the embassy in order to get married.

HARTER: Oh yes, to be sure. There were a number of the “love at first sight” occurrences.

There were certain cases of people who showed up in ACS (American Citizens Services) which looked like they were just part of the people smuggling process. Somebody came in and arranged a wedding in order to bring the person to the states, simply for the purpose of immigration. We did certainly have some of that, yes. And, I can recall INS had to look at a couple of those arranged marriages.

Q: Is there anything else we should cover about this time you were there?

HARTER: It was again, a very wide open, very entrepreneurial time period for Southern China. They were really getting their teeth into development and growth and very quick to dispense with communist ideology when it came to economics and business. They were averaging during that time period, 18, 20 percent or more growth each year.

I recall Ambassador Jim Lilley coming down to visit a couple of times with the express intent of going out into the provinces to see what the south's economic development was all about. He too was amazed to see what was going on. I recall he was also very proud of his staff in China and he noted how when we went off to meet with provincial and local government officials we all conducted our meetings in Chinese even though the Chinese often had interpreters set up for the meetings. He commented to me that none of his other colleagues in Beijing had similar capabilities among their staffs either in Beijing or in their Consulates.

I guess I should also mention the other Consulates that were in Guangzhou at that time. Once again I organized a monthly luncheon group among the various CG's in town. The group included the Poles, the Japanese, the Australians, the French, and the Thai. The Poles had been there the longest because they had been one of the first to recognize the PRC and because they needed someone in southern China to look out for Polish seamen on the Polish and Eastern European ships that delivered trade goods to and from the PRC.

There was a North Korean office in Guangzhou as well but nobody ever associated with the North Koreans. Even the Chinese officials were a bit stand-offish when it came to the North Koreans. I can recall the head of the Guangdong Provincial Foreign Affairs Office telling me that the North Koreans were into smuggling and all sorts of unsavory activities and that they virtually never came to any official events. I can't recall ever seeing them at any provincial events which involved the consular corps though I did see their dark colored sedan occasionally on the streets of Guangzhou. The Vietnamese also had consulates in Guangzhou and in Guangxi province but these had been closed during the 1979 border war. Toward the end of 1992, the Vietnamese and Chinese resumed the staffing of their respective consular missions and a Vietnamese Consul General appeared. I was the Dean of the Consular Corps at that time and it was my duty to welcome him to Guangzhou and he participated in the last few luncheon gatherings which I attended before leaving China in January of 1993.

The luncheons served as a chance to review general events in the consular district and occasionally to talk about the larger events in China. We also reviewed consular issues and our relations with the Guangdong Government and I recall we made joint demarches to the government on a number of occasions about local policies or to seek better access to government officials. As a result we got an annual group meeting with the Governor of Guangdong and we successfully resisted the Foreign Affairs Office effort to have us make all of our appointments to see provincial officials through the FAO.

As a result of our “activism”, the Foreign Affairs Office also tried to be more open and provide more opportunities for us to participate in provincial events. One of the most enjoyable was attendance at the annual lychee festival in one or another of the Pearl River Delta municipalities or counties. We’d travel by tour bus to the locale and after the usual ceremonial greetings we’d go out into the orchards where the lychees were being picked. Fresh lychee just picked off the tree is especially sweet and we’d all be covered in sticky juice. After the required farewell banquet, we’d all be presented with big baskets full of lychees to take home.

I guess I should also note that I again assigned the three political and economic officers to cover each of the outlying provinces in our consular district, leaving Guangdong to be covered by everyone. Political and economic officers were to be responsible for all activities in their respective provinces and not just issues in their own cones. This developed a better understanding of the issues and personalities in the provinces. The three officers also were tasked to mentor junior officers who were interested in doing reporting work. Because we had such a large consular section, most of them were first tour officers and not all of them belonged to the consular cone. So, I encouraged them to try to get out of the Consulate and to take some in-country travel. If they traveled in the consular district – and there were some worthwhile things to see and do in the consular district – I told them I would not charge them annual leave if they proposed and I approved an investigative reporting topic that they could complete as a result of their travels. Then, I’d have one of the political or economic officers review and develop their reports for transmission to Washington. Although I guess relations between consulates and the embassy are often a good bit more structured and constrained, we did not have any such limitations while I was in China. We reported directly to Washington without clearing our materials with Beijing. Occasionally, Beijing would ask us to submit some information to assist the Embassy to complete a tasking from Washington, but it was more usual for us to be tasked and to respond directly to Washington.

Q: Was there concern about, on our part about the environment?

HARTER: We certainly did have concerns about the environment. We tried to make sure that American manufacturers that went to China paid some attention to that too. We advocated they not just simply export a lot of old systems and old technologies that would create environmental problems. While I was there, there were a number of scandals involving fires in over-crowded dormitories where the companies hadn’t taken the proper safety precautions and hundreds of people died in the fires. Fortunately these did not involve U.S. companies, but people who were working in these factories were often producing directly for the US markets. We tried to encourage American businesses to develop good business operations and practices as though they were in the U.S. and to try to encourage better local conditions for the workers in these factories. It was easier to do with companies that were actually producing products in their own or joint venture factories than it was for those that only involved buying up production or factory output that was owned by another investor. The garment and toy industry largely fell into this latter category. Southern China export industry factories often had sweat shop conditions with poor ventilation, inadequate lighting and safety equipment. These factories often ran all day long and the successive shift workers shared dormitory beds with those on other shifts.

When I was talking about before about the U.S.-Taiwan partnership, Nike had basically partnered with a lot of Taiwan shoe manufacturers who came in and set up the facilities to manufacture Nike shoes. Some Korean factories also were moved and this occasionally meant there were Korean managers running the factories. Some of these factories were first rate, with good ventilation in the toxic smelling gluing areas and featured well-lit assembly lines with good equipment that protected the workers along the line. Workers wore masks so they weren't inhaling the fumes or the residue of the fabric that floated in the air. But others were 180 degrees opposite and it all depended on the Taiwan or Korean manager/owner. Human rights organizations in the U.S. occasionally would target NIKE or some other manufacturers because of poor conditions for the workers.

A lot of Nike's bad publicity in the late 1990s in Vietnam came about as a result of this sort of situation. The local Nike representative there wasn't paying much attention to the factories in Vietnam and didn't recognize their link to NIKE's image. The Korean and Taiwan-run factories there just got out of hand and I can remember there were charges a Korean manager was involved in beating workers. NIKE didn't have a very good public relations staff at the time and they added to the problem with some inept press releases. NIKE had an overall responsibility to set some basic standards for production and for treating workers but it was certainly difficult to do when they had no control of day-to-day operations on the factory floor. Once again, this was an area where P&G had an excellent reputation and its quality control procedures and its overall worker-owner relationship was outstanding.

Q: In Summary how would you differentiate the workload at Guangzhou from other China posts?

HARTER: The obvious difference between Guangzhou and the other China posts was first and foremost our immigrant visa work for all of China and the much higher volume of adoptions we were handling as China adoptions became popular in the U.S. Beyond that, the Consulate General's major operational focus was support for U.S. businesses seeking to get into the China market. As CG, I spent a lot of time advising businessmen and working with them in their dealings with local officials and government-owned factories. Showing the flag, was clearly a commercial endeavor, much like it was when the US first appeared in China in the 18th Century and when we established a presence on Shamian Island in the 19th Century. It was too bad I didn't have a big sailing vessel since the Consulate building backed directly on the Pearl River.

DAVID DEAN
Trustee, Board of American Institute in Taiwan
Washington, DC (1989-1995)

David Dean was born in New York City in 1925 and graduated from Harvard. He entered the Foreign Service in 1951. He served in numerous posts including Kuala Lumpur, Rotterdam, Taichung, Hong Kong and Taipei. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1998.

DEAN: Yes. I stayed on the Board of Directors of AIT as a trustee. I had been on the Board since it was founded on the 16th of January, 1979, and I stayed on it at their request when I left Taipei in December of 1989. I was on the Board up until September of '95. The reason I left, as you may know, was because the administration appointed a man named James Wood to the chairmanship of AIT. When I heard about this I spoke and wrote to Winston Lord, who was Assistant Secretary of State for East Asian Affairs. I told him I looked at Wood's record and that he had no experience whatsoever in the field of relations with China or Taiwan. This was in '95 mind you, at the time when all of these things were going on that I just mentioned, President Lee's visit to Cornell, the Straits crisis leading up a little bit later to the second military crisis and our dispatch of carriers. It was a critical time. My worry was that the administration, even with President Lee's visit and the repercussions from it, still wasn't paying enough attention to what was happening in our relationship with Taiwan and our relationship with the mainland. I felt that they really were allowing a crisis to come to a head by not paying enough attention to it early on. That was one of the reasons I had spoken to Winston Lord. James Wood was sort of a secondary reason. It was pretty clear to me that they weren't paying any attention to what was going on if they intended to name someone without any background to the job.

Q: Was he a political appointee?

DEAN: Yes. They didn't use the normal procedure to get him in. Apparently it was some deal between Moose, who was Under Secretary for Administration and the White House Personnel Office. It later turned out that Wood had gone over to the White House for the last couple of years and was camping out in the White House Personnel Office, trying to get them to appoint him to something.

Q: Who was he?

DEAN: I don't know. He was a lawyer from Arkansas or something, but he had worked in the State Department and in FBO and in diplomatic security. His boss in diplomatic security had called me when he heard about this, and said you don't want someone like that because I had to fire him for lying. Furthermore he caused trouble over properties that diplomatic missions might have in Washington DC, more trouble with the DC officials and with the embassies than you could imagine. All of these things had to be swept up after him. I had this call and a couple of others from employers about him. I didn't want to protest on the basis of his own personal record. I figured the Department should know that, but I based my letters on his lack of background in the area and also on the belief which I had spoken earlier to Holbrooke when we started the operation that it was important to have a Foreign Service officer there who was at least amenable to discipline, knew what the rules were, took orders from the Department and tried to carry them out, and didn't try to create an independent foreign policy. I didn't put all of these things in my letters, unfortunately. Maybe I should have. I sent letters to Winston Lord and Tarnoff, who was the Under Secretary of State then, and to Tony Lake, but the die had been cast. They confirmed the appointment of Wood. Subsequently they fired him about a year later. He kept trying to sue the Department because he felt that AIT should be an independent agency not subject to guidance from the State Department. The State Department lawyers said the whole intent of setting up the American Institute in Taiwan was so that the State Department could use it to carry out policies toward Taiwan. Anyway, I saw the lawyer's letters passing back and forth. It was a very messy thing. Wood also apparently had been trying to steer Chinese businessmen to a consulting firm with which he was associated. According to Nat Bellocchi, he tried to raise funds for the Democratic National Committee in Taiwan and other things. It just proves that for a job of such sensitivity, you have to get someone whom the State Department can rely on to carry out their own requirements. This is what I tried to say, perhaps inexpertly.

Q: Well, you said it expertly. These things are usually decided at a political level. Moose was Under Secretary for Management at that time. He was also from Arkansas and the President was from Arkansas. These things happen.

DEAN: That's right, and I understood that too, but it was unfortunate. I can see things like that happening when you know, you have the case of an Ambassador to London whose only qualifications may be that he speaks English. But you can have a good deputy. But, AIT Washington was a very small office. It has a few people with explicit responsibilities. It doesn't have deputies or DCMs. I'm not talking about Taipei; I'm talking about the Washington office.

Q: Another question back to the time you were in AIT in Taiwan, What was in it for the Taiwanese government to encourage all these investments in Mainland China?

DEAN: It wasn't what was in it for the government; it was because we had forced the value of the NT dollar to rise. Wages in Taiwan went up very rapidly. Formerly they had been a big manufacturer of low wage goods like shoes and textiles and things of that type. Now wages were too high; they couldn't manufacture these things competitively, so it was very easy for them to move to the mainland. The mainland welcomed them. They just took their whole machinery and their managers mostly and sent them over to Fujian. They spoke the same Minnan dialect in Taiwan as they do in southern Fujian province, so they were welcomed with open arms, and the wages were incredibly low in comparison. This was a made in heaven deal for Taiwan's manufacturers of shoes, golf clubs, textiles and a lot of other things where low wages would help a lot. As a result, Taiwan itself has been propelled into the high tech area. Perhaps not by our design but by the circumstances, propelled into computers, electronics, the high end of manufacturing where their high wages are not that much of a drawback. The wages there for computer professionals are still less than they are in the States. They prospered from their factories on the mainland, and they prospered from their new high tech factories in Taiwan.

Q: Did you have any concern at that time about this development?

DEAN: I don't think any of them foretold it. Later on President Lee became concerned about the huge outflow of investment funds as well as factories to the mainland. He is worried that the mainland would have a lever it could use against Taiwan. Already over 20% of Taiwan's exports go to the mainland. They already have a lever. This is to say nothing about the investments that Taiwan has made, over $30 billion of investments on the mainland in factories. I think Lee Teng-hui's government is worried and has prevented some very large investments. The Formosa Plastics Group wanted to invest something like $6-$9 billion on an island just off Xiamen in a big petrochemical plastics complex. He persuaded them not to do it by offering them more land in Taiwan, some place that they could build there. I think that these big companies will eventually invest heavily in the mainland as time goes on. It is hard to say what is going to happen.

Q: What have you been doing since you left AIT?

DEAN: I thought so highly of President Chiang Ching-kuo that I agreed to become an advisor to a foundation that was set up in his memory. It is an academic foundation that gives grants to colleges and universities to encourage Chinese studies, research and books for publication by university presses, for new faculty positions, for senior scholars and for dissertation grants, things of this type. So, I have been doing that two or three days a week, and I write articles. I have written one recently for a book that is to be published, entitled Twenty Years After the Taiwan Relations Act, "a review of U.S. relations with Taiwan." Mine is a chapter in the book and Nat Bellocchi will write a chapter, David Lanx, Jim Lilley, and a few others will also contribute. I have raised funds for a biography of Chiang Ching-kuo. It has been completed by a colleague in the Foreign Service, Jay Taylor, who is putting the finishing touches on the last draft and will send it up to the Harvard University Press shortly. It is a very interesting book; I have read all the different drafts. It is well written, informative, and it goes over many of the things I may have touched on. I hope Harvard will accept it and it will be a popular book.

Q: During this last time you were with AIT what was the role, you mentioned one thing about Madame Chiang Kai-shek, who was a dominant figure for so long. You mentioned the grey ghost.

DEAN: That was the "ghost from Shihlin." That is what the Taiwanese called her when she tried to intervene in the election of the Chairmanship of the KMT after Chiang Ching-kuo died. I don't think the Taiwanese hold her in the same respect as history does, as we do for example or as the mainlanders who live on Taiwan do. Several of my Chinese friends journeyed to New York City for her one hundred and first birthday, I think in April. She is looked upon as one of the last great figures of this century. Certainly she was very prominent during W.W.II in terms of Sino-American relations and certainly she will have a place in history. Some young newspaper woman just came by and interviewed me because I knew her quite well in the olden days. She is writing a biography of Madame Chiang Kai-shek. It is hard to get people to say anything, even people close to her because there have been some scurrilous biographies, as for example Sterling Seagraves' book on the Soong dynasty. It was a case in point, sort of like yellow journalism. So, people are afraid to say anything or to be quoted or anything because they don't know how the author is going to slant things. I have gotten involved in writing some articles about the future relationship between Taiwan and the mainland. A close friend of mine, the publisher of the China Times in Taiwan, Mr. Yu Chi-chung, a remarkable man in his late 80s, wrote an article about the prospects for a confederation or a commonwealth for China and Taiwan. I wrote a similar article at the same time in 1994 for St. Johns University's conference on Taiwan. Mr. Yu gave his opinion in a speech before the Central University in Taiwan. Subsequently even the former chairman of the oppositionist party, the DPP, Democratic Progressive Party, advocated a British Commonwealth solution for Taiwan and the mainland like the British Commonwealth of Nations. Various others have raised this same issue. Even one of the active DPP legislators, who was an academic before he became a legislator, was thinking of a confederation that might even include other Chinese areas. At any rate, it is an idea that probably would be accepted by us and Taiwan and other countries, but not at this time by China. I think in the final analysis this would give Taiwan their independence in everything but name, and a commonwealth name is not a tie that binds too tightly, the only objections probably would come from China. China has promoted their one country two systems that they have used for Hong Kong. But the one country two systems idea they have for Taiwan is much broader than the Hong Kong model. It is not impossible for me to see in some future period, 10 or 20 years from now, when China's definition of one country two systems could expand and become suspiciously like the definition for a commonwealth or a confederation. It would solve the problem for everybody and in a way that would be peaceful and without stress to everybody involved. China is a huge place; Taiwan is a very tiny place. It is true that China can use Taiwan's expertise in trade and everything like that, but essentially China has its own problems. I think they don't want to be forced into a confrontation over Taiwan, but they will if they have to. It is the territorial imperative all over again. It is still an interesting and critical issue. I closed my chapter for the book I mentioned by advocating the same thing, a commonwealth of nations or a confederation.

MARK E. MOHR
Deputy Director, China Affairs
Washington, DC (1990-1992)

Mr. Mohr was born in New York and raised in New York and New Jersey. He was educated at the University of Rochester and Harvard University, where he studied the Chinese language. After service in Korea with the Peace Corps, he joined the Foreign Service in 1969, and served abroad in Taipei, Taichung, Hong Kong, Tokyo, Beijing and Brisbane. In his service at the State Department in Washington, Mr. Mohr dealt primarily with Far East Affairs. After his retirement he worked at the Department of Energy on Nuclear energy matters. In 1997 he was recalled to the State Department, where he worked as Korean desk officer. Mr. Mohr was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2009.

MOHR: In May 1990.

Q: Then what did you do?

MOHR: I took the job as deputy director of the China desk. I wanted to support our people in China in any way I could, and I wanted to be a part of helping to prevent the bilateral relationship from crashing through the floor. If that happened, I felt it might take generations to get it back on track. One of the reasons, as I mentioned previously, for going to the China desk is that I felt the personnel system had not been as responsive as it could have been to the desires of our people in the field.

Q: Well let's talk about first about the personnel system, the personnel in broad administrative terms, what was the problem?

MOHR: I don't really know. Perhaps the China desk was just exhausted from the entire Tiananmen business, and the people there just didn't have the energy to put pressure on personnel to be more responsive to requests from the embassy. In those days, the embassy would send in daily cables called O-Is, which stood for official-informal communications. They involved the nitty-gritty administrative stuff, including personnel issues. We would send in questions or requests in the O-Is, and often many of our queries would go unanswered. I vowed that when I returned to the desk, every issue raised in an O-I would have a response, even if it was an interim response, within 24 hours.

Q: Talking about the communications, I represent an earlier era where we used quill pens, and clipper ships. How did it work when you were there? The internet, was that up and running by that time?

MOHR: This was 1989. There were no cell phones, there was no internet. There were just telegrams, like the O-Is.

Q: How would an O-I work?

MOHR: It was a daily cable to the Department, and it involved administrative matters. But it also included substantive matters. For example, we would comment on policy or on requests from the Department to engage the Chinese on some issue or other.

Q: Would these action messages be screened by the DCM or something to make sure you weren't wasting time?

MOHR: The screening should have been done by the China desk at State, but they didn't do that.

Q: You were on the China desk for how long?

MOHR: For two years, from 1990-1992. As I mentioned, after the Tiananmen incident, the U.S. imposed a set of sanctions against China. All military cooperation ceased, and China's leaders were barred from visiting the United States. The Congress, the media, and public opinion were all critical of this policy. They felt we should be doing more to punish China for shooting the students, especially in the economic area.

A consensus therefore built up to abolish most-favored-nation (MFN) trade status with China. If MFN were taken away from China, Chinese goods into the United States would be taxed at least at double the going rate. If that were to happen, China's trade with the U.S. would be destroyed. As trade with the U.S. was the engine of China's economy, the damage to China would be considerable, and this would probably have set back bilateral relations for decades. Thus, the task of the China desk post-Tiananmen was to preserve MFN for China. President Bush actually told the State Department directly that the China desk was to focus on preserving MFN for China. The basic threat came from Congress. There was a majority on the Hill to take MFN away. Our goal was to find 34 opposing votes in the Senate, enough to sustain a Presidential veto when the legislation passed to remove MFN from China. .

Our task was formidable. Both houses passed the legislation, and after much lobbying we succeeded in sustaining the Presidential veto by one vote; I repeat, one vote. It was a turning point in the history of the relationship, and I don't think either political scientists or historians have appreciated this event. If the vote had gone the other way, we estimated that 10 million jobs would be lost in southern China alone within 3 months of the removal of MFN. China would have suffered severe long-term economic damage. Those within China who never wanted to normalize with the U.S. would have been vindicated. They would have argued that the U.S. never wanted to see China strong and prosperous, that we always wanted to keep China down. In that case, these persons in China would have been put in charge of the bilateral relationship, and China, just like in the 1950s and 1960s, would have taken a posture of regarding the U.S. as an enemy, allying with nations with similar views. Just imagine the problems today if China were supporting Al-Qaeda, or if China were allowing Al-Qaeda bases on its territory to train. It's one thing to invade Iraq, but invading China would have been out of the question. Fortunately, nothing like that ever happened, because we won the battle to preserve MFN for China by one vote. I was the head of the task force that accomplished this.

Q: OK, how did you bring this about?

MOHR: Basic lobbying. Unfortunately, U.S. business interests refused to support us, even though we were fighting for their interests in trade with China. We're talking about billions and billions of dollars in trade here. Nevertheless, they were afraid to draw the anger of Congress, and the public. The basic argument against continuing MFN ran something like this: China still has the red blood of the students on its hands, but all the Bush administration cares about is the green of money. So U.S. business was afraid, and would not help us. We were left to our own devices. We drew up our arguments for preserving MFN, and would just call or meet with Congressional staff and the leaders of the relevant committees to press our case.

We coordinated our efforts with the Bureau of Congressional Affairs, and identified about 40 Senators who might vote in favor of MFN. Then we just went to work. Hours and hours of lobbying, that's what did it. Nancy Pelosi was in her first term in Congress, and she ran with this issue. She said she had a moral imperative to take MFN away from China. I spoke to her personally several times. I never could convince her, but it was a given that the House would vote to take away MFN. We concentrated on the Senate, trying to get the 34 votes we needed there to sustain a Presidential veto. I will never forget the day the vote was taken. I got a call from Pelosi's chief staffer who said, "You are probably celebrating right now. (Actually, we were). You shouldn't because we got a late start, so now we have a strategy in place from this very moment. We are starting today. If I were you I wouldn't celebrate too much because next year we are going to bring you down, and we are going to take away this odious Most Favored Nation status." Fortunately, his words proved hollow: in the next year, they lost by 23 votes.

Q: Yes, but by then things had changed.

MOHR: Yes, but that was a year later. On the day, the staffer really scared me. I mean you work so hard to accomplish this goal, and after just one phone call, you think you are going to have a tougher fight on your hands over the next year, and this time you might lose. After all, on that day, we only won by one vote. It's like doing some huge research paper for school, then your computer eats it, and you have to start all over again. It really was an awful feeling.

Q: So essentially this is a three-cornered game or something. The House people were encouraging the Senate to block it. It is the Senate that decides this.

MOHR: The Senate decides when the president vetoes a bill. The House and Senate first passed a bill to remove MFN from China. Then the President vetoed the bill, and the Senate, which of course had passed the bill, now had the opportunity to override the presidential veto. But they needed a two-thirds majority to do so.

Q: You said Pelosi led the fight from the House. She is from San Francisco, isn't she?

MOHR: Yes she is, and that is one of the reasons she said she had to get involved, because so many of her constituents are Chinese. But I think this was an excuse. She was in her first term, and this issue gave her national exposure. It launched her leadership career. I would talk to her, she would call me personally and we would argue. I told her I didn't think she was right. I didn't go so far as to say that I questioned her integrity, but I don't think she really cared about the issue. I think she cared about getting her name in the newspaper on a daily basis.

Q: What about the Senate?

MOHR: Well, Jesse Helms was chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee (SFRC). Lucky us. I mean, here we have a Republican president, with a Republican majority in the Senate. The president is passionately in favor of preserving MFN for China, but there is no way in hell that he can convince a majority of his own party in the Senate from voting to take MFN away from China. Ironical, isn't it? And it wasn't as if we had this isolated or irrational policy. Every other major country in the world, the Europeans, the Japanese, the Australians, etc. had sanctions on China because of Tiananmen, but none, I repeat none, had any trade sanctions. So our policy was in keeping, so to speak, within international norms. Of course Congress didn't care about what anyone else in the world was doing. All it cared about was punishing the Chinese leadership for what it did at Tiananmen. But by taking MFN away, it would be punishing the Chinese people far more than the leadership, and the people had been the victims. Another irony was that this was one of the few instances where the Republican leadership in Congress would be taking an act that would hurt U.S. business interests as well, but emotions were just too high. Members of Congress had been so provoked by those T.V. images during Tiananmen that they didn't care.

There is another point I would like to make. Not only did we not have the support of U.S. business in the MFN fight, we didn't have the support of Secretary of State James Baker either. At the time, Baker had presidential ambitions. I think he felt, assuming that Bush would win again in 1992, that he could be a presidential candidate for the Republicans in 1996. I drafted three separate speeches for Baker to give supporting MFN for China. They always were returned to me with something written on the top to the effect of, "Will not deliver." The third time this happened, I went to one of Baker's staffers and asked why the secretary would not deliver the speech. He replied, "Mark, you are so naïve. The secretary does not do losers." I asked him to explain, and he said MFN would be taken away from China, and the secretary did not want to back a losing cause. I got really mad, and said that so long as Baker took his paycheck from the Treasury, he was secretary of state, and he had a duty to act like one. The staffer just chuckled.

The real reason for Baker's inaction was that he didn't want to anger Congress, and bring the media down on his head, in defending MFN for China. This, he felt, would damage his chances to run for president after Bush's (assumed) second term. I often wondered why the President ordered the China desk to defend MFN, but didn't order his secretary of state to do likewise.

Q: Of course this happens again and again with such people. There is nothing like presidential ambitions to screw things up.

MOHR: Right, secretaries of state shouldn't have presidential ambitions, except if you have the abilities of a Thomas Jefferson. So it was one of the things that really disappointed me. Baker wouldn't support us. The U.S. business community wouldn't support us. But we won anyway, and MFN—and the bilateral relationship—was preserved.

Q: What about the embassy of China? How did it work from your perspective?

MOHR: The embassy couldn't help. They were considered poison, any Chinese government official was.

Q: Didn't they have any clout or influence on the Hill?

MOHR: Then? No, they were just members of a country that was universally reviled. They were treated like lepers. Also, at that time, they didn't have any office in their embassy that dealt specifically with Congress. It was not until 1994 that they established a unit in their embassy to deal with the Hill. Although their first diplomatic office was set up in 1972, and an embassy in 1979, the Chinese were so ignorant of our political system that they thought, just as in China, the legislature in the U.S. was just a rubber stamp, and the executive was all that mattered. Although we constantly tried to persuade them of the importance of Congress, they wouldn't listen, that is, until 1994.

Q: This has always been a problem with embassies. When people first arrive they think that their main contact point is the State Department. The main contact point should be the media and Congress.

MOHR: And the NSC.

Q: Yes, I recall interviews that I have had revealing that the difference between Pakistan and India was that the Indian embassy would only come to somebody of comparable rank, maybe an assistant secretary, whereas the Pakistanis would get right down to the lowliest desk officer and cultivate that person. It showed, because the Indians were very hyped on protocol, and that is not what you want. You have got to reach out all over the place. Who was the assistant secretary for East Asia?

MOHR: In 1990, it was Richard Solomon. He knew Baker's opinion concerning the issue, so he focused his attention on Cambodia. Ironically, Solomon had a Ph.D. in Chinese studies. Have you talked to Solomon?

Q: Yes I have.

MOHR: What did he say? Well, it will be interesting to read what he said.

Q: You can pick it up on the internet. My interview with him is on the internet.

MOHR: Where on the internet?

Q: You Google frontline diplomacy and then go to the S. It will be there. Now as I did those interviews, the earlier ones, they were not obviously as detailed. Perhaps I didn't get into his views on MFN. Maybe I didn't get to this interesting point.

MOHR: I agree it will be interesting, because I am sure he was aware that the President had given it top priority, but he spent the majority of his time on Cambodian issues. His principal deputy assistant secretary, Desaix Anderson, on the other hand, was very supportive of our efforts to maintain MFN for China.

Q: Did you have much to do with the White House and the NSC?

MOHR: Not me personally. Kent Wiedemann, who was my boss, the office director for Chinese affairs, had daily contact with his NSC counterpart, Doug Paal. They spoke every day over the phone, usually from about 5:30 p.m. to 6:30 p.m., so there was daily contact between the desk and the White House.

Q: Well, could the president do things? Was he on the phone to the Congress, particularly the Senate?

MOHR: I would have to assume that the President called many senators and lobbied personally. I know for a fact that he was engaged heavily on this issue. Being a former head of the U.S. liaison office in China, President Bush had a good background and a good feel for the bilateral relationship. He really cared. It's funny, because in a way, the President was the real head of the China desk. We on the desk really didn't have much support within the building, but in the end it didn't matter, because we had the support of the President.

Q: Were the Chinese understanding of the problem and repairing things; were they cooperating on trying to show that?

MOHR: Well they didn't shoot anybody else. So I guess that was a positive. The way the Chinese saw it, they didn't do anything wrong. There had been a challenge to their regime, and they beat it back. They felt it was no one else's business. They were fairly outraged that we decided they had done something wrong and imposed sanctions on them. The President publicly called for them to apologize. That was never going to happen. So we maintained our sanctions, and they continued to criticize us and refuse to do business with the U. S. embassy.

Q: Well you must have made a trip or two to China didn't you?

MOHR: No, there was no point. Not in the years following Tiananmen. It was a stalemate, and I was too busy trying to preserve MFN for China. It was a full time lobbying job.

Q: So you did that for two years?

MOHR: Yes, there was agreement within the U.S. government that if we could preserve MFN, the Chinese would see that, despite the sanctions, we meant them no real long-term harm, that we valued the bilateral relationship and wished to maintain it.

Q: Were the Taiwanese trying to screw up the works?

MOHR: Not that I recall. I think the Taiwanese were afraid that a rupture in relations between the U.S. and the PRC would only create more tension in the Taiwan Strait and in the long run harm them as well.

Q: Well if you had horrible relations it could mean that China might use Taiwan as an external enemy or something.

MOHR: But you need to recall that in 1987, there was a big breakthrough between China and Taiwan. China agreed to allow Taiwanese to visit the mainland for the first time, and the government on Taiwan agreed to let their people go visit. So China and Taiwan had begun a process of opening up, and neither side wanted Tiananmen to affect that. As a matter of fact, while tourism from Western countries dropped over 90 percent in the year following Tiananmen, Taiwanese tourism continued unabated. I talked to some Taiwanese tourists, and they confirmed to me that they were not afraid one bit. In their opinion, Tiananmen had nothing to do with them.

Q: How about say the British and all that? Did we have much contact, did you have contact with the other embassies?

MOHR: Well as I said, the British were among the few serious China watchers in the diplomatic community, but we didn't have a lot of contact with them. However, we would occasionally discuss what we thought was going on in China with them, the Japanese, and the Soviets.

Q: When you were back in Washington did you ever talk to the Russians, I guess they would be the Soviets still, or the British?

MOHR: No, we were just too busy. We put in over 12 hours a day working on MFN and other issues in the bilateral relationship. Occasionally, foreign embassies would come in to ask about the state of U.S.-China relations, but that was about it.

Q: Again, at the level of the Secretary, there was little contact.

MOHR: Yes, as I said, Baker just didn't want to get involved. But fortunately for us, and for the state of the bilateral relationship, the President did.

Q: Well how about the second year you were there. What was that like?

MOHR: It got a little easier. As I said, on the first MFN vote, we only won by one vote. By the time of the second MFN vote, we garnered almost a majority, and we only needed one-third plus one.

Q: OK, after two years, were there any developments other than the MFN?

MOHR: That was pretty much it. The second year was much easier, much less stress. Then, I needed to focus on my next assignment. Traditionally, the deputy director of the China desk is an FSO-1, a rank equivalent to a full colonel in the military. The pattern usually was that the deputy director, on next assignment, goes to Beijing to be the political counselor. This is a senior foreign service job, and after two to three years in the job, the incumbent always had been promoted into the senior foreign service. The only problem was that I was exhausted. Two years working on the INF treaty, the last year working 16 hour days; two years in China watching things blow up and people getting shot; two years in Washington worrying day and night about MFN. I needed a rest, and being political counselor in Beijing, especially during those times, was a very stressful position. I thought about it for a long time, and instead of making a move to advance my career, I made a move to shore up my mental health. I did not apply for the job of political counselor in Beijing. Instead, I chose the position of U.S. consul in Brisbane, Australia.

ROBERT GOLDBERG
Economic Officer
Hong Kong (1990-1993)

Mr. Goldberg was born and raised in Baltimore, Maryland and educated at Gettysburg College and the University of Chicago. He accompanied his Foreign Service wife on her assignment to Tokyo before entering the Foreign Service in 1983 as Foreign Service Officer. A Chinese language specialist, Mr. Goldberg served both in the State Department of State in Washington, DC and abroad dealing primarily with Economic and Chinese affairs. His overseas posts include Tokyo (as spouse), New Delhi, Hong Kong, Guangzhou and Beijing, where he served twice, once as Deputy Chief of Mission. Mr. Goldberg was interviewed by David Reuther in 2011.

Q: While you are in language training changes are taking place in China. You have got Tiananmen Square, the European and American reaction. Scowcroft makes two trips to China to try and coordinate how the two countries are going to work their way out of this. So by the time you are in Hong Kong then as econ officer, Hong Kong reporting is probably pretty important to try and figure out what is happening in China at that time from let's see, you probably arrived in June of 1990.

GOLDBERG: That sounds about right, June or July 1990. My predecessor was Bob Wang who was my successor in Beijing as DCM and who is there now. That is an interesting story in itself. Scott Bellard was the senior China Watcher. I worked for him; and Gil Donahue was the political/econ chief. We didn't have that many people doing reporting. Starting in the mid-80s, much of what was coming out of Hong Kong was commentary on what was going on in the mainland – we weren't first with the story, but we were pretty good at providing texture to the story.

I had some interesting contacts. The most interesting one was the secretary general of Xinhua, the news agency which was running Hong Kong for Beijing. He was reputed to be China's spymaster in Hong Kong. At my first meeting with him, he came right out and said, "A lot of people think that I am a spymaster. That is not the case." These meetings were always very interesting because he spoke in a very thick Cantonese accent which was very hard for me to understand, so he brought along a very polished person whose mandarin was impeccable and who at times had to translate from accented Cantonese Mandarin into Mandarin and occasionally slip in an English word. A lot of the work I did wasn't really mainland watching per se but was looking at the mainland's penetration of Hong Kong. So I did a series of reports on mainland companies in Hong Kong and what they were actually there to do. We had the ability to actually go in and talk with directors in the companies. Scott and I would go out together and meet with people who traveled to the mainland frequently and wrote prolifically like Willy Wo Lop Lam and Ching Chung. Ching had been red guard cultural revolutionary in Hong Kong, and he was then editor of one of the more interesting magazines being published there. He was subsequently arrested on the mainland for spying or getting access to information that he shouldn't have. I guess he was imprisoned for three or four years.

Q: We were talking about contact work. Contact work is the bread and butter of any post overseas. When you arrived did you have a hand off with your successor?

GOLDBERG: Bob Wang was very generous in terms of introducing me to a lot of his contacts. I understood these people had their own agendas in terms of dealing with us, and one in particular was kind of interesting, given his association with Wang Yungching of Formosa Plastics who was thinking about building a major plastics project in Fujian province. I spent a year or so meeting with this guy every couple of weeks to talk about what was going on. That project never came to fruition.

Another major area of interest was what the Taiwanese in Hong Kong were up to and how they were facilitating economic contacts on the mainland. I was close to people who in Taiwan business associations in Hong Kong and spent a fair amount of time chatting them up. At that point Hong Kong was also moving all of its textile factories to the mainland and the Taiwans were cooperating with Hong Kong companies to access mainland labor, land etc. We couldn't compete with what was being churned out on the mainland, but we had some significant areas where we could make a contribution in terms of understanding south China economic integration.

We talked with a lot of American companies as well. The Amcham or American Chamber in Hong Kong was a very important window for many American businesses seeking access to the China market.

Q: You were saying that the Chinese companies were coming in to Hong Kong. Was this also the time that Chinese provinces set up offices?

GOLDBERG: Oh sure. Some of them had been set up before I got there, so I spent a lot of time with Guangdong and Guangzhou company enterprises, Fujian and Fuzhou enterprises; provinces and cities I traveled widely in when I was Consul General in Guangzhou. These companies were pretty successful in Hong Kong. None of them could compete with China Resources or China Merchants that had been in Hong Kong for many years.

Q: My impression was that one of the reasons for having the provincial offices in Hong Kong was to begin to educate the provinces in what was available and how the trading/capitalist system worked.

GOLDBERG: You would like to think that was the case. Maybe it was, but when I would have conversations with these companies it was all about the deal and about the money. Twenty years on, there is obviously a lot more sophistication about how you talk about these things. But 20 years ago, we were dealing with a lot of fairly unsophisticated people who clearly didn't understand how markets worked.

Q: Now were you there when Deng Xiaoping made his southern trip which is always described as the first time that reform had gotten back on track.

GOLDBERG: Yeah, I was in Hong Kong. Anytime Deng appeared somewhere and made pronouncements, it was noteworthy and you took a close look at it. We talked with our contacts in Hong Kong and their message was: watch this page carefully and see what happens.

Q: Could you give a broad brush coverage of the depth and breadth of the contacts you were meeting with during your time there?

GOLDBERG: Well, as I said, Chinese companies based in Hong Kong were a very significant part of the portfolio. The Taiwan companies and Taiwan associations gave us some pretty good insight into what eventually became a major concern of the Taiwanese companies and the Taiwan government's concern about the hollowing out of Taiwan's manufacturing. Before I even started my job at the Hong Kong consulate, after language class was over and before my family was settled, I went back to Taiwan for three weeks and did a paper on Taiwan companies going to the mainland; I met with a lot of the companies that I subsequently dealt with in Hong Kong. Contacts that I first made in Taiwan carried over to the mainland. There were obviously American business companies with which we talked. We always went to the left leaning magazines because they were far better than the right leaning magazines on mainland policy. We would see Wen Wei Bao journalists who were mainland directed. We also talked with Ming Bao reporters who were pretty objective. Apple Daily was pretty good but reported a lot of rumors that were made up out of whole cloth. Then I made several trips to Guangdong Province and Fujian.

Q: Now when was that? When did you do that trip?

GOLDBERG: The first one was in 1991 and took several days. The second in 1992 sometime.

The 1992 trip was from one side of the Pearl River delta trip to the other, from Zhuhai up to Guangzhou and then to Shenzhen. Nowadays you can drive from Shenzhen to Guangzhou in three hours or take the train to Hong Kong in 2 ½ hours. The highways and the infrastructure are superb today, obviously designed so manufacturers can get their goods to ports or railroad stations.

The 1991 trip actually was more important than the 1992 trip because I met someone at the Taiwan Center at Xiamen University who put me in touch with the Xinhua source that was so important in my reporting.

Q: And I would think the PAO has another set of contacts with journalists, movie...

GOLDBERG: Absolutely. Later on as we moved closer to reversion, decisions were made that the real value-added in Hong Kong was the story of emerging Hong Kong democracy and Hong Kong's ability to retain its independence.

Q: When did the reversion discussion start? I forgot.

GOLDBERG: The British discussions? In the early 80s. The final decisions were made in the mid-80s. The Brits had always sent out as Governor of Hong Kong a Mandarin type who had significant China background. When we got there David Wilson was the senior British official, and then the last year I was there Chris Patton arrived and totally changed the conversation with the mainland. You may recall Patton saying he would not go to Beijing before he gave his state of the Colony or State of Hong Kong address and that really angered mainland officials. It took them a long time to get over it. They saw Patton as a latecomer who after a hundred years of British rule in Hong Kong was now insisting that Hong Kong deserved more democracy. The Chinese accused him of being anti-Chinese.

Patton rarely backed away from his efforts at pushing the envelope on democracy. I went as note taker to Dick Williams, our Consul General, on his first interview with Patton. It was fascinating. You were just bowled over by the intellect of Chris Patton, and Patton was happy to talk – and be admired. He was probably as smart as he thought he was, but he could have done a better job of stroking Chinese sensibilities. Regrettably, Patton didn't do that. I saw Chris Patten one other time, again as a note taker for some delegation. They too bought into the Chris Patton line about democracy and how we had to further democracy in the run up to reversion.

Q: The Chinese thought they were inheriting a colony and Patton turned it into a Trojan horse.

GOLDBERG: The Chinese thought that the "one country two systems" was the solution to all ills. And I think they understood that they approached reversion, people would recognize the need to accommodate Beijing's needs and requests and they would even start self-censoring so Beijing did not have to do it itself. But the couple of times I had serious discussions with people in Hong Kong after I left, they told me that they were wary of discussing their private worries publicly.

Many Chinese we talked to saw a British betrayal of an implicit contract with Beijing – to be stewards of Hong Kong and turn it over pretty much as it was, not with a fervor for promoting democracy over the last four years before reversion. You have to remember David Wilson and the people who preceded him were well acquainted with China's way of doing things and were just in a waiting pattern for reversion. Patton's mission was different; it was how do you provide some sort of representative government infrastructure that allows the people of Hong Kong to have a voice. It was too late. It really was; it was far too late. Again, I think the Chinese believed Patton did not understand China's broader national interests. Part of that was the desire for one China, two systems to work and be seen in Taiwan as a way of eventual reunification.

Q: Now you were in Hong Kong and the administration in Washington changes. Did that have any particular impact on staffing or...

GOLDBERG: No, not really. Staffing wise we have always had a professional as the consul general in Hong Kong. When Dick Williams left, Richard Mueller came in as consul general, but I was there for only a couple of months before heading back to the states. Everyone was thinking about what size staff and what issues we needed to consider with reversion – the creation of the modern Hong Kong Consulate, if you will, came with Richard Boucher who made the key decisions about issues the consulate should report on. Staffing-wise, the eventual drawdown wasn't really as great as you might think. By the time you get to 1997, we had gone from a defense attaché system to a liaison office staffed by military out of uniform. People in other agencies who watched China out of Hong Kong were starting to move those slots to the mainland. But that was a gradual process that took place over a decade. When I was desk director and making decisions about eliminating jobs in Hong Kong and putting them on the mainland, I experienced how bitter and drawn out these bureaucratic fights could be.

Q: Now wasn't the senior military person assigned to Hong Kong while you were there a naval officer?

GOLDBERG: Right because in Hong Kong, the main military function is to handle ship visits. Hong Kong is a major port of call for R&R [rest and recreation]. We used ship visits to attract Chinese officials to vessels for tours. It was a fairly substantial office, but after 1997 it was reduced in size. Our defense people in Hong Kong were also actively traveling to the mainland to look at the south China military regions. They had to notify the Chinese about the places they planned to visit; the Chinese followed them pretty closely. The information they collected didn't strike me as particularly significant – lots of license plate numbers, ships in harbor, but I suppose that information in the aggregate was significant to make certain judgments.

GREG THIELMANN
Washington, DC (1990-1993)

Mr. Thielmann was born and raised in Iowa and was educated at Grinnell College and Princeton University. A specialist in Political-Military Affairs, he held a number of positions dealing with such matters as Strategic Proliferation, Arms Control and Missile Programs. He also served abroad at several posts in the capacity of Political Officer and Consular Officer. His last position was Chief, Office of Analysis for Strategic Proliferation and Military Affairs in State's Bureau of Intelligence and Research. Mr. Thielmann was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2004

Q: Yes. It really is amazing. Well, what about China? How did we view China at that time, '90 to '93?

THIELMANN: What I remember about that era is that it was so difficult for the intelligence community to not use our own model of strategic forces development in thinking about the Chinese. So what I remember from that era was how strong the other agencies pushed in their analytical product for the assumption that China would have many more strategic nuclear weapons within some number of years, that they would have multiple independently targeted reentry vehicles on each of those missiles and that they would be telling policymakers the Chinese are basically going to take off. One of the reasons I remember that so strongly was because I was uncomfortable at the time since we had seen a history of the Chinese being very modest in their nuclear weapons programs. I mean they acquired nuclear weapons, and then they increased their capabilities at a very slow rate. It was nothing like either the U.S. or the Soviet development pattern -- kind of exponential increases in warheads. I remember at the time feeling that I didn't really have enough time as an analyst of Chinese strategic forces to really pound the table too hard on this issue. I remember being skeptical, but these memories came back to me several years later when I reentered the picture and found that lo and behold the Chinese hadn't done any of those things that the majority of the intelligence community seemed comfortable in predicting. But they were still at that same low level of strategic missiles that could threaten the United States.

Q: Well, as you are looking at this, did you find the normal military assumption of a worst case scenario. You can't say the United States will roll over the Iraqi Army in a matter of days practically. You have to say well, maybe such and such, whatever it is. It's always, you have to plan for the worst case. Was this coming through in the what you are getting out of the analysis people?

THIELMANN: I think that's certainly part of it, and I'm not as hard as some on the worst case analytical predisposition of the Pentagon. I mean I call it responsible prudent worst case analysis.

Q: I agree.

THIELMANN: But that's what they need to do. But that didn't mean that we had to do that. The way I would put it, our obligation in advising the senior State Department leadership was to present them with our best estimate of what was likely to happen and not what could in the worst circumstances happen. I mean we can identify that and encourage people not to forget that this most likely course could be wrong and that it could be even worse than that. But that shouldn't be our headline on intelligence products because that's very misleading. If you end up writing products that use screaming headlines and saying this country could do this when that's a ten percent probability, you've fundamentally mislead the Congress and the senior leadership because they don't read that as being something that's very unlikely. So to me that's the real difference. You do need to look at the worst case, but you also need to have perspective properly presented to the policy makers. So I think what was happening here was a reflection of the natural and understandable instincts of the military side of the intelligence community. But then the irresponsible senior intelligence officials who come up with the community products giving it more weight than it deserves and the kind of presentations that are made. I would also say even for those who understandably should look at the worst case, I don't think there was due deference to what the track record was of China even in that 1990 to 1993 interval. They should've drawn some conclusions from how China had behaved in the 1980s instead of just saying well, of course China could technologically develop independently targeted reentry vehicles. In order to provide the sort of U.S. level of protection of their modest force, there is an imperative they increase the number of warheads. I mean that's the way we would think. We would think you assume the worst of the other side so you have to make sure that you can survive an attack that the other side makes against you. The Chinese obviously didn't think that way because their forces in the early 1990s and certainly in later 1990s were getting perilously vulnerable to a first strike U.S. attack. But the Chinese weren't thinking the way we were about that because they were obviously willing to accept that kind of vulnerability.

MARSHALL P. ADAIR
Chengdu, (1990-1992)

Mr. Adair, son of a United States Foreign Service Officer, was born in Maryland and raised at Foreign Service posts in the United States and abroad. He was educated at Middlebury College and joined the Foreign Service in 1972. During his career Mr. Adair held a number of senior positions at the State Department in Washington, DC, dealing with a variety of areas, including relations with the US military Commands, Economic and political issues in Europe and Department personnel matters. A Chinese language specialist, his foreign posts include Paris, Lubumbashi, Taiwan, Hong Kong, Beijing, Rangoon, Chengdu (China), and Tuzla (Bosnia). Mr. Adair was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2011.

Q: Okay, you're off to Chengdu. Now, describe where this is.

ADAIR: Chengdu is the capital of Sichuan Province, which is in central western China. It's really right in the geographic middle of China, including Tibet. Sichuan Province is very special in China. It is surrounded by mountains. You have the Himalayas on the west; the Hengduan Mountains on the border with Yunnan where the Yangtze River goes through; the Tianshan, Qinling and Dada mountains on the north; and then lower mountains on the east. Sichuan province is essentially a basin through which several rivers flow. The rivers have made that basin a very fertile area. The mountains protected and isolated it from invading armies. It has a mild climate so it's very easy to have agriculture pretty much year round. The fertility of the basin was enhanced by one of the world's first major irrigation projects more than 2,000 years ago. With irrigation Sichuan became a major food producing area. It seems to me that over the long course of Chinese history different groups, when they were defeated, sought protection in that basin, creating a concentration of civilization there that's special in China.

The weather is unusual because all those mountains, they trap the clouds. The Sichuan basin has a thin layer of clouds all the time and you very rarely see blue sky. It's not dark, just hazy all the time. That also means that it is more humid and damp. That has affected agriculture and that has also affected Sichuan cuisine. One of the reasons that Sichuan's food is so spicy is it's designed to counteract that humid climate. And it's got a very unusual spice that's used almost nowhere else in the world that I have seen: the Sichuan peppercorns. These are not the little Thai spicy green peppers. These are peppercorns that grow on a tree. They have a very pungent, numbing taste and that is specifically useful for getting rid of excess moisture in the body.

Everything about Sichuan is unique. That concentration of different peoples has created the largest and densest concentration of people in China. When I arrived in Chengdu, Sichuan was the most populous Chinese province with well over 100 million people. Technically now it's no longer the most populous province, because the metropolis of Chongqing (Chungking – the WWII capitol), has been broken off and made an independent municipality.

Q: That's very interesting.

ADAI: So Sichuan itself is special and it has a history throughout China of being special in terms of people and culture. We've seen that during World War II it was important in an even larger sense than it had been in some of the other historical times. This was where the government of China retreated to in the effort to fend off the invasion from Japan. The capital was in Chongqing with armies throughout Sichuan and Yunnan. That was their redoubt, and we helped them out. We put the B-29's and the Flying Tigers in and around Chengdu and down around Kunming in Yunnan Province.

After World War II and after the Chinese civil war, when China was becoming so isolated during the Mao Zedong period, they also moved some of their strategic industry away from the coastline and into the interior. A certain amount of it went into Sichuan. So it continued to be a strategically important and strategically sensitive area.

Q: What was its relation to Tibet?

ADAI: Well, first of all, it borders on Tibet. Secondly, what is now Sichuan Province includes not just the central Chengdu plain that I was describing, but the easternmost part of the Himalayan mountain range. That part used to be part of the Tibetan Kingdom. It was called Kham in our transliteration. Today, it's a part of Sichuan Province. It is not included in what China calls the Autonomous Region of Tibet. So, Sichuan Province borders on Tibet, has a portion of what used to be Tibet included in it, and, when I was there, it was the principle place from which one left to go to Tibet. That was the flight path - from Chengdu into Lhasa. There were land routes that went in from Qinghai and Yunnan, but most short-term visitors to Tibet would go from Chengdu.

In the foreign affairs structure of our embassies and consulates, Tibet was placed in the consular district of the consulate general in Chengdu. Back in the mid 1980s, when we negotiated the consulates in China, I think the two that were of primary importance to us were Shanghai and Guangzhou. The third was Chengdu. Then we established one in Shenyang, which was up in the northeast. We also negotiated agreement to establish a consulate in Wuhan, which is in the industrial center of China. However, we never opened that one because of budgetary shortfalls.

Q: Well you were there from when to when?

ADAI: I arrived in January, 1990, and left in July, 1992.

Q: So what was the situation in that part of China at the time? Had things at Tiananmen left an impression or was it sort of business as usual?

ADAI: No. Tiananmen definitely left an impression. It was fairly tense. It was tense all over China after Tiananmen. We had a difficult relationship because the United States had so openly disapproved of what the Chinese government did in Tiananmen Square. Things were especially tense in Sichuan and in Chengdu. I was told when I was in Sichuan that the Chinese government was not surprised by the expression of dissent that manifested up there in Beijing. What they were surprised by was that the strongest manifestation of it was in Beijing. They were actually expecting it to be in Sichuan, in Chengdu. I don't know to what degree that's true, but Sichuan traditionally has been a problem for the central government of China. It has always been unruly. It has always maintained a sense of independence, and the people in Sichuan are quite volatile. The central government therefore expected trouble in Sichuan. There were serious demonstrations in Sichuan, the most serious after Beijing.

Q: Well had the Chinese kept non-Sichuanese troops in Sichuan?

ADAI: My understanding is the Army of the Peoples Republic of China is not local. Military personnel are moved around regularly. That lesson was learned that a fairly long time ago – actually that was true during imperial times as well.

Q: How big was the consulate and what were you up to?

ADAI: Let's see, we had five American Foreign Service Officers, and one Foreign Service Secretary; so there were six official Americans with families and about 20 to 30 Chinese staff. We didn't have our own building. Our offices and our residences were the Jinjiang Hotel in Chengdu. We had an entire wing of the hotel. The offices were on the ground floor and then we had rooms to live in on the next two floors. It was a fairly high profile operation. Everybody knew we were there. There was only one other consulate in Chengdu at the time, and that was the consulate of Nepal. They were there part-time. Our job was to represent the United States, to get to know as many people as we could, to understand what was going on out there, to have a dialogue, and to provide services to the officials and the population in terms of visas and information on the United States.

Q: Well, what were your main activities? I would imagine the visas must have been busy.

ADAIR: The visa section was very, very busy. There was one consular officer and there were always people waiting. That was really hard. The consular officer had the most stressful job of all - and that was true for China in general. There were just a lot of people that wanted visas, and not a lot of people met the criteria that had to be met in order to give non-immigrant visas. It was just too difficult for many people to prove that they wouldn't stay in the United States.

Q: Yes. Well I saw something in the paper, I think yesterday, saying that for students, Chinese students coming to the United States, it's very difficult because they seem superb on paper but are not always what they are cut out to be. In other words there's, you know, considerable fraud.

ADAIR: There may be. Chinese students have to show that they're able to pursue study in the States. They have to show that they're able to pay for it. They have to be accepted, of course, into a college in the United States. Now there are lots of places in the United States that are willing and able to present documentation saying that they will accept Chinese students. There is also lots of money that's available to support them, from overseas Chinese, from organizations in the United States, from the Chinese government, and increasingly now from people in China. Many Chinese students are extremely qualified. Many also have insufficient English language. They have to pass the TOEFL (Test of English as a Foreign Language) exams, of course, but even then consular officers have to talk with them to make sure that they actually can speak and understand. It's amazing that young Chinese can learn as much English as they do but some of them still don't have what they need. Some of them are just too scared when they get to the consulate, and appear more inarticulate than they are. They are also not sure what they should say and what they shouldn't say there, because they've dealt with bureaucracies all their lives.

Then there is the crux of the difficulty for our whole system, and that is the determination whether they intend just to go to the United States, study and return – or whether they intend to remain indefinitely in the United States.

Q: You know, as an old consular officer, my feeling was hell, the students don't know whether they want to stay.

ADAIR: I agree.

Q: I mean, that's that period in life when it depends on what cards are dealt to them at the time.

Did the Sichuanese who were going either to be students or just to visit have a particular area or areas they were headed for in the States?

ADAIR: Neither geographic nor substantive as far as I recall. Also, it was not just Sichuan. We had people from Sichuan, Yunnan, Guizhou and Tibet in our consular district. All had to apply in Chengdu for their visas.

Q: How stood things in Tibet? It must be a difficult issue to work on. I was driving behind a car yesterday which had a license plate engraved with "Free Tibet." That was sponsored by one of the states around here. How did you deal with that sort of thing?

ADAI: That's a huge issue. First of all, we as a nation have always wanted to support freedom and self-determination for other people around the world. We believe that people should be able to define their own nation, determine their own form of government and express themselves and their culture. We want to be able to support that. Second, Tibet is an intriguing and romantic image for us. It's a colorful and exciting mountain kingdom far away; it's Shangri-La, it's what "Lost Horizons" was written about.

Q: By James Hilton, yes.

ADAI: Yes, and when you see the people, they're striking. They're beautiful, colorful, dynamic, and energetic. There is so much there that we like and admire. On top of that they have a mysterious and intriguing culture. Tibetan Buddhism with all of its bells and whistles (literally) is intriguing for a lot of us. In addition, this mysterious and intriguing culture was invaded and suppressed by a larger neighbor; one that we were once taught to revile and see as the ultimate extremist and inhumane enemy. Not that long ago, the Chinese communists were painted as the most evil, dangerous threat to the world ever. The combination of all those things made it almost impossible, I think, for Americans not to want to support Tibet. We made it a cause; we almost had to make Tibet a cause. It's a part of our psychological makeup. We would have done the same thing to support some of the Indian cultures out in the western United States - if we hadn't been the ones that were actually destroying them.

Q: Yes.

ADAI: So, it's almost a given that Tibet is going to be a subject of interest, intellectually and emotionally, for Americans. We had to deal with that. I have to admit that I was one of those Americans interested in Tibet for all of those reasons. That's one of the reasons I wanted to go to Chengdu. We also had to deal with the fact that Tibet is extremely important to the Chinese government. The United States accepted long ago that that Tibet was a part of China. When we recognized the PRC in 1979 that was no longer an issue for us – in terms of foreign policy. Nevertheless, we had opposed the invasion and the forcible imposition of PRC control. Since we did not recognize the PRC at that time as the lawful government of China, that position was not difficult to take. We went further, and clandestinely tried to help Tibetan freedom fighters oppose that invasion and control. The CIA had provided support to Tibetan resistance fighters in the 1950s and we certainly gave them moral support for decades. But now we are faced with the reality that we recognize the PRC as the lawful government of China and that Tibet is a part of that China. We recognize it, and so does most of the international community. I could go into in much more detail but I don't think we want to here.

It was a real challenge for the consulate and for me personally. Tibet was part of our consular district and we were responsible for all aspects of U.S. foreign policy in that area. We did have human rights concerns. We believe as a nation that concern for the human rights should be part of our foreign policy and part of our relationship with other governments. It is our policy to promote respect for and protection of human rights in all countries. Therefore, it was a part of our dialogue whenever we dealt with Tibet – whenever we visited Tibet. Every time I went to Tibet I had a list of people that we were concerned about. We had reports of people who had either disappeared or been abused or whatever. Sometimes we knew they were being held in prison, sometimes not. I would give that list to the authorities – to whoever I met with in Tibet – and I would talk with them about it. I would ask them for information, and they would usually give me the standard reply that this was none of our business, that it was the internal affairs of China. I would say of course it's the internal affairs of China, and then I would explain our broader concern with human rights. I would explain the principled part of it, and I would explain the practical part of it. The practical part was that this was the reality of the United States; and that we would continue to make this an issue in our relations. Then I would appeal to them, in the interests of better relations between our two countries, to do the best that they could. They maintained their principled position, and out of humanitarian concern they did come back and give me information on many of those people, which I would send back to the Department.

On one case I actually went and visited the prison in question with the ambassador who was making a visit to our consular district. I arranged for him to visit; we went, we saw the prison, we saw the conditions, we met with individuals, we talked with them and did a full report on it back to Washington. What I saw, though, was that we weren't always helping the cause of the Tibetans, individually or culturally.

When public statements were made in the United States about Tibet, by members of Congress or other notables, these would be heard or read about by people in Tibet. Often this would encourage them to take greater risks. Not too long after something like that happened in the United States, activities would surface on the streets in Lhasa. People would demonstrate and they would get carried away. Then there would be a crackdown and people would get hurt, killed or put in prison. That part was unnecessary. It wasn't helping. It set things back for them. Unintentionally we were often causing problems, I think, for people in Tibet. We were causing them problems rather than helping them.

Q: Did you have good contacts in Tibet?

ADAI: My contacts in Tibet were primarily official. I worked through the foreign affairs office there, which I had to do in all of the areas that I worked. In the case of Tibet, the head of the foreign affairs office was actually a Chinese diplomat who had been assigned to Tibet after his return from Yugoslavia. So he understood the dynamic; he understood the position I was in; and he understood the implications of this for China's relationships with other nations. He did his best to help. He was always available to talk with me. We would have our official meeting, and have fairly extensive discussions. He would try to get me access – to people in the monasteries, to people in the government up there in Lhasa, to economic officials, to prison officials, etc. He got me regular appointments with the governor of the autonomous region of Tibet.

The one person he never got me a meeting with was the party secretary. The party secretary at the time was Hu Jintao, who is now the chairman of the communist party of China and the head of state. But I never got to see him. On the whole the access that I had in Tibet improved. Part of the issue of access was just getting around. Initially when I went up, I was pretty much confined to Lhasa. When I had been at the embassy in Beijing earlier I had managed to make one trip to Lhasa as a tourist and had gone out to the southeastern part of Tibet, but it took me awhile to get to other parts, to get to some of the monasteries.

Q: Did you find the Tibetans well informed? I mean, were they a savvy bunch or were they provincial?

ADAI: That depended on who one was talking with. Some of them were very well informed – like the governor and some of the people in the foreign affairs office. They knew what was going on in China and they were aware of what was going on elsewhere in the world. There were business people and some in the monasteries who recognized the reality of the political situation, but were distressed with certain aspects of it and wanted to find solutions to that. And, then there were monks and other individuals that I met at various times in Lhasa who just wanted the Chinese out at whatever cost. That wasn't an option.

I had one long conversation with a monk in one of the big monasteries who expressed concern that the quality of their religious instruction was declining. He believed the new, younger monks weren't getting the kind of guidance they needed because many of the older monks had fled. That would be a serious problem in any religion but it was particularly serious in Buddhism and in Tibetan Buddhism, because they have to go through not just instruction, they have to go through training. If they don't have people that have gone through this themselves and are wise enough to see where they are in their own spiritual, emotional, psychological make up, it's very easy to get off track. That was a legitimate concern, but they probably weren't going to be able to deal with it effectively.

Q: This is probably a good place to stop. We'll pick it up the next time'

Today is the 8th of November, 2011, with Marshall Adair. Marshall, we were talking about your experiences in your representation in Tibet. Could you set up sort of a permanent office there or was this a no-no or what?

ADAI: No, I don't think there was any option to set up a permanent office. I don't think the Chinese would have let us do it, and I don't think that we could have found the money to do it even if they had. It would have been an interesting place to be but I don't know how much it would have helped anyway, really.

Q: Well to a certain extent the very existence of such an office would mean that you would be constantly petitioned or demonstrated.

ADAI: That's right. It probably would have generated more trouble; and that wouldn't necessarily have helped the Tibetans.

Q: It wouldn't advance any particular cause?

ADAI: I don't think so.

Q: What were your connections, if any, with the Dalai Lama at the time?

ADAI: I didn't have any connection with the Dalai Lama; and I didn't have any communication with his people at the time. There was communication off and on, I think, between some people back in Washington on the China desk but not that much. I had met the Dalai Lama once in Washington on my own, and had pictures of him and Ginger talking together. People in Tibet revered him, and they were ecstatic to receive pictures of him, because they were publicly available in Tibet. We had taken some pictures with us when we visited the first time back in 1985 and the reception was really quite extraordinary. The Chinese officials tried to stop us from passing them out, but they weren't heavy handed about it, at least not at that time.

Q: Was there a serious liberate Tibet movement in Tibet?

ADAI: There was serious sentiment for Tibetan independence, but there was no effective organization that I saw. The Chinese government control of it was pretty effective. However, there were plenty of people that were available to demonstrate if the occasion arose.

Q: How about India? A lot of the monks, of course, ended up there. Was this a significant center of Tibetan activity outside of Tibet?

ADAI: I don't have any personal experience with the Tibetan community in India so I really can't talk about it effectively. India provided refuge to the Tibetan exiles, and has allowed them to live there as a government in exile for many years now, for decades. It's really quite an extraordinary thing. There's a community there and a government there that has all of its officials and travels all over the world contacting people. It has its own procedures and resources. That is certainly serious. That's who many governments around the world deal with.

Q: Did you get any good reporting, a feel for the education within Tibet and how it reflected on both Buddhism and on the history of Tibet and all?

ADAI: As far as I know, the principle education on Buddhism and that kind of history of old Tibet existed within the monasteries. It was education that was given to the young monks, the novices. The people that educated them were the older monks. There were older monks there but many of the more accomplished monks, had chosen to leave Tibet, either when the Dalai Lama left or later.

The Chinese had no reason to provide education on Tibetan Buddhism in the public school system, or perhaps anything that was favorable to the religion itself. The government of China is officially atheist. For decades it actively discouraged religion in any form. They are still suspicious and view organized religion as a politically and socially disruptive force. Nevertheless, even during some of the worst of times they allowed somewhat more autonomy for the study of religion in places like Tibet than they did in other parts of China. However, even after China began to relax those kinds of controls, I don't think it became part of the regular curriculum. Teaching religion and Tibetan culture I think depends more on the Tibetans themselves, and they have limited resources to continue it.

Q: Now what about visitors from outside, including Americans; were they bringing "the word" back? I mean, spiritual support or not?

ADAI: You mean taking it into Tibet or taking it out of Tibet?

Q: Taking it into Tibet.

ADAI: Well first of all visitors from the United States and other countries continued to be restricted. The severity of that restriction would ebb and flow, mostly in relation to the political and security atmosphere. Access to different parts of Tibet has certainly grown in the last two decades; it's grown tremendously. Foreigners, particularly Americans and Europeans, that had an interest in Tibetan Buddhism would visit. They would want to talk with monks and different people in the religious communities. But I wouldn't really describe it as them taking the word in. I think most of them were going in for their own edification, for their own education.

Q: Were you able to go to Tibet at will or did you have to get permission each time?

ADAI: I had to get permission each time. When I was in Chengdu we pretty much had to get permission to go just about anywhere. But I don't think I was ever told no. I went a total of, I think it was seven or eight times while I was there.

Q: What about traveling around Sichuan province? Was it easy to travel?

ADAI: No, it wasn't easy to travel. Again, we had to get permission. From Chengdu, we were allowed to travel, without permission, a certain distance out along several roads and it varied. Beyond that we had to get permission to visit anything other than tourist-type places, and sometimes permission was required for those as well. It was very restricted. We could ask for permission and we would often get it, but we were also turned down a significant number of times. That was particularly true if we wanted to go off into places where foreigners didn't often travel.

The government had a number of concerns. Number one, they were still in the process of opening up. It was still a little bit difficult for foreigners to travel in China in general. It was getting easier every year but they didn't have their political, supervisory system, or whatever you call it, set up to watch and take care of people. The first concern was that we might cause trouble for them.

The second concern was for our safety and well being. That was partially a genuine humanitarian concern, and partially because the local government was responsible for the safety and wellbeing of the diplomats. So in some respects it was just easier for them to say no, you can't go there because we don't have the facilities, than it was to try and set up a system for care and feeding of the foreigners. It was evolving, but only very slowly. One of my objectives was to expand the area to which we were allowed to go without permission. I talked with the local officials quite a lot, and they were not about to do it. They probably didn't have the authority to do it anyway. We didn't get any real response from the authorities in Beijing either. So I went to the embassy and I went back to the State Department and I argued that we should restrict their movements in the same way that they restrict our movements. In other words, their diplomats in the United States should be restricted.

That's something that the State Department has always tried to avoid doing, because that sort of tit for tat is sort of small-hearted; and it can cause more problems than it solves sometimes. It's more difficult for us to set up those kinds of restrictions, and once we do it may be hard for us to remove them. So for those reasons and the danger that they would cause even more problems for us in other countries we tend not to do that. However in this case I argued it forcefully – and incessantly – and people finally agreed. I went back to Chengdu, pulled out a map and looked at the different consulates in the United States. I then recommended that we make an analogy between Chengdu and the Chinese consulate in Houston, Texas. At the time Chinese diplomats at the Chinese consulate general in Houston were free to go anywhere they wanted, and see anybody they wanted. I crafted restrictions on the diplomatic personnel in Houston that were as close to what we experienced in Chengdu as I could; and presented them to the Office of Foreign Missions at the State Department. The Department imposed the restrictions – which was really quite surprising to me. Within two weeks of that action all the restrictions were taken off of us.

Q: Good God.

ADAI: I think that the reason it worked was basically that it was good for both parties. China is a huge country with a huge government which is a huge bureaucracy. There is tremendous inertia. There are many different factions with different interests. Those interests may not be mutually exclusive. They may not be totally in competition, but the competition is what comes first and sometimes it is difficult to get beyond it and find the common interests. The Chinese intended to lift many restrictions on foreigners eventually, but many of these competing interests stood in the way. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs in principle would be interested in helping us, but in practice it would have been difficult so they would be inclined to avoid it. However, when we told them that they were going to be similarly restricted that clarified their interest. It also gave them an important argument to use with all those other factions, whoever they might have been. In other words, they could now say that Chinese national interests would suffer in a specific way if they didn't take action.

The other reason that it worked was that it didn't come out of the blue for them. I made sure they knew that this was going on. I included our Chinese employees in the consulate in the whole exercise. So they were reporting constantly about what we were doing. They knew that it was coming. They might have been surprised when it actually happened. They also knew that it wasn't being done as a punitive exercise. It was being done out of necessity on our part, as constructive thing to promote our access, and that was in the interests of both countries as well.

Q: Well then you basically could go where you wanted?

ADAI: Our access was significantly improved. There were still some areas that were restricted. At this point I can't remember exactly what they were, but they would have been areas that were considered to be particularly sensitive.

Q: Nuclear?

ADAI: Well they had a space launch center out there.

Q: Yes.

ADAIR: I visited it by invitation for the launch of an American-made satellite. There had been some American personnel from American companies working out there to make it possible, and they made a big deal of the launch – which turned out to be successful. Many people attended. I went from Chengdu. There were people that came up from Hong Kong, including some big Hong Kong investors like Li Ka-Shing.

Q: Did you have any sort of tribal groups that were restive?

ADAIR: No, not when I was there that I recall. There are lots of minorities in southwest China. Quite a few are in Sichuan. There are even more in Yunnan and in Guizhou. The Chinese government makes a big deal of the fact that these minority groups are allowed the autonomy to pursue their own customs – and to some degree their own social and quasi-political organization within the larger context of China. When you visit these areas it's very colorful. Their villages may look the same as they have looked for centuries. Their clothes, their language and many of their customs are unique. They are all still part of China. They have their own representatives in the Communist Party and other organizations. In some respects I think they've been able to maintain their own cultures better than similar minorities in the United States.

Q: How about academics? I would think that this would be a place where aspiring academics from the United States and other countries would love to go and study.

ADAIR: Yes, I think so. There weren't very many when I was there. There were a few in the university in Chengdu. There was one in Tibet. Some came to the consulate to register with us, but I didn't see very many of them. I think there are more now. Negotiations were underway when I was there for the Peace Corps to send out people to that area. I think the first group went out soon after I left in 1992.

Q: You were there when they were working on the Three Gorges Dam?

ADAIR: They were beginning, yes.

Q: Was that hitting your area?

ADAIR: It hadn't yet, but would eventually. There were villages in our consulate district that knew they were going to be moved. The whole process was just beginning. I believe there was still a chance to back away from this big project. But they didn't.

Q: Was there room for dispute? Was the Chinese government allowing contrary opinion to come out at all?

ADAIR: Well, they weren't encouraging it. Most people that I talked with just assumed that the government in Beijing had decided to do it, and that any discussion of it was not going to change the basic direction. All you could do was perhaps was soften it a little bit. One of the reasons was that it was the brainchild and the pet project of the prime minister of China, Li Peng. He believed that it should be done for a variety of reasons and he was the power in Beijing.

Q: In talking with the officials in your area, how did they refer to Beijing and all? Did they kind of roll their eyes and-?

ADAI: No, absolutely not. There was almost no expression of any kind of disagreement with Beijing. The officials that I dealt with in Chengdu kept their distance from me. I saw them when I asked to see them and it wasn't always easy. I'm talking about the senior officials. Most of them had very little interest in dealing with the American consulate or American personnel. I think that that was partially because they had other things on their plate, and partially because there was a lot more downside for them than there was upside.

Q: I would think so.

ADAI: Particularly since this was the period after Tiananmen and there was still a fair amount of tension. When I talked with them the conversations were fairly shallow. We didn't get very deep into issues. There was virtually no expression of personal opinions. Of course, it's not only in China that you encounter that.

It's not to say that there were no officials in the area with whom we could talk. There were some who were in positions that were not sensitive or in positions that where they were supposed to deal with us on various matters. That included economic officials who wanted to promote trade with the United States, and support officials, people that dealt with us on an administrative support level.

Q: Did you get involved in cultural affairs?

ADAI: We had a public affairs officer at the consulate and she got involved with bringing American musicians and speakers to the area. They were well received. We ourselves visited sites in the area. We went to the temples, we got to know some of the artists in Chengdu, we went to the markets, we met people that were educated and with whom we could discuss history and different things about Chinese culture.

Q: Did you find you were besieged by parents and kids who wanted to go to the United States to school?

ADAI: Yes. We were besieged by people applying for visas in general. Students were certainly a big element of that. There were parents who wanted to get their kids to school in the United States, because they wanted to get them out of China and give them different opportunities. Things were changing in China but they hadn't gotten to the point where they are now; where the opportunities in some respects are better than they are in the United States. We gave lots of visas to people to go to the States to study and to visit. We also had to turn many down.

We had one incident where a businessman who I had met in Guizhou Province came to the consulate with a relative of his who wanted to go to the United States. He brought 30 bottles of Mao-tai, which is expensive. It's one of the most famous drinks in China and came from Guizhou Province. I went down and I talked to him. I told him that we could not accept his gifts, because these visa issues had to be decided on the merits. I asked him to take his wine back. He insisted that this had nothing to do with the visa; that he was bringing it as an expression of friendship between nations, etc. etc. I knew that technically I should not accept the gift. However, I had also been raised, basically, to believe that if somebody offers you something it's impolite not to take it. There's an element of that in some cultures that's true. I finally said he could give this wine to the consulate but it will have absolutely no impact on the decision. He said fine. We took the 30 bottles of Mao-tai and then gave them to all of the Chinese employees in the consulate. His relative went in and saw the consular officer who interviewed him and then refused him the visa. I thought, well, at least that's going to spread like wildfire and it would be unlikely to happen again.

Subsequently, I concluded that the decision was half correct. What I really should have done was then go back to that man who had come in and take him out to dinner so that he didn't lose face personally. But I didn't do it, and that was wrong. There are many things in my career that I would like to be able to revisit.

Q: Yes, well in these interviews of course we play by one set of rules and they play by another.

ADAI: And we, for the most part, are not able to play them as intricately as they do. And it was really hard. You were in the consular cone and you know how difficult it is to do that kind of work. But it was really hard for the consular officers all over China. I would not want to be a consular officer in China.

In Chengdu it was especially hard. The volume was high. I think that the individual consular officer in Chengdu had close to the same number of cases as individual consular officers in Beijing or Guangzhou or Shanghai. However, in Chengdu that consular officer was alone. He or she had no one else to share the burden with. They also had no privacy. There was no respite because they couldn't leave the office and go to their home and be private. They left their office, went around the corner and upstairs into the same hotel. Access to the hotel was not restricted. They could be cornered in the hotel or on the hotel grounds or just about anywhere. They were in a fishbowl, and people could go after them at any time. So the stress for those consular officers was just tremendous. I admired them greatly for the poise that they maintained.

Q: Well did the fact that they were in China compensate those officers for the stress they had to bear? America's fascination with China goes back many, many years. Did this make a difference?

ADAI: Of course. Most of us who were in China were there because we were interested in China. It wasn't because we had just been told to go there. Most of us were fascinated with the circumstances that we found ourselves in. Most of us understood that there were many different levels to it and that when we were restricted in one way or another or stressed in one way or another, it wasn't a one dimensional thing. It wasn't just directed at us. We understood that there were all kinds of reasons for this, and that the people with whom we were dealing were going through something infinitely more difficult and complex. Those of us in Chengdu at that time had it better than the American diplomats who first arrived in China in the 1970s, and better even than when we were in Beijing in the mid-1980s. There was more freedom to walk around; there was more freedom to associate with others. We could talk to people. We still had to be careful because we never knew whether somebody that talked with us would get in trouble or something. But we could communicate with individuals. We could talk with the old woman who was selling something on the street and exchange smiles. We could have a philosophical discussion with somebody at a teahouse or in the park. I think most of us appreciated that we were able to get quite a lot out of it. When I was there there was only one American officer in the consulate who didn't have Chinese language. That was the administrative officer, because the Department had had trouble finding somebody. He was from USAID and he volunteered. He and his wife were probably two of the most enthusiastic people who were there. They got out and they went all over. They took full advantage of the opportunity to see the place and to communicate with people. There were lots of people there that spoke some English and wanted to practice their English too.

Q: Were there any particular points in the United States that students were headed for? I mean, established connections or not?

ADAI: I think there were a few places that were better known than others.

Q: Yes, I was talking to the headmaster of my prep school, who was saying he couldn't say it in public, but China's become almost a cash cow.

ADAI: I've seen that in a number of private schools.

Q: I mean, he said they were getting superb students. They were not lowering their standards.

ADAI: I know some schools that are actually going to China and recruiting.

Q: Was the question of religion at all taking root from where you were?

ADAI: Religion of one form or another was becoming more prominent in many places around China. Chengdu didn't seem to be unusual. I was aware of more resurgence in the Christian religion in Beijing and in Guangzhou than in Chengdu. I don't recall visiting a Christian church in Chengdu. However, the Buddhist and Daoist temples were very crowded and active.

Q: Were you sort of off the beaten track for visitors to China, government visitors?

ADAI: Pretty much so. We certainly didn't get the same number of official visitors as Beijing, Shanghai or Guangzhou. We did get some. Some made a special effort to get out to southwest China because they had a personal interest. Some came out for specific government or business purposes. I only remember one group coming through to Tibet. That included Dick Holbrooke and John Holdridge, who were both private citizens at the time. We also had a number of visits from officials who were focused on Yunnan because of the narcotics issue.

Q: Were drugs a problem in your area?

ADAI: Not in Sichuan. In Yunnan there definitely was a problem along the border with Burma. It was a problem that the Chinese government was concerned about. They were taking a variety of measures to deal with it, both law enforcement and rehabilitation. Drugs were being moved from the border with Burma across China and down to Hong Kong, though detailed information was hard to come by. We made some efforts to begin building a relationship between our Drug Enforcement Agency (DEA) people and the Chinese public security bureau. It started in Beijing, but when I arrived in Chengdu it was still sort of tentative and nothing had happened in our area. I thought that that was a good time to try, so I went down to Hong Kong and talked with the DEA people there. They were enthusiastic, so I then went to Yunnan and talked with the foreign affairs office there. They were responsive too, and organized a trip to the border with Burma. The Director of the Foreign Affairs Office in Yunnan, and the Director of the Yunnan Public Security Bureau took me and one DEA officer from Hong Kong. It was the first time that any official American had been to the Chinese side of the Burma/China border since before the Chinese communists had taken over in 1949. It was fascinating. It was really fascinating for me, because I had recently lived in Burma, and I had not been allowed to go to the Burmese side of the border. It was completely off limits to foreigners and specifically to Americans.

I had seen the Chinese and Burmese mixing and working together in Mandalay. I had begun to be able to see when someone in Burma had Chinese ancestry. On the Chinese border I had to try to see it in reverse. In some ways it was more difficult, because that area of Yunnan has so many different minorities of its own. That's a big part of Yunnan's identity. On that trip, we only went to one place on the border, a town called Ruili, where most of the trade was crossing. There was clearly an important Burmese influence on the Chinese side, and probably an even bigger Chinese influence on the Burmese side.

The trip was successful in that it initiated direct ties between DEA and the Chinese Public Security Bureau in Yunnan, and nothing untoward happened. There was no downside to it, and everybody was more comfortable working with that relationship afterwards. Not too long after that the assistant secretary of state for narcotics (INS) also visited. We took him to the border as well. Then we did a longer trip, went to more places and visited rehabilitation centers. We were able to wander along the river there where the border was and talk with people.

Q: Did you have Americans caught in drug smuggling or anything like that?

ADAI: No. Not when I was there and I'm not aware of any since then either.

Q: How about Chinese dissidents? Were they of a presence where you were?

ADAI: We didn't have any issues with high profile political dissidents in Chengdu when I was there. Sichuan is a very volatile area, and traditionally the people of Sichuan have been as upfront as any Chinese about expressing disagreement with the central government. For that reason there was probably more effort made to keep that kind of expression suppressed.

Q: Were there any American firms dealing there?

ADAI: Yes, there were a few but not many. There were a few companies dealing with larger Chinese operations. Hughes sold a communications satellite to the Chinese government and had personnel at the rocket launch center in the west of Sichuan Province. McDonnell Douglas had some personnel working with an aircraft manufacturer near Chengdu. There were virtually no entrepreneurs that I saw in that area when I was there. I tried to encourage people to come and didn't get any takers, except for one, McDonald's.

Q: Well let's talk about it a little.

ADAIR: Well, close to the end of my tour in Chengdu another mountaineering group came through. This was the second American mountaineering group that I'd seen come into China to climb Everest. The first was when I was in Beijing, led by Lou Whittaker from Seattle. This one was led by his twin brother, Jim Whittaker. This group was going to climb with the Chinese and with a Russian group. I think it was called the "Climb for Peace." When they came through they stopped in Chengdu on the way, and we met with them. When they left I asked Jim Whittaker what we could do for them when they came back. What would they like? He laughed and said, "How about a Big Mac?" I said okay.

So I called the headquarters of McDonald's in Hong Kong and I explained the situation to them. I didn't know whether the team would succeed in getting to the top of Everest or not. They did. However, I thought McDonald's could get a lot of good publicity from catering a welcome back event. They thought about it and said yes. They filled up an airplane with all the stuff for Big Macs and flew it to Chengdu with their own personnel. We worked with the local government and local businesses and set up the event at a major hotel in Chengdu. We let the climbers know when they got down to Lhasa, put up big welcoming banners and invited about 300 people. The mountaineers loved it, and I thought everybody loved it. Driving to the reception I was sitting with Jim Whittaker and I explained what had been set up. He asked me if I wanted him to speak. I replied that if he wanted to speak, sure, but that this reception was for them to enjoy so the choice was his. He said very well, he would just eat. So that's the way we did it. I introduced them; and he got up and made a big deal of taking a bite out of the Big Mac. Afterwards I got a nasty letter from one of the American professors who were at the university there, saying he couldn't believe that the U.S. Government would do such a crass material thing, promoting American companies and not even give Jim Whittaker a chance to speak. I replied to him, but I guess you can't make everybody happy.

Q: How about corruption? Did you run into this?

ADAIR: Chinese corruption?

Q: Yes.

ADAIR: When I was there Chinese corruption, in the sense that we usually speak of it, did not appear to have really gotten started yet. There wasn't enough freedom yet. Corruption always existed in China, of course. There are always people who will try to use whatever power they have to do something for themselves that is outside the bounds of what is permitted. During the period of Mao Zedong's rule in China the corruption was still there. It just was not on the business side because there wasn't any business. The currency of corruption wasn't dollars or yuan. It wasn't money. The corruption came in the form of whether you would get a better apartment, or a car to take you around, or your child would be allowed to leave the country to go study overseas. The economic opening that began in the late 1970s and grew through the '80s began to provide economic incentives for corruption through profit. But it hadn't really had a chance to be that noticeable in Chengdu in the early 1990s, at least as I recall. It was probably growing pretty quickly in construction related areas though.

Q: Well I got a certain insight into this from a book by this Peace Corps volunteer who then became a New Yorker. I think it was called "Driving Around." It's a book about driving around Beijing and China. He documents corruption related to cigarettes. Apparently there are categories of cigarettes and you tell how much clout you have or you think you have by the cigarette brand that you smoke.

ADAI: I think those kinds of things can take many forms. I took a congressional delegation to Yunnan Province and we visited a tobacco company. I can't remember where the congressional delegation was from. When we finished the tour of the plant, the company gave everybody several cartons of cigarettes to take with them. They had one kind of cigarette that was an experimental combination of tobaccos unique to China. And I asked the company if they would give me a couple more cartons of that, because I thought I would take them to a friend in Hong Kong who might be a good advertisement for them. One of the people in the congressional delegation sort of raised his eyebrows and asked if that was appropriate - could it be considered a kind of a bribe? I laughed and said I didn't think so, but I suppose someone might have thought so.

Q: One of the things that certainly was prevalent at all our embassies and consulates for years may still be going on, and that was the Christmas gifts.

ADAI: Yes.

Q: At one point because other countries were undergoing real privation we used to give out things like bottles of Scotch, but also razor blades and things of this nature. And you know, after a time I think we've probably gotten away from this, but this was giving the customs officials and others with whom we worked the message that we really care for you and we remember you; remember us.

ADAI: Right.

Q: Now, did you do any of that sort of thing?

ADAI: Yes, we often try to give gifts to people. In China and elsewhere I tried to give gifts that were about the United States.

Q: Books.

ADAI: Books, particularly picture books of the United States. I tried to get them from USIS (United States Information Service). When we could we would give American whiskey, but that was difficult to get in China, particularly in Chengdu.

In Chengdu, we mostly took people out to dinner. In China there is a whole culture of eating. You don't go out one-on-one. You get a big group of people; sit at a big table where a seemingly endless array of dishes is served; and it's very loud and boisterous. That was part of Chinese culture and it was permissible for Chinese officials to accept those invitations. It was also less compromising for them, because these were public, multiple person events. They were less vulnerable to potential criticism. So we tried to do that as much as possible for the people that we dealt with – at least as much as we could afford it. It was a way of showing our interest in them or gratitude for services that they had done for us. We would often take the head of an office and a number of his people - anywhere from five to 15 or 20 of them. They liked it because we would take them to good restaurants that many of them wouldn't otherwise have the chance to go to. There weren't any foreign restaurants in Chengdu at the time; it would be Chinese restaurants. It was nice for us because we got the chance to visit with them in a way that was less formal – and because it was something that we could actually do for them.

Q: I was just thinking of the problem that diplomats have had, certainly in the former Soviet Union, probably Russia now, with drinking. Was trying to drink you under the table part of the Chinese system?

ADAI: Oh, very much a part of it. I told you about my experience in Beijing.

Q: Let's talk about it some more now.

ADAI: Okay. There is a part of Chinese culture where drinking is very important. It's done as a social thing, it's done as a competition thing and it's done as a personal thing. People who get drunk together can form a bond. In China it has been also carried into art forms. Some very famous poets have composed poetry when they're drunk. I suppose like Coleridge and his drugs. I don't know to what degree paintings were done that way. Even in martial arts there's a whole style called "the drunken master."

I was first exposed to it in Taiwan when I was studying. The teachers tried to teach us the danger of this. I was less concerned about the danger. I wanted to experience it - try all the different wines and stuff like that. And I did that to some degree in Taiwan and to some degree in Hong Kong. But I didn't get really exposed to it until I went to Beijing. Beijing in the mid 1980s was still pretty closed down, but official drinking was permitted. As I described earlier, I way overdid it. In Chengdu I was more careful.

Q: Are there any tricks?

ADAI: Oh, there are. People have all kinds of tricks. The first one I learned was from Russians at the UN in New York back in 1971. They said if you eat lots of butter before you go and drink, you won't get drunk. I tried that. It didn't work for me – just made me sick. The Chinese actually have a variety of medicines that you can take before and after that help significantly because they protect the liver. The butter or oil prescription may protect the stomach, but it hurts the liver. So the Chinese know how to do it.

The best story I heard, though, was from an uncle of mine who was an American military officer stationed in Kunming during World War II. He had to have dinner with a local general who was a famous drinker – and I guess not a very nice person. He secretly arranged some deal with the people at the restaurant so that only the general was getting liquor – he was getting something else. He won that competition, and somehow the ruse was never discovered. If it had been, I suppose things might not have gone well for the restaurant owners.

At our wedding reception in Taipei, when we made the obligatory toasts to each table of guests, I had tea in my glasses, which was the same color as the wine. At the time I had a stomach ulcer and alcohol was dangerous. However, my ruse was discovered by one of Ginger's uncles who started to broadcast it until he was stopped by his mother who had recommended that course of action to begin with.

Q: Did you get any reflections on the WWII participation by Americans in Chungking when you were there? What is Chungking called now?

ADAI: Chongqing. There were still strong memories of that period, and of the American involvement in both Chongqing and Chengdu. There were American bombers stationed outside of Chengdu. The Flying Tigers were near Kunming in Yunnan province.

Several times during our stay in Chengdu, people came up to me on the street, older people, to say they remembered the Americans who protected them when we most needed it. They would describe seeing the Flying Tiger aircraft over the city. The Flying Tigers were the fighters that protected the cities from the Japanese aircraft. The B-29s were bombers would fly out across the lines to bomb the Japanese positions. When these planes flew overhead, the people knew they were American - that somebody was with them. That meant a lot to them and they had never forgotten it. That was really touching, particularly since for the previous 30 years our two countries had been mortal enemies. Some of these people even made a point of saying that during all that time they never forgot what we did to help them.

When I was there the Chinese government also memorialized Joseph Stilwell, the American general who was in charge of U.S. military forces in China and the liaison to General Chiang Kai-shek. A small museum was set up in the house where he had lived. Some of his family members came out for that and I attended the ceremony. And that was pretty nice, that the American general would be recognized that way; that he would be given an official place in their history.

Q: You know, every once in awhile, we have an incident with the Chinese. They get very touchy on things that often are either their fault or our fault. I'm thinking of the collision with the reconnaissance plane that forced it down, and also the bombing of the Chinese embassy in Belgrade. Did anything major like that that happen while you were there?

ADAI: When I was in Chengdu we didn't have anything specifically of that nature. We did after I left. One of my big projects in Chengdu was to get the permanent consulate building completed. When I went out to Chengdu, the consulate was in the hotel. There was a site that had been selected for the consulate, and a Chinese construction company had actually built the shells of the buildings. The project had stopped because communication between the Department of State's OBO (Bureau of Overseas Buildings Operations) and the Chinese had fallen apart. OBO had put the project on hold indefinitely. I spent a lot of time trying to resurrect that project, and succeeded. It was a lot of work, and quite difficult to get through the bureaucracy. But we finally got it restarted. I didn't move into it but my successor did.

One of the issues had been a question about setback. There was a wall around the whole compound, but the consul general's residence was right against the corner of the wall. It didn't meet the standards – a 100 foot setback – that I think had been established after the initial construction started. I argued that was less important in a place like Chengdu where China would always control the security. Well, after we bombed, by mistake, the Chinese embassy in Belgrade, there were demonstrations in Beijing. A mob stood around the embassy in Beijing and threw stones at it breaking all the windows. There was a picture of the ambassador looking out through the broken windows. Well, what they didn't show was what happened in Chengdu, where the mob burnt down the residence of the consul general. Luckily no one was hurt, but that showed me the downside to my aggressive argument that we could apply a different security standard in China.

There's a very strong emotional side to the Chinese population. It may take some time to come into play. They can go through an awful lot before they finally react, but when they do react it's pretty serious. It can happen when there is a perception that their national honor has been damaged beyond what can be justifiably accepted. The Chinese government does not always try to defuse those situations – enough said.

Q: Perhaps understandably in some cases. As an old Belgrade hand I wondered, how the hell could we have done that?

ADAIR: When my Chinese friends have talked with me about that, I have said that it would make no sense for the United States to do something like that. It would serve no rational purpose. But I also said, "Never underestimate the ability of any government to make really stupid mistakes like miscalculations using out of date information, improper maps, etc. – and that includes the United States for all its wealth and power. With us, the bombing of an embassy is pretty unacceptable. If that happened to us we would be pretty difficult to please. We always have to be careful. There are lots of ways in which the lines may be crossed inadvertently, and the reactions – of either side - might surprise us.

Q: Well for example court cases. I mean something dealing with a Chinese plaintiff in a court case determined in, you know, East Bygosh, Pennsylvania, might not get much attention in Pennsylvania, but once it gets played up in China it could be a different story.

ADAIR: Yes. I think another area where difficulties may grow over time may be visas. We have made it difficult for Chinese to get visas to the United States. It's expensive, and many Chinese have felt insulted in their efforts get visas to visit the United States. We see now that it's becoming very expensive for Americans to get visas to China now. Perhaps at some point it may become difficult for Americans to get visas to China at all. The Chinese may tell us they are just doing it out of reciprocity. They are telling us that now, and there is some truth in it – some. I think we gave some multiple year visas to Chinese when I was in Chengdu, but I can't get one now to China. These kinds of things stick in peoples' memories and get interpreted differently over time.

Q: Well as far as relations with China, it strikes me that here is a population that can be encouraged to really be beastly, including go on rampages against other countries. It strikes me that this would be a real factor that we'd almost have to consider in our relations with them...

ADAI: Any population can be encouraged to be beastly - any population.

Q: I know but the Chinese-

ADAI: The Chinese have a larger population than anybody else.

Q: Yes.

ADAI: The Chinese stand on a much deeper and older civilization than anybody else in the world. They have an ancient social organization – which has survived in spite of the Cultural Revolution - and many traditions that restrain them. But those restraints can be taken off. And, perhaps because they have such a complex set of restraints, if there's any green light that says "you're relieved of these restraints," then maybe the explosion is larger than it would be in other cases. Maybe that's part of the reason the Japanese behaved as they did during the war. Their society has some of these restraints as well. I don't know.

Q: Was there any action while you were there, in your area, on encouraging Chinese-American military cooperation of any kind?

ADAI: Well yes, we were trying to establish more contacts between our two militaries. It was happening very, very gradually and the embassy was playing a role. American and Chinese military attaches in many places around the world were increasing their contacts. When I was in Chengdu I didn't have any contacts with the military per se. I met some military officials at the satellite launch that I referred to.

However, that part of the relationship was very limited. In the long run it is a really important part of our overall relationship. One way or another, our respective defense establishments have enormous influence on our national and international policies. In China there have been periods when the military was not just heavily influential, but dominant, in government decision making across the board. It may have been less so in the 1980s and early 1990s because that seemed to have been part of the plan - to move them back a notch, get them involved in other things, and give them a stake in opening to the rest of the world. In recent years, the Chinese military seems to be reasserting its role again. China has become wealthier. It can pour more money into the military, and is taking a much larger role on the international stage.

To some degree, this is natural and perhaps necessary. As China grows more powerful it will have to play a role across the board: political, military, economic, cultural - everything. The question is, what kind of balance will there be? One of our largest concerns from the beginning has been to promote a relationship with China that is not an antagonistic relationship. We had an antagonistic relationship in the '50s, '60s and part of the '70s because both sides chose to make the relationship antagonistic. In more recent decades, both sides have tried to overcome that legacy. However, there are still forces in both countries that would like to return the relationship to an adversarial one. I think that we have to be real careful about what we do all around the world – even in apparently unrelated areas - because what we do can affect the balance between those who would promote a more friendly and constructive relationship and others who would prefer something very different. When I was in Chengdu, the United States undertook the first Gulf War. In the minds of most Americans, it was done for the best of reasons: we intervened to protect Kuwait, a small and friendly state, from Iraq, a more powerful, territorially aggressive and not so friendly state. We intervened, with the approval of the United Nations, to restore internationally recognized boundaries and to maintain the integrity of an international system intended to avoid catastrophic conflict. In addition, we considered our intervention to be quite restrained. We didn't go in and occupy Iraq. The first Bush administration was really impressive in the way that it did that.

On the other hand, our display of massive technological warfare was so extraordinary - and so flamboyant - that I think it had a profound impact on Chinese observers. It surprised most Americans that we had those capabilities. I think it also surprised and worried many Chinese.

Q: Oh yes.

ADAI: The Chinese were impressed and they were also concerned. If I were a Chinese official in Beijing at that time, I would have been asking, why would the United States be willing to take its power halfway around the world to protect this little teeny country with which it had no protection treaties? Oil would not be a sufficient answer since the United States had other sources, and also could have simply restored the apparently friendly relationship that it had had with Iraq not too long before. I would also have been concerned by the demonstration that the United States could apply unbelievable force anywhere on the planet. Then we demonstrated the willingness to do it again with the second Gulf War, and the invasion of Iraq – even more worrying because we were willing to go in and occupy.

I think these factors strengthened the voices within China pressing to view the United States as the enemy, as a threat. Some 3,000 years of history have taught the Chinese that they will suffer when they ignore potential threats from the outside, whether it be from Mongols, Tibetans, Manchurians, British, Japanese.....or Americans? So now we see them pouring more and more resources into the military - traditional forces, navy and even space. They've always been concerned about Taiwan. We have been flying intelligence gathering planes off the coast of China as a matter of course for years. That's got to be a concern for them. If China were to fly spy planes 12 miles off the coast of California we would go apoplectic. Why, I don't know what we'd do because it's almost inconceivable that they would do that. It was a surprise that they made such a show over the Hainan incident; but on the whole both sides were fairly restrained. There will be more of these situations, particularly since that whole area of the South China Sea is very important to China. I don't know how it's going to play out.

Q: Because it's not as though there are other countries in that region that look with pleasure on the Chinese laying claim to the area.

ADAIR: No, they don't.

Q: Okay, when did you leave?

ADAIR: I left China in the summer of 1992 - July.

Q: Alright, and for the next time, where did you go?

ADAIR: I came back to Washington, went into the Senior Seminar for a year and then went into the European Bureau.

Q: Today is the 15th of November, the Ides of November, 2011, with Marshall Adair.

And we're going to go back a bit. I made a note to ask you, how did your wife find being a Taiwanese in the Middle Kingdom and all?

ADAIR: That's a very important question. People from Taiwan had a very special status in the PRC at that time; and for many of them it was not comfortable. The government officially welcomed them, but of course welcomed them as citizens of China. The official policy was intended to be very accommodating: maintaining the political position, recognizing differences. In a sense it was a courtship, one where both sides had interests but not necessarily interests that coincided. It was particularly challenging for women from Taiwan who were married to American diplomats and officially American citizens.

Before we went to China we had heard stories about how difficult it was for ethnic Chinese spouses to get along in China. Public security officials often restricted them from entering the embassy, either by misunderstanding or possibly intentionally. The guards at the embassy, some officials at the hotels and even people on the street sometimes tended to give them a hard time. The assumption was that there was some envy because the people from Taiwan were wealthier and better dressed; or anger because they were considered by some to be traitors to China. There were all kinds of stories.

Ginger was aware of that, and decided to address it head on. When we arrived in Beijing, while we were still living in the hotel, one of the first things that she did was to tackle the relationship with the embassy guards – the young policemen or soldiers from the Public Security Bureau. She put on this little hat, a somewhat ordinary hat except that it had a cute little duck embroidered on the front. It stood out. Then she went and visited all of the guard stations at the embassy buildings and the around the area – there were probably ten of them. The embassy itself had three embassy buildings: the ambassador's residence, the main chancery and the administrative building. In front of each of them and at each entrance to the diplomatic residential area was a guard-stand. She took her ID card, went up to each of them and she introduced herself. She said I'm Mrs. Adair, the wife of Marshall Adair, who's such and such at the embassy; I come from Taiwan, etc. She was polite, smiling and friendly - and they had never seen anything like this.

They were all just taken aback. She wasn't asking to go in, she was just introducing herself and telling them that she would be going in – and she wasn't going to cause them any trouble. I don't know exactly what she said to them, but after that they all remembered her. She was never stopped, which was very unusual. She was never given any trouble. They would even smile when they saw her coming and wave to her when she came in. Lots of the other people continued to have difficulty.

She figured out pretty early on something that I often forget, that there are two sides to people. There's the side where people are worried or angry or afraid or whatever and there's the other side of people that want to be friendly and helpful and so on.

Related to that were the restrictions placed on all of us as foreigners, and particularly as foreign diplomats. I didn't like the restrictions that were placed on us, didn't like the idea that we were constantly being listened to, constantly being followed; didn't like the idea that we were told we couldn't go here or we couldn't go there. I didn't like the fact that when we went into restaurants we were only supposed to eat in certain areas, and that when we rode the trains we could only ride in first class - and pay more and so on. Most of us saw that as an imposition. We believed that these were restrictions exclusively for political reasons.

Well, restricting us for political reasons was a big part of it, but it wasn't the only part. The other part was that officials at most levels had instructions to make sure that nothing happened to us. If anything did happen to us they were responsible. So they were extra careful. Ginger could see this pretty clearly, and she figured out ways to reassure those people rather than get angry with them. She learned how to appeal to their better side. It took me years to see and accept that. Obviously she could communicate with them better because she had fluent Mandarin. My Mandarin wasn't fluent.

She was also able to connect with people in China that I was not able to connect with. I had some obvious disadvantages: I was a foreigner with a different face and limited Chinese language. I had some less obvious disadvantages: I more often didn't recognize what people had to offer personally. I was focused on officials or things that I had some understanding of. There was an awful lot out there that I didn't understand. I didn't understand the art world, the performing art world, the literature world. Everyone was all dressed the same in these dingy blue overalls, and they seemed to act the same way. Actually, they were all different and had some very different backgrounds. Some were not educated at all. Some were extremely well educated - not just in terms of the ruling party and what you were supposed to believe - but classical educations that went back way before the communist takeover in China. Ginger picked up on stuff like that just by talking with these people briefly, meeting them on the street or whatever. As a result of that she met people that were beyond the normal environment of the embassy and beyond what was normally accessible to embassy personnel. And when she met them, I got to meet them too.

For instance, there was a Buddhist association in China. At the time, in the mid '80s, China had already begun to relax its restrictions on religion. There was a national Buddhist association and there were Christian churches and there were various other things. She got to know some of the monks and lamas and others associated with those communities; and she was actually able to study with them, which was very unusual. I made an official call on the head of the Chinese Buddhist association before I made that trip to Tibet, and Ginger went with me. When we talked with him, he found out that she had an interest in Buddhism and he said, “Oh, you should go and meet this person.” That was pretty rare at that time as well.

So Ginger exposed me to a much broader segment of Chinese society. She helped me to understand that the restrictions that were being placed on us by the official community had two sides to them. They could restrict us but they could also help us sometimes. Some of these people, who we saw primarily as obstacles, could give us better access to some places than we could get on our own, because some of those people were very, very well connected. And as a result we were able to meet people, go to places and do things that otherwise might not have been possible.

Q: Did you have the feeling at the time that there was an effort to seal off problem areas in the Chinese community from foreigners or was this more a matter of trying to keep you out of trouble?

ADAI: Well it was both. They didn't want us to get into trouble but they didn't want us to foment trouble. There were areas that they were watching that they were concerned about. They didn't want foreigners going in and making things more difficult for them. One of these areas was religion and particularly the local Christian churches. The government had decided to provide them with more freedom to worship and follow their faith, but they didn't want that to spill over into the political arena. They were concerned that if these groups grew too much or too rapidly they would spill into the political arena. And, historically they had some evidence for concern.

Q: Well I was wondering. I've talked to people who have served in the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe. As time went on, communism as a belief was losing an awful lot of its appeal. People were going to lectures on the principles of communism and falling asleep. This is compulsory for some, but it had lost its appeal up and down the line. Towards the end you couldn't call upon people to be good communists, because they'd almost laugh in your face. What was happening at the time you were in China to the appeal of communism, the teaching of it?

ADAI: In the late '70s Deng Xiaoping made the decision to begin relaxing the controls on the economy, because he recognized that the command economy imposed as part of communist doctrine and philosophy had not worked. But, in other parts of the world the free market economy had been much more successful in using resources, harnessing the energies of the people and stuff like that. So he and others decided to move government back from control of all economic activity and give more freedom to people to participate in it on their own. By necessity that included allowing other freedoms in society like association, movement, education and so on.

However, they also determined that the communist party had to remain in power – partially because some form of legitimate authority was essential and probably also to protect the leadership's own position. The senior leadership had been “communists” for a long time. Most of them had to believe in at least some various principles of communist theory and philosophy. They were not prepared to junk it. The communist party would continue to be the power governing China and it would not accept any questioning of that. The realm of political organization and governmental management was off limits at the beginning to these reforms. Communist ideology, loyalty to the party and the party's control of all mechanisms of government and security had to be maintained; they were determined to maintain them. Now, what his vision was for the long term, 10, 20, 50, 100 years, I don't know. I'm still speaking of Deng Xiaoping because he was the force behind this.

Clearly there were some contradictions. Ideology was important, because it had been an active tool in holding a very large and diverse population together. It also held the party together. Relaxing the command economy was antithetical to standard communist ideology. So, they had to do an ideological dance to smooth and explain this change. They came up with the phrase, "socialism with Chinese characteristics." They inserted Chinese-ness, or what I call Han nationalism or Han chauvinism into the equation. Cultural nationalism can be a very useful unifying – and disciplinary - tool.

Essentially what I think was happening was the communist party was moving into the position the imperial court and bureaucracy had occupied for more than 2,000 years before the chaos of the 20th century. The party would retain absolute authority, but allowed the rest of the country to operate more freely as long as it was healthy and not threatening the stability of the nation. It would retain the power to stop any problems that might develop. How that has actually been done in terms of the education of communist party members and stuff like that, I don't know. I don't know how this has really played out in those inner circles, but it's a work in progress. My own view is that eventually they're going to go back to something like the imperial system that they had for some 2-3,000 years.

Q: Were you picking up from anybody a change in how students viewed communism? I mean, you know, courses and other things that were going on?

ADAI: I think in the beginning some, perhaps many, believed communism was flawed. But most of the people that had any connection to the establishment would be careful about how they expressed that. In so far as students were concerned, I think Deng Xiaoping's initiation of reforms encouraged a renaissance in the importance and attraction of formal education. Parents determined to obtain the best possible education for their children, within China or abroad. Students once again focused more on their studies than on political activity. For many people, it has seemed for the last several decades or so that the best educational opportunities were overseas, because the institutes of higher learning in China were limited by outlook or by resources. Access to the best Chinese institutions was more available to the children of those who were already in power. So a lot depended on where you stood in that hierarchy as to how you saw the system.

I was able to meet a few young people that were fairly high up in that hierarchy when I was in Hong Kong and occasionally in Beijing, but not very many. Those that I did meet were very well educated and intelligent. They were not doctrinaire. Their thinking processes were not controlled by the slogans of the previous decades.

Q: The Little Red Book had disappeared pretty much?

ADAI: Pretty much, yes. The leadership of the Communist Party had decided on the direction that China was to take, and that direction was substantially different from China's trajectory of the previous 40 years. However, they also knew that if they were going to maintain authority within China, they had to act within certain parameters and they had to maintain loyalties in their relationships. And they did it.

Q: I have to say that I spent four years in a religious prep school run by monks, Episcopalian monks, and there was compulsory chapel. Later, when I joined and worked in the Foreign Service, I did so with the profound feeling that this whole God business is nonsense – but within the context of the Foreign Service I didn't say so. Now I'm older and I can say it. But one can live in community with others and abide by their morays.

Now, back to your wife. What about the Taiwanese factor? Did she find herself either challenged or just plain questioned? I'm sure that this was a burning issue, but one that normal Chinese necessarily had much exposure to.

ADAI: Well, that's right. Basically, at that time the Chinese were very concerned about Taiwan. One of the nation's primary goals was to bring it back into the fold, re-establish connections and reintegrate it into China. So, at that time they were very interested in people from Taiwan. Luckily the government's perspective was more long-term. They weren't trying or hoping to do this in a period of five or 10 or 15 years so there wasn't a lot of pressure behind it and emotions were under control. They were especially interested and curious about people who were actually Taiwanese. There were a lot of people in Taiwan who were not Taiwanese; people that were born on the mainland and had gone to Taiwan with Chiang Kai-shek. Ginger was Taiwanese. Her father's family had been there for some 300 or 400 years; and her mother's family had been there much longer because much of her mother's family were the aboriginal people – related to the Pacific Islanders.

Issues related to Taiwan actually started when we were in Hong Kong. She was very upfront about this. I remember a conversation with a taxicab driver, who labeled her as Chinese. She replied, "No, I'm not. I'm Taiwanese." "What? Taiwan is a part of China." "No, it's not." That was her personal answer. The taxicab driver went apoplectic. His whole universe was being challenged. Ginger was very straightforward with the people that she met in Beijing. She considered herself Taiwanese, and would show people a picture of her family that she carried around with her. - "See, we look different." She considered herself part of the Chinese tradition, but as far as she was concerned Taiwan should be an independent country. But she was not political. She didn't seek out political arguments. It was only if they pushed her that she would answer. She was happy to talk about her family, she was happy to talk about culture; but she did it in a Chinese context, where you don't spill your guts to just anybody. Americans are much less restrained.

Q: Was she ever called upon to talk in public, like on a radio talk show or something like that?

ADAI: No, and she wouldn't have done it. I don't think that the embassy would have wanted her to go. She made it very clear that she wasn't interested in politics in any form whatsoever.

That was one of the things that made it easier for her to go and study with the Chinese monks and the Tibetans. She didn't want to get involved in those kinds of questions. There were other things that were far more important to her and were more important to them as well, so.

Q: While we're talking about religion, what about movements in China like the Falun Gong?

ADAI: Yes, that's a quasi-religious, quasi-political movement centered on the phenomenon of "Qi" - the basic life energy that exists in and around all of us - and how to tap into it. The concept of "qi" - and how to use it, "qigong" - runs through thousands of years of Chinese history and culture.

Q: The "Boxers" would have been something like that.

ADAI: Yes. Today, Falun Gong is presented as a philosophy and a religion. But historically these movements in China have gone beyond the bounds of personal development into social and political arenas - and they have presented challenges to existing governmental authority - sometimes serious challenges. So the current Chinese government has banned it. Lots of people are up in arms about that on the grounds that it violates human rights. But the Chinese government is very clear about it. Historically, when these movements have started they've gotten out of hand. This one looked like it was getting out of hand. The way it's pursued here and in other places is very political.

Q: Well now did that impact at all on your service in China?

ADAI: No. We have met people that are interested in Falun Gong. We have certainly met many more people that are interested in qi. Daoism is focused on this. Buddhism teaches a lot about it, but goes at the whole process of personal development in a different way. Daoism focuses on the physical manifestations. Qi is a big part of Tibetan Buddhism which focuses on the body and the cultivation of it as a means to enlightenment. The Taiping movement and rebellion in the 19th century was a quasi Christian manifestation. At one time or another, all of these have been, or have been used by some as mechanisms to challenge existing authority. This phenomenon is something that successive Chinese governments for thousands of years have realized that they have to keep in check, because they can threaten the foundations of government and order in China.

That concern is what was behind the restrictions on Christian communities in China as well. The government would allow them to exist and to function up to a point, but if they became too evangelical and moved into the sociopolitical realm that was when they were restricted.

Q: Were you having problems in 1993 or so? I spent three weeks in Kyrgyzstan preaching the culture of how to set up a consular establishment, part of a USIA- sponsored program. There were many Christian faiths sending people out to these areas. They were having a wonderful time, converting and all this. Some of them were, you know, akin to snake handlers practically. Was any of this going on?

ADAI: Yes. It was harder to do it in China, because the Chinese government kept pretty tight controls on it, but there were people constantly trying. This included Americans. They were so proud when they got through customs with Bibles in their suitcases that had not been discovered. They thought that they were doing such a favor to the Chinese people by spreading the word. I grew up in the Christian faith, and the Christian Church has been an important part of my life. I think it has a lot to offer people and I think it's done a lot of good. It's also done a lot of harm; and I've always been very uncomfortable with both the concept and the practice of evangelizing. It's one thing to share something and teach people. It's quite another to demand that they behave in a certain way and follow the faith that you tell them to follow unquestioningly. It's very difficult for Americans, perhaps for anybody, to draw the lines there.

Q: I was wondering; I would think one of those Christian sects is one that many Americans are uncomfortable with as the election in 2012 approaches - that's Mormonism. The Mormon Church puts a great deal of emphasis on conversion.

ADAI: Yes.

Q: -and in Asia particularly.

ADAI: That's right. That's one of the reasons I was uncomfortable with the choice of the last person we sent as Ambassador to China.

Q: Huntsman.

ADAI: Yes. I just don't think it's right to send people who have another agenda. But, you know, this is not new to China. The Jesuits were there, in the courts of the emperors, hundreds of years ago, and the Jesuits had the same goals. Their goal was to convert people to the Christian faith; they just did it in a different way, and perhaps with a longer timeframe. There were Nestorian Christians that came in from the west of China, using the Silk Road, and established places of worship, teaching their faith in a number of places in China. Muslims have gone into China and done the same thing. So have the Tibetans. The Tibetans conquered - occupied the capital of China - back in the late 700s, I think it was. A lot of that was an energy that came from religious belief, religious conviction. It may start with a belief in the divine, but in the long run it becomes all too human. It's more easily corrupted than any other form of power, I think. It does as much harm as it does good.

But before we leave the subject of China, I would like to talk about the family experience there. I talked a little bit about what Ginger did in Beijing earlier. When we got to Chengdu it was the same story, but on another scale. Ginger was able to access parts of the society in Szechuan that I was not able to. In the city of Chengdu she went around to places, met people and met organizations that I would either not have known about or might not have been permitted to contact. I might have been kept at arm's length because of my face and my position. First of all, she took our son, Charles, to schools because she considered enrolling him. He was only 4 1/2 when we got to Chengdu but she thought that it would be good for him to go to a local school - to have kids to play with and to learn the language and stuff like that. She eventually decided against it, because the schools that she visited were conducted a dialect that was unintelligible to most Mandarin speakers. She had some concerns about the safety of the school building and things like that as well. So we ended up tutoring Charles at home.

But Ginger also went to the service organization that helped the consulate and said she wanted to visit an orphanage. She had always had an interest in orphanages. The government people wanted to take her to a model orphanage, but she said no - what else was there available? She ended up going to a much lower profile orphanage where many children had been left because they were disabled in one way or another. It wasn't a real happy sight, but they did the best that they could. When she visited it, she took Charles, and then they continued their visits. She wanted to make a contribution, but she was uncomfortable making a monetary contribution because she didn't know how it would be used. So she went to the market. At that time China was producing lots of down jackets for export, and there was a substantial surplus domestically – but they still cost money. She bought lots of warm jackets and comforters and took them to the orphanage - enough for all the kids. And they were somewhat taken aback. Nobody had ever done this before. Also, Chengdu has a fairly mild climate so they didn't really know what to do with it. But they accepted it and they were really pleased that someone would show this kind of interest. Then, that winter it snowed for the first time in 30 years or so - so they were really pleased to have that gift. To this day, I have no idea how Ginger anticipated that.

Ginger was able to meet people and have an impact on the way they viewed us as well. Yes, she was Chinese, but they also knew who she was – eventually. In the case of the orphanage, they concluded that her gift was an official gift from the consulate. It wasn't – it was personal.

We lived in the hotel, and most people didn't like living in a hotel for extended periods of time. When we got there we heard all kinds of stories about the people that managed the hotel – that they were uncooperative, and that particular individuals were difficult to deal with, and so on. There was a great deal of frustration. Ginger approached it completely differently, just as she had in Beijing. She would talk with the hotel staff about their families, she would give them little gifts - things that we had at the consulate like books or something that she found on the street - just little gestures. And she developed a really close relationship with them. One result was the people in the hotel helped us more and more.

We had two organizations in Chengdu that were sort of responsible for us. One was the Foreign Affairs Office, which was sort of a mini-foreign affairs ministry. We were to conduct our relations with the government through them. They seemed like they didn't want to deal with us at all. They were very uncomfortable when we would come because there was really no upside to the relationship for them. There was a downside - this was post-Tiananmen. They would do their duty, but tried to keep it to a minimum. There was another organization called the Foreign Affairs Service Bureau, which was the organization that provided us with all our staff, and they were the ones that actually had to support us. In the past, that relationship too had been a bit of a struggle. But Ginger helped to change that. I would talk to them formally; but she would drop by from time to time just to have tea with them and chat. They felt more comfortable. She learned what they could do, what they couldn't do; and how we should ask for this - or how we could help them as opposed to just being a one-way street. It changed the dynamic of the relationship tremendously.

If I had been a bachelor it would have been a very different kind of an atmosphere. If I had been married to an American woman it probably would have been a different dynamic, even if she had excellent Chinese. All of those things made a difference - and our son Charles too. He was four years old when we arrived and six years old when we left. He learned to ride his bicycle in the rose garden at the hotel; he and his mother would travel by pedi-cab and go to the park every day and stuff like that. But he introduced me to a lot of things that I wouldn't otherwise have noticed.

Q: How was that?

ADAI: Well, for instance, stuff that he saw in the park. He would say, "Oh, you've got to come," and he would show me what he and his mother had done: having tea; watching the waiters come and pour the tea from three feet away into the tea cups; watching the people do their exercises in the park. One day he found something else that I would have missed. I had been trying to think of ways that we could do things with our Chinese staff, to improve the team spirit. We had about 30 Chinese staff and there were only about six of us Americans, so we relied on them. My birthday was coming up, and Ginger and I had thought maybe we should do something for my birthday that would include them. When Charles was in the park with his mother he saw something that he had never seen before and he wanted to show me. I went back with him, and he showed me a bumper cars arena. The park had set up a carnival like arrangement with bumper cars, and I said, "That's it; we're going to invite all the Chinese staff to come over to the park with us and do the bumper cars on my birthday." We did and it was hysterical. I don't think any of them had seen it, and they had certainly not driven them. Charles had found it and made it possible.

Q: Did you find this focus on children sort of opened up people? Often in societies the way to get to know people is through children, usually with parents of other kids. How did you find this?

ADAI: That's very true in China. It always made people more comfortable, even the highest officials. It was nice for them to be able to focus on a child and then ask you about that afterwards. And it always made me feel good. I mean, you always feel good when somebody asks you about your kids. And Charles was a really cute kid.

NATALE H. BELLOCCHI
Chairman, American Institute in Taiwan
Rosslyn, Virginia (1990-1995)

Ambassador Natale H. Bellocchi was born in Little Falls, New York in 1926. He received a degree in industrial management from Georgia Tech in 1944 and was soon drafted into the U.S. Army to serve in a rifle platoon during the Korean War. His Foreign Service career included positions in Hong Kong, Laos, Vietnam, Taiwan, Japan, India, and an ambassadorship to Botswana. Ambassador Bellocchi was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on March 21, 1995.

Q: So in '90 you moved over to what?

BELLOCCHI: To the chairman of the American Institute in Taiwan.

Q: Chairman of the American Institute in Taiwan. Because we're doing this for the historical record, could you explain the background to this, and then what it encompasses.

BELLOCCHI: Technically speaking, as you know, the TRA, Taiwan Relations Act, in fact legalized the establishment of the American Institute in Taiwan to conduct the unofficial relations between the people of the United States and the people of Taiwan. It actually began just before the TRA was actually passed.

Q: When was that?

BELLOCCHI: 1979. The treasurer of the corporation told me that he opened the bank account for the American Institute in Taiwan with one penny. He always likes to tell that story. Our account with the Riggs Bank was opened with one penny, but eventually we got money from Congress to get the Institute going. We have this office here which is the headquarters of a private non-profit corporation.

Q: We're speaking in Rosslyn, just across the Potomac from the Kennedy Center, and the Department of State.

BELLOCCHI: So, in fact, some people wanted to say we must in appearances be separated from the Department of State, which we were until about two years ago when the Office of the Inspector General moved into this building and this became SA-39 but we don't advertise the fact that we're in the same building as the State Department. It's very unique, and I found it a very innovative way of carrying on a relationship that has everything that any relationship we have with any country has except the name.

Q: Can you give a thumbnail sketch of the history on how this organization developed up to the time you took it over in 1990? It obviously was a strange creature.

BELLOCCHI: Yes, it remains that way, strange. It was started relatively small. We had the headquarters here which is supposed to act as sort of a State Department side, and then the branch office out in Taipei is an embassy in everything but name. They were to report to their headquarters here, and in fact it flows through to the Department from us. The system works fine except in policy matters. The U.S. government must maintain complete control over policy, so the State Department lays down the policy. We implement it in effect. And the man out in the branch office in Taipei under normal circumstances would be an ambassador, and his recommendations and reporting and all the same thing that goes on, normally, goes on there. This office here, the headquarters, is more the administrative headquarters with the money coming in via Washington, we redisperse it out to the branch office, and most of the money goes out there. That's where most of our people are. So that is what maintains this office here, this job. It has other elements, not just supporting the branch office in Taipei. We are responsible for the money that we're getting. We have public affairs activity because the State Department doesn't conduct public affairs for our relationship with the people in Taiwan. I go around the country speaking largely to Chinese-American associations all the time.

And then probably more important than anything is liaison with the Taiwan representative here which I do on almost a daily basis. I'm the liaison with State on a daily basis, the liaison with MFC, with Commerce, with Agriculture, Treasury, all the others. They all flow through us here.

Q: Let's say you have a fast breaking situation--just recently the Mainland Chinese fired some missiles into the Formosa Straits as to sort of say, we can do nasty things. I might just mention for the record right now, August 1st, our Secretary of State is meeting with the Foreign Minister of the People's Republic of China because we're going through what the British would call a "rough patch" with China. But, you know, when you have something fast breaking, the idea of sending something to you in Rosslyn to get over to the State Department...

BELLOCCHI: Oh, no, no. In actual fact there are communications. That is, after all, in the air somehow it winds its way straight over to the State Department also.

Q: They eavesdrop on your communications.

BELLOCCHI: There's no short-stop on that. We are here mainly in the administrative sense shortstopping on occasion.

Q: What has the State Department had to deal with Taiwan? They have to have something within the body of the State Department to deal with Taiwan.

BELLOCCHI: Oh, there's the coordination office over there that would be somewhat the equivalent of a desk, except that because we are here dealing as a liaison with the Taiwan representative office, there doesn't have to be the same number of people. But the relationship is as broad as you would find anywhere.

Q: For example, can the State Department people, the relations group, can they go out and have lunch with the Chinese, the Taiwanese?

BELLOCCHI: Yes, I have lunches quite often.

Q: You're the 'beard', in a way.

BELLOCCHI: Yes, and I invite people on both sides.

Q: You're the cutout in a way.

BELLOCCHI: We're technically, yes. And yes, that's really an important part of the program.

Q: I would think it would be essential.

BELLOCCHI: In many ways, let's take the example, the trade negotiations. That's relatively a non-controversial subject to get into. If we're negotiating a trade issue, or whatever it is, GATT, or whatever it is they're negotiating, of course the negotiations have to be done by USTR. We don't have the expertise to do that kind of business. And the Taiwanese are the same, they don't have that kind of people here in the Washington office, so people come from Taiwan, for example, and we set up a meeting. And we have as our "consultants" people who come from USTR. We sit them down at the table, and say, "Welcome to AIT, let's sit down and talk trade." And they sit down and they talk trade. If they come to some kind of an agreement, they turn it over to the Taiwan representative office, and to the AIT, and we write up an agreement according to the lines that they've been instructed, and we sign them. It's an agreement between AIT and TECRO the Taiwan representative. So that's the way things are done across the board.

Q: I suppose all we've done, the thing has been in place now for what?

BELLOCCHI: Sixteen years. Beyond anyone's realization. I think when the TRA was passed, I know that somebody that you know, gave a speech over at the War College, very intimately involved in our China relations at that time...

Q: I think your talking about Chas Freeman, aren't you?

BELLOCCHI: Who said that this thing was probably not going to be needed more than about three years. Well, it's been sixteen years later. So actually by accident it has survived, not only survived, but thrived. You know, we pass out, we say we process more non-immigrant visas in Taipei, sometimes more than any other country, but at the very minimum we are the third largest processor of NIV visas in the world. I mean it's across the board. Our trade is enormous. We sell to Taiwan twice as much as we sell to the PRC. I mean it's a very big relationship.

Q: Let's talk a bit about our representative's office in Taipei.

BELLOCCHI: In Taipei, it's called the American Institute in Taiwan.

Q: Who staffs it?

BELLOCCHI: We have a director, who in other circumstances would be the ambassador. We have a deputy director who under other circumstances would be the DCM. And then what we call the general affairs section, which under normal circumstances would be the political section. We have an economic section, we use the same words for that. We have the travel service section, which would be the consular area.

Q. You mentioned the travel services section. I'm an old consular officer, and a part of consular problems, one, just visas and all, which is relatively simple, but are there special provisions because the visa law is set up to say, countries?

BELLOCCHI: The Taiwan Relations Act includes in it, or gives the AIT the authority to process visas, and we are even getting the authority for passports soon, because that's become...so many travelers back and forth. We did not originally have that authority. The visas are still stamped as being issued in Hong Kong. That clearly is not going to last very much longer. What we change it to is still under discussion, but eventually that will be changed.

Q: One of the things I take it is that you must have an officer in charge of euphemisms almost.

BELLOCCHI: Well, that's really one of our jobs. My deputy spends a lot of his time scrubbing communications to be sure it doesn't say...oh, yes, we're a laundering agent as well.

Q: One of the important function of a consular things, and that is protection of Americans. Usually you have a Consular Treaty.

BELLOCCHI: That's right, American services.

Q: What do we have with Taiwan?

BELLOCCHI: We have an American Citizen Services Office.

Q: But do we have the equivalent to a treaty?

BELLOCCHI: No, we have an agreement between AIT and our counterpart on privileges and immunities, and they are almost the same, but not quite the same as diplomatic immunity type of thing. So that's really the thing that judges...I mean our professional relationship between us and the Foreign Office there.

Q: Because this is for the historical record, when you say...I can never get the right term, but our office, your office in Taipei is staffed, who are these people, where do they come from, and how does it work?

BELLOCCHI: Okay, the Taiwan Relations Act has taken very good care of that. We have a mixture of people, but most of them are Foreign Service people who have been separated, and they are actually separated from the Foreign Service. It's a very bothersome process for our personnel people in the State Department to go through all the paper work that has to be done to separate them from the Service. They're given a regular passport for their tour in the AIT. We in our budget include all of their salaries, rents, benefits. That's why our budget is as large as it is, it's around $34 million a year, it's because it includes all these things that under normal circumstances are centrally located in the State Department. At an embassy the admin officer does not get the money to pay people out there. Their pension checks are sent direct here at home. The rents are coming out of Washington as well. That's not the case with us. We have to do all of that ourselves. But we contribute to their pension fund with the TSP and all the other business. So their time in service is never broken. It's smoke and mirrors. We've arranged a way so that these people's service remains intact. These are the bulk of the people. We do have some people from Commerce, Foreign Commercial Service, and the Foreign Agriculture Service. The military is not able to separate uniform military personnel, so we pick up recently retired people, of course, with the cooperation of DOD, to come and work for us.

Q: They probably come out ahead on that in a way, a little more selective.

BELLOCCHI: And it's not a bad deal. We have some civil service people, including from the State Department, who are separated the same way. And then we have some people who are direct hire. We can hire directly. So we have a whole combination of people for whom we have to pay everything.

Q: Looking at this thing institutionally, in many ways the very fact that you've been here for five years now means that you have probably a little better institutional stability here.

BELLOCCHI: More continuity.

Q: ...than you do in other places, which is always a...

BELLOCCHI: Our people here in Washington. But the turnover out there in Taipei now is very much like an overseas post, a three year assignment cycle.

Q: Is there a problem there as it used to be if you served in Israel you couldn't go to an Arab world?

BELLOCCHI: No, they've got American tourist passports. They can travel anywhere they want.

Q: So a service in Taiwan does not preclude their serving in the PRC?

BELLOCCHI: Oh, no, on the contrary. We teach language students in our school in Taipei, the old Language School. Most of them go to the Mainland for assignment there.

Q: Often, and I'm sure right now, there are policy discussions going on. I mean the PRC is showing a propensity to export arms, and to arm itself, and there is concern that this may be our next major enemy...

BELLOCCHI: That's one school.

Q: But, I mean it is a school so there have to be essentially policy considerations about whither our relationship with these things, which would mean meetings certainly between the Department of Defense and the State Department and the National Security Council. What happens? Where do you fit into this?

BELLOCCHI: Well, technically speaking, and in most part not only technically but actually, policy discussions go on over at State, and once the policy is decided, that's what we stand up and salute and carry out. Now, that's not to say we are not asked what do you think of this, or what do you think of that. But we do not have a role in the decision making. Formulating, it may be of course, they will try to draw on all the expertise they can get on what they think is going on here and there, especially in Taiwan, what our views are, and what the reactions would be, etc. That, of course, I contribute to. But the decision itself is made in government. It's got to be a USG decision.

Q: But there has always been the thing, do we from time to time at least have a Taiwan vet, I mean somebody who has been sitting there in the NSC or something like that?

BELLOCCHI: You mean that kind of continuity in government?

Q: Sometimes when policy is being considered, it's not bad to have somebody who knows, who has been around the block in a particular country sitting over at the NSC--you're rolling your eyes.

BELLOCCHI: You know, like any other service, military or anyone else, we don't like to be second guessed anytime, so having someone that says, "Well, we've been through this two times before, and this is the time it worked..." it isn't always very appreciated. So one treads that one rather carefully.

Q: I wonder if you'd comment a bit about how, you've been in and out of this whole relationship for some time, when the Taiwan Relations Act was set up, and Chas Freeman said he'd give it three years. This was generally considered because, if I recall, and correct me if I'm wrong, Taiwan did not seem like the greatest ally. I mean it was the end of Chiang Kai-shek. Repugnant may be the wrong term, but it seemed to be two regimes, the People's Republic and Taiwan both. It was very easy to have a two China policy because then we got to deal with them, but we didn't like them. They're not like us, but things have really changed, and I wonder if you could talk a bit about your reflection on the change. Because I think this is profound in what's happening.

BELLOCCHI: It is absolutely fundamental to the problems we're having right now. I have to see it from the perspective of Taiwan, and some of the other people that you're talking to, of course, have to look at it from the perspective of China. And the PRC, there is no one that I know of, no matter how rabid a supporter of Taiwan, or how rabid an anti-China person that individual is, would ever contest that we should have a good relationship with the PRC. That's an important relationship. No one ever contests that. But seeing it from a different perspective really makes a difference. And what has happened is that our policies established in the '70s were based on the kind of two Chinas, if we can use that expression, that you just talked about, and that doesn't exist anymore. China, of course, has changed a great deal, but nothing compared to the way Taiwan has changed. So how you deal with this set of relationships when you have an authoritarian Taiwan, and how you deal with it when you have a democratic Taiwan, is different. You cannot do in a democratic Taiwan, what you could do in an authoritarian Taiwan. And what to do about that has really perplexed everyone and that exists today among the highest thinkers of these set of relationships, Mr. Kissinger included. That they can easily say, "Well Taiwan, just don't make any noise now because we've got to deal with this big fellow who is very important for us, and you know that's it in your interest, that we have a good relationship. So you just stay down, boy, and don't make any trouble." That's not even feasible anymore. If you're a political leader and depend on votes, and the people have opinions over there--they're one of the most widely traveled people in the world, 20% of the people in Taiwan travel abroad every year. I mean they're really very conscious of what goes on in the world, so that makes them extremely sensitive to the fact they have no status. They have difficulty going to different countries. They have to get visas on different pieces of paper. They're getting more and more proud, or nationalist, or whatever you want to call it. And that isn't given enough weight here, and it absolutely is not given enough weight over in the PRC, who I think really don't understand the fact. They don't understand democracy, so they don't understand what's going on over there. But the fact is that there is a very, very strong undercurrent in Taiwan of this kind of feeling. And a political leader has got to be responsive to it, or he's going to lose power. And the president of Taiwan no longer has that carte blanche power, no matter how popular he is, that the old leaders of Taiwan used to have. So that is a different set of circumstances. When you have say, "Please don't make noise now because we've got this boy to deal with." The leader there can't say, "Well, okay, we'll sit tight." They won't sit around very long because the people aren't going to accept that. So how you deal with it is a very perplexing issue, and that is the problem that we're facing today. It's a democratic Taiwan, and how in the world is that going to fit into this mold that we had before? We are having problems with it already. That's the reason we're in trouble now. Because in trying to deal with this, if one side cannot accept the changes, or doesn't understand the changes like the PRC, not able to understand the things, well, how do you deal with it? So we're in what you said, a bad spot, a rough spot, with the PRC on this because they are not in a position to accept the changes that have to be dealt with now, or they're going to lose out. It's almost a catch 22 because, for example, you mentioned the missile firing. Missile firing was a rather crude way of reminding the Taiwanese to behave, because if they don't behave those missile could be aimed a little bit further on. But what's the other side of that coin? The other side of that coin is that they've just gone through another experience, one that it was "them," against "us." It's a unifying experience for the people on Taiwan, and strengthened the differences between the people on Taiwan, and the people on the Mainland. It doesn't help. It hurts that kind of tendency, saying "Fellows, you've got to get together and make up your mind what kind of relationship you want." And when you do things like, it actually drives them further apart. And that's what's been going on. There are a lot of people, I think, with forlorn hopes. Frankly, I think they're unrealistic. A million plus people from Taiwan travel over on the Mainland. They're tourists, they've got plenty of money, traveling is cheap for them. As far as I know, I don't know what figures, how reliable they can be, but the last time I heard the figures they say a total of 300 out of 7 million have stayed over there. These are people that were old, and wanted to die in their old village back in the Mainland. Nobody will stay over there, and it's become a place where--I'm from up-state New York, when I was growing up a trip to New York City was kind of a rare occurrence, 250 miles away in those days was a long way, and everyone always said, New York is a great place to visit, but I'd never want to live there. Well, that's what the attitude is in Taiwan. The PRC, that's great, it's interesting, its got a big wall, big statues, big buildings, but I wouldn't want to live there.

Q: As we're speaking today, and God knows, one really can't predict, it's still a very authoritarian government which is kind of falling apart in many places.

BELLOCCHI: Well, the standard of living also, I don't know what the per capita income over in China is, maybe 400-450, it's 12,000 on the island. Just that alone in practical terms...I think both sides understand that whatever--they say unification, if that's what it is, that's fine, but it is a long, long way down the road. And there's got to be something to take its place in the meantime, and it can't be what was before, because too many changes have taken place. So no one wants to bite that bullet. It's a very difficult thing. It's probably not the time. China is in the process of deciding on its next leader. How long that's going to take, but I think that article the other day in one of the papers, Wall Street Journal, saying we're really going to have to wait until things settle down over there, and probably settle down here because we have a campaign coming up before anything of any substance can be done. But whether or not we will be willing to bite the bullet, will have the political will, or them, the PRC, to bite the bullet, and say, "Let's sit down and think about the changes and what alterations we should make for this kind of arrangement." We're always going to have problems.

Q: There doesn't seem to be much push for unification. On the part of Taiwan, I don't see what's in it for them. In fact many of the people don't...I mean it's a new generation, an island people, just in the normal course of events.

BELLOCCHI: Unification on Taiwan, as it is still in the Mainland is an emotional issue, a carryover from the civil war on the Mainland of China. In Taiwan now, with the Taiwanized government, democracy, all the things that have happened on Taiwan, unification is no longer an emotional issue, it's a practical problem. In China it's still among the top leadership an emotional issue. The old civil war baggage is still on their shoulders. In Taiwan it is no longer an emotional issue, it's a practical problem. That doesn't mean that they'd give up unification. It means, though, if we've got to have it, let's do it in a realistic way. The political leadership on Taiwan has got to put the welfare and security of the people on that island first, or they won't stay in power. And that's the change. Not unification first, the people on Taiwan first.

Q: You say you go around and address a lot of Chinese American associations. What are you saying, and what are you getting from them?

BELLOCCHI: Oh, they're in quite a change themselves. They're reflecting the turmoil in thinking out there. The older Chinese American groups...I can no longer go to say San Francisco or Los Angeles and just speak with one group. I've got to speak to two or three, or I've got a problem because they won't mix. And the older generation, they really have no emotional attachment to Taiwan per se, their attachment is to a China that doesn't exist anymore. So they're completely befuddled. They don't like what's going on in Taiwan. Taiwan was only supposed to be a temporary footstop before we get back to China. So they're unhappy. And, of course, the PRC is making hay in some of those associations because they're representing themselves as the real China now, "We're not what we used to be." So they're making some inroads. Taiwan is losing the allegiance of a lot of the old Chinatown crowd, places like that.

The new immigrants from Taiwan are the real basis of support for Taiwan these days. And they have plenty of support within the country. The younger generation that is coming here now, immigrating to the United States, gets much more involved in our politics than the older generation. They ran their laundry, and their restaurants, and they sent their kids to medical school, and they didn't care about all this other business. Not now. This younger generation here, they're really savvy and they're very much involved in the politics of their communities. And if these organizations were ever able to unify, which is totally against their character, they probably could be a political force. But they have difficulty unifying, so they're are not. But if you're talking about what problems do we have, if you want to have a sense of what I think, we don't here as a country have a sense of the revolution that's taking place in Taiwan. I've just lived through it these five years. When I began to talk to these groups, especially the Taiwanese groups, the overwhelming problem was, why can't we get a visa to go back home? They were blacklisted. There were people that couldn't go because they preached independence and all of this business. That was the overwhelming problem of the groups here in the United States. That's all gone now. It's all gone. They can go back. Some of them are in the legislature. If you go to meet the leader of the opposition, he has spent 25 years in jail. Nobody has been killed by this revolution that's taking place, so people haven't noticed it as much. But if you could feel it when you go to Taiwan the people that you're dealing with now, it's like a big breath of fresh air. They want to talk independence. They want to oppose the leadership simply because they can do it now, and weren't able to do it before. It's that kind of thing that the leadership has to live with. They have opened the doors, and opened the windows, and everybody wants to shout, and boy their politics are as vigorous as you can find anywhere. Because it's new, it's invigorating. They can really do all the things that they could never do before. And that strengthens them very much. So we worry about that they should really be thinking about their relationship with the Mainland. The only time they think about it is how much money can I make over there, or if they shoot missiles, there they are, at it again. But otherwise they don't think of the Mainland. They think of all their problems on Taiwan.

Q: We have a sizeable immigration, I assume, I don't have the figures, but coming particularly from that Quan__ area from Mainland China. Do you find yourself talking to these people? Are they a separate group?

BELLOCCHI: No, although some of them are in the groups. The groups I talk to are usually quite identified with the Taiwan side, and you don't find them there. Where you find the differences in the groups that I talk with, are really in generation because even Mainlander young people who are recent immigrants from Taiwan, are not terribly different than Taiwanese immigrants from Taiwan in thinking. What they have is what today's Taiwan is like, whereas the older generation are thinking of the day's that are now history.

Q: Here you are in this quasi-official position. Can you talk to them the way you're talking to me now?

BELLOCCHI: I remember the first group I went to talk to was the Taiwanese American Chamber of Commerce of North America, having their annual meeting up in New York, and I decided to go and I gave them the talk. I had been giving talks before that were much more candid than before. I think previous AIT people had always talked about trade, and how well the relationship was doing, and put them all asleep type of talk. And I decided Taiwan was opening up, and we had to tell people what Taiwan was like. It was more than just trade in this relationship. So they were a little bit shocked in the older groups that I would talk about the changes taking place, and how bad it was. They weren't letting their own citizens back into Taiwan, and the fact that they were developing quite a different identity on Taiwan than those people on the Mainland. This was almost heresy to be saying this. Well, when I went up to the group in New York, this was the first Taiwanese group...

Q: This was about when?

BELLOCCHI: Towards the end of 1990, around that time. There was still all the business of visas and all, so I gave them that kind of talk and told them what Taiwan was like. And you can't imagine the feeling of the people. There was about 400-500 people. They always have huge crowds in these things. There were about 400-500 people there and you could tell that they were so, so happy that someone from what they perceived government, was actually paying attention to them. They had never had anyone pay any attention to them before. So as I travel around the country talking to more of these groups, I sense they really had a very strong feeling that they were sort of cut adrift. I think now that that's changing. They're really getting a lot more confident. I mean Taiwan's pragmatic diplomacy is giving us a lot of problems in terms of our policy. But it is very, very well received by the Taiwanese community, even here in America. Certainly back home that's given them a little pride.

Q: I keep referring because right now I'm doing a couple of interviews with other Chinese more Mainland oriented. One as we mentioned before is Chas Freeman, who was both deputy chief of mission in Beijing, and also ambassador to Saudi Arabia. So I asked him about the difference between the Taiwanese lobby and the Israeli lobby. The Israeli lobby is renowned in the United States. And his thing was really in many ways the Taiwanese lobby, particularly in this day, was getting more effective because the Israelis were more in your face in that they would come, and say you do this, and if you don't do this I'll have a Senator calling you by this afternoon. Whereas he said the Taiwanese have cultivated and really gotten much more into that. I don't know. I just want you to comment on that.

BELLOCCHI: Okay, I know Chas has just made a speech out there in Hong Kong that said they bought the vote, I think that's absurd, really, I'm sorry, it's absurd.

Q: We're talking about the vote about...

BELLOCCHI: ...whether or not we should give them visas to come here to visit. The resolution got a 96 to 0 vote. Lobbying certainly helped. There's a lot of lobbying that goes on. That doesn't hurt, but it's the message, and I think it really misdirects our ideas if we think that they bought it. But, there's no question about their effectiveness, and they're coming close to what you have just described. They have plenty of people up on the Hill, influencing a very broad spectrum of politicians. It used to be that only very conservative Republicans...

Q: We're talking about Senator Knowland and a few from California.

BELLOCCHI: But that's changed now, democracy has made quite a difference up on the Hill. I mean, someone like Leiberman in Connecticut, and Paul Simon in Chicago.

Q: We're talking about quite liberal Senators.

BELLOCCHI: ...these are people that support them because they are a democracy, and they have turned their human rights thing around so completely, so they have a very broad spectrum of support up on the Hill. And yes, the Taiwan lobby is getting more and more open because it's a democracy and they can't hide the figures anymore. And even PR firms like Cassidy are being used to generate public relations. Well, that's a lot like what the Israelis were doing. It's the same kind of thing. And the fact that the Taiwanese themselves are far more politically active in our politics, all of this has meant that they have greater radar reach on the Hill, and they more clearly understand that the only thing that really keeps them in play is the Congress. They're well aware of that.

Q: Well, Nat, to sort of end this, from your perspective we're talking about August 1995. How do you see the relationship with Taiwan, the People's Republic, and the United States developing?

BELLOCCHI: Taiwan would like us to detach that trilateral relationship and make that two separate bilaterals. I don't think it's possible, of course, because you've always got to take the other into consideration. But it's troublesome. I think the relationship with the PRC is a separate issue, and it may even get worse because of our politics. But that hasn't anything to do with Taiwan. Unless we can start accepting that we've got to do something different than we were doing before, I mean really different, we'll have trouble. We won't have the same kind of relationship we've had with Taiwan in the past. They've got money. They've got great economic strength, and they've got political strength because in March 1996, I'm sure Lee will be elected, directly elected, by the 21 million people on that island to be their president. You can't get more legitimate than that. And what do we do about it? When they say, "I'm the president of Taiwan, I want to do this, and I want to do that, or I want to go this way." We can say no, of course, but at some cost.

Q: What about Taiwan's relationship with other countries? We tend to be U.S. centric. when we put this thing together, but how do they deal with other countries?

BELLOCCHI: With difficulty because all these other countries as on almost every issue, are hiding under our skirts. They always tell the Taiwanese, "You deal with the Americans, and you want to enter GATT, you deal with the Americans." Only when the Americans stick their neck out, are they willing to stick their neck out afterward. But in many cases it's getting more and more difficult. When we gave Taiwan trouble on military sales, the French moved in and sold them Mirages, for example, and then moved right back out again. They don't have the same interest we have, none of the Europeans do, so they can dance in and out of these problems and leave it up to us.

Q: I imagine Japan...

BELLOCCHI: Oh, no, they're more cautious than ever. I mean they've got more at stake, they're much closer to China than we are. They've got problems, and they're growing problems. Some of the problems that they're growing in Japan are the same things that we've had to face. They've got a lot of business with Taiwan; they have more business with the PRC than we do. We have more business with Taiwan than the PRC. They have it the other way around, but they also have a democracy that's increasingly aware of the democracy in Taiwan. So Taiwan's support in Japan is actually growing. It was very high at first because they appreciated that old Chiang Kai-shek didn't demand reparations for World War II. Well, that crowd has sort of died away. They've sort of become history just like Chiang Kai-shek has become history. But now the newer group is coming up. They're doing business with Taiwan. They respect democracy in Taiwan. So I think the Foreign Office, in Tokyo is beginning to feel the same kind of pressures that our State Department feels on the issue of Taiwan. In a much lesser degree now because their inclination to be more wary of the PRC is much greater than ours, based more on geography than anything else.

Q: How about some of these other relationships, sort of an ASEAN, Malaysia, Singapore, Indonesia, Philippines, again they're in that area very suspicious of the power of Mainland China.

BELLOCCHI: But there's something else too. Taiwan has become the largest investor in Vietnam, and the second largest in most of the other countries, Thailand, Indonesia, Philippines. The Philippines are becoming a major factor in this. So here's little Taiwan which offers no threat to them at all putting money in their country. Whereas their own Chinese population, many of them are putting money in Mainland China, taking them out of the country. Here's Taiwan, putting some money in. So that helps.

Q: Do you see upon the Taiwan government...is this natural economic expansion, or is this, I mean as you see it, are they making real efforts to make sure they invest in various places?

BELLOCCHI: No, they can't direct it. It's very much a free market. As a matter of fact if they could direct it they wouldn't have this much going into the Mainland that goes now. It really is very difficult for them to direct. I mean they can try incentives, which is what they're doing with the southern strategy, for example, and being led by some state enterprises, to go down there and invest. But that's all. They can't coerce their private sectors into these areas. Erland Heginbotham, formerly a DAS at State, attended the seminar that I was in, and he said that if you want to know where the next economic opportunities are in the Asia area, follow the Taiwanese businessmen, because they're largely small corporations, or little branches of bigger ones that take risks, and they move. I mean, if the opportunity, especially labor costs are cheaper here than there, then they take their machines out of there, and simply move them over to the other ones. A very simple operation.

Q: Sounds like a much more flexible operation than say the Japanese.

BELLOCCHI: Oh, yes. It's part of the character in Taiwan. They can never get together, so they're all little individual companies, but it really gives them enormous flexibility. So you find some of the investment that has been in China gets disgusted, they simply pick up their machines, put them on a boat, and go down to Vietnam.

Q: I would imagine the Taiwan-Vietnam relationship...Vietnam as we talk now we've just started to open American relations, but I would think the Vietnamese would welcome Taiwan because there's obviously no love lost between Vietnam and China these days.

BELLOCCHI: Also no danger. So no, of course, they have an investment guarantee agreement with Taiwan. Even the KMT has made investments in Vietnam, a big industrial park down there. And a lot of companies have gone down there. They're welcomed by the Vietnamese. One Taiwanese businessman I talked to in Taichung who had factories in both Fujian and Vietnam, and asked him what he thought of the two. And he compared in very much an absolutely apolitical way, he wasn't thinking of politics at all. But saying labor costs were cheaper in Vietnam, trainability was better in Fuchien, but quality was better in their labor in Vietnam. And then he wrapped up the discussion by saying that one big difference was that Vietnamese officials encourage him to invest, while Chinese officials expect him to do so.

MICHAEL H. NEWLIN
Retired annuitant, Bureau of Political-Military Affairs
Washington, DC (1991)

Ambassador Newlin was born in North Carolina and was raised there and in the Panama Canal Zone. After graduating from Harvard he joined the Foreign Service in 1952 and was posted to Frankfurt, Oslo, Paris, Kinshasa and Jerusalem, where served as Consul General. During his distinguished career, Ambassador Newlin served in several high level positions dealing with the United Nations and its agencies and NATO. He served as Ambassador to Algeria from 1981 to 1985 and as US representative to the United Nations Agencies in Vienna., 1988-1991. Ambassador Newlin was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2006 and by Thomas Dunnigan in 1997.

Q: This is one place where the United States and the Soviet Union were in agreement.

NEWLIN: Absolutely. Even during the worst days of the Cold War.

Q: We have got these nuclear toys but we don't want anybody else to have them.

NEWLIN: That's right. Well the Russians did make a mistake I believe right after communists took over in China. I think they did help the Chinese, and then of course when their relations soured, that was a big mistake that they figured they had made. When China then became a nuclear power, that was something that they had contributed to. The Chinese would have done that anyway, but it would have taken longer.

Q: What did you do?

NEWLIN: After Clarke wound up over at the White House, he persuaded Rand Beers to join him as his deputy. Have you interviewed him?

Q: I haven't finished, but I started.

NEWLIN: Okay, well Rand Beers was the deputy assistant secretary for export for munitions licensing and policy which was the largest group in PM which issued licenses for the export of military equipment. This all goes back many years when Congress passed a law saying the State Department would be responsible for licensing military items. Of course it all had to be coordinated with Defense and with the other appropriate agencies. A big thing. So I had to quickly learn all about export controls, first of all the laws and then the regulations. Then I was doing that, when Bob Einhorn who was the person that Gallucci relied on for anything to do with nuclear matters, Bob Einhorn came into my office one day and said, "Mike, would you be willing to lead a delegation to Kazakhstan to explain to them export controls?" I said, "I would be delighted to do that." So we put together a delegation under the Nunn Lugar program which was one of the most far-sighted pieces of legislation that was done to deal with problems resulting from the collapse of the Soviet Union. The Nunn Lugar program was to secure and prevent the proliferation of nuclear materials. The heart was the safe and secure dismantlement of nuclear weapons in Ukraine, Kazakhstan and Belarus but export controls were also a part to short circuit the involved Congressional budget procedures and in view of the urgency of the problems, the Nunn Lugar legislation provided that an initial sum of $500 million would be reprogrammed from the enormous Pentagon budget. Easier said than done. Belarus was a special case but Ukraine and Kazakhstan had so many other problems that they hesitated to address SSD. So I guess I was the first one to be asked to do something under Nunn Lugar. Now this was quite apart, Stu, from everything that was going on at the very highest levels including the president and secretary of state to deal with what is going to happen with all of these nuclear weapons and nuclear facilities in the newly independent states. That was all being dealt with separately. Things like export controls, and then later on safe and secure dismantlement of nuclear warheads and nuclear materials. That was all under the Nunn Lugar program. So I put together my team. It had people from DOD, customs, energy, CIA. So we were all ready to go. We sent a telegram to Almaty which was the capital then. The person that was responsible in PM for getting the Nunn Lugar funding called up defense and defense said, "Oh, we are still working on this reprogramming thing. There is no money available now, and we don't know where it is coming from." Imagine the bureaucratic scrounging. Nobody wanting their money reprogrammed. Dan Poneman was on the NSC staff. He followed the PM operations. He was having a meeting to discuss a variety of things. The assistant secretary of defense for international affairs, I think it was Ashton Carter. Have you ever heard of Ash Carter? No, I think. He was from the Kennedy school at Harvard. So I went over to the old executive office building and sat in on this meeting. When Ash Carter got up to go back to the Pentagon, I got up and went out and I said, "Look, we have got a real problem here. We are supposed to carry this thing forward and Kazakhstan is willing. We can't get any money from you." He said, "I will take care of it." And he did. So off we went.

It was a very interesting experience. Here the Soviet Union dissolved. The people in charge were the people; many of them had been running things under Moscow including the president. Here the United States comes in and wants to talk to them about creating export controls. Of course that raised suspicions. Why are the Americans doing this? What is in it for them? What is in it for us and so forth and so on. But they did produce a Kazakh delegation with all the appropriate people.

They had just created their own atomic energy agency with their own Kazakh personnel. Of course there were vast quantities of nuclear material. Ust-Kamenogorsk was the largest factory in the world that produced nuclear materials for reactors. So we explained to them our own system and the fact that they needed to move quickly to set up their own export controls. Our system while it is very effective, it is very cumbersome because of the accumulated regulations that we have. I stressed to them that they should set up something that met their requirements and not necessarily try to duplicate what we were doing. They were very receptive. They had their own fledgling experts there. We spent several days in sessions. Airplane connections in those days were not very frequent, so we wound up at the end with a couple of free days. Somebody said we ought to do a field trip. I said, "Sure, where do you think we ought to go?" "Well let's go to Baikonur, their Kennedy Space Center, or we can ask to go to the Chinese border and see what the export controls are on the Chinese border, or we can ask to go to their nuclear test site at Semipalatinsk.” I laughed. “Do you think they will let us go to Semipalatinsk?” So they said, “Well let’s ask.” The answer came back, “Well no, we are working at Baikonur.” They first said yes to the Chinese border, and then they said no, there was a transportation problem. They finally said toward the end of our stay, “You can go to Semipalatinsk.” There was a catch though. There were no air connections with the old Aeroflot that would get us to Semipalatinsk and back to Almaty in time for us to get one of the flights back to Frankfurt. My colleagues said, “Let’s ask the Department if we can charter a military plane from the Kazakhs to go there.” I laughed and said, “That will take weeks to decide.” They said, “Well we can ask can’t we?” “Yeah, go ahead and send them a telegram.” Next morning the answer came back, “Go to the embassy, get $1500. Charter plane and take your delegation to Semipalatinsk.” Off we went. We flew in a modified military plane called a Yak. The Kazakhs met us at the airport and we bussed out to the test site. Drove up to their building and here were the Russian generals with their pie plate hats. “We welcome you to Semipalatinsk on behalf of the President of Kazakhstan.” And they were very nice. We drove around through what had been their open air nuclear test area. Our representative from energy was a lady. She said, “This is all a charade. These cows and sheep that are out here eating all this green grass. It is all radioactive. You would never drink any milk or eat any of this flesh.” So we then stopped by a door. We all got out and went in, put on the white smocks. They gave us a dosimeter to measure radioactivity. We went down a corridor looking up at a huge reactor, brand new reactor. One member of our delegation was from the Sandia nuclear laboratory. He had nothing to say during the entire time we had been there. Then he started asking questions. “What is the reactor fueled with?” “Well highly enriched uranium. Weapons grade uranium.” “How much? When was it put in? What is the reactor used for?” “The Reactor is used for research.” So we had a very successful meeting there. We went back and had a nice luncheon. As we were getting ready to leave to be bussed back into town, the Kazakhs came up to us and said, “Mr. Ambassador, would you by any chance have space on your plane for some of our delegation because we can’t get a plane back to Almaty today?” I said, “We would love to have you on board.” So we had the whole new Kazakhstan nuclear ministry of top officials on our plane. We could talk to them and find out who they were and where they came from. So that started our effort on export controls.

