I recall in the latter part of 1969, after his around-the-world trip, Nixon produced a Report to the Congress on Foreign Policy of the United States. It was the first time that it had ever been done from the White House, not from the Department of State. He got all the NSC staff in there. We sat around in the Cabinet room, and Nixon gave us a little harangue about what our jobs were and how, by God, he was going to run foreign policy.

In the course of this he said, "If the Department of State has had a new idea in the last 25 years, it is not known to me."

That was a lot of nonsense, of course, knowing what Marshall had said to him. Half the people in that room were Foreign Service officers. But Nixon had this thing about the Foreign Service. Those of us who were on detail from the Department had to be very cautious. We tried to be as open as we possibly could, to keep in good, personal contact with Marshall, Alex Johnson, old friends and acquaintances, but it was not the easiest thing in the world. This was because of Kissinger, himself. I think the only time he resolved this problem was later in 1973 when he became Secretary of State himself, and Brent Scowcroft took over as the Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs. I think we worked it out pretty well.

Q: I remember that, on a number of occasions, I would call up John Holdridge over in the White House if something came up and I wanted to get it to Henry's attention. Sometimes I would call up Henry directly. I still have quite a bit of correspondence with Henry about various items. They were always very nice letters, nothing nasty. Nastiness was always done behind your back.

Nixon, when he concluded this trip around the world -- I learned this from somebody who was at the meeting at Camp David -- had the Cabinet and other people up there who were big-wigs. He told them about his trip around the world. In the course of this, he made many nasty digs about the State Department and the Foreign Service -- especially the Foreign Service.

HOLDRIDGE: Let me say one reason why I think it might have happened. Nixon preferred one-on-one in his meetings with chiefs of state and heads of government. In one place, Bangkok, the ambassador, who is a very dear friend of mine and a man I respect enormously, Len Unger -- he wasn't personally involved in this, but his deputy, Norm Hannah was -- went again and again to the mat with Kissinger about Len going in and attending the meeting, as he should have. There is no reason why the ambassador of the country should have been excluded. The same thing, incidentally, happened in the Philippines.

Q: It happened in Indonesia, too, where our ambassador spoke Indonesian. He would have done a better job than the Indonesian Interpreter they used.

HOLDRIDGE: I thought Frank was in that meeting.

Q: He was not in that meeting, and he clamored to get into that meeting. Henry took me aside several times and said that, if Galbraith once more brings that up, he is out.

HOLDRIDGE: This is what I think ruined Norman Hannah's career.

Q: It has been traditional that ambassadors attend these meetings.

HOLDRIDGE: That's right, but Nixon would not have it.

Q: No. He didn't have that, but he didn't have a Secretary of State present. Therefore, we had no record, except what Henry chose to recall, and what he then chose to tell us he recalled. Increasingly, we in the State Department realized that we didn't know all that was going on. When that happens, you begin to lose confidence.

This brings us back to the point you were making, indicating that there were certain differences that existed between you and me with regard to how we should carry on for the Warsaw talks. Should we go in for a high-level meeting, etc.? What was the next move?

I remember very well that Henry sent over and asked our views on this, for whatever they were worth. We would give them. One of the things that I mentioned to him was that I trusted, before we were committed to a high-level meeting, one of our high-level people would have some advance indication that it would result in something that was constructive. Nothing would be worse than to go out there, and then get slapped in the face. It would be the end of all that we hoped to achieve in our U.S.-China relations.

That kind of thing has been distorted in his account in his White House Years. He implies that we were throwing cold water. It was not true at all. All we were saying is that we didn't know all of the pieces in the puzzle. This is the first time I'd heard from John Holdridge about the telegram he had composed on the plane --

HOLDRIDGE: This is the first time I had heard of the problems that faced the State Department with respect to having a high-level representative go to Beijing. This is very interesting. We are, at long last, cross-referencing. [Laughter]

Q: We weren't in communication with each other. John knew certain things. He was under strict secrecy not to tell us. We knew that we didn't know all of the parts. It created a distrust. Naturally, old friends maintain the same kind of ties we preserve all our careers -- John and me - - but it put it to the real test, to be dealing with the same problem and for me not to be privy to all the information that he had access to.

HOLDRIDGE: I wasn't always privy, either. You know, Henry would have three different groups working on a problem in the National Security Council, which might even include China. Not one of the members of those groups knew that the others were working on the same problem. That is the way he did it. It was a paranoiac way of doing things, which I hated. I detested it.

Q: This is a very key point here, because we recently had this trip of Scowcroft and Eagleburger to China. I think it would be the instinct of anybody in the State Department to say, "If they go to China, we trust that there would be some advance understanding with regard to what they might achieve out of such a visit."

To go there and make this highly visible toast, etc., forgetting all the recent, well-remembered incidents in Tiananmen Square would be unthinkable, unless there was some definite result expected out of this thing. We would probably have had some advance indicators that, perhaps, they might make some concessions on this or that, etc. Therefore, it would be worth investing our reputation on such a visit.

HOLDRIDGE: Maybe there had been an advance indicator.

Q: We don't know -- still don't know -- because the White House still operates in this kind of highly-secretive way.