I did give a press conference in the end where I said what all of us believed was the case, that they had no export controls. In Soviet times all the decisions in this whole area were made in Moscow. So they had no export controls as we knew them. They had to develop them. I made this point and it was reported on the front page of the Washington Post, that they had none, and that we had better hurry up with the Nunn Lugar program in dealing with all of the other nuclear successor states. This remark was not taken kindly by the new undersecretary for disarmament, a Miss Lynn Davis from the Rand Corporation. She had replaced Frank Wisner, and PM came under her. She wanted to know who authorized my statement and had the U.S. government determined that this was the case, and why was this statement being made in Almaty. That kicked off a long period of her dissatisfaction with what PM was doing across the board.

Q: During this time, we began to ease up on the China question, as I recall. The first tangible evidence was the visit of the Chinese ping pong team.

NEWLIN: Yes, there began to be indications that we were. Of course by that time Charley Yost had departed. In 1970, George Bush arrived. It was his first time in national politics as well as diplomacy. He was closer to the White House, I would say, than he was to the State Department. He was very conscientious about following his instructions and he was diligent in doing his homework.

The first big thing that happened was the Chinese ping pong visit to the U.S. George Bush invited them to play ping pong at the U.S. Mission. The newspapers all carried pictures of him and the team. George may have been the senior U.S. official to meet with them.

Q: Paddle in hand! What was his relationship, by the way, with Henry Kissinger, who was then in the White House?

NEWLIN: Well, like anyone else's, I guess. Henry told him in strict confidence on the eve of the vote on Chinese representation, a very critical movement, that he was going to make the trip to Beijing. George told me in strict confidence that he was going to make the trip to China. I guess I was the only one he told; maybe he told others, I just don't know. So I told him, I said, "Well, we will lose the vote, but nobody can blame you." He said, "No, no. We've got the vote." The awkward thing was that Rogers and the State Department did not know about the trip.

Q: That is to maintain the Taiwan seat?

NEWLIN: Yes. We changed to what amounted to a two China policy. We supported Beijing as the representative of China but linked this to continued representation for Taiwan. I said, "The waiverers, whenever this gets out, when the pictures come out of Henry meeting with Mao and Zhou En-lai, when push comes to shove, we will lose." But we still maintained our full court press. It was one of the most dramatic things I was ever involved in. Two days before the vote I asked our experts at the Mission to estimate what the final tally would be (they did not know about the trip). Instead of a narrow victory, they projected a seven or eight vote loss. I persuaded George to send it to the Department in a Top Secret message so that they could be prepared. He was reluctant because he did not want to appear defeatist, but he was persuaded.

Q: So everybody was drawing the conclusions that the game is over.

NEWLIN: Yes. Why should we ruin our future relations with China when Kissinger is meeting Mao? That is how it came out. We had to go down to Washington, went down to Washington with George. We met with Scali and the media and briefed them as to what had actually happened. Long standing allies, the Netherlands, Belgium, Tunisia joined the stampede.

So then the Chinese did arrive. The Chinese ambassador in Ottawa was told to pack up and come to New York and assume his duties there. I don't think the Chinese were really expecting it. I will tell you another very interesting thing that happened. All of this was going on and we were lobbying the quarters. I went over and tried to persuade the Dutch to stand with us and the Tunisians that had promised. They were hell bent to vote for Beijing. The Albanians were the sponsors of the resolution that replaced the Nationalist Chinese with the PRC. So during the meeting it looked like and we were lobbying so much that it looked like that we were going to prevail again in defeating the Albanian resolution. So the Albanian representative got up and started towards the podium. The Pakistani permanent representative Aga Shahi said, "Where are you going?" The Albanian said, "Well I am going up to the podium. I am withdrawing my resolution." Shahi said, "Why are you doing that?" "I am afraid we are going to lose." "You are crazy; the Americans are losing. Don't do that."

Q: Tell me, Mike, Before you heard about Kissinger going to China which obviously pulled the rug out from everything.

NEWLIN: It changed everything.

Q: But before you heard about that, was there sort of the feeling OK we are fighting this battle, and we fought this battle year after year after year to keep the PRC out of the UN. Was there the feeling that OK we are doing this one more year, but this is really a losing battle to go on with?

DONALD A. CAMP
China Desk Officer
Washington, DC (1991-1992)

Consul General
Chengdu (1992-1995)

Donald Camp was born in New York in 1948. He received his BA from Carleton College and an ND from University of Chicago. He joined the Foreign Service in 1974. His overseas assignments include Colombo, Bridgetown, Beijing, Chengdu, and Kathmandu. His sister, Beatrice Camp, is also a Foreign Service Officer. Mr. Camp was interviewed by David Reuther in 2012.

Q: Coming off the Hill then you took an assignment to the China/Mongolia Desk.

CAMP: Well, I had been assigned to be Consul General in Chengdu, a job that was open in summer of 1992. So I had a gap of one year and the obvious place to put me was the China Desk, where I could do work that would prep me for my next assignment..

Q: Can you give me a description of the China Desk, its size and organization?

CAMP: It was the Office of China and Mongolian Affairs. Office Director was Bob Perito. I worked directly for the Deputy for Political Affairs, Mark Mohr. In the East Asia Bureau front office, we reported to Desaix Anderson, the senior deputy assistant secretary. I was the human rights and Tibet affairs officer. The Tibet portfolio was particularly significant for me since I knew Tibet was going to be a major area of focus when I moved to Chengdu.

Q: This was your third or fourth desk officer assignment. What were the kinds of things that you were covering and writing on?

CAMP: I had more congressional activity because Tibet and human rights in China are both very high profile issues. This was only two years after the Tiananmen massacre, and emotions were still very high. There was a lot of involvement with Capitol Hill, NGOs, and the public and press.

My congressional experience came in very handy. I knew most of the Foreign Relations Committee staff at that point. China prison labor was a big issue at the time, especially the controversy over products of Chinese prisons coming to the US. It was dealt with both as a human rights issue and as unfair competition. In the course of dealing with this issue, I learned that we pay our own prisoners a pittance; they also produce products that compete in the marketplace. No one was much interested in hearing about that.

Q: What's U.S. policy to China as seen from the desk?

CAMP: Besides the usual business of carrying on a bilateral relationship, we always felt as if we needed to fight back against efforts to completely derail our relationship with China. We were under legislatively-mandated sanctions, but there were also efforts in Congress and elsewhere to rebalance our relationship toward Taiwan and away from the mainland. We tried to take a longer term view in the State Department and say we will continue to need a productive relationship with China, let's not go overboard.

Q: Is that illustrated by the Radio Asia issue?

CAMP: That is a good example Congress was looking for ways to bring news into China. In those pre-internet days, it was still very much a closed society. Voice of America was active but did not have a mandate to report actively on China's internal developments. The congressional proposal was to establish a Radio Free China, which would be a surrogate radio network analogous to Radio Free Europe. It would provide the Chinese public an alternative to local media and actually provide perspectives on what was happening inside China. The State Department believed that it would be better to beef up VOA, expand its Mandarin – and Tibetan – services, and increase its coverage of Chinese news. A lot of my time was spent on this effort, which was ultimately unsuccessful. VOA was never a particularly effective advocate because they really didn't want to change their focus, and become a local news purveyor. And so, VOA now coexists with Radio Free Asia. There was concern at the time that two radio services would be competing for a limited pot of funds, and I think it has played out that way, to VOA's detriment.

Q: Now, on Radio Free China and other issues, again, you're dealing with other actors in Washington, other offices.

CAMP: There were frequent interagency meetings, which took a lot of our time. But my job was very much an outreach job. I was fortunate because our jobs are so often focused on internal deliberations that we don't have time to talk to the press, the Hill, the NGOs. My job by necessity was to help convince critics of our policy that there was a way forward on U.S. policy toward China that did not involve cutting the country off from everything. So I dealt with a lot of the interest groups. One of the more interesting and effective, then and now, was the International Campaign for Tibet. Then and still (2012) it was headed by a very effective Tibetan by the name of Lodi Gyari, who cut a wide swath around Washington. He's the personal representative of the Dalai Lama in Washington; he was well-received, sometimes lionized on Capitol Hill and among journalists and think tanks. I got to know Lodi; he was a very effective lobbyist. But part of my job was trying to prevent his efforts from derailing US-China relations. As I recall, there was a bill introduced in Congress around this time that referred to Tibet as an occupied country. This was received in Beijing with dismay. The Chinese Embassy knew that it had no effect on the official relationship and was presumably telling the Foreign Ministry. Our message to China was along the lines of "Look, we have very serious human rights concerns here, you know that. We do not intend, however, to change our official relationship with China. We continue to recognize Tibet as an integral part of China. That has not changed, whatever you may hear from Capitol Hill." But when a senior party official in China reads in his official translation of the American press that the Congress has called Tibet a country, he is not going to understand the nuances of American politics, and the separation of powers. He's going to think this is reflective of US foreign policy. So we did a lot of damage control.

Q: Did you have an opportunity to interact with any of the embassy officers?

CAMP: Yes. Some of the same people I had worked with in the Foreign Ministry in Beijing in the mid-'80s were now in fairly senior positions. The DCM was Liu Xiaoming who had been a junior officer at the Foreign Ministry in 1984-85. So it was nice to re-establish that relationship. In general, the Chinese embassy officers in Washington were a pretty sophisticated lot. They knew how to work the halls of State and of Capitol Hill. It was a difficult time for a Chinese diplomat in Washington. They were not greeted with enthusiasm on Capitol Hill, for instance. But it was important to them – and to us – for them to explain to their leadership back in Beijing how Washington worked.

Q: Now you're preparing to move to Chengdu to become the Consul General.

CAMP: That's right. I was an avid reader of the reporting from Chengdu while I was on the desk. I was also the desk's backstop/liaison for the consulate. The management backup was performed by the bureau's executive office and a lot of that was focused on preparing the consulate's new office building and the move from the temporary hotel location. I was the beneficiary of that in the first year I was in Chengdu.

Q: Actually, like most of our consulates, didn't they start out in a hotel or something like that and finally after long negotiations got their own plot of land and then built a building?

CAMP: That's exactly right. And it was longer than usual in Chengdu. But fortunately, this was mostly accomplished by the time I got to Chengdu. At that point it was mostly opening our new facilities.

Q: How did you prepare for your new assignment?

CAMP: Well, in addition to dealing with the human rights and Tibet issues from the Washington perspective, I worked on trade promotion issues. And toward the end of my year on the desk, I went over to the Peace Corps headquarters to talk to the folks working on the new Peace Corps program in China, which was to be headquartered in Sichuan, in Chengdu. Peace Corps almost always sets up in the capital, but with China so huge, they decided to focus at first just on the province of Sichuan. And, in another departure from standard practice, they had agreed with the Chinese after laborious discussions that it was not to be the American Peace Corps, it was to be the U.S.-China Friendship Volunteers.

Q: So now going out to post you would have stopped in the embassy in Beijing. What did the embassy tell you it wanted you to look at and report on and who was your handler in the embassy?

CAMP: My supervisor the DCM, Scott Hallford, was very helpful. And the Ambassador at the time was Stapleton Roy, one of our great China hands. He told me that he had a Chengdu history himself. He'd been a boy in Chengdu, as the son of a missionary family. During World War II, he would climb to the top of the city wall and watch the explosions as the Japanese shelled Chengdu. So he had a personal interest in Sichuan and came to visit a number of times while I was there.

Q: Did he have any particular emphasis on your focus?

CAMP: Yes. Tibet was something that the embassy was very interested in. It was a very sensitive issue then as it is now, both for human rights concerns and our whole bilateral relationship. So one message was to get out to Tibet often. They also wanted more reporting from the other provinces in the consular district. Chengdu's district was the province of Sichuan, the autonomous region of Tibet, the province of Yunnan and the province of Guizhou. Yunnan bordered on the Golden Triangle of Southeast Asia, and therefore was a developing major narcotics area. Sichuan was just beginning to be a major investment focus for foreign companies. The east coast had already seen a lot of development. Now attention was turning more toward the west, so trade promotion was important. And the fourth big issue was management. We had been in a hotel since the consulate opened seven years earlier. And we would finally be moving into a compound, an office building, an apartment building, and a CG's (consul general) residence. And that took a lot of my attention, particularly that first year.

Q: The new buildings, were they newly built by the State Department's Overseas Buildings Bureau?

CAMP: It was kind of parallel with the consulate in Shenyang, which had opened earlier. That is to say, the design was OBO's (Overseas Building Operation) -- it was FBO then, OBO now. But the construction was primarily done by the Chinese with some OBO supervision. I don't know how it worked out in Shenyang, but in Chengdu it was not good. It took a lot longer than we expected. And one of the problems -- the biggest problem probably -- was a design problem from the beginning from our side, which is to say it was designated as an unclassified post. And that is not realistic. That was probably done for cost-saving reasons. But it was clear when I went out there that we needed classified communications. We didn't have it, we didn't have an area that allowed for that. So that took a lot of redesign while I was there and delayed us further. But it was much more comfortable when we finally moved in, compared to working and living in the Jin Jiang Hotel in downtown Chengdu.

Q: And that's where you were when you first arrived.

CAMP: Correct.

Q: And when you first arrived, how large is the consulate?

CAMP: We had seven American officers and we had about 25 to 28 locally hired staff. So it was small. And it was clearly destined to grow. One of the problems was that the locally employed staff was, unlike almost anyone else in the world, not hired by us and they weren't employees of the U.S. government. They were contract employees and they worked for the Sichuan provincial government and they were assigned by the Sichuan provincial government. So we didn't choose them as we would like. And this problem persisted for another 10 years or so all over China before we finally were allowed to hire employees.

Q. When was your first trip to Tibet?

CAMP: I arrived in August 1992. I am pretty sure that I went up within the first few months because that was a priority for the mission. I can't actually remember the first trip with great clarity, but it was wintertime. I had some perspective on the place from my 1984 visit. The government in Beijing allowed limited access. It was relatively open for most of the time I was there; diplomats could go but under strict numerical limits and each trip was on a case-by-case basis.

It was clear you were always under surveillance there. You couldn't set foot in anyone's house without everyone knowing that you were there. And this was brought home to me once when I was sitting with a Tibetan, who might properly be called a dissident. And in walked someone who obviously knew who I was and said, "We need to talk to you. You need to come over and talk to the Foreign Office." So we had to be very careful about who we met. And that limited our reporting greatly. Even foreigners were careful about what they said. As in 1984, I called on the Nepal Consul General, the only foreign diplomat there. He obviously knew more about Tibet than most because he was from neighboring Nepal, spoke the language, and had a consulate staff. But he also knew he was under surveillance and was never very helpful. I always checked in with him, but he never had that much to say.

Q: Now, when you come to Chengdu in '92, what is the Chinese policy toward Tibet? Or at least what is our perception?

CAMP: The atmosphere was somewhat more liberal than the past, and dramatically so by comparison with the horrors of the Cultural Revolution. High schools were teaching in Tibetan and -- my own touchstone of openness -- you could still buy pictures of the Dalai Lama in the bazaar. If you asked for a picture they'd pull one out from underneath the counter and sell it to you. If you went into the most holy of the shrines, the Jokhang Temple, right in the middle of town, in the sanctum sanctorum there was usually at least one picture of the Dalai Lama. Once I remember seeing a "Free Tibet" poster there. So clearly the police did not come into the sanctum sanctorum. That was not always true. Crackdowns seemed to run in cycles.

I tried to get to Tibet at least four times a year. One of my memorable trips was as escort for a congressional delegation arranged at very short notice. Senator Claiborne Pell, then Chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, and Senator Levin were on a CODEL in China. They had had a longstanding request to visit Tibet; during their visit in Beijing, it was suddenly approved.

Senator Pell was quite elderly. The Chinese government sent along a doctor, because they knew of the health problems of going to 13,000 feet suddenly. The Americans sent along our own doctor at Senator Pell's wife's insistence. She was quite concerned.

But the senators were very excited. We had a small delegation. Everyone's advice when you arrive in Tibet, whether you're a 20-year old and fit, or older, is to take the first day off, just relax, acclimatize. You're going from practically sea level to 13,000 feet; it's actually quite dangerous. Senator Pell would have none of that. We came in from the airport, which is a lengthy drive. And he saw a famous monastery. He probably knew about it already, but he said, "Stop. I want to see that monastery."

Well, that was another climb of maybe 800 feet or so. The doctor was taken aback, and tried to encourage him to continue into the city and relax till the following day. But Pell just started climbing the steps. It was as if he was rejuvenated, with a shot of adrenalin.

So we all followed him, in my case with a sense of foreboding. I had had mild altitude sickness on a previous trip. In fact, that night, Senator Levin and I both had horrible headaches and couldn't sleep. We commiserated with each other and the doctors helped us get through the night. Senator Pell slept like a log and was great the next morning. He was on a psychological high. It was a successful trip. The Chinese showed off the relative freedom accorded to Tibetan Buddhism and Senator Pell and Senator Levin had the trip of a lifetime.

Q: Now, one of the pressures that's building in Tibet is Chinese immigration. Han Chinese are coming into the area. It's similar to when the Qing Dynasty fell. Manchuria had been off limits to the Chinese. And when the dynasty fell, the Chinese piled into Manchuria.

CAMP: This was beginning to be an issue. It became more dramatic after I left. Han Chinese from the plains mostly had a very negative image of Tibet, not only because of the cultural image of Tibet, but because they didn't think it was a good place to do business and they thought it was too high and too cold. Not many came at the beginning, but you gradually started to see Sichuanese shops popping up in Lhasa. It was still very much a Tibetan city. Soon after that, and even more so now that the train line has come in, you have Sichuanese and other Han Chinese from all over coming up to do business, to settle, to establish themselves. And they found it very lucrative. Lhasa is much less a Tibetan city now, except for the area right around the Jokhang, the traditional bazaar. I saw a little of that. There was just the beginning of the idea that Han Chinese were destroying Tibetan culture by overwhelming the local populace.

Q: So as you progressed through this tour, what trends were you perceiving about Tibet?

CAMP: It was mostly a liberalizing trend in those years. The Chinese were eager to show it off, show off what they were accomplishing. Again, their point of reference was the Cultural Revolution, when things were disastrous and Buddhist monks were tortured. And so now there was an effort to demonstrate Tibetan Buddhists can practice their religion, monasteries are open and prospering. That was true to an extent. But any indication that those monks were involved in politics was a bridge too far for the Chinese authorities, and they would crack down.

Richard Gere was invited to Tibet in 1994, and came through Chengdu. He had a delegation, including some Rinpoches from India, an American Rinpoche and a reporter from Rolling Stone Magazine. It was quite an entourage. Richard Gere, even then, was known to be a devotee of the Dalai Lama. He wasn't quite the public activist on Tibet that he is now. I presume the Chinese authorities thought they could influence him by showing him Buddhist culture in Lhasa. The effort was unsuccessful.

Q: Could you describe some of your contacts? Who were you calling on on a regular basis?

CAMP: As I said, I tended to be fairly careful about private contacts in Tibet. I started with a few who had been cultivated by my very good Political-Economic Officer John Brennan who had studied some Tibetan. He really made an effort to travel to Lhasa, but also importantly the Tibetan areas of western Sichuan and of western Yunnan. Neither was part of the autonomous region of Tibet, but both were part of the historical area of Tibet, and politically quite important. John was very good about searching out people with his limited Tibetan, so I followed in his footsteps. In Lhasa, I had a few local Tibetan contacts but also lots of government contacts. Those latter were not practically productive in terms of knowing what was going on but they were important because we needed to work with the government. I can't say I made much of an inroad into the Tibetan dissident community -- in any case, contact with me would have been a real problem for them. But we did talk to monks through interpreters who were native Tibetan speakers. They worked for the government, but they were often sympathetic to the Tibetan cause and would go off script on occasion. That was obviously very useful for reporting purposes.

Q: Did you get around to the other provinces in your consular district and did you get a chance to get around at the district level?

CAMP: Yes. In the mid-1990s, the officialdom of Sichuan province was fairly conservative. We were the first foreign consulate in Chengdu and in Sichuan Province. They weren't quite sure how to deal with us and they were taking orders from Beijing and learning how you deal with the foreigners. So the provincial government, while not unwelcoming, was not very helpful. It was hard to get onto university campuses. I had two excellent Public Affairs Officers, both good Chinese speakers, but doing programs on campuses was really, really tough. My son went to kindergarten at Sichuan University, so I had access to that campus regularly. We continually pushed the envelope and tried to improve our access. I went to Chongqing frequently. At that time, it was part of Sichuan Province, although later hived off as an autonomous city. And I went to some major cities along the Yangtze which were major commercial areas. One of my tasks was commercial promotion and so we were trying to encourage American investment and trade from the United States. We were just beginning to get high tech in there. Intel came in while I was there. Boeing and McDonnell Douglas were trying to sell aircraft. Sichuan Airlines was a new entity, so I called on them and tried to discourage them from buying Airbus and buy Boeing instead. McDonnell Douglas had a manufacturing operation in collaboration with Chengdu Aircraft Corporation, making parts of the fuselage for its commercial aircraft. Proctor and Gamble started a factory as well for shampoo sold on the local market. Sichuan was such a huge and populous province that American corporations were already seeing it as a huge potential market.

Yunnan Province was particularly important because it bordered Burma and Laos, so we covered a lot of narcotics issues down there. They had the beginning of an AIDS problem there. China was still very much in denial about AIDS with Beijing saying that it was a foreigners' disease, unknown in China. Meanwhile, along the Burmese border, the government had established AIDS hospitals and living quarters for those with AIDS. A lot of it was related to narcotics, shared needles, and the spread of AIDS from Southeast Asia. So I did some reporting on that. The Yunnan provincial leadership was actually pretty good, pretty welcoming. As a border province, I guess they saw that a foreign presence like ours could be more an asset than a burden, as I think they saw us in Sichuan.

Guizhou, the fourth province in the consular district, was quite poor; at that point, it was more interesting from a cultural and anthropological point of view, but I didn't have a lot of business there. I think I just made two trips there in three years.

Q: Are the distances involved there large? Did you drive?

CAMP: In the mid-'90s we could drive virtually nowhere, partly because of the roads but more because of the government restriction on foreign diplomats. Air and train were the main methods of transportation. To give you a sense of the distance, Chengdu to Kunming in Yunnan was a 24-hour train ride. It was a beautiful train ride. It took you through mountains and valleys and fantastic scenery. It was obviously much easier to fly. There was nothing of the network of major roads or bullet trains between cities that there is now. As I was leaving in 1995 they had just opened the Chengdu-Chongqing Expressway, which made a huge difference. But it didn't affect much of my life there. I almost always traveled by train and occasionally -- if we could get permission -- by office car within 50-100 miles of Chengdu.

Q: If you're basically the only diplomatic mission there, when July 4th comes up how do you celebrate it under these conditions?

CAMP: Well, July 4th was a great occasion all three years. The first was the most memorable because we'd just moved into our new consulate, and so we had the 4th on the consulate grounds. And of course everyone wanted to see this new American outpost in Chengdu. We had a small but growing American community and we had a large Chinese contact list that was delighted to come to the consulate and particularly for that occasion. So it was quite a raucous party and people were admiring our green lawns, which had to be the only green lawns in Sichuan Province at the time. We'd put a lot of effort into making it look like a little bit of America with Chinese characteristics. So the party was a great success. And in fact, I think because we also combined it with a consulate opening, we had high level representation both from our embassy -- the DCM -- and the Governor of Sichuan Province who was quite a senior personage. For the second year, we had the Peace Corps, so that was even better in some ways. We had 30 or so young Americans who were delighted to have a bit of Americana for a day after their time in the villages or the towns of Sichuan.

Q: One of the things that comes up toward the end of your tour is Harry Wu.

CAMP: That was fascinating. He came through Chengdu on one of his sub rosa trips on which he was gathering data on prison labor. I never expected to see him. I didn't know he was in Sichuan Province, although it's not surprising since Sichuan has some of the more developed prison labor camps or did at the time. Harry Wu walked into the consulate one day -- I don't even know how he got into the consulate -- and was ushered into my office. And I was amazed that he was here, because the Chinese wanted to arrest him. They had no interest in his digging up dirt on the prison camps. So while he was expansively telling me what he was doing, I was pointing to the ceiling and trying to pantomime -- "No, write it down. Don't talk to me." But he was fearless. He wanted to tell me what he was doing, he wanted to explain, he wanted me to report back to Washington. And I suspect it was to some extent self-preservation, that he wanted it to be known by the Americans that he was there. I always thought the consulate was pretty well surveilled, but he did not get arrested on that trip. He got out of Sichuan and finished his research. I was never quite sure why he was not picked up after that meeting, because I can't imagine he escaped the attention of the local authorities.

Q: Doesn't he have U.S. travel documentation?

CAMP: I don't think that would have protected him from arrest when you're doing things that the Chinese government considers criminal. And I'm sure they would have found some criminal charges to apply to him.

Q: You said that there was no Taiwan issue in Chengdu. What does that mean?

CAMP: Well, I'd served at the embassy in Beijing before and I of course went up there frequently. And whenever there's a crisis in our relations relating to Taiwan -- often over arms sales -- you hear a lot about it from the Foreign Ministry. But not just the Foreign Ministry. If you go to the Commerce Ministry they have an obligatory statement they feel they need to make before they start doing business with you. In Sichuan, they didn't seem to really care much about that. It simply wasn't on their agenda.

I would go for long periods without anyone mentioning Taiwan to me except in passing. In fact, as often as not, it was a positive reference, as in "maybe we can do business with Taiwan." That's what they were interested in. They felt no obligation, they were under no duress from the party or the Foreign Ministry to raise Taiwan with us. In fact, they didn't raise many bilateral issues or bilateral political issues. They wanted to get things done.

Q: Well, that it didn't get raised in your area is interesting because your last year coincides with President Lee Teng-hui visiting the US, which prompted a major, major spat.

CAMP: Of course. And you know, maybe my memory is failing me a bit, but I don't remember that even then Taiwan was raised with me. They were far from Beijing -- "the emperor is a thousand miles away," as the Chinese say. And my boss was a thousand miles away, which is a nice thing about consulates like Chengdu..

I suspect the decisions that were made in Beijing that affected our life were affected by bilateral problems like Taiwan. For instance, the Peace Corps occasionally would have problems bringing in supplies or bringing in new volunteers or whatever, which may well have been orchestrated by Beijing. But as far as my official contacts, minimal.

Q: You're saying the supervision by the embassy was pretty modest?

CAMP: It was. The embassy had many other priorities and we were fairly low on the list. Once I asked the DCM whether I was doing OK, since I hadn't heard from him in a long time. He said, "Don, I'm just so glad I have a consulate that I don't have to worry about."

I also didn't have a good way to communicate with the embassy either. The only secure communications we had was an antiquated STU-3 (Secure Telecommunications Unit) phone. I had to unlock my safe, get out the key and put it into the telephone to talk to the DCM or whoever was calling me from Beijing. We were considered an unclassified post at the time though we did have a means of sending classified cables.

Q: Could Chengdu report straight back to the department or did all your reporting go through the embassy?

CAMP: For most of the time I was there it was a practical problem. We would type our cables in what passed for a classified area in the attic and then send them to Beijing by courier. After a while we did some policy cables that were specifically from Chengdu, addressed to the Department and presumably went there without editing by Beijing. It was more a practical issue than any policy of centralizing reporting at the embassy.

Q: What outside events affected your life in Chengdu?

CAMP: I will digress and point out that while I had a peaceful three years, my successor Kees Keur's tour was rudely interrupted by the US accidental bombing of the Chinese Embassy in Belgrade in 1999. That prompted riots in Chengdu and a breach of the consulate's wall by the rioters and the burning of the CG's Residence. I hope Kees will do his oral history; it was a scary time in Chengdu.

Q: Did you ever get involved in the Chinese commercial space launch facility in Sichuan?

CAMP: Yes. Very much. The major Chinese commercial satellite launch site was in Panzhihua, south of Chengdu. At that time, we were licensing American components for Chinese satellites.

But we were very careful about tech transfer concerns, and therefore certain components were carefully protected and were under our control until they were launched. At one point, I was invited to Panzhihua to observe a launch, which was a total success. A few months later, there was another launch and I sent my Pol-Econ Officer, John Brennan, to observe. The launch vehicle exploded spectacularly shortly after launch. The debris of the satellite was spread over dozens of square miles. The tech transfer people immediately said, "We've got to recover those pieces." And so John actually led a team to go scouring the countryside for pieces of the satellite that had exploded, and I think turned up a few. I imagine a few escaped as well. But that was quite an adventure for John.

Q: One of the shadows over Chengdu I would suspect is World War II because that was where the Americans were. Did you get some old GI's coming back?

CAMP: Yes. We had a couple of things related to World War II. When I first arrived, Chongqing had a famous museum devoted to one of the Kuomintang's spy missions against the communists, which detailed alleged KMT and American atrocities against the Red Army during the war. I never visited that museum. But the Chongqing municipality, to which I give a lot of credit, decided that they wanted to celebrate the American support for the war effort against the Japanese so they built a museum to U.S.-Chinese cooperation in World War II and it was dedicated to General Joe Stilwell. General Stilwell's daughter came out for the inauguration. They had interesting artifacts that they'd found related to General Stilwell, to the 14th Air Force, and to Flying Tigers leader Claire Chennault. I donated an army jacket from my father-in-law who'd flown The Hump in those days.

Similarly, there was a monument in Kunming to the aviators who'd flown the Hump. I paid my respects there.

And 1995 marked the 50th anniversary of World War II. The Pentagon decided they wanted to celebrate this by sending around the world their latest cargo plane. I think it was the C-5. Enormous thing. They flew it from Beijing to Yunnan and then over the Hump to India. I got to fly from Beijing to Kunming. With Chinese government help, they'd found surviving Chinese pilots from that era and brought them along on the flight. They took them up to the cockpit and showed them what a modern aircraft was like. And these guys were wonderful. They said, "Yeah, we flew this high, but we didn't have pressurization". And the young American Air Force pilots were just so touched by these old guys and vice versa. It was a really wonderful experience and a very successful Pentagon-organized commemoration of US-China cooperation during the war.

Q: Did that attract any American tourism?

CAMP: That was certainly part of the Chinese government's interest in it. I tried my best to publicize the Stilwell Museum. But World War II veterans were fairly long in the tooth by that time and not a lot of them were traveling to China. So I don't think it was a big tourist draw of the kind the Chinese had hoped for.

Q: What would you say was the most interesting thing about the Chengdu assignment?

CAMP: It's hard to find just one. From a professional point of view, I'd been in the Foreign Service 18 years and it was my first opportunity to be in complete charge. The Foreign Service trains us as political or economic or consular or admin officers, but then at some point throws us into management positions. I survived and grew and thrived.

But one of the most satisfying things for me personally, even though I was not directly responsible for it, was the arrival of Peace Corps. I'd been in the Peace Corps in India many years before and it had been a formative experience for me. So it was very exciting to be involved in the creation of a big new program and with China One, as the first group of Peace Corps volunteers was called. It was a management challenge. We had to integrate into the consulate staff a Peace Corps Director, Admin Officer, a nurse, and some locally hired staff. In line with standing Peace Corps policy, they were not really part of the consulate. But the Peace Corps Director Bill Speidel ended up living in one of our consulate apartments, and becoming a good friend. The volunteers would come to the consulate for Thanksgiving or other occasions; it was really a wonderful addition to the American community in Chengdu, which was primarily businessmen and missionary teachers. The volunteers brought a new life to the area, and in fact, several of them later became very good writers. One of them, Peter Hessler, who was in Chongqing at the time, is now a New Yorker staff writer who has written extensively about China. I can't take much credit at all for the success of Peace Corps there, but it was certainly one of the more exciting parts of my tour there.

There were missteps too. There always are. When China One was due to be sworn in, we had Senator Pressler in town for a CODEL. So we invited him to make a speech at the Peace Corps inauguration. It would have been fine, except that Senator Pressler, who I don't think knew much about the Peace Corps or its tradition of being non-political and apart from the State Department, said very memorably to the volunteers with the government of Sichuan listening in the audience and on the podium, "We'll look forward to your reports from the villages." And, "Thank you very much for furthering American foreign policy." It was one of the more awkward moments of my Foreign Service career. But Peace Corps thrived and has prospered and has since expanded to other provinces.

J. RICHARD BOCK
Deputy Managing Director, American Institute in Taiwan
Rosslyn, Virginia (1993-1996)

Richard Bock was born in Philadelphia and raised in Shelton, Washington. He attended the University of Washington and Princeton University and entered the Foreign Service in 1955. His career included posts in Germany, Vietnam, Taiwan, Hong Kong, China, and Australia. He was interviewed in 2002 by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

BOCK: I stayed in Washington and was assigned as deputy managing director of the American Institute in Taiwan, which despite the "In" in its name was headquartered in the U.S. in Rosslyn.

Q: You were there from '93 to when?

BOCK: To '96.

Q: The organization had become rather mature by this point.

BOCK: Yes.

Q: How did you see its operation by that time?

BOCK: The office in Rosslyn was quite a small office. We had a total staff of about ten. It served a couple of functions. One, it served as an administrative backstop for the AIT office in Taipei. That was kind of a can of worms, that I didn't get involved in any more than I had to, although I did to some extent. Then we were also sort of an interface for Taiwan representatives in Washington, either stationed in Washington or traveling to Washington. This gets back to the nature of the U.S.-Taiwan relationship as it evolved after normalization with China in '79. We had no "government to government" relations. All relations were to be filtered through these private organizations which were set up, AIT on the American side and a counterpart organization on the Taiwan side. Well, the Taiwan government folks were never happy with this arrangement. They agreed to live with it but they were always tinkering at the edges. We had a relationship with Taiwan which covered a very large number of aspects. It wasn't just a political relationship. Virtually every agency of the U.S. government had something, some program or some interest in Taiwan. All of these then had to be filtered through this artificial channel. That was what I spent most of my time on, dealing with all the agencies of the U.S. government to make sure that they understood how they were to deal with Taiwan and to offer our services in helping them to do so. Some of these agencies had longstanding programs with Taiwan and somebody assigned to run them who knew the drill and they were easy. Some did not and they were difficult.

Q: Before we get to that, who was the head of this? This was a time of some difficulty, wasn't it?

BOCK: It became a time of some difficulty. When I joined AIT in '93, the office was headed by Nat Belocchi, a former Foreign Service officer who had served in Taiwan and had been in that position for a couple of years. The tradition had been to fill that position with someone... With one exception, they were State Department background. Even the one exception had been someone who had been dealing with East Asia on a policy level. That had worked pretty well.

Q: Who was that?

BOCK: The exception was David Laux, who had been in the CIA and then been in the White House and been assigned to AIT. However, in '95, the White House decided that it had a new person they wanted to assign into that position who had virtually no China background and whose brief experience in the State Department as a political appointee had apparently been an unhappy one, a fellow named James Wood. There was a lot of resistance within the State Department to his appointment and it was delayed for a long time. It was finally, however, made.

AIT has a formal structure - even though it's this artificial creation, it had a formal structure of a board of directors of three individuals, one of whom was the managing director and the other two were just separate directors. They formally elected a chairman of the board. When Wood was named by the State Department at the White House's insistence, the other two directors resigned in protest, publically. Belocchi as the third director was prevailed upon by the State Department to stay on so there wouldn't be a zero board with only this one new person coming in. He was not happy about it, but he was a good soldier and did that. But then there was a struggle to find new directors and there were a lot of things that developed in the wake of that. Wood had an agenda which was not transparent. He wasn't there just to implement U.S. Taiwan policy.

Q: First, where was his power coming from? Somebody doesn't just get nominated. You have to have backing and somebody who's pushing.

BOCK: Yes. I can only answer that question on the basis of rumor. His roots were in Arkansas. He was a lawyer from Arkansas and had been in Washington for a long time. Some people claimed he was a friend of Clinton's. He never really made that claim himself and I'm not convinced that he had any more than a passing acquaintance with Clinton. His nomination was apparently pushed by Dick Moose, who was Under Secretary for Management.

Q: He was also from Arkansas.

BOCK: Yes. Why it happened, I never understood. It seemed that this was going to be a troublesome appointment and why anybody would want to do that is beyond me.

Q: How did Congress fall in on this?

BOCK: There were some voices raised in Congress as to whether this was a good idea, but I don't remember... It's not a position that requires confirmation. There wasn't any storm involved. There were some questions raised.

Q: Where had Wood served in the State Department?

BOCK: I think he served twice. He had served once in Bonn in some kind of a legal office and I know very little about that. Then he had been out and been reappointed and served in the Office of Foreign Missions in Washington as their in-house counsel. When the whole controversy about his impending appointment to AIT came up, the former head of OFM was quoted in the press as saying he would never hire James Wood for anything again but not saying why. So there was bad blood there.

Q: So what happened? You were his deputy.

BOCK: Yes.

Q: This must have been very nervous-making for you.

BOCK: Well, it was awkward. But we managed to get on all right. He started analyzing what AIT's legal position was, had a lawyer background, with the evident intent of trying to make AIT more independent from the State Department. It was never clear where this was going to lead. I left before that developed into any serious problem. Then what happened is that he was accused of using some of his trips to Taiwan to get illegal campaign contributions to the Democratic Party. I don't know for a fact whether that was ever true or not. I think it's still unproved. But he was finally forced to resign and that was after I left. The reason for the resignation was on that basis.

Q: While you were there, did this job normally require policy considerations or was this really to operate sort of as the Taiwan desk?

BOCK: First of all, there was a Taiwan desk in the State Department. It wasn't called that. It was called the Taiwan Coordination Staff. The head of the Taiwan Coordination Staff was essentially office director. He was the one who did all of the policy recommendations to the East Asia Bureau. AIT was supposed to take all its policy guidance from the State Department. The only time that becomes an issue is when the managing director is making some public statement. On his various visits to Taiwan, he would normally have public statements and sometimes in Washington, although not... It's usually the Taiwan press that's interested in what he has to say. Wood never got himself in real trouble on that basis. Whatever he was trying to do, he wasn't trying from the outset to change U.S. policy toward Taiwan. But he did have this kind of resistance to too much oversight from the State Department.

Q: I interviewed Nat Belocchi while he was still in the job. Was there concern in AIT in your office about there being an awful lot of money in the Chinese community, particularly those that are interested in Taiwan, and various connections? Was this something you knew was out there?

BOCK: Oh, yes. This had been a well known fact for years that Taiwan was considered next to Israel to be the best managed, best funded foreign lobbying operation in Washington. In fact, at one point, somebody dealing with China who was fending off all these complaints about how the U.S. was always catering to Taiwan's interests, said to this Chinese representative, "You ought to look at the way Taiwan operates. You might learn something." It was a complicated system because, first of all, they are a semi-official representation in Washington. Then there were various consulting contracts with some of the top notch lobbying firms in Washington, some of which were run through the Washington representation of Taiwan and some of which were not. And then finally there was the whole Taiwan independence movement operation, which was quite separate but which was also increasingly well funded from various Taiwanese-American groups and was in close with a number of congressmen.

Q: You had been dealing with Chinese affairs and had covered both sides of the Straits. Were you noticing a growing problem after Tiananmen that China per se, Mainland China, was pursuing this quite authoritarian stance, still run by a communist regime, and was pretty hardline with economic changes? And then you have Taiwan, which is increasingly, particularly on your watch, was treating democratic and much more what we all hoped other countries would be. When you get this, it gets harder and harder to not have an American response of saying, "Dammit, this is a democratic society and this other one ain't."

BOCK: Yes. It was becoming much more confrontational than it had been in my previous tour in Taipei. On the one hand, there had been the clampdown after Tiananmen so that moves toward democratization of China seemed to be pretty much on hold, although there were little things that a person could point to if you were looking. Secondly, the Taiwan government under Lee Teng Hui, who had taken over in the late '80s, was becoming increasingly, although it was a nationalist KMT government, Lee Teng Hui himself took a line increasingly looking toward independence, although he was usually careful not to use that term. He was very aggressive in trying to raise Taiwan's international profile. In fact, it was during my watch there that we had a major incident where he gave a speech at Cornell University which really outraged the Chinese government. It may be worthwhile to give you a little background.

Q: Yes. This is major.

BOCK: We had had a policy as of '79 that visits to the United States by a president of Taiwan were out of bounds. We had Cabinet level visits which were all "unofficial," even including the foreign minister, although the foreign minister could never come to Washington, but he would make stopovers. Taiwan had relatively few countries around the world that recognized it officially. One concentration of those countries was, still is, in Central America and to some extent the Caribbean. So, as they tried to increase their international profile, they wanted to send their president to various places like San Salvador and Panama City, but the only way to get there was to go through the United States. So, that raised the question of stopovers. And this was an awkward one from the U.S. point of view. The Chinese, of course, said, "This is totally outrageous for any so-called 'Taiwan president' to come to the United States under any guise." Well, that wasn't the U.S. policy. The U.S. policy was a refueling stop would be okay. But we were very cautious about somebody like Lee Teng Hui in particular using a refueling stop to engage in political activities.

So, this question came up in '94 or '95 of a stopover in Hawaii on the way to some event in Central America. What was proposed was an overnight stopover because of how long a flight it is, after all, from Taipei to Central America. The proposal that went up through channels in the State Department had several options involved on the basis of how long a stopover could be and where it could be and so on. For reasons that I had never understood, at a fairly senior level, another option was added which was "refuse." That was the option which was adopted by the Secretary of State. It was communicated to Taiwan and greeted with outrage. "This has nothing to do with U.S.-Taiwan relations. You are preventing us actively from dealing with our diplomatic partners." Well, it was an untenable position and the U.S. had to back down.

Q: Did you all get involved?

BOCK: Not really in the policymaking process, no. AIT's role was, once the policy was set, then it was up to AIT to manage the actual stopover. So, eventually, the State Department backed down and said, "Okay, but only a refueling stop. No overnight." Nat Belocchi was sent out to Honolulu to handle this. The story is that when Lee Teng Hui got to Hickam Air Force Base, he refused to get off the plane as a sign of his great displeasure with the way this had been handled. The plane was refueled and was sent on. That was not the plan. The plan was, there was a VIP room set up and he was to get out there and have an hour or an hour and a half stopover. He refused to get off the plane. The Taiwan people leaked the story that the U.S. refused to let him off the plane. It was only after a while that that was sorted out. This raised a lot of anger in Congress among friends of Taiwan.

That was the background, then, for the next thing, which was a request by Lee Teng Hui to accept an invitation by his old alma mater, Cornell University, to receive an honorary degree. The State Department's position was that this would be a big breach of our policy. Stopovers were one thing, but an actual visit, even though it wasn't the president coming to Washington, was going to be seen as a real change in our policy and also was going to be real troublesome because it would allow all sorts of demonstrations and meetings and so on. But the result was that Congress passed some kind of a non-binding resolution virtually unanimously saying that the State Department should grant a visa to Lee Teng Hui to go to his alma mater. So, eventually the State Department backed down. It's my view that if we hadn't had this Honolulu incident in the first place, which had created this whole atmosphere, the original State Department policy on Cornell could have been maintained. But maybe not. You never know. Anyway, Lee Teng Hui came to Cornell. We worked with the university authorities there to try to see that this would not be politicized, but of course he had a huge entourage of press, he had various congressmen waiting for him on a change of planes in Syracuse for private meetings, and when he got to Cornell, he gave a very political speech. Of course, the Department had been giving assurances to the Chinese that this would not be a political speech. So, it was a disaster all around.

Q: Was anybody that you know of saying, "Let's not give these assurances. This guy is a loose cannon?"

BOCK: Not that I know of. I was one step removed from the people making the recommendations as to how we should handle it, but as far as who was talking to the Chinese embassy, that was still another step away.

Q: Did anybody from AIT go along?

BOCK: Oh, yes. Belocchi went up, as well as a couple of other people. I went up on an advance. When they sent their advance team over, I was up for a couple of days trying to work the arrangements and make sure that whatever restraint we could get would be put on the program.

Q: What was your impression of the advance team?

BOCK: I don't know exactly what they knew, but you started out with the assumption that anybody representing the Taiwan government would play for what they could get. There were no surprises there.

Q: Were people in AIT braced for the disaster?

BOCK: Yes.

Q: So what was the fallout?

BOCK: The fallout was not in the U.S. It was a ratcheting up of confrontation across the Taiwan Strait resulting in exercises in which the Chinese fired missiles off the Taiwan coast, in which then the U.S. sent two carrier battle groups down to the Taiwan area, saying, "This is unacceptable," and things were kind of wound down after that. But there has been more of a state of confrontation between China and Taiwan since that Cornell speech than there had been previously.

Q: Was there any disquiet on the part of the people who were in AIT about the aging military potential of Taiwan to defend itself? Was there a feeling that time was not with Taiwan?

BOCK: Yes, I think that feeling's been there all along. I had mentioned earlier when talking about my period in Taipei that in the 1982 Communique between the U.S. and China, in which we agreed not to quantitatively or qualitatively increase our military assistance, that the qualitative part was a ticking time bomb... With the decision on the F16s in 1992, that removed the qualitative restriction, although we claimed it didn't. But even so, yes, there were concerns. There was a fellow in the AIT office in Rosslyn whose job was the military portfolio. He was a liaison with the Defense Department and handled all these visits by Taiwan generals coming over. With the decision on the F16s, the next problem was whether Taiwan was really in a position to absorb these properly. That was a constant concern. There were other concerns. Taiwan wanted submarines. That was a big issue. We said, "No, because it looks too much like an offensive weapon." That decision recently has been reversed. But you're right. Regardless of what decision was made on these individual issues, there was still the reality that you had an island of 20 million people facing a continental power of 1.2 or 1.3 billion with growing economic power.

Q: Did you see a change in our relations with Mainland China? Had we gotten over the Tiananmen shock of '89? Were you seeing steps towards an improvement or was there always a qualification?

BOCK: Well, I think Tiananmen certainly continued to dampen any expectation of internal democratization in China, expectations that were fairly widely held in the 1980s. But what became the issue was no longer what was going to happen internally in China, although that was always an issue. But the major issue after this missile confrontation was, has China made a new determination that it's going to seek a military solution to its problems with Taiwan? After 1979, there was a general expectation, although Beijing was always a little bit cagey, that they were prepared to be patient and would look for ways to unify Taiwan into China by peaceful means. After 1995, that was increasingly in question and still is.

Q: Did you find that the approaching absorption of Hong Kong in '97 or '98 was looked at by everybody as saying let's see how this works and this might be something for Taiwan to look at?

BOCK: There was something to that, yes. People were interested in Hong Kong and the idea that the Chinese were going to want to handle Hong Kong smoothly because they need it as an example of how peaceful integration can work. On the other hand, there was realization that the circumstances in Hong Kong and Taiwan were very different. One was a colonial outpost which had never been run democratically although in the last years Governor Patton tried to establish democracy. On the other hand was Taiwan, which was running itself increasingly as a democracy. It had been running itself for 40-50 years and had been democratic now for maybe 10 years. So, the issues involved were very, very different.

WINSTON LORD
Assistant Secretary for East Asia and Pacific Affairs
Washington, DC (1993-1995)

Ambassador Lord was born and raised in New York City and earned degrees at Yale University and the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy. He entered the Foreign Service in 1961. After serving in Washington and Geneva, Mr. Lord was assigned to the Department of Defense before joining the National Security Council, where he was involved in China and Indonesia matters. He subsequently served on State's Policy Planning Staff. In 1985 Mr. Lord was named US Ambassador to China, where he served until 1989. From 1993 to 1997 the Ambassador held the position of Assistant Secretary of State dealing with Far Eastern Affairs. Ambassador Lord was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kenned in 1998.

LORD: Then, when Clinton was elected President, I think that the following considerations led to my appointment as Assistant Secretary of State.

Q: [Bernkopf] Is that because the position of Assistant Secretary is more independent than what you had as a Special Assistant to Secretary Kissinger?

LORD: Well, Kissinger was tough in another way. It was tough in physical terms, but, then, I was a lot younger when I was Special Assistant to Kissinger. So I was able to handle that. Being Special Assistant to Kissinger was tough in terms of travel and the hours I had to work. It was also tough because of Kissinger's personality. It was also exhilarating because of the excitement of working for someone like Kissinger, who was so brilliant, as well as the attraction of being involved in dramatic events. I'm not going to say that being Special Assistant to Kissinger wasn't a tough and demanding job. However, my focus was much narrower. I was dealing with China, Vietnam, to a certain extent Russia, and I was writing and drafting material of very great importance - whether communiques, peace agreements, or presidential statements. I was focused on those countries and was essentially reporting to one person. As Assistant Secretary, I was the nexus between the Secretary of State and the Seventh Floor and my Bureau and/or the Embassies in the East Asian area. Not to mention the White House, the Defense Department, the economic agencies of the government, the CIA [Central Intelligence Agency], and other institutions, non-governmental organizations, business, the media, etc.

I enjoyed the job of Ambassador to China the most, but working for Secretary Kissinger was more dramatic. The most enjoyable job was being an Ambassador. A more difficult job was being Assistant Secretary of State for East Asian and Pacific Affairs. The good thing about being an Ambassador is that you essentially are running your own show. You have to take instructions from the State Department in Washington, but you're in charge of your own team. It's much less bureaucratic in terms of infighting and jungle warfare than you inevitably have in Washington. That doesn't mean that you don't have your own share of such bureaucratic warfare, and you have personnel problems in an Embassy. However, at least you feel that you are running your own ship, whereas in Washington you are involved in constant, bureaucratic battles. On the other hand, you have much more power in Washington, more influence on policy.

So the Assistant Secretary not only has to run his or her own bureau. You have to deal with and instruct 20 or 25 Ambassadors. You constantly have to deal with Congress and the press. You have to work the inter-agency circuit. You have to deal with other bureaus in the Department, in competition with officials on the Seventh Floor. You have to deal with think tanks and interest groups, all of which makes it fascinating and demanding but which stretched me even further. I'll get into all of that later on. I don't recall what this question involved, but these were all reasons for my mood as I took over the position of Assistant Secretary and my approach to it.

Q: [Kennedy] What were the salient points of your statement, particularly the ones which would have involved moving ahead, rather than the usual contents.

LORD: I don't want to go into it at great length, because it's probably more than you want to know. What I did was the following. First, the title of the statement was "A New Pacific Community: Ten Goals for American Policy." When I referred to it over the next few years, I called it, "Lord's Ten Commandments." This may not have been the first use of the term, "Pacific Community," but it was the first use by an official of the Clinton Administration. I don't know whether it had ever been used as a goal of American policy.

My theme was that it was in our interest to work with other countries. We needed to work to build a new, Pacific Community. I started out by listing all of our interests in Asia. I won't go through them, as it's not necessary here. However, they included security, political, historical, cultural, economic, and social interests. The fact is that we have a growing number of immigrants coming from Asia. Our population is moving from the East Coast to the West Coast. These are all reasons why Asia is already crucial and will be even more so in the next century. I included the statement that there is no part of the world more important to United States interests than the Pacific region.

I set out that view, in addition to the usual introduction about my background, the honor I felt at having been chosen for this post, and pledging to work with Congress. Then I went into the importance of our interests in Asia. One of the themes I used, and I'll get more specific in a minute, was that we had to pursue our bilateral interests by all means, as these were crucial to the U.S. I wasn't suddenly saying that there was a community already existing out in Asia. That was more a vision than a reality. So there was a mix of going over the key, bilateral relationships, with heavy emphasis also on trying to build more of a community in the Pacific area, even as we have already done in Europe. However, I made clear that the concept of a Pacific Community was a lot different from a European Community.

I laid out 10 goals. I would like to keep this very brief, but they were basically as follows. I purposely put Japan first, as I thought that it was our most crucial partner. Particularly since I have a heavy China background, I wanted to make clear to everyone else, including the Japanese, that I thought that Japan was the most important country in terms of U.S. interests. I put South Korea second because it was another key ally and the site of the most urgent security challenge. Then I got to China and the others. I'll just read off the Ten Goals, because that's the easiest way to review them.

I mentioned our need to forge a fresh, global partnership with Japan that reflects a more mature balance of responsibility. Global partnership means not only our bilateral relationship but increasingly working with Japan on many regional and global issues, as well as a more mature balance of responsibilities, meaning that Japan needs to assume, in conjunction with the U.S. but also in terms of its own self interest, more responsibility in the world. I was trying to be very careful in my drafting.

Secondly, I mentioned erasing the nuclear threat and moving toward peaceful reconciliation on the Korean Peninsula. This was aimed at disposing of the problem and then trying to build a more stable and long lasting solution.

Thirdly, restoring firm foundations for cooperation with China, where political openness should catch up with economic reform. That is, trying to restore momentum in the Chinese-U.S. relationship, in cooperation with China, but also working in the fact that political openness needed to catch up with economic reform. I tried to go into both the strategic interests and also the concern for freedom.

Fourthly, I referred to the need to deepen our relationship with ASEAN [Association of Southeast Asian Nations], as it broadens its membership and scope. I wanted to make clear that although much emphasis had been placed on the big actors in Northeast Asia, ASEAN was really growing as a major economic and diplomatic power in many ways. I also made clear, consistent with my overall theme, that we not only had to deal with ASEAN as a group of countries, as a part of building a Pacific Community, but also the U.S. had very important, bilateral relationships within ASEAN which we also had to nurture.

Then I referred to obtaining the fullest possible accounting on our Missing in Action, as we normalized our relations with the Socialist Republic of Vietnam. Of course, I put the accounting of our MIAs first, as we always did, we had to do, and we should do also. We needed to do this, both in terms of what we needed to do but also in terms of building domestic support for this policy. However, I worked in the phrase, "As we normalize our relations with Vietnam." This involved stretching the envelope a little bit because I was projecting the normalization of relations with Vietnam.

Then I went on to speak of working to secure a peaceful, independent, and democratic Cambodia. Cambodia was scheduled to have elections in May, 1993, so that was an urgent goal. I went on to refer to ASEAN in its collective dimension as being key on this issue as well.

The last four goals were sectoral and essentially oriented more toward a Pacific Community, speaking in collective terms.

I spoke of strengthening APEC as the cornerstone of Asian Pacific economic cooperation. APEC is the Asian Pacific Economic Cooperation forum, which is not the world's greatest title. It was not self-evident that, in listing 10 goals in the Pacific Region, we would include APEC. At this point APEC had been going for a few years, beginning with the Bush Administration, but it hadn't achieved much of a profile or attracted much interest. I wanted to talk about our economic interests in Asia in general, which obviously were crucial. However, I also wanted to make clear that APEC would be a major vehicle for promoting our economic interests, and I'll get back to that.

So I put that in. The order of these goals was important. I wouldn't argue that all 10 goals were equally important, but I put strengthening APEC down as one of these goals. Then I got to the security goal, subtly making the point that in our new foreign policy economics was at least as important as security, unlike during the period of the Cold War.

On security, and here I was pushing the envelope again, I spoke of developing multilateral forums for security consultations, while maintaining the solid foundations of our alliances. I'll go into more detail on this, but I would point out that the Bush Administration, with some plausible reason, was very skittish and reluctant to push regional security schemes. They were concerned about the old threat from the Brezhnev Doctrine and the implications of collective responsibility. They didn't want anything that looked as if we were walking away from our bilateral and unilateral security obligations and replacing them with some fuzzy, regional mechanisms. They didn't want to signal to anybody that we were pulling out of East Asia. They were worried that if we put too much emphasis on regional security dialogues, we would look naive. They felt that Asia wasn't Europe, where we have NATO as a long established, defensive alliance.

I believed that these interests and considerations were not mutually exclusive. So I made it very clear that we should maintain the solid foundations of our alliances and our forward, military presence. However, as long as we keep our alliances and our forward, military presence as the foundations of our policies, we could supplement and not supplant them with regional security dialogues. This concept was pretty much embryonic at that point, but I signaled in this statement that we were going to emphasize these dialogues and forums. Again, this concept was not particularly controversial, but it was a new departure, versus the views of the Bush administration in terms of our emphasis. I was signaling that.

Both the APEC and regional security dialogues were picked up by the President in his first few months. He lifted APEC to the summit level, and he suggested overlapping regional security approaches in addition to our alliances and military presence in a major security speech in South Korea.

Then I referred to spurring regional cooperation to deal with global challenges like the environment, refugees, health, narcotics, nuclear non-proliferation, and arms sales. This reflected the new foreign policy agenda and some of the issues involved. Actually, these issues were not all new, but they were growing in importance. Secretary Christopher would have a new Under Secretary for Global Affairs, for example. Nuclear non-proliferation, the environment, and so forth were very important. I knew that President Clinton was interested in some of these issues, so I wanted to make sure that they were highlighted on the agenda. Again, I felt that regional as well as global cooperation could contribute to our positions in the Pacific and to meeting these problems.

Then, finally, and because the last goal is almost as prominent as the first goal in an agenda, I put down promoting democracy and human rights where freedom has yet to flower. This goal underlay and would contribute to all our other goals. So I ended with it, not to mention the rhetorical value.

So those were the ten goals, and I went into greater depth on each one. As I said, I think that the statement was well received and I'm glad that I went to the trouble I did.

A NEW PACIFIC COMMUNITY TEN GOALS FOR AMERICAN POLICY

Opening Statement at Confirmation Hearings for Ambassador Winston Lord, Assistant Secretary of State-Designate Bureau of East Asian and Pacific Affairs, March 31, 1993

China

Ever since participating in the opening to China more than two decades ago, I have worked hard to build Sino-American relations. I will continue to do so, conscious of both American interests and values.

China is an influential member of the international order. More than one of every five humans live there. It possesses nuclear weapons and exports nuclear technology. It launches satellites and sells missiles. It represents a huge market and one of the world's richest civilizations. It holds a permanent seat on the United Nations Security Council. It is central to key regional issues like Indochina, Korea, and disputed islands. It abuts the unsettled Central Asia region. It is salient in new challenges that require global action.

In recent years, China has opened up to the world, moved toward a market economy, and enjoyed the fastest growth rate in the world. Together with the greater Chinese communities of Taiwan and Hong Kong it has become one of the most promising areas for investment and trade.

At the same time, its leaders cling to an outdated authoritarian system. Serious abuses persist. While Beijing releases some prominent activists toward the end of their jail sentences, it arrests others for the peaceful expression of political views. The Chinese leaders are gambling that open economics and closed politics will preserve their system of control. It is a gamble that sooner or later will be lost. Economic reform produces - and requires - political reform. In today's world, nations cannot prosper for long without Opening up their societies. Technology and information, the forces of modernization, and global democratic trends have been eroding communism and totalitarianism across the globe.

All of the Asian models of economic success toward which China looks - many of them Chinese societies - have shown that political relaxation, tolerance of opposition a freer press, the rule of law and other democratic elements are inescapably linked with economic development.

Our policy challenge therefore is to reconcile our need to deal with this important nation with our imperative to promote international values, we will Seek cooperation with China on a range of issues. But Americans cannot forget Tiananmen Square.

The United States therefore should conduct a nuanced policy toward Beijing until a more humane system emerges. Shunning China is not an alternative. We need both to condemn repression and preserve links with progressive forces which are the foundations for our longer term ties.

We will continue to be guided by the three Sino-American joint communiques that have provided a flexible framework for our relations. It is up to China and Taiwan to work out their future relationship; we insist only that the process be peaceful. Consistent with our undertakings not to challenge the principle of "one China," we will continue to build upon our unofficial relations with Taiwan based on the Taiwan Relations Act. In our diplomacy and through the 1992 U.S.-Hong Kong Policy Act we should make clear our large humanitarian and commercial stakes in the future of Hong Kong.

Against this backdrop we face a host of serious issues with China: Widespread human rights violations, including in Tibet. Chinese exports of dangerous weapons and technology to volatile areas. Our fastest-growing trade deficit, which is now more than 18 billion dollars, second only to Japan. Collaboration at the United Nations and on regional conflicts. Emerging challenges like the environment and drugs. We should work together where our interests converge and bargain hard over differences.

We will press forward with this agenda in a sober, constructive fashion. Our approach will reflect that China is a great nation. In response to positive movement by the Chinese, we are prepared to address their concerns and strengthen our ties.

The Chinese people hold the same aspirations as others around the globe. We will support those aspirations - without arrogance - recognizing that the Chinese people will determine their own destiny, but confident that we are aligning ourselves with the future.

Economics

In the aftermath of the Cold War, economics is increasingly supplanting military considerations on our foreign policy agenda. More than ever our national security depends on our economic strength. With domestic renewal now America's highest priority, trade and investment are critical. And no region is more central for American economic interests than the world's most dynamic one - Asia.

When I served as Ambassador to China, I devoted more time to promoting American business and economic interests than any other task. I will do so as well in my forthcoming role. I will consult closely with the American business community on their problems and their goals. I will urge our overseas posts to do the same. For the private sector in Asia, as elsewhere around the world, is an increasingly important actor. Helping American businesses to penetrate overseas markets will be key to America's prosperity.

The Asia-Pacific region is the world's largest consumer market and our biggest export market. Last year our exports were worth more than 120 billion dollars and 2.3 million American jobs.

We need to confront our Asian economic challenges and opportunities on several levels. Foreign policy begins at home - strengthening our competitiveness is a sine qua non for an effective policy. The successful completion of the Uruguay Round is the most urgent multilateral task - this would dramatically increase trade and investment in Asia as in the world, and it would help preserve an open global system against the dangers of protectionism and regional blocs. We welcome the positive role played by Australia and New Zealand as active Cairns Group members. Here, as on other issues, we will consult closely with Canada. Bilaterally we must continue to pry open Asian markets, Particularly in those nations running large surpluses with us. We will champion expanding trade but we will insist that others open up to our products and services. As the President has said, we will compete, not retreat.

In addition to these domestic, global, and bilateral policies, greater regional cooperation is required.

The most promising vehicle is APEC, established in 1989 through the efforts of Australia and others. Today this trans-Pacific grouping brings together fifteen Pacific economies representing almost half of the world's GNP. It underscores the new imperatives of interdependence. It can dampen the appeal of exclusionary regional blocs. It can advance regional trade liberalization and integration. It can anchor America in the world's most dynamic region.

As the host for this year's annual Ministerial Conference in November, the United States has the opportunity to strengthen this organization. This will be at the top of our agenda this year. Working with others we can create a true Asian-Pacific economic community.

Security

For the first time in this century, there are no adversarial fault lines among the great powers in Northeast Asia: the United States, Japan, Russia and China. The post Cold War period invites dialogue to prevent arms races, the forging of competing alignments, and efforts by one power or group of powers to dominate this strategic region. Our voice will be crucial. In close concert with our Pacific allies, we could engage Russia, China and others inside and outside Northeast Asia.

Global Issues

- Many measures of human impact - from water use to the emissions of trace gases - show greater change since 1950 than in the previous 10,000 years. The Asian region, with its massive increase in energy consumption, faces severe environmental problems. They range from the plundering of Southeast Asian forests to China's burning of coal to the threat of global warming for some Pacific Island states.

- There are almost 20 million refugees in the world today. Even more people are uprooted within their own lands. While some recent developments in Asia are promising, poverty, repression and uncertain political succession could unleash major migrations in the future.

Q: [Kennedy] You made these points, and there was this concern by the Bureau of Congressional Relations you have referred to. How did the hearings go? There is always the wild card of Senator Helms, the conservative, Republican Senator from North Carolina. I would have thought that he would not be your friend.

LORD: As you will recall from our earlier discussions, he hadn't been a friend in holding up my nomination as Ambassador to China for months. However, in this case I had no opposition or any real problems, as far as I recall. I did the usual round of going up to Congress ahead of time and talking to the Senators. They asked questions, but these were easily handled, and I had worked very hard to get ready. I knew the issues. And I had a solid, bipartisan reputation and credentials.

I had some follow-up, written questions to respond to, but it all went very smoothly. I don't recall how long it took, but it was fairly fast. Any controversial questions really went quite smoothly.

Senator Helms didn't cause me any problems this time around. In his case I had been outspoken about Chinese behavior regarding human rights, so that probably made him feel that I wouldn't roll over for the Chinese. This was one of the key issues in that area.

In 1992 I could have run into trouble in my deposition on Vietnam. That is always an emotional issue.

Q: [Bernhardt] Where did this idea of raising the level of participation in APEC originate? Was it with you?

LORD: No. I think that it originated with some people outside the U.S. Government. Fred Bergsten was very helpful, working with us on the APEC meeting. He probably floated the idea of raising the level of the meeting, although I don't recall precisely. I certainly had the idea, but many others had it, too. I can't pretend that this was a brilliant idea that only I thought of. The Australians had floated it. It just seemed to me that this was a terrific way to highlight the Asian region, to get President Clinton engaged in it, and to start a process of Pacific leaders meetings, as European and Atlantic leaders had been meeting for decades already. They were in constant touch and were talking about issues that they had in common. I thought that this was a good way to build a Pacific Community which was in our interest, even as we maintained our bilateral foundations. Those meetings would also be a good umbrella for a series of bilateral meetings at the site of the conference - just like the United Nations General Assembly in the fall. Indeed President Clinton was able, for example, to have regular meetings with Chinese President Jiang before he was able to visit China.

Q: [Kennedy] Talking about minorities, what was your impression of the recruitment to positions in EA/P of Asian-Americans? Would you say that they were sort of coming on stream?

LORD: I think that by definition we had more Asian-Americans in our Bureau than in any other Bureau. There was a lot of interest among Asian-Americans in our bureau, and we had a lot of them there. I considered that as part of the minority mix as well. That was a fairly easy objective to achieve. Even when I came into the bureau, I noticed that we had quite a few Asian-Americans. The real problem and challenge was and remains the recruitment of African-Americans. The bureau and the Foreign Service in general have done much better in the recruitment of women. However, we're still lacking in terms of African-Americans. Nevertheless, I attached a high priority to this, and the powers that be in the Department of State recognized and appreciated that.

Could I mention a few other, generic issues which might be helpful to you? I'm talking now over a period of several years. First, and I'll get back to these, I went on all of the Presidential and Secretary of State Asian trips overseas during my tenure as Assistant Secretary. I traveled with the Secretary of Defense to China, Japan, and Korea. I went semi-clandestinely with the Director of CIA [Central Intelligence Agency] to China. I went with the NSC Advisors on a couple of Asian trips. In each of these cases I was the top adviser to the principal representative.

I don't have the numbers, but in my own personal travels I went to Japan the most. I made it clear, particularly early on during my service as Assistant Secretary, especially with my China background, that Japan was our number one partner in East Asia. Japan was the first place that I visited on my own, as I recall, and certainly this was very early on in my term as Assistant Secretary. Almost every time I went to Asia, I would try to go to Japan. I would always seek Japanese officials out at meetings of senior officials on regional security, around the edges of the UN, and so forth. I would try to show that I wanted to consult and concert with them as much as I could on the various issues in Asia under consideration.

On my own trips, and when I traveled with the President and the Secretary of State, I must have visited Japan about 15 or 20 times during this period. I would say that I visited South Korea at least 10 times; China, six times; Hong Kong several times; ASEAN countries probably varied from Brunei, twice, to Thailand, about eight times, with the other countries more or less in between and closer to the level of trips to Thailand. I visited Vietnam roughly six times; Cambodia, roughly four times; Australia, maybe four times; New Zealand, maybe three times; and the South Pacific, maybe three times. I went to Europe several times and to Russia twice for consultations on Asia. I thought that these trips were important in pushing our interests and for all of the other reasons I have mentioned.

I also gave high priority to dealing with the press. To be honest about it, I got to be fairly good at it. Mike McCurry [White House press spokesperson] would have me go out after Presidential meetings, sometimes by myself, and sometimes with White House people. It was fairly unusual for White House people to let a State Department official handle this. Such meetings with the press were often on a background basis but sometimes on the record, especially in terms of Presidential meetings and always in the case of State Department meetings. I would often be brought down by the State Department press spokesperson, first Mike McCurry and then Nick Burns, to give special briefings at the State Department. I did a lot of press contact work on the telephone and gave a lot of backgrounders to the press.

I did a lot of work with the foreign press, not only on the phone, but also at the Foreign Press

Center in the Department of State. I had more appearances by far on USIA's WorldNet than any other Assistant Secretary.

Q: [Kennedy] Would you like to talk about the two, major meetings? First, there was the trip which President Clinton made to Japan and to South Korea. Then we might move over to the Seattle meeting of APEC [Asia-Pacific Economic Conference]. Perhaps we could begin with a brief, overview of the situation and problems during the four years of the first Clinton term. Then we could hit each country and problem separately.

LORD: Right. We're talking about both reality and perception of how we were doing in Asia and in the Pacific during this time. When we had some of our biggest problems, I think that you could say that our Asian problems were like what Mark Twain said about Wagner's music: "It's not as bad as it sounds."

I think that it's fair to say that we got off to an early and good start. Although there was some friction right away with Japan on trade, we took advantage of the calendar that we discussed, including the President's trip to Asia. Generally, during President Clinton's Asia trip, he set out broad themes in Japan and South Korea on economics, security, and human rights/democracy.

My Senate confirmation statement was of use in my early dealings with other countries. I went on an early trip to several countries in East Asia in May, 1993, before the President went on his trip to the area and began moving on regional dialogues. I negotiated with the Congress, on behalf of the President, MFN [Most Favored Nation] extension for China. At the time, and people tend to forget this, this was greeted as a very positive outcome. Although the President had been very harsh on China during the campaign and many in Congress wanted very tough conditions or to cut off MFN altogether, the human rights conditions we negotiated were modest. They put some pressure on the Chinese, but they weren't so onerous that the Chinese couldn't meet them, and thus we wouldn't lose MFN extension as a result. In any event, I worked well with Congresswoman Pelosi [Democrat, California] and Senator Mitchell [Democrat, Maine] on this issue. There was disappointment from the beginning with the economic people in the administration, who didn't want any conditions. Later they sabotaged the President's policy. But at the time (June 1993), the MFN deal was greeted as a success.

Then, by the end of 1993 we had the very successful meeting in Seattle of APEC. There was the drama of the first meeting ever of the leaders of the various, participating countries and setting forth provisions for greater trade and investment in the Pacific. This was part of a triple play on trade. Just before President Clinton arrived in Seattle, NAFTA was approved by the U.S. Congress. And soon after Seattle there was a breakthrough on global negotiations in the Uruguay Round of GATT.

Q: [Kennedy] That's the North American Free Trade Agreement with Mexico and Canada.

LORD: That's right. President Clinton arrived at the APEC meeting, having just won a major victory on NAFTA, with the help of the Republicans, I might add. This was accomplished literally one day before he arrived in Seattle. If he had lost this agreement, it would have hurt everything. So the President came in on the wave of a major success. This gave an impetus to the whole APEC meeting, of course.

Then the bold vision set forth by the APEC leaders in turn directed the attention of the Europeans to the Uruguay Round of tariff and trade negotiations. The Europeans had been dragging their feet on the Uruguay Round. Then the Europeans began to see in APEC that the U.S. and Asia might get together at Europe's expense, and they began moving on the Uruguay Round. Within a couple of months, therefore, we had major breakthroughs on NAFTA, on APEC, and on the Uruguay Round in GATT [General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade] negotiations.

When you put all of that together - the MFN deal on China, the President's Asia trip, APEC, etc. - things looked as if they were going pretty well in the Asia-Pacific region in 1993. We did have trade problems with Japan. However, on the whole, things looked pretty good at that time.

During the latter months of 1993 therefore I was getting a good press, and people were generally supportive of our initiatives. I might add at this point that Secretary of State Christopher decided that Cliff Wharton wouldn't work out as new Deputy Secretary. So Christopher was looking for a Deputy Secretary. I'm just giving you the general rhythm of the administration, but it reflected the fact that Christopher and the White House were happy about how things were going in Asia at that point.

As I say, at the end of 1993 Secretary Christopher was looking for a Deputy. I know for a fact that the choice came down to Strobe Talbot or myself. Indeed, at one point Elaine Sciolino from the "New York Times" called me and said that the "Times" was going to run an article on the following day, saying that I had been chosen to be Deputy Secretary of State. I said: "Well, you know something that I don't know," and I steered her away from that. This was just as well, as the story was not accurate.

One semi-amusing comment here. I was told by someone very close to Secretary Christopher that the choice was between Talbot and myself and over the following weekend Christopher was reportedly going to choose between Talbot and myself. One thing that he doesn't do, unless it involves a crisis, is that he doesn't bother you on weekends. He's not like Kissinger, who might go out of his way to contact you on weekends, if he possibly could. It was very unusual for Christopher to call you on weekends. He might call you on Saturday morning, if you're in the office or he sees you. Otherwise, you don't generally get a call from Christopher over the weekend. He would say to himself: "This can wait till Monday."

So I went into the weekend, knowing that the choice was probably between Talbot and me and against this background of Christopher's habit of never calling on weekends. At about 6:00 or 7:00 PM on Sunday night a call came through that Secretary of State Christopher was calling me. So I sort of looked at my watch and thought that I might be asked to be Deputy Secretary at about 6:50 PM on such and such a date.

What Christopher discussed with me was some press report on China. It was not all that important or urgent and could have waited until the next morning. We discussed this report for about ten minutes. I kept waiting for the other shoe to drop. Not only did I know that he was making up his mind on his deputy but I also knew that he knew that I knew! So here we had this ten minute conversation about some relatively modest issue about China. He got to the end of it, said: "Thank you," and hung up. I was totally puzzled. In any event, I found later that Christopher had chosen Strobe Talbot instead of me. He called me finally in Vail, Colorado.

Frankly, and this may sound amazing, I was not that disappointed. First of all, I thought very highly of Strobe Talbot. I'm not just being polite for the record. Secondly, I really liked what I was doing and had my teeth sunk into the job. Obviously, on balance I would have preferred to have been selected as Deputy Secretary of State. However, I've always had some anxiety levels as I've moved up, so I had mixed feelings about the resolution of this issue.

Q: [Kennedy] Well, I'm trying to get a feel about the inner workings of the bureaucracy and do not want to criticize anybody. However, what was your impression and the word as to why the relationship between Cliff Wharton and Christopher hadn't worked out?

LORD: Well, I had known Cliff Wharton as a Director of the Council on Foreign Relations. He is a very able man. I think that the conventional wisdom is true, in that Christopher didn't think that Wharton had all of that much experience on foreign policy and that he wanted either Peter Tarnoff, Tom Pickering, or somebody else as his number two man in the State Department. I think that it actually was Tom Pickering's name which was floated around most often at the time. However, the White House, with its laudatory goal of increasing diversity in the administration, put considerable pressure on Christopher to choose Wharton, who is an African-American. You'd have to ask Christopher if this is true, but I got that feeling. So I don't think that Wharton was Christopher's first choice to be Deputy Secretary.

All of us have strengths and weaknesses. I think that Cliff had served in AID [Agency for International Development], but he was not a bureaucratic jungle fighter and wasn't all that decisive. I just think that Christopher needed more support, and Wharton wasn't working out in the job. I think that Wharton wasn't all that happy, either, as Deputy Secretary. It is a little awkward for me to discuss this matter, and I think that you ought to talk to the people most directly involved. I must say that Wharton is an extremely decent guy. I think that Christopher needed more decisive, stronger support and that he, Christopher, found that he couldn't successfully delegate key issues to him.

I don't mean to digress too much on this Deputy Secretary issue. I believe that if you are detached about it, strictly in terms of foreign policy resume, mine was probably more impressive than Talbot's, because he had only worked for the government for a year. He had done extremely well as a special representative on the Soviet Union. However, he didn't have the equivalent of my experience on foreign policy, although he had a very impressive resume in other ways. But he had shown in one year that he was terrific on policy making and on dealing with the bureaucracy, as well as on substance. Above all, he was very close to the President, which I felt was valuable for Christopher. I thought that that would be very helpful for Christopher in dealing with the White House and the President. So I thought that on those grounds, as well as Talbot's other qualities, he was a very sensible choice.

Anyway, Talbot is so decent a person that he would handle his close relationship with the President and serving Christopher with great skill, and he did so. In short, he was an asset for Christopher in terms of the White House, but he clearly never played Christopher off against the President and never used his White House connection to Christopher's disadvantage. He retained enormous respect from Christopher and from the President. He did an excellent job and has done so ever since. He is just a great human being. I would say that off the record as well as on the record.

This is more or less by way of telling the good news in a general way on the first year foreign policy - and my reputation - in the Clinton Administration. Now I'll get to the bad news. As I said, during the first year of the Clinton administration I think that people felt, and I felt also, that we were off to a good start. Then we ran into some trouble, no question about it, in the first few months of 1994. Several things conspired to produce this result.

First, and I'll go into more detail on Japan, but what dominated the public and media perception of Japan policy was trade disputes with that country. I'll get into that later. Basically, the conventional wisdom or the view of the hard liners in economics was that we ought to confront the Japanese on these matters. But even those who were worried about the balance of payments deficit or market access felt that all of this noise and dispute with Japan was dominating what after all was our most important partnership. One way or another many thought we were hurting relations.

Secondly, at the same time, we had this reversal on MFN [Most Favored Nation] status for China. We had the unfortunate trip by Secretary Christopher to China in March, 1994, and then the President changed his position on MFN conditionality. It is now called "Normal Trade Relations" or "NTR," instead of MFN, which is what it was called at the time. So we were embarrassed on that front and weren't making a great deal of progress with China. Therefore, it looked as if we weren't doing very well with China. People like Kissinger and other Republicans in particular said that we weren't giving enough emphasis to strategic dialogue and that we were too focused on human rights. At the same time, the human rights people, including some in Congress, were unhappy that we had reversed our policy on MFN. So there was considerable criticism of how we were handling the China relationship.

In addition, in the early months of 1994, the Korean issue heated up. The North Koreans were threatening to leave the NPT.

Q: [Kennedy] NPT is the Non Proliferation Treaty.

LORD: Yes. There was a lot of to-ing and fro-ing about IAEA [International Atomic Energy Agency] inspections of North Korean nuclear facilities. So we had a buildup of tension on the Korean front. And trouble with our two biggest partners in Asia, Japan and China. You put all of this together, and there was considerable criticism of our Asia policy. This became increasingly personal. With respect to the MFN reversal - I'll discuss in detail later - people were looking for scapegoats. Clearly, I was a likely target. I had been in favor of conditional MFN extension and I had advised President Clinton to that effect. I was Assistant Secretary for East Asian Affairs, including China, and so there was a lot of press backgrounding and even foregrounding, particularly by the representatives of our economic agencies, that I had not consulted enough with them and had sort of screwed things up. There was an article in "Newsweek" with my picture asking: "Is Lord about to be fired?" So this was not the happiest time of my career.

I obviously thought, at the time, that although we had some problems, they were manageable. There was also the debate at the time about Asian values. There was a conference in Vienna about Asian values versus universal values.

Q: [Kennedy] Could you explain what that distinction means?

On China, I think that if we had it all to do over again, we probably shouldn't have had conditional MFN renewal. But we were in a box in 1993 because of the President's campaign positions. I also think that it might have worked. I think that in 1993 we got the best possible outcome, given the President's campaign rhetoric. The compromise that we got from Congresswoman Pelosi, Senator Mitchell, and others, the yardsticks for Chinese improvement were realistic. If we had not been undercut by the economic agencies of the U.S. Government and our business community, we might have worked this out.

Nevertheless, China policy was looking rocky. During the summer of 1993, State drafted a strategy paper which we sent on to the White House. I had a lot to do with drafting it. (End of tape)

We had drafted this paper on the strategy of engagement with China. It essentially presaged our future policy and was approved by the White House in September 1993. We were trying to be more closely engaged with them. I felt that some of the critics who said that we hadn't engaged in enough strategic dialogue with China didn't appear to realize that we weren't exactly talking to Zhou En-lai and others of the older generation of Chinese leaders. However, I understood that we needed to straighten out China policy in some respects. In the case of Korea we had inherited a very difficult problem from the previous administration, and there weren't very many good choices available to us. So I felt that we were doing the best we could on that front, and we were negotiating rather than selling out to North Korea or going to war with it on the nuclear issue.

More importantly, I believe that we were making progress on other issues that had been lost sight of. We will go into all of these issues in more detail. We were already moving ahead toward normalization of diplomatic relations with the Socialist Republic of Vietnam. We had raised APEC to the leaders' level, with all of the positive implications of that. We were moving ahead with APEC as a major instrument of free trade and investment. We had begun to launch regional security dialogues, which I thought were important.

Nevertheless, having said all of that, both in terms of reality and certainly in terms of perception, the early months of 1994 were certainly the nadir of my tenure as Assistant Secretary for East Asian and Pacific Affairs. But, during the rest of 1994 and later, we really began to pick up again. I'm trying to be as detached as I can in this respect. Perhaps this was less so in the case of China, but we got beyond the initial MFN dispute and began to have more visits and to work on a broader agenda. With Japan we negotiated several trade agreements, the trade deficit began to go down, and we were stepping up our dialogue, working with Joe Nye of the Department of Defense on security issues. We were beginning to make progress on that.

In October, 1994, we negotiated the Korean Nuclear Accord, a framework agreement which was a major step forward. We made much further progress on relations with Vietnam and moved ahead on that. In July, 1994, not only did the regional security dialogue move ahead but we created the ASEAN [Association of Southeast Asian Nations] Forum, which brought five new countries, including China, Russia, and Vietnam into this security dialogue. That was a significant step forward.

Q: [Kennedy] That happens.

LORD: It happens, particularly when a memo is critical of what you are doing. So I can understand that accusation, however wrong. That's just a sidebar.

First, the memo did lay out where things were going well. I thought that this was only fair. I didn't want to get everyone too depressed, and so I pointed out where things were going well, along the lines which I have mentioned, even then, in the spring of 1994. But then I spent the bulk of the memo saying that we were having some problems, what they were, and why we had them. Honestly, I haven't looked at this memo for a couple of years.

Some people thought that this memo was written as a part of the China policy debate and before the MFN decision. It was about that time, though I can't remember exactly when it was. It wasn't primarily about China, though it included China. Basically, I talked both fundamental issues as well as stylistic problems. On China I believed we needed more strategic dialogue and to expand our agenda.

However, the memo wasn't written primarily because of China. China was one of our problems. Basically, my view was that we have to broaden our agenda with China. Human rights are still crucial, but we have to talk about a lot of these other issues, like Korea and so on, as part of a broader agenda.

On Japan we were already working with the Department of Defense on the need for stepping up our visible as well as our invisible security dialogue.

But the news focused on broad themes, not specific policies. I went through the various issues before us. There was a general theme of getting more multilateral support. I focused on this and the Asian values issue. I also emphasized that we should act without arrogance. With other nations, I thought we should appeal to self-interest themes.

I talked about style generally with the Asians and how we had to be respectful without rolling over. I don't recall everything that I said but I did talk about our stylistic approach, and the need for greater Congressional and media attention. I covered a lot of issues in this comprehensive memo. I was trying to get us on a more positive track, both in terms of substance and in terms of perception.

I think that the memo was pretty useful. It was designed to encourage a debate on these issues. When the memo leaked, a lot of people felt that I was covering my flank or other parts of my anatomy by criticizing the Clinton administration on our policy. This was nonsense, because I had helped to fashion it. I didn't always succeed in this regard, because, frankly, we didn't have control of Japan policy in the early period of the Clinton administration. There were some problems. However, I was basically being self critical, too, pointing to areas where we could do better. It would be nonsense to say, at least of policy toward East Asia, that our problems were everyone else's fault, not mine.

So that was one thing that I did in the spring of 1994 when we had problems in Asia.

The other thing that I did was to convene the Chiefs of Mission conference of 1994. These meetings are sometimes pretty routine, but we did a lot of work on this meeting. Everyone was there from all our posts and from various agencies in Washington, bringing up problems and suggestions. Again, this happened in June 1994. That meeting was important in getting ideas on how we should approach things. People then went back to their post, sometimes instituting a new style and approaches.

So I think that those two efforts were fairly important.

Q: [Kennedy] Well, regarding the memo, you can write one, but the question is: "What came back?"

LORD: What came back was discussions with Secretary Christopher and others in Washington regarding the memo. I can't remember whether we had a special meeting called to discuss it. However, there was a very enthusiastic response in terms of providing intellectual grist for the mill. I also invited comments from our Embassies and asked them to reply to the points made in the memo. There was very good dialogue with our posts.

I can't quantify the impact the memo had. First of all, I am very careful to avoid claiming that this memo turned around our Asian policy. I don't think that things were that bad, as some people thought. Secondly, our policy would have been turned around to some extent, as you always learn on the job. The whole Clinton administration was learning and adjusting. But I think that the memo had some influence, and in fact that we began to pick up speed. In the subsequent months, there were adjustments in our approach as recommended in my memo and other papers we wrote. By itself, this memo wasn't going to solve the Korean nuclear problem or some of the other issues I mentioned. However, I think that the memo underlined the need for greater emphasis to our China policy in the sense of the need to broaden our agenda. I think that it underlined the need for having other elements in our Japan policy. I think that, stylistically, we adjusted our tone somewhat in the region. I did that by constant iteration and instructions in this regard.

Speaking generally, I think that this memo got people thinking, although I can't quantify to what extent. I got some very good feedback on it from various people. As I said, there was some criticism from people outside the State Department who said that it was designed to have a self serving purpose at a time when I felt defensive about where we were. But people in the government bureaucracy and at our overseas posts tended to think that it was a very useful exercise. In most cases people agreed with its main themes.

Recently, I received a copy of the memo as published in a Japanese newspaper. I enclose it here for the record, as published.

Washington - The following is a letter Winston Lord, Assistant Secretary of State, submitted to Secretary of State Warren Christopher:

Subject: Emerging Malaise in our Relations with Asia

When this Administration took office, the fundamental challenge in the Asia-Pacific region was to raise the region's profile in our foreign policy. We sought to highlight the stakes for our domestic audience and convince Asians of our staying power.

(1) In the first year, we have succeeded - through the travels of the President, yourself and others; high level bilateral meetings; major speeches setting forth the vision of a pacific community; maintenance of our military presence; the APEC leaders meeting; promotion of regional security dialogues; forward movement with Vietnam; staunch support for a democratic Cambodia; modest improvement of ties with Indonesia and Malaysia; reinforcement of relations with Australia on arms control, regional security and APEC; and a change in our contacts policy for New Zealand.

(2) Now, we face a fresh, growing, more complex challenge. With our Asia-Pacific partners more persuaded of our long term engagement, they now are beginning to resist the nature of that engagement. A series of American measures threatened or employed, risk corroding our positive image in the region, giving ammunition to those charging we are an international nanny, if not bully. Without proper course, adjustments, we could subvert our influence and our interests.

(3) The malaise

This spring, the positive Pacific community principles articulated by the President in Seattle are being crowded out by a plethora of problems which Asians perceive as caused by hostile unilateral U.S. actions. These are creating a sense of resentment and apprehension in our relations with the region - and also engendering some tension within the Administration.

(4) Central to this malaise are the problems in our two principal Asian relationships.

(5) Japan and China.

We view these as arising from the unwillingness of Japan and China to conform their policies to international norms. Asian, and others, view us as placating domestic interest groups and criticize us for tactics that destabilize relationships which are central to the region's peace and prosperity.

There are a host of other frictions. Our attempt to interject workers rights issues into the world trade organization has been universally opposed by Asians and non-Asians alike (France being the major exception). It threatens (threatened?) to mar the APEC Trade Ministers meeting in Marrakesh. We have sanctioned China on the MTCR, and Thailand for Libya. We just announced sanctions on Taiwan regarding endangered species. We have decertified Laos on narcotics, although granting them a national interest waiver softened the blow. We continue to press Malaysia and Indonesia on workers' rights and Singapore on its flogging sentence against an American teenager. We disagree with almost all Asians about the proper tactics for promoting reform in Burma. In varying degrees our promotion of human rights and democracy complicates our ties with several nations.

This is not to suggest that such policies are basically wrong. We have a right and a duty to pursue our interests and reflect our values. Moreover, one should not judge success by an absence of friction; harmony sometimes is purchased by paper over differences, risking larger problems down the road. Some of the frictions can be viewed as inevitable bumps in the road. The confluence of these individual issues, however, has fostered malaise, eroding the sense of optimism and partnership forged in Seattle.

In brief, the Asia-Pacific region presents in acute form a general challenge for American foreign policy. How do we reconcile our competing goals in a post cold war agenda when security concerns no longer lend us a clear hierarchy?

Q: [Kennedy] While we're on the subject of a Chiefs of Mission conference, how did you feel about Ambassadorial appointments to your area? A new administration had come in, and they had political payoffs and all of that to consider in making such appointments. How did you feel that you came out?

LORD: I felt that we won some and we lost some. I made a real effort, both on the merits, to get the best people as Ambassadors, and, in terms of morale in the Bureau, to get as many outstanding senior Foreign Service Officers who had served the Department loyally, preferably in the Asian-Pacific region. I think, on the whole, that I did well in this regard, over the course of two, three, or four years. I can't quantify this. Naturally we didn't always get the Ambassadors that we wanted, but I felt that, with one or two exceptions, I had a full crack at getting our views across.

Sometimes Ambassadorial appointments depended on the White House and sometimes it was up to the Seventh Floor of the Department of State. However, more often than not, we managed to get good people assigned as Ambassadors who deserved appointment. I say this without being critical of my predecessor, there was a feeling that, in recent years, not too much attention has been paid to this. It's one thing to nominate someone as Ambassador. It's another thing to get into a bloody fight to make sure the appointment is made, including lobbying people on the Seventh Floor of the Department and/or the White House.

I spent quite a bit of time on this matter. I believed that, on the whole, we had been successful in making pretty good appointments overseas, and I felt that I won more than I lost. Of course, I welcomed truly qualified political appointees - such as Mondale to Japan - so long as the percentage was not high.

I will just finish up this overview now, and then we'll go into issues in more depth. I felt that in particular, we had some pluses and some minuses in our policies in 1995. Our experience in 1996 was very good on the whole. There were several developments in this connection that made me feel very good. One of the reasons that I left office at the end of the first Clinton term was that I felt that our Asia-Pacific policy was in good shape.

In 1995, by the way, we normalized diplomatic relations with Vietnam and opened up an American Embassy in Hanoi. That was a major step forward.

We will discuss developments with China in 1996. In the spring was the Taiwan missile crisis and other issues included intellectual property rights, nuclear proliferation problems, and human rights issues. By the end of the year, we had gone from crisis to genuine, major progress. Secretary of State Christopher went back to China in November, 1996. This was a very successful trip, and set up subsequent summits. I had worked on this with Tony Lake [National Security Adviser] in a July 1996 trip. The future summit meetings were announced at the Manila APEC meeting at the end of 1996. So relations with China were on a positive track.

With Japan we had President Clinton's trip in the spring of 1996. I think that this was one of the best prepared and most successful summit meetings which I had ever been involved with regarding any country during my whole experience with foreign affairs. This trip reaffirmed and updated the alliance after the Cold War. It closed with a major joint statement on our partnership, the defusing of the Okinawa rape incident, which we'll get back to, and the strengthening of the U.S.-Japan Security Treaty. This involved working on new defense guidelines that would update our treaty and clarify how we would work together on various regional, as well as bilateral, security problems. This was a very successful trip which made me feel particularly good, given the importance which I attached to Japan and the problems which we had during the first couple of years of the first Clinton term. This was the fruit of a dialogue for which I give Joe Nye and Kurt Campbell [of the U.S. Defense Department] full credit. Nye and I, as well as our deputies, had worked closely together on security issues, which resulted in some of these results. Full credit also goes to Secretary of Defense Perry, who did an outstanding job, particularly on the Okinawa rape issue, on which he and Ambassador Mondale also worked very hard.

So I thought that relations with China and Japan were both on the right track.

On Korea, the Agreed Framework which we had negotiated in 1994 was still holding up in 1996. By then, and after considerable effort, we had launched Four-Power Talks [involving the U.S., China, North Korea, and South Korea]. So the situation in Korea was looking good. We had some tensions with our South Korean friends, but we were able to ease them.

By 1996 APEC had gone through several meetings with national leaders and had become an institution. We had free trade and investment goals announced in APEC in 1994 and made good progress in succeeding years. These were major objectives which, in turn, inspired the countries of the Americas to move toward free trade, and so on. So APEC was well established. Regional security dialogues, notably the ASEAN regional forum, were moving ahead as well.

Cambodia was still holding up. We had improved our relations with New Zealand, as I said, and strengthened relations with Australia.

In short, I believed that by the end of the first Clinton term we were in good shape in these countries, and in the regional generally. Of course we had made some mistakes, especially early on, but I was pleased with the progress over the four years, both on specific issues and on elevating the region on our foreign policy agenda. The overall record stacked up quite well with the goals and my March 1993 Senate statement.

Now, of course, I was also fortunate in the timing of my departure, since we had a domestic scandal [Monica Lewinsky affair] in the White House, which emerged after I left and increasingly preoccupied the President and his people and caused problems back home. There was also, of course, the major Asian financial and economic crisis which also broke soon after I left the government.

Q: [Kennedy] All right. Can we just discuss one question? There was sort of a political earthquake in the United States resulting from the Congressional elections of 1994, when the Republicans gained control of both the House of Representatives and the Senate. The new Congressional leaders brought in very much of a conservative agenda. It seemed as if the Clinton administration was greatly weakened. Was there any sort of conservative focus to this development?

LORD: That's a very good question. I would say that, for a variety of reasons, it didn't have any major impact on our Asian policies. There is no question that it had a tremendous impact on political alignments in the United States. I haven't thought about this systematically, but it might have had some impact on other foreign policy issues.

Regarding Asia, this change in Congress didn't really hurt us. First, the bad news was that generally we saw people emerge in Congress who were less interested and less informed on foreign policy. This was continuing an established trend. We had people coming into Congress who didn't have a passport. When Congressmen go overseas, which I think they should do, most of them work hard. They get unfairly criticized in the "Washington Post" for going on boondoggle trips. I think that there were two or three Republican Congressmen who boasted that they hadn't been overseas since the late 1980s. This was a ridiculous situation, in terms of ignorance. This resulted in problems caused more by ignorance than ideology.

Having said that, I found that most of the issues that I dealt with involved contact with the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, the House of Representatives Foreign Affairs Committee, and particularly the sub-committees dealing with Asia. We found very responsible leadership in these committees, which continued when they were taken over by Republicans. We saw Senator Thomas come in as Chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Sub-Committee on Asia and Congressman Bereuter as Chairman of the House Sub-Committee on Asia. They were both bipartisan, serious people with whom I was able to work extremely well, as I did with their predecessors, Senator Robb and Congressman Ackerman.

We were fortunate in the people who were chosen to serve on the key sub-committees on Asia. We were also fortunate that there wasn't that much controversy over Asian problems. We had problems throughout with a guerrilla minority on the Hill dealing with Vietnam. The other part of the problem with Vietnam involved the White House. The biggest part of the problem was political skittishness of the NSC and the White House, rather than Congress. That situation didn't change. It was there anyway.

The Korean Framework Agreement was generally approved, but funding problems emerged as we went on, but this wasn't any particular reflection of the 1994 elections. Problems with the Framework Agreement were more the result of North Korea being such an unattractive, opaque, and lousy regime. No one liked to make deals that were less than perfect with the North Koreans.

On China the MFN debate, no matter who controls Congress, given China's policies on other issues such as human rights, trade, Tibet, or nuclear non-proliferation, always presented problems. I don't think that this problem was appreciably worsened by the results of the elections of 1994.

On Japan many Congresspeople continued to think that we should be firmer on economic issues. Then, as we began to have more positive security relationships with Japan, that wasn't much of a problem.

This is a long way of saying that the elections of 1994 were of major significance in terms of domestic policy and maybe some foreign policy issues, but not in terms of Asian issues that could really hurt us. Ironically, I think that most people would say that in general the Clinton administration on foreign policy, and certainly Secretary of State Christopher, with his reputation, did much better during the final two years of the first Clinton term than during the first two years.

This was an interesting phenomenon. At the outset of the Administration, you had the stumbling over Haiti, Somalia, and Bosnia, as well as some of the Asian problems that we had during the first two years of the first Clinton term. Obviously, there could be criticism of many foreign policy issues, but I think generally that most fair-minded people, and even Clinton's fiercest critics, would say that by the end of 1996 our foreign policy situation looked a lot better than it did at the end of 1994. This was despite the fact that Congress was going in the opposite direction during the period 1994-1996. Now, how you put those two trends together is somewhat ironic. So, the fact that we faced a new, less attractive, and less informed Congress did not particularly hurt our foreign policy. The Clinton Administration ultimately got its act together, gained more experience, and changed some policies. We did a better job on Asia, as a whole, during the last two years of the first Clinton term than during the first two years.

Q: Could you talk about China as you described it to candidate Clinton? Also, did China come up as an issue during the 1992 presidential election campaign?

LORD: The answer is "Yes, of course." As we get into this more current period on China, let me say that, from the beginning, I was, of course, a strong believer in engaging China. The United States and China are two great nations looking to the next century. From the American national interest and in the global and regional interests, they need to work together.

At the same time I've never had any illusions about the difficulties of doing this. Nor the fact that, throughout these years and as far ahead as I can see, the relationship between the United States and China will be periodically sweet and sour, if I may use this expression.

Two of the more important people in my life on various China issues have been Henry Kissinger and my wife. Of course, in many ways my head is with Kissinger, but my heart is with my wife, in every way, but including China in particular. What I mean by that is the following.

Particularly when I was younger and working with Kissinger, my overwhelming emphasis then was on geopolitics. I don't recall focusing as much on human rights, trade, and other matters. I continue to share Kissinger's view of the strategic importance of the relationship between China and the United States. However, frankly, and he would admit this, too, we had somewhat of a parting of the ways on China, not so much personally but conceptually, since the Tiananmen Square massacre [of 1989]. Therefore, I agree with Kissinger on the one hand, in the sense that I agree on the importance of engagement with China and that was the basic approach of the Clinton administration. However, I assign a higher priority to human rights than Kissinger does, both generally and in foreign policy terms, and specifically on China. Not only because of the virtues and values of human rights and idealism and the need to maintain Congressional and domestic support, but also because I think that it is in China's self interest to emphasize respect for human rights.

I believe that China cannot develop its economy without a freer society, especially in the age of information. I think that it is in China's interests in terms of maintaining stability for the Chinese people to be able to express themselves peacefully. With unemployment and other pressures, there will be instability in China. If there is no room for peaceful dissent, then people will take to the streets. For all of these reasons I think that the protection and promotion of human rights should be an important part of our policy.

However, I do not go as far in this direction as my wife, who also agrees with the concept of engagement with China. From the beginning, she supported the opening toward China and still does. Nevertheless, she believes that human rights must be a centerpiece of our policies toward China. She wouldn't hold the whole relationship with China hostage to human rights, but she would be much more apt to go slow and be tougher unless there is more progress made in China in the area of human rights.

So, therefore, I don't believe in holding back the development of the Chinese-American relationship because of the human rights situation in China as much as my wife would favor. However, I would certainly put more stress on human rights and be less defensive about the Chinese than Henry Kissinger and, say, the great bulk of the American business community and experts on China. So much for the general background.

Now, I will start after the Tiananmen Square massacre, which I have covered.

Regarding the Tiananmen Square massacre, I was not shocked in the sense that I knew that the Chinese authorities could be brutal. But of course, I was very distressed by what the Chinese authorities did in Tiananmen Square, which was totally unnecessary in my view. The demonstrations were fading away.

Q: This was in June...

LORD: June, 1989. Coincidentally, I had left China on April 22, 1989, when the Tiananmen demonstrations were just beginning to take place, a week after the death of Hu Yaobang and the day of his funeral, when the first big crowd of about 100,000 people assembled in Beijing.

I returned to the United States as the news of the Tiananmen Square demonstrations grew and I was therefore immediately invited to appear on television and speak to other news outlets in May, June, and July, 1989. As I said, I had left China in mid-April, 1989. Obviously, I supported what the Bush Administration was doing at the time. However, I was very tough on the Chinese authorities, even though I believed very strongly in the development of our relations with China, where I had just been Ambassador. Like other observers, I was hopeful about how the situation would turn out. I thought that the demands of the demonstrators in Tiananmen Square were reasonable. I thought that the Chinese Government's solution to this incident was brutal and unnecessarily so, because the crowds were dispersing when the crackdown took place. In my view, this situation could have been solved peacefully. So, in my comments on this incident, I was very critical of the Chinese authorities.

Nevertheless, I still believed that we had to deal with China and had to keep moving ahead in developing the Sino-American relationship. I thought that we should react strongly to this incident in a rhetorical sense and apply sanctions for what the Chinese authorities had done.

The approximate sequence of events was as follows. I had left China as Ambassador in April, 1989. After a short interval my wife was commenting on CBS [Columbia Broadcasting System] television, identified only as an author. During the summer of 1989 I wrote an article for "Foreign Affairs" magazine, entitled "Beyond the 'Big Chill,'" which was published in September, 1989. In that article, as I say, I was very tough on the Chinese authorities. I said that they needed to move toward greater freedom. I said how unnecessary all of this repressive action had been. But I also made a strong case for holding the Chinese-American relationship together and continuing to move ahead.

At this point the Bush Administration had been relatively firm in its response to events in China, although, even then, not enough to my liking. Its public rhetoric was relatively too moderate, but the administration had taken certain steps involving some sanctions. At that point I was unaware of the secret visit by Brent Scowcroft [National Security Adviser] to China only a week after the Tiananmen Square massacre.

I showed my article for "Foreign Affairs" to Dick Solomon on the NSC staff, just for his ideas but not in the sense of any censorship. We had worked together. The fact remained that my article was very tough on the Chinese and maybe tougher than the Bush administration wanted. However, it was also very positive about forward engagement and was supportive of the Bush Administration's general policy line. So there wasn't any real daylight between my position and that of the administration. I thought that administration officials were fairly happy with the article. However, whether they were happy with it or not wasn't the point. I was simply expressing my views.

Over the next couple of years the MFN issue as it related to China began to be debated every spring.

Q: MFN means...

LORD: Most Favored Nation. It is renewed every year because of the Jackson-Vanik Amendment. The President is required by this legislation to certify that emigration from China [and other communist countries] is relatively free, which it has been, despite all of the other things the Chinese have done. We could conscientiously say that this was so. Nevertheless, we could only renew MFN for a year at a time, because China didn't have permanent, MFN status. I won't go into all of the details of MFN.

I don't have the exact chronology before me. I don't remember whether this issue came up in 1989 or whether it was too late by then to consider whether to extend MFN status for China. In 1990 I did not favor placing conditions on the MFN status for China and certainly was not in favor of revoking it. I have never favored revoking MFN status. However, as the years went by, I felt that the Bush Administration was overly soft on China, even though I believed in engagement. I thought that we had allowed the pendulum to swing too far in the other direction. I was getting increasingly restless about what I thought was an overly compliant posture toward China.

Then, it was publicly announced that Brent Scowcroft had been to China in December 1989. Scowcroft was pictured exchanging toasts with a senior Chinese official, whose name I don't recall. Scowcroft also made, in my view, some ill-considered remarks on this occasion. This was sort of the last straw for my growing impatience with the Bush Administration's posture on China. Again, I'm not against engagement with China. I am not one of those right wingers or left wingers who care only about human rights. However, in terms of respect for the Chinese people, the world, our values, and our interests, I thought that we had to take a stronger stand. I began to get more dissatisfied with the posture of the Bush Administration. In fact, the Scowcroft trip pushed me over the edge, as it were. I wrote a very strong op ed [published opposite the editorial page] piece about the Scowcroft trip which was published in the "Washington Post."

I knew of the Scowcroft trip and wrote this article in a few days. I learned just after I published the piece that Scowcroft had not only visited China in December but also in July a week after the massacre. Had I known that, I would have adopted an even stronger posture. Given my past service as Ambassador and association with Scowcroft and others, my article made quite a splash. From then on I began to express a more critical view of the administration but hopefully not nasty or partisan. I kept saying that engagement with China was important and continued to sound that theme. Moreover - I don't remember the exact sequence of events - either when asked for my comments or when testifying before Congress, I said that I was not in favor of revoking MFN status for China or placing conditions on granting MFN status in 1990.

I believe that by 1991, or certainly by 1992, when I was asked to testify before Congress, I modified my position. I felt that, on the one hand, we should not revoke MFN status for China. MFN status is really normal and available to almost all countries, including terrible regimes. More importantly, I thought that there was much substance to the argument that you can encourage a society by engagement and by opening up our relations. If we cut off MFN status, we would be cutting off the reformers and business people who were working in the direction we wished. This would also hurt American business interests and legitimate concerns, both in terms of our exports to China and imports from China of cheaper goods for our blue collar people who buy textiles, shoes, sneakers, toys, and so on. This would also hurt innocent bystanders, particularly Hong Kong and also Taiwan, if we cut off MFN status for China. Cutting off MFN status would be too blunt an instrument to express our displeasure with what China had done. Such action would put us in confrontation with China, when I still believed in engagement. On the other hand, I was increasingly frustrated with what I thought was the overly soft approach toward China by the Bush Administration and the fact that we didn't seem to have any leverage with China.

Q: You say: "...with some reluctance?"

LORD: With some reluctance, I modified my stance. I didn't favor China's losing MFN [Most Favored Nation] status. I came out in favor of what I considered modest conditions for an extension of MFN status for China. The point here was to lay out some objectives, sufficiently concrete to be meaningful, but not so specific and detailed that we would box ourselves in. We needed to have some flexibility on how we would interpret making progress. So my basic position was that we needed some leverage to make progress which would not lose MFN status for China for all of the reasons that I've mentioned. However, by setting some modest conditions, that would give the Chinese some incentive to make progress. They could do enough to meet our conditions but not so much so that they would have grounds for worrying about instability or risking their control of the situation. At least we would have some leverage on the Chinese because of their huge trade surplus with the U.S. and because of the importance of trade to them.

Therefore, I advocated modest, not heavy but realistic conditions concerning progress in human rights, which they could meet in the course of a year. I reluctantly decided that this was the next step in trying to find a way to move the Chinese on this issue.

Q: You've been a Washington operator. Where did you feel that the thrust for this sort of business as usual attitude or policy on the part of the Bush administration was coming from? Bush had been the Chief of the U.S. Liaison Office in Beijing.

LORD: I thought that this attitude came directly from President Bush himself, related to his time in China and elsewhere. This was proven to me in connection with the Fang Lizhi incident, which we covered. Basically, he blamed me and the Embassy, instead of blaming the Chinese for their outrageous behavior. I was careful not to let my personal animus against him and Brent Scowcroft [National Security Adviser] get in the way of my policy prescriptions.

It was clear to me, in view of President Bush's supine reaction to the Fang Lizhi incident, that this kind of attitude toward the Chinese was coming from him.

And I figured that Brent Scowcroft shared Bush's view. Secretary of State Baker was more politically attuned and kept his head down on China, because he knew it was not popular in Congress and among the public more generally, although he got more involved later on. So Baker was a little bit more nuanced in his approach. Certainly, I thought, Bush and Scowcroft were soft on China. That's why I gave you a little bit of philosophy in the beginning of this segment. I believe strongly in engagement with China. I think that it's phony to debate isolation versus engagement. I think that you can have engagement of a hard headed nature. You can be firm with the Chinese and keep your powder dry, but also have a broad agenda of positive things to accomplish. You should hold firmly to human rights but should not let human rights hold the relationship between China and the United States hostage. I just felt that the balance in this relationship had been upset by the Bush approach.

So in careful congressional testimony I laid out this rationale for a modest position on MFN extension. This would be enough to induce progress but not so much as to risk losing MFN extension. I figured that the economic interest for China was enough to make this approach work.

I was equally strong against either extreme: either revoking MFN or placing heavy conditions, on the one hand, or business as usual and not stepping up some of the pressures on China, on the other hand.

My view probably also came to the attention of the prospective Clinton Administration, which was looking for a policy on MFN extension. They were not happy with the position of the Bush administration.

Now, in the course of the Presidential election campaign of 1992 candidate Clinton used very strong language. He was tough on President Bush's position on China saying Bush had allegedly coddled dictators, or whatever the language was that he used. I was not consulted on the language he used in his speeches. I thought that it was excessive. Even though I myself was frustrated by what the Bush administration was doing, I had never gone as far as candidate Clinton went. I thought that Clinton went too far.

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: Do you know where the language used by Clinton came from?

LORD: No. I don't want to be disingenuous. I was not unhappy that Clinton was being critical of the Bush approach. I was not happy with it myself. However, I was not consulted and did not help to write the language which Clinton used on China during the campaign. I would not have gone that far myself, because when you become President, you need more room for maneuver.

So after the New Haven meeting around Labor Day [of 1992] I got a few phone calls on behalf of Clinton from Nancy Soderberg, Sandy Berger, Tony Lake, and so on, asking for my views. I wrote a paper or two. I basically set out various options and recommended the line which I had used in my testimony before Congress, involving setting modest conditions, and I stress the word, modest.

Thus, I advocated conditional MFN extension. So that's where I stood when I ultimately agreed to serve in the incoming Clinton administration.

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: Do you have a sense that Clinton used this attack on President Bush as an important part of his campaign?

LORD: If you are asking whether this issue came up during the 1992 Presidential election campaign, in fact foreign policy was never as big a deal as other issues. Clinton's basic campaign was that President Bush ignored domestic policy. However, in the foreign policy area, I think that it's fair to say that China was one of the three or four topics that Clinton touched on.

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: Right. It's interesting to note, insofar as one can tell, that candidate

Clinton had been to Taiwan when he was Governor of Arkansas. However, he had no real experience with, or interest in, China as such. So were his remarks on China part of his basic view or were they obtained from someone else?

LORD: I think that these views were part of his own convictions. In the first place, then Governor Clinton probably was friendly to Taiwan. However, he wasn't being propelled by a pro-Taiwan outlook. I think that he understood, and certainly this was clear in our conversations, when he asked good questions, that China was important. I want to make clear that in my briefing, and I should have made this point more clearly, that, in addition to coming out modestly for conditional MFN, I placed heavy emphasis on the need to engage China and the importance of moving ahead. In fact, I emphasized that the U.S. and China had many interests in common. I also said that I thought that we had been too soft on the human rights issue and that the granting of conditional MFN was the way to go.

There was more discussion with Clinton in my September 1992 meeting with him, not specifically on MFN, but on the relationship with China and where it had been over the years. That is, what the context was and the importance of moving ahead. So a lot of this discussion was based on that. Clinton asked good questions. I had the feeling that even then, before he was President, he considered that the relationship with China was important. He didn't want to swing all the way over to isolation and containment. He genuinely was concerned about China on human rights grounds. Surely, there was a partisan element in this. This sort of thing happens in every campaign. Clinton saw that Bush was vulnerable on this issue, and it might play well before the American people. I'm sure that that was another factor.

Q: Can you talk about who asked you to be Assistant Secretary of State? Also, can you talk about your confirmation hearings for this position?

LORD: Sure. Warren Christopher, the incoming Secretary of State, called me on the phone. I don't recall the exact date, but it was sometime in December or perhaps January, 1992. The appointment was not announced, I think, until January 20, 1993. When I was nominated to be Ambassador to China, Senator Jesse Helms [Republican, North Carolina] held me up for several months. I had a long wait for confirmation as Ambassador to China. This time the process was easy. My appointment as Assistant Secretary for East Asian and Pacific Affairs was announced on January 20, 1993. My hearings took place about two months later, in March, 1993. Then I was approved, more or less right away. I don't want to get too far away from the China scene. We can get back to my confirmation hearings some other time.

I worked very hard on my opening statement for the confirmation hearings. The Congressional relations people at State didn't want me to make a major statement. They preferred bland opening statements, such as that I was happy to be here, that the appointment as Assistant Secretary of State was a great honor, that I looked forward to working with Congress, etc. Then I could say that I would be happy to take questions from the Senators. Instead, I prepared a broad-ranging speech, including my view on how we should deal with China. I had to fight to give it. After all of the work I had put into the original draft...

Q: Stick with China. Okay.

LORD: Shortly after I was confirmed as Assistant Secretary for East Asian and Pacific Affairs, in fact, within a few weeks, I had to go to Brunei to attend a regional security dialogue.

This was convenient, because I wanted to get overseas quickly on my first overseas trip in my new position. Of course, I thought that it was also important to go to China, particularly since we had the MFN deadline looming. At that point some people even thought that President Clinton might recommend revoking MFN for China. There was a lot of sentiment for revoking MFN or attaching strong conditions to extending it in the Congress, in addition to Clinton's own statements made during the campaign. There were a lot of questions about what President Clinton was going to recommend. For example, was he going to wait until he was close to the June renewal deadline for MFN status for China? It seemed to me, and, of course, Secretary of State Christopher agreed, that I should get out to China and sort of test the waters.

I can't tell you the exact date I went to China on my way to Brunei and a couple of other places. It was in April or May, 1993. While in China I made the point that President Clinton wanted a good relationship with China. I tried to stress some positive elements. I drew on and pointed to my own personal involvement and the experience I had with Secretary Kissinger and then when I served as Ambassador to China.

The Chinese officials I met knew, of course, that I had been critical since the Tiananmen Square massacre [of 1989]. So by this time they had sort of ambivalent feelings toward me, all the more so since my wife had been even more critical and outspoken, even though they had loved her while she was there with me when I was Ambassador to China. So they probably looked at me with some ambivalence. They knew that they would have to deal with me for four years. They were probably concerned about what President Clinton had said in his own campaign in the fall of 1992. They credited me for my role with Nixon and Kissinger and as Ambassador. But for the Chinese conservatives, at least, my interaction with Chinese students and the Fang Lizhi incident had created some concern.

The Chinese basically listened to my presentation, which included a heavy dose of comment on human rights and the need for progress. However, I was careful to cover a broad agenda, including regional and global issues, as well as bilateral problems. I was honestly concerned about the looming deadline on MFN extension to China for another year. Therefore, I made a pitch for progress on that front.

The Chinese gave me a cordial reception, because of my past contributions to Chinese-American relations. A new, American administration was in office, and they wanted to get along with it. They sought to display general courtesy to me. The reception was not as warm and outgoing as it would have been before the Tiananmen Square massacre. It was a perfectly proper reception in terms of whom I saw and so forth. However, the Chinese officials didn't go overboard. The subsequent discussions I had were workmanlike. I didn't expect immediate progress, particularly in the first meeting. I didn't get any sense that there was going to be any movement on the human rights issue in particular. Therefore, while I can't say that I was surprised, I surely wasn't encouraged by this trip to China. Our immediate preoccupation was with the MFN debate, but I was trying to set the stage for the Chinese-American relationship in general.

When I returned to Washington from this trip, of course, we were getting close to the MFN deadline. In the course of May in particular we had to start figuring out what our decision would be. However, it couldn't just be our decision in the State Department or even the White House. Congress was controlled by the Democratic Party. Basically, I handled the key negotiations with Representative Nancy Pelosi [Democrat, California] in the House of Representatives and Senator George Mitchell [Democrat, Maine] on the Senate side. I was the point person for President Clinton, accompanied usually by Wiedemann of the NSC. Of course, we consulted other agencies of the U.S. Government. We weren't just winging this issue on our own. However, I think that it's fair to say that the economic agencies didn't feel that they had had a fair enough crack at the process at that point. They never liked any conditions on MFN. Sandy Berger [Deputy National Security Adviser] was involved, as were several other officials. However, I was essentially the point man who worked this issue out with Representative Pelosi and Senator Mitchell. We had a series of meetings with them and their staffs where we crafted a package that was realistic from the Administration's view and sellable to the Congress at large.

What people now forget is that what we worked out at the time was, on the whole, hailed as a very good outcome. To be sure, the economic agencies of the U.S. Government would have preferred no conditions on MFN extension. They don't like sanctions, they don't like any uncertainties in trade, and all of that. Further, they advanced legitimate arguments on what might result from losing the extension of MFN status to China. The business community in general didn't want any conditions on MFN extension. So they were not happy. However, I think that even the people in the business community and former colleagues of mine like Kissinger (I believe he killed the outcome "statesmanlike") and others were somewhat pleased over how moderate the conditions on MFN extension ultimately were, given the President's campaign and the Congressional mood.

There were plenty of people on the other side of the argument who wanted much tougher conditions on MFN extension or even outright revocation of MFN status. Therefore, when we came out with what were really moderate and realistic conditions, this was hailed in most quarters at the time as a significant success. I'm sure that many people, certainly in Congress, thought that the outcome was much too mild. In the academic community I'm sure that there were some people who were opposed to any conditions at all. Certainly, economic observers didn't want any conditions. However, on the whole, MFN extension with moderate conditions was greeted as a significant achievement. As I recall, most people were pleased because we had headed off MFN revocation or heavy conditions.

The outcome on this issue took into consideration President Clinton's rhetoric in the 1992 campaign, which I thought had been quite heated. However, we had avoided loading on conditions which the Chinese could not realistically meet. Specifically, we came up with two mandatory conditions. First, there was the Jackson-Vanik amendment language, which had always been there and which related to free emigration from China. The other was connected with goods produced by prison labor. We had five other conditions which dealt with prisoners, Tibetan culture, and other matters. In dealing with these conditions we stated that there had to be overall progress on them. We had to be specific enough to make it possible to figure out what we were trying to do but flexible enough to give us some leeway on judgements whether this related to preserving Tibetan culture and history or getting prisoners released. However, we had to avoid being so specific as to put us in a box, by saying something like: You must release 28 prisoners, or something like that.

So we said that there must be significant, overall progress. It wasn't even put in terms that there must be overall progress in each of the five categories. There just had to be overall progress made, whether on each of them, all of them, or some of them. Therefore, there was some judgment calls on what needed to be done, but enough specificity to be credible to our domestic audience and comprehensible to the Chinese.

The feeling was that, with the Chinese stake in this bilateral relationship - and we would stress other parts of the relationship at the same time and work with them on this - there would be enough progress, so that, a year later, we would not have to revoke MFN status for China. We would have made some progress. We could then review the bidding on conditional extension of MFN status and extend, revise, or drop the conditions at that point. However, all of this was contingent on what we hoped and expected would be enough progress as to justify renewing MFN.

Q: Just to get a feel for the political environment in the United States, the Bush administration, which had been a Republican administration, had been castigated for being too soft on China. Was there any significant number of Republicans or conservative Democrats who were in favor of doing something to China?

LORD: There was real doubt about the outcome. It was key that we obtained the support of Representative Pelosi and Senator Mitchell, who were quite outspoken on this issue and carried a majority of their colleagues. There were some people like Senator Helms [Republican, North Carolina] or Congressman Solomon [Republican, New York], and here I'm just picking names out of the air, who either wanted to revoke MFN status for China or attach very heavy conditions on MFN extension. Then there were some Democratic and Republican members of Congress and a lot of Republicans like former Presidents Ford and Bush, who favored MFN extension without conditions. By no means did this category include all Republicans. There were conservative Republicans as well as liberal Democrats who felt strongly about conditioning MFN extension. Some Republicans and a few Democrats, mainly those serving on economic sub-committees and who represented economic interests, didn't want any conditions attached to MFN extension.

The major problem at that point was to avoid having heavy conditions attached to MFN extension, given the sentiment in Congress. The fact that Representative Pelosi and Senator Mitchell agreed to much less than what they had said that they wanted made the job easier for us. They were very statesmanlike, because they didn't want President Clinton to be in a box. As long as some, modest conditions were attached to MFN extension, they would go along with this outcome. When we set out, it was not a foregone conclusion that we would not have either MFN status revoked or have heavy conditions attached to MFN extension. It appeared more likely that heavy conditions would be attached to MFN extension than to have MFN status revoked.

Moreover, we obtained congressional agreement to have this set forth in an Executive Agreement rather than legislation. This gave the President even more flexibility. These were significant achievements, given the political climate.

So at the time our outcome was generally hailed, as was I for my role. This was generally forgotten a year later when President Clinton had to reverse his position on this issue. Frankly, one reason that I received personal praise, as did the Clinton administration at the time from most quarters, although I'm not saying that this was unanimous, was that we were able to have Representative Pelosi and Senator Mitchell deliver the broad, middle ground of people who were critical of China but didn't want to wreck Chinese-American relations. When we got the credentials of Representative Pelosi and Senator Mitchell behind us, we were able to move ahead. There was some grumbling from economic specialists in Congress and a lot of grumbling from those who thought that we had been too soft on China. However, Pelosi and Mitchell gave us the necessary cover...

Q: Senator Mitchell was the Democratic majority leader in the Senate. However, Representative Pelosi...

LORD: She was a member of the House Foreign Affairs Committee. She is from San Francisco, represented a lot of Chinese in her district, and always has been very outspoken in favor of Chinese dissidents and scholars. She had regularly urged President Clinton to be firm with the Chinese authorities.

Both Representative Pelosi and Senator Mitchell were very responsible in their attitudes on this issue. I went up to Capitol Hill and dealt with both of them, personally. There were other people with me, of course. As I say, we were very pleased with the outcome.

Now, the dirty little secret is that, over the next few months, in fact, thanks to the extension of conditional MFN and engaging the Chinese, we made some progress. Now, it was not monumental progress, and that's for sure. I don't want to exaggerate it, and we never did. However, until we got to the trip to China by Secretary of State Warren Christopher, in March 1994, we were beginning to make some progress during that period. Secretary Christopher met his Chinese counterpart in July at the regional security dialogue in Brunei. President Clinton met the President of the PRC, Jiang Zemin, in November, 1993. This was his first meeting with Jiang Zemin, and I'll come back to that in a minute, at Seattle, when we lifted the APEC meeting to the summit level...

Q: APEC means?

LORD: The Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation forum. This is a grouping of major economic powers in the Asian and Pacific region to promote free trade and investment. It now meets annually and is attended by heads of government. We were the host at the first meeting during the Clinton Administration in 1993 in Seattle and we lifted this meeting to a summit level to underline our interest in Asia and the importance of Asian trade, as well as Asia's political significance.

The fact is that these meetings with China produced some general commitments through quiet work. The Chinese, however grudgingly, were making some gestures in the field of human rights. There were a few releases of prisoners, somewhat better accounting of the number of detainees, and an agreement to talk with the Red Cross about prison conditions. Chinese formulations on Tibet were less bellicose, certainly than they are now. The Chinese agreed at some point, and I don't remember the timing, to a regular and formal dialogue on human rights with John Shattuck, the Assistant Secretary of State for Humanitarian Affairs. We reached a prison labor agreement, and emigration from China continued to be quite free.

While I don't claim major progress, I believe the last half of 1993 represented the most progress we made during the first Clinton term. Surely the MFN conditions were of some help.

MFN extension was agreed to in June, 1993, and we were looking to the renewal of MFN coming up in June, 1994. We were concerned whether we were going to get over the bar of debate on MFN renewal and whether enough, significant progress would be made. We did not by any means think that the situation was hopeless. There was enough progress in the fall of 1993 to make it possible to say that we were beginning to move ahead.

However, we also encountered serious problems in carrying this out. First, there was general, Chinese resistance to pressure. The conditions of course were public pressure, even though we worked to implement these arrangements in private, as much as we could. The Chinese remained preoccupied with repression and political control. Jiang Zemin himself had not yet solidified his position as Chinese political leader. Above all, the Chinese considered human rights to be an internal issue.

On the other hand, China was extremely interested in trade and exports, and sought to have good relations with the U.S. But there was disarray on our own side, which totally undercut our leverage on this issue.

First, there was the U.S. business community, which didn't want to have any conditions placed on MFN renewal and which, at the end of the road, generally doesn't care about human rights at all, although there are some exceptions. The business community doesn't realize why a politically more open society is in their own interest. Anyway, the U.S. business community, instead of lobbying the Chinese to improve human rights practices in China, so that MFN could be renewed on its own merits, was lobbying the Clinton administration to drop any conditions and was very vociferous in that respect. That is, perhaps, understandable and certainly legitimate, although you would like to think that they would lean on the Chinese, as well as President Clinton and Congress.

What was not legitimate was the behavior of our economic agencies, particularly the Treasury, the Department of Commerce, and the USTR [Office of the U.S. Trade Representative]. Sometimes they would put themselves on the record, expressing half-hearted support for the President's policies. However, very purposefully and on background, they were attacking the President's own policy. This came to a crescendo in the winter and spring of 1994, but this pattern of behavior was already evident from the very beginning of the Clinton administration. This totally undercut us with Beijing. Obviously, they could see the disarray within the U.S. Government.

President Clinton, to his detriment, didn't rein in these economic agencies. He refused to knock heads as he should have done in ensuring that his own policies were carried out. Therefore, we had splits in our position, which the Chinese could see and which totally undercut our leverage. The Chinese could say to themselves: "Well, the White House is not policing its own agencies. All of the economic types in the American administration are unhappy. The business community is 'lobbying' the administration. They're unhappy, so why should China make concessions?"

I'm not saying that this is the only reason that we ran into trouble. I am saying that it sure as hell hurt us. If the President disciplined his own administration, we might well have pulled this off. It was a major failure of leadership by Clinton, not backing the State Department in carrying out his own policy, letting his economic officials undercut his own policy.

Throughout 1993-1994 I convened interagency meetings to monitor our overall China policy as well as progress on the human rights question. I also convened such meetings in 1995-96 as we continued to make progress, despite ups and downs, with China.

I'll get to the March 1994 trip to China by Secretary of State Christopher next, but let me circle back to President Clinton's first meeting with PRC President Jiang Zemin and give a little chronology here.

Q: This was in Seattle?

LORD: Yes, in November, 1993. By then, as I said, Secretary Christopher had met the Chinese Foreign Minister in Brunei in July, 1993. I want to make this clear. Christopher has been accused of not spending enough time on China. It has been reported that Christopher went to Syria countless times and to China twice. The fact is that he met his Chinese counterpart 12 times in four years. So, on the average, this was about once every three months. Christopher made two trips to China. The second trip was very successful. The first trip to China turned out to be very unfortunate. Throughout the four years, he continued to correspond with Chinese Foreign Minister Qian Qichen. He met with him at least 12 times, probably in seven or eight different cities. This included every summer around the edges of the regional security dialogues. It also included every fall in New York on the occasion of the UN General Assembly meetings and APEC [Asian-Pacific Economic Cooperation] summit meetings. This was in addition to Christopher's trips to China, and so on. We even met once in The Hague. Of course, I was at all of these meetings, as I was at every Presidential meeting. The point here is that Christopher devoted a great deal of time to China and was in constant dialogue with his Chinese counterpart.

Q: This was before the first Christopher trip to China. Christopher had been Deputy Secretary of State during the Carter administration. What was your impression of any baggage which Christopher carried to China, when you first were getting acquainted with him, and all of that?

LORD: I would say that he had a pretty balanced approach. There were two elements which certainly made him somewhat more skeptical and hard-headed on China than, say, Secretary Baker during the Bush administration. The main element was that Christopher had always been strong on human rights and had a lot to do with implementing President Carter's human rights policy. The issue of human rights became a part of the U.S. agenda during the Carter administration.

So Christopher had a human rights background as a lawyer, and he was genuinely concerned about this issue. So he had some distaste for the Chinese political system. He believed that it was legitimate to press for progress in this regard. Having said that, I would add that he was obviously a very experienced, international operator. He understood the importance of China in our foreign policy. Christopher had spent most of his life in California, had a Pacific orientation, and believed in the importance of the Pacific Ocean area. Indeed, I got a lot of support from him in elevating Asia in our foreign policy.

So Christopher wanted to improve relations with China but had no problem with being pretty firm on human rights as part of that. Again, like me, he didn't advocate holding the whole Chinese-American relationship hostage to the human rights issue. He believed that human rights were an important factor. He had no problem with the extension of conditional MFN status to China. He agreed that we should try to make the conditions modest when we negotiated with Representative Pelosi and Senator Mitchell.

So that's where Christopher was coming from. He had also delivered the bad news to Taiwan in early 1979 about full normalization of our diplomatic relations with Beijing. In Taipei his car was rocked back and forth by Taiwan demonstrators. However, he didn't hold that against Taiwan. He understood their emotions, and this incident didn't make him anti-Taiwan or affect his view toward Beijing.

I just want to repeat at the outset that he worked very hard on the relationship with Beijing. When we improved this relationship during the last year of the first Clinton term [1996], I believe that Christopher did as much as anyone, if not more than anyone else, to get us back on track, contrary to what has been said in various media and books. Tony Lake in 1996 helped out in doing this and also deserved a lot of credit for it. I worked side by side with Lake also.

Anyway, President Clinton met Jiang Zemin in November, [1993], and it was frankly a poor meeting. I believe that they spent about an hour or an hour and a half together. At this point Jiang Zemin didn't have full self-confidence. He was still consolidating his position in China. I had been dealing with Zhou En-lai, Mao Zedong, and Deng Xiaoping, who were very impressive, and Jiang suffered by comparison. During the course of the meeting with Jiang Zemin, President Clinton asked Jiang a question about economic reforms and Chinese economic policy, as an easy way to get a conversation started with him. President Clinton was then treated to about a 45-minute monologue in which Jiang Zemin cited statistics. It wasn't a hostile meeting by any means. It was just wasting time during this first meeting between the two Presidents. Jiang Zemin went on and on about how China had done economically. Then they touched on other issues briefly and to no great consequence toward the end of the meeting. So very frankly, although of course we went out and said what a wonderful meeting it was, President Clinton was disappointed with it, as were we all.

Again, I want to make clear that the meeting wasn't hostile on human rights or anything else. It was just that this was a wasted opportunity on the essentials. President Clinton put the usual, more positive spin on it, although if you look at the statements made, you can see that we were careful not to portray it as a great meeting. We didn't go overboard in our characterization of the meeting, as far as I can remember.

I frankly don't remember much about the Christopher-Qian meeting which took place in July 1993. It was pretty workmanlike. There is no question, and I want to be honest here, that during some of these early meetings, we usually had only an hour or an hour and a half on the edge of an international conference. A lot of the agenda focused on problem areas, including human rights, the trade deficit, and nuclear non-proliferation. On the Chinese side, the issues they raised included Taiwan. We tried to talk about other, positive aspects of the agenda. I think, looking back, that we probably should have tried harder. Too much of the meetings consisted of each side covering its complaints. However, I think that people have to understand that, if you want to have a strategic dialogue with the Chinese these days, it isn't all that easy. Not everyone can conduct such a discussion as well as, say, Zhou and Deng used to do. And we had some real bilateral problems which we had to deal with.

I should add that in the summer of 1993, that is, after we had come out with the MFN conditions policy, we worked on a strategy toward China. I believe that this was at my initiative, but at any rate it was agreed in the State Department and the White House that we should be laying out a strategy for the administration, now that we had gotten through the initial MFN extension issue. While I don't recall if we actually used the word engagement, although I think that we did, the basic policy toward China which we are following today was laid out in that memo prepared in the summer of 1993.

Of course, we said that we had to be firm on human rights and we already had a conditional extension of MFN. But we sought in this paper to define elements of constructing a broad agenda, included trying to find positive elements on which to work with the Chinese and the importance of China and the U.S. working together in the next century. Outside observers discern themes at best toward the end of 1996, but these themes were in that paper prepared in 1993. I think that it was a hell of a good paper. It took a long while to get White House approval of it, not because of opposition to it. The delay in obtaining White House approval of it was just due to inertia. It was massaged through a couple of high-level, interagency committees and was then sent to the President. I think that he finally approved it in September, 1993.

I don't think that we implemented this paper well, in terms of strategic discussions. In a typical case, let's say, Secretary Christopher would be having a meeting of an hour and a half, perhaps a working lunch, with his Chinese counterpart. You have to cover human rights and try to make progress, as well as telling the press that you covered human rights. The Chinese foreign minister would take up time on the Taiwan issue. We had some urgent matters for discussion, including possible sanctions on non-proliferation. You had to address economic issues. So by the time you got through all of that, there was very little time left to talk about North Korea, Cambodia, regional security, APEC, global issues, and some of the more positive matters.

So, if we had it to do over again, maybe we should have done things differently. We always had longer meetings with the Chinese than we had with anybody else, but then were still compressed. You could argue that Secretary Christopher should have gone right away to China. I grant that. What I am saying is that the basic approach of engagement with China, of having a mixed bag of positive and negative issues on the agenda, of trying to construct a strategic relationship, even as we grappled with these problems, and of trying to demonstrate to domestic American and Chinese opinion that we had some converging and parallel interests, all of that was in our basic strategy paper. We had some difficult issues to deal with. But we didn't implement this strategy paper as well as we might have done. And, of course, the Chinese didn't make it easy.

Q: The Clinton administration came into office in 1993, not really well focused on foreign affairs. I'm not talking about the Clinton team but rather how it was directed. The domestic economy was considered the major issue. As an outsider looking at this, I had the feeling that President Clinton did not have much background on foreign affairs. In fact, he had virtually no background in this area. At least as reported through the media, there seemed to be a certain amount of drift and really no great focus on foreign affairs. However, you were on the inside of this on major issues. Was there any of this?

LORD: Yes, that is fair. I think that this was the view on the outside of the administration and I think that it was also a fair view from the inside. I think that most fair-minded people, who were not partisan either way, will tell you that the last two years of the first Clinton term were much better in terms of foreign policy than the first two years. If they are really fair, they will say that the last two years of the first Clinton term were pretty good. Most people would say that the first two years of the first Clinton term were pretty bad. I say two years. Maybe it was a year and a half versus two and a half years.

In reply to your point specifically I would say at the outset that the administration had to deal with Bosnia, Somalia, and the Haitian problems, for example. There was backing and filling on the extension of MFN status for China in 1994. So, both in terms of perception and reality, I think that it's fair to say that the Clinton administration didn't do well at the beginning.

This was partly due to the process of shaking down a new administration. It was partly due to the fact of the President's overwhelming focus on domestic issues. Clinton was elected the first time by saying that President Bush had ignored domestic issues. There was the election slogan, "It's the economy, stupid." Clinton genuinely wanted to focus on the economy from the beginning, and I think that this was correctly the case. However, you pay a price for this. You can't run foreign policy without the full involvement of the President and the White House. This is certainly true of China policy.

A good example of this is that for years I pushed strongly, and I persuaded Secretary Christopher to push for a Presidential speech on China. I also worked directly with the NSC [National Security Council] staff on this. I started this effort in the summer of 1993. Certainly, it was one of the recommendations of the strategy paper, which was finally approved in September, 1993, and which contained a recommendation for a Presidential speech. I thought that it was important to have the strategic approach to China laid out to the public in a broader framework, so that these constant problems that we had on human rights, nuclear non-proliferation, trade, and Taiwan wouldn't be the only things that people noticed. These issues could be put in a broader context of the need for engagement on some of the more positive aspects of the agenda.

I literally spent four years trying to get President Clinton to give a speech on China. In fact, I wasn't able to get the President to give a speech on China during the first Clinton term. China would often be part of a speech but never the main issue. Once Clinton started giving speeches of this kind, they turned out to be pretty good and they helped. Even Secretary of State Christopher didn't speak out solely on China for a couple of years. I was pushing for that as well. Every time we could do so, we would work in a reference to China at some length in a speech on Asia, or in testimony before Congress. But Secretaries of State just don't get much public attention when they speak, anyway. Christopher is a man for whom I have great respect, but he's no Billy Graham [well-known preacher and evangelist] when he gives a speech.

So the point I'm making is the same as yours. That is, President Clinton did not focus that much on foreign policy. He is a very quick fix, very smart, you can brief him up in a hurry, and he will do a great job. However, he just wasn't that much involved. This has changed over the years, but he paid the price on China because he didn't give a speech containing a strategic concept on what we were trying to do, he didn't discipline his own cabinet, he didn't give sustained interest or direction.

Q: This points out the importance of having insiders who know how significant speeches are. Insiders have that ability to deal with speeches. They know the work that goes into writing a speech. If you don't make the effort, that is an act in itself.

LORD: It was partly the fact that we were never able to get President Clinton's attention. This was due, very frankly, to some of his political advisers. If the President gives a speech on China, you know that it's going to be controversial. There is no way that you are going to make everybody happy. Part of the problem was the lack of emphasis on foreign policy but a large part of it was the realization among some of the President's advisers that this was a delicate, sensitive matter. First, because it involved campaign positions. Then, as time wore on, and the President changed his position on the extension of MFN, he would make statements around the general subject of MFN, but these would be 10 and 20 minute statements. I don't mean that President Clinton never spoke on China. It was just that he never gave a long speech on China, which we desperately needed and wanted. It was a great disappointment, and it hurt us.

Q: I think, too, that you are also pointing out the problem facing a new administration just entering office. The people surrounding the President are essentially domestic, political operators. In many ways they have the ear of the President, and there is the impetus of not making waves in the field of foreign affairs. This means that foreign affairs operators like yourself continue to be frustrated.

LORD: This is true of many administrations.

Q: It is true of many administrations.

LORD: In addition, there is the general question of giving a foreign policy address. The specific subject of China is especially sensitive.

Anyway, that was the background of the trip by Secretary Christopher to China in February or March 1994. In effect, he was going to China to promote our China relationship generally and specifically to make the further progress needed so that we could renew MFN. Keep in mind what I said. We had made some progress, but we hadn't made enough progress as yet.

We were going to China by way of Australia. There was a joint meeting with the Australians and the respective Foreign and Defense Ministers. While we were in Australia and also while we were heading toward China, the Chinese, in advance of Christopher's visit, began rounding up dissidents. This reflected their general nervousness. The Chinese authorities figured that these dissidents would speak out, try to meet Christopher, or something like that.

Then, literally when we were flying to China and to our own surprise, Assistant Secretary of State for Humanitarian Affairs, John Shattuck, met privately with Wei Jingshen, the most famous Chinese dissident. Shattuck had gone to China ahead of Secretary Christopher and his party to try to make more progress on human rights, so that Christopher could push the ball down the field a little farther. In effect, Shattuck would prepare the way. Again, we had this MFN deadline coming up in a few months. So Shattuck was in China as part of our formal dialogue. This was one of the reasons that we were making some progress. At least we had that dialogue.

Shattuck consulted with Ambassador J. Stapleton Roy, our outstanding Ambassador to China, but what they didn't do was to consult with Secretary Christopher, which, in my opinion, they should have done. So we were blindsided by this development. The fact is that Ambassador Roy and Assistant Secretary Shattuck had every reason to meet with Wei. Wei was an heroic figure. He'd been let out of jail, at least on a temporary basis. This was one of the things that we managed to accomplish. For about 24 hours the Chinese authorities failed to react, even though, with their surveillance system, they knew that Ambassador Roy and Assistant Secretary Shattuck had met with Wei. Then Wei made some public remarks, and the Chinese authorities, in effect, felt forced to react. So that's what happened.

In any event, the Chinese authorities blasted the hell out of everybody because of the meeting with Wei in advance of the Christopher visit to China. Again, I believe in meeting with dissidents, but I also believe that something this sensitive should have been checked out in advance with Christopher.

In this atmosphere, as we were heading toward China, there were some calls in the United States to cancel the Christopher visit to China. So we had debates on this issue within the delegation before we got on the airplane to go to China and on the airplane itself. Secretary Christopher got on the phone and touched base with a few Senators and Congressmen. My recommendation was that we should not cancel the Christopher visit. If we canceled the visit, we weren't going to get the MFN conditions met and we would have to make the horrible decision to cut off MFN extension. Then, whatever we did, the whole Chinese-American relationship would come to a standstill. Indeed we might have a crisis.

On the other hand, when people say that Secretary Christopher had a bad trip to China, let's remember that the Chinese were rounding up dissidents before we got to China. I said that we had to go ahead with the trip, despite the firestorm of Congressional and media criticism at home.

So, in effect, I recommended on the plane, and I think that we pretty much all agreed on this, that we should not cancel the Christopher visit. Instead, I said that we should make some public statements and some on background that we were very unhappy with what the Chinese authorities were doing. So we recommended that Secretary Christopher should get on the phone, from the plane, to some key Senators and Congressmen, to deflate any pressures to cancel the trip and assure them that we would press strongly on these issues. We felt that Secretary Christopher should do all of this before he reached China. In this way he would have made the point and protected his domestic flank while he was going ahead with the trip. At the same time, if he didn't do this so vocally on Chinese soil, it would be somewhat less provocative to the Chinese. In this case the Chinese authorities were being provocative by rounding up dissidents. Still, we didn't want the whole trip to fall apart.

This was my recommendation, others on the plane agreed, and Secretary Christopher agreed with it. He used some pretty tough rhetoric before we arrived in China. I say that because he has been criticized. Well, the point is that he could either cancel the trip or just ignore what the Chinese authorities were doing, such as rounding up dissidents, and so on. I felt, and I still feel, that all that Secretary Christopher could do was to be firm in public before he got to China. This was to justify going ahead with the trip and to show the Chinese that he wasn't just a pushover. Then he need not be so critical of the Chinese on Chinese soil and could see whether we could make progress.

When we reached China, we had a frosty reception. I forget how long we were there. I think that it was for two or three days. The first meeting was with Li Peng [Prime Minister], who was extremely rough and tough.

Q: In what way?

LORD: He was very dismissive of Christopher, accused him of meddling in China's affairs, and criticized Assistant Secretary John Shattuck's dealing with Wei. We didn't make progress on other issues, either. Li Peng was always tough on human rights issues. So it was just a very nasty atmosphere, and the general atmosphere of the Chinese reception was cool.

I don't whether the next meeting took place on the same day or not. I wouldn't say that President Jiang Zemin played "good cop" to Li Peng's "bad cop." Jiang Zemin wasn't particularly friendly, either, but he was a lot less vitriolic. This was his style, anyway. He's always been more tempered in dealing with our relationship than Li Peng has been. However, Jiang Zemin was also less than cordial. He was less insulting, but he was fairly firm. I had the feeling that he was sort of letting us know that first we were going to be hit over the head. Then he would ease up a bit, and we were supposed to feel grateful.

Actually, on the last day of the visit, when we met with Foreign Minister Qian Qichen, we began to make some progress on a few issues. They were not major issues, but compared to where we started with at the beginning of the visit, we moved forward. In the course of this visit there were some volleys fired back and forth with the Chinese press spokesman. I had to brief our press. The Chinese blamed us for hurting the atmosphere of the trip. This was during the trip. I got up and said that this was a great "leap of chutzpah" on the part of the Chinese. In effect, they accused us of ruining the atmosphere of the trip while they had been rounding up Chinese dissidents. So there were some pretty nasty exchanges, back and forth. I was pretty pleased with some of my one-liner comments. This was clearly not making the trip a smashing success, but I felt that we had to be firm in facing the Chinese.

So we left China obviously unhappy. We had made no progress on human rights. There were a couple of vague promises in a couple of areas, but I can't remember what they were. As I say, the meeting with Foreign Minister Qian Qichen was somewhat better, but mostly in relative terms. We made some headway on a couple of other issues. All in all, the trip wasn't a total disaster, since we had made some progress. But the press was already saying that the visit had been a disaster. People back in the U.S., including the representatives of the economic agencies, were giving background interviews with reporters. They were directing their attacks at Secretary Christopher, and not the Chinese. This was really a disreputable performance by our government.

Of course, it was important to get a White House statement backing up Secretary Christopher. This had to be a Presidential statement, saying that Christopher had represented American interests firmly. We needed a statement which said that we wanted good relations with China, but the Chinese had to behave themselves better, and that kind of thing. We never got such a statement from the President, who remained silent. Christopher tried to get this statement but without success. So the combination of the attitude of the economic agencies in undercutting Christopher and the President's not only not coming to Christopher's aid or disciplining his cabinet but just being silent made this a very tough period. The White House was irresponsible, leaving Christopher (and the rest of us) twisting in the wind.

We didn't have a great deal of conversation on the plane. However, Christopher and I, more or less independently of each other, began to think through where we went from there in our policy toward China. Christopher was detached and cool enough at the time. Rather than just getting mad at the Chinese, Christopher felt that we had to rethink whether we were on the right course on the MFN issue, however modest the conditions were and whether the MFN issue wasn't too blunt an instrument for dealing with the Chinese. He was wondering whether we had to think of some other approach.

So we returned to Washington. It was pretty clear now by March, 1994, that we weren't going to make it over the hump and get enough progress on human rights to get an extension of MFN status for China by May, because of the lack of progress on this trip and the disarray in our own government. The U.S. business community was continuing to lobby us and not the Chinese.

We made one last effort during this period by sending Mike Armacost, former Under Secretary of State, to Beijing on a secret trip to Beijing to try and get last minute development on human rights. We made little progress.

During the spring of 1994 we went through an agonizing reappraisal. We did a lot of computer runs, working with the Department of Commerce, to see whether it was possible to come up with an MFN arrangement hitting only those Chinese exports that were from Chinese military industries or were derived from military sources. In other computer runs we considered to what extent we could hurt China with higher tariffs on some Chinese exports but wouldn't hurt Hong Kong or Taiwan. So we tried to see, since the Chinese did not make enough progress on human rights, whether there was a way selectively to affect Chinese exports by hitting only military industries or picking products that didn't affect innocent bystanders.

We just couldn't find any way of doing this. There was no way to sort out the Chinese structure of military versus civilian companies and cut-outs and cover and producers versus exporters and holding companies. The only thing that we could identify, which we finally did, was Chinese arms exports of handguns to the U.S., which were coming onto our streets. That was one kind of merchandise which was coming from the Chinese military, and we could single it out. But we just couldn't come up with a nice deus ex machina program to identify anything else to get us out of this box.

We had hoped that we could say, in effect: "We don't want to cut off all of our trade with China, but we are going to hit them selectively because they haven't made enough progress on human rights. We are going to hit military companies, we are going to spare Taiwan, Hong Kong, etc." We figured that this might be enough to satisfy our domestic audience in the U.S. We would admit that China had not made enough progress on human rights and so we were taking these limited steps. We weren't going to cut off all MFN trade. We were trying to get something that might affect, for example, 10 to 20% of their exports to the U.S., as opposed to the majority of their exports. So there would be enough damage limitation so that we could continue with MFN status on most Chinese exports to the U.S. and avoid the major problems I mentioned. We would have selectivity in the application of trade controls, avoiding harming Hong Kong and Taiwan, but also maintaining some momentum in the overall Chinese-American relationship.

Well, as we got down to the wire, we found that we didn't have those options. We just couldn't come up with a program or, rather, the computers couldn't find it.

So then we had three choices. First, we could say that the Chinese hadn't met the conditions, however modest, for the extension of MFN. Therefore, we were revoking MFN status for China. We didn't want to do that for all of the reasons I have mentioned. The negative impact on Chinese-American relations and on our business and exports, as well as the impact on Hong Kong and Taiwan were generally things that we wanted to avoid. We never wanted to harm them.

Q: Can you explain why, whatever we did with MFN status for China, it would have an effect on Hong Kong and Taiwan?

LORD: Well, a great deal of Chinese exports to the U.S. go through Hong Kong. Many of them are reprocessed and given a higher value in Hong Kong. This is one reason why we have disputes in our trade. The Chinese think that we exaggerate the deficit in our trade with China, because a large part of this trade with the U.S. really comes through Hong Kong. So, by hitting Chinese exports to the U.S., we were going to hit the economy of Hong Kong very heavily. I don't have the figures in front of me, but a great deal of Chinese trade with the U.S. goes through Hong Kong. And a large number of jobs in Hong Kong would be affected. We would be raising tariffs on goods of Chinese origin, if China lost MFN status, to a level which would be prohibitive, in many cases. Hong Kong would have been severely affected, and Taiwan, somewhat less so.

Q: Why would Taiwan have been affected? Was Taiwan also at that point reprocessing mainland Chinese goods destined for the U.S.?

LORD: Taiwan had some investment in China and so it imported some goods from China, reprocessed them, and then re-exported them to the U.S. from China. Indeed, a large part of our trade deficit with China was caused by Hong Kong and Taiwan production going into China. So our trade deficit went down with Taiwan and Hong Kong but went up with China. But Hong Kong and Taiwan still would have been affected by our limiting our trade with China.

There were mixed feelings in Taiwan because the government there didn't like Beijing. However, they also didn't want to hurt their own economic interests, so they were pretty quiet on this issue. In fact, the Taiwan Government did not lobby Congress to cut off MFN status for China. I think that the Taiwan Government just stayed neutral on this issue. So, one of the choices facing us was cutting off MFN status for China. We didn't want that choice. In the U.S. government, I believe John Shattuck was the only one favoring revocation of MFN, or at least selective revocation.

Another choice was to say: "Well, China already has MFN status. We're not happy with Chinese behavior. However, based on how we define them, the Chinese have met enough of our goals, and we will renew MFN status for China." Maybe we could again renew MFN extension but with conditions. That would be one sub-option. We could renew MFN status, saying that China had made enough progress to justify renewal, but we are still going to keep some conditions on because China has not done as much in the field of human rights as we would like. We rejected that course as well. Rejection of this course was strongly recommended by Secretary Christopher, myself, and others because it would have lacked credibility.

On the two mandatory conditions, emigration was an easy call - dissidents and other people could get out of China without any great difficulty. Prison labor involved somewhat of a stretch, but in good conscience, taking into account the views of the lawyers, we could say that we already had a prison labor agreement and we had some inspections provided for to ensure that they were not exporting the products of prison labor. It wasn't an airtight breakthrough by any means, but we thought that it was enough to justify meeting that condition. However, in terms of overall significant progress in releasing prisoners, there wasn't much to point to. The Chinese authorities had let some people out, but they were also beginning to round up others. On prison conditions nothing had really happened. Nothing had happened in the case of Tibet. On these and other conditions, we just felt that the Chinese authorities hadn't made significant progress on them. If we had tried to stretch what had happened, we would have had a firestorm in Congress. Probably this would have resulted in having the President overridden by Congress, anyway.

In any event, it would have made the President look so eager to stretch the truth that he would have done anything to renew MFN status for China. We would have lost credibility in Beijing because the Chinese Government would have concluded that the American Government was so desperate to renew MFN status for China that they were calling our bluff. The Chinese hadn't made any real progress on most issues. Our lack of credibility would have had an impact around the world. So we ruled out manufacturing progress because of domestic and Chinese reaction.

I think that the third choice, which we eventually selected, was the least bad alternative. Certainly, it was what I recommended at the time, but it was very embarrassing. It meant a reversal of policy. The President hadn't been willing to discipline the economic agencies or present a united front in any event. The Chinese would continue to do what they had been doing, and placing conditions on renewal of MFN status just wasn't going to go anywhere. We weren't prepared to pretend about progress allegedly made and we weren't prepared to revoke MFN status for China. So we felt that the only choice we had, and the least bad choice was simply to renew MFN, while pressing human rights in other ways. And this is what we did.

This was awkward, but it was the only choice available to us at the time. Some people might say that we should never have placed conditions on the renewal of MFN. Some people said that we should have kept MFN, while others said that we should have revoked MFN status for China. I still feel, to this day, that if we had had a united administration and a strong President on this issue, we might have pulled off our initial policy of MFN renewal with modest conditions.

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: I was just curious. In initiating this policy to what extent, if at all, did you consider that you were giving leverage to the Chinese? In many ways the renewal of MFN status for China could only work with Chinese good will. That is, if the Chinese were willing to come far enough under these conditions. So the initiative for making the Clinton administration policy work was in Chinese hands. Was that a consideration?

LORD: Yes. However, put another way, we felt that the Chinese had enough of a stake in the Chinese-American relationship in general, and the export and trading part of it in particular, to have Chinese good will. After all, we were taking one-third of their exports, and they had a huge surplus in their trade with the U.S. Therefore, in this view the Chinese had an incentive to cooperate with us, if not out of good will, at least in their own self-interest. However, that depended on China's concern that there was a real danger of their losing MFN status. And between the business lobbying and what the economic agencies were saying, that clearly was not the case. There is no question that one can criticize conditional MFN, albeit forgetting that we headed off revocation of MFN and the imposition of heavy conditions on MFN extension. You can say that extending conditional MFN status should never have happened in the first place, but in 1993 we faced the realities of Clinton's campaign positions and the congressional mood.

The President said that he wasn't going to pretend about the extent of progress. He said that we considered that conditional MFN renewal had been a useful instrument up to now, but we had used up whatever utility it had, and we couldn't make any further progress on this front.

We stated how we would be vigorous on human rights on other fronts. Specifically, we revoked or cut off MFN status on Chinese small arms and handguns, so there was a tiny sector that we did hit. We stressed that we would continue to consider human rights a very important part of our policy and that we would do it through resolutions passed in Geneva, and through the human rights dialogue. We began to mention legal reforms in China at that time. We mentioned that we would work through Radio Free Asia and other programs involving non-governmental organizations. We also said that we would try to work with the business community on the adoption of good business principles to promote human rights. There were a couple of other elements which were announced at the time.

So we've renewed MFN without conditions and changed our position. And we set out to improve our relations and press human rights in other ways.

In the fall of 1994 Secretary Christopher met again, in Indonesia, with the Chinese. The APEC meeting that year was in Bogor. He was working hard by cable, by letter, and also at periodic meetings with Chinese Foreign Minister Qian Qichen. Various issues came up, but I can't give you the chronology.

We had the famous case of the Chinese ship with the chemicals on it. We received poor intelligence from our people. The ship wasn't transporting dangerous chemicals. We stopped the ship, boarded it, and examined it. We got egg on our face as a result. What happened was that our intelligence people had proof, from the cargo manifest of the ship, that it was scheduled to load certain dangerous chemicals on board. Either the Chinese snookered us in a kind of con game and took these chemicals off at the last minute to embarrass us or, in fact, they had unloaded it in planned fashion. It didn't have any dangerous chemicals on board at the time we inspected it. The Chinese predictably blasted us for this.

We were also concerned about Chinese nuclear proliferation activities with Pakistan. We had to slap sanctions on China a couple of times in this connection. I think that this occurred once in 1993 and again in 1995.

We made very little progress on human rights. The Chinese called off the dialogue with Assistant Secretary John Shattuck after a while. We would go to Geneva and lose on the votes taken there to pass a resolution critical of the Chinese.

On the other hand, the Chinese were somewhat helpful on North Korea and became increasingly helpful in this connection. On Cambodia the Chinese halted their aid to the Khmer Rouge. They were more helpful there and supported the UN operation and the elections. Our exports to China were increasing, even though the overall trade deficit with China was increasing generally. There was some, slogging progress on nuclear non-proliferation, particularly in the wake of the sanctions that were applied to China.

We tried to talk about broader issues with China. We began to talk about developing a new agenda on some of the global issues. So the Chinese-American relationship began to make some progress. It was not dramatic, but clearly it was getting way beyond the level of the Christopher trip, which had gone so badly.

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: Could you say something about the relationships within the American administration? One of the things that has often been talked about is the growing role of Ron Brown, Secretary of Commerce, in defining how the relationships worked, and foreign policy more generally. What did you see as the dynamic in this situation? To what extent was Secretary Christopher as important a player as previous Secretaries of State might have been?

LORD: I think that Secretary Christopher was important during this period. No question about that. In fact, on China I think that he was the most important player short of President Clinton, despite criticism of him. Now Tony Lake, the National Security Adviser, got into this picture constructively toward the end, and we'll get into this later. But in the first few years, his deputy, Sandy Berger, was the key person at the NSC on China, and Asia generally. Having said that, there was no question that Christopher did not control foreign policy as Kissinger did. So there was in some people's eyes, and probably in the eyes of the Chinese, some varying degrees of emphasis which were different, if nothing else.

Whenever there was an economic cabinet member, like Ron Brown, or the Secretary of the Treasury, or the USTR [United States Trade Representative] going to China, we would work with them. I would often send one of my people with them. We would brief them and encourage them to raise human rights, even as they promoted our economic or commercial interests, and try to show a united front. This was particularly the case after the tough going early in the Clinton administration. I must say that, after that change in MFN policy, we had a much more united and disciplined administration. Most official visitors who went to China, even though they didn't particularly like it, would raise the human rights issue. So we began to get a more cohesive policy, partly because with no conditions standing in the way of MFN renewal, the economic agencies were comfortable with the policy. I think that the President was happy no longer to have this yearly deadline of MFN renewal staring at him. It had been an awkward and embarrassing situation, but we began to make progress overall with the Chinese.

Again, the economic agencies were important, but they didn't dominate foreign policy. We had very good relations between the White House and the NSC [National Security Council]. That was generally true with regard to policy toward East Asia. The NSC Asian officers and I and my colleagues worked extremely well together. The same with the Defense Department.

On China there were a lot of skull sessions, particularly when we got to the renewal of MFN status each year or when the President was going to meet Chinese President Jiang Zemin at an APEC meeting or Secretary Christopher was going to meet Chinese Foreign Minister Qian Qichen at some international conference. There would often be an interagency meeting, usually chaired by Sandy Berger [Deputy National Security Adviser]. Tony Lake [National Security Adviser] wasn't too much involved with China in those days. We worked well together, so there was a cohesiveness which had been previously missing. I think that it is fair to say that, although the White House became more involved, the Department of State was still in the daily lead on China policy. However, the economic agencies were important and were bound to be important. At this point we at least had a united policy. It was constructive that the White House became generally more interested and in control of China policy. Christopher and I personally were fully involved throughout. There has been some revisions that after the 1994 MFN change the White House took over and State was cut out. This is total nonsense. We worked very closely together.

Secretary Christopher very much promoted our economic interests. He took a lot of time at meetings in doing this, even the economic agencies would mention human rights when they went to China. So we had a better team at this time than had previously been the case.

Q: Were we, not only in front but virtually all by ourselves in dealing with human rights in China, compared to the British, the French, and so forth?

LORD: The answer is "Yes." I have said publicly that our friends would hold our coats when we raised some of these tough issues with the Chinese, whether it concerned human rights, nuclear non-proliferation, or even trade negotiations. They would hold our coats and then take the trade contracts while we took Chinese annoyances.

That's a very good point. It's another reason why the conditional approach on MFN renewal did not work. We were all alone in this respect. No other country tried to put on sanctions or conditions on trade status. Other countries didn't press the Chinese on human rights. There were modest exceptions to this, like Great Britain, because of Hong Kong, and Australia, because they cared about human rights. Other countries just went through the motions. So the Chinese, of course, were very adept at saying: "Well, you people may want to place conditions on MFN renewal or keep bugging us on human rights, which are our internal affair, but our European and Japanese friends don't do this. We'll just give them the contracts."

In fact, the Chinese wouldn't always do that because we might have better technology or better deals. The Chinese didn't want to be dependent on Japan and Europe, so the Chinese bark was sometimes louder than their bite. However, there were times, for example, when we were left with the feeling that maybe Airbus Industries got a contract for aircraft that Boeing might have gotten. Maybe some French or Japanese company got something that an American company might otherwise have gotten.

So this lack of multilateral help hurt us. One of the criticisms was that the U.S. was pressuring the Chinese unilaterally and why didn't we do this in coordination with our friends? The answer to this is that we tried very hard to get our friends to act in coordination with us. I would have policy talks with my counterparts, including the British, the French, the Germans, and the Japanese in particular, and try to persuade them to work with us on human rights issues so that we would have a more effective approach to the Chinese. We never got anywhere with this approach. This really hurt our efforts in the field of human rights in China. No question about it.

One of the reasons that our business community was upset with stressing human rights was that they figured that the Chinese would shift business to their competitors.

Q: During the period from 1993 to 1997 the issue of birth control and particularly of abortion were hot button issues in American politics. Did you have to deal with that?

LORD: I had to deal with that, but, strangely enough, even though it was always there and always simmering, these never became overriding issues. There were major issues on human rights in general, but I would say that prisoner release, Tibet, and prison labor policy. Of course, some Chinese officials saw the need to hold down the growth of China's population in any way possible. However, I think that there was less and less proof that forced abortions were going on, although there surely were some. This issue, at least in my recollection, never became one of the major matters.

Every now and then there would be related matters like infanticide, killing girl babies, mistreatment of orphans, organ transplants, or issues related to these. These might come up. However, these were just among the human rights issues that we were concerned about. They were never at the top of the agenda. We were concerned about them, but I just don't think they caused that much steam in Congress, compared to other matters, like prisoners and Tibet.

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: One other question. I'm not sure whether it belongs here or maybe later, but how much access, if at all, did people concerned with the China portfolio have to the President? Did you have opportunities to meet with him and brief him? Did Secretary Christopher go on trips with him?

LORD: Well, early in the first Clinton term foreign policy was not the President's major preoccupation. However, we would meet with President Clinton before he met with Chinese President Jiang Zemin, perhaps a week or so in advance. Then we would meet with President Clinton again just before he would go into the meeting.

Most of the interagency meetings on China policy were at the level of Sandy Berger [National Security Adviser], Peter Tarnoff [Undersecretary of State for Political Affairs], and myself, at the Department of State level. Joe Nye would sit in, representing the Department of Defense. These meetings did not involve the President. I don't recall a full-scale, NSC [National Security Council] meeting on China alone during the first two or three years of Clinton's first term, if, in fact, such a meeting ever occurred. There were a couple of sessions at which we briefed the President, attended by outside experts in addition to ourselves. However, President Clinton did not pay a great deal of attention to foreign policy at this time. He made up for this later on, to some extent. Often, if he was going to an APEC meeting or on an Asian trip, we would work in China issues as well. I can't recall more than one or two such sessions which were just on China, for example, before President Clinton met with Chinese President Jiang Zemin. However, President Clinton is a quick study, and we had the opportunity to brief him before he would meet with someone, as I say, like Jiang Zemin.

Generally, briefing President Clinton was a little hair raising because he was usually late for them. I'm talking about the briefings just before he would go into a meeting. These are supposed to take place an hour in advance of such a meeting. But the President would show up for his briefing with only about 15 minutes to go before the meeting. Several people would be standing around in the Oval Office in Washington or some hotel, wherever we were, shouting last minute advice at him. He would be looking through his talking points. His press secretary would be going over his public statements. We would be pretty nervous. We didn't know how much homework he had done and whether he could absorb all of this advice. However, he would perform quite well at these meetings.

Now, as time went on, some outsiders thought that our China policy was not really progressing as much as it should have. We did what we could to engage the President. I know that, on occasion, President Clinton met with former Secretary of State Kissinger or Al Haig. Often, businessmen would weigh in on U.S. policy toward China. We know now, of course, that even campaign contributors could do that. However, in terms of your basic question as to whether President Clinton was exposed to a lot of expertise and heavy thinking and debate on China policy, I shouldn't think so.

Q: There wasn't somebody who was a friend of President Clinton's from Little Rock, Arkansas, who had a Chinese cousin or something like that? Sometimes, it happens that somebody who is personally close to the President may have pronounced ideas on China.

LORD: It's not surprising that business people, either in a meeting or if they are talking to the President at a reception, or when they are having coffee with him, or on some such occasion, would advocate trade or investment with China, or engagement with China in general. There is nothing wrong with that, and I am convinced that anything which President Clinton did on China was not done as a favor to contributors. Again, we have to look at investigations now going on and make sure that they are fully carried out. However, President Clinton's views on China policy would have been what he thought was in the national interest, not the result of a lot of systematic access by outsiders. That was true, not just on China, but on foreign policy issues in general. At the same time, the consistent economic emphasis by businesspeople seeing him undoubtedly had an effect.

So we were sort of moving ahead on China policy. I can't quantify it. However, as we reached the beginning of 1995, we had had these periods of ups and downs. Then we reached the visit to the U.S. by President Li Teng-hui of Taiwan.

Let me just step back on Taiwan for a minute. In 1993-94, we launched the first, systematic review of our Taiwan policy since the passage of the Taiwan Relations Act in 1979. This review went on for a good year or so, including debates on how bold we could be. I don't remember the specific timing, but it happened early in the first Clinton term. We in the bureau led this effort, personally headed by me and my deputy, Tomsen.

There was never any feeling that we were going to revolutionize policy toward Taiwan in one way or another. We weren't going to go backward and resume having official relations with Taiwan. That would really have hurt ourselves with Beijing, as it was one of the most sensitive areas from Beijing's point of view. Nor were we going to flip over, do the bidding of the PRC [People's Republic of China] Government, and hurt Taiwan in any significant way. That would be weak, unnerve allies, demoralize a good friend, and caused an upheaval in Congress.

So this review was constrained from the beginning, and I think correctly so. We didn't want strawmen options and we ruled out either extreme. However, within that framework we wanted to see whether we could strengthen ties with Taiwan, without significantly hurting our China relationship.

Many anomalies had grown up since we had passed the Taiwan Relations Act in 1979. These had turned out to be awkward in terms of how we deal with Taiwan, because this relationship has to be unofficial. So the questions came up, "Where can you meet Taiwan officials and in which U.S. Government buildings?" "What level of American Government officials can go to Taiwan? Who could visit the U.S. from Taiwan? What shall the name be of the Taiwan Government office in Washington?" A lot of things were rather hurriedly thrown together in 1979 to compensate for normalization of relations with the PRC [People's Republic of China] and to control keep our ties with Taiwan, both in legal terms and in terms of nomenclature, and in political terms with regard to Beijing. These arrangements had become cumbersome and awkward in dealing with Taiwan. So not only did we want to strengthen relations with Taiwan but we wanted to simplify relations in a way that wouldn't have major substantive impact but which would just make it easier to work the Taiwan side of the issue.

So we went over this subject for probably a year. It took a long time, partly internal debates, partly White House inertia. Taiwan kept pressing us in terms of what was going to happen. The results were constructive. They were modest, but I think that they were helpful. I can't remember all of them, but we changed the name of the Taiwan office in Washington to "Taiwan Economic and Cultural Relations Office [TECRO]." Now what was it called before?

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: It was called, "The Coordination Council for North American Affairs."

LORD: The Coordination Council for North American Affairs is a real mouthful, and TECRO was a modest improvement. We did that, but it certainly didn't make this office more official. We wouldn't do that, but it gave more sense of what this office was up to. We did approve, in principle, economic cabinet level official visits to Taiwan, which was quite significant. However, such trips had to be related to specific goals. Such trips wouldn't be frequent, but they would be acceptable when they could help us, particularly in the cultural and economic areas. Until then, I believe, the only U.S. Cabinet level official who had ever gone to Taiwan was Carla Hills, at the end of the Bush administration. She was U.S. Trade Representative. We also said that Taiwan officials who have economic functions could meet in U.S. Government offices, even though we said that they couldn't meet U.S. officials in the State Department in Washington, because this would suggest diplomatic overtones.

We decided that we would vigorously support Taiwan membership in international organizations which didn't require statehood. And in the case of those which required statehood, we would press to make sure that their voice could be heard in some fashion, perhaps as observers. In the case of those organizations which didn't require statehood, such as APEC, WTO [World Trade Organization], and other economic agencies, we would push for some Taiwan presence more strongly.

At the APEC meeting in November, 1993, we also worked out that Taiwan could attend the summit meeting that year. That was also very tough and delicate. Taiwan had already become a member of APEC during the Bush Administration, but it was not a foregone conclusion, when we lifted the level of representation from Foreign Ministers to Heads of State or Heads of Government, that Beijing would settle for Taiwan being present. So we had delicate negotiations conducted by my deputy, Peter Tomsen, in which we arranged for Taiwan to send a representative to the APEC meeting. This representative would not be President Li Teng-hui of Taiwan. This would have been too much for Beijing to accept. The Taiwan representative was, in effect, at the economic cabinet level. This got Taiwan into the APEC summit meeting but at a slightly lower level. It was a rather ingenious compromise which represented a step forward for Taiwan in many ways. They really couldn't have expected to have President Li Teng-hui at that meeting when PRC President Jiang Zemin was there. The PRC didn't like this arrangement, and Taiwan didn't like it either, which shows that it was a good deal. It has lasted ever since.

I want to underline that I worked very hard at maintaining good relations with Taiwan. I met with their representative, as well as visiting officials very frequently, probably more than any Ambassador in my region. Because of unofficial ties, we couldn't meet in the State Department - I would go across the street to meet in a hotel room; sometimes we had meals at the Four Seasons Hotel in Georgetown. I was dedicated to good relations even as we went ahead with China, because we had moral and historical bonds, we were responsible for Taiwan's security through arms sales and rhetoric and deployments, it was a democracy in contrast to China, we had strong economic links and there was great congressional and media support for Taiwan. I kept Taiwan closely briefed on trips and meetings with China - my own, the President's, Secretary Christopher's, etc. I always supported a robust arms package. Except for the Lee visit interlude, my relations were very cordial, especially with Ding Moushi and Jason Hu.

In any event, we did all of these things and others for Taiwan. I forget when we announced the results. Of course, it was less than Taiwan had hoped for, but we felt that we had cleaned up a lot of the anomalies, maintained our basic policy, avoided really annoying Beijing all that much, and modestly pleased Taiwan. I think that we came out quite well. The outcome wasn't dramatic. It correctly avoided the extremes.

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: Why did it take so long?

LORD: Essentially because people disagreed. Also, frankly, this was a result of inertia in the White House, particularly when there was sensitivity on this issue. It was hard to get meetings scheduled and decisions made.

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: Were there people arguing that this was going too far, that we were going to hurt Chinese feelings, and this was a bad move?

LORD: I don't remember that there was a lot of passion in the discussions, to be honest, because it didn't mark a dramatic departure. I don't recall anybody in the Clinton administration pushing for much bolder moves in support of Taiwan. I don't recall anyone saying very passionately that this was going to hurt our relations with Beijing. Thus, you have raised a fair question, why this process took so long. I think that a lot of it was simply a matter of plain inertia in getting the White House to come to grips with the issue. There might have been some nervousness that, maybe, Beijing would be a little annoyed, but I don't recall that this view was held very passionately.

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: I ask because, from the outside, I think that the feeling always was that if movement had been faster on this issue, it would have been seen as a really positive, administration move.

LORD: A very good point.

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: However, it took so long that everybody's expectations were raised.

LORD: That's a very good point, and I am glad to record it here. This package of measures involving Taiwan was not revolutionary by any means, of course. We did not review or change our policy on arms sales to Taiwan and the basic policy of unofficial and friendly ties with Taiwan. But if we had done all of this, say, in three or four months, people would have said: "Well, they're looking at the situation affecting Taiwan and they're cleaning up some anomalies. And there's some good steps forward. This is not as much as we 'Taiwan' supporters would like, but it's a step forward. They did it without alienating Beijing. It was a pretty good job." And I think that in fact was the case.

However, taking a year for action was damaging. Not only were the economic and academic experts on the outside watching this situation, wondering what the hell was going on. Taiwan, of course, was working with Congress to try to pressure on the administration to undertake some bolder moves forward. They had their expectations raised, although, through careful backgrounding of the press, we tried to keep those expectations down. I also tried to keep them down in my meetings with Taiwan representatives. By the time these changes came out, a lot of people probably thought that we had produced a mouse. I think the outcome was better than that. I think that it was partly the delay which caused this misperception.

Having said that, however, we didn't pay a price of any significance in Beijing, and we got modest kudos from Taiwan. On the whole, Congress thought that we should have done more, but members of Congress grudgingly said that we at least did something.

Then, in the course of 1994, there was the episode of President Lee Teng-hui of Taiwan wanting to visit the United States in transit to Central America, where he was making a state visit. I believe that it was in 1994. Up till then we hadn't even allowed transit visits by top officials in Taiwan through the United States, bound for another destination. This was due to opposition by Beijing, which had a tremendous, double standard in this regard. They accepted that President Lee Teng-hui could play golf and have official meetings with the leaders of Southeast Asian countries. Beijing would hardly say anything about it. But the U.S. was a different matter, as was Japan.

In any event, in 1994 President Lee Teng-hui wanted to have a visit, preferably a stopover somewhere in mainland U.S., en route to Central America. He wasn't asking for an official visit to the U.S. at that point. What he wanted was more like a transit visit, but a leisurely transit visit. We split the difference. We decided that we would make the case that, given considerations of geography, it was only natural for him to go through the U.S. en route from Taiwan to Central America. It would have been a little tough and inconvenient not to do so. It was also a matter of airplane distances. You couldn't fly directly from Taiwan to Central America. So on grounds of logistics, convenience, and courtesy, you could make a case for approving this transit visit through the U.S. We knew about Beijing's sensitivities and we decided to have the transit take place in Hawaii. Yes, Hawaii is part of the United States. However, it's in the middle of the Pacific Ocean. A short visit there was not like landing in New York or California. We decided to approve a transit visit which was genuinely a transit visit. It would be a refueling stop. President Lee Teng-hui would come into the VIP lounge while his plane was refueled. I sent out the head of our Taiwan office in the State Department to greet him as a matter of courtesy.

The problem is that this solution didn't work in any direction. The Chinese Government in Beijing was mad and beat up on us, but that was manageable. We could live with that. President

Lee Teng-hui, wanting a more high profile visit, said that he wanted to spend a couple of days in Hawaii, play some golf, and meet local people. Instead of Taiwan being grateful that for the first time ever its President had set foot on American soil, it turned out that it was not at all satisfied that the arrangement approved was a step forward compared to what any other American administration had previously permitted. Lee was upset because he just had this refueling stop in Hawaii.

Lee decided that he would play up this incident and magnify it by not getting off the airplane. As I said, I had sent one of my officers from the Taiwan office to meet and greet him and bring him into the VIP lounge. To this day, like the "Energizer Bunny" [advertisement for a brand of flashlight batteries], I've been trying to stamp out this rumor that we wouldn't let Lee get off the airplane in Hawaii. Of course we wanted him off the plane. We wanted him in the VIP lounge in the airport in Honolulu. By the time my officer met him at the plane, Lee decided that he would get more propaganda advantage by staying on the plane. Then Taiwan put out a statement that we wouldn't let Lee off the plane in Hawaii. We never caught up with that allegation. I became blue in the face, telling every newsman and every Congressman and Senator that I could get my hands on that this allegation was not true. The Taiwan Government keeps saying, to this day, that Lee couldn't get off the airplane in Hawaii. This is total baloney.

In any event, that was a little forerunner of what came next. Beijing was upset, but this was all right with us. We knew that they weren't going to be pleased. We thought that this was a fair splitting of the difference, balancing security, comfort, and courtesy. We were not being provocative. President Lee didn't have any press conference while he was in Honolulu.

This incident foreshadowed what happened in 1995. Lee started pressing for an official visit, or at least a working visit. He knew that he couldn't come as a head of state for an official visit. The excuse he used was that he wanted to receive an honorary degree from Cornell University. This was nonsense, because he already had an honorary degree from Cornell. The idea was that he would go up to Cornell University, give a speech, and be feted by his former university.

Taiwan already had strong lobbyists on Capitol Hill, of course. Taiwan was in second place, just behind Israel and just ahead of Greece in its lobbying effort in Congress. Taiwan also hired a PR [Public Relations] firm, Cassidy. My own view is that Taiwan would have been able to mount a lot of pressure for a travel permit, which is shorthand for Lee being able to come and visit the U.S., even without the PR firm.

They had four million dollars available for this campaign. There were some people in the Taiwan Government who argued against this trip, saying that they should not annoy the Americans and pressure the U.S. Government or go around and lobby Congress, but there were various factions in Taiwan behind this project. Who knows all of the details? In any event, the pressure was intense for us to allow Lee to come to the U.S. and give a speech at Cornell University. This particular episode, along with the reversal of our policy on MFN extension, were the two key events for which the Clinton administration has been criticized on specific aspects of our China policy.

So we had to deal with the question of the Lee visit. There was a view in the administration, held fairly generally, that Lee should not be allowed to come. You never know when the President was consulted, but he was clearly aware of the matter. The fairly generally held view was that, even though the Chinese Government was being somewhat unreasonable by objecting to an unofficial, private visit by President Lee Teng-hui, the turbulence that would be caused in our relations with Beijing wasn't worth granting a travel permit to Lee. We continued to talk about a transit visit, but when it came to a working visit, this would present a fundamental problem. The basic policy for several administrations had been not to allow visits by high level Taiwan officials. We already had moved on transit visits.

I remember going up on Capitol Hill on several occasions and just getting lambasted. I was asked: "What the hell is going on? Can't a guy who is a distinguished person, the head of a democracy, come to the United States and visit his 'alma mater'? We're not talking about a high level, high profile visit. We're just talking about letting this poor guy come here and get an honorary degree. Are you going to let these 'pirates' in Beijing pressure you? This guy Lee is a democrat and a friend of the U.S. What the hell is going on here?"

I remember thinking frankly, during all of the time that I was testifying to the best of my ability, that I privately agreed with the Congressmen. This was an absurd situation. I'm not saying that I argued, within the administration, that Lee should be given a permit. I saw the turbulence building in Beijing and I was not in favor of giving him a trip. However, I felt that, on the merits, it was absurd saying that Lee, as a democratic politician, couldn't get honored by his alma mater. We kept on fighting the Congress and telling the PRC Embassy and Beijing that it was our fundamental policy not to have a visit to the U.S. by such a high level official of the Taiwan Government. This position was also relayed in a meeting in April, 1995, which Secretary Christopher had with PRC Foreign Minister Qian Qichen at which he said that our fundamental policy was still not to allow visits to the U.S. by high level Taiwan officials. However, Christopher also said that we were having a difficult time convincing the U.S. Congress that this was the right course, and the pressure was building up. Understandably, Qian Qichen reported the first part of Christopher's remarks back to PRC President Jiang Zemin and others that the U.S. continued to oppose such visits. Either he didn't report the second part of Christopher's remarks or didn't give appropriate weight to these Congressional pressures. Maybe Qian Qichen thought that, whatever these pressures, we would just ignore them.

I'm not trying to say that Secretary Christopher was trying to tell Qian Qichen that we were going to reverse our policy on visits by high-ranking Taiwan officials. The PRC authorities, I think, were caught by surprise, but there was a lot of foreshadowing by Christopher to Qian Qichen of the ultimate decision, based on the fact that there were great difficulties in the way of continuing this policy. When we did reverse this policy on visits to the U.S. by high-ranking Taiwan officials, Qian Qichen didn't say that he was personally embarrassed. PRC President Jiang Zemin was embarrassed, to the extent that he looked as if he had been outflanked by Taiwan at a time when Jiang was trying to consolidate his position. This was a very sensitive issue, which was embarrassing both for President Jiang and for Foreign Minister Qian. Qian was identified with dealing with the U.S. and for having gotten these assurances that there would be no further visits to the U.S. by high-level Taiwan officials. It was one of the reasons why Foreign Minister Qian was so hard-line during the later Taiwan Straits missile crisis. He needed to show that he could be firm on Taiwan and so protect his flank. The same was true with Jiang.

Anyway, the pressure kept up on this proposed visit to the U.S. by President Lee Teng-hui. Congress voted unanimously, without dissent in the House of Representatives, to allow Lee to come for a short visit. In the Senate, I think, the vote was 97 to 1. These were "sense of the Congress" resolutions without legal effect. However, the votes were overwhelming and were a clear message to the administration. The only holdout in the Senate was Senator Bennett Johnson [Democrat, Louisiana], who voted both out of conviction, to avoid upsetting Beijing, and because of various oil interests and so forth. This took guts, I must say, no matter what his views were. So we got to the point where we felt that Congress would be so outraged if we held out on this issue that it might tamper with the Taiwan Relations Act and might enforce other things with respect to Taiwan which could really hurt our policy toward Beijing. The media was also generally beating up on us. The Cassidy firm had been very effective, but these pressures would have been there anyway.

We also felt that the PRC Government was overreacting, of course, but basically we knew that continuing to decline to issue a traveler's permit to Lee Teng-hui was going to cause huge problems. On the other hand, we knew that we had told the PRC Government that we would hang in there, so it was very awkward for us.

Now, I was traveling overseas in May, 1995, so I didn't get directly involved in the last few days of debate in Washington on the Lee visit. I don't know exactly what I would have done if I had been in Washington at the time. However, I want to make very clear that I knew through back channel messages from my deputy, the acting Assistant Secretary for East Asian and Pacific Affairs, as I was traveling, what was happening and that we were going to reverse our policy and let Lee Teng-hui visit the United States. I did not oppose that decision.

In retrospect, if I had this to do all over again, I think that we should have agreed to grant Lee a traveler's permit from the beginning. We would then have avoided the flip flop in the eyes of the PRC Government, although they still would have been outraged at the decision. However, on the merits, I think that Lee Teng-hui should have been allowed to make a private, unofficial visit, and then we should have been prepared to tough it out with the PRC. Another thing that we should have done, and I'll get to this, is that we should have been much more air tight on the speech that Lee was going to give at Cornell University.

Q: By any chance, during the arguments on this issue within the administration, was the case for letting the Shah of Iran into the United States for medical treatment brought up as something that might have been a parallel?

LORD: No, I don't recall that. By the way, I happen to have been in favor of allowing the Shah of Iran to be brought into the U.S. for medical treatment. But that parallel...

Q: I was just wondering whether that case was considered. There is a certain symmetry...

LORD: In terms of our relations with another country, I understand that, but I don't recall that that argument was used. Basically, it was the impact on Beijing and the pressure on Beijing, versus the impact of the pressures from Congress. And, of course, there was the feeling that the PRC Government was really overreacting on this issue. However, in the end, we were also concerned that Congress might pass legislation which would really tie our hands on Taiwan and China. As I have said, these were incredibly overwhelming votes in both houses of Congress.

There also was the question of timing and the President, and I'll never sort this matter out. When he announced the decision on the travel permit for President Lee Teng-hui, President Clinton expressed the view along the lines of: "I believe in freedom of travel. Why can't the President of Taiwan come to the United States privately?" This seemed to suggest that Clinton didn't know what American positions on proposed visits had been. He finally seemed to conclude that our position had been unreasonable and that we were going to change it. I can't tell you how much President Clinton consulted with Tony Lake [National Security Adviser] and Sandy Berger [Deputy National Security Adviser] as he went along. However, it was such a visible issue that I can't believe that the President wasn't in favor of holding the line. He just changed his mind, and put emphasis on the freedom of travel and other considerations when he announced his decision. Of course, the Congressional pressures were key for him.

Of course, we tried to package this decision for the PRC Government as best we could. What we told them, and what we told Taiwan at the same time that we did this, was that this visit was going to be at the lowest key possible. So we worked out that President Lee would hold no press conferences. He would land in California and go directly to Ithaca, New York, [where Cornell University is located] and not even go through New York City. Of course, not Washington, but not even New York City. He would go directly to Ithaca. He would not be met by any U.S. Government officials, although we would have my Taiwan Country Director accompanying him, partly to keep Lee under control, to work with their people, and make sure that he didn't do something that would be awkward.

There were Congressmen and Senators who wanted to go up to Cornell and meet President Lee. We couldn't do anything about that. However, he would not meet with any administration official, there would be no press conference, and he would not even go through New York City. We were assured by Benjamin Lu, the Taiwan representative in Washington, that Lee's speech would be low key, would be non-political, and would cover economic reforms in Taiwan. So, in retrospect, the other thing that we should have done was to obtain the text of his proposed speech in advance. I know that we attempted very vigorously to get details of the speech from the Taiwan representative in Washington, but without success. This should have made us suspicious.

In retrospect, and I didn't argue this at the time, we should have given him the visa from the beginning, so we wouldn't have had a public flip flop on the issue. We wouldn't have had these pressures from Congress and the awkward reversal of policy. This would have helped modestly with Beijing. In the context of air tightness, on the trip being unofficial and low key, which we managed to pull off on other things, besides the speech, we should have said that we would only approve the issuance of a travel permit for Lee if we could see the text of the speech in advance. If he didn't like this condition, he didn't have to come to the U.S. at all.

I am convinced that the Lee speech created a major problem. The PRC Government was going to scream and shout, even without the speech. However, the fact is that during most of the Lee visit, we kept the press away, we limited his itinerary, and we explained all of this to the PRC Chinese.

They did not react all that strongly during the lead up to the Lee visit and even during the first couple of days of it. The reaction was strong, but not in terms of the decibel count that I was familiar with in terms of the Chinese rhetoric. Then Lee gave his speech. In his speech he had countless references to the "Republic of China on Taiwan, in addition to other provocations." He totally double crossed us. Of course, the PRC Chinese went ballistic. I must say that I went ballistic as well, as did others in the U.S. Government. After all, on this issue President Clinton had stuck his neck out, risking our relationship with the PRC, and then Lee gave a big political speech on Taiwan.

As a result, on my own, I just refused thereafter to receive Benjamin Lu, the Taiwan representative. I was not personally given any instructions to do this and I didn't consult anyone. For a few months he had absolutely no access to me. I was the highest level official in the State Department that he was allowed to see and I had been seeing him regularly. Because of his performance on the visit, however, and to register our displeasure on the speech, I just ignored him. He was finally recalled to Taiwan. I would like to think that I had something to do with it. He is a nice man but ineffectual. However, he personally could have been more helpful. He was either weak or disingenuous. He had been lobbying Congress and going around us, without attempting to discuss the matter with us. He wasn't respected in Taiwan, anyway. Everyone thought that his appointment to Washington was somewhat puzzling to begin with. I was therefore sending a message to Taiwan about our unhappiness over this issue but also our unhappiness with his behavior. As a result, he was withdrawn from Washington, but not just because of me. But the Taiwan Government saw that he had no access to the State Department, and this contributed to its decision to withdraw him from Washington.

Anyway, we were very tough with Taiwan afterwards. Also we went back to Beijing on it, but in any case the damage was done. PRC President Jiang Zemin and Foreign Minister Qian Qichen in particular thought that they had been embarrassed on this matter. I don't remember all of the things that happened, but the PRC Government cut off some trips and exchanges. They withdrew their Ambassador from Washington, and relations got very frosty just when we had been making some progress on our relationship. I think that the PRC began its first military exercise [in the Taiwan Straits] in summer, 1995, not long after the Lee visit.

I also paid close attention to Hong Kong throughout my tenure. The British colony was to return to Chinese sovereignty on July 1, 1997, after I left office. I thought it was important to underscore American support for Hong Kong's future autonomy and freedom under Chinese rule. I enthusiastically supported Governor Chris Patten's efforts - and tangle with Beijing - to introduce some elements of political choice and democracy. This would constitute a glass ceiling which the Chinese would have to break if they wanted to roll back reform. Of course, the British were late at doing this - Patten had the courage and foresight to do this whereas all his predecessors had essentially kow-towed to Beijing. Some of them, and some so-called China experts in the U.S., criticized Patten for this. I strongly supported him, as did our government. I would always see him, usually at a private working breakfast on my several trips there to show the flag.

I would also meet with the Chinese representatives (NCNA) and urge tolerance in China's self-interest. Christopher and I would also raise this in our meetings with Chinese officials elsewhere.

In Hong Kong I would also meet with American businesspeople, Hong Kong business types, and Hong Kong legislators, including democracy activists, like Martin Lee. I would include support for Hong Kong in various speeches and hold press conferences there, as elsewhere in Asia.

At any rate they fired some missiles and had some military exercises. We reacted to this, saying that these exercises were not helpful, but I don't recall any high level protest, since they were not particularly provocative.

In 1995 we got MFN status renewed for China by a fairly significant majority despite the controversy that came up every year. We kept working on other issues. However, as we reached the beginning of 1996, it looked as if we faced a real nightmare. This was even before the Taiwan Missile Crisis heated up again. We had been able to improve relations somewhat with the PRC but we discovered that there was a whole minefield ahead of us. The Chinese were sending ring magnets to Pakistan, which helped Pakistan develop their nuclear capability. Consequently, we slapped on sanctions because of that.

We had very tough negotiations on intellectual property rights. American business interests were losing billions of dollars each year because of pirating [unauthorized copying] by the PRC Chinese of CDs [Compact Discs], VCRs [Video Cassette Recorders], computer software, pharmaceutical products patented in the U.S., and so forth.

In March, 1996, we had coming up the annual tussle in Geneva over a resolution critiquing Chinese human rights. This was always a source of irritation between us and Beijing. The MFN extension would come up after that in May-June, and the human rights issue wasn't going well. There was still the chill left over from the withdrawal of the PRC Ambassador from Washington in the wake of the Lee visit, although he would have returned by then. I don't remember when exactly. However, there was a basic chill on exchanges with the PRC. So the relationship between the U.S. and the PRC Chinese was not in very good shape early in 1996 and difficult issues lay ahead.

With my encouragement Secretary Christopher - of course with the full agreement and encouragement of the White House - said that we have to look at our whole policy toward China and see how the hell we are going to get back on track in terms of our relationship and get through all of these minefields. I don't recall whether it was January, 1996, or it may even have been in the fall of 1995. At any rate, we began a process of intensive, strategic reviews, both in the State Department and at the White House. Either Sandy Berger would chair meetings at the White House or Christopher chaired meetings at the State Department, with Sandy Berger or Tony Lake coming over to the State Department.

The point I am making is that this contradicts stories that this was essentially a Christopher-led operation or a White House one. Meetings were held at the White House and the State Department and there was total cooperation. Everyone felt that we had to see how the hell we were going to get through this minefield of issues. So we not only looked at specifics about what we would do about IPR, what we would do about nuclear non-proliferation, and what we would do about human rights. We also considered our approach to all of these issues, generally. It was agreed, among other things, that we really would try to make a much more aggressive effort to engage in a strategic dialogue with the PRC, even as we referred to individual issues.

I should add that at this time Liu Haoqui was Tony Lake's equivalent within the Chinese hierarchy as National Security Adviser, although not as powerful, reporting directly to Lee Peng [PRC Prime Minister]. He was also Vice Foreign Minister. He had been an America hand for some time, including when I was in Beijing as Ambassador. Anyway, Liu was coming to visit the PRC Embassy in Washington in March, 1996, to talk to all of the PRC Consuls General and the PRC Ambassador. This was a sort of "Chiefs of Mission meeting," whatever they called it. So, with close coordination between the State Department and the White House, we requested that Liu spend some time, not only with the usual suspects in the State and Defense Departments but also with the National Security Adviser. We arranged a day-long retreat and to have a strategic dialogue with him.

This was done with Christopher's agreement with the understanding that I would sit in on all the Lake-Liu talks. The PRC Government clearly appreciated that there was full coordination within the U.S. Government, with Secretary Christopher keeping up his vigorous efforts with the PRC Foreign Minister, which he did, throughout this period.

Lo and behold, on the day Liu arrived in Washington, Friday, March 7, 1996, the PRC fired missiles that landed on either side of Taiwan. One missile landed off one port in Taiwan and two others, I believe, landed off a second port. This incident greatly escalated the tension in the Taiwan Straits. As I previously mentioned, the PRC had already held military exercises in the area, and tensions were building up. That was the other development which was already making things look pretty grim in early 1996.

So that particular time - March 1996 - was clearly the low point in U.S.-China relations during the first Clinton term. All of these factors came together, with the missile crisis being the latest and the most dramatic.

As we looked toward the Liu visit, we had decided not to change our policy toward the PRC, but to implement it much more aggressively in terms of a strategic dialogue, looking ahead at all of these minefields and the continuing problems we were having. We were engaged in mapping out what we would do on each of these issues. But also we tried to think of ways that we could do things the PRC might find positive, in addition to pressing them on things that they would find difficult. So a lot of discussions on strategy went on, as I say, between the State Department and the White House. Secretary Christopher chaired most of the key sessions, unlike what is stated in this "Washington Post" article, which emphasized the role of the White House.

Q: You might mention why we are mentioning the "Washington Post."

LORD: Well, as we speak here in late June, 1998, there has been a two-part series of articles in the "Washington Post" which essentially could have been written by Tony Lake and his new partner, Rothkop, who used to work in the Department of Commerce. These articles essentially said that U.S. China policy during the Clinton administration was screwed up by the State Department until Tony Lake rescued it. That's what I'm referring to.

I will give Lake his due, as we go ahead, you can be certain. It's just that this is a one-sided view. I'm not saying that Lake wrote these articles. I'm just saying that these articles contain a lot of spinning, in the sense that they are a very partial view, if you look at them from the historical perspective. The facts are that both Lake (with me by his side) and Christopher worked on improving our relations with China in 1996. There was total coordination in our government. It was natural, and healthy for the National Security Advisor to get more involved (until then, it was mostly his deputy, Berger), but this was done in close concert with Christopher and me. Together we did a very skillful job on China in 1996 and by the end of the year relations were much more positive.

We had arranged for Liu's visit to begin on a Friday night with an informal dinner at the State Department, hosted by Secretary of State Christopher. This was to make clear, as Liu went off the next day for a full day's meeting with Tony Lake and me, that the State Department was still heavily involved in U.S. foreign policy. So as part of a united front, Lake was going to come over to the Department, and they were going to have a joint dinner with Liu.

When we got word of the PRC missile firings, we decided to add Secretary of Defense Perry to the discussions we were going to have with Liu. I don't believe that we included the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Gen Shalikashvili. So the dinner included Secretary of State Christopher; Secretary of Defense Perry; Tony Lake, National Security Adviser; myself; and Jeff Bader, the PRC Country Director, who was note taker. I can't remember whether Sandy Berger was there. It was a small dinner, with about six or seven of us on the U.S. side. We decided to do a full court press, of course, on the PRC missile firings. This was now required before opening up a strategic dialogue on the next day. This had now been overtaken by the PRC missile firings, which we had to address first. We weren't going to cancel the Liu visit. However, we had to carry out our policy of having a strategic dialogue against the backdrop of firmness in view of this Chinese provocation.

It was agreed that first Secretary of Defense Perry, then Secretary of State Christopher, and then National Security Adviser Lake would speak, although I am not entirely certain of the order in which they spoke. I know that Secretary Perry went first. Each of the three speakers was to deliver a tough message over dinner. We worked closely together on this. In effect, Perry, and this has been covered in the article in the "Washington Post," said that what Beijing had done could result in grave consequences. This was a pretty heavily loaded term. He said that this could lead to a possible conflict with the United States. He likened what the PRC had done, firing missiles North and South of Taiwan, as a kind of bracketing artillery fire, where you fire to one side and then to the other side so that you can zoom in on the actual target. He used that image, which was strong language. And Christopher and Lake also used strong language.

Our clear impression was that Liu was totally surprised by the timing of the missile firings, if not the missile firings themselves. I'm sure he was not pleased that this was the way that he was starting his visit to Washington. Liu, of course, was firm. He is always firm. He can be jovial at times. He was personally very friendly to me and my wife on many occasions when we were in China, so I have personal respect for him. However, he can be very feisty in his discussions in defending Chinese interests and attacking the U.S. So he was tough. However, I felt that, by Chinese standards, he was on the defensive, and his decibel level was under control. He clearly felt awkward about this situation, although he didn't say that, of course.

So we basically spent the whole dinner on this one subject. We made some references to the view that we hoped to move ahead with our relationship. We noted that Liu would be meeting with Tony Lake throughout all of the following day. However, we indicated that we thought that this was a hell of a way to start important discussions.

On the next day there was a lot of snow on the ground, and it was cold. We drove down to Pamela Harriman's estate in Virginia. It is called "Pelican Estate" and it is secluded. I forget the exact town it is near. There were four of us on our side, including Tony Lake, Bob Suettinger of the NSC staff, Jeff Bader, and myself. We had worked closely with Tony Lake in setting this up. We worked very well together. Tony Lake did an extremely good job and deserves a lot of credit. He helped a lot. He had not played that much of a role on China policy, as Sandy Berger had. Now he was getting more involved on some of these Asian issues, generally and specifically on China. It's true that Lake had been advised by some outsiders that the White House should get more involved, including Tony Lake personally, as Zbigniew Brzezinski and Henry Kissinger had formerly played key roles on China issues. Lake should have been doing the same thing here. In years gone by Kissinger and Haig had urged the importance of our having a strategic dialogue with China, and the importance of having the White House involved in it.

So we carefully scripted how we would approach the meeting with Liu. We sat in a comfortable living room. There were four people on the Chinese side, plus one interpreter. We sat around a fireplace and then went into the dining room for a working luncheon. Following this, we came back to the living room and sat around the fireplace. The discussion lasted roughly from 9:00 AM to 4:00 PM, including lunch. Our strategy was the classical one to follow at a time like this. First, we had to repeat the warnings and the grave concerns expressed at dinner on the night before, regarding the Chinese missile firings at Taiwan. We began with that.

Tony Lake also made references to words that we heard from Charles Freeman about a potential Chinese threat against us (Los Angeles specifically), if we had a nuclear confrontation. We said that we didn't know how authoritative these words were, but we didn't like what we were hearing. So there was some tough talk at the beginning, reiterating the points made the night before.

We then went over to what was supposed to be a more constructive discussion. We decided to do that in three parts. They were carefully scripted but were also projected to the Chinese in advance. The first part of the presentation was more conceptual, philosophical, and strategic, describing two great powers heading into the next century, that is, how we could work together, why that is important, and how we see China. We said that we want to see China as a strong, stable, prosperous, and open society. We weren't out to contain China, divide it, or subvert it. We thought that it was in our interest for China to have these attributes. We would not oppose China in developing such a society and, indeed, would work with it. However, we said that we were also hard-headed and would defend our interests. We would maintain our force levels and our alliances. We would be firm in negotiating. We had interests and would stand up for our values. This was a philosophical discussion of our approach and why it was important to have a strategic dialogue with China. We sketched out some areas where we could work more effectively together and give some content to this approach.

Some of the areas involved ranged from Korea to Cambodia, regional security dialogues, APEC, economic questions, Chinese admission to the WTO [World Trade Organization], and environmental questions, crime and narcotics. All of these things have become more familiar today. We laid most of those out on this occasion, as I recall.

So we started with this conceptual, philosophical, and strategic framework of a rather positive nature, after the initial pounding about Chinese missile firings in the vicinity of Taiwan.

Then in the second part of the day we took on the tough issues. We didn't want to start with the negative side. We wanted to set out a strategic, positive framework within which to take up these tough issues. We also didn't want to end up with negative issues but rather on a positive note. So we put the tough issues in the middle. We covered human rights, trade, nuclear non-proliferation, Taiwan, and so on.

Then we ended up in part three by indicating where we could go on some of the issues which we had sketched in the agenda earlier in the presentation. We outlined some suggestions on how we could make progress on troublesome issues such as nuclear non-proliferation, human rights, and some other matters, as well as reference back to regional security, economics, and some of the other positive aspects. We also proposed the intensification of exchanges between the two countries at various levels, and, I believe, some foreshadowing, without locking ourselves into it, of a possible summit meeting. We indicated that our Presidents had met on occasion and we suggested that this might be a good idea.

Q: President Clinton had not yet made a state visit to China.

LORD: No. He hadn't made a visit to China of any kind. The last visit had been made by President Bush in 1989.

That, basically, was the approach we made to the Chinese. Tony Lake handled himself very well. There was a firm discussion, particularly in the middle part of the agenda. However, it was clearly constructive, and, obviously, the Chinese liked the fact that this was a discussion at the strategic level of two great powers. Lake and Liu livened the discussion with some humor at times, and so on. On the whole, it was the most extensive discussion and the most strategic that we had with the Chinese during the first Clinton term.

It was the best such discussion that we had had because previous meetings, whoever was conducting them for the U.S., lasted for only an hour here or two hours there. We never had more than a two or two and a half hour meeting. For this meeting we purposely got out of our Washington offices and from within range of telephones. We knew that we had seven hours to discuss these matters. It was an important step, particularly since we had reached the nadir of our relationship at that point. I believe that this meeting helped set the stage for an improvement in our relations thereafter. It was a turning point. I'll get into more detail on that.

We still have to comment on what the Chinese were up to at this point. Do you want me to answer any questions about this meeting, which was held, I believe, near Middleburg, Virginia?

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: Could you say something about what the Chinese raised with you when you asked them for this meeting? How serious were the discussions which Chas. Freeman had with General Xiong?

LORD: It depends on whom you were talking to. Chas. Freeman likes to think that these discussions were of fundamental importance. I think that that's baloney. It was vague, at least the way we heard it at the time. It seems to have gotten more precise since then.

But I think that we all felt that there was enough there that we had to respond and take note of it. We didn't want to inflate its importance. Obviously, it wasn't coming...

Q: What was supposed to be coming out of this?

LORD: Basically the Chinese were alleged to have said more or less as follows. They said: "Look, we're not worried if we get into some tension and potential conflict with the United States. By the way, we have nuclear weapons, too. In the event of a real confrontation we don't think that the Americans are going to give up Los Angeles in exchange for Taiwan."

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: They basically said that in the 1950s and 1960s it was possible for the United States to eliminate China with nuclear weapons. However, times have changed, and the United States would not be willing to sacrifice Los Angeles for Taiwan.

LORD: So this was unpleasant, but it wasn't so authoritative that we wanted to give this comment the dignity of an official, Chinese position. We also wanted to let them know that we had noticed the comment. I wonder whether this exchange was quite as important as Freeman suggested. Nevertheless, he felt that he had the obligation to report it, and it was of potential significance. So we addressed that matter head on at the Saturday session as well, but not at great length. Does that answer your question?

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: Yes.

LORD: On the very next day we met in Secretary of Defense Perry's office on the Taiwan missile crisis. This was Saturday, March 8. We were, of course, very concerned about Chinese actions. We felt that, obviously, China was seeking to intimidate Taiwan and influence the Presidential election there. There still was residual fallout not only from the visit of President Lee Teng-hui to the U.S., but from Taiwanese diplomacy, which was trying to get more international profile. Taiwan was trying to get into the UN, in response to growing independence sentiment in Taiwan. Beijing, in its heavy-handed way, was trying to prevent this.

This shows how little the PRC leaders understood about democracy. All they did was to increase Lee's margin of victory in the Taiwan presidential elections and make many people on Taiwan very angry. The Chinese also scared countries in East Asia. On the other hand, in effect the PRC sent a message to Taiwan that, although they can't attack Taiwan in an amphibious way, they could lob in a few missiles. They could affect the Taiwan stock market, investment, and so forth.

So the PRC didn't lose totally on this. I'm sure that the PRC rationalized it in their own mind that their tough muscling around had some positive impact.

In any event, we met in Secretary Perry's office on Saturday morning, March 8. I remember that I went over to the Georgetown section of Washington and joined Secretary Christopher at his home and then rode over with him to the Pentagon for this meeting. The Americans present were Perry, Christopher, and myself - I was the only sub-cabinet official there - John Deutch, the Director of Central Intelligence, was there, as was JCS Chairman General Shalikashvili, and either Tony Lake or Sandy Berger from the National Security Council staff. Probably Lake, but maybe both of them were there. I just can't remember.

Perry's office had charts on display for the meeting. Perry had Gen Shali do the presentation. Basically, there was no debate. The question was what, if anything, we could do to deter Chinese use of force. Neither we nor Taiwan had any intelligence that the PRC was going to use force at that time against Taiwan, beyond firing a few missiles and using intimidation. We had no evidence that the PRC was going to hit an uninhabited island with a missile or harass shipping. Certainly, the PRC was not going to attack Taiwan if they didn't even have the capability to attack one of the offshore islands. As far as we knew, none of this was within the PRC range of capabilities. Our best judgment was that the PRC wanted to engage in psychological and political warfare to intimidate Taiwan and send a signal about the sensitivity of this issue, from the PRC point of view. Taiwan intelligence agreed with that view.

Having said that, it was agreed that there was a five or ten percent chance that we were wrong. The PRC might take aggressive action at the lower level, namely, for example, seize an uninhabited offshore island or lob a missile at some uninhabited territory. The PRC might possibly go after one of the larger, offshore islands, although we believed that they couldn't take even one of the offshore islands without bloody fighting, and they would have to prepare to do that well in advance. We knew that the PRC wouldn't attack Taiwan itself, because they couldn't do so. Furthermore, that would be incredibly provocative.

There was a danger that our intelligence was wrong and that the PRC might just do something of a modest nature which would still be very humiliating and which would make it very difficult for us to decide what to do in response. Or, through miscalculation, the PRC might stumble into action. Either a missile misfire could hit a populated center, or harassment of shipping could result in a collision or some incident in the air. Or something could happen just inadvertently. There was unanimous agreement, and Secretary Perry stressed this point, "an ounce of prevention is worth an awful lot of cure." Our choices after the Chinese had done something would be much more difficult, even after an accident, however modest it was, than if we deterred them from the beginning. So the feeling was that we had to have a demonstration, beyond the rhetoric that we had been applying, both privately, through diplomatic channels, and publicly, when we strongly criticized what the Chinese were up to.

We had to show the Chinese that we were serious. Furthermore, we wanted to show our allies and friends in the East Asian region that we were reliable partners. We wanted to remind Beijing that we were number one in terms of military power. We also, of course, wanted to reassure Taiwan about its security concerns. We wanted to show Beijing that provocation doesn't pay and is dangerous. And, of course, we were concerned about our domestic front in Congress, whose views we shared completely. Many members of Congress were concerned about Taiwan and were angry about what Beijing was up to. For all of these reasons there was a unanimous view in this group which met in Secretary Perry's office that we needed to do something significant.

We had the usual aircraft carrier deployed in the region. I think that the USS INDEPENDENCE had been undergoing repairs and overhaul in Yokohama. I guess that by the time of this meeting it had already sailed, with its accompanying battle group. We made sure that it moved close to the region of the Taiwan Straits. This key decision, by itself, would get some attention from Beijing, in the sense that this was a carrier deployed in the Pacific. When we moved it closer to Taiwan, this was significant but it was not particularly dramatic. We didn't want to take any half measures. So we purposely decided, again without anybody disagreeing, to deploy another aircraft carrier, along with its accompanying escorts, to the area, which would really make our point. This would marshal the biggest fighting force in the Western Pacific for a long time.

We had to get this second carrier, which I think was the USS ENTERPRISE, from the Indian Ocean or Persian Gulf, so this carrier had to be replaced from somewhere else. Of course, it took some time for it to get to the vicinity of Taiwan. The very fact that we were deploying a second carrier would - did - get everyone's attention. So it was agreed, and Sandy Berger or Tony Lake, whoever was there, and I guess it was Lake, said that he would take this matter back for presidential approval, which he got by that night. We agreed that we wanted the word of this redeployment of the second carrier to get out quickly. We didn't want to be overly high profile, but it was important for the word to get out rather quickly to have an impact on Beijing and U.S. domestic audiences. After all, the information about the PRC missile firings had spread quickly and was causing a great stir.

Secretary Christopher was due to be on the TV program, "Meet the Press," which was one of the Sunday talk shows on March 9. We decided at the State Department to have Secretary Christopher handle the announcement during this program. I don't know whether we checked with anyone else on this, but it had been agreed by everyone who had been at the meeting in Perry's office that we would get the word out. Christopher had taken enough of a beating on China policy and deserved better than the treatment he had received. So, it was appropriate for him to take the public lead on this key move. So he got the word out. I forget the exact phrasing he used on "Meet the Press."

We were working on this matter on both sides of the Straits. With Beijing, of course, the most dramatic signal was the deployment of these aircraft carriers to the Taiwan Straits. Both publicly and privately in our rhetoric, we were telling Beijing not to use force and get into a conflict with grave consequences and so forth. At the same time we were providing them both for real as well as for face reasons, evidence that we were not changing our policy toward Taiwan. Our policy was still a One China policy. We assured Beijing of continuity. We also told Beijing that we were telling Taiwan that they shouldn't be overly provocative in their diplomacy. So we sent a double barreled message to Beijing, that is, aircraft carriers, "tough rhetoric," and "don't use force" coupled with assurance that we were sticking with our China policy. We were disturbed with what Beijing had done but we weren't going to change our policy on One China. We were urging Taiwan to cool it. We were encouraging Beijing and Taiwan to have direct talks across the Taiwan Straits. We did not put the carriers in the Strait itself but kept them nearby.

With Taiwan, of course, the deployment of the carriers was reassuring and a great boost to morale. It made the point. We also filled this in with appropriate rhetoric. We told them that we found what Beijing was doing was unacceptable. However, we told Taiwan that we didn't like Taiwan's being overly provocative in its diplomacy, because this might drag the U.S. into a conflict. We said that we didn't think that this would serve Taiwan's interest because tensions in the Taiwan Straits don't serve Taiwan's security or the economy of Taiwan. Recalling President Lee's speech at Cornell University and Taiwan's direct dealings with the U.S. Congress, we were not going to let them outflank us. As for Taiwan's international diplomacy, the U.S. would support Taiwan's efforts to get into international organizations which do not require statehood for entry. In fact, I don't recall whether we tried to discourage Taiwan from its campaign to get into the UN but we did say that we didn't want Taiwan to act in a provocative way. We told Taiwan that they could see that we continued to ensure its security, and they could see what we were doing with the deployment of the aircraft carriers to the Western Pacific. In return, Taiwan owed us some restraint.

Specifically, we had Peter Tarnoff, the Undersecretary of State for Political Affairs, and Sandy Berger, Deputy National Security Adviser, meet secretly at a hotel in New York with Ding Moushi, who had been the Taiwan representative in Washington during the early part of the Clinton administration. He was now a direct adviser to the Taiwan Government on national security affairs, although not the national security adviser to President Lee Teng-hui of Taiwan. We knew that he had a direct pipeline to President Lee and was also an able guy, unlike Benjamin Lu, then representative at the time in Washington. We didn't even tell Benjamin Lu that this meeting was taking place at a hotel in New York. So they met up in New York. I didn't go. My country director, Bodey, went. Tarnoff represented State. He and Berger delivered both the reassurances to Taiwan and the point that they not be provocative at the same time.

I happen to think that this combination of rhetoric and diplomacy with Beijing and Taipei was one of our finer moments. This deployment of carriers to the Taiwan Straits helped to cool things down. From then on our relationship with Beijing started to improve. As I've already indicated, Beijing probably saw that the missile firings had backfired. They had caused apprehensions in Asia and caused a conflict with us in which Beijing had to stand down and stop firing missiles. So their firing of these missiles hadn't been a ringing success. On the other hand, President Jiang Zemin, of the PRC, had now protected his flank on Taiwan, after looking awkward because of the visit to the U.S. by President Li Teng-hui of Taiwan. Jiang Zemin was still consolidating his position. The PRC showed that it could cause jitters of an economic, if not security, nature, with regard to Taiwan. But on the whole, we figured that the missile firings toward Taiwan was not one of the PRC's wisest decisions.

Meanwhile, we got lots of credit in Asia. Taiwan, of course, warmly welcomed our show of support. The Asian reactions were very supportive but as usual quiet. I think that the Australians came up with a public statement. Many Asian governments patted us on the back and were very happy, although not many said so publicly. This was the usual game that they played with Beijing. We know that we did ourselves an awful lot of good throughout Asia, without exception, because the East Asian countries were concerned about this episode, about China creating mischief in 1994 in the South China Sea, and China's buildup of its military. Even though nobody wanted a confrontation with China, and rather wanted engagement, the East Asian countries were concerned about Chinese power. That was one of the reasons, along with keeping Japan under control, that these countries welcomed the U.S. military presence in East Asia. So they welcomed our checking China. These actions were also applauded in Congress and in the U.S. press. We got a lot of credit, in contrast to our previously having taken a beating on China policy on some occasions. It was kind of refreshing to have all of these kudos. I think that we deserved them and that we handled this situation quite well. To this day, even critics of the China policy during Clinton's presidency all applaud our handling of the 1996 missile crisis.

We then worked on all of these other elements of the Chinese-American relationship. There were major negotiations on nuclear non-proliferation. We got the Chinese to agree by May, 1996, not to ship any nuclear materials to non-safeguarded facilities in Pakistan. With this and other Chinese steps, we were able to lift the sanctions previously imposed, and so we made progress on nuclear non-proliferation.

On intellectual property rights we threatened China with the largest sanctions in the history of trade negotiations in order to get their compliance. These sanctions would have affected about $3.0 billion worth of Chinese exports. We got close to publishing the list, but our leverage worked. As a result of tough negotiations, we got a very good agreement, including arrangements for enforcement by the Chinese, which our industry strongly supported. So we got that issue out of the way.

We were stepping up our dialogue on other issues. We had continual meetings at my level in Washington and, of course, in regional security talks in July, 1996. Also, Tony Lake went to Beijing in July, 1996. I went with him once again. We continued the strategic dialogue with the PRC, in this case in Beijing. It was held in the Dai Yutai guest house, which is in a compound away from the office buildings of the PRC Government. It wasn't as distant from the center of the PRC Government as Pamela Harriman's estate in Middleburg, Virginia, had been for the talks with Liu. We had similar meetings with PRC officials on the strategic dialogue regarding where we wanted to go strategically in the future in handling ongoing, tough issues, as well as expanding our positive agenda.

We were now talking about reciprocal summit meetings. We got pretty concrete during that visit. We had come up with this idea earlier as well, but not in as concrete terms. In addition to Tony Lake carrying on this dialogue, I participated in it, and we found it very helpful. Secretary Christopher was also working very hard through messages to the Chinese foreign minister and through his meetings to get the Chinese-American relationship back on track. Christopher made several statements and speeches, although we never got one from President Clinton. We had begun to solve some of the contentious issues. The extension of MFN was resolved without difficulty. We made modest progress on trade, nuclear non-proliferation, and even human rights. None of this was dramatic. The Taiwan issue was defused, and we began to expand our agenda.

In short, by the time Secretary Christopher went to China in November, 1996, we had developed considerable momentum. Already in the air was the possibility of a summit meeting. We went to China just before going to Manila, where the annual summit meeting of APEC was taking place, and President Clinton would meet PRC President Jiang Zemin. This was a happy note to close off Clinton's first, four-year term, in contrast to Christopher's earlier Beijing visit. There were very warm and friendly discussions with PRC Foreign Minister Qian Qichen. It was agreed that the two Presidents would announce mutual summit meetings when they got to Manila a few days later. We made some progress on other substantive issues.

Christopher gave a major speech on bilateral relations in Shanghai. With my encouragement, he deleted references to "partnership" with China as being overly optimistic. We had a banner with this phrase at the speech site changed. Christopher and I didn't want a misleading label that would make us look naive in our relations with China. But in the second term, after we had both left, the Clinton Administration unwisely used the even worse phrase "strategic partnership."

We went from China to Manila where the two presidents jointly announced the two summit meetings.

So we concluded the first Clinton term in a lot better shape than we had been at any time during those four years [1993-1997]. Specifically, we had come a great distance from March, 1996. Now I'll answer your questions.

I would agree that we could have done some things better before 1996. On the other hand, I think that any fair-minded critic would say that from March, 1996, the nadir of the Chinese-American relationship, we did an excellent job. This continued till the end of the first Clinton term where U.S.-China relations were in their best shape of the four years. I think that we handled ourselves very well with an appropriate mixture of firmness, expanding the dialogue, and highlighting a positive agenda. We finally were getting more public statements about our policy toward the PRC, but still not out of the White House.

So this was one of the reasons that I felt comfortable about leaving at the end of the first Clinton term. I thought that our policy toward Asia was generally in good shape. We had strengthened our alliance with Japan, reduced tensions in Korea, normalized relations with Vietnam and moved ahead with APEC and ARF, and made progress elsewhere. I felt that our China relationship was on track and heading for summit meetings. We had gotten out of this difficult period and were headed on a generally positive but still inevitably mixed course. Given my long relationship with the China issue, I wanted to feel that way before I left government service.

Q: We're probably reaching our endurance levels here, but, just for a minute, let's talk about when we were in the trough of our relations with China. At that time, did anyone say that we ought to play or threaten to play, the Taiwan card? I mean that if the PRC was going to be beastly on human rights or something like that, we might do something like invite President Li Teng-hui to come to the U.S. for an informal lunch at the White House, or something like that.

LORD: That's a good question and a fair one. The answer is: "No." I don't recall anyone ever suggesting that. I myself would have been against such a course. I could get impatient with the PRC and would argue about how firm we should be with them. I believe in using leverage and pressure at times. However, you have to take into account the best mix with the Chinese and face and the effects, as opposed to posturing.

On Taiwan I always felt that we shouldn't touch that. It was too sensitive. I didn't think that we should be any less faithful to Taiwan but I also didn't think that we should be provocative to Beijing. I don't recall anyone ever suggesting that we should stick it to the Chinese by fooling around with our Taiwan policy. So this just didn't happen.

In the inevitable debates over individual arms sales to Taiwan some people in the Pentagon and in the Department of Commerce may sometimes have wanted to be somewhat more ambitious, although I'm not even sure about that. The Pentagon would not necessarily always be for arms sales to Taiwan. These were individual decisions, and reasonable people could disagree on Taiwan defense needs, whether offensive or defensive. I was always supportive of a solid arms sales policy to support Taiwan.

As for diplomacy, no, no one ever said that the PRC leaders were being tough and therefore let's give President Lee Teng-hui a state dinner at the White House, and so on. This kind of possible action was never proposed at my level, or any other level.

Q: Regarding the missile crisis caused by the PRC firing missiles near Taiwan, there had been an even more dangerous crisis during the Cold War. We deployed Patriot missile batteries in Israel. The Patriot missiles were designed to shoot down just the type of missiles that the PRC had. Did we consider doing anything of that nature?

LORD: We had already provided Patriot missile equipment to Taiwan. It was called MAD. This did not mean "Mutual Assured Destruction" but something else called, "Modified Air Defense." I don't remember that we rushed this equipment to them during the middle of the Taiwan Straits crisis. Maybe we provided it to them afterwards.

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: We had promised to provide Patriot missiles to the Chinese Nationalists at some time before the Dole-Clinton election campaign of 1996. I know that Senator Dole spoke about providing Theater Missile Defense to Taiwan, while Clinton said that we were going to speed up the delivery of Patriot missiles to Taiwan.

Q: [Charles Stuart Kennedy] This was during the 1996 election campaign.

Q: [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker] This was after the Taiwan Straits missile firings began, so I'm not sure what was actually in place in Taiwan. I have a few other questions. What was your assessment of Lee?

LORD: I'm basically positive about him. I am less positive than I used to be. He jerked us around on the question of his 1995 trip and speech and the way he was playing with Congress directly instead of the Administration. So that behavior has modestly altered my view of him. However, in terms of the big picture, I think that he deserves great credit. He will be recognized as the man who consolidated and really brought democracy to the presidential level in Taiwan, while maintaining its great economic performance. So, on those grounds alone, I think that he deserves a great deal of credit. His state to state formulation of relations with China in the late 1990s was unduly provocative, however.

Let me make this clear. I can understand his frustrations, and Taiwan's frustrations, about not getting any more international space. We have encouraged the PRC, and we should continue to do so, to let Taiwan participate in some of these international organizations, making clear that this doesn't represent recognition of Taiwan's statehood. It's not a threat to Beijing or to the one China policy. The PRC has let Taiwan participate in APEC and in the WTO. Why not some of the other organizations? Taiwan should be a member of the organizations that don't require statehood and an observer in those that do.

I understand Taiwan's frustrations. It has turned in a great economic performance, is one of the world's largest markets, despite its relatively small size, and has gold and foreign exchange reserves which are among the largest in the world. It is a flourishing democracy, has generally acted in a responsible way, and has a population of 23 million people. I understand its concern that it doesn't have more international profile, even if it preserves the one China principle. However, having said that and against that backdrop, Taiwan, in fact, Lee bypassed the American administration and dealt directly with Congress. It would be a correct description to say that Taiwan did this, in addition to Lee's double crossing us in connection with his speech at Cornell University.

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: Our policy toward Taiwan has basically been one of strategic ambiguity in terms of what we would do in this situation. First of all, how much discussion has there been of changing that policy? Secondly, do you think that President Lee Teng-hui made an assumption that Taiwan would have American support, regardless of what happened?

LORD: A good question. Of course, we didn't want Taiwan to think that they had a blank check from us. That was why we were telling Taiwan not to be provocative just because we were deploying the two carriers to the Taiwan Straits. After all, it was Beijing which provoked that crisis. Nevertheless, it was not in Taiwan's or our interest to have a conflict or tensions in the Taiwan Straits. Just because the U.S. had a commitment to the security of Taiwan, it should not think it could abuse that commitment by getting us all into a scrape which we all would be well advised to avoid.

During the 1996 missile crisis, there was some discussion of the question of strategic ambiguity within the Administration, but I don't recall that there was any view that we should be more precise. During this time I testified a lot before Congressional committees and gave a lot of interviews to the press. I got a lot of questions about why we were not more precise in our response to the PRC challenges, i.e., why we maintained strategic ambiguity. In answer to these questions I used one or another of the following themes.

First of all, the Taiwan Relations Act itself states that any administration has to consult the Congress before taking any specific actions. So I said to Congressmen opposing ambiguity that it was rather ironic that they seemed to want the administration to get out in front of them, whereas the Taiwan Relations Act states that there should be consultations with Congress before action is taken. Secondly, there is a provision in the Taiwan Relations Act, and I don't have the verbatim language of the act here before me, that the administration is obliged to come to the Congress when the situation has developed to the point that the threat to security is so serious that we should consult with Congress on what to do. We've never reached that point. Even in the crisis which arose over the PRC missile firings in the general direction of Taiwan, we didn't invoke that part of the Act. Thirdly, it is prudent generally that you don't state in advance what you will do in specific situations. Fourthly, and most fundamentally, if we get away from ambiguity and go in either direction, we're in trouble. If the PRC thinks that we won't come to the defense of Taiwan in a crunch, it's going to be aggressive and will press Taiwan. In that case we're likely to run into a difficult situation and possibly a conflict. On the other hand, if Taiwan thinks that we're going to come to its defense, no matter what happens, it's going to be provocative, knowing that it's going to have a free ride no matter how angry Beijing gets.

Therefore, we can't be precise about what our response would be in a crisis. Having said that, we've got to use the right kind of adjectives and send aircraft carriers at the right moments to make clear that it's dangerous for Beijing to think that it can act aggressively. However, as we did it, we reassured Beijing that we're not changing our policy. Meanwhile, we made it clear to Taiwan that it doesn't have a blank check.

So there wasn't much debate within the administration on this crisis. Most people saw that rationale. I don't recall people arguing that we should be more precise. Frankly, I didn't feel too much pressure from Capitol Hill. I think that the merits of the case were pretty persuasive. A few Congressmen argued that we should be very precise and tell Beijing exactly what we were going to do.

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: Yes. Subsequently, I think that both Secretary of Defense Perry, and particularly Joe Nye, have said publicly that we ought to be more precise. Would you say that this is a point which may have evolved in their thinking since the missile crisis in the Taiwan Straits and which they didn't express at the time?

LORD: That's correct. I'm not even sure that Joe Nye was in the administration at the time of the crisis over PRC missile firings at targets near Taiwan. I think that he may have left the administration by then.

Now, to complete the coverage of China during the Clinton Administration, I went on a trip with Secretary of Defense Perry and Senators Nunn and Warner [Democrat, Georgia, and Republican, Virginia, respectively], which modestly advanced the military relationship with the PRC. I don't remember the date. I also went on a trip with John Deutch [then Director of CIA], which was black hat but not totally secret. We were prepared to confirm the trip, which, indeed, was part of a longer Asian trip. It leaked out, when he was in South Korea, that he had already been to China. I was with him on that trip. This was very unusual - for the CIA Director to take an Assistant Secretary of State with him. But Deutch had a high opinion of me and wanted my counsel on China. We got along very well. He was not particularly pleased with the Chinese response to intelligence sharing and other issues. He generally wasn't too enthusiastic about the Chinese. I wanted to cover those two trips which I went on, in addition to meetings I had with the President.

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: Could you say anything about why Jim Sasser was chosen to be Ambassador to the PRC? How did that happen?

LORD: First, Ambassador Stape Roy had been terrific, but he was due to leave China and go to Indonesia. We needed a top grade replacement for him in Beijing. Of course, ideally we would want somebody who had had a lot of experience on China and would have the kind of background that Stape Roy and I had. On the other hand, we also needed someone of stature. We were at the point where we were trying to improve our relations with the PRC. We had former Vice President Mondale in Japan, so we wanted somebody who had some stature in Beijing.

We have some terrific people, career people on China in the Foreign Service. But in terms of timing, we've gotten beyond Stape Roy, Art Hummel, Winston Lord, and that generation, and the other ones coming up haven't quite made it to the point where they could yet be Ambassadors to the PRC. Even if these other, capable people could handle the post of Ambassador to the PRC, they don't yet quite have the reputation to do so in terms of their resume. So in the career service we weren't quite at the point where we had a natural choice, though Charles Freeman thought that he was a natural choice to be Ambassador to China. Chas was very disappointed. He had hoped that he would get this assignment. There were some people in the administration who thought that he was overly sympathetic to Beijing. You could have made the case for appointing Freeman as Ambassador to the PRC, since he had been Ambassador to Saudi Arabia, he had the best resume, the most expertise, and was the best Chinese language speaker in the Foreign Service. But there were doubts whether he would be objective enough, whether he would suffer from clientitis.

Briefly, there was no other career candidate. You would have to talk about how well he got along with people in the Pentagon. I don't know anything about that. I would think that they would have checked him with the White House. As I say, some people felt that he wouldn't be tough enough on the Chinese. I never got the impression that Freeman was almost going to be chosen. I believe that in the White House there was a feeling that there was a need for a political Ambassador, one with status and political ties.

Jim Sasser had been senior Democratic Senator from Tennessee. I think that he probably would have been Democratic leader in the Senate if he had been reelected to the Senate in 1996 and if the Democrats hadn't lost their majority in the Senate. In any case, he was one of the leaders of the Democratic Party. He was very close to Vice President Al Gore. He was defeated for reelection to the Senate in 1996 and was looking for a job. So I believe that the initiative for Jim Sasser's appointment as Ambassador to China came from Vice President Gore. President Clinton also thought highly of him. So that's how it came to be.

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: I've forgotten exactly when the U.S.-Japan guidelines were finalized, but clearly they were being discussed while you were still in the State Department.

LORD: Oh, absolutely. We'll get into that in some other session, but I worked very closely with Joe Nye to insulate the U.S.-Japan security relationship and our overall ties from the trade disputes that we had with Japan. Bill Perry [then Secretary of Defense] took the lead on defense guidelines, and Secretary Christopher, my deputy, Tom Hubbard, and I worked with him and his people, especially Kurt Campbell. These guidelines came out around the time of the President's trip to Japan, which was in the spring of 1996.

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: Yes.

LORD: It was a very successful trip. It had been postponed from November, 1995, because President Clinton said that he had to stay home because the budget had not yet been passed. He couldn't go to the APEC meeting in Japan. He was scheduled to make a state visit to Japan, as well as attend the APEC meeting.

We were determined to strengthen our relations with Japan, which is, of course, an important partner in Asia. We had had these trade disputes with Japan. I want to get into this in more detail in another session. We also felt that with the end of the Cold War and the passage of 15 or 20 years it was time to update the guidelines on U.S. policy toward Japan. China had started complaining and had become suspicious. This feeling seemed to have been directed at Taiwan. It appears that the initial, Presidential visit and the Defense guidelines document, also reaffirming the Japan-U.S. alliance generally, which would have taken place in November, 1995, would have been strong, in any event. Then the Taiwan missile crisis, which relates to your question, I'm sure, intervened between the original date for the Presidential visit to Japan and when the visit actually took place, in April, 1996.

Some people have said that the Japan guidelines document was strengthened because of the Taiwan missile crisis. The answer to this is, "Yes." Japan again began to become worried about an aggressive China. However, I want to make the point that this Japan guidelines was going to be a very strong statement of principles. I can't remember the exact time when we finalized the revision of the Japan Defense guidelines document, because this was an ongoing process. It was clear that the revision of the Japan Defense guidelines document was given greater impetus by the Taiwan missile crisis. It was kept ambiguous whether the guidelines document applied to Taiwan. Neither we nor the Japanese have either confirmed or denied it. We were not about to deny that it applied, because it might well apply. However, it was provocative to Beijing to say that it does apply because it considers Taiwan part of the territory of China. The phrasing of "situations surrounding Taiwan..."

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: Situations and areas surrounding...

LORD: "Surrounding Japan," so it doesn't mention Taiwan. So we and Japan effectively stonewalled the Chinese on what the guidelines document really means. We wanted the Chinese to understand that it might well mean Taiwan. However, we didn't say that it did, because that would be provocative.

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: In your experience has it been difficult to get Japan to talk about China? Have there been continuing consultations between the Japanese and American Governments on China problems?

LORD: There have been no difficulties at all. I went out of my way on this subject myself, because of my own, personal experience in the 1970s, the Nixon Shoku, and so forth. I thought that it was crucial to stay in close touch with Japan. I'll talk about Japan in another session. I went to Japan more than to any other country by far. On almost every Asian trip I would drop in on Japan, either at the beginning or the end. We regularly had regional security dialogues, which I promoted and which we worked on at my level, in getting ready for the ministerial meetings. In May I would usually make a trip around Asia. We would meet with Japan at the beginning and coordinate our strategy. We would maintain a constant dialogue on China policy and make sure that there were no surprises in this regard.

The only rift between us was on human rights. Japan just wouldn't put any pressure on China. Partly this was natural policy because Japanese commercial instincts always overrode everything. It was also partly because of their guilt feelings about World War II and the "Rape of Nanjing." The Japanese didn't want to look as if they were lecturing China, when...

Q: The Japanese weren't the right people to do that.

LORD: They weren't the right people. They haven't been exactly forthcoming in confessing their sins in China, or Korea, or World War II generally.

Q: That's what I mean. They haven't really fessed up.

LORD: Yes. Also, on the other hand, the Japanese have sort of said that, because of their history, it's awkward for them to discuss human rights abuses, even though they don't acknowledge their history.

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: The Japanese always seem to be uncomfortable, both when our relations with China are bad and when our relations with China are good.

LORD: A very good point. If our relations with China are bad, then the Japanese get nervous about tensions in the Taiwan Straits, because they might have to choose between the U.S. and China. If U.S. relations with China are good, the Japanese wonder if it will be at Japan's expense. So the phrases which they have been using, and which you may be familiar with, is that we may either bash Japan or may bypass Japan. Right now the Japanese are concerned about our possibly bypassing Japan.

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: One final question that might be a little sensitive, but, particularly, there has been recent pressure by Congress on the administration. Many questions have been asked in Congress about whether the administration should have sanctioned China and/or Pakistan about transfers of missiles and missile technology from China to Pakistan. The administration has always insisted that these transfers haven't been clearly demonstrated. However, intelligence sources have recently suggested that the administration did know about these transfers of missiles and missile technology and that there were such transfers.

LORD: Well, as you know, there have been a lot of issues during the last several years regarding transfers of technology from China to Pakistan and elsewhere in the nuclear and chemical areas. These reports have reflected varying degrees of precision and severity, sanctionability, and so forth.

We did invoke sanctions against China on two occasions, in 1993 and 1995, in this general area.

I think that the specific area to which you refer is whether we had evidence to prove that they shipped missiles and technology to Pakistan. The general feeling was that they were right on the edge, but we never had a smoking gun. In effect, without getting into classified material, we saw suspicious crates and heard chatter about unpacking these crates. We were able to see some signs of training by Pakistanis on how to use certain equipment. This would have been a real hammer if we had invoked the sanctions. I admit that people were not anxious to do this. In any event, you need very high legal standards if you're going to do that, and we didn't have a smoking gun.

Furthermore, we were making progress, generally, in the nuclear area with China. But we were now more concerned about missiles. At that time, the Chinese were then, and even more so now, linking their proliferation of missile technology with our providing arms to Taiwan and in specific terms, Theater Missile Defense equipment. So the Chinese are tough on missiles. They say that it is proliferation when we ship something to Taiwan, which we of course totally reject. There are some ambiguities regarding materials useful for chemical weapons. However, in the nuclear area the Chinese were making progress throughout this period. That was another incentive not to find the PRC guilty on missiles. It is fair to say that there were those, certainly in CIA [Central Intelligence Agency] and maybe in DIA [Defense Intelligence Agency] who felt that the evidence was sufficient and that we should invoke sanctions. But others, including in State, argued we had to have a smoking gun.

We never crossed over that line. I would be the first to admit that we were not anxious to do so. I will also say that if we did have a real smoking gun, of course we would have invoked sanctions. We had every legal and moral obligation to do so. And the Congress would have been very insistent.

There were different sanctions for different reasons. Whatever their laudable purpose, they were generally not well crafted, leaving aside a debate on whether sanctions are effective at all. Most of the effect of sanctions is to cut off our exports. So it hurts our economic interests and has very little impact on Chinese imports. Now, of course, sometimes they want our technology, for whatever reason. But, on the whole, the sanctions were hurting American companies more than China. So the sanctions did not apply particularly effective pressure.

We made progress in the nuclear area. China signed many international agreements. It cut off nuclear assistance to Iran, beyond what it was required to do. It also tightened up on Pakistan. We worked very hard on the missile and other areas as well, through a combination of selective sanctions when we had to apply them and when we felt that they were required. Incentives, either involving lifting the sanctions or possibly by defining more carefully dual technology exports, and the geopolitical dialogue which we carried on were maintained. We have continued to explain why it is in China's self-interest to clamp down on nuclear and missile proliferation. We have said many times that the nuclear arms race in South Asia is going to be of more concern to China than to the U.S., because of geography. We have suggested to the Chinese that they may have helped to create a monster in their own backyard. And with China's growing need for Persian Gulf oil, it has an interest in making sure countries like Iran cannot threaten shipping with missiles. Also nuclear weapons in North Korea would be a real headache for them, and could provoke Japan, South Korea, even Taiwan to develop nuclear weapons.

So the PRC has joined the NPT [Non Proliferation Treaty] and the Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty, even though the Chinese had done much less testing than anybody else. They agreed to cut off the export of fissile materials. They made this agreement on non safeguarded facilities after the ring magnet episode with Pakistan. They agreed not to ship any more missiles to Pakistan. China also joined the Zanger Committee on nuclear exports, and has helped us with regard to North Korea. I think that it's fair to say that, on the whole, they've moved forward on the nuclear front. Of course, that was shown by the decision of President Clinton to go forward with a nuclear agreement during the visit of President Jiang Zemin last October, implementing the agreement which we reached in 1985 when I was Ambassador to the PRC. We had never sent this agreement to Congress for ratification because we couldn't say, in good conscience, that the PRC had ended its unhelpful activities with Pakistan and Iran. The fact that the President could now go ahead with the nuclear agreement showed the progress made with China in the nuclear area.

Anyway, we made progress with nuclear arms after heavy slogging over a period of months and years. We encouraged the PRC successfully, when I was Ambassador in Beijing and since then, to cut off all nuclear cooperation with Iran, even though it's legal. Iran is a member of the NPT and is subject to supervision under that treaty. We just said that such nuclear cooperation was unwise, even though it wasn't illegal. Such cooperation, if it had been with Pakistan, would have been illegal. China has also agreed to cut off sending any conventional missiles to Iran, so we have made further progress in this area.

Let me make just a couple of other points. Whatever tactical mistakes we made with China, and I think that we inevitably made some in this complex relationship over the four years I have been talking about, I have tried to explain also where I think that we have done well. I think that the mistakes we made were not so egregious, although I would say that we did much better toward the end of the 1993-1997 period than at the beginning. I would like to make the key point that it takes two to tango, to use that awful cliché. There is a tendency by some of my former government colleagues and academic experts, which I still resent, that when things go wrong in our relations with China, it's always the fault of the U.S. In fact, it may often be China's fault.

I still feel strongly about some of the experts and former officials who jumped on us because of some of these matters, when they really ought to have been tougher on China. That is also true of the business community as a whole. This is not to say that we did everything correctly. My experience with China now goes back to the 1971 secret trip with Kissinger and a year or two before then, preparing for it. During recent years, the mood and the attitude of the Chinese leadership has been the most arrogant and prickly that I've ever encountered. This doesn't mean that I'm not in favor of engagement with China or that we shouldn't work at this relationship. As I've said, "They never promised us a rose garden." However, for a variety of reasons the Chinese have been particularly difficult to deal with. This includes their growing power, invocation of nationalism, apprehension about American encirclement.

Before I go any further in that direction, let me say that in our own backyard we suffered greatly because President Clinton never gave a speech on China during 1993-1997 and that our moves were not always the wisest. However, we faced the lingering effects of the Tienanmen Square massacre, the end of the Soviet threat, and Chinese aggressive actions. It wasn't just that the Chinese are bad at public relations. They do things in the field of human rights, Tibet, weapons transactions, market access, and Taiwan that are bad period. They deserve a bad press at times. So you put that together with Tienanmen Square images and the end of the Soviet threat, and you have problems in the U.S. with respect to China.

Moreover, there is the Chinese mood. First there is the point that, over 5,000 years of its history, China was number one and the "Middle Kingdom." Everyone else was a barbarian, irrelevant, or was a tributary state of China. The Chinese were leading the world and were superior. Then the Chinese had a bad century or, say, 150 years when they were humiliated by foreigners. The country was carved up by European powers. There was the Opium War and the Japanese invasion of China. Whatever the case, China from the mid-1800s to when Mao Zedong took over the country in the late 1940s, looked as if it was being trampled on by outsiders.

So China is a country which, in effect, has very little experience - only the last couple of decades - in dealing with outside countries as equals. During most of its history China was number one. More recently, it has been humiliated. So there is a combination of arrogance, xenophobia, and nationalism. This is not new. It goes back for some time, but it is part of the general background to the present.

Then, on top of that, there is the always tricky phenomenon of an emerging power like China, which is in the process of becoming a great power, adjusting its status to the world's superpower. That was the case with the Germans early in the 20th century. That is a difficult process to handle. This often happens. Then, on top of that, there is the fact that China is growing very strongly in the economic field and, to a certain extent, in military terms, though this has been exaggerated in some quarters. This gives the Chinese a certain self-confidence, a certain arrogance and a certain desire to flex their muscles and also to be treated as equals, as they should, anyway, as a great, rich, historic and cultural force. On top of that the Chinese have a certain smugness vis-a-vis the Soviet experience. They figure that Gorbachev and other Russian leaders allowed too much political freedom without making economic progress. So the Soviets lost their empire, and the Communist Party lost control of the country. The Chinese feel that they're not going to make the same mistake. And they say, see, it's working. The Chinese leaders say that they have lifted the lives and living standards of the Chinese people, and that they have managed to do that without allowing political freedom. They think that they're not going to make the same mistake which Moscow made.

Then the Chinese military are demanding more of a role. In the South China Sea and the Taiwan missile crisis, they clearly had a significant role to play. They showed that they can be more aggressive. In addition, there is the fact that there isn't a single, dominant leader in China; whether he was good or bad is another issue. The Chinese had previously had Mao, Zhou En-lai, and Deng Xiaoping. Although Jiang Zemin is now clearly the first among equals and is consolidating his position, throughout most of this period he was still engaged in trying to solidify his status. It was only in 1997 that he completed strengthening his position. He had had a successful Congress of the Communist Party of China, Deng had passed away, there was a relatively successful reversion of Hong Kong to China, although the jury is still out on this, and Jiang Zemin had a successful trip to the U.S. However, during most of this time Jiang Zemin was watching his flanks. The Taiwan missile crisis is a good example of that. So this meant he couldn't afford to look soft on sensitive issues. Thus, China did not have a self-confident, charismatic leader who could steer the China-U.S. relationship as Deng, Mao, and Zhou had done earlier on.

Then there are Chinese suspicions of the United States. Some of these are probably for tactical reasons to put us on the defensive. But some of the Chinese leaders genuinely feel this. The most extreme Chinese view of the United States is that we're keeping them down, and we don't want another super power around. So, in this view, we are trying to restrain, contain, and isolate them. This is allegedly proved by our maintaining our military presence in the Pacific Ocean area and by our strengthening our relations with Japan and so on. Allegedly, the U.S. is trying to control China's exports of military materials and military sales and is allegedly interfering in the Taiwan Straits and in Taiwan generally. Another allegation is that we are trying to keep China out of the WTO [World Trade Organization], and generally trying to keep China down. Then we are trying to divide up China's territory, with pressures on Hong Kong, Tibet, and Taiwan. On top of that we are allegedly trying to subvert China politically by pushing human rights and democracy, so that the PRC Government will lose political control of the country.

If you put all of these allegations together, I would argue that that's a fairly difficult mood to deal with. This is not by any means an excuse for any mistakes we might have made. It just means that, objectively, it's not going to be easy to deal with these people.

We should continue the policy of engagement, which I am in favor of. However, when we run into trouble, because the Chinese fire missiles, lock up dissidents, crush Tibet, or sell dangerous weapons in volatile areas of the world, some of the so-called China experts in the U.S. or some of the former U.S. Government officials should admit that maybe the Chinese are making trouble, and it's not just the U.S. administration.

One other China-related issue - the visit of Mrs. Clinton to China in September 1995 for a UN-sponsored International Conference on Women. I may have covered this elsewhere. I was with her as foreign policy advisor. She also went on to Mongolia with my urging to show support for that struggling democracy, and an inherent contrast to repressive Beijing. There she met with high level Mongolians, of course, and visited a nomadic family in a yurt. Very colorful trip, and the Mongolians were immensely pleased.

I had met Mrs. Clinton before, including sitting next to her at a White House dinner. I was very impressed with her intelligence which is well known. We worked hard with her and her staff to get ready for the trip. On the plane to China, and throughout the trip I was also impressed with other qualities, not so well known by the public - her sense of humor, her willingness to listen to ideas, her approachfulness, without losing the dignity of First Lady. We had a good time, figuratively putting our feet up, with her and her staff. She was pleasantly surprised that I encouraged her to be tough at the conference on women's issues, rather than being a State Department softy worried about upsetting the Chinese who were a clear target on some of these issues. I knew she cared deeply about these issues and that U.S. leadership was important and that her audience would be watching her. So she gave a very firm and well received speech. There was a driving rainstorm and trouble getting around the swampy compound outside Beijing that the Chinese forced the NGO groups to occupy so as to isolate them. I also knew that being firm on these global issues wouldn't really hurt us with the Chinese.

We didn't even finally decide to go to China for the conference until the Chinese released Harry Wu, a dissident who they caught sneaking back into China.

Q: Right. The next session will concentrate on your time as American Ambassador to China. Then we'll revert back to your time with the NSC and talk about things other than China. Particularly Vietnam and the Soviet Union.

LORD: That's right. We'll do China first, and then you're welcome to hear about anything else. I assume that that's up to you. I assume that that's what you want.

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: That's the main thing.

LORD: We'll certainly finish the discussion of China, I think. I would welcome both of you going over the transcript and thinking of any additional questions that you might have. I'll try to make sure that I haven't left anything out. Maybe in half a day we can get through the rest of it.

Q: Fine

LORD: The most contentious part was where did the guidelines apply. The Chinese have been complaining that these guidelines might apply to Taiwan. Both we and the Japanese cleverly agreed not to confirm that. We agreed not to rule out the defense of Taiwan, in case China becomes aggressive and attacks. We agreed not to be provocative toward China or say that the guidelines covered what the Chinese considered their territory. So we neither confirmed nor denied that the defense guidelines covered this. In effect, we said that this relates to situations, not geographic entities. We danced around this matter and we're going to continue to do so. The Chinese continue to press us and the Japanese to exclude Taiwan. Of course, neither we nor the Japanese will do that. We wish to deter Beijing's use of force without being provocative.

Q: [Kennedy] Did we get involved over - I'm not sure what you call them - or did we just sit back and relax over the Northern Islands [Kuril Islands] problem? I'm not sure that that is what you call them. They are located between Japan and Russia.

LORD: We supported the Japanese position on those islands. We were clear on that. We supported Japan both privately and publicly on this matter. We called for an improvement in relations between Japan and Russia. Every now and then someone would surface with the stupid idea that we mediate on this issue. How can you mediate something when you have already taken one side's position? I've never understood that. We spent some time on that issue, and I worked with Strobe Talbot [Deputy Secretary of State] on trying to improve relations between Japan and Russia. We tried to introduce this matter in our talks with the Russians to gain some perspective on this issue. I might add that during my four years as Assistant Secretary I engaged in bilateral consultations on Asia with the Russians. I went to Moscow twice, and Russian officials came to the U.S. once or twice to discuss Asian issues across the board. The feeling was that we were moving with China and Japan on regional security issues in general. Russia was a Pacific power which had specific interests in Korea, and it had relations with all of these other countries. Russia had potential economic interests and a desire for investment. They wanted to get into APEC and into the ASEAN Regional Forum [ARF]. I felt that Russia was a legitimate, important player, and one way that we could deal with them, particularly when they weren't in the other organizations yet, was to have these bilateral consultations.

I also pressed for Russian entrance into the ASEAN Regional Forum, and I helped to get them into ARF, as well as China and India.

Q: [Kennedy] Well, I was wondering. I started with the status of the Northern Islands.

LORD: Oh, yes. Without being belligerent about them and certainly recognizing that these islands involved something that Yeltsin couldn't resolve overnight, we made clear that we supported the Japanese position on that territory.

Q: [Kennedy] Now, before we leave Japan and U.S. relations with Japan, were there any issues in the Middle East, in the United Nations, or anywhere else on which we were either working with Japan or colluding with Japan. Also, in connection with the United Nations, were we involved in giving Japan one of the permanent Security Council seats?

LORD: Well, we of course supported them on this issue and still do, by virtue of Japan's weight and financial contributions which are important on the world and regional scene. We've supported Japan and Germany for permanent seats on the UN Security Council for some time. They've always appreciated the fact that we have kept that up.

You're absolutely right. We would meet and talk a lot about bilateral, economic, and security issues. We also spent a lot of time, particularly Secretary Christopher and Secretary of Defense Perry, on the security side. We would also discuss other issues as well. On some of them the Japanese were very helpful, while on others they were cautious and not helpful.

On the Middle East the Japanese were helpful economically, in terms of contributions. However, they were always worried about their Arab flank because they obtained a lot of oil from the Middle East. We could never count on them to lean on the Arabs to be reasonable. Similarly, they were more cautious about Iran, Iraq, and the Gulf. Because of their dependence on oil, they wouldn't be as tough. That's sort of their style, anyway.

On Korea the Japanese were very helpful. They engaged in close coordination on this issue with us. They understood the Four Party Talks approach [involving the U.S., China, North Korea, and South Korea],

The Japanese left it to us to do all of the heavy lifting on human rights. Partly, they still had guilt feelings about World War II, the rape of Nanking, and the occupation of China and Korea. The Germans have repeatedly acknowledged their misbehavior in Europe. The Japanese haven't really apologized for the rape of Nanjing and other atrocities but they are, nevertheless, sensitive to it. The Japanese feel awkward about lecturing the Chinese on human rights, when they behaved in such a bestial fashion during the 1930s and 1940s.

Q: [Kennedy] Did Vietnam enter into your discussions with the Japanese?

LORD: On Vietnam we kept in close touch with the Japanese. I would say that the Japanese were generally quite helpful. A problem in connection with Vietnam was not to have the Japanese leap too far ahead of us and sort of isolate us on the Vietnam issue in multilateral institutions and bilaterally in other contexts. The Japanese were out in front of us, but I would not say in an unhelpful way. We really can't complain too much about what the Japanese did on Vietnam and some other issues.

Q: [Kennedy] What about sanctions against Iraq? Did the Japanese play any role or did they try to stay out of it?

Q: [Bernkopf] I was going to say, in just going around the circle, what about the Japanese attitude on Taiwan? You referred to the defense guideline issue. To what degree were there consultations on the Taiwan issue with Japan?

LORD: Well, we kept in close touch with Japan on China generally, including Taiwan. We never had any real disagreements. The mood in Japan in recent years sort of fluctuated on China and Taiwan with public opinion. Over the last several years, and particularly the last couple of years, there was a growing feeling that Japanese interests lay more with the mainland of China and that Japan shouldn't hamper itself by being overly solicitous about Taiwan. The Japanese never wanted to dump Taiwan, but the feeling we got was that they wanted to improve their relations with mainland China. However, the Chinese keep bashing the Japanese on different aspects of World War II. More recently, they have criticized China in connection with disputes over the control of certain islands. They have also beaten up on the Japanese regarding the exchange rate of the yen. These actions by China have tended to make Japan nervous. Whenever there is a U.S.-China summit meeting, the Japanese have been a little concerned as well.

For all of these reasons I think that, consequently, there has been some recent concern among the Japanese about Taiwan. I don't want to exaggerate this and I'm just talking about an amorphous mood. However, I felt that in the course of my four years as Assistant Secretary that the Japanese romance with China began to sour a little bit. The Japanese still knew that they had to and wanted to deal with China, but they began to see that China is going to be a real rival in the region. The Japanese are getting a little annoyed at the Chinese sticking it to them all the time when they meet with the United States. The Chinese seem to want to make the Japanese feel guilty. As I said, there are still some territorial disputes in the Yellow Sea, or other areas. Japanese-Chinese relations have always been a love-hate relationship.

On Taiwan there has always been a suspicion in China about Japanese motives, because of the history of Japanese involvement in Taiwan. Regarding Taiwan the only two countries that the Chinese really care about are the views of the United States and the relations between Taiwan and Japan. The Chinese leaders generally look the other way when Taiwanese leaders visit Southeast Asia, whether for official visits or golf games. However, the Chinese go crazy when President Lee Teng-hui of Taiwan goes to Cornell University, either unofficially or to get an honorary degree. Also, President Lee Teng-hui attended a Japanese university. So the Chinese complain loudly to us and Japan about high-level dealings with Taiwan, but tend to overlook other countries.

I don't know of any U.S.-Japan disagreements on Taiwan. During the Taiwan missile crisis, the Japanese welcomed our sending aircraft carriers to the region. They would not have admitted this in public, but then they never do.

Prime Minister Hashimoto and other Japanese officials were very good on the defense guidelines. One of their cabinet spokesmen got out of line, in effect, when he said that the defense guidelines applied to Taiwan. I think that he was fired for that remark. Then, somebody else tried to pull back and said that the defense guidelines didn't apply to Taiwan. I think that was Koichi Kato. Prime Minister Hashimoto reaffirmed the U.S.-Japan security treaty during the President's trip to Japan. Just as we reassure Japan when a senior American official goes to China, without being defensive, we also don't want to be provocative with Japan when we're dealing with China, although I would rather lean toward Japan if we have to choose.

So before President Clinton's trip to Japan and during the process of reviewing U.S.-Japanese defense arrangements, we kept the Chinese posted. We briefed the Chinese fully just before the announcements in Japan and on the public statements made during the trip by the Japanese Prime Minister and the President, specifically on the defense guidelines. We made clear that our defense treaty was not directed at China and that we wanted constructive relations with China. We talked to the Chinese privately as well.

We found ways to remind them, however, that firing missiles in the Taiwan Straits and being belligerent might well contribute to a tightening of the relationship between the U.S. and Japan. We said that it wasn't in China's interest to be provocative. However, that was done with some subtlety.

So, in answer to your question I don't remember any serious disagreements between the U.S. and Japan on Taiwan.

Q: [Bernkopf] Were the Japanese at all reluctant to discuss Taiwan and future problems, in the event of a conflict?

LORD: The Japanese certainly made no public statement or let any comment on this subject leak out, although they were more relaxed in talking about Korea than they were about Taiwan. I wasn't in on all of the detailed discussions on contingency planning, and I can't say just how precise we were on this. However, the U.S. and Japan continue to maintain that the defense guidelines apply to situations and not places. Nevertheless, it's clear, and this is a strictly hypothetical comment, that if China launched an obvious act of aggression against Taiwan, and Japan wouldn't let us use our bases in Japan or help us out, a lot of Americans would wonder what the U.S.-Japanese alliance was all about. I think that the Japanese understand that. However, everyone hopes that we never get to that point.

Q: [Kennedy] When we talk about a defensive alliance, we should note that things have changed. You have to be defensive against something. How would we deal with a putative Chinese attack on Taiwan and what have we been thinking about that? Taiwan is obviously something.

LORD: Obviously, the easiest thing to point to, and the least controversial aspect is Korea. We had no objection to saying, either publicly and privately, that we were going to work out with the Japanese how we can coordinate better in the event of a crisis on the Korean Peninsula. In such a situation Japan would be absolutely crucial as a staging base. We would want to be sure that we could use all of Japan's bases and we would want to be sure that they would back us up with refueling, minesweeping, and so on. So that's an easy contingency to discuss. That's the one that we point to.

Beyond that, what we've been stressing generally is the importance of this treaty for regional stability and reassuring people with our presence, with the added virtue of having troops in the area. Beyond Korea we are not specific in using examples in public. The treaty is there and it's meant to be a deterrent. I don't even know, myself, in the years since I left the Department of State, how much private precision we have on the Taiwan situation, on a contingency basis. We do have quite a bit of precision on South Korea. It's hard to be specific and quantify, but there is no question that our defense relationship with Japan does provide a sense of stability in the region. The U.S.-Japan relationship and our troop presence generally in Asia are going to be under review if not challenge if we ever get a settlement in Korea. Don't hold your breath until this is accomplished. However, if the Korean situation is resolved and the country is unified, or at least peace returns to the Korean Peninsula, then people are going to wonder why we have all of these U.S. forces in Asia.

We'll get to Korea in just a minute. That's the next subject. However, the fact is that the Koreans themselves, and I've heard President Kim Dae Jung say this in so many words, want us to stay on in South Korea even if North and South Korea are reunified. He said that he would say this to his North Korean partner if the country is ever reunified, and we'll get back to that. If we take our troops out of South Korea and they're only in Japan, that will put all the more domestic, political pressures on Japan to ask the U.S. to withdraw our forces from Japan as well. So we have to stress, and we believe this, that the presence of U.S. forces in the area, including Korea, provides regional stability.

In fact, if the threat to our forces and to South Korea all but disappears, then we probably should reduce or redeploy at least our ground forces. But our air and naval forces generally and troops remaining in Japan and to some extent in South Korea would still be relevant. We don't want Japan to be the only place in the Pacific where we have troops, besides Hawaii and Guam. Have I answered your question?

Q: [Kennedy] Yes.

Q: [Kennedy] You served as Ambassador to China, and you saw, I don't know how many, but in any case a lot of Chinese going to the United States to study. I mean, they were studying subjects at important levels. They were coming back to China. Obviously, this present generation of Chinese includes a lot of people who have a real understanding of the United States. They will be moving into important positions in their families and elsewhere.

Q: [Kennedy] We're talking now about an opaque system, which allows editors and commentators to have a wonderful time because they can make up anything that they want. Had Kim Il Sung [long time leader of North Korea] died at this point?

LORD: Well, before answering that question I would like to get back a little bit to the narrative. In the midst of the difficulties that we were having with the North Koreans, and I don't recall the exact dates, as 1993 wore on, and then in 1994, we got to the point where the North Koreans were on the verge of pulling out of the NPT [Non Proliferation Treaty]. So we went to the UN and pressed for sanctions against North Korea. The situation was getting quite tense. Of course, we had to bring along the Japanese, who were a little bit nervous but were generally supportive. The South Koreans, of course, were happy to work with us. The Chinese were dragging their feet, as were the Russians. However, we managed to get a UNSC President's statement even though we didn't get a Security Council resolution. We were moving toward sanctions because the North Koreans were flouting the IAEA [International Atomic Energy Agency] inspections.

I don't recall the exact language they used, but the North Koreans threatened that sanctions could or would lead to war. So people have to remember that this was a very dangerous situation. We couldn't ignore the budding nuclear threat, and we didn't wish to risk a bloody war. We negotiated a less than perfect agreement but a very good one, in my view. Also, we were willing to flex our muscles. This was a classic lesson in diplomacy. You have to have sticks and carrots to use. The stick was that we were prepared to go for sanctions, and we worked hard on that at the UN. This was a very tense time, and people tend to forget this.

During this time we also reinforced our forces in South Korea to strengthen our diplomatic hand and to be ready for conflict. We sent Patriot anti-missile weapons. We sent Apache helicopters. And, in the middle of an NSC [National Security Council] meeting, at which I was not present, there was talk of further force deployments. There were options being considered of major reinforcements, moderate reinforcements, and token reinforcements. The President was close to deciding even at that meeting to have another, major buildup of our forces. Then a message came from former President Carter, who was visiting North Korea, of a possible breakthrough with Kim Il Sung, the North Korean leader.

So former President Carter made an historic contribution, for all of the concerns and nervousness we had in connection with his travels. One of my officers traveled with him on each of his trips in East Asia. Dick Christianson had actually been the DCM [Deputy Chief of Mission] for some time.

Q: [Bernkopf] I don't know whether we've already covered this. Could you talk about working with China on the nuclear crisis involving North Korea and the agreed framework that was developed?

LORD: Yes. This issue is certainly relevant here. From the very beginning of my term as Assistant Secretary I thought that it was important, as did the administration, to work as much as we could with China on the problem of North Korea. In the first place it was the most urgent and dangerous problem.

Q: [Kennedy] Can you explain what the problem was?

LORD: We'll do this again briefly. When we entered office, the North Koreans were refusing some IAEA [International Atomic Energy Agency] inspections of some of their nuclear facilities, which they were obligated to have inspected under the NPT [Non Proliferation Treaty], which North Korea had signed.

This issue came to a head after we entered office, when the North Koreans threatened to withdraw from the NPT. We threatened to apply sanctions, built up our forces, and went to the UN. The North Koreans were saying that the imposition of sanctions could lead to war. It was a very tense situation, which I have dealt with in more detail.

This was the most urgent security problem that we faced, certainly in Asia and perhaps during the first year or two of the whole Administration. We thought that it was important to involve China, for several reasons.

First, we thought that China probably had more influence with the North Korean regime than anyone else, although we knew that the North Koreans were prickly and weren't going to take orders from anybody. In terms of influence with North Korea the Chinese certainly eclipsed the Russians, although we also wanted to stay in touch with the Russians also on this issue. So the Chinese were going to be a crucial factor in restraining North Korea, as they already were a crucial factor in propping up North Korea economically.

Secondly, we felt that there were some parallel objectives in this situation. China already had an important economic relationship with South Korea, which was growing. The Chinese had fish to fry with the South Koreans. We were quite sure that for a considerable period of time the Chinese had been restraining North Korea from any military adventures, because they didn't want to be dragged back into a possible conflict on the Korean Peninsula, as they had been during the 1950s. The Chinese didn't want to complicate their relations with the U.S. and Japan, not to mention South Korea. Generally, China didn't want a war, particularly with nuclear implications, right on their border. So China had been a source of restraint on North Korea. The Chinese were becoming much more even handed now that they had interests in South Korea. There was a parallel linkage between Chinese contacts with the two Koreas.

Thirdly and more broadly, we felt that by cooperating on this issue we could also demonstrate that we had regional, global, and strategic interests with China on our agenda. Perhaps we could agree to cooperate in other areas and achieve better exchanges on regional security matters, for example. In this way we could demonstrate to the American and Chinese publics that China and the U.S. could work together on some of these regional and global issues.

So for all of these reasons we put a high priority on dealing with the Chinese, and we worked with them throughout my four years as Assistant Secretary of State.

Generally, in the course of those four years and since I have left that position as well, the Chinese have become more cooperative, without going so far as to be in lock step with us. In the exchange of information during this four year period and since then we did not get much out of the Chinese at all; they would profess not to have a great deal of information on North Korea.

They generally told us that the situation in North Korea was not as bad as people had been saying and that, in particular, the economic situation was not as bad as many people believed. They told us that the situation was stable. They were not particularly candid with us, to say the least. By contrast, over the past couple of years the Chinese have acknowledged that the economic situation in North Korea is very serious, although they have emphasized that the political situation is relatively stable.

I want to make it clear that they have not always been entirely helpful. However, they have been increasingly helpful throughout the past few years. The Chinese have always been careful to guard their flank with North Korea, but we sensed a clear frustration on China's part with North Korea. First, because of the dangers involved and, secondly, because North Korea has such an opaque regime which is very difficult to deal with. This was accentuated by the fact that the Chinese had long, personal associations with Kim Il Sung, but when he died, he was replaced by his somewhat flakey son [Kim Jong Il]. As a result, Chinese personal ties with North Korea were consequently reduced.

The Chinese were also frustrated that they had been urging the North Koreans for some time to reform their economy as the Chinese had done. The North Koreans had resisted that advice because they were worried about losing political control of the country to outside influences. So the Chinese had to bail out North Korea economically.

For all of these reasons over time the Chinese were increasingly concerned about the situation in North Korea. In addition, the Chinese have had greater exchanges of information with us, they have come to have greater trust in us, and have had greater contact with South Korea. They have become somewhat more helpful to us, although they have never moved in lock step with us.

This has meant that the quality and quantity of their exchanges of information with us on North Korea expanded over these years. This meant that, after considerable delay, they finally agreed to join the Four Party Approach [North Korea, South Korea, China, and the United States], which was helpful in the effort to promote peace on the Korean Peninsula. Most of the talks in that context have been at the technical level. There has only been a couple of talks at the Deputy Assistant Secretary level until after I left the State Department. However, as I understand it, the Chinese have moved from a position of not being particularly helpful or being passive or sometimes even taking the North Korean side, to the point of actually facilitating talks and the four party approach. The Chinese never joined KEDO, which is an organization set up to help provide alternative and less dangerous, nuclear reactors.

Q: [Kennedy] Is that spelled K-E-D-O?

LORD: Yes, it deals with North Korea. So that has been frustrating. The Chinese have provided a great deal of economic assistance to North Korea, including food and oil, which has kept it from collapsing, more than any other factor. As I say, diplomatically the Chinese have recently been more helpful.

So this is a theme in all of the regional and global issues. This is the first one that we can cite in terms of pointing to the fact that we have some parallel interests with China, in spite of our ideological and other differences. This is an area where the Chinese have been constructive. They haven't always been perfect. We've had a lot of trouble during this period about military contacts at the DMZ [Demilitarized Zone] at Panmunjom in Korea. The North Koreans have constantly challenged the armistice agreement of 1953 and have demanded a peace agreement. They have tried to force outside countries acting as observers to withdraw from Panmunjom. We've had less than all out help from the Chinese on that. Even on that, their attitude was nuanced. They wouldn't pressure the North Koreans or back us fully on some of these issues. However, they would make the point to the North that the armistice agreement still was in place, until a peace agreement could replace it.

So the Chinese were still somewhat worried about their North Korean flank. However, on the whole the Chinese involvement in Korea was helpful. They obviously helped to put pressure on North Korea and they helped to prop up North Korea so that it didn't collapse. They demonstrated that we had shared interests which supported the Chinese-American bilateral relationship in general.

Q: Why don't we turn now to bilateral relations between the U.S. and South Korea? I think we had some economic issues outstanding. What was your feeling about the political situation in South Korea? How did you think South Korea was handling its foreign policy? Are there any other issues that you might want to discuss?

LORD: Yes. I think that we can cover these issues fairly quickly. We've already covered them, to a certain extent. One of my major concerns was to make sure that we had as much solidarity as possible with the South Koreans, even though we sometimes had a prickly and paranoid President of South Korea to deal with. I have already indicated that we worked hard on that matter, as did others. It was not just me. Also included were Secretary of State Christopher and Secretary of Defense Perry.

Throughout the four years I served as Assistant Secretary, our primary preoccupation with South Korea was dealing with North Korea. We had economic issues in dispute with South Korea, but we actually had a trade surplus with them. So, in terms of trade, it wasn't as pronounced a problem as it was with Japan or China. When I initially got the job as Assistant Secretary for East Asian and Pacific Affairs, one of the first things that I did was to meet with American business people in New York. Hank Greenberg, a major businessman and head of a large insurance company, pulled together a lot of American business people interested in Asia. We went around the table and asked them what was the most difficult place in East Asia to do business in, particularly in terms of American investment. Almost unanimously, they said South Korea, more than Japan, China, or any other place.

So we obviously spent some time on the trade issues. We finally got South Korea into the OECD [Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development]. This was all before the financial crisis in Asia, which occurred after I left office. We instituted semi-annual consultations on economic issues, addressing macroeconomic as well as specific trade issues. I would raise these issues when I went to South Korea. Secretary of State Christopher and others would raise them. However, in all candor, although they were significant issues, they took up a very small percentage of our time and attention, compared to the nuclear question, the North-South talks, and North-South security questions.

South Korea generally could be counted on to help us on UN issues, but they were so preoccupied with their own security questions that we didn't expect much, nor did they do much in other areas. We consulted closely with South Korea on regional issues, such as, for example, the ASEAN Regional Forum [ARF]. We worked with them in APEC [Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation Forum] in terms of economic advancement. However, in relative terms the economic dimension wasn't relatively that significant, compared to the security dimension. I think that that's the correct proportion. This doesn't mean that the American economic agencies didn't spend a lot of time on economic issues. I'm simply saying that I didn't spend too much time on these issues, although when I talked with them I pressed them, as I always did, on general and specific economic, trade, and investment problems.

Finally, at the instigation of President Kim Young Sam, he and President Clinton agreed on a bold new initiative of Four Power talks, to include South Korea, the United States, China, and North Korea. Obviously, strictly North-South talks would have been better, and that's what we wanted. However, failing that, the South Koreans agreed, and we, of course, agreed with them, that we ought to try this other approach. The rationale was as follows. First, the parties included were signatories to the Armistice Agreement [of 1953]. The Chinese had fought in Korea, so they were a party to the Armistice Agreement. Therefore, in addition to geography, history, economics, and ideological ties with North Korea and improving ties with South Korea in their direct interest, they had that rationale. The Japanese had not been a signatory to the Armistice Agreement.

Secondly, you never could tell whether the North Koreans welcomed the Chinese or not. On balance, they probably didn't. They didn't like trilateral discussions involving North and South Korea and the U.S., which made the balance two against one. Then the North Koreans may have thought that, since China was shifting somewhat toward South Korea, this might make the balance three against one. Ostensibly, the Four Power talks were designed to be two communist powers over here and two good guys [the ROK and the U.S.] over there. So there was that cover. We were very careful to make sure that the Japanese, in particular, were comfortable with this arrangement. They were and they never gave us any trouble on this. They understood the rationale of the Armistice and they understood that if they were included, the Russians would have to be included. This would have meant Six Power Talks, which we thought would be too complicated. We of course continued to consult closely with Japan, both bilaterally and together with South Korea.

The Russians were very upset about this. They thought that they had a legitimate interest in Korea and wanted to know why they were not included in these talks. As I said, we never had formal consultations with the Russians on this subject. In informal talks with them we basically said that we saw some value in Six Power talks at some point, whether for guarantees or other purposes. Therefore, we could see that a Six Power arrangement might have some function. However, meantime we told the Russians that we would keep them closely informed, and why didn't they join KEDO? They have not been happy about their not being included in these consultative talks.

The other rationale for the four-party approach on Korea, however, was that if we got four parties together, then, under that cover and around the edges of that conference, we could promote a North-South dialogue. The North Koreans have resisted talking to South Korea for so long that, for reasons of cover, it was easier for them to talk to South Korea directly as long as everyone was in the same city for the Four Power talks. Also, the carrot for North Korea was that that meant that they could talk to us as well. So we made it clear that if North Korea came to the table in the Four Power talks, we wanted to urge that North and South Korea conduct the basic negotiations, with the Chinese and us being in a facilitative role. However, the North Koreans would also have the benefit of talking directly to us, which they wanted. As against that, they would also have to talk directly to South Korea as well, which they may not have wanted.

For all of these reasons this was announced at Cheju Island, when President Clinton met there with South Korean President Kim Young Sam, I believe in the summer of 1995. I was there for this meeting.

We spent the rest of the first Clinton term trying getting the North Koreans to move ahead in the talks. They would inch along in talks at the Country Director level at the UN in New York. We tried to get the Chinese to weigh in. The Chinese were supportive, but they weren't prepared to pull out all the stops. They kept arguing more U.S.-North Korean movement. As always, the North Koreans were a pain in the neck. They would inch up to the starting line and give us the impression that we were going to get the four-party talks started. Basically, we only had talks about the talks. We never had actual talks. Instead, there were talks to see whether we could have talks. We finally reached the point where we could have four-party talks at the level of my deputy, Tom Hubbard [Deputy Assistant Secretary of State]. Since I left the Department of State, my successor has had a couple of rounds of fruitless discussions at the Assistant Secretary level.

Meanwhile, recently elected South Korean President Kim Dae Jung has been more forthcoming toward North Korea. He has encouraged U.S. investment and U.S.-North Korean direct talks, including relaxing our sanctions. He has himself opened his arms to the North Koreans but so far has been rewarded by considerable intransigence, although the rhetoric from North Korea has been more restrained.

There was another complication in U.S.-South Korean relations. I don't have the exact date, but late in the first Clinton term, probably in 1995 or 1996, a North Korean submarine stranded in South Korean territorial waters. There were both North Korean commandos and sailors on it. The commandos killed all of the sailors, and many of the commandos escaped. There was a big manhunt all over South Korea. Some of the North Korean commandos were captured, and some South Koreans were killed. This caused a furor in South Korea and held up any movement toward talks or anything else with North Korea.

Again, during this time I spent a good deal of time holding the hands of the South Koreans, pledging U.S. solidarity with them. I remember that once I arrived on a trip to South Korea, and there was a big cartoon in a South Korean newspaper which showed a South Korean watching television. The video was all screwed up. It was on the blink. It just wasn't working. The heading of the cartoon referring to the video said: "U.S.-South Korean Relations." The cartoon showed me coming in through the window. The caption showed me saying: "I'm here to fix your television set."

Q: Did you have the feeling or was it conventional wisdom that the North Korean infiltrations, such as the case of the North Korean submarine, may have been designed by the North Korean military to louse things up?

LORD: That's a very good question. That is one explanation of this incident. However, it seemed to us to be somewhat inconceivable that the North Korean military could do this without the blessing of Kim Jong Il, the son of Kim Il Sung and the apparent ruler of North Korea, or at least his acquiescence. The North Korean military couldn't have just done it on their own. So to this day, since we don't know anything about North Korea anyway, we don't know what happened. We do feel, without falling into the trap of good guys and bad guys battling within the Politburo of the Communist Party, that there are some people in North Korea, probably within the Foreign Ministry and the economic agencies, who want to implement the Framework Agreement and get outside help. There are others, probably including most of the military, who are hardliners. There are probably even some who would like to sabotage the agreement.

So if I had to hazard an explanation of this incident, I think that this infiltration incident was an ongoing thing which they did all the time. They didn't launch it specifically to screw things up. They didn't want to be caught. If you're not caught, you don't screw things up. So this was ongoing, and probably Kim Jong Il was kept posted. He probably said: "Just because we're negotiating with the Americans, we don't stop our intelligence activity. Just don't get caught." So they went ahead and screwed up.

Q: Why not stop at this point? We'll note at the end of this section that we've covered relations with China, with North and South Korea, and with Japan. So we're ready to move on to the rest of Asia during this 1993-1997 period.

***

Today is October 21, 1998. We might now look at some of the other issues. I'm going to leave it to you to pick the matters to raise as we go along. They're almost completely separate issues. So if you will name them, we'll start off.

LORD: Okay. What I would propose to start off with is ASEAN, both collectively and in terms of its individual members. This would include the newer members, such as Vietnam, Cambodia, Laos, and Burma. Then we'll pick up Australia, New Zealand, Mongolia, and the other pieces of Asia that we haven't covered already. We can then look at some regional approaches, whether it is APEC, ASEAN and regional security matters, global problems like the environment, and then the whole question of promoting democracy and human rights, as well as the Asian values debate. Then I might cover my more general recollections on the four years of my service in the Bureau of East Asian Affairs, after we've gotten through these individual pieces. Okay?

Q: All right. In the first place you mentioned ASEAN. Can you tell me what ASEAN stands for?

LORD: Sure. ASEAN stands for the Association of Southeast Asian Nations. It's an organization of several countries of Southeast Asia which was established 25 or 30 years ago. It originally consisted of Thailand, the Philippines, Indonesia, Malaysia, and Singapore. Then it added Brunei a few years ago. In more recent years it has added Vietnam, Laos, Cambodia, and Burma. Of course, the addition of the countries of the former Indochina and Burma has complicated ASEAN's performance. I won't dwell on this, because most of it happened since I left office as Assistant Secretary. These additions have added poor countries to other countries which were generally regarded as economic tigers. It also added generally authoritarian or semi-authoritarian governments to a grouping which was mixed but had a considerable degree of political freedom. So the addition of some of these newer members has affected the cohesion of ASEAN.

ASEAN started out essentially for economic purposes to promote economic progress among these countries and also to damp down regional and historical tensions between Malaysia, the Philippines, Indonesia, and Thailand. There have been disputes among these countries, one way or another. Even as the European Community was meant, in part, to ease historical antagonisms and prevent future conflicts between France and Germany, for example, so, although on a less grandiose scale, one of the purposes of ASEAN was to try to mute these rivalries and to promote cooperation among these countries.

What started out as an economic grouping also began to take on some political and diplomatic force as well. As the Clinton administration came into office in 1993, obviously the giants of China and Japan, as well as South Korea, given the historical involvement of U.S. troops, captured a great deal of our attention, including continuing public and media attention in the U.S.

However, we have become very much aware of the fact that Southeast Asia, including ASEAN, is also crucially important, both collectively and in terms of its individual members. For example, as ASEAN heads toward the year 2000, and with its new members, the 10 members comprising all of the Southeast Asian region, have a population of some 400 million. If you take the ASEAN countries collectively, this group of states has already become roughly our fourth largest export partner. These countries are located in a very strategic area, which includes the Straits of Malacca and the passage of oil and trade through there, which affects not only the U.S. but also key allies like Japan. Therefore, ASEAN is very strategically located.

Of course, the ASEAN area also has historical resonance because of our involvement in Vietnam. Indeed, the Vietnam War, while a tragedy and a mistake, in my view, had a clear silver lining in the dark clouds - the fact that by our involvement in Vietnam we bought time for the Southeast Asian countries. Whether you believe in the domino theory or not, the Vietnam War did give them some time to develop, with the buffer of U.S. involvement in Vietnam and, in a certain sense, in Laos and Cambodia, to protect them. This allowed these Southeast Asian nations to get on their feet and not only not be taken over by communism but to begin to develop their own, free market approach and their own economies. In fact, they became economic giants.

I would like to enter a little footnote here. We'll get to APEC later, but when President Clinton was about to make a speech at the APEC meeting in Seattle, he was going over his speech drafts. When he was traveling out to Seattle on Air Force One [aircraft on which the President usually travels], he noticed a phrase which he thought was terrific. The phrase said that the Asian countries had grown from dominos to dynamos. He told the speech writer, who was going over the text with the President, that this phrase was terrific. The speechwriter very generously said: "Oh, that was Win Lord's phrase." So when the President actually gave the speech in Seattle at the APEC meeting, he got applause when he got to that line. The President stopped, looked in the camera, and said: "I have Winston Lord to thank for that line. I'm glad that you liked it." There never has been a more generous speechwriter. You can appreciate that when the President says something, the speechwriter should not take credit for a given phrase; but citing to the President somebody else for the phrase was an act of generosity that I will never forget.

Again, as we speak today, we see some serious economic problems in the Southeast Asian region. However, on the whole, during the last 25 years a lot of the tigers in Asia have been in the Southeast Asian grouping. The movement toward freer trade among the Southeast Asian countries of ASEAN, as well as the political and security stability among them which ASEAN fostered, had a lot to do with their very dramatic economic growth. Also, of course, the U.S. security presence in Asia helped to provide stability for ASEAN as well as for many other countries, including even China. This allowed the people of these countries to focus on improving their economies and not having to worry about conflict.

Q: When you are talking about regional security, normally you are pointing at a threat, or something like that. It sounds as if there was no longer a threat.

LORD: Could we come back to the regional security meetings before we go into that? I thought that I would treat that separately in the context of the ASEAN Regional Forum.

Q: Sure.

LORD: ASEAN was crucial for the regional forum, but this included many other members, and I would rather do this under the general rubric of regional institutions. That's a good question.

I also made a considerable effort to meet, not only my own counterparts, but also foreign ministers during the general debate at the UN General Assembly each fall, when the Secretary of State was too busy to meet with some of them. (End of tape)

I'll go through the specific countries.

Indonesia was clearly the giant in ASEAN by virtue of its population. We had a mixed relationship with Indonesia. The difficulties lay in the human rights area. Indonesia had an authoritarian regime, a lot of corruption, and a problem with East Timor which Indonesia had taken over from the Portuguese back in the 1970s. There was a movement for the independence of East Timor or at least much greater autonomy. There was also somewhat similar unrest in Aceh.

Q: That's at the northern end of Sumatra.

LORD: Right. So Indonesia was a constant concern of human rights groups and others. It put a certain limit on our relationship with Indonesia. Indeed, every time that the President, the Secretary of State, or I met with our Indonesian counterparts, in addition to a very positive agenda, which I'll get to in a minute, we would usually raise East Timor or human rights issues.

So this was a controlling factor preventing us from having a full blown relationship with Indonesia.

Having said that, I should add that we had a very positive agenda as well, and we treated Indonesia as a very important country, even though we disapproved of some of its human rights practices. As I've already mentioned, it's the fourth largest country in the world in terms of population, it's the largest Muslim country in the world, and is generally very moderate in its approach to Islam, as opposed to radical fundamentalism elsewhere in the world. So it's an important example of toleration and general restraint in that area.

Indonesia provided us with some military cooperation. Some of our training activities with the Indonesian military were restricted by Congressional concerns over human rights. Some of the Indonesian leaders whom we trained were enlightened in terms of the rule of civilians over the military, legal justice, and human rights practices by the Indonesian Army. However, there were some graduates of U.S. training programs who turned out to be involved in the suppression of some groups, and this caused controversy. So there was a constant debate about how much we should cooperate with the Indonesian military which, of course, is a very important political force in Indonesia. In fact, it's the dominant political force. We generally felt that through the exchange programs and joint operations we exposed Indonesian military personnel to professionalism and attitudes toward democracy and human rights which would pay off and would be good over the long term, on the whole.

However, given the Indonesian military role in East Timor and in other areas, you can see why Congress had some concern. However, we had some access for U.S. Navy ship visits and training programs with the Indonesian military, so that there was a military dimension to these activities.

Indonesia is an important country economically, as well. It has been a significant and positive force in diplomacy. Often it led ASEAN activity. As I said already, in the South China Sea Indonesia didn't have any territorial claims of its own and therefore could play a less subjective role, holding workshops and trying to promote cooperation among the ASEAN countries and with Vietnam before it became a member of ASEAN. Indonesia was also very important with respect to diplomacy regarding Cambodia and efforts made to try to reach a cease-fire there and organize elections. On that issue, as on so many others, its very dynamic Foreign Minister, Ali Alatas, was a crucial player.

Indonesian troops were involved in UN peacekeeping in various areas. Indonesia was an important player in the regional security dialogues. In November, 1994, Indonesia was the host to the APEC meeting in Bogor [West Java], where it supported the objectives of free trade and investment in the Asia-Pacific region by the year 2020 and for developed countries by the year 2010, which were set forth under the leadership of President Suharto.

Of course, Indonesia was very strategically located, as I already indicated. So for all of these reasons we had many goals of a positive nature to pursue in Indonesia. However, we were somewhat constrained by various human rights problems.

As you will recall, in the wake of the Vietnam War there was the classic problem of the Khmer Rouge taking over and establishing a brutal regime in Cambodia. We'll get back to Cambodia later. Part of the problem was further exacerbated by the participation and influence of other, outside countries. On the one hand there was China, with its historic animosity toward and problems with Vietnam. This was ironic because we saw China as a patron of Vietnam during the Vietnam War. We underestimated the actual tensions between China and Vietnam.

China essentially backed the Khmer Rouge, apparently thinking that a Khmer Rouge - dominated Cambodia would be a kind of buffer between Vietnam and China, or that a Chinese-influenced Cambodia would put more pressure on the Vietnamese. As you recall, Vietnam invaded Cambodia in 1979 and installed a government essentially dominated by the Vietnamese. China was always involved in trying to weaken that government. The Chinese don't worry about things like genocide and human rights. Anyway, they didn't have to hold their noses very much when they were working with the Khmer Rouge.

On the other hand the Vietnamese, of course, wanted to see a friendly government in Cambodia. In fact, the Hun Sen Government in Cambodia was disposed in a friendly way toward the Hanoi Government.

Then there were the Thai working with the Khmer Rouge for the reasons I have mentioned. The Thai have some historical tensions with Vietnam as well, of course. The Thai were allied with us against North Vietnam during the Vietnam War.

There were also residual French interests and a residual U.S. role in Thailand.

The Cambodian conflict was complicated by these outside powers, all of which gets me back to Thailand and our leaning on them. Gradually, the Chinese became more even handed. They cut back and then cut off aid to the Khmer Rouge. The Thai began to crack down more effectively along the Thai-Cambodian border. All of this helped to weaken the Khmer Rouge. As we speak now the Khmer Rouge are just about finished as an effective force in Cambodia. In many ways Cambodia is a tragic country. At least they no longer have the threat from the Khmer Rouge.

Q: During the time that you were Assistant Secretary were we working on China to "withdraw its support" from the Khmer Rouge?

LORD: Absolutely. They would never acknowledge directly to us that they were doing what we wanted. They didn't do it primarily for our purposes. Again, they did it because they saw that Hun Sen and his forces were in the ascendancy. The Chinese knew that they were paying a price for their blatant support of the Khmer Rouge, in terms of international opinion, which isn't as important to them as geopolitics and the balance of power. Anyway, as the Khmer Rouge began to grow weaker, the Chinese began to see that maybe they could have more influence in Southeast Asia by displaying less support of the Khmer Rouge.

Q: Cambodia received support from China.

LORD: Yes, but, given China's historic problems with Vietnam, anything that makes Vietnam nervous helps China with their Vietnam problem. Again, we would raise this matter with the Chinese, appealing to their own interest and influence in the region. With the Chinese you don't get very far by invoking the human rights dimension and by talking about the terrible genocide. You have to cite practical reasons, including their desire to have better relations with Southeast Asia and their general interest in having more stability in that region.

In any event, returning to Thailand, we really raised the Cambodian issue in almost every meeting with the Thai, because it was very crucial to us. As I said, the Thai became more and more helpful, to the point that, during the last couple of years of my service as Assistant Secretary, I think that it's fair to say that we were pretty satisfied with what the Thai were doing. We would check out what the Thai were doing through our intelligence reports. We had a pretty good reading as to whether the Thai were reining in their people. It reached the point where, not only did the Khmer Rouge no longer count on Thai aid or even Thai asylum but sometimes they would be turned back from the Thai-Cambodian border. So working with the Thai became another way of weakening the Khmer Rouge.

The other problem with Thailand was illicit drugs. The Thai became more and more cooperative on the drug problem, which had been a major issue for us. So we made progress with that. I cite those two problems as being typical issues we dealt with in Thailand, along with intellectual property rights. We made some progress on that issue, as well.

Thus, we had some difficulties with Thailand, but we had a very good security relationship with them. Thailand was our most important Southeast Asian security partner. We had our second largest military exercise in East Asia with Thailand, after another major exercise in South Korea. There have been numerous exchange programs and exercises, and we have had access to Royal Thai facilities.

We had one disappointment in 1993 or 1994. We tentatively approached the Thai to see if we could preposition some supplies offshore, in Thai waters, for possible future contingency use. This would have consisted of materiel and equipment which we could get to quickly, not only for Southeast Asian contingencies but also those involving the Middle East. We didn't handle this issue very well, diplomatically. We didn't prepare the ground well, news of it leaked, and it got caught up in Thai domestic politics. Thailand never really turned the proposal down, but it put it off indefinitely. This was somewhat irritating, since Thailand is an ally, and we thought that, given their cooperation in so many other areas, we would obtain their approval. Instead, the issue got tangled up in Thai domestic politics, since it looked as if Thailand would become involved in regional conflicts if it agreed to pre-position U.S. military supplies in Thailand. The U.S. JCS [Joint Chiefs of Staff] finally decided a year or two later that we really didn't need this equipment storage facility. That was one example where, on the military side, we did not have full cooperation from the Thai. This was an exception to the rule of broad cooperation from the Thai.

Q: Did you meet Mahathir?

LORD: Yes. I had at least one meeting alone with him when I visited Malaysia in my own right.

I sat in on meetings between Secretary Christopher, President Clinton, and Mahathir. I saw him in the White House.

I should add that Mahathir wasn't totally hostile at all times. He could turn on the charm, but you never forgot that he held these views of suspicion of the West, even as he wanted Western investment. I will also say that he supported the U.S. military presence as being in the interests of Malaysia and Southeast Asia for stability. He still has some residual concerns about China or Japan and so he sees the U.S. as a balancing force. Even then, he was somewhat more ambivalent toward us than, say, Singapore, the Philippines, or Thailand.

I would point to all of the democratic forces in Asia and add that one shouldn't just listen to people like Lee Kuan Yew and Mahathir, let alone Jiang Zemin of China,

Q: Okay, we're back in business.

LORD: Let's start with Vietnam, which has recently become a member of ASEAN in its own right. Let's start off by talking about Vietnam primarily in the bilateral context, which most concerns us, on the whole, although better relations between the U.S. and Vietnam made improved relations with ASEAN easier when Vietnam became a member.

I would say that, from a personal standpoint, I had more personal impact individually, while working with others, of course, on this issue than perhaps on any other matter in the region. I would like to think that I was heavily involved, and I was, in all of the major Asian issues and made a contribution on many of them. However, I think that in terms of the normalization of relations between the U.S. and Vietnam, if I can be slightly immodest, it would not have happened without constant efforts on my part.

This involved a real balancing act. There were several factors in it. First was Hanoi itself, and our negotiations with the Vietnamese Government. Then we had to consider the interests of the White House, which was very sensitive on this issue. The White House was very concerned about domestic, political criticism, particularly since President Clinton had avoided the draft during the Vietnam War. Also important to consider were domestic pressure groups, veterans' groups, and members of the families of the Missing in Action and POWs [Prisoners of War]. They did not all hold the same view. They often had different views, some of them very strongly held. Then there were the political sensitivities of members of Congress, who were on different sides of this issue. They held varying views, but many of them were very suspicious of Hanoi, as were other domestic groups.

So we constantly had to watch all of these flanks as we tried to move ahead with the Vietnamese-American relationship. I believe that the policy we ultimately followed was one of our most constructive and most successful during these four years. We moved from the point where we inherited this issue to full, diplomatic relations by the time we were finished, less than four years later.

Q: Could you describe how the Bush administration handled this issue, to understand where you moved?

On the other hand I also had a sense that Vietnam was an important country. It was important to try to heal the wounds left by the Vietnam War in our society. Moving ahead in relations was our best bet to get more information on our missing in action. Vietnam was also potentially important from the economic point of view. It obviously was also important in geopolitical terms. It has a large and dynamic population. Given the traditional Vietnamese antagonism toward China, it was also useful, in dealing with China, with which we wanted better relations, to improve our relations with some of China's historical enemies. This was just to remind the Chinese of the balance of power considerations applicable in this situation, whether it involved India, Vietnam, Russia, or Japan. Having good relations with those countries is helpful when we deal with China. So, for all of these reasons I felt that it was important to try to move ahead with Vietnam, even though I had this distrust of them.

Q: Could you explain for the record what we mean when we talk about MIAs, what the situation was, and how it had progressed, because this is a crucial consideration?

Q: Were you getting much support from the Asian countries on normalization of relations between the U.S. and Vietnam?

LORD: China was ambivalent. On the one hand, they would say that we should move ahead without worrying about issues like MIAs and human rights. They would ask why shouldn't we have normal relations? However, underneath this, I think that they would just as soon we not have good relations with Vietnam because of their own historical antagonism with Vietnam. One of their concerns probably was that normal relations with Vietnam would give us more leverage against China. For historical reasons the French would say that we should move ahead on relations with Vietnam. So most countries thought that we should make progress in this direction.

Now, a little more on the politics of this issue. I've already said that the White House was very sensitive on this question. Making progress on this matter was often like pulling teeth. Secretary Christopher was very helpful on this matter. He spent a lot of time on this. I spent a lot of time with him to get him working on it at his level. He wanted to move ahead, along all of the lines I mentioned, as did many people in the State Department. I had terrific support in my own bureau with outstanding FSOs, like Peter Tomsen, Ken Quinn, Kent Weidemann, Chris LaFleur, with experience in the area.

The U.S. economic agencies were anxious to move ahead because of the economic dimension in particular. The Defense Department, including the Joint Chiefs of Staff, wanted to move ahead, probably because they thought that we could get more information on the MIAs and partly because they saw the China aspect I mentioned above. Just generally, in terms of our interests in the area, they thought that having a better relationship with Vietnam wouldn't be all bad.

Q: Because it might have gotten lost, you might explain that, while we didn't have formal diplomatic relations with Vietnam, unlike North Korea, which is really sealed off, we had all sorts of contacts with Vietnam. There were visits by prominent Americans to Vietnam. Even teams went out to Hanoi to talk about MIAs.

LORD: Yes, we had teams in Hanoi which we greatly beefed up under the Clinton administration. We had people up there, even before the Clinton administration entered office, searching for remains of MIAs. We were working with the Vietnamese to get more information. Our military people doing this were extremely dedicated, and doing hard, sometimes dangerous, work.

There were some official American visitors going to Vietnam. We were not totally isolated from Vietnam, as was the case with North Korea and some other countries. We had an embargo on trade. We also blocked World Bank and IMF loans to Vietnam. Of course, we had no Embassy, Liaison Office, or anything else.

Q: But we had an immigration program, the so-called orderly departure program.

LORD: That's right. The orderly departure program helped people get out of Vietnam and travel to the United States if they wished to do so. There was also the problem of Vietnamese boat people who escaped from Vietnam and went to Hong Kong or to one of several countries in Southeast Asia. We tried to work with the Vietnamese authorities on that.

Q: What was our reading on the Vietnamese Government at that time? That is, in 1993.

LORD: Well, it was pretty authoritarian. There were some indications even then, in 1993, and the process continued, that there was a desire in Vietnam to reform their economy. Somewhat like what the Chinese had done, to open up to some extent to the outside world. The Vietnamese Government seemed to be interested in trying to get more foreign investment. However, the picture on human rights in Vietnam was still very grim. So that was our general impression. There were some members of the leadership who were considered more pro-reform than others. However, it was going to be a tough row to hoe, certainly in the field of human rights. But there were some indications that the Vietnamese Government was opening up.

As we looked at the situation in Vietnam, I've explained what we saw in it for us, in terms of moving ahead. From the Vietnamese point of view, first they had a major economic incentive to open up with us. That is, getting American trade and investment to help them in their efforts to open up to the outside world generally, in a way similar to what China had done, and to reform their economy. So they clearly had a tremendous, potential economic interest in normalizing relations with us. Not only oil research, for example, but investment generally and all kinds of other things.

Secondly, Hanoi had a general sense of diplomatic isolation because of us. The Vietnamese knew that we were, in effect, holding Japan back somewhat, for example. If they could normalize relations with us, this would open the diplomatic gates more generally. They managed to have pretty good relations with other countries, but normalization with the U.S. would generally help them. Thirdly, more specifically on the diplomatic and geopolitical front was their concern about China. By normalizing relations with us they would have some assurance and/or leverage vis-a-vis the Chinese.

So for these economic and geopolitical reasons, we figured that they had a lot of incentives to work with us. The trick was to play on those incentives to get the Vietnamese to be more cooperative on the MIA and the POW questions, in their own self interest.

I would like to make one more quick point, before I forget. I have talked about my own role, somewhat immodestly, but I could not have done this without tremendous help from a lot of Foreign Service Officers, and particularly Ken Quinn, who, as we speak, is now our Ambassador to Cambodia. Also, Kent Wiedemann, who is supposed to be our next Ambassador to Cambodia. There were other Foreign Service Officers, including Chris LaFleur, who is now DCM [Deputy Chief of Mission] in Tokyo. He was previously on the Vietnam desk. Desaix Anderson, who became our first Ambassador as we moved ahead. A lot of people worked very hard on this process of normalization. Obviously, this was always a collective effort.

Now, basically what we did in the course of several years was to make some progress on MIAs and then take a step forward in the relationship between Vietnam and the United States. One way we went about this was that we had to have some criteria to define progress on MIAs.

I don't have all of these yardsticks at my fingertips, but we had four or five main areas where we wanted to see progress made. These included, I recall, finding the remains of MIAs. That is, getting as many remains back as possible. Also included in the yardsticks was information on the missing in action, particularly the most promising cases. There were about a couple of hundred of these cases. We sought access to Vietnamese archives to get more information on the histories. Also, we wanted cooperation from the Vietnamese people. It wasn't just getting cooperation from Vietnamese Government officials. We also needed cooperation from villagers, some of whom might have seen things relating to the MIAs. The Vietnamese Government people always said that one way we could get help from the villagers was "to help us with our MIAs," even though they didn't care as much about them as we did about our MIAs. We did try to help them with their MIAs in terms of turning over our own records and archives, so they could go to their own people and say that the Americans are helping us with Vietnamese MIAs. They would then ask the village people to volunteer information to us.

One thing that the Vietnamese Government officials did was that, in their communications with their own people, they made it clear that they should cooperate and that it was in their interest to do so. Some of the Vietnamese people might not want to cooperate because they had bitter memories of the war, the American bombing, and so forth. So it was important to show that we Americans were providing the Vietnamese officials with information on Vietnamese MIAs. I recall that I went on a couple of trips to Vietnam where we brought information on their MIAs, so that they could tell their own people that they ought to cooperate with us.

Another criterion was cooperation with Laos and triangular searches. A lot of MIA cases involved locations in Laos, as well as some in Cambodia. I might add quickly that Cambodia was always the most forthcoming of the three countries of the former Indochina on the MIA question, although it was the least important in terms of information. The situation of MIAs in Laos provided a mixed picture. The Laotian authorities were generally quite helpful. However, they were generally poor in providing logistic help, so our assistance was needed.

So we had these criteria and probably some others that I've forgotten. Whenever we wanted to take a step forward, and I'll mention these in just a minute, we would also have White House white papers and State Department press releases, explaining how the Vietnamese Government had stepped up their cooperation, before we could take another step in normalizing our relationship.

In addition to dealing with Congress to get support, President Clinton also sent special missions to Vietnam to deal with MIA questions. I was Co-Chairman of these special missions, along with a man named Herschel Goldberg, who played a crucial role in them. Herschel Goldberg was the Deputy Director of the Department of Veterans Affairs. He was from Arkansas and had been working on veterans' affairs in Arkansas. He was on close terms with President Clinton. Then he came into office as the second ranking official in the Veterans Department. He also had served in Vietnam and spoke some Vietnamese. Because he represented veterans' interests and because he, himself, was suspicious of Hanoi, was from Arkansas, and was close to President Clinton, I welcomed his cooperation in this effort, in which he became heavily involved. It turned out that his involvement in these special missions was crucial to their success. So it wasn't just the State Department, the Defense Department, the JCS [Joint Chiefs of Staff], the economic agencies, and the White House. The Veterans Administration, which obviously had a clear interest in the Vietnam issue, was represented by Herschel Goldberg, its deputy director, who turned out to be very important in this regard.

If somebody goes to the President and says: "The Vietnamese Government is cooperating on MIA issues, and we ought to move ahead to broaden trade, or something like that, with Vietnam," and this person is from the State Department, from the Defense Department, or one of the economic agencies, the impact would be less than if Goldberg did. Not that we wouldn't have credibility, but the President might say: "Well, how do I know that the Vietnamese Government is really helping us?" So when a tough-minded, suspicious guy like Herschel Goldberg would say this to the President, it would carry a lot of weight. Also, Goldberg was very helpful with veterans groups and, to a certain extent, with the MIA families organizations. He would have more credibility with them than State Department or even Defense types. Tony Lake and I in particular worked with family and veteran groups as well. I made several appearances before them as well as consulting them.

From the very beginning and even before I had personally met him, I saw Goldberg as an asset. As I say, he turned out to be very crucial. He and I headed up several Presidential Missions to Vietnam. I was always an equal ranking member of the mission but was mainly concerned with the political side of it. I would make sure that Goldberg was treated as the first among equals, even though we were co-chairmen of the mission. In fact, the NSC [National Security Council] representative on the mission, whether it was Wiedemann or Roth, would be the third-ranking person. Goldberg was the co-chairman and was the "first among equals," as he should have been, both because he was a sub-cabinet level official and also because he was close to the President. I felt that, for credibility purposes, it was very important for our domestic audiences to see that the number one person on the team was a Veterans Department man and not a State Department official.

Goldberg and I worked extremely well together. It was not because we particularly liked or trusted the Vietnamese Government officials we met on the successive trips to Vietnam, though we liked the Vietnamese people. Rather we saw that it was in the self-interest of the Vietnamese Government to help us on MIAs. Because of our efforts to press them on this matter, they were, in fact, cooperating, and we were able to go ahead on the normalization of relations. We regularly made reports to President Clinton after these trips on the cooperation we had received from Vietnamese Government officials. This had credibility because Goldberg was involved in preparing these reports, in addition to myself, the Defense Department people, and so on. We always had an officer dealing with POW/MIA matters from the Defense Department at about my level, as well as other experts from the Pentagon and so on.

We made several of these trips. I made some trips on my own but often went with Herschel Goldberg. On the first couple of trips we also had some representatives of MIA and veterans groups with us, because they could help us prepare for the trip, sit in on the discussions with the Vietnamese, and also report back to the President, as did Goldberg and myself. This was somewhat of a risk. We had to include various members, some of whom were more radical than others and more distrustful of U.S. Government officials. However, we felt that this was a good move in terms of domestic politics, since it gave them a chance to participate on these trips. Secondly, it made it possible to bring more leverage and pressure to bear on the Vietnamese officials because they would be sitting in on these meetings. The Vietnamese officials would hear directly from MIA family representatives and from U.S. veterans groups and could see how important this matter was to us, from the political point of view.

These representatives also gave us some good advice. We constantly had to make sure that we were in charge of the talking points. We often would go over our approaches with them before the trips, though we couldn't give family group and veterans organization representatives a veto over talking points. On these trips we would make our presentation. Then we would turn to the veterans and the MIA family representatives. They would make their own comments, individually.

I would say that in the veterans community there were different groups. Some of them were willing to follow our approach. Others were more suspicious of the U.S. Government. We didn't convert everybody. Some of these representatives were still hostile to the Vietnamese Government and didn't want to go ahead on normalizing relations with Vietnam. Others were already in favor of going ahead. I think that some of those in the middle were somewhat influenced to cooperate with us once they went on these trips.

Q: When you were talking to the Vietnamese officials, what was your impression of how well informed they were about America?

LORD: I think that they were pretty well informed, considering the fact that we didn't have a lot of communications with them. Some of them had made occasional visits to the U.S. and so on. I don't know how to quantify this, but I think that Vietnamese officials were relatively well informed about America. I think that they understood the domestic political pressures on our side. They certainly had to understand this, from the aggressive talking points we presented on the MIAs. We always spent the first couple of hours of a meeting with them on this issue alone. They understood how important this issue was for us, in principle, in terms of our domestic politics, and in our being able to move ahead on normalization of relations with Vietnam.

Really, it was quite extraordinary to go to Hanoi, either alone or a co-leader of the Presidential Commission on MIA questions, and spend three-quarters of our time on the MIA issue. From the standpoint of the Vietnamese Government officials we met, they were thinking about economics and geopolitics and the fact that, after all, we had lost the war. They had many more missing in action than we did. I'm sure that some of the Vietnamese officials were sort of puzzled and others were annoyed that we should spend so much time on the MIA issue.

It really got to be repetitious. We used essentially the same talking points at every meeting with them. However, I think that, by virtue of our presentations and, I'm sure, from their conversations with fellow Asians and fellow diplomats, they gained an improved knowledge about Americans. This added to their general knowledge. I feel that they understood the U.S. pretty well.

Q: Modern sampling techniques, particularly the use of DNA as an identifier, were really just coming into their own.

LORD: That's right, and they became more and more helpful. We would dig and dig in these incredibly remote and heavily forested hillsides, and DNA samples were very difficult to find. Sometimes it took heroic efforts by our people, and by the Vietnamese villagers as well, to conduct these searches. In the course of the search they might just come up with a couple of teeth, or something like that. Digging around took an extraordinary effort. The DNA samples helped.

We had laboratories in Hawaii, which I often visited with the Secretary of State and others when we went through Hawaii. These laboratories did the DNA work, which sometimes took considerable time. They would look at the remains very carefully, piecing things together.

In summary, how we moved ahead was roughly as follows. Based on Presidential Commission trips made by Goldberg and myself or in the course of my individual trips, we reported back to the President, and the White House released a summary of the findings. In 1993 we took the first step of no longer blocking or vetoing support from the IMF [International Monetary Fund] and the World Bank in the form of loans for Vietnam. This actually was in many ways more important than the bilateral trade embargo, which we still had at this point. It freed up money from other countries. Up to this point we had blocked IMF and World Bank loans to Vietnam. This was the first step we took in response to some progress in MIA identification, which we reported back to the White House. This was in 1993, I believe.

I don't have the specific date in mind, but some time in 1994 we took the next step and lifted our embargo on trade with Vietnam. This was another step, which was also based on further progress with the MIA cases. Later in 1994 we set up Liaison Offices in Washington and Hanoi, just as we had had previously done years earlier with the Chinese. Up until then we had been dealing with the Vietnamese in the United States, primarily through their Ambassador to the UN in New York. He was very helpful. He would come down to Washington and talk to me, and I would see him up there in New York. However, now we set up Liaison Offices in each other's capitals. That was a major step forward, as they were de facto embassies.

Then, in 1995 we moved to full diplomatic relations. In one of the most dramatic events in the four years I spent as Assistant Secretary, Secretary Christopher made a trip to Vietnam in August, 1995, during which we raised the U.S. flag at the new American Embassy in Hanoi. I'll get to this trip in just a minute. Given all of the historical baggage behind it, that was quite a moment. So this was the way we proceeded over a period of several years. He also visited Cambodia on this trip and, along with the rest of us, was depressed once again by Khmer Rouge atrocities.

In each case it was like pulling teeth to get the White House or Tony Lake to continue the process. We sent along enough convincing reports to the President by Goldberg, myself, and others - backed up, as I say, by the Pentagon and by the economic agencies in Washington - to give us reasons to move ahead. Very frankly, this was not an easy job. Over the years I and my colleagues had to maneuver and press the White House, as well as working with Congress and the family and veteran groups. It took great effort and Christopher was very supportive.

Secretary Christopher has characterized his trip to Vietnam in 1995 as a very moving experience for him. He deserves a lot of credit for his effort in accomplishing this, working in cooperation with the White House, on this whole saga over a period of several years.

In the course of this two-day visit to Hanoi we spent the first day essentially and symbolically on the past. The second day we spent on the future. As always, on the first day he met with the Joint Task Force people to see how we were doing in cooperation with the Vietnamese in collecting and shipping remains and developing further information on MIAs. This, of course, represented the past. He participated, as I had on an earlier visit to Hanoi, in a repatriation ceremony. This was a very simple ceremony at the airport in Hanoi. The Vietnamese turned over to our people several coffins containing the remains of deceased American military personnel, which were then loaded upon transport planes and flown back to the U.S. It was one of the most moving experiences in my life when I witnessed one of those ceremonies. I had the same experience with Secretary Christopher as well.

As I said, the MIA issue was still a high profile matter, and this took up the first day of the Christopher visit to Hanoi. We then took up other issues, of course, including economics, geopolitics, and so on. There were further meetings with Vietnamese officials and discussions about where we could cooperate and develop our bilateral relations. There were meetings with U.S. businessmen to underline our economic interests in Vietnam. Raising the U.S. flag at our new Embassy symbolized the beginning of a new relationship. Then Secretary Christopher gave a speech at the University of Vietnam before a group of Vietnamese students. He talked about the past and also about the future, looking toward the next century.

This was a nicely symbolic trip which was the final and major step accomplished over a period of several years to normalize relations. It turned out, by this time, to be very well received in the U.S., including the media, with minimal criticism.

During the remainder of those first four years of my service as Assistant Secretary, we continued to try to flesh out that relationship with Vietnam. We had Desaix Anderson, a distinguished Foreign Service Officer initially serving in Hanoi as our first Ambassador. Then Pete Peterson, a former POW, went to Hanoi to replace Anderson. We worked to get more information on repatriation and to move on trade and the MFN [Most Favored Nation] issue, discussed geopolitics, including China. We also talked to the Vietnamese about human rights. We had several dialogues on this issue while I was there. These were like the human rights dialogues which we had with the Chinese. They were conducted by Assistant Secretary of State John Shattuck and people from his Bureau of Human Rights, with other people from our bureau sitting in. These dialogues took place both in Washington and in Hanoi.

Q: As we were moving on these issues, what was the role of Senator Helms [Republican, North Carolina]?

LORD: It was interesting. He was among those who, you might imagine, would be opposed to this. However, he never seemed to be as much out in front on this issue as he was on some other issues, like abortion or the United Nations. He was Chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, obviously, and he was generally very suspicious of Vietnam. He was generally not helpful. Senator Smith [Republican, New Hampshire] and various Congressmen were much more vocal on this issue, and they could count on Senator Helms' supporting them. It was more Senator Smith and others that we were dealing with on a day to day basis. As I have said, we had indispensable help from Senators and Congressmen who were war heroes or POWs.

Q: Obviously, this whole opening to Vietnam was a very emotional and also a political issue, one that really engaged the attention of Americans. What was your impression of the Vietnamese leadership in Hanoi, when you were talking to them? Did they seem to have the same...

LORD: We dealt, on a day to day basis, at one level, of course. I'll get to the Vietnamese leadership in a minute. The Vietnamese representative at the UN in New York later came down to Washington to head up their Liaison Office. He is now their Ambassador in Washington. The Ambassador and the Foreign Minister, a man named Cam, were pragmatic and relatively easy to deal with, particularly for Vietnamese, based on my experience during the 1970s. They were clearly interested in moving ahead with the Vietnamese-American relationship, in their own national interest. Therefore, they wanted to be helpful on the MIA question.