HOLDRIDGE: Let me tell you why. This brings up a little bit about the surroundings of the Kissinger trip to Beijing in July of 1971. The reason that there was no publicity given on this is -- the way Henry Kissinger put it -- if it came out, we would be trying to negotiate our China policy, not with the Chinese but with the Washington Post and the New York Times. He felt that this would be absolutely unacceptable. That is why there was so much secrecy attached to it. Not that we were worried about how people would view it, etc. The question was that advance publicity might have even killed the whole opportunity, because the Congress or the press would have been hanging caveats all over, to the point where we couldn't move. The only way that he saw it was, if you are going to do something like that, you've got to do it in such a way that there are no prior limitations on what you can discuss or how you can go about it.

Q: I am prepared to accept that, but I have some caveats, too. I think the Assistant Secretary of State in charge of that area should be informed.

HOLDRIDGE: I was shocked that Dick Solomon, who is my successor, twice removed, was not present.

Q: That's right. Not to inform me about Henry's trip was almost disastrous. When I was told at a staff meeting in June 1971 that it had just been announced on the radio that Dr. Kissinger had suffered an attack of flu at Islamabad and was taking several days off to recuperate in Muree, I told my staff that no one suffering from Delhi belly would ever drive up into the mountains.

I just said to my people, "well, he's probably gone to China."

I suddenly realized that maybe he had gone to China. So I swore them all to secrecy about our conversation just in time to prevent the leak. What I was saying in my demurrer in early 1970 about having a high-level emissary go to China was that there ought to be some kind of advance indication that it succeed. That was exactly what Henry was doing. He was going out there, in secret. When he got to China, he didn't know whether this was going to result in a Presidential visit, did he?

HOLDRIDGE: Let me say that there had been enough from the Chinese through Ayub Khan in Pakistan to suggest that there would be a positive response. He was not going blindly into outer space.

Q: What I'm saying is that it is terribly unjust for him in his book to be criticizing the State Department on this issue.

HOLDRIDGE: He, of course, was absolutely unjust.

Q: In fact, what he was doing was exactly what we are suggesting he should do. Find out one way or another whether or not this trip would result in something --

HOLDRIDGE: I feel confident that there was something there. When we were talking about the Warsaw talks in 1970 and the whole question of a high-level emissary, all this became moot. In May of 1970, the U.S. military went into Cambodia and Mao Zedong cut off the Warsaw contact by a piece that was signed by Mao, himself, on the front page of the People's Daily. The whole thing languished. There may have been some efforts by Henry via Ayub Khan or whoever to reopen, but nothing really happened.

Then Edgar Snow visited China in the latter part of 1970. He stood next to Mao Zedong on Tiananmen Square for the October 1, 1970, ceremony. I think some word came back through Edgar Snow that there was some receptivity. In March of 1971, there was an issue of Life Magazine, in which Edgar Snow gave some of his accounts of his visit. In this issue, which became almost our Bible, Edgar Snow reported how Mao said a visit by Nixon to China would be welcome, and if he wanted to bring his wife and daughters, too, that would be fine.

Q: By March of 1971, it was very clear that the Chinese had made up their minds. Of course, we had ping-pong diplomacy shortly after that. You made an interesting point about 1970 that I overlooked. That point was our involvement in land warfare against the Vietnamese in Cambodia and bringing Cambodia into the war. There was a very strong Chinese reaction to this thing, and it clearly set back everything.

In the latter part of 1970, it must have been a period in which the Chinese were doing some very serious reevaluation of their total strategic position. By the beginning of 1971, maybe by March, when Snow reported his meeting with Mao, they had already made up their minds that they were going to have to change their policy.

HOLDRIDGE: Yes, I think so. Actually, apropos the strategic threat, about the same time that we started in 1968 to propose the Warsaw resumption, Zhou En-lai was hosting an Albanian military delegation. He took them out to Shuang-changtzu, the missile-testing base, and announced to the world -- to our great interest -- that there had been over 2,000 violations of China's territory by the Soviet Union. In other words, this is a sense of the magnitude of the Soviet threat as the Chinese perceived it.

After a decent interval and after the furor over the Cambodian exercise had died down, the Chinese could once more take a look at their strategic needs, the idea of having one enemy rather than two, and resume the contact with the U.S.

In the early spring of 1971, Henry called me in and said, "We're back on track. I want you to start working on a book." (A "book" meant a collection of issues and talking points on these issues for use by our representatives at high-level meetings.)

Q: There is another interesting point here which is the Cultural Revolution. The Cultural Revolution, as you say, started in 1966. I would say 1965. In any case, it was beginning to peter out in 1971, wasn't it?

HOLDRIDGE: It had already thrown China into such turmoil, that even Mao Zedong had repudiated the Red Guards and thrown 30,000 of them from Beijing out to Yenan, where they were supposed to be able to steel themselves through revolutionary struggle.

Q: In other words, internal events in China were also bringing it to the point of a rapprochement with the United States.

HOLDRIDGE: Yes. I think that the voice of those who preached a less-ideological policy and a more realistic one were beginning to be heard again. Zhou was able to save some of his people from purgatory, keeping them out of jails --

Q: They had their kind of McCarthyism that was now lifting, where people began to say what they thought.

HOLDRIDGE: Yes. I think there was still an intense debate going on in China over the whole merits of this, and they probably continue right to this day. Nevertheless, the strategic considerations were uppermost at that time.

Q: Tell me about the preparations for Henry's trip. At what point were you cut in on it? What was your role in it?