They would sometimes play the game that, "We have our own hard liners in Hanoi. We need your help in order to satisfy them" or, "Don't press us too hard on human rights. This is a sensitive issue among our leadership." Or they would say: "There's a debate in our leadership, and there are suspicions of U.S. intentions. So please be careful." They would play that game but, on the whole, at this level people seemed to understand the U.S. fairly well and genuinely wanted to improve our relations. I must say that we had really cordial and friendly relations with some very helpful people in Hanoi, as well as their representatives in Washington and New York.

I would see members of the Vietnamese leadership when I was heading the Presidential Commission on MIAs with Goldberg, or when I was with the Secretary of State. You got different emphases from them, at one time or another. I saw the Prime Minister, the head of the Communist Party of Vietnam, and the President of Vietnam. The impressions we had of them would vary. If I recall correctly, the Prime Minister and Deputy Prime Ministers were generally more pro-reform. You got the sense that they were somewhat easier to deal with and friendly, whereas the head of the Party was sort of in the middle, and the President was more hard line. These were people in their 70s. They clearly had a personal legacy left over from the war, but we sensed no particular bitterness or vitriol coming out of them. They didn't rake over old coals. Generally, they were patient listeners, whether at my level or a higher level, to long presentations on nothing but the MIA question. They always pledged full cooperation with our efforts, sometimes noting their own MIA problems.

I can't say that any of these officials were incredibly impressive, as, say, Zhou En-lai had been impressive or even someone like Fidel Ramos of the Philippines and other officials of a more democratic stripe. So those were my impressions of them.

Q: My question, beyond that, was whether dealing with United States representatives seemed to stir any emotions on the part of Vietnamese officials?

LORD: There might have been one or two meetings where emotions of this kind would pop out on occasion. I can't be specific about that, but there might have been a phase of the conversation where the Vietnamese would get slightly testy. However, on the whole, whether we were dealing with the Vietnamese leadership, with people at my level, with the Foreign Minister, or with a few ordinary Vietnamese citizens that we met, there was a remarkable lack of bitterness about the past. There was a general commitment to look to the future in our mutual, national interest. I had seen the same phenomenon in China, where, despite our mutual hostility and isolation for two decades, there was an immediate positive response to us. I got very little evidence of an adverse, emotional reaction to Americans.

The other interesting thing is that in the U.S. I would only occasionally see and meet with Vietnamese-American representatives. While we had a lot of dealings on the domestic front with Congress, with families, and with veterans organizations, moving ahead with Vietnam did not seem to be a major source of controversy. Normalizing relations with Vietnam did not seem to be a serious issue. The Vietnamese I met in the U.S. wanted to normalize relations with their country, because they felt that it was in their own self-interest to do this. Another reason might have been that this might give them a chance to go back and see their families in Vietnam. If they were from South Vietnam, you might have expected that they might be bitter because they had worked with the U.S. and had to leave Vietnam when the war ended in 1975 or 1976. Or, if they were boat people, they might have left Vietnam because they were violently against the communist government and were opposed to improving relations with it. But for some reason the Vietnamese people who had come to the U.S. had very little contact with my office or with me personally, even though obviously I was one of the point men on the whole policy of improving Vietnamese-American relations. They didn't play a major role in our policy. I never had the sense that one of the obstacles to moving ahead, for example, would be the opinions of Vietnamese who had fled their country and come to the U.S. There was much more American than Vietnamese-American opinion opposed to normalization of relations. And even this turned out to be modest, in part thanks to our skillful handling of the issue.

Q: Well, then, turning to the other parts of Indo-China, such as Laos and Cambodia, we talked somewhat about Cambodia already.

LORD: Yes, let me deal with Cambodia, and then we'll discuss Laos, Burma, and some other places.

This is another issue, like Vietnam, that had some personal resonance with me on several issues. First, in dealing with the Vietnamese negotiations in the 1970s. When I worked with Dr. Kissinger, Cambodia and Laos were also on the agenda. As I already mentioned, I came close to resigning from Kissinger's NSC staff over the American incursion into Cambodia in the spring of 1970. Also, like every human being, I was subsequently totally shocked and outraged by the Khmer Rouge atrocities in Cambodia. I think that most people would agree - although, more recently, Africa has had its own horrible stories in Rwanda, Burundi, and the Congo - that after the holocaust of the Jews in Europe, Hitler, Stalin, and Mao, the Khmer Rouge brutalities were among the worst events in the second half of the 20th century. I have great respect and affection for the Cambodian people. I also had Cambodia a little bit in my background because when I was Ambassador to China, Prince Sihanouk spent several months out of each year living in China. I used to go and call on him, just to stay in touch. The Chinese played an important role in the ongoing Cambodian situation, of course, supporting opposition to the Vietnamese, but this also reflected our past association. I had met Sihanouk several times when I was traveling with Dr. Kissinger. For a long time, he suspected that the Nixon Administration had engineered his overthrow in 1970 - this was not true.

I always felt considerable admiration for Sihanouk. He acquired in some quarters a reputation for being a buffoon because he was always changing his mind, going with the wind, and switching sides. Perhaps there was an element of that even in these meetings, but I felt that here was a man who was doing a balancing act but who always had his country's interests at heart. He was genuinely trying to ensure that Cambodia might become more peaceful and prosperous and live a more democratic life. He was personally torn by his own personal angst about his country, and the difficult choices he faced.

On the one hand, of course, he was a fierce, Khmer nationalist who loved his country and always put it first. He was always trying to figure out what was best for Cambodia. Therefore, he always had natural, anti-Vietnamese instincts as a Cambodian. He opposed the Vietnamese invasion of Cambodia in 1979. On the other hand, he detested the Khmer Rouge, who had murdered something like 15 or so members of his own family and who kept him essentially as a front for their rule for seven years, during which time he was under house arrest. He was torn between an intense dislike of the Vietnamese and an equally intense dislike of the Khmer Rouge. He steadily searched for the best way through this thicket, which involved a lot of emotional, personal, and political dilemmas for him.

Certainly, Sihanouk was in favor of promoting a third force, an alternative to the Khmer Rouge and Vietnamese influence, that still is led by his son, Prince Ranariddh, who has always been rather ineffectual and weak. So I found from our conversations that Prince Sihanouk reflected this terrible agony of his country and genuine patriotism. I thought he was shrewder than many people gave him credit for, even as he has periodically reversed his positions. He was above all a survivor. To this day, he's a force in the country.

Anyway, I came to Cambodia in 1993 with some considerable historical baggage, just as I had with Vietnam. Early in my tenure as Assistant Secretary of State for East Asian Affairs, Cambodia was high up on my agenda. I came into office in March, 1993, and the Cambodians were gearing up for elections in May, 1993. The biggest peacekeeping program in the history of the UN was being implemented in Cambodia at that point. The program was called UNTAC. I don't have the details at my fingertips, but literally billions of dollars were being spent on a very large UN presence.

As I was saying, by the early spring of 1993 the huge UN operation in Cambodia had succeeded in doing many things. First, violence had substantially declined in Cambodia, compared to the Khmer Rouge period and even after that, when there was fighting between the Khmer Rouge and other factions.

Secondly, with UN help, 350-400,000 refugees, most of whom had been in Thailand, had returned to Cambodia and were being resettled. Thirdly, outside influence of a nefarious nature was being reduced. The Chinese were backing away from their support of the Khmer Rouge. The Thai were beginning to crack down on the Khmer Rouge along the Cambodian-Thai border. The Vietnamese were being generally helpful. Elections were being organized in Cambodia. All in all, this was one of the most successful UN operations ever.

So my first task, or rather the Clinton administration's first task, on the Cambodian front was to give as much support as possible to the electoral process and to make sure that the elections were as fair as possible.

I went to Cambodia early in my tenure as Assistant Secretary to show support for this electoral process. This was only about ten days before the elections. There were some outbreaks of violence and some question as to whether all of the various political parties were going to participate. Some observers were not sure that the elections were going to work out, even though 95 percent of the people had been registered. This was quite an achievement. So I purposely went there to urge all of the political parties to take part in the elections. I held a press conference to show American support for this process. Even though I wasn't 100 percent sure, by any means, how it was going to come out, I expressed great optimism and U.S. support for this process. I said that I hoped that it would be a fair election and said how meaningful this would be for the Cambodian people, who had had such a tragic history.

The UN operation in support of the elections was headed up by the Japanese, a Mr. Akashi, who then went on to Bosnia afterwards. He did a fabulous job in Cambodia. Working with him was Australian General Sanderson. Of course, I met with them, as well as with others, when I was in Cambodia. In my various trips to that country I met with many people, including government leaders, members of various factions, representatives of non-governmental organizations and human rights groups, American business people, and so forth.

Q: You mentioned that a decision had to be reached, early on in the process, about what we should do. Would we support Prince Ranariddh fully, or would we go for cohabitation, or however you call it? On an issue like this, I think that it's interesting to follow the process. How was the decision made? Was it made by you, or...

LORD: First of all, it was essentially a United Nations decision. Or at least it was a decision made by the countries participating in UNTAC [UN Transitional Authority in Cambodia]. As I recall, the decision was unanimous among the countries involved that, even though we didn't like the way Hun Sen was muscling his way in, he had received some 40 percent of the vote in the election of 1993, and we were going to have civil conflict, so we ought to live with this. The UN certainly made that decision. Indeed, it was a UN and not a U.S. decision. Obviously, having said that, I must add that we were crucial to it. But if we had held out, I am not certain that we could have changed it. We would have stood pretty much alone in this respect.

Within our own government, I don't recall the exact process. As the very least, it would have been a decision approved by Secretary of State Christopher and by Tony Lake, the National Security Adviser to President Clinton. I don't know whether it ever reached the President. Certainly, it was the kind of key decision that would be dealt with at that level.

Q: What about Laos?

LORD: I don't have too much to say about Laos. It was rather quiet during my watch. You have to have priorities, and of course you have to say about every country that it's important. And Laos does have some importance, but I'm not going to sit here and insult people by saying that Laos, Brunei, and Papua New Guinea were our highest priorities. I visited Laos a couple of times. Since it was part of the former Indochina, it had a certain resonance for me. I've already mentioned that my first assignment as special assistant for Dr. Kissinger was to write a paper on Laos in 1970 and this turned into a crisis because of misleading information fed to me by other agencies. Like Vietnam in the early 1990s, Laos had an authoritarian government and had some human rights problems. However, Laos was very important to us regarding the MIA question, second only to Vietnam. It was not so much the numbers of MIA cases but the fact that many of the most promising ones concerned Laos, because we were getting more information on those in Laos. Laos was also important in terms of the narcotics traffic.

So we paid some attention to Laos. I tried to get the attention of Secretary Christopher and others directed to Laos, though I couldn't justify it very much. I visited Laos a couple of times. I always saw the Lao Foreign Minister when he was in the U.S., either at the UN in New York or in Washington. I would try to get him in at higher levels of the State Department, probably at the Undersecretary of State or Deputy Secretary level.

We worked to improve our relations there and to increase trade and investment. We didn't have the kind of embargo to deal with that we had with Vietnam. We tried to get Lao cooperation on the drug program. We made fair progress with some effort.

On MIAs I always felt that the Lao weren't very helpful. For some reason the American MIA family groups said that Laos was more helpful than Vietnam. I didn't think so. Part of the Lao problem was just poverty and a lack of resources.

So I spent some time on Laos. I was always very courteous to them. Even before Laos became a member of ASEAN, if Lao representatives were in town for whatever reason, I tried to see them. Whenever Lao representatives went to an ASEAN regional security dialogue, I made a particular effort to see them. However, Laos was not a high priority for me. The single most important issue on the agenda of contacts with Laos was MIA cooperation. We managed to improve that. Often we tried that together with the Vietnamese. We did some work along the Vietnam-Laos border. At one point I went to an excavation camp in that area where we searched for MIA remains, working with the Lao and the Vietnamese.

Laos was a secondary issue for us. We made modest progress with Laos during my four years as Assistant Secretary. It wasn't on a major scale, but there was some improvement on the investment front, on the MIA question, and on drug cooperation.

Q: Burma?

For several years China had continued to develop its relations with Burma, because the Chinese leaders, of course, don't care about human rights in another country. Secondly, for geographic reasons, the Chinese have sought to extend their influence in Burma and eventually to gain access to a warm water port in Burma. So there has been a lot of Chinese military aid extended to the Burmese Government.

Our interest in Burma was to see whether we could improve the human rights situation and gain the Burmese government's cooperation on drugs. There was some debate within the U.S. Government and within our Congress about which objective should have priority. Some observers, including some Congressmen from Harlem [in New York] and other places where drugs were a huge problem, consider that drugs are decimating our youth. They feel that, in this case, our overriding priority should be dealing with the narcotics situation. Even if it meant giving some aid to the Burmese Government while holding our nose about the nature of the regime, they felt that we had to do something to stem the flow of opium and other drugs into the United States from Burma, which was a key supplier. I don't have the figures before me now, but a huge percentage of the opium traffic in general and other drugs was coming out of Burma.

Q: Were there any other political personalities on the scene, apart from the Burmese military and Aung San Suu Kyi, whom we were concerned about?

LORD: Not really. I don't recall anyone else. There was the usual speculation about who was somewhat more reasonable and who were the hard liners in the regime. There was speculation about who might be somewhat more willing to deal with Aung San Suu Kyi and who wanted to isolate her totally. We had some reason to believe that there were some different factions, but the Burmese were never really forthcoming. The collective decision of the Burmese military continued to reflect a hard line.

Outside the government, Aung San Suu Kyi's supporters who won the 1990 elections by a landslide - many of them were harassed or imprisoned. The only other force in Burma are the ethnic groups. There were a lot of ethnic insurgencies in Burma, including three or four different major rebellions. The Burmese military junta moved to crush and/or reconcile itself with each of these different groups, to make sure that they could consolidate their power. Through military pressure and some process of negotiations and bribery, they managed to stamp out several of the ethnic insurgencies.

Some of these groups were at least potential allies of Aung San Suu Kyi, at least temporary allies of convenience with a common enemy. They might have been able to weaken the Burmese Government's central control of the country, but the alliance of these ethnic groups with Aung San Suu Kyi was not particularly effective. As a practical matter, there was no real way that we could deal with them. Some of these ethnic groups were engaged in drug trafficking, so they weren't necessarily good guys either.

Q: Still sticking to this general area, did Hong Kong amount to anything in particular?

LORD: I can't recall how much we talked about Hong Kong in the China context. This was not a major agenda item with the Chinese or British, although we were concerned about the return of Hong Kong to China in July, 1997. We made clear our interests in China's living up to its obligations to preserve Hong Kong's autonomy. I visited Hong Kong several times and always met with Governor Patten, Anson Chan, the local Chinese representative and Americans and Hong Kong business leaders and Hong Kong legislators including Martin Lee, plus the media. Patten, in my view, was terrific and very courageous in trying to carve out political space and freedom for Hong Kong before the Chinese took over. He incurred Beijing's wrath and insults by pursuing reforms that gave the Hong Kong people somewhat more political clout. He was trying to make it difficult for the Chinese to roll back this process after the 1997 takeover. I - and our government - strongly supported Patten, who was extremely impressive. We established good personal ties as well.

Now let me review Mongolia briefly.

I always had a soft spot in my heart for Mongolia. To the credit of Jim Baker, the former Secretary of State under President Bush, he visited Mongolia twice. Once he was supposed to visit there even longer and do some hunting. Then there was some kind of international crisis that he had to leave Mongolia to deal with.

Q: It was the Gulf War.

LORD: The bad news is that I believe Baker went to Mongolia during his tenure as Secretary of State twice as often as he went to Japan. He went to Japan only once, I believe, which, in my view, reflects a somewhat skewed priority.

Although it was obviously not at the top of my list, Mongolia at least deserved attention and sympathy for several reasons.

First, it was the first Asian country to throw off the yoke of the Soviet Union, in 1990 or 1991. You should remember that the Mongolian economy was about 90 percent dependent on the Soviet Union. So this was a courageous move for Mongolia, even in that early period after the disappearance of Soviet influence and empire.

Secondly, the Mongolians have tried consistently now, and for several years, including my term as Assistant Secretary, to promote both economic and political reform. Mongolia is unlike Vietnam and unlike China, which have only gone in for economic reform, and are still authoritarian in outlook. Mongolia promoted democracy at the same time as they promoted opening up their society to a free market, foreign investment, and trade.

Thirdly, Mongolia is sitting out there between these two giants, Russia and China. There is obviously a lot of romance and nostalgia and admiration for these nomadic people, who have lived between these two giants. Mongolia has no human rights problems. They are trying to promote democracy and the free market. Not only should we have some sympathy for that, but also we believed that they could establish a pattern and influence debate about what course much of Asia is going to take. This concerned the issues of Asian values, authoritarianism, human rights, and more political freedom. Mongolia could be an example, even though a modest one given the fact that while it is a large country, it has a small population of only two or three million people. A successful Mongolia would show that you can have open politics, with free elections and democracy, and make economic progress at the same time. The example of Mongolia could make it possible to counter the Chinese argument - and the phony Asian values argument - that you need stability to make economic progress with "stability" translated into repressive government.

So for all of these reasons, I always worked hard on Mongolia. I labored to get as much aid for Mongolia as possible. Whenever a Mongolian visitor would come to the UN General Assembly or would visit Washington, I would always try to make it possible for him to see as high a level official as possible, like the Secretary of State or the Deputy Secretary. I took two trips to Mongolia. The first trip really demonstrated my commitment. I went in January-February, 1994, when it was ice cold. I went out over the Gobi Desert in a helicopter. I met with all the Mongolian leaders. We had some very interesting geopolitical discussions in the Gobi Desert with their National Security Adviser and their Foreign Minister. I was very moved by the whole experience.

I went back to Mongolia in the fall of 1995 with the First Lady, Mrs. Clinton. We had gone together to China for the International Women's Conference, and we went off from there to Mongolia. She was also very touched by the visit. I've always kept in touch with Mongolia since then. I meet periodically with their Ambassadors in Washington and in New York.

After I left government, I pressed for a time to have President Clinton stop in Mongolia when he went to China, but I gave up on that after a while. I thought that the symbolism of the President's visiting this neighboring democracy in Asia would be impressive. (On his trip to China, President Clinton didn't even go to Japan).

We managed to get quite a bit of aid for Mongolia, which couldn't absorb all that much. The aid was for energy and for other purposes. The total amount was $10-$15 million annually. Given the shrinking AID budget and the fact that Mongolia is rather distant from the point of view of an average American, we did well. We emphasized to Congress that the Mongolians were trying to promote freedom, as well as the capitalist system. They had no human rights abuses. They had free elections. They went from a communist to a non-communist government. I thought that the Mongolians really deserved our support. Several Senators visited Mongolia and came back supporting an aid program for that country. During the last year I was Assistant Secretary, we got more aid for Mongolia from Congress than we asked for, which is almost unheard of, particularly in a time of declining aid budgets.

Sadly, and as we speak, Mongolia has had some real problems. A certain deadlock has developed between the President of Mongolia and the Prime Minister and Government. The jury is still out on what they're going to do. I spent more time on Mongolia than, perhaps, many people would think that it deserved. But I had a soft spot in my heart for that country, and I thought it was an important example of courageous people trying to move in the right direction.

Q: Should we talk about Australia and New Zealand?

So the subjects we discussed with Australia were UN peacekeeping, various regional conflicts, and issues like Cambodia, relations with key Asian countries like China and Japan, open trade, progress toward free trade, lifting APEC to the summit level, forceful and regional security dialogues, always being forthcoming and trying to move these dialogues along, while taking on the Chinese and others, environmental and non-proliferation issues. These discussions with Australia really reflected dream relationship.

Interestingly enough, Australia was the one country in Asia with which we had a trade surplus. Indeed, the Australians used to point out that, in terms of the percentage of trade, their deficit with us was bigger than our trading deficit with Japan. I remember the first AUSMIN meeting, because it was in March, 1994. It involved bringing Secretary Christopher to Australia as well as Perry. This was on the way to the terribly difficult Christopher trip to China, when the Chinese had locked up dissidents.

Anyway, I remember this AUSMIN trip for that reason. When we got to Australia, we had terrific meetings of Defense and State Department representatives. We agreed on just about everything. However, at that point, as I've said elsewhere, we were having difficulties both in our Chinese and Japanese relationships. With China, because of human rights and the MFN issues. With Japan, because of trade disputes - Mickey Kantor, the U.S. Trade Representative, took on Japanese Prime Minister Hashimoto and others, and so on. Even though Evans and Keating and the Australians in general were very high on human rights and democracy, they didn't think that we ought to link them with trade and MFN with China. They also didn't think that we should be getting into a big battle with Japan, particularly when it looked, as a result of our poor public relations that we were in favor of managed trade, while Japan was in favor of freer trade. This of course turned upside down our two countries' positions.

I mention all of this, because when we came out for a joint press conference with Foreign Minister Evans and Secretary of State Christopher, as often happens, the media focused on the one problem area. 99 percent of our agenda and meetings had been positive. We had a tremendous communique. We had agreed to cooperate on all of these regional and global issues.

However, Evans got one or two questions on Japan and China. He took a whack at U.S. policy, and that just dominated the entire media coverage in Australia and the U.S. coverage of the meeting. So it looked as if we had had poor meeting whereas, in fact, we had had a fabulous meeting. This was really unfair and the media often do that - bad news is more news than good news.

Secretary Christopher was annoyed at that, including Evans' role, although you can't really blame Evans for giving an honest answer and then having the Australian press totally dominated by it. The press likes to fasten on differences between countries. We had such a love match with the Australians on all of these issues that it was almost boring. It was unfortunate that such a successful visit was marred by this media slant. Not to mention the fact that we were all preoccupied by the upcoming Christopher visit to China.

So, although Australia was helpful and would talk about East Timor and human rights, as we did, and was probably more helpful than any other country in Asia in this respect, Australia was certainly not more forceful than we were or out in front of us on that issue. As I said, Australia was helpful on human rights with the Chinese, even though sometimes it cost them. It was helpful on Cambodia, and on all of these other issues. However, I wouldn't say that they were more forceful than we were. Just that they looked better than any other Asian country. They were in the habit of being helpful to us.

Also, another thing that the Australians were doing, which I clearly understood and had no problem with, was that they were trying to become more of an Asian country. Of course, they had started out with an almost undiluted, heavy, British background. So they looked to England and Europe and the Commonwealth in general until recent years. Then they shifted in their trade patterns, their alliances, their interests, and influence. They looked more to the United States, which is now a major influence on Australia. Now Australia, when I was in office, also wanted to be seen more as Asians than Europeans. They were excluded by Prime Minister Mahathir of Malaysia from his EAEC [East Asian Conference] concept, which made the Australians (and New Zealanders) mad because they thought that they should be accepted as Asians.

Australian trade patterns were beginning to be more with Asia and not just with the U.S. and Europe.

What I have to cover now are a couple of functional matters.

Q: I was going to ask you about APEC, mutual defense, and Asian values. I think that we can also cover a couple of other matters.

LORD: Some of this I have touched on tangentially already, but let me go now to APEC and then regional security.

Q: Could you explain what APEC stands for and how it came to be?

LORD: APEC stands for the Asian Pacific Economic Cooperation Forum. It is, perhaps, the most awkward name ever devised. The word "Forum" is usually dropped, so just call it APEC.

It's a trans-Pacific operation which had been started a few years earlier. I believe that the first meeting of the group took place in Australia, and some of the other, early meetings took place in Seoul [South Korea] and elsewhere. It was designed to promote freer trade and investment in the Pacific area. It included the major countries of the Asia-Pacific area, plus the United States and Canada. Under a compromise that had been worked out a few years earlier in Seoul it also included both Taiwan and China. It's one of those organizations which didn't require statehood to be a member, like the UN. Rather, one could become a member of APEC if it were a recognized, economic entity. Given Taiwan's economic importance, the Chinese allowed Taiwan in, although there was constant fighting about how much influence Taiwan could have, at what level, and so on. Hong Kong was also a member.

When the Clinton Administration came into office, there had been a lot of “alphabet soup” going on in the Pacific area, including economic and other organizations. Even I can't remember all of the initials, but there was the Pacific Basin Economic Council and a couple of others. Some of them were strictly to promote trade and investment. Others were think tanks, and there was a whole bunch of organizations. However, this seemed to be easily the most promising to us. It always met at the foreign minister and trade minister level.

We decided, and I highlighted this also in my confirmation statement, that in striving to elevate Asia in our foreign policy agenda and to build incrementally, with others, a Pacific Community we would blend both bilateral and regional approaches to Asia. If it were a matter of defense, this obviously meant maintaining our bilateral relationships and alliances but also promoting a regional security dialogue.

For example, if we were concerned about Korea, we would wind up not only promoting bilateral talks between both North and South Koreans but also four power talks, including China and the U.S. If it was APEC, we wanted to pursue trade and investment bilaterally, but we also wanted to use APEC for trade and investment liberalization. Often, it's easier to encourage countries to open up if there is collective pressure, not to mention incentives, than if it was just a bilateral meeting with another country. We thought that, over time, whether it was Japan, China, or whoever else where we had trade problems, not only would we negotiate with them bilaterally but we also hoped that the collective commitments and pressures toward freer trade in the area would work on these countries as well and help us to open them up. In this way we wouldn't have to do all of the heavy lifting by ourselves, even as we hoped that the GATT [General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade] and then the WTO [World Trade Organization] would help on a global basis.

We also saw APEC as being important because it included the U.S. and Canada. Therefore, it was trans-Pacific in character and would tend to head off regional blocs limited to Asia only, including the EAEC [East Asian Economic Caucus]. However, one of the debates about trade policy concerns whether it is dangerous to have a regional organization like APEC, or one like NAFTA [North American Free Trade Area] tending to promote trade within blocs, as opposed to a global approach to trade, under the GATT and now the WTO. The fact is that these two approaches are not mutually inconsistent. We always referred to APEC and the North American Free Trade Association as leading toward or at least promoting global trade liberalization, not as regional trading blocs as such.

Indeed, we used movement on trade and investment in APEC, as I'll mention in a minute, as an inducement to the Europeans to be more reasonable in GATT and in the Uruguay Round. It also helped to spur progress in the Western Hemisphere.

So we had the fortunate calendar timing that I mentioned earlier. There were 15 members of APEC when the Clinton administration entered office. The host country for these meetings rotates every year. It just so happened that in the first year of President Clinton's first term, the U.S. was the host country. Even as the G-7 [meeting of the largest industrial countries] had taken place in Tokyo, when there was a one out of seven chance that the G-7 meeting in its first year would be held in Asia. We used that to promote the Pacific community right off the bat in the Clinton administration. So the U.S. was the host nation for APEC in 1993, and the meeting was held in Seattle. This provided an opportunity to put Asia on the map in our foreign policy, public consciousness, and also in Asia's perception of American priorities.

Later in the game, and with the support of Prime Minister Keating of Australia, President Clinton and the White House agreed, roughly in June or July, 1993, to raise APEC to the Summit Level at the meeting scheduled to be held in Seattle, Washington, in November. This would be the first ever summit meeting of Asia-Pacific powers, in and of itself important. We would give APEC more visibility. We would increase the pressure on the various bureaucracies to come up with meaningful arrangements to make progress for their leaders. It would give political impetus from the top on trade and investment, and not just at the ministerial level. This would help to anchor the U.S. in the Pacific area. It would show Presidential leadership, particularly on an issue like international trade, which was very important to our domestic economy and increasing our exports. And it would mean that every year the President would meet with Asian-Pacific heads of government, usually traveling to the region.

President Clinton had based his campaign on the slogan, "It's the economy, stupid." So it all played into Clinton's domestic priorities. Clinton was very conversant and comfortable with trade and economic matters, unlike with some other, foreign policy issues on which he had very little experience.

For all of these reasons we promoted lifting the APEC meeting to the Summit Level. It's one of the best things we ever did. It meant a huge challenge for our Bureau of East Asian and Pacific Affairs, with 15 heads of state or government coming to the U.S. There was an awful lot of agenda items to prepare for, and to coordinate with the White House, with the U.S. Trade Representative, the Department of Commerce, and the Treasury Department. There was the whole scheme, with all of the separate bilateral meetings, plus all of the other paraphernalia of a Summit Meeting.

The meeting was held in Seattle, of course, on the other side of the American continent, involving not only heads of state and governments, but economic and foreign ministers, with all of the schedules, logistics, and preparations required. With the great help of my principal deputy, Peter Tomsen, we put together a major task force in the Department of State and practically coordinated for the whole U.S. Government a large part of the substance of the meeting, working with others, of course. We also were involved in working out the logistics of this large scale meeting. I think that it's one of the best things that our bureau ever did. This was fairly early in my tenure as Assistant Secretary, and I give full credit to my colleagues for their efforts.

We had one, specific diplomatic challenge, too. That was the representation of Taiwan at this Summit Meeting. As long as it was not at the Summit Level, China had lived with a Taiwanese economic minister coming to the APEC meetings, but did not want to have the Taiwanese foreign minister attend, for symbolic reasons. Taiwan always had a minister there, just as other countries did. But the other countries also had foreign ministers attending in previous years.

When you get to the Summit Level, what do you do? Taiwan, of course, wanted to send President Lee Teng-hui, and the Chinese were sending Jiang Zemin. The Chinese said that they would not agree to having Lee Teng-hui at the meeting. So we had a hell of a challenge. Again, my deputy, Peter Tomsen, took this on, including the preparatory meetings on APEC, which I also went to. Tomsen was the point person for the preliminary arrangements, with the help of Sandy Kristoff. After working with the Taiwanese and the Chinese we worked out a deal in Seattle at the working level, which was then referred back to the respective capitals. The Chinese agreed that Taiwan could attend, although they had not even wanted a Taiwan representative there at the Summit Meeting. The Chinese agreed that the Taiwanese could still participate in the meetings of the foreign or economic ministers prior to the Summit Meeting itself. However, the Chinese didn't want to sit in the same room with, or accept the presence of, someone else representing Taiwan at the chiefs of state level. This would look like two states or two governments representing China.

It wasn't easy, but we got the Chinese to agree that Taiwan could attend. We got Taiwan to agree in turn that the chief Taiwanese representative would not be Lee Tung-Hui, the President of Taiwan. Instead, the chief Taiwanese representative would be a kind of super economic minister. He was at a somewhat higher level than the chief Taiwanese representative had previously been at APEC meetings, but he was still not a head of state or head of government. His functions were purely economic.

We thought that this was a pretty ingenious deal, which has held up every year since then at APEC Summit Meetings. Prior to these meetings Taiwan and China would come to us. Taiwan would want to up the level. We would say: "Go to the host country. It's their problem this year, not ours." They have always stuck to this level, and it's probably going to continue to stay at this level. However, our arrangement was a matter of considerable significance. Taiwan is very important, economically.

I've already told the story perhaps, but I'll tell it again. On the way out to Seattle, President Clinton was going over his speech. He came across a phrase which he told the speechwriter he liked very much. The text said that Asian countries had gone from being dominos to being dynamos. In a very generous and unusual gesture for a speechwriter, he said that this was a phrase from Winston Lord. The President's speech was carried on national television two days later and was interrupted by applause. The President said that Winston Lord came up with that phrase. He said that Lord had a lot of good ideas but he came up with that phrase. I've always been grateful to the speechwriter.

Anyway, Secretary of State Christopher gave a major speech on Asian policy. The President gave another speech. We got a lot of visibility out of this in the press and around Asia. We had a very fortunate chain of events in this connection, which made this even more successful. Just before President Clinton arrived in Seattle, he got a favorable vote out of the Senate approving the NAFTA Treaty, using the APEC meeting as leverage to a certain extent.

Q: [NAFTA is the North American Free Trade Association.]

LORD: He got that with Republican Party votes, certainly. It was a good example of how President Clinton, when he really throws himself into something, can get something done. Unfortunately, he doesn't often do that on foreign policy, but he did in this case. He won a very tough vote on the approval of NAFTA. If he had lost that vote, it would have been another day or two before he arrived in Seattle. He would have come into the APEC meeting severely weakened politically. He would have gone to a major conference on trade and investment after having lost to his own Senate. Conversely, having won that vote, President Clinton came in with considerable momentum, having won a major victory on an issue that had looked very tough.

Together with the Asian leaders, he worked out a statement which at the first year of meetings at the Summit Level, was essentially a vision for the future. It wasn't concrete yet, but it was a commitment by all of the leaders attending the APEC meeting to promote freer trade and investment in the region. It stressed the importance of working together. It contained a lot of visionary language. This was very much needed. The very fact that it took place at the Summit Level was a real achievement during the first year of such meetings. No specific agreements were needed. This gave a whole new lift to APEC, which had been meandering along, in the shadows, without making much progress. Now it was a useful meeting each year.

So that APEC meeting really was a huge success. In subsequent years APEC made further progress. The most dramatic step came the next year when APEC took that vision, and the leaders agreed, that there would be free trade and investment throughout the Asia-Pacific area by the year 2020. For the developed countries like the U.S., Japan, and a couple of others, this goal was to be reached by the year 2010. Now, a few years later, this may look relatively cautious, since these are objectives to be achieved in 20-25 years. However, at the time, we were talking about the elimination, in principle, of all tariffs and investment barriers throughout this huge, vast region, which is the fastest growing area in the world. It offers the greatest terrain for U.S. exports.

This was a pretty bold objective. From the standpoint of the United States, it is particularly good, because most of our tariffs and investment restrictions are fairly low, anyway, and we have relatively free trade. Whereas in countries like China and Japan, as well as in Southeast Asia, this objective has major implications. Even though this deadline was some time off in the future, the value of a deadline like that is that investors, governments, and entrepreneurs start making decisions about trade and investment, knowing that this element of much freer trade and investment is coming up. So this was a major political, as well as economic, statement made in 1994 in Bogor, Indonesia.

In the following year, 1995, the APEC meeting was held in Osaka, Japan. The meetings are always held in November of each year. There are always lots of lesser meetings throughout the year in preparation for this meeting. Foreign and trade ministers meet just before the Summit Meeting itself, doing business of a more nitty, gritty nature than the leaders. The summit leaders would lay out a vision for the next year and would be working at it for the next 12 months. Then the foreign and trade ministers would reach agreement in November and report to their leaders.

Right after that, the Summit Meeting itself would be held, issuing new directives for the next year. It was sort of a rolling process.

Q: I notice that when you were saying "Asia-Pacific," you were also saying, "the United States and Canada" on some other issue. There were two other countries that I was thinking of: Mexico and Chile.

LORD: Yes. I'm glad that you mentioned that. Membership is an issue that came up. There is a classic question, first of all, as to whether you deepen a fairly new, international organization, or whether you widen it. The EEC [European Economic Commission] faced that issue in Europe. Nor was there a clear, overriding threat, like the Soviet Union during the Cold War. So there was always a debate about that.

In APEC we were talking about important countries of the Pacific area. In the Western Hemisphere there are countries like Chile, Mexico, and Peru. The primary considerations are that they are important in terms of trade, they border on the Pacific Ocean, and they are generally free traders. Then, of course, there are other claimants for membership in APEC. Russia considers itself a Pacific power. Shouldn't they be included in APEC? Vietnam was a growing power. Shouldn't they be in APEC? So there were a lot of debates and controversy, particularly at the foreign minister level. It occupied us during the first couple of years.

Secretary of State Christopher got around this issue by declaring a moratorium after letting in Mexico and Chile. We then had a three-year moratorium, and this issue of expansion began to come up again after I left the Government. Since then Russia and Vietnam have expressed interest in joining APEC.

Q: Could we continue for a little more and talk about Asian values, whatever that means, and the issue of regional defense? Then could you talk about Secretary of State Warren Christopher and President Clinton and your views about them? Then about the budget squeeze?

LORD: Let me discuss those questions, minus Secretary Christopher and President Clinton. We can see whether we have the time and energy to discuss them or whether I ought to think more systematically about them. We could start with them the next time.

Q: Sure, no problem.

LORD: And we could look at the other substantive issues. What would that cover?

Q: Well, here you were, the head of the Bureau of East Asian Affairs, dealing with the appointment of Ambassadors and so forth. I'd also like to ask for your views about the American Institute on Taiwan (AIT), political Ambassadors, and general matters of that kind.

LORD: We can get back to those and deal with the other issues here.

Regarding the issue of regional security, I talked about that in my confirmation statement before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, in terms of the building of the Pacific Community. As another aspect of our East Asian policy, we wanted to blend both the bilateral and the regional aspects of it, particularly as the Pacific area really wasn't a community at that time. You don't throw away your important bilateral relationships. You maintain and strengthen them and you also try to build some of these regional approaches. I've mentioned various examples of that.

This is where we departed somewhat from the policy of previous administrations. On the whole, Asian policy has been fairly consistent from one administration to another, though with some different nuances and emphases. For example, we raised the APEC [Asia Pacific Economic Conference] meetings to a summit level, and we were more aggressive on normalization with Vietnam.

On regional security we took a different tack. Frankly, I did this without any particular authorization because I was still in the process of being confirmed. I more or less previewed this different tack in my confirmation statement. The Bush Administration approach, which I think was quite understandable was that if you encourage regional security organizations and dialogues, you run some serious risks. Encouraging new regional security organizations might be interpreted by our Asian friends as an effort by us of seeking a way out of our responsibilities, of trying to turn over the burdens of American defense responsibilities in the East Asian region, in both psychological and financial terms, to regional organizations in an effort to try slowly to withdraw from the region. So we might be sending the wrong signals if we indicated that we thought that new regional security arrangements could replace our long standing bilateral alliances. Secretary Baker had specifically laid out a concept that our Asia policy should be composed of spokes in a wheel, with the U.S. in the middle of this wheel, and with various, bilateral spokes going out from it.

Also, the previous, [Bush] administration had plausibly pointed out that Asia is not Europe. Asia is much more culturally diverse and more geographically spread out. There is no real, collective security approach, unlike NATO [North Atlantic Treaty Organization] in Europe. So any possible parallel approaches would not really hold up. Also, as I have pointed out, regional security schemes, which had popped up over the course of many years, often had a subversive quality. The Russians, and Brezhnev in particular, often used to propose collective security in Asia, precisely to try to reduce American influence. This Russian idea appeared to involve turning to peacekeeping and a collective mini-UN type of approach, in order to drive out the U.S.

So for all of these reasons there was little enthusiasm in the previous administration for regional security arrangements.

I took a different view. I don't think that there was unanimous agreement in the new administration but I encouraged this for those who hadn't thought about it. I set this idea forth in my confirmation statement before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

I said that, first of all, we reaffirmed our bilateral alliances. They came first. We should not lightly dismiss them or in any way call them into question. In fact, we should try to strengthen them. They were still relevant and still important in the world following the end of the Cold War. That should be our foundation.

Secondly, another foundation should be our forward military presence. We had reached the level of roughly 100,000 troops deployed in East Asia, having reduced this level down from about 130,000 during the latter phase of the Cold War. We should make clear that we were going to maintain a level of about 100,000 troops deployed in East Asia, assuming that the host countries, and particularly Japan and South Korea, the major powers concerned, wanted to continue to have us do that. I said that these countries wanted us to maintain this level of troop deployments as a stabilizing presence. So in no way would we question these foundations which were in place and which the previous administration had also been in favor of.

However, to supplement and not to supplant these foundations, we could begin to look to the conduct of a regional security dialogue. Not as a replacement, as I said, but as an additional factor to deal with this vast region of East Asia. I said that we should do this gradually. This should not be seen as an attempt to shed our responsibilities. Rather, we should seek to reduce tensions and promote a better climate in the area, even as we maintained our hard headed alliances and a forward, military presence.

Conceivably, over a long period of time, maybe the climate would change and these regional organizations would be strong enough that we could begin to reduce our presence in the area. However, we didn't assume that this would happen, and this wasn't our purpose. This was to be added insurance for security purposes and stability.

We felt that we should encourage regional dialogue, though not so much on the level of NATO. NATO was one bloc set against another bloc in Europe and a defined threat in the form of the Soviet Union. Rather, we should seek to develop a gradually increasing dialogue with the countries of East Asia to have a better understanding of each other's intentions, reduce miscalculations, build up a somewhat greater climate of trust, and talk about sensitive issues. We would seek to develop confidence-building measures and perhaps to move on to preventive diplomacy, where you seek to head off conflicts, and even get to the point of conflict resolution, where you try to resolve conflicts.

When we came into office, an annual practice had developed under my predecessors. Every year, in the spring, usually in May, there was a meeting with the ASEAN [Association of Southeast Asian Nations] countries at the Assistant Secretary level to prepare the agenda of security issues for a subsequent meeting in July, when the Foreign Ministers would meet. This Foreign Ministers meeting was called the ASEAN Post-Ministerial Conference. The Ministerial Conference was a summit meeting of ASEAN leaders and their Foreign Ministers. After that, the ASEAN countries would have a dialogue with key outside powers in two forms. First, there would be a series of bilateral dialogues. The ASEAN leaders would sit with their interlocutors from the United States, the EEC [European Economic Community] countries, Japan, China, Australia, and New Zealand. By that time, the Republic of Korea was also included. Second, the ministers of all of these countries would meet at one time in one place and talk about regional issues.

There was no attempt to do any work between these sessions, such as holding committee meetings. There wasn't much discussion of sensitive issues. The participants made mostly set statements. These really didn't go very far.

So the first thing I did was to make sure that Secretary of State Christopher would be willing to attend this ASEAN Post-Ministerial Conference. Generally, the Secretary of State attended these meetings, but on a couple of occasions he missed attending these sessions. That sent a very bad signal. I wanted to make sure that as part of our effort to make some fast progress with our Asian associates, our Secretary of State would attend these post-ministerial meetings.

Again, just as was the case with APEC, this was very useful, not only for the dialogue with the Asian countries but also for the various bilateral meetings that we would have. So it was possible to have bilateral meetings with other countries which were there to have a dialogue with ASEAN countries, as well as the dialogues we had there in the collective meeting.

In 1994 we agreed to invite other key countries which had not been attending this post ministerial conference. We wanted them to join that, and we arranged to call this meeting the ASEAN Regional Forum, or the ARF. I was always glad that we didn't call it the "Biannual ASEAN Regional Forum," which might have been contracted to "BARF!" So we included China, Vietnam, Russia, Laos, and Papua New Guinea, which had not previously attended this meeting. We agreed that every year, at the Foreign Ministers' level, these countries would meet with the rest of us collectively, in addition to the ongoing bilateral meetings with ASEAN.

We also maintained the somewhat separate grouping; the ASEAN post ministerial conference had become a little cumbersome. We really talked generally about relations between the countries concerned. The discussions were not limited to security matters. The new ASEAN Regional Forum as such was just concerned with security issues.

Starting in July, 1994, we would start first with the ASEAN Regional Forum [ARF]. It started out as a half day's meeting and then extended into a full day. The emphasis was on very informal meetings with only the Foreign Ministers and one aide present from each country participating. In that case I was the aide present with Secretary of State Christopher. Since then they have managed to expand participation to one more person, so that they could get someone from the Pentagon attending. There would be a note taker in another room, listening in on a public address system, so thank God I didn't have to take notes! There was just the Secretary of State, me, and another official. After that we would have the post ministerial conference, on issues beyond security.

We made modest progress throughout this period. Several interesting things happened. At first the Chinese were quite cautious. They were happy to join these consultations but they didn't want to discuss sensitive issues there. They wanted to keep it a general discussion, partly because they wanted to deal on sensitive issues with countries on an individual basis, particularly with regard to the South China Sea, which was of interest to many ASEAN countries. The Chinese figured that they could throw their weight around by dealing with this issue bilaterally. They were worried that if the various issues involved in the South China Sea became involved in an ASEAN forum, they would have to take on ASEAN collectively. There were other issues which they didn't want to discuss, such as Taiwan and so forth.

So in the early going we tried to make progress in the sense of discussing sensitive issues at these meetings. In addition, we sought to have meetings throughout the year in between these Foreign Ministers' meetings. We talked about confidence building measures that could be explored at these sessions. However, the Chinese wanted to go slowly. Some of the other countries such as Malaysia, I believe, also wanted to go slowly. Some other countries, such as Australia, Singapore, and the United States, wanted to move more quickly. Japan and Korea were somewhere in between.

As time went on the Chinese became a little more relaxed about becoming engaged, and more sensitive issues, including the South China Sea, came up. We even discussed Burma, which, after all, is a Southeast Asian country. We discussed Burma while the Chinese were sitting there, and they even joined in the discussion. So the dialogue became a little freer and a little more spontaneous, with a little less speech-making. I don't want to exaggerate the speed of the process. It still had some distance to go at this point.

We also got the Foreign Ministers to agree on confidence building measures, and the U.S. did much of the heavy lifting in this respect. Countries agreed to issue white papers on their defense policies. During this period China issued its first two white papers on this subject. There was cooperation on search and rescue issues and on dealing with some natural disasters. There was some discussion of having observers present at military exercises and arranging for exchanges of military officials.

So the first step in the ASEAN Regional Forum agendas was to include these confidence building measures, involving greater transparency and cooperation. We hoped to move over time into more diplomatic areas, such as perhaps preventing crises or at least heading off miscalculations, and maybe some day getting into conflict resolution, although we were a long way from that.

One specific contribution the ASEAN Regional Forum made involved Mischief Reef, a disputed island which China occupied in the Spratley Islands, which the Philippines claimed as its territory. It was close to the Philippines. There was a lot of tension about this island where the Chinese were establishing a presence. We issued a very strong statement. It was not anti-Chinese, but it was clearly meant to warn China against the use of force. We said that we took no stand on the territorial issues involved here, but said that there shouldn't be any unilateral actions. The international law of the sea and freedom of navigation should be observed, and we hoped that the countries involved would work out this matter peacefully. This was a much stronger statement than had ever been made previously. There also was a rather strong ASEAN statement which supported the Philippines.

I believe that the advent in 1994 of the ASEAN Regional Forum added to the pressure on the Chinese to back off, to talk to ASEAN collectively, and to behave themselves on this issue. So the advent of the ASEAN Regional Forum meeting, together with these other actions, persuaded the Chinese to back down. It helped to defuse that crisis. This showed the potential of the ASEAN Regional Forum.

We added a couple of more members, Cambodia and Mongolia, in the ASEAN Regional Forum which, we felt, were important. Meanwhile, we had to differentiate this meeting from the ASEAN Post-Ministerial Conference. We were trying to push the latter conference into more global issues, like nuclear non-proliferation and terrorism, and even some issues which overlapped with APEC, such as the environment.

I don't want to exaggerate the significance of the ASEAN Regional Forum, but we thought that we had started something which could be quite useful. Under the umbrella of these meetings we held bilateral discussions with the Chinese, because Secretary of State Christopher would always meet with the Chinese Foreign Minister on such occasions. As I said, even though Christopher only made two trips to China, he met with the Chinese often, in various cities. He also attended high-level, trilateral meetings on Korea (U.S., Japan, South Korea) which took place around the edges of ARF. So this was another part of our effort to build a Pacific Community.

Q: I gather that with these institutions you have to draw the line somewhere.

LORD: Yes.

Q: However, as I look at the map and think of some of the issues involved, I would think that there would be a temptation to bring India into the discussions as an observer, or something like that. In a way, India has some interest in a good number of these matters.

LORD: I'm glad you made that point. I'm glad you mentioned this. In my last year as Assistant Secretary for East Asian Affairs [1996] Indian participation became a hot issue for exactly the reasons that you mentioned, in view of India's geographical position, to some extent its naval capability, and the tensions in its relationship with China.

So as you can imagine there was a debate, and even within the U.S. Government, on Indian participation. You can imagine the debate that took place between the various bureaus of the State Department on this matter. The issue was a classic one. There were all of the reasons mentioned for including India. However, the problem was how to include India without including Pakistan. When you start opening up the membership...

Q: Then you have to include Sri Lanka and others.

LORD: And you turn it into a sort of mini-UN. On balance, I favored including India, drawing the line against including Pakistan, even though this might cause some strain with Pakistan. I think that India has a clear, East Asian dimension, just by virtue of geography and culture. It has a much greater interest and presence in East Asia than Pakistan.

I felt that the way to do this was to make clear that Sub-Continent, South Asian issues like Kashmir and so forth, would not be discussed. We would only discuss East Asian issues with India's participation. Obviously, there was no happy way to resolve this, and Pakistan was not pleased. We worked hard on this matter. I worked effectively with Singapore behind the scenes. Singapore has a heavy Indian influence and so wanted to include India. One of the Singapore arguments, which I agreed with, was rather subtle. Singapore argued that the inclusion of India in the ASEAN Regional Forum would increase leverage on the Chinese. Any consideration of Chinese-Indian tensions would involve having one more entity to work with in dealing with these tensions, not to mention the legitimate security concerns of China, India, etc.

Q: Absolutely. When you look at this matter, it really looks incomplete.

LORD: You are very perceptive. I can't think of anything else.

Q: While you were Assistant Secretary for East Asian Affairs, how did the Indians respond to the matter of inclusion in the ASEAN Regional Forum? Did you find that they were a positive influence?

LORD: Yes. India was only included in the forum during the last year I was there [1996]. They were quite responsible, and very grateful to the U.S., and me personally, for getting them in.

Q: I think you have already referred to it but I wonder if you could explain the issue of Asian values.

LORD: Yes. There is one other thing I would like to mention first. One of the challenges facing the ASEAN Regional Forum was that it was pretty well driven by the ASEAN countries themselves. They organized it and provided the host country every year. However, there was a feeling that the ASEAN countries perhaps dominated the organization too much. After all, by the time I left the Bureau of East Asian Affairs, while the six ASEAN members were in the process of increasing to 10, there were 19 members of ARF [ASEAN Regional Forum]. With the increase of ASEAN members to 10 the ASEAN countries provided about half of the membership of the ASEAN Regional Forum. So we often met with non-ASEAN members of the ARF to try and get our strategies aligned. Not so much with China but with some of the other countries. We thought that ASEAN had a right to provide a certain driving force in the ASEAN Regional Forum, but we also didn't want the ASEAN countries to dominate everything.

Also, to the extent that the ASEAN Regional Forum was driven by the ASEAN countries, it didn't seem particularly well suited to discuss Northeast Asian situations. We would talk about Korean issues and, to a certain extent, China-Taiwan, and U.S.-Japan defense relations in the ARF as part of our effort to discuss sensitive issues. However, part of the problem with the size and diversity of the ARF, which I supported, was that you couldn't really discuss some of these key issues in any meaningful way.

We had always envisaged our approach to regional security as not only involving alliances and foreign military presences plus the ASEAN regional dialogue. We also thought of other groupings which would address specific issues. On Korea, for example, we ended up with Four Power Talks (the two Koreas, China, and the U.S.). We also started an informal, non-governmental six power dialogue on security. We called it the Northeast Asian Security Dialogue. This was organized by a professor from the University of San Diego named Susan Shirk, who is now Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for China in the Bureau of East Asian Affairs. With her help and leadership we created a grouping of six countries, including the U.S., Japan, South Korea, North Korea, China, and Russia.

There was one exploratory meeting held during my first year in the Bureau, which was at the technical level. This meeting was attended by academic figures and governmental officials from Defense and Foreign Ministries, in their unofficial capacities. There were North Koreans attending that first meeting. We generally had yearly meetings afterwards at the deputy level (Peter Tomsen went for the U.S.), but we never got the North Koreans to join in this unofficial organization. Partly for that reason, we never tried to make this an official organization, but this remained our longer term goal. We felt that it was important to have a smaller grouping concerned with Northeast Asia, which would be more manageable than the ASEAN Regional Forum. Also, this sent a certain signal to the ASEAN Regional Forum that we had other options if the ASEAN countries tried to dominate the proceedings in the ARF.

We felt that at unofficial meetings people would speak more freely than they could if they attended as government officials. This was something like sending scouts out on the terrain, trying to see what the situation was. They would report back to their governments, even though the meetings were unofficial. We were working with some academics and scholars, trying to see whether some progress could be made. That was another area where we tried to make progress, although we never got very far.

A couple of points on "global issues" before I get to the issue of Asian values. In my March, 1993 confirmation hearings, I included matters related to the environment and other "global issues." President Clinton and Secretary of State Christopher put emphasis on these global issues. We can no longer call them new, but they were still fresh issues in addition to the traditional security and economic matters. Other such issues besides the environment were refugees, terrorism, drugs, and international crime. Some people would put down nuclear proliferation under this heading. So I included that as one of the ten challenges I mentioned in my confirmation statement. It seemed to me that, by definition, since most of these were global issues, they would have to be treated globally and not regionally. However, just as we can have regional trading groups that led to global approaches, I thought, we can do some work here in the East Asian region on these matters.

I'm not going to pretend that this was our highest priority, but we made some efforts on these global issues, both bilaterally and regionally, as well as globally.

Bilaterally, with Japan, we established what we called a "Common Agenda." I mentioned that in the Japan section of this interview. This includes the environment, natural disasters, AIDS, science and technology, etc. There is a whole range of such issues on which we work collectively with Japan. It never got much publicity, but we did a lot of useful work.

With China we similarly tried to carve out positions on some of these issues, which I mentioned in the China section of this interview. We sought to increase cooperation with China on the environment on drugs, terrorism, and other issues. We fleshed out our agenda bilaterally and also addressed these problems globally.

I went with Mrs. Clinton to the United Nations Conference on Women in 1995.

We would talk about the environment in places like APEC [Asia Pacific Economic Conference] and the ASEAN Regional Forum. The environment was a major part of our agenda in the South Pacific Forum, which I mentioned elsewhere in this interview. The Clinton administration was pro environment and worked on global climate issues or, for example, the coral reef initiative. Secretary of State Christopher gave increased emphasis to the environment within the State Department by appointing an additional Under Secretary for Global Affairs, Tim Wirth, a former U.S. Senator who coordinated the work of various bureaus within this area like the environment, narcotics, crime, human rights, refugees, and so on.

Under this heading the drug issue was important, and there were certain, key countries, such as Burma, which I have already mentioned. With Thailand we had increasing cooperation, and the same thing was true with Laos. There were some discussions with Vietnam. We had some cooperation with Cambodia, where there was a growing problem of drug addiction. We had considerable cooperation with China, where there was more and more concern about the drug problem.

Thus, we did pay some attention to global issues. I can't say that we ever really achieved a great deal, although we certainly made some progress, in terms of some of our bilateral relationships, and to a certain extent with APEC and elsewhere where we had more systematic discussions of the issues.

Finally, let's move on to the whole question of democracy and human rights, and the related so-called Asian values. I hate to keep referring to my confirmation statement but I knew that matters of this kind were going to be a part of the intellectual and political debate during my projected four years as Assistant Secretary for East Asian Affairs, or however long my tenure in office was going to be. So I paid considerable attention to issues of that kind. I made promoting democracy and human rights the tenth of my goals, although this did not mean that this issue was the tenth most important. Indeed, in a way, it summarized the intellectual challenge. I couldn't put it first, but putting it in tenth place gave it more visibility than making it fifth or sixth, and it cut across all the other nine issues.

Promoting human rights and democracy amounted to a mixed bag in Asia. There were a lot of established democracies of different types in the region, or what we would call democracies. Among these are Japan, which, of course, is essentially a one-party democracy. In South Korea they have made considerable progress in making more sense of their political system; South Korea had become a democracy, with elections, by the time we entered office. Taiwan is making its democracy take root, making clear that Chinese care about freedom. The Philippines and Thailand are democracies. Mongolia is struggling to become a full-fledged democracy. In Asia and around the world, people have struggled and even risked their lives to vote, whether in Cambodia, where almost 90 percent of the people voted, crossing minefields and facing massive intimidation, or in Mongolia, traveling for miles and miles on horseback in order to vote. All of this, in my mind, proves that democracy is one of the universal aspirations of mankind and that it isn't just a Western concern. The people time and again showed that it was important in their view.

The field of human rights is not the same thing as democracy but closely related to it. Human rights are most respected and protected in democratic systems. I have discussed at length how we handled these issues with China. With Vietnam, as in the case of China, we had a formal dialogue and raised some specific issues as well as the general matter of human rights, including the release of some prisoners. Burma's repression was a key problem. In Indonesia, there were human rights problems, particularly in East Timor. These were some of the major human rights problems. I have just placed each of them in their own context elsewhere in my interview.

In promoting human rights and democracy, I often took on the so-called "Asian values" question, which I tried to include in some of my speeches. I said that we would promote democratic values without arrogance, but also without apology. By saying "without arrogance" I meant that we had to be careful not to be self-righteous and not to display a kind of missionary zeal. That is, other people didn't have to be like us, because they had national histories and cultures that were different. We had to avoid making this the only issue in our bilateral relations, when with these countries we had many security, economic, political, and other interests to deal with. We had to avoid looking as if we were being overbearing on this issue, hurting other interests by looking arrogant or overly zealous. Sometimes we needed to avoid complicating our efforts by being too public and expressing our views in a way which was too much in other people's faces, as it were. This could make it mighty difficult for them to move, even if they wanted to do so. So we tried to avoid arrogance.

However, on the other hand, we also avoided making apologies, in the sense that we made it clear that we stood for certain things in this country. Americans have always had the view that their foreign policy has some idealistic, as well as some practical realpolitik elements. To maintain support for our foreign policies in Congress and among the American people, we had to express some of these values in our relationships. So this was important in our foreign policy generally, as long as we didn't promote them in an arrogant way. We would do this without apology.

Also, in terms of tone, we tried to promote our democracy and human rights in terms of other nations' self-interests, as opposed to just appealing to human goodness and universal aspirations. For example, in my speeches I continually made the case that, in an age of globalization, of computers, fax machines, cellular phones, satellites, and the Internet, a country cannot develop its economy, certainly over a period of time, without opening up its society. You need to have pluralism, openness, and freedom of information if you want to compete in today's world. This is just a matter of objective reality and of self-interest. Maybe, if a country has a small economy, like Singapore's, which has the rule of law but still isn't a full democracy, you can get away with some undemocratic behavior for a while. Maybe, as in the case of China, you can have a mixed bag with economic reform and political repression and, for a while, make progress. But this cannot last long.

Over time, open societies are clearly necessary for development purposes. For example, you cannot attract investment, which you need to develop, if there is not transparency, the rule of law, the rule of contracts and honoring contracts, which are elements of democracy. For example, you cannot attack corruption, which is so much of a problem in so many countries, including those countries which have an emerging free market system, unless you have a free press to attack corruption and ventilate these problems. You cannot move forward on difficult reforms where there is going to be disagreement about the proper role of the state, without some free dissent and debate, with different viewpoints freely expressed. You cannot have what can be painful transitions where you have at least temporary unemployment or other problems of adjustment in a global economy, without some political safety valves through which people can express dissent peacefully. If they can't express such dissent peacefully, then the only way that they can do so is to take to the streets. I think that that's going to be a problem in China, which has huge problems of unemployment, exacerbated by widespread corruption. If the Chinese Government doesn't give people the chance to express themselves peacefully, there will be more ominous demonstrations of discontent, especially when it gets into the WTO.

We tried to lay out this self interest line and to say that it was in the interest of the Asian countries to loosen up and be more pluralistic and more open. We said that you don't have to attempt to implement Jeffersonian, American democracy. We said that elections aren't the only yardstick of a free society, although elections are important to hold governments accountable because if they make mistakes, there can be peaceful change and some other government can enter power, as happened in Korea and Thailand. In contrast, the previous government of Indonesia was overthrown because Indonesia didn't have a democracy.

So, as I say, we tried to stress the self-interest aspect as well as specific components like the rule of law, free press, etc.

Furthermore, I believed strongly in another reason to promote freedom which we stressed to American audiences. I often raised this with my old boss, Henry Kissinger and others, who were less enthusiastic about how important democracy should be. The fact is that democracy and open societies serve our hard-headed national security interest. I read this in a book - I don't know how a person can judge this, but it's stated in this book that there have been roughly 350 wars fought since 1819 and none of them has been between two established democracies. Whether or not this is absolutely accurate, the fact is that people cannot come up with examples where two democracies have fought each other.

Q: You can play a real game with the case of Germany versus France in 1914.

LORD: Well, I wouldn't call the Kaiser's Germany a real democracy. You can get into some semantic battles, but the fact is that, depending on how you define democracies, wars, and so on, it's very hard to find many, if any, examples of two, open democracies fighting each other. Generally, democracies are not aggressive, even against non-democracies, although they will defend their interests.

Furthermore, open, democratic societies don't persecute minorities and their citizens. Therefore, they don't drive people into opposition of a militant kind, because the people can express their views. Or, put another way, democracies don't generate refugees. You lessen refugee flows with open, democratic societies. Furthermore, democratic governments do not practice government or state terrorism. They are apt to be better trading partners and they are apt to be better in terms of the environment. The Chernobyl disaster occurred partly because Russia did not have a free press reporting on its problems.

So there are a lot of hard-headed, pragmatic reasons to promote human rights and democracy.

So we also wove that theme in. We said that we were not just dealing with some idealistic mission. We know that we have other interests to balance off with human rights and democracy. But in a pragmatic way and particularly in terms of security and economic development, the spread of freedom is crucial. It is in the self-interest of the country that we are talking to. These are universal aspirations are not just "Western" ideals. We can cite examples of this around the world the past decade which I have mentioned particularly since the fall of the Berlin Wall, including many places in Asia.

Furthermore, we tried to work in, without being overly defensive, the view that the U.S. was not perfect either, and we've had some need to perfect or improve our own society. An important theme is that democracy is not just a matter of elections. You can have elections in a given country which might bring in a government which might then crack down and practice human rights abuses, despite the elections. So you need to build a civil society, the infrastructure of democracy, not just hold elections.

Personally, I would introduce these themes at meetings which we would have and I would include them in speeches. We would also balance these themes with our other interests.

Generally, we tried to get as much multilateral support as we could on these themes. With the exception of Australia, Canada, and New Zealand we wouldn't get much help from other countries in promoting these values. Japan was nervous in terms of its guilt over World War II and didn't want to lecture other people. It also had commercial interests. ASEAN has a couple of democracies but generally didn't believe in interference in the internal affairs of its members or other countries. European countries were more interested in business contracts than in promoting human rights. Thus, even though we tried, at various levels, to get some help, usually it was the U.S. operating by itself in dealing with these matters.

That brings us to the Asian values question, which is closely related. In that debate we would make all of the points that I have already made. That was part of our position in this debate. We would also point out that there aren't any Asian values per se, because there are so many spokesmen for Asia. You have Anwar versus Mahathir [in Malaysia], Aung San Suu Kyi [in Burma], Kim Dae Jung [in South Korea], or the Dalai Lama [for Tibet]. There are a lot of such people speaking for Asia beside the autocrats who use the slogan of stability as an excuse for maintaining authoritarian government.

The Asian values question came into concrete focus during the first year of my service as Assistant Secretary for East Asian Affairs. A conference was held in Vienna to review the UN Human Rights Covenant. Some of the Asian countries were promoting amendments to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights to provide for some escape clauses to take into account local considerations and move away from universality. We beat that effort off. Secretary Christopher was very strong on that.

I always felt that this was a phony debate, as if Westerners didn't care about discipline, community commitment, and family values, or Asians didn't care about freedom.

I often met with human rights groups in the State Department and with such organizations when I went to other countries, such as Cambodia, Indonesia, and so forth. I met with human rights groups in the U.S., I'd say every three or four months, even as I met with business people and other interest groups to try to help to form our policy. I heard their viewpoints and reported back to them on progress that had been made in Asia.

I think that the whole fervor in the Asian values debate has sort of calmed down somewhat. I think that people are now so concerned with the financial crisis that the Asian values debate is beginning to fade from sight. It will be important to see whether Thailand and South Korea, which are democracies and which are also trying to carry out IMF [International Monetary Fund] recommended reforms, succeed.

Asian values were a hot issue during much of my tenure as Assistant Secretary. In the spring 1994 memo to the Secretary which I wrote, and which we discussed, I pointed out we were having some difficulties with our policies in the region. This was a relatively famous memo which, I think, was called by some the "Malaise Memo." I have joked that it really was called the "Malaysian Memo." I addressed this values question. What I stressed in my memo was that we should be careful about our tone, but promoting our values should be a high priority. I thought that we should try to stress some of the themes that I have suggested, so that stylistically we would be more effective and sensitive in promoting our values.

In my final week as Assistant Secretary I gave a farewell for journalists at the Foreign Press Center. My opening talking points highlighted the challenges and accomplishment of the past four years.

Q: We might close at this point. There is one specific question which I'd like to ask. One of my recent interviews was with David Dean who, at one point, was Director of the American Institute on Taiwan [AIT]. He said that it should be understood that we would never have a political appointee as the Director of that office. Politically, the AIT is very sensitive. However, during the Clinton administration a political figure was appointed to it. I think that we talked about this issue.

LORD: Let me give you a run down on that. First, a comment about Ambassadors generally. I think that, like most Foreign Service Officers, I'm a strong believer in having a mix of career and political Ambassadors. All that I ask, and all that most FSO's ask, is that, first, political appointees should be qualified. Secondly, they should be a distinct minority of Ambassadors, so that you don't remove the incentive for Foreign Service Officers to move up to the top level of the service. Thirdly, they shouldn't get all the most important posts.

In my view every administration has been guilty of having too many political appointees. I think that roughly 15% of the Ambassadors should be political appointees. But early in administrations, the figure of political appointee Ambassadors is often about 40%. Then the figure drops down to about 30% as the term wears on.

Q: It's in that range.

LORD: I think that there are too many political appointee Ambassadors. Having said that, I think that there's room, and there should be space for new people coming in who are particularly qualified to take on an assignment as an Ambassador. Someone who is well qualified and also politically connected with the White House can take on assignments where clout is important. You can always have experts qualified in that country, including DCM [Deputy Chief of Mission], supporting the political appointee. However, you have to reserve the great bulk of Ambassadorships, including many of the most important positions, in terms of quality as well as quantity, for the Foreign Service. Otherwise, you're going to destroy morale and you may not have as good Ambassadors. I can look at this question in a detached way because I've been a Foreign Service Officer. However, I've also been a political appointee, including my assignment as Ambassador to China. Clearly, in my case I was qualified to be Ambassador to China, not only because I had spent much of my career working on Chinese affairs, but I had the other qualifications.

Some of our best Ambassadors have been political appointees. To take a couple of examples, we had Ambassador Mondale in Japan and Ambassador Laney as Ambassador to South Korea. They were both terrific and were well qualified. We should make sure that political appointees are well qualified and that the Foreign Service provides most of the Ambassadors. There should always be room for some political appointees in Washington. The Secretary and some of the Undersecretaries and Assistant Secretaries should be political to provide new blood and effect White House perspectives. But they should be experienced and able. And most of their high level positions should be career people, to provide continuity and maintain high morale in the career service. I don't believe there should be more than occasional political appointees below the Assistant Secretary level.

I'm not sure that I would ever make a permanent exception for any post, one way or the other. If there is ever a case where you should only have career appointees, it probably would be the Director of the AIT [American Institute on Taiwan], who is a de facto Ambassador. Actually, we're not talking about the person who is in Taiwan. In this case what David Dean is referring to is not the Director of the AIT, who continues to be a career appointee; other Directors have been Lynn Pascoe and Daryl Johnson. He's talking about the man who was sitting in Washington and had David Dean's job. AIT is a strange, unofficial relationship. It is a mechanism to maintain the appearance of unofficiality while having an intermediary here in Washington, but of an unofficial nature.

We're talking for purposes of this recorded interview about the AIT person sitting here in Washington, not the person in Taiwan, who has continued to be a career officer and, in my view, should be. I'm not saying that this overseas position should always be unofficial. However, as long as it is unofficial, I think that it should be held by a career officer, as much as possible.

The same thing is true of Washington, where we traditionally had distinguished people like David Dean, who had a China and/or Taiwan background, spoke Chinese, and knew people on Taiwan. These people also usually know quite a bit about China. Above all, they should know the delicacies and sensitivities of the Chinese-American relationship, how to manage this unofficial Rube Goldberg contraption with Taiwan and who are not subject to domestic political pressures from the Taiwan lobby and so on. So I would agree with David Dean's basic premise that the Director of AIT should be a career Foreign Service Officer.

Now, this practice was broken in the Clinton administration. This proved that David Dean was right and that I was right, although I was not strong enough in defending this position. The time came for a replacement for David Dean who, after all, had been in the position for several years. It was only fair to replace him. David Dean said that he didn't mind being replaced, as long as his replacement was a good man. But that wasn't the issue.

We began to get strong pressure from the White House to replace David Dean. The White House pushed hard for James Wood. Wood had previously served in the State Department as a political appointee. There was some controversy about how well he did in that capacity. He left the Department. Some people felt that he left because he was "incompetent" and perhaps this is not totally unfounded- (end of tape)

Wood had no ostensible qualifications to work on Taiwan affairs. He had helped President Clinton in the election campaign of 1992. I forget now, but I think that he was close to some people in the White House and elsewhere. He didn't have a particularly distinguished career, including this murky time when he was previously in the State Department. He claimed to have worked, at least to some extent, on the Taiwan Relations Act. However, it was clear to me and to my colleagues in the Bureau of East Asian Affairs that he did not have strong qualifications. Above all, there was the principle that David Dean mentioned, namely, that Taiwan was too tricky, sensitive, and arcane a relationship to be handled by an inexperienced political appointee and subject to political pressures. Not to mention a need to sense nuances from the substantive point of view in dealing with Taiwan and China.

So frankly I kept getting pressure from Dick Moose, who was Undersecretary of State for Management. Dick, in turn, was getting pressure from the White House to appoint Wood as Director of the AIT for Taiwan. I frankly ignored this pressure, I dragged my feet, I said that he wasn't qualified, I said that they should try somebody else if we couldn't keep David Dean in this position. I said that if this guy needed a job, they should get him a job somewhere else where he may be qualified. I said that maybe he was a good guy. I wasn't saying that he shouldn't get a job, but not THIS job. I kept dragging my feet. I got several phone calls. I dragged this out for about a year.

Finally, the pressure got very heavy, and I made a mistake. I said that I would interview the guy and check him out. He came across not too badly in the interview. The pressure was so intense that I said that I finally didn't agree with this appointment but we would have to go along with it if it was this important to the White House. This was a mistake that I made at this point, frankly. Maybe I could have stopped this appointment if I had really broken a lot of crockery and resisted strongly enough. That's not certain, however.

However, the pressure from the Seventh Floor [of the State Department, where the Secretary of State and other senior officers have their offices] and from the White House was very heavy. I pointed out the problems, but finally decided that I would go along with the following package. The Secretary of State would appoint him, but first we would have a written agreement with Wood on what his job was and how free he was to operate. We would make it clear to him that he was under my guidance and that of the State Department in general. This was the case, and it's always been understood by career officers. That is, if Wood was going to be a political appointee, we would have a charter showing that nevertheless he was under our control. Secondly, we would get very strong (in effect Vice) fellow Directors at AIT. We had had some good people, but they weren't heavyweights; sometimes they were appointed to AIT as a favor to them as retiring FSOs. This made clear we were going to get two people who were knowledgeable on China and Taiwan and strong people to help control Wood if he was going to be a problem.

If I had known that he was going to be a disaster, I would have resisted his appointment even more. I finally decided that the package seemed okay. I thought that we would have a charter on how he was going to operate and would also have two strong Directors in AIT to control and guide him. Indeed I didn't really think that we would need to really control him. I thought that he might be weak, but not nefarious. So we got Chris Phillips, who had been an Ambassador in our Mission to the UN and had been the head of the National Committee on U.S.-China Relations. We also got Bill Brown, who was an expert on Asia, and had also been Ambassador to Thailand. So these were two heavy hitters.

Q: Well, now we're back from lunch. I thought that we might do some profiles of people that you've worked with. I was thinking of the first term, Clinton administration, involving President Clinton, Secretary of State Warren Christopher, and others. So I'll turn you loose and may have some further questions on this subject.

LORD: As we sit here on April 27, [1999], I note that I've done profiles on Henry Kissinger, President Nixon, and Mao Zedong, as well as, to a lesser extent, on Zhou En-lai, and Brezhnev. I dealt with Al Haig a little bit, Gromyko a little bit, and so on.

Let me begin first with the Presidents I've worked with. I've worked with every President since President John Kennedy, except for President Carter, when I left government service to take a break during that period. I didn't meet Presidents Johnson and Kennedy directly or work with them. I was too junior at that time. So President Nixon was the first President that I had extensive interaction with. The next one, of course, was President Ford.

I went on some trips with President Ford, including his trip to China, Indonesia, and the Philippines. I sat in on some of his meetings but I don't want to exaggerate my exposure to him. I didn't have as much contact with him as I did with Presidents Nixon or Clinton, or even with Reagan. Through Kissinger, through my own observations, and through selective meetings with President Ford, I formed some impressions of him.

Kissinger has a new book out on sale, which was published in the spring of this 1999. It is very laudatory of President Ford. It basically talks about what Ford did to heal the nation after Watergate and to hold the nation together. He talks about Ford's decency in improving the atmosphere, and the political price he paid by pardoning President Nixon for the good of the nation. It may have cost him reelection [in 1976]. Kissinger's book is entitled, "Year of Renewal." He credits the renewal to President Ford.

I would grant all of those things to President Ford, certainly including his decency. He was always polite and straightforward. You didn't have to stop to figure him out, as I did with a complicated man such as President Nixon. President Ford came across, in the sense that, "What you saw is what you get." All of which is to be applauded. I would also, as I say, applaud his "healing function" and his courage in pardoning President Nixon. I would also add, on the positive side, that he showed courage on occasion. For example, in 1976, Kissinger undertook a lot of diplomatic activity in Africa, including trying to bring majority rule to Rhodesia, which came to be known as Zimbabwe. Some of this activity was happening during the Presidential primary campaign, including in Texas and some of the other primaries in the South. Ford was being challenged by Reagan and the conservative wing of the Republican Party. Meanwhile, we were pressing for equal rights for Blacks in Africa, which was not the most popular issue at the time in the U.S. South. To Ford's credit, he explicitly told Kissinger that: "This may hurt me," in terms of a challenge from the Right wing of the Republican Party in these southern primary elections. He added: "However, you go ahead and do what is correct." Kissinger moved ahead along this line.

I remember one day when we landed in Senegal, I believe. On the very day that we landed there, Reagan had beaten Ford in the Texas primary election. So, in our usual black humor, some of us on the staff greeted Kissinger by singing: "The eyes of Texas are upon you," and so on. I make this point to indicate that Ford showed some courage there. I don't want to be negative on Ford. He had these positive dimensions and deserves to get credit for them.

Having said that, I think that President Ford was not a great man by any means. From what I've read of Kissinger's memoirs, and I've read a lot more in other books about Ford, I think that Kissinger was overly generous toward Ford. I think that Ford had his limitations. This is based on superficial contacts I had with him. I must admit that Ford was nothing but nice to me and was always a decent man. So I hesitate to be critical of him, but in the interest of candor I just think that he was limited in terms of intelligence or conceptual strength. To his credit, he knew his limitations and delegated to Kissinger the basic running of foreign policy. He was able to make some difficult decisions, not only in Africa but on some other issues during his tenure as President.

First of all, I didn't think that Ford was particularly smart or handled himself all that well in meetings that I attended. More significantly, with respect to his essential decency and courage, this was limited in some respects. Certainly, he was courageous in pardoning President Nixon, and that dwarfs other things. I want to acknowledge that. However, despite Ford's closeness to Kissinger and respect for him, Ford didn't really defend Kissinger very strongly when the Reagan people attacked Kissinger. At the time Ford was watching his right flank. Kissinger did not even go to the Republican convention where Ford was given the Republican nomination for President.

Ford knew that Kissinger would be a magnet for conservatives who didn't like Secretary Kissinger and didn't like detente. I just don't feel that Ford was very loyal to Kissinger, any more than President Eisenhower was very loyal to General George Marshall when he was attacked by Senator Joseph McCarthy, though I don't want to compare the two - Ike was a great American and great President. So there was that element.

What also dismayed me about President Ford was that, in a stupid attempt to appease the right wing of the Republican Party, Ford dropped Nelson Rockefeller as nominee for Vice President. Rockefeller was one of my heroes. He was a moderate Republican. Ford replaced Rockefeller as nominee for Vice President with Bob Dole, whom I didn't particularly like. I felt that that action was both stupid tactically and showed weakness in exaggerating the right wing problem in the Republican Party, particularly as time went on. In any event, this was no way to treat Rockefeller, who had been a loyal Vice President. Rockefeller, to his credit, never complained, either privately or publicly. He was a good soldier. I found that a major mistake on Ford's part. So my own view of President Ford is mixed, and that's really all I have to say about him.

Q: Did you get any feel for Nelson Rockefeller during the time you were on the NSC staff? As Vice President, Rockefeller went back to the 1940s as far as being involved in Latin American affairs was concerned.

LORD: Right. I met Rockefeller on several occasions. I certainly didn't know him well. I had met him superficially on social occasions, as I recall it, when I was younger. I met him through Kissinger and went to his house at least a couple of times but didn't deal with him and sit in on meetings with him while Rockefeller was Vice President, at least as far as I can recall. On the occasions when I did meet him, he struck me as very dynamic, someone who was very gregarious and energetic. Being a moderate Republican, I basically liked his views, although as I look back on it, he advocated perhaps too big a role for government for my taste when I think of his service as Governor of New York.

I knew of Kissinger's great respect for Rockefeller. I also had great respect for him. Rockefeller seemed to run his political campaigns on the basis of ideas, thinking that he would be nominated for President by issuing policy papers. That is not quite the way you do it. Meanwhile, he risked being cut up by the conservatives and could never quite get through a Republican convention. I was very upset when people like Senator Goldwater beat Rockefeller. I was particularly upset when Rockefeller was booed at the party convention in San Francisco by the Goldwater people. I liked Rockefeller because he was forthcoming on the racial issue and was a strong proponent of integration and equal rights. He was very strong on that. Rockefeller seemed to me to have a kind of vision on foreign policy that Kissinger did, in terms of a combination of firmness but also a willingness to negotiate with our adversaries. America had to play a large, international role. So I was a great fan of Rockefeller's, but I didn't know him well.

Q: I was wondering whether, during the time that Rockefeller was Vice President [under President Ford] and he was the patron of Henry Kissinger, there was any evidence of the hand of Nelson Rockefeller behind Kissinger?

LORD: I don't recall. Kissinger kept Rockefeller posted, because he was Vice President, because he was a close friend of Kissinger's, and because Kissinger had worked for Rockefeller. To Nixon's great credit, he chose Kissinger to be his National Security Adviser. Indeed, as Kissinger tells it, when he was approached by Nixon after the election of 1968 to be National Security Adviser, Kissinger had the effrontery to say to Nixon: "Let me think about it. I'll get back to you." He was thinking about whether to take a chance and work for Nixon. After all, he'd been with Rockefeller, he'd been with the Harvard University liberal intellectual crowd, even though he wasn't a liberal himself. He was wondering whether he would be criticized and would feel awkward, working for Nixon after he had opposed him in the primary campaign. Rockefeller, of course, generally came out of the Harvard, etc. milieu, which was suspicious of Nixon.

Kissinger went to Rockefeller, and Rockefeller said: "Look, Nixon is taking a much bigger chance by appointing you than you would be taking by joining him. After all, he has his own perspective. You've worked for me. You're a Harvard intellectual." I don't know exactly whether Rockefeller said that Kissinger was a Jewish immigrant, but he said, more or less, that if Nixon was willing to take a chance on Kissinger, how could Kissinger have the effrontery to tell the next President of the United States that he would think about it and get back to him. Rockefeller said to Kissinger: "Call Nixon right away and say that you accept." And that's exactly what Kissinger did. Kissinger tells this story himself about his reaction to the offer from Nixon and Rockefeller's comments.

That's the approach Rockefeller had. The other approach was that Rockefeller never expressed bitterness, either publicly or privately, about being dropped as Vice Presidential candidate by President Ford. Rockefeller remained loyal to Ford, even though it must have been a bitter blow to someone who wanted to be President. He probably thought that his best bet was to succeed Ford as President, after being Vice President, never envisaging the humiliation of being dropped from the ticket.

The next President I dealt with was Ronald Reagan. As I said, I left government service in 1977 and therefore didn't serve during the Carter Administration.

Q: Before we leave President Carter completely, were you getting...

LORD: I can give you something on Carter...

Q: Could you? There are always waves of Presidents. I was wondering, particularly because of the work you did, the milieu you came from, and all of that...

LORD: I should talk about Carter. I knew him superficially. I didn't know him very well before he became President, although I believe that I had met him. I was attracted to Carter in the sense that he looked to me like a moderate Democrat from the South. I'm a centrist myself. Throughout my lifetime, I have voted almost exactly 50 - 50 for Republicans and Democrats. I stayed away from Senators Goldwater [Republican, AZ] and McGovern [Democrat, ND] and generally voted for candidates from the center, whether moderate Republicans or moderate Democrats. Even though it's a secret ballot, I'll be very honest and say that I was sufficiently unhappy with President Ford dropping Rockefeller from the Republican ticket in 1976, as well as other dimensions of his record that I didn't approve of, and was sufficiently intrigued by Carter, even though I didn't know much about him, that I actually voted for Carter in the 1976 Presidential election. I did this, even though it meant that if Carter won and Ford lost, I'd be leaving government service. In fact, I wanted to leave anyway. I was exhausted, and this prospect didn't bother me.

So, superficially, I was attracted by Carter. Since then, I have met him in various milieus. I met him even during the Clinton administration, when he negotiated on the Korean issue. I met him when he came to China, when I was Ambassador. I saw him at the Carter Center in Atlanta once. I've also been at meetings where I hosted him at the Council on Foreign Relations at which he or his wife spoke. I have met him and have some impression of him, even though I didn't work directly for him.

None of these impressions will represent a particularly revolutionary analysis. There is no question that President Carter is very smart in a detailed, tactical way. I think that the conventional wisdom is correct, that he was terrific on details but he paid too much attention to them. Unlike any other President or a busy executive, he would not only read the full memoranda sent to him, but he would read the annexes and attachments, even though they were bulky. He would get to know a subject intimately. However, the problem was that he would know the trees but would no longer know the forest. It is rumored that Carter even scheduled appointments on the White House tennis courts. I find that hard to believe, although as a great tennis fan, that's probably not a bad idea. So there is that aspect. He was a bright, smart engineer.

There is no question that on Korea Carter was very helpful to the Clinton administration, and I've gone into that in a previous interview. Carter is sharp. In retrospect, I give him more credit than I did at the time for giving us a new emphasis on human rights in our foreign policy. In the 1970s, and when Carter became President, I was still more of the realpolitik school of Kissinger. I was more interested in human rights than Henry Kissinger was, but that's not a very high barrier to leap over. I tended to agree that, on the whole, you worry more about the foreign policies of foreign countries than you do about their domestic systems. I have greatly evolved in my thinking. I think that human rights are a legitimate item in our foreign policy agenda and an important item with any country. We need to look at human rights carefully, not only to maintain domestic and Congressional support, but also to reflect our values and to include idealism as well as pragmatism in our foreign policy. Above all, I think that this concern for human rights also advances our security interests because more open, democratic nations are less aggressive and less apt to produce wars. They don't generate refugees, they don't practice terrorism, and they are less involved in the drug traffic. Therefore, there are concrete security and other benefits to be gained from promoting democracy and human rights in foreign countries, in addition to humane considerations.

Also, in the age of the Internet, fax machines, satellites, and computers, I don't think that you can develop an economy effectively without a more democratic, law-based, open, transparent society. If you don't do this, you're going to fall behind at some point in your development. So, for all of these reasons, I am now convinced that human rights and democracy are legitimate aims of our foreign policy. They are not the only aim, and cannot dominate all other considerations, whether it is with China or any other country. However, promoting freedom as such is an important aim of foreign policy. I feel that more strongly than Kissinger did. I feel that more strongly than I did when I was judging the performance of President Carter. At the time I thought that Carter was probably pushing human rights too much.

Of course, President Carter has been a terrific, ex-President. He deserves the kudos he has gotten for his humanitarian work, his important efforts at the Carter Center in Georgia, as well as some of the selective diplomacy he has engaged in, including Korea. At other times I think that he has been too generous toward real dictators and, as a human rights advocate, has tended to overlook some of their excesses. Sometimes, he has meddled in some issues without cooperating fully with the U.S. Government. So his record has been a mixed bag. However, on the whole, you have to give him credit for his performance as an ex-President.

As for his presidency on foreign policy, clearly by the end with the hostage crisis and oil problems, he was on the defensive and looked weak. But you have to give him credit for at least three major achievements which people tend to forget: the Panama Canal Treaty, which took great courage. The Camp David Middle East Peace Accords. Normalization of relations with China. That's impressive.

Having said that, I think that he falls short, certainly on personality grounds. He has no sense of humor and is very egotistical. (End of tape)

One example of Carter not being overly generous involves his visiting Beijing in the late 1980s, when I was Ambassador there. We had a good visit with him and Mrs. Carter. However, in the course of a series of banquets and luncheons, where the hosts were Chinese, there would be toasts to U.S.-Chinese relations, including Carter's contribution to normalizing relations in 1979, for which he deserves credit. However, there I was sitting there, the current Ambassador to China who had been involved in the opening of relations with China with Kissinger and President Nixon and who would like to think that he made his own contributions to reopening U.S. relations with China. However, not once, throughout this visit, in any of his toasts or public comments, or even private comments, to Chinese, when he was talking about the development of U.S.-Chinese relations, did he talk about anything but his own contributions. He never acknowledged what Nixon and Kissinger, and, to a certain extent, what the serving U.S. Ambassador, who was his host, had done. I don't want to exaggerate this, but this shows a certain lack of grace.

LORD: I think so and I also think that it's dumb in terms of the Chinese. They remember old friends. They give Carter credit for what he did but they also give President Nixon and Henry Kissinger a lot of credit. It would have been more graceful, and the Chinese would have respected him more, if he had mentioned that. I don't want to exaggerate this, but I think that President Carter has a tendency toward self-righteousness, pomposity, and a lack of humor. He has always been very decent to me. He has never been impolite to me. He is bright, and I think that he knows it. But he doesn't spread generosity around.

Q: Moving up the line of the Presidents, did you have any feel for the role of the Presidents' wives, as we go through this review? Did you have any dealings with them?

LORD: I really can't comment on the Kennedy and Johnson administrations. I've always felt that Jackie Kennedy [Mrs. John F. Kennedy] was overrated. Why she should have put up with what her husband did, I'll never understand. Mrs. Lyndon Johnson, of course, put up with what her husband did, as well, but I think that she was formidable. She is one of my favorites as First Lady. I think that she has great strength of character. Mrs. Nixon, of course, was an enigma, very shy, and obviously didn't like the public life of a First Lady. She was living with a complex person, but I only met her very superficially and never really got to know her. The same is true of Mrs. Ford. I didn't know her as well. Of course, she was struggling with alcoholism at that time and was not very prominent. As far as the First Ladies that I knew, these were all women who didn't expose themselves very much to outsiders.

Now, I got to know Mrs. Carter during their trip to China. I also hosted her at the Council on Foreign Relations in the late 1970s. I was quite impressed with her. She was just as smart as her husband. She had a warmer edge to her than her husband did. She was a little more friendly and a little more generous. It was clear during their trip to China that there was tension between the Carters at that point. I think that they had a very good marriage, but they had just co-authored a book, and they admitted themselves that during the writing of that book, they disagreed a great deal. I recall that during this trip to China in the late 1980s that she tried to show her annoyance with President Carter in the following way. The Chinese always kept to a very tight time table. When you go to the Great Hall of the People in Beijing, the Guest House, or some other place for a meeting or a dinner, they don't make you start too soon and then expect you to wait around. They leave just in time, so you get there on time.

My wife is convinced that, on at least one occasion, Mrs. Carter went into the ladies room just before we were to leave and stayed there for 10 or 15 minutes. There was nothing wrong with her physically. She just wanted to make her husband concerned about being late for the next event on the schedule. My wife had to go in and sort of get Mrs. Carter out of there. So that was an amusing footnote. Mrs. Carter struck me as a very able person. I respected her.

That brings us up to President Reagan. First, as I think I mentioned earlier, I think that we were chosen partly by Mrs. Reagan, as well as by the President to go to China, because she had read my wife's novel, "Spring Moon." She loved it and pointed out to her husband that if I were to be appointed Ambassador to China, the U.S. Government would have two people for the price of one, as my wife is Chinese and would add a great dimension to my assignment. I always found Mrs. Reagan very approachable. I basically saw only her good qualities. I had no doubt that she would be so fiercely loyal to her husband that, if you ever crossed her, you would be in deep trouble. She could be tough but she struck me as someone who was really quite gracious in our various encounters, and I had many of them. She seemed friendly. I always felt that she was so loyal to her husband and so worried about his place in history that she was a moderating influence on issues like dealing with the Soviet Union. She wanted President Reagan to go down in history as a peacemaker. In that sense I think that she was probably helpful. I have no doubt that you could get into trouble if you weren't fiercely loyal to the President.

Reagan himself presents an interesting phenomenon personally. I have always said that I was a moderate Republican and still am. That's almost an oxymoron as we speak in 1999. However, I always distrusted the Right wing of the Republican Party. I thought that, to some extent, it had a racist dimension, even if it was unintentional. In some cases right wing Republicans were isolationist and in other cases they were nationalistic and confrontational in a way that was not effective in foreign policy, when we needed a balance of firmness in negotiations and cooperation. I didn't know that much about Reagan when he was Governor of California. However, as he began to aim for the Presidency, first challenging Ford and later when he actually was elected President, I really wasn't a fan of his. I was a Rockefeller or Nixon supporter. I felt that they were people more toward the center of the Republican Party. I didn't expect that I would think highly of Reagan.

However, by the time he ran against President Carter, because of the Iranian hostage crisis and what I thought was a very poor response to that event, as well as some economic problems in the U.S., I actually got to the point where I voted for Reagan. However, I had some concerns about his outlook, including his policy toward Taiwan which, at that point, threatened to cause a problem with China. Nevertheless, I figured that, once he entered office as President, he would see, as his predecessors and successors have, that we had a great interest in working with and trying to deal with the Chinese, even though we had to "hold our noses" at times. I also thought that people like then Secretary of State Al Haig and others would be working on him to follow the example of his predecessors. Indeed, this is an interesting phenomenon. In successive presidential elections we have seen the challenger to the sitting President attack him as being too soft on China. Once the new President gets into power, after a year or so in office, he has adopted the policies of his predecessor toward China.

President Carter attacked Kissinger and Nixon for sucking up to the Chinese and being too soft after reading some of the transcripts of meetings with the Chinese. Carter, of course, normalized relations with China after some initial lean toward the Soviets. He promoted the relationship with China, and this is to his credit.

Some Republicans, although not the great bulk of them, attacked Carter for selling out Taiwan. However, Carter was attacked by Reagan regarding his Taiwan policy which, he charged, was much too soft. Reagan gave great emphasis to this issue. Of course, after he was elected President and had been in office for a couple of years, and the 1982 Communique of Taiwan arms sales was negotiated, Reagan then went to China, and he moved China policy forward, as his predecessors had done. Reagan was followed by President Bush, who endorsed his policy toward China but ran into early trouble because of the 1989 Tiananmen Square massacre.

Then President Clinton came along, and he bashed President Bush for being too soft on China, particularly in the wake of the Tiananmen Square massacre. He conditioned MFN [Most Favored Nation] trade on Chinese improvement in the field of human rights. Then, after a year or two, President Clinton changed his policy toward China and moved more toward the policies of his predecessors as President.

So this has been a recurring phenomenon and makes for an interesting footnote.

I developed a growing respect for President Reagan, which continues to this day. I'm not one to mythologize or eulogize him and ascribe to him heroic, Churchillian accomplishments, as some of his worshipers do. Having said that, I think that Reagan proved that there are certain qualities that are more important than being brilliant. Of the Presidents I dealt with, I'd say that Reagan and Ford seemed to me to be the least intelligent in the conventional sense. Nixon, Carter and Clinton, it seemed to me, are the most intelligent, with Bush somewhere in between. There is no question that in meetings I sat in on with Reagan, mostly on China, because I was Ambassador then, he would follow his cue cards. He would follow his script, at times somewhat mechanically. So I didn't feel that there was a great mind at work here, something like Nixon on foreign policy or Carter on details, and so on. However, Reagan proved that if you have a certain few principles and convictions and you stick to them, and don't bend with the wind and consult the public opinion polls, as Clinton has done, you can get some things done. Perhaps the single largest achievement of Reagan was to restore the spirit and confidence of the American people, especially after Carter's period of "malaise," economic problems, oil shocks, and American hostages. Observers were saying that the American presidency was fatally weakened. Reagan disproved all that and showed that a President could do great things. His optimism, faith in America, strength of character, fidelity to his principles all made a huge difference in the American psyche in addition to his specific accomplishments.

In addition of course he was one of the great orators and could lift his audiences, whether at a time of national tragedy like the American Challenger space tragedy or telling the Russians to tear down the Berlin Wall. Of course speechwriters like Peggy Noonan - or Ted Sorensen for Kennedy - deserve great credit.

The economy did well under President Reagan. Of course, he also helped to bring about the end of the Cold War. Now, I give great credit for this to Secretary of State George Shultz, and I'll come back to this later on. I'm not sure that President Reagan could have done it by himself. There's no question that he was tough and firm with the Soviets. He built up our defenses. He went too far with the idea of Star Wars [which he called the "Strategic Defense Initiative," or SDI]. This was a crazy idea which sought to build up a perfect shield to protect the U.S. However, by stretching the economy of the Soviet Union and the ability of the Soviets to keep up with us technologically, it certainly helped to bring down the Soviet Union. Under the influence of Secretary of State George Shultz, Mrs. Reagan, and some others, he used the assets available to him with the buildup of our defenses and technology drive to create further leverage on the Soviets and also negotiate with them. He helped to bring about the demise of the Soviet Union and was helped in this regard by the administration of President George Bush. The rottenness of the Soviet system had an awful lot to do with this, so that not all of the credit for this should go to President Reagan.

The policies of Reagan's predecessors also had a lot to do with this, including those of Nixon and Kissinger and, to a certain extent, those of President Carter. So, no one person deserves credit for our victory in the Cold War, but certainly President Reagan deserves and is getting much credit. I've changed my mind about Reagan. He showed good judgment in choosing people like Secretary of State George Shultz and using them effectively. He showed a willingness to adjust to changing circumstances, as he did in the cases of Taiwan and China, as he did on negotiating with the Soviets, and on maintaining his principles. I think that all of that is a plus. I still can't figure out how culpable he was in the matter of exchanging arms for American Embassy hostages in Iran, which I thought was a disgraceful episode. However, Reagan was always vague, and he managed to slip through that, because of his vagueness. He has to be held responsible for the Iran-Contra affair, and that is a major mark against him. It was outrageous to be dealing with Iran in that way, not to mention possible violations of law by subordinates and a possible coverup because of Reagan's vagueness.

However, on the whole, I would give Reagan very high marks. I would give him lower marks on what he did on our budgetary deficit. The term "voodoo economics" is true. You cannot raise defense spending, which I think we needed to do, cut taxes, and say that you are going to get a balanced budget. This just can't be done. On the whole, I think that Reagan deserves great credit and I would certainly put him above Ford or Carter as President. Nixon was much more brilliant in the field of foreign policy and had much more dramatic achievements in some respects, although, because of the Watergate Affair, you have to rank him lower in terms of his overall performance.

Next came President Bush (Senior). This is the mirror image of my evolving view of President Reagan. I went from negative to positive on Reagan. I did just the opposite in evaluating President Bush. Again, I'm a moderate Republican and therefore, for that and many other reasons, George Bush appealed to me greatly. I had known him and played tennis with him. I had known some members of his family favorably and well. He was a WASP [White Anglo-Saxon Protestant] like myself. He went to Yale, as I did. He was in the Skull and Bones, a secret society at Yale like myself. He was a moderate Republican and seemed like an eminently decent guy. When he went to China as one of the first chiefs of the U.S. Liaison Office in Beijing before we had full diplomatic relations with China, I was in charge of getting him ready to go to China on behalf of Kissinger. I briefed him and took him around to call on a number of people. I was very impressed, not only with his enthusiasm but his ability to absorb the various dimensions of China policy. I thought that he did an enthusiastic job in Beijing, even though there wasn't much that he could do in terms of policy. He was kept on a tight leash by President Nixon and Kissinger. The Chinese didn't allow him a great deal of access in Beijing in a still very restricted environment. So, for all of these reasons, I was a fan of George Bush before he became President.

Furthermore, when he was Vice President under Reagan and I was Ambassador to China, almost every time when I came back to Washington for consultations or when I was accompanying a Chinese leader, such as a Vice Premier, on a trip to the United States, I would see Vice President Bush. He was one of the hosts of the Chinese leaders. He would host either a dinner or a lunch in honor of the visitor, in addition to entertainment by the President, if it was appropriate, depending on the level of the visitor. But I would see Vice President Bush on my own, just as an old friend to bring him up to date on China, in which he was very interested. He had had the same driver that I had in China. He wanted to hear about his old friends in Beijing, as well as talk about policy issues. There was always a very full exchange of views, back and forth. He was very friendly, so I was a great fan of George Bush.

I voted for George Bush and thought that he would be a terrific President. I also thought, very naively as it turned out, and I have covered this point elsewhere, that I would get a high level job with George Bush. There were rumors in the press that I might be National Security Adviser to President George Bush. Bill Safire, "Newsweek," and others suggested key jobs were awaiting me. It was reported that I was favored to be appointed CIA Director, which was absurd.

Someone else had me down for appointment as Deputy Secretary of State. There were a lot of rumors going around. I didn't know what I'd be, but I was pretty sure that I would be up for a pretty high level job, given my good relationship with George Bush and the fact that I thought that I had done well on China, as well as during the rest of my career.

I want to emphasize genuinely that the fact that I did not get a high level job is not the reason why I changed my mind on George Bush. I changed my mind on Bush because of his trip to China, which we've covered at great length elsewhere in this interview, so I won't repeat myself. Basically, leading up to this Bush trip to China, I wrote personal memos for him and personal profiles on policy, which I thought were very good. His advance people thought that I and the embassy had done a terrific job. So everything up until that trip to China was positive, as far as my view of George Bush was concerned. By then I had found out that I wasn't going to get a high level job working for Bush, but that didn't affect my view of him. Frankly, I was disappointed and puzzled, but this didn't change my positive view of Bush for all of the reasons that I have mentioned.

I changed my view of Bush as a result of his trip to China in February, 1989. My views regarding Bush on that will be found elsewhere in this interview. It completely soured me on his character.

Q: The Tiananmen Square incident occurred in...

LORD: June, 1989. Bush's trip to China took place in February, 1989, right after his inauguration as President. I've covered that and his weakness in the face of the Fang Lizhi incident and his sending Brent Scowcroft [National Security Adviser] to do a press backgrounder which was totally inaccurate and which attacked me and my Embassy.

That annoyed me, both on personal grounds, which is only human, but also, and more importantly, in terms of a general weakness toward the Chinese and a general lack of character.

As time went on, after I left government service, I felt that President Bush had been very weak in response to the Tiananmen Square massacre. So I was increasingly disillusioned with him. I admired what Bush did in terms of Desert Storm [victorious campaign in the Gulf War in 1991], for which he deserved great credit. He marshaled public opinion and had the courage to intervene there. He maintained a complicated alliance with several countries in fighting that war. I think that President Bush was right not to march on Baghdad. We would have been bogged down. But I think he should have continued the fighting for a couple of more days and decimated the Iraqi Republican Guard. And he should have provided air cover for the rebelling Kurds and Shiites. However, on the whole, he deserves the credit he's gotten for that. I think that he managed the transition from the Cold War after President Reagan very well. Certainly, he supported the unification of Germany effectively and dealt with Soviet President Gorbachev at a time when the Soviet empire was crumbling, and the Communist Party of the Soviet Union was losing control in that country. He made sure that the Soviets didn't feel "cornered" and that they were able to save some face. So there was a peaceful denouement to this situation. President Bush deserved credit for many developments in foreign policy.

As I said, I thought that Bush was increasingly weak on China. I became steadily more impatient with him on that front, to the point where finally, after hesitating, I began to speak out against Scowcroft's trips to China after the Tiananmen Square massacre, as well as his general softness versus Beijing. I became more and more critical of President Bush and also more disillusioned with him. I also felt more generally, as an American citizen, that Bush largely ignored domestic policy because he was so interested in foreign policy. Essentially, I believe that's why Bush was not reelected. People thought that he was ignoring domestic issues. So in that respect I thought that Bush was delinquent. More generally, I began to see a weakness in Bush's character, in contrast to Reagan. I reached the point where I admired President Reagan a lot more and President Bush a lot less.

I had been a fan of Mrs. Bush as well. However, she has a public reputation beyond what she deserves, in my opinion. She is one tough lady. Never mind about her being tough. I'm in favor of that. But she can be quite nasty and was to my wife, during President Bush's trip to China. So I generally have a less elevated view of her than the general grandmotherly vision that she projects to the American body politic.

That brings us to President Clinton. Of course, President Clinton swung too far in the other direction and did so much in the field of domestic policy early in his first term that he didn't pay enough attention to foreign policy. By the time the election campaign of 1992 rolled around, I was critical in private and in public of Bush on China and was generally disillusioned with his character as I saw it. Clinton appealed to me the way that Carter had many years before. That is, he appeared to be a moderate, centrist Democrat. As I said, I was disillusioned with Bush. I served Democrats and Republicans. It appeared to me that Clinton was not a left wing Democrat by any means. And he clearly was bright.

I knew something of his background as a womanizer and some of his weaknesses, obviously his evasions on the Vietnam War, as well as the Jennifer Flowers affair. It was clear to me that Clinton was not a perfect human being. I'm very old-fashioned on marriage vows, and I didn't approve of his behavior. However, I understand that Clinton's behavior was irrelevant to other people. People disagree on the importance of that, and certainly they say that this is not a crucial matter for a President. A lot of Presidents have been in trouble in this respect. Clinton was not my first choice among the Democrats, but once he became the nominee of the Democratic Party, I preferred him over George Bush.

Indeed, I met with him once on Japan and China policy during the 1992 election campaign around Labor Day, 1992, and this has been documented elsewhere. I was extremely impressed with this first meeting with Clinton, and he has made a good impact on many people. Among his characteristics are his intelligence and his clever answers to questions. He is a good listener. He is also charming, friendly, and open. When I walked into the room to meet him, he said: "Strobe Talbott [now Deputy Secretary of State] speaks very highly of you." I didn't know that Strobe Talbott, who is a good friend of mine, was also a Rhodes Scholar, as Clinton was, and is very close to Clinton. Presumably, Talbott mentioned me to Clinton as someone to keep in mind for a future position.

I had a favorable exchange with President Clinton on China and Japan, voted for him, and came into the Clinton administration enthusiastically. By now, I am totally disillusioned with Clinton as we speak here in the spring of 1999. I had mixed feelings while I was working for Clinton. On the whole, I had a positive attitude toward him. Clinton did some good things. I liked the fact that, for whatever calculating, poll taking, triangulating reasons, Clinton had moved to the center and committed himself to welfare reform and balancing the budget. I think that the Republicans also deserve a lot of credit for that. I was frustrated about Clinton's lack of systematic attention to foreign policy during the first couple of years of his first term. I felt that he was right, that domestic policy had the highest priority after the Bush administration, and I thought that if the Clinton administration was strong domestically, that would help him in the foreign policy field. So Clinton clearly wanted to make domestic affairs his major priority.

Having said that, I found that Clinton was a little too sporadic in foreign policy for my taste. We encouraged him to host the first APEC [Asia-Pacific Economic Conference] summit meeting in Seattle in November, 1993, which was an important element in our Asian policy. We managed to use his calendar for that reason during the first year of his first term. Also, in July, 1993, we were able to arrange for President Clinton to go to Japan and South Korea on his first, overseas trip, because there was a meeting of the G7 [seven most highly industrialized countries in the world] in Tokyo. We managed to get him involved in Asian affairs early by using the calendar. But he was sporadically involved in foreign policy issues generally early in his Administration.

I was most frustrated with President Clinton on his China policy. After I had negotiated a deal with Congress with moderate conditions on MFN renewal, the economic agencies undercut us and showed division in our government to Beijing, undercutting our leverage. The President never disciplined his Cabinet and made them support his own policy. Then when Secretary of State Warren Christopher went to China early in 1994, it was the last chance to get the Chinese to make progress on human rights, so that we could renew MFN [Most Favored Nation] treatment for China. We had a chance to advance enough to say that they had met minimum conditions for MFN treatment for China. This was a very tough trip to China, which I have described elsewhere. The Chinese cracked down hard on dissidents. We tried for a week or two to get President Clinton to issue a statement supporting Christopher and making clear to the Chinese that the turbulence in China was the fault of the Chinese Government and that the President was backing up Secretary of State Christopher. However, we couldn't get a single statement out of the White House by President Clinton or the White House, backing Christopher. This clearly undercut Secretary of State Christopher at the time. It gave the Chinese every incentive to hang tough on human rights.

Also annoying to me was the fact that throughout his first term President Clinton never made a speech on China. I tried mightily to get him to give one. Now, China is one of the most complex relationships that we have, probably THE most complex. You have to explain to an American audience why engagement with China is in our interest and why engagement is not appeasement or rolling over. We need a mixture of firmness in negotiation and cooperation. Our relationship with China will continue to be a mixed relationship, both sweet and sour. That can only be handled by a President, articulating a strategic approach, which President Clinton never did during his first term. We had a policy of engagement with China, which my staff and I had advocated in a memo prepared in September, 1993. It looked very much like what we're doing today, as we speak. However, we never got President Clinton to present this policy. He and his political advisers always calculated that this topic was too sensitive to treat in a speech.

We convinced Secretary of State Christopher to make long comments on China, but a Secretary of State never gets the attention that a President does. So that just documents the fact that President Clinton was an in and out on foreign policy, and our foreign policy during the first couple of years of the Clinton administration suffered as a result. I'll get back to this when I get to Secretary of State Christopher, but we were much more successful in 1995 and 1996 on several fronts. We stumbled early on policy toward Somalia, Haiti, and Bosnia. We had to reverse ourselves on China, and there were some serious problems early in the Clinton administration. Then Christopher got much better afterwards, as did the Administration generally on foreign policy.

Nevertheless, despite this mixed review, I always liked President Clinton in terms of his charm, his warmth, and the feeling that he was engaged with you. I considered President Clinton extremely bright. He is the smartest President that I ever worked with. He is also the dumbest President that I ever worked with, and I'll get back to that. In terms of his smartness, I've never seen a President who could absorb issues so quickly and put this understanding to good use. The most concrete example of this was getting him ready for high level meetings, in my case, with Asian leaders. Whether the meeting was in California or at the White House, at an APEC summit meeting, the UN, or wherever it was, you are supposed to have time before a given meeting to get the President ready. This is not always literally the case. You don't know whether the President has read his briefing book. You don't know sometimes how much he had grasped of the leader he is meeting with or the issues involved.

In some cases we had interagency briefings of Clinton, sometimes with outside experts, a week or two before a trip or meeting. But usually just before the meetings themselves, with all of his advisers waiting around, Clinton usually ran late. He would be available for briefing purposes with only 10 or 15 minutes to go before the meeting instead of the hour scheduled. At this point I would worry greatly that he won't know enough or know what to do. For example, there were times in the Oval Office [of the President] when you would have, say, Secretary of State Christopher there and maybe also the Secretary of the Treasury or the Secretary of Defense and the National Security Adviser, depending on what the issues and who his interlocutor was. His chief of staff and his press adviser, McCurry, or whoever it was, would also be standing around him. All of them would be trying to get in a few words about what he had to do on this issue, that issue, how to handle the press, and the kind of questions he was going to get. There would also be advice on how President Clinton should conduct the meeting. It was especially awkward for me because I had a superior, Secretary of State Christopher, present at such a time. There wasn't much that I could say, particularly when my boss was there, although Christopher is a very decent man and didn't mind it too much.

So we would be sitting around a table or standing near the President's desk in the Oval Office. There were about 10 or 15 minutes to go, with perhaps five people talking at once. President Clinton would be shuffling his cue cards containing his talking points. You didn't know what the hell was going to happen. So what happened? He went into the meeting and performed brilliantly. He not only knows the issues as well as you do. He knows how to conduct the meeting. For example, he would start off with a fairly warm and friendly approach, depending on the circumstances. I am generalizing, but he would be relatively friendly and cooperative during this early part of the meeting. Then the tough or difficult issues that he would have to grapple with, or the warnings or problems he would want to raise, he would put in the middle. Then he would make sure that he ended up on a positive note again for face or mood reasons. He didn't want to start off or end negatively. This is pretty elementary as an example of an A-100 course in diplomacy or negotiations. However, President Clinton had an instinct for this, and I use it as an example. He not only knew the issues but would also handle them in the right sequence.

That was one of his strong parts, and I use it as an example of President Clinton's brilliance in absorbing the details affecting complex issues and giving them back to the visitor. He had a slight weakness. I think that he wasn't tough enough at some of the meetings. For example, with the Japanese on economic issues or the Chinese on human rights. He had a certain tendency of wanting to be liked by his interlocutor. Particularly in terms of meetings with the Japanese and Chinese, I felt that he wasn't quite firm enough at times on some of the issues.

So when I left the Clinton administration at the end of 1996, it certainly wasn't because of Clinton himself. I had no particular complaints. I felt that our foreign policy was in much better shape than it had been when I entered office [as Assistant Secretary of State in 1993]. I certainly felt that our policy toward Asia was in good shape. The China summit meeting was scheduled, and relations with China were on track. We had come out of a crisis with China related to the Taiwan missile crisis. President Clinton had had a very successful visit to Japan, where he had handled himself very well. I was with him on that trip as well, of course, as I was on all of his Asian trips. I had also sat in with him in Oval Office meetings, as well as meetings on Air Force One. I had had a lot of exposure to Clinton. I liked him personally and thought that he was a good President in many ways.

We had also normalized diplomatic relations with the Socialist Republic of Vietnam. APEC meetings were moving ahead, and regional security and a lot of other things were going well on the Asian front. We had the Korean Framework Agreement. We had terrific relations with Australia and had greatly improved relations with New Zealand. We were doing well with ASEAN. Also Mongolia.

Since I've been out of office for more than two years now, I've learned, as has the rest of America, including some of his closest advisers, that President Clinton has some fundamental, character flaws. When I worked with him, I went through a period of semi-denial that this was so, as was the case with some of those advisers. Maybe I was naive not to have known this, but if I didn't fully understand this, how about George Stephanopoulos [former key staff for Clinton] and others, who claim not to have fully understood it either? Well, without going into a great deal of detail which is particularly relevant to this record, I have learned of the coverups and lying to the American people and violations of the law by the nation's chief law enforcement officer. This is now confirmed by the judge, who has concluded that Clinton appears to be guilty of contempt of court. Not to mention how he treats his wife, his daughter, his cabinet, and the American people, especially women.

For all of these reasons I was glad that he was impeached by the House of Representatives in early 1999. I also became disillusioned with him because he follows public opinion polls too closely. He was selfish and reckless and immature and put his stupid, mind-boggling gratification above his Presidency, his character, and his family. He is a person who clearly was already in danger because of his relationship with Jennifer Flowers and Paula Jones and all of the rumors of other matters. He didn't even have the sense to do what he was doing outside of the Oval Office.

I think that people may disagree on whether he should have been removed from office. The biggest argument against his removal is that the American people didn't want it, and therefore there would have been bitterness and polarization on this issue. I can live with impeachment and a finding by a judge that Clinton has been guilty of contempt of court, as well as permanent stains on his record. However, I stand by some of the positive aspects of his record, including some of the things that he accomplished. On balance, I am furious at what he did to the country and how he let down the American people. It was a tremendous waste of talent. And the issue was not "sex" but the breaking of the law and coverups and how he dragged this nation deceitfully for years.

So those are some comments of mine about the Presidents I served under. Regarding Vice President Al Gore, I knew him only superficially before I entered office under the Clinton administration. In 1992, I chaired a Carnegie National Commission on Foreign Policy, to look at our foreign policy and make suggestions to the incoming Administration. One of the people we talked to before we wrote the document was then Senator Gore. We talked to him about foreign policy, and particularly on the environment, where he has been an expert. At that meeting and in the course of other, superficial observations of him, I was impressed with Gore as a moderate Democrat, a dynamic and experienced figure, basically centrist in his instincts. This view of Gore, which is widely held, was reinforced during the occasions I had to deal with him during the first term of President Clinton. This included dealing with visiting Chinese or other Asian leaders, for example, and substituting for President Clinton, as Vice President Gore did in Osaka in 1995.

In debates on Vietnam policy I thought that Gore conducted himself well. For example, on Vietnam policy, as I've said, I thought that President Clinton was very skittish because of his own draft evasion and his worry about domestic backlash. Gore was generally supportive of my efforts and those of Secretary of State Christopher to move ahead in a graduated way with normalization of relations with Vietnam, which I thought was in our interest. Gore was very helpful in that regard. So I generally had, and I still have, a basically positive opinion of Vice President Gore. He was extremely hard-working, well-versed, experienced, and, on the whole, a centrist figure. However, I have become less enamored with him because he got up, on the day that President Clinton was impeached, and said that Clinton was one of our greatest Presidents. That was a bit much for me. I realized that he felt that he had to be loyal to the President, but I thought that went too far.

Gore certainly has been a very impressive Vice President. I don't think that any Vice President has been as intimately involved in policy matters. This has not just involved PR [Public Relations] but counseling the President, sitting in on key decisions, and undertaking important assignments abroad and at home. He has handled these matters quite competently. So I have no animus against Vice President Gore. He has certainly treated me decently. At a couple of meetings which I attended, Vice President Gore did seem to be following briefing cards and not knowing the issues very well. However, that was the exception, rather than the rule. Gore is a little stiff, as people say, but I thought that he was a decent man. Again, I'm basically positive toward Gore, but I can't live with his statement that President Clinton was one of our greatest Presidents.

I was originally a tremendous fan of Mrs. Clinton. I first got to know her, sitting next to her at dinner at the White House, when I had occasion to talk to her for most of a couple of hours. I also met her superficially at various meetings and social occasions. She was always very gracious, warm, and obviously intelligent. I became a super fan of hers when I accompanied her on a week-long trip to China and Mongolia. That this was in the fall of 1995. She went to a United Nations conference on women's rights in Beijing. We attended this conference for several days. It was primarily an international conference, not a U.S.-China meeting. She had no bilateral meetings with Chinese leaders. We were having trouble with the Chinese at that point, but that wasn't the question. She was there for the UN meeting as a representative of the U.S. Then we went on to Mongolia.

First of all, she confirmed what everyone knows. She is extremely bright and the smartest First Lady that I've ever met. However, beyond that, she took advice I gave her on a speech. I was there essentially as her adviser on China and Mongolia. I was the only person outside her immediate staff. They were very loyal to her and very friendly to me. I encouraged her to be tough with respect on human rights and women's rights, including implied criticism of her hosts.

Some of the State Department people and other advisers were telling her: "Don't embarrass the President" by beating up on the Chinese record on women's rights or human rights. However, I said: "Absolutely not. You're here to speak at a UN women's conference. You're addressing that issue and you can put it in universal terms and not just China. But you shouldn't shy away from it. That's not inconsistent with engagement with China; it is another dimension of it. You should express your own convictions and principles because of the nature of the conference and to show that we have a balanced policy toward China. We're just not going to roll over for them." So, if anything, I toughened up her speech. She probably expected me, as the Department of State adviser, to suggest that she not annoy our Chinese clients or to be nice to them. I may have gained her respect in that sense. In my consideration of the issue, I advised her in terms of what I thought was right for U.S. policy.

She took other advice and was modest in her approach. The speech was strong and good and went over very well. She got a tremendous reception on a day when it was pouring rain. I still remember the unbelievably bad conditions under which it was delivered. She spoke in a tent.

Mrs. Clinton was also very friendly, warm, and approachable. She didn't lose her dignity, and she was still the First Lady of the United States, but you felt that you could talk to her as a human being and a friend. She displayed a good sense of humor. So I just liked her on every level and I retain these positive views of her to this day.

However, because of the scandal involving President Clinton, I've lost some respect for her. She is too smart not to have known what was going on. Therefore, she was an enabler for the President. She said that this affair involved a “vast right wing conspiracy” and said that right after the Monica Lewinsky scandal broke. She had also protected the President during the campaign on the Jennifer Flowers issue. You can't judge other people's marriage, but, perhaps out of ambition, for a woman who is supposedly a spokesperson for women's rights to put up with this kind of performance by her husband to me is beyond the pale.

Q: Let's turn to your experience with the various Secretaries of State you knew. You've already talked quite a bit about George Shultz...

LORD: I've already talked about Henry Kissinger, George Shultz, and Warren Christopher, the three Secretaries of State I worked with the most. I've discussed Kissinger at great length, as well as Shultz and Christopher. I've already talked about Shultz and I'll just touch on him briefly.

I think that George Shultz was a truly excellent Secretary of State, one of our three best since World War II, though he is not Dean Acheson or Henry Kissinger in stature. By the way, Kissinger deserves to be ranked as one of our top Secretaries of State and National Security Advisers. I think that it's just a bit misleading to say that Kissinger was a great Secretary of State. You have to include his 5-6 years as National Security Adviser. He was a great Secretary of State, but he was also a great National Security Adviser. You have to put the two positions together because, otherwise, you lose some of his almost incredible achievements during the first four years of the Nixon Administration. I've covered his achievements at the Department of State as well as the NSC. At State in addition to Middle East breakthroughs and independence for Rhodesia (becoming Zimbabwe) and his other specific accomplishments, perhaps Kissinger's greatest contribution was his holding the country and our foreign policy together almost single-handedly in the wake of the Watergate Affair. But you have to add the 1969-1973 achievements, what he did in terms of China, the Soviet Union, Vietnam, and the Middle East, etc. before he became Secretary of State.

Shultz, of course, was brought in after Al Haig's debacle and Haig's quarreling with Jim Baker and the White House staff generally, as well as Haig's general personality. Shultz brought in a steadiness of personality but, much more important than that, on most issues I happen to have agreed with Shultz. I think that he had just the right balance of toughness and a willingness to negotiate with the Soviets and with others. He was out in front on some issues like terrorism and the importance of technology to foreign policy and the world in general. He was way ahead of most people on issues like that. He had patience and toughness of the kind that Warren Christopher had, and I'll get back to Christopher later. Shultz had somewhat greater conceptual strength than Christopher did, though obviously much less than Kissinger.

Shultz didn't have the most effusive kind of personality. He didn't have a great sense of humor. He was very tough to figure out, not just for me, but for others as well. People used to call him "the Big Buddha." If you were briefing him for a meeting, he was a terrific listener, and you knew that he was taking in everything that you said. That's the good news. The bad news is that you had no idea how much he agreed. He would listen and absorb what you said and, perhaps, ask a few questions. However, you never got much feedback. You never knew how much he was taking aboard and how much he agreed with. You knew that you were being listened to, carefully. But Shultz handled himself extremely well in meetings, and you could tell that he took aboard your briefing. So it all came out all right, but you never got a sense of feedback, nor was he ever particularly generous in extending praise to his subordinates. That's the least important attribute, but, if you're a human being, you have to get some feedback.

A couple of times I got some feedback from George Shultz indirectly. For example, in connection with his lengthy trip to China in 1987, I think that I've mentioned what he said on the airplane on the way back to the U.S. He said that this was the single, best trip he had ever taken as Secretary of State, and maybe as a public official. Our Embassy and I had something to do with that. I know that George Shultz thought highly of me, but I could never have proved it by his exchanges, his memoirs, or anything else. He had a Buddha-like quality, but that's the least important characteristic about someone.

When you talk about President Reagan bringing an end to the Cold War, you have to include George Shultz in there as well. I don't think that Reagan could have done it by himself. Reagan was excellent, in the sense of being principled, firm, and steady. With the help of George Shultz and Mrs. Reagan he also saw the need to negotiate. However, essentially, he built up our assets. An additional factor which helped to bring down the Soviet empire was the basic rottenness of the Soviet system. In addition to that it was U.S. spending on defense, and particularly the Star Wars program, calling the Soviet Union an Evil Empire, his insistence on human rights, as well as negotiating with the Soviets and meeting separately with dissidents in Moscow. In supporting all this, Shultz had the basic instincts to conduct a firm policy and exert some leverage on the Soviets. He continued to exert pressure on the Soviets over their invasion of Afghanistan. When I was in China, we did an awful lot of work against the Russians, with the help of the Chinese. Reagan was very good at putting pressure on the Soviets. Shultz could turn those assets and leverage into negotiated outcomes and use them effectively, in a diplomatic sense. So Reagan deserves credit for picking the right man as Secretary of State, that is, George Shultz, after making a mistake with Al Haig.

I think that you have to give Shultz a lot of the credit for steering President Reagan, in a hard-headed way, toward negotiations with the Soviets and using the leverage that he had built up. I give Shultz a lot of credit for that.

Shultz was clearly opposed to the Iran-Contra idea of trading arms for hostages. He skated close to flatly denying his involvement in that. He clearly was against it, but it seemed to me that it turned out that he knew that something was going on in this respect. However, he didn't dare try to find out just what it was, which is not the most heroic position to take. He certainly was a lot better, as were Secretary of Defense Casper Weinberger, than Lieutenant Colonel Oliver North, Bud McFarland, and the rest of the group on the National Security Council staff. But he could have been more aggressive, and not just passively against the Iran-Contra maneuver. He could have poked around a lot more than he did. So Shultz sort of escaped criticism for that.

I recall that Shultz agonized over this issue. I could tell from the media and what I had heard that he debated whether he should stay on as Secretary of State after the Iran-Contra debacle. Not because he was involved in it, but just generally because of his unease over the whole matter. I wrote him a personal, back channel message, on November 22, encouraging him to stay on as Secretary of State. I told him how important he was, how steady he was, and that he had invested too much to leave his position. I'm not pretending that this message had much impact on what he decided to do. I just cite it. Obviously, others were telling him the same thing. I don't think that Shultz ever really came close to resigning as Secretary of State, but there were some rumors circulating to that effect. (End of tape)

In 1984, during President Reagan's trip to China, the American business community had a meeting with Secretary of State Shultz. Or maybe it was a separate trip which Secretary of State Shultz made by himself. Anyway, Shultz was in China on this occasion, and the businessmen began criticizing the United States over our maintaining controls on exports and not sharing technology with China. The American business community also complained about other aspects of how the U.S. dealt with China in the economic field. To his credit, Shultz controlled his anger but, in effect, said: "If you don't like the United States, leave it." He said in substance, support your government. I don't recall his exact words, but in effect he made a very tough reply to the American business community.

The American business community also attacked Secretary of State Christopher when he went to China. They were more polite, but they still displayed an obnoxious attitude to him. They undercut our policy in China by lobbying us, together with the U.S. economic agencies, and by splitting the U.S. government and thus encouraging the Chinese to be inflexible on human rights, as I discussed earlier in this interview. They never pressed the Chinese. Zhu Rongji has just been in Washington as we speak in the spring of 1999. The American business community is regularly critical of the Administration and the President but fawns all over Zhu. So on the whole, and with some exceptions, the American business community has behaved outrageously on China trade issues, as it has on human rights issues generally. Thus I always respected Secretary Shultz for responding firmly to them on that issue. So I always gave him very high marks, although I couldn't always figure out what he wanted to do. I thought that he was a solid, steady presence. There were considerable achievements made during this period.

As we sit here in this magnificent Foreign Service Institute [FSI], my understanding is that Shultz was responsible for the rehabilitation of this building for use by the FSI at a time of budget constraints. He realized the need for training our diplomats. He put aside the necessary money for this work and held firmly on this issue. At the time it would have been very easy to say: "Well, we'll do that some other time. I have to worry about nuts and bolts now. That's for next year." He deserves credit for that as well.

In terms of style as Secretary he relied heavily on his Assistant Secretaries and the career service rather than a palace guard of close aides (as Baker did). In this respect he was probably the best in using professionals and was popular for that.

Any more questions on Shultz?

Q: No. I thought that you might express whatever thoughts you might have on Secretary of State Jim Baker, even though you did not serve under him.

LORD: Well, under Reagan he was Secretary of the Treasury after he was White House Chief of Staff. At the time I was serving as Ambassador to China. The only really direct experience I had with him was when he made a trip to China as Secretary of the Treasury. This must have been some time in 1987. I was very impressed with him. I had heard about his political shrewdness. I had admired his performance as White House Chief of Staff. I knew that he was skillful in getting people elected but also did a terrific job as Chief of Staff to President Reagan. It seemed to me that he was doing a good job as Secretary of the Treasury. I had a favorable impression of him before he came to China, and it was even stronger after he left. I thought that he dealt with the Chinese well. He didn't fawn over them. He was polite but businesslike, which you have to be with the Chinese. Too many people fawn over them, as business people often do, and they are seduced by their Chinese experience.

A minor issue came up during Secretary of the Treasury Baker's visit to China. I can't remember now what it was, but he skillfully negotiated a concrete solution to the problem while he was there. I think that it involved financial services of some kind. It may have been related to the dual taxation treaty, or something like that. It was not a matter of cosmic importance, but I saw the skill with which Baker handled it. He was very personable. I liked him and was very impressed with him. I always thought that he was an able person. I think that he did a pretty good job on foreign policy during the Bush administration. Certainly, he performed well during the Gulf War and with respect to the German reunification issue.

But handling relations with China reflected the less laudable side of Secretary Baker. He made sure he stayed away from controversial issues. As a result, he was not obnoxious on China in terms of being soft, as General Brent Scowcroft and Bush had been. He just tried to stay out of current issues on China policy altogether. He just basically let other people deal with the Chinese because he knew that in domestic, political terms, after the Tiananmen Square massacre, China was not a popular issue. So he had a tendency to stay away from something that would hurt him politically. This was not exactly an admirable trait.

Also Baker really relied on a palace guard at State. They were very able. But the Foreign Service felt excluded and resented this.

Q: From my interviews I have the feeling that Baker, in effect, was somewhat interested in running for President. He kept that option open, which is always very dangerous for a Secretary of State. As was the case with Kissinger, a Secretary of State deals with things that most Americans don't want to have to deal with.

LORD: That is an issue that I would fault Baker on. The example of China is a good one. There were some others that were controversial that I now forget. He tried to keep a low profile on them. He would be happy to be engaged in the more popular ones. But in terms of dealing with the Russians and German reunification, the Gulf War, and some of the big ticket items, Baker was excellent. The team of Baker, Secretary of Defense Dick Cheney, National Security Adviser Scowcroft, and President Bush made up a pretty harmonious group, whatever else you may think of them.

Baker was very skillful. At first, when he entered federal government service, he was one of three people working for President Reagan as co-chief of staff in effect. He shoved the other two aside skillfully. I forget their names now, but Baker became first among equals. Later, he became

Secretary of the Treasury for Reagan and then Secretary of State for Bush.

One footnote here. Baker didn't treat George Shultz, his predecessor as Secretary of State, very well. They were both moderate Republicans, working for Republican administrations and they had been cabinet colleagues. I know that Shultz, who was pretty tight-lipped, was pretty annoyed that Baker wasn't particularly graceful during his transition into office as Secretary of State. As I recall, he consulted Shultz only once, and never called him very much afterwards, so Shultz was somewhat annoyed that his successor as Secretary of State wasn't more gracious.

You're right. Baker was someone who was always calculating his political image and would stay away from controversial issues. Maybe he was too clever by half, certainly more of a negotiator and tactician than he was a conceptualizer, like Kissinger or Zbigniew Brzezinski. On the whole, I think that Baker did a pretty good job as Secretary of State.

I naively thought that I had a pretty good reputation with him, too. I obviously can't judge people. Baker didn't invite me to be in the Department of State with him, which sort of surprised me, to be honest. However, I have no particular animus against Baker.

I think that the fact that he stayed away from some controversial issues suggests that after President Bush's term was over, they were not the closest of friends. In contrast, Scowcroft at first wasn't particularly close to President Bush - certainly not as close as Baker - but he became much closer to him and collaborated with him on the book published by Bush. I think that Bush feels that Baker distanced himself from some of these controversial issues.

Q: Baker kept his distance from Bush, although they were both from the same city.

LORD: It sounds that way now. They used to be very close friends, and Baker's low profile on some tough issues may be the explanation for this new distance.

Q: Then we come to Secretary of State Christopher. I would also like you to talk a bit about former Vice President and then Ambassador to Japan, Fritz Mondale.

LORD: All right. Let me comment on Mondale briefly. I have covered him elsewhere, too. I had known Mondale superficially off and on over the years. He was involved with the Council on Foreign Relations when I was there. I had also met him in some other capacities. My mother was from Minneapolis, so there was always a Minnesota connection to a certain extent, but I didn't know Mondale well. As I say, I knew him superficially as Vice President. I got to know him best when he was Ambassador to Japan, during the Clinton first term as President. I got to like him and, to this day, I'm full of admiration for him. Mondale was always more liberal on domestic politics than I was, as a centrist, but that's not a sin. I always respected him. He is an extremely decent man. He was a perfect example of why a political appointee as Ambassador can be so good. Every Foreign Service officer that I know welcomes good political appointees of good quality, if they deserve it and if they bring new blood into diplomacy. All of this is positive, as long as you don't have too many political appointees, taking all of the best posts.

Mondale's appointment as Ambassador to Japan was important to show Japan that we had someone of elevated stature for assignment to that post. It was a wise appointment and paid the Japanese tribute. However, more important, Mondale's political instincts turned out to be terrific. I remember when I was briefing him before he went to Tokyo in 1993. I recall his saying that what he intended to do was to be very respectful of the Japanese in public but to be as tough as he had to be in private, particularly on economic and trade issues. Ambassador Armacost had been tough with the Japanese as well. In fact, some of his toughness in private crept into the public dimension, and he was knocked around a little bit by the Japanese because of it. I think that was a bum rap. Armacost was a very close friend and was my deputy at one time. He was terrific and did an excellent job in Tokyo as Ambassador, particularly in the wake of former Senator Mike Mansfield. I yield to no one in my respect and affection for the Senator, but Ambassador Mansfield increasingly suffered from clientitis and was much too soft on the Japanese on economic issues. Ambassador Mansfield was disdained by the American business community. I don't always side with the American business community but I think that they had a point that Mansfield wasn't always tough enough with the Japanese. So Armacost had to correct that impression when he replaced Mansfield.

I think that Ambassador Mondale combined the best of all worlds. He was very respectful and cordial with the Japanese in public, without fawning over the Japanese. However, he could be very tough with them in private, including on economic issues, even as he worked with us and others, including Secretary of Defense Perry, myself, and Joe Nye to insulate our security relationship with the Japanese from our economic frictions. Mondale proved his worth, not only in terms of his style with the Japanese, but in terms of his political instincts also.

There was one incident during his tenure as Ambassador to Japan. I don't have this exactly right, but a Japanese student in this country was shot to death.

Q: This was during the Halloween period in Louisiana, or some place like that. It was awful.

LORD: That's right. Ambassador Mondale didn't ask for instructions or even get on the phone and ask whether he could do this or that. Using his political instincts, he immediately went on Japanese television and apologized on behalf of the United States. Not in a guilt-ridden way that would be excessive, but in an appropriate way. He defused the domestic Japanese backlash immediately by his instinct to get out there quickly in the same news cycle as the report on the murder. This showed that his political instincts were very good.

Another example was when there was the terrible incident of the rapes in Okinawa. He was magnificent in dealing with the Japanese public on that, as well as privately with Japanese officials.

So I was very high on Mondale's firmness, his hard work, his balanced view that we had to do something about economic issues, as otherwise they might intrude on security matters; the security relationship is in our own interest, and we have to keep it insulated from economic issues. This takes hard work on the security side. Together with Defense Secretary Perry, Mondale deserves a lot of credit. I think Mondale was an excellent Ambassador and a very decent man. I have great admiration for him.

Let's discuss some of the other people in the Clinton administration, starting with Secretary of State Warren Christopher. I have great respect for Christopher, who is a very decent person. Everyone knows his public service. He served twice in the Department of State as Deputy Secretary and then as Secretary. He also had responsible positions in California and was Deputy Attorney General of the United States. He dealt with riots during the Vietnam War and police problems in Los Angeles. He's really had a distinguished career. Whether it was dealing with the problem of hostages from the American Embassy in Teheran or police problems in Los Angeles, he's had some genuine accomplishments. I consider Christopher a friend, and he's always been very decent to me.

I believe in being loyal and I will be loyal to Christopher. Having said that, I think that he was too old for the job of Secretary of State. He came into the position at age 70 or 71. Some people are very vigorous at that age, and he is in great shape, physically. He jogs all the time, he's thin as a rail, and he's tough. However, I got tired in my late '50s as Assistant Secretary of State. I don't think that you can be in your 70s and be President or Secretary, although Reagan managed to pull it off. Toward the end with Reagan, it was a close call. There were times when I just felt that Christopher's stamina was amazing for someone of his age and in view of the pressures he was under. But that's the point. A Secretary of State shouldn't have to have amazing stamina. I really don't think that people in their 70s should be President or Secretary of State, no matter how vigorous they are. I just don't think that they can handle the job, as a rule. So I think that he paid a certain price for his age, even though, God knows, he was amazing in his resilience, in recovering from jet lag, and in being tough. There were times when you could tell that he was tired and not at the top of his game. I don't blame him for that. He was a great public servant. At his age he could have rested on his laurels but he was willing to serve his government. But I think that the factor of his age intruded on his effectiveness.

Like Shultz, Christopher was very difficult to figure out. He was very much like Shultz in briefings. He would listen, but you had no idea how much he was taking aboard. Having said that, I felt that, like Shultz and perhaps even more so, it was worthwhile to brief him because he was following a lot of your ideas. He would stick very closely to the talking points he was given. He knew his material and worked very hard at it. However, I had the feeling at times that he had a schedule which he had to get through, no matter what, and he didn't have a great deal of spontaneity or time for important detours or follow-up. I wonder whether he could decide whether or not to be discursive or to follow up on something. What you hear about Christopher is true. He was patient, decent, dogged. He had a willingness to take the long view and to hang in there. He was a good negotiator, tactful, and decent. He had all of these qualities. Of course, he had great stamina for his age, but I've already addressed that.

On Asian matters, I have to say that we didn't do badly when he was Secretary of State. We always had to fight the problem of Eurocentrism. My whole strategy for my confirmation statement and later on was to make Asia as important as Europe in our foreign policy. Looking ahead, I thought that this was as it should be, and in fact it actually was. I had good cooperation from Secretary Christopher on that point. Certainly, Clinton too cooperated on the calendar of the first year of the Clinton presidency, when he started off by going to Japan and Korea, then raising the APEC [Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation] talks to the summit level. Christopher supported that. He made several of his own trips to Asia to visit specific countries and/or to attend economic (APEC and security (ARF) conferences. If I really needed to get his attention on an Asian problem back in Washington, I could do it. I always had direct access to Secretary Christopher and never had any problem with that.

Having said that, I would have to add that problems with Bosnia or the Middle East could distract his attention. That's understandable to a certain extent, but it could be frustrating. There are times when you can only do so much at the Assistant Secretary of State level. I would like to think that I did quite a bit and I surely had access to other leaders, even though the protocol divide was quite extensive. However, at times you have to involve the President or the Secretary of State, and both the President and Christopher at times were distracted by some of these non-Asian matters. We managed to get across to the Asians, and fairly successfully, I think, that we thought that Asia was more important because of the APEC Summit Meetings, because of the regional security dialogues we started, and because of the President's trips to Japan and Korea, his engagement with China and the normalization of relations with Vietnam, etc. For these reasons we managed to elevate the status of Asia within the U.S. Government.

There were times when the situation was frustrating. On one occasion, as I have related elsewhere, Christopher had to turn around from a regional security meeting somewhere in Southeast Asia, cancel a trip to Australia, and return to the U.S. I recall an anecdote in that connection. The Foreign Minister of Australia, Gareth Evans, was the most impressive foreign minister in the region. He could also be very tart and tough. I had a great relationship with him. He had a great sense of humor and is a brilliant and creative man. However, he was understandably outraged that Secretary Christopher, on this occasion, was canceling his visit to Australia. The meetings were scheduled to last for two days. We were going to go to northern Australia and meet there so that we wouldn't have to go all the way down to Canberra. I was on the phone with Evans, trying to negotiate what the communique would say about why Secretary Christopher had to go back to Washington.

Evans was screaming in my ear, in effect saying: "You've got to get Christopher to say in the statement that he will visit Australia in the next six months," or something like that. He must be committed to go to Australia. I ran down the hall to Christopher's office and finally got him to agree to go to Australia. In fact, Evans beat up on me by characteristically using an Australian expression: "You've given me a shit sandwich to deal with my own public opinion and my leaders back home."

I mention all that because a couple of months later I was calling on Evans in New York at the time of the UN General Assembly meeting. It was a one on one meeting, although we also had some advisers present with us. I had access to these foreign ministers. Evans greeted me. There was a little plate of finger sandwiches on the table. So I sat down at the table and moved the sandwiches around, looking at each one of them. Evans noticed this and said: "What the hell are you doing, Lord?" I said: "I'm looking for the shit sandwich!"

In any event, there were some distractions, but on the whole Secretary Christopher helped us on Asia. I say this against his background of great decency and humanity. I like Christopher. However, he is stiff and is basically shy. To me some of the most impressive foreign ministers he dealt with were the ones he liked least, because they were full of themselves and, like Evans, were very blunt and egotistical. However, I thought that Evans was so creative and so friendly to the U.S. on the whole that he was one of the ministers that I liked. Secretary Christopher did not have good chemistry with some of these ministers.

One issue that Secretary Christopher was very helpful on was Vietnam. I've mentioned elsewhere how we had to fight the White House, because of the skittishness of President Clinton and National Security Adviser Tony Lake on this issue in moving ahead on normalization of diplomatic relations with the Socialist Republic of Vietnam. I went to Christopher and got his support to back up our reports of Vietnamese cooperation on MIAs [Missing in Action] and the interest we had in moving ahead on normalization. He would argue with President Clinton and Tony Lake that we should continue to move ahead. Secretary Christopher was always a very solid factor and deserves a lot of the credit, and I think that I also do, frankly, for our normalization of relations with Vietnam. Secretary Christopher clearly didn't have as much conceptual strength as Secretary Kissinger did. However, who the hell does? Christopher approached negotiations on foreign policy more like a lawyer on discrete issues which you try to solve pragmatically, one at a time, without enunciating great, strategic concepts. You could argue that, in the wake of the Cold War, that was appropriate. However, Christopher didn't have the developed sense of grand strategy that Kissinger had.

I think that Christopher came out looking fairly good as a Secretary of State. He won't be ranked with the great Secretaries. Part of that is due to the opportunities which some of them had, such as Secretary Acheson did. Part of it is how good the Secretary is. If his record had been written after his first two years as Secretary of State, Christopher would have looked worse than he does as a whole. That is true of President Clinton's first two years as well.

One of Christopher's big mistakes, as he freely admits, is that he went to Europe to discuss policy toward Bosnia and backed off from being tough with the Yugoslavs, because of European skittishness, as opposed to showing leadership. There were problems in Somalia, and some of them were due to President Clinton. There were initial problems in Haiti, although that ended up coming out pretty well. There was a tough trip we made to China in March, 1994, which we have talked about. Certainly, President Clinton didn't back up Christopher on China policy. So the first couple of years of the first Clinton administration were pretty tough for Christopher. He had a pretty bad press.

The press is never as kind when things go well as it is vicious when things don't go well. I think that by the time Christopher left office, the press gave him a much better scorecard than he would have gotten for his first two years in office as Secretary of State, but I think that he deserves better than that. His patience and plodding paid off with some progress in the Middle East. We finally got the Dayton Accord on Yugoslavia. Of course, Assistant Secretary Dick Holbrooke had a lot to do with that. One could question now whether we should have dealt with Milosevic. However, the Dayton Accord stopped the killing in Bosnia for three years, if nothing else. Holbrooke himself said that Christopher was very helpful on that front.

I've indicated that Christopher was helpful on Vietnam and policies toward some other Asian countries which we have discussed. I'm not trying to recall everything that Christopher did. I know that he worked very hard with the Chinese, despite the problems, to get us out of the hole that we were in following the Taiwan missile crises. In 1996 he met several more times with Qian Qichen, his counterpart. Even as Tony Lake was getting more involved, you have to give Christopher a lot of the credit, after some rough times with the Chinese, for helping to restore that relationship. He held strategy meetings on how we could get through this difficult period in the spring of 1996, and he helped to implement this strategy. He stayed in touch by correspondence and by meetings with Qian. He ended up with a successful trip to China in November, 1996, where we fixed the summit meetings with the Chinese, which was announced a few days later in Manila at the APEC summit meeting.

Christopher also worked hard with the Japanese Foreign Ministers, who kept changing to try to make sure that our economic frictions did not spread to the overall relationship, including security ties and a common agenda on global issues and so on. So Christopher worked quite hard on the Japan front. He also was very involved and supportive of our policy on Korea.

I think that, by the time he was through as Secretary of State, the Clinton foreign policy looked better, and Christopher also looked better. I think that he will go down, and rightly, as a solid and competent Secretary of State, though not a great Secretary.

Q: I was thinking of Tony Lake and Sandy Berger [National Security Advisers to President Clinton during his first and second terms]. Maybe you could comment on Secretary of Defense Bill Perry first.

LORD: I think that Bill Perry was certainly one of the most impressive people in the first term of the Clinton administration. I think that Mickey Kantor [U.S. Trade Representative and then Secretary of Commerce] was also impressive. He had a down side in terms of hurting us in some of our relationships, but he got an awful lot done in international trade negotiations. In connection with the APEC [Asia Pacific Economic Conference] summit meeting he was helpful, as well as with the Uruguay Round of GATT [General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade] and NAFTA [North American Free Trade Agreement], in addition to some bilateral talks. His deputy, Charlene Barshefsky, was also Kantor's successor as U.S. Trade Representative. She was equally impressive. Obviously, Bob Rubin and Larry Summers [Secretary of the Treasury and Deputy Secretary of the Treasury and eventually Secretary of the Treasury] were impressive on the economic side, given our economic performance and the respect they commanded. However, Bill Perry was up there as one of the most impressive and most decent people in the Clinton administration. He was an excellent Secretary of Defense and a man of great integrity.

Traveling with Perry, as I did on his trip to China, I found, as was the case with Strobe Talbott, that he was a joy to work with. He would sit around informally and prepare for a meeting carefully, discuss objectively strategy as well as tactics and how we should approach the issues involved. He would invite me to speak with his interlocutors while I was sitting there with him. I was with him during his meetings with the Japanese and the South Koreans, as well as with the Chinese. He would handle himself extremely well and do the post mortems afterwards. He and Strobe Talbott were the best people to travel with because they were terrific in this respect. You didn't get that feedback or intellectual exchange from Secretary Christopher, who was more "Buddha-like," or from Secretary George Shultz.

In my view, Perry was right on the issues. He was tough-minded and firm, as a Secretary of Defense should be expected to be. He was also flexible. He saw the value of the Agreed Framework with the North Koreans, even though it wasn't a perfect agreement. He saw the extremes of either acquiescence with the North Korean nuclear program or perhaps going to war. These were less good alternatives than the one he came up with. Secretary of Defense Perry was also helpful on China, helping us develop a military relationship. He not only went to China himself, and I accompanied him, he had his top deputies go with him to develop the exchanges with the Chinese military, generally recognizing the strategic importance of China. However, he could be firm with the Chinese as well. He was a major force, though the decision reflected a unanimous collective opinion, in moving the U.S. Navy aircraft carriers near the Taiwan Straits during the March, 1996, missile crisis affecting Taiwan and China. He felt that this would get the attention of the Chinese leadership, so he proved that he could be very tough, too.

Above all, I think that his greatest accomplishment, at least in the area I was involved in, was Japan. We had a lot of points of friction with Japan on economic issues. He wanted to insulate those problems from our security relationship. I worked hard with Joe Nye, with Secretary of Defense Bill Perry, and with others to do that. There was no question that the Pentagon took the lead on this issue, as it should have done. They handled this matter very well. Perry also handled very well the aftermath of the Okinawa rape incident. He displayed his sensitivity, going ahead with reviewing our defense relationship and guidelines with the Japanese. He helped in his own trip in March 1996 to set up a very successful trip to Japan by President Clinton in April, 1996, during which we reaffirmed our strategic partnership, if that's the word we used, and I think that it was. We did so along broader lines, as well as managing the Okinawa rape crisis and relocating and consolidating our defense facilities in Okinawa to defuse that tension politically and maintain our force presence in Japan. He performed magnificently on all of these fronts. Now, of course, he is heading a review of the role of our Korea policy, and he has the kind of credibility with Congress and domestic public opinion to do that in a very effective way.

Having said that, I would have to say that Lake was very helpful on Asia policy during the last year of the first Clinton term. Specifically on China, Lake became more involved. This was something that Secretary Christopher didn't mind, although he tried for a long time to prevent a trip to China by Lake. Christopher probably didn't want a repeat of Brzezinski's [National Security Adviser during the Carter administration] taking over China policy from Vance. But in 1996 they acted as a tag team, exchanging roles with one another. In 1996, Christopher worked very hard on China policy, and so did Lake.

I joined Lake in strategic discussions with the Chinese in the spring of 1996 at Middleburg, Virginia, at the Harriman estate. He handled himself very well, and we worked closely together. In July, 1996, I went with him to China, where we had important, strategic exchanges and really began to get into substantive discussions with the Chinese, which we should have done a long time previously, on some of the big issues around the world. We were also tough with the Chinese where we had to be. Essentially, we broke the ground for a summit meeting, which Secretary Christopher cemented in November, 1996, during his trip to China.

Lake was also helpful on Korea. He met with the Koreans and helped to come up with the four party peace proposal, which President Clinton and President Kim Dae Jung announced. I forget the year, but I think that it was during the summer of 1996.

So, when he finally got himself involved on Asia policy, Lake was very good and very helpful. However, he took a while to do that, and he had these personality quirks which none of us ever figured out.

Sandy Berger, who was Lake's deputy as National Security Adviser, was one of the hardest working people I have ever met. I think that he was overloaded with responsibility. He was a very decent man, open to all opinions. He felt, as any Deputy NSC Adviser should do, all agency views must get fair consideration. He ran meetings well and with impeccable fairness to all points of view. With my encouragement, after the change in our MFN [Most Favored Nation] policy toward China, we began to have Berger chair meetings on China, as opposed to me.

We worked very closely together. I would go to all of these meetings, but unlike what Jim Mann suggests in his book, this was not a case of the White House taking something away from the State Department after a failed policy. Rather it was recognition of the fact that we had to have more White House attention devoted to China. We had to balance off competing government interests and get discipline among the economic agencies which undercut us in terms of MFN policy and generally have a more integrated China policy. We wanted to have everyone singing from the same sheet of music, and this is not something I could do out of the State Department. Moreover, more NSC leadership meant more Presidential and White House attention. We had to go to the White House and at Berger's level. We were much more successful once we did that, with my full encouragement. I was fully involved in every meeting. I went on every trip, including trips with Tony Lake. So I had no complaints, and this is a typical case of distortion by Jim Mann. This allowed the strategy for 1996, which had come from Secretary Christopher, to be implemented at White House meetings. I think that Sandy Berger was very fair and very good. I had great admiration for him. I thought that he was overwhelmed at times. I think that we can stop here, unless you have some questions.

Q: This may be somewhat out of sequence, and we could put it at the end. Here you were, dealing with Asian affairs and particularly Chinese matters. Your wife was born in China. I imagine that your nerve endings would be particularly sensitive to this, but did you find that in the political outlook of many Republicans, and we're talking about 1999, you encountered an almost anti-Chinese, racist bias, as there has been, for example, against the Blacks or Jews or other minority groups?

LORD: The quick answer to your question is "No." I don't think that there is a racial dimension, certainly in the Republican or Democratic Party as a whole. There may be something of a more general, racist dimension in the American body politic as a whole.

Let me just address this matter briefly. As we speak, there may be a tendency in certain quarters, although I don't know how much evidence there is of this tendency as yet, that, because of indications of official Chinese fund raising and espionage in the U.S. by Asian looking people, there may be some feeling of suspicion toward them. Unfortunately, most Americans can't tell a Chinese from a Japanese or a Korean. I don't think that such a view is very widespread, and I don't even have any proof that it exists. There may be some Chinese-Americans who have a different view of this. They may feel that some Americans have inherent suspicions of Asians, just as some police officers may have inherent suspicions of Blacks or Puerto Ricans they meet on the streets. I don't believe that this has become a major factor as yet among the American public in general. It certainly is not true of Republicans (or Democrats) as a whole.

First of all, the reaction to indications of official Chinese fund raising and spying isn't just a Republican matter. A lot of it is, for obvious reasons, but there has also been fund raising on behalf of the Democratic Party. It is also true that some recent cases of spying have taken place during Democratic Party administrations. There are a lot of Democrats who are concerned about some Chinese activities. That includes the Cox Committee Report, which is due to be issued soon and parts of which have already leaked out. This report expresses virtually unanimous views on Chinese spying, from both Democrats as well as Republicans. Certainly, the Republican Party is not unified on China or on this particular aspect of China.

The views of China as we speak, in the spring of 1999, are not a matter of controversy between Republicans and Democrats. The debates on China are held within the two parties. On the Democratic side, you have great concerns about China in the views of Congresswoman Nancy Pelosi [Democrat, California], union leaders, and some liberal Democrats, primarily because of human rights issues, but also on nuclear non-proliferation and maybe trade deficit issues, and jobs in the case of trade unions. They want a tough posture toward the Chinese. On the other hand there is the Clinton administration and many Democrats who favor engagement with China.

Similarly, as far as the Republican Party is concerned, there is a debate within the party with respect to policy and attitudes toward China. One of the Republican groups involved in this debate is led by people like Kissinger, Ford, and Scowcroft. These are people who, in the past, have worked for engagement with China and still believe, for geopolitical or other reasons, that we should move more closely to China. Plus businessmen who, on the whole, are Republicans and very much in support of engagement with China. On the other hand there are conservative Republican figures, such as Pat Buchanan or people concerned about the pro-life issue, such as Gary Bauer, or religious people worried about religious discrimination in China, or human rights advocates in general. These people are also worried about our trade deficit with China or about nuclear non-proliferation. And these people, including some in think tanks, see China as a looming military threat. Some consider that China will inevitably be an enemy, and that we should contain that growing power.

So, getting back to your question, I don't think that it's a matter of the Republican Party being racist on China. In the first place, the people most critical of China are within both parties in this debate. And those friendlier to China are within both parties, too. Also, I don't think that those who are against China do so for racist reasons. Sometimes, it's hard to figure out what is implicit racism, but I really think that those who are anti-Chinese, including those in the Republican Party, hold these views for reasons that are understandable and have nothing to do with race. I think that they honestly believe that the Chinese have behaved in a reprehensible way on human rights, on Tibet, and on religious persecution. These people believe that the Chinese have a huge surplus in their trade with the U.S. because they keep their domestic market closed to us. They also believe that the Chinese have been exporting technology, nuclear weapons, and missiles to sensitive areas and rogue regimes, that they are trying to bully Taiwan, and that they are getting arrogant. And many believe that China is becoming a military threat.

On top of that, the Chinese have been spying against the United States. Some aren't particularly shocked at this, because everyone, including Israel, engages in this kind of activity. But these people consider that this kind of activity is additional evidence of unfriendliness toward the United States. Others feel that the Chinese have tried to influence our political campaigns, although definitive proof is not yet available. Some of these people emphasize some issues more than others. Some of them look at the situation across the board. Plus, there is the matter of China's growing power, and some people believe that China is going to challenge us in the future, not only in Asia but around the world as well. They genuinely want to see a tougher policy pursued toward China, and it's not because the Chinese happen to have yellow skins.

Now there is no question that some of these people get upset at some things the Chinese do but don't get upset if other people do the same thing. I mean, bad as the Chinese are in the field of human rights, Saudi Arabia, for example, does not exactly have a good record in terms of human rights. Just take the treatment of women. There are other bad regimes which we beat up on, like Iran, Iraq, North Korea, or Serbia under Milosevic. We tend to pick on smaller nations. We beat up on other countries in the field of human rights. Obviously, Israel has advantages because it has tremendous, political clout in this country with Congress and public opinion. People have to worry about the Jewish vote, and so on, much more than they have to worry about the Chinese vote. Israel is also a democracy, and it has some genuine, security concerns. So Israel gets a much easier ride than China, which is not a democracy. On the other hand, some nasty regimes get much tougher treatment from us than China, with whom we have a greater range of interests.

That's a long-winded way of saying that I ascribe no feelings of real racism in these anti-China tendencies, because I think that it is made up of all these other elements.

Let me go back briefly to the end of my tenure as Assistant Secretary, after the APEC summit meeting in November 1996.

In addition to ongoing business, I and my bureau worked hard for the transition to a new Secretary, Madeleine Albright, and my successor, Stanley Roth. This included the preparation of many briefing papers and memoranda, as well as verbal briefings and meetings. There was one particularly important, comprehensive session that I had on the region with Ms. Albright and her top aides.

I also sent messages and farewell cables to our overseas posts, summing up our years and thanking my colleagues. I also worked on helping the career moves and next assignments of several in my bureau and abroad.