HOLDRIDGE: My role was doing the books. As he said, "Start working up position papers on all the issues that would be discussed with the Chinese."

Except for Vietnam -- I didn't draft those. I drafted the relations with Japan, with Korea and the Korean problem, Southeast Asia, all the various areas in East Asia and the Pacific, which were mine. Henry wanted to talk about Vietnam himself. Of course, I heard what was going on. He took Dick Smyser along on that trip. He was his resident expert on Vietnam, although Dick didn't open his mouth the whole time. [Laughter]

My job was to think up the positions. The way we worked it out is -- first of all, there was a three-inch paragraph which indicated the issue involved. Next came the anticipated Chinese position, and then "your response."

Q: Whose clever idea was it of having -- the United States says and the Chinese say, and then where both agree? To me, the format of the eventual Shanghai communiqué was a stroke of genius. I don't recall seeing any kind of communiqué drafted that way, where you were able to get in your independent positions and differences and then show where you agreed. Where did that idea crop up?

HOLDRIDGE: That came out after the return from the first trip, in preparation for the second. I think that the second visit in October of 1971 brought this formula into play. The Chinese had to say their say. We wanted to make it very plain that we were supporting South Vietnam. The way it worked out is that each laid out his position -- we declared this, the Chinese side declared that.

Q: It is a reflection, I suppose, of your first talks. Henry said that the Chinese sounded off -- I assume it was Zhou En-lai -- for the better part of two days about all of the injustices that China had suffered at the hands of the West. They had to get it off their chest.

HOLDRIDGE: We expected that. At the same time, Zhou was very pragmatic, too. We worked from the early spring of 1971 -- and I made a trip down to Key Biscayne once with the books to show Nixon, who was down at his Florida White House. We finally arranged the take-off and all of this correspondence through the back channels. Again, Kissinger was hypersensitive about any leaks on this. In this particular respect, such a dramatic break with the past, I think he was correct. He didn't want to have our China policy defined by the New York Times and the Washington Post. He wanted to do it himself.

Q: The only thing there is that, as I heard it later on, the Chinese insisted on the secrecy. The fact of the matter is that we insisted on it.

HOLDRIDGE: Henry never intimated that the Chinese laid it on, although they were quite prepared, of course, to accept. We went public on July 15, after we got back. The only problem was making sure that there was some forewarning to everybody concerned.

Q: You wanted to be sure that, when the news broke, that it broke at the same time in Peking as it did in Washington. That was critical.

HOLDRIDGE: We did that. It was at 8:30 or 9:00 at night in Los Angeles. The President was making a speech before the World Affairs Council. That would have been roughly 9:00 A. M. in Beijing, so it was no problem.

The Pakistanis were very helpful in this regard. They were not only the conduit, but they provided the means of transportation.

About the reassurance factor -- we were stepping into the infinite. Getting aboard the airplane around 4:00 A. M. in Rawalpindi, who should we meet aboard the airplane but Chang Wenjin, Wang Haijung, Nancy Tan (Tan Wanshuang), the interpreter, and the guy from the protocol department, Tang Wangbin. Chang Wenjin later was ambassador to Washington. He was one of the senior people in the foreign ministry in Beijing, and had been associated with Zhou En-lai since the time of the Marshall mission. Wang Haijung was Mao Zedong's grandniece. There were four Chinese, plus a Chinese air crew aboard this airplane who would navigate the aircraft once it got into Chinese territorial air.

Chang Wenjin made it very plain that he had been sent by Premier Zhou to reassure us all that we would be well received, and that there would be no problems about security.

Q: You stayed in that compound?

HOLDRIDGE: We stayed in the Tiao Yü Tai. We landed, in fact, at an airport which was south of Beijing. I believe it is adjacent to where China makes its MRBMs and which nobody else has visited. We thought very little of it, of course. We were whisked off the airplane and into those Hung Chi's (Red Flag limousines).

Q: Your presence in Peking was all secret?

HOLDRIDGE: Yes. No one knew.

Q: Were the blinds drawn on the car?

HOLDRIDGE: Yes. People were looking at this cortege. Just like Gorbachev going to Beijing in April of this year, we went in a small door in the Great Hall of the People, underneath the main steps. We went into the Great Hall of the People to talk to the Chinese, to Zhou En-lai. We went up in an elevator about the size of a telephone booth, all crowded together.

I took the opportunity while we were there -- I thought Kissinger ought to know more about China than just seeing the inside of the guest house or the Great Hall -- to suggest to the Chinese, since Beijing is a beautiful city and we were there at a good time, that we take a little time off to see one of the major attractions of Beijing. I suggested the Summer Palace, the Temple of Heaven, or the Forbidden City. The Chinese were nice enough to give us a tour of the Forbidden City one morning. They closed the whole thing off. Nobody else was there. Just us. It was an eerie sensation.

Q: If there had been any foreign newsmen around, thought, that probably would have broken it, wouldn't it?

HOLDRIDGE: In fact, the correspondent of the New York Times was there.

Q: How did you keep him quiet?

HOLDRIDGE: Well, he was in the hospital having his appendix taken out. [Laughter]

Q: He was under heavy sedation. How much time elapsed between Henry's trip and the President's announcement?

HOLDRIDGE: We got there around July 7. We had about two-and-a-half days there. They were tense, by the way. Zhou En-lai would say, after we had had a long afternoon of conversations followed by a dinner -- we would be sitting just among ourselves -- "I will join you at 9:00 when we will resume our talks."