There were various farewell parties, including a large one with staff, colleagues, and friends (including my wife) at which Secretary Christopher spoke in positive terms.

Incoming Secretary Albright asked, indeed urged, me to stay on as Assistant Secretary. I declined for reasons cited earlier in this history, including my view that we had made major progress in the region and that our relations with key countries and institutions were in good shape. Also I was tired after four years of the most demanding, along with the Kissinger years, of all my jobs.

Ms. Albright then offered me my pick of any embassy in the EAP region (and I inferred that other regions might be possible, too). Sandy Berger, the National Security Advisor, clearly with her concurrence, called me to offer specifically the Ambassadorship in Seoul, Korea. I again declined with appreciation. Finally the State Department recommended me to the White House as Ambassador to Japan, the one post I would consider. The White House, however, settled on House Speaker Tom Foley.

On January 20, 1997 I left government service for almost certainly the last time. I had served in a series of challenging, often dramatic, assignments at the State Department, in Geneva, at the Pentagon, in the White House, again at State, at the Council on Foreign Relations, in China, again in the private sector, and once more at State.

MICHAEL A. BOORSTEIN
Administrative Counselor
Beijing (1993-1996)

Director, American Embassy in Beijing Project
Washington, DC (1999-2002)

Mr. Boorstein was born in Washington, DC and was raised in that area. He was educated at Beloit College, the University of Colorado, Harvard University and the University of Turku in Finland. Entering the Foreign Service in 1970, Mr. Boorstein specialized in administration and personnel, serving in Palermo, Rome, Ottawa, Warsaw Curacao, Moscow and Beijing. In addition, Mr. Boorstein played a major role in the planning and construction of US embassies in Moscow and Beijing and in the renovation of consulates and embassies throughout the globe. He spoke six foreign languages. Mr. Boorstein was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2005.

Q: Well, while you were setting up all these new sites and all this, when you were working in Moscow, everything seemed to be dominated by security, eavesdropping and all that. How stood things when you were in China?

BOORSTEIN: Oh, exactly the same. The threat level was viewed at the same level as it was in the Soviet Union. The need, well, basically, we operated under the assumption that our embassy was insecure and at the end of the day the only way to fix that was to build a whole new facility and that's what we're doing now in Beijing. Even though we had secure conference rooms where we would go, the view was it was better than nothing, but not as good as it really needed to be. We were very much disciplined to the need to segregate the Chinese national staff from the areas we worked in. You had your secure spaces that were only for the Americans and the Chinese were not allowed in. Of course in the chancery the Marine guard barred the entrance from having people go upstairs which was totally an American area. I worked on another compound which had the consular section and I'm trying to think, yes, the consular section and a lot of the administrative operations and we had the Chinese staff back in my little area, my immediate office and that of my deputy and the secretary was an area where the Chinese staff was not allowed to come back. They could come under escort. You could invite a Chinese Embassy person to your office for a meeting, but that person could not go in and out on his or her own.

You know the same kind of regime that operated that if we had a sensitive personal issue at home and we wanted to have a discussion with our spouse we were allowed to come in and use the secure conference room to have that kind of a discussion. We were told not to keep any sensitive personal papers at home, but in our office in the safe. So, there was that great deal of sensitivity. Of course the planning for our new embassy and in the case of Guangzhou just like we did in Moscow, there are only top secret cleared American workers building those parts of the compound that are only going to be used by Americans for the classified work.

My preoccupation as the administrative counselor as I was saying was on the facilities side and being a member of the school board. Let me talk about the school board experience a little bit because that really was a dominant part of my life and again it helps to illustrate some of the roles that Foreign Service diplomatic people play in our more important overseas posts. The International School of Beijing was founded in 1980 as a diplomatic school for the children from five nations, the U.S., the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia and New Zealand. In 1980 there were no students whose parents were expatriate business people because there just weren't any there, very, very few. It started off in an embassy apartment and then it gradually grew to the size where they had to get leased quarters. The school was housed in a housing complex that included apartments and a Holiday Inn and like I said the capacity of the school had maxed out at about 600. We did this modular campus to increase the capacity, basically doubled the size, had a new multipurpose building, had a new cafeteria. It had new two story modular classrooms that basically became the middle school and the upper school, the high school. Until I arrived until 1994 it was the only school in Beijing that taught in English for foreigners. Subsequent to that and again as part of the critical mass of people, the number of expatriates as well as the diversification, new English language schools started up afterwards, but only the international school retained, it was the only high school available in Beijing.

I was on the school board for three years. The second year I was the vice chairman and the third year I was the chairman of the board. The efforts got into serious high gear to find a new campus and to find funding to build and design a new school. In order to do that we had to get the permission of the Chinese government to move the school. The Chinese government took advantage of that request to basically eliminate the school's diplomatic status eventually, since the vast majority of students were the children of expatriate business people rather than diplomats. In order to place the modular campus, the school had to use about one-third of a playground that it had leased from the Chinese government. This was the summer of 1994. The previous fall the International Olympic Committee was voting on which country and which city was going to get the Olympics for the year 2000. China was advocating like crazy to have it in Beijing in the year 2000. That was the year that there was a non-binding resolution in congress that said that the U.S. position was not in favor of granting the games to Beijing because of China's poor human rights record. As a result, in China there were a lot of strong anti-American and anti-British sentiment that led up to the vote. This was in October or November of 1993 and by a very close vote the nod went to Sydney to get the Olympics in the year 2000. The mayor of Beijing at the time a gentleman named Chen Xi Tong was very resentful of the fact that Beijing didn't get the Olympics and blamed the Americans. He was no longer mayor I believe by the spring of 1994, but he was still a senior party official and he retained his title I think of being head of the committee for the Chinese Olympic Committee. We learned from pretty reliable sources that he was behind a unilateral action that the Chinese city government took. We had started the construction of the modular campus. We laid down the foundation on which these modular buildings would lie and one of the buildings was going to be very near the fence line separating the school's property from the highway leading to the airport. Well, this former mayor was able to enforce a decision that expropriated a strip of land no more than 20 or 30 feet wide from the fence inward, which they claimed was needed as a green space. So, therefore the amount of room available to build the modular campus shrunk. We literally had to dig up the footings that were placed and move them 30 feet inward and use up even more of the playground to accomplish this. There were all kinds of protests from the diplomatic missions that were the sponsors of the school, but to no avail. There was no due process here. It was not like it was an action of some sort of land commission that the school could appeal. It was simply a bullying tactic on the part of the Chinese government.

Q: Well, apparently we keep seeing articles about this all the time that the communist officials use power without redress.

BOORSTEIN: That's right. That was done and so the school was smarting from that. We got the campus done and whatever, but ultimately a year and a half later when we were looking to get new land and to get the Chinese government to agree through basically the Beijing municipal government that we could move, the foreign ministry got into the act and basically then unilaterally lifted the school's duty free status and then said that the customs authorities were free to bill the school for the duty on the imported classrooms after the fact. Well, the embassies protested and basically the school with the backing of the U.S. Embassy and the others refused to pay the bill and I don't believe the bill was ever paid. It was a very Chinese solution in that the Chinese basically said "we have the right to charge duty," and the American Embassy I believe said, "we acknowledge your right to charge the duty, but we also inform you of our right to refuse to pay it on behalf of the school." So, it reached an impasse. In any event the school did get its land, did get its permission to move. The capital fee levy was imposed. It took a great deal of selling to the parent organizations that were not as supportive of the school or they didn't support their parents to the extent that the American government did. At the end of the day we got through. The school was built and I was invited to the dedication ceremony in April of 2002. I saw this beautiful campus and it was a great feeling of satisfaction that I was very instrumental at its beginning.

Q: Were you harassed, you know, we've had over the years lots of stories about the KGB harassing American diplomats and all. How heavy was the hand of the Chinese security service?

BOORSTEIN: Speaking personally they didn't bother me at all. Maybe they felt I didn't know as much as a political officer or whatever, but in terms of the embassy as a whole, we went on fairly high security alert shortly after I arrived because the international Olympic committee was voting on which city was going to get the Olympics in the year 2000. This was in the fall of 1993 and Beijing was competing for it mightily and that was the year that Sydney was awarded the games. So, there was a lot of anti-China feeling in the congress because of their human rights level, the Chinese human rights record. There was a sense of congress resolution as I recall against China being awarded the Olympics for Beijing in 2000. The Chinese were not happy with that and so on the day that the vote was held I believe it was the evening in Beijing we took some security precautions. We coordinated with the Brits and the Australians and some others. We for example took all of our motor pool vehicles, which we were very comfortable in parking on the street overnight and moved them inside our compound. We advised people to stay home, low profile. China of course did not get the games, Sydney did. There were no riots. There was a lot of anti-American rhetoric in the press and this, that and the other thing, but nothing that was taken out on us. I mean unlike whatever the year was where during the campaign in the former Yugoslavia where there was all this NATO bombing and we inadvertently bombed the Chinese Embassy in Belgrade and killed several of their people.

Q: Were you there when that happened?

BOORSTEIN: No. That was in '99, 2000, something like that and of course that was very serious. Our poor ambassador was basically held hostage in the embassy for three or four days. There were all kinds of pictures of paint being splattered and rocks being thrown and that was part of the impetus where we felt that it was very important for us to have land with the proper setback to build our new embassy. None of that, I'm trying to think in terms of other people in the embassy. Some of our military attachés that of course it was their job to push the envelope when they went out on their trips and if the Chinese caught them being too close to military installations taking pictures or whatever they would file a protest and in some cases they would kick them out of the country. My sense is that it didn't happen as often as it did when I was in Moscow in the late '70s, early '80s.

Q: How did you find the Chinese Foreign Service Nationals?

BOORSTEIN: By and large, they were very good. They were good at what they did. It was a double-edged sword because you knew that they were planted there and in particular, even when you would have counter intelligence briefings before going overseas, the security officials would have some specific information or had come to some conclusions about a certain number of the local staff that you were basically told to trust less than others. At the same token, I'm not going to name any names here you would still find these people to be very helpful, whether it came to, there were times where we had to get visas for people that were transiting Beijing and they were going to North Korea where of course we had no relations. It was during a time where we were considering establishing relations and there were some of our local staff that were very adept at dealing with the North Koreans at their embassy in Beijing to get the visas. When you want stuff done, they were there and they were helpful. But of course, we were very careful in what we gave them access to. We were very careful because of the category of threat that was established for all of our posts in China. We had certain protocols in place that separated even our unclassified information systems from the Chinese. Our computer center for example was staffed entirely by Americans with security clearances whereas in other countries you could have locals in the computer centers. That certainly was not the case in Beijing. We would have certain floors in the embassy that were totally off limits to the Chinese, except we would let the char force in there in the evenings under escorts by the Marines under escort. As I said we were very careful and it was a regime where the security officer kept. He ran a very tight ship and we had a lot of awareness. We were reminded and if we wanted to have any sensitive conversations at all, we had to use the special rooms that were designed for that purpose. That was just a factor. You just sort of got used to it. You knew you were not in friendly territory.

You also, in dealing with the foreign ministry I recall one instance where I went in there, I forget what the issue was and I, which I typically did, I took one of the DSB employees to be the interpreter. Of course, he was a Chinese national and my Chinese was not fluent by any stretch of the imagination, but I knew enough that I could follow along when he interpreted my comments and there was one case where I stopped him and I said, "No, Mr. Chung, that's not what I said." I repeated it in English. He apologized and he said, "Oh, I heard it differently." Well, you know, I think that's bologna. I think he knew exactly what it is that he wanted to say and he wanted to characterize what I had to say in a different way and I caught him. I was quite gratified that my Chinese was good enough to having picked out that nuance.

Q: Did you have overall responsibility for the administration of our post?

BOORSTEIN: That's right.

Q: How many posts were there and could you characterize what their problems were?

BOORSTEIN: Sure. We had four consulates in China. Our two largest were Shanghai and Guangzhou and the two smaller ones were Shenyang and Chengdu. Shenyang is in northeastern China.

Q: Is that all Dalian or is that?

BOORSTEIN: No. I don't know that it ever went under another name. You're thinking of Port Arthur, not Dalian. Guangzhou was Canton in the old days and that was our largest and it remains our largest consulate. Shanghai a little bit smaller. Chengdu and Shenyang were roughly a quarter of the size each of those other two. They were mainly listening posts. Shenyang being fairly close to the Korean, the North Korean border. Chengdu, which is the capital of Szechwan province where the pandas come from, where the spicy Chinese food comes from, was also the closest post we had to Tibet and that was a major reason why we had our consulate there. At the time and I believe to this day Chengdu remains, we are the only consular presence in Chengdu. No other countries have a presence there. In Shenyang there are other consulates, the Japanese, the North Koreans, I think even the South Koreans have something there. I'm not sure about any other countries.

They each had their own management challenges. Guangzhou was and remains the only post in China that issues immigrant visas. The consular section there is enormous, the biggest we have in China. Southern China being a very economically active area, a booming area, the demand for non-immigrant visas for business purposes for other travel increased enormously. The largest number of immigrant visas that would be issued, would be issued to orphans. American families would go to adopt Chinese children, mainly girls that were abandoned by their families. It was always heartening to go down to Guangzhou and stay at the White Swan Hotel, which was just down the street from where the consulate was. It was basically the same complex. To see all these parents that were there to adopt children and the children were with them while they underwent the formalities. They were basically seeing these kids for the first time and seeing how they interacted and how joyous it was for the most part, to see them and it was very gratifying to see that.

Even on this last trip that I made in March even though the consular section has relocated to a high-rise office building because of the demand for the space they still use the White Swan because the White Swan is used to catering to their needs and still see the parents and the kids. There was one instance where they were taking a group picture by this lovely Chinese fountain in the lobby of the hotel. That's really a major focus of our consulate there, plus of course the consular district that encompasses, that Guangzhou is responsible for, probably has 90, or 100 million people and so that's more than the population of Germany, more than the population of Italy. There's a lot of interest by our consulate staff to get out and about to talk to the provincial authorities to see what's going on with business. Wal-Mart has invested a lot.

Q: It's also the area of special business areas.

BOORSTEIN: Shenzhen, yes, that's the special administrative zone up from Hong Kong. It's a two hour train ride from Hong Kong and it's a very, which I did in March when I was there, the first time I'd done that. It's an easy trip to make.

Q: You didn't mention Hong Kong. Hong Kong did fall under you?

BOORSTEIN: No. Hong Kong, there was a debate while I was there because of the return in 1997, that's when it returned to Chinese control. There was a debate whether administratively it should be brought under the jurisdiction of the ambassador in Beijing or remain an independent consulate. It remains an independent consulate. The government of the Peoples Republic of China under the terms of the return of Hong Kong is responsible for foreign affairs and for defense of Hong Kong. Everything else it retains its independence. Economically primarily. When you fly from Beijing to Hong Kong, still to this day it is an international flight. You go through customs. You get your passport stamped that you've entered the territory of Hong Kong and that will be the case I believe for 50 years. So, for a variety of reasons it was decided that Hong Kong, the consul general will not report to the ambassador in Beijing. The four consulates that we have in China are as I mentioned. We have the right under the Shanghai protocol of I think 1979 to open up a fifth consulate in Wuhan. We have never exercised that right. The Chinese on the other hand have five existing consulates in the U.S., in New York, which is separate from their UN Mission, Chicago, Houston, Los Angeles and San Francisco.

Q: Were there any of these consulates cause problems for you?

BOORSTEIN: Well, yes, they required a lot of administrative coordination and help. For example, while I was there the consulate general in Guangzhou underwent a major renovation just to deal with the growing demand in the consular section and they were adding staff and they had to rearrange it to make sure the staff could all be accommodated and we didn't have any ability to at that time to expand as they did now into a separate location, but it ultimately got to that point. We were constantly having teams from Washington and local contractors and other things going on there. Shanghai was the same thing. A lot of pressures for the consular section, which only gave out non-immigrant, visas. They ultimately ended up in a new space in leased quarters for the consular operation. The consulate general in Shanghai was in an older building, which had a lot of maintenance problems. A lot of maintenance challenges. It was a compound in and of itself. There were grounds and you couldn't build onto the grounds. They were protected as historical properties. Shenyang and Chengdu were in compounds that were leased to us under the provisions of an agreement that dated back to 1991 a lot of maintenance problems. When I was there, we were renovating an apartment house for our staff in Chengdu that was then occupied and just a lot. The Chinese just messed up the internal construction and you would have toilet pipes that would not be routed correctly and you would get the products that would come out of a toilet coming out of your bathtub and it required a lot of retrofitting. You would have pipes that would burst in walls and cause all this mildew and mold that would have to be fixed and it was just a constant effort. It was finally dealt with, but one of the things that and we were also supporting the embassy in Ulan Bator. I went and visited there during my tour in November and it was already extremely cold, snow on the ground and they also had space issues. They also had maintenance issues in their chancery. There was constant travel on the part of our general services people. There was constant travel to support their financial systems in making sure that vouchers were properly processed and whatever because their local staff was not very experienced. It was a lot of handholding that went on, plus the administrative Americans in the two smaller posts were largely inexperienced and so you had to keep an eye out on them. I visited Shanghai and Guangzhou probably three or four times while I was there. I visited Chengdu a couple of times and I went to Shenyang only once and to Ulan Bator. You have to keep hands on these kinds of places.

Q: Did you run across any manifestations of the locals, not really warlordism, but the local parties. I'm told that there are a lot of little almost like dukedoms or communist party cadre in places where they control an awful lot of corruption.

BOORSTEIN: Nothing that was really surprising. We had an issue in Shenyang over payment of back rent and that issue, we were ready to pay a certain amount and the Chinese took issue for that, I don't recall whether it was based on an exchange rate or based on whatever and that issue went on for years. We would pay what we thought was right into an escrow account just because we didn't want to have one big bill at the end. These were all local government officials I'm sure were influenced by the party whether they saw an opportunity to make some extra money, I don't know.

Each city where we had a consulate had its own branch of the Diplomatic Services Bureau. They had a system of the foreign affairs offices of the provincial governments were the ones that we'd have to deal with. Sometimes they would listen to Beijing, sometimes they wouldn't. Nothing really jumps out at me to think wow, it was any more significant in one place than the other.

Q: Before we leave here, can you characterize how you felt maybe of some of your fellow officers about China because you know China in some ways is seen as the great power of the 21st

Century or a menace. It's got so many internal problems that just keeping it together is going to keep it pretty well inward looking. What were you getting?

BOORSTEIN: Let me comment on that. I wanted to finish a thought that you had asked me a question earlier about living conditions to show what has changed in China that started while I was there. When I got there like I said 100% of us all lived in Chinese government supplied housing. We then, to meet our demand, leased several apartments in commercial high-rise apartment houses. In 1995, we initiated negotiations with the Chinese to hold them accountable to deliver under the 1991 property agreement, which provided our ability to buy land for a future embassy in Beijing and also to buy a site for a future consulate in Shanghai. We also wanted the right to buy commercial real estate. Now in China, being a communist country, you can't own land. The state owns the land. You can rent for up to seventy years by paying a lump sum once at the beginning and that's yours for seventy years. We had been giving the Chinese the right to buy property in the United States for their staff and we basically said we're not going to do that anymore until we get something approaching that in China. We negotiated that in 1995 and we obtained the right to buy commercial property. Well, you go to Beijing today, we do not have anybody living in government provided housing in Beijing. Everybody is either living in apartments or villas in the suburbs that were built to cater to the growing expatriate community that we had bought or that we leased. That has been a huge, huge improvement in post morale. So, I just wanted to make that point and that started on my watch. I am very pleased that I was part of that negotiation. I was on the negotiating team that hammered that one out and it really has had enormous consequences for the morale in the quality of our living conditions.

Anyway to get back to your question, during my tour there was recognition.

BOORSTEIN: It was recognized that the nature of our relationship was growing so rapidly that we could no longer from a Washington perspective try to run it on a shoestring. The mission in Beijing, it's hard to say, was significantly smaller than Moscow for example, which grew by leaps and bounds after the fall of the Soviet Union. It was smaller than our embassy in Tokyo, it was smaller than our embassy in Manila, Bangkok, and certainly Seoul, Korea but it wasn't reflective of here's a nation of 1.2 billion people generating the largest trade deficit for the U.S. of any other country in the world as of yet, and an emerging power. So this was the beginning of efforts to look into the future and figure out what was going to be needed to really be adequately staffed and resourced to conduct relations with China.

So my last year there, in particular, was the beginning of the planning for what lead to the China 2000 program. That was spearheaded largely by the person who replaced me in Beijing, Pat Hayes, when he was the deputy director of the executive office of the East Asia Pacific Bureau and with the support of Undersecretary Moose who visited Beijing in the spring of 1996 and walked away shaking his head at our poor housing, the decrepit state of the chancery and recognized that this was a post that was under funded, under staffed and the facilities were in awful shape. You could only do so much to upgrade it. So that gave strong impetus to the discussions that lead to our purchase of a site for our new embassy and ultimately getting, I think it was $435 million from Congress, the largest single appropriation for an American diplomatic mission ever to build a new embassy. The number of desks the size of that embassy are roughly I'd say at least three times greater than what it was when I was there.

Where we first had a presence in China we had nothing there from '49 to '72 and then when we had the liaison office, when George Bush, Sr. was there in the mid-70s then we opened up our consulate in Guangzhou, we opened up our consulate in Shanghai and ultimately the other two. It was all done on a shoestring and initially our staff stayed in hotel rooms, we purchased the chancery that we still are in today from the Pakistani's, which we took over from them. Then ultimately, I believe, the second big building in our compound, I think the Romanians had it at some point and, of course, all the Communist countries had palatial buildings in Beijing, which now are largely rattling around with hardly anybody in them. Even across the street, the Bulgarians at one point we were negotiating with the Bulgarians to help them move to another place in Beijing so we could take over that compound and combine it and that would be the site of our future embassy. Well, even we recognized that was inadequate, that plus after the bombings in Africa and the change in the set-back requirements we realized, when I was running the Beijing program office, that we couldn't possibly manage our projected growth by building a new embassy on that property.

So we think we have it right although we know that when the day that embassy opens in 2008 it's going to be bursting at the seams already. So we may have to build an annex, we have enough ground on that property to build another building and we probably will do so two or three years later. In terms of the resources that the U.S. government, number of government agencies, the size of the staff, the dollars pouring in to support the infrastructure, the platform for us to conduct diplomacy have just multiplied enormously since I was there in the early and mid 1990s. Like I said, it was just the beginning of the recognition that we no longer could be the pioneers and there was an attitude among some of the early senior diplomats and I won't name any names of, well, we are just here and we just have to roll up our sleeves and do our job and live with these lousy conditions because that's the way it is. We are American diplomats and we don't need to ask for anything.

Well, fine when you got to a point though and maybe this represents a change in the attitude in the Foreign Service and people going abroad in general, that we have positions that were vacant, largely the lower ranking communications staff, the secretarial staff and so a big push was made to improve overall conditions and afterwards they came up with a nice video saying how wonderful it is to serve in China. Well, they were able to show footage of some of these new commercial apartments that we had bought or leased that were really quite nice and so they don't have those recruitment problems anymore that they had when I was there.

So, that really was a watershed moment that I was there, I helped stimulate it, I helped respond to the people and what...again zeitgeist was there where you had sympathetic people in Washington, you had sympathetic people at senior post management and they all, we worked together. I was not there for the crest of the wave but I was there for the building up of it and the resources all came together probably in 1999, 2000, three or four years after I left.

Q: Now tell me back to the question of when you left there in what '90...

BOORSTEIN: '96.

Q: '96. What was, you know, talking to your colleagues and your own feeling whither China particularly vis-à-vis the United States?

BOORSTEIN: Well you know, we felt that we were in China for the long haul and that we wanted to promote human rights, we wanted to set an example of much like what we did in the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe. We felt that in the long run maybe democracy will come to China. It was not an overt every day kind of thing that you hear more by this administration but still with our outreach through our press and culture sections, the USIA (U.S. Information Agency) kind of thing, and trying to promote the rule of law into China there was a sense I mean again I don't know that you would see it in any overt unclassified policy documents or even the classified ones but there was a sense of eventually the Communist structure in China will collapse. It was important for us to help them get there without it being destabilizing. So in effect that continues, the engagement bringing Congressional delegations.

The biggest bilateral issue between the United States and China was and probably still remains, Taiwan. In the Fall, no the Spring of 1995, I had been there a little less than two years the U.S. agreed to issue a visa to the president of Taiwan, who was an alumnus of Cornell University, to come to a reunion and I believe event to be a keynote speaker. Well, the People's Republic of China (PRC) reacted violently to this, I think they conducted war games in the straits; they just basically threw a blanket of ice over our relations. This was a time; our ambassador to China J. Stapleton Roy was a man that I respect enormously, personally and professionally. He was a consummate China hand, he was born in China, his parents were missionaries, he spoke fluent Chinese, he grew up in China and left in 1949 as a teenager. He had served earlier as deputy chief of mission back in the late '70s, early '80s and came back as the ambassador in 1991 and was very well liked by the Chinese, well respected by the Chinese officials in the ministry of foreign affairs but here at the end of his four years he left under this enormous cloud because of this polity decision. Whether he agreed or not, I have no idea, to issue this visa. So he left, the foreign minister did give him a farewell dinner and I attended it and we gave him a send off in the embassy. I had a particular closeness with him because he was there at the founding of the international school of Beijing and I was one of his two representatives on the board and I always had ready access to him on any issues involving the school that I needed his advice in dealing with the Chinese authorities and I had almost this unwritten agreement with the deputy chief of mission that I didn't have to go through him, I would just go right to the ambassador. He was very supportive and he left under this cloud and it just took a long time for that ill will of that act to dissipate. So anything whether it was the sale of more military jets to Taiwan or its allowing even a future president of Taiwan to even get a transit visa to go through Los Angeles to fly to El Salvador because Taiwan was very successful in having diplomatic relations with some countries in Central America in lieu of the PRC it was just a constant irritant. So they are just emotional about that little island being a rogue element and they feel that if they don't eventually take it over it's just going to speak terrible things for their ability to be unified.

Q: Well it does give the ruling party something on which to rally I mean they don't really have a hell of a lot of other things going for them.

BOORSTEIN: Right.

***

Q: OK, today is the 31st of August 2006 and we're in 1999.

BOORSTEIN: Correct.

Q: So what was up?

BOORSTEIN: OK, well I had just come on board as the first director of the Beijing program office in the office of foreign buildings in the bureau of administration and this was a new office that was created for the purpose of planning for the future new embassy in Beijing. I've already covered the rationale for why a special office was required because of the overriding security requirements in Beijing, similar to what we had done in Moscow, but with the much wiser perspective of having gone through the debacle of the first Moscow project and having figured out how to do it right ten years and a couple hundred million dollars later.

So it was decided to treat the future embassy in Beijing with similar security attention but to have it within the office of foreign buildings rather than a separate office that was done for Moscow. Because of my experience with the embassy in Moscow and having served as the admin counselor in Beijing, Pat Kennedy, the assistant secretary for administration, asked me to head this office, which I was delighted to do.

I started out...the office of foreign buildings at the time was headed by Patsy Thomasson, who was a political appointee from the Clinton administration. Patsy Thomasson was a political operative from Arkansas, close to the president. She had come to the foreign buildings office after having worked in the White House office of personnel as I recall, and during the shake up there when there was a bit of a travel controversy in that office, she was sent to the State Department to be a deputy assistant secretary. She was pretty effective in that job. She took it quite seriously; she had some background having been involved in some construction of highways in Arkansas. She was a bit ambivalent about the idea of having a special office only dealing with one embassy project even though here supervisor, the assistant secretary for administration, decreed that was the way it was going to be. There was some reluctance to be as supportive and as embracing of the concept as I would have hoped would have been the case, but nonetheless the office thrived, developed and we very quickly were given some additional resources.

I had a full time security officer, I had a full time engineer, I had a full time asset from the intelligence community, a gentleman who was a China analyst. He was very, very effective in sort of guiding the effort on how we were going to frame the relationship with the Chinese because we knew also that the Chinese wanted to build a new embassy in Washington. So much like the underpinnings of the Moscow project in the 1960s, where that was also driven by reciprocity we had the same reciprocal dynamics going on, which really gave us a wonderful opportunity to get what it was that we needed.

So building on the Moscow model, and the Moscow project was still under construction, so I took my little team to Moscow in late 1999 and also visited Helsinki to have them see the logistical arrangement through the port of Helsinki. Earlier I had already been to China, accompanied the Undersecretary Bonnie Cohen on her first trip to China, along with the Executive Director of the Bureau of East Asian and Pacific Affairs, Bart Flaherty. We went to Beijing, Guangzhou and Chengdu. Chengdu had their consulate compound walls breached by Chinese rioters, who were protesting the inadvertent bombing of the Chinese embassy in Belgrade during the Balkans campaign.

Q: Kosovo.

BOORSTEIN: Kosovo intervention. So the Department and the East Asian bureau very much wanted the undersecretary for management to see this small consulate and see the ravages of the effect of the rioting because they had basically come over the wall and they had burned the consul general's residence, which was in the compound. The consul general and his wife basically had to flee for their lives back into the main embassy, excuse me, the main consulate office building. The people in the consulate who lived also in an apartment house that was also on the compound also took refuge in the compound and their lives were saved because of the hard-line and everything else that prevented the Chinese from breaching the walls. Some actually stayed in their apartments as well, but there were no casualties, but a lot of damage, in the consul general's residence essentially a shell remained, but the inside was burned out.

We did some preliminary planning for the new embassy in Beijing and through a series of trips and interactions with the East Asian bureau and with the embassy we developed what's called the Space Program. We figured out how big the embassy needed to be in terms of the staff, taking into account the very rapid growth that had been pent up due to the limitations of the existing facility. This lead, after one round of negotiations, I believe in early the year 2000, we had to inform, no actually it was during the visit of Bonnie Cohen to Beijing, we actually had to inform the Chinese that the earlier arrangement that had been developed through an earlier bilateral agreement would not work. That agreement would have allowed us to purchase the Bulgarian embassy compound, which is right next door to the compound existing at the time, but because of the bombings in Africa in 1998, the standards for set-back for embassies changed and were increased from 50 feet to 100 feet. So by doing that, the footprint that would be left to build the new embassy was not sufficient to utilize the Bulgarian compound. So we told the Chinese we needed a new ten-acre site, 40,00 square meters, within the city limits convenient to our housing and convenient to the foreign ministry. That was a very tall order but we basically offered the Chinese very plum property in Washington in our international center for their embassy.

Q: Where was that located?

BOORSTEIN: The international center is near the zoo. It's an area that was set aside in the 1950s when the Bureau of Standards moved out to upper Montgomery county in Maryland with the idea of relocating embassies there to allow embassies to build new buildings designed for that purpose rather than to be scattered around or be in smaller, inadequate quarters along the Massachusetts Avenue corridor.

So a number of embassies had already moved or were already in the process of building. Egypt, Bangladesh, Austria, the United Arab Emirates, I think there are ten or twelve, the Israelis are there, Singapore. As a matter of fact, Singapore was right next to the sites we had...we offered three contiguous sites to the Chinese, the last undeveloped sites on that property. So, of course, we were not going to finalize the deal until we got what we needed. So ultimately the Chinese did offer us the ten-acre site roughly rectangular even though it's called the third diplomatic zone in Beijing and it really was quite a good site in an area where new embassies were also being built in Beijing.

We hammered out a final agreement in November of 2005, which set the stage for further negotiations on conditions of construction that applied to both the embassies in Washington and Beijing. That turned out to be more problematic. Those negotiations took almost three years. The Conditions of Construction Agreement was signed in November 2003; the main issue that divided the two sides at the time was our insistence that we had to have 100 percent visual contact with our shipping containers that were shipping over materials for construction of the embassy. We originally wanted to use the Moscow model where the Russian government allowed us to designate a forty-foot container or a twenty-foot container as a diplomatic pouch. The Chinese for their own reasons refused to do that but at the end of the day did agree to the principal of constant visual contact by U.S. eyes and so that was allowed and that allowed the agreement to be signed.

After that happened and even as those negotiations were occurring, the foreign buildings office conducted a design competition that was sponsored by the General Services Administration (GSA), it was called the design excellence process. Through that process the firm Skidmore, Owens and Merrill or SOM, based in San Francisco, was selected as the designer. I found that personally rather ironic, because SOM was also the original design firm for the failed Moscow project of the mid-'70s. But, of course, their product, in terms of the housing compound, the school and the marine house still remain today.

So the development of the plans went fairly rapidly. We had our staffing plan laid out, we had our government estimate of how much it would cost to build, we set out the standards based on the conditions of construction, which required a great use of top-secret cleared American workers for again the same reasons that we did in Moscow.

In the midst of all of this in January of 2001, after George Bush was elected president and that was dragged out and the Supreme Court decision that gave him the election in December, Patsy Thomasson as the deputy assistant secretary left on January 20th.

Pat Kennedy appointed me as the acting-deputy assistant secretary for the entire foreign buildings office. I was the senior ranking Foreign Service officer at the time and even though my portfolio was only Beijing until a little bit more other stuff in China, he would give me that responsibility, which I did for about two months. In that capacity I went to Guatemala for a regional administrative conference for the Western hemisphere posts, was involved in some planning issues and construction issues in the form...

Q: With the east wing of the National Gallery, etc., etc., etc.

BOORSTEIN: The Bank of China building in Hong Kong is a very signature piece with cross beams. He wanted to talk to me and would I mind giving him a call and here is his phone number. So I called and got through to him and he picked up the phone. I said, "I am very pleased to talk to you Dr. Pei, what's on your mind?" He said, "Well you know of my love for my adopted land the United States and love of my country of origin China and that the Chinese ambassador in Washington reached out to me as an ideal bridge to help ensure the progress for these embassies in both of our capitals. I am doing this as a friend to both the United States and China. So as a result of that request he asked me to look at the site that the State Department has offered the Chinese." I said, "Well I think that's wonderful." He said, "I have to tell you I don't like the site, it has bad feng shui." Feng shui is the Chinese principle of...feng shui literally means air and water and it is the relationship of the elements, it is the relationship of where do you put the living room, where do you put the bedroom...

Q: How it faces?

BOORSTEIN: Whether your main entrance should be on the north side, the south side and all these consequences and we had gone through great lengths to convince the Chinese that this site was in fact good for them not for any feng shui reasons, but because this was on federal land and outside the purview of the government of the District of Columbia. We didn't want to get the Chinese to have to deal with the DC government and have the DC government be difficult and snub their nose at the State Department as a federal government entity because they wouldn't care about or wouldn't understand the sensitivity of the whole bilateral-political relationship and therefore try to play hardball with the Chinese, because we wanted them to play ball with us in Beijing. So by having them on federal land it came under the jurisdiction of a National Capital Planning Commission, which does have a representative from the DC government but they can't sing the tune, they can't force the decisions alone. So this is all going on in my mind as I. M. Pei is telling me that he doesn't like the site. So here I am, Mike Boorstein, senior Foreign Service officer, telling the most renown living architect in the world today, "I wish you hadn't said that Dr. Pei because we are trying to make that site work and we believe that it is in the best interest of the U.S.-China relationship that the Chinese find that site acceptable. That I'm sure that you with your architectural talent can find a way to make that site work." Then his reaction was, "Oh, do you think that I made a mistake?" I sort of repeated myself and I said, "Not one that can't be rectified." You have to pull out all your diplomatic skills and I was telling one of my architectural colleagues and he said, "Well Mike, you were talking to the equivalent of a rock star in the world of architecture." Here I am talking to the Mick Jagger of architects about this.

Q: This is May 2007. We have been talking about the siting of the new Chinese embassy here in Washington and go ahead.

BOORSTEIN: OK, I want to talk about the time that I was the director of the Beijing program office from that time forward from my recollection of where we picked up on the tape I think we are roughly in 1999-2000. When I finished my year at Harvard I became the director of the Beijing program office which is a new office within the Foreign Buildings Office of the bureau of administration that was created in order to consolidate within one organizational structure, the planning for the new embassy in Beijing and to model the kind of resources that were integrated along the same lines that were used to build the embassy in Moscow because of the very heavy focus on security. So we also were taking advantage of the fact that just like the early days of negotiating with the government of the Soviet Union back in the late '60s early '70s we had a very good opportunity because the Chinese and the U.S. both wanted to build new embassies in their respective capitals. So the whole arrangement where in we could build our embassy and build it in accordance with a program that would maximize our security, we had leverage because the Chinese wanted to build a new embassy in Washington that would be really their signature embassy of any place in the world. So that is what was behind our trying to facilitate the Chinese getting their site in Washington and putting it on federal land.

So, there was a series of negotiating type trips that were organized that were held both in Washington and in Beijing. I was the deputy chief negotiator. The negotiating team on the U.S. side was headed by Terry Wilmer who was the director of real estate for the foreign buildings office and had a lot of experience in negotiating property acquisitions for the State Department and he did a superb job. I had worked with him dating back to 1995 when I was the administrative minister-counselor in Beijing when we were negotiating the gain the ability to actually purchase the equivalent of ownership in China under 70 or 90-year leases to allow us to have residential apartments and things of this nature. In exchange, we were able to grant the Chinese an arrangement they wanted for their UN mission in New York, which was a very diplomatically finessed kind of arrangement because it wasn't a bilateral issue, it was a multilateral issue. The State Department itself was kind of internally conflicted because the people in New York, at the time at the U.S. mission to the United Nations, including Madeline Albright who was the U.S. ambassador to the UN at that time, were very much in favor of helping the Chinese whereas the bilateral side of the house, the China desk, the office of foreign missions etc., were interested in finding a linkage as tenuous as it was with what we were looking for in China. It all worked out by sort of smoke and mirrors and winks and nods and letting the Chinese know that we weren't going to help them in New York unless they helped us in China and ultimately we got what we needed. But over several series of negotiations we were able to work out the arrangement where we acquired our ten-acre site in Beijing and the Chinese were able to get the land that they wanted in the international chancery center, which was on federal land. The short version is we ultimately were able to negotiate the acquisition on a 90-year lease renewal for another 90 years on the property in Beijing and we negotiated it in part by giving back another piece of land that they had allowed us to buy under a previous agreement that was signed I believe in 1995, if not earlier.

So we ended up by... I'd say the deal was signed, the last round of negotiations was in November of 2000 and so we got the site and then through a series of agreements and whatever, the site was cleared. We did our geo-technical studies and then in early 2001 at the end of the Clinton administration the Deputy Assistant Secretary for Foreign Buildings, Patsy Thomasson, who was a political appointee, she had to leave because George Bush was elected. She was very, very sad and upset to leave because she really liked the job. I was named as the interim acting deputy assistant secretary for foreign buildings. I was the senior foreign service officer in the organization at the time and Pat Kennedy, who was the assistant secretary for administration put me in the position on an interim basis, on an acting basis, and I did that for about two months.

When Colin Powell came in his first nominee for appointment, as a new deputy assistant secretary was a retired two-star general from the Army Corps of Engineers, Charles E. Williams. He came in having negotiated an arrangement with the new secretary of state that the foreign buildings office would be removed from the bureau of administration and be made a bureau in and of itself. This was not apparent at the time he came in because he was sworn in as the deputy assistant secretary but within a few weeks it was clear that was the direction we were going in. That had all been agreed upon before he came because during the transition period he was brought in to evaluate for the secretary the whole program of how we managed our overseas construction and maintenance and management of our properties for diplomatic facilities and consular facilities and housing.

So by the second or third week in March he was sworn in and I was no longer the acting deputy assistant secretary and I went back to being the director of the Beijing program office. Well within a couple of weeks, no his first week actually the third or fourth day he held an off-site at Fort Meyer where he was going to unveil his reorganization arrangement for this new bureau. So he unveiled it sort of piece by piece, sort of like peeling off a layer of onion or sort of like a very non-titillating striptease where he would take off a glove and take off his shirt and expose this new organization to his senior people. Sure enough there was an organizational chart and I didn't see the Beijing program office on it. So during a break at the end of the first day, I went up to him and I said, "General Williams," and by the way that is what he wanted to be called. He was not Chuck he was not Mr. Williams, he was General Williams because of his Army career, that was what he identified as and that was what he was known and is still known today because he is still doing the same job. So he smiled and said, "Well, don't worry Mike I have something even better in store for you." Well I sort of dragged it out of him and what he wanted me to do and what he appointed me to do was to be the director of the office of planning and development of the new overseas building bureau.

So this was one of the senior jobs, it was the equivalent because he became the equivalent of an assistant secretary so I basically was elevated to be the equivalent of a deputy assistant secretary of this new office that he had created called planning and development because before under the foreign buildings office there was no discrete office of planning. It was sort of part and parcel of the real estate function and it was not as prominent. So I then became the director of planning and development for the entire world. I inherited a staff of about 85 architects, engineers, space planners and cost specialist, cost engineers. So the first thing that we were asked to do by General Williams was to put together a compendium in accordance with a set of criteria of the most critical projects for new embassy or new consulate construction as well as the most critical rehab renovation projects around the world. It was called a long-range overseas building plan. So this was delivered to Congress, it was used by OMB (Office of Management and Budget), a copy was given to the secretary. We turned this thing around in about three months. This thing has been updated ever since 2001 annually, The Long-Range Overseas Buildings Plan is the official title.

I got involved in the roughly 15-months that I was in this job. I took a team to Paris twice to try to improve some of the space issues there. There was the Talleyrand building, which is very historic; it is where the Marshall Plan was administered. It is right on the street by the Place de la Concorde and deemed to be very vulnerable. The idea was to take our people out and put them elsewhere either within the Chancery or in leased quarters in other parts of the city of Paris that were more secure, to basically move out the consular section and public diplomacy. This was very delicate because there were some representational rooms in there that were being renovated by use of private funds because of their historical nature, there was the idea to build an underground parking garage underneath the backyard, so to speak, I mean the garden of the American ambassador's residence. This was all politically motivated because on Tom Brokaw's NBC Evening News the segment he would have from time to time called the Fleeing of America broadcast about a GAO (General Accounting Office) report that said that there was a sliver of land next to the ambassador's backyard that was being used for parking space for senior officers of the American embassy in Paris at no cost and the GAO had recommended it be sold because it was worth several million dollars. So I was going there, General Williams had gone there initially after this story broke at the request of the secretary to look into it and then I did the follow up visits to look into what it would take, how much it would cost to put in an underground garage and whether we would have to tear up the back third of the ambassador's very beautiful garden and then rebuild it. So we even took along a landscape architect. Long story short that garage was never built but I had two wonderful trips to Paris, and did further the planning process for that.

I continued to be involved in the China program preparations when it came to some of the reciprocal discussions even though the Beijing program office was put lower into the new organization chart as part of the larger office of construction and commission. I went to a East Asia-Pacific administrative conference in Hong Kong, I went to Moscow and Oslo after 9/11. The threats to our chancery in Moscow because after we moved into the new embassy we maintained the old one which was right near the street so we were trying to find a way to protect by enhancing the blast resistance of the original building so I led a team over to look at some of those studies and had a lot of interaction with Ambassador Vershbow and his team. Then I went through Oslo on the way home and looked at property options for building a new embassy in Oslo because even though the embassy in Oslo was designed, I believe by Saarinen, it was on a triangular piece of property in Oslo that was very vulnerable from a security standpoint. So I was looking at a site where the former Fornebu Airport was which was just being abandoned. Ultimately there was another site that was going to be a military barracks. That had been abandoned by the Norwegian military and it's my understanding, this was after I left, that's the site that ultimately was chosen and the embassy is either under construction or is already finished. So I was glad that I played a roll in that particular undertaking.

I went to a European conference of administrative officers in Frankfurt. The objective was to convince a lot of these agencies from other embassies around Europe to consolidate their regional functions in Frankfurt where we were building a new consulate in the former Army hospital there, which before the war or during the war had been a German Army hospital.

ROBIN WHITE
Director, Bilateral Trade, Economic Bureau
Washington, DC (1996-1998)

Ms. White was born and raised in Massachusetts and educated at Georgetown University. After graduation she worked briefly on Capitol Hill before joining the Foreign Service in 1973. A Trained Economist, Ms. White served at a number of foreign posts as Economic and Commercial Officer. In the State Department in Washington, she occupied several senior positions in the trade and economic fields. Ms. White was also a Japan specialist. Ms. White was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2005

Q: Where did you go after Canada?

WHITE: In the summer of 1996, I became the Director of the Bilateral Trade Office in the Economic Bureau. That had two divisions for developed and developing countries. We worked various free trade agreements, including NAFTA, the Generalized System of Preferences for developing countries and other bilateral issues. We had to coordinate closely with the regional bureaus.

The China Most Favored Nation (MFN) issue was a major issue during that time. We worked with USTR and the China desk to get the Chinese government to improve their trade practices but also faced a yearly Congressional vote on the continuation of MFN tariff treatment for China.

Q: What was the problem with China? Was it just because China was communist and had lousy human rights?

WHITE: The reason for the annual Congressional vote was the Jackson-Vanik Act, which had originally been aimed at the Soviet Union. We didn't have specific trade problems like today where China is the new economic giant with a huge trade surplus and an undervalued currency, but there was still a sense that China was a potential threat to the U.S. in economic and security issues. We in EB worked with USTR, Commerce, Treasury and the China desk at the State Department to prepare one pager summaries. These were used as background with various audiences. For example, we wrote on issues as diverse as slave labor in China and connections the Chinese military had with Chinese factories; these were issues raised by labor groups, human rights groups and Congress. There were probably 30 or 40 of these one pagers that set forth the claims or accusations and then laid out the facts. Of course the reality in some cases was fairly grim, but perhaps not as bad as the opponents were making out. We argued that the U.S. and the west would benefit from drawing China further into the global system, that by exposing the Chinese people to Western influences through trade, they would become more aware of democratic trends and seek more of a say in their own government.

PAUL P. BLACKBURN
Chinese Language Training
Washington, DC (1996-1997)

Public Affairs Officer
Beijing (1997-2000)

Paul P. Blackburn was born in Hawaii in 1937. He received his BA from Haverford College in 1960 and an MA from the School for Advanced International Studies in 1962. His postings abroad include Bangkok, Khon Kaen, Udorn, Tokyo and Kuala Lumpur. Mr. Blackburn was interviewed by Charles R. Beecham on November 18, 2002.

Q: What was the biggest programming challenge you faced?

BLACKBURN: There were many difficult ones – relating to the Vietnam War, to our sudden opening to China, to increasing trade frictions, and so on – but the Watergate crisis certainly put us in a strange public affairs situation. The Japanese generally were quite high on Nixon, despite the “Nixon shocks” relating to China and our unpegging the dollar-yen exchange rate. They thought Nixon was a tough, effective Cold War leader. In Tokyo, as elsewhere in Japan and around the world, USIS officers suddenly found themselves in the odd position of explaining why our president’s transgressions were so serious many Americans had determined that he should be thrown out of office. My Japanese contacts, no matter how versed they were in “American studies,” simply could not grasp what was going on. They kept asking me if there wasn’t really some sexual or financial scandal behind it all. I tried to explain the seriousness of Nixon’s alleged participation in the Watergate cover-up, and to use the crisis as a way of informing Japanese about the arcane workings of our political system. Despite our efforts, the Japanese continued to view the cover-up as a very small matter that had been blown way out of proportion by Nixon’s mean-spirited and opportunistic enemies.

Q: Who was in Hong Kong then?

BLACKBURN: The PAO was Jack Friedman. He was one of the extremely rare cases when a State Department officer with no USIA experience was assigned as a PAO. Though Jack was very dedicated, his lack of familiarity with the arcane array of Agency products, programs, regulations, and hidden pots of money made it difficult for him to operate as effectively as he might have. Since consolidation, with considerable interchange between officers in all the cones, the Department has done a much better job of basic public diplomacy training for officers such as Jack Friedman.

Q: Then you went off to China. How did it happen that you were assigned there? I don’t remember that you had any particular background in China.

BLACKBURN: True, I didn’t have much, except for my graduate study, my Legislative Reference Service work, and my support for the 1979 Mondale visit. Getting that assignment was a total surprise. Here is how it happened. One day in the spring of 1995 I noticed in my email take a message in transliterated Thai, of all things. When I had deciphered it, I realized it was from my old friend Harlan Rosacker, Director of USIA Personnel, asking if I would be interested in going to Beijing as PAO. He said I should not mention the communication to anyone except my wife, but to call him if I wanted to discuss the idea.

After consulting with Pek, I called and asked what in the world was going on. Harlan said, “The senior assignments inner circle group – including Director Duffey, Counselor Donna Oglesby, and me – think that you are the Agency’s most-qualified person to be running USIS in China at this point. We have two strong candidates among the China hands, but neither has had your large-post management experience. So how about it?” They wanted me to curtail in Tokyo and start language training that summer, arriving at post in the summer of 1997. I said I’d be delighted to have the job, but there was no way I could leave Tokyo before the end of my tour in 1996. Harlan said in that case I would just have a year of language training and do the best I could with that.

Q: You mean, studying on the side?

BLACKBURN: No, it was to be a full-time year starting in 1996. But not the usual two years. Harlan said they would give me all possible support, but did not expect me to reach the S-3, R-3 proficiency normally required for assignment to the position.

I was told that secrecy was necessary so that everything could be worked out more smoothly. Well, this was extremely awkward for me, because it meant that my boss, East Asia Area Director George Beasley, was not in the loop. George was not just my boss, but also the officer I was to replace in Beijing in 1997. Besides that, he was the former head of the Chinese Language School in Taijung and a strong believer in sending people to China with the strongest possible language skills.

So USIA directly contacted Stapleton Roy, the Ambassador in Beijing, to seek his concurrence in the assignment. Stape had known me since he was DCM in Bangkok, when I was PAO and Frank Scotton, now the Beijing PAO, was CAO. He of course consulted Frank, who was taken aback by the news and immediately contacted George Beasley. This backwards way of getting the word to George was very unfortunate in many respects. Among them was that it put me in a bad light. It looked like I had at best been complicit in a deception and at worst had perhaps instigated the whole thing.

Stape Roy was willing to concur, provided that I came equipped with a 3-3, or close to it, in Chinese. Frank told him that if anyone could reach that level in just a year, he was confident I would at least make a good stab at it. I gather Stape okayed the assignment on the basis of that rather vague assurance.

I fully respected the strong views of George, Stape, Frank, and the other leading China-hand candidates for the job. No wonder they had reservations about me. Here I was coming along out of the blue, at 57, not knowing a word of Chinese. Such an age is definitely not the recommended time in one’s life to start learning that endlessly complex language!

Anyway, I had the assignment and was determined to make the best of it. From 1995 until I left Tokyo in 1996 a Chinese-speaking wife of an officer on the Embassy compound taught me some basics of the language for a couple of hours a week. Once I got to FSI in Washington and was tested, the linguist determined that those introductory lessons were enough to get me placed in that semester’s only available new class above the beginner level. I joined two other officers, Robin Bordie and Doug Kelly, who had previously lived in China, already spoke quite a bit of Chinese, and clearly were way ahead of me.

Robin and Doug showed enormous tolerance of my presence in the class, and I owe them an awful lot. I got a tremendous push – and pull – from being in class with them, while struggling to move along at their pace. That year of Chinese was, by a long way, the hardest of my Foreign Service career.

Q: I can imagine.

BLACKBURN: For those ten months I was totally consumed with trying to learn Chinese.

Q: Does your wife, Pek, speak Chinese?

BLACKBURN: Yes, some. And that helped provide a supportive atmosphere at home. I also got a boost from Pek's aunt, who was with us at the time and speaks pretty fluent Mandarin. She helped me with drills and in other ways.

As a way of keeping sane and not taking myself too seriously – I would say to myself, “Look. When it comes to the Chinese language, you are nothing but a fuzzy-headed, pudgy, and naked old man with a speech impediment. But come on – how bad is that?” My attitude was simply to give the challenge my all-out best effort. And the teachers were terrifically supportive. After a year, thanks to the instructors, to my fellow students, to my own efforts, and to the leg up I got from previous exposure to Thai tones and grammar as well as to Japanese characters, I finished the ten months having reached an S-2+, R-3.

After that I went to Taiwan for ten more weeks of study and further progress at the Taipei Language Institute. Once I got to Beijing and started working in the language, I continued to improve and eventually reached my cherished goal of the S-3, R-3. I thought that was quite an accomplishment, one that paid a kind of debt I owed to George, Frank, and the others who rightly upheld the importance of Chinese language competence for all officers assigned to China.

Once on the ground at the post, I got great satisfaction from using the language whenever I could, with strong encouragement from Chinese I dealt with. I had many chances to speak Chinese in meetings, when making toasts, and in other semi-formal situations. My excellent Chinese language tutor helped me with remarks I made at functions. Some of those presentations were considered so amusing and apt that they were later included in the standard teaching materials used for advanced Chinese language studies by FSOs in Beijing.

Working in China was tremendously stimulating. The energy and excitement of the place were palpable. Though it retains many of the unpleasant characteristics of a totalitarian dictatorship, the country is changing so fast and in so many ways that its future directions are one of the great stories of our age, a fact that accounts for the presence of legions of foreign correspondents there. Every day I would wake up expecting – and unusually finding – some mind-blowing and major change occurring right under my nose.

I had the chance to travel all over China. We had branch posts, known after “consolidation” as the Public Affairs Sections, or PAS, of the local consulates, in Shanghai, Shenyang, Chengdu, and Guangzhou. I got to all of them several times and to many other parts of the country as well.

Q: How big a staff did you have?

BLACKBURN: We had 18 Americans.

Q: You're kidding! I didn't realize we had that many people in China.

BLACKBURN: Yes, it was a substantial number. For example, we had an IO and two AIOs, plus three ACAOs reporting to the CAO, and five officers at the branches.

Q: What did they all do?

BLACKBURN: Well, for example, you needed an ACAO just to run the International Visitor program. China had, and still has, the largest IV program in the world, sending well over 100 people as either IVs or Voluntary Visitors. It was an enormous undertaking. And the Fulbright program had to be handled by an ACAO in our office, because there is no Fulbright binational commission in China. We needed an ACAO to work exclusively on handling a program that in terms of numbers of exchangees almost equaled Japan's, which is run by the Japan-United States Exchange Commission under an Executive Director and more than 20 Japanese employees. And you needed a third ACAO for the speaker program, which involved an array of lectures and seminars throughout China. Then we had a Regional Library Officer, who was responsible for all the Information Resource Centers in China, as well as strengthening our contacts in the Chinese library world.

On the information side, we needed an AIO for press and an AIO for electronic media as well as the Embassy website. In addition, we had a contract American editor of the post-produced Chinese language magazine called Jiaoliu, which we sent out each quarter to a selected mailing list of about 10,000. And we had an Executive Officer, until consolidation, and a computer specialist, both of whom were sorely needed to keep us afloat in that country.

All the branches were one-officer posts, except Shanghai, which had two.

In our front office, I had a deputy, Don Bishop, and an American secretary, first Maxine Jeffries and then Linda Adams.

Q: How about the Chinese staff?

BLACKBURN: There were about 55 Chinese staffers at all our various facilities. They were officially employed by the Diplomatic Services Bureau, or DSB, and could be removed by them at any time. Though this had happened quite frequently in earlier years, by the time I got there we were essentially able to hold on to the ones we wanted to keep. There were pluses and minuses to the fact that they were not Foreign Service Nationals. On the plus side, it was easy to discharge them, an option I had to exercise a couple of times. They were entitled to two week's notice, but in both cases I delivered the news on a Friday afternoon and they chose to depart immediately. On the minus side, we were constrained by DSB regulations that made it difficult to reward the outstanding performers, as the DSB took a handsome cut of all payments.

I was pleasantly surprised at how good and loyal the Chinese staff was, having over the years heard accounts of their inefficiency and unreliability. That was not my experience at all. And we were getting better employees all the time, thanks mainly to having more control over the hiring process. Even some of the old-timers, like Yang Gengqi, in charge of distribution, were first-rate, while new hires like Gu Hong in the Information Resource Center and Lin Chunmei in the Press Section were fully the equal of FSN counterparts in other countries where I served – in terms of dedication, analytical ability, English fluency, and overall professional skills.

Q: How did the Americans you programmed fare under the rigid Chinese system?

BLACKBURN: There were certainly rigidities, but just as with our experience with managing DSB employees, we found more and more flexibility. For example, by the time I arrived we had growing input into what campuses the some 20 American Lecturers brought over each year under the Fulbright program would be assigned to. We even “sanctioned” one leading university by denying it a lecturer because of our unhappiness with the way they had treated an American professor the previous year. The university quickly shaped up, allowing us to resume placements to that institution. Except for rare instances, the American Fulbrighters were extremely enthusiastic about their China experiences – the students they taught, the seminars they arranged or participated in, and their opportunities for travel all over the country. Although it was a constant struggle to recruit Fulbrighters to go to China, once there on the ground, they were amazed and delighted with what they found.

At this time all of us in the Embassy were witnessing, even participating in, major changes in China. To the astonishment of many, for example, my wife was invited to give numerous guest lectures at both the Foreign Affairs College and Peking University, two institutions once very difficult for Embassy officers or their families to visit without special permission. In USIS we pushed the envelope in many ways. For instance, with “rule of law” being a priority of the Chinese leadership, our post, our speakers, and Fulbright Lecturers organized conferences on such topics as American legal education in America and the relationship of law and the media.

Q: Isn't it unusual that you would even have a one-country magazine after USIA shut down so many of them?

BLACKBURN: Yes, it was one of the very few left at any of our posts. The key people we sent it to seemed grateful for it and recipients often commented to us on specific articles. I think it was an important public diplomacy asset – even though we fully recognized that our mailing list of only 10,000, however thoughtfully constructed, was at best reaching only a small cohort of China's present and future leadership.

Q: Was this all a continuation of activities begun before your time as PAO in China?

BLACKBURN: Yes, very much so. I was fortunate that on my watch the public affairs programming environment in China opened up so quickly and widely, while my predecessors missed out on seeing the fruits of their earlier labors. I hope my successors will benefit in similar ways from things I did.

Q: Were you doing this on your own premises – or with cosponsors outside?

BLACKBURN: Most of the speaker presentations were at Chinese think tanks or on university campuses. We would be there officially as their guests. They would carry the water to get the official approvals needed for the event to go forward.

We also used our own facilities. In the early 1990s USIS opened an information resources center at the Jingguang Center, an “offsite” location away from the three heavily-guarded American Embassy compounds. It was in many respects like the American Centers in Japan, but we also ran the Fulbright and IV programs from there. We used a programming space for some presentations, but we didn’t have Japan’s simultaneous translation capability, and we had to limit its use to fewer than 50 attendees. Though it was obviously a USG facility, that didn’t seem to bother our audiences very much, particularly since many of them were considered reliable “foreigner handlers” by their home offices. The advantage to us was that we could invite individuals from many institutions. Most of our programs there were directed at fluent speakers of English, though on occasion we used consecutive interpretation or had Chinese-speaking lecturers.

Sometimes we held WORLDNETs or other events right at the USIS facility, which was located on the same compound as the Ambassador’s residence. Memorable WORLDNETs included interactive dialogues with American officials talking about upcoming APEC meetings, new approaches to environmental regulation, and possible restrictions on Chinese imports because of Asian Longhorned Beetle infestations.

Some of the branches, particularly Chengdu and Shenyang, used regular on-site speaker programs to reach broader communities in which they were located. The Consulate posts also had WORLDNETs and Digital Videoconferences (DVCs) with American speakers. Shanghai became a leader in using the DVC medium.

Q: Tell me more about the beetle problem you just mentioned.

BLACKBURN: A major problem arose suddenly in late 1998 when our Animal and Plant Health Inspection Service – or APHIS – people in the Agriculture Department discovered an infestation of Asian Longhorned Beetles in packing materials used for Chinese exports to the U.S. The Secretary of Agriculture was about to cut off imports from China unless the problem could be solved by some system for certifying that the wood used had been properly treated. Such an action would have affected the bulk of China’s billions of dollars of non-textile exports. The consequences for our bilateral trade as well as for our overall relationship would have been enormous.

I got immediately to work on a public affairs strategy, which we put in place with the help of the APHIS and Agriculture folks. The first task was to get the announcement delayed until some public affairs groundwork could be laid, and to make sure that the official statement both provided a realistic phasing-in period and presented the policy in non-accusatory tones. Our job on the ground was to explain to the local U.S. correspondents as well as the Chinese why this action had to be taken. We set up a one-country WORLDNET with a senior officer in the Department of Agriculture, who carefully explained how the beetles had already destroyed many trees in New York and Chicago, and showed video news clips that backed up his presentation. The Chinese were shocked, and many doubtless suspected us of introducing a non-tariff barrier to reduce the bilateral trade deficit. Besides using WORLDNET and other presentations, we also provided detailed hand-outs – in Chinese as well as English – to explain the problem and how we intended to work with the Chinese to set up an eradication and certification scheme that would keep the beetles out of the packing cases and allow trade to continue as before.

Although we often think that public affairs activities for foreign correspondents don't have much impact on what we do locally, in this case I believe there was a direct connection. Though the Chinese media gave scant attention to our public affairs output, and even refused to accept full-page descriptions of the problem we offered to pay to have placed in Chinese papers, the leadership doubtless was influenced by the long and factually accurate articles written by U.S. journalists we briefed, especially those appearing in the New York Times and the Chicago Tribune. Thanks to our efforts, and the great work of USDA and APHIS officers who gave endless briefings to Chinese exporters and port officials, the new procedures were put in place with so little fuss we all counted it a minor miracle.

Q: It sounds like things had really opened up.

BLACKBURN: That's true. The police state apparatus was still there – as we saw when central authorities told Chinese publications not to accept our Asian Longhorned Beetle placements – but overall bilateral atmospherics were greatly improved by the successful visits of President Jiang Zemin to the U.S. in 1997 and by President Clinton's to China in the summer of 1998.

Q: What was that "POTUS" visit like?

BLACKBURN: I was deeply immersed in that one, which took Clinton to Xian, Beijing, Shanghai, and Guilin. With seven nights on the ground in China, it was the longest peacetime visit by a U.S. President to any single country – exceeded only by President Wilson in Paris after World War One and President Truman in Potsdam at the end of World War Two. The President was accompanied not only by Hillary Rodham Clinton and daughter Chelsea, but also by Mrs. Rodman, five or six cabinet officers, numerous other dignitaries, and a raft of business executives.

I stayed on top of the planning from the beginning, working with the White House advance team as well as with Anne Edwards and her press advance people. That meant traveling several times to each of the cities on the itinerary and participating in the usual endless discussions of hotel space, filing arrangements, and transportation. In the end we brought on legions of volunteer American residents who supplemented our assigned American and Chinese staffers and provided guidance and other services to the White House correspondents. Again, I asked the Agency to send me a "dream team" of my choosing, and succeeded in lining up most of the people I thought would be most useful. One assignment that gave me particular pleasure was to bring George Beasley back, at his request, to help out as the senior USIS officer for the Xian stop.

The trip was notable for the fact that both the opening joint press conference between Jiang Zemin and Clinton at the Great Hall of the People and also the President's speech at Peking University were broadcast live by the Chinese state media. Getting to the point where that could be made to happen involved complex negotiations with the Chinese, who consistently insisted that they would not allow the direct transmission within China, but would permit foreign broadcasters to carry live coverage from those two sites. The White House judged the trip a great success because of those events – even though the President's most critical statements were not repeated in later broadcasts or picked up in any of the Chinese print media. USIS was also directly involved in a live talk radio program that BPAO Tony Sariti suggested for Shanghai and another long interview that was carried nearly in its entirety on CCTV.

The atmosphere surrounding the trip was almost euphoric. The two leaders talked about working toward a “constructive strategic partnership.” It seemed like democracy might flourish in China, and there was even hope for resolving the Tibet issue. The public affairs part of the visit was central to its success, and we all felt somehow that our sleepless nights had been worth it. Of course, in the months that followed, things went south. The democracy movement was squashed, tensions rose in the Taiwan Straits, no progress was made on Tibet, the WTO negotiations ran into serious difficulties, and the government harshly cracked down on Fulan Gong.

Though not normally a fan of Presidential visits, I have to say that the Clinton visit to China in 1998 was certainly one of the highest points of my career. Besides being exciting and fun, it produced a helpful Chinese “party line” that it was okay to be friendly to America, which opened a lot of doors to us. The stress on me had been great, however. For weeks after it was all over, I could not sleep through a full night undisturbed by anxiety dreams.

Q: What were some of the specific consequences of that visit?

BLACKBURN: Now the official word was that “relations between the world's most powerful developed country and the world's largest developing country” were headed in a positive direction. One senior PRC official responsible for media guidance told me they had sent guidance to the Chinese media that only positive stories about the United States were to be reported by correspondents overseas! That guidance had a limited shelf life, of course.

The new mood helped propel what I think of as a continuing “golden age of American Studies.” Just about every educated Chinese, however they might feel about our country, has concluded that his or her future is somehow tied up with the United States. Just as Americans are paying increasing attention to China, they are looking at us – and even more seriously. Their motivations of course are many, but certainly include trying to understand how better to sell to us, to compete with our companies, to latch on to our technology, to fend off our efforts to change them, to learn the secrets of our success in maintaining stability with such a large and diverse population, or simply just how to come to America to build a new life here. The result is that vast numbers of students want to learn more about America.

We strongly supported the American Studies Center at Peking University, the premier academic institution in the country. Just after his speech on that campus, President Clinton presented that Center with a multi-volume special collection on American institutions and ideals. We had worked with the American Studies folks back in USIA to put together the collection, never dreaming that it would be the President making the formal presentation. At one point we had three Fulbright lecturers assigned to Peking University – one teaching American literature, one teaching U.S. constitutional law, and one teaching, among other things, a ground-breaking interdisciplinary survey course in American Studies that attracted more than 200 students. The lectures from the law course, given by Professor Elizabeth Spahn, were put on the university's website in both English and Chinese. We were excited to be doing all this at China's top university – and the likely source of many future leaders.

Another initiative I set in motion was to translate basic American law texts into Chinese. The idea was to create an "American Law Library" that would eventually total 200 volumes. Don Bishop – with help from USIS staffer Yang Gengqi and our Chinese and American legal community advisors – honchoed the program during my time there, our successors Lloyd Neighbors and Rich Stites kept it going, and Don plans to move the project along further when taking over as PAO in the summer of 2003. The opportunity to translate these texts in much demand by the Chinese and get them sold all over the country represented an important breakthrough, one that promotes positive changes at a very fundamental level.

Q: Can you say a little more about the Fulbright program and what you were trying to do with it?

BLACKBURN: Sure. Fulbright has a long history in China. In fact, the China program was the first in the world to get off the ground after World War Two. That Fulbright operation of course went off to Taiwan with Chiang Kai-shek. We had essentially no exchanges with the People's Republic of China for the 30 years from 1949 to 1979, the year we set up the current structure for U.S.-China Fulbright exchanges.

During my tenure I promoted the idea of starting a Fulbright commission in China, a proposal that could never have had a glimmer of support just a few years earlier. Unfortunately, the obstacles were simply too great for us to make appreciable progress. Officials at the Chinese Ministry of Education, our counterparts in managing the program, gave me a respectful hearing and several of them bought my arguments about the advantages that would come to both countries. However, China has never allowed such a semi-autonomous binational body to operate outside the tight control of Chinese officialdom, and I had to content myself with the few short steps we made along the steep path toward actually getting one established. Still, I am sure one day a China Fulbright commission will come into being, as it has in nearly all other countries with which we carry out substantial Fulbright exchanges – even many that operate on a much smaller scale.

One specific measure we took in the direction of broadening the oversight of the Fulbright program was to set up an advisory body made up of Chinese and Americans from outside the governmental chains of command. Its first task was to select senior scholars and other individuals from both countries to participate in a "Distinguished Lecturer Program" to commemorate the 20th anniversary of the Fulbright program in the PRC. Our inaugural meeting in May 1999 was very productive and encouraging. Unfortunately, it took place the afternoon immediately preceding the U.S. accidental bombing of the Chinese embassy in Belgrade, an event that cast a pall over our relations for many months thereafter – and represented the nadir of my Foreign Service career.

Some of our speakers dealt with more provocative topics. For example, Joshua Muravchik spoke all over the country about America's commitment to democracy. He is a conservative intellectual, often published in the Washington Times, and a powerful, though soft-spoken, lecturer. His straight-forward message to audiences was that America will not feel truly secure in this world until all major countries, especially including China, are democracies. It was the kind of message that you would think could not be delivered to audiences in China, but – handled properly – it could be done.

Similarly, we had speakers address the sensitive but important role of religion in American society and politics. We of course had to program them officially under a more anodyne rubric like "U.S. interest group politics." Still, the speakers were not only able to talk on the campuses, but also to meet with officials in China's Bureau of Religious Affairs about this major factor in American life. Such programs helped us provide needed context for much-resented U.S. expressions of concern about religious freedom in China.

Q: And the Chinese didn't complain?

BLACKBURN: No, they didn't really object, provided we did not circumvent procedures egregiously. They were in most cases interested in hearing what our speakers had to say. Sometimes officials in local areas were reluctant to approve a lecture – and everything had to be cleared in advance – but usually a program could be arranged, even at an alternate university venue. On some occasions, a party cadre in the audience would feel it necessary to stand up and give a lengthy rebuttal to points made by our lecturers. That was just part of doing business in China.

Besides the speakers, we devoted a special issue of Jiaoliu magazine to the subject of religion in America.

Q: Please tell me more about what happened to your operation at that point.

BLACKBURN: Essentially, all but the most routine activities came to a complete standstill. For example, on the calendar for later in May was a major symposium on regional security that we had been working on for months. It was to include security specialists from all over Asia participating in the USIA and CINCPAC annual program called the Symposium on East Asian Security, or SEAS. SEAS had never before had a China stop on its program itinerary. Our cosponsors were the prominent military intelligence think tank called the Chinese Institute for Contemporary International Relations, or CICIR, with which we were working closely for the first time. All was in readiness – for the participants and for a distinguished panel of speakers that included current Assistant Secretary for East Asia and the Pacific Jim Kelly. The event was canceled by the Chinese immediately after the bombing. A year later, however, we joined CICIR in pulling off a similar event. That one was a symposium for the annual gathering of SEAS alumni from Japan, Korea, Mongolia, Russia, China, and the U.S. called the Symposium on Northeast Asian Security, or SNEAS, a rotating security “Track II talkfest” I got started while PAO in Tokyo.

Another unprecedented event on our calendar affected by the bombing was a conference set for September on U.S.-China-Russia relations. In that case we were cooperating with the Chinese Institute for International Relations (or CIIS), the major think tank of the Foreign Ministry. They were cautious about working with us, but with terrific help from American scholar Jonathan Adelman, who had strong relations with the CIIS leadership, we had finally reached agreement on a workable concept that promised to meet all their concerns while achieving our goals as well. That conference was also iced – though it, too, was successfully organized the following year.

Q: What were you doing during the crisis itself?

BLACKBURN: On the Saturday morning of the bombing, the Embassy held an Emergency Action Committee meeting at the Embassy as soon as the senior officers could be assembled. The Regional Security Officer told us there would be a demonstration in the afternoon. We were instructed to tell our American staffers and their families to stay in their apartments in the diplomatic compounds, exercise proper security precautions, and await further news of developments.

As the demonstration got under way that afternoon I rode my bike to a street corner by the Embassy where I could watch what was going on – all the while trying to look like a harmless senior-citizen foreigner. The demonstrations were orchestrated by the Chinese authorities, who worked through the Communist Party cadres assigned to the universities. Two busloads from each of the major Beijing universities came, each with similar banners and slogans to chant, and each bearing a petition to be delivered to Embassy authorities. At first the demonstrations were peaceful, and the Embassy sent representatives to the gate to accept petitions. But the protests got more and more hostile as the afternoon progressed, and the marchers started throwing items such as glass bottles, stones, bricks, paint, and eventually Molotov cocktails. In that early period, I felt pretty safe, being out there on the street along with a large contingent of foreign correspondents and other onlookers, just observing developments and ignoring attention directed toward me.

My daughter was due to perform in a play that evening at the International School, so I was keeping an eye on my watch all the while. Not knowing for sure how hot things were getting in other parts of the city, I decided to go into the Chancery, report to Ambassador Sasser, and then head out to the play. I slipped by the demonstrators and wheeled my bike through the front gate of the Chancery so I could tell those inside what I had been observing on the street. I briefed the Ambassador, the Acting DCM – who was Jim Moriarty – the RSO, and others on what I could understand of the demonstrations, what the American correspondents were doing, which universities had so far marched past, and the general atmospherics. Seeing that the Ambassador was on the verge of returning to his residence to be with his wife, I grabbed my bike, exited the door by the front gate, and peddled off through the demonstrators to find a taxi to get me to the school. I later learned that my departure from the Embassy was filmed by CNN and frequently carried as part of their coverage of those days. As it turned out, I had left just ten minutes before the Embassy was completely shut down for the next three days. In that short time, the demonstrations got uglier and the RSO urged the Ambassador to stay in the Chancery, where he could be better protected by the Marine guards, rather than return to his less-protected residence. The Ambassador was understandably unhappy about being separated from his wife, though fortunately the Sasser's adult son and some friends were there with her.

Not surprisingly, when I got to the school I learned that the play had been canceled and all the kids had gone home, which I promptly did myself.

During the first day and a half of the crisis, many of our colleagues, especially those in the Chancery and at some of the Consulates, were in significant danger. Though U.S. Marines protected the Chancery from direct assault, officers on the spot engaged in a full-scale destruction of classified materials that might fall into the hands of demonstrators should the Embassy be overrun. In hindsight, it appears the danger was never that close, but several Chinese did jump the compound wall and had to be confronted by Marines in full battle gear before they were persuaded to jump back over the wall.

Except for Shanghai, with its own Marine guard contingent, the other Consulates were protected only by Chinese security guards. In Chengdu those guards were of virtually no help. Demonstrators climbed the compound wall, set fire to the Consul's residence, and smashed their way through the outer door of the Consulate. They were using a bike rack to try to crash into the interior – while screaming that they were going to exact vengeance – when city security forces finally arrived and routed them. Our colleagues were understandably terrified through this ordeal. They were frantically calling the Embassy and local contacts, and getting increasingly agitated by the slow, almost grudging response of the Chengdu authorities. During this most dangerous period I talked with Min Bookbinder, the wife of the BPAO, who was then standing on the roof of the Consulate staff apartment building. She had an all-too-clear view of the still smoldering Consul's residence and described for me the pervasive fear that the apartments were soon to come under direct attack. Chengdu staffers and their families were traumatized during that period, but fortunately the situation soon stabilized.

I was proud of the performance under such conditions of my USIS colleagues – and their family members. Throughout the Chengdu crisis, BPAO Joe Bookbinder performed courageously, as did those in the other two Consulates most heavily attacked, Salome Hernandez in Guangzhou and Thomas Hodges in Shenyang. Shanghai, where Tony Sariti and Teresa Wilkin served, was never seriously endangered, though the staffers there likewise performed with distinction. Conditions were exceptionally stressful for official Americans wherever they happened to be in China during those first days.

Happily, in the end no Americans anywhere in the country reported suffering any physical harm. One Australian and I think a Canadian – who to no avail protested that they were not Americans! – got roughed up, but only slightly. Canadian lapel buttons were in wide use by U.S. citizens during those days.

Throughout the ordeal we maintained contact with the USIS Chinese employees, especially those with email. Some of the USIS staffers were of great help, for example by translating statements from the White House and the Secretary of State.

The Fulbright professors were another major concern. I was convinced that, with campuses all over the country erupting with anger at the U.S., many of the Fulbrighters and their families would want to be evacuated as soon as possible. But none of them did request to go home. To their great credit, they all hunkered down for those first tense days in their campus apartments, staying in touch by email with Frank Whitaker, the ACAO in charge of the Fulbright program. After a few days their Chinese handlers and colleagues at the universities knocked on their doors and told them it was safe to return to normal activities. The email system Frank had earlier put in place was a great communications tool. We could stay up to date on the Fulbrighters' situations, give them specific advice and information, and keep them apprized of Embassy thinking.

The volume of press queries from international media was almost overwhelming. Information Officer/Spokesman Bill Palmer and his deputy, Tom Cooney, fielded an unrelenting onslaught of questions and requests for on-the-air descriptions of the scene on the ground. I handled some of them, too. People called at all hours of the day and night, both on our regular phones and on the cell-phones they somehow knew we were using.

Throughout the crisis, we were able to maintain the Embassy website. It was regularly under attack by hackers, but our contractors somehow managed to fend them off, or to quickly get it back up whenever it was taken down.

Q: You mean electronically, I assume.

BLACKBURN: Yes, that right. Electronically, not physically. We used the website in many ways besides just communicating with each other. For example, I wrote a statement for the Ambassador, expressing his regret about the mistaken bombing and calling for continued good relations between the two countries. We put that up, with his picture, in both English and Chinese. The Embassy's Gunnery Sergeant, an excellent photographer, took a widely-used picture of the Ambassador looking forlornly out through the broken glass of the front door of the Chancery. The Washington Post and a lot of papers around the country carried it on their front pages. Another he took showed our American flag through an upstairs broken glass window of the Chancery. That one was on the front cover of the Far Eastern Economic Review. We put both these photos, and several others, on our website, and the news organizations picked them up from there. Chinese media handlers I talked with later told me they felt very resentful when they saw what we had done. They said we should have also carried pictures of the devastation and deaths at the Chinese embassy in Belgrade. I explained that that was not our job, but that we had carried numerous statements conveying our regret for the tragic mistake. Our contacts were generally unaware of the damage done to our facilities when the demonstrators got out of control, and were shocked to hear that we had be showered with rocks, paint, Molotov cocktails, and even human feces.

Once the demonstrations had essentially run their course, we brought the USIS Chinese and American staffers back to work. A few of us had gone in earlier to try to clean up some of the dirt and glass shards, but we couldn't fix the broken windows and there were limits to what we could do to make the premises presentable before the main body of the staff returned. It was pretty bad. Everybody, especially the Chinese, was deeply disturbed by what they saw. Though we were not the primary target of the demonstrators, our compound was directly on the main route the demonstrators walked along. The USIS facility lost about 85 broken windows, while perhaps a ton of rocks and other debris had been thrown into our office space. Besides returning to depressingly messed up offices, the Chinese staffers were still suffering the effects of having had their families and friends urge them to get DSB to transfer them to new embassies and away from the contemptible Americans.

On the first day we were all back, I called the staff together and said, “Look. This is what happened, as best I understand it. Many Chinese think we bombed their Belgrade embassy on purpose. It was not done on purpose. It really was a mistake. We understand that Chinese media and party cadres put that unflattering interpretation on the accident, and that all Chinese feel very angry right now. The mistake was a terrible one, and we are deeply sorry it happened. At the same time, you should realize that Americans are insulted and upset with Chinese who accuse us of doing it on purpose because we feel some kind of hatred toward China and the Chinese people. As you can see, some Chinese felt justified in attacking Americans and causing all this damage to our facilities. We in USIS just have to deal with this tense bilateral atmosphere and get on with our work. After all, we are the Chinese and Americans who every day try to strengthen the basic fabric of relations between our two countries. That is our job, so let’s get on with it. But first let’s have some meals together and try to relax a bit.” And that is what we did.

One incident that sticks out in my memory involved Ambassador Sasser, who behaved with courage and dignity throughout the crisis. During those first days some of the press calls got through directly to him – despite our off-site efforts to help him pick and chose which interviews to accept. At least one, but perhaps more, of the journalists who reached him got a quote to the effect that, being stuck in the Chancery as he was, he felt like a “hostage.” His use of that term, plus the wide play given to our website photos, were apparently the motivation for a call from the State Department Spokesman, who – unable to reach me – got through to IO Bill Palmer. The message conveyed was a firm instruction that we were to stop “hyping the drama” of our situation, which was distracting public attention away the priority effort then under way in the former Yugoslavia.

Q: Did U.S.-China relations suffer permanent damage?

BLACKBURN: Sure, it was harmed, but in most respects it bounced back pretty quickly. In the days immediately following the bombing, the Chinese showed that they did not want the emotions of the moment to overwhelm the benefits China gains from the bilateral relationship. From the get-go they were anxious to protect economic relations and tourism. In fact, American tourists were going about their usual activities through the whole episode – and came up against no particular hostility, as far as I know. And the American business community was strongly encouraged by the Chinese authorities not to pull out either people or investment.

They also wanted to keep our educational ties going. Following the Tiananmen Square tragedy in June of 1989, we suspended the Fulbright program. People in both of our countries remembered that, and thought it had been a big mistake. When relations are sour, that is not the time to cancel educational exchange activities; you need them all the more. So both at the Ministry of Education and on the campuses, officials made a special effort to emphasize to the Fulbrighters and other foreign teachers, especially Americans, that their presence was very welcome. Military-to-military contacts stayed on ice for quite a while, but educational ties and media relations soon were much like they had been before the bombing.

After a couple of months, the overall climate of the relationship improved substantially. We sent a delegation to give senior Chinese officials an explanation of how the targeting mistake came to be made. Another delegation worked out what we would pay the Chinese for the loss of life, injuries, and property damage sustained in Belgrade – and the compensation we expected for the damage done to our facilities in Beijing and elsewhere in the country. We finally agreed on a payment of about $30 million to them. And they agreed to give us about $3 million.

Q: Did we have a good explanation of what had happened? I forget the details.

BLACKBURN: We said that it was a faulty map, and using some charts and maps, explained to the Chinese leadership in some detail how things went wrong. Those charts and maps have never been made available to the American public! I felt, and still feel, that we did a very poor job of providing a satisfactory public explanation. The Chinese kept insisting that we had done it on purpose, and we had no hard documentation to use in rebutting them. Unfortunately, bureaucratic butt-protecting kept us from admitting our mistakes – except through leaked information that appeared in the New York Times. That put new Ambassador Joseph Prueher and the rest of us in the very odd position of referring our Chinese interlocutors to a newspaper article, rather than giving them an official document – or, better yet, a White Paper – that laid it all out.

With nothing to bring the issue to closure, the bombing has entered the long list of humiliations China feels it has suffered at the hands of anti-Chinese foreigners over the last two centuries. I thought it was a great failure of our public diplomacy, but I was unable to do anything about it – either when there or after I got back to Washington.

Q: Did the consolidation of USIA and State take place while you were there? What was the time frame?

BLACKBURN: The merger took place on October 1, 1999, nearly five months after the Belgrade bombing, so I was in China for nearly a year of the new organizational arrangement.

Q: Was the same thing happening in all countries?

BLACKBURN: Yes, I believe so. It was the new reality, and the arguments we were all hearing from our DCMs had a lot of logic to them. I tried to present an objective and persuasive case outlining the kinds of compromises all parties to the new arrangement should be prepared to make. Citing the legislating mandating that USIA's integration should not entail any diminution in public diplomacy quantity or quality, I stressed that the State Department had not simply acquired new personnel and new resources to manage, it had also taken on unfamiliar responsibilities carrying unique requirements. And to do that job, we would need understanding and full support from the rest of the Embassy, especially the Admin Section.

I argued that PAS should retain a deputy to help run what was still a complex nationwide program. I prepared a lengthy memo for McCahill detailing the ways that my responsibilities differed from those of the heads of other Embassy sections. I showed, for example, that the job of the Political Minister Counselor, while undoubtedly exceedingly demanding, involved relatively few management tasks. Understandably, any effort to persuade a political officer DCM that the PAO's position entailed more responsibility and administrative skill than that of the Political Minister-Counselor was unlikely to carry the day. Though McCahill and his successors as DCM, Gene Martin and Mike Marine, were not persuaded by my arguments regarding either the PAO grade level or the need for a deputy, the Washington management arm instructed all missions not to take precipitate action until a comparative job analysis could be conducted. The analysis looked at persons supervised, budgets managed, and other quantitative factors. This enlightened approach was very helpful to our morale. The survey, completed after I had departed Beijing, found that most PAO jobs, including the one in China, did not need to be down-graded, even if they were higher than other major sections of the Embassy.

Q: That protected you a little bit. Is that what you are saying?

BLACKBURN: Basically we agreed, in Beijing and elsewhere, to wait a year or two before instituting major changes. That gave our post breathing room to make the transition to a new team, Lloyd Neighbors and Rich Stites in our case, without everyone going through the trauma of a major shakeup.

The General Services Officer (GSO), the Budget and Fiscal Officer, and other key support personnel tried to be helpful, but they were essentially ignorant, as they admitted, of how we operated, especially in the area of contracts. Gradually they appreciated our special needs – for example, that periodicals for our Information Resource Center needed to be ordered on a different schedule and according to different procedures than staff-use periodicals for other sections of the Embassy.

In the case of the USIS vehicles, initially we were allowed to keep the four we had, but soon they were added to a central pool. At first GSO said we should ask for drivers when we needed them. After a short time, however, they realized that we had frequent need for drivers who understood our requirement to make deliveries all over the city, to ferry our speakers around to unusual destinations, and so forth. So we ended up with a modified system whereby drivers were more or less permanently on duty at our two locations – a kind of satellite motor pool, if you will.

In procurement, too, there was a learning process we had to suffer through. The initial impulse was to treat PAS no better than any other section. However, we had so much trouble getting the flexible and speedy support we needed for our routine work – and kicked up such a fuss – that, before too many months had passed, new procedures gave us quick processing when necessary, plus authority to make our own small to medium purchases.

Making these adjustments was aided by the fact that PAS activities in China and elsewhere were given a separate allotment that was funded from the earmark for public diplomacy Congress put into – and continues to insist on – in the State Department budget at the time of consolidation.

Q: Just a minute. Before you go any further – isn't there a Congressional mandate for democracy programs to be run out of Washington, for example through the National Endowment for Democracy, or NED, and other institutions connected to the two major parties? What connection is there with them?

BLACKBURN: There is of course some connection. NED, the Asia Foundation, Ford Foundation, and other institutions have long promoted human rights in China and other countries. There is also money floating around both the State Department, in different offices and intended for the same purpose. Some of the funding in Washington goes to NED and its affiliates, with the expectation that they will find the appropriate U.S. and foreign organizations to administer programs on the ground. But our embassy-based democracy commissions were to hand out small amounts, generally less than $10,000, to local organizations that could really use such funding.

His overseas posts include Tokyo (as spouse), New Delhi, Hong Kong, Guangzhou and Beijing, where he served twice, once as Deputy Chief of Mission. Mr. Goldberg was interviewed by David Reuther in 2011.*

GOLDBERG: Well I knew I wanted to go back or I wanted to go to China. Seems I say that a lot. I went and lobbied very hard for a job that just opened up out there as the chief of the external economic unit in Beijing. The only other candidate was Bob Tansey. There was a disagreement between Washington and Beijing over who should get the job. Bob was in Beijing already and some people out there thought he should have the job. I received desk support and ended up being paneled into the position. It was an interesting three years to say the least, because almost everything I did was related to China's succession to the World Trade Organization or WTO.

Q: Can you give us a sense of what that office was like when you got out to the Embassy? Now they are still in Er ban?

GOLDBERG: San-ban was the chancellery where I worked. The Embassy does not move to new offices until 8-8-2008 [August 8, 2008]. When I arrived, Jack Gosnell was the econ counselor. But he had burned a lot of bridges and was not long for the job. He remained econ counselor in name only for a period of months before he was replaced by Bob Ludan, who was then head of the internal section and for whom I worked for two and a half years. Deputy Chief of Mission was Bill McCahill, an econ officer who had formed a pretty good relationship with Jim Sasser before being designated in that position. Bill became a very good friend. The econ section was relatively small at that time all things considered. I initially had three people reporting to me; by the time I left I had five. The internal section increased by one or two people as well. So let's say by the time I left in 1999 there were ten people. Today there are two dozen. Bob Ludan became the economic counselor and I was the nominal deputy. Bob Tansey headed up the internal section for a while before Steve Wickman – later a CG in Shenyang – replaced him.

Q: Now, the Ambassador, Jim Sasser, was a non-career ambassador. What were the atmospherics like?

GOLDBERG: Well he was terrific. Early on, after doing some remarks for him at an airport ceremony during which the remains of American servicemen recovered in Yunnan were being repatriated I became his speechwriter. So my relationship with him was quite different than that of other people in the mission. He was a politician – like Jon Huntsman for whom I also worked – and treated people at the mission like constituents. He wanted them to know he appreciated their work, and he was working hard for them. As a result, he got a lot of buy-in for his objectives and he had a number of officers – like me, I suppose – who were quite loyal to him. Sasser was far more interested in the politics of China than in economic policy. But overall, we were well served, given his contacts at the White House. He was very close to Al Gore. His wife had known Gore's wife for a long time, Sasser had in fact driven Gore's father around on his losing campaign to be returned to the Senate. He got to know Gore even more when they were both Senators from Tennessee. He knew both Clintons as well, so his entrée in Washington was unbeatable in all respects. He could call Washington and people would answer his calls.

He once said the best piece of advice he ever got was from Stape Roy, his immediate predecessor, who told him, "You want to go back to Washington to touch base at least three times a year." Well Sasser went back probably four times a year to touch base. I accompanied him a couple of times on those trips, ostensibly as speechwriter. At that point, my wife was still working, and she was in the States so on trips back, I was able to spend some time with my family. Of course the trips were a fair amount of work because we were constantly shaping the presentations that he made. I also accompanied him to most of his meetings, though when he went to the White House to see the Vice President, I waited outside by the gate.

All-in-all, we were very busy in this very large mission. I spent most of my time working with USTR, which seemed to come out every other week, meeting them at the airport, taking notes or doing whatever had to be done. Occasionally they let us in as they brainstormed issues; Bill McCahill was particularly well responded. Working on the accession protocol to the WTO carried through the whole three years that I was there.

Q: What were some of the issues that were involved in that?

GOLDBERG: You name it. It was across the board - tariffs, the regulatory environment, the lack of transparency, negative lists, when certain things were going to be allowed, what China's developing country status actually meant., the time frame for phasing in obligations. These were the nitty gritty issues under discussion. It was basically working out the "devil is in the details" aspects. It really wasn't until the Bush II administration when Bob Zoellick was USTR and Jeff Bader was the Assistant U.S. Trade Representative handling China issues that they made the political decision that enough was enough. We had gotten 98% of what we needed. The remaining 2% was not going to happen. Some companies and sectors were going to be disadvantaged, but maybe we could remedy that in the next round of serious negotiations - which of course are essentially moribund. You ought to talk with Jeff about all this.

We made a lot of progress in the three years I was in Beijing, but we were never really quite there. A host of Assistant and Deputy Assistant USTRs before Jeff kept trying - Lee Sands, Deborah Lehr, Bob Cassidy, Christina Lund, Don Phillips.

Q: I can imagine your experienced domestic lobbying.

GOLDBERG: Absolutely. No trade agreement takes place in the absence of the squeaky of business and industry.

Q: While you were in Beijing, in July 1997, Hong Kong reverts to China. How was that seen or did it impact on your work.

GOLDBERG: It didn't impact what I was doing. We were interested, of course, but the Hong Kong and Macao office rarely saw anybody from the embassy. Our ConGen Hong Kong people would come to Beijing once a year to meet with their counterparts; sometimes their counterparts were not prepared to meet with them. American businesses which still had their home offices in Hong Kong would come up and chat with us about reversion and about doing business issues in the mainland. But increasingly, on those matters, the Amchams in Beijing, Shanghai, and Guangzhou were able to speak for themselves about their business-related interests. I'd also point out that much of the lobbying on WTO related issues came from business home offices in the U.S. So USTR and the White House were listening to U.S.-based chief executives in terms of what they needed and then calling upon them later to support and sell this agreement to the Congress.

Q: One of the events that marked the re-normalization of the relationship after Tiananmen Square when that Jiang Zemin visited the United States in October 1997, and Ambassador Sasser accompanied him on that trip.

GOLDBERG: Well he accompanied him throughout the visit. I don't know if he flew on a Chinese plane or not. I know Sandy Randt did years later on Chinese leader state visits and Huntsman accompanied Hu Jintao on his plane in January 2011. When we had a Presidential visit, we ceded a seat or two on our planes to the Chinese - not Air Force One, but the follow on plane. On the Jiang visit - Sasser went back, thought it went very well, and he thought he had a good overall relationship with Jiang.

But Sasser like every other ambassador was frustrated by the asymmetric access he had versus what the Chinese ambassadors in the U.S. have. Chinese ambassadors in the U.S. see secretaries and White House officials, and members of Congress, even get presidential drop-bys and meetings when seeing the National Security Council advisor. U.S. ambassadors have long been relegated to dealing with senior vice-ministerial level people or the vice minister in charge of American affairs. John Huntsman, for example would see Vice Minister He Yafei or Vice Minister Cui Tiankai; when I was Chargé, I'd more than likely just see the Director General for the Americas Zheng Zeguang. Sasser used to chafe at that. But he had a pretty good relationship with Jiang, who seemed to like Americans.

Q: How did he characterize the Jiang visit when he got back?

GOLDBERG: Oh very successful. But these kinds of visits are always successful – even before they occur – unless something out of the ordinary happens. They are so well scripted. Jiang Zemin staked part of his legacy on building up a strong relationship with the United States. Jiang wanted to be perceived as someone with whom the United States could work. We did think Jiang had a geostrategic approach.

Q: About this time the Chinese dissident Wei Jiansheng was released. Did that impact on anything?

GOLDBERG: Well, just in the sense the Chinese were happy to get rid of him and we were happy to check him off as a specific subject of concern. Human rights remained a pretty important issue.

Q: Now you are saying McCahill was your DCM. What was he like to work with?

GOLDBERG: Well for me, very supportive. Bill really studied up on WTO issues, and got to know Charlene Barshefsky quite well. She was at that time the Trade Representative, having succeeded Mickey Kantor. He worked well with Bob Cassidy, the Assistant U.S. Trade Representative and was viewed as a team member – more so than those of us who were on point, so to speak. Bill had a back channel to one of Jiang's most senior advisors, Zeng Qinghong, who eventually became vice president during the first five years of Hu Jintao's presidency. So if there issues that needed some political oversight, Bill had this back channel.

Q: By this time America's diplomatic footprint in China is fairly extensive. Did you get a chance to visit any of the other consulates?

GOLDBERG: I traveled a bit, not that much. Talking about America's footprint, one of the most important things that happened while I was in Beijing was the inspection of China posts in 1998 by Dick Hecklinger and his OIG [Office of Inspector General] team. The report that Ambassador Hecklinger did led to the "China 2000 ramp up" in resources – it was a recognition that we needed to think critically about putting more people, more money, better technology in China so that we could significantly enhance our capabilities there. I had an opportunity to spend a couple of hours with Hecklinger. The report was, as I say, key to the growth of the mission. Of course, it was a time when the State Department was growing again, resource-wise. My sense is that the mission today has grown beyond its needs – I know some will dispute that. But it was half or a third the size in the late 90s than it is today and we were never at a loss for work, whether it was preparing for groups coming out, supporting groups that were there, or doing the follow up work after the delegations had left. And then, on top of that, we were doing reporting, trying to provide some sense of next step strategic thinking about the relationship and whither China. That was particularly true on the WTO side. We had a good team, people who understood the issues quite well and who were willing to work hard. I was lucky. I had Chris Beede who was the Mission interface on WTO issues with USTR. Afterward, Robin Bordie was in that role. Robin was outstanding. We also threw in anyone else who seemed to have time on his/her hands to work the issues.

Q: On the bread and butter issues, who were your contacts? Who were you dealing with on the Chinese side?

GOLDBERG: My contacts were almost all government because these were national level trade policy issues. I didn't have the kinds of contacts with think tankers that would have been helpful but some of the officers working for me did. I saw a lot of people at what was then still MOFTEC, the Ministry of Foreign Trade and Economic Cooperation, which morphed into the Ministry of Commerce years later. Also I saw a lot of people at the Ministry handling telecommunications – today's Industry and Information Technology Ministry. We also worked with the U.S. Treasury Department to make contacts with the People's Bank of China on tax issues and subsidies for state owned enterprises. Financial services didn't occupy a terribly large component of our WTO work. We coordinated closely within the mission with the Foreign Agriculture Service and outside with the U.S. Department of Agriculture since market access for U.S. agriculture was a significant issue in WTO accession. Not as significant as we would have liked it to be but still significant. One of the criticisms of my work at that time was that I spent more time doing speeches and presentations for Sasser than I did on the issues I had been assigned to go out and do. Probably true.

Q: Talking about handling visitors; in June 1998, the President visits China.

GOLDBERG: Yeah, and I had nothing to do with that visit. Absolutely nothing.

Q: How could you not?

GOLDBERG: Well Charlene Barshefsky was out there ten days in advance of the President's arrival and I was the control officer for Barshefsky. The Chinese were interested in having a WTO agreement ready to sign when the President got there. The last meeting I attended with Charlene was at MOFTEC about an hour before the President's arrival. She was sitting across the table from Shi Guangsheng, the MOFTEC Minister; sitting next to Shi was Long Yongtu - their senior WTO negotiator who was looking at his feet the entire time because he was embarrassed about Shi's pleading to get Charlene to sign a statement of principles. To his right was Yi Xiaozhun, who became a vice minister at the Ministry of Commerce and is today China's WTO Ambassador in Geneva. So there is Shi trying to get Charlene to sign this two page MOU [Memorandum of Understanding] and Charlene saying, "No. Can't do it. Can't sell it. The President won't buy it." We got up and left and stood outside the Ministry and watched the presidential motorcade go down Jianguo menwai toward the Diaoyutai state guest house where the President was staying. So when I say I had nothing to do with the President in his visit, I literally had nothing to do except attend the President's meet-and-greet at the embassy before he left. Just my luck - by the time the President got to where I was on the rope line, his aides whisked him away.

Q: Why couldn't we sign off at that time? What were the issues?

GOLDBERG: A memorandum of understanding? The issue was that we had no agreement that spelled out chapter and verse what China's obligations were.

Q: So they were looking for an overarching something and we were looking for the details.

GOLDBERG: Yes that is where the devil is in the details. Again as I say it doesn't come until Zoellick and Bader decide enough's enough and we can conclude a deal.

Q: Well, actually isn't the next act in the WTO story Premier Zhu Rongji's visit to Washington in April of 1999.

GOLDBERG: He thought he was going to sign an agreement too and I think at one point the administration was prepared to sign. But then White House advisors kept at Clinton and told him we didn't have enough to justify signing. Nobody wanted to sign a bad agreement just to announce it at a high level meeting, and it would not have been as good an agreement as the one we eventually concluded. A lot of people think that Zhu Rongji was using the WTO as a way of making China's domestic industries and companies, particularly the state owned enterprises, more competitive. He wanted them to operate in a global business environment. I think there is a lot to that. Sasser said that Zhu was pretty disappointed that Clinton had backed off. It probably had a bit of impact on him politically, but I don't think it ever showed in his relations with the U.S. One thing - if an agreement is not signed before a visit of this sort, it's unlikely to be signed during it. But the Chinese really pressed during the visit, and it just didn't happen.

Q: One of the things the academics pick up at this time is the USTR publishes a list of what are considered Chinese concessions, and that publicity damaged Zhu's standing at home.

GOLDBERG: Undoubtedly, but I think the biggest damage was the failure to bring this to a close.

Q: Actually, finally it did come to fruition. When was that?

GOLDBERG: Well not until the next administration. So we are looking at the Zoellick-Bader collaboration, and it came very quickly. The sense was we had enough to sell the agreement and it was time to cease the bickering. Both sides were moderately satisfied with the agreement, though the Chinese maintain they negotiated under duress and at a disadvantage and the final outcome was not good for them. But ten years on, if you look at the outcomes, I think from China's perspective it has been successful, more so than for us. And the tenth anniversary commemorations on the agreement have reached the same conclusion.

Q: One of the events that came up during the time you were in Beijing was the May 1999 bombing of the Chinese embassy in Belgrade. That must have been interesting.

GOLDBERG: Well it was interesting; interesting is sort of an understatement. There was disbelief in the Mission that this had happened. You know the famous story - we hit what we wanted to hit but it wasn't what we thought it was. The defense attaché received a call in the early hours after the bombing and was asked whether the Chinese had an Embassy in Belgrade and where it was located. The mission hunkered down. The first day, demonstrations around the embassy were reasonably peaceful. We closed up shop and were told to stay at home. You could always get into the embassy by jumping over the wall between the Irish and American embassies and you could exit the same way. We had very good relations with the Irish.

But the demonstrations turned violent the evening of the second day after CCTV coverage of the bodies of the dead Chinese diplomats being flown home and images of bloody clothing. That evening, the Chinese government bussed in some hooligans likely from the Public Security Bureau or the Ministry of State Security, and they threw rocks and plastic liter bottles filled with urine at the mission. They busted almost every window in the mission, but they never broke one of our antiquated Wangs [Ed: and early word processing computer]. It didn't make any sense. Such extraordinary aim. When we finally got back in the mission, clean up didn't take that long and we were up and running pretty quickly.

While the demonstrations were going on, we were supposed to stay inside our apartments near the Embassy, but in fact, they were in such a limited area – with Chinese students who were bussed in to march around for a couple of hours or so – that we didn't feel any inhibition about sneaking out the front of side entrance and going over to Starbucks for a cup of coffee. Some officers met contacts there who provided insights about what was happening elsewhere in the city.

My last meeting in Beijing as note taker was when Ambassador Tom Pickering came out to explain what happened. The story he told was plausible and the narrative held together but it was still totally unbelievable and fantastic from the Chinese perspective. He acknowledged we hit what we wanted to hit. We thought it was something other than it actually was. Yang Jiechi was then a vice foreign minister and he sat across the table from Pickering. People have asked me if I ever saw Yang very angry and emotional. Well yeah I have. This was a rather magnificent performance. Because it was clear he wasn't paying any attention to what Pickering was saying but was rehearsing his reaction would be. It was truly over the top. I wasn't very good at taking notes that day because I was busy watching his performance. The only other performer I ever saw to top that was Madame Wu Yi who was Shi Guangsheng's predecessor at MOFTEC and who subsequently became a vice premier and China's most senior woman for a decade. She was a consummate actress. But whether Yang was acting or had really lost control was unclear – it was just interesting to watch from a performance point of view. So when I was actually doing the cable of the meeting, and we had at that point the 24-hour rule to get it done and back to DC, I had to ask others at the meeting to help me recreate what had happened.

Q: I think Pickering was there on June 17, or something like that.

GOLDBERG: And I left at the end of that month.

Q: Ambassador Sasser leaves about the same time doesn't he?

GOLDBERG: Yes he does. I was actually on a trip when Sasser left. We went out to the northwest and did the Silk Route tour at that time. Anyway, as I say I very much enjoyed working for him; he had superb political skills and really knew how to work the Washington system. I think he did a good job out there.

Q: Is there anything you think you want to add to what your duties were at that time?

GOLDBERG: No, not really. I was very fortunate to be working for Jim Sasser and having an opportunity to help him out with his speeches and do a bit of travel with him, working on the WTO account. The Embassy was a great place to work and I made a lot of very good friends – though few among the Chinese we met. I learned an awful lot about mentoring people and have been fortunate over the last decade or so to have continuing associations with some extremely talented people.

Q: Let me ask this. You served in Hong Kong before, but this was your first inside China assignment. Did you have some assumptions about China or about your contact work that didn't turn out? I mean comparing how China looked at the start of your tour with how China looked at the end of your tour, what did you see changed perhaps in your own mind but more certainly on the ground?

GOLDBERG: Well I arrived there about four or five months after the firing of missiles in the Taiwan Strait – that was the Chinese reaction to our providing a visa to Taiwan President Lee Teng-hui to speak at Cornell in June 1995. And I left in July 1999 after the Belgrade Embassy bombing. So two extremely difficult events bookended three years of a very positive relationship, one that was on an upward trajectory until Belgrade. Belgrade alone didn't sour the ties – there were concerns about China's military modernization program, differences over a wide range of global issues – and this will sound familiar – Iran and North Korea. We had concerns about trade policy. I'd say there a darkening of ties in 1999, but Belgrade put a period to the positive and gave us pause so we could reevaluate where we were. I don't think we really recovered and started having a productive – or more productive – conversation until after September 11 (2001).

Q: When you were in Beijing and you are interacting with your official Chinese contacts in your various ministries, did they seem increasingly sophisticated in their approach to some of the issues that came up?

GOLDBERG: Well the main issue that I dealt with, the WTO, the standard line was that the level of expertise was extremely thin, in other words, a mile wide and less than an inch deep in terms of sophistication about the issues. During the period, the Chinese were taking advantage more of the window on the world they had and they were learning a great deal. I would add that over the years we've seen an increased sophistication and confidence on the part of their diplomats.

Q: Your next assignment then is back to the China Desk and this is going to be the start of a long policy association with China. Let me start out by asking how did you get that next job?

GOLDBERG: Well, I was up for reassignment in the summer of 1999. Steve Schlaikjer who was then the China desk director traveled to China for meetings in the fall of 1998 and we talked about my coming on board as the econ deputy. We had been in language class together ten years before, although Steve was studying at a much higher level than I was. This was the best option that was available to me at the time.

Q: Now what was that job as deputy director for economic affairs? How did it fit in the office? There is an office director...

GOLDBERG: We were really firing on all cylinders insofar as economic issues were concerned. Although Steve was extremely well versed on the issues, Jim Keith who was the deputy for political affairs and personnel – a job I held later - wasn't. So a lot of interesting issues fell to me. I had a lot of interaction on economic issues that affected China within as well as without the department. One really nice thing as a deputy – and I had to acknowledge this really was kind a second deputy job, not as important as the one Jim had – was that I had an awful lot of autonomy. This was the time when we were working to extend to China PNTR or permanent normal trade relations.

Q: Let's go back to the organization of the China Desk. You have a director, Schlaikjer. You have a deputy...

GOLDBERG: Deputy for political and personnel affairs.

Q: OK, so there is one director and two deputies which are divided between political and econ functions.

GOLDBERG: The political deputy often does a lot of the administrative and all of the personnel stuff. In decisions with regard to economic officers, of course, the political/personnel deputy consulted with the economic deputy. But in terms of the efforts at recruitment, most of the responsibilities fell on the political/personnel deputy.

Q: How many people were working with you on the econ side?

GOLDBERG: On the econ side I had three total. Just two actually working econ issues, because the third was the desk officer for Mongolia. I had one person working on what was the equivalent of the ESTH, Environment, Science, Technology, and Health portfolio, and one person who was handling a variety of macro, micro, and trade issues.

Q: Give me understand the organization of the EAP front office. The assistant secretary at this time was Stan Roth?

GOLDBERG: Yes.

Q: Who was the deputy assistant secretary that handled China affairs? Was that Darryl Johnson or Ralph Boyce, I have forgotten?

GOLDBERG: Skip was doing Southeast Asia; we reported through Darryl. He was a classic political officer – I have a great deal of respect for him but he wasn't overly interested in economic issues. Nor was Roth. So I was EAP's voice coordinating China economic issues with E [Office of the Under-Secretary for Economic, Business and Agricultural Affairs] and EB [Bureau of Economic and Business Affairs].

Q: Who would you have worked with from those offices?

GOLDBERG: Well internally almost any office EB, the economic bureau, but mostly the trade office. At that time Bill Crane was either the director or deputy director for trade policy. We did stuff with Wes Scholtz on investment-related issues. We didn't do terribly much with the monetary and finance people in large part because financial markets weren't as key an issue as they would become ten years later. We worked closely with the Under Secretary for Economic Affairs office Al Larson. Over the course of two years I got to know Al quite well, and worked pretty closely with him, again mostly on WTO and PNTR but on some IPR [Intellectual Property Rights] and other trade issues.

Q: Right, let's get to that in a minute. The observation I would like to make is that as an officer on the desk, a senior economic officer at that, what you have just described is the web of contacts certainly in the building that you worked with on a normal basis to get the job done.

GOLDBERG: And outside the building as well. We spent an awful lot of time at meetings over at USTR. I also sat in on a few White House meetings convened by the NEC to discuss about how we could move forward on our relationship with China.

Q: Now set the stage for me on the permanent trade relations issues. China had to have an annual renewal.

GOLDBERG: It was once called Most Favored Nation status. But we changed the name since every nation except China and a few others were favored. In order to accede to the WTO and have the benefits of the multilateral accession protocol, China needed PNTR – and they had to extend that to us as well. Absent this mutual provision, a country would not enjoy the benefits of the accession - this is the problem we face with Russia

Q: Now one of the complicating problems if I recall on the political side of this issue is Tiananmen Square and congressional and lobby criticism of that to block or forestall the issue of China's accession to WTO.

GOLDBERG: Jackson-Vanik Amendment [1974] was not just simply anti-Soviet Union-related. It was also applied to all countries deemed human rights violators. It had to be waived or terminated in order to extend the WTO protocol to China. And the key here was the Congress. We spent a lot of time in meetings with Congressional staff. We also were doing papers for as many as two senior level meetings a week at the White House. Many of them were attended by Madeline Albright, the Secretary of State. Eventually they were so frequent, that she decided to delegate attendance to Al Larson in his capacity as Under Secretary for Economic Affairs. But Albright retained a whip hand by appointing her counselor Wendy Sherman to be head of a State Department supra working group. But Al was our public persona in the interagency process. There was a lot of give and take in our internal meetings. The president himself was very much involved in lobbying legislators and we were writing points for him as well. It was a very constant drumbeat of activity – good thing we had super copy on our computers' word perfect package. I should note that we also worked very closely with H [Bureau of Congressional Relations] at that time. Congressional relations provided strategies that might appeal to individual legislators.

Q: Did you yourself get up on the Hill and brief people.

GOLDBERG: I talked to staffers. At that point I did not talk to congressmen directly.

Q: Were those discussions political or economic?

GOLDBERG: I would say that at this point it was largely a political discussion more than economic. We focused on job creation what the benefits for American workers and farmers, American service providers and consumers. We had data on all of that which proved to have been exaggerated. A key feature of our argument was that China's accession to the WTO was going to change China positively so that it would operate in a rules based environment on trade issues. We didn't say that some of our worst trade tensions are with those countries with which we are the closest, like Canada and Europe; countries are perfectly willing to operate in a rules based environment and break the rules. They are prepared to have WTO cases brought against them and if found in violation of the WTO agreement pay a fine which is really less than the cost of doing business.

Q: Would you be able to characterize by party or leanings those who seem to be easily persuaded by these issues and those who were quite resistant on the hill?

GOLDBERG: It is easy to sort of say Democrats went this way; Republicans went that way. But it wasn't that simple. My recollection is that we had an easier time with Republican members on the Hill than with Democrats who were wringing their hands over human rights issues and were concerned that granting PNTR meant they would lose leverage by threatening annually to penalize the Chinese for their various sins. One of the ways around that was to use the money saved by sun-setting a commission and putting it in to two other commissions that had a China focus. This was the cost of getting Senator Byrd's vote. One of these was the Congressional Executive Commission on China, which was composed of members of Congress and members from the administration; the other was the Economic and Security Review Commission on China, a group of commissioners appointed by members of Congress. With regard to the latter, there were an equal number of Republicans and Democrats, with the chairmanship of that commission as well as the deputy chairmanship being rotated each year or two between the two parties. The Commissions put out a fair number of reports each year and the Chinese always find something to criticize in them. I've always thought it was a pretty good gig to sit on one of these Commissions and ride whatever hobbyhorse you were on in to the sunset.

Q: So that was sort of the price for moving the process along.

GOLDBERG: Yes, and as I say they are still around ten years later.

Q: Now you were on the desk from 1999 to 2001. A number of things happened in the world at that time, but the first thing I want to look at is you have a new administration come in in 2001. Now normally the desks in Washington do transition work in the November, December period before the inauguration. Here you have some very important issues with China, so I would assume this transition business quite occupies the desk.

GOLDBERG: It does, but you will recall the administration coming in was very critical of the Clinton administration's policy towards China. It brought in people at the Deputy level like Rich Armitage who said it was time to rebalance America's East Asia policy and refocus on Japan. Our colleagues on the Japan desk were under the gun to come up with creative ways we could use to re-establish that relationship. It didn't take long for China to hit the headline, particularly in February, President Bush "mis-speaking" himself – as his press spokesperson said - with respect to defending our ally on Taiwan. Taiwan was not an ally and that led the Chinese in Beijing to conclude that something different was in the offering in terms of the bilateral relationship. Then of course there was the EP-3.

To get back to your question, the transition team – and I think this is true of all transition teams – wanted to find ways to distinguish the incoming Bush administration from the Clinton era and to come up with a new Asia Pacific policy. It's always back to the future in these situations rather than forward and let's build on what we have already. This transition was complicated, as you recall, by an election that was unprecedented in American history. You didn't have the final tally on who would be the next president until mid-December.

Q: Oh that is right. So the transition team wouldn't be there ready to go.

GOLDBERG: Exactly, so you are dealing with multiple transition teams and multiple agendas writing papers that are trying to satisfy – and take in to account – the biases of the next administration. But I do recall that when the decision went for George Bush, the air got sucked out of the China side and we figured that all of the action would go elsewhere in the Asia Pacific – as I say focusing on our alliance structure, re-establishing the U.S.-Japan relationship, emphasizing the competitive aspects of our relationship with China rather than the cooperative ones.

Q: Now as you were saying on April 1, 2001,, a Chinese air force plane crashed into an American EP-3 off the coast of China and our plane landed on Hainan Island. This started a very intense period of interaction with the Chinese. That certainly would have dominated work on the desk even on the econ side.

GOLDBERG: Well actually at that point I really wasn't even functioning as an economic officer. During the ten days standoff between the U.S. and China, David Sedney who was the political deputy at that point, and I were a two-man working group switching off every 12 hours and monitoring developments. We had a small office in the operations center. We did nothing but EP-3, coordinating with our people in Beijing. What I would say is that issue largely got resolved at a level well above my pay grade, well above the assistant secretary's pay grade and the undersecretary's pay grade.

Q: High-level attention you are saying.

GOLDBERG: Yes. The discussions were among Rich Armitage and Colin Powell, Paul Wolfowitz, at Defense, Condoleezza Rice at the NSC and Joe Prueher, our Ambassador in Beijing. David or I might listen in on some of these conversations but just as often we were excluded. We were very fortunate to have Admiral Prueher in Beijing at that time. He was a former naval aviator and former CinCPAC or Commander in Chief of the Pacific. Prueher had flown EP-3's and knew what the plane was capable of. In a rather dramatic moment he said to Jiang Zemin that the military was misleading him. There was no way that a slow-moving, lumbering plane like the EP-3 could turn sharply into the fighter jet that was being flown by Wang Wei, the Chinese pilot. It was at that point the crisis was defused. Within a matter of weeks, our people came home; the plane didn't come back until much later and it came back in pieces.

Q: So actually one of the issues here is the level of sophistication or at least briefing of the other side.

GOLDBERG: Well we always had the feeling that the military people in China withheld the facts about the capabilities of the two planes. Still, there was genuine anger over what had happened. The loss of the plane and the loss of the life of the Chinese pilot, and genuine anger that about the United States pressing its right to patrol waters off of China's coast in order to keep tabs on China's military buildup.

Q: I presume the Department response to the EP-3 incident was to stand-up a task force?

GOLDBERG: Well, it really wasn't a task force. It was really more sort of a limited working group. With a task force, you end up with 15-20 people working as a team around the clock. Oftentimes the task force are formed to ensure the safety of American citizens in difficult situations and to respond to the inquiries of their family members with regard to their whereabouts. A task force has a very large consular presence and lots of interagency coordination. This never got to that point - it was just Sedney and I and maybe one or two others who kept a log of what was going on.

Q: Did you in the working group end up writing papers or summaries, chronologies, a logbook if you will.

GOLDBERG: As I said, we certainly kept a log. We did a chronology. We did notes to brief people, but they weren't really for the senior officials. They were for other officials, out of the loop but with a need to know - like the deputy assistant secretary or the assistant secretary.

Q: Your next assignment in the summer of 2001 is to the economics bureau with whom you had been liaising all along. How did that tour come up?

GOLDBERG: Well, I got a note from Tony Wayne's executive assistant inquiring about my interest in an EB job - Tony was then the EB assistant secretary and I had worked closely with him during the PNTR battle. I thought it was kind of special, Tony reaching out to me, but in fact, these notes went out to almost every economic officer, because economics jobs at that time went begging. EB was one of those bureaus that had to do a significant amount of recruiting - aggressive recruiting - in order to get its jobs filled. Anyway, I went and talked to Shaun Donnelly who was Tony's principal deputy assistant secretary and he suggested a few jobs. I wasn't sure whether my career was going to continue much past this Washington sojourn and figured it might be a good idea to get some experience dealing with real business issues. So I took the job as the deputy special representative for economic and commercial affairs. There was no special representative the first year I was in the office, so I was effectively running it.

Q: Now again could you situate that office within the bureau?

GOLDBERG: Well to be honest about it, it was kind of a marginal office in many respects. There were bigger issues, trade issues, financial issues, monetary issues, and while all of these had an impact on businesses global operations, we were a backwater operation. In addition, we were not really doing policy but coordination and liaison with business. And advocacy. But the lead on advocacy was not CBA, the Commercial and Business Affairs office, but the Advocacy Center over at the Department of Commerce. My second year in the office, there was a special representative - Frank Mermoud - and he liked to travel. So I was still running the office more or less while Frank was handling the politics of putting us on the map. We had a pretty good group of people and we had a lot of autonomy. The first year was higher profile, of course, as I attended the biweekly EB staff meetings as well as the daily meeting with Tony Wayne and the weekly meeting in E with Al Larson. All of which took up a lot of time and which Frank enjoyed. The special representative was kind of lower than a DAS but higher than an office director level.

Q: So you had people working for you? You were a supervisor.

GOLDBERG: Yeah, I had five or six people working for me, and that continued even after the special representative came in. They were divided along geographic lines Asia Pacific, Africa, Latin America, Europe. I had one person who did a small grants program. And we always had interns. We were one of these offices that needed interns because we had so much operational work to do.

Q: What is behind the name change. You said it was first the deputy representative for commercial and business then a special representative?

GOLDBERG: I was paneled as the deputy special representative and in the absence of a political person that first year, I was the acting special representative. Then in the second year after Frank arrived, I was his deputy. It was good to have all that exposure the first year, because it gave me credibility within the bureau, within the building, and with the Commerce Department as being someone who could get things done.

Q: Would you also have touched bases with businesses?

GOLDBERG: We were constantly in touch with businesses. Whether it was groups like the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the individual business associations, or regional groups that were set up in support of businesses like those in the Asia Pacific. We spent time at the mid levels of all the major corporations; I sat in on most of the meetings that Tony or Al had with senior businesses leaders when they came calling.

Q: What was their interest? What could State provide these business people?

GOLDBERG: You know in a lot of business people are risk averse, surprisingly so, they want guarantees of government support and if not of support, then of the government not looking too closely at their actions. We advocated on their behalf when they were looking for contracts and we provided detailed risk analysis of the political climate in a country. Tony Wayne was a political officer and as economic assistant secretary, he was better at big picture briefings than at analyzing the data. He was very generous in terms of including officers who had area expertise in his meetings.

Q: Now this 2001-2003 tour coincided with the September 11 twin towers attack. You are in an economic business bureau, but did you see any impact from that?

GOLDBERG: In my second year, I spent an awful lot of time as a member of the Iraq task force group. You may recall the State Department report that was done about the future of Iraq took a much different approach to reconstruction than the one that was adopted – more measured, with more transitions, more capacity building, not leaving the Iraqis to deal with issues that they had no inkling about. I was also involved in working with USAID on coming up with ideas with regard to contracts – the bidding of contracts, including sole source contracts. I helped write some of the rules for the interagency on how contracts would be bid and monitored.

Q: This is all the work State did in looking at Iraq.

GOLDBERG: The State study of post-Iraq war scenarios was two volumes. And all for naught in the aftermath of the war, what with Rumsfeld calling looting the “exuberance of liberation” and Bush declaring “Mission Accomplished” when it was no such thing. Had we followed the State blueprint – and here I’m not trying to lay blame on DOD or others who wanted to get in and out as quickly as possible, but their actions certainly were short-sighted - we probably would not have had the kind of problems we have had over the last ten years.

Q: Now was the seventh floor interested in this work?

GOLDBERG: Oh yes, very much.

Q: Did you brief on the seventh floor?

GOLDBERG: I didn’t. The work that we did was briefed up on the seventh floor, but I personally didn’t brief on the seventh floor.

Q: You were saying earlier you weren’t quite sure what this job and the Commercial Business Affairs office would provide to you. Two years later as you are leaving what do you think you got out of this assignment?

GOLDBERG: What I thought I would get going in was contacts that might stand me in good stead later on as I moved into a different career. But what I ended up getting was some hands-on practical knowledge about how business operates and what government can provide to business

Q: Now in the summer of 2003 you move again but it is back to the China desk.

GOLDBERG: Yes and it is back to a very different job. It was the other deputy job, the one handling political and personnel issues.

Q: Well going back to our template, could you describe the desk when you arrived in the summer of 2003. Who is there?

GOLDBERG: Well let’s see. Joe Donovan was the director. I was his deputy. Chris Marut was Chris there at that time as the economics officer.

On the political side, we had maybe four people and on the economic side there were three people. We had a public affairs officer seconded to the desk – this was the period when every officer was a public diplomacy officer and to show how serious we were about that, we brought PAS into the desk’s activities. So overall, including office management people, the desk was about twelve.

Q: Who was the deputy assistant secretary the desk reported to?

GOLDBERG: Randy Schriver, who was very close to Richard Armacost, the Deputy Security. And the assistant secretary was Jim Kelly.

Q: Since you are literally coming home after a short absence, how did the desk feel to you? What were the atmospherics? What were the policy priorities?

GOLDBERG: It hadn't really changed that much from what we had been doing before. Again let me reiterate, this was a very operational job. China policy since the Kissinger days has been made over at the NSC, with State Department input. We were fully engaged writing and briefing but always understood where policy was made.

Q: What were typical duties at this time? An average day?

GOLDBERG: The first thing we did when we came in in the morning was a daily note to the Assistant Secretary about overnight events in China and Hong Kong. That was latter shared in the building round the interagency community. Some of the issues did require guidance and we would ask for it. The Assistant Secretary then used the items to brief at the Secretary's daily meeting. So that was the first order of business when we came in.

The second order of business was press guidance. In many respects it was updating previous press guidance. But whenever you had something that was unusual or different, you'd churn out and clear a couple of sentences. After clearance, it went on the EAP press office and to the Assistant Secretary's suite by 10:00am. Once all the boxes were checked, our items would be incorporated in the book for the press secretary's noon press briefing. Then of course there were the daily taskings. At night, or throughout the day, we put together the official-formal, which was a series of "private" communications and information sharing with the embassy or the consulates. In those we would also solicit Mission views and opinions or talk about personnel related issues.

Q: Now in the old days, as they say, that official informal was sent out as a telegram. But at some point State converted to e-mail. Which was it when you were there in 2003?

GOLDBERG: We started with cable, but by the time I left as Director three years later, everything was in e-mail.

Q: Now how would you describe the difference of being the deputy political as opposed to being the deputy economic?

GOLDBERG: A lot of issues were ones I had not addressed previously, especially on the military, security, and intelligence sides of the house. So obviously I had more contact with the NSC and DOD. I had to get smart of some things I hadn't really been involved in before, like security and intelligence. Not that everything was new but the level of detail that you needed to do your job well was greater than before and different.

Q: Let me back up a tad. How is it that you came back to the desk in the first place?

GOLDBERG: Well another one of those situations where a lot of the jobs that I had been interested in - and some of them were DCM jobs overseas - went to other people, and it was getting pretty late to be looking for a job. I spoke to Don Keyser, who was then the DAS for China before becoming PDAS for Korea and Japan and Don asked if I were interested in going back to the desk? I was and I did.

Q: Excellent. You arrived at the desk in June 2003 during year three of the Bush administration. In the wake of the earlier EP-3 incident and the 9/11 attack on the twin towers, what is now the major attitude toward China?

GOLDBERG: Well, I think the Bush people had the sense that China could be helpful in the war against terrorists. If we were successful in working together on this, we could develop a broader strategic relationship, one which made it possible to ease our burdens in Afghanistan and Iraq. Also, we could get China to help us forestall Iran's nuclear ambitions or other efforts that were inimical to American interests. Eventually we even persuaded the Chinese to help us deal with North Korea's nuclear program. When I was on the desk, Jim Kelly had a famous meeting with his NK counterparts where they acknowledged they were in possession of nuclear capability that could lead to a bomb. There was great anger and hostility as the North Koreans, not surprisingly, had taken advantage of the United States, not honored the agreements of the early 1990s about not embarking on a nuclear program that was aimed at weapons development.

Q: You were talking about liaising with China to tell the Iranians to behave themselves. This must have been difficult when the Iranians were encircled. They had American troops in Iraq and American troops in Afghanistan. How successful do you think the Chinese might have been?

GOLDBERG: The Chinese were interested throughout this period in keeping America preoccupied in the Middle East/South Asia/the "-stans" so that the focus would not be on China. It didn't cost the Chinese anything to say "sure we will be helpful" and then not deliver or deliver minimally; alternatively, they could and did resort to their policy of non-interference and just state that they were not going to do anything which interfered with another nation's right to self-determination. A lot of our discussions were repetitive; they certainly didn't move us forward in a positive direction, and personally, I think we were unrealistic in our expectations, even slight as they were. But given the situation, the dire situation we found ourselves in and with people thinking that China was a potential ally, the conversation went on. I think we spent far too much time assuming they would help.

Q: I would presume as head of the political side of the house you had a fairly decent interaction with the Chinese embassy during this assignment. Any particular regular contacts? What level were you interacting with?

GOLDBERG: As director, I interacted at the political counselor level. As deputy, with an odd assortment of lower level officials. The Chinese mission in Washington – as with missions throughout the world – was really pretty rank conscious. Political counselors preferred dealing with the director, the DCM with the DAS and the ambassador with the Assistant Secretary and above. We had the occasional social get together with the Chinese. Very scripted and formal. There was always a degree of wariness.

Q: Now were they still in their old embassy?

GOLDBERG: Yes. They didn't open their new embassy until 2008, the same year we opened ours.

Q: Now, you have interacted with Chinese over a few years now. What assumptions or observations were you making about the caliber of their diplomatic people that you meet?

GOLDBERG: Given the importance of the United States, many of their best diplomats were in the North American bureau. They had people who were increasingly better language qualified, better informed about the United States than their predecessors, and certainly far more polished. It doesn't mean that they were any more desirous of having personal relationships. They were cautious – there was, in their view, potential for them to be compromised or be perceived as compromised by their colleagues, being too close to the Americans. But they were certainly getting a better caliber of officer at their Embassy in Washington and their consulates elsewhere in the U.S.

Q: Do you remember anybody particularly who was outstanding?

GOLDBERG: Certainly He Yafei, political counselor and DCM who went back to China and became a Vice Minister focusing on North American affairs. He is now Ambassador to Geneva. Their DCM Liu Xiaoming, who was probably more impressed with himself than other people were with him, but he knew his stuff. He became Ambassador to North Korea and is now their Ambassador in London. The Ambassador to the U.S. at the time was Li Zhaoxing and he represented more the old way of doing business than the new; he became Foreign Minister. Xie Feng, who is now their DCM, was here as was my counterpart in Beijing when I was DCM, Zheng Zeguang. They had some up and coming people who were bright, highly motivated, and interested in the relationship.

Q: Now I would assume since you are on the political side of things, you have some sort of watch on Taiwan issues. Mike Meserve is in regional affairs doing Taiwan at this time. How did things Taiwan come to your attention?

GOLDBERG: Joe and Mike would meet two or three times a week formally with the Deputy Assistant Secretary and more often informally. I had a good relationship, at the time, with Mike and often went to his office – down the hall – to talk. Mike had two people working with him, but coordination was extremely good. Given the importance of the issue, you had to have a keen sense of the issues on both sides of the strait how developments would play domestically in the U.S. There was also a lot of coordination with Congressional affairs on Taiwan-related issues.

Q: Such as?

GOLDBERG: Oh, who to brief up on the hill. How to brief them. When to brief them.

Q: What would you say were the main issues during this assignment from 2003 to 2006?

GOLDBERG: We didn't have anything like the Belgrade bombing or the EP-3 incident, that is events that sort of set the relationship backward in dramatic fashion. Or move it dramatically forward. For the last six years of the Bush administration, we had a relationship that was on a reasonably positive trajectory.

Q: Speaking of operational things, you were mentioning that in July of 2005 you became the director. How did that come about?

GOLDBERG: Originally I was going to language training that year before going out as Consul General in Guangzhou. A couple of people who might have been interested in the Director job passed on it. Randy Schriver asked me if I was interested in doing the job and I said yes. I figured whatever language I really needed to brush up on I could do that while I was out in Guangzhou. It turned out that wasn't the case and I could have used a year review, but certainly I don't regret the time I spent as Director. I think it made me a better manager my last five years in the Service.

Q: So you would have been assigned to Guangzhou already by 2005?

GOLDBERG: Yes. I was already assigned to language training. So before Guangzhou, I was supposed to have a year of language training.

Q: So actually the Director job was an extension of your two year tour.

GOLDBERG: Well you could look at it that way but you have to be formally paneled into the Director job. It was a different number, a different code. I was paneled for a one year tour. Since that was my seventh consecutive year in Washington, I had to get formal approval from the Director General's office to be in stateside that long.

Q: Oh that is right. State had a regulation you are only supposed to be back in Washington for a set period of time, Five years?

GOLDBERG: At that time it was six. Now it is five. So I moved up. Randy left and Jim Keith came in as the Deputy Assistant Secretary for China in EAP.

Q: What was Jim like to work for?

GOLDBERG: Very substantive and policy savvy. Very good relations on the seventh floor. He was close to Chris Padilla who was Bob Zoellick's executive assistant and spent a lot of time with Zoellick as well. Jim was often called upon to fill in for Chris Hill, the Assistant Secretary, when Hill was otherwise engaged on North Korean issues.

Q: Now as Director it would have ratcheted up your contacts at the Chinese embassy.

GOLDBERG: Exactly, so the political counselor at the time was always in the office or on the phone – that was Jia Xiudong. Periodically I would meet with the DCM when I was acting in Jim's capacity and I had more opportunities to meet with Chinese delegations.

Q: Any particular issues came up during your directorship?

GOLDBERG: You know the interesting thing is the further up you go the more the personnel issues become important. I dealt with more personnel issues as Director than I did as Deputy Director. So there were efforts to put the right people in the right places, and then there were efforts aimed at getting the wrong people out of where they were. I guess the major event of my time as Director was Hu Jintao's visit to the U.S. and how it was marred in some ways by referring to the PRC as the Republic of China (i.e., Taiwan) and a Falun Gong journalist shouting slogans at Hu during a White House ceremony.

Q: Now you were saying that through language you were to be assigned as Consul General in Guangzhou. Was that going to be Mandarin or Cantonese?

GOLDBERG: No, it was going to be Mandarin. Cantonese was a bridge too far for me personally. When I left the desk, I did take six weeks of language training. When I was in Guangzhou, I used speeches as language learning opportunities, forcing myself to practice my delivery and reading the remarks in Chinese characters rather than having them Romanized for me. That enhanced my ability to engage directly in Chinese.

Q: Now the Consul General in Guangzhou is the largest of the five CGs, isn't that right?

GOLDBERG: Actually Shanghai was and I think is still larger in terms of personnel numbers. But the thing about Guangzhou that is notable is that it handles all of the immigration work China wide. People who were actually immigrating to the U.S. were processed – lovely word – in Guangzhou. So we had the full range of consular service, immigrant, non-immigrant, American citizen services, fraud prevention and adoptions - what have you. The largest component of the mission was devoted to consular.

Q: Actually that part of China is the traditional source of overseas Chinese.

GOLDBERG: Yes. But increasingly Chinese are emigrating from places throughout China, not just Guangzhou and Fujian, so we would see people from central China like Hunan and Hubei, for example, and from the north, Shanghai and Beijing. But the reason for having all immigration services in Guangzhou, as you point out, was that traditionally immigration had come from that area.

Q: Now what was the consular district?

GOLDBERG: The consular district was Guangzhou, Fujian, Hainan and Guangxi provinces.

Q: And did you get a chance to travel to all of those provinces?

GOLDBERG: Oh yes, actually I tried to get to them three times a year. I didn't go to Hainan that much. But I did spend a fair amount of time in Fujian and in Guangxi. In part, aside from the importance of just getting out and showing the flag, the reason for that travel was to establish virtual presence posts. These are not consulates per se but recognition that a city or an area was a target of opportunity and we should be visiting frequently. We had three VPPs: Nanning in Guangxi, Xiamen and Fuzhou in Fujian. So I was traveling in those two provinces extensively. In my second year, we established the Nanning VPP on the Fourth of July and in my last year, we did the same – on the Fourth – in Xiamen. It was important for us to reach out beyond Guangzhou, the consular city in which we were based, to other major cities in China, especially to communities that we thought might be receptive to an American presence and an American message.

Q: How did that work out?

GOLDBERG: Pretty well. But these things tend to lose focus unless you really tend them. So although countrywide I think there were a dozen VPPs, only a few were really successful – and I think Xiamen and Nanning were among them. We did Fuzhou because the Mayor of that city, the capital of Fujian province, was unhappy that we would focus on Xiamen, a city of two and a half million people rather than Fuzhou which had four-plus million. Also, at an earlier time, we had thought that we might put a consulate in Xiamen.

Q: Now getting back to the consulate in Guangzhou, what sections do you have there and who is working for you?

GOLDBERG: Well we had a full complement of State department officers – pol/econ/consular/management/public affairs. We had a commercial officer, soon to be two officers. We had an agricultural officer. We had somebody from the Department of Homeland Security. We had a Patent and Trademarks Office person. Technically, he was under the commercial office but we treated him as a separate office. All were members of my small country team in Guangzhou.

Q: And who was your political and economic chiefs?

GOLDBERG: When I first got there the political chief was Jim Turner and after that it was Steve Lang. Steve is now the Deputy Director on the China desk.

Q: Back up in Beijing the ambassador is Clark Randt, and Dave Sedney is DCM.

GOLDBERG: Yes. David was there, an old friend who was very supportive of what we were doing.

Q: Now one of the interesting things about your consular district is Fujian province, from which the people on Taiwan actually emigrated from. So I suppose you were reporting on Fujian in terms of Taiwan investment, tourism.

GOLDBERG: We would spend time whenever we went to Xiamen city at the Taiwan Research Institute of Xiamen University. We got to know the scholars there really well. We also met with the Taiwan associations anywhere we went in Fujian; also in major cities in Guangdong and Guangxi, which also had a significant Taiwan presence. Our reporting – our ground truth version of what was actually happening in cross-Strait business and trade was very good. We didn't cross over into policy lines but we could see for ourselves the increasing economic integration and Taiwan's growing economic dependency.

Q: There was a considerable amount of Taiwan investment in that area?

GOLDBERG: Everywhere in the south. Guangxi province, for example, was trying to attract Taiwan investment into the hinterlands and part of the long-range Guangxi infrastructure development project related to getting goods to market, accessing ports in Guangzhou and Shenzhen by building roads and railways.

Q: Now as the senior officer at the mission you must have had fairly extensive contacts both in the provincial administrations and the party organizations?

GOLDBERG: No, not the party. They weren't terribly interested. I had nothing much to offer in their view. So my contacts were mostly with the provincial government. But even there, the provincial governors weren't interested in seeing me either so I was relegated to a vice governor. Others in the mission were lucky if they saw directors general. The Chinese really low-balled us, even as they – as I've said before – had access to senior officials in the U.S. Their senior people did often roll out the red carpet for major American business and trade groups. That was money, after all.

Q: What was the nature of the reluctance? Did they have the capability to interact, language?

GOLDBERG: They just weren't interested. I don't know what Gary Locke's experience is, but I know that Sandy Randt, Jon Huntsman, Jim Sasser, Joe Prueher, they were all frustrated that the only people they saw were "vice" something or other - a vice minister of foreign affairs, a vice minister of commerce – when they had an issue of consequence.

Q: Now Guangzhou has a fair sized foreign diplomatic community.

GOLDBERG: Yes. When we were there it went from about 22 missions to 32. A significant increase. I am not sure how many they have there now. It could very well be the same because a couple of missions like Sweden closed up shop and a few have opened. But we did end up with a very significant foreign mission presence.

Q: Now did all those missions have fairly equal or unequal contact with the Chinese?

GOLDBERG: Absolutely. Everybody was frustrated. I remember a meeting with Party Secretary Zhang Dejiang when he was in Guangdong. Once a year he would meet with members of the diplomatic community and that was it. So overall there was great frustration on our part in terms of our inability to engage at the most senior levels.

Q: Let me ask you an operational question. With that size of foreign diplomatic community, was there an international school?

GOLDBERG: Yes. There was the Guangdong Guangzhou American school, but it was an international school.

Q: And did you have some fairly significant responsibilities for the administration of the school?

GOLDBERG: During the first two years, I sat on the board as the U.S. representative, and then in my third year I delegated that to my administrative counselor.

Q: What was the international school like?

GOLDBERG: It was not bad. During this period, we were considering plans for and then building a new school in one of the suburbs of Guangzhou. Most parents you talked to thought their kids got a good education. As you went higher up in the grades in the school the number of Americans as such was significantly reduced. The largest contingent of students at the school was Korean.

Q: Speaking of new buildings, didn't the consulate at Guangzhou move out of the hotel at one point, had they already moved out?

GOLDBERG: No, that is the new mission. We were in the old Esso Tower near the White Swan Hotel. The mission is still there. A lot of the work I did was associated with building the new consulate, which is scheduled to open next year.

Q: How did those negotiations go?

GOLDBERG: Very difficult. Reciprocity was very important. When you got an agreement at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs level, you would be back at square one dealing with the local regulators. So we had teams out all the time meeting with the Chinese on design, and trying to come to terms with an ever changing set of regulations, which the Chinese told us were unchanging. When I was there we had cleared the grounds in the area that the building will occupy in Zhujiang Xincheng, the new city along the Zhujiang River. But we had not formally broken ground. Ground was broken when I was in Beijing as DCM.

Q: What is the new facility going to look like?

GOLDBERG: A state of the art building. It will be a secure facility with the appropriate setbacks that were mandated by the Inman Commission after the Africa bombings in late 1990. It will be a very open facility, with a great hall leading into the consular area. There will be an atrium, similar to the atrium in the Beijing Embassy. The flow-through looks very good particularly on the consular side of the house. It is a facility that allows for an increase in the number of Americans and Chinese who are working in Guangzhou. It can accommodate up to about 325 people total.

Q: There was an story on the NBC 10:00 news program last night about visas from China and how everybody had to go to the five consulates to even apply and there was terrible delays and what not. Were those kinds of delays and heavy workload the case while you were there?

GOLDBERG: Heavy workloads yes. But I think the carping about this has gotten significantly greater my last year in Guangzhou and then the year and a half I was in Beijing, when in fact the process has been simplified and efforts are made to be more accommodating. Still, absent more officers – and that has happened – there are long waiting times. In Guangzhou and Beijing, one of the significant reforms was the decision that a person did not have to apply in his or her consular district but in fact could, if the wait time was too long in one place, he or she could go to another consular district where the wait time was shorter.

Q: Now I assume you have hosted the ambassadors' field trips down to your consular area?

GOLDBERG: Yeah. We had Sandy Randt down there three times during the period I was there.

Q: And what would those be like in terms of work for the consulate and what was going on?

GOLDBERG: Well they would give us a list of people they hoped to see and a list of events they were interested in our setting up for them. Randt was able to see the Party Secretary, Wang Yang, and that was the first and only time I saw Wang in an American scheduled meeting. I saw Wang only one other time after that with a group of other diplomats. Having the Ambassador visit mean putting together a considerable number of briefing papers, updating contacts preparing for Q's and A's [questions and answers] and things like that. But having the ambassador did provide a greater degree of access and opportunities for having dialogues that we would not have otherwise have had.

Q: I have in the back of my mind that Guangzhou is responsible for almost half of China's GDP.

GOLDBERG: Probably less. Probably Guangdong and Fujian together account for 1/3. I am not sure that it is still that high.

Q: You would have done some extensive economic reporting.

GOLDBERG: Yeah we did. It was really economic reporting on the Pearl River delta area, the area between Guangzhou and Shenzhen area. Then we did reporting on the Xiamen-Fuzhou corridor in Fujian and what was happening there as well.

Q: Connecting money to investment is important to business. Were you also looking at the banking system and making judgments about it?

GOLDBERG: The banking, I mean we did that basically through our American contacts. The local Chinese bankers weren't all that interested in meeting with us. I did get to know Frank Newman quite well. Frank was a former American Deputy Secretary of the Treasury who became a senior administrator at the Shenzhen Development Bank. We did have some contacts with the China Development Bank as well and the China Merchants Bank. None of these were major policy banks in China, whose local subsidiaries had nothing to do with us. So whatever we might have learned about the banking community came from our contacts with foreign bankers who were there. And even they were guarded.

Q: Now Shenzhen was one of the original special economic zones. You are there almost 20 years later. Has it been subsumed, overwhelmed? How are the Chinese planning their economic expansion?

GOLDBERG: Well, Shenzhen has not been overwhelmed or subsumed in any way shape or form. Shenzhen was never really under the Guangdong provincial government authority. It always reported directly to Beijing. Beijing continued to have a vested interest in Shenzhen's success and cross-border interaction with Hong Kong and whatever else they might be able to do this area. Shenzhen today is a city of seven-to-nine million people, has reasonably sophisticated financial services and telecommunications, with Huawei and ZTE campuses in the city.

Q: Now you have the consulate in Hong Kong next door. What was your relationship with them?

GOLDBERG: Starting in early 2009, we were doing more joint reporting, more cross border traveling. As a result, we were doing a better job of telling the story of what was happening in south China. In fact, we also had an MOU with Taiwan with regard to travel of Taiwan officers on the mainland and in Hong Kong.

Q: What kinds of things were being observed that impacted on the mainland and in Hong Kong businesswise? I have in mind reports that Hong Kong was moving its small manufacturing into Guangdong and as was Taiwan so I assumed you would be reporting back and forth on Hong Kong XYZ Company....

GOLDBERG: They moved the manufacturing out of Hong Kong well before I got to Guangzhou. When I went to Hong Kong, Joe Donovan would host events for me and the consulate would arrange some meetings. We would see business people who had thrown in their lot with the mainland government; their entire business operation had already been moved across the border. A lot of the Taiwan businesses who were in Hong Kong had made a similar migration, retaining the back end, sales and finance in Hong Kong, but moving the whole manufacturing operation to Guangdong, and to a lesser extent Fujian. Also increasingly large numbers of Taiwanese – many of them former military from pre-revolution days, others businesspeople pure and simple - were settling down in Shanghai.

Q: Now you had been stationed in Hong Kong many years before. From this perspective in 2006-2007, what differences did you see? Of course you are on the other side of the border now but does Hong Kong look to you?

GOLDBERG: The biggest difference was that while there was the appearance of freedom of expression and dialogue, it was also clear that many people would not say what they thought about some of the changes for fear of offending the ruling authorities. Papers that used to be critical were self-censoring.

Q: How useful was the press you were reading in Guangzhou?

GOLDBERG: Ahh. Good question. If you read the standard national papers, you questioned what they wrote about south China. But you also had papers like the Southern Weekend which often would report on issues that were critical of the mainland policy. They sometimes crossed the line; editors were fired or journalists who were imprisoned or detained for periods of time. You could do an article that was critical of something going on in another province or another locality outside Guangdong province, as sort of exposé. It was always clear to the casual reader in Guangdong or Guangzhou the real target was either the provincial governor or the mayor or deputy mayor of Guangzhou who were doing the same things. These investigations were chosen at random.

Q: What was our political reporting on governance or ethics?

GOLDBERG: We had a couple of delegations in Guangzhou looking at governance and ethical issues. We also had groups looking at rule of law. Beijing University established a law school on its campus in Shenzhen, which taught American jurisprudence rather than the European. That got a lot of play, i.e., training lawyers in a different legal tradition. But for the most part we ended up being unable to verify much of the corruption going on around us and ended up reporting rumors rather than facts or coming up with real case studies. We had a better than average handle on what was going on in Shenzhen where almost every mayor or deputy mayor was called to Beijing and placed under administrative detention. It was easy to be corrupt in Shenzhen

Q: Let me move on to something else. You should have a fairly major USIA (U.S. Information Agency) program and outreach. What did that look like?

GOLDBERG: We had two really good people handling our public diplomacy. Darcy Zotter whom I had known in Beijing ten years before worked for me first and was followed by Paladino who had served on the China desk when I was there. I spoke at a lot of events, opened some exhibitions, fronted for some musical groups that came out. We had some seminars etc. All-in-all, it was a very well-run operation at a time when the mantra was every officer a public diplomacy officer.

Q: Was there a USIA library?

GOLDBERG: There was one attached to the USIA office that Chinese could use, but it wasn't terribly large. It was mostly periodicals and journals. We had a couple of computer terminals where people could access information.

Q: How was the funding for that? Was that always a problem for the USIA program?

GOLDBERG: You could always use more, but I don't think we were ever in a situation where we could not do a program because we didn't have the money during the three years I was there.

Q: Let me go back to something else. We are talking about an ambassadorial visit. At the time you were there, were those visits just to Guangzhou or to the other provinces?

GOLDBERG: I never traveled in Fujian or Guangxi with Sandy Randt. He only came to Guangzhou or Shenzhen.

Q: Actually one major event happens at the time you were there. In 2008 the Chinese hosted the Olympic Games. That must have been very exciting for them.

GOLDBERG: Well that really was a Beijing-centric event in almost all respects. As far as Guangzhou was concerned, they were looking towards the Asian Olympics, which the city hosted in 2010. People watched these events on television but you didn't get the same sense of excitement you got up in Beijing.

Q: Anything else about Guangzhou that we haven't touched on?

GOLDBERG: Well I would say just one other thing and then why don't we bring today's session to a close. There was an awful lot of illegal immigration and people smuggling. We organized a group of six consuls general to address those issues as a group. While I was in Guangzhou, I organized our team of CGs for a trip to Fuzhou to talk to the vice governor, the mayor of Fuzhou and immigration officials about ways we might cooperate in order to meet the challenges of illegal immigration.

Q: And they were seized with that?

GOLDBERG: They weren't as seized with it as we were. We were seized with it but they were not. My successor, Brian Goldbeck, continued the program.

Q: Now one of the programs that you would have controlled down there was the international visitors program I assume.

GOLDBERG: We contributed to the International Visitors Program by coming up with lists of people from our consular district who we thought might benefit from the travel and work/study experience.

Q: Were you fairly successful in getting your nominees accepted by the program.

GOLDBERG: Yes. All of our nominees were accepted by Beijing. We always provided a significant list of alternates and many of them were chosen as well. The only limitation was whether the Chinese would allow the people we chose to go on these programs. Those who didn't go despite being chosen would plead they couldn't go for work reasons. However, it was often the case that they could just not get permission from their unit to participate.

Q: So we are not only talking about civil society types but government people.

GOLDBERG: Yes.

Q: Was there any particularly successful IV grantee who came back and said, "Wow?"

GOLDBERG: We had some bloggers who went, who blogged about their trip. We had some people who went in and came back less enthusiastic about the relationship as a result of some of the things they saw, a sense that China's time was coming and America was in decline.

Q: Interesting. Like what?

GOLDBERG: They were critical of mass consumerism, American values, television programs, sex, clothing, you name it, so much of it was cultural. We had one conversation with a returnee about whether China was ready to have a dramatic rethink of its political system and move toward real representative government. He said it wasn't important to have representative government, what was needed was to make officials more accountable for their actions.

Q: Bob we have got a big part coming, Embassy Beijing, 2009-20011.

GOLDBERG: Well the first question to ask is how did I even get this job?

Q: That is right because DCM jobs are special and important.

GOLDBERG: I was lucky. The DCM, Dan Piccuta, a good friend, was planning to curtail and retire. I was already paneled into a job working in the office of the Inspector General. Dan asked me and a few others whether we might consider coming to Beijing. Frankly it was one of those jobs you just can't turn down. Having been in Beijing in the 90s, having worked so many years on the China desk, and then having traveled to Beijing many times over the course of three years as Consul General in Guangzhou, I knew there were a lot of challenges and I thought I was more than capable of handling them. I had some support in the EAP front office and good recommendations from Dan and others.

Jon Huntsman had already been chosen as ambassador and was going through the confirmation process. When I contacted him and asked if he wanted to do an interview, he said no. He was comfortable with whatever decision EAP and the State Department personnel office made. I landed in Beijing on July 5, and was Chargé for the first six and a half weeks I was there. The first issue that confronted me on the day that I arrived was the uprising in Xinjiang province and whether or not I would send our officers, two military and two State Department officers in to harm's way in order to monitor the situation.

Q: Was that the embassy's call?

GOLDBERG: It was the embassy's call. We informed Washington of our intentions, but did not ask permission. We already had officers on the plane at that point. I guess if there had been any pushback out of Washington we would have reversed course. But none of us thought there would be because the demand for information was very strong. We just went ahead and did it.

Q: Now were these officers from the embassy in Beijing or from one of the consulates?

GOLDBERG: Just Beijing. Xinjiang, even though so far to the west, was in the Beijing consular district.

Q: Now how did you hear about these disturbances in that area?

GOLDBERG: It was already in the news. CNN always trumps anything we do in terms of getting the story out. But then hopefully we do our job in terms of getting the details and the story behind the story right. We also do pretty well on analysis that might be useful to policy people in Washington. That is why you need people on the ground.

Q: Now, did Chinese authorities need to approve this?

GOLDBERG: We didn't even bother with that. Had we asked, we would have tipped our hand and been told the situation was too volatile and no one could vouch for our protection.

Q: Who headed the team, do you recall?

GOLDBERG: Well what we did initially was send down a couple of very low-level officers under guise of doing our standard consular services package. In other words, we were making sure that American citizens in the area we were serving were safe. We did get inquiries about their welfare and we needed to account for them. We sent one consular officer and one political officer down. And, as I said, we also dispatched two military officers, who were there to observe military movements. We did that over a period of about six weeks alternating teams every week to ten days. Then they would come back and be debriefed. While there, they would phone in messages or send us e-mails which we turned into sitreps or situation reports on a daily and sometimes twice daily basis. When they returned they would do a more in depth cable. The military officers did the same through their system.

Q: Now did our team members get to talk to local officials or not?

GOLDBERG: Not very much. In fact once it was clear what we were doing, they were followed. There were a couple of times they were warned away from certain areas which were problematic in terms of their security.

Q: And what conclusion did the Embassy come about this event?

GOLDBERG: In the beginning, foreign reporters called the situation a home grown or domestic reaction by disadvantaged Uighurs to Chinese policies. In some places in Xinjiang, Han majorities of over 70 percent were controlling business; Uighurs were nowhere to be seen and few were benefiting from economic development in the area. Clearly the policy out of Beijing was to Sinicize the area – just as in Tibet or the Tibetan areas of Sichuan. But ultimately our conclusion was there was considerable outsider or outside the country involvement, with financial and arms support for the uprisings.

Q: Umm mmm. I can remember from my own studies when the Qing dynasty fell, up to then Manchuria had been off limits to Han Chinese. Afterward, Han Chinese farmers looking for open fields and better prospects flooded into Manchuria.

GOLDBERG: In any case it was quite a challenge, but for me as DCM the decision to send them was not a difficult call and officers wanted to go. We had no dearth of volunteers. For the first two weeks I was in Beijing, I would get calls, maybe three times a week, from the Chinese foreign ministry, usually at 10:30 at night to come in and receive a demarche at 11:30. They were always doing me a favor they said by providing me with information that was strictly confidential – confidential that is until the stroke of midnight when it would be out in the New China News Agency. Those demarches also ended with the Chinese expressing hope that the U.S. wouldn't be involved in the events that were unfolding in Xinjiang and that the U.S. wouldn't comment unfavorably or characterize Beijing actions as human rights abuses, that we would understand the Chinese were doing everything possible to prevent the violence from escalating

Q: Now you said that the team out there would sometimes report back by e-mail.

GOLDBERG: If not by e-mail, then by blackberry or telephone. When it became clear that the U.S. was not condemning the Chinese but urging a cessation of the violence and trying to assist in finding an accommodation between Chinese and Uighur interests, then there was less blocking of communications between the Embassy and those in the field.

Q: Now let's go back to the Embassy as you arrive there. This is a major American diplomatic establishment and certainly has more agencies than just the State Department present. Could you talk about how large the embassy was and how it was organized?

GOLDBERG: Well mission-wide, there was an Embassy and five consulates. We consider Wuhan to be a consulate although it had not been planned to set it up as such – we did at that point have the right to open a fifth consulate and had chosen not to do it earlier. Our hand was forced between under the Vienna convention if you have a diplomat permanently stationed somewhere, then you need to have a consulate. We had about 2000 Chinese and Americans countrywide working for us. The Embassy when I got there had about 31 or 32 agencies. Every agency wanted to be there. We had agencies that had no presence elsewhere globally like the Food and Drug Administration, which had a total of eight people in country. So it was very big. You tend to think country team meetings are small and compact, an opportunity to engage in depth on some specific issue. But for our country team meetings, we might have as many as 35 people sitting in a secure area with a very limited amount of time to brief on their activities.

Q: Well it sort of illustrates the depth and breadth of the issues on which we interact with the Chinese. You said the Food and Drug Administration was there.

GOLDBERG: Yes, when I was Desk Director, I had participated in conversations with regard to opening the FDA. Guangzhou and Shanghai were the two consulates in which an FDA presence was approved. We spent about a year or so changing the layout of three floors in Guangzhou consulate so that we could accommodate the FDA presence and its need for a lab for testing. As you say, the FDA's presence does illustrate the breadth and depth of the relationship and how many issues we were involved in. On the FDA side alone, we had Heparin adulteration, the Melamine milk scandal, some pharmaceutical issues. All were matters on which we felt it necessary to engage the Chinese in country.

Q: Now did the Chinese have a counterpart organization to the FDA?

GOLDBERG: Whenever you set up one of these offices, there is always a memorandum of understanding that provides reciprocity. I'm not sure what the Chinese have done in this regard.

Q: About the time you arrived there or maybe earlier the Chinese had another Swine flu outbreak. Of course, they responded to it much differently than the earlier SARS outbreak. I think I read articles about tourists being tested right at the airport to see what their temperature was.

GOLDBERG: Right and if they had a temperature or some evidence of illness then they were confined for a period of anywhere from seven to ten days. This created some problems for us, not just our citizens being quarantined but the need to respond to public inquiries about what was going on. We had to have our consular officers over to the hotels and hospitals where people were confined. The Chinese were operating from a zero tolerance non-science based position. It was as if they were seeking to hermetically seal the country off from any illness. Interestingly, their course of action was popular with the Chinese public.

Q: And of course you are just saying this would involve the consular officers doing citizen services.

GOLDBERG: It ate up a lot of time.

Q: How big a consular section did we have?

GOLDBERG: China wide we issued hundreds of thousands of visas a year. So it was a substantial operation. We had 40 or 50 Chinese and Americans or more working on visas and American services.

Q: Now how was that visa situation because from 9/11 there had been new rules and it slowed the process down. Was that impacting on your situation in China?

GOLDBERG: Post-9/11, many countries thought the United States was closing its borders. Actually we were redefining ways in which the United States could make its borders more secure but we didn't do a very good job of explaining what we were up to. We had a one size fits all because you don't tailor your visa policy to any one country; it is designed to be worldwide. Our visa issuances while I was in Beijing increased dramatically; this was true of all of China. By the time I left in January 2011, we were issuing well in excess of 80% on an adjusted basis. But our rep on the street was that visas were somehow difficult to get. In fact, our bias was towards issuance and not towards denial.

Q: Speaking of some of the interesting organizations that were at the embassy at the time, I am looking at the list. DHS [Department of Homeland Security] was there. DHSCIS [Citizenship and Immigration Services], DHSICE [Immigrant and Customs Enforcement], what were they doing?

GOLDBERG: CIS was also in Guangzhou and Shanghai looking at what was called visas 1992, or those given to family following to join people who have refugee status in the States. CIS was evaluating and processing family members. In some instances family members weren't really real family members, but individuals paying the people in the States to put them on an application. This could cost you anywhere from $25,000 to $50,000 if you were successful in getting your name on the list. So we had a lot of people at DHS following this very closely as to whether or not people were in the appropriate legal status. But they also did some other things in terms of liaison with the Chinese on immigration and customs and border issues.

Q: So in fact they were in liaison with the Chinese on some of these other issues sharing their expertise. At the time I was there, there were an outstanding group of officers in the defense attaché office. I think General (Charles) Hooper was there at the time that you were there. What were their responsibilities?

GOLDBERG: General Hooper had left before I got there. I saw him I guess in April or May, but he had been replaced by Brad Gehrke, a rear admiral, by the time I arrived.

Q: What was DAO's contribution to the mission and their liaison with their Chinese counterparts?

GOLDBERG: Their mission was threefold. First they were trying to build relationships military to military. This was difficult as the Chinese military held them at arm's length first because of our Taiwan policy and then later because of differences over navigation in the South China Sea. Their second function was an intelligence one. Their officers traveled around the country doing direct observation of military installations if possible (and it was not all that possible frankly) and collecting information from people along the way. Then the third function was working within the mission to advise us in general about what is going on. They also coordinated with other elements of the mission that had intel functions.

Q: Now at this time how were we ranking the Embassy in size? It was one of the larger ones wasn't it?

GOLDBERG: Yeah, I think it was number two.

Q: Now you are there; you are chargé. That is kind of a tough way to start an assignment. You don't even get a chance to know where the bodies are before you have to start directing them around. But Ambassador Huntsman comes in. How did he see his role and how did you two work together to run the embassy?

GOLDBERG: Well it was always clear from day one that the Ambassador was the policy guy, the public face of the mission, and that I was the mission manager. But he was very generous in including me in any meetings that I wanted to be included in. It was always clear mission-wide that anything substantive that went to the ambassador for approval or consideration as part of his overall activities and agenda passed through the DCM's office. That is normally the way that it operates. We had a very good relationship from day one. He came in fully briefed. He had ideas about things he wanted to do from the moment he arrived. A lot of our activities were pointed toward the President's visit at the end of the year. So we convened a series of meetings and hosted any number of delegations really with eyes towards making that visit a success.

Q: Now actually Ambassador Huntsman has been an ambassador before.

GOLDBERG: Twice. He had been Ambassador to Singapore when he was 30 during Bush I and he was also Ambassador and Deputy U.S. Trade Representative for Asia during Bush II. So he came fully conversant on all issues. While he was engaged on all fronts, he took a special interest in the economic working group. We formed a working group – replicating the interagency group in Washington – so that we could come up with ideas on how to expand our commercial presence and resolve trade conflicts, which are endemic in any relationship of this size. Our objective was to advise Washington on the best ways to create opportunities for American businesses and jobs for American workers.

Q: Then in late October 2009, Commerce Secretary Locke, USTR Kirk and a group went to Guangzhou for the U.S. China Joint Commission on Commerce and Trade. That is a pretty high level delegation. Is that trade commission particularly active?

GOLDBERG: Yes. It has been around for a quarter of a century, meeting annually at the top level, once or twice a year at the deputy level and constantly at the assistant level. It was designed to handle the day-to-day operational aspects of the trade and commercial relationship. The annual Strategic and Economic dialogue in contrast is supposed to look at the broader conceptual issues that further bilateral trade interests or bedevil them.

Q: What were some of the major economic issues that arose during this assignment?

GOLDBERG: Pretty much the same thing as any other time during the last decade. Access to markets, transparency issues, intellectual property rights, financial services, banking and insurance, capacity building. One of the issues that was hard to get a grip on was “indigenous innovation.” It appeared that the Chinese were only going to allow domestic companies to bid for government programs and that were going to give favorable, if not exclusive, consideration to domestic companies in a whole host of things from telecommunications to infrastructure. These domestic companies, by virtue of dominating the domestic Chinese market, would acquire the know-how and skills to be global in scope and the very bigness of China would dictate that China set new rules for standards and regulations. Indigenous innovation was characterized as one of the “new” developments that we had to address, but in fact, it wasn’t as new as a lot of people made it out to be. It was pretty much how they operated most of the time.

Q: Actually I notice that the time you were there the Rio Tinto scandal popped up. What was at stake there?

GOLDBERG: For us, insofar as the arrests of the Rio Tinto employees were concerned, nothing. We weren’t involved in providing iron ore to the Chinese and Rio and the others that were involved are not American firms. Rio’s employees, among them Stern Hu, who was arrested with a couple of Chinese employees, is Australian. Our Australian colleagues were most under the gun wavering between wanting to be supportive if this were an injustice but they were outraged when they found out that the bribery allegations were true. From a broader perspective, the Rio arrests sent a chilling message to all companies about the scrutiny they were being subjected to from Chinese authorities. What saved the U.S. companies was the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act, which makes it illegal, punishable by a fine and imprisonment, for American companies to bribe or act in a corrupt fashion overseas.

Q: What were some of the things that Ambassador Huntsman was particularly focused on in addition to economics?

Q: In addition to economics, he was very much involved in our VPPs, Virtual Presence Post program. He supported the expansion of these activities by either providing money or showing up, just visiting. He traveled a lot. From the moment he arrived he was very positive about public diplomacy in general, talking about who we are in the United States and our deep abiding interest in making the U.S.-China relationship a successful one. He also made the most of his family - one of the things the Chinese were most intrigued about was his adopted Chinese daughter, Gracie Mei. Jon and Mary Kaye visited Gracie's hometown several times, and the Ambassador took Gracie back to the orphanage from where she was adopted. I think he was giving her an appreciation of her identity as a Chinese, but was always aware that she was now an American.

In addition to the VPP travel, the Ambassador visited all the consulates two-three times during his time in China and he went other places where Americans had not have been for a period of time. He was much in demand by business for the support he gave companies seeking to expand their commercial presence in China.

His third priority was being CEO of Mission China. So he did outreach to the mission, walking around, listening the concerns staff brought to his attention. Morale at mission China shot up significantly during the period he was there.

His fourth priority was ensuring that Washington was clued in on everything that was going on. He would be on the phone - mornings and evenings – with key individuals in Washington, providing his views about what was going on as well as listening to theirs. We did limited distribution scene setters for major visits and he had something insightful to add to every one of them. I would edit things and add a fair amount, but he then took that and shaped it in ways that gave it a distinctive voice.

Q: The Ambassador's travel was remarkable. How about your own travel?

GOLDBERG: Well my predecessors, interestingly enough, didn't travel. Sandy Randt, the Ambassador, thought it was the Ambassador's job – and indeed the Ambassador's prerogative to be the public face of the mission and he alone traveled for the front office. One of my predecessors traveled once. Dan Picutta traveled a couple of times. But I got to all of the consulates (except Guangzhou) and went to Shanghai and Chengdu three/four times during the 18 or 19 months that I was there. The Ambassador thought that was important to demonstrate that we were hands on and concerned about the welfare of the people who were serving outside of Beijing.

Q: Now as the chief management officer did you run into any inter agency squabbles that you had to referee or major personnel issues?

GOLDBERG: Of course. Many times that was reconciling differences on the economic side of the house. Some of the disagreements that existed in Washington were mirrored in Beijing. But Huntsman's view, and I think he was singularly successful in dealing with this problem of interagency dissonance, was that we were all in this together, working with one another in a collegial fashion and we could as a unit could make a unified series of proposals to Washington about how issues should be addressed. You were always going to have interagency squabbles. And personnel problems, some of which I handled better than others, but I give Huntsman full credit for handling them well all the time. What always impresses me about missions in general, and I encountered this in Guangzhou, is how many things end up on the senior manager's desk and they are issues you were never prepared for. You heard a lot about some things people might do and someone would invariably do something that made you want to ask "My God what were they thinking?"

Q: Now one of the major pressures on an Embassy would be a presidential visit, and President Bush visited Beijing in November 2009. You mentioned that when you arrived in June you knew that a presidential visit was on the schedule. Could you sort of walk us thorough how a mission as large as Beijing begins to shape and organize one of these visits. What is the Embassy role in these processes?

GOLDBERG: You start by trying to help Washington define the issues. You are very operational, focusing on some things you are actually seeing on a daily basis. There is a lot of control officer work, inspecting, visiting the sites the President is going to visit and making sure that everything is staffed out. Inside the mission, one of your first decisions is to designate a senior officer, not necessarily in terms of rank but in experience, who will be the operational point or contact for the White House. This person also has an assistant who may or may not be a junior officer. As an aside, let me note that an Embassy as large as Beijing can afford to assign multiple officers to do things as a training/mentoring exercise.

Next you set up a working group. We did that in early August. Our working group eventually grew to 20-25 people. Before the President arrived, we had a daily countdown meeting and when the President's team arrived, we sometimes met twice a day. The DCM is nominally the overall control for a presidential visit, but a smart DCM knows he or she needs a couple of the Mission's best officers to make a visit work.

Q: Who were those primary points of contact?

GOLDBERG: Well on this presidential visit, I think it was Graham Mayer in the political section who had worked for me on the China desk, and Brooke Spelman, who is the daughter of former Shanghai Consul General Doug Spelman. Wise choices, wonderful officers. That's about all the credit I deserve.

Q: Now in these kinds of visits there are expected formal sessions and required dinners. But the mission generally is in a position to say if the visiting dignitary went to this campus or this monument, it would be unique and make a particular statement. Did the embassy get a chance to nominate...

GOLDBERG: You make your views known all the time, you provide lots of options, and the White House chooses. Naturally, the president's time in Beijing was quite limited so all the things we thought might be good from a PR point of view were not possible. The last thing he did while he was in China before getting on Air Force One was to go out to the Great Wall. In fact that photo of him in the leather jacket standing alone on the wall at Badaling, against a backdrop of the Gobi desert, was used by some Chinese firms for commercial purposes. Nice that it was so iconic, but in point of fact, he was freezing out there. As was Jon Huntsman who didn't take an overcoat with him.

The most significant part of the visit was the President's Shanghai town hall meeting. You will recall he went to Shanghai before he came to Beijing. He was very comfortable in these town hall forums and the idea was that he would make a few remarks and then respond to Q&A. Our hope was that the town hall would be broadcast countrywide – an illusion from the very beginning and not sure who was smoking what when we tried to do this – and we spent a lot of time negotiating with the Chinese for extended coverage. Until the last minute it wasn't clear how much coverage there would be. It was not nationwide but it was better than we thought we might get, limited largely to Shanghai and its environs. What gave some limited satisfaction was that when his town hall comments hit the blogosphere, tens of millions more Chinese had the opportunity to read what he had to say. The whole experience was frustrating – difficult negotiations with the Chinese on coverage, the venue, who would be present at the town hall. Looking back, we'd have probably been better not to have done it because the press story was how the Chinese were trying to limit the town hall rather than the efforts to give the President a platform to speak directly to the Chinese people.

Q: Do you check this off as a good visit?

GOLDBERG: Personally I think this was a very good visit, a successful visit. As good as it was, it really was the end of a reasonably successful period of diplomatic engagement and the start of a period of considerable difficulty. People looking at the visit in retrospect thought the visit had not gone well, while people who were part of it felt quite the opposite. What happened just a month later in Copenhagen, i.e., the public airing of our differences on environmental issues was just the beginning. In July and February, we were beset with Taiwan arms sales and the Dalai Lama's visit.

The President had made it very clear when he was in China meeting with Hu Jintao and others that he intended to see the Dalai Lama when the Dalai Lama was in the states next and that he was going forward with a package of arms sales that had been approved previously. The Chinese would always get angry when we announced the sales, then even angrier when we followed through with actual sales. We also had some significant trade issues which contributed to the downward spiral a period of two or three months.

Q: I was noticing on the 18th of February 2010, the president did meet the Dalai Lama in Washington and the media picked up a story that the Ambassador was summoned to take a protest at MFA (Ministry of Foreign Affairs).

GOLDBERG: Pretty standard reaction. Any time the president meets the Dalai Lama, the Ambassador is summoned to protest this interference. Sometimes he is called the day before and then the day after as well. Nuisance calls, really. The Chinese would always claim we were engaging in a conversation with a “splittist” who is not a really a religious figure.

Q: About that same time, March 2-4, 2010, Deputy Secretary Steinberg and Jeff Bader came to town, very close after the President’s visit. What was the focus of their trip?

GOLDBERG: Well two things. First, we wanted to emphasize that it was important to have a normal dialogue even in times of stress. Our second objective was to engage the Chinese in a strategic discussion separate from the Strategic and Economic dialogue (S&ED). We wanted to address matters like cyber security, the weaponization of space, the South China Sea and maritime navigation. We also thought this kind of dialogue could be a way of having a more open and frank dialogue on Taiwan or Iran. It took about a year to get Chinese assent to consider such a conversation under the rubric of the S&ED which Steinberg had shortly before he left office as Deputy Secretary. The fact that the Chinese accepted the Steinberg/Bader visit at that time was a sign that they wanted to find a way to reengage over three tough months.

Q: I would suspect that on an issue like Taiwan arms sales, the whole mainland-Taiwan relationship has a lot of nuances to it, and you are hearing different things from different Chinese organizations. How would you describe the discussion of Taiwan during this period that you were DCM?

GOLDBERG: The cross-Straits relationship was improving on its own. Without any push or help or “interference” from the U.S. Ma Ying-jeou had replaced Chen Shui-bian as president. Ma was interested in establishing a broader, more mutually beneficial economic relationship with the government in Beijing. He also wanted to promote cultural and student exchanges. He avoided talk about political associations of any sort. The mainland-Taiwan relationship was operating in a fairly positive fashion and it eased somewhat the anxiety in Beijing about Taiwan independence. It didn’t spell the end of their concerns about U.S. arms sales, of course; now the mantra was “see, things have improved, they are improving further, why would you sell arms to Taiwan when there is no longer any threat from us.” So there was no end to Chinese complaints about our failure to honor the third joint communiqué of 1982 in which we pledged, among other things, to decrease the quantity and quality of arms that America sold to Taiwan for its self-defense. I can’t really recall a good conversation on Taiwan on an official level that concluded with “you have given us something to think about and we will be back to you.”

Q: I was noticing there were some visits back and forth between China and Taiwan which seemed to be thickening the economic relationship and what not. That was of reportable interest I presume.

GOLDBERG: That is right, and we encouraged that. We also reinforced our interest with the State Council’s Taiwan Affairs Office. Of course, we were also happy that we were no longer dealing with all the name calling that had gone on before during the Chen Shui-bian years.

Q: One of the other major relationships the embassy was probably watching was the Japanese-

Chinese relationship. How was that proceeding?

GOLDBERG: That was a legacy of World War Two and subsequently a tribute to both Japanese obtuseness about the image they presented by periodically making ill-considered statements about the War and the visits to Yasakuni Shrine and to Chinese efforts to play the nationalism card by criticizing Japan for omissions and a failure to apologize adequately. Clearly the Chinese valued the economic and trade relationship with the Japanese, the access to services products and technology. I'd say the two sides have a "Yes, But" relationship. Yes we want to move ahead and we can work together, but apologies to date have not been good and by the way that relationship you have with the United States is directed against us, so why don't you reconsider. This is complicated today by the vast amounts of oil and gas resource interests in the seas claimed by both China and Japan. You have Chinese submarines patrolling in territorial waters, which are off Japan's continental shelf, and creating incidents that require U.S. support for an ally.

Q: I was noticing that in September 2010, there was this incident of a Chinese fishing boat colliding with a Japanese patrol boat. That occurred in one of those disputed areas. I saw media reports that in the midst of that controversy or circumstance the U.S. told Japan that the area was covered by a security treaty. That is a fairly strong support to the Japanese side.

GOLDBERG: We made no bones about it. We reaffirmed our commitment to Japan in an area that we believed the Chinese were encroaching upon.

Q: Another area where the embassy is probably making a fairly substantial contribution is the whole North Korean situation and the Chinese role in getting the Six Party Talks going. How did the embassy see China's role with regard to North Korea?

GOLDBERG: The six party talks were managed out of Washington, with advice and assistance from the mission. In terms of direct influence on policy, the embassy's role was less significant than people might think was the case. We maintained contact with our colleagues at the South Korean embassy and worked very closely with them but they were as in the dark about what was going on in Seoul as we were sometimes about Washington's actions. I would meet periodically and exchange views with the Korean DCM, who went on to become Korea's senior negotiator for the Six Party Talks. The political counselor and political officers had their own set of contacts – I mean we were meeting with them at all levels and having essentially the same conversation, devoid of much more than speculation. The South Koreans were always interested in seeing whether there was any difference between what Washington was telling them and what the Embassy in Beijing was telling them.

We also tried to have as many meetings as we possible with the International Liaison Department of the Chinese Communist Party. As you might know, the Chinese relationship with North Korea is party-to-party, not government-to-government. The ILD is a tough nut to crack. They would brief us after a high level visit but often they would dissemble about what had happened. For example, I was once told that Kim Jong-il had been remarkably spry on one his visits in Northeast China, jumping up on a train, when we knew he was still suffering from the effects of his stroke. Anything we learned in China as to what was going on in North Korea was either through contact with NGO's that had some role in North Korea or from Chinese think tankers who were prominent in providing advice to party officials.

Q: Was there any particular domestic, economic internal issue in which the Embassy quite disagreed with an approach that Washington suggested?

GOLDBERG: Not really. We never got to that point because the communication was so good. People had a lot of confidence in one another. Jeff Bader was over at the NSC and was very savvy and policy-oriented. We had differences of emphasis but not basic approaches with those doing economic policy at USTR, Commerce, and Treasury. The EAP people at the State Department - Joe Donovan for whom I had worked was PDAS, Dave Shear was Deputy Assistant Secretary for China - I'd known for years. Kurt Campbell and Jim Steinberg were very engaged and for the most part prepared to entertain views that we might have with regard to how to get things done.

Q: You mentioned extensive contact with your South Korean counterpart. Was there kind of a Friday afternoon lunch group with your counterparts in other embassies?

GOLDBERG: We had get-togethers with like-minded missions. I was part of two groups like that. The South Koreans were not part of either group. The Ambassador had similar meetings with his counterparts.

Q: That way you would be able to see what other people are seeing in their reporting and sharing.

GOLDBERG: We certainly share our views on issues of general interest. And we'd discuss different approaches. It was not surprising that the conversation usually turned on what the Americans were doing.

Q: Off a slightly different angle. Beijing is a major diplomatic post for everybody, which must have meant tens of national day celebrations. Did you get involved in those requirements?

GOLDBERG: I did far more of that when I was in Guangzhou where we had 30 plus national day events. I did not go to all that many in Beijing. For the most part you'd go to the really important four or five; the rest you passed out to other mission officers and they'd have an opportunity to meet with their counterparts. We'd often have five or six people at a single national day event - from the political and economic sections, the military, some other agencies.

Q: In your own work did you have a set of regular contacts on the Chinese side of things?

GOLDBERG: Mostly in the foreign ministry - the director general for the Americas. I did not meet as many Chinese in my official capacity as you might think because I was spending the vast bulk of my time inside on management and paper flow issues, chairing various working groups, dealing with the daily personnel issue.

Q: One of the things that is in train and I have lost track of the time line. The U.S. was planning or breaking ground for a new embassy. Was that going on at the time when you were there?

GOLDBERG: Breaking ground for a new consulate in Guangzhou, yes. Negotiating for land in Shanghai, yes. Looking at building an annex onto the embassy property, yes. The annex will be eight stories and designed to handle the dramatic increase in the number of officers who have been sent to Beijing since the mission itself was built. The original “right sizing” blueprint did not adequately account for how large the mission would eventually become.

Q: Eight story annex. Well that means you are no longer in Erban and Sanban and those facilities.

GOLDBERG: We haven’t really been able to get rid of those and we recently decided to reopen Erban to accommodate visa overflow. The problem is that we have a difference of opinion over who should reap the benefits of the land appreciation when the properties are sold. Yiban remains the Ambassador’s residence and we will stay there for the long term because we are never going to get another piece of property like that. What we need to do is tear it down and build something that is more representative of our presence in China. That is not going to happen any time soon in this current economic environment.

Q: So when did we move to the new Embassy site?

GOLDBERG: 8-8-08. President Bush was there to inaugurate. The actual move itself came a couple of months later. I was not in Beijing at the time.

Q: One of the things that you must have been watching, certainly the officers in the external section of the political side were doing so, was China’s outreach to the rest of the world and its greater diplomatic activities. I think you and I just shared a list of President Hu travels here, the Premier travels there. Did you see and report on high level Chinese outreach to other countries?

GOLDBERG: Yes. The Chinese are on the world scene, even if they are not yet a global power in the classic sense. They have been going out so to speak for at least fifteen years. Jiang Zemin certainly liked to travel and it is a part of any senior leader’s activities. After any visit, we would seek an MFA briefing; we would also talk with the missions where the Chinese leaders had traveled as well as ask U.S. missions in those countries for their take on what had happened. Though it sounds like we did a lot along this line, it really was not a significant part of our work.

Q: What was the significant part of our work?

GOLDBERG: I must have drunk the public diplomacy Kool Aid but I think a big part of our work was non-traditional diplomacy – trying to find a way to get the Chinese to understand the United States better, I mean really understand what was going on beneath their surface observations; we also wanted to get away from the Chinese mantra that they understood us better than we understood them. During the whole 4 ½ years I was there, we invested an awful lot of time in public diplomacy and outreach. To his great credit, Jon Huntsman took up that cause and made it his own as well. Also of significance was the economic and commercial work, helping American business and agriculture, finding new opportunities would lead to jobs in America.

On the political side, we worked to get traction in our discussions on issues as varied as North Korea, Iran, and Afghanistan-Pakistan. We wanted our policymakers to understand Chinese views on these issues so that when they presented American policies, they would present them in a way that also responded to Chinese concerns. Overall, just about every bit of our work was significant in my view; but were I evaluating the Huntsman legacy, I'd say it related as much to our interest in showcasing what America has to offer to the Chinese as in the more traditional things we do.

Q: Now did that include leadership grants, the USIA program?

GOLDBERG: Sure, in Guangzhou, as I said earlier, we made suggestions that were then vetted in Beijing. In Beijing, I saw and signed off on the final list. I didn't have anything really to do with it as such. The country team that evaluated potential applicants made good decisions and I think we were able to get the right people to the States.

Q: Now in terms of official Chinese travel, the embassy always wanted to encourage visits to the U.S. I recall in late October, 2009, the vice chairman of the military commission General Xu Caihou visited the U.S. and had some fairly significant meetings with Steinberg, Sec Def Gates, and even President Obama. Would you categorize that as a fairly successful trip?

GOLDBERG: I think that is a fair assessment. The Chinese were very pleased and thought it was a successful visit as well, especially being received by the President. Unfortunately successful visits don't necessarily lead to outcomes where you are able to work more closely together to find common ground. I don't think the Chinese are ready for that kind of military-to-military relationship. They will take what they can get on the protocol side, but on the substance side, they hold us at arm's length. It is not just Taiwan arms sales that lead to a downturn in mil-mil ties, although Taiwan is important. It is also about Chinese insecurity – they are spending billions to modernize their military and to develop strategic doctrines. They like having asymmetry in the relationship. The more they know about us the better, and the less we know about them, the better.

Q: Reciprocity is always part of the diplomatic portfolio. January 18-21, President Hu Jintao visited the U.S. That must have involved quite a bit of coordination with the Chinese, devising an itinerary. How does the embassy get involved in that level of Chinese official coming to the States?

GOLDBERG: Well in the same way as when President Obama visited Beijing. We had a working group in Beijing to coordinate with our Chinese counterparts. We had meetings at all levels, the main ones being the Ambassador's with Vice Foreign Minister Cui Tiankai to go over what the agenda would be. I met with my counterpart Zheng Zeguang and then later with his replacement Xie Feng, who had returned from Washington where he had been DCM. They had their working groups; we had ours. We all wanted to ensure that Hu Jintao found a welcoming environment in Washington and with the American people that he might meet along the way. The Chinese are a lot more reserved about those kinds of interactions than Americans are. So whereas the President was anxious to have a town hall meeting with a real exchange of views, the Chinese always wanted to limit the interactions their president had with the American people. They were concerned there might be some sort of embarrassment. Always in the back of their minds, they wondered: is there is going to be the playing of Taiwan's national anthem, a reference to the Republic of China rather than the People's Republic of China, a Falun Gong episode like the one that took place in 2005, some kind of human rights demonstration. We always tried to tell them that in a country like the United States the unexpected is going to happen and you need to be prepared for that. Well, they never accepted that which is why I think most of their officials come off looking stiff and formal.

Q: It must keep their planners on edge. When President Obama came out, it is always fun dealing with the Secret Service, White House Security. Did any particular things come up along those lines?

GOLDBERG: Yeah there was one incident. Normally we reserved the entire floor that the President is on for security purposes. That means we really don't want any Chinese anywhere near the President; for security purposes. But the Chinese reserved rooms for themselves on the President's floor in November 2000 and not just one or two rooms but a half dozen, crowding out some people who needed to around the President. That was a deal breaker for a visit as it could compromise the security and communications for the President. So you get these pissing contests going back and forth with each side marking its territory.

Q: You have been involved with China for some time by now. What would you tag as major changes in their outlook or attitude or trends over the years, including did you see whether MFA was one influential domestically and secondly more talented and trained.

GOLDBERG: Well on the MFA side I think the foreign minister and foreign affairs communities are less influential these days than in the past. Clearly the state counselor, Dai Bingguo, had the most influence by virtue of his relationship with President Hu Jintao. It will be interesting to see what the next state counselor's relationship with Xi Jinping, the heir apparent, will be like. The Chinese certainly do have better language officers, and their people come back constantly to the U.S.; they are more sophisticated about what was happening in the U.S. Regrettably, the conversations we'd have in private were not all that sophisticated or illuminating, but pro forma, a recitation of talking points. They would have no reason, of course, to have any other kind of discussion. If we engaged productively with anyone, it was with China's think tank people, who as I said were incredibly influential by virtue of the fact that they were writing policy papers to the Chinese leaders, and some of those are actually acted upon.

Q: When I was stationed in Beijing we did pay attention to the think tanks and called on them from time to time. I assume the embassy is keeping up that contact work.

GOLDBERG: I didn't do very much of that as DCM, but our political counselor and political officers certainly did so. Those who were involved with economic issues similarly met frequently with their contacts in think tanks on trade and investment, financial issues. Our Treasury attaché had very good contacts over at the People's Bank of China and at the Ministry of Finance, less good at the Chinese state owned banks because you required PBOC approval before engaging with them – and that was not forthcoming. Overall, on the sophistication side, the jury is still out.

Q: Let me ask you a few questions, you talked about virtual presence posts. Could you define that and say what it means for China?

GOLDBERG: In places where we do not have consulates, we identify cities or areas that might be of significance to the United States for economic reasons or public diplomacy reasons or because up and coming leaders reside there, or we have a lot of American citizens living there. We identify these and we organize teams in the consulates and at the embassy to go to these places every six to eight weeks, if possible, to do programs. We incorporate ambassadorial travel, travel by political and economic counselors, consular services work, and anything else that might be of interest – opening an American company, doing a health program.

We also have a website for each VPP and upload general information to it as well as slide shows of American life – and if we have a visit, anything specific that happened. As I said earlier, country-wide there were 15-16 places identified for VPPs, 15-16 working groups put together, some more successful than others.

Q: Now as the economic and tourist relationship with China has expanded, and I suspect it has expanded significantly, did any particularly unique or difficult American Citizen Services consular cases come up?

GOLDBERG: Yes – especially problems encountered by Chinese-American businesspeople. Often this was in the form of extortion, less commonly there were accusations of spying or obtaining information illegally. There was one case in which the Ambassador took a personal interest - a Chinese-American, the geologist Xue Feng, whom he felt had been unfairly treated and who was convicted of getting information that had been public when he downloaded it (and was still available on the internet) and then subsequently classified secret. When I left, he was still appealing his sentencing. The Ambassador's interest in this particular case was so great that either he or I would go visit this person once a month. It was a statement about the case, but also about the fate of Americans in China who were being unjustly accused. I visited about eight times or so.

Q: Now American tourism to China is increasing by leaps and bounds, at least in my mail I am always getting offers to take a Yangzi River trip or visit Xian. So the embassy must be aware of large numbers of Americans just coming through the country.

GOLDBERG: We did, but for the most part we did not have any contact with them unless they lost a passport or there was some problem that they wanted to bring to our attention.

DONALD M. BISHOP
Deputy Public Affairs Officer
Beijing (1997-2000)

Donald Bishop was born in Tennessee in 1945. He received his BA from Trinity College and his MA from Ohio State. He joined the Foreign Service in 1979. His overseas posts include Hong Kong; Seoul and Taegu, Korea; Dhaka, Beijing, Lagos and Abuja, Nigeria; and Kabul, Afghanistan. Mr. Bishop was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2010.

Q: All right. Today is the 1st of March, 2011 with Don Bishop. And Don, you're off to China. When did you go to China?

BISHOP: We got there in the summer of 1997 – for a normal tour of three years.

I went from being PAO in Bangladesh to being the Deputy Public Affairs Officer in one of our largest programs. Perhaps only ten or a dozen of our programs in the world had a DPAO, so this was a step up.

I replaced Charles Silver. For a short time after I reached post, George Beasley was PAO, but then Paul Blackburn arrived, and I spent the remainder of the three years working as his Deputy.

At the time, all Embassy people were required by the Chinese to live in one of the Beijing's three diplomatic compounds. So were all foreign journalists. We lived for a few months in the Sanlitun compound, but our permanent place was a nice-sized apartment in the Jianguomenwai Compound. The diplomatic compounds were guarded by the People's Armed Police ("PAP guards" in Embassy lingo). On one hand they provided ordinary security. On the other hand, they were assuring that we could not invite ordinary Chinese in for conversations. The RSO told us to assume that all our telephone calls were monitored.

The Jianguomenwai compound was only a few hundred yards from the Embassy's Yiban compound. Yiban ("Compound 1") included USIS, the Ambassador's residence, and the Health Unit. It was a nice walk every morning from our apartment to the office.

Q: When you arrived, the Ambassador was a political appointee?

BISHOP: Yes, James Sasser, former Senator from Tennessee, a terrific ambassador. When I say "terrific," I of course mean he had a good sense of policy. He had, though, an extra bonus. Perhaps because he'd spent his life in politics, he liked meeting people. He was good at motivating the Embassy. He and his wife always came to Embassy social events, even small hail and farewells, and always with a covered dish! Even junior officers and FSNs could feel his magic, let's say. He showed some real determination when he stayed in the Embassy during the demonstrations at the time of the Belgrade bombing. At his Embassy farewell, he was given a framed copy of a newspaper with his picture on the front page, and the whole Embassy community gave him the most heartfelt long cheer I witnessed in 31 years.

Q: What was his background?

BISHOP: He had been a Senator from Tennessee, but he was defeated in 1994 by Bill Frist. He was a prominent leader in the Democratic Party, with strong ties to Vice President Gore, and President Clinton named him to go to China.

He was succeeded by Ambassador Joseph Prueher. He had been the CINCPAC, Commander in Chief of the Pacific Command. So the Embassy transferred from a former Senator to a former Admiral.

Admiral Prueher was another great ambassador. His style of leadership was a little unusual, in Foreign Service terms, because he'd grown up in the military frame, leading in the Navy style. He was also good at policy and very good with people.

I compare both of them to the Secretary of State, Madeline Albright, who made many visits to Beijing. Whatever the brilliance of her foreign policy insights, she was a zero on leadership. She came to China three or four times without once having gathered the staff to express her gratitude for their work. A Secretarial visit, as you know, is a very big and very taxing deal. Thanks are in order. If you miss a chance to thank people at post because you've got to rush to the next capital, that's one thing. But to have done it three times, four times, let's say it was noticed by Embassy people.

Seeing this disposition of hers, Ambassador Prueher pulled her aside and said "You need to thank the people who worked so hard." So she agreed to schedule a half hour meeting with the Embassy staff in the consular waiting room. I said to myself, OK, she's finally growing in the job. Then, at Country Team we were asked to provide jokes, amusing lines, laugh lines, for her to use at the meeting during her pep talk. I didn't think much of her effort.

Q: All right. Let's try to set the scene. First, what was the situation in China, per se?

BISHOP: It's the late 1990s. There had been the Cultural Revolution in the 1960s. There had been the opening under Deng Xiaoping in 1979, the same year the Embassy was established. When I arrived, we were well into the second decade of China's gradual opening.

Every single step along the way was stony. The Communists had fiercely implanted a suspicion of foreigners during the civil war, the establishment of the PRC, and the Korean War. The anti-Rightist campaign and the Cultural Revolution had really seared people. The result was that everything that the Embassy might do, and every approach that America would make, had to overcome Chinese misgivings or suspicions. Even in the 1990s, the usual Chinese response to our extended hand was to create bureaucratic obstacles.

The usual Embassy take on China -- and on the Foreign Ministry -- was that the government of world's most populous nation was not yet up to being a great power. They had the aspiration. They talked it. They could say that history had denied this to them. But they realized that they had not built up the institutions, nor had they the confidence, needed by a leading country to play a leading role. So China was still in an odd way a little passive in stepping forward to grasp opportunities that were presented. I'm speaking of course, of China ten to fifteen years ago.

In the 1990s, then -- we now all think of as a rather tranquil decade between the end of the Cold War and 9/11 -- the controlling idea, well expressed by a succession of presidents since President Nixon, was that the U.S. task for the relationship with China was to pull them little by little into a partnership with United States, and to become a responsible actor in the world stage. There was a trade side to that, a security side, and so on.

My sense was that our American China hands were committed to a very long slog. Step by step, little by little, the U.S. would pull China into fully joining the rest of the world. Then China would undertake the obligations and responsibilities that would bring.

I think the largest specific issue for the Embassy in the 1990s was whether China would accede to the World Trade Organization. This big issue had preoccupied the Embassy for years, and it happened while I was there.

I should mention that there was an inspection of the Embassy just after I arrived. The inspectors reported that the whole Embassy, USIS included, was coming under increasing pressure from more and more and more issues on the U.S.-China agenda, and more and more congressional visitors.

The inspectors understood, too, the reality of work in Beijing. Every time we opened the hand to China to cooperate on this or that, we faced the bureaucratic obstacles that came from China as a party state. It added enormous friction to our work.

The phrase in the inspection report that sticks in my mind ran something like “This was the Indianapolis 500 of diplomacy, and the Embassy car on the track is -- a Ford Pinto.” The report acknowledged that we did not have the resources, the people, or the money to be able to achieve what was needed in China.

Q: Let's take up a point you just made. In China, there's the government, and then there's the Communist Party. What is the relationship? And how did this effect the work of the Embassy and USIS?

BISHOP: You're right that any analysis, any take on “China” needs to recognize how the Chinese Communist Party rules. China is a “party state.” The PRC constitution acknowledges the role of the Chinese Communist Party as the vanguard. I knew this in theory before I got to China, and I'd seen some of it from my earlier vantage point in Taiwan, but China was very much a party state.

A short digression on Chinese history. Remember that the CCP and the KMT, which became the cores of the PRC and the ROC, had both been given organizational shape by the Comintern agent in Guangdong province in the 1920s, Mikhail Borodin. In a way, the CCP/PRC and the KMT/ROC mirrored each other in their party state setup. The Party determined its policies, the party line, so to speak, and the members of the Party in the state structure implemented it. Each significant organization like a university, a radio station, a business, or an association had a Party Secretary, and Party members in the organization assured that its work conformed to the Party line.

This system had been decaying in Taiwan, but it was still formally intact at the time of Chiang Ching-kuo's death in 1987, my first year there, but then it finally unraveled. In China, though, the party state had been institutionalized by the Chinese constitution in 1949, and it continued.

What this meant for us at the working level was that you might visit a town and they would introduce you to the mayor. You were a representative of a government, the Embassy, visiting the town, so your meeting the mayor was an appropriate government-to-government contact. In fact, however, the mayor is not the most powerful person in that town. Rather the Party Secretary is. But you didn't meet the Party Secretary because they were adhering to form, that you should meet someone from the government structure.

People who deal with China come to understand this second, parallel structure there, the Communist Party. If you visit a factory you'll be introduced to the manager, say, but since there's a Party organization in the factory, which assures that the organization hones to the Party line, the guidance given by the Party congresses, the Party Secretary holds the ultimate power.

You could see this party state structure very clearly in the meetings of the National People's Congress. You know the charts we show American school children about "how a bill becomes a law." There's a different chart for China. Passage of a law by the National People's Congress is the third and final step on their chart.

The first step is the meeting of the Party Congress. The Party drafts all the laws. At the meeting the Party announces its work plan and shapes needed legislation.

Once the Party Congress approves a bill, it goes on to the second step at the CPCC, the Chinese People's Consultative Congress. This is a rump organization, and this is a meaningless step, but it's a formal step required by history. The CPCC includes representatives of the rump, the remains, the fictional representatives of the democratic parties that had existed in 1949, now completely under the thumb of the CPC. All the individual representatives of the old parties that sit in the CPCC are personally approved by the CPC as reliable. The CPCC also includes selected and approved representatives of groups, like religious bodies, so that they can give their sanction to the Party's initiatives.

The second step in the process, then, is a formal and publicized consultation with these puppet representatives. In theory the CPC might integrate some of their concerns into the legislation, but this was never evident.

So, the bill has been drafted by the Party Congress and chopped by the Consultative Congress. Then it goes to the National People's Congress, which rubber stamps the bill. The NPC put a government/democratic/legislative cloak over the decisions of the party, a chop, so to speak, a seal, and they formally became laws.

The deep China watchers who lived and breathed Party congresses could see in the 1990s that little by little the meetings of the National People's Congress did include some policy debates. Here and there a few delegates actually voted "no" on a piece of legislation. These might have significance in the future, but at the time they were shallow, almost invisible, ripples on a smooth pond.

So, when you went to China you had to get used to this unusual party state structure. If there were any democratic winds blowing in China, or perhaps we could say participatory winds, they all had to be found within the party. Chinese would tell you that, “Oh well, yes, we don’t quite have your system of democracy, but you see there’s considerable democracy within the Party which represents the people.” This was not convincing, but you would hear it. The notion was that the 60 million members of the CPC somehow knew all the conditions of ordinary people in China, and the Party would address the issues on the inside. Here and there the Embassy’s political officers could wring out a few signs of liberalization and more permissive atmosphere for debate within the Party.

Q: Well then, what were you and your colleagues in Public Diplomacy up to?

BISHOP: In 1997 when I arrived, we had the traditional relationship between State and USIA at post.

USIS or PAS in China was called the Press and Culture Section. USIS in Beijing had a PAO, DPAO, IO and two AIOs, CAO and three ACAOs, an IRO, an OMS and some local hire Americans. The main office was in the Yiban compound, but we had several ACAOs, the IRO, the magazine editor, and the IRC in a high rise office building, the Jingguang Center, on the second ring road – the American Center for Education and Exchange (ACEE). We had branch posts at the consulates in Shenyang, Shanghai, Chengdu, and Guangzhou.

After I received word of the assignment to Beijing -- this was while I was in Dhaka -- I realized that the China assignment would test my management because the program was so large. In Dhaka I was running a full-service Public Diplomacy program, but I could be involved in everything. I could write press releases, I could organize programs, I could personally review Fulbright applications, and so on. I could still be “hands on.”

In China, I realized, that would no longer be possible. I would have to delegate. I would have to lay down the general direction for our programs, and think through the times that I would review how things were going. For the International Visitor program, for instance, I needed to focus on the instructions that went out to those nominating Chinese for the program, and I should chair the selection committee, and I would myself release each nomination cable, but in between, and afterwards, I didn't need to be micromanaging.

When I arrived I found that the outgoing PAO, George Beasley, and his outgoing DPAO, Charles Silver, had worked out a novel organization of the post. At most large USIS posts, the heart of the traditional DPAO position, the everyday business, was to supervise the work of the branch posts at the consulates. For the DPAOs in Seoul or New Delhi, for instance, the primary job was to tend the field programs. In those posts, it was the PAO who supervised and rated the Information Officer and the Cultural Affairs Officer and the Executive Officer.

But George Beasley had set up a much better system. The DPAO supervised the IO, the CAO, the EO, and the PAOs at the Consulates. The PAO directly supervised and rated only two people, the DPAO and the Office Management Specialist (once upon a time called the secretary).

This organization gave the DPAO far more authority and scope than merely being the manager of the field programs who also happened to sit at the PAO desk while the PAO was away. It was more like the military system, with the DPAO acting as Chief of Staff. I was quite pleased with this. I supervised everyone in USIS in Beijing and at the Consulates (except for the PAO and the OMS). I had the whole program as a Class One officer. Perhaps you could say I was the Chief Operating Officer.

Of course, I kept the PAO informed of any problems or issues, whether they were on the IO or the CAO side, and there was the ordinary crossfeed and guidance at staff meetings, but the issues were mine to work through as the direct supervisor. The PAO who replaced George, Paul Blackburn, also liked the new organization, and he continued the arrangement. Paul and I were together for three years. It was the best collaboration of my career.

This new organization gave the PAO time to strategize and work the Front Office in ways that other PAOs, tied up with supervising the IO and CAO, could not. The inspection team, for instance, had given the Ambassador informal feedback that the relationship between USIS and other parts of the Embassy was frayed. Paul did good work in ending any tension between parts of the Embassy. The novel organization of PAS gave him the time to do so.

There are a couple of other features of the post to note. One was the local Chinese employees. At other posts, our employees were FSNs, but in China our local employees were not our own direct hires. They were employees of the Foreign Ministry's Diplomatic Services Bureau (DSB). That deal had been made back when the Embassy was established. Not a week went by without us cursing it. We wondered what the original Liaison Office people or Embassy people who had made that deal had been thinking about.

The DSB arrangement meant that FSOs in China could not really develop the kind of full rapport with local employees seen at other posts. Their salaries came to them from DSB (which, by the way, took its own cut of what we paid for their services). You knew they had their own rank and promotions within the DSB. There was anxiety that they might be reporting to the DSB, not just on programs, but also on you and your quirks – and your contacts. This arrangement impaired the kind of bicultural collaboration that you had at other posts. There was speculation among the FSOs about who among the FSNs was the real leader of the DSB cell, or what was their rank over at the Diplomatic Services Bureau.

Q: That sounds like Moscow, where the Ambassador's chauffeur was probably a colonel in the KGB and that sort of thing. You know, I mean --

BISHOP: Yes, there was that kind of talk.

All that said, I'd learned from Bangladesh that being zealous for the FSN cause is an important way to develop rapport. I tried to develop relationships with all the senior local employees, and to prepare them for the day when the DSB system would be terminated and they would become FSNs.

Q: What kept the Information Officer and his staff busy?

BISHOP: Fielding the many requests for statements, interviews, and backgrounders that came from the international media filled up most days. So did organizing the press conferences for the many top-level visitors, handling the press at visit sites, or joining a visitor's entourage as "riding press officer." There was the normal requirement for press translations. The IO supervised the local-hire editor of Jiaoliu magazine. We arranged for Chinese journalists to visit the U.S. as part of the TV Coop program.

Speaking for a moment about the WTO, PAS was not at the negotiating table or in the meetings that resulted in China's accession, but we were steadily providing every statement of Administration policy to the Foreign Ministry, to China's scholars and policy institute specialists, and to the Chinese and international media. It was IO Bill Palmer -- one of the very best! -- who arranged the countless backgrounders for journalists and set up the press conferences for every Administration principal that came to Beijing for the negotiations.

Q: And the Cultural Affairs Officer?

BISHOP: We had all the exchange programs, and the CAO was the major point of contact with the Ministry of Education on the Fulbright program.

One ACAO tended the Fulbright program -- arranging the selection and travel of Chinese academics to the U.S., and supporting the American Fulbrighters who were teaching at Chinese universities. The American profs, most in China for the first time, needed a lot of hand-holding, especially because Chinese universities often wanted to treat a Fulbrighter as one more Foreign Expert or one more body that could be impressed to teach English.

Another ACAO handled the International Visitor program. The IVLP program in China had a different profile than in most other countries. We sent very few of the China IVs on group programs; almost all were solo IVs who traveled on individual schedules with a dedicated escort interpreter. Planning the individualized programs took a lot of time.

Another ACAO was designated as the Director of the American Center for Education Exchange, and that officer tended speakers and seminars along with many other odds and ends. Organizing a program in China for a visiting U.S. speaker was made more difficult by the need to arrange everything through the Foreign Affairs Office (waiban) at a Chinese university or think tank. The Chinese had their own ideas about topics.

Q: You have spoken before about "leaning" public diplomacy programs to support goals. Were you able to do this in China?

BISHOP: To the degree that I have had sway over our Public Diplomacy programs, what I always wanted to do was push the envelope on policy. I wanted to make sure, for instance, that our U.S. Speakers all addressed, directly or tangentially, the high priority issues in the Mission's strategic plan, and spoke to influential audiences. In China you could do things, but you had to do them in ways that were smart and worked within the Chinese system. As I mentioned, we always had to work through the Foreign Affairs Offices of Chinese government departments, universities, or organizations, and sometimes it took real creativity to get our speakers in the door.

I wanted to make sure that we had a vigorous conference diplomacy. I told each Branch Public Affairs Officer that we had enough money to fund a $15-30,000 conference in Shanghai, Shenyang, Guangzhou, and Chengdu each year. I said, “Set up a conference. My only guideline is that it be on a Country Plan or Mission Program Plan theme. You pick it out. If you love the environment, that's fine, environmental issues are in the Mission Program Plan. Go ahead and organize an environmental conference. If you're keen to advance the rule of law in China, that's also an MPP theme, so a rule of law conference would be great.” In Beijing, our part would be to send a keynote speaker from the U.S. and perhaps an Embassy officer to join the deliberations, I told them. One reason I did it this way was because I so valued autonomy. I wanted the Embassy to recognize the expertise and judgment of the officer on the ground. And I wanted the Public Diplomacy officers at the consulates to feel the enthusiasm that comes from being empowered.

USIS Beijing was still publishing Jiaoliu, the magazine I had helped launch when I was in Hong Kong. We began to run feature issues that addressed different country plan themes, giving Chinese specialists from the top to the bottom of their system a better view of U.S. policy, in Chinese.

I worked with the ACAO to reshape the International Visitor program nomination process to align it with MPP goals. The TV Coops that we proposed to Washington were on the same set of MPP objectives.

Perhaps the best example of the “leaning” – bringing as many programs in the Public Diplomacy toolkit to bear on our goals -- was broadening and deepening our focus on rule of law. More “rule of law” would support virtually every other U.S. goal in China -- political, economic, commercial, trade, and human rights. We could talk about this for a quite a while.

There's more to the Chinese legal system than meets the eye. We tend to think of China as having a top-down and unitary system of government. We imagined that if Jiang Zemin pounded his fists, then everyone in China, right down to the local village, would snap to. The reality was way more messy. The Party and the government issued guidelines and passed laws in the National People's Congress, but then every province's Party Congress and People's Congress had to develop its own implementing legislation and regulations. Laws were not, then, actually uniform within the whole country, so there was room to influence local authorities. Translations of American law texts could reach down to provinces and provincial law schools. Moot courts demonstrated by visiting American law professors could familiarize Chinese law students with the jury system. And so on.

Q: Well, one has to think about the Russian legal system as it developed, or didn't develop. It's so corrupt that much of the law is based on how much they can squeeze out of people, or punish people who are opposed to the local cadre and all.

BISHOP: Well, let's talk about that.

China's party state system is thoroughly corrupted by power, and its most important goal is to protect the Communist Party's monopoly on power. Protecting the Party's monopoly isn't just an abstract notion. It means defending the party secretaries or the deputy party secretaries down at the province or municipality. Those leaders have all found ways to squeeze the system for ill-gotten gains. They want to protect their power, and they want to protect their cash flows. It means the Party and government turn a blind eye to the venality of Party members and local officials, their petty and not-so-petty oppressions, their crony deals that evict ordinary citizens so that companies can amass more money, their infidelities, and the crimes committed by family members.

The legal system is co-opted, and cooperates. Local judges check with the Party Secretary first before they issue a ruling in any sensitive case. This is an integral part of the system of control that defends the status quo, defends the corruption within it, defends the power bases, and quashes any independent social movement.

Party members would never acknowledge this reality, but they understood that it was not law that held sway at the local level, but rather the caprice of local leaders. Party members understood that big league corruption was diminishing the standing of the party among Chinese people. Party members understood they had an interest in making the Party and government more honest. They understood that it was not in China's, and not in the Party's, long term interest that local judges were often retired Army officers and NCOs who didn't know the law and asked superiors for guidance on cases. The Party members understood this, but tomorrow's need for reform and honest government ran up against today's demand for cash and power. The few Party members who retained a spark of idealism were entangled by bosses and co-workers who were focused on power and the money, rewards, perks, cars, banquets, and mistresses that flowed from the power.

Everyone knows that changing the Chinese legal system, and its culture, will be the work not of years or decades but also generations. Still, if Public Diplomacy could get law school professors talking about the law, talking about standards, learning about international best practices, understanding how Chinese law had to keep up as the stock market boomed or property was developed or China developed its own strong entertainment industries, all this could in time be transformative. We found that working on rule of law programs with the law schools gave us an entry point into these conversations, and USIS programs, and our book translations, could have a significant effect.

China is an enormous country, but rule of law programs at the law schools gave us a leverage point in the Chinese legal system to move it in a better direction. The Chinese were interested in "rule by law" while we were speaking of "rule of law." Still, you have to have a law first. While I was there, China was suspended somewhere on a continuum between rule by law and rule of law, closer to the former than the latter, but we found that among China's law professors there was a strong desire to move toward the latter. The intellectuals were talking about rule of law, so were businessmen, and so were citizens, though in the Chinese way all the discussions were discreet and bounded, lest the system get pushed too hard.

I sensed the system was sufficiently open to discussion, and it led me to lean as much of our Public Diplomacy as I could in the direction of rule of law. I decided that spending time and money on rule of law would have a larger ultimate payoff than in some other areas. When I left, a quarter of all the Fulbrighters -- the Americans coming to China, the Chinese going to the U.S. -- were in law. To the Fulbright program, add speakers, add conferences, add articles in Jiaoliu, add the translation of law books -- I was trying to take all these diverse, and too often disconnected Public Diplomacy programs and get them increasingly focused on this single high priority issue. I think we made some good headway.

Probably we did more programs with the Beijing University Law School than the others, but we were sponsoring programs at other law schools in the Capital. The BPAOs also began to develop ties at the law schools in the consulate cities.

Of course, we couldn't visit a law school and give a fireball talk on human rights. They'd have cold feet on that, indeed, the Foreign Affairs Office would bar a presentation. But you could talk about all the parts of it. You could talk about evidence, you could talk about court procedures, you could talk about court administration and administrative law. You could address the roles of judges, and prosecutors, and attorneys. You could organize moot court sessions to introduce the jury system. It was using discussion of parts of the law to get to the whole -- rule of law.

Law in China had enough attention in Washington that justices of the Supreme Court visited from time to time. One was Sandra Day O'Connor. While I was in China, the justice I programmed was Anthony Kennedy, once when I was DPAO and once as PAO, as I recall.

When he came, I joined Justice Kennedy for his entire program. When he met students at a law school, of course he could draw on his vast experience as a speaker and a teacher to put together an inspirational talk. At Peking University he was very skillful, leading with the case of Yick Wo vs. Hopkins. This case from 1886 involved a California law on laundries that discriminated against Chinese laundrymen. The U.S. Supreme Court overturned the law. It was the perfect case for the audience of Chinese students. It addressed state law and Supreme Court review, it addressed how discrimination can be clothed in legal disguises, and it involved disadvantaged Chinese laundrymen getting a hearing in the highest court in the land. It counteracted the narrative that Chinese immigrants to the U.S. in the nineteenth century, the railroad workers and so on, encountered nothing but persecution by white America. It was a great talk.

Justice Kennedy of course understood that while visits and talks played a role, there needed to be long-term relationships between the law schools in Beijing and law schools in the United States. There were some ups and downs in that long-term effort. What the Chinese law departments wanted was bricks and mortar first, facilities. Their view was that facilities could house exchange professors and moot courts and so on. Interested American donors, however, didn't see it that way. They wanted to do the seminars and exchanges and courses first. Justice Kennedy didn't find so many eager donors.

That said, spending two or three days with a Supreme Court justice is a pretty rare thing, and riding across town with him, chatting, you got some inside glimpses of the Court. I didn't know, for instance, that among his colleagues Justice Scalia is called "Nino." You could tell Justice

Kennedy was a great teacher when he gave his talks, and when he talked about the Constitution. One of the great things about the American Constitution, he said, is that it is so short. Since I heard him say that, I've been looking at the length of constitutions -- Nigeria's must be 150 pages long. But ours fits in a little booklet. "Because it's short, it's teachable," he said. A 150-page constitution, how can you teach kids about that?

Q: And when a country's fundamental law runs 150 pages, it means they're going to be continually changing the damn thing.

BISHOP: That's true too! The teachableness of the American Constitution -- with a short constitution, you can plant the big ideas in the mind of even a seventh-grade civics student. That's what keeps the constitution alive in ordinary citizen's hearts. For instance, when you watch "Law and Order" or one of the other police or courtroom television programs, you learn that the law of evidence is quite complicated. All the complexities are for the police and the lawyers and the judges. An ordinary viewer can understand, however, that what everyone's arguing is "searches and seizures" in the Fourth Amendment. They know it from reading the Constitution in high school.

For many years the China Book Translation Program had been run by the Deputy Public Affairs Officer. I continued it, but I made a strategic turn to focus on law, where translation and publishing could make a real impact. I thought about a goal of translating in full fifty American law textbooks into Chinese -- contracts, torts, evidence, patents, copyrights, trademarks, securities, banking, financial regulation, and so on. I worried that the goal of fifty titles was too ambitious, but Paul Blackburn said, "Let's go for 100." We set in motion our own hundred flowers blooming. We partnered with the China University of Political Science and Law, partly because they had branch bookstores in law schools all over the country. Fast forwarding some, when I left Beijing in 2006 we had about 60 of those titles in motion. Even now, I think that the $5000 we spent on each volume was exceedingly good value.

The arrival of a translated law book on torts or evidence or property was a pretty big publishing event in Chinese legal circles because it introduced the whole array of American legal thinking to Chinese scholars and practitioners.

Q: You were promoting legal education through Fulbrights and exchanges. Did young Chinese have opportunities for jobs in law?

BISHOP: Another large question! The basic law credential in China is a bachelor's degree in law from a Chinese university. When I was in China, China was producing not so many graduates with that basic credential, but the law departments were expanding and so were the number of graduates with degrees in law.

As in the U.S., there are primo, blue ribbon law schools and not-so-famous schools. Among Chinese law graduates, there was the ordinary stratification. The best students could pass examinations to be judges or prosecutors, the very best finding positions in Beijing and Shanghai and the other leading cities, and others spreading out to smaller places. For the students without the stellar degrees, there were jobs to be found in Chinese government departments and, increasingly, in Chinese companies that wanted people who had a legal background. Again, a favorable location in a large city was preferable to a job in a smaller or more remote locale. And there was the beginning of a trend seen in other countries -- some of the private sector jobs that drew in law grads could pay more than the traditional prestige jobs as judges and prosecutors.

The presence of American businesses in China and the growth in trade was beginning to create a need for both American lawyers in China who understood China and for Chinese lawyers who understood the American legal system. A number of stateside law firms had offices in Beijing and Shanghai. The credentials of these expat attorneys were American, so they were not formally allowed to practice law in China. The firms also needed, then, Chinese attorneys who had had some legal education in the U.S., spoke English well, and understood the Chinese and American legal systems both. Some of these Chinese attorneys with LL.M. and J.D. degrees from the U.S. had also passed bar exams in the U.S. Many young Chinese law students hoped to get on a track for these jobs. Usually an LL.M. from an American law school was the gateway degree, and the prospect of a good future and good salaries made the investment worthwhile.

The short answer to your question, then, is that there were jobs for China's law school graduates. If we have too many lawyers, China has too few, so there was work for all in an expanding field.

Parenthetically, the first young American graduated from Peking University's law department while I was there. He was a real pathbreaker, deciding in high school to earn his bachelor's degree at Peking University. At the time, an American could easily qualify for admission -- now it's much harder. In any case, when he graduated, he could ask for any salary he wanted, and he went to work for one of the big New York law firms.

Q: In your experience, how much did leading Chinese know about the U.S.? Were they still looking at the U.S. through the same lens as Chairman Mao?

BISHOP: It's not possible to discuss this briefly, but let me give it a go.

In Chinese bureaucracies, the less creative, less energetic time servers who didn't really read or speak English -- their views of the United States had often been formed during the Cultural Revolution when they were young, and hadn't really changed. You could hear echoes of Marx and Chairman Mao when they spoke. The leading people in government departments or institutes had broader views. They were more sophisticated, though even in the 1990s they had to be careful in their language lest it appear they had been too influenced by the U.S.

I would also say that all Chinese, from the top to the bottom of their society, were watching American movies -- mostly illegal DVDs with not-so-accurate Chinese subtitles. Set aside the IPR issues for a moment. A steady diet of Hollywood gave them a sensationalized view of America -- drug abuse, car chases, corrupt cops, venal businessmen, abusive fundamentalists, gunfights on the streets.

One of the things that I noticed about the flow of communications, the exchange of knowledge, or the currents of mutual understanding between China and the U.S. was that there was an asymmetry in translation flows. If you sit in the Pentagon or the State Department, various parts of the U.S. government translate enormous amounts of material from Chinese and English. Much of it came from the Foreign Broadcast Information Service (FBIS), partnered with the BBC to share translations. I didn't have a good handle on it, but Defense had its own translation activities. At USIS we were a small part of this translation flow, doing our overnight press summaries and media reactions.

No one person, no diplomat, no analyst, no Congressional staffer, could read everything, so great was the daily flow. I won't say it's a Mississippi, but there's a Hudson River of translations that goes from Chinese to English, from China to the States. U.S. policymakers are, therefore, pretty well informed.

If you looked at all the U.S. government material on China -- think of all the studies, the testimonies, the papers -- there's a vast Lake Superior of stuff about China written in the United States. But only a little trickle of that gets put into Chinese. We were investing money and skilled manpower in helping American policymakers learn about China, but we never made a parallel investment in helping Chinese learn about the U.S. That meant that Chinese were not getting a good view of what Americans think about China. This also meant they were not getting a full view of their own society, because they were unable to access the many American papers and studies that might reveal to them what their own government did not.

It's true that Xinhua published two restricted circulation newspapers, for "internal use," neibu, for government and Party officials. These were Cankao Xiaoxi, "Reference News," and Cankao Ziliao, "Reference Materials." People at the Embassy believed that these two newspapers were the means by which senior leaders read about the United States and were exposed to foreign criticism of China. I never saw a copy of Cankao Ziliao, but occasionally it was possible to pick up a copy of Cankao Xiaoxi at from an inattentive seller at a news stand.

My own scan of a few issues indicated that the Xinhua editors were running a kind of foreign news digest. There were articles sourced to AFP, Tass, the BBC, and American wires, yes. I was surprised to see so many articles from the Central Daily News in Taiwan, the KMT newspaper. But all of these articles were heavily abridged, and editors were pulling their punches when the foreign articles opposed Chinese policies. I have my doubts that Chinese officialdom was seeing foreign reporting and commentary on China in any depth. I'm not sure the two newspapers were presenting the full range of opinions being published on the U.S. I tried to get the Embassy to support a formal study of the papers, but I couldn't interest anyone.

Convinced, then, of the imbalance in translation flows, I went to Beijing with two goals. One was that the Embassy web page must be in Chinese as well as English. That was the easy one.

The other was to have USIA launch a Chinese language version of the Washington File (formerly the Wireless File). When the File was launched in the 1950s, they had the anchor English version, but staff were also dedicated to producing a daily Spanish file, a French file, and an Arabic file, for instance. If the Secretary gave an important speech, it was translated into French in Washington, rather than asking each Francophone post to translate it for the local French-reading public.

When the Wireless Files had been set up in the 1950s we didn't have any relationship with China, so a Wireless File in Chinese had never been organized. That meant, for instance, that each year when the President delivered his State of the Union address, a battery of translators in Washington turned out French, Spanish, and Arabic texts which were immediately sent to posts around the world. In China, Public Affairs Sections had to organize big, crash efforts at post, to have everybody drop everything and to work into the evening. Of course it was done in Taipei and Hong Kong and Beijing because no post could wait for the other to do the work, not to mention that usages in the three places had diverged after 1949.

It was mind-boggling that there was no Chinese version of the Washington File, and every time one had been proposed over the years, Washington pleaded it's too hard, or we don't have the people, or no one has given us funds, all the usual pathetic bureaucratic excuses. I couldn't stand it. With Paul Blackburn's assent, I wrote one of my best cables ever, saying a Chinese Washington File was long overdue and had to be organized NOW! I wrote it bluntly enough that it actually got people's attention in Washington, and the new version of the File was going within a few months.

I didn't have to do the hard work of organizing the new File, finding the money, justifying the new positions, the FTE's, and hiring a team. Bob Holden had to do that in Washington. Still, I think it was my cable that galvanized Washington, and it set in motion a permanent structure in the government to increase the flow of translations out to China.

Q: I recall President Clinton made a visit to China. What was the public affairs role?

BISHOP: President Clinton came to visit China while I was there. This was the nine-day visit from June 25 to July 3, 1998.

You experienced enough visits by a President or Secretary of State in your career to know that even a three-day visit about grinds an Embassy into total incoherence.

Q: One presidential visit is equivalent to an earthquake.

BISHOP: This visit was nine days. The first question is what can a President do in one country for nine days?

The trip was planned for months. First, the President landed in Xi'an to be greeted. He came to meetings in Beijing, followed by a visit to Shanghai. And he went down to Guilin to take the river cruise, and he went out through Hong Kong.

The political and economic officers had their own headaches setting up the appointments with high officials -- Jiang Zemin, Zhu Rongji -- focusing on the U.S.-China agenda. Everyone else dropped everything to handle the lodging and vehicles and security and communications for two Boeing 747s of visitors. This meant tangling with the Secret Service and the scores of young people -- let me be blunt, ignorant and bossy young people -- sent by the White House for the pre-advance, the advance, the lead and so on.

One of the 747s was completely filled with traveling media. There was the sizable Beijing-based press corps, and hundreds of other journalists arranged their own travel to China from all over Asia. The Japanese and Koreans sent many dozen representatives of the pencil press and video crews. This came to about a thousand journalists, all wanting access and good coverage. Just credentialing the American press was a big hassle of its own. Parenthetically, the Chinese refused visas to two reporters from Radio Free Asia, which became the subject of cables and demarches as the trip drew near.

For USIS, in each city we had to set up all the media coverage, and we had to set up filing centers for all the members of the traveling media that accompanied the President. There wasn't wi-fi in those days. Now, journalists can write stories in their hotel rooms and send them to editors via the internet. Back then, however, we had to set up an old fashioned press center at each location -- hundreds of telephones, hundreds of desks, hundreds of internet lines, an industrial copier, and AIOs to tend to the journalists' wishes. This had to be done in Xi'an, in Beijing, and at all the other stops.

Every Chinese-speaking Public Diplomacy officer in the Foreign Service was yanked out of whatever they were doing. Many retirees were "recalled." George Beasley, for instance, came back, and he set up everything for the Xi'an greet, and then he leapfrogged to Guilin.

As I said, the numbers were intimidating. There was a Boeing 747 that carried the President and his staff, and there was a second 747 for the traveling press. Just hauling the baggage from the aircraft to the hotel, and back, at each stop had to be done with military precision with bossy young Washington staff acting like they were Drill Instructors at Parris Island.

Q: Why Xi'an?

BISHOP: Xi'an is where the terra cotta warriors are, so in Xi'an you can see the majesty of China's ancient culture, and its history. It's a pretty interesting city. It provided good photo-ops. Had I been setting things up, though, I would not have made Xi'an the first stop because that is where northern chiefs and kings entered China on their way to pay proper obeisance to the Emperor. President Clinton's stopping in Xi'an fit too easily into a Chinese template.

Q: This is a kowtow or ...

BISHOP: Yes, there was some of that image. President Clinton of the so-called mighty superpower has come to China, through Xi'an just like the barbarians of ancient times.

Paul Blackburn, the PAO, was in his real element. Paul's experience with high level visits made him understand that the PAO needed to be with the President's spokesman the whole time. With Consulate PAOs reinforced by TDYers handling public affairs on the other stops, I was the anchor in Beijing.

The visit was quite successful. The joint press conference with Jiang Zemin and Bill Clinton was broadcast live. The President gave a speech at Peking University, and he was interviewed on a radio talk show in Shanghai.

Still, the Chinese were happy to jerk us around. We wanted the joint press conference to be broadcast live. They consistently said no, but then consented, but only an hour and a half before an event scheduled for the middle of the day. Because there was no advance announcement, no one was tuned in. As for the radio talk show in Shanghai, the reach of the program was quite limited.

At any rate, we were doing the USIA thing, trying to really allow the Chinese to hear American leaders unfiltered by how Xinhua or People's Daily would rewrite the story.

I came to understand how Xinhua reported visits by foreign leaders. Here's the simple version. Every visit included a policy speech. The speeches characteristically began with a few words like "it's good to be here in this great country." So the next day's Xinhua lead was "Visitor Calls China a Great Country." The speeches usually include boilerplate about our happy concord and greater progress and partnership and blah de dee blah blah, and then, toward the end, "we still have to make progress on this or that," or "we Americans are concerned about this and the other." These sentences are the policy heart of the speech, but of course they were never reported by Xinhua.

For domestic stories, Xinhua never admits that China has any problems until the Party has started to solve them. Xinhua's China is a kind of la la land. This is why a major Public Diplomacy goal for every visit was to allow American words to be broadcast directly, so that our messages would be heard without being subject to the intermediate editorial hand of Xinhua or the newspapers.

It was gratifying that the President and Mrs. Clinton attended the Chongwenmen Church in Beijing, and Mrs. Clinton and Secretary Albright attended a ceremony at the old synagogue in Shanghai. Our top visitors made it a point to attend worship services in China, to demonstrate the U.S. commitment to religious liberty.

Q: Haven't these visits to places of worship rankled the Chinese?

BISHOP: By the late 1990s, I'm sure, the Chinese were used to the requests. They were always to places of worship affiliated with the officially recognized Three-Self Protestant church, so that eased their anxieties. Even so, worshippers in China were cheered by the visits by high-level Americans.

While we're discussing religion, though, let me mention something more. During the 1990s, there was a lot of talk in the United States about the religious right, and in our own domestic discourse it was the dangerous religious right, or the theocratic religious right. I fess up. I'm a member of the religious right. So when Chinese began to take their lead from the U.S. critics, getting all concerned about the impact of the religious right on American politics and U.S.-China relations, it particularly got to me.

These Chinese misreadings fit into the PRC's own historical narrative. In the Party's take on the nineteenth century, the missionaries were just imperialists in disguise, talking happy Jesus talk when their real goal was to keep China down. The Chinese concerns over the religious right also gave testimony to the strict controls on religion in China.

Over the years I've observed that when religion is a topic of discussion, Foreign Service Officers who themselves are not religious have a kind of tin ear. Too often they don't know how to respond because they don't have a basic sympathy for the effect of religion on a man's or woman's heart. They're not very effective in discussing religion in American society. Say you're having a conversation with the scholars at the Chinese policy institutes, a quiet one with no journalists. They might ask, "What about this religious right in the United States? You know, they seem to be demonizing China."

It's not unlikely that there are FSOs who personally regard the "religious right" with disdain or alarm. "Ohh, religious right," and the roll of the eyes indicates they've dismissed the religious right in their own understanding of American society, and they communicate that it's illegitimate to the Chinese. Just as illegitimate as opposing abortion, say, or gun control. The Chinese have their own tin ears, since all members of the Party have to abjure belief in God when they take their oaths as new members of the Party.

I noticed, then, that questions about "the religious right" indicated that the Chinese lack of understanding about religion was an obstacle to mutual understanding. Our human rights policy certainly draws on religious views, or on views of justice grounded on religious values, and we weren't communicating this well to the Chinese.

So what do you do? The Chinese are very sensitive about religion. They consistently refused to allow us to program speakers in this area. I was looking for an article that I could run in our magazine, Jiaoliu, explaining religion in the United States -- a straightforward, scholarly, non-religious article, but one which acknowledged the important role of religion in American society. Once it was translated into Chinese, we could reprint it, we could refer to it, we could put it on our web page, we could do things with it. Alas, I could never find one. Many articles that addressed the topic were not good for Chinese readers because they presumed too much cultural knowledge.

I finally decided there was nothing for me to do but to write an article myself. I spent a month, I suppose, writing out a primer on the place of religion in American society in a strictly factual way. At the end it gave some introduction to religion as a factor in American politics and foreign policy.

I was thinking that it would be published in Jiaoliu, but quite to my surprise, when I showed the article to scholars at the Institute of American Studies at the Chinese Academy of Social Sciences, they liked it. They published it in their own journal. I think I may have been the first Embassy officer to have been published by the Chinese Academy of Social Sciences. My friends at the Academy told me that there was enough buzz about the religious right among senior Chinese leaders that my article "went to the top." I suppose they prepared a cover letter and sent it up the chain. I don't know if Jiang Zemin read it, but it circulated among senior leaders.

The article was published in their journal, Meiguo Yanjiu, "American Studies," and it also went on their website. Their imprimatur was a chop saying it is OK to read and cite.

We took the same article and published it in Jiaoliu as we originally planned. Of the things I've published in my life -- and I still consider myself an active historian, though in the minor leagues, of course -- that is my most cited article. It's been loaded onto dozens of Chinese websites. The Director of the Institute of American Studies told me on my second tour that it is the most cited article in Chinese social science literature on religion in the United States. I really think I did a good turn for Uncle Sam when I wrote it.

Q: I assume it was written initially in English.

BISHOP: Yes, and the Institute of American Studies translated it into Chinese, and our own magazine's translator tweaked it some for the Jiaoliu version.

Q: Can you append it to this interview?

BISHOP: I think I could, yes.

Q: Well, this brings up the question of religion and how the Chinese have shown themselves to be extremely sensitive to --

BISHOP: The Falun Gong.

Q: Yes. Was that an issue when you were there?

BISHOP: I have a hard time distinguishing between my first and second tours, but let's talk about religion in general.

Religion looks to a higher authority than government, something higher than the ordinary political order. The Chinese Communist Party established itself as the top of the political, economic, and social order in 1949. Religion's appeal to higher principles is something that Party can't endorse, and indeed regards as inherently subversive, so there's a permanent state of tension between the Party and religion.

At different times believers in China have undergone persecutions. The Chinese constitution, when it was written in 1949, did include a sentence about freedom of religion, just as the Soviet Union's constitution had. But like all Communist constitutions, freedom of religion is one of those things subject to law.

When the People's Republic stood up, the Communist Party and the PRC government established organizations to handle religion, or perhaps to contain it. On the government side, there's a State Administration of Religious Affairs. On the Party side, the United Front Work Department tends religious issues. There are five authorized religious bodies -- the Chinese Patriotic Catholic Association, the Three Self Protestant Association, a Daoist Association, a Buddhist association, and a Muslim association. The Party assures that the leaders of these associations do not allow religion to threaten the basic order, the leadership of the Party, and the fundamental atheism of the state.

So there's a small licit place for religion in Chinese society. If you're a member of any of those religious bodies, though, you forfeit your opportunity to become a Party member because of the oath that Party members have to take. So yes, there's freedom of religion to join one of those five religious organizations, but there are what Jefferson would have called temporal burdens and civil incapacitations that follow from that. A believer knows his worldly advancement will be capped.

It's worth noting that the list of five faiths has some striking omissions. There's no Jewish association even though there have been Jews in China for a thousand years. There's no association for Mormons. The Church of Jesus Christ and Latter Day Saints has long hoped to become an open religion in China. Notice, too, that all the Protestants got grouped together.

By the way, the meaning of "Three Self" is that Protestants in China should be, first, self-propagating. That means there should be no foreign teachers or missionaries. Only Chinese can talk to Chinese about religion. Second, Protestants should be self-supporting, meaning that no foreign money can help build churches or buy Bibles. The third is "self-governing." There can't be any foreigners in religious bodies.

The same principles apply to the other official groups. There can't be a Jesuit university in China. There can't be bishops named by the Pope because that would mean the Holy Father is governing the Church in China. For all the faiths, there can't be subordination to any hierarchy that is not Chinese, which means the Pope or the Dalai Lama or the LDS Quorum of the Twelve.

The system, then, does allow a small and circumscribed place for religion in China, but it is a place subject to extreme vigilance by government and Party.

As the years have gone by, that place has become a little more open, and there's more toleration of these five groups, depending on decade and place. The system has had, however, an unintended side effect.

The five religions -- Catholicism, Protestantism, Buddhism, Daoism, and Islam -- are what I call "mature" religions. All are religions with centuries of meditation on the great moral issues, and also meditation on the relationship between church -- what we would call "church" -- and society. All of them have centuries of experience in dealing with different forms of government.

The desire for values and guidance to help a person through life is written in the human heart. Religions are one way that people find meaning, indeed, the way most people find meaning. This desire for meaning is very intense. Any Chinese will tell you that's a major problem for China in the twenty-first century -- the lack of meaning beyond a richer material life, the lack of a code of morality that supports justice. In the 1950s and 1960s, the Party tried to make China's brand of socialism, socialist rectitude, and the teachings of Chairman Mao the new moral reference point. We can be diplomatically understated and say it didn't work out well, and the Party is now entirely discredited in this role.

Where I'm going is that when the mature religions don't have an opportunity to engage a person, the heart still has the longing. Without religious teaching, or moral teaching at the least, the longing can go off into crazy directions, like money and fame.

The mature religions can provide all of this, but the door to their revelations, their meditation, their reasoning and to the consolations of faith is only open a crack. Chinese yearnings for faith are as powerful as anywhere in the world, but the Party cannot allow Chinese to embrace faith in something higher than itself. When the mature faiths are not allowed to meet the yearning, immature religions may take their place. One sign is the sway of relatively unlettered Protestant pastors in some rural areas, pastors with a few months of seminary and self-taught Bible study, who can gather some followers. In the Catholic mythology of my youth, you'd hear talk of ignorant country preachers, Protestants of course, derided as "snake handlers." Some of these Chinese countryside preachers remind one a little of that old stereotype.

And then you get new religions, like Falun Gong, which meets the desire for meaning, for solace, for all the things that religion provides. It started from breathing exercises, qigong, meditation, and getting your heart to calm down and all of that, but it grew and became a new religion. The Chinese Government's response to it has been ugly.

The meaning of all this for U.S. Public Diplomacy is that there's a constant tension between an America dedicated to religious liberty because of our founding principles, and China, where the government is more or less -- sometimes more, sometimes less, some places more, some places less -- trying to keep the lid on religion.

Q: As the Embassy's Public Diplomacy person, were you feeling pressure from religious communities in the United States to do something?

BISHOP: No doubt religious leaders in the U.S. from many faiths spoke to the State Department on Chinese persecution and the need for religious liberty in China, but I never got any calls from Catholics or Protestants or the Mormons to do this. They may have been coming in through other channels, perhaps reaching the Political Section each year when the Human Rights Report was prepared, but I wasn't feeling it. I did it because my conscience demanded it.

This demand met the Public Diplomacy need to figure out China and the communication asymmetries between our two nations, to understand where there was no meeting of the minds, and to help China better understand the U.S. Our posture on religious liberty, and the tension with China that derived from it, didn't come out of nowhere. It wasn't suddenly invented by Jimmy Carter or Ronald Reagan or the "religious right" just to give China a hard time. I wanted them to understand what it was our history and our social order that moved us in this area.

Q: OK, what about the academic side? I remember, growing up, meeting people who had been in the Yale in China program. Tell us about academic connections between China and the United States.

BISHOP: Certainly the academic ties between China and the U.S. were growing -- during both my Beijing tours. This is a rather large topic, and we only have time to discuss the wave tops.

One current in the stream was individual students going to study in the other country. The Chinese were limited in the early years after 1979 by lack of English, some; for lack of visas, some more; but mostly because education at American universities was so expensive by their standards. Still, each year there were more Chinese students in the U.S., mostly in graduate programs. And there were more American scholars -- faculty and students -- in China, though the numbers were fewer and their stays were shorter.

Both sides wanted to set up something more permanent than the flow of individual scholars -- longer-term relationships and programs. This dovetailed with the belief that long term educational relationships could help avoid conflict between China and the United States in the future.

Before I came, the Hopkins-Nanjing program had been established. The American students go to Nanjing University where they bunk with Chinese roommates. The Americans take classes in Chinese, and the Chinese take classes in English. But there were beginning to be other programs -- law school programs, language programs, even undergraduate programs. The growth, however, was not symmetric. Far more Chinese were studying in the U.S. than Americans in China. The Chinese went to the U.S. for full degree programs; the Americans came for shorter periods, sometimes for only a few weeks. The Americans in China faced obstacles and sensitivities that Chinese in the U.S. did not encounter.

The asymmetry in numbers was partly a function of language. Chinese, when they applied to study in the United States, had been studying English for years. They will all confess that no matter how long they studied English, they were still shocked when they actually got to the United States and realized how poorly they had been prepared. Still, they were far better prepared than American students going to China. Chinese is taught in few American high schools, so American students start later. And they could only study Chinese at large comprehensive universities. So Americans are way behind in Chinese language study.

Q: Was there a solid cadre of Chinese students majoring in Americana? American history and so on?

BISHOP: Every year there were, and there are, more Chinese students who are serious about studying English, and the opportunities to learn English in China are now good enough that there are many university students whose English is quite good even though they had never been to the States. There's some understanding of American society and culture that naturally flows out of learning the language. There's also fascination with, or interest in, America's popular culture. Movies, illegal DVDs, and just the buzz about the United States -- our cultural presence all over the world -- drew people more to us than to the British.

I think, though, that most of the interest in English was not in the first case driven by curiosity or good will or a desire to understand America. Rather it was driven by the desire for good jobs. A young Chinese who could land a job with the Price Waterhouse office in Beijing was on his or her way to success. This is especially true for Chinese women, who have opportunities for advancement in foreign companies that they don't have in their own.

This is where I think the economic opening was ramifying. The opening didn't have just economic effects or trade effects. It also had larger cultural effects by creating incentives for people to study English, and as we've always known, when you study the language, understanding the culture follows.

All that said, I think your question was about American Studies. There's no doubt that Chinese scholars -- from the real experts at the policy institutes to undergraduates writing papers -- were trying to understand America's economy, history, law, society, and so on. Individual students and faculty members were doing so without formal majors or programs in American Studies, and there wasn't an American studies movement or an American Studies society.

There was demand for a movement or a society, but it ran up against the controls established by the Party. A proposal to establish an American studies track at a university, or hold an American studies conference, or recognize a local American studies organization would surely go up the chain and need approval by the Party Secretary. The Party defaulted to a general distrust of the United States, so such approvals were rare.

About the only platform for American Studies at the time was the American Studies Center at Fudan University in Shanghai, which had been set up in the 1980s with the approval of the university's President Xie Xide, who had studied at Smith College in the class of 1949. During the Cultural Revolution she had been barred from teaching and was locked inside a lab for ten months. She cleaned lavatories and swept floors in the Physics Department.

As far as a society was concerned, the Institute for American Studies at CASS had an American Studies Society as one of its affiliates, and the rule was that no local American Studies society could be organized except in concert with CASS. The Party had made this arrangement to crowd out any independent organizing. This wasn't just true of American Studies. No independent women's organization could exist outside the purview of the All China Women's Federation, a Party organization, for instance.

All over the world, USIS posts supported American Studies societies and conferences. In China, we couldn't do so directly. It required some indirection, sponsoring conferences and activities that focused on specific issues rather than on America, and the Party working through the Foreign Affairs Offices of universities and policy institutes could turn the spigot on or off as needed.

Q: Do I recall that the bombing of the Chinese Embassy in Belgrade happened while you were in Beijing? That caused major demonstrations, as I recall.

BISHOP: Yes, a NATO aircraft bombed the Chinese Embassy, killing three, and the NATO aircraft was an American B-2 bomber from Missouri. The circumstances of the mission and the intelligence error that caused the bombs to be dropped on the Chinese Embassy are in the public record, so I don't need to go through them here. I can give one man's view of things from the Embassy, though.

I first heard of the deadly mishap from a journalist on Saturday morning of May 8, 1999. I must not have had enough coffee that morning, because I didn't anticipate the sharpness of the Chinese reaction to the news. I went to the office in mid-morning to work on efficiency reports. I went home for lunch and went back to my office in the Embassy's Yiban compound afterwards. At about 3 p.m. I received a call from the Marines -- they were calling every office -- to tell me I should leave the Embassy. The word was that the demonstrations were coming.

The outrage in China was quite palpable. My office was at Yiban, and as evening approached angry students and citizens began to protest at Erban and Sanban, the two other Embassy buildings separated by a street between. I was following events from my apartment in the Jianguomenwai Compound a few blocks away, watching it live on CNN. If you ever have a chance to see the television footage, it's quite dramatic.

Where there were entrances, gates, to our two compounds, the People's Armed Police had three rows of men with interlocked arms blocking access. The physical pressure on those policemen was high, and from time to time two young policemen in the front row might lose contact with one another, but the lines held. There was screaming and shouting. Students were climbing the trees on the street to see if they could get over the wall. Hundreds of people were throwing rocks over the walls at the buildings -- many were substantial paving stones. Here and there a Korean-style Molotov cocktail would sail over the wall and burn between the wall and the building.

It was very dangerous. Most everyone had been evacuated from the three Embassy buildings, but not everyone. The Ambassador's residence was behind our USIS offices in the Yiban compound, and Ambassador Sasser's family was hunkered down inside. They moved to the safe haven for the compound, which was the old vault next to my office. Our IO, Bill Palmer, was there with the Ambassador's family members.

Bill had gone through the police lines into our Yiban building to fax the Ambassador's condolences to the Chinese media, but then he couldn't leave. You may recall that President Clinton had done also expressed condolences, but he did it rather off-handedly on the tarmac at Andrews AFB. The optics -- too casual, informal -- were not good and angered the Chinese. Bill Palmer told me that the most tense moments followed the end of a soccer game at People's Stadium. Departing fans poured into the neighborhood and bombarded our Yiban building and the Ambassador's residence with paving stones and rocks.

Still inside the two main buildings were the Marines and about five others including the Ambassador. Things were so dangerous that they began to destroy the Embassy's files in accordance with the destruction plan, going from safe to safe and tossing everything into the shredders.

I digress here and say -- it's very interesting what happens in an Embassy when all the documents have been destroyed. Six months later, a pesky request comes in from Washington for information -- Washington is famous for asking Embassies to search files that could as easily be accessed in the Department, but they like to dump the work on posts. After the records had been shredded, Beijing could reply, "gosh, we don't know. We don't have any records from then." It considerably lightens the burden of work.

Anyway, the documents were being destroyed, and the Ambassador was one of the five Foreign Service people in the building while infuriated people are rioting outside. Once in a while, a Chinese would manage to get over the wall, but would be pulled out by other Chinese or by the People's Armed Police before doing any damage or getting hurt.

The Marines were safely inside the building too. There were no breaches of the doors or windows, and if there had been a penetration all would have retreated into the safe haven. If, in the charged atmosphere, the confusion, the rage, anyone would have been killed -- this is a "what if," it didn't happen -- I think the Embassy would have been razed to the ground. It was, in any case, very touch and go.

The demonstrations continued a second night and a third. The fourth night was calmer.

I have photos of the piles of rubble outside the Embassy from all the paving stones. The walls were stained with eggs and burst bottles of ink. It was the same over at our Yiban building. That was the event.

Paul Blackburn and I would go to our compound each morning -- the streets were calm for a few hours after the night's demonstrations. The compound was full of stones and rocks, all the windows were broken, the offices were strewn with broken glass inside, air conditioners were damaged.

Q: Where could you go? Could you go home?

BISHOP: Except for the Ambassador and his family in The Residence, everyone in the Embassy lived in one of the diplomatic compounds. Our apartment was only a few blocks away in the Jianguomenwai compound. We were safe there. Nobody was going to go in and bust their way past the PAP guards and the Brazilians and the Nigerians and the Euros in order to get to us. It was our office buildings that were damaged.

I hope you will have a chance to interview our BPAO in Chengdu, Joe Bookbinder. He has quite a tale of the assault on the Consulate compound and the burning of the Consul General's residence there.

When the crisis passed and the Ambassador was able to leave the compound, he held an impromptu press conference in the parking lot of the Jianguomenwai Diplomatic Compound. I was the one to set it up, and my sister emailed me from Connecticut to say that she saw me in the background. Perhaps five seconds of international exposure! I'm still owed fourteen minutes and 55 seconds of fame.

The Ambassador was calm and reassuring, and in the course of his brief comments he mentioned how steady the Marines had been. A while later, this resulted in a telephone call from Jamie Rubin to Bill Palmer -- to pass the word that the White House didn't want to see any comments from the Embassy that might imply that the Embassy had been the Alamo.

After the bombing and the demonstrations, we in USIS were looking at a wreckage of all the patient work we had been doing -- in rule of law, and trade, and building mutual understanding and trust. I'm sure our colleagues in DAO were facing even greater wreckage to the mil-to-mil relationship. Paul Blackburn and I realized that the bombing was a real setback. Even though it would take years to repair, we had to do something to restore communication and dialog between the Chinese and U.S. scholars who best understood the long-term challenge of bringing our two nations closer together. It had to be done sooner not later.

Paul came up with the idea of immediately organizing videoconferences between scholars at key Chinese foreign policy institutions and their American counterparts. Getting the Chinese to participate in the videoconferences was the first challenge. The next step was to persuade the Chinese to host quiet, face-to-face gatherings of Chinese and Americans to talk through all the issues that the bombing called forth.

We spent some money on this, generously covering the Chinese institutes for costs -- lodging, meals, honoraria, and so on. Chinese hosts always tried to make some money whenever we hosted an event, charging the foreigners high room and meal rates in hotels their Ministry owned, higher than the rack rates, for instance, and we always tried to trim these costs. After the bombing, however, we paid what they asked -- in order to get things going.

I believe we were successful in getting the Chinese university and policy institute scholars -- all of whom were advisors to ministries -- together with Americans faster than they would have on their own. Fortunately, we could do so from post funding, so that we could make things happen without depending on Washington to dither over money. Paul's idea of jumping right into this was a very good one.

Q: Well, it does, you know, something that struck me about that and then later the plane collision and al. The Chinese seem to be a very touchy people, and these demonstrations can get going. You kind of wonder, can you really have good relations with such a touchy people?

BISHOP: Here's my short take on what's a very large question. Dealing with the Chinese on anything, even in calm and ordinary times, you run into some unique features of the Chinese personality -- "face," for instance. Every time you negotiate a deal, or work with the Chinese, there's a chance of unknowingly running up against a Chinese sensitivity.

You might say or do something with the French or the Germans that hit them wrong, but there's enough cultural overlap so that they would understand your intentions and overlook the intercultural faux pas. The Chinese are more distant culturally, and they have their own cultural and behavioral characteristics. When you deal with them, you need to be careful not to do anything that pushes them far enough to get a face-driven negative reaction. You must know these general features of the Chinese personality that have been thousands of years, I suppose, in the making.

Then, there's another factor to deal with -- the narrative, the Chinese understanding of their own history. The Party's and the PRC's narrative of Chinese modern history is that in 1500s, 1600s, and 1700s, China was the most advanced, the most humane, the most prosperous society in the world. Then the Europeans came and made China submit. China's centuries of shame began with the First Opium War in 1842. And, according to the narrative, the whole history of the 19th and early 20th century was the West keeping China down, denying China its rightful place in the world, taking advantage of China. This narrative was expressed early in the 20th century by those who founded the old Republic, and the Communists sharpened it. It had, and has, the advantage of pointing to others as the cause of China's woes.

The narrative is deeply seared into the Chinese mind, and there are ripple effects. When the Communists took over in 1949, they liked the narrative, gave it Marxist, Communist, and revolutionary characteristics. They built on the narrative that described foreigners as imperialists whose predations were motivated by the aim of keeping China down. In the late 1940s, members of the PLA were taught by their political officers that the U.S. was as great an enemy as Chiang Kai-Shek.

The narrative is taught in the schools. The Party assures that museums, or television dramas, or anniversary celebrations, repeat the narrative. All the versions of the narrative in the 1950s, 1960s, and 1970s were strongly anti-American. The Chinese took to heart many of the Soviet Union's criticisms of the U.S. and capitalism. I noticed this from looking at PRC magazines from that time before the Sino-Soviet split. The PRC magazine Manhua drew on all the same visual tropes as the Soviet Union's Krokodil.

Even after 1979 when China turned direction with Deng Xiaoping's policy of opening, the features of that narrative never changed. It takes a party decision to allow the narrative to be changed. Individual Chinese scholars might come to understand that the outcome of the Opium Wars were as much China's fault as they were the West's. They might understand that the Dowager Empress did more to diminish China's standing in the late 19th century when she crushed China's own self-strengthening movement than did the foreign powers. Scholars might understand that the Boxer Rebellion was not what Party historians said it was. You could talk with individual scholars here and there and help them see a new view of things. But to get the Party to change what is taught in the schools -- that was something we could not accomplish.

Nanjing was where the first treaty between the United States and China was signed. Inside a park there's a pavilion where the documents were signed and exchanged. The park is one of Nanjing's "patriotic bases." Every school child in the city, sometime during their education, will tour the patriotic base stations. At the park where the treaty with the U.S. was signed, the Party tour leaders talk about the unequal treaties. The "unequal treaty" with the U.S. was far less unequal than those with other Western powers. It offered more opportunities and partnership to China in the 19th century than the treaties signed with the other imperial powers. Still, at the patriotic base, the United States is grouped with all of them. This is all part of the problem of "narrative" that U.S. Public Diplomacy encounters.

When I wrote the paper on religion in the U.S., I was trying to challenge the Chinese narrative on religion. When you organize American studies conferences, you're trying to challenge or perhaps chip away at the narrative. The narrative is so strong, and it has been taught so thoroughly, however, that whatever headway you make in the face of the narrative is highly vulnerable to any shock in U.S.-China relations. The bombing of the Chinese Embassy in Belgrade provided that kind of shock, and all the old feelings of distrust re-emerged, multiplied by the outrage and anger.

In the aftermath of the bombing, Chinese scholars that I knew appeared on television to help explain what was going on to viewers. Even though I knew these scholars to be thoughtful, knowledgeable, friends of the United States, and perhaps even “liberal” in the Chinese context, when they were faced by outraged Chinese opinion, they said things that conformed to the Party’s narrative instead of what they knew in their own mind to be the circumstances.

Q: There was a scandal involving the President while you were in China.

BISHOP: Yes. Paul Blackburn and I both happened to be working in our two offices in Yiban one Saturday morning when the Monica Lewinski news first broke.

Q: As embarrassing as it comes.

BISHOP: Yes! We realized even at the time of the first report that this might become Watergate all over again -- a major crisis that would engulf the Presidency. As things unfolded over the weeks and months, our worst prognosis alas proved justified.

Q: Actually it boiled down to a congressional coup.

BISHOP: That's one way to look at it ...

Q: The president --

BISHOP: Well, it was possible that it would go away, but at the same time we realized this could be really big, really big. I remember that on the following Monday we had our regular tight staff meeting of PAS Americans. One of our AIOs had been hiking in the woods that weekend and hadn’t heard the news. She asked, “What’s this? What are you talking about?” And Paul said, “We may be on the edge of a major constitutional crisis.”

When Paul and I talked about it on Saturday, though, we sensed that it could have an effect not just in Washington but also on the Embassy. I told Paul, “OK, here's the only solution for the President.” This is a joke, a public affairs strategy joke, you understand. “He should drive immediately to Lynchburg. He should go to Sunday services at Jerry Falwell's congregation.”

Q: A very conservative Christian ...

BISHOP: Yes, head of the Moral Majority. “Go to Jerry Falwell’s church, and when in an Evangelical way Falwell asks, ‘anyone who would like to repent should come forward,’ the President should walk down the aisle, fall on his knees, and confess.” That would clear the air of any denials. And it would also split the religious right into two groups -- the group that wouldn't forgive him, and the group that would say “oh, he’s seen the light. If he can repent, we must be Christian and forgive him.” End of joke.

Still, as things turned out, it would have been good advice -- good from the public affairs angle (admit wrongdoing right away, don't think you can hide something), and good from the political angle!

Q: Before we leave Monica Lewinski, what did you do? I mean, how did you play it?

BISHOP: As the crisis unfolded, Chinese officialdom was completely nonplussed. What on earth was going on? So much ado about nothing! Don't these Americans have odd hangups?

Of course, some Embassy officers were also nonplussed, and I'd say the reactions at the Embassy paralleled what Americans were thinking at home. Those Americans at the Embassy who were more politically liberal downplayed the crisis and the President's infidelity, and those who were more conservative were dismayed. In China, however, those among us who were critical of the President's behavior could hardly say so. This is because the Foreign Service always defaults to supporting an administration, and defaults to downplaying political earthquakes.

As the scandal unfolded, I came to a conclusion about Public Diplomacy. When an individual officer is convinced, on any issue, he or she argues and advocates. When an officer doubts, or lacks conviction, she just explains.

There was plenty to explain without taking sides in the U.S. domestic battle. As in, here are the provisions in the Constitution about impeachment. Here's the precedent of Andrew Johnson. Here is how hearings work. A special prosecutor can do this, and can't do that. Did you know the House impeaches, the Senate tries? Here's what the managers do. And so on. It was a good opportunity to acquaint the Chinese with parts of American governance they weren't familiar with.

Said again, when Americans are overseas as diplomats, we don't show our own Democrat or Republican preferences to foreigners. We always speak on behalf of the administration. If you have personal misgivings about a policy, the way you get around them is to say, well, let me explain: this side says this; that side says that. In this way you don't play your own hand.

Another example: If the Chinese asked you about the many Americans who criticized the religious right – saying it had run amok in criticizing the President – the right way to handle the question is to explain -- that there's economic America, political America, and there's religious America as well. So in many ways I think our response was simply to explain.

I recall explaining the impeachment process to one Chinese contact, who had picked up on the idea that impeachment was way disproportionate to the events. I still remember using a phrase I had heard in the U.S. commentary -- that the President's transgressions "hadn't risen to the level of impeachment." As soon as the words were out of my mouth, I felt a twinge of disgust at what I had just said. I felt like a shill from the easy temporizing.

You asked a short question. I'm afraid the answer was too long. I'd say we just explained what was happening.

Q: I think you wanted to mention consolidation.

BISHOP: Yes, the consolidation between USIA and State happened during my first tour in Beijing.

It had been talked about for years and years, but every time the talk waxed, it waned, it seemed to go away. I sense that most USIA people overseas had heard “wolf” cried so many times, we didn't think it was going to happen. But indeed it did.

My view of it -- an uninformed view because I was overseas, not seeing the inside game in Washington -- is that Jesse Helms had some burrs under his saddle about foreign policy and foreign aid. There were three independent federal agencies that were also involved in foreign policy -- USIA, the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency (ACDA), and USAID. His deepest rancor was for USAID. That's the scalp he wanted. But USAID was blessed at that time with a very vigorous and outspoken director, Brian Atwood. And USIA was in the hands of Joe Duffey. I don't think he understood the stakes.

First, ACDA was tossed into State. That was the first play. And then it came down to USIA or USAID. I still think that Jesse Helms wanted USAID, but the administration tossed the USIA bone to the howling pack. That's why USIA was folded into State, and USAID remained an independent agency.

Q: I've talked to people who served under Duffey in Washington.

BISHOP: And ...

Q: And first place, said one, he was weak. And two, that he really wasn't very interested in the job or anything. I mean, you know, I mean he comes across as --

BISHOP: I can't say that I have any insight into Director Duffey's thinking, but I've heard the same. He didn't grasp the threat to USIA, and many thought he was too passive as it unfolded.

Q: Well then, how did this affect you in Beijing?

BISHOP: On September 30, 1999, we were USIA employees. On October 1, we belonged to State.

One effect was on a PAO's annual evaluations. In USIA, each PAO received two ER's, one from the Ambassador, and one from the USIA area director.

Q: ER -- efficiency report.

BISHOP: Efficiency report? Evaluation report? A PAO had two reports in the file every year, one from the Ambassador about how you were achieving the Mission's goals, and one from the USIA area director saying how you were managing the post (the area director was in a position to be able to compare posts) and working on the administration's objectives.

After consolidation, there was no longer an area director. The Public Diplomacy Office Directors who inherited the rump of the old area offices no longer had any input to evaluations, and they had no standing when promotion panels convened.

In the new dispensation, the PAO's single reporting official was at post, and it was no longer the Ambassador. The annual evaluation was signed by the DCM with the Ambassador as reviewer. The effect of this was that PAO's came much more firmly under the Ambassador's guidance as communicated by the DCM. PAO's also had less direct access to the Ambassador than before.

Similarly, a Branch Public Affairs Officer just became a Consulate's Public Affairs Officer. Their evaluations were now written by their Consul General instead of by the Deputy Public Affairs Officer. This weakened the ability of a Country PAO to organize a unified countrywide Public Diplomacy program.

My own observation was that when they gained direct supervision of the PAO and Public Diplomacy programs, DCMs and Ambassadors got way more interested and more controlling. They wanted, for instance, to approve every U.S. speaker that came to China. In general, their preference was that no one could be invited who was not a 100 percent advocate of the administration's policy. They felt they could name individual contacts to be International Visitors. They were much more explicit about it than they had been earlier.

On September 30, we had a USIA Executive Officer for USIS China. Our Executive Officer in China was Vince Raimondi, one of the best. September 30 was his last day in our building. He was immediately moved over to the Embassy's Management section in the Erban compound. We no longer had our own dedicated management person. In the Management section, Vince was given three portfolios. He was additionally given, as I recall, oversight of communications and the medical unit. On October 1, then, we had one third of Vince's time, not full time.

And ... though it wasn't an issue in Beijing, all over the world DCMs who had small cars were happy to take over the PAO's larger cars. That transfer of the cars became such an issue -- things were a little crazy.

So, consolidation affected our daily operations in many ways. As I said, Paul Blackburn had one third of an Executive Officer available to help us from the Management Section, but there was no real diminishment of the administrative burden on a PAO. Several of our "admin" FSNs were "crosswalked" into the Management Section. The work still needed to be done, and the nearest officer with some management experience was the Deputy Public Affairs Officer, meaning me. I know from talking to my counterparts in New Delhi and Seoul and Tokyo -- we DPAOs felt like we had been hit by a train as consolidation wrenched us into assuming so much administrative work.

The consolidation had another particular effect on me. Looking ahead to my transfer in the summer of 2000, the last USIA assignment panel, meeting in July of 1999, named me to be the Country PAO in Kuala Lumpur. That was considered to be the real plum among PAO assignments for a Class One officer in the East Asia and Pacific area. Kuala Lumpur was often described as a country club assignment.

Then, about three weeks later, the last USIA promotion panel promoted six officers to the Senior Foreign Service, and I was one. I went from being an FS-1 to be an FE-OC, a Counselor. This eventually set in motion my next assignment in Nigeria.

Q: OK, so we'll pick this up the next time when you're off to Nigeria.

BISHOP: Nigeria, 2000 to 2002.

Q: Today is the March 8, 2011, with Don Bishop. As you left, whither China?

BISHOP: Oh, whither China?

The Chinese are a wonderfully likeable people. We often focus on differences between Americans and others, but I found there are some deep symmetries between our culture and theirs. In the 19th and early 20th centuries, much of the fellow feeling, the mutual attraction, had been communicated, both ways, by the missionaries and by the early exchanges. It was given additional impetus by the Second World War.

They are direct and frank, even more than we are. They value education like we do. They work hard, like Americans do. So I believe that the cultural compatibility of China and the United States can provide a good basis for the relationship. However, that cultural attraction ran up against the views of the new PRC Government in 1949, and during the Korean War we became bitter enemies. During the Korean War the PRC government was fighting us, and at the same time they were vilifying us among China's people, going on and on about American imperialism, and cooking up falsehoods about germ warfare.

After 1979, when Deng Xiaoping decided on the opening policy, there was potentially an opportunity to restore the cooperation and friendship between China and the United States. There's a magnetic attraction between the two cultures. Our two economies complement one another. The huge volume of trade shows there's an economic attraction as well. But the Chinese Communist Party, is ever anxious to sustain its power. Party leaders understood well enough that the Party's corruption and its many other shortcomings undermine its standing among ordinary Chinese. The CCP always finds it useful to keep stoking Chinese nationalism. The Party's brand of Chinese nationalism still draws heavily on the historical narrative of Chinese victimization and the role of the predatory Yankees that the party developed and propagated before and after 1949.

All this means that a closer long term relationship between China and the United States depends on allowing the cultural and economic attraction to get us through the political differences. The obstacle to that is the Communist Party.

Among Chinese institutions, moreover, the institution that is most heavily ideologized, and the most isolated from the rest of Chinese society and from the world, is the People's Liberation Army, the PLA.

Remember that, formally, the PLA is not China's army, it's the Chinese Communist Party's army.

Remember too that the PLA is the Chinese institution that has been receiving budget increases of 10 percent or more every year. Remember that it's a black box, meaning we don't know much about its internal dynamics. The PLA's political officers keep it ideologically pure. And the PLA holds in its heart the desire to make China a power that can challenge the United States. And anyone who has served in the Defense Attaché Office in Beijing will testify that the Chinese refuse, or slow down, or strangle every confidence-building initiative that DOD proposes -- refuse the open hand, so to speak.

So who knows where China's future will go? Its direction depends in large part on more liberalization in knowledge and culture, more room for faith to give Chinese a moral anchor, and it depends on the eventual unraveling of that Party narrative of Chinese history.

Q: Well, one thinks of how the Japanese Military got Japan into deep trouble --

BISHOP: Yes, it certainly did. That's right, though you've understated it. Militarized Japan brutalized and agonized half the world.

Q: Well, you know, I've talked to people who served in Poland before the system there collapsed. And they said that, you know, for the last 10 years of communist rule they felt that there are probably maybe three, maybe four dedicated Marxists in Poland. How stands Marxism in China? We're talking about when you left there.

BISHOP: Whether it was my first or my second tour, you could find officials who were pretty well schooled in Marxism. They knew their doctrines because they had received pretty hard line Marxist-Leninist-Maoist indoctrination early in their careers. They could still recite it.

For China's ordinary people, though, the hold of that ideology had long since disappeared. There were legacy attitudes that remained -- a nostalgia for the equality Chairman Mao espoused, the distrust of foreigners, the feeling of victimization. There was legacy disinformation, of which the charge of germ warfare in Korea was one. But ordinary people no longer cited socialism and communism as motivating principles.

The Party -- that's five percent of the Chinese population -- has made a deal with the rest of the Chinese people. It's an unwritten deal, an unspoken deal. It's that so long as we, the Party, deliver economic development, better jobs, more money, a better life, then don't challenge us. So far they're still able to deliver.

Underlying that crude deal is a judgment about human nature -- that people respond to economic stimuli. This is, of course, economic determinism, which we can say is another legacy of Marxism. The Party and the Chinese people agree on a system of governance based on economic self-interest.

The first thing to say is that I'm signed on with Michael Novak, George W. Bush, and increasingly President Obama that the desire for democracy and self-government is in the human heart. This means that China, in the long run, has to somehow, like Taiwan did in the 1970s, 1980s, and 1990s, let go of the commanding Party-State system. There must be more room for China's people to feel the sense of empowerment and dignity that comes with self-government, with democratization.

And there's another thing to say about the economic determinism that underlies the Party's deal with the Chinese people. My view of human nature is that while economics is an important factor in any society, and people indeed have economic needs that have a certain priority in life, there are other yearnings in the human heart beyond economics, beyond materialism, beyond consumerism, beyond money. There are yearnings for justice, and for knowledge of God, and for meaning in life. The Party is not providing these nonmaterial goods.

Thanks for giving me some time to assert some convictions.

Q: Well, we'll check on this in a decade's time.

G. EUGENE MARTIN
Deputy Chief of Mission
Beijing (1999-2000)

A Specialist in Chinese Affairs and a speaker of Chinese, Mr. Martin spent the major part of his career dealing with matters relating to China, both in Washington and abroad. His overseas assignments included Hong Kong, Taipei, Huangzhou (formerly Canton), Beijing, Manila and Rangoon. His Washington assignments also concerned China and the Far East. Mr. Martin was born in Indiana of Missionary parents and was raised in the US. and India. He is a graduate of Kalamazoo College and Syracuse University. Mr. Martin was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1999.

Q: What happened in 1999 when you left Manila for the second time?

MARTIN: After 33 years in the Foreign Service and without an ambassadorship in sight, I decide it was time to retire and do something different. I left Manila in early July, moved back into our house in Washington, took the transition course at FSI, and began to look for new opportunities.

Q: But then you got called again.

MARTIN: I guess opportunity found me. As soon as I got back to Washington that July, Steve Schlaikjer, the country director for Chinese-Mongolian Affairs, called and asked if I'd be willing to go to Beijing as DCM. I said I was about to retire, and I thought it a little late to change plans at that point. In typical Chinese fashion, where one asks three times to determine if a refusal is genuine or just polite, he kept after me. The third time, the ambassador designate, Admiral Joseph Prueher, who had been the Navy Commander in Chief, Pacific (CINCPAC), called and urged me to come join him. Initially he said for three years, but since I had retired and the Department would not return me to the promotion track, I agreed to go for one year until they found somebody else. I insisted on being returned to the Foreign Service rather than going on TDY status so my wife could join me. So I was sworn back into the FS (oddly, in front of a poster of Moscow's Red Square) and resumed my career, minus promotability and extra retirement credit.

Q. When you went to China in 1999, what was the situation, both internally in China and then in Sino-American relations.

MARTIN: It was a rather turbulent time. Exchange visits by Presidents Clinton and Jiang Zemin in 1998 seemed to move Sino-American relations to a more positive level. Then Premier Zhu Rongji's spring 1999 visit to Washington fell apart when the Administration was unwilling (or unable) to conclude a permanent normal trade relations agreement at the last minute. This was followed a few weeks later by the U.S. bombing of the Chinese embassy in Belgrade. No Chinese has been willing to accept U.S. explanations of mistaken targeting. The resulting anger among Chinese students and the government's need to permit managed demonstrations against the U.S. chancery further strained relations. Added to these frictions was Washington's insistence on pushing its annual resolution in the Human Rights Commission; nagging trade disputes and periodic complaints about the Chinese government's lack of control over proliferation activities of its supposed private companies.

On the positive side, by November, the 13-year effort to reach an agreement with China on its accession to the World Trade Organization (WTO) was finally successful. The WTO agreement helped dissipate some of the earlier tensions which, between May and November, caused Sino-American relations to be very frosty. The fact that Beijing was still willing and able to make the many concessions to reach the trade agreement shows how eager the government was to join the WTO.

Jim Sasser, who had been the ambassador during the previous three years, had left shortly after the May demonstrations over the Belgrade bombing (which the embassy called the "rock concert"), and DCM Bill McCahill was chargé for most of six months. Bill had been in Beijing over three years and was exhausted from his direct engagement in the WTO talks as well as the post-Belgrade tensions. I believe Washington was eager to find ways to improve relations. I think that's why Joe Prueher was picked. It was decided that it would be useful for him to go out and to try to establish a good, firm relationship with the Chinese. He had established a good relationship with the People's Liberation Army when he was the CINCPAC commander.

Prueher did not seek the job. I think he agreed to do it because he realized that he probably was the only one who would or could be confirmed by the Senate. I think a career Foreign Service person could not have been confirmed by the Senate, particularly given Senator Helms views. Joe made a great effort to make sure he touched all the bases on the Hill when he was having his consultations before his hearings. The hearings went well and he was confirmed without difficulty. His military background and apolitical stance helped.

Q: Did you go out together?

MARTIN: No. I went out early. In fact, I was on leave in Michigan when he called me and asked if I would work with him. When he agreed to my proposal to go for only one year, I came back to Washington, did some quick consultations during the month of November, and went out the end of November, 1999.

Being recalled to the FS was an interesting event as this was still a rather new phenomenon in the State Department. Not many people are recalled. I knew that Tom Pickering had been recalled after he had resigned or had retired, and I figured, "Well, if it's good enough for Tom, it's good enough for me!" So I said I wanted to be recalled into full active duty and not go out on TDY or as a WAE (when-actually-employed) because I wanted to take my family with me. It took some negotiation but as they were eager to get somebody out there to work with a first time political ambassador, the Department was willing to give me pretty much anything I wanted. We had already made family plans for Thanksgiving and Christmas plans but I agreed to go out in November after Thanksgiving, relieve Bill McCahill, be there until the ambassador arrived in December, and then come back for Christmas break to pack up and return with my wife in January.

I arrived in Beijing the end of November and Bill McCahill turned the embassy over to me about the first of December. Ambassador Prueher arrived on the ninth. The Chinese seemed eager to have a U.S. ambassador after nearly six months so arranged for President Jiang Zemin to receive his credentials after only a few days. The credential ceremony was in the Great Hall of the People and followed by a rather lengthy sit-down discussion of bilateral relations in a small anteroom. The warm reception Ambassador Prueher received indicated the importance the Chinese attached to the relationship and their desire to move ahead and to have a good bilateral relations with the United States.

Q: Why did the Chinese turn the accidental bombing of their embassy in Belgrade into such a big thing, allowing mobs to get out and scream and yell. It would seem to be counterproductive. We were abject in our apologies as the bombing was a horrible mistake.

MARTIN: It's part of the psyche of our relationship. The leadership, I think, realized this, but the initial reaction was really a visceral one. The problem is that they still are not sure what our motives are. They read what is said in Congress and in the press. They see people attacking China on human rights issues. They learn of U.S. military planning which focuses on China as a growing strategic threat. They believe the U.S. sees China as a future competitor if not threat that we need to keep down or prevent from reestablishing itself as a world power and as an equal among nations. China's political system and experience leads the government and Party to see these disparate issues as part of a big, master U.S. plan to contain China politically and economically if not strategically with the ultimate goal of changing their communist system.

This gets into the whole question of international equality and China's role in the world, China's rightful place in the world. I believe it is all part of the Chinese psyche that for the last 200 years they have been kept down by the West, first by invasions, encroachments, and extraterritoriality. They still have this sense of humiliation, of being picked upon; and so when something like the Belgrade bombing happens, the initial reaction is to see it as an intentional act by the U.S. to humble China.

We said, “But it was a terrible mistake! It was a targeting error. We thought it was a different building. We didn’t realize it was the Chinese embassy. Etc. Etc.”

And they answered, “That can’t be true! You can’t make a mistake! You’re the world’s only remaining superpower. You’re the one with all the technological advantages. Your bombs are all guided so go where they are directed. You don’t make these mistakes.”

My effort to try to explain that during the Gulf War most of the casualties on the American side were self inflicted, that friendly fire killed a lot of the Americans who died during the war. But it didn’t cut any ice. And there’s also a rising sense of nationalism in China.

Q: So the Chinese played the nationalistic card.

MARTIN: Yes. I think the government was discomforted because of the visceral reaction by the younger people particularly, who saw this as an out and out U.S. purposeful action because China had not been supportive of U.S. efforts in Kosovo. China opposed our use of NATO rather than the UN to legitimize our engagement and bombings. The government felt that it had to let the people, students particularly, demonstrate over the embassy bombing. I don’t think they expected the demonstrations would go as far as they did. People told me, when I was there subsequently, that the government felt it had no choice. If it did not allow the students to demonstrate in a controlled manner, including throwing rocks and bricks at the outside of the embassy, students could have demonstrated against the government for not supporting Chinese interests. I think that this was their quid pro quo - they allowed groups of students to come in a controlled manner. Colleagues of mine who were there said police at the barricade at the end of the block let in groups of 50 or a 100 students at a time to protest and throw bricks at the embassy, then move on. The police served like ushers in a movie theater, keep one crowd out until the show is over by the first group. They move offstage, and the next group moves on. But after two or three days of venting, the government clamped down and banned further protests. During those two or three days, they actually bused people in. The police and the security forces maintained control of who was demonstrating, but they allowed them to demonstrate. They really tore up the embassy. The picture of Jim Sasser in the shattered doorway certainly showed the damage.

Q: Did this demonstration, and the trashing of the embassy have an effect on embassy personnel, souring their view of relations with China?

MARTIN: Yes, it soured many of them! Those who left in the summer were the lucky ones. Many of those who had to stay another two or three years became quite cynical and did not enjoy it much. That was part of my effort, to try to rebuild morale in the embassy, to help them see that it was a staged venting of Chinese nationalistic fervor wasn’t against them personally.

The important thing to remember is what you saw in the U.S. press and what you saw on the embassy building itself was localized. It was all within about a two-block area. Outside of that, people were not affected. U.S. businesses went on as usual; embassy staff, American and Chinese, came and went without much trouble. The bombing did come up in conversations regularly. When taxi drivers or shopkeepers learned you were American, they would say what a terrible thing we had done, why was the U.S. anti-China, etc. This continued throughout the year that I was there.

Q: I'm thinking more towards the 2001 EP-3 incident, but I remember seeing a cartoon showing an American looking rather exasperated at a small, little Chinese, like a schoolboy, and says, "All right. I'm sorry. I'm sorry. Now why don't you grow up," or something like that. But I mean because in the second case, it was obviously an error on the part of the Chinese. This wasn't on your watch, but it does signify sort of a feeling that there are people that no matter what you do they'll always be looking for signs of 'Do you love me,' 'Do you hate me.'

MARTIN: They take offense quickly. Partly it's the sense that the foreigner might be trying to harass them, or suppress them, or take advantage of them. This comes again from the 200 years experience they've had with the West, from the early 1800s. As I tell my class here, there is a well-instituted sense of humiliation in China. They carry this Humiliation 101 to the nth degree. They teach it from preschool on up - that China's situation is caused by foreigners, it's only because China was weak and not strong, and it's only the Communist Party, which is able to give China back its rightful place in the world. When this mantra is drummed into students throughout their education, people will react in that way. I think the Internet is increasing information flow, and giving people access to information from other than the Party. As China opens up to the world, the Party's controls are beginning to break down. But the foundation of humiliation has been laid and will continue to influence Chinese perceptions for quite a while.

Q: What happened to business and cultural relations?

MARTIN: Business relations basically went on without much interruption. There were a couple days when American businessmen laid low; they didn't go out; they didn't have any major visits by home office people. But very quickly it was made clear by their Chinese interlocutors that they were not held responsible, that the U.S. government was held responsible. And as usual, the way the Chinese play it, the Chinese and American people are friends, there's no problem between the peoples of the two countries, and businesses can continue because it's beneficial to both sides. It's just on the governmental level. This is the typical traditional Chinese view - that if it wasn't for the government, we'd all get along wonderfully!

Q: What were you seeing in terms of changes in Chinese society in the three years you were away?

MARTIN: They had become much more open. The access to the Internet and the access to information from any number of international sources was much greater. The other thing I would mention is that I was in Guangzhou before, and I came back and went to Beijing. Beijing is very much of a capital city. Guangzhou is perhaps like San Francisco, whereas Beijing is Washington, and bureaucratic, and is more formal and official than Guangzhou. The Cantonese people tend to be less interested in politics and more interested in business, money, and getting ahead. It is a very different environment and impacts the embassy's perspective and also how the embassy and the Chinese officialdom interact. However, generally my impression in those three years was that China was continuing to develop and open up rapidly.

There's a lot more of what I call personal space for people. It's not individual rights, but individual space perhaps is a better term. People talk more freely. They didn't feel as confined or as restricted in what they said. Taxi drivers, of course, like anyplace else in the world, were great interlocutors, and they were willing to talk about just about anything, and what a bunch of bums were running the country, and so forth. Shopkeepers would complain about the situation, people on the street that you'd meet, even the academics that you met in official receptions, delegations and conferences were much more open about criticisms of how China was changing. Many of them were still cautious in terms of criticizing the leadership directly or criticizing the system, but they were always trying to make the point that we are moving, we are progressing, but we need to continue to make reforms and changes, particularly on the economics side. The problem is that economic reforms have gone about as far as they can go without becoming politically sensitive. This is what we're seeing now, as the economic situation becomes increasingly difficult for state owned enterprise workers thrown out of work by bankrupt or corrupt firms or farmers protesting illegal taxes and having land taken from them by corrupt officials.

Q: As you arrived, you had an embassy which still was shaken by the demonstrations. It's not a lot of fun to have not just stones thrown at you, but to feel that the government's behind it. What does that do to you relationship with contacts, friendships and other Chinese interlocutors? How do you go about restoring morale?

MARTIN: The approach I took was to try to develop more of a community in the embassy. The embassy's staff was quite diverse. Some of them, of course, were the China cadre, who has learned Chinese, had spent much, if not all, of their career on China. They love China, they know the culture, they know the language, they have friends, and so forth. These people understood the situation better; they know that it's a transient, not a personal thing against them, that it's something that is done for political necessity. The other side of the embassy were people who didn't really know China - who are not there because it's China, but because it's an assignment.

This was more difficult group of people to help. These were the people who were alienated, people who felt threatened, people who felt it was more than they could take. Trying to work with people who may not have known much about China and the causes of events - the communicators, the office management specialists, the admin officers, even consular officers - was difficult. These were the people I tried to spend some time with to try to get them to understand the situation.

Q: Could you get them out of the American community to learn more about the "real China"?

MARTIN: I wonder what the "real" China is anymore. The country is changing so fast. Beijing is light years apart from rural China which one can find just a few miles outside the rapidly expanding urban area. But one has to be motivated and interested in seeing and learning about the different aspects of the country. And after being attacked by screaming mobs, that is hard to encourage.

The difficulty of the Chinese language is a real barrier. If an employee does not speak or read Chinese, or is unable or afraid to use basic Mandarin, he or she feels very isolated. "Compounditis" or cabin fever builds up and people are reluctant to go out of the Embassy community. Fortunately, unlike in the early years, Beijing has become quite a cosmopolitan city with a lot of things people can do outside the diplomatic circle. They can go to restaurants, the theater, to movies, go bowling. The embassy had few recreational facilities besides a small swimming pool and happy hour at the Marine House on Friday nights. But people had established a bowling league, for which one didn't have to have the language. A British hiking club organized walks in the countryside, on the Great Wall which appealed to some. The Beijing expatriate community had grown to probably 100,000 or more foreigners by the time I was there, and so one could have a lot of contact with Australians, Brits, or other Westerners. There were also numerous restaurants, bars, and night clubs to frequent, everything from New York delis to Aussie bars to Middle Eastern restaurants with belly dancing performances. All it took was a willingness to get out and explore what was available.

My wife worked with the Community Liaison Officer (CLO) to foster an active spouses club which engaged family members in activities - tours, shopping trips, discussions. Spouses often felt even more isolated while employees when to work. When we arrived, most of the staff lived in apartments in Chinese Foreign Ministry run housing compounds for diplomats. While the Embassy administrative section provided maintenance, furniture, and support, all diplomats were lumped together so you never knew which country your neighbor may be from. Housing became one of Joe Prueher and my major endeavors.

Q: How did you find your contacts with the Chinese authorities? Were you coming down from this certain high because of the World Trade Organization negotiations?

MARTIN: Yes. I think the WTO agreement was an excellent ramp up to Joe and my assignment. By the time I got there, everybody was feeling much better because of that agreement. We felt that we had a chance to get back on track of reestablishing relations. We still had the ongoing negotiations over compensation for the Belgrade bombing mistake. The State Department Legal Advisor and others came in and out, a couple times in the first few months, negotiating over what was going to be paid to repay for the damage that we caused at the embassy.

Q: And how about the victims?

MARTIN: The victims had been paid off very early. The families of the people who were killed in the attack were paid very promptly. I think by June or July that check had already been delivered. This was the compensation for damage to the embassy itself, which I think in the end came out to 28 million dollars. The problem was more on our end, I think, because everybody who was responsible, or irresponsible, insisted that the State Department pay for it, rather than DOD, or CIA, or whoever mistakenly target the Chinese Embassy. State had to go through a Congressional budget process and get an extra line item in the budget. Congressional views of China influenced this, as in, "we're not going to pay anything to the Chinese Communists, etc." Eventually things worked out but the negotiations were pretty arduous. Several times when the delegation was there, they went on all night. The final agreement was reached, I think, at four-thirty in the morning after having gone for several days almost straight through.

When I arrived, things did seem a little bit more on the up. Bill McCahill turned the Mission over to me on a Thursday evening, saying said, “Okay. It’s all yours! You take it from here.” The next morning the Foreign Ministry called saying they wanted Chargé McCahill to come in for a demarche. Bill says, “It’s all yours! I’m out of here!” So I went over for my first meeting. My interlocutor was Yang Jiechi, (subsequently the Chinese ambassador to Washington and in 2007, Foreign Minister). We had known each other when he was the DCM in Washington and I was on the China desk. We had not seen each other for several years so he welcomed me warmly. Then we sat down, and he launched into a tough statement on Taiwan about how we were not living up to the three communiqués, encouraging Taiwan independence, etc. After I agreed to report his message to Washington, we stood up, he welcomed me to Beijing and escorted me to the door. I felt like I was right back in the swing of things.

Q: Speaking about these three communiqués, were we living up to what we said, and were the Chinese living up to what they said?

MARTIN: I think you have to look at the political situation at the time of those communiqués - the time that Kissinger and Nixon made the agreement on the Shanghai Communiqué and the subsequent ones. The recent to-do over what Kissinger agreed to, and what he said about Taiwan; the differing interpretations by the PRC and the U.S. which have come out in the press recently, all put different spins on the communiqués. At the time, I think there was less attention paid to Taiwan and Taiwan’s future than there was to the importance of doing something that would keep the Soviet Union off balance. That was the main goal, both for China and for the United States. We saw our interest as being parallel in that regard, and would have been happy to have Taiwan left out. The Chinese insisted on having something said about Taiwan. We agreed to it, but in subsequent years, I think that we’ve taken an extremely loose and liberal interpretation of what we agreed to.

Have the Chinese lived up to it? I think the Chinese have continued to push the best they can. They continued to insist that they reserved the right to use force against Taiwan if it doesn’t go their way. I think they’re very frustrated by the fact that they thought that the communiqués were going to start the process that would eventually force, or persuade (perhaps the better way) Taiwan to come back to the fold. But it hasn’t happened, and Taiwan has become democratic now, which makes it much more difficult for us to pressure them to do anything.

Q: Were you getting from any of your Chinese counterparts or other contacts an understanding of the fact that Taiwan really has become a different country, and it’d be very difficult to meld them together?

MARTIN: I’m not sure they understand that. I don’t think they understand the politics of Taiwan. They don’t understand the democratic forces that have become very active in Taiwan. I think the shock of the Democratic Progressive Party, the DPP, actually winning the election in 2000 was really a shock to them. All their experts on Taiwan had predicted that he would not win, and when he did, the shock reverberated throughout the government. I think many so-called Taiwan experts in Beijing had to go through some self-criticism sessions after Chen Shui-bian won in 2000.

Q: Was this partly a problem of the Chinese embassy in Washington and other scholars reporting back what they thought their superiors wanted to hear?

MARTIN: I think it's partly that, but it's also partly that they just don't have the concept of what the democratic process is. Since the DPP won in 2000, the PRC has invited several senior Kuomintang Party (the nationalist party, the KMT) leaders, to visit China, ostensibly to visit their family homes, to meet with officials. It's all part of the united front policies, which the Communist Party used at various stages in the past. But they don't really understand by doing that, that they're not really making a big difference in terms of public opinion in Taiwan. Once someone described it to me as the Chinese think that they are the gorgeous bride, and they can't understand why the Taiwanese don't want to marry them. The Taiwanese look at them, and say, "Boy, that's a pretty ugly person, and we don't want to get linked up with them in any way!" I think that there's a very different concept.

Q: Did you see the cadre's families, the kids from the upper crusts of society, beginning to move into authoritative positions?

MARTIN: They're called princelings, and that's controversial, because several of the newer generation of leaders in China are sons or daughters of former high officials. I think that it's controversial because some of these people are corrupt, they're into special favors, and they're the elite. There's an increasing criticism in Chinese society, which is now more open and more critical with more information, particularly on the Internet and in chat rooms, about the special advantages these sons and daughters of the high officials have. More of these people are moving into private sector businesses rather than into government. They are involved in entrepreneurial startups of private companies, the high tech, the Internet, the IT (Information Technology) sector of society.

The other thing that you find is that they're much more worldly. They certainly know much more about the world than their parents or their peers who never left China know, because they've studied overseas, they've traveled overseas, they're much more aware of China's weaknesses and China's lack of development. They're also, I think, much more nationalistic. Even though they've lived overseas and learned about the United States and other countries, that doesn't necessarily mean they're friendlier to the United States or that they're particularly more democratic. What they see, or what their reaction is, is that China needs to strengthen itself more to be able to compete on an equal basis with the rest of the world, not necessarily on military terms.

Q: In our exchange programs, were we trying to break away from getting the princelings to the United States and trying to reach down for equal opportunity and diversity? Could we do that, or was it too controlled by the Chinese?

MARTIN: It is controlled. My experience in Guangzhou was that a lot of the people that we wanted to send to the States could not get permission to go. The usual excuse was that they're too busy; or that their offices needed them, they couldn't let them go; etc. They weren't politically correct. The answer was often "We will decide who you can send to the States," and their candidate would usually be the office director, the bureau chief, or the Party cadre who wanted a trip to the States, and were happy to take our largesse and go to the States. These were not the people we wanted.

We've had some success in breaking out of this limited universe of people. We seek out academics, students, business people, people from the provincial centers rather than from the capital. This is somewhat successful, but it's still limited in terms of the scope of the people that we could get and we could reach.

Q: This was an internal and external thing. You were out there when we were moving USIS and making it public diplomacy. How is this working within the embassy, did you feel?

MARTIN: I think it has been a difficult integration. There was a lot of resistance and trepidation within USIA which wasn't quite sure what this was all going to mean. Would they be totally subsumed in the State Department? What would be their role? Would their programs would have to be rearranged with different priorities? I think there has been some of that as they became integrated. The ambassador had a particular agenda that he wanted to carry out, and getting USIS in Beijing to do what he wanted them to do was sometimes a little bit more difficult than I think it should have been, partly because they had their own priorities and inertia. They had their traditional programs and focuses that they thought were important, having done them for years - and the ambassador had a different focus.

Q: Could we talk a bit about the ambassador, and when he arrived, and what his goals were, and how he operated?

MARTIN: Admiral Joseph Prueher was my first political ambassador, but I must say, he was a good one to work with because when he arrived, he made it clear that he did not know a lot about China. He realized that he had to depend upon the career people and the people who had experience in China, and would draw upon them as much as he could. And he did. He depended on and used effectively his political and economic officers, and worked well with other staff.

He was also shocked - and that's not putting it too strongly - by the level of support and the facilities that the embassy, or the State Department, provides an ambassador. Of course he was coming from being a four-star admiral at the Pacific Command, where he had myriad minions working for him at his beck and call, who would stand up, salute and say, "Yes, sir," to whatever he asked. It was a little difficult coming in and realizing that there was little in terms of support and little in terms of adequate personnel to be able to do the job that he thought was necessary. We in the State Department have long felt that, but we usually put our shoulder to the wheel and muddle through the best we can.

I think his biggest shock was that the communications system within the embassy was so antiquated that he had no way of communicating with anybody. The unclassified, the classified, the e-mail, everything was totally separated, and security requirements in China are even more rigorous than almost anyplace else in the world because of security concerns. So one office cannot talk to the other electronically. It's very difficult to operate, and I think he was frustrated by that. He was also frustrated by the lack of resources the administration section had to be able to do what was necessary.

The present chancery building in Beijing was a pit. It was the old Pakistani embassy that we took over when they moved out. It was an old antiquated building, not much has been done to it, and after what the staff called the “rock concert” in May, it was even worse condition. All the windows had been broken, and FBO (Overseas Building Operations) replaced the glass, but refused to replace the wooden frames through which the winter winds howled and whistled. So the creature comforts of working in the embassy were really quite limited. The ambassador was quite shocked by that. Coming from a naval tradition where everything was painted and shipshape, it was quite a shock!

The Embassy in Beijing traditionally had a hard time getting bidders on its positions. While the language was a factor, a larger issue was the terrible housing. The pioneer China-hand who volunteered for Beijing during the 1972-79 U.S. Liaison Office (USLO) period did not mind the hardships and isolation because of the adventure and excitement of being in on the beginnings of a new relationship after over 20 years of no relations. But by the time I arrived in 1999, the bad housing was a major obstacle to getting good people and their families. Joe Prueher saw that immediately and decided to make that a priority of his tenure. In good Navy tradition, Joe was keenly aware of the importance of good morale and the need for the commander to work to improve it in any way possible.

Fortunately, the Foreign Ministry, which ran the diplomatic housing compounds through the Diplomatic Services Bureau (DSB), was beginning to realize the growing expatriate community could not be squeezed into the old, tired compounds. Initially, all diplomats, journalists, international organization representatives, and businessmen had to live in the compounds. The apartment buildings were poorly maintained, the standards of cleanliness and responsibility varied greatly between families from the West and those from the Third World. While the Embassy's General Services office tried to hold onto specific apartments so new generations of officers could move in and GSO upgrades maintained, the Embassy did not have much influence if DSB wanted to shift people around.

Joe and I first ascertained the Foreign Ministry would agree to have U.S. Embassy personnel find housing outside the DSB compounds. Then we had to persuade the Department, particularly the Foreign Buildings Operations (FBO) office to support and fund finding new, and more expensive, housing. One way Joe built his leverage was to insist that every CODEL and official visitor be taken to an Embassy apartment to see the squalor in which our families had to live. It was eye opening to Members of Congress as well as Department officials who had never previously seen the conditions. We tended to take the visitors to the worst compounds where the dark, dingy stairways smelled of mold and urine, the elevators either didn't work or were frightening to use, the apartment kitchens were dirty and cramped, and glass from windows often fell out onto children's playgrounds below. The conduit closets for pipes, sewers, electrical cables, which ran from the top to bottom of the buildings, were called "roach runs" by the residents since insects and vermin had easy access to kitchens and bathrooms. We had the Embassy doctor describe the health problems caused by the living conditions and family members described the trials of living in what was comparable to tenement housing in U.S. cities.

Our campaign was successful and Embassy personnel were given the opportunity to move into commercial housing which was being built. Some moved into new apartment blocks managed by Hong Kong companies. Others opted to move out of the increasingly polluted city to Western style houses in suburban gated villages with grass, swimming pools and bike riding areas. Others chose apartments attached to upscale hotels for foreigners. I guess about 90% of the staff in the Embassy when I arrived moved out of DSB housing and morale soared. Others preferred to stay where they were, because they were due for transfer in a few months and didn't want to move twice, or because they wanted to stay close to the Embassy and downtown. Giving individuals a choice and a selection of housing greatly reduced complaints and helped with recruitment.

Housing was only one aspect of a number of property issues I focused on during my year in Beijing. As mentioned above, the chancery building had been the Pakistani chancery and little major renovation had been done when the U.S. moved in in the early 1980s. After the front of the building was trashed by the post-Belgrade bombing demonstrations in May 1999, FBO decided to renovate the entire building while building a new annex on the back for additional office space. Offices and hallways were stripped to the bare brick and new electrical, plumbing and communications lines installed. The work also gave us a chance to inspect the security conditions in the building.

We were reminded of being in an ancient city one day when a skeleton and old artifacts were found during the excavation for the annex. We called in the Chinese Antiquities Bureau who told us the area of the First Diplomatic Area where we were had been outside the city walls until recently and had been used as a burial ground. Based on their records and the artifacts found in the grave, they estimated the skeleton dated from around the early Ming Dynasty (14th or 15th century AD). I made the mistake of allowing the inspectors from the Antiquities Bureau "borrow" the artifacts from the grave as we never saw them again. I had hoped to put them in a glass display case in the lobby of the chancery.

The Beijing Embassy property consisted of three compounds in the First Diplomatic Area just off Jianguomen Wai (outside the Jian Guo gate), the eastern extension of Chang An Lu which runs through Tiananmen. The first, which was originally the entire USLO office building and residence for the USLO Chief (including George H.W. Bush), is now the ambassador's residence and Public Diplomacy offices. The 2nd compound contains the Administrative and Consular Sections. Across the street, the 3rd compound is the chancery and Marine house. Planning for a new chancery had been underway for several years, with several different plans being proposed and abandoned. When I arrived, the plan under consideration was to tear down the existing chancery, take over the Bulgarian property next door and build a new building on both sites. Neither Joe nor I liked that idea as the Embassy would have to operate out of temporary quarters for a lengthy period, and the Embassy would still have to operate from three separate compounds, a communications, logistics and security problem.

During one of FBO's frequent visits to discuss the new chancery, the Chinese agreed to give us a large tract of land in the 3rd diplomatic area in Liang Ma He, further out from the center of Beijing, to which many diplomatic missions were moving. As is always the case, however, China is a stickler for equal reciprocity and the MFA was not happy about what the State Department was offering for the new Chinese embassy in Washington. We had a long series of negotiations with the diplomatic property office of the MFA, generally amicable but tough. I felt accomplished that we were able to reach an agreement before I left in September. The Department offered the Chinese two lots in the International Diplomatic area off Van Ness Avenue which the MFA accepted unhappily. The U.S. received a large lot which is big enough to build a chancery, ambassador's residence, Marine House, and separate Admin and Consular building, all in one contiguous area. We thought we received a good deal.

I left shortly after the property deal was reached so missed the lengthy negotiations over the construction details. After the disastrous construction of the new U.S. chancery in Moscow a few years ago, the Department was gun shy about another embassy in a communist country. It insisted on a hard and fast agreement that every construction worker, all building materials, and every item to be placed in the chancery had to be imported from the U.S. in secure containers and guarded constantly. Needless to say, the Beijing embassy will probably be one of the most expensive ever, second only to the new U.S. Embassy in Baghdad. The Chinese of course insisted on the same privileges, so their chancery site in Washington looks like an imported Chinese construction site with workers' dormitories, Chinese cranes, Chinese security personnel on site, etc. The new chanceries are scheduled to be completed and open in July 2008, shortly before the Olympics. Could be a chaotic time.

Q: What did Ambassador Prueher bring with him in his attaché case as far as what he wanted to accomplish?

MARTIN: As I said, he was apolitical, he said he did not seek the job. But he was willing to serve, and his commitment was he would stay two years. He saw himself as a bridge between the old Clinton administration, and the new administration after the 2000 election. He saw himself as someone who could try to help reestablish cordial and useful relations between China and the United States by working on various contacts. He had three major points that he made frequently to the Chinese: 1) that he did not seek the job, 2) that he was not looking for any other onward U.S. government job, and 3) that he would tell it the way he saw it, and he did that. He was frank and outspoken, diplomatically and courteously of course, but he said what he thought, and he said what was necessary. And I think that was appreciated by the Chinese, and it was certainly appreciated by the staff in the embassy. He was able to get everyone to support his goal of reestablishing the relationship on an even keel. He believed his experience in the military and his contacts with the Chinese military (he had visited China several times as CINCPAC) would be helpful in moving the relationship forward.

Q: You mentioned in public diplomacy he had a different thrust than our people on the ground had. What was that?

MARTIN: I think the difference was that he was much more focused on public diplomacy, the selling of our policies and perspectives. He wanted USIS to get out and make sure that we communicated with as broad an audience as possible in China on what U.S. policies were, to try to deflect criticisms, misinterpretations, or misunderstandings of U.S. policy. More traditional USIS programs on cultural and educational exchanges, international visitors, Fulbright programs, and so forth should be a lower priority. He agreed these were all important programs but thought the top priorities should be getting out and selling U.S. policy. He was also looking for a good speechwriter who could craft his speeches and remarks the way he wanted. It took awhile but one of the USIS officers did a good job in that regard.

Q: At the time you were there, did you feel we were getting a good representation of our side in the media and the press?

MARTIN: Minimal. It had increased over the years., from nothing previously. In terms of percentage increases, it was quite significant, but still, it's very low compared to most other countries. Getting our views out was difficult, getting the papers to publish what we sent them, getting the media to cover things that we thought were important was very difficult. The Chinese government keeps very close control over the information flow, and so it was difficult for us to get our points out. The ambassador did a good deal of speaking, he traveled around the country as much as he could, he met with people and tried to get the word out as best he could, but it was difficult.

Q: How did the ambassador, and you, and others find the Chinese university system because often this is the place where the students get out of control. I mean there are some places where you almost can't, if you're an American, go to them at all.

MARTIN: For many years, you could not! The embassy officials for years were not allowed into the campuses except under very tight scrutiny and control.

Q: Did you get any feel for what the universities were doing? I mean vis-à-vis modernizing China, and our relations, and all.

MARTIN: Some, not a lot, frankly. I did not have a chance to get out there. I went to Beijing University several times. I gave speeches there a couple times. The ambassador was able to go there. But again, one always got the sense that it was a handpicked audience. It wasn't just a bulletin board sign on the door, saying "U.S. ambassador's going to speak. You all come." It was pretty much decided by the university, by the Party secretary as to who was going to attend. Often it was just faculty, graduate students, or teaching assistants rather than Joe Blow the student. Our contacts with students were limited even though the ambassador and the rest of us would to make an effort to get to know the students, get to meet the students at least, try to talk to them on an informal basis.

Fortunately, there are many Americans attached to the Chinese universities, either as students or as English teachers. My experience in Guangzhou was that many Americans were teaching English to Chinese university students all over the country, providing a good window, on American perceptions, institutions, and philosophy; exchanging information with the Chinese.

Q: You mentioned the Internet a couple times. Could you explain what it was and how you saw its impact and its use in China during this period?

MARTIN: You have to remember that until the Internet came along, the Chinese government, the Communist Party in that sense, was the sole source of information in China. The average Chinese citizen could not subscribe to any foreign media, whether western or Asian. The Party controlled all print and broadcast media. Some foreign newspapers and magazines were available in the hotels for the foreigners, but you couldn't buy them on a newsstand. Obviously, foreigners would leave their copies, and I'm sure these would circulate in the Chinese community. But again, I'm sure also if the Party people found them, they would be confiscated and destroyed. So the flow of information was very tightly controlled by the Party.

The Internet has opened a window, which makes it easier for the average person to get access to what is happening outside the country. On the Belgrade bombing situation, people knew within a couple of days that President Clinton had called Jiang Zemin and had apologized profusely for the mistake. This was not revealed in the internal Chinese press for weeks, if not months. I'm not even sure it was ever really revealed. So people were able to get information which their own government did not tell them. Same thing with the EP-3 situation - the initial government reaction was to the story from the military in Hainan Island that the U.S. reconnaissance plane had run into the Chinese fighter. Joe Prueher, was able to tell the senior leaders in the foreign ministry that could not have happened that way because he was a pilot, he was an aviator. So he knew exactly what an EP-3 can do, and the fact that it's moving much slower than a jet fighter coming alongside of it. If the EP-3 had turned, as they said, into the fighter, it would have missed it because the fighter would have been long past before it could have hit. In any case, the Chinese went with what they heard from their military sources down in Hainan, went public with that, and demanded compensation, and apologies based on the accident being the U.S.' fault.

It was the Internet that helped people learn what really happened in both of these incident cases. In general they know much more of what's going on, even though a lot of the sites are blocked. The government does control the Internet. It does limit what people can get. The government says they're trying to prevent pornography and hostile information.

Q: Is it easy to block their Internet ?

MARTIN: It is fairly easy to block the Internet in China. My home computer in Beijing was very slow logging on and getting onto various Internet sites. I could, but it took a long while, and certain ones I couldn't get - Washington Post, New York Times -

Q: You couldn't get those?

MARTIN: You could not get those. But the Chinese are a brilliant people, and the people who are into computers and the Internet have no problem finding cutouts and various other servers that they can access in a roundabout way to pick up what they need.

Q: Was there at all a "Samizdat" (self-published underground Press of dissidents in the Soviet Union) type of publication? This was the self-publishing thing that went on during the Stalin time, or the Soviet era time, where it was called Self-Published, which often mimeographed sheets, you know, got circulated around. Was this -

MARTIN: There is some of that. There's also now more and more of that on the Internet. They have both the chat rooms and use sort of the private publications that people pass around within the Internet system.

Q: Did they have Internet cafés?

MARTIN: Yes, they do. They're very tightly controlled as the government is able to control what portals they can access or what sites they can access. But the growth of the Internet has been phenomenal, and I think in the last 10 years it's growing exponentially, and people predict in the next 10 years the Chinese will be by far the largest Internet users in the world. In fact, they talk about Chinese replacing English as the most common Internet language. Even though the spoken dialects - Cantonese, Fujianese and Mandarin - may be different, and everybody understands and studies Mandarin, the characters are the same, so it's a universal script.

Q: What about with the computer has this simplified putting the ideographs on computer, or is English still a lot better?

MARTIN: They've got a pretty good system for the ideographs, for the characters. They can be put on the system quite easily. There's a tremendous amount of information on the Chinese internet. One of our colleagues in the embassy was very active in terms of both monitoring and reading what was on the Internet, as well as putting out some of our documents on the Internet. He probably reached far more people than all our speeches, press releases or public events. And the Embassy website was well known for it became a target for attack whenever the U.S. said or did something which was seen as anti-China.

Q: Yes. I would think...it hadn't occurred to me before, but you'd almost need Internet officers, don't you? I mean this is all over the world now.

MARTIN: That's right. USIS was also active online but this one particular officer, who was almost bilingual in Chinese and Japanese, was able to really access, translate, and put out on the Internet information that he developed himself. He was a great source of information as to what was going on. After the Belgrade bombing, our embassy home-page was bombarded by the Chinese Internet users with all sorts of scurrilous comments, threats, and emotional messages back and forth. If we hadn't been able to access all that, we wouldn't know what the public sentiment was. The hostility toward the U.S. and nationalistic feeling was quite striking.

Q: What about trade opportunities? I always think of the book that came out in the '30s called Oil for the Lamps of China, and the idea was always "what a market China was going to be...." I remember some man who was really very interested because he sold caskets and he thought of those millions of Chinese dying every year.

MARTIN: The old saying, of course, is the British term: that if every Chinese person wore his shirt an inch longer, the mills of Manchester would be running forever! Well, the market is there, but it's not there. I mean there is a market as the Chinese standard of living goes up. As they get more disposable income, which many of them have never had, there is a market for Western things. But it is not an infinite market because 1) you've got Chinese companies that also produce goods, some of which are still competitive and good, particularly the more private sector goods. 2) You've also got competition from other companies - Japanese, Koreans, Southeast Asians, what have you - who have also invested and produce in China. But 3) you've got a limited middle class. When people look at China, they look at 1.3 billion people, and think, “Wow! This is a great potential market!” But of that 1.3 billion people, probably 900 million to a billion probably don’t have much in the way of disposable income. You’re talking about two to three hundred million people, which is not an insignificant market, but it’s not a billion!

People are moving up the economic ladder and are potentially good customers. Previously foreign products were considered to be better because they were more reliable, safer, probably what they were supposed to be, whether shampoo, breakfast cereal, or computers. But now the Chinese have moved upscale very quickly. Part of perhaps the nationalistic vent is that people now say, “You ought to buy Chinese. Don’t buy American,” or “Don’t buy Japanese.” The Japanese have always had a problem in China, particularly this last century, particularly because of their encroachments into China, their colonialism, and imperialism. Back in the ’20s, after the Treaty of Versailles awarded German territories in the Shandong Peninsula to the Japanese, the Chinese instituted a boycott of Japanese products. This was one of the first nationalistic movements in China and caused a lot of friction, perhaps even provoking a more militant Japanese policy toward China. This has happened over the years since then. Recently, when Japanese Prime Minister Koizumi visited the Yasukuni shrine in Tokyo for the war dead, the Chinese internet lit up calling for a boycott of Japanese products. Many American companies invest in China anticipating a major growth in the domestic market but may find the market limited by competition with Chinese companies that appeal to consumers' nationalistic sentiments.

Q: Were we monitoring the new class of the Chinese millionaires? Every once in a while you are reminded of the old hundred flowers campaign (during the mid-1950s) which suddenly had their heads chopped off. Was there a feeling that the excesses of this class might bring the wrath down upon them?

MARTIN: Many of the most egregious excesses have been restricted lately, apparently mainly by the wealthy themselves out of self interest. Many are worried about periodic anti-corruption campaigns since many of these people did get their money through corruption -- personal contacts, payoff, or bribery of officials. There is an increasing concern that corruption may be the straw that breaks China’s back, because it’s rampant, just everywhere. A vice mayor in Shenyang, in the Northeast, was recently reported to have squandered something like 20 to 30 million dollars gambling in Macau. At the same time, you have the workers in the state-owned enterprises out on the street, without a pension, without any kind of a social safety net. It is a serious social, economic and ultimately, political problem.

Rural areas have been in recession, if not depression, for the last four or five years; and bankrupt state-owned enterprises are kept alive only by the banking system providing them loans, which nobody expects to be repaid. But the rural population is dispersed enough that it’s somewhat more manageable. When the proletariat lines up on the street with 30,000 people demonstrating, that becomes a political problem.

Q: Yes. What was your impression during this 1999 – 2000 period of the Central Government, its ability to deal with the horrendous problems of this huge state?

MARTIN: It's an immense challenge. They were trying to do the best they could. Zhu Rongji, the premier at the time, had some very good ideas, but I'm not sure he was able to really succeed in all of his goals. Part of the problem is, as I said earlier, the economic reforms have gone about as far as they can without a political reform. Some movement on the political side of things is needed before economic dislocations can be adequately addressed. It is unclear whether or not the government, whether the Party's willing to do that. There is hope that the Party may transmogrify into something like a democratic socialist party in Eastern Europe, in which managers administrators are allowed to make decisions in a more democratic manner, or less authoritarian manner.

Even though technically China has a strong, centralized national government, provincial governments have a great deal of power and influence. The amount of money they send forward in terms of revenue collection, in terms of taxes, is minuscule compared to most other countries. The Central Government only gets somewhere between 20 and 25 percent of the total revenue taken in the country. So they don't have a lot of resources with which to operate. As I mentioned above when talking about my tour in Guangzhou, the Guangdong provincial government finds all sorts of ways to raise money, but they don't call any of them taxes. They're fees, tolls, surcharges, or what have you. They don't call them taxes because by law they have a certain percentage of taxes they have to remit to the Central Government. This is true of all the other provinces and municipalities. The central government tries to keep all the regional and local officials working in the same direction but it is a challenge.

Q: Did you see any potential schism developing in China, including even a breaking away between say the coastal region and the interior or north-south?

MARTIN: There are many regional divisions in the country - east and west, particularly the far west, the Muslim and minority areas of Tibet, Xinjiang. The minority areas feel alienated, separated from China. They don't want to belong to China, don't feel that they are Chinese in many ways, both ethnically, or racially, and certainly culturally. That is why Beijing is so adamant about maintaining its control of Tibet and Xinjiang, because they are afraid that if they let one go, they will all drift away. Another reason why they're so adamant about Taiwan is if they give Taiwan any kind of autonomy or independence, then why not Tibet, why not Xinjiang, why not inner Mongolia, etc.

As I noted while in Guangzhou, there are also many divisions between the north and south. Guangdong has traditionally been more progressive, outward looking, and integrated with the global economy than most of China. Similarly, migrants from Fujian province have gone abroad for centuries, mostly to Southeast Asia, so they are more outwardly oriented. Hong Kong has had a major impact on much of south China because of the spread of manufacturing, investment and people across the border. We called it the "Hong Kongization" of South China. But now it is Shanghai's turn to attract foreign investment and wealth, spreading development all up and down the Yangtze River basin.

As to a possible breakup of the country, my usual answer is that the sense of a unitary China is psychologically so powerful that most Chinese will do anything to keep the country together. I think that's why Taiwan remains such a big psychological issue. The sense of China's coming back together as a unitary nation, or a culture (because the idea of nationhood is a recent concept in terms of Chinese thought processes), is very strong, stronger than centrifugal forces pulling regions apart.

Q: We in the Foreign Service have watched these things over the years and called things wrong a number of times. We often believe the devil we know and deal with will always be the same. The idea of the Soviet Union breaking up did not. make any sense to many officers. Are there others who've been through your experiences who were looking at it differently?

MARTIN: I'm sure there are! This is my own personal estimate at this point. But, once can always say "it depends." Depending on how things develop, whether or not the government and Party is able to address these major economic and social issues, will determine whether their country is able to make a go of it. I don't see China splitting apart into different political entities but can see regions the country becoming much less cohesive than now. I believe the Central Government will still be able to maintain control through the police, security services and military.

Don't forget the Soviet Union was a forced empire of disparate nations and peoples who resented Moscow's rule and broke away as soon as the center eased up its control mechanisms. Beijing has studied the Soviet collapse carefully and is determined to avoid the same mistakes.

But again, the Chinese have a great fear of luan (chaos or confusion), because they've gone through that over the last hundred years. They realize how terrible things were before 1949: civil war, foreign invasions, foreign encroachments, China being picked apart by foreign powers. I think the Chinese want to try to do everything they can to avoid that. I think even the people who don't like the government, people who don't like the Communist Party, are going to make every effort to try to avoid that situation in the future. Many people have told me, "It's a bad situation. We don't like the government. We don't like the situation here now. But life is better now than it has been for the last 150 years!" It's hard to argue with that! And the Communist Party of course constantly reminds people that it was the one that ended foreign interference and is rebuilding China's status in the world. It uses De Gaulle's line "Apres moi, le deluge" to emphasize that without the CCP, the country would revert to its pre-1949 chaos.

Q: What about the Communist Party? Are there more than 10 people who still believe in real Marxism? If you have a political system based on a doctrine, an ideology, you have to teach the doctrine. If no one still believes in it, it is an awful lot of waste of time, an awful lot of people get bored. Were they beginning to come up with another configuration, or was the government still spouting the old terms and teaching the old Marxism in the universities?