Nine o'clock came, nobody came, nothing happened. Ten o'clock, eleven o'clock, midnight -- Henry really was going through all sorts of paroxysms here, "What is happening? What is going on?"

So we would go out and take a little stroll around the gardens of the Tiao Yü Tai, where we didn't think we could be bugged. He would ask me, and I said, "Well, they are probably debating it."

I had assumed that maybe it was the People's Liberation Army was dragging it's feet, but in retrospect it was really the ideologues, the people who are the kind we see who have been challenging the reform program in Beijing today. These are people who later showed up as the Gang of Four, etc., who challenged this whole idea of an opening to the United States. It was very tense.

Finally, we reached an accord. They came out with a communiqué which talked about both sides renouncing and rejecting hegemonism, which could only mean the Soviet Union. [Laughter] Since we were there, we couldn't be hegemonists because we were renouncing it, and the Chinese weren't hegemonists, either. The only persons who could be were the Soviets.

Q: How far would you say you went in actually framing the positions that were eventually taken in --

HOLDRIDGE: Not very far. This was only the opening gun. That is why the second trip was necessary --

Q: So, what you were really saying is that you were getting the okay on the President's visit, and getting a clear indication that it would result in something.

HOLDRIDGE: That is correct.

Q: You came back knowing that the President was welcome, and that that would be the real opportunity for a new era in our relationship.

HOLDRIDGE: Yes.

Q: Then you went back again in October. What was the purpose of that trip?

HOLDRIDGE: The purpose of that one was to start framing the joint communiqué. I started this whole process by doing a draft. I looked over some other joint communiqués which had been done, and I used that as a skeleton outline and went on from there. What emerged was still quite different, but at least it started the whole process going. This was in September.

Q: Were you using this concept -- the Chinese say, the United States says, where we agree? Were you using that kind of format?

HOLDRIDGE: To an extent, yes. I noticed that it was reflected in other joint communiqués.

Q: What would you say were the difficult points?

HOLDRIDGE: The difficult point was Taiwan. There was no question about that.

Q: You were trying to find the right language.

HOLDRIDGE: Yes. To jump ahead a few months, the night before the Shanghai communiqué was issued, we sat up until the wee small hours of the morning at the hotel in Hangzhou. Chang Wenjin and Foreign Minister Chiao Kuanhua were on one side of the table and Henry was on the other side. They were going back and forth about the wording. It was a very tedious thing.

You are familiar with the last-minute changes on the morning that the communiqué was issued.

Q: I precipitated them.

HOLDRIDGE: Alexander Haig, who was on the National Security Council, made a trip in January of 1972. He said that he also negotiated some more about the joint communiqué. He may have, for all I know.

Q: The idea of that trip was the logistics.

HOLDRIDGE: The logistics, the communications, and all the rest of it. I think that Al, characteristically perhaps, may have made more of it in his book, Caveat, than was actually the case. I don't want to dispute what he has to say.

The process was involved, and it was complicated in October by the fact that the Chinese had just undergone this reputed coup d'etat against Mao Zedong by his formerly-designated heir apparent, Lin Piao. It was an eerie situation in Beijing. The streets were very nearly deserted, as they were when we got there in July. (It struck me then that it was a city like Warsaw, having been bombed out, because it was so still. People looked dazed. It was the Cultural Revolution coming to an end.)

In October, the problem was the military presence. I remember we went to a function at the Great Hall of the People, in which Madam Mao was hosting Henry Kissinger. We saw one of these revolutionary dramas of which Madam Mao was so fond -- and authored, perhaps. On the way back to the Tiao Yü Tai, which was a distance of some four or so miles, at every street intersection along the main road there, there was a lamp hanging down. I think it was a normal street lamp. Under every one there was an armed soldier, standing with an AK-47. It was kind of weird. We had wondered whether, in fact, in the light of the reputed coup, which took place just before the Kissinger mission went, the Chinese would actually follow through with it. They did. Zhou En-lai seemed his usual self, and there didn't seem to be any problem.

In fact, we went out to see the Great Wall. This was going to be one of the high points --

Q: There was no secrecy on this trip?

HOLDRIDGE: No. There are some interesting by-play there, too, in that the Chinese took great care to publicize it, and to show that Yeh Chienying, the old marshall and presumed leader of the PLA, was the one that was squiring Henry around.

Q: That brings us to the president's trip itself. You and I were fellow passengers in the plane going out there. As a matter of fact, so was Scowcroft, Win Lord, and a lot of other people who were featured in China-policy issues.

When we got out to Peking, you were in one building and we were in another. In other words, State and NSC were kept --

HOLDRIDGE: The sheep were separated from the goats, Marshall, I am sorry to say. [Laughter] How Bill Rogers put up with that nonsense as long as he did, I don't know.

Q: Henry would touch base with us occasionally with regard to progress in the talks he was carrying on with the vice foreign minister. I assume that you were very closely involved.

HOLDRIDGE: Actually, it wasn't the vice foreign minister. It was with Zhou En-lai.

Q: The negotiations, I gather, at the working level were more or less conducted by the vice foreign minister.

HOLDRIDGE: We did have some talks about some of the issues, which are "lesser included issues." Those were not much taken up on the Presidential visit. They were taken up on subsequent visits.