MARTIN: They still do, yes! Marxism courses are still required. The Communist Party school for cadre in Beijing runs all the party officials from the entire country through a required six-month course at certain stages of their career, sort of like training in the Foreign Service. Marxism, Leninism, Mao Zedong Thought and recent revelations such as Jiang Zemin's "Three Represents" are still required study. My impression is that most people don't listen, don't pay much attention, and don't find it applicable to their life or work these days.

But the Party has adapted to changing times. At the anniversary of the Communist Party founding on July 1 few years ago, Jiang Zemin, , opened Party membership to the private sector, to entrepreneurs. What kind of a Communist Party is it that allows capitalist entrepreneurs to join the party? It is a party that realizes that their hold on power is based upon their being able to provide the goods to the people, to continue to improve the economy, to continue to improve the standard of living of the people. The goal is to at least give everybody the sense that things are getting better, that they too have an opportunity to improve their life in the future. This is totally different from the traditional Chinese view that the good times were during the golden age of Confucius.

The communist perspective of course is that historical development is inevitable and society moves from feudalism to capitalism to socialism and eventually communism. Now the line is that things are getting better, the future is going to be better, China's going to reestablish itself as a strong power, that China's going to become one of the leading cultural civilizations of the world, back to where they were before. This is their goal, to resume their global position. And I think all Chinese, of all political persuasions, identify with that goal. The question is whether it going to be accomplished by the Communist Party? I think most people think not, at least as the Party is presently configured. It is going to have to transmogrify somehow.

Q: Was the Party's recruiting business people to get people with a business viewpoint into the seats of power or to make sure they did not become a separate political force?

MARTIN: I think the Party realized it needed to co-opt the growing entrepreneurial sector to ensure it maintained control over a key sector of the economy. And the entrepreneurs were flattered to be a part of the power elite, partly because many had been successful because of connections with bureaucrats and cadres and partly because they saw it as a means of preserving their status. Broadening Party membership to the entrepreneurs was one of the three "represents" of Jiang Zemin who recognized that getting the new private sector to support the Party would help advance the CCP's efforts to provide economic benefits to people and thus remain in power. Ideologically, the doctrinal changes have required contorted rationalizations but the Party has always been able to find the necessary flexibility.

I see two problem areas. Younger Party members are frustrated with the old rigid procedures and doctrines of the party. While they are happy to be in the seat of power, many realize the growing economic inequalities are destabilizing. They are also questioning why greater political choice cannot be given once economic options and changes have been instituted? But how do you reform politically without losing power? I think these are the dilemmas they face, and they haven't resolved.

Q: While you were there, did you see concern about China absorbing Hong Kong and then ruining it all? But it sounds almost like Hong Kong is absorbing China.

MARTIN: I left Guangzhou in 1996, a year before Hong Kong reverted to Chinese sovereignty and returned to Beijing a little over two years after. I was in Hong Kong on June 30, 1997 for the turn over ceremony and had followed developments thereafter. The transition went well and fears of Chinese suppression of Hong Kong's freedoms did not occur. By the time I was in Beijing, the issue did not come up in our bilateral relations.

Hong Kong continued to dominate south China's economy as manufacturing moved out of Hong Kong into Guangdong province. As the Cantonese populated both sides of the border, the interactions were very natural.

Q: Is there a Shanghai way of doing things, and a Hong Kong way, or a Guangzhou way of doing things, or not?

MARTIN: There are differences, yes, of course. I think that there are different approaches and that they don't like each other very much. The Cantonese are active in terms of trading abroad, whereas the Shanghaiese tend to be more involved in the economic power structure within China, in terms of banking, finance, and infrastructure.

I noted above during our discussion of my tour in Guangzhou that at that time I did not feel the four consulates were very well integrated into the overall mission. I did not mind being left alone then but when Joe Prueher and I arrived in Beijing, we wanted to keep the consulates informed of what we were doing. I wanted to set up a secure phone line to each of the Consuls General so I could have a weekly if not more frequent conference call. But we found that the secure communication system could not handle it. So I started a weekly informal message to the CGs and we invited them to Beijing for quarterly coordination meetings. Joe also made it a point to visit each of the consulates as did I.

Each consulate had its own unique character and challenges. Guangzhou took the least attention, perhaps because I was more familiar with the situation and since the CG had worked as my consular chief.

Shenyang became a problem when fumes permeated the residence apartments next to the office building, making consulate personnel sick and frightened of long term health issues. We evacuated the building and put everyone into a western style hotel while we had tests conducted on the apartment building. When no satisfactory cause was determined, we decided to move the staff into new housing which alleviated concerns and improved morale in that isolated hardship post.

Chengdu was a small post responsible for nearly 60% of the land area of China (including all of Tibet and Xinjiang). Generally it was a relaxed and efficient post which had moved into new office and residential quarters. Ambassador Prueher and I had to resolve a serious internal staff problem, however, which took considerable time and care to manage emotional issues. I appreciated Joe's firm but fair approach and his insistence that he make the difficult decisions.

The Shanghai consulate at times assumes the character of its host city, which considers itself China's leading metropolitan and financial center of China. With a large American business presence and frequent visitors, we occasionally had to reiterate that consulates are subordinate to the Embassy.

Through Joe and my periodic visits and frequent communications, I believe we were able to create a sense of partnership and cooperation with the consulates.

Q: What about the cultural side - movies, films, TV. All of us have seen these magnificent movies that have come out of China. I'm sure these have gone through quite a filter; but still, they seem much franker than before.

MARTIN: They are very frank now, and the social issues they deal with are really quite amazing to me. That is one of the major things I saw when I returned after an absence of three years. Films are discussing more social issues - urban alienation, divorce, the environment. Traditional neighborhoods are being bulldozed, and replaced by high rise apartments being like the urban renewal tenements in Chicago. The changes in people's lives are being well expressed in the movies and relates to what people are going through.

Q: What about the role of the People's Liberation Army (PLA)?

MARTIN: China is moving out of a totalitarian system or a totalitarian structure of government. Chairman Mao could do what he wanted, and everybody followed him. Deng Xiaoping for the most part could as well but generally consulted a group of contemporaries called "the elders." The third generation (Jiang Zemin) had less total personal control. It's much more of a collegial leadership at the top. The fourth generation now in power, is even less authoritarian. Now it more a matter of the leaders placing their supporters in key positions in order to carry out the their policies. Not unlike a new U.S. administration putting its political appointees in key jobs.

This kind of a system builds interest groups. There are factions or different interest groups within the CCP as well as out in the public. Leaders now have to listen to public opinion which previously either didn't exist or nobody dared express opinions other than what the party told them to express.

I consider the PLA (People's Liberation Army) just another big interest group, a powerful one; and they sit at the highest ranks of the government! So they have interests which often do not fit well with the way the rest of society is developing. The PLA, despite being a "people" army" has in recent years been basically separated from society. Traditionally, most of the military have come from rural areas, most are not well educated. PLA modernization aims to upgrade the caliber and education level of recruits, especially officers. They want high tech people, college graduates. Much of the increased military budget is going to higher pay to draw a better quality recruit. The PLA is not having an easy time as pay is still low for university graduates and it's a rough life. Most people coming out of the university, if they have any smarts, don't want to go into the army. As the army modernizes, and gives higher priority to the navy and air force, it needs technically competent personnel to operate more sophisticated weapons systems. As the country modernizes and becomes more international in its outlook and policies, the military is fighting to maintain its political clout. It is important to remember the PLA is the combat arm of the Communist Party and not a national army under the government structure. During World War II and the civil war, the Red Army was key to the survival of the Party. The PLA maintain its central political role until Deng began his economic reforms and the PLA had to take 4th place in the modernizations. But it was recalled to keep the CCP in power in 1989 during the Tiananmen incident. Now the Party focuses on maintaining its power by providing economic development and rising living standards, not a role the PLA can play.

However, as China assumes a larger regional, and increasingly, global, role, the PLA argues it has greater responsibilities to protect and advance China's interests. And there is always Taiwan, the PLA's (and CCP's) number one objective. To be able to fulfill its missions, the PLA argues for, and generally wins, increased budgetary support to purchase and develop sophisticated weapons systems, improve training, and recruit better educated personnel. They carefully study U.S. war fighting techniques in the Gulf War, Kosovo, now in Afghanistan and Iraq, and realize how far behind they are technologically and doctrinally.

Q: Yes. The PLA was predicated on mass armies, and we've gone high tech, and mass armies are more of an encumbrance than a help.

MARTIN: Absolutely! They see this, and realize that they're falling further and further behind. They're buying Sovremenny (Russian built class guided missile destroyers) destroyer-cruisers from Russia, airplanes from Russia, and developing their naval and air capabilities. A critical weak point is their defense industry. They have had 50 years to develop their military industry but continue to have problems in producing high grade metallurgy needed for modern weapons systems. They don't have the capability to build a Sovremenny destroyer yet themselves. They don't have the capability of building a Sukhoi fighter on their own. They tried to put it together in kit form. They tried to reverse engineer one. But their defense industries are not yet sophisticated enough to produce their own modern weapons systems that are required in today's world.

Q: Did you get a feel that there's an intellectual ferment going on, a realization that maybe a relatively small, high-tech military would be better?

MARTIN: They're trying to do that. They've downsized considerably. They used to have something like four million soldiers in the PLA. They've downsized to two million something now, and they're cutting even more. A lot of these people have been shifted over into what they call the People's Armed Police (PAP), a paramilitary police force. Technically they are off the PLA rolls onto the PAP rolls but the PLA and PAP have close links.

Their goal is to transform the people's army into more of a high tech, more of a sophisticated, modern army rather than a mass army. They've gotten away, certainly, from the idea of people's war in which you had massive frontal assaults.

Q: Yes. What about all these, I mean again, we're talking about this 1999-2000 period, these factories, and the corruption, and all. I mean the PLA seemed to be very much into its own state as far as a very lucrative one, and more like a Mafia organization than anything else.

MARTIN: As we discussed earlier, Deng Xiaoping's allowing the PLA to make up for minimal budget support in the early 1980s by getting into commercial endeavors ended up weakening and corrupting the military. Jiang Zemin ordered the PLA out of business and increased their defense budget significantly. In recent years, PLA budget increases have averaged around 17 percent although U.S. analysts believe that's probably only a percentage of the PLA's total budget.

Q: As the PLA downsized, do they have a problem with a huge officer corps as in the Soviet Union?

MARTIN: I think the PLA faced a similar problem but cut back on their officer corps as well. They've watched Russia pretty closely as to what Russia's been going through, trying to avoid the same mistakes. One problem the PLA is encountering is a lack of a strong non-commissioned officer corps, which many consider the backbone of the U.S. armed services. Without a deep bench of sergeants and petty officers, it is difficult for officers to maintain communication and command over enlisted soldiers.

Q: When you left in late 2000, did you see China, then or in the near future, being a particular menace or threat to the United States?

MARTIN: I don't think so. I see China increasing its influence around its borders - Southeast and Central Asia - but don't see that it will necessarily threaten our vital interests. Southeast Asian nations are well aware of this 600-pound gorilla in their neighborhood, and they would just as soon have somebody else around to deflect the focus of China. There is strong support for the U.S. to remain actively engaged in the region. However, the countries don't want to have to choose sides. They don't want to have to say, "We will side with the U.S. against China," or "We'll side with China against the U.S." because they want to have as good relations with both sides as possible.

China, at the same time I think, wants to have as calm and peaceful of a relationship with its neighbors as well as us, to be able to continue its economic development, and resolve its internal, domestic, economic, and increasingly political problems. And I think, hopefully, this will give everybody a chance to keep calm and continue to develop and maintain good relationships without a dustup.

Q: Outside of the always difficult issue of Taiwan, do you see any potential of China wanting other areas, being aggressive anywhere else?

MARTIN: China traditionally has not been an expansionist power although, depending on the strength of the dynasty, they have expanded, or contracted their control over border areas in Central Asia. I believe China's present borders, based on the furthest reach of the Qing Dynasty, probably are beyond what they should be. They could give autonomy to Tibet within the Chinese framework; and I think Tibet would be just as happy to have an autonomous relationship with the rest of China as long as they could preserve their unique culture. But Beijing is afraid that if it give any space at all, the minority areas would all just spin out of control, and drift off.

Q: Yes. Did South Korea and North play any role while you were there?

MARTIN: Yes. Kim Jong Il came to visit once when I was in Beijing. It was interesting to talk to my Foreign Ministry interlocutors about their impressions of Kim. They were surprised as well about how sophisticated he was, how much he knew about computers, and how he was well clued in on what was happening in China and the rest of the world. He's probably one of the few in North Korea that has a computer with Internet access, and so forth. He's also not the flake that many people in the U.S. make him out to be.

Korea was very much on people's minds. China has good relations with South Korea which has complicated relations with the DPRK. They are somewhat discomforted by North Korea and not quite sure how to handle Pyongyang. They feel they have an obligation, for their own interest, to try to help North Korea in its transition into a more normal country, which will be difficult.

Q: Were they as concerned as we are about the hard versus soft landing of North Korea?

MARTIN: They don't want a collapse of North Korea 1) because they anticipate hundreds of thousands, if not millions, of North Koreans flooding across the Yalu River into Manchuria, where somewhere around 300,000 ethnic Koreans already live, some of them who've been there for generations. 2) They're also concerned about what that would do to South Korea, and 3) they're concerned what a united Korean peninsula would mean for their own security interests, particularly if it's allied to the United States. I think they are uncertain how to handle all these issues.

I think the South Koreans don't want it to collapse either. They see what happened with East Germany, and this would be, you know, ten times or a hundred times worse.

Q: How did you feel relations between China and our Congress were? Did members of Congress come over to see things personally?

MARTIN: Congressional views of China were diverse but the most outspoken were the negative ones. Joe Prueher was very good at was making the rounds on the Hill. He, in fact, came out, and he thought after his confirmation that he might have been able to get a slight window of opportunity to even get Jesse Helms to come out to China, which would have been a real coup. Helms never did, of course. But there was an opportunity, I think, to try to bring more people out. Jim Sasser was good at bringing his former colleagues from the Senate out to China to visit, and we strongly urged members of Congress to come as often and as voluminously as possible. We said, "You may not change your mind, but come out and see it for yourself. Don't rely upon second or third hand interest groups to tell you what's happening in China. You need to see it." Most members who came out were absolutely surprised with what they saw because this was totally different from what they expected to find in China. We had, I think, almost every cabinet secretary in the administration come to China at one point or another during the one year I was there. So we had many delegations, many business people, some for talks, others just to see what was going on. I think it was very useful.

We have a lot of things going on with China in terms of all parts of the government that are involved one way or the other. What you hear about in terms of the political friction is only a small percentage of our bilateral relationships, many of which go on without much interruption despite the political ups and downs. We have a lot of scientific exchanges with technical delegations going back and forth.

Q: You talk about exchanges. You know, I can understand what would come from our science and tech side. What were we getting from them?

MARTIN: Medical, health research, medical research processes, environmental studies. We're exchanging views, perhaps more from our side going to China to try to help them with some of their environmental degradation, which is very severe. There are a lot of science and technological areas in which we're working together - computer translation facilities in terms of linguistics, working on various agricultural resources, drought problems, again, environmentally related. Right now Beijing is under a dust cloud, usual spring dust storms, that make it so you can barely see across the street from the thickness of the dust. Everything is painted orange in color.

But you know, there are a lot of areas in which we have a lot of exchanges back and forth, and it's quite productive.

Q: How were Sino-Russian relations when you were in Beijing?

MARTIN: They seemed to be fairly good. Putin and Jiang exchanged visits. They had pretty much regularized their contacts. Part of it, in my view, was to still play the three-cornered game of keeping contacts with the Russians so it didn't look as though U.S.-China relations were the only game in town.

Q: And we're not even playing that game anymore!

MARTIN: We don't play that game anymore.

Q: Tell me about your involvement in the Taiwan issue during your tour in Beijing in 1999-2000.

MARTIN: I was in Beijing during a momentous time in Sino-US-Taiwan relations. Taiwan was coming up for another round of presidential elections in early March of 2000, and the PRC was getting exercised about this. The previous election, in 1996, when Lee Teng-hui was elected, was the cause for a great deal of friction in our relationship, and the cause of PLA military exercises in the Taiwan Strait.

In the 2000 election, Chen Shui-bian was running on the Democratic Progressive Party (DPP) ticket; James Soong on the People's First Party, the split off faction from the KMT; and Lien Chan, the KMT candidate. Lee Teng-hui could not run because of term limits, and so there was a great deal of uncertainty as to who was going to win among these three because the three-way contest was probably going to result in a minority candidate getting elected. The Chinese were very concerned about this because they saw the DPP and Chen Shui-bian as advocating a pro-independence policy, which was, in fact, one of the planks on the DPP's political platform for years.

Early in the year we spent a lot of time talking with Chinese officials and scholars about the election, giving our views about what was happening in Taiwan, and essentially cautioning them not to do anything rash. However, China continued to ratchet up the rhetoric through January and February. The third week of February a high level interagency delegation came from Washington, led by Deputy Secretary Strobe Talbott, with representatives from the Defense Department and other agencies, which gave it a rather high profile. They spent two or three days in Beijing having various senior level discussions with various elements in the Chinese government. Their message was to keep it cool, not to get excited about the Taiwan election, that U.S. policy had not changed, and that the election in Taiwan was something that Beijing should take handle with a great deal of caution.

The delegation left, I think, on Friday afternoon. The ambassador left to go back to Washington on Saturday because he had previously scheduled consultations and discussions on the Hill. On Monday morning, the Chinese issued their White Paper on Taiwan, which contained for the first time what we came to describe as the third “if.” Previously, Beijing had said that they would use force or military action against Taiwan if Taiwan declared independence. The second “if” was if a foreign country, unnamed, but obviously directed at us, occupied Taiwan or established military relationships with Taiwan. Now they added a third “if,” which was that if Taiwan did not begin negotiations for reunification with the mainland under their “one China” policy. This third “if” caused a great stir all around the world, particularly in Washington.

There was a great deal of concern as to why they issued the paper two or three days after the Talbott delegation had been there without any hint of their plan during the 3 days of talks. Was this a slap in the face of the U.S.? Was it a deliberate attempt to embarrass us? Was it an attempt to try to influence the Taiwan elections, which was probably the case? And so there was a considerable amount of discussion among analysts as to what this all meant.

We quickly engaged in damage control. We made a number of official representations and held a number of discussions with Chinese leaders, indicating that we didn’t think this was very helpful, and urging that they continue to be calm and cautious in their response.

A couple weeks later, on March 18, 2000, Taiwan held its elections and sure enough, Chen Shui-bian won the presidency. For the first time, the KMT, the Kuomintang Party, was out of power in Taiwan. The Nationalist party Sun Yat-sen and Chiang Kai-shek created in the 1910s had been defeated by democratic elections. or teens, and ’20s. This was a momentous change politically in Taiwan. The Chinese authorities in Beijing were absolutely shocked. They were totally nonplused in terms of what to do now. It is important to remember that the KMT (Kuomintang Party) and the CCP (Chinese Communist Party) were sister parties. They were both established as Leninist parties by the Kuomintang back in the ’20s. The relationship was such that they knew and understood each other since they both came from the same roots. But in recent years, as Taiwan became more democratic, particularly as Taiwanese (as opposed to transplanted mainlanders) assumed greater leadership within the Kuomintang, Beijing increasingly did not understand the political dynamic in Taiwan. So when Chen Shui-bian was elected, the PRC was absolutely astounded. They really had no idea how to react on this.

Fortunately, I think because of their being so shocked and uncertain, they didn’t do much. I don’t give much of the credit to us for telling them to play it cool, although I think that did help. Essentially I think they reassembled their Taiwan experts to sort out 1) what went wrong, 2) why the experts had not predicted Chen’s election, and 3) what they could do about it. Eventually, in April, what they finally came up with was a wait-and-see attitude, to see what Chen Shui-bian did. Obviously if he declared independence or if he started making noises along those lines, they would have to take strong action. But they would wait and see what he did. I think that was a good policy on their part as it reduced tensions and fears of peremptory action. With periodic spikes in rhetoric, Beijing has essentially continued their wait and see policy since then.

Q: What was your reaction and your embassy's reaction to the third "if"? Did you see it as a power play by one part of the Chinese government over another?

MARTIN: We had a lot of debates as to whether this was a PLA forcing the hand, whether this was a cleared document, whether this was something that the Foreign Ministry had not cleared. The Foreign Ministry had been the hosts for the Talbott delegation, and although the delegation had met with the PLA and Defense Ministry, it was essentially a Ministry of Foreign Affairs (MFA) show. The question we all discussed at great length was whether the MFA had been cut out of the decision? Was this a power play by the PLA and others in the state council, vis-à-vis Taiwan? I think the final conclusion, after a great deal of discussion, and talking to Foreign Ministry and PLA contacts was that it was a well cleared, inter-ministerial document which had been vetted throughout the government, and reflected a united PRC policy.

Why they came out at that particular juncture, why they thought that this was necessary, is unclear. My view is that they were frustrated that Taiwan was not going in the right direction, that they had to lay down this additional condition, this warning that their patience was not infinite.

Q: Had there been any Taiwan politicians talking to Communist Party members in China or elsewhere?

MARTIN: The problem was they had not had a dialog. Ever since Lee Teng-hui, the president of Taiwan, had 1) gone to the States, and 2) been reelected, Beijing had turned off the dialog. The PRC had refused to continue what looked like a pretty good start back in 1992 when they had unofficial talks between the two unofficial organizations that had been set up on either side for cross strait dialog, and that looked as though it was going pretty well. But after '95, this was turned off on the Chinese side and not restarted. We constantly encouraged them to reopen the dialog, to find ways in which they could reestablish talks, reestablish connections, reestablish communications because there were a lot of issues that needed to be resolved. But this was not done at that point. It has been subsequently, although it's not on the formal level.

Q: Yes. It seems like the Chinese government makes these statements, and then, I mean they're, you know, crying, "Wolf! Wolf!" but most of the time, they're ones that really everybody knows, at least in the short term, aren't going to happen.

MARTIN: Well, you don't know that, I mean in a sense, because they've continued their missile buildup in Fujian Province and in the provinces that are facing Taiwan. They have been rattling the sword, if you will, at least in the PLA press and the PLA media, about Taiwan saying that, you know, their patience is not infinite, that they can't wait forever, that they need to restart the talks. After Chen Shui-bian got elected, they waited a while to see what he would do, but then they continued to emphasize the need for "one country, two systems" for Taiwan to recognize "one China." Fortunately, I think Chen has been very cautious in his public statements and in his actions. He has repeatedly indicated a willingness to talk to the mainland, to have discussions with them, but he insists 1) on an equal basis, and 2) without the Chinese precondition of recognizing “one China,” that Taiwan is part of “one China.” Because of the way Beijing has defined it, “one China” means Beijing is the capital and Taiwan is a subordinate entity. It’s not a province perhaps, but a subordinate entity under Beijing.

Q: You were a chargé when the third “if” came out. How were you received when you talked to officials?

MARTIN: They would reiterate their policy line, which followed what the White Paper had said, that this was their government policy, that they were concerned about Taiwan. They wanted to make sure that everybody understood their position. We reiterated our point that it was not helpful because it threw down the gauntlet. This added threat to use force was also destabilizing because of its vagueness in timing (how long a wait for Taiwan to unify was too long?).

Also in March of 2000, the National People’s Congress was holding its annual sessions in Beijing. Many people will remember the picture of Premier Zhu Rongji with his finger pointed in the air, shrilly saying that, the Taiwan situation is very dangerous, and in the forthcoming election the Taiwan people need to think carefully about who they’re going to elect, etc. I think this was another blatant effort by Beijing to try to influence the elections in Taiwan. Once again, as it had been in the previous election, it backfired. Some believe it may have helped split the election returns three ways. Chen Shui-bian won only by about 39 percent of the vote, James Soong came in second with about 37, and the KMT candidate came in much lower, around 23 percent. Chen was elected president, but the KMT retained majority control of the Legislative Yuan. Chen has had a difficult time getting any of his program or legislative agenda through.

Q: Why was the KMT doing so well in the legislative assembly?

MARTIN: Basically local politics. They had the local election system pretty well sewn up, either through patronage, corruption, name recognition. Being the beneficiaries of the party in power for so long, they had a large war chest in the party coffers, and they were able to essentially spread the wealth around during elections, for roads, public services, etc.

But that is how democracy works. One of the things that Chen has been trying to do since he was elected is to have electoral reform, to changes in the system by mandating better accounting, and more transparency in the electoral process. With democracy, if you don’t have transparency, but have a dominant political party which has run everything for the last 50 some years, you’ve have a lot of networks and interests which can affect election results.

Q: Going back to Mainland China, did you see any seeds of democracy developing there?

MARTIN: I think there are indications of it. They have the much touted village elections, which they started at the lowest level, the village level. The township is the lowest level of governmental authority. The village, which is under the township, is perhaps equivalent to a neighborhood or community of several tens of houses. In the village elections, the government allows people who are not party members to run for election as village chiefs. In many cases party members still get elected. In other cases non-party members are. There’s been a lot of foreign interest and attention to these elections. Former-President Jimmy Carter has been an observer; the Carter Center's been involved in monitoring and studying this process. I think it's a good step forward, but it has not moved very far. The National People's Congress pass a law to expand village level elections with the unstated suggestion that they might be elevated to the township or higher level eventually. It's a start, but it's got a long way to go as it is still below the bottom rung of the governmental bureaucratic structure. Often, if the non-party member is elected, he or she is then persuaded become party members. The elections thus become sort of an entry level test for the Party. People elected by their peers as being competent, uncorrupted, good leaders are attractive to the CCP.

Q: I think we touched on this before. Did you have the feeling the party, the ideology, was gone?

MARTIN: There's not much ideology left in the party. They still have the rhetoric. They still have their study sessions. President Jiang has come out with a campaign called the Three Represents, and everybody's trying to decide what this really means. It's his way to sort of follow in the tradition of Chairman Mao's thought, that he was a great ideologue and a great philosopher. But Jiang is not. Jiang is an engineer, and he's trying to come up with, you know, kind of a political mantra or political campaign, which can represent his ideology. It's not taken very seriously. Everybody has to study it in the party, but basically what the party is doing is finding ways to stay in power, and the way to stay in power is to continue the economic benefits to the people.

Q: I notice you're talking about the three "ifs" and the three this, and the seven those. Just as aside, I imagine in the embassy, there must have been jokes in the corridor along the lines of, "Oh, God, here is Martin with his four others and six formers...."

MARTIN: The four yes'es, three no's; the six do's, and four don'ts; and the one up, and two downs. There are lots of jokes around, within the China cadre about this. The Chinese themselves are rather inured to all this because they always have threes of this, fours of that, pluses and minuses, and so forth. But it's all part of the rhetoric that they've gone through for the last 50 years. And the numeration is just a short hand for longer campaign slogans used so even the most illiterate farmer can remember it. While foreigners may think the terminology humorous, the political campaigns can be deadly serious for Chinese. Much more so during Chairman Mao's day when people were killed or exiled during the incessant campaigns, but anyone in a government or Party position has to go along with the campaign de jour or risk his job.

Q: You'd been in and out of this for a while. Do you have any comments on the China hands, the ones like yourself and others who are coming around? Can you characterize them? I'm talking about the State Department and others who are dealing with China. Are they cynics? Are they optimistic? Do you have any feel for the thought process, including your own?

MARTIN: I think one cannot generalize on a diverse cohort across a broad time spectrum. Am I a cynic, or am I an optimist, or a pessimist? It depends on what day of the week you ask because it does vary. One's attitude and mood has its ups and downs, often influenced by the vagaries of our relations with China.

Those of us who spent our careers studying or trying to learn about China, trying to understand China, realize the complexities of the country, realize the complexities of our relationship, and it's very difficult to make generalizations. It's dangerous to make generalizations. As Stapleton Roy, the former ambassador, has put it, which I think sums it up - predictions are very difficult, particularly about the future - and so you have to be very cautious in how you predict things. But if I have to generalize, my sense, is that over the last 20-25 years, China has gone through a tremendous period of change, a dramatic transition, both economically, under the economic reforms that were started by the former paramount leader Deng Xiaoping, and socially. But the social changes have not kept up with the economic changes. Now you have serious problems in the state-owned enterprise sector, the state sector of the economy, which basically is bankrupt. People are being thrown out of work, being thrown out on the street with no safety net after having been in the "birth-to-death" cocoon where the work unit took care of all one's personal needs. Lacking any national social safety net - unemployment insurance, social security, pension system, health benefits - millions are left on their own. These social problems quickly become political problems. The dramatic rise in public protests and demonstrations is the result. The government sees and understands the problems but has not been able to solve them.

I think most of us who have dealt with China hope that the problems can be resolved peacefully and equitably. If they are not, the internal dislocations, strife, and friction will be tremendous, and the repercussions, certainly in the region and probably around the world, are going to affect all of us. There are optimists and pessimists. People are all across the board. The important thing to remember is that just because people know about China, have studied China, perhaps have an inkling of understanding about China, it doesn't necessarily mean that they are any more in favor of what the government is doing. Knowledge does not result in endorsement. Those of us who have lived and worked in China are probably among the strongest opponents and critics of the communist system for we see the weaknesses, the brutality and unfairness of the system which perpetuates and exacerbates the problems. At the same time, we recognize and credit the CCP and government for the successes it has had -- economic development, rising standards of living for hundreds of millions, greater choices and opportunities for individuals. We try to report events as we see them, and I think generally report it in a fair and unbiased way.

Q: I've talked to many Soviet hands and many saw the Soviet Union as a potential if not present enemy. Their efforts within the United States have been to play China as an enemy given the PRC's buildup of its military force. So there are elements within the United States who look on China as being not only a trade rival, but a huge, looming military and political rival. Was this a feeling that permeates the China hand corps, of seeing it as the enemy?

MARTIN: I go back to the old saying, "Your position is determined by who issues you the paycheck. If you're with the Defense Department, your job is to look out to the future and think about potential rivals, potential competitors strategically, militarily. In the State Department, I think we look at it more in terms of how can we resolve this diplomatically, how can we work out an understanding or a relationship with China which will prevent us from becoming military competitors or rivals.

I think that the important thing is that we try to work both sides of the issue; to maintain our preparedness militarily, but also work with China to try to prevent a zero sum game in which one side wins and the other loses. We can't lead them, but encourage them to see the rationale of moving in directions which will prevent them becoming a military competitor. I believe most FSOs support opening China for trade and encouraging China entering the WTO despite all the problems and difficulties that's going to cause. Educational exchanges, having people come to the States to study, can increase Chinese understanding of our society, what our system is like. Perhaps some of this will rub off, and moderate Chinese policies.

The option is having China develop on its own, as we saw back in the '50s and '60s, when they were contained and isolated. That didn't turn out very well. The Great Leap Forward and subsequently the Cultural Revolution almost tore the country apart. China supported all sorts of insurgencies and conflicts with their neighbors. I think that's not something that we want to see in the future. Nor would we benefit if China falls apart and civil war breaks out between regions or ethnic minorities. An unstable, insecure China would cause far greater chaos in the region and world than what we see today.

Q: What about China's policies towards Central Asia, places like Kyrgyzstan on the border of China? With four and a half million people, they are a little bit nervous about having China with its billion and a half population next door. Did there seem to be much of an outward thrust towards those places, or concern about them?

MARTIN: When I was in Beijing, no, because the U.S. was not focused on Central Asia at the time. But China was attentive because of the collapse of the Soviet Union and the new independent status of all these Central Asian countries. Beijing well understood the need to worry about what these weak, struggling nations would do. Historically, Central Asia was the area from which most of China's troubles came. The nomadic peoples were constantly pressing against the settled areas of the border lands. And, in certain periods, non-Han invaders, including the Mongols, conquered and ruled China. Currently, Beijing is concerned about ties between minorities in Xinjiang Province of Western China -- Uighurs, Kazakhs, Uzbeks, and Tajiks - and their tribal counterparts across the border in Central Asia. And the growth of fundamental Islam and groups willing to use terrorism to advance political goals adds to China's concerns. At the same time, Beijing is eager to establish good working relations with the governments of Central Asian countries, for political, economic (mainly energy) and security reasons.

Q: So it's not as though China was casting greedy eyes towards the others.

MARTIN: There's no indication the Chinese, at this point, have any ambitions to expand their borders westward. They have enough problems managing the Xinjiang Autonomous Region. At the same time, there are economic issues, over which they want influence, particularly oil and gas resources as well as minerals. Since 9/11, the increased U.S. presence in the region as part of our war on terrorism is of greater concern to China. Many in Beijing see U.S. military forces on their western borders as just the final brick in the containment wall that we are building around China. You talk about people in this country seeing China as a future military or security threat. The Chinese look at our policies, look at where we are, and they see us increasing our presence all around China, and they begin to wonder, "Who's the threat? Are we a threat to the U.S. or is the U.S. a threat to us?"

It's a mirror perception. They are concerned about what our policies are, and they often, as we used to say, put two and two together and get five and a half or six. Many Chinese perceive a grand orchestrated U.S. strategy by the U.S. to contain or keep China down from its rightful place in the world. They see our trade and military policies, our diplomatic initiatives as being manipulated and controlled by a master hand in the White House or someplace. These are the perceptions that we need to address in our bilateral relations.

Q: While you were there, did India come up? It's going to surpass China in population soon, and it's had a completely different experience. With all its problems, it is a democracy, and things are moving there. Was China looking over its shoulder at India?

MARTIN: I think the Chinese are paying more attention to India now. They've always had their alliance relationship with Pakistan because Pakistan was the only one that supported China's policies around the world. They saw India as a potential and a growing rival, both in geopolitical terms as well as a potential threat to their control over Tibet and the Himalayan regions. They also see democratic India as an alternative model for the third world, which China always sees itself as. They keep saying that they don't want to be a leader of the third world. They're just one of the gang. But they do see their system and their ways of doing things as an example for other underdeveloped countries. And China's successful economic development is quite a selling point.

Q: India's restrictive trade practices, which are finally being removed, are in a way has almost an advantage over the Chinese, because they have many aspects of the Western world.

MARTIN: Right. They have an underlying foundation of the British common law system, which the British left them. They have more of a rule of law than China has. But I think the countries are very different in many ways. The chaotic nature of Indian politics and society makes Chinese blanch. And Indians looking at China see it potentially as a hostile power. In reality, if you look at geopolitical relationships, the Himalayans are a wonderful barrier! Not much gets through there! There are a few passes, but it's not a broad boulevard in which you're going to send lots of goods, people, or troops back and forth. There are certain areas in which they rub up against each other, and there's friction, but it's not the north German plain.

The WTO angle is interesting. India, of course, was quite concerned about China joining WTO, mainly from a competitive point of view. The end of textile quotas in 2005 made other textile producers, Pakistan, Bangladesh, India, concerned that there's going to be a great sucking sound as China took all the textile markets around the world by being the low cost producer. While it has not reached that extent, China and India are essentially economic competitors.

Q: Yes. Are there any other areas we should cover?

MARTIN: I want to mention about PNTR, about WTO.

Q: Yes.

MARTIN: The conclusion of 13 years of Sino-U.S. negotiations on China's entry into the WTO in November 1999, just before I got to Beijing, led directly into one of the main issues on our plate during my year tour. That was getting Congress to pass a bill giving China Permanent Normal Trade Relations (PNTR) status. Once China entered the WTO, the old Most Favored Nation (MFN) trading status became illegal. So the annual congressional debate over China's human rights behavior warranted renewal of China's MFN, renamed Normal Trading Relations (NTR) status. Congressional critics of China and human rights groups' used the annual debate to castigate Beijing's poor performance although Administration advocacy always assembled enough votes to renew NTR.

For several months in the spring of 2000, beginning around the time of the Taiwan election, we launched a concerted effort in conjunction with the administration in Washington to convince Congress to pass the Permanent Normal Trade Relations bill. Commerce Secretary William M. Daley was the point man in D.C., coordinating the efforts of other Cabinet secretaries and departments. He and Agriculture Secretary Daniel Glickman were to organize congressional delegations to China, to talk to the Chinese, determine Chinese perspectives, and learn how the Chinese were going to implement the WTO agreement to which they had agreed.

That spring was a contentious time in our relations. The Cox report on China's nuclear espionage highlighted the Wen Ho-lee case in Los Alamos in which Wen was accused of selling warhead secrets to the Chinese. Perhaps to mollify human rights critics, the administration decided to again submit a proposal to examine China's human rights record at the United Nations Commission on Human Rights (UNCHR) annual meeting. All these things came together along with the Taiwan elections in the first half of 2000, making it a tense time in our relationships, and a very busy embassy.

The PNTR campaign went well and in the end, obviously, Congress did pass the legislation. Secretary Daley and Secretary Glickman were unable to get very many members of Congress who were willing to come out to China at that point, I think for domestic political reasons more than anything else. Many Members felt it was not politically wise to be seen traveling to China for whatever reason, so we only had a couple congressmen that came out with Glickman. But I think it was a useful campaign, and the legislation passed by a larger majority than we expected.

Passage of PNTR in the late summer removed a big thorn from our bilateral relationship. I believe our public, transparent campaign impressed the Chinese and began a period of improved relations after more than a year of tension and problems. But those of us working in China get used to undulations Chinese-U.S. relations and we expect improvements to be followed by new issues. And the next spring we had the EP-3 incident.

Q: How about the Olympics? Does that come up during your time?

MARTIN: The Olympics was after my time. Obviously, they were very much in the throws of preparing their case. The Olympic committees came for visits, Beijing was being spruced up with grass plantings to make it all look cleaner, etc.

We had visits by almost every cabinet member in the U.S. government during the time I was there. I think only the Secretary of Labor, who kept planning to come, but never could quite get away, was the only one that didn't come. Two that came in the summertime were Secretary of State Albright and Secretary Cohen of Defense. Quite a contrast between the two - the Secretary of State now travels in a much more imperial fashion than others, and the contrast between Secretary Albright's visit and Secretary Cohen's visit was quite dramatic. For Albright's visit, nearly all normal Embassy functions were sidelined as the Secretariat had to be staffed 24 hours a day, site officers had to dedicate themselves to each site and event, and the ambassador and I were on call if not involved most of the time. Two weeks later, Secretary Cohen came in, on a USAF airplane, as she did, but accomplished his visit with hardly a ripple or disruption other than perhaps the Defense Attaché office. Cohen's visit was much lower key with minimal storm and stress.

Q: This does raise a point. Secretary Albright had a reputation within the Foreign Service that was not a warm, cozy relationship. Part of it was because of the feeling that she was somewhat cut off, and public relations, particularly the people around her, were more important than the substance. Did you have that feeling or concern?

MARTIN: I think in many ways this was similar to other secretaries we've had, where the secretary tends to have his or her own circle of advisors and staff, and people that she or he trusts and works with. My experience, having served under secretaries, is that the morale, efficiency, and effectiveness of the State Department is best when the secretary draws upon the expertise and the resources of the department and the Foreign Service. When they isolate themselves, and use their own coterie of advisors and their own staff, and don't let the professionals in, you have bad morale, more security leaks, and you don't have very good foreign policies.

Q: Describing the American-Chinese relationship, it's a little bit like dealing with a jealous spouse or partner who is always looking behind comments and actions for hidden meaning. It makes for a very stormy relationship.

MARTIN: Yes, you could use that analogy, or you could say it shows a basic lack of trust between two parties. One often doesn't quite know why the other side is doing something. You don't know what they're going to do next, and you're not sure of your relationship with them. Whether it's a marriage, or a bilateral relationship, it's a matter of history and past actions. One of the things those of us who study and work in China try to do is to look at the total picture - history, culture, perceptions, relationships - and try to figure out why they're doing these things. They don't do them just for fun or because they want to be mean to us. They do them for historical, psychological, internal, domestic, political reasons. The important thing now, looking at China's reaction to events, in addition to all those mentioned above, is to remember China is changing so rapidly. It is not the totalitarian country it used to be. It's not a dictatorship run by Mao, who could do what he wanted, no matter how crazy it was, and no one dared object. Now there are interest groups in China, different factions, different sectors, that all have a strong voice in the councils of government, and they make their views known. In WTO relationships, how do you implement the WTO agreements that they've had? You've got a lot of people in different ministries who are going to drag their heels as best they can because it's their ox that's going to be gored. Premier Zhu Rongji came under heavy pressure from the Agriculture Ministry after he signed the WTO agreement which gave many concessions on agricultural imports. That would never have happened twenty or thirty years ago. Everyone doesn't just salute and go along with the leader's decision anymore.

Q: One last question. There was a nuclear spy episode in the United States. That happened during your time there.

MARTIN: Yes. Wen Ho-lee, the Chinese-American scientist in Los Alamos.

Q: Obviously, both the United States and the Chinese are going to be looking at each other in not completely overt ways. Was Chinese spying in the United States, from your perspective, a problem in our bilateral relationship?

MARTIN: It certainly is an irritant. Both government know both sides seek to obtain classified information of the other. It's an irritant mainly because they do it. We do it to them; they do it to us. It's a very different kind of spying than what we're used to, at least according to movies and the historical record in terms of the Soviet Union or the Eastern Europeans. You don't have people in trench coats making secret drops or handoffs, and this sort of thing. That may be part of it but the Chinese methodology is like a giant vacuum cleaner. They just suck up everything that they can get, and they have the resources to do it. Thousands of Chinese students are in the U.S., some of which undoubtedly work for or report to the Ministry of State Security. There are growing numbers of travelers, visiting officials, as well as hundreds if not thousands of people sitting at computer terminals in China on the Internet, picking up every little piece of information they can about a long list of topics. And eventually, little by little, the missing pieces of the puzzle, or unknown fact, can be reassembled. There is an enormous amount of information in public domain in this country and other countries around the world on just about everything, from strategic issues to weapons systems, to economic data, to commercially sensitive data, etc. So do the Chinese on us? They do it through agents, but they also do it through Chinese students, scientists, travelers, officials who are encouraged to look for information of specific topics while in the U.S. and then debriefed on their return. It can be as simple as, "What did you learn in the States?" They are able to learn a lot as we have a lot to offer.

Q: But can they do anything with all the information they suck up?

MARTIN: Too much information is a problem for all of us. Sorting it out and knowing what is useful and what is not is a challenge. But the Chinese are patient and have a wealth of resources devoted to it. We just need to ensure we don't make it easier for them.

To sum up my Foreign Service career, I would say it has been fascinating to be a witness to the dramatic changes in Asia over the past 40 years. By spending most of my time on China and Southeast Asia, I think I had some of the most interesting and rewarding assignments. The great aspect of being involved with China is that it is a fascinating country to study. As the Chinese say, "You can study until you're old, you can learn until you're old, but there's still a large percentage that you'll never know." So I often describe myself not as an expert but as a mere student of China.

I left Beijing the end of September 2000 and re-retired, but remained connected to the Department as a contractor, chairing the area studies course for China and Northeast Asia.

HAROLD W. GEISEL
Chief, Negotiating Team with Chinese for Embassy construction in Washington and Beijing (2001)

Ambassador Harold W. Geisel was born in Illinois in 1947. He received his BA from Johns Hopkins and his MBA from the University of Virginia. After entering the Foreign service in 1971, he was posted in Brussels, Oslo, Bern, Bamako, Durban, Rome, Bonn and Moscow and served as Ambassador to Mauritius. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on June 30, 2006

Q: Were the Soviets, Chinese messing around there?

GEISEL: A bit. I mean, I think in memory of the good old days. They had the biggest embassies, both the Russians and the Chinese. Someone put a bug under the ambassador's cocktail table once in the office and I think we ended up assuming it was the Russians. We caught one of the Embassy laborers trying to retrieve it when we broke it but he just ran away. To sum up, I would say life there for all the embassies was pretty desultory.

Q: Well tell me, what-

GEISEL: If you were to ask me what was the issue that took more of my time than anything else, it was finding a way to rebuild securely the Moscow embassy, the new embassy. I suppose that's one of the reasons I was recruited out of Moscow. I went to a lot of meetings and these were meetings at the highest levels, including the director of Central Intelligence. Moose and I were taken out to the National Security Agency, NSA, at Fort Meade and given what they claimed was a very, very special briefing on their concerns and we were told about all sort of ways that we wouldn't believe that we could be listened to if we weren't careful. Afterwards they said to us, you know, we hope you understand you have been shown the crown jewels. When Moose and I were alone I said well, I think actually we were shown the crown princess's jewels. It took up a lot of my time and ultimately of course we did come up with a concept. Actually we'd been selling it to the Hill and to the intelligence community earlier under the first Bush administration; it was called Top Hat. What you had was the compromised portion of the building, you know, where we found bugs in the rebar and everything else; the compromised part of the building would have unclassified activities and local employees only and then we would build a barrier, I forgot how the actually did it, I know at one time we were talking about glass bricks but I don't think it ended up with them because I don't think glass bricks could have supported it. Then we would have the classified part where everything, the bricks, the mortar the concrete, you name it, came from the States. This was very useful to my later negotiations with the Chinese over how to build an embassy in Beijing. There wasn't a grain of sand that didn't come in in what was essentially a diplomatic bag to build the secure part of the embassy.

Then there was the usual crisis after crisis, no money and all of that. There I take my hat off to Moose because money was so tight in '93 that USIA actually didn't take two junior officer classes. Moose, even though we were tight for money, you know, we stopped all senior performance pay. We took those two USIA classes of people who'd been hired by USIA and we brought them into State. We were very worried about money all the time.

Q: We'll get to. That's the, yes.

GEISEL: But the first thing that's interesting was that when I did this roving all over Africa, I went to Mauritius at least twice as a roving administrative officer, fixing the post up. They didn't really need much fixing up because they had some superb FSNs. But in any event when I went to Mauritius 16 years earlier, it was a pretty poor place. The first time I went, which would have been probably 1980, it was the damndest thing. There was a line four miles long waiting to get into the U.S. Embassy. The reason was that someone had spread a rumor that the U.S. Embassy would give unlimited immigration visas to the United States and it was actually picked up by the Mauritius Broadcasting Corporation. In those days it was such a poor place that they had a department of emigration to encourage people to leave the island and this famous Swedish social scientist, well I guess he was an economist of sorts, named Malthus, who was sort of full of it, hatched up this theory that was based on Mauritius. The theory was that eventually people in countries with a high birth rate would overwhelm the land and they would starve and Mauritius was what he had in mind.

So when I got there the first time it was lovely but poor. And they did something though that was very smart in between when I went there in 1980 and I came back in 1996. What they did was when Maggie Thatcher agreed to turn back Hong Kong to the Chinese the then, I don't remember if it was the finance minister or the prime minister, went off to Hong Kong with a suitcase full of Mauritius passports and he told the rich Chinese that he met no, you can't buy Mauritian citizenship but, if you invest in Mauritius, you can become a Mauritian citizen. And some very, very rich Chinese built textile factories. By the time I got to Mauritius, it's the damndest thing, here it is a tropical island, and they were the world's number two manufacturer of sweaters. The tallest building in 1980 was Rogers House, the American embassy was on that fourth floor. When I came back they had quasi skyscrapers 30 stories tall and it was an island that was so prosperous that they rated its living standards with Spain or Portugal or even Ireland. I think Ireland was an exaggeration but Spain or Portugal was probably true. It was capitalistic and democratic and everyone adored it by the time I came back.

Now if White House Personnel would have had its act together, I never would have gotten it and I note that I have since been followed by two real estate gazillionaires, one Democratic and then one Republican and Mauritius will probably never go career again. The way it used to work was that there was an informal agreement between State and White House Personnel that there were two embassies; there was Mauritius and there was Seychelles and one would go career and the other would go political. But what the White House didn't realize is that, first of all, the political appointee to Seychelles had died and, secondly, we were closing our embassy in Seychelles because the US Air Force had decided to close its tracking station on the main island of Seychelles. By the time the White House had figured this out, the president had long since put a checkmark by my name and my name had been submitted to the Senate for my three countries.

Q: Well how British and how sort of residual French was it?

GEISEL: Well it was more, in many ways it was more, culturally, residually French than British but governmentally it was much more British. When the British came in the Napoleonic wars and overthrew the French, just as luck would have it, they had a very reasonable minded army of occupation and very high class people who were much more interested in playing polo and horse racing than oppressing the French who really could have used a bit of oppression because they were pretty arrogant. They let the French planters do their thing and in return the French planters left the British alone as far as government was concerned but the French kept their slaves much longer than they should have and they blackmailed the British into buying them out when they finally insisted on freeing the slaves. But the majority population group was Indian Hindus who came originally as cane cutters but there were about 17 or 18 percent Indian Muslims who were originally Gujaratis and traders who sold to the Indians. Mauritius actually was named after a Dutch prince because the Dutch discovered it, slaughtered all the Dodo birds because that's the only place the Dodo ever was and didn't think they could do anything else and left. The French came later in the, let's say that would have been the early 18th century, and grew sugar. They imported slaves. The slaves didn't like cutting cane and ultimately were replaced by Indian coolies when the slaves were freed. I use the word coolies because that's what they were called. There were, I think, it must have been about 25, 30 percent of the island were what were called Creoles, which were the descendants of the slaves who, by the late 20th century, were thoroughly mixed but they were the largest bunch of Christians on the island. The island even had an old Catholic Cardinal so you really had an incredible mixture of cultures with the Muslim culture, the Hindu culture, the Creole culture; then you had the French planters who dominated business, along with the Chinese. The French were about one percent of the population but they lived a very nice life by and two percent of the island were the Chinese, who also had come earlier as coolies but who were brilliant businessmen and were called the Jews of Mauritius because there were no Jews on Mauritius except for me and maybe 10 or 12 other people. In the second World War the British had deported a couple lots of Jews who had shown up in Palestine on some rinky boats and they had sent them to a fortress, a prison fortress in Mauritius and enough of them died that I would always say, not counting the tourists, there were far more dead Jews on Mauritius than live.

Q: Was there a problem or was Mauritius prosperous enough so that there wasn't a problem that happens in so many places exploiting workers and all that?

GEISEL: Good question. Well of course remember we didn't really have any facilities on the island; we had agents on the island. All the manufacturing on the island was either textiles or sugar. The Mauritians actually on textiles had rudiments of what I would have to call a labor inspection service. They were pretty good about checking the factories for safe working conditions. For sugar it was not an issue because everybody, one way or another, knew the prime minister and other people so you really did not treat people badly. Look, it's not a wonderful life to cut sugarcane, it's a hell of a life but it was all mechanized really. In fact, that was the one brand the Mauritians, I mean, the average Mauritian thought it was French, didn't even know it was American that had the whole island sewed up and that was Caterpillar. The machine that was used to do the work digging up the cane and getting rid of all the boulders because it was all volcanic was the Caterpillar and they used to refer to it not as an excavator but they would say, a Caterpillar. Most of the generators were Caterpillars too. They really understood how to export.

When I was in Mauritius, there was literally a severe labor shortage in the textile factories and they had to import Chinese textile workers from the mainland and you could say they were exploited because they worked terribly hard hours but, relatively speaking they were well paid and it was clear, because I spoke to the Chinese ambassador about it, these people wanted to work. They wanted to work outrageous hours, they were virtually all young single women who wanted to make money and go back to China with a pocket full of bucks.

Q: Talk a bit about the Chinese as negotiators.

GEISEL: They are tough as nails. They actually have for their government people a negotiating school and I sure wish we had something like that. No one is allowed to go on their teams until they've been to the negotiating school. So the name of the game is, first of all, no one talks except the leader of the delegation. But with us, the leader of the delegation sometimes can hardly get a word in edgewise what with all the different agencies. I'm exaggerating but I have reason to exaggerate because this is a bad point where we were weak. The name of the game is to see who is the real head of the Chinese delegation or if the real head is even on the delegation because the other thing you know is the delegation is empowered to do nothing except listen and attempt to get you to give concessions. The Chinese specialty is sitting under the tree just patiently waiting for fruit to drop.

Q: Well now, by this time, we're talking about 2001, 2, 3, had we learned to keep our fruit from dropping?

GEISEL: Oh, pretty much so. It was, oh, we didn't give them anything. We didn't give them anything that we didn't want to give them, I should say. We had our plan and we stuck to it. The issues began and ended with security and the Chinese, and we went back and forth with concrete batch plants and zoning and all sorts of stuff but it all, it was going to rise and fall on whether we could be certain that we could control our shipments every moment from the time they left the United States, or they left where they were pouched until they got to Beijing and to our controlled site. We would get all sorts of deals and everything fell into place except the security elements and that's when we had to leave. Our ambassador in China gave us great advice.

Q: What's his name?

GEISEL: Randt, Clark Randt is his name. He has lived in Hong Kong for many years, he's an attorney and he speaks Mandarin Chinese. He said to us, you'll never get this through unless you walk away from the table at least once and go home. He was right. We actually had to walk away from the table twice, go home once, and then the Chinese called us back. The Chinese foreign ministry did not have control, it was their security people. The Chinese foreign ministry, I think, wanted to build a new embassy which they needed as badly as we needed. A new one.

Q: Well did you have the feeling that the Chinese security people really wanted to compromise, in other words, to stick their stuff in or was this just a matter of-

GEISEL: They didn't want to have a new embassy. They didn't give a damn about their people in Washington. You know, our current, soon to be former, thank God, embassy had so many areas where it could be compromised, even though we tried and tried and tried, it was such a God awful mess and I think they were just as happy as pigs in manure with us in that place. Finally, I think what may have pushed them over was that President Bush the elder was to have dinner with the prime minister, no, with the president of China and Ambassador Randt got him to mention this to the president of China and I think that may have been what pushed the deal through.

Q: Just looking at this, I'm sure...

GEISEL: This is a serious business and occasionally various elements in an embassy like Beijing or Moscow have got very sensitive stuff and I'm sure the same is true for the Russians and Chinese here in Washington.

LAWRENCE DUNHAM
Office of Foreign Missions (OFM): Assistant Chief of Protocol
Washington, DC (2001-2005)

Mr. Dunham was born and raised on Nantucket Island, Massachusetts and was educated at Catholic University and George Mason University School of Law. After working briefly in the United States Customs Service in Washington, DC, he joined the Department of State's Office of Protocol in 1983. He worked in the Office of Foreign Missions as Diplomatic and Consular Liaison until 2001, at which time he was appointed Assistant Chief of Protocol, serving in that capacity until 2005. Mr. Dunham was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2007.

Q: One last question. Did you get involved in the Chinese embassy which was put up in a big apartment building on Connecticut Avenue? They were building over by Van Ness and that area. Did that hit you at all, or did the Chinese get involved?

DUNHAM: I was not involved. The Office of Foreign Missions and the Office of Overseas Buildings were the lead offices in that case. The reason was that the U.S. government had to negotiate with the Chinese government as to where we would locate our embassy in Beijing. In the process of negotiation we needed to be able to offer space to the Chinese here in Washington. The only involvement I had, was when the negotiations were complete there was a treaty signing arrangement at the State Department between the State Department and the Chinese government. I was involved in that. By the way, the building is going up. They have made a lot of progress. I think they plan to be in there within the year.

Q: Speaking of the Chinese, the Chinese are renowned for their protocol and all that. Did you find in dealing with them you had to be on your toes protocolwise?

DUNHAM: Yes, although I didn't get too involved in visits with them. My other colleagues were responsible for that. I do recall a couple of occasions where they were really rather formal about something. I will tell you about one because it was rather interesting. I won't go into detail about what happened, but there was something that occurred involving a Chinese diplomat. Because of it the Chinese decided to come in and make a presentation to us at the State Department. I agreed to receive the embassy representative. She was probably a counselor. She came in and spoke at length. She actually read a document to me. So I took notes. Then we concluded the meeting. As she was leaving, I said, "I wonder if it would be possible for you to leave me with a copy of the document that you read. It would be very helpful," and it was in English. She said to me, "I don't know if I can leave it with you because I was only told to come in and read it to you." So I asked, "Could you inquire?" She said, "Yes, I will inquire and I will call you back." Later in the day she called me back. She said, "I have been told I can't give you the document, but I will be happy to read it to you again."

There is one other thing I wanted to talk to you about. It is a relatively esoteric area, but it is interesting. Most of the time is routine but in a couple of cases it did become an issue. One of the areas for which the Diplomatic Liaison Division of Protocol had responsibility was handling the Agrément requests for foreign ambassadors coming to the United States.

Q: You might explain what an Agrément is.

DUNHAM: The Agrément process is described in the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations. There is a specific provision in the Vienna Convention that addresses it. But it has been a practice in international relations generally since time immemorial. Essentially it involves seeking the advance approval of the receiving state before a foreign ambassador is sent there. In cases where a foreign diplomat is sent to a country to represent it, he or she gets a visa and they travel there and are registered with the host country once they arrive. But in the case of ambassadors, the host country is queried in advance as to whether or not they would accept a particular individual as ambassador. The formal term for the process is Agrément, which is the French word for Agreement. In 99.9% of the cases this is a routine procedure. The sending state would send a written request, although it doesn't have to be written. It can be oral. But they send a request stating that so and so is being appointed to be our ambassador to your country. Is he or she acceptable to you? With the request they attach a biography (a CV of the individual). In the U.S., the paperwork is received in the State Department and generally it is reviewed by the desk. It might be vetted elsewhere in the U.S. government just to make sure nobody has any reason to disapprove the request. Once everything appears to be in order, the office of protocol will respond to the foreign government either with a diplomatic note or a cable indicating the person is acceptable to the U.S. government and saying we should be advised when they are preparing to travel to the U.S. because we have a procedure for greeting new ambassadors on their arrival in the U.S. In most cases this is done routinely within a few weeks of the Agrément request. However there were a couple of cases over the years where we weren't able to do that. I remember in one case there was a person who was proposed to be an ambassador. In the process of reviewing the Agrément it turned out the individual had been accused of some very serious human rights violations in his country. We made a determination that we would not accept him, and we did contact the government and advise that this person was not acceptable. These requests are handled confidentially. We don't want to embarrass the government and we don't want to embarrass the individual. Only a few people are involved in the process. All of the paperwork involved is treated as confidential. In one case, however, the matter did become public. This was a very interesting case.

DONALD M. BISHOP
Public Affairs Officer
Beijing (2002-2006)

Donald Bishop was born in Tennessee in 1945. He received his BA from Trinity College and his MA from Ohio State. He joined the Foreign Service in 1979. His overseas posts include Hong Kong; Seoul and Taegu, Korea; Dhaka, Beijing, Lagos and Abuja, Nigeria; and Kabul, Afghanistan. Mr. Bishop was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2010.

Q: All right. Today is the 15th of March, 2011, the Ides of March, with Don Bishop. I believe we're headed to China, you for the second time. You were there from when to when?

BISHOP: I had left China in 2000. That first tour in Beijing had been as Deputy Public Affairs Officer. I went to Nigeria from 2000 to 2002. While I was in Lagos, my old boss Paul Blackburn gave me a call. When he finished as PAO in China he had become the Office Director of EAP/PPD. He asked me if I would like to be PAO to China.

The dream of every USIA officer was to run one of the big programs. I had thought about pivoting my career, to give me a shot at becoming an Ambassador by first being a DCM or a Consul General, but I was a little too senior to make the turn. So I agreed to accept Paul's offer. Lloyd Neighbors had replaced Paul as PAO in Beijing, and his tour ran until the summer of 2003. Paul called me in early 2001. There would be a year to fill between my departing Nigeria in 2002 and beginning work as PAO in Beijing in 2003.

That's how I was given one of those rare chances to go into language refresher for a year. Jemma and I left Nigeria in the late summer of 2002, spent some time in the U.S., and then went out to Beijing.

Once upon a time, all FSOs went to Taipei for their second year of training in Mandarin, but by 2002 the Foreign Service Institute and the Embassy had built up a parallel program in Beijing. The Chinese Language and Area Studies School in Taipei did not close, and even today it trains a goodly share of America's China hands. But there were a number of good reasons to add a Beijing option, which better suited many officers and their families as they sequenced their moves. I didn't think I needed to go to Taiwan again, and skipping another move was a plus.

I spent the end of 2002 and the beginning of 2003 at the Beijing Education Institute. I crossed town every day and had pretty much five hours of one-on-one in Chinese. It was a very good language experience, and the year gave me a break from the usual work and policy stresses. I needed it after Nigeria. Also, I was reading more on China -- and meeting more and different people -- than if I had gone directly to the PAO job.

I can conjure from the memory many riveting stories of language study, but let me just tell one that offers a glimpse on how things are organized in China. In my previous time in Beijing, I had never had a chance to visit the tomb of Matteo Ricci, the awesome Jesuit who did so much to bring Christianity to China. For many years “the authorities” didn't allow many visitors to his tomb. But with China now so much more “open,” I asked about it. The tomb turned out to be only a walk from the Beijing Education Institute, it was now possible to arrange visits. The teachers set aside an afternoon for all of the Embassy students to walk over. This gave us a chance to work on our vocabularies and expressions on history and religion, after all, and enjoy an afternoon in the University of Plein Air.

In the center of the Beijing Party School -- not the Central Party School, but the Party School for the Beijing municipality -- by the way, the Party Schools had all been renamed, in English, “Administrative Colleges” -- was a small grove of steles, traditional Chinese stone tomb markers. This is where dozens of Catholic priests were buried, Chinese priests included.

As we reached the gate of the Beijing Party School, the guard made a telephone call, and soon we were joined by a professor from the Party School to be our guide. He introduced himself as the Vice President of the Matteo Ricci Study Society.

What was this? A professor at the Party School had to be a member of the Chinese Communist Party. Members of the Party must be atheists.

He was an agreeable fellow, taking us over to the tombs and giving us a historical explanation of Ricci and the early Catholic missionaries. Then he offered some words of evaluation. Chinese appreciate some of Ricci's teachings, he told us. For instance, in a feudal society with polygamy and concubinage, Ricci's teaching that a man should only have one wife ... “anticipated the Marriage Law of the PRC enacted in 1950”! We Americans looked at one another -- this was quite a new take on things!

Chinese welcomed the scientific knowledge of the Jesuits and other missionaries, our guide said, but Chinese were not really attracted to Ricci's religion. For instance, Christians teach that between his death and his resurrection, Jesus “descended into hell.” I was quickly turning over memories from catechism class to try and figure out what he was telling us.

He was evidently referring to the phrase in the Apostles' Creed, and to an interpretation of doctrine that derived from the phrase. The Christian teaching, he told us, was that before Christ, everyone who had died resided in hell, and it was Christ's descent that released Adam and Eve and other righteous souls into heaven. Chinese could never accept this, the professor said, because that would mean Confucius had been in hell, something inconceivable.

He continued with some other nickel-and-dime, cartoonish arguments against the existence of God, drawn right from the pages of Krokodil and Manhua, I thought.

So, what we were seeing on our visit to the Party School and Ricci's tomb was how the Party assured that no one could visit without hearing the Party's interpretation of historical events. And since there was a national Matteo Ricci Study Society, firmly under Party vigilance, no one else in China could try to develop Ricci studies without the Party's assent. This is how Party organizations keep scholarly thought within bounds, by crowding out independent scholarship and initiatives.

In any case, I finished up the language refresher and began work as Country Public Affairs Officer, succeeding Lloyd Neighbors, in the early summer of 2003. I was PAO for three years.

Q: What changes had taken place since you left China in 2000?

BISHOP: Let's talk about the post first. One big change was that after years of negotiation with the Foreign Ministry's Diplomatic Services Bureau, American families no longer had to live in the Diplomatic compounds. We were put in an apartment tower that belonged to the China World Hotel.

Another was that the Embassy could hire employees directly, and those employees could be FSNs, not members of the Diplomatic Services Bureau assigned to the American Embassy. Our longtime DSBs were given the chance to convert to FSN status. Some did, some didn't. We began to advertise positions as they came open. Individuals could now apply freely, and we were able to choose some very fine Chinese employees and train them up to our standards. When I became PAO, I allocated more of our Public Diplomacy money, for instance, to send our employees for programs in the U.S., and to send some to nearby embassies like Seoul or Tokyo to see how things were done in Public Affairs Sections there.

The consolidation – folding USIS into the State Department – had worked some major changes too. I'm sorry to talk organization and administration when foreign policy has more sizzle, but we should reflect a little bit about the progress of consolidation by 2003.

Enough time had passed that the initial frictions were over or should be over. I had been the DPAO in Beijing as USIA finished up, and now I was PAO under the State Department four years later. The organization was about the same size, and we had the same amount of money. But it's worth pausing to note what had changed.

As I mentioned previously, we lost our Executive Officer in 1999. Much of the work previously done by the USIS Executive Officer had shifted to the Deputy Public Affairs Officer. I had felt that immediately when I had been the DPAO. It had usually been the Exec, for instance, who represented USIS on the housing committee, the awards committee, and at most ICAAS meetings. The DPAO now picked up the full load of meetings. Executive officers had written the grants, now that job had passed to the DPAO.

In 1999, though, I could still call the individual who had been the USIS Executive Officer, now sitting in the Management Section with many more responsibilities, and ask for guidance and help. When I arrived as PAO in 2003, I asked the Management Counselor which one of his deputies had the PAS account? He was surprised by my question because they no longer had that arrangement. I knew that meant that the DPAO had an even heavier management load.

Another large change was that George Beasley's and Paul Blackburn's wonderful structuring of PAS – with everyone reporting to the DPAO as operating officer – had been ended by my predecessor while I was away.

As I arrived, I also learned that there was no longer to be a Deputy Public Affairs Officer. My predecessor as PAO had traded in the position for an additional Assistant Cultural Affairs Officer. This meant that many of the administrative burdens, originally handled by the Executive Officer, then by the Deputy Public Affairs Officer, would now shift to the PAO. This was partly because only the PAO had enough experience with the organization and money issues. Without a Deputy on the staff, I could not restore the better arrangement that had made the Public Affairs Section so effective under George Beasley and Paul Blackburn.

When I had been DPAO under Paul Blackburn, I supervised the Information Officer, the Cultural Affairs Officer, the Information Resources Officer, the four branches, and the Executive Officer. I was acting as a chief of staff, the operating guy. How about this as a parallel? Paul was the Petraeus, I was the Odierno. Freed from the day-to-day supervisory responsibilities and all the program implementation except when he wanted to put his personal stamp on a program, Paul was able to conceptualize things, strategize, work the ambassador, cajole members of the Country Team, and so on.

Coming back in 2003, then, I found that the PAO's time was once again taken up with day-to-day duties. I felt like I had had two assignments as DPAO. I had all the administrative work when I was DPAO, and I had it again as PAO. There was a cost to eliminating the DPAO position. It diminished the time I had available for conceptualization, strategizing, and dealing with the Ambassador, DCM, and other members of the Country Team. I confess that I deeply resented the organizational change. DPAO positions were eliminated in other countries, too, and in every case the PAO felt the same effect. Small administrative changes can have outsize effects.

When I was in Abuja, the DCM's OMS was new to the Foreign Service, Llywelyn Graeme. I suggested he bid on the position as OMS in PAS in Beijing, and happily he got the assignment. I was under such administrative pressure that I had to ask Llywelyn to take on some of the paperwork and be more involved with the Print Shop and administrative FSNs than had been the case for the OMS in the past. On the whole, this worked well for me, but not every FSO in PAS was happy with dealing with an OMS in that role. This minor friction was one more way in which decisions made in Washington made things at posts more difficult.

One more change unfolding from consolidation, number two. The former BPAOs were now Consulate PAOs in Shanghai, Shenyang, Chengdu, and Guangzhou. They were now supervised and evaluated by their Consuls General. Of course there was still the ordinary programmatic communication between PAS, the mother ship, in Beijing and the Consulate PAOs, but their priorities were being set by their CGs. The PAO, then, didn't have the same ability to unify the country program as before. Different CGs, from experience or feel or what they had seen somewhere else, used their Public Diplomacy people and resources differently.

A third change I would note is that consolidation had already worked a change in mentality among the Public Diplomacy Officers in the Foreign Service. Let me use a commercial parallel. USIA officers had thought of themselves as members of a law firm or a public relations firm that was hired by a corporation. State was like AT&T, USIA was like Hill and Knowlton, advising on international public affairs and organizing programs.

The individual members of this “firm,” USIA, even as they were working on the Ambassador's or the nation's priorities, all knew their futures were in the firm. They could be partners. They could run overseas offices. They had public visibility, standing, and acclaim in foreign capitals. They had a discipline -- public diplomacy and public affairs -- that focused on the media and opinion and on programs to change opinions and establish a favorable standing for the brand. That meant they had a profession, a focus, a body of professional reading. Public Diplomacy was your bread and butter. Public Diplomacy was what you had to master. Mastery and competence led to advancement.

After consolidation, we stopped being members of a public affairs firm that worked for the Embassy. We became House Counsel. In the private sector, the top of that ladder is to become General Counsel in a corporation. The members of the Legal Department at a company are all attorneys, but they are much more focused on doing the bidding of upper management. They narrow their professional reading and competence to the part of the law that concerns the company. And only rarely, exceedingly rarely, will a General Counsel ever become head of the company.

My commercial analogy only goes so far, but think it over. After consolidation, the self-image of Public Diplomacy officers and their incentives began to change. There was a new career psychology that came with being in the Department of State. The PAO was only one of the Embassy's counselors. The independent brand and standing of “USIS” was now history, and the Public Diplomacy officers became much more anonymous, blending into the Embassy staff.

At the same time, it was now possible for Public Diplomacy officers to become senior leaders in the State Department. If good Public Diplomacy officers aspired to become an Ambassador or even a Consul General, however, they needed to get out of public diplomacy, probably when they were an FS-2, maybe as an FS-1, and begin checking off the boxes -- deputy Office Director, Office Director, then perhaps DCM in some modest place so they could become DCM in a bigger place. They then might become a DAS. That's the sequence that gives a State officer a shot at higher management and the coveted title of Ambassador. I began to notice that this new calculus was affecting the career choices of our most promising Public Diplomacy officers.

There was another change that had taken place while I was away. You'll recall I've mentioned USIA's three phase communication model -- Issues, Audiences, Programs. The primary tool in developing and tracking the middle step, audience, was the Distribution and Records System, the DRS. USIA had developed its own software that was launched a little before I entered the Agency in 1979, and with many updates it was still the software being used by posts in 1999.

To speak frankly, the DRS completely collapsed with consolidation. No one in State picked up the responsibility. The software was never updated. In Beijing as at other posts around the world, we fell back on the old “cuff lists,” individual rolodexes on the desks of Americans and FSNs. Posts in their desperation began to use commercial software like Outlook or Goldmine, but no one undertook to decide on a single product that would be used at every Embassy.

These software programs could handle “distribution,” but they did not provide the tailored quarterly overview reports to PAOs to use in overall post management. No one in Washington took responsibility for solving the problems of non-Roman alphabets and character systems. Once network security became such a large issue for the Department, posts could not on their own elect to use a commercial program that might be in use by, say, AmCham companies locally. They all had to be approved by the network security people, and the security review of Public Diplomacy software never seemed to have a high priority.

The result of these dysfunctions was that Public Diplomacy lost the unified approach to “audience” that once was the pride of many strong posts. I knew we needed a new model DRS, but it was a problem we could not solve on our own.

Another thing that was different after consolidation was that the old Country Public Affairs Plan had disappeared, and now we were integrated into the Mission Strategic Plan. The Department's strategic planning has gone through several iterations -- MPP, MSP, MSRP.

My generation of USIA officers had been taught, “We don’t do culture, we do policy.” In USIA, we were not going to win promotion by being Foreign Service impresarios bringing clog dancers and drama groups. I did my share of performing arts programs during my career, and “events” could play a useful role in some places at some times to build our nation's standing, but the heart of the work we were supposed to do was build up public affairs support for WTO accession, missiles in Germany, the Doha Round, votes in the United Nations, and so on. As I said, “we don't do culture, we do policy.”

The Mission Strategic Planning process in State at first seemed to favor that view of Public Diplomacy. If the mission decided its number one priority is A, and number two is B, the planning process should lead the Public Affairs Section to give extra focus, extra push, extra horsepower to these Mission goals in the plan. The PAO should bring to bear as many different programs as possible on the top priority Mission objectives. When I explained this to David Sedney one time, he said, “I'm hearing you say there are no Public Diplomacy goals per se, but only Public Diplomacy support for the Mission's other goals.”

That Plan’s listing of an Embassy's goals, or the administration's goals, however, left out all the standing programs, mostly on the Cultural Affairs side, Fulbright, speakers, libraries, English teaching. There were bread and butter for Public Affairs Sections. Where did they fit?

In the revised iterations of mission planning, therefore, the Department allowed an extra Public Diplomacy objective in the plan under the rubric of “mutual understanding” or “foundation of trust.” This free-floating add-on Public Diplomacy objective was conceptually sound, but it let officers just run the usual repertoire of programs -- rather than think carefully about what the policy goals the programs are supposed to serve.

My own focus had been to “lean” as many of the Public Diplomacy programs in the direction of MPP themes as was possible, but I'm not sure this was a common practice by PAOs. For instance, we knew that rule of law in China could be one of the first steps towards respect for human rights and democratization. So I leaned PAS programs toward the rule of law when I was DPAO. A goodly, some might say disproportionate, share of speakers were on rule of law topics, in front of legal audiences. A goodly share of the Fulbrighters that we sent to the States were law professors. A goodly share of book translations were American law textbooks. The idea here was to lean a post's different Public Diplomacy programs in a policy direction.

The Department adopted the Mission Program Plan process in the final years of USIA, and the Agency was an organization that carried with it certain convictions and practices about how to advance ideas. But the way the MPP worked out after consolidation was to make conducting exchanges or English teaching or cultural programs a Mission goal, but not necessarily tied to a policy effort.

After consolidation, PAOs became more vulnerable to various bright ideas coming from Ambassadors and DCMs. They wanted "events." They wanted "publicity." They wanted to meet authors and poets and musicians. USAID programs with their long timelines, in the hands of implementing partners, didn't yield many opportunities for them to bring "gifts" when they made visits. They increasingly looked to Public Affairs Sections to allow them to play the role of Lord or Lady Bountiful.

This has been a bit discursive, but I wanted to mention that when I arrived as PAO in China, many organizational changes had already taken place that affected Public Diplomacy. The most severe was that more and more of the management load had to be carried by the PAO, and there was an opportunity cost to this, forfeiting good strategizing and working with the Ambassador.

Q: In the White House, say, the equivalent of a public affairs officer usually sits in on the president's council and is, is to some extent -- not an alter-ego, but is very familiar with the president's thinking.

BISHOP: Agreed. But remember that under the new dispensation PAOs no longer had a direct report to the Ambassador. A PAO's reporting official was now the DCM.

Q: So there were changes in the organization that had occurred since you left China in 2000. What about the U.S. policy posture with China?

BISHOP: As for policy, during my first tour from 1997 to 2000 we were all very much implementing President Clinton's policy of engagement. Originally, the word "engagement" threw the Chinese for a loop. They didn't know whether we were trying to get married, or to engage them in battle. Eventually they understood our meaning. What we were interested in was more contact, more Chinese participation in the international order, and eventually more collaboration on the issues. At that time, the largest issue in this comprehensive policy of "engagement" was China's accession to the World Trade Organization.

When I arrived for my second tour, from 2003 to 2006, I could feel there was a changed emphasis, and temperatures seemed a few degrees higher. The increase in the trade deficit made our trade discussions sharper, as did the question of exchange rates. We spent a lot of time trying to build up the military-to-military relationship. We spent time on human rights, as always.

There were the Six Party Talks on North Korea's nuclear program. Compared to my first tour in Beijing, the number of visitors from Congress and the administration had increased. For three years we had constant CODELS, except for a pause in the closing months of the 2004 Presidential election campaign, along with visitors at the cabinet level.

And in the wake of 9/11 we had the new agenda on terrorism. Here there was an overlap between our interests and the Chinese interests. They weren't particularly eager to help us out with terrorism in the Middle East, with weapons of mass destruction in Iran or Iraq, or on Afghanistan. But they were worried that a terrorism motivated by Islam might infect Muslims in western China, out in Xinjiang province especially. Whenever Chinese minorities asked for more autonomy or more respect, the Han Chinese leadership often treated it as separatism or "splitism."

Q: Who was the ambassador?

BISHOP: Ambassador Clark T. Randt, Jr. Ultimately he served as Ambassador for nearly eight years. There was talk that he was President Bush's roommate at Yale. I heard him explain many times, however, that he was one of President Bush's fraternity brothers.

Some people could spin that in a way that made Ambassador Randt out to be an unqualified political appointee who got the job based on friendship with the President. But Ambassador Randt had learned Chinese in the Air Force, and after he was discharged he had gotten his law degree and become a China trade lawyer in Hong Kong. He was well qualified for the job.

When Ambassador Randt was at the Department for some consultations, and I was in Washington from Nigeria, I had a chance to meet him. I expected a short meeting, a courtesy call, but the planned 15-minute meeting lasted about 45 minutes. He told me all the things that were wrong with the Public Affairs Section. When I went for my in-call in Beijing, he again took 45 minutes and made the points again.

He was dissatisfied with some things. For instance, when he had reached post as the new Ambassador, he met the Information Officer, who gave the Ambassador a review of his work. The IO had used the word "clients" in his review. I assume he meant "stakeholders" or "contacts" like international journalists, Chinese journalists, think tank scholars, but he had said "clients." That had really hit Ambassador Randt wrong. He told me what he told the IO: PAS had only one client, the Ambassador.

Q: I don't quite get the -- BISHOP: Well, Ambassador Randt was using "client" in a business sense. A company that hires a public relations firm or a law firm is the client.

Q: Right. And instead of saying who are our targets.

BISHOP: Yes. It was an unfortunate choice of word, but it stayed with Ambassador Randt. And I might add that the officer in question, one of our best Public Diplomacy officers with a rare 4/4 in Chinese, resigned from the Foreign Service a year after he left China.

There were other things Ambassador Randt didn't like about PAS. My predecessor as PAO, Lloyd Neighbors, had been able to maintain a good personal relationship, but I sensed Lloyd also felt the Ambassador's unhappiness with the Public Affairs Section.

When Ambassador Randt arrived, he found that the Information Officer routinely set up briefing sessions, on background, between American journalists and Embassy political and economic officers. This was and is a routine practice at most American embassies. A few times, though, the officers wandered off script, and the Ambassador would learn that an American Embassy source had said this or that. He often learned it when he received a call from Washington asking what's going on. The Ambassador wanted more control over backgrounding, and every backgrounder required his personal approval in advance. This reduced the number of off-script remarks, but it reduced backgrounding too.

The Ambassador was doing me a favor by being straight in explaining his feelings. He told me that we had one of the very largest sections in the Embassy, but for the number of people we had, and the money we had to spend, PAS was not contributing much. He didn't see us making a large impact. He wasn't sure the Embassy needed such a large Public Affairs Section, given its small role. This rather puzzled me, but of course I could only say, "Got it, sir. Right."

Q: Yes.

BISHOP: I was nodding at what he said, indicating that I heard him. But I was turning things over in my mind. The size of the Public Affairs Section organization in 2003 was the same as it had been in 1992. We had a few additional FSNs and some locally hired Americans, but there had been no increase in the number of American FSOs in all those years.

Every few years, USIA had conducted regular reviews of how resources were distributed between posts and geographic areas. After 1989, these reviews were the bane of the European area since Europe was receding in foreign policy importance. Based on Cold War priorities, the European area and its posts traditionally had plenty of people and plenty of money running large programs. In the 90s, after the Cold War had ended, USIA always seemed to find that it was Europe that was "fat."

Hearing the Ambassador's concerns, I recalled that USIA had conducted one of its major reviews as the Cold War ended and our foreign policy priorities began to shift. They had done it very carefully for every country. What's the population? The GNP? How many television and radio stations does the country have? How many universities? How many students has the country sent to the U.S.? How many newspapers in the capital? The number of university graduates? The volume of trade? Do we have an alliance? Are there U.S. forces based in the country? And so on.

USIA had been very careful and thorough about coming up with a kind of algorithm that matched resources to foreign policy needs. Out of that process in 1991, China got, I recalled, 18 Americans, 13 in Beijing and five at the four consulates, making China one of the largest posts.

Now it was 2003. We still had the same number of American officers. But consider all the same metrics. There were way more Chinese newspapers, and they were big and fat and slick because of newspaper liberalization. There were more journalists. The Chinese had, since 1992, invested billions in higher education, and in 2003 there were many more universities -- new, large, comprehensive universities all over the country. Every university hoped that a faculty member could receive a Fulbright grant. All hoped they could get International Visitors and U.S. Speakers and help with English teaching. They wanted more and more of what the Public Affairs Section had. So did the media. Bilateral trade and business ties had exploded. We had new bilateral agendas and senior dialogs on trade, economics, the environment and health, and defense. PAS was supporting many times more visits by Administration principals in 2004 than had been the case in 1992.

By every measure, then, the Public Affairs Section in Beijing was way under resourced. As important as money is, it was not the dearest resource. The most important resource is people. American officers are very dear in the Foreign Service. We had no more in 2003 than we had in 1992.

There was more in the Ambassador's views on PAS. As PAO in Beijing, I was a new Minister-Counselor. I learned from the DCM that, in the Ambassador's view, my rank was too high. He believed section chiefs should be "hungry FS-1s" who would work and work to be promoted into the Senior Foreign Service. Their ambition would make them responsive to every Presidential and Ambassadorial priority.

So to be told by the Ambassador that PAS was too generously staffed, that he didn't see us pulling our weight when we had no more people than in 1992, and that PAS leadership was too senior, I couldn't quite square that. But of course, I saluted and said what I had to say. What do you do? You have to go ahead with what you've got. It was clear to me that the Ambassador had formed an impression of PAS soon after he arrived, alas, and it was fixed in his mind.

Q: And I think the thing that struck me as being someone who has sat in on a lot of country team meetings as a chief of a consular section, how important the public affairs side was. But it was under the old system and maybe --

BISHOP: Of course I attended Country Team meetings in Beijing, but the group had become so large that there were no real discussions or deliberations in those meetings. When I arrived, another member of the Country Team told me how meetings should go. When it came for my two-minute report, I should always look the Ambassador in the eye. Address only him. Be sure to show proper deference. Don't ever surprise the Ambassador, meaning the Country Team was not the place to give him a first brief on something.

Like you, I sat in on CT meetings over many years with many Ambassadors. The place where it worked wonderfully was Bangladesh. The Embassy hummed under Ambassador Merrill, partly because he was a very good manager of the meeting, partly because he also held a few "tight" country team meetings during the week, and partly because the Country Team in Dhaka was not large.

In China, though, new agencies were joining the Country Team, and the table was getting quite crowded. For instance, the different parts of the new Department of Homeland Security -- ICE, CBP -- joined the Country Team. Commerce and Treasury reinforced the Embassy with political appointees who sat at the CT table. The meetings got to be quite large, which meant that briefs and discussions necessarily became short.

Except for the Country Team meeting, many agencies might only be scheduled for a 30 minute meeting with the DCM, rather than the Ambassador, once or twice a month, to go over what they were doing.

It happened that I usually sat next to the Department of Agriculture's rep -- the Minister-Counselor for Agricultural Affairs -- at Country Team meetings. He was irritated with the lack of front office attention to what his people were doing. His "face time" was a having a biweekly 30-minute meeting with the DCM, and meeting the Ambassador in a group with the senior Economic and Commercial officers. In these group sessions he was the last to be called on, usually when the other two had used up almost all of the meeting. So when it came time for his two minutes at the Country Team meeting, he insisted on giving full readouts on all FAS activities, undeterred by the expected time limit, taking no notice of the nervous non-verbals coming from the Ambassador and the DCM. He was going to report on what he did! Maurice House -- I liked him for it.

If there were important meetings at the Embassy that might focus on a particular human rights case, or how to develop the mil-to-mil relationship, or the Six Party Talks, rarely was PAS asked to join. I got a window on those things during some short stints as Acting DCM, when the DCM was on leave and they rotated section chiefs to his desk. I got to be DCM a few times for a few days or a few weeks. Otherwise, Public Diplomacy wasn't at the conference table.

The most frequent PAS access to the Ambassador was not at the Country Team meeting but at the morning press brief. Ambassador Randt preferred an oral briefing to a written summary. The Americans and the FSNs in the PAS Information Unit came in well before the rest of the Embassy opened. They read the early editions, scanned the web pages, and they had watched broadcasts overnight. They ran Lexis-Nexis searches for the latest articles on China.

The Ambassador was not particularly focused on the Chinese media. What he needed to know was what the American and international media were saying, because it was their stories that might prompt a telephone call from Washington. Every morning there might be 25 or 50 important stories on China in the Washington Post, New York Times, the Wall Street Journal, the McClatchy group, Scripps Howard, Reuters, Associated Press, BBC, and so on. At the morning press brief, the IO or an AIO read out the first paragraph of a news report or editorial and then handed a copy of each story to the Ambassador, one by one.

This was expensive, in time and money both. We were spending a quarter million dollars a year on the Lexis-Nexis searches for the Ambassador's morning briefings, half of IIP's budget for internet searches. Fortunately, the bills went to IIP, not to us.

I was surprised how much the addition of this comprehensive daily press briefing to the list of PAS taskings affected our whole organization. It required a huge amount of hands-on time by the IO and the AIOs that then couldn't be used for other purposes. Ambassador Randt let me know that I was also expected to attend. Missing the briefings, he told me, would indicate that I was not giving my complete personal support to the Ambassador and the President of the United States. As a 110 percent ardent supporter of President Bush and his agenda, this really stung me. Not to mention that it meant the middle of every morning of every day was unavailable for other meetings or activities.

I'm sure that those who looked over the Ambassador's schedule, seeing the time allocated for the press briefing, thought PAS had more "face time" than other sections. Usually, however, those briefings were scheduled for half an hour, and depending on the size of the day's take, the time was rushed. All the focus was on the news. There might be an opportunity for me to take a minute at the end to ask the Ambassador for some brief on-the-spot guidance on a program or an issue or a speech.

In three years, I only recall two or three proper sit-downs with the Ambassador to talk about Public Affairs strategies or Public Diplomacy. We were responsive when asked, but I can't say we were proactive. Yes, we needed the Ambassador's nod for most initiatives, but I just don't recall many meetings.

Q: Every ambassador has their own way.

BISHOP: Of course.

Q: But public affairs, of course, is probably the major tool of getting something across.

BISHOP: Yes.

Q: Political reporters don't do that particularly. It's eliminating probably the major strategic tool that you have to operate in the country.

BISHOP: It's right that at the Embassy in China while I was there, Public Diplomacy was "not there for the takeoff," to use half of the famous phrase from Edward R. Murrow. This was not only the case for Public Diplomacy, though. The long term trend in American foreign policy making has been to have the policy debates in Washington and look to Embassies simply as platforms to organize visits to foreign capitals for Washington principals, or to be implementers. As Henry Kissinger told Nick Platt, the job of the Foreign Service is to tend the "nuts and bolts."

I recently met some people who were on the NSC during my second China tour, and hearing them discuss China issues, I realized how valuable it would have been for me to hear their perspective at the time. In conversation with them, I gathered that the Ambassador's voice was heard in Washington, and they were aware of the Embassy's point of view. But none of this was shared with me as PAO.

In any case, few in the Embassy, not just PAS, were "there for the takeoff." I wasn't at decision making meetings because decisions weren't made in Beijing. They were made in Washington.

The job of the Public Affairs Section was to deliver the Washington messages. Here I'm being frank, describing “what is” rather than what “ought to be” or “shouldn't ought to be.”

As for smaller issues, like the release of a human rights prisoner, or getting China to respect a WTO provision, they were worked with the Chinese by the Ambassador and by the Economic and Political sections. This was the inside game, conducted behind the scenes without publicity. When the Chinese leadership made this kind of decision, it was unlikely to be criticized by the Chinese media, so the lack of involvement by PAS was not fatal. If we received a press query, the IO and AIOs just read out Washington's guidance.

Q: Tell me more about the Ambassador and human rights.

BISHOP: The Ambassador was always keen to urge China to release human rights activists that had been jailed. It was one of his admirable commitments. A common critique on Capitol Hill of U.S. human rights advocacy in China was that it was always on the list of bilateral issues to be discussed, but it was usually discussed last, giving the impression that trade or security issues, say, were actually more important. Ambassador Randt's speeches had quite a different pattern. No matter what the bilateral topic, he began with a review of human rights cases, making the point that the Chinese government had violated its own laws to detain individuals. During his years at the Embassy he had the satisfaction of seeing many of those cases resolved. Whenever that happened, he added another case to the list in his next speech.

Q: What was your impression of the press or to use the broad term, the media? Not just American, but the media core in Beijing.

BISHOP: In our minds we made the ordinary distinction between the Chinese media, the American media, and the internationals. We can talk about the Chinese media first.

At a Chinese press conference with one of their officials, all the Chinese journalists knew they must allow the reporter from People's Daily – Renmin Ribao -- to ask the first question. People's Daily is newspaper of the Communist Party of China. It was known to all that People's Daily and Xinhua, the New China News Agency, would report the story in the way the Party intended. One could say the two would write stories that reflected the Party line. I cannot help but add the People's Daily reporters wore their newspaper's preeminence on their sleeves. They were quite full of themselves, when in reality they were hacks.

At press conferences, other Chinese journalists would ask questions, and they might give the appearance of being fractious or assertive, bold or sassy, or make out like they were Sam Donaldsons or Nina Totenbergs speaking truth to power -- American power, that is -- but this didn't, in the end, show in the news articles they wrote. The Party's control of, or bounding of, journalism was evident.

At the same time, all the new media were strongly competitive, anxious for circulation, profits, and influence. They could show some of this in their graphics, the splashy color, the new sections on style or cooking or sports, but as for news, the journalists knew that ordinary people wanted more than the correct stories, aligned with the Party line, that People's Daily or Xinhua delivered.

Our Embassy colleagues who pored over news and editorial copy in the fashion of true China watchers could begin to see differences in the editorial postures of different newspapers. And they noticed that on different issues the newspapers and magazines could turn the volume up or down. If People's Daily or Xinhua were critical of the United States on this or that issue (and this was very much a default position), other newspapers did not formally cross any redlines by making the criticism sharper. This was a downside, an unintended consequence, perhaps, of the Party's template reliance on nationalism as one of its sources of legitimacy. I'm not in close touch with Chinese news and views now, but I gather that this trend toward stories colored by more nationalism has become even more prominent since I left China.

All that said, if truth be told, we spent more time responding to the American media than we did the Chinese. That was because Washington read the American media, and we could expect a telephone call from Washington if there was a troublesome story. I suppose there were a dozen American journalists that PAS dealt with most frequently -- The Washington Post, New York Times, Wall Street Journal, McClatchy, Scripps Howard, Associated Press, the three networks, CNN, and so on. Reuters was usually included on our list as an honorary American organization. Influential British publications like The Economist, along with the BBC, had easy access to the Embassy too. We treated the Australians well.

We didn't give much access or attention to others from Europe, or from India, though the sudden prominence of al-Jazeera, and its generally straight news reporting on China, was noticed. The Japanese and Korean media were in Beijing in large numbers, and more, many more, would parachute in for each session of the Six Party Talks, but we didn't do much with them. We rarely accepted their requests for backgrounders, for instance.

Q: You mentioned that there were frequent visits by CODELs, members of the President's cabinet, and agency heads. How did this affect your press work?

BISHOP: As I mentioned, the number of visits by Washington VIPs was much greater than it had been during my first tour. President Bush had passed the word that members of the Cabinet should get busy with China. That concentrated their minds on thinking about what their Departments might do in China to thicken the relationship. I believe the whole Cabinet came to China while I was there, and some Secretaries made many visits.

The Mission standard was to give cabinet secretaries the full court press. All of them held press conferences, and most sat down for television interviews with one of the American networks, to let the American people know they were involved in China. PAS provided a site officer at each stop on their itinerary, and a riding Public Diplomacy Officer in the motorcade. We didn't have enough AIOs for all these roles, so I had to shanghai ACAOs and the Jiaoliu editor -- Charlene Fu had been a reporter for the Associated Press -- to join the media support for a cabinet visit. This took them away from their jobs, not just for the one or two days of the visit, but for the many interminable countdown meetings.

The press conferences, interviews, photo ops, and pull asides yielded a tremendous amount of coverage -- in the U.S., in China, and around the world. Of course television anchors have to trim big stories down to a few sentences or paragraphs, but volume adds up, and we were helping Administration newsmakers in a big way.

The down side was that the Information Unit had mostly become a press office. The other tasks in the Information Unit portfolio -- publishing Jiaoliu, tending the Distribution and Record System database, keeping up with and supporting the Voice of America and Radio Free Asia, developing our web presence, and so on -- slowed down, so great were the day in and day out of media work. I quite admired how the IO, Sheila Paskman, gritted it out. She and I both realized, however, that other important tasks were being postponed.

I was very impressed with the Director of the Federal Aviation Administration, Marion Blakey. The FAA needed a close relationship with China because of the increase in flights between the U.S. and China, and for aviation safety, air routes, and crash investigations. Chinese companies were producing components for aircraft manufactured by Boeing and Airbus, and they were beginning to sell their own aircraft, which would eventually require FAA certification. This is a pretty serious agenda.

Administrator Blakey and the Chinese Minister of Aviation met several times. This is an example of how the U.S.-China relationship was developing in one area largely away from the public eye. It's also an example of lean staffing. The FAA had one staffer in Beijing, Joe Tymcyswm, and how he did so much of the legwork was a wonder to behold. His prep work would be cemented by a Blakey visit.

The Chinese Minister of Aviation had noticed that when American visitors arrived in Beijing they were usually jetlagged, and a lot of important business was delayed waiting for them to recover. The Minister arranged things so that the FAA Administrator would travel from the airport to the Summer Palace, which is on a lake. He would walk her around the lake, and with the interpreters they would begin to discuss the issues in an animated professional way. This gave her a break after the flight, got her into the fresh air, postponed the reckoning with jet lag, showed her something of China's heritage, previewed some of the issues that would be on the agenda when they sat down at a conference table, and built a personal relationship. I always highlighted this kind of cooperation when I spoke to groups in China.

The Coast Guard is one of the five armed forces, the uniformed services, but it doesn't belong to DOD. It had for many years been part of the Department of the Treasury, but it had been placed under the Department of Transportation, and it's part of Homeland Security now.

Because it wasn't part of the Department of Defense, it was treated differently than the other four services by the Chinese. When the Coast Guard came to China, the Embassy didn't deal with the PLA but with the various departments of waterways and fisheries and weather.

The Commandant of the Coast Guard, Admiral Tom Collins, came for an official visit while I was PAO. I reminded him "I have seen you before" when we met, mentioning that I had watched, "seen," the Coast Guard cadets all march onto the Trinity football field when we were both studying in Connecticut.

Joining him during the visits with him to the storm center and the maritime offices were quite fascinating. Like the visits of the FAA Administrator, this kind of visit that brought together specialists showed the promise of U.S.-China relations seen from the working level.

Q: You also mentioned growing numbers of CODELs.

BISHOP: More CODELs meant more work.

Some were from the House, some from the Senate. Some had a dozen members, others just one. Some members had become China experts from many visits, others were dipping their toes in China for the first time.

The visitors with long experience on China issues got quite substantive meetings, and, as always, they could be more frank with the Chinese about the atmospherics in Washington. We at the Embassy were the good cops, the Congressional visitors could be the bad cops.

For the newcomers, we had to mix in visits to the Great Wall and some shopping. We also had a steady stream of STAFFDELS, usually from the professional staffs of committees focused on foreign policy, defense, and appropriations.

Q: Do you have anything to share about visits by President Bush, meaning the media angle?

BISHOP: Here's a particular memory. Whenever we had a visit by President Bush, I noticed the advance teams spent an inordinate amount of time on events and settings.

I would say they were responding to the growing need for more visibility in advancing a Presidential agenda and the President's standing. The same was true for Secretary Rice. If I count satisfying public affairs events, Secretary Rice's visit to the ice rink at the China World Hotel -- remember she had been a figure skater when she was a teenager -- was a fine moment. It didn't just happen. It required a lot of work.

Earlier, media preparations for a Presidential event might focus on where the President would stand, or what would be in the background of each shot. During the Bush administration, the advance teams spent hours and hours designing and purchasing, locally, big screened backdrops for Presidential statements. They could cost several thousand dollars, not only for the design work but also for the rush job with a local vendor. Someone on our staff had to join the effort, of course, one more demand on the staff.

Yes, there were some lighter moments. I entered one hotel conference room fifteen minutes ahead of the President to get a final look at the preps for one of his statements, and I found that his press lead and our AIO had placed the President's podium in front of a new, gorgeous, huge backdrop of a red Chinese gate with brass fasteners. They had been working on this for days. It cost $7000 as I recall -- $7000 for a backdrop for a 15-minute event.

It was three panels, actually, set up so that the President could enter from just off center. When the time came, the President walked out from between the panels, stepped up to the podium, and expertly delivered his statement. Then, unmindful that he had entered from the rear, he walked to some double doors to his right. Except that they were locked. It was a short embarrassment, he made a joke, and then an aide appeared from the rear and helped him leave.

Of course, that scene was what made the world's news reports, along with a lot of snarky commentary about clueless Bush, no exit strategy, and so on. All those cheap shots I so hate. You win some, you lose some.

Q: I would like to ask, for your office, who monitored, or how important was the Internet?

BISHOP: By 2004 the internet had, indeed, become an important method of communication in China. In 2005 our Embassy web page was receiving about three million hits per month. The vast majority of visitors were searching the website's pages about visas.

If we speak of "monitoring" the internet, the FSNs who prepared the daily media summary reports for Washington gradually learned to look at Chinese newspaper web pages rather than the hard copy of the newspaper. Looking at the websites of television stations helped with covering what was said on the airwaves. If your question means, however, were we reading blogs, or following web conversations, the answer is no. That would have required a dedicated staff we didn't have.

During my first tour in Beijing, we had a USIA Foreign Service specialist, Janet Reid, who managed all our own IT functions. Janet's position was one that was absorbed by State, and her replacement did not work at PAS. We can say that her transfer was another self-inflicted wound of consolidation, and we lost our dedicated IT specialist just as the internet was opening up so many opportunities.

During my second tour as PAO, PAS had one local-hire American, Sommer Austin, who worked on the Embassy's website. She had two FSNs who combined some of the lower level "system management" tasks with maintaining the website. This was our own internet presence.

Sommer managed the transition from a unique American Embassy Beijing website to one that conformed to the worldwide same-look "branding" templates that were mandated by the Under Secretary for Public Diplomacy and Public Affairs. She managed the parallel loading of materials in English and Chinese. She worked up some pages unique to Beijing, like a page on our book translation program. She updated the consular web pages. The Department had mandated that each Embassy have only one web page, and that it be managed by PAS. This was doctrinally correct, but it was, so to speak, an "unfunded mandate" since we received no more people or money to manage this.

Charlotte Beers was very keen, from her private sector experience, on branding. This meant more than simply having a brand like "Cool Britannia." It also meant that a company's products and its web presence should be unified visually, which meant every Embassy's website should look the same, and URLs should have the same format, as in "london.usembassy.gov" or "beijing.usembassy.gov."

An internet issue that preoccupied us was the “Great Chinese firewall,” the Chinese government's ability to shut down access to certain foreign websites. RFA's website was one. We did not want to be among the sites that was vulnerable to being turned off by the Chinese.

If our website was on “state.gov” or “usembassy.gov,” however, it would be relatively easy for the Chinese government to restrict access. At post, therefore, we wanted to keep the website inside the firewall, so we ran our own site at “org.cn.” What appeared on “state.gov” was a mirror site. That arrangement took time to manage.

Doing all this, I'm sure Sommer and her FSNs were wrung out at the end of each day.

A website is, in a way, a “passive” web presence. Companies and organizations and NGOs now know they need to reach out into the net, drawing netizens into conversations, friending, sending out regular messages to individuals by email. We weren't there. We were still in the old mode, as in, if we put our stuff on our website, they will come. We knew this was a weakness, but every time the Information Unit focused on it, then another cabinet visit was announced, which tied up everyone for weeks. To ride the wave of change on the internet, we simply needed more people.

This is one more reason the Ambassador's perception that PAS wasn't pulling its weight was wrong. In 1992, when the size of the American staff was set, the internet had no impact on public opinion or Public Diplomacy. More than a decade later, its presence revolutionized private sector communication, and the private sector added more and more people to deal with it.

In Public Diplomacy at posts in the field, in contrast, the internet was something extra that we were just supposed to accomplish in our abundant spare time, presto-chango, wave the magic wand. This was plain and simple stupid, and I'm getting hot under the collar just talking about it. It provides an example of how Washington can think a big thought -- we need to do more on the internet -- yet fail to consider what burdens that places on posts, and fail to consider providing more resources.

Compared to many other Embassies, however, our website was strong in Chinese, not just English. This was partly the fruit of now having a Washington File in Chinese. There was a steady flow of translations coming out of Washington. A hat tip to Bob Holden in IIP. At our end, we also spent a lot of money for outside translations, especially for Jiaoliu magazine, and we made sure the material was available on our Chinese language webpages. That's where we were. Compared to any self-respecting American corporation that was doing business in China, though, we probably looked pretty pathetic.

Since you've got me going on this, let me say some more. During my whole last decade in the Foreign Service, I was struck, distressed, dumbfounded by the absurd distance between needs and means. In China, the economy grew and grew, and the universities grew and grew, and newspapers grew and grew, and broadcasting grew and grew, and the internet exploded, and the means, the resources, that we needed to respond were never provided to us.

The example that really brought this home to me was the NBA, the National Basketball Association. They sensed the potential of a huge market, and huge profits, in China, especially after Yao Ming began to play with the Rockets.

Q: The basketball phenom ...

BISHOP: Yes, the tall, handsome Chinese basketball star, and great national hero.

The NBA decided that one way to increase their viewership, which meant also meant Chinese buying more T-shirts and the televising of games that provided a platform for more advertising, was to arrange some exhibition games in China, with Yao Ming on the court. They chose Shanghai and Beijing as the venues, two games in each city. They rented huge basketball stadiums. I went to one of the games in Beijing. It was done wonderfully. I could see the impact. Everyone in the stadium was charged up about the NBA, and I think to some degree they had good thoughts about American-Chinese friendship, and worldwide sport, and so on.

In order to stage these four games in China, the NBA sent 185 people to manage things -- TV people, video people, tickets people, interpreters, and so on. One corporation, the NBA, for three weeks of activity in China, sent 185 people.

I was Uncle Sam's public affairs account manager in China. I operated all year round. I had the diplomatic portfolio, the trade portfolio, the education portfolio, the commercial portfolio, the human rights portfolio, the terrorism portfolio, the Six Party Talks portfolio, and on and on. I had 18 Americans and about 60 FSNs in five offices. We are supposed to make the Chinese love us and agree with us on all our positions? We're supposed to make some headway with this absurdly small amount of resources, in people and money? We're simply not serious.

We did our damndest, we did some good things, but my mind was being fried by this difference between needs and means.

OK, I've said it. Let me get hold of myself. Restore my diplomatic sangfroid. Forgive this "poor poor pitiful me" moment.

We received frequent reminders from Washington about the Government Performance Results Act (GPRA, or "Gip-ra"), with its emphasis on measuring outcomes. The great minds in Public Diplomacy in Washington hadn't figured out how to measure Public Diplomacy's effects, but they rightly realized that at least that they needed a comprehensive record of activities, large and small, at posts. They set up the RESULTS database to maintain the information. It was routinely sieved for reports and Congressional testimony.

This system may or may not have worked in different countries, but it really worked in China because I put a lot of emphasis on it. No matter how much was going on, the officer in charge of a program had to file the short report to Washington the day it happened, or the day afterward. We were the shining stars back in Washington.

Q: Well, this is something new to me. These reports, who was looking at these things?

BISHOP: Who was looking at them? It's a pretty good question.

Q: You know, sounds like a proliferation of paperwork or digital work.

BISHOP: We were doing it by email by that time.

Although the reports went into a big database, they were seen by people in the various Public Diplomacy offices in Washington, and they became the talk of staff meetings and daily spot reports to principals. A report that involved a Fulbrighter in China, for instance, was seen by ECA and also by EAP. So it created buzz, with occasional feedback that "the Assistant Secretary was pleased to hear you had done this or that," which gave some extra incentive to our officers for filing the reports early and well. No one asked for my opinion about the overall worth of the reports and the database, but I decided we should do things zealously, not to be tardy or churlish in our response.

Looking at my list of the issues, there were the Six Party Talks. I wish that I could unveil the talks and give you the whole, unvarnished, down and dirty inside story ...

Q: Tell us what the Six Party Talks were about.

BISHOP: The Six Parties are North Korea, South Korea, Russia, China, Japan, and the United States. These are six countries that have a focus on the Korean peninsula and the North Korean nuclear program. The talks were aimed to persuade North Korea to give up its nuclear program. Even now, the North Koreans haven't done so. The talks haven't born fruit.

I wish I could give you all the inside dope, but when Chris Hill would walk in with the American delegation to join the other five delegations at one of the many meetings in Beijing, the doors closed and we public affairs people were outside the room handling the media horde. When I say "we," I'm generously including myself, but the heavy lifting was done by Sheila Paskman and the Information Unit.

My one insight to share on Six Party Talks is that when Chris Hill became the chief American delegate, I noticed that he had a different view of using the media than his predecessors, different from practically everybody else in the U.S. government. For most American delegation leaders, meeting the press was an obligatory burden after a meeting. Foreign Service people are pretty well practiced at learning how to say nothing when speaking to the media: "it was a constructive meeting," or, "yes, we really clarified each other's positions," or "I think there's a way forward if ..." Nonetheless, meeting the press is regarded as something you had to do, and it was generally dreaded.

Chris Hill had a view that encounters with the press, even pull-asides, detouring before or after a session to talk to the media off the hotel lobby, were a tool in the negotiations. He often talked about "feints" in what he said to the journalists. He might say to us, "Oh, did you notice, I just fainted there."

Now, I'm not in a position to really say how effective he was at that, but I did notice that he was serious and calculating in thinking about the media. I kind of liked it. He regarded meetings with the media as part of shaping or staging individual sessions of the Talks.

All of this meant work for PAS. Even encounters between Chris Hill and journalists that were portrayed as short impromptu chats walking in and out of meetings required planning and setup on our part.

Here it was possible to also see in microcosm the large changes that had taken place in Public Diplomacy over the years. In the 1960s, say, when communication between Washington and posts was much more spare, American Embassy spokesmen (I suppose they were mostly men, then) were well known media personalities in the host country. In the 21st century, the Spokesperson did more planning and setup of venues than standing behind a microphone. The actual policy words were spoken by visiting Washington principals like Chris Hill. Once, Embassy spokesmen did their own backgrounding for the American press. Now, the spokesperson would set up individual meetings with Embassy experts.

Q: What did the Chinese think of North Korea and the “Kim dynasty”?

BISHOP: China and North Korea have this emotional tie that goes back to the Korean War -- blood brothers on the battlefield, lips and teeth. The PRC drew on these themes when it propagandized its own population during the Korean War. One of the problems with Chinese narratives, however, is that they they're hard to turn off. Even now, the Chinese must genuflect to those memories, at least in public.

My sense is that the Chinese officials who must deal with North Korea have had abundant opportunity to see their intransigence up close, and it has not led to more fondness. Though it has been insufficient, the Chinese have been vexed enough to occasionally twist the North Koreans' arms, as when they cut off the fuel supply to North Korea for a few days. They don't do it openly, but they do things to cramp the North Koreans.

When the Chinese look at a failing regime in North Korea, there's the possibility of an implosion, and a half dozen scenarios of how it might happen. All the scenarios result in refugees across the border with China's northeast. Surely the Chinese could contain the refugee flows in camps, and I can't imagine there's not some kind of plan for that. Even so, they regard a refugee crisis as destabilizing, and they don't want to go down that path. Also, the likely outcomes of a North Korean implosion would bring Korean unification with the South in charge. The Chinese like the idea of a North Korean buffer between China and the power of South Korea and its ally the United States.

So the Chinese do enough, from year to year and month to month, to contain North Korean excesses without doing anything fundamental to change the equation. Of course the only thing that can fundamentally change the equation is regime change in North Korea, and that makes the Chinese nervous.

Q: If you look at the many programs managed by Public Affairs Sections, from working with the media to education and exchanges, what were you focused on?

BISHOP: When we had our discussion about my first tour in Beijing, as Deputy Public Affairs Officer, I mentioned that I was keen to “lean” all our programs in the direction of high priority bilateral goals. In my second tour, I continued with that emphasis on “leaning,” and I think I was able to run things in a way that increased the number of programs. “Lean” and increase the numbers, both.

I've always been keen to have things counted, and each time I was PAO I had my staff count the number of programs that had been conducted in the past few years. Some were easy to count -- how many Fulbrighters went to the States? How many International Visitors? How many press conferences did we arrange? This counting, baseline counting perhaps, allowed us then to think about expanding the number of programs. This was also valuable when I wrote each officer's annual evaluation, and, to be frank, when I provided information for my own ER.

I copied out some figures before I came here. For the 2004-2005 evaluation year, print and web editors ran our materials -- meaning press releases, op-eds, backgrounders, materials on the U.S., excerpts from testimony in Washington -- 3800 times. The count had been 200 in 2000. Here, our outreach work ran parallel to the increasing demand for materials by China's expanding media sector. Still, this was a pretty good rise, not just in quantity, but in quality too. Chinese readers got more of their views from our sources, quoting Administration officials. The circulation for each issue of Jiaoliu magazine was about 18,000.

International Visitors increased by one fourth to 100. We doubled the number of Chinese Fulbrighters in a single year, including 20 of the new Fulbright Language Teaching Assistants. We counted 468 presentations by 150 speakers. We sent journalists and film crews from several Chinese stations to the U.S. to produce programs under the Television Cooperative program run by the Foreign Press Center. Among the topics they covered were AIDS, genetically modified organisms, protecting the environment, and enterprise. The television co-ops were a very fine tool, since programs produced by a station in one province eventually were circulated for broadcast in other provinces, too.

All this was running at a pretty fast pace.

One of our largest efforts in China was the International Visitor program. In most countries, it's up to PAS to find IV nominees who speak English so that they can join group programs with Visitors from other nations too -- programs for journalists, or economics professors, or city planners, or women leaders, for instance. The problem with the group programs is that you have to find English speakers.

From the first days of the program in China, there were so few people who could speak English that USIA and then the Bureau of Education and Cultural Affairs had organized single-person programs for China. We were sending 90-some IVs a year, and almost all were tailored one-person programs with escort interpreters. One of the finest officers in Public Diplomacy, Ruth Kurzbauer, had this portfolio, and I marveled at how she bore up under the workload.

The extraordinary dedication of IV resources to China meant that we should really know our stuff when providing input to Washington for each visitor. There are a couple of angles to this.

For instance, we sent many women on programs that addressed women's rights. Looking over reports from previous programs, I saw that ECA and the program agencies were organizing rather predictable programs. The IV would arrive in Washington. For three or four days they got the standard tour of federalism, separation of powers, and so on. When they began their tailored schedule and their individual appointments, they would meet a woman Member of Congress. They would visit the National Organization for Women and other women's organizations working women's issues. What got my attention was that the visitors were always being sent to meet people at Emily's List. It's a women's organization, for sure, but it is political, and partisan. It provides money to pro-choice Democratic women candidates.

This struck me wrong several ways. First, we were sending our Visitors to a partisan organization with no parallel visit to a Republican group. Second, we were telling Chinese women that women in the United States are all unified on a certain view of women's issues, the NOW view, and they are all pro-choice. I was bothered by this approach because it implicitly supported the reliance on abortion in China's family planning, which we criticized every year in the Human Rights Reports.

I insisted very strongly that Chinese women IVs had to see the full range of American women's organizations. For instance, Concerned Women for America has a larger membership than NOW, and it's pro-life. I found it curious that NOW had somehow become the designated organization to represent American women. I was fine with Chinese women meeting pro-choice American women's organizations, but I insisted that they must meet pro-life women as well.

When I looked at the programs that had been organized for Chinese specialists on the environment, I noticed something similar. The usual template program was to send them to visit the EPA in Washington, and then in Denver, say, they would visit the EPA regional office. Or they would visit the Bureau of Land Reclamation in Washington and the local office in Boise.

What was missing was care for the environment in the private sector. Vast tracts of American forest belong to Georgia-Pacific and Weyerhaeuser, for instance. The corporations are very active in conservation and environmental protection, so much so that you can tell from aerial photos that the private forests and ranges are better tended than the public lands. So I insisted that our Chinese IVs must visit corporations -- and state governments too. My intention was to give the Chinese a much more balanced view of the United States, to reinforce lessons in federalism, and to see corporate responsibility in a markets and enterprise economy.

Here's another example. One IV was a professor of economics. This young department chair, nominated by a consulate, had received his Ph.D. from a Chinese university. I sensed that this professor still lived in a world of central planning, and I wanted the IV program to give him a totally new feel for the American markets and enterprise economy.

At the time, China was transitioning government employees, Party members, and those working for state-owned enterprises out of government-owned housing. They were privatizing unit-owned apartments, allowing employees to purchase ownership on favorable rates. This meant that the new owners could sell or rent out the properties in the future, so the change in favor of ownership must be matched by changes in banking and lending.

I knew from reports on past IVs that the programmers would send the IV, during the initial week in Washington, to the Federal Reserve and maybe the FDIC and Treasury. I wrote out a different plan, telling Washington to take him to a local real estate company to witness a house closing. He would see private property, transfer of property, prices, loans, mortgage insurance, the termite inspection, title insurance, and so on. I wanted him to have a consumer's view of the economy before he visited the big institutions -- a view from the bottom up, so to speak, rather than a look down from the Federal Reserve. I thought the visitor needed this because of China's own system of central economic planning and controls.

I followed up with Ruth and with Washington after the professor returned. When asked, the real estate agent thought it better not to have him sit through a real closing. What they arranged was for six or eight people in the office to gather at the table. One played the seller, another the realtor, a third the banker, and so on. Our visitor was the buyer. They went through all the forms, and answered all his questions for a few hours.

He was asked, which loan are you choosing? Thirty year fixed, 15 year fixed, an ARM? Do you want to pay closing costs? How many points will you pay? And so on.

The IV was surprised by the choices. He had lived his whole life in an economy where all things are made uniform, where the government decides, not the consumer. He had had no idea about the role of consumer choice, competition, consumer protections, and so on.

One more focus to mention. I mentioned the impact of 9/11 in China, and Chinese worries about separatism among the Muslim minorities in China's west. I asked all our ACAOs to organize some programs in the West, and Darrell Jenks moved out smartly. Darrell, EAP/PD area director Peter Kovach, and I opened this effort with a series of programs in Ningxia and Xinjiang provinces. The Foreign Affairs Offices were made nervous by our approach, so they didn't schedule us for any large presentations, but we met with scholars that they invited to round tables, and I would say the response by the scholars to our low key approach, discussing areas of U.S.-Chinese cooperation, was quite positive. Out west they hadn't heard much about cooperation at all. We also were able to meet Muslim leaders for good conversations.

Q: How about performing arts programs, high culture, so to speak? USIA had been famous for cultural presentations like Louis Armstrong.

BISHOP: You'll recall during Hong Kong portion of this series of interviews that I had mentioned Isaac Stern's visit to China in 1979 -- and later Charlton Heston's visit to China to direct The Caine Mutiny Court Martial. Those programs had made a large impact, and my take on things is that performing arts programs are particularly useful when a given bilateral relationship needs an initial shot of adrenaline, or when two countries that have been estranged establish a new relationship. No doubt when North Korea opens, a few strategic performing arts programs will be important. Those programs in China had illustrated that principle.

When I was in Beijing, though, it wasn't necessary for Uncle Sam to sponsor those performing arts exchanges. There were plenty of privately arranged performances. I recall attending wonderful performances with Chinese and American musicians playing Stradivarius violins brought from the U.S. The performances on the instruments were part of the sales strategy by houses that bought and sold the violins. Winston Marsalis came to Beijing as part of a promotion of his albums by Sony. My point is that the growth of the economic and cultural relationship had taken on a power of its own, so our Public Diplomacy priorities could focus elsewhere.

Even so, we organized some small scale performing arts programs. In my first tour, Kevin Maynor's musical interpretations of Paul Robeson were well received. When I was PAO, the folk singer Abby Washburn came to China under our auspices for a number of performances with Bela Fleck. She sang some songs in Mandarin. And a young Fulbrighter, Caitrin McKiernan, produced the play Passages of Dr. Martin Luther King.

Let me mention a few more Public Diplomacy focus areas.

The tighter scrutiny of visa applications all around the world also affected our work in Public Diplomacy. The need for every single applicant to be interviewed put enormous pressures on the consular section. In PAS, as single manager of the Embassy's website, we had to greatly expand the consular pages, and they needed frequent updating. We had to deal with criticism of the new system of advance appointments for visa interviews, and complaints about the FAQ telephone line. The major issue, though, was that the number of visas that were given to Chinese to study in the United States had decreased after 9/11.

Q: Why was that? Because just it was time or because we were doing a better job of -- BISHOP: Before 9/11, a Chinese applicant for a student visa primarily had to overcome an issuing consular officer's doubt about the applicant's return to China, meaning that after receiving an American degree, would the applicant return? As you know, refusal rates change, with chiefs of consular sections and/or individual officers and/or the inspectors judging that too many or too few visas are being issued.

There were always worries that some Chinese applicants in specialized scientific fields were seeking to learn technologies with military applications, and as the Russians and Chinese increased their efforts to obtain U.S. technology, the reviews became more thorough, and applicants had to wait many weeks or sometimes months for clearances.

I would say, though, that the decrease in visas to Chinese students stemmed primarily from more thorough security reviews, which often delayed issuance beyond the beginning of a school term. Once a few applicants were refused visas, fewer applicants applied to U.S. universities for fear of wasting time and money or losing face. There was a chilling effect of lower issuance rates. Once things begin to chill, there are more refusals to applicants who shouldn't receive a visa, yes, but the chill affected many other students who might have received a visa. The numbers cascaded downward.

When American student visa issuances sagged, the other English-speaking countries -- the U.K.,

Australia, New Zealand, even South Africa -- surged their efforts to attract Chinese students. In any case, whether we were too strict, or whether our competitors were attracting more students, in PAS we had to develop a response, a public affairs campaign to reverse the trend.

Reversing the decline required the Consular Section to play a role. They had to make Washington comfortable with the idea that the Embassy in Beijing was going to be giving visas to more Chinese students instead of being quite so cautious and strict. They had to work through some of the security issues that were causing long delays in the issues of visas. They had to tweak the visa interview appointment system so that student visa applicants could be seen earlier.

Our role in PAS was to let Chinese students know that American colleges and universities were ready to admit Chinese students, and that the door was also open at the Embassy.

This was work. There was the face-to-face work with students and their faculty advisors at the universities, talking things up. Both CAO Rob Laing and I hosted or were guests for web chats. We gave some office space at the ACEE to Frank Mok, who worked for the Institute for International Education as a student counselor.

I sensed we needed a written “anchor” for this effort, a speech with the right pitch and the right details that could be widely circulated. I ended up writing it myself, and Darrell Jenks, the ACEE Director, gathered a good crowd of students and educators at the ACEE to hear it. Once delivered, we translated it, and we put it on the web and could point to it whenever needed. This speech was picked up and loaded on dozens of Chinese websites, so great was the interest in U.S. student visas. It's still there. One Chinese magazine said it was the definitive speech on American education, the welcome for Chinese students, and visas. I included some useful advice on the visa interview.

American universities seem very expensive to Chinese, even if they're going to a fairly low cost state university. The tuition is so large, compared to Chinese living standards, that there was talk that American universities were making a profit off the Chinese students. New Zealand language institutes had become infamous for their focus on profits, so Chinese students were suspicious that all foreign universities, American schools included, wanted to gouge them. So in the speech I talked about this directly.

I explained that whatever Chinese students spend, their funds are being matched, either by the state legislature or by the endowments of the private universities. This is because the total cost of a year of education is much higher than the amount that students pay. A Chinese student, even paying out-of-state tuition, might be paying 30 or 50 cents for a dollar's worth of education. Even now, there are still comments and buzz about that speech.

And the numbers of applications, and visas issued, began to rise again.

Q: How about the return rate?

BISHOP: The return rate also went up, though I don't think that was necessarily our doing.

Q: Got to be the economy.

BISHOP: Yes. There are more opportunities for graduates in China. They return because they know their MBA from an American university is a primo credential to get a good job back home.

Q: It's interesting. I dealt for a long time with Yugoslavia. Students who went to the United States on Fulbrights or on exchanges -- the university faculties were not at all responsive to them because these were old farts who didn't want their way of tenure or anything else changing. The younger people full of bright ideas would be relegated to the lowest ranks. Was this true in China too?

BISHOP: I think that many of the Chinese returnees would tell the same story. Those who returned in the 80s and 90s commonly ran into just what you described. Heads of departments or senior professors who had earned degrees overseas had earned them from the Soviet Union. There were many economics professors with Soviet degrees, for instance. What did they know about economics, trade, commerce, business? Nothing useful for China's future. So the scholars who returned from the U.S. met more than ordinary university politics. There was an ideological hangover as well. And who are these young whippersnappers, anyway?

This was moderated over time by the enormous expansion of Chinese higher education. It solved some of the problems by creating new positions. In time the older generation of professors had to retire. And gradually university administrators knew they had to build quality faculties, which meant those with foreign degrees.

Q: In dealing with universities or other institutions, did anyone take a look at Marxism? Or had this become sort of ancient history?

BISHOP: It's not ancient history because every high school and university must offer certain courses in Marxism, Leninism, and Deng Xiaoping thought. My conversations with Chinese students led me to understand, though, that they just endure these classes. They sit through them. They nod and pretend to be awake. But in fact, just like other parts of the ideological posture of the Party and the state, these things are largely disregarded.

The courses are required for graduation because the Party doesn't want to give up its position as guiding the ideology of the country. Another factor that explains the lingering influence of Marxism is that the universities and policy institutes may have dozens of scholars on their rolls, and some (the older scholars, the lazy ones, or those whose background was in the PLA or the Party) coast along on their old learning, unwilling to question the premises they had been taught.

I was quite struck by this academic inertia of rest at a conference on Taiwan issues organized by one of the universities. Of course, Taiwan is a hot-button issue, and among the scholars were some who were quite sophisticated in their understanding of how changes in Taiwan, democratic changes, need to be factored into the PRC's approach to the island. To hear their nuanced papers, however, you had to listen to many others by their colleagues who rotely repeated all the old lines, complete with the oddly stressed voices of Communist indoctrination.

A program like the one we organized for the economics professor from Heilongjiang University was partly to challenge the whole concept of central planning, and to demonstrate that the old ideologies and habits were inadequate for China's future.

Younger Chinese academics in the leading universities were conscious that Marxism and Communism didn't provide good guidance for China's future. I was asked to speak at a conference at People's University on just war theory. As the Chinese government thought through its responses to Kosovo, 9/11, Iraq, and Afghanistan, they realized that Mao's ideological framework -- wars of imperialism, bad, people's war, good -- didn't provide much useful guidance in a rather complex world. So the university had organized a conference to examine just war theory. They weren't ready to endorse it, but they grasped that they needed to understand it, and that it might help broaden their thinking.

I hadn't been given much notice about the conference, and not many details. I put together my presentation on just war thinking mostly from memory, recalling my study of Thomas Aquinas and teaching at the Air Force Academy.

I discovered that the Chinese university had invited an international affairs professor from a prominent U.S. university to anchor the conference. Much of his way-too-long paper criticized several U.S. administrations for their unjust wars. I found that I was the paper presenter that gave them a plain vanilla description of the criteria for just wars, and defended the war on terrorism as just.

Q: Here and there you have mentioned the People's Liberation Army, the Chinese military. Did it figure in your Public Diplomacy?

BISHOP: It has been a U.S. goal -- a DOD goal, a State goal, a White House goal -- the same goal in Republican and in Democratic administrations -- to develop the military-to-military relationship with China, to build trust.

The PLA -- and here "People's Liberation Army" includes the Navy and the Air Force -- is the most separate and most ideologized of China's institutions. Remember too that the PLA is not the nation's army, it's the Party's army. Soldiers swear oaths to the Party, not the Constitution.

The PLA has an elaborate system of foreign affairs offices. Foreigners who deal with the PLA officers who staff these offices refer to them, informally, as the "barbarian handlers." The English-speaking barbarian handlers, who studied the language at their own separate military academy in Luoyang, are very smooth. These men and women are the ones who meet foreigners, set up schedules, arrange the meetings, sit with the Americans at banquets, and so on. Only highly reliable officers get these jobs.

Successive DATTs were frustrated by this need to move everything through the Foreign Affairs Offices. They wanted to build communication, knowledge, and trust with warfighters, with field commanders. It was abundantly clear from their actions, if not their words, that the Chinese didn't want this to happen. Meeting a commander or the head of a staff section, or visiting a base or unit, was very hard to arrange. Again, the PLA is sealed off in most ways. To meet the incessant foreign demands to see the PLA in the field, the Chinese had a show roster of ships and bases, and Potemkin commandos would perform martial arts for the foreign visitors.

Q: It's been pointed out in numerous articles that the PLA is one of China's most conservative institutions ...

BISHOP: Yes.

Q: ... and one that views the United States as a potential enemy.

BISHOP: Yes again.

Q: If you're in the military you've got to have an enemy. You've got to have a big enemy so you can get more money. We could even say we are doing this with China ourselves, like we did with the Soviets, painting them as much more powerful as they probably were. Were you able to insert yourself in military-to-military things?

BISHOP: For the record, I'm not bought into that line of thinking – that the U.S. armed forces conjure up or exaggerate threats so that they can receive more resources – so I won't take that bait right now.

When you used the word “conservative,” I think your meaning has been the same as when I've used the word “ideologized.” And conservative Chinese ideology is left.

Dealing with different ideologies, you're always wrestling with words. I think you understand, though, what I mean when I say the PLA is ideologized and isolated. They live on their bases. The officers are Party members. They have their own schools. Units have political officers to indoctrinate all personnel. The PLA has certainly taken to heart the narrative in which the United States remains an imperial power that wants to keep China down, and that the U.S. is China's number one future enemy. This suspicion is a backdrop to every mil-to-mil initiative.

There have now been decades of American efforts, led by all the Secretaries of Defense and all the Commanders of the Pacific Command, to build trust and relationships with the PLA. The results have all been limited -- by how the Chinese historical narrative of victimization frames their suspicions, by Communist doctrine, because of the PLA's institutional isolation, by how the Foreign Affairs Offices handle American delegations.

Although it became a larger issue after my time as PAO in Beijing, the active Chinese military program to penetrate the servers of U.S. government agencies and American corporations was beginning to be noticed. I wasn't privy to any classified discussions of this, so I'm speaking of what was in the news. The Chinese denials of military involvement -- that any penetrations or cyber raids against U.S. targets were done elsewhere, or were executed by patriotic hackers independent of the government -- were just not credible.

As for Public Diplomacy and the PLA, I have always believed that Public Diplomacy can be helpful in building mil-to-mil relations -- by arranging better and more far-reaching media coverage of mil-to-mil events, and by using Public Diplomacy's writ to deal with educational institutions to open military academies and professional military education to Embassy-sponsored programs.

It's always the case, however, that the Defense Attaches in American Embassies all around the world are possessive about contacts with local militaries. Is a ship making a port call? The colonel says, "Don't worry, Mr. Ambassador, we'll take care of everything." Is there a group of American officers from one of the war colleges visiting? "Don't worry, Mr. Ambassador. They'll stop by and shake hands with you, but since they belong to me I'll set up the rest of their schedule."

There are generally two ways that PAS can be part of the large effort. One is with the local media. When EUCOM deployed people to train Nigerian peacekeepers or clear unexploded ordnance, an active public affairs posture, organized and led by PAS, arranging for the American military people to meet the journalists, was a great confidence builder.

There were these opportunities in China too. Once or twice a year, for instance, an American naval vessel would visit Shanghai or Qingdao or Zhanjiang in the south. As always, the Attaché said, "Don't worry, Mr. Ambassador, leave it to us." The Attaché's team would meet with the PLA's foreign affairs handlers to go over the visit. When they got to the bottom of their checklist they raised the question of media coverage, and the PLA team said, "Don't worry. We'll take care of that." And our team would say, "Great, one less worry for us."

Done this way, who would show up to cover the event? It would be the Chinese equivalent of Armed Forces Network, CCTV-5, the military channel. There might be visuals of the ship at the dock, but the words of the story were always spoken by the Chinese military journalist.

I always took the position that if a ship came to Shanghai or Qingdao or Zhanjiang, that city's local media and that city's bureau chiefs from the national media should be invited to events. I regularly deployed Wendy Lyle, our scrappy Consulate Public Affairs Officer in Guangzhou, to handle these ship visits. Wendy immigrated to the U.S. from Taiwan, and she knew how to get results by being assertive in a Chinese way.

Wendy would show up with the DATT advance team when the ship arrived, and when the PLA handlers said "Oh no, no, no, we've already arranged the media coverage," she might just say, "I've got them here! They're in the bus! They're ready to come in the gate! Of course you're going to let them cover the ship." This gave the Foreign Affairs officers real heartburn, but often the PRC senior officers were so amused by this Chinese-American woman and her assertive ways, they let the press come in for the events. Your ordinary province-level journalist was quite wowed by a U.S. Navy ship, and the papers ran lots of photos and stories.

So, PAS could advance the mil-to-mil agenda by playing its "media" card.

Another way was to use our role as the Embassy lead in education and exchanges to approach military schools. "You're educators. Well, we're educators too. We do Fulbrights, we do speakers, we do seminars, and we do it at every university in China. Your military academy is a university. Couldn't we bring by a speaker to talk to your faculty about ...”

This proved a tougher nut to crack. We'll talk about the 60th anniversary of the end of World War II in a few minutes, but I was, I believe, the first Embassy speaker at the Academy of Military Sciences. We succeeded in getting them to agree to allow Charles Hawkins of the HERO Library to speak there too. So we were slowly prying open the door to the PLA's senior schools.

There was one more way to use Public Affairs to help with the mil-to-mil relationship. Each Ministry has an associated policy institute, a think tank. They were open to having U.S. speakers, joining seminars, and so on. We programmed speakers, for instance, at one of the Ministry of Defense think tanks, the Foundation for International Strategic Studies (FISS).

Darrell Jenks, as ACAO and Director of the ACEE, ran our speakers program, and he grasped what I hoped PAS could do with the PLA. He and his staff always approached MND institutions for our speaker programs. It took some time for him to work through their initial misgivings, but once they had accepted a speaker and met Darrell, who spoke wizard Chinese, they were pleased to have the chance to meet more Americans.

By the way, Darrell was doing the same things at the Central Party School and the provincial Party Schools, though they were now called “Administrative Colleges” in English.

Q: What did you talk about?

BISHOP: We should back up a little bit. I began as PAO in 2003. The sixtieth anniversary of V-J Day would be 2005. I asked around the Embassy if there were anyone thinking ahead to the anniversary, and the DATT recalled that he had recently seen a draft Pacific Command plan. When I read it, I realized the PACOM intended to organize or support observances in Hawaii, the Philippines, Guam, Australia, and even Palau. There was no mention of China in the plan.

I asked the DATT if his office intended to do anything. In effect he told me they would have no time. Like us, they were overwhelmed by visitors and by all their many different taskings from around DOD. He let me know they would be happy to attend an event if the Chinese organized something, and maybe attend a dinner or two, but they were in no position to organize anything from the Embassy side.

I sensed that the sixtieth anniversary could provide an opportunity -- to use the story of U.S.-China cooperation during the war to put a dent in the Party's narrative that the U.S. was always trying to keep China down. Not to mention that the Flying Tigers, the Doolittle Raid, the Hump route, the Burma Road -- all were great and compelling stories that needed re-telling in China.

Q: Stilwell and --

BISHOP: Vinegar Joe, yes.

I discovered that after years of ignoring the role of China's allies in its war against Japan, the Chinese were beginning to offer recognition. For instance, when the USAF Museum at Wright-Patterson Air Force Base wanted to add a stone runway roller to their exhibit on the Hump Airlift, the Chinese found a roller in good condition on the side of a runway in Yunnan Province, where it had sat, unused, for 60 years. There was a large ceremony in Kunming to present the roller to the U.S. My former USAF Academy colleague and fellow Trinity College alumnus, Brigadier General Jon Reynolds, came out for the ceremony as the Museum's representative. I got to give the big speech. There were six of us Americans on the stage, and when an elderly Kunming resident who had worked on the runways as a boy came on stage, we all gave him a salute. He was sincerely abashed by the salute and by the thunderous applause. A nice moment.

We had all noticed that in the front row in the audience was an elderly Chinese woman jauntily wearing a beret, and she came forward to see us as soon as the ceremony ended. She was Rita Wong, who had worked as a Chinese nurse at the U.S. Army hospital in Yuannanyi. It was a rather fine occasion, and she had bought old photos of herself in her nurse's uniform.

She kept repeating a name, "Lieutenant Colonel Herbert Bush." He had been the hospital commander. After the ceremony back in Beijing, I spent some time with Google hoping to track down Dr. Bush. He had passed away, but I found his son, also a physician, in Connecticut. Rita was too old to make the trip, but her family flew to Connecticut to meet the son and place flowers on Lieutenant Colonel Bush's grave. Another nice moment.

One more memory of the gathering in Kunming. Another old gentleman told the story that his father owned a silk shop, and many of the American GIs visited the shop to buy silk to take home to mothers, wives, and sweethearts. Indeed they had helped the son with his English, and they had invited him to the base to see a musical play. The elderly Chinese thought a moment ... "what was the name of that tune?" I said, "Oklahoma!", and he clapped his hands with delight. Yes, he had seen the USO production of Oklahoma! This was an interesting story of the longevity of memories of cultural events.

In addition to the stone roller donation, the Chinese were finally inviting a few veterans groups -- Russian, American, British, French -- to China. They found a partner in the Sino-American Aviation Heritage Foundation, of which Jeff Greene was the sparkplug, idea man, and tour leader.

There were still a few of China's "united front" organizations that looked back to World War II. For instance, the people who had been at Yan'an with Chairman Mao when they were young, who had dealt with the Dixie Mission, there were still a few of them around. They had their own little society. These united front groups would be given some money on occasions such as this. They were inviting, for instance, the family of people like Evans Carlson, the Marine Raider who had ...

BISHOP: ... been in China before the war. Yes, Randolph Scott played him in the film. He passed away many years ago, but his granddaughter was invited to come, and to bring with her some people who were also interested in China.

Learning of these Chinese invitations, we began our own planning. We wanted to do more than join or attend events that China was organizing. We should also go on the initiative, organizing some events in Beijing, Kunming, and Chongqing. We organized seminars using our own money. IIP provided the historian Ronald Spector as a speaker. We attached ourselves to Chinese events too, and protocol at their events required them to allow us to speak. We focused on the war for about a year and a half.

We frequently used three documentary films that had been made in World War II. We took the Frank Capra film in the "Why We Fight" series, "The Battle of China," and had it subtitled in Chinese. We did the same with "China Crisis" about the Flying Tigers and "Stilwell Road" about the war in Burma. That Captain Ronald Reagan was the film's narrator added a nice touch. We didn't do a careless subtitling. We transcribed the full texts of the narrations and had them properly translated.

We showed two of those films at the Diaoyutai State Guesthouse. There weren't any active duty PLA who attended, but among the four or five hundred who gathered to watch the film, many were retired from the PLA, generals included. Most were younger, but in the large crowd were a few old enough to remember the war. As the films ran, we could hear people saying, "Woww, I didn't know." "Stilwell!" "Flying Tigers, ooohh!" And "gosh, the Road." There's some great, wonderful footage in those films, which conveyed at first hand America in the war, and Americans losing their lives for China.

There was a woman in her 70s in front of me, and when the films ended, I asked her what she had thought. She had been a child during the war. She said, "no one has told this story for years."

Darrell Jenks and ACAO Jeff Loree showed the films to many groups, and the reactions were always positive. The films still had dramatic punch.

From Jeff Greene I learned that the combat cameraman who had made "China Crisis," Hal Geer, was living in California, still active at the age of 94. We brought him over, and he attended a public premiere of his great documentary at the National Library. After the film was shown, the Q&A could have gone on for hours.

We were on a roll with the films. Our conferences were successful too. With the mayor of Chongqing (old "Chungking") and the governor of Sichuan Province, we had the first dinner in General Stilwell's conference room in Chongqing since the war. I detached two Hump fliers from Jeff Greene's group to join the dinner, and the applause they received was quite sincere.

I gave plenty of talks, but I realized we needed something more substantive and long-lived, so I reincarnated myself as a historian for a short period of time, and I wrote a long paper that outlined American participation in the war in China. It was the first paper in a volume published by the Chinese government's World War II History Research Group.

As 2005 ended, I had a really good feeling that we had succeeded in reawakening the memories of Chinese and American cooperation during the war, putting one dent in the Chinese narrative of the war.

Q: Nobody called me to talk about my experience of watching HMS Belfast bombard Chinese positions off Chodo Island in North Korea.

BISHOP: (Laughter) Stuart, that's the wrong war! I was working on recalling the time when we were working with China, not fighting China! (Laughter)

If it helps, I've been on the decks of the HMS Belfast. It's docked in London on the Thames, a museum ship.

Q: Were there any attempts to, you know, get the veterans of the Korean War on both sides to get together?

BISHOP: Well, there wasn't anything that I was doing. I do recall that some of the World War II veterans who came out had been in the Korean War also, and Jeff Greene had helped some American aviators from the Korean War meet Chinese pilots. But in 2005, I was focused on World War II.

While we're discussing the Korean war, though, Ha Jin, the professor of English at Boston University, wrote War Trash which won the PEN Faulkner Award in 2005. It's about the Chinese prisoners in South Korea during the war. It's quite a stirring book. I read it in Beijing.

Just after reading the book, I happened to be sitting at a table at a conference next to one of the very well known CCTV talking heads, and the Korean War came up. His father had been in the Korean War, had been a prisoner of war, and was one of those who, at Panmunjom, chose for China instead of Taiwan, I learned. His father went through the years of hardship as a result of what the Party did to the former POWs after they returned.

It was more than he could stand, my CCTV friend told me, when the soldiers who had chosen to go to Taiwan came back to see their families 30 years later. They were honored by their high schools and given the red carpet treatment because they were rich. The loyal prisoners who had come back to China and had been dumped on. He was bitter about it. His father's story paralleled Ha Jin's novel.

Q: Oh, absolutely.

BISHOP: The World War II observances and events were quite satisfying. I got to see lots of China. In Weifang in Shandong Province, I met many of the men and women, then children, who had been in the Weihsien internment camp during the war with Eric Liddell and Art Hummel.

Q: The Eric Liddell who was in the movie Chariots of Fire, and the future Ambassador to China, Art Hummel?

BISHOP: Yes. And it led me to read Shantung Compound by Langdon Gilkey, one of the most profound books to come out of the war. He had been held in the Weihsien camp too.

I gave one speech in Kunming that made everybody sit up straight. Seated in the center of a large outdoor square was a group of American CBI veterans and their wives, in their 70s and 80s. The city's and the province's leadership had turned out to greet them, and in the Chinese fashion they were giving a series of speeches of welcome. Behind the veterans, in ranks, were high school students, policemen and policewomen, members of the People's Armed Police, and PLA soldiers.

When it came time for me to speak as the Embassy representative, I called on each of the groups in ranks to "listen to what I say!" The officials in line behind me definitely looked my way. "Look at these men. They have had long lives after the war. They have had careers. They have raised families. They have never forgotten China. Their experience here made them better men and better Americans." Words to this effect.

"They took care of their comrades who had setbacks after the war." And, "they voted in every election." "This is how they loved their country, by being good citizens."

I was listening to the interpreter and watching his non-verbals. Mention of an election was skating at the edge. But of course, I backed away with reassuring talk about U.S.-China friendship, about Chinese airline pilots learning flight safety from a Boeing subsidiary in Kunming. The interpreter and the officials behind me relaxed a little, but they had gotten my message about democracy. It was one of my better moments.

I'm reminded that one of the things we did to mark the 60th anniversary of the end of World War II was publish a special issue of Jiaoliu magazine. Editor Charlene Fu, a local hire American, outdid herself on the issue. She had also put together the theme issue on religion in the United States.

I can't mention Jiaoliu without mentioning, however, the end of the magazine. After the end of USIA's magazines in the 1990s, we were still publishing Jiaoliu as a one-country post publication using our own money. China with Jiaoliu and India with Span were the last two posts able to sustain single-country magazines.

Both magazines depended on locally hired editors. When the Department ended the flexibility given to posts to hire Americans locally, at an American salary, in favor of a single "Locally Engaged Staff" status that meant Americans could only be hired at FSN salaries, they grandfathered incumbent Local Hire Americans for five years. Charlene Fu was one of those affected. As the end of her five years approached, we worked with personnel to keep her on without a salary cut, to no avail. Without her, the magazine came to an end. The Bureau of Human Resources wanted to standardize hiring options and simplify things. Their one-size-fits-all ruling that ended Local Hire Americans had a toll in ending a significant publication.

Q: We haven't come to Iraq and all that, or --

BISHOP: Let me think. The initial American responses after 9/11 had taken place while I was in Nigeria. The overthrow of the Taliban also took place while I was in Africa. The invasion of Iraq and the taking of Baghdad were in the first half of 2003, when I was in my language refresher. At that time, the focus of American diplomacy was to assure that China did not veto any of the U.N. Security Council resolutions that would give us freedom of action.

One of the fundamental anchors of China's foreign policy is the principle of non-interference in the domestic affairs of other countries. Our arguments about Saddam Hussein -- he is a pretty nasty character and look what he's done to his own people -- never struck any chords in Chinese officialdom. The Embassy was always demarching the Chinese on this or that, and the Chinese surely sensed that they didn't want to challenge us on Iraq, but in the Public Affairs Section we weren't spending a lot of time defending the war.

As the "GWOT" unfolded, the Chinese found our focus on terrorism had some advantages for them. China's population included non-Han Muslims in Xinjiang province, and they could increase their control over Xinjiang's people under the terrorism rubric. They also liked our preoccupation with Iraq and Afghanistan, which give them more space to maneuver in other parts of the world.

Q: Did the fact that the Chinese were essentially bankrolling our trade with them, did that come up?

BISHOP: The direct answer is that all of us in the Embassy well understood that China's foreign currency reserves were rising and rising. And of course we realized that they were parking those reserves by buying up our Treasury notes. But while I was there, China's reserves, and ownership of our debt, were seen through the lenses of trade deficit reduction and exchange rates. We were focused -- and visiting members of Congress like Senator Schumer were focused -- on the unfairness of their pegging the yuan to the dollar so that there was never any adjustment in rates in response to the imbalance in trade.

I'd say that we weren't focused on how the level of debt might hazard the strength of our own domestic economy. That was something that became evident in 2010 and 2011, after the rapid increase in the deficit and in the amount of debt owned by China as the Administration responded to the economic crisis.

Q: Were there any events that you had to respond to? Any particular events during this time or?

BISHOP: In my first tour in Beijing there had been the bombing of the Chinese Embassy in Belgrade. I am not thinking that there was any big event like the Olympics that hit us. The pleasure of organizing the Public Diplomacy for the 2008 Olympics in Beijing fell to my successor, Don Q. Washington.

Q: Or the plane collision at --

BISHOP: Oh, no. The collision between the Chinese fighter and the U.S. P-3 Orion had happened before I arrived. The people who dealt with it were still at the Embassy and talking about it, but I had missed the event. I did, though, pay attention to how China portrayed the event.

The collision and its aftermath were quite instructive. The Chinese were lying through their teeth when they said the Orion maneuvered in order to hit the Chinese fighter. The two planes had collided because of the wild acrobatics by the Chinese pilot. Samuel Hymes said fighter pilots could be divided into two groups, the “sanes” and the “crazies.” The Chinese pilot was obviously a crazy. Rolling around the Orion at high speed, he miscalculated. He thought he would give the American crew a good scare, but instead he clipped the radome and the wing. The Chinese fighter was lost, and the pilot died. The Orion, thanks to an amazing feat of airmanship by the pilot, managed to land on Hainan Island.

The Chinese propaganda machine went into high gear. They propagated a dishonest account of the maneuvers of the two aircraft. And, in their own domestic propaganda, they also decided to portray pilot Wang Wei as brave, the best pilot that had ever flown the skies, a zealous and selfless member of the party, an exemplar for all Chinese to follow. Demonstrating this, they said that when his wife had become pregnant, the couple had had a chat, and they decided that it was not the right time in his flying career for them to have a child. So they had decided to go ahead and abort the child.

You can guess that this rather staggered me -- that a career, or perhaps the greater glory of China, justified an abortion. This was bad enough.

As I thought about it, though, the same story line told me that the Chinese who wrote out this narrative for domestic consumption had no idea for how this would be heard around the world. It reflected the isolation of the PLA. They played to a domestic audience without being aware of how controversial and heart-rending an abortion would be regarded in the United States. They didn't realize that the story that they told to their own soldiers and their own people about his great virtues would come across quite differently when it was read overseas.

Anyway, the P-3 incident was before my time.

Q: I've heard that the Chinese are becoming quite active in their own Public Diplomacy. Did you see this?

BISHOP: My counterpart in the Chinese Government was the Minister for the State Council Information Office. China's public diplomacy belonged to this Minister, Zhao Qizheng, who had a winning personality. We got to know each other when we worked together on World War II V+60 programs.

Right after I arrived, I went to the State Council for my initial call on Minister Zhao. We drove to the main entrance of his office building. I was greeted at the car by members of his staff, and they escorted me down the halls and up the elevator to the reception room near his office.

They made small talk all the way. They gave me a quick introduction to the SCIO, mentioning how it had been formed in the early 1990s. Sensing the need for China to build up its own public diplomacy, they told me, they had done a serious study of how other governments organized their information, public affairs, public diplomacy, and cultural affairs -- that bundle of different activities. The model they most admired was the U.S. Information Agency. USIA had it all down right, they told me.

When they organized the State Council Information Office, then, they largely organized it on USIA lines. Just as when USIA had been formed in the 1950s, they pulled in a mix of people, some from the Foreign Ministry, some from the PLA, a few journalists, a few cultural experts, so that the mix of people they had in the SCIO paralleled the kind of people we had in USIA.

I was feeling pretty good about the conversation, and then they said, “Of course we have heard that USIA has become part of the State Department.”

That was no secret, so I said, “yes.”

And ... they exchanged knowing glances and chuckled out loud. They were laughing, diplomatically. As if they knew how we had taken a focused, high morale Public Diplomacy organization -- one that combined “information,” public affairs and the spokesman function, with “culture,” education and exchanges – and moved it all into the State Department. They knew that if the State Council Information Office became part of the Foreign Ministry, they would soon be pulled into the Foreign Ministry’s own culture and its own sense of priorities.

As I went in to meet the Minister, just an ordinary introductory call, I couldn't shake off their laughter. They knew what USIA had been, what it had done, and they thought, these unpredictable Americans. They had a winner in USIA, and they moved it into the State Department.

Q: Did you get any idea of what the Chinese were doing in Washington at the Embassy?

BISHOP: As far as their Embassy in Washington was concerned, the answer is no. You could, however, see that China’s new public diplomacy was pulsing with the resources of money and people. Minister Zhao was doing quite a good job. China's Confucius Institutes, for instance, are equivalent to an American Corner or in some cases a USIS center. They launched those while I was in China.

For us to have a library or a permanent program space in China, we would have to run a full gamut of permissions from every part of the Party and government in China. The U.S.-China consular agreement was an obstacle. It provided for an American office in only five Chinese cities. When someone in Washington had the bright idea of American Presence Posts, the Chinese asked in Washington whether they would be allowed to open presence posts in American cities, and of course the Department’s answer was no. So the Chinese nixed American presence posts unless the consular agreement were re-opened. No one was willing to take on that porcupine.

But for the Confucius Institutes, the Chinese just called up University of Wherever and asked, “Confucian Institute, would you like to have one? If so, we can provide you with this and that.” Their public diplomacy has free rein in the United States. Ours was bounded, kept within certain bounds by Chinese Government.

They now have hundreds of journalists who work for PRC government or Party media in the U.S. Their only counterparts are two VOA correspondents in China. The Chinese never granted permission for more.

Our Center in Beijing, the American Center for Education Exchange (ACEE) had a library, and our English teaching officer, the IIE rep, and university admissions materials were there. It was, however, in the wrong part of the city, in the east on the Second Ring Road, though all the university students, the traditional Public Diplomacy audience of convenience, were in campuses in the west of the city. It would take a student a long time to get over to the ACEE from Peking University, and in the years I was there, the trip became longer and longer as the city became larger and more congested. In 2003 I could make the trip in 40 minutes in a taxi or Embassy car. (Travel options for students were slower.) By 2006 it took well more than an hour. In any case, we were inconveniently situated because the Chinese had decreed years before that diplomatic establishments could only be in the northeast quadrant of the city. It wasn't just us, it affected all the other embassies too. The Chinese had succeeded in bottling us up by allowing us to only be in certain places.

We could take a speaker out to a university, but that was not the same as having a library or center. Given the traffic, a single talk by a speaker at a university required us to set aside a whole afternoon or a whole morning.

China Central Television, CCTV, had several channels. One was CCTV-9 in English. You can see it here on cable in many areas. It's really slick. Someone who has been to China can watch a program and know what they have omitted, what they have gauzed over, but for most viewers, their presentation of programs and therefore of images of China, visions of China, is very good, and very well thought out. The State Council Information Office was working to expand reception of CCTV-9 around the world. It was clear that China was enlarging its public diplomacy presence around the world, and it's even clearer now.

If China reforms, their greater public diplomacy presence will be OK. But if the Chinese turn in troublesome directions, then their public diplomacy will be troublesome too.

For instance, American college students who go to the Confucius Centers are likely to absorb the notion that Taiwan is some kind of illegitimate hangover from the Chinese civil war, and that it really does belong to China. Even among the young Americans that I met studying language in Beijing, you could tell from their conversations that they were taking in the PRC view of Taiwan, partly because they had not been to the island to see things for themselves. China's public diplomacy would, of course, propagate the PRC's view of Taiwan as illegitimate.

Q: What was your wife doing while you were in Beijing?

BISHOP: Both during our first and second tours, Jemma was a Consular Associate. She worked in American Citizen Services, handling virtually everything -- lost passports, notarizations, reports of birth, voting, taxes, letters rogatory, disputes with local vendors, indigent Americans, "free to marry" certificates, and so on.

There were some high profile cases while she was in charge -- an American severely injured in Qinghai province, and Americans detained by North Korea. The cases involving North Korea usually involved the Swedish Embassy in Pyongyang. Sweden is the protecting power for Americans in North Korea. When a North Korean woman successfully deceived the Chinese guards and came into the Embassy, it was Jemma who was the interpreter during the several days it took to arrange for her to leave China.

Q: How did you find social life in China?

BISHOP: Although it's changed some over the years, it's harder to make Chinese friends in China than it was in Taiwan. Taiwan is sophisticated, educated, trading. In Taiwan, it's easy to have Chinese friends, and they are friends.

In China, it wasn't the same. There was always the anxiety that Americans have ulterior motives, and also that being too friendly with Americans might get me in trouble. Chinese you met in the course of your work rarely became friends. You might see certain individuals frequently -- at a Ministry, an institute, or a university -- and you could become friendly in a business way, but it didn't extend to being friendly in a personal way. So that's one thing to say.

That said, Beijing has become a great city to live in -- public events, museums, shopping, all kinds of restaurants, and sights to see -- so it's a very attractive assignment.

And when the China hands get together, the eyes water at the memory of the food.

Jemma and I continued to visit the Panjiayuan market on many Saturday mornings, and we began visiting furniture dealers on the outskirts of the city. That was one form of our recreation.

Q: Well, then you left there when?

BISHOP: Jemma and I left China in the summer of '06. And what remains before we can wrap up, then, is my going to the Pentagon and then finally Afghanistan.

Today is the 21st of March, beginning of spring 2011 with Don Bishop. And Don, where are we now?

Q: This is probably a good place for an end of tour view. Whither China? I mean its relationship with the U.S., and its own future.

BISHOP: Here's one man's sense of things.

Underlying China's economic advance in the world is a narrative. The narrative explains that China lost the preeminence it once possessed in the 1500s, 1600s, and 1700s because of the foreign imperialism of which America had been a part. China's 20th and 21st century advance, then, is only China resuming its place in the world. It's a success story, yes, but Chinese have mixed emotions about the resumption. On one hand they are gratified by China's economic recovery and prosperity. On the other hand, they haven't let go of some grudges, and the memories lead some to want to get even.

I've read enough Chinese history to know that imperialism was a factor in China's years of agony, usually counted from the Opium Wars. But it was hardly the only factor, and indeed a stronger case can be made that China's own domestic dysfunctions during the Qing dynasty contributed more. The Chinese narrative largely ignores this.

This narrative of restoration, and getting even, has been woven into the Communist Party's own narrative about Chinese history and class. So the answer to "whither China?" largely depends on how that narrative is shaped for the future.