Q: What were you doing, then, during those days when we were in Peking, prior to the Shanghai communiqué? We were in Peking for the better part of three or four days, as I recall. We were in one guest house, and you were in the other.

HOLDRIDGE: He managed to sneak off and see Mao Zedong without me, which I hold against him. Again, his propensity for trying to keep it down to --

Q: He saw Mao Zedong twice?

HOLDRIDGE: Yes, it was Nixon, Mao, and Henry, but not yours truly. I said, "What the heck."

I did sit on the conversations that Henry had with Zhou En-lai.

Q: Was there much done in terms of the Shanghai communiqué's framing and wording during that Presidential trip, or had the document been pretty well done?

HOLDRIDGE: It had largely been done. I did one little bit while I was there, and that was on exchange of persons -- a paragraph that was added about newsmen, scientists, etc.

Q: When the President went out there, the Shanghai communiqué was pretty well formulated.

HOLDRIDGE: Yes. The big problem was the wording of that one paragraph on Taiwan.

Q: People on both sides of the Strait -- you eventually did come up with a satisfactory one.

HOLDRIDGE: We changed it from "all people" to "all Chinese." That was on the morning of the communiqué, just before it was issued. There was a last minute scurrying around. This was because there were many people on Taiwan who do not call themselves Chinese. They call themselves Taiwanese. If we had said, "all people," this would mean that the Taiwanese had also maintained a position of one China and that Taiwan as a part of it, which is not necessarily the case. If you said, "all Chinese," this gets you into something else again.

Q: This was not my major intervention. The major intervention had to do with the fact that, in the communiqué, as I saw it, at Hangzhou, it had already been approved by the President and by Zhou En-lai, that it contained language in which we listed all of our existing commitments, and that America would stand behind them. It left out our commitment to Taiwan. I reminded Rogers, when I saw it, that this would certainly revive in people's memories the fact that Dean Acheson similarly left out Korea as one of the places for which we had a commitment and for which he was held responsible for the Korean War -- very unfairly, of course, but there it was. This could really unravel the whole document.

HOLDRIDGE: I don't know that it was all that unfair, Marshall. Harry Truman said the same thing. There were two speeches within a few days of one another in the early part of 1950.

Q: All I'm saying is that this, to me, would have been a great opportunity for Kraslow and others just to pull the whole document apart at a time when we released the Shanghai communiqué. It would have riled up the defenders of Taiwan back in the Republican Party -- people like Vice President Agnew and the Secretary of the Treasury, who had many reservations about the President going out to Peking in the first place.

HOLDRIDGE: Let me add that, when this was presented to the newsmen in Shanghai at the Chin Chiang Hotel, Marshall did a brilliant job of presenting it. He was the briefer, even though he had not been deeply involved in the drafting of it. He was stuck with the job of presenting it to the press. Bringing up that one point, he did orally what we did not say in wording.

Q: Let me just say that you are giving me too much credit. All I did there was to present what had gone on in the counterpart talks, where I had been present. Then Henry took over. Meanwhile, Henry had worked out -- presumably with Zhou En-lai or somebody -- that same night when we were in Hangzhou, an alternative way, leaving out this language about which security treaties we'd stand by, simply leaving it out. But then he said, in response to a question from Kraslow of the Los Angeles Times, that no mention was made there of our commitments to the Republic of China on Taiwan or of our other commitments. These were all covered in the President's state of the world message that he had made earlier on in the year. In that, we said that we stood behind all of our commitments, including to the Republic of China in Taiwan. Henry added this. He hoped this, in view of where this press conference was being held, there would be no further discussion of this point. There weren't.

The way that Henry handled it was brilliant. He did, once and for all, dispose of the problem. I give him credit for it. What I will not give him credit for is the fact that, in his memoirs, he treats my intervention as being lots of silly little, minor nitpicks, very typical of the State Department.

HOLDRIDGE: Henry is a brilliant man, but he is a [expletive deleted] when you really get down to it. [Laughter] He is not the most lovable personality in the world. He is terribly arrogant, and he wants to make sure that nobody else can shed any rays of light on any subject. He does not give credit where credit is due.

Q: I do think that the greatest things that we do sometimes in diplomacy are the things that don't happen. This didn't happen because of my intervention. Since it didn't happen, nobody ever notices. When somebody says exactly the opposite of what you did in his memoirs that everybody reads, clearly it is a time to speak up.

HOLDRIDGE: I read his memoirs, and there are a few other episodes which do not accord with my own memory.

Q: In all this work in the NSC, was the Russian card ever mentioned? What I mean is, was the China card being played as opposed to the Russian card?

HOLDRIDGE: Yes, of course. We did not do it in ways which brought up the Russians as the bugaboo, but we simply pointed out what the Soviets were doing worldwide, and the problems that this posed for both of us. Therefore, we pointed out the advantages which we could gain mutually by recognizing the problem and working together to resolve it.

Q: In many ways, the Soviet problem was the glue that held it together.

HOLDRIDGE: Yes. This was the point from which we started. To give Henry some more credit, from the very beginning our thought was that, in addition to the strategic elements in this relationship which we hoped to develop, we also wanted to assist China in turning away from its inward-looking positions -- its policies which had taken it apart and away from the relationship with the outside world and which had turned it inward. We thought that, maybe by opening up to the United States, this would help to turn China outward, to make it more a normal member of the world community, and something that would be a benefit to the Chinese people as well as to everybody else. This element was there from the very beginning. It was not simply the strategic value.