I don't see, either on their part, or on our part, any serious attempt to change that narrative. It's clear that substantial fruits of China's growing economic power -- their holding of so much of our debt -- is financing their outsized, year after year investment of money in the PLA, the most closed and ideologized institution in Chinese society. This is going to create tension and friction for some time. All this means that China will continue to pose large challenges to our foreign policy.

Q: Do you see any potential areas of conflict? I don't necessarily mean armed conflict, but conflict with the West, or with the United States.

BISHOP: My schooling in international relations included the concept that the relationship between any two nations can be placed on spectrum of conflict, a continuum, a line between peace and war. This applies even to the relationship between the U.S. and Canada. We would place our relationship with Canada way over toward the "peace" side of the spectrum, but we have our conflict over timber exports and border trade, and there are Canadian columnists who worry about Canada being overwhelmed by its gigantic neighbor to the south.

During the Cold War, one could argue that there was "peace" between the U.S. and the Soviet Union because we did not fight one another, but who can doubt that our relationship would be marked closer to the "war" end of the spectrum -- Cold War.

Between the U.S. and China, yes, we have a "peaceful" relationship, and many areas of common interest and cooperation, but a clear look shows many conflicts too. Their intelligence services, without doubt, have launched a concerted campaign to steal our technology. It troubles me too that the Chinese have opened a cyber campaign against us. This is war behind the curtain, war that they have begun, not us.

If we speak of conflict in the geopolitical sense, the first contested area is likely to be what the Chinese call the "near seas." China wants these waters to be recognized as its maritime sphere of influence -- the Sea of Japan, all the waters along the chain of islands that we call the Pacific littoral, and then way deep down into the South China Sea to cover its island and resource claims.

We believe that anywhere outside of a country's twelve mile limit we have a complete carte blanche, a blank check, to move our power in and out. Set aside for a moment that with only 280 ships, our naval power is much diminished. Chinese zero-sum thinking about their naval domain means there are likely to be a lot of frictions over the near seas as they challenge any deployment of American power. I think their long range ambitions extend farther east into the Pacific, certainly to Guam and perhaps as far as Hawaii, believing that large Pacific areas should be acknowledged as their maritime sphere of influence.

It's not the rise of Chinese naval power, by itself, that is worrying. If China applied its growing blue water Navy to constructive use, fighting pirates in the Straits of Malacca or the Indian Ocean, getting their citizens out of Libya, sending Chinese ships and units to help neighboring countries deal with earthquakes, and so on, I'm comfortable with that. That would be win-win.

I fear, however, that the Chinese don't see it that way. Deep inside they think that -- as their power develops, ours must recede. And I think that's one of the differences in vision -- asymmetries in our visions, perhaps -- that needs to be worked through. That's why we need more dialog with China's military planners and strategic thinkers, and why it's so frustrating that China refuses our mil-to-mil proposals that would build trust.

Since a war -- a real war -- with China is unthinkable, we're going to have to do this largely with diplomacy and non-aggressive use of our military power. And our Public Diplomacy always needs to help the Chinese change their narrative.

Q: How do you see China itself? I mean looking at China, first off there's the problem of the population, far too many -- probably not enough females. But also how to keep them occupied. Plus, the fact that it is big and there's a tendency to move towards the equivalent to warlordism. And the ideology is kind of gone out of the mix, but --

BISHOP: This is several questions wrapped together.

You know from our previous conversations that I've never signed on to the concept of "overpopulation," and I believe the one-child policy violates human rights.

The Chinese, moreover, have not yet been willing to face all the issues that stem from their demographic trends. I was one of the first in the Embassy to begin talking about the imbalance between boys and girls, in our own conversations, and with Chinese. I found that Chinese were not generally aware of how large the imbalance had become. The Party, using its control of the media, doesn't admit to problems until they have figured out how to say the Party is righting the problem.

The Party has a dilemma on public discussion of population issues. They have stridently persevered in their population control policies despite public hatred of the controls, so now they can't allow discussion of the adverse social consequences of the policy, lest that discredit the entire system of Party control over Chinese society. I also found out that Chinese didn't much like to have a foreigner talk to them about it.

If each new birth cohort has from 15 to 20 percent more boys than girls, China is well into uncharted demographic, social, economic, and political territory. The full force of this imbalance has not hit China yet. Many in the unbalanced year groups are still young.

The reaction of many Chinese I talked to about the imbalance was to laugh it off. One official smilingly conjectured that girls in Taiwan would find men from the Mainland more attractive, helping reduce the imbalance. He was sitting next to me at a large banquet, so I couldn't stand up and shout out loud what a fool he was.

I suppose a sharp economist would say the official was looking for a solution that relied on "imports" of women. I'm not aware that young women in Taiwan are eager to move to the Mainland to redress the gender imbalance, and the numbers don't work out anyway, but indeed there is an "import" factor at work. There are already reports of kidnapping of girls from the near counties of Vietnam, Laos, and Burma. It has been reported that the most hazardous place for a young woman escaping from North Korea is the first five miles into China after crossing the river. It's not the threat of being caught by the police that is the hazard, it's the gangs that prey on the North Korean refugees. They let the men go, but the women are kidnapped and then sold to farmers in remote villages. (If you can't imagine that women are really sold in China, look at the photos in Nick Kristoff's and Sheryl WuDunn's book.) In any case, there aren't enough nearby extra women to supply the Chinese imbalance.

When I think about this, I think of some historic parallels. After the Chinese Exclusion Act became law in 1882, the Chinese railroad workers and cooks and laundrymen in the American west couldn't bring wives to join them. The Chinese communities in the west had real gender imbalances, too many men, too few women. Some of the old literary stereotypes, the prejudiced stereotypes, of the Chinatowns -- opium smoking, gambling, giant queue-wearing Chinese immigrants in the United States prone to drink, wielding their cleavers in any quarrel -- were rooted in the fact that the men in the culturally isolated Chinese communities in Wyoming and other areas didn't have wives to pull them into family life. So could that happen on a large scale in China?

The Party and the government know that high rates of employment are necessary for China's social stability. Especially if there's an oversupply of men, China has to provide jobs for the coming birth cohorts. That's why the Party focuses so much on the implicit deal that's been made with China's people. The Party will provide economic growth, jobs, and livelihoods as long as you, the people, don't challenge our authority and our leadership.

For years, people in the Embassy have been saying the high Chinese economic growth rates don't seem sustainable in the long run. How long can a country grow at 10 percent a year, year after year? Continued high growth has been partly attributed to the presence of large labor pools among the rural population, millions and millions of villagers willing to migrate to the cities and factories. Even though wages in Shenzhen are low, and Chinese migrants work in what we would call sweatshops, life is better there than in the villages.

There's some evidence, though, that those rural labor pools are drying up, and China can no longer rely on cheap labor for its comparative advantage. I myself am not predicting any imminent turnaround to China's economic prospects, but there are adverse trends. No doubt China's leaders lose some sleep over this. They want China to continue to grow because it is economic growth that propels its national power and enables the growth in its military power. But they lose sleep over the prospect of social instability if growth slows and unemployment rises. Social instability could undermine the "legitimacy" of the Chinese Communist Party.

As for the possibility of a new warlord era, I believe that there's a big difference between now and the 1920s and 1930s when warlordism was a factor in Chinese politics. There have been several decades of national mobilization since then. The mobilization has strengthened national identity and feeling. There was the nationalism driven into China by the Second World War, and you have all the mobilization that took place after 1949. It is now firmly fixed in the Chinese mind that China is one nation with one future and one destiny. The social power of Chinese unity is so great that I can't see a regionalized future, a warlord future, for China. This is not to say that minority peoples, in China's west, for instance, do not want more autonomy or even independence, but for Han Chinese, 91 percent of the population, I don't see warlordism as a prospect.

Q: Did you get any feel for -- I don't know, don't want to be pejorative in this -- but the lack of innovation within the Chinese economic side?

BISHOP: Well, it was commonly observed that although Taiwan is a fully trading nation, its contributions in the economic chain tend to be at the lower end because Taiwan had not developed its own brands. Perhaps Acer was the first of the Taiwan brands to be known in the international market.

The Chinese can also reference the example of South Korea. Their path to development relied heavily on the conglomerates, the chaebol, which had pluses and minuses. Taiwan with its small and medium enterprises had a higher per capital GNP than South Korea for many years, but South Korea has now pulled ahead. The Korean companies -- Samsung, LG, Hyundai -- have created well known brands, which are now their own factor in Korea's prosperity.

The PRC realizes that being an assembler or a provider of components for products that other companies design and sell under their own brands is not giving China a full share of the wealth that might come to them. So there's an effort to develop their own brands. That's just starting. They would like to increase the share of their export earnings that comes from branding, not just producing.

As for the general question of innovation, there are Chinese businessmen who make millions by copying and selling our software and other products. There's plenty of money to be made by reverse engineering. The Amcham always counseled new American firms entering China to guard the "crown jewels" of their processes, or their trade secrets, or else they will be stolen. You can take this as a lack of innovation if you want to. I frame this rather in terms of the great distance between the power of foreign brands, products, and organization, and China's. The money to be made by "copying" or theft is too great a temptation, both for the businesses and for the local governments that collect tax revenue from the Chinese companies that engage in these predatory practices.

There's another reason to hesitate about saying the Chinese as deficient in innovation. They are pioneers in some fields. In applied agricultural science, my sense is that they are quite innovative, and there will be major Chinese contributions to increasing the world's food supply. And although it's taking place behind the curtain, my guess is that the PLA and Chinese companies are leaders in certain, shall we say, troublesome software applications.

Q: My guess is that we could talk about China for several more hours, but it's probably time to wrap up your assignment.

BISHOP: Yes, China is a large topic. I'm conscious that this interview format shorts nuance and complexity. The large questions you have asked have no short answers, only long ones, and America's China hands produce long and thoughtful papers on every one. They argue all of them at seminars. Those who read these interviews may think I'm being shallow and glib. I could write out the same opinions with lengthy qualifiers and numerous footnotes, but that would take away some of the frankness I've been aiming for.

I'm being more frank than diplomatic. I'm well aware that a diplomatic career makes one very careful in word and speech, and when speaking with our foreign counterparts we particularly choose our words. If any Chinese ever get to reading these transcripts, they may feel an edge on what I've said. If they conclude that I was uninformed on this or that topic, or that I jumped to unwarranted conclusions, I'm OK with that, and I look forward to more conversations. If they conclude, though, that there's any hostility, any anti-Chinese feeling, in what I've said, they are mistaken.

Over the years I have developed a great respect and affection for China, and the entire aim of American policy must be to keep our countries at peace, so that we can in time join together in solving the world's problems. Over the years I've come to the conclusion that there is a natural affinity between American and Chinese cultures. Both of us are frank and blunt. They respect education as we do. They work as hard as we do, and the Chinese traits of business and enterprise that so awed the world in the early twentieth century are once again earning the world's respect.

I will be frank, though, that I think China was badly wounded in the twentieth century, by the death throes of the Qing dynasty, by its civil war, by the long war with Japan, and by Communism, and it still carries the scars, one of which is a reflexive suspicion of American motives. I wish it were not so.

Some of my leadership of Public Diplomacy in China supported the efforts by American administrations to bring China back into the international order as a constructive player -- things we did to support WTO initiatives, protect IPR, and so on. There was much wailing and gnashing of teeth when we pressed the Chinese on WTO, for instance, but I believe Chinese now see the benefits that flowed from their accession. Some were efforts to help China in its own acknowledged task of establishing the rule of law. Some were to recall earlier periods of cooperation between China and the U.S.

And some challenged the Chinese Communist Party's curbs on their own people -- human rights, religious liberty, and an end to population control, for instance. If reading this offends some Chinese gatekeepers, I am confident there are others in China who hope for the same changes as I do. Chinese officials fear luan (chaos) if China democratizes. I think they are wrong. They disrespect the energy, patriotism, and good sense of their own people.

DAVID J. KRAMER
Assistant Secretary for Democracy, Human Rights and Labor
Washington, DC (2008-2009)

David Kramer was born in Malden, Massachusetts in 1964. He attended Tufts (BA in Soviet Studies and political science) and Harvard (MA in Soviet Studies). He was Assistant Secretary for Democracy, Human rights and Labor 2008-2009. Mr. Kramer was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2011.

KRAMER: DRL is Democracy and Human Rights and Labor, so the old HR Bureau. I was assistant secretary so I was responsible for running the bureau. I did a good bit of traveling then. I had less than a year to do what I wanted to do so I had to cram a lot in in a very short period of time. I led the resumption of the human rights dialogue with the Chinese. I went to Beijing in May of 2008. On that same trip I went to Hanoi, did the same with the Vietnamese, traveled to the Caucasus, Azerbaijan, Armenia, Georgia, went to Ethiopia twice because of the situation there, traveled to Nigeria and the DRC, and also Guatemala, Mexico, Pakistan and India, a lot of places.

Q: OK. Let's take this time. Your time is basically limited. You traveled around. Where did you find you had a focus?

KRAMER: I spent a lot of time on China, resuming the human rights dialogue with China was very important and then the fall, after the May dialogue was also very important. I am disappointed at what little we accomplished frankly but I did spend a lot of time on that.

Q: What was the situation at that time with China?

KRAMER: Remember they were hosting the Beijing Olympics in August, 2008? George Bush had decided quite a while before he was going to attend and I think in retrospect we did not use the president's decision to go to the Olympics enough as a point of leverage to try to get the Chinese to concede on some human rights issues and release political prisoners at a minimum. China was certainly a major focus.

Q: Was this the president's decision to go to China? This was a political move.

KRAMER: The Chinese wanted him to go. The president was interested in sports. My first day on the job as assistant secretary in the Department of Human Rights and Labor, the president just coincidentally was coming over to the State Department for a briefing on three issues and one of them was about democracy and human rights. So my first day on the job I briefed the president of the United States. That's a pretty interesting way to start.

The issue of the Olympics came up and we talked about that and he asked me whether I thought he should go. I said that he should as long as we used his decision to go as a point of leverage and he agreed with that but at the end of the day we didn't succeed in doing that. There was a lot of focus on China.

Q: Were we doing much in the way of dialoging with the Chinese on human rights or was it there wasn't much conversation going on?

KRAMER: Well, the dialogue had been suspended in 2002 by one of my predecessors, Lorne Craner. It didn't resume until 2008. The dialogue, I think it is fair to say, and there is about to be another one with my successor this week with the Chinese is probably not the way to advance human rights issues with the Chinese. It is a way instead in fact for them to stovepipe and marginalize the issues outside of normal channels of interaction. I think we really have to rethink the situation with the Chinese.

Q: Is it with the Chinese as it is with the Orient, face comes up. Actually, it is true in every country but it seems to be more important. Is it that if we push the Chinese publicly then they are not going to give? Is it possible to deal sort of around?

KRAMER: I think it has to be a combination of public and private. I think private has to be strong but you need a public element to it. I understand the saving face quality or need but at the end of the day, you also have to let people inside China know that you are pushing on these issues. I don't think we did enough on that.

Q: You left there?

KRAMER: January, 2009 with the change in the administrations

BEATRICE CAMP
Consul General
Shanghai (2008-2011)

Beatrice Camp was born in Montgomery, Alabama in 1950. She has a BA from Oberlin College and joined USIA in 1983. Her overseas assignments included Beijing, Bangkok, Stockholm, Budapest, Chiang Mai, And Shanghai. Her brother, Donald Camp, and husband, David Summers, are also Foreign Service Officers. Mrs. Camp was interviewed by Mark Tauber in 2016.

CAMP: From Chiang Mai we returned to Washington for a year to rebuild the Chinese language skills we had worked so hard to acquire 25 years earlier. I had an option of studying in Taiwan but wanted to be back in DC for family reasons. Being in Washington also gave me a chance to sit in on meetings focused on trying to figure out how to handle our participation in the Shanghai Expo.

First some background on the dysfunctional way that we handle world's fairs in the modern era. Once upon a time the United States was an enthusiastic participant in international expos; we hosted a number of memorable fairs in the U.S. as well until 1984. In the old days USIA had a large exhibits office with an expo unit that designed and managed our overseas pavilions. USIA officers were assigned to work at the pavilions; for example, Bill Lenderking had a foreign service assignment as protocol officer at the 1970 Osaka fair.

Congress dealt a blow to this process when it decided to prohibit the use of appropriated funds for participation in international expos. USIA cobbled together various sources of private funding for a few more world's fairs before being folded into the State Department in 1999. At that point, the responsibility for U.S. participation in international expos was handed to ECA (Bureau of Educational and Cultural Affairs).

With no extra money or staff coming with the expo mandate, ECA has been reluctant to dive in ever since they got stuck with it. The department tried and failed to create a U.S. pavilion at the 2000 Hannover fair, then succeeded with Toyota money in Aichi, Japan five years later. Now the Chinese were putting on heavy pressure to make sure we had a presence in Shanghai in 2010.

The internal tension revolves around the fact that ECA doesn't want to participate and the regional bureau very much wants to. As the Consul General-designate in Shanghai, I knew that a decision for or against U.S. participation would have a huge impact on our relationship. I thought it was necessary to participate and figured we would eventually sign on. The question was when.

My nightmare scenario was a long-delayed decision, with Washington finally waking up in January 2010, demanding to know why we were snubbing China's big party. So I was glad to see that things were already in motion, with ECA issuing a request for proposal (RFP) in late 2006 for organizations to bid on the exclusive right to manage, design, fundraise, build, and demolish the USA pavilion.

Q: Was there a budget for it?

CAMP: No. The RFP does not come with any money.

Q: It would just be giving the official U.S. Government seal of approval to a particular agency or company?

CAMP: The chosen partner is responsible for the fundraising, as well as the design and management – even though all of this has to be approved by the State Department

ECA's 2006 RFP received two bids. The ECA panel liked the bid that came from the guy who had worked on the 2005 Aichi Expo, Doug West; he had experience. Unfortunately, West ended up withdrawing his proposal after deciding the fundraising would be too difficult. (The RFP estimated the cost "to range between $75 million to $100 million". The budget was later lowered to $60 million.)

The other bid, from a cultural attractions company called BHL, proposed asking Congress for the money, which ECA considered a no-no; the bid also failed to address other requirements laid out in the RFP. At the point where I attended my first expo discussion in fall 2007, ECA had sent BHL several letters asking for additional clarification; everyone realized this couldn't go on forever; a decision had to be made. Finally, ECA judged the proposal "not viable."

Although that seemed to be the end of the road, the ECA-led committee continued to look for ways to enable U.S. participation. An attempt to get the Commerce Department involved, a perennial move by State pointing out that world's fairs are really closer to trade fairs, failed. In spring 2008 ECA received three additional proposals; although BHL cried foul, ECA ruled it was okay because the RFP remained open.

Q: Interesting.

CAMP: The unorthodox process led to BHL's accusations that the system was rigged against them. They saw themselves as "the last ones standing", they believed they should have won the bid. This grievance, kept alive by a member of the BHL team, continued long past the Expo, generating much of the bad publicity that plagues the USA Pavilion's reputation to this day.

Complicating the situation even more, one of the partners in this new bid was married to the Deputy Assistant Secretary of the Commerce Department. The aggrieved group claimed conflict of interest; this accusation lasted throughout the Expo and years beyond. As of a few years ago, the BHL partisan was still filing Freedom of Information requests and still writing nasty articles alleging a conspiracy.

Q: Holy cow.

CAMP: But all that was still in the future. I was delighted that chances for a pavilion were still alive and enjoyed seeing the Hollywood-style presentation of one of the new bidders to EAP (Bureau of East Asian and Pacific Affairs) DAS Glyn Davies; the two representatives of Shanghai Expo 2010, flipped through story boards with gauzy comments such as "the architect won't be Frank Gehry, but it will be someone like Frank Gehry..." They got the nod.

At last we had a private-sector partner to work with, called Shanghai Expo 2010 Inc. It was led by Ellen Eliasoph, a lawyer with long China experience married to Ira Kasoff in Commerce, and Nick Winslow, whose background was in theme parks. Their original proposal focused on sports, in a bid to get money from the NBA. That didn't work.

Q: The expo itself was meant to be just sort of a cultural event or was it also designed to present participants' manufacturers or services or so on?

CAMP: When world's fairs first started in 1851, much of the focus was on countries presenting their industrial progress. Over time they became more cultural, more about nation branding, more future oriented. But all national pavilions have some commercial component.

Shanghai's theme was "Better City, Better Life", an urban focus. In addition to national pavilions, Shanghai had city pavilions and corporate pavilions; the Expo was huge and broke previous world's fair records, including number of companies participating and number of visitors.

While this slow drama was unfolding in Washington, the Chinese were pressuring us to participate. ECA's go-ahead to Nick and Ellen's proposal included an initial requirement that all the money be raised before we could sign the participation contract with the Shanghai Expo organization. This was later modified to $15 million, which still proved a high hurdle. (When the Milan Expo came around five years later, the Department set the requirement at $5 million.)

My first year at post we lurched through a series of cliff hangers as Nick and Ellen attempted to raise money and we enlisted AmCham Shanghai's help. After the sports theme fell through, Nick and Ellen came up with a different script. This new scenario was based in 2030, focused on a Chinese woman who visited the 2010 Expo as a young girl thinking about all the progress made in the two decades since. Kind of dumb.

The third and final design took visitors through several different theaters, ending with a 4D movie about a little girl who looks out at a vacant lot, dreams of creating a beautiful garden, and mobilizes her diverse community to realize her dream. While I ended up lukewarm on some parts of the pavilion, I thought the garden production was beautifully done, whimsical and effective. The 8-minute production conveyed a very American message about grassroots involvement and caring for our environment.

Meanwhile the consulate was getting a lot of flak for lack of progress, with the disgruntled BHL advocate predicting failure to anyone who would listen. Once a month AmCham hosted an evening for its members to get a briefing from and ask questions of the Consul General; these monthly sessions started to feel like a pummeling.

Meanwhile the Chinese authorities were summoning me to meetings, asking for an official decision as to whether the U.S. was going to participate. They couldn't fathom our weird way of going about creating a national pavilion.

You may recall that George Bush attended the Beijing Olympics despite calls from human rights advocates to stay away. I kept thinking it would have been a lot easier for us if the Chinese had taken advantage of his visit to extract a promise of U.S. participation in the Shanghai Expo. I don't know why Hu Jintao didn't ask him then; somehow the Chinese leadership let that opportunity slip. But when Hillary Clinton became Secretary of State and paid her first trip was to China, the pressure was on.

Q: When did you arrive in Shanghai?

CAMP: I was scheduled to arrive right after the 2008 Olympics; my predecessor Ken Jarrett wanted to stay through that event. However, my departure from DC was delayed ten days for lack of a visa. Although I had applied in July, the Chinese government had yet to approve my visa in time for my scheduled departure over a month later. David and I had packed out and moved into a hotel; every two days I rebooked our flight. To this day I don't know what the problem was, although Joe Donavan, who was headed to Hong Kong as Consul General, faced a similar situation.

After a week of delays I went to a meeting at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce about the Expo, knowing that an official from the Chinese embassy would be there. "Oh," she said, "you don't have your visa?" That ended the impasse. It was odd, and probably a good reminder that not everything that happens in China has a logical reason.

We finally arrived in early September. I became the first woman to head a U.S. Consulate in China. My welcome reception was on the day in 2008 that all the banks crashed.

Q: Oh my gosh.

CAMP: Our invitees that day included the rep from AIG, who shook my hand saying, "I work for the government now too." (On Sept 16, 2008, the U.S. government took control of American International Group Inc. as the Fed negotiated a deal to lend up to $85 billion to the insurer, giving the USG a 79.9% equity stake in the company.) The Wall Street Journal reporter showed up late for the reception; I was surprised he even had time to come.

Another seminal event during my first month was the melamine-tainted milk scandal, which killed a number of infants and sickened many more, estimated at 300,000. The corruption that led to this tragedy was instructive. Somewhere along the supply chain, perhaps starting with the farmers, milk was watered down to increase the volume. Because the reduced protein content of the watered down milk brought a lower price from the big milk companies, farmers and middle men added melamine to increase the protein content and the price.

Not only was this a tragic scandal that revealed terrifying corruption in the food supply, it also caused a run on all kinds of foreign milk powder. The resulting shortage affected our consulate staff as well. One of our management officers returning from Beijing by car made several stops to buy milk powder for concerned consulate parents.

During my first call on the city government, basically a friendly chat during which they let me know they'd been doing their research by talking about my journalist background and making a flattering comparison to Edgar Snow, the vice mayor asked me what Americans thought of China. I responded that I had watched the Beijing Olympics while still in U.S. and that the opening ceremonies had really impressed American viewers. This drew a big smile from the vice mayor. But, I continued, without really thinking, Americans were horrified by stories about babies dying because big Chinese companies had adulterated milk with melamine. Seeing his face fall made me realize that wasn't the most diplomatic thing to say, but it was probably effective in conveying both the positive and negative stories that reach the U.S.

Six months later I was shocked when melamine-tainted milk powder re-appeared on the market, after it was supposedly all destroyed. Considering that a high ranking official was executed for the first scandal, whoever put it back in circulation must have been confident that he could get away with it. Another worrisome sign of corruption in the system.

Q: Wow, interesting. How about official visitors?

CAMP: Soon after Hillary Clinton was appointed Secretary of State she traveled to Beijing; her early visit was considered a sign of the importance of the U.S.-China relationship. Reportedly this was also when she first heard about the Shanghai Expo, and the U.S. failure to sign on – which made us wonder what happened to the cables we had been sending the Department on this subject. The Chinese leadership let the Secretary know this was a priority for them, an important second act on the world stage after the Beijing Olympics. She responded with a hands-on role in fund raising, setting up the Office of Global Partnership Initiatives (S/GPI) to solicit corporate contributions.

Although Clinton wasn't coming to Shanghai on that first visit, an event we were planning at the consulate almost threw a wrench in the works. My colleagues and I had decided to host a 200th birthday party for Abraham Lincoln. Lincoln is popular in China; former President Jiang Zemin was known for quoting from the Gettysburg Address, which he had studied as a middle-school student learning English. And of course Lincoln provided us an opening to talk about “government of the people, by the people, for the people”.

With our preparations well under way, including gathering Lincoln pennies from consulate kids' piggy banks and planning a menu of Kentucky Burgoo, I got a Saturday call from the DCM asking me what the hell we were doing. Relevant authorities in Beijing had heard about our Lincoln reception, considered it suspicious, and were threatening to derail the Secretary's upcoming visit.

Q: Wow.

CAMP: I couldn't believe that Lincoln's birthday could cause such anguish, but this was China and our logic was not always their logic. On Monday I was called in by local authorities, who read me a prepared statement. The only clue to all this was a question from my phone call with the DCM, who asked me whether we had invited Liu Xiaobo, a Chinese dissident then under detention. The following year he was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize, which was strongly denounced by China. No, we didn't invite him, I said, besides, he's in jail.

When I got to the office and checked the list, I saw that we did have an invitee named Lu Xiaobo. Now in Chinese characters those names wouldn't have been confused at all; the only explanation was that somebody had provided the authorities with the English version of the guest list, leading to the mistaken conclusion that we were doing something subversive. The result was that half our guests didn't make it; they were likely told not to come or were blocked from getting to the consulate, so we had a much truncated event. It was another one of those occasions where you are left in the dark, analyzing in vain what lesson our Chinese counterparts were trying to send.

Q: Right, exactly. How would you even have imagined before the event that this could be the reason? It's such a small detail on your guest list.

CAMP: For sure, if the mix-up in names was even the reason. In fact, we had invited some dissidents with the intention of making a statement – a quiet one - about democracy and human rights. As a public diplomacy officer this was second nature; talking about Abraham Lincoln offered a good way to approach civil rights, human rights, how a society changes. But it wasn't as subversive as the Chinese chose to take it.

Q: Interesting. You mentioned being the first woman to head a U.S. consulate in China. What were the ramifications of that?

CAMP: It was somewhat humbling to find myself number 34 in a line of American Consuls General dating back to the 1860s; their imposing portraits lined the consulate entrance hall. This pantheon of male predecessors included the nephew of Abraham Lincoln's Secretary of State William Seward.

While I appreciated the honor of breaking this particular glass ceiling, the real question was why it hadn't happened earlier. And in any case, I was not alone in the Shanghai diplomatic corps. Among the 65-plus resident Consuls General I could usually count five to six other women; we organized an informal lunch group.

Still, being a female CG was useful leverage to promote women's issues and American diversity. We took advantage of this status in a couple of ways, starting with hosting an annual International Women's Day (IWD) lunch at the consulate. I found it ironic that I had first learned about this occasion in Beijing in the early 1980s. While International Women's Day was barely recognized in the U.S. at that time, women in China were given a half day off on March 8 and I joined other female diplomats at a reception in the Great Hall of the People hosted by Zhou Enlai's widow, Deng Yingchao.

Twenty-five years later IWD had become a non-political be-nice-to-women day in China while the U.S. had reclaimed its standing as the originator of this event in 1909. We marked the 100th anniversary at the consulate with a lunch for female artists, writers, and activists, taking as our theme the "Bread and Roses" message of the early U.S. labor movement. I hosted similar March 8 lunches all three years, with government officials one year and NGOs the next.

My final year, with the Shanghai Expo behind us, we launched a series of talks at universities on women's "challenges and achievements" in the United States. Audiences, mostly female, were very receptive, asking follow-up questions that revealed their own concerns. With presentations at six universities, this topic proved an effective way to reach students that didn't overly alarm the authorities.

Q: What else were you involved with?

CAMP: Shanghai was the fourth largest visa issuing post in the world, we had a huge U.S. business community. A number of U.S. state and city governments had rep offices in Shanghai and both NYU and Duke established branch campuses while I was there.

We hosted lots of official visitors; practically everybody who went to Beijing wanted to come to Shanghai as well. Our main consulate location was in a beautiful old mansion on Huaihai Lu. We opened there in 1980 after a 30-year hiatus following the Communists taking power; the U.S. had a consulate in Shanghai for nearly 100 years before 1950.

We started to outgrow the mansion in the early 1990s and by 2008 had offices scattered in three locations. Public Affairs, Consular, Foreign Commercial Service (FCS), and the Foreign Agricultural Service (FAS) were located at the Ritz Carlton, the Portman Building, which also housed the Marines.

The Food and Drug Administration (FDA) joined us in 2010, as FDA established its first overseas offices amidst growing concern about contaminated food (including pet food items) and pharmaceuticals entering the U.S. from abroad. A Federal Aviation Administration (FAA) representative based in Shanghai kept tabs on the development of a Chinese-manufactured jet, a step-by-step testing process required in order for the FAA to give approval for a new plane's use in the U.S. We also had reps from the Department of Homeland Security monitoring container security at the port of Shanghai.

The Environmental Protection Agency, while it didn't have an office in China, was working closely with the Shanghai EPA on air quality monitoring.

And as an example of the kind of scientific cooperation that was going on, our district included the Hefei Institute of Plasma Physics in the Chinese Academy of Sciences, which was working with the Energy Department's Princeton Plasma Physics Laboratory on fusion reaction. Given our export controls regime, I was surprised to learn about the collaborative research being done by these high level research institutions. All the more depressing then to hear the head of the Hefei lab, who had studied at Princeton, describe his problems getting a visa to attend a scientific conference in the U.S. There was nothing we could do to speed up the process, as his background required a special review in Washington.

A number of U.S. businesses were operating research and development facilities in Shanghai, including one run by GE where we regularly took visitors.

Q: You must have had a very large level of management issues. Were the USG offices managed with a common general services office (GSO) or was each agency separately responsible?

CAMP: Under ICASS (International Cooperative Administrative Support Services), every USG agency at the consulate had to sign on to certain core services and then opt in or out on other services, such as the motor pool. Our management office helped find office space for each of these agencies, all of whom needed a waiver to be located outside the consulate grounds.

Among the non-State agencies, Commerce and Ag were the largest and worked most closely with the consulate. FCS Shanghai had five commercial officers, an exceptionally large presence that testified to the importance of Shanghai for U.S. businesses.

Q: Remarkable.

CAMP: FAS Shanghai had two foreign agricultural officers, running what Ag calls an agricultural trade office. Although we have a trade deficit with China, our Ag attaché frequently reminded us that we have a trade surplus in agricultural goods. They buy corn. They buy soybeans.

Q: Pork if I remember right.

CAMP: Pork, yes. In fact, China actually bought the company - Smithfield - after I left.

The American business community was enormous. As Shanghai AmCham membership grew, I was asked to present a plaque to the 4,000th member. Remarkable, considering that less than 30 years earlier a single lonely American business man showed up at the newly opened consulate seeking an invitation to the diplomatic happy hour, according to Don Anderson, who re-opened the U.S. consulate in 1980 after a 30-year hiatus.

The way Don told the story, he and one secretary were first located in the Jinjiang Hotel, where they had established a Friday afternoon happy hour with the Brits and the Australians. One Friday an American showed up saying “I’ve just arrived, I’m an American businessman, I don’t know anybody, can I come to the happy hour?” I was told that the AmCham actually started in the living room of the consul general, now the main reception room in the consulate office building.

One of the perks for AmCham members was a monthly meeting with the Consul General, during which I would review various developments and then answer questions. These often focused on American Citizen Services issues, such as visas, hospitals, schools, or dealing with the Chinese bureaucracy. The Expo, and concern over whether the U.S. would participate, started to overwhelm this question time and make it much more contentious.

We were also blessed with a large number of entry level officers, a result of Shanghai’s status as the fourth largest visa issuing post in the world. Many were outstanding officers; a number are now already on their second China assignments. Despite the heavy visa load we did a pretty good job of rotating them into other sections of the consulate. During the six months of the Expo they provided invaluable help with our constant stream of visitors.

Q: Now as junior officers did they interview in Chinese? Typically, junior officers only get six months of language.

CAMP: They all received Chinese language training, usually one year. We also had our own training program at post, to make sure they got the visa interview language that FSI didn’t always provide. I enjoyed working with them and knowing that they were the core of our future China cadre.

Q: And while a consular officer has a relatively limited number of questions and a relatively limited kind of conversation the individual on the other side could start talking about anything.

CAMP: And not all applicants spoke standard Mandarin. Visa officers would sometimes have to call on our local employees for help. Some new officers came in with Chinese skills under the Critical Needs Language Program, which provides extra points for Mandarin. Ironically, many of the people who entered the foreign service with good Chinese language skills were blocked by Diplomatic Security (DS) from serving in the country.

I saw several frustrating cases in which a first tour officer was assigned to China and then disapproved by DS. Having relatives in China was generally a game-stopper, because of blackmail and conflict of interest concerns. The problem was a lack of consistency. My predecessor Ken Jarrett was married to a woman who was born and raised in Shanghai and had relatives there, yet Ken managed to make a whole career in China. It was hard to know what DS would approve and what they wouldn't, which naturally provoked anger and frustration.

We had some terrific officers, with lots of China experience. One of the joys of being in China was continued growth in staff and resources, something I had not experienced at previous posts. Staffing cuts are more often the norm at other places during my career.

Personnel issues are never far away, however. One involved our campaign for a deputy CG position; it didn't make sense that every embassy, no matter how small, has a DCM, while a consulate with 70 direct hire Americans doesn't. I was grateful that my predecessor had worked out a sort of unofficial deputy position, which I tried to get formalized. I succeeded in getting an informal recommendation for the position into the 2010 inspection report, but EAP/EX was opposed and nothing changed.

Q: Very interesting.

CAMP: Another position that diverged from the description on the bid list was our Nanjing Presence Post officer. American Presence Posts (APPs) are usually one-officer posts, doing primarily commercial work.

Q: Yes. Totally unclassified.

CAMP: As embassies have gotten larger, more sclerotic, and more fortress-like, the idea of a lean diplomatic presence outside the capital was very attractive. The model was first used in France, which still hosts the bulk of these APPs; given security concerns, however, they haven't proved easy to establish.

At the height of their appeal, the department decided to assign an officer to set up an APP in Nanjing, an important educational and commercial city a few hours drive from Shanghai. (New high speed trains have since reduced the travel time to 67 minutes.) After the position was filled, the Chinese said no to having an officer resident in Nanjing. Unless we established an official post, they wouldn't allow us to put a diplomat there.

Q: And this was simply because they were very officious in general or was it a reciprocity issue?

CAMP: Partly reciprocity. Under a 1981 agreement, both governments were allowed five consulates in the other country. The Chinese had opened their five - New York, Chicago, San Francisco, LA and Houston - while we had only four. Shanghai and Guangzhou were our first, in 1979 and 1980. We opened Shenyang and Chengdu about four years later. A U.S. consulate in Wuhan was to be our fifth but we never moved ahead, covering central China from Beijing instead.

Q: Do you know the reason?

CAMP: Money mainly. And the embassy conducted a survey to show that visa demand in the area was low, and could easily be handled Beijing. This didn't make sense to us in Shanghai, where we were struggling to keep up with visa applications. The department finally took a half-step in 2007, following the APP model by sending retired USIA officer Wendy Lyle to Wuhan. Wendy was famous in China for her English language teaching program on VOA; she reported that taxi drivers recognized her voice from the years of radio broadcasts

Q: Oh so it did open.

CAMP: We officially opened the consulate in November 2008, nearly a year after Wendy arrived. Even once Wuhan had the status of consulate, Wendy worked alone, out of an apartment. This ad hoc arrangement went on through several officer rotations, with Wuhan authorities regularly hectoring the resident American that their first priority for the consulate was to issue visas. It was several more years before we added staff; as of 2016 the consulate still wasn't processing visas however.

But back to Nanjing, a post there wasn't part of the 1981 five-consulate bargain, plus the Chinese authorities refused to accredit a diplomat to a facility that lacked diplomatic status. The officer assigned, Chris Wurzel, stayed in Shanghai, heading an office of one that we grandly named the Outreach Unit.

Embassy Beijing was emphasizing outreach to other cities – still calling them APPs even though no one resided in the designated cities. We came up with a slightly different approach in Shanghai, where we created a team for each of our three provinces, with the Outreach Unit Chief in overall charge. The team leaders were political or econ officers; we included commercial and consular officers as well, and gave our entry level officers a chance to travel and work with experienced officers in various cones.

When I visited one of the three provincial capitals in our district I would introduce the team leader by noting that if we had a consulate in Anhui (or Nanjing or Hangzhou), this officer would be the Consul General. The provincial officials liked the sound of that, and liked having a designated contact point at Consulate Shanghai. Although this was not the way the Nanjing position was described on the bid list, I was happy with our adaptation. You manage with the personnel system that you get, explaining to bidders that the job isn't necessarily what the HR system puts on paper.

Q: Yes.

CAMP: As for the Expo, we finally got ECA to modify the requirement they'd set to raise the entire amount before we could sign a participation agreement, an impossible task. (The original budget was $80 million, later revised down to $60 million.) By mid-2009 the private sector partner had raised $15 million, allowing us to sign the participation contract in July 2009.

Q: One year away.

CAMP: Less than a year before the opening. We were reported to be the last country to sign out of 185. Although I recall Malta signed after we did, our long procrastination consolidated a reputation for the U.S. being late, a meme that persisted through the next big world's fair in Milan.

Another big, if late, step was Secretary Clinton's appointment of Jose Villarreal as our Commissioner General, an unpaid position that oversees the national effort. Jose initially struck us as a counter-intuitive choice for China – he was a Hispanic lawyer from Texas with no China experience.

We soon realized how lucky we were with this brilliant choice. Jose was closely connected to the Clintons and proved a great fundraiser as well as a great manager – and an all-round mensch. Although a prominent Chinese-American had seemed a more likely choice, it might have put us in the cross fires of the divisions in that community. We did work with the Committee of 100, which includes such figures as I.M Pei and Maya Lin.

Also key to our efforts was Hillary Clinton's new Global Partnerships Initiative (S/GPI) office in Washington, first headed by Elizabeth Bagley and then by Kris Balderston. Kris spent probably 99 percent of his time on the Shanghai Expo.

Q: Absolutely believable with only one year out.

CAMP: Finally some companies started coming in with $5 million contributions. On July 1, 2009, the day Jose became Commissioner General, Pepsi announced a $5 million sponsorship at a press conference in Beijing led by Indra Nooyi, the head of Pepsi. We were on our way. What I didn't realize at that point was that Pepsi's money had put us in the middle of the cola wars.

Q: Oh no.

CAMP: Five years later something similar happened in Milan. Coke turned us down at both Expos; they chose to build their own separate Coca-Cola pavilions in both Shanghai and Milan, at much greater cost than a $5 million donation to the USA Pavilion. In Shanghai I think they spent $40-$50 million on their pavilion; they also contributed to the overall Expo, becoming the exclusive supplier of soft drinks at the expo. GM and Cisco built their own corporate pavilions as well, which took them off the board as contributors for us.

When Hillary Clinton accompanied President Obama to Shanghai in November 2009, we arranged a press event with her at the pavilion building site, which was a muddy mess in the rain. In our efforts to make it look colorful, we hung up big Pepsi banners, raising the ire of Coke, which had exclusive rights inside the Expo - except at the USA Pavilion.

Later, during the Expo, a Coke rep complained to us that the USA Pavilion was the only place in the entire Expo where you couldn't buy a Coke. That's really a shame, we agreed, adding to ourselves: you should have thought of that. They could have built their own pavilion AND given us money; instead we were strictly a Pepsi products place.

Q: So just to clarify you were getting good turnout of companies but not necessarily donations for the USA pavilion specifically.

CAMP: Pepsi sponsored our pavilion to the tune of $5 million. Although the three U.S. corporations that funded their own pavilions did not contribute to us, other major companies did; we ended up with 60 sponsors at different value levels, with several at the $5 million mark.

Q: That is remarkable in the two-year period, and particularly in the last year, to reach your goal.

CAMP: It was a squeaker; we had to stay optimistic in public – especially in my monthly AmCham remarks – but concerns about meeting the goal were always a dark cloud over our heads. Another complication was TARP (Troubled Asset Relief Program); we couldn't take money from any company that was receiving TARP funds after the 2008 economic collapse. I have a vivid memory of the April 2010 press conference when Citi Group pledged $5 million, immediately after getting out from under TARP. That put us over the top two weeks before the pavilion opened.

We were all cheering. Of course by that time the pavilion was mostly built but the budget also included expenses for running the pavilion during the six-month expo.

Q: Absolutely. And all kinds of unanticipated expenses too.

CAMP: Especially because the later you start the more expensive everything becomes as well.

CAMP: Aside from fundraising, we had many other hurdles, sometimes created by folks in the department who were trying to parse the law restricting the use of appropriated funds for world's fairs. Given those restrictions, and the sometimes strict interpretation in Washington, I was ecstatic when the department lawyers approved our proposal to double hat our Public Affairs Officer, Tom Cooney, as Deputy Commissioner General.

Tom was invaluable to the success of our effort, along with another PD officer, Alys Spensley. After finishing her CAO assignment in Shanghai, Alys stayed on a Y tour (one year temporary) to serve as the Consulate Expo Liaison Officer, or CELO, a title we made up. I don't think either Tom or Alys took a day off for the entire six months of the Expo; the work was relentless.

Five years later when I was helping coordinate the Milan Expo, Consulate Milan had to make do with a single person handling what Tom and Alys juggled in Shanghai. They worked their butts off; it was the two of them who really made it happen because they kept on top of everything, including liaison with the Expo bureau, the private sector partner, the Commissioner General, our business supporters, VIP visits, the whole shebang.

One major component of our pavilion, probably the most popular, was the Student Ambassador program. These 160 young Americans fluent in Chinese were following in the footsteps of the former USIA Russian Guides Program, although we were the first to call them student ambassadors. The program was managed by the University of Southern California, which did the selection from Mandarin speaking applicants. Some spoke other forms of Chinese as well – Cantonese, Shanghaiese, Sichuanese – a nice unexpected bonus.

Q: These were all students at USC?

CAMP: No; USC had the contract to select them with the stipulation that the students come from as many different states and universities as possible.

Q: Okay. And these youth ambassadors received a stipend?

CAMP: They got housing and some food money and a stipend. The 160 students were divided into two groups of 80 who served for three months, half of the Expo. Overall they were excellent, although dealing with a large cohort of 20-year-olds takes hands-on management.

Before, during, and even after the Expo we were under a lot of criticism, much of it coming from a man named Bob Jacobson; he represented the BHL group whose proposal ECA had judged non-viable. Jacobson took every opportunity to attack the pavilion, charging that the U.S. was late, the pavilion was ugly, the cost was too high. My personal favorite was a blog in which Tom Cooney was described as my “henchman”; Tom was less amused.

Jacobson’s smack talk was echoed by a freelance journalist in Shanghai, Adam Minter; the two of them would bounce accusations back and forth, citing each other. We felt constantly under siege.

Given this concern, it didn’t help when one of the incoming student ambassadors blogged before arrival that the pre-Expo training arranged by USC was a joke; he called the reading list junior high-level. I insisted on bringing them for a briefing at the consulate in the hope that our historic building, the flag, and the picture of the president, would impress upon these kids their role in representing the United States to an expected 6 million visitors. We set up a panel of embassy officers, which I kicked off by drawing parallels with the Russian guides in USIA exhibition days, many of whom went on to join the foreign service. I emphasized that they were part of a great tradition and they had to take it seriously.

I pointed out that for anyone interested in a Foreign Service career, this was a wonderful gateway and noted that the Russian guide program had produced at least four ambassadors. As it turned out, they were less impressed by the career potential than by the story of former guide Tom Robertson (later ambassador) who met his wife through his guide service. That got their attention – the romantic aspect - although in fact a number of the Shanghai students have already gone on to State Department careers.

I think that helped a bit; overall the experience was great; they were stars at the pavilion. But any time you're dealing with that many young people in a foreign country you're bound to have problems.

Q: And they're not U.S. Government employees and they don't know the State Department corporate culture and so on and so on.

CAMP: Five years later some of these same problems cropped up at the Milan Expo. Nevertheless it's a great program, with the students contributing creativity and enthusiasm to our participation. In Shanghai, where we had very long lines to enter the pavilion, the students would walk down the queue and talk to people. Many of the Chinese visitors had never met an American in person before; they were thrilled to make the acquaintance of one speaking fluent Chinese. Hillary Clinton gives a shout-out to the student ambassadors in her book Hard Choices. They were terrific.

Q: That's worth its weight in gold.

CAMP: They played crucial roles in staffing our pavilion. After standing in line for as much as two hours, visitors would rush in through the turnstiles, relieved to be inside at last; our good air conditioning also helped. As they gathered in the intro theater, a student ambassador standing on a soap box would warm up the crowd: "Anybody here from Guangzhou?" It had the feel of an American football game; people would yell back answers. "Anybody here from Sichuan?" Sometimes the students would use Cantonese or Sichuanese as well as Mandarin. They also told corny jokes, puns, such as "shenme ma bu neng qi?" – "what horse can't be ridden?" The answer, Ao ba ma, was a pun on Obama's name in Chinese, which includes the character for horse.

The pavilion itself was set up as a series of theaters. The first room featured videos with different Americans, including celebrities such as Michelle Kwan and Kobe Bryant as well as ordinary people, trying to say welcome in Chinese. Our critics made fun of this - is this how we introduce America? But the Chinese visitors liked it.

Q: Who made the movie?

CAMP: Our private sector partner contracted with a company called BRC to do the videos; they also created the show for the GM pavilion in Shanghai and, five years later, the EU pavilion in Milan. They're now part of the U.S. team for the Astana Expo in 2017.

The second theater featured feel-good corporate messages mixed in with children saying things such as "if we all help in little ways, it becomes big ways..." That was my least favorite segment; I still cringe at hearing those sappy sentiments so many times.

The high point of that second theater was a video message from President Obama, which generated a lot of people trying to take selfies with the screen. The final, and to my mind best, presentation was a 4D video called “The Garden”, about a little girl who mobilizes her community to turn a vacant lot into a garden. The message was subtly subversive in a society where most decisions are made at the top, and the visitors loved the 4D thunder and rain. Many brought umbrellas that they opened at the right time, Rocky Horror Show-style.

Q: As long as it worked...

CAMP: “The Garden” definitely grabbed viewers; I think it worked well. And overall, Chinese reactions to our pavilion were good – we asked Fudan University to survey visitors – and the Chinese press was very positive. Americans were less enthusiastic. When asked for her reaction, Clinton famously, and unfortunately, responded with a flat “it’s fine”.

The shows were just one aspect of our participation. We had a VIP room for important visitors, including many Chinese and foreign government officials as well as top sponsors. Depending on contribution levels, sponsors had the right to use the upstairs area of the pavilion for events. For example, GE, which featured its healthcare division, had a banquet for hospital directors. Walmart used the space for environmental programs with students.

The Foreign Agricultural Service celebrated American Food Day by passing out California almonds to people waiting in line - that was very popular. FAS also hosted a dinner at the pavilion, where I sat with all the nut people - the pistachios, the almonds.

Q: Does China grow nuts?

CAMP: Not much, which makes it a good market for us. The FAS presence in Shanghai is an Agricultural Trade Office, which promotes U.S. agricultural products in China. There were many commercial aspects to our Expo presence; the Commerce Department was involved as well. In fact, then-Commerce Secretary (later Ambassador to China) Gary Locke presided at our groundbreaking ceremony in 2009.

On the U.S. side, most Americans were totally unaware of the Shanghai Expo, or our official presence. The New York Times correspondent based in Shanghai told me that once the U.S. agreed to participate, the story was no longer of interest to his editors.

The Times considered it newsworthy only if we snubbed the Chinese by staying out. Once we said yes, the story was dead. Most Americans had no idea this world’s fair was going on in Shanghai. And yet, over six months the Expo attracted a record 73 million visitors. Our USA Pavilion drew 7.3 million, 10 percent of all visitors. Despite those staggering figures, most Americans didn’t know about it and most of the State Department didn’t either.

Q: Very true.

CAMP: I was fascinated to see references to the Expo turn up in several of the Clinton emails released in 2015. Her role in helping fundraise became part of the larger criticism of her wooing big corporations. One of the releases showed an email chain that started with PAO Tom Cooney forwarding a negative blog by freelance journalist Adam Minter to Commissioner General Jose Villarreal, who sent it to Cheryl Mills. Mills sent it to the Secretary, whose comment is redacted. I'd love to know what she responded.

Q: How long was the Expo?

CAMP: Six months. May 1 to October 31, 2010.

It opened with great ceremony and a tremendous fireworks display. That was preceded by a soft opening, during which we received a visit from President Hu Jintao, who took pictures with the student ambassadors. I was pleased when Wang Qishan, who chaired the economic dialogue with the U.S., drew Hu's attention to the display highlighting U.S. corporations who were our sponsors. That was a story worth repeating to our corporate partners.

Hillary Clinton, who gave remarks at the building site in 2009, came back during the Expo. We also hosted three other cabinet level officers, plus members of Congress, top CEOs, mayors, and governors. When Mayor Daley brought a trade delegation, we surrounded him with all the Chicago-area student ambassadors wearing Chicago t-shirts. Governor Schwarzenegger needed no extra hype from us; he was mobbed everywhere. From local officials to mayors to governors, they all took advantage of their Expo visits to promote commercial ties with China.

In advance of Secretary Clinton's visit, which was to include a banquet at the USA Pavilion, her staff asked us to recommend other pavilions for her to visit. Our pavilion was located with other western hemisphere countries, making Mexico or Canada good possibilities. Or why not combine India and Pakistan? Or Turkey and Greece? What a great opportunity to make a diplomatic gesture with a 15-minute visit.

To evaluate these possibilities we sent officers around incognito, like secret shoppers. to check out which pavilions might work best logistically as well as politically. As we did this, other pavilion directors were catching on that something might be up, resulting in calls from their Consuls General asking whether they should alert their Ambassadors to be present.

Q: Wonderful.

CAMP: This exercise became a headache as the visit grew closer with no decision from the Secretary's staff. When her plane landed in Shanghai, we still didn't know what she would do between the morning visits to the USA and China pavilions and the evening banquet. We remained in suspense through lunch, which was hosted by the Mayor of Shanghai. The upshot was no visits; she got in the car and returned to the hotel. We did find out that our various recommendations had been read, however, as staffers who stayed behind asked us to arrange afternoon visits for them.

Q: It seems to be just her modus operandi.

CAMP: Indra Nooyi, other CEOs, and a number of other people came to the banquet. We had to close the pavilion for half a day in order to stage the dinner there.

Leaving aside the Expo, there was lots more going on in Shanghai during my three years. President Obama's 2009 visit, the H1N1 epidemic, trade issues, U.S. universities establishing campuses in Shanghai, the 30th anniversary of the reopening of the consulate, extended outreach to provincial officials, a huge visa load, and double digit annual growth in demand for American citizen services.

President Obama made his first visit to China in November 2009; Shanghai was his first stop in the country, which ended up causing some problems. The Chinese would have preferred he start in Beijing.

Q: I'm sure.

CAMP: They wanted it to echo Reagan's visit in 1984 or Clinton's visit in 1998. Both went to Beijing before coming to Shanghai, where both addressed students at Fudan University.

The Obama White House plan mandated a town hall meeting, the type of event they knew and liked from the campaign. They envisioned a town hall in Shanghai with the President alone on the stage. The Chinese, however, wanted him to speak at Fudan University, and they wanted him to be introduced by the university president.

The concept of a town hall meeting, with the President speaking directly to the people, didn't sit well with the Chinese. We had arguments over every aspect of the White House plan. Where the event would take place. The height of the platform. Who would do the introduction. What podium to use. The guest list. We finally settled on the Museum of Science and Technology.

The White House insisted on a student audience and we at the consulate had a list of specific students we wanted included. However our local Chinese contacts said they couldn't find these people – "You know there are a lot of people named Wang in China." "But we gave you the email addresses," we retorted.

It was a fight every step of the way, with the Chinese always insisting "this is the way we did it in 1998". I don't know whether they actually kept good records or they were bluffing. In any case, it was clear that our side didn't have reliable accounts of past visit procedures. The Chinese were withholding access pins for the hotel where the President would be staying; during a meeting a few days before the POTUS arrival we declared we weren't leaving until they handed over the pins.

Obama landed at Shanghai's Pudong Airport at night in the driving rain. Although the poor visibility deprived us of the sight of Air Force One landing at Shanghai, the money shot was Obama walking down the steps from the plane carrying his own umbrella.

The photo went viral; it was seen as a telling contrast to Chinese officials who usually have someone holding an umbrella for them. Everybody else on the plane must have come down the backstairs because he was all by himself, which made for a stunning image. My own rain-soaked image was less appealing, as I realized when the President reached me in the receiving line. "I should give you my umbrella," he said, which, although sweet, made me painfully aware I looked like a drowned rat.

After the President's motorcade drove off, I went back into the terminal to wait for the Secretary's plane, which arrived close to midnight. She was scheduled to visit the Expo site early the next day, which meant, of course that we had to get out there even earlier. Media had to be in place by 6:00 a.m., at a cold, muddy building site with no shelter available from the rain.

The Secretary went in her own car, accompanied only by her assistant Huma Abedin, giving us no chance to brief her about the Expo. I was in the van with the Commissioner General, Jose Villarreal, who got a phone call telling him that the Secretary would carry her own umbrella. That was our cue to follow suit, aided by a stash of 20 umbrellas we found in the van. It's times like this that you really appreciate great staff who had thought of such details.

At the site, Clinton gave a rousing speech, proclaiming we would have a great pavilion, even if she had to "build it myself, brick by brick". As late as it was, only five months before opening day, Clinton's strong support and enthusiasm were key to our eventual fundraising success.

After the Expo event with the Secretary, we rejoined the President for a meet and greet with consulate staff and an elaborate lunch hosted by the Mayor of Shanghai. In best Chinese banquet style, the food for every dish was shaped into a picture, such as a palm tree or a panda. We each had menus embroidered double sided on small Chinese screens to take home as souvenirs.

Q: Wow.

CAMP: The formal meeting between the President and the Mayor came before the lunch. Ambassador Huntsman was there and the White House staff. Now less than two hours before the town hall meeting, we still hadn't received Chinese agreement on using the White House podium. So when I received a phone call from the DCM during the presidential meeting, I answered it, despite recognizing this was a huge no-no. Although I limited myself to monosyllabic responses as the DCM explained the podium compromise, the White House staffer taking notes kept glaring at me. I felt my career melting away.

The DCM told me the stand-off was resolved by a Chinese promise to broadcast the President's speech if we used their podium, rather than the one that came on Air Force One. The embassy accepted the compromise and we used the Chinese podium. They did not broadcast the speech.

Our partial comeback, later, was to print pamphlets of the speech. With Obama on the cover, these became very popular giveaways, much sought out by students during our university visits.

Q: That's a brilliant alternative.

CAMP: In another compromise, the president of Fudan University gave a short introduction standing beside Obama, then left the stage. Ambassador Huntsman, who speaks Mandarin and had taken the time to learn a bit of Shanghai dialect, whispered in the President's ear and the President greeted everybody in Shanghai dialect.

Q: Holy cow.

CAMP: Huntsman sat down, leaving Obama alone on the platform (the height of which we had also had to negotiate), as per the White House scenario. The student questions following the President's remarks were innocuous, but we'd arranged also to take questions that came in online. That turned out to be very clever.

Huntsman, who was reading the online questions, picked one about China's "great firewall" censorship. This question provided the President the opportunity to talk about the free flow of information and gave the event some substance. Of course the international press picked up the story that the students that we wanted invited were not allowed in. They used words such as "docile" and "handpicked" to describe the audience, but overall the event and the coverage were positive. And then the President flew off to Beijing for the rest of the visit.

Q: Did you ever find out why they decided to go to Shanghai first?

CAMP: Given the way the White House handled it they might have wanted to emphasize people-to-people diplomacy over the more formal kind. Or maybe they wanted him to have a day to adjust before meeting the leaders in Beijing.

Q: It could easily have been simply the route, the timing for the president's sleep, who knows.

CAMP: It probably made sense to get on the ground and have a softer start before Obama met for the first time with Hu Jintao. I don't remember the issue being discussed when I flew to Beijing for the initial embassy prep meeting about the upcoming visit.

When we first heard that President Obama was coming to China, I was acutely aware that my last presidential visit in China was Reagan's in 1984. That 25-year-old experience seemed so ancient that I was reluctant to cite it. My hesitation evaporated when Ambassador Huntsman led off that first planning meeting in Beijing by talking about being a young staffer on the 1984 Reagan visit, which immediately put me on familiar ground. I never had the nerve to ask Huntsman if he was the neophyte staffer who bragged about putting all his files on his newly acquired laptop computer, which then got fried when plugged into the 220 current in Beijing.

Q: Amazing.

CAMP: Given how many disputes we had with the Chinese, and their interest in precedents from earlier visits, we did a lessons learned cable from the trip. Obama's been back to China since and I have no idea whether our 2009 lessons were put to any use, but journalists seem to have longer memories. When Obama was reportedly snubbed by the Chinese after landing in Hangzhou for the September 2016 G20 meeting, one story noted "it was reminiscent of the rough treatment he received on his first trip to China, in 2009. Then the Chinese refused to broadcast on state television a town-hall-style meeting; packed the hall with Communist Party loyalists; and censored an interview he gave to a Chinese publication. At the time, many viewed the treatment as a metaphor for a rising power flexing its muscles with a young president from a superpower in decline."

Q: Of course the problem with lessons learned is that every president does it differently.

CAMP: But the thing with the Chinese is that they use supposed precedents to push for their desired outcome.

Q: I see what you mean.

CAMP: While some of the details seem like one-time-only arrangements, I can imagine future Chinese officials arguing “in 2009 we used our podium” or “in 2009 we didn’t broadcast the President’s speech.” Will my successor or his successor be able to respond “yes, but you double crossed us on the broadcast”? Is that now in the records at the embassy or the consulate? I’m sure there are people who remember, but you know how the past slips from our consciousness.

Q: yes, yes.

CAMP: And speaking of history, one of our most memorable events involved the return to China of the ashes of John Leighton Stuart, who was the U.S. Ambassador in Nanjing when relations were broken in 1949. Born in China, the son of missionaries, and founder of Yenching University, Stuart was our last Ambassador on the Mainland until 1979, 30 years after his departure.

Stuart’s name is well-known in China, thanks to a famous essay by Mao Zedong read by school children titled: “Farewell, Leighton Stuart!”, basically saying good riddance to Stuart’s departure.

I received an email from Pat Kennedy, Under Secretary for Management, informing me that the ashes were being shipped in the classified pouch from Washington. (This alert did not spare me a moment of confusion when our communicator informed me later, “I have the Ambassador in the vault.”)

The back story was that Stuart, who died in 1962, had asked that his remains be buried in China alongside his wife’s grave at Yenching University, now the site of Beijing University.

The effort to have Stuart’s remains interred in China was led initially by his long-time assistant, Philip Fugh, followed by Philip’s son John Fugh. John Fugh, the first U.S. general of Asian descent, finally reached a break through after a meeting with Politburo member and later president of China Xi Jinping, who had been party boss in Zhejiang Province 2002-2007. While a Beijing burial was out of the question – and Mrs. Stuart’s grave had long since been obliterated – Gen Fugh obtained permission for burial in Hangzhou, capital of Zhejiang Province and Stuart’s birthplace.

Most of this I learned in the van taking me, my husband, General Fugh, and his wife June Fugh to Hangzhou, along with the box containing Ambassador Stuart’s ashes. Along the way we also learned that the very companionable June Fugh, who seemed oddly familiar to us, was the sister of longtime broadcaster Connie Chung, with her own fascinating family tale.

Ambassador Randt flew from Beijing to Hangzhou for the interment, which took place at a new official cemetery outside of the city.

At Stuart's gravesite we were startled to hear from somewhere behind us "Amazing Grace" followed by the "Star Spangled Banner"; a group of elderly Yenjing grads revealed after the ceremony that they had hidden a tape recorder in the bushes, figuring correctly that the Hangzhou waiban (Foreign Affairs Office) would not provide any musical accompaniment.

Like Pearl Buck's home in Zhenjiang, the childhood home of the once-reviled John Leighton Stuart has now been turned into a museum. It is even marked on Hangzhou tourist maps.

As a side note, we noticed nearby the grave of the Chinese fighter pilot, Lt. Cdr. Wang Wei, who died after colliding with an American EP-3 in 2001. The American crew members were forced to make an emergency landing on Hainan; Wang Wei's body was never found. We had no way of knowing whether the Chinese decision to place Ambassador Stuart near a military officer honored as "Guardian of Territorial Airspace and Waters" was coincidental or not.

Q: And that was during your first year as Consul General.

CAMP: Ambassador Stuart's ashes, the President's visit, our Lincoln's birthday confrontation, and the H1N1 outbreak were all during my first year. The visit and event schedule intensified once the Expo opened in May 2010, giving me the opportunity to greet not only President Hu Jintao but probably every provincial party secretary in the country. With military relations frozen because of PRC anger over arms sales to Taiwan, our Expo pavilion was one of the few USG sites visited by high ranking Chinese military officials. Although they frequently wouldn't identify themselves – "sorry, I don't have a card" - we would ask them to sign the guestbook and sometimes then we would see who it was.

Among many notable Chinese visitors, the prize was probably Bo Xilai, the Chongqing party secretary who was later jailed for corruption along with his wife. In 2010 he was a hot ticket for the dinners that AmCham Shanghai arranged during the Expo for members to rub shoulders with notable provincial officials or heads of American corporations.

The AmCham dinner card for Bo Xilai filled up quickly; Chongqing was a prime business growth location and Bo Xilai was seen as an up-and-comer in the party hierarchy. We invited the acting Consul General in Chengdu; Chongqing was in his district and he was more than willing to fly to Shanghai for the chance to meet the party secretary.

After agreeing to a pre-dinner small group meeting with Bo, we spotted a conflict on the weekly pavilion visitor list. Bo Xilai, along with his playboy son Bo Guagua, was scheduled to visit the pavilion at the same time as the dinner. AmCham notified us that the Mayor of Chongqing would be at the dinner instead and we discussed how to deploy our forces. We agreed that I would attend the dinner and preceding meeting with the Mayor, while my deputy, Chris Wurzel, would greet Bo at the pavilion.

On the gossip level, Bo's Oxford and Harvard-educated son was also of interest, thanks to his well-earned reputation as a playboy. After joking that he was probably going to the USA Pavilion to pick up girls, we found out, sure enough, he knew one of the student ambassadors. They chatted downstairs while Chris Wurzel talked with his dad upstairs in the VIP room.

Our Expo pavilion also provided the opportunity to greet a lot of American and international VIPs. I spent one Sunday afternoon waiting for Singapore Prime Minister Emeritus Lee Kuan Yew to show up, only to have him bail after visiting the Singapore and China pavilions. We were third on his list and it was too much for a man in his 80s.

Having served in Thailand, I was particularly excited at the chance to receive Crown Princess Sirindhorn. I wrote to friends in Thailand asking for the correct way to welcome her in the royal language, Rajasap, used with Thai royalty. My efforts were in vain. Princess Sirindhorn walked in with her entourage, dressed in her famously informal way in a plaid shirt with a camera around her neck, stuck out her hand, and said in common Thai "mai dai jer gen ma nan leaw", meaning "I haven't seen you in a long time." I was charmed.

Q: Wow.

CAMP: The pavilion had a VIP entry allowing visitors to not only skip the lines but to join the show at various points, depending on how much time they had. It was very efficient. Princess Sirindhorn wanted the whole experience, so we started in the orientation theater with videos of Americans trying to say welcome in Chinese. The Princess, who studies Chinese, stood beside me repeating in Chinese, "huanying dao meiguo guan", "welcome to the U.S. pavilion." And I'm thinking how amazing to have the Crown Princess of Thailand welcoming visitors to our pavilion.

Official American visitors, in addition to Hillary Clinton, included three other cabinet level officers – Commerce, EPA, and Transportation.

Q: Now just a very quick question on the other Americans. In organizing them for their visit did they do other things to promote other U.S. Government agenda items or were they just basically there to show the flag?

CAMP: Most of them either came from or went to Beijing, so they had other agendas as well. We took Transportation Secretary LaHood to the GM pavilion, which featured a show with driverless cars; they gave him a ride in one of the prototype cars, which delighted both the Secretary and GM. Secretary Locke, who led our groundbreaking in 2009, has in-laws in Shanghai. He came during the Expo as well, then slipped away to have noodles with his relatives.

Q: My goodness.

CAMP: We also hosted a bunch of mayors and ten governors, including several that ran for president in 2012 such as Mitch Daniels from Indiana, Tim Pawlenty of Minnesota, Rick Perry of Texas. Schwarzenegger was a big draw; we were a little worried how to manage a press conference with him at the Expo, among such big crowds. Before assuring everyone “I’ll be back”, he made the bold statement that California would host the next Expo. We all scoffed, knowing we haven’t hosted an Expo in the U.S. since 1984. (The Bay Area did give it a try the following year with no success.)

We also received a lot of business people, such as Indra Nooyi of Pepsi and Jeff Immelt of GE and lots of celebrities, including Robert De Niro, Quincy Jones, and Halle Berry.

Q: The reason that I asked, although you got 7.3 million visitors, it was hard to measure the value. With all of these VIPs, there must have been opportunities to derive extra value.

CAMP: From the Chinese point of view, the Expo and our participation brought all these people to Shanghai who might not have come otherwise. After visiting the Expo, Schwarzenegger rode one of the new high speed trains and talked about building one in California; for the Chinese this was great stuff. Locke, of course, was promoting U.S. business, as was the Transportation Secretary.

EPA (Environmental Protection Agency) Administrator Lisa Jackson opened an “Air Now International” exhibit at the Expo, a project that we had been working with the Shanghai EPA for some time to measure pollution levels. Shanghai was the first city to promise to make public their pollution levels; it was an important piece of bilateral cooperation.

Mayor Daley came with a Chicago trade delegation, as did other local government officials. There were also diplomatic benefits; our people come and show respect and the Chinese get to show off what they’re doing. I could cite public diplomacy, commercial diplomacy, government-to-government contacts, business, educational, scientific, cultural, the whole gamut. I’m sure our entry level officers will never forget their experiences as control officers for these VIPs.

Q: Yes, that’s experience you can’t buy. That’s fantastic.

CAMP: We also had a number of congressional delegations, CODELs. I’ll never forget the visit of my Virginia congressman, Jim Moran. I was pleased he accepted my standard invitation to visit the consular section – something not many CODELs did. I had arranged for a young officer to brief on our whole visa operation. In the middle of his description of the process Jim Moran interrupted to say “what I don’t understand is why you’re making all of these great Chinese graduate students go back to China. Why don’t we just keep them in the United States?” We were all stunned. The officer valiantly pointed out that Congress makes the laws, we just carry them out.

Shanghai always attracted a lot of visitors but Expo supercharged the schedule.

Another major event that engulfed us was the spring 2009 H1N1 outbreak. China’s experience with SARS a few years earlier had left it scarred in terms of quarantines and transparency; having been criticized for initially hiding the extent of the SARS epidemic, the government went all out on H1N1. The first appearance of what was also known as swine flu was sourced to a flight from Mexico. China immediately halted all flights to Mexico and started quarantining people. They installed heat detectors at the airport that everybody had to walk through for fever detection.

Monitors boarded airplanes right after landing. People in white hazmat suits walked down the aisles waving temperature monitors at passengers' heads. Advice circulated to pop a Tylenol an hour before landing, to avoid recording any kind of elevated temperature. If the authorities detected somebody with a fever they would quarantine not only that person but whoever was sitting around him.

CAMP: Arriving passengers with temperatures were taken to ad hoc quarantine locations, many of which were old hotels at the edge of the city. Our American Citizen Services section was extremely busy. I became involved with one case in which a five-year-old girl was quarantined without her mother. When I contacted the authorities to say that this was a problem, they reassured me that they'd given her a cell phone so it was okay; she could talk to her mother whenever she wanted.

We couldn't tell them not to quarantine people but we pushed for rapid notification of all Americans detained. At one point, the parents of one of our consular officers flew in and were about to get quarantined; as duty officer, their son received the notification and convinced the authorities to sequester them in his apartment.

Q: Wow. That's okay.

CAMP: On another occasion the Mayor of New Orleans was quarantined; we managed to get him out in a couple days on condition that he leave the country immediately. Of course we had to keep this achievement quiet; if we could spring a VIP, why couldn't we get everyone out? It was a difficult time but eventually the epidemic waned.

Q: This really is breathtaking.

CAMP: There always is so much going on in China. I was eager to commemorate the thirtieth anniversary of the reestablishment of the consulate in 1980, but with the anniversary falling in 2010 just before the Expo opened our resources and time were limited. I settled for collecting stories from former consuls general and others, which is now on the ADST website as "Shanghai Stories". We also created a timeline, a trifold pamphlet, marking different events such as KFC opening in Shanghai along with tracing the increase in visas from 100 in 1980 to 100,000 by 2007, an astonishing growth trend.

Q: How large was your staff to do this or did you contract out for a lot of this?

CAMP: We had 65 direct hire officers when I arrived and 70 when I left three years later. Soon after, the Department started the limited career appointment professional associates program, bringing in people for five year contracts who speak Chinese to help with the ever-growing visa load. At one point we were so backed up we staged a special Saturday work day with all hands on deck; I spent the morning pasting visas into passports.

I was particularly sensitive to student visas from my stint eight years earlier as head of educational advising services in the Bureau of Educational and Cultural Affairs. As I mentioned earlier, I was impressed when the visa chief came from Beijing to the NAFSA conference, the National Association of Foreign Student Advisors. Knowing that the universities were furious over frequent visa denials or delays for the Chinese students they had accepted, I thought his attendance was both necessary and courageous.

By the time I was assigned to Shanghai, the area covered by our consulate was affluent enough that we were issuing to the majority of visa applicants, a positive story that we worked to get out. But we were still hampered by being able to issue only one-year visas, which was reciprocity for the Chinese refusing to give longer visas. That logjam has finally been broken with a mutual consular agreement on longer visas, which means applicants won't have to keep applying every year and our work load will go down.

Q: Right.

CAMP: Although we had good, creative visa officers who tried everything, our physical space was limited. For a while the only solutions were longer hours or more effectively snaking the line through the visa section. Our consular section was in a shopping mall, with no additional space available. Shanghai has been on the books for a new consulate for a number of years with land acquisition the major problem, a problem that is getting worse as the city grows and land values skyrocket. Although we had bought land in the Hongqiao area in 1992, the department determined it was too small.

I had a number of discussions with the municipal government about this with no resolution, although they strung us along with the possibility that post-Expo development of the fair site would include a new diplomatic enclave afterwards. On Ambassador Huntsman's last visit to Shanghai in 2011 he raised the issue with the party secretary, who promised to look into it.

Q: How long was Huntsman ambassador?

CAMP: Sandy Randt was in the job until the day of Obama's inauguration, January 20, 2009. Obama's nomination several months later of Huntsman, a Republican former governor of Utah, came as a surprise.

Huntsman stayed two years, leaving in April 2011 to run for President. I liked Huntsman, his interest in China and his facility with languages; he was an excellent communicator. In Nanjing I watched in admiration as he told the party secretary that we could make special arrangements to boost commercial relations with Nanjing, because it was such an important city and trade with Jiangsu province was crucial. I could see the party secretary melting in Huntsman's hands, he was so good at this.

In addition, Huntsman had an adopted daughter from China, named Grace. Grace was 10 years old at that point; she'd been adopted from the city of Yangzhou, in Jiangsu province. Huntsman did a wonderful job of using this personal connection to great advantage: “We have strong ties with China, we have strong commercial ties, strong political ties and ties of the heart. My daughter was born in China and it’s very important to me”. It was fabulous stuff.

After the visit to Nanjing, Ambassador and Mrs. Huntsman wanted to go on to Yangzhou with Grace to visit the orphanage. I called in re-enforcements from our press office as Huntsman’s comments sparked increased media interest and I worried about the effect on a 10-year-old girl.

It turned out beautifully. On the bus to Yangzhou, I could hear Mary Kay Huntsman saying to her husband: “Remember, Jon? Remember when we came here 10 years ago?” I was near tears, just eavesdropping. The orphanage put on a big welcome, band and all. Grace was calm and composed as her father answered most of the questions. It was really a lovely event. He does well.

Q: Just a question about all the events that you’re doing that require a fair amount of on the ground management. Even small things that go wrong on the ground can ruin something; was that an issue for you? Were you able to keep things moving smoothly?

CAMP: It helps that the Chinese are very good at this; they’re not going to screw up. And our provincial outreach efforts meant that we knew key people in each of the provinces. Not necessarily each of the cities but we did a good job of getting around. I had visited Yangzhou on one of my first trips as Consul General to speak at the 70th anniversary of Pearl Buck receiving the Noble Prize for literature. Buck lived in Yangzhou as a child, a fact the city embraced as she moved from persona non grata to celebrity in the China lexicon.

My speech-prep research included asking my teenage niece, herself adopted from China, whether she had heard of “The Good Earth”. I don’t think Pearl Buck is widely read in U.S. schools these days.

Q: We read it in eighth grade, in 1973, but I think you’re right. At this point it’s gone.

CAMP: It’s ironic. Pearl Buck was not welcome in China for many years; the PRC denied her a visa soon after Nixon’s visit so she never got to return to China. Then thirty-plus years after her death when she was back in favor there, Americans had lost interest.

The academics at the conference craved reassurance that Buck was still important to Americans. Thanks to checking with my niece I could say that “The Good Earth” was on school reading lists, which is what they wanted to hear.

Because of that event I had a basic grounding in Yangzhou, most crucially their local food specialties – Yangzhou is considered one of the culinary centers of China. The city’s gardens are also well-known; the new China Garden to be built at the National Arboretum in Washington is based on a Yangzhou model. So when I went with Huntsman I had some previous exposure to draw on.

We had contacts in all the cities and, most of the time, if we were meeting with the party secretary or other high official, the local government took charge of the arrangements. They decide who sits where at meetings and the obligatory banquet, which the city hosts. That's one of the times when knowing the local specialties pays off. We didn't have to worry about any of that stuff.

It gets complicated when we propose something that the Chinese authorities don't want. Towards the end of my time in Shanghai, we and our counterparts throughout the U.S. mission were reporting problems arranging and completing some of our programs, mainly cultural events. We all experienced an increase in "bu fāngbiàn"

("it's not convenient") responses from the Chinese side. Beijing Public Affairs had set up a whole dance tour around the country; the night before a scheduled performance we were told it wasn't convenient for them to perform. Embassy Beijing asked us to keep track of and report every bu fāngbiàn incident.

We didn't know why the Chinese were suddenly discouraging cultural performances, but our collective responses showed just how widespread this was. The embassy used these statistics to discuss the matter with the Ministry of Culture, although I don't know that they ever figured out what was going on. It seemed odd to be quashing cultural programs when the country was opening a new museum every three days.

Q: Wow.

CAMP: Cultural centers as well. Shanghai is a city of over 25 million people divided into 16 districts; not only was the municipal government opening cultural centers, individual city districts were as well. I was invited to the opening of such a center in Jiading that featured the Moscow State Symphony for the inaugural concert. At intermission I was approached by a Chinese cultural impresario who wanted my help in recruiting performing groups coming. They had all these new halls they needed to fill.

Q: Wow.

CAMP: This situation came to mind five years later when we met a group of Chinese impresarios in Bulgaria who were traveling around Eastern Europe auditioning groups to perform in China. We watched an audition with folk dancers, singers, even comedians. So despite this odd bu fāngbiàn period, there was great interest in U.S. and other performing groups.

Q: This is a huge undertaking, always managing large events. And that the Expo worked out for us has to hurt less.

CAMP: Of course the Chinese very much wanted us to take part in the Expo. They pressured us, threatened us, told us that had saved a prime spot for us; the rumor was that if we didn't participate they'd put a McDonald's on the site reserved for the U.S. There was a lot of pressure.

Around the beginning of 2011, Huntsman began to be talked about as a presidential candidate for 2012. This created the awkward image of a Republican ambassador to China preparing to run against his boss, the Democratic incumbent. As the story built, Huntsman resigned effective April 2011.

During the Ambassador's final week in China, he came to Shanghai to deliver the 6th annual Barnett-Oksenberg lecture sponsored by the National Committee on U.S.-China Relations, followed by a dinner at the consulate. But the event that loomed largest for him was a Harley motorcycle ride through Shanghai. He's a big Harley Davidson fan; when he left the governorship in Utah he rode away from the governor's mansion on a Harley.

Q: Yes, I vaguely remember that. But is Harley popular in China?

CAMP: Harley Davidson is the only American-made motorcycle. There was a Harley enthusiast group connected to AmCham that arranged this, although special permission was required to ride through the city. Concerned about how this would be received, I called Beijing to ask the Ambassador's staff how important this event was for him on a scale of one to ten. Twelve, I was told.

Ambassador Huntsman spoke at the AmCham Shanghai breakfast, wearing his riding boots with a suit jacket, then changed into his biker jacket and joined the Harley group at the back door of the Waldorf. They took off for a 20-30 minute ride that was due to end at the Portman Ritz Carlton, where our Public Affairs section is located and where both Presidents Bush and Obama stayed.

After seeing off the bikers, the head of AmCham and I went by car directly to the Portman so we'd be in place to greet the Ambassador and his motorcycle gang. Although we thought we had a ten-minute lead, almost immediately we heard the vroom, vroom of Harley engines. The city authorities, whom we had not notified for fear of getting denied, had turned all the stoplights to green, making the ride much faster than expected. Our Regional Security Officer reported that the police remonstrated with him later about not being informed of our plans. Their complaint was so politely delivered that we felt bad, but it was one of those occasions when is it better to do it than to ask permission.

Q: Sounds like the police got word very late.

CAMP: Or maybe got into hot water with their superiors. I don't know at what point they figured out this was going to happen. In fact, some kind of permit was needed for the ride so it wasn't completely unknown. But we at the consulate had not notified the Shanghai police that Ambassador Huntsman was going to participate.

In any case, Huntsman got his motorcycle ride. I was glad I had nixed a proposal that the group ride into the consulate compound; I didn't like the image of the motorcycles pouring through our gates. Some months later our Information Officer went to social media training in Beijing that analyzed Chinese perceptions of the U.S., as seen through various social media channels. A picture of Huntsman on a bicycle drew positive comments while a picture of Huntsman on the motorcycle evoked very negative reaction.

It was a classic public affairs example of what you want to be seen doing and what you don't want to be seen doing.

Q: When I started doing social media and we had to count the number of hits we cautioned the ambassador against overexposure. But you can't debase the coinage with social media; every day is fine. There is no bottom to the desire for the ambassador to do something that's appealing.

CAMP: Yes. Smelling the flowers, kissing the babies, riding a bicycle.

Q: Right. There's no bottom to the hunger for ambassadors doing fun things that anybody might do.

CAMP: Which is why we have all those embassy videos of people eating food or singing holiday songs.

Q: Absolutely.

CAMP: One other Huntsman story that became an incident occurred as part of the Jasmine Spring, Chinese protests in 2011 that drew inspiration from events in Tunisia that led to the Arab Spring. On the heels of the Arab Spring, we got word of silent protests being planned in Shanghai and Beijing. In Shanghai we decided to send a political officer to blend into the crowd and quietly observe.

In Beijing, for whatever reason, Ambassador Huntsman with his son and his bodyguard went to the McDonald's on Wangfujing in the center of the city, where the protest was. He was caught on video, with a bystander (likely the man wasn't simply a bystander) challenging him as to what he was doing there and saying he was interfering. It didn't help that Huntsman was wearing a leather jacket with an American flag on the sleeve. When the Chinese made a big deal of his presence there, Huntsman said he was just out with his family, getting ice cream at McDonald's on a Sunday outing. But that's where the protest was, so there were lots of sensitivities and a fair amount of criticism on social media.

Huntsman left China in April 2011 to run for president. David and I departed that summer.

Q: So you were there from 2008 to 2011. And there was never a possibility to extend?

CAMP: I asked just for the record and was told, no, we don't extend people in these jobs. I'd been told that in Chiang Mai as well.

Q: And what did your husband do while you were in Shanghai?

CAMP: David speaks good Mandarin, better than mine. He's terrific with languages and even learned enough Shanghai slang to cause jaws to drop. Twice a year he went back to the U.S. to manage the bed and breakfast in Idaho he bought after retiring, but most of the time he was with me in Shanghai. At one point he got interested in places named in Chinese Tang dynasty poems.

Q: Oh interesting.

CAMP: The idea started when we visited Suzhou, a classic town on the Grand Canal. A Tang dynasty poet named Zhang Ji wrote a famous poem there called “Night Mooring at Maple Bridge”. The poem evokes the scene: the moon, maple trees, a fisherman’s light, the sound of the temple bell at midnight. You can still visit Maple Bridge and see a monument to the poet.

That experience inspired David to look for other Tang poems about places that still exist, wondering how many of these there might be. As he started to collect more and more, traveling to the sites, he began to imagine a book that was a combination poetry collection, travel guide, and language study book.

Q: Lovely.

CAMP: He put it all together with photos of each place, the poem in Chinese characters and in Pinyin Romanization, a word-by-word translation, his own translation of the poem, and a description about how to get there and what the place was like. He planned to do 50 but ended up with 60 poems. If we’d had another year in Shanghai he probably would have collected 20 more.

Q: A literary travel guide of China!

CAMP: Not only was it fun for David, it was great for me when I could quote bits of these poems in speeches and at banquets. That was always a crowd pleaser; I only wish I’d done a better job on my memorization.

I also benefited by accompanying David on several of his poetry-seeking trips, which was a lot different from traveling as Consul General. Thanks to David we went to the birthplace of a famous poet named Du Fu in Gongyi, to the tomb of Bai Juyi in Longmen, and to Dunhuang, a fabulous historical site along the Silk Road at the edge of the desert.

On our return from Dunhuang, we rode an over-crowded train that reminded us of our first time in China 1983-85, long before the fancy bullet trains of today. Even booking in advance we couldn’t get seats, so we took little folding stools to sit in the aisle. Other passengers, hunched shoulder to shoulder, seized the opportunity to talk to the first foreigners they had ever met. In a typical fashion we were long familiar with, they asked how old we were, how much money we made, that kind of personal question. So going in search of poetry was a rewarding way to travel.

Q: Absolutely.

CAMP: David also traveled on a textile tour organized by a friend of ours, Li Lundin, the Taiwan-born wife of retired Foreign Service officer, John Lundin. Now living in Hawaii, Li led a group from the Honolulu Museum focused on textiles of Southwest China where they visited villages and hill tribes that produced distinctive textiles and other crafts. He took advantage of opportunities to see parts of China that I didn’t.

Q: The textiles, would they be silk or wool or-?

CAMP: Cotton mainly. We're talking folk textiles, not the grand robes of emperors. Having lived in northern Thailand we were familiar with some of the hill tribes in that area, many of whom spread across the borders in Laos, Burma, and southwest China. In fact, the Dai minority of China speak a version of Thai. Yunnan province has a national ethnic minorities park tourists can visit where Thai new year, Songkran, with its marvelous water throwing festival, is celebrated twice a day, every day of the year. Tourists can rent a bowl and clothing for 10 RMB to join in the water throwing. It's tourist-corny fun.

SHANGHAI STORIES
30th Anniversary of the U.S. Consulate in Shanghai
Beatrice Camp, Editor

Don Anderson, Consul General (1980-1983)

When we first arrived we were all housed at the Jinjiang Hotel. I had a suite which doubled as our social gathering place, and Roz Fishman, my secretary, also had a suite which doubled as the Consul General's office. We had a practice of gathering at the end of the day for "Happy Hour". On one evening there was a knock on the door and I answered it. A man was there, and he said "I represent McDonnell-Douglas and I'm the only American businessman resident in Shanghai. Could I come in for a drink? "

David Hess, Branch PAO (1980-?)

On April 24, 1980, US efforts to rescue our Foreign Service colleagues held hostage in Iran failed. On Friday, May 2, we received word from the Public Security Bureau that on Saturday there would be a large-scale demonstration against the United States held in front of the Consulate General. CG Don Anderson was out of town.

Saturday morning, Joe Borich and I assembled at the consulate. Public Security assured us that we would be safe, and to make us feel better, parked about two companies of armored Public Security troops behind the old American school, which at that time was a naval research lab.

At about 11 o'clock, we spotted the mob coming down Urumqi across Nanjing. There appeared to be about 5000 people. On closer inspection, we noticed that there were four Middle Eastern students in front carrying a banner "USA Hands-Off Iran!" The other 4996 demonstrators were apparently just curious Chinese who followed along to see what was going on.

We kept the gate closed, but one of the four real demonstrators called out demanding to see the Consul General so that he could present their demands directly to him. We shouted back that the CG was out of town. He lowered his standards and said any American would do. We told him we were closed and to come back Monday.

They never came back.

Thomas Biddick, Consular, later Political Officer (1980-1982)

I served as Consul in 1980-82 and was one of the original Shanghai crew along with CG Don Anderson, Joe Borich, Tom Lauer, Dave Hess (USIA), Roz Fishman and Chips Carpenter. I opened the consular section and then moved to political when Steve Schlaikjer arrived to head consular.

In those early days, I was the only consular officer and handled nonimmigrant visas as well as ACS, including some interesting citizenship cases involving Americans who had survived the decades of revolution and separation. Our local employees were all assigned by the Waiban.

It was my honor to be the first on the scene in January 1980, followed shortly thereafter by CG Don Anderson, Joe Borich, Dave Hess, Tom Lauer and several others with their spouses and families. We initially stayed in the Jin Jiang Hotel and enjoyed the amenities of the club across the street (the old Cercle Sportif from French Concession days), including a massive indoor swimming pool, bowling alley and ballroom where a gala celebration was held to mark the New Year. The consular corps consisted of the Polish, Japanese, French and U.S. consulates. Resident Americans were few but well-acquainted with the consulate, including some old-timers from “pre-Liberation” days, a few students and teachers and the folks from Nike and Pan Am. We would ride out to Fudan University in the consulate pick-up for softball games. Visitors from the U.S. included the singer John Denver, who stayed with Don and Blanche Anderson at the residence and entertained us at a private party there. I also remember a visit by former president Carter during that period (1981) and of course the CODELs such as that headed by Senator Howard Baker who visited the PLA submarine base at Wusong.

Change was in the air with the Dengist reforms underway and there were social tensions brewing in the aftermath of the Cultural Revolution. Security was sketchy in those days. While riding my bike to work, I was passed a note (in Chinese) informing me of a threat from a disgruntled Wenzhou NIV applicant. Later a person fitting that description was caught by local guard trying to make a run into the consulate compound. And then there was the morning when the CG discovered a young fellow hiding in a downstairs bathroom. He apparently had scaled the wall but didn’t do any harm.

Steve Schlaikjer, Consular Officer (1980-1982)

We have a couple of 1981-82 vintage group photos of the Shanghai Clippers softball team (sponsored and coached by Pan Am), including some with visiting pitcher-songwriter John Denver.

The event Tom Biddick recalls was a major impromptu city-wide demonstration after midnight on 19 November 1981 following the China national men’s soccer team defeat of Saudi Arabia (that futbol powerhouse) 2-0 in a World Cup final round qualifying match broadcast live from Kuala Lumpur. The event left a deep impression on me.

China’s hopes were high that it would represent Asia-Oceania in Madrid in 1982 in its first time competing, post-Liberation, for the World Cup. The government, including government controlled press, at first encouraged the spontaneous demonstrations of patriotic fervor that crowds in Shanghai and elsewhere had exhibited in an earlier 3-0 victory against Kuwait. But late-night street parades continued after the great defeat of Kuwait (with clanging gongs, drums, shouted slogans” Zhongguo Jiayou, Zhongguo Wansui, Zhongguo Diyi”, etc.), troubling the sleep of party leaders (not to mention, literally, that of the US Consul General and his wife), and the Party propaganda organs ordered in various ways subtle and direct that, while patriotism was wonderful, there would be no more demonstrating “next time” after the upcoming KL match with the Saudis.

Watching the game on TV in Biddick’s Huaihai Gongyu flat, Joe Borich, Tom Biddick and I (and Tom Lauer?) were intrigued to hear, even before the final whistle blew, fireworks popping off in the distance in a 360 degree arc. We could feel the city, around midnight, stirring and levitating. We got up, too, went with our bikes onto Huaihai Road, and followed the curb-to-curb flow of pedestrians and bicyclists left (eastward), towards People’s Square (the old Racetrack opposite the Park Hotel). I got separated from my colleagues after a pair of young Shanghai men (stage-whispering back at me occasionally: “Ni zhidao, Zhongguo meiyou ziyou, Zhongguomeiyou ziyou”) beat a path through fellow demonstrators to let me, the loudly-announced “Meiguo Lingshiguan” guy -- now walking my big former Taipei Police Department black-framed bike -- proceed like Jesus on Palm Sunday. I stage-whispered back: “hey, Deng Xiaoping’s not so bad, don’t say China has no freedom.” I kept flashing two-to-zero hand signs and yelled “er bi yi” a lot, smiling, hoping to keep the conversation limited to sports.

We never got quite as far as People’s Park, as the flow turned into a flood that dammed up around Sichuan Lu, with city buses mired in the crowd like caterpillars in honey. Ten thousand Shanghailanders (including the trio of rather obvious Consulate General staffers) stood, stock-still, eerily quiet, waiting to see what would happen. To me it seemed people were looking around to see if anyone would step forward to lead this movement. Not long after this pause, however, the Gong An decided enough was enough, formed into battle lines, and charged the crowd near me, wielding cattle-prod-like night sticks. The charged charge sent a wave of demonstrators away from the center of the thoroughfare, and it (they) broke over me. Pressed to the hard pavement, my bicycle sprocket cutting a digital arc in one calf, the soft steel frame bent in a V around me, I heard a pile of what felt like ten panicking Shanghailanders collectively scream above me. I thought: “what a really stupid and embarrassing way to die, suffocated by a bunch of demonstrators who broke at the first sign of trouble!” In the end a couple of helpful bystanders (plainclothes police??) took me to a local Gong An paichusuo, where dozens of police were being mustered out into the night from their barracks. After a bemused look at my consular ID card and a few polite perfunctory questions about what in the world was I doing out on a night like this, the desk sergeant sent me home in a small PSB truck, my bent bike stuck in the rear cargo space.

Tom Biddick’s first-hand political report of the soccer demo the next day was a model of Foreign Service on-the-scene reporting. As I recall, he included the thought that the students, workers, and sports fans of Shanghai sensed that a social-political movement might have started that night, but the crowd lacked leadership or, frankly, any obvious common goal. Plus ca change?

China got beat in a later game by Kuwait and did not go to Madrid in the end. But hopes were raised.

Tom Lauer (1980-1982?)

I can't add much to the description of the great demonstration. I do recall that by 10 or 11 p.m. phalanxes of young men on bicycles continued to move toward the square chanting "Zhongguo-Zhongguo" in low and defiant tones. They were angry.

I do have an anecdote about the presence or lack thereof, of foreigners in the city at that time. Shortly after my family arrived (wife, daughter and two boys -- all young and blond), we went to the zoo. When we went into the building that housed the great apes we saw, not surprisingly, great apes and about 150 Chinese, most with families. Within seconds all of the Chinese had their backs to the apes and were staring, maybe in disbelief, at the five blond-haired, Chinese speaking space aliens.

Tess Johnston, (1981-1986 and 1989-1996)

I served here -- unique in the Foreign Service, I was later told -- for a total of 12 years: Sept. 1981 - Sept. 1986, then Sept 1989 - Oct. 1, 1996. (Surely that must be a record?)

This description of Tess' first assignment in Shanghai is excerpted with permission from Permanently Temporary: From Berlin to Shanghai in Half a Century by Tess Johnston, published 2010 by Old China Hand Press.

We were a total of seven, five Officers on the second floor behind locked doors, the remaining two, the consular and the administrative officer, in the downstairs offices. Every day as I walked up the curving oaken staircase and passed the stained-glass windows I marveled at the master craftsmen who had built this gracious villa.

Our offices were located in a series of former bedrooms stretching on either side of a broad corridor. My office, plus the files, and later the massive main frame of our first computer, was on the enclosed second floor terrace with broad windows looking out on the garden. The CG's office was located in a larger bedroom and he and his wife lived next door, "over the shop" so to say. Their living room and bedroom were, respectively, the former master bedroom and en suite dressing room, and their kitchen was on the far end of my office's terrace; we were separated by a heavy door from which the CG would emerge each morning. It was a compact but quite pleasant arrangement all around.

Unless we had special permission, we were allowed to drive our cars only within the 25-kilometer radius of Greater Shanghai. There were police-manned roadblocks on all roads to check inward and outward movement and a foreigner's car would be turned back if it did not have the proper papers. Thus trips to the two most famous scenic cities nearby, Hangzhou and Suzhou, were allowed only by special permission.

Stan Brooks, Consul General (1983-1987)

Our work with Fudan University would be another Shanghai story well worth telling. A treasured memory is of Dr. Xie attending our showing of Amadeus.

From the Reagan visit, something you and/or Mary overheard at Fudan right after his 30(?) minute speech. As everyone was leaving the auditorium, one young woman, who obviously didn't understand the function of the two conspicuous teleprompters the president had used, said to another student something like: "Isn't it amazing! Such an old man, and he memorized that whole speech!"

And I remember well our session with the endearing old painters, one in his nineties, the other in his late eighties as I recall. I've forgotten their names, but see them still in my mind's eye. And I still hear the younger one saying, with reference to his elder, "Wo buguo zhi shi yige xiao xuesheng."

One of the photos I sent to Shanghai is of Richard Pontius introducing a performance by Shanghai Music Conservatory students at the consulate. Richard told me about asking a student at the conservatory why is it that the Germans call their country the Fatherland, and you Chinese call yours the Motherland. The student instantly replied, "Never mind, America is Disneyland!"

A sign of the times. My alma mater the University of Wyoming has exchange programs running with Shanghai University and Shanghai Normal.

It was a small, happy and very productive post that I inherited from Don Anderson and it remained so as new challenges arose during my service there.

The only inspection in the four years resulted in a letter from Secretary Shultz announcing that Shanghai was one of the ten top posts worldwide in that cycle. In the exit interview with the inspectors, I pointed out two key facts that made my job easy: people knew their jobs and did them well with little guidance; and their teamwork was superb.

The most concentrated test was President Reagan's visit. Our performance was recognized in a group Superior Honor Award.

There are two more documents I'm happy to cite. One is Tess Johnston's Foreign Service Secretary of the Year Award. The other is the accreditation of the reopened Shanghai American School. This was obtained by my wife Claire after she took over as principal.

My general impression from those years is of visitors, visitors, visitors. Taxing but fun. Ambassador Hummel noted we were successfully handling almost the same volume of visitors as the embassy with its much bigger staff.

I expect that your archival research can turn up, inter alios, all the CODELs, the Reagan visit and pre-advances and advance, and Secretary Shultz's second visit (with Mrs. Shultz). As well as some or all of the following for whom Claire and I gave receptions or dinners.

Chicago Mayor Washington and party, San Francisco Mayor Feinstein, Mrs. Jay Rockefeller with children, Katharine Graham and party, Boston Children's Hospital Open Heart Surgery Team, San Francisco Opera Company, Brooklyn Museum Art Exhibit and various U.S. athletic teams.

Finally, here are a few more memories.

- holding monthly meetings with the small but growing American business community (there was no Consulate General).
- attending the rollout of the first MD-80.
- addressing a large Consulate General meeting in Hong Kong. The talk included some speculation on the future economic roles of Hong Kong and Shanghai respectively.
- hosting with Claire big Fourth of July picnics in the consulate garden. A good many Americans from around the consular district and beyond attended.
- going out on the streets to observe the big student demonstrations in December 1986-January 1987.
- attending as dean of the corps, with Claire, the reception aboard the royal yacht hosted by Queen Elizabeth.
- hiking alone for several days in the Huang Shan. No other foreigners, and few Chinese!

To read about the consulate today, and to remember how back then all personnel fit in the present main office building, is to be reminded of how much growth happened after the mid-eighties.

Re the re-establishment of Shanghai American School: Bonnie Wisnewski when we arrived was running a school in the servants quarters in the backyard of the compound using correspondence courses. Claire (Brooks) often went back to help. In December 1983, Bonnie and her husband were leaving for the states and Bonnie asked if Claire would cover the school while she was gone. The Wisnewskis didn't come back, and with the parents' consent, Claire stayed in the job until we left in 1987. As principal Claire along with the teachers decided to develop curricula for the school. Also in the second year Claire felt the school should be accredited and contacted the Western Association of Accreditation in California. In under two years the process was completed. And she started a Kindergarten and a small Nursery school.

Note: Photos contributed by the Brookses include:

- A copy of the White House photo, original size, of President Reagan, the Hummels and me at Shanghai Airport.
- A copy of a photo, enlarged to the same size, of Mayor Jiang Zemin pointing to something at an art exhibition. I'm standing beside him. The original likely came from the Waiban so archival research may identify the occasion.
- Three standard size prints of scenes at a Shanghai American School field day, an annual event held in the consulate garden. In the photo of four kids at the start of a sack race, note what "sacks" were being used.

Winter of 1986-1987

Charlie Sylvester succeeded me in 1987. Larry Robinson, a strong political officer who served with both Charlie and me, did some fine reporting on the student demonstrations the winter of 1986-87. Here is another account of the demonstration from someone else who was an observer on the scene: “See the reference below from the NYT. As I recall, the demonstrations were also sparked by an incident during a concert at a campus in Shanghai when the police beat many students. These were almost certainly the largest demonstrations in Shanghai since the Cultural Revolution, and they foreshadowed what was to happen in 1989.

My enduring memory is of the demonstrations which took place right at the end of December were of tens of thousands of people in front of the Shanghai Municipal Government building chanting “Jiang Zemin, chu lai,” and of the newspaper headline several days into the incident which paralyzed Shanghai: Xinminwanbao: “New Hairy Boy Found in Sichuan”. I have always found that hilarious, and telling.

From the New York Times: “Those demonstrations in December 1986 and the beginning of January 1987 attracted tens of thousands of students and were starting to draw support from workers when the Government cracked down and imposed a campaign against “bourgeois liberalization,” like Western democratic influences.”

Kent Wiedemann (1983-1986)

Many of us saw US presidential visits, which speaks to Shanghai’s importance, and surely provided a lot of fun for us. Stan Brooks was Consulate General then (1983) and I was his deputy. Reagan’s speech at Fudan University, in which he recommended a belief in God, left a lasting impression. White House advance was irate when I informed them that the Jinjiang Hotel, where the president and party would be lodged, refused to remove its flagpole so the president’s helo might land there in an emergency. The Jinjiang won that one, and I include a copy of the rules posted at the entrance to its club as a reminder of its poor attitude then.

“Searching for Shanghai”

An American historian once said, “The past is another country.” In the case of Shanghai 2010 vs. 1980 the past might as well be another galaxy. For those familiar only with the neon, chromium and glass of Shanghai today, let me take you back to when I first arrived there in August 1983. At that time I had studied Chinese literature and history since 1965, married into a Chinese family and lived in Taiwan and Hong Kong for seven years. But this was my first visit to the Mainland, and I was psyched.

Then came the reality. My family and I passed through immigration and walked over to the luggage pick-up area. There were no conveyor belts, just great heaps of luggage piled in the middle of the floor. I scrambled through the piles, finally found our suitcases and then walked out into the sultry Shanghai night. Our car glided through the dark, silent streets -- dim, decaying buildings on both sides, French sycamores leaning out over the road. Car lights flashed on and off, lighting up the scurrying, morose masses of Shanghai like a flash of lightning on a dark night.

“Why don’t you turn the car lights on?” I asked our driver.

“It’s against the law. Your might blind the other drivers.”

So, you just flashed your lights when you suspected someone or something was in your way.

Shortly we arrived at the Park Hotel with its dimly lit rooms and a shower that reeked of chlorine, evoking memories of high school swimming class. It took the local contractors three months to paint our three-bedroom apartment at the previously elegant Huaihai Apartments, so we were sentenced to one month at the Park and another two months at the Donghu Guest House. Soon we learned the importance of Elephant Glue Paper, a low-tech but efficient way of catching mice.

At that time Chinese companies were just beginning to develop products for the international market, and they still had problems with the English names for them. In addition to the aforementioned Elephant Glue, they had another glue made from donkey and mule hooves. This was known as Genuine, Blood-nourished Ass Glue. Pharmacies also sold Atomic Pile Busters, which might have been an antidote for the previous product. Taiwan merchants, already with a degree of market savvy, were selling a diet drink known as Slim Tea. The Mainland version was, less euphoniously, Cut Fat Tea. My favorite, however, was the package of sticky-rice dumplings filled with black sesame paste, known as Acme Glue Balls -- perhaps used to ensnare Wile E. Coyote.

The Park Hotel, despite its deficiencies was a great place to learn about Shanghai. It was located on Nanjing Road, in the heart of the city’s still limited commercial district. Soon we learned that Shanghainese don’t rush down the streets like their Hong Kong kinsmen. There’s no room for that on the sidewalk, so they just mosey along. In those days the only big stores in the city were located along Nanjing Road, and on the weekend these were invaded by desperate shoppers from outside the city. The Number One Department Store, for example, hosted over 300,000 customers every Sunday.

One evening shortly after my arrival I learned just how crowded Shanghai could be. I had attended an official dinner just off Nanjing Road and come out to wait for my car. What I didn’t realize was that a parade had just passed by and the crowds were only beginning to disperse. The sidewalks and the streets were packed with people. No way my car could get through. I would have to walk. I pushed my way through the crowd and turned onto a side street. It was full as well, but I decided to move ahead anyway. But after ten feet or so I could go no further. I tried to turn back, but people were already crowding in behind me. Gridlock -- with people, not cars. I stood there in a mild state of panic for 15 minutes, unable to move. Now that’s a crowd.

Moving to the Donghu Guest House was an upgrade for us. It was a beautiful, though shabby old house that had once belonged to Du Yuesheng, the underworld overlord who in the 1930s and 40s ran drug and prostitution rings and helped Chiang Kai-shek take control of the city. Our next-door neighbor was Ed Shaughnessy, a University of Chicago grad student who was later to become one of the world’s leading experts on Chinese bronze inscriptions and Chou dynasty archeology. Ed was from the Indiana Jones School of Archeology, always wearing a rakish fedora and a beautiful leatherjacket. He was not only flamboyant but brilliant as well. He spent long hours at the Shanghai Museum working closely with their leading experts on the classical bronzes. When he finished his three-month stint at the Museum, he drafted a long report for the Director, in elegant Chinese, a feat that still impresses me to these 30-years later.

Winter in Shanghai was also a revelation. Shanghai is not quite as cold as Washington, DC, but it is damp and does get below freezing at times. That was tolerable for westerners who had heat in their offices and apartments. But Chinese citizens did not. One friend who worked at the Shanghai Music Conservatory told me, “Last night I left a glass of water in the practice room. This morning there was ice in it. Can you imagine how students play under these conditions?”

Wu Gongzhan, the cultural assistant at the Consulate, also commented on the cold. “I grew up in Shanghai. Every winter I got chilblains from exposure to the cold. My hands would swell up and the skin began to peel off. But when I was 16, during the Cultural Revolution, I was sent down to the countryside, all the way to the Siberian border. It was 30-below-zero there, but our houses were heated. No more chilblains.”

More than the inconvenience, more than the crowds, more than the cold, Shanghai makes me think of food. Just after the Cultural Revolution ended, the city of Shanghai, with a population of 12 million, had only 200 restaurants. Good food was considered counter-revolutionary, a bourgeois affectation. “Put some more sand in my rice, please. That’s the way we comrades like it.” By 1983, however, this attitude was beginning to change. A number of good restaurants were popping up, though trying a new one was always a risky endeavor.

One day my family and I had been wandering around the city for some time and were desperate to find a restaurant. The only one around was a “Qing Zhen Guan,” (“Clear and Pure Restaurant”), a Muslim dumpling shop. There wasn’t much clear or pure about the place, but we didn’t have a choice. So we went in. The restaurant was about to close for an afternoon break, but the manager grudgingly let us in and sat us at a table that was strewn with the residue -- bones and all -- of a previous feast. The waiter, a cigarette hanging from his lips, a filthy wet rag in his hand, strode over and began to sweep the table clean, raking all the bones onto the floor.

“Don’t worry,” he said, “Someone will clean that up.”

At that, a young girl appeared from the kitchen, snow shovel in hand. Quickly she began scooping up the detritus on the floor and cheerfully throwing it out the window.

“A trade opportunity,” I thought. “A snow shovel for every restaurant in China.”

Despite such experiences, we soon found some excellent restaurants in Shanghai. And we wound up haunting those places. My eight-year-old son Mark quickly became an aficionado. His favorite dish was “babao ya,” (eight-treasure duck), stuffed with rice and mushrooms and all sorts of other goodies. One day when he and his sister were studying Chinese with their tutor, Mrs. Du, Mark said, “I love babao ya.”

“Oh, then I’ll make you some,” replied Mrs. Du.

Mrs. Du was an elderly woman, in her mid-sixties, well-educated, but living in poverty, as did almost everyone in Shanghai at that time. Inviting an American family to her apartment was just not done. But she did it anyway. And we went to her tiny, efficiency apartment. Somehow, with only the most primitive kitchen utensils, and at great cost, she managed to prepare a sumptuous banquet, including Mark's beloved duck.

This kind of experience made Shanghai a wonderful place to live, despite the inconvenience, the shabbiness, the crowds, and the cold. Even under great hardship, Shanghainese remained optimistic. They were funny and smart and incredibly diligent. They befriended me at some risk to themselves, for dealing with an American diplomat was not a circumspect thing to do at that time. But Mrs. Du and others like her made my life and work in Shanghai rewarding. U.S. Government programs touched many of these people and changed their lives for the better. Following are a few more tales about my friends in that great city.

Muriel Hoopes (note: her name appears on the invite list for the April 1980 reception) "You have committed an expatriating act."

When I first met Muriel Hoopes in Shanghai in 1983, she was in her 80's, still energetic, but worn by time and travail, more travail than most of us meet in several lifetimes. She was silver-haired, wrinkled, stooped, but with a strong sense of self and a keen wit.

Though born in New York City, Mrs. Hoopes had lived in China for more than 50 years. In the 1920's she lost her American citizenship, and now in 1983 the U.S. Consulate General in Shanghai was helping her get it back and that's a story worth telling.

I had met Mrs. Hoopes at a Consulate General party and now I was visiting her at home -- along with Peter Rose, a Smith College sociology professor, who came to Shanghai as a guest speaker for the Department of State. I had told him some of Mrs. Hoopes story. He wanted to hear more.

With that in mind, we went to visit Mrs. Hoopes on a cold fall evening. Mrs. Hoopes lived in a third-story, walk-up apartment in a battered old building that hadn't seen much repair since 1949 and the beginnings of Communist rule in China. This was true of almost all the apartments in Shanghai at that time. In Churchill's famous phrase, this was truly "an equal sharing of misery" for most of the population of Shanghai.

We climbed the dank stairs to Mrs. Hoopes' apartment. She greeted us at the door, and we had our first glimpse of her Spartan cell, a single room with a bed, several rock-hard chairs and a 40-watt bulb dangling from the ceiling. The kitchen was down the hall, shared by other families on her floor. The toilet: a chamber pot. In the 1980's, many apartments in Shanghai had no flush toilets. Night soil collectors made their rounds early every morning. In those days apartments did not have heat. Shanghai was south of the Yangtze River, and therefore, in the eyes of the central government, did not need heating -- even though the temperature occasionally dropped below freezing. Mrs. Hoopes served tea and we gratefully clasped the mug with both hands to warm our frigid hands.

Professor Rose had written a number of articles on immigration and emigration in the United States and wanted to learn more about Mrs. Hoopes' experience. Here is the tale she told:

In the early 1920's I was working as a nurse in New York City. One day on the subway I lost my balance and stepped on the foot of a young Asian man standing next to me. I apologized profusely.

With apologies out of the way, my curiosity got the better of me. "Are you from Japan?" I asked.

Immediately the man drew back with a wounded look on his face.

"Of course not. I'm Chinese. Don't you know about the 14 demands the Japanese made on China as part of the Treaty of Versailles negotiations? Why don't we go out for lunch this weekend and I'll explain it to you."

We met for lunch. I discovered that Wang was studying engineering at Columbia on a scholarship from the Chinese YMCA. This young man from China fascinated me. We fell in love, got engaged and planned to move to China after Wang completed his degree.

Several years later we did marry and make preparations to go to Shanghai. In San Francisco we lined up for immigration procedures prior to embarkation. The immigration officer looked at my passport. He glared at me and said,

"You won't be needing this passport anymore. By marrying a Chinese, you have committed an expatriating act. You are no longer an American citizen."

This was shocking news, but unfortunately true. The Asian Exclusion Act of 1924 clearly stated that any American marrying an Asian alien lost his/her citizenship.

Wang and I then hurried over to the Chinese embassy where I was issued travel documents. I left for China the next day and have never been back to the United States.

After Mr. Wang and Mrs. Hoopes reached China, he went to work with the YMCA, which was an active, vibrant organization at that time. Mrs. Hoopes taught English at Hujiang, a private liberal arts college in Shanghai founded by the Baptist Church. They did well, raising a family during the difficult, but for them tolerable, period of Nationalist rule and the Civil War.

With the founding of the Peoples Republic of China in 1949, however, their situation took a turn for the worse. As part of an effort to boost the authority of the Communist Party, Chairman Mao turned to a virulent nationalism. In these circumstances Mr. Wang was doomed by his American degree and his American wife. It didn't matter that Mrs. Hoopes was no longer legally an American. She and her family were still tainted by her long-since severed links with the United States.

What was a bad situation after 1949 became even worse in 1965 with the beginning of the Cultural Revolution, a time of national psychosis for China. Mr. Wang was arrested (who knows on what charges). Mrs. Hoopes was not sent to prison, but was held in isolation (house arrest) at the college where she had been a teacher.

In 1983, after the opening of the U.S. Consulate General in Shanghai, the Consular Section reached out to American citizens in the area and to others who might have claim to such status. By this time Mrs. Hoopes' children had grown up and found a place in Chinese society. Mrs. Hoopes applied for a reinstatement of her citizenship. This was approved and not long afterwards, she made her first trip to the United States in more than 60 years. Unfortunately, her health was not good and she died not long after her return.

Much Ado about Music in Nanjing

Without music life would be a mistake – Nietzsche

When I first arrived in Shanghai in 1983, the Chinese government had just launched a campaign to combat so-called “spiritual pollution” (jingshen wuran), pernicious cultural influences that were supposedly sapping the strength of the revolution. And, according to Chinese security authorities, much of the problem stemmed from foreign, particularly American, sources. One internal security document at the time warned that foreign diplomats would try to seduce Chinese citizens by inviting them to cultural events at the embassy. Then they would “drag them underwater and get them to reveal national secrets.”

Under such circumstances, cultural programming was difficult. Our opportunities to speak to the public, especially university students, were limited. Thus I was surprised in the spring of 1984 to receive an invitation to speak to students at Nanjing University. Authorities at the university were nervous about what I might say, so I suggested as a topic “American Folk Music.” The topic seemed harmless enough, so the powers that be gave their approval. What they didn't get at the time was that the theme American Folk Music allowed me to speak freely about American history, religion, protest movements, freedom of speech, unionization -- all topics that would never be discussed in a Chinese classroom at that time. What's more, music appeals to the emotions, and that's how you change minds, not through rational argument.

In those days the level of English of Chinese university students was relatively poor. They could read well but had little experience listening to spoken English. Thus I planned to speak in Chinese and have the students listen to recorded songs in English that represented the breadth of American folk music. To help the students understand what they were hearing, I prepared lyric sheets so they could read along while they listened. The organizers told me about 100 students would attend the lecture, so I prepared 150 copies of the lyrics just to be safe. But when I walked into the crowded lecture hall with 150 copies of the lyrics in hand, I knew I was in trouble. At least 300 students crowded the hall, standing-room-only.

I immediately asked two students if they would help me pass out the lecture materials. Then I picked up the microphone and announced, “For today's lecture I have prepared handouts, lyric sheets for the songs you will hear. Unfortunately, I don't have enough copies for everyone. Would you please share these with the person sitting next to you?”

As soon as I said the word “share,” everyone in the room stood up and stormed the front of the room, surrounding my two student assistants. They began shoving and fighting. Papers flew through the air. Several students fell to the floor; another knocked over my microphone and broke it.

At first I was shocked by this behavior. Then, I thought, “Wow, I’m like Mick Jagger. They really want to hear what I have to say.”

I had just learned my first lesson in the economics of scarcity. In 1983, Chinese university students rarely met foreigners, particularly Americans, and even more particularly, American diplomats. So my lecture at the university was a big deal. What’s more, I was going to talk about American music, a previously forbidden topic. To have a copy of the lyrics -- what could be better? Sharing was not an option.

Twenty years later, I was in Beijing at a dinner for artists and cultural promoters. A tall, well-dressed young man approached me and said, “Mr. Neighbors, you may not remember, but I met you in Nanjing in 1984. I was the student who arranged for you to speak about American music at the university. When the officials heard about the lecture, they were quite upset. I got scolded severely. But we all enjoyed the program very much, so it was worth the trouble.”

Also from that time: October 1984 -- Delegation of American Writers

(note from Bea Camp: at the time that Lloyd Neighbors was Branch PAO and Stan Brooks was CG, my husband David Summers and I managed joint two-week TDY stints in Shanghai from our embassy jobs in Beijing. I remember a meeting between US and Chinese writers, at which Gary Snyder proclaimed that the true oppressed of the earth are the grass and the trees. The LA Times wrote about this trip, which in addition to Snyder included Allen Ginsberg, Norman Cousins, William Gass. Francine du Plessix Gray, William Least Half-Moon, Maxine Hong Kingston, Toni Morrison, and Leslie Mormon Silko.

“Nine Writers on the Eve of a China Adventure” by Elizabeth Mehren, Times Staff Writer

Twice in a single evening last week, Maxine Hong Kingston’s mother telephoned her, obviously quite frantic. “When you get there,” she told her novelist daughter in the first conversation, “keep your mouth shut.” Soon, mother and daughter were back on the phone. “You know,” Kingston’s mother said, “some of that stuff you wrote was very anti-communist.” Yes, the author of the widely hailed “China Men” and “The Warrior Woman” agreed, some of that stuff was definitely very anti-communist. “Well,” said her mother, “tell them you didn’t mean it.”

Ira Kasoff, Commercial Officer (1985-1987 and 2004-2007)

I was the second Department of Commerce officer posted to Shanghai, following the path-breaker, Genny Dean. I decided to keep our office in the little guard house where Genny had set it up - just inside the grounds, at the corner of Huai Hai and Ulumuchi Roads. It was tiny and unheated, but it was ours (everyone else was in the “big house” next to us). We had a small reception area where our two local staff sat, an even smaller meeting room that could seat two or three guests (as long as they weren’t too big), and a small office for me, the lone commercial officer (compare this to the large staff and the sumptuous offices in the Portman that the commercial section enjoys today). We were quite busy, as American business people were beginning to discover Shanghai, but doing business in China in those days was definitely not for the faint of heart. We turned often for help to two “private sector” Chinese friends, the legendary T.C. Tao, who had set up the first non-governmental consulting business in China, and the lawyer Richard Hsu, who was still active in Shanghai the last time I was there. It was a challenging job, but never dull, and under the enlightened leadership of CG Stan Brooks, and with great colleagues like Richard Boucher, Lloyd Neighbors, Keith Powell, Larry Robinson et al., it was one of the great experiences of my life.

I should also mention two of my proudest achievements from that time: first, and undoubtedly most important, establishing weekly Sunday afternoon football games on the consulate grounds. In addition to facing mundane challenges like organizing the players, finding a football, etc, we had to persuade the divine Claire Brooks to allow us to use the lawn for the game (a decision she later came to regret, given the damage we did each week), arrange with security to let the non-USG players onto the grounds every Sunday, etc. But the game became a fixture for the ex-pat community, and was a great morale-booster, particularly for hard-core sports-addicts like me. The other accomplishment was helping to found, with a small group of American businessmen, the Shanghai Consulate General, which was not unlike the founding of the Communist Party in 1921. I organized a small group (including Norman Givant, Ernie DeBellis of Foxboro, and a few others) in secret underground meetings, until the day we felt confident enough to announce its establishment. This duty fell to me, and I paid a call on the head of SMERT (the unfortunate English name for the Shanghai Foreign Economic and Trade Relations Committee). I discussed several items of business with him, and then casually said something like, “oh, and I’ve helped the business community form a chamber of commerce,” before moving on to another topic. He did not seem fazed by this, and we took this to be a tacit go-ahead. As readers undoubtedly know, the Shanghai Consulate General has grown to be the largest American chamber outside of North America, with some 4,000 members the last time I checked. Though I think they are still not officially recognized...

Keith Powell, Consular Section Chief (1985-1987)

I served in Shanghai with Consul General Stan Brooks. He was a fine gentleman and his wife, Claire, a wonderful lady who did a lot to support the nascent American School and the expat community. A few incidents stand out in my mind from that time.

Elves: The consular section (all two officers and five FSNs) was located on the ground floor of the old house. We took in visa applications, sent in name-checks on every one, waited 15 working days for a response, then issued if no response. We had stacks of passports backed up for the slow name-check process. The Consul General lived upstairs in the Residence part of the house. Several mornings I came in and found stacks of passports moved and the data entry having been completed. It turned out that the Consul General’s wife (who helped us out TDY on a couple of occasions) had come down in the night and took stacks of passports to complete the data entry. Before I left we took her out for a consular section lunch and I gave her a certificate as a Consular Elf (ala the Elves and the Shoemaker story.)

The Million-Dollar Bar-B-Q: It is apparently gone now. But around the time I arrived, Corning Glass was finishing a joint venture building for some kind of glass firing facility in the Shanghai area. They had leftover special kiln-quality firing bricks from the project and they used them, at the suggestion of the Admin and Commercial Officers, to build a bar-b-q in the consulate backyard...over near the Green House (now the cafeteria.) It was, I suspect, the only bar-b-q that was certified up to like a million degrees of heat.

TGIF: We used to alternate TGIFs with the Australians who were then located across the street. One day the news spread through the community...they had imported a Container Load of Fosters Beer for their office lounge! It took the Aussies (with a little help from the rest of us) one month to go through the entire container!

American School: They opened the American School on the consulate grounds in what had been the garage (previously the stables, later the cafeteria, later the consular section, now...GSO?) They started a separate kindergarten in what had been the Greenhouse (now the cafeteria.) It started, Little House on the Prairie style, with, I think, 10 students 1-8. Kindergarten had like 15 children (including mine). The school received a donation from Northwest, McDonald-Douglas and other businesses and ordered a big wooden jungle gym set up. We had a weekend "barn raising" with the families bringing food, cooking on the bar-b-q (see above) and putting up this huge wooden climbing structure. (No idea when it came down.)

Comments on efforts to secure property for a new consulate.

In 1986-7, I was the DS representative with Ambassador Salgo on a trip to visit prospective new compound sites. He was working on property issues in China, Eastern Europe and the USSR. OBO, then FBO had come up with a "cookie cutter" design for consulate compounds in China (Offices, CGR and Staff Residences.) Shenyang had been completed, Chengdu was almost done, but, Guangzhou and Shanghai did not have any property identified by the Chinese to pursue a new compound. Guangzhou moved into the "Esso Tower" next to the White Swan Hotel and that was that until the current effort. Shanghai on the other hand was in the midst of major new construction all over town. Since it was contemplated that adequate property could not be obtained in the near term, the suggestion was made that the Consulate General could easily be accommodated (Offices and Residences) in the new "Portman" project. The idea didn't have legs and for better or worse we stayed in the current location. In those days we also renovated a space on the compound for consular services. All in all it was a tight fit for everything.

Charles Sylvester, Consul General (1987-1989)

Former CG Sylvester died February 7, 2010, just as we were beginning this project. An obituary in the Washington Post March 5, 2010 reported that while serving in Shanghai, "Mr. Sylvester enjoyed showing visitors the photographs of previous Shanghai consuls general on the paneled stairway wall leading to the Sylvester living quarters. He noted that the long line of men with old-fashioned beards and hairstyles were often beneficiaries of the spoils system. "They tell me that every one of them in the 19th century was indictable," he said....

Frank "Pat" Wardlaw, Consul General (1989-1992)

I arrived immediately after Tiananmen, shortly after dependents and non-essential personnel had been evacuated, and the political situation remained fraught for the next three years. The Shanghai leadership found it convenient to use us as a confidential conduit and as a public partner in a “normal” relationship. Indeed the partnership sometimes took a concrete form as I played tennis and bridge on several occasions with Zhu Rongji, then Shanghai Mayor, and Wu Bangguo, then Party Secretary. Given the tensions inspired by Tiananmen, this ambivalent relationship could have been problematic, but I was blessed both with unfailing professional support by a strong front office in Beijing (Ambassadors Lilley and Roy and DCM Pascoe) and two crackerjack reporting officers in the Consulate (Jon Aloisi and John Norris). And there were other positive notes. I enjoyed a series of capable consular officers, who bore with good humor the pressures of the unending visa line; the best secretary I worked within the Foreign Service, Tess Johnston; and a very sensible and helpful senior Chinese employee, Xu Bailing. (Note: Sadly, Xu Bailing died a few years ago.)

Living and working arrangements were somewhat less ideal in those days. Eva and I lived on the second floor of the Consulate, and while the ten-foot commute from breakfast table to office desk was nice, there was a certain lack of privacy. The absence of Marine guards, despite the wide range of our official activities in a difficult environment, compounded the problem in multitudinous ways. On one notable occasion a demented interloper managed to scale the walls, dodge the motion sensors and make it to the door of our apartment, where he tried to persuade Eva to open the door. (I was out, but she resisted his offer of diversion.)

In addition to serving as security officer-in-residence, I did occasional duty as guide. At the behest of my Japanese colleague one Sunday, I toured the Consulate with the then Chairman of Toyota. Mr. Toyoda, it seems, had been conceived in our residence back in the pre-war years when the Toyoda's had been textile barons centered in Shanghai. His aged mother had returned to Japan for his birth, and had never seen Shanghai again, but now she had dispatched him to take pictures for her of the old family home. Mr. Toyoda was accompanied by a staff photographer, but either as an emergency backup or as a gesture of filial piety, he carefully snapped everything himself with a little pocket camera. I can only recall two visible reactions. He was delighted to note that our motor pool in those days was, with the exception of the CG's Chevy, exclusively Toyota. The little rock garden in back brought him to a full stop. “It's so...” Here he paused and gave a little shudder. “It's so Chinese.”

Nora Sun, Commercial Officer (1989-1991)

My tour at the Consulate was during September, 1989 till December, 1991. The climate at the time was somewhat tense right after the June 4 incident. The only action at the Consulate seemed to be in my section -- Commercial Section!! We were the only ones with visitors and the local government was extremely receptive to any requests of meeting we made. The whole Consulate was rather quiet with no Congressional or Administration visitors -- very low key, except our section!

Tess Johnston (1989-1996)

In her autobiography Tess describes returning to Shanghai in September 1989 in the wake of diplomatic and business departures following the June events at Tiananmen. Excerpted with permission from Permanently Temporary: From Berlin to Shanghai in Half a Century by Tess Johnston, published 2010 by Old China Hand Press.

The Consulate was down to a skeleton staff and this left a big vacuum at a time when the reporting requirements were heavy and every hand was needed to get the reports back to Washington....

After my three year absence the city appeared to me virtually unchanged. There were a few new buildings on the road from the airport and one or two hotels. The five-star Portman Hotel was still under construction downtown, but work on it had now halted....

The hotels had previously been the main gathering places for foreigners and as housing had been in short supply, many had lived in them. Now the lobbies were eerily empty and restaurant waiters stood by to serve guests who never came.

Jerome Ogden, Consul General (1992-1994)

My tenure in Shanghai coincided with Shanghai's big push to become the "locomotive" ("dragon head" in Chinese) for the Yangtze River Basin, so a lot of infrastructure projects took off in that period, many with American technology. I participated in the ceremonies to open the first subway, the first stock market, the first elevated highway, the first fiber-optic international telecommunications link, the new water treatment plants, electrical grid modernization, etc.

In 1975, when I first visited Shanghai while at USLO Peking, the trip from Hongqiao airport to the city was mostly through farmland and low-rise hovels until you got to Jiaotong University, not far from the Huai Hai Consulate General office. So Shanghai's growth is a source of wonderment to me every time I go back

Pam Slutz, Political Officer (1991-1994)

Pam (Su Peiqiu) was the Political Office (vice Jon Aloisi), then chief of the Pol/Econ Section and DCG (vice John Norris), and finally acting CG (from May-October 1994, between Ogden and Borich). Her husband Ron Deutch (Du Rongjian), was the Management Officer.

We were fortunate to have been in Shanghai to witness first-hand the landmark economic, physical and political changes that took place during the early 1990s. Our first week (June 1991), we went to the top of the Jinjiang Hotel -- to see the lights of Shanghai. There were none! The city literally rolled up the sidewalks at 1800 hours: no night life, no street lights. We had to shop in the Friendship Store and use FECs. There were a few getihu (hole-in-the wall but private) eateries and small shops -- including the "black market" which wound around in the alleys in the former French quarter on Sundays. But these small entrepreneurs were constantly harassed by the local authorities. There was no traffic to speak of because no one had cars or motorcycles; everyone -- even we -- rode bicycles. There were no bridges over the Huangpu, only the tunnel (dangerous noxious fumes) or the ferry. Pudong was just fields. Getting to Fudan University was a long trip! And our friends at Fudan and other think tanks were nervous about meeting with us. Many dissidents were still in jail in the aftermath of Tiananmen. In short, Shanghai was a slum, milked dry by Beijing of all the revenues derived from its manufacturing/industry, and kept on a very short political and economic leash.

We had to hire our domestic and Embassy staff through DSB, and live in housing provided by DSB. As Pat Wardlaw has noted in his own contribution, we were blessed, nonetheless, to have Xu Bailing. Ron and I visited with him in Shanghai shortly before his death.

And then over Xin Nian in 1992, Deng Xiaoping went on his famous Nan Xun and said something to the effect that “it does not matter what color the cat is as long as it catches the mice.” In other words, it was OK to be a capitalist: “socialist market economy with Chinese characteristics.” And the lights went on in Shanghai! Shanghai went into a building and spending spree. Diane Long, then President of the AMCHAM, did a fantastic job of “door knocking” and attracting American companies. American Fortune 500 companies CEOs (GE, etc.) came to Shanghai eager to invest. McDonnell-Douglas began a second assembly line to meet demands from China Eastern and other regional airlines, and the local Volkswagen assembly plant went into overdrive.

Secretary of Commerce Brown visited in September 1994, (I believe) the first Cabinet-level visitor to Shanghai in many years. Overseas Chinese (read: those whose families fled Shanghai to Hong Kong and Taiwan in 1949) were encouraged to return and to invest. Many were given back their property (for example, the former gangster Du Yuesheng). Overnight, huge blocks of slum housing were cleared (razed to the ground) and people and their possessions moved to the “suburbs” where there were no schools, no transport, no shops. New high-rises with shiny glass windows and neon lights went up. In short order, thousands of people were moved to make way for two new bridges over the Huangpu. Buildings started to go up in Pudong. Migrant laborers, free to travel, left the rural areas and flooded into Shanghai in large numbers. Traffic snarled. Construction on the subway began.

Tess Johnston (and Deke Erh) spearheaded the attempt to preserve as much as possible of the old Shanghai -- especially its unique Art Deco architecture. But it was an uphill battle. I still recall going with Tess to the site of one building (once owned by an American shipping company) that was being gutted -- to try to preserve the mosaic wall panel in the foyer. Too late, it lay in pieces on the floor.

Most of the Tiananmen-era dissidents were released -- only to be re-detained in the wake of the “Most Favored Nation” decision in May 1993 when US economic interests trumped our human rights concerns. Then when the US and other governments agreed to issue visas (and grant political asylum) to many of these dissidents and their families, the Chinese government issued them passports...and they left. I must have provided INS with affidavits for nearly a dozen individuals and their families -- most of whom have settled in Flushing, New York and have become LPRs. Congress released its hold on ASHA funding for the American Center at Fudan University.

We were among the first wave of Consulate staff to move out of “DSB housing” and into a very nice (albeit tiny) apartment in the Shanghai Center high rise apartment complex adjacent to the hotel (which was then part of the Shangri-la chain). For the first time, we were able to hire (and fire) our own domestic -- and Consulate -- staff without having to go through DSB. We began traveling by private car beyond the 25-mile limit -- to Nanjing, Yixing, Hangzhou, Suzhou. I was “permitted” to join a tour to Tibet in 1993, organized by expats residing in Shanghai. Unfortunately, in 1994, the same Shanghai FAO denied us permission to join the tour to Tibet and decided, after some deliberation, to ground us -- no more self-driving by private car to Yixing to buy clay pots! Some policies changed more slowly than others...

Ronald Deutch, Administrative Officer (1991-1994)

When the MSG detachment went fully active -- 1992 -- we secured the original front door facing the street and made the entrance at the garden side. We removed the original metal doors and had a set of heavy wooden doors constructed to look like the wooden doors on the street side. I also oversaw construction of the portico at the garden entrance.

Either RSO David Kidd or Russell (Dal) Polson could likely confirm the exact date the secure entrance went “live”. We continued to use the old entrance but only for large rep events. I also oversaw renovations to the consular section and putting in a new secure pedestrian entrance at the street entrance.

I was usually in trouble with the DSB because I typically never got permission but just did it and then begged forgiveness.

Joe Borich, Consul General (1994-1997), previously posted at consulate 1980-1982 as Economic Officer

It was the spring of 1997 when Newt Gingrich, who was then Speaker of the House, arrived in Shanghai on Easter Sunday morning. He was scheduled to depart for Beijing that evening, but he was mine for the day.

Since it was Easter he wanted to go to church. On our way to the Protestant non-denominational church on Hengshan Road Newt made more than a few references to the “rampant religious persecution” in China that he’d heard and about. I allowed as how there was such persecution in some parts of China, but that it was nowhere near as widespread or systemic as he apparently believed. He was more than a bit surprised to find that there were easily over 1,000 Chinese in or outside of the church (there were too many worshippers for all of them to fit inside). We sat through an unremarkable Easter service (except, of course, for the fact it was all in Chinese) and then went on to our other events for the day, including a lunch with Mayor Xu Kuangdi and an early evening reception with Consulate General.

I took Newt to the airport after the reception and bade him farewell. Upon returning home I decided to give my mother a call, it now being Easter Sunday morning in South Dakota where she lived. Now, there are two things you need to know about my mother: 1) she was a devout Catholic (though quite ecumenical in her view on religion) and 2) she was a devout Democrat. (Somewhere along the way I lost my zeal for both of her passions.) Having wished her a happy Easter, I started the conversation as follows:

(Me) “Mom, guess what? I went to church on Easter Sunday this morning for the first time in 25

(Mom) “Saints be praised”!!

(Me) “With Newt Gingrich.”

(Mom) after a pause of about 30 seconds: “I’ll continue to pray for you, Son.”

Robert Wang, Pol-Econ Officer (1994-1997)

I was head of econ-pol section for all three years and deputy CG to Joe Borich for the last year.

I recall there were about 20-25 American officers and staff (not including family) but may be a bit off. Non-State agencies included: FCS and Agriculture and USIS. We had loads of visitors, including: VP Gore, SecState Christopher and about a dozen CODELs each year. POTUS (Clinton) did not come until 1998 (although I went back to Shanghai from Singapore to help out). Notable CODELS included: Newt Gingrich, Sam Nunn, William Cohen (I think he came as Senator rather than Defense Secretary when I was there)

Particular memories: I attended the opening of the first MacDonald’s (on Huaihai road?), the first ring road (which opened on Oct 1, 1994 and apparently only had one usable entry/exit so the entourage had to make a full circle since it couldn’t get off the road otherwise...but it opened “on time!”), the Oriental Pearl TV Tower (where we took countless visitors) and the various trade zones in Pudong....not to mention the first Paulaner (next to the consulate) and Malone’s (next to the Portman).

Knowing that Joe Borich highlighted the Gingrich visit, I would highlight the visit of the USS Fort McHenry to Shanghai (1995). This was one of the first ship visits to Shanghai and we were told (by the Commander when we boarded the ship) that all of our sailors were instructed to be on their best behavior. But just in case, the sailors were asked to go ashore at least in pairs (sort of like when the first Chinese diplomats came to the States). The consulate set up tours and activities for the sailors, and the ship held a great reception on board for AmCits as well as some in the diplomatic community.

Raymond F. Burghardt, Consul General (1997-1999)

A major event during my time in Shanghai (1997-99) was the three-day visit by President Clinton. I have photos and even a copy of the unclassified scene-setter we sent.

The 1998 Clinton visit to Shanghai may have been the longest ever made by a sitting president to a constituent post. It was enormously complex. In addition to separate POTUS and FLOTUS motorcades, at times there also were separate motorcades and programs for Secretary Albright and Commerce Secretary Daley. In addition to Tom, we hired many other colorful people as TDY assistants. One memorable addition was my old friend Curt Perry, whom I recruited to handle all the Air Force 1 arrangements since he was a pilot who knew a lot about places and also spoke Chinese. I’m sure Curt’s professional background generated considerable interest on the part of Deputy Director Yang and the MSS. There were later some allegations that I had brought Curt on board as “The CG’s Drinking Buddy,” but these were calumnious allegations.

Nora Sun writes: “CG Burghardt rounded me up for that well documented 1998 Clinton trip as well.”

Anthony Sariti, Branch Public Affairs Officer (1997-?)

For me the Clinton visit was most memorable. Many of my “war stories” of that visit (like the comments of my WH liaison who, as he boarded the bus for the airport at the hotel, told me the visit was good but that there had been “too much substance”) would probably not be appropriate for publication. I attach photos of two (unopened) boxes of Clinton M&Ms that were handed out to selected consulate officers.

I arranged for President Clinton to visit an “Internet Cafe,” something quite new in Shanghai at the time. Naturally, when we got there, the owner had stacked the place with the sons and daughters of friends and relatives, but still it made a very presentable “event” in tune with a modernizing China and policy of openness. As the President entered, he was immediately ushered to a table around which had gathered four or five young men, peering intently into their windows on the world. (Happily, the Chinese had unblocked the White House site for the day.)

The President engaged each of the web surfers in animated conversation. It was a great “photo op,” and the cameras were rolling. I had positioned myself on the side of the room next to two young girls who were also ostensibly busy traveling the information highway, but who nonetheless kept stealing glances over their shoulders at the president. After about 10 minutes or so, the President got up and started to leave. The disappointment in the girls’ faces at not having had the chance to talk with the President was all too obvious to me, and so I decided to “make their day.” As the President stood up and started to retrace his steps back to the waiting limo, I caught his attention in true Sam Donaldson style: “Mr. President,” I said, “I think there are two young ladies here who would like to talk with you.” That did it. The President, without saying a word to me, pivoted sharply and made his way over to the small table. Sitting down, he began to talk in his easy and friendly way to the female surfers in the room. As I translated for the President, he asked them what they were doing, and they proudly showed him the sites they were working with...women’s fashion pages! Traditional cultural roles still held sway then, but these girls were not taking a back seat as far as technology was concerned. I often think of that day and am sure that at least two women in China will be telling their children and their children’s children of the day they met US President Bill Clinton at the Internet Cafe.

Jerry Ogden, Consul General (1992 – 1994)

Re the Clinton visit, my friend Tao Wei of (GM) Youth Limousine tells the story of a crisis when the presidential limousine wouldn’t start and the secret service wouldn’t let any outsiders near it to try to fix it. Mr. Tao says someone in the consulate finally vouched for him and he was reluctantly allowed to check under the hood of the limo, which he managed to repair just in time. Someone who was actually there may recall the emergency and the facts more precisely...

Robert D. Griffiths, Pol-Econ Chief (1997-2000)

The 1998 visit of President Clinton was a huge undertaking. The President of course was the main focus, but the First Lady also had her separate schedule, as did Secretary of State Albright. In addition, there were several other cabinet secretaries and a group of six senators. And then there was Chelsea Clinton, who also had her separate schedule. I had a large matrix of where all the different groups were at every hour over the course of the three-day visit, and at one point we had six different motorcades in motion (the motorcade from the airport included 88 vehicles), a nightmare for Chinese security, even if they had not felt the need to control every event down to the last casual patron or bystander.

Anthony Sariti tells a behind the scenes story of the Internet Café.

During a tour of the then-new Shanghai library, it was also a tad puzzling that as President Clinton and his group walked through the facility -- which we had insisted remain open to the public -- not a single person bothered to even look up from his newspaper or book as the President walked by! I guess resources for control ran out, however, when we got to the stock exchange. There again, the place was open for business as usual, but this time apparently the people really were stock brokers and when the President walked onto the floor and began shaking hands, the place turned into near bedlam as people were falling over themselves to shake the President's hand. It was an electrifying moment as the enthusiasm that these young entrepreneurial types had for the U.S. President was clearly evident. In mind, that image was the highlight of the POTUS Shanghai visit in 1998.

Another, more sober event, was after the 1999 accidental bombing of the Chinese Embassy in Belgrade. While the consulate did not sustain the damage that the Embassy did, after the crowds were disbursed from the streets that Saturday evening, we required a massive clean-up to deal with the garbage and debris that had been flung over the wall. Tensions were so high that the Embassy decided to not hold a formal 4th of July reception in Beijing, but left it up to the consulates whether to go ahead. In Shanghai, we did, in a modest but dignified affair that included the singing of the respective national anthems by Chinese and American soloists from the consulate community. To everyone's relief, the entire consular corps and all the appropriate Shanghai officials showed up, and we congratulated ourselves on how "Shanghai is different" and how we all wanted relations to get back on track quickly. After all, "The Emperor is far away." Sorry I don't have, or rather cannot readily find, any graphics to recall the event.

SAS moved to Zhudi from the 3rd Girls Middle School in the summer of 1997. Initially, the entire school met in a temporary facility a few blocks away while the current campus was under construction. Beginning in 1998-99, parts of the school began moving to the present Puxi campus as buildings were completed. I believe that the entire "Puxi" school was on the present campus by 2000. The Pudong campus was under construction in the fall of 1997 and classes began on that campus the 1998-99 school year.

More on the Clinton visit from Tess Johnston, who served at the consulate 1981-1986 and again 1989-96 and is now retired in Shanghai.

Excerpted with permission from Permanently Temporary: From Berlin to Shanghai in Half a Century by Tess Johnston, published 2010 by Old China Hand Press.

... one of the perks of my Shanghai Tours was that over the years I was privileged to meet numerous VIPs and a few U.S. presidents (Reagan, Carter, Bushes I and II and, most recently, Obama). The highlight for me was the visit in July 1998 of President and Mrs. Clinton, along with Secretary of State Madeleine Albright. For that I served as site control officer for the Ohel Rachel Synagogue, where Mrs. Clinton, Chelsea, and Mme. Albright paid a brief official visit. President Clinton, however, went elsewhere and I only got to meet him at the traditional “Meet and Greet” held earlier for the Consulate’s personnel.

On that occasion, held in the hotel where the Presidential party was staying, the Ambassador spoke briefly, I lingered on the back row, far from the podium, as I had been up most of the night manning the Control Room and was weary and rumped. Imagine my surprise to hear the Ambassador mention my name as he handed the President and Mme. Albright copies of two of our books as their official Consulate gifts. The Ambassador then stated that I was famous in the Foreign Service for being the only officer to ever curtail a tour in Paris -- and that to go to a hardship post which Shanghai then was).

I had a greater surprise when President Clinton called out, “Where is she, where is Tess?” Everyone looked around as I raised my hand, smiling modestly, I hoped. The Ambassador asked if I would come forward, but the President simply said, “Get up here!” -- Which I did, with alacrity, trying to smooth out my messy hair as I made my way forward through the crowd. He shook my hand, smiling and exuding the charm for which he was, and still is, famous; he then called for the official White House photographer to take a photo of me presenting the book to him and Mme. Albright.

Ohel Rachel Synagogue - notes from Bea Camp, Robert Griffiths and Tom Biddick

Bea Camp: In 2009 Rabbi Greenberg came to the Consulate to thank us for past (and present and future) efforts on behalf of the Ohel Rachel Synagogue during the past ten years. He presented the consulate with a plaque “In honor of the important role in conserving the light of the historic Ohel Rachel Synagogue. Built in 1921. Celebrating 10 years of the revival of Ohel Rachel, 1999-2009” [Editor’s note: the synagogue was opened in 1920, but not consecrated until January 1921] During the Expo in 2010 the synagogue was opened for Friday and Saturday services, but reverted to its only occasionally open status when the Expo closed. When I attended the 2010 Hanukkah celebration, I was again the recipient of effusive thanks for the consulate role over the years.

Robert Griffiths: In what must have been 1997, I got my first look at the Ohel Rachel Synagogue. Rabbi Schneier was visiting from New York and I joined CG Burghardt and others to accompany him to the site. The building was being used as a warehouse of sorts, and, after searching for an open door, we had to climb over several dusty rolls of carpet to get inside. The Rabbi had been there before and had something to show us. Making our way to one end of the very unkept building, he finally pulled back a curtain to reveal what had been the original Holy of Holies. An inscription in Hebrew was clearly visible engraved in the wall. From then on, the Jewish community, with assistance from the consulate, steadily worked with the Shanghai authorities to restore the building and, it was hoped, return it to the community for its original purpose. Despite the pressure of the upcoming Presidential visit, the authorities were unwilling to allow the building to be used again as a synagogue, but did clean up the building for the visit and by the following year refurbished for use as a museum. On occasion, the Jewish community received permission to use the facility for celebrations of Jewish holidays.

Thomas Biddick: Robert Griffiths' notes on the Ohel Rachel Synagogue bring to mind some further recollections of the Clinton visit to Shanghai in 1998, which likely was one of the more challenging episodes in the 30 year history of the consulate. Robert and CG Ray Burghardt headed the operation, which involved separate programs and motorcades for the President and First Lady. Ray, Robert and the consulate staff got caught in the middle of a series of disputes between the White House advance team on one hand and the Shanghai Waiban on the other. (Details to be provided in someone's memoirs).

To handle the complexities of the advance work, the consulate staff was augmented by TDY and locally-hired Americans. I was hired on contract as FLOTUS control officer, working with a capable group of event officers including Mike Michalek, Bob Wang, Beth Duncan and Tess Johnston. The Waiban was highly suspicious of my involvement as a Chinese-speaking consulate spouse who seemingly appeared out of nowhere. Meanwhile, the FLOTUS advance team was planning a human rights initiative centered on the First Lady's speech. Needless to say, this came to the attention of responsible persons of departments concerned on the Chinese side.

During the course of the visit, while the President was participating in a discussion at the Shanghai Library, the Waiban demanded a copy of our guest list for the First Lady's speech. Apparently they were concerned about the possibility of invitations being issued to human rights activists or other suspicious persons. It was decided that I would return to the consulate immediately to produce such a guest list. Once I was back in our safe haven on Huaihai Zhong Lu, a Waiban vehicle appeared at the entrance. From that point, I received a phone call every five or 10 minutes from Xu Bailing, relaying the Waiban's impatience. An exercise in creative writing was required, since we had distributed the tickets to the First Lady's speech in blocks to several organizations and did not actually have a guest list. After I produced this work of fiction, it was delivered to the waiting Waiban car and I then managed to rejoin the FLOTUS motorcade, my paranoia now in overdrive. Meanwhile, the streets were empty in the entire inner city of Shanghai as the People's Armed Police and other security forces enforced a security blockade.

The First Lady's speech was delivered without incident and the entire visit was deemed a success. But those of us directly involved took awhile to recover from the experience.

1999 Demonstration

Excerpted with permission from Permanently Temporary: From Berlin to Shanghai in Half a Century by Tess Johnston, published 2010 by Old China Hand Press.

In May of 1999 I was reading on the balcony of my lane house when I heard the sound of shouts and excited male voices not too far away. As the road behind my flat led to the Shanghai Stadium I thought perhaps it was a Shanghai victory in a soccer game. That usually caused a riotous reaction. After the last major victory a friend had been down on the Bund when a massive and overjoyed crowd of fans swept through in waves of delirium. The crowd was so dense and the pressure so great that my friend propped his bicycle up against a sturdy light pole at the curb and then placed himself behind it for protection against the surge of the crowd. When they had finally swept past, his heavy bicycle was bent into a curve.

The crowd noise continued and indeed got louder, so I went in and turned on the telly to see what on earth it might be. It was then that I learned of our disastrous bombing of the Chinese Embassy in Belgrade. The crowd that I was hearing was at the front of my lane: It was Chinese students, enraged, screaming and chucking rocks and ink bombs at our Consulate, which lay just across the fence. Of course I had to see what was going on so I headed down my lane toward the street.

Now everyone in my lane knew that I was an American and somehow connected with the Consulate -- trust me, the Chinese always know everything about you -- and I was the only foreigner living in the lane. As I walked along all my neighbors were talking excitedly and several walked toward me. Uh-oh, I thought, are they going to berate me, spit on me, who knows what? I braced myself. What did they say? They told me please not to go out onto the street because it was very dangerous for me to show my Western face out there! I may have been an Ugly American but I was their Ugly American and they did not want me to come to harm. That's China for you!

I thanked them and said I would be careful, that I was just going to peep out the lane to see how big the crowd was. When I got to the head of the lane I saw a whole line of armed police blocking off our entrance to keep the milling students out. They did not want me to go out either, but I talked my way through and lingered around the fringes of the crowd. They were obviously angry but somehow they did not seem that angry; they did not appear to be out for blood. I came back home and watched on TV as the events unfolded at the Embassy and at our consulates all over China. Chengdu got the worst of it. Their perimeter walls were breached and the CG's residence was attacked; luckily they were shaken up but not hurt, but it was a scary scene.

The next day I called a friend in the Consulate where he and some of the staff were still holed up. I told him that if the hostility spilled over into my lane I was going to crawl out my window, onto the roof and then drop down on their side of the fence into the Consulate garden. He laughed and said, no, no, if things got worse over on his side they would climb the fence over onto my roof and drop down into my flat. Either way, it was nice that we were all going to be in the soup together.

I think the protest went on for another day or so, but the students had to get back to classes, and the motorists and pedestrians got tired of the street being cordoned off, so things sort of simmered down, then returned to more-or-less normal. Our Consulate's Chinese char force cleaned off the façade of the main building, threw out the rocks and trash, and the staff probably updated our emergency action plan yet again. Then they go back down to business -- probably lots of reporting business. Another day in the Foreign Service life. I only wished that I could have been on the inside looking out instead of the outside looking in.

In June 2005 we arrived home from a short trip to find that two North Koreans, two days earlier, had jumped our wall -- by climbing a tree outside -- into the compound. Thus began the most intense two weeks of my tenure, and for the whole Consulate. The story ended well, as we sent the two refugees off via Singapore to South Korea. But getting to that point involved non-stop negotiation and coordination with the Shanghai authorities, especially the Foreign Affairs Office and the police, the South Korean Consulate, several airlines, the Embassy, and through the Embassy with the MFA and UN High Commissioner for Refugees Beijing office. Most harrowing was the very complicated efforts to arrange an x-ray screening for tuberculosis for the two refugees. The Department initially forbade us to let the Shanghai police take them out of the compound to a hospital (for fear they would repatriate them), but then relented. But by that time we had arranged for a portable X-ray machine, and did the screening "in-house." They tested negative! Since we kept a twenty-four hour watch on our "guests," the entire Consulate staff rose magnificently to the challenge. Quite a time, but ultimately a small success for a better life for the visitors.

No presidential visits during my three years. But we did host the Special Olympics and held a reception on the Consulate lawn -- together with professional wrestlers. Michelle Kwan was there too.

My interest in pursuing this consulate history project was sparked by DPO Simon Schuchat showing me the original invitation list and guest book from Don Anderson's April 1980 reception that marked the official opening of the consulate. But I was also inspired by events during my first months that indicated an interesting change in official post-1949 Chinese hostility to two old China hands: author Pearl Buck and Yenching University founder/U.S. Ambassador John Leighton Stuart. In September 2008 I traveled to Zhenjiang for a conference on Pearl Buck and the opening of a museum in the house where she grew up; ironically, Chinese scholars now fear that Buck is being forgotten in the U.S. just as she is being rediscovered in China.

In November 2008 I accompanied Ambassador Randt to Hangzhou for the interment of the ashes of John Leighton Stuart, who was the U.S. ambassador in Nanjing when relations were broken in 1949. Mao later wrote an essay titled: Farewell, Leighton Stuart!, basically saying "good riddance" to Stuart's departure. General John Fugh, whose father had vowed to fulfill Stuart's wish to be buried in China, credited the Hangzhou burial to the intervention of then-Zhejiang Party Secretary Xi Jinping. At the gravesite we were surprised to hear "Amazing Grace" followed by the "Star Spangled Banner"; a group of elderly Yenching grads confessed they had hidden a tape recorder in the bushes, figuring that the Hangzhou waiban would not provide any musical accompaniment. Like Buck's home in Zhenjiang, the childhood home of the once-reviled John Leighton Stuart has now been made into a museum that tourists can visit.

Given this seeming willingness to go with the ebb and flow of history, we were taken aback when our consulate reception in honor of Abraham Lincoln's 200th birthday ran afoul of Chinese sensitivities. The day before the event the authorities called me in to ask that we cancel the event. Although we went ahead, half of our guests didn't manage to join us. We had lots of leftover birthday cake as well as food for thought.

Meanwhile, the consulate kept growing and official visitors kept coming. President Obama's November 2009 visit to China started in Shanghai, where he held a memorable Town Hall meeting with students -- every step of which involved hard bargaining. Former President Carter came in January 2009 to help us commemorate the 30th anniversary of the establishment of diplomatic relations; he returned the following year for the Expo. Secretary Clinton visited twice.

But it was our efforts to ensure meaningful U.S. participation in the Shanghai Expo, the largest world's fair in history, that dominated most of 2009 and 2010. Despite heavy odds -- a late start, no government funding, a recession, and critics who thought they could do a better job -- Hillary Clinton's personal commitment to the project in 2009 made it work. From May through October 2010, seven million Chinese got a first-hand look at the U.S. via a visit to the USA Pavilion at Shanghai Expo 2010. President Hu Jintao came during the soft opening in April, followed in May by the Secretaries of Transportation, Commerce, and State. Madeleine Albright led the delegation for our National Day. My colleagues and I had the fun of greeting thousands of VIP visitors, including Arnold Schwarzenegger, Robert DeNiro, Rafael Nadal, and Crown Princess Sirindhorn of Thailand, as well over a third of the Politburo.

No story of modern Shanghai is complete without marveling over infrastructure developments. During these three years the Bund underwent a complete renovation, the Peace Hotel re-opened, the Shanghai World Financial Center was inaugurated as the (then) second tallest building in the world, and the subway system became the longest in the world. Most important for consulate employees was the opening of subway line 10 in April 2010, giving our folks living in Hongqiao a direct line between their homes and the Shanghai Library, a block from the consulate. The "Hongqiao Hub" now connects high speed trains, a new air terminal, and subways, all converging near the old airport. Train travel to Nanjing takes 73 minutes; Hangzhou in 45 minutes by train.