Q: When was the idea of the U.S. liaison office in Peking? Was that agreed to during the President's visit, earlier during your visits with Henry in China, or did this occur after?

HOLDRIDGE: It was after. It was in January of 1973. We had managed to have a number of visits to China, subsequent to the President's visit. There was one in June of 1972. There was another in the fall when I recall Henry spent some time in Japan. Japan was feeling deeply hurt, having been let out of all of this situation. There was one in January, and then we really got down to brass tacks. In some of these others, we had addressed the issues. Some were claims versus property, the sequestered funds which we had in the United States -- the Chinese assets versus the claims of Americans against the Chinese for property seized, etc. We resolved a number of issues.

By this time, by the way, the State Department was very much a participant. Al Jenkins went along on the October trip and all subsequent ones, to my knowledge, including the President's trip.

In January of 1973, we began to talk about the future relationships between us and the advantages of having a mission. I personally thought that maybe the Chinese would balk at going too far. It was my thought that maybe something in the nature of a trade mission might be more acceptable to them. To my astonishment, it was Zhou En-lai who proposed going on up to the level of a liaison office which, of course, we immediately accepted.

Q: So he was the one that really made the suggestion.

HOLDRIDGE: Again, this is a follow up to the position we had taken as far back as 1969 that we wanted to set up missions. The question was, what kind of a mission would be possible under the circumstances. What would be acceptable? We were willing to go as far as the Chinese were. I didn't think they would make this quantum jump into something which was as advanced as a liaison office. To all intents and purposes, we were a diplomatic mission.

Q: It was really justified in the eyes of the Chinese on the grounds that this was a stepping stone to full recognition. We had to go through the antics of liquidating our relationship with the Republic of China on Taiwan and having a new relationship there. That would take time. During that time, it was important to have a continuation office.

HOLDRIDGE: In the Shanghai communiqué, in fact, there is a paragraph which talks about the ultimate goal of normalization of relations.

Q: It was a seven-year period, then, that we had a liaison office.

HOLDRIDGE: We opened in May of 1973, and it turned into an embassy as of January 1, 1979.

Q: So it was a six-year period. How long was it before the liaison office was actually started? You were one of the first people there.

HOLDRIDGE: Al Jenkins went in several weeks ahead of time to set up shop in the Beijing Hotel. He went in and came out again. We all then went in together. Martha Jenkins came along at that time. My wife was unable to leave. We had to liquidate the house. We had left on such short notice. We went in from Hong Kong in May of 1973 to get to Beijing in time to read (in the Chinese press) that, as of May 1, Deng Xiaoping had been brought out of hiding and had reappeared on the scene, resuscitated.

Q: Zhou En-lai, meanwhile had died?

HOLDRIDGE: No. He was still very much in evidence. He didn't die until 1976. We went in and set up shop, first in the Beijing Hotel. The Chinese were working overtime to finish up a mission for us. It was intended for somebody else, but the Chinese redid it to our specifications, which meant extensive remodeling of the communications section, as you can well imagine. Other things had to be adapted to our needs, but they were very cooperative. To begin with, there were no problems, really.

The Chinese seemed to be going out of their way to be accommodating. That didn't last too long. After a while, I think, we were still catching the backlash of differences within the leadership of the Chinese Communist Party about the merits of opening up to the United States. Our relationship would blow hot and blow cold. Sometimes we would be doing very well, indeed. We would see Chiao Kuan-hua, the foreign minister, who helped to draft the Shanghai communiqué. He would be very congenial. Then we wouldn't see him for a long period, and we would only see the deputy director of whatever office we were working with in the foreign ministry.

We would be summoned from time to time. The phone would ring, and one of the little voices at the other end of the line from the foreign ministry would say that so-and-so would like to see you.

We would say, "What for?"

They would say, "Something involving the liaison office."

This always meant that we were going to be hit between the eyes with some sledgehammer blow. They were going to discipline us for something. It was rather interesting.

Q: Were you head of the office?

HOLDRIDGE: I was deputy. There were two deputies. Al Jenkins was there, but Al took himself out of the running.

Q: Who was the representative, then?

HOLDRIDGE: I usually went.

Q: Who was the chief?

HOLDRIDGE: At that time it was David Bruce, one of our most distinguished diplomats. He was a very great man.

Q: How did he endure all of this? It must have been a very unusual experience.

HOLDRIDGE: Stoically, with great interest. His feet hurt much of the time, but he was fascinated. He thought it was just great. He made the mistake of having his corns removed by a Chinese foot doctor. That was not the most clever move he had ever made in his life. [Laughter] He had to wear Chinese slippers around the office for quite a while thereafter.

We had this on-again, off-again relationship. We were often zapped. I would be called on some kind of a protest given. David would go along sometimes.

On one occasion, for example, one of our young officers from Hong Kong was allowed to visit. He stayed with one of the people in the liaison office and went out bicycle riding. He rode his bicycle right into a compound which was off limits and which said so on a sign. He was stopped by a PLA soldier. We didn't know about that. Two days later, he was down in Hang Zhou, and he called us.

He said, "Something happened which, perhaps, you might be interested knowing about. I was stopped by the Army for going into a proscribed zone."

We winced at this. Sure enough, within several days the phone rang and, Lin Ping, the deputy director of the American department from the foreign ministry, wanted to see us. He always loved to give us the business.

In this particular episode, we thought, "Now, what could it possibly be? Oh, it must be that bicycle episode."

We had already reported it. As soon as he told us, we reported it to Washington. We took note of the problem which could arise. Sure enough, when David Bruce went in to see the Chinese, Mr. Lin Ping delivered this admonition about one of our people going into a military zone. We told him that we had already taken note of it, that he had told us about the episode two days later, and that we had reported it to Washington. We assured him that it would not happen again.

Another problem which we dealt with in the early days was the Chinese exhibition of archeological articles dug up during the Cultural Revolution. They had a special exhibition which they eventually called "cultural artifacts." It was quite an exhibition, including jade body suits, Tang dynasty figurines, all really beautiful things. It was making a tour of the world, and it was going to come to the United States. One of the things we were negotiating with the Chinese was the terms, the agreement, that we would have between our two countries on this exhibition.

The Chinese presented us with an agreement which they had used in every other country worldwide where this thing had been visiting. Lo and behold, when we sent it back, the people in the legal division of the Department objected strenuously. There was not enough protection, etc. We had to go back to the Chinese to try to change certain paragraphs. Each time we suggested a change, the Chinese would toughen up, until the terms were stiffer than ever before which were even more objectionable to the people in "L" (the Legal Division).

Finally, I got to the point where I wrote a cable back saying, "We have to determine whether we want this exhibition to come to the United States or not. If we want it to come, we are going to have to accept the Chinese terms the way they are. They are not going to change. The alternative is no exhibition. Now, what do you want?"

Ultimately, the exhibition came to the United States and was a great success. But the Chinese had, meanwhile, used this little episode to teach us a lesson -- Chinese love to teach lessons.

Q: Looking back over the span of years between the time you were in the liaison office, when you went to Singapore in 1975, and then later on when you were assistant secretary, have you seen the Chinese much easier to deal with? Do you feel that their exposure to us developed a greater mutual understanding and trust than there certainly existed at that time?

HOLDRIDGE: Yes, to an extent. There has undoubtedly been quite a change up until the present and the reaction to the Tiananmen situation of June. Starting with normalization and now more recently, the Chinese had begun to function as normal members of the world community. They joined the IAEA, the World Bank, IMF, have applied for the GATT, and begun to function just like any normal country. They sent 40,000 students to the United States.

People were accessible at various levels of the government -- you could talk to them as individuals and not as ideologues. It used to be so bothersome to me when I talked to Lin Ping. There was always this consciousness of the superiority of China -- the "outer barbarian" versus the "middle kingdom" kind of concept. Lin Ping used to rub it in. He was always smug about the value of the thought of Mao Zedong.

Q: In Singapore, you had a close relationship with Lee Kuan Yew . He has always had an ambivalent attitude towards China. He has had close relations with, and he still visits and spends a week or two every year in Taipei. At the same time, he is the premier of a Chinese city. They have normal relations with Peking, and yet they have this personal relationship with Taiwan.

HOLDRIDGE: Actually, they don't have normal relations yet. They are waiting for Indonesia to take the first step. In fact, when I left Beijing and Lin Ping gave me a farewell lunch, he asked me, "Now that you are going to Singapore, when do you think that normalization between China and Singapore will occur?"

I said, "Well, it is going to have to await Indonesia."

Lin then said, "Ah, then it will take a long time."

Q: Why do they take this stand?

HOLDRIDGE: It is because Indonesia is hypersensitive --

Q: I know why Indonesia feels that way. Why do they feel they have to play second fiddle to Indonesia?

HOLDRIDGE: It is because of the Chineseness there. If these uppity Chinese, as perceived by the Indonesians, were to run ahead of Indonesia and to establish diplomatic relations with Beijing, this might be a touchy, political problem in Singapore's relationships with Indonesia, which Lee Kuan Yew didn't want to have. He had enough problems left over from "Confrontasi" (the confrontation between Indonesia and Malaysia) as you remember. The Chinese in Singapore did not wish to advertise Chineseness by establishing relations with Beijing before Indonesia.

Q: Are you aware of any desires on the part of Peking to have relations with -- HOLDRIDGE: Certainly. Indeed, there is a trade mission there now, operating in the Bank of China. To all intents and purposes, it is like a liaison office.

Q: When I was in Jakarta last year and talked to Suharto, we didn't talk about China. We talked about population issues, basically. I gave a talk in front of an audience of diplomats and other leaders, and during the question and answer period -- this was all open to the press -- they asked me whether I thought that Indonesia should normalize relations with China.

I said, "Well, since we have good relations both with Indonesia and China, I would say yes. I personally hope very much that there would be a restoration of normal relations."

It touched off a storm in the press. The latest word I heard on that is that they are seriously considering --

HOLDRIDGE: They are working on it now, but you were probably a little premature, Marshall. When I was there, I knew it was a little more than premature.

My position on restoration of relations was that it was a question which they will have to decide for themselves, in the light of their own determination of their national interests. As far as we were concerned, we believed it was in the interest of both the U.S. and China to have this relationship, helping to open China to the outside world, to turn it outward, etc.

Q: Basically, that is what I said. I also said, "You asked me the question. I'm answering your question."

I didn't raise it. They raised it.

HOLDRIDGE: I pointed out the advantages which we perceived, but said that they will have to make up their minds themselves.

Q: I remember talking with Lee Kuan Yew one time back in 1964. He said, "We are a rich country, surrounded in a sea of poverty."

He was pointing to Indonesia.

"We are also a Chinese city in a sea of Moslems. We are very lonely. We, therefore, welcome our relationship with the Western world."

I never could quite understand the position that they took in Singapore with regard to nonrecognition of Peking. This is the first time I've ever heard it from you that it was because they were deferential to the Indonesian position. I always thought Lee was worried that it would create tensions amongst the Chinese in Singapore, between those that favored Taiwan and those that favored Peking.

HOLDRIDGE: I'll grant you there is some element of value in that perception, as well. Singapore has only been a nation since 1965. It has only had 25 years of nationhood. Since over 75% of the population is Chinese, Lee wanted to have time for Singapore to develop a sense of national identity. There is also that element in his calculus. He was principally concerned about not rushing ahead of Indonesia.

As to this nationhood or national identity, shortly after we got there, I was talking to one of the Singapore ministers. He mentioned that there had been a soccer game in the Kallang sports stadium between a Chinese team and a Singaporean team. The place was jammed. The minister said that they were holding their breath in the Singapore government to see which team the Singaporeans cheered for. It came as a great sense of relief when the crowd was cheering for the Singapore team. [Laughter]

Q: We have not covered your years with the Agency, or in Indonesia, and as assistant secretary, as well as your years in retirement. These years covered the important years where the United States and China were getting together.

HOLDRIDGE: My last accomplishment regarding China was the communiqué on arms sales to Taiwan on August 17, 1982. Al Haig picked me as his Assistant Secretary for East Asia and the Pacific. I sat in that chair, even though not confirmed until May, as of January 21, 1981. There was no one there to do it since everyone was in a state of disarray. We were having problems about having politicians being appointed to deputy assistant secretary positions, etc. I just picked up, walked over from CIA, and sat down in the chair and functioned.

I ran into some interesting problems about Ed Reischauer's memoirs coming out, talking about nuclear ships visiting Japan, etc.

Q: It was ships with nuclear weapons on them. There were American ships coming into Japanese ports.

HOLDRIDGE: Yes. There was also the time when the United States submarine managed to ram and sink a Japanese fishing vessel, a small freighter, with some loss of life. It didn't stop to pick up the casualties. These are some of the things that I had to deal with.

The very first thing I had to deal with was Taiwan. Our friends in Taiwan saw their great and good friend Reagan come along. Remember, Nixon sent Reagan to Taiwan to explain what was happening after the Shanghai Communiqué. You and I visited and saw Chiang Ching-Kuo in early March of 1972. Later on, to keep things on track, especially over the whole question of the United Nations' membership, Reagan was sent by Nixon to reassure Chang Ching-Kuo that we would stand firmly behind Taiwan and its position internationally. In comes President Reagan, and Taiwan thought that it was going to have it home free. The first thing that I had to worry about was who was going to attend the inaugural ceremony. It was made public by Anna Chennault that there was going to be official representation from Taiwan. The governor of Taiwan, the secretary general of the Kuomintang Party, and the mayor of Taipei were all included to represent Taiwan, the Republic of China, at the inauguration. Chai Zemin, the Chinese ambassador let it be known that if these people showed up, he wouldn't. The last thing we needed in the world to start the Reagan Administration off with was a big fuss over China policy.

The way I resolved that one was first to go to Anna and tell her she had made a dreadful mistake, and that she should do what she could to pull back on the reins. I then made an international phone call in the clear, assuming that ears would be listening all over, to Chuck Cross, the head of our American Institute in Taiwan. During that telephone call, I told him what dreadful consequences would ensue in the relationship with Taiwan if we started out the Reagan Administration with a big brouhaha over China policy.

The word got through, and the secretary general of the Kuomintang Party, who was here, got a diplomatic illness. Jim Lilley, who was in the CIA at the time and was our AIT representative later on, and I went over and called on the poor, ill gentleman in his hospital room over in Alexandria. This was to show that our hearts were in the right place. That was issue number one.

Issue number two was this whole constant arm-sales issue which they had created. Taiwan had been told earlier at some stage in the process that they would get an aircraft which would be an upgrade of the F5E/F series, which they had. It was known as the F5G, and it was carefully designed by Northrop so that it did not have a kind of a range or a loiter time capability which would allow it to be an offensive weapon against the mainland. It would be a fighter interceptor and useful for defensive purposes. Along comes the F5G and Taiwan begins to talk about it all over the place -- in the New York Times, the head of the Chinese nationalist Air Force, and various other leading figures talked about it.

Immediately, this whole arms-sales issue became inflamed. The Chinese fired back their responses. Over a period of time, it became known to us through actual diplomatic representations that they could live with what was there -- the F5E/F -- but they could not accept an upgrade. This they would not go beyond.

Al Haig had reassured them in 1981, when Huang Hua, as foreign minister, visited Washington after a visit of Cancun and to the U.N., and told us that we were going to have to set a deadline on the cessation of sales to Taiwan. Al very strongly resisted that idea, but said across the table that we would be willing to accept limitations on quantity and quality -- keep it at an existing level. We had a big problem about what Taiwan's actual needs were. Various government agencies labored long and diligently to come up with the idea that Taiwan did not need an upgrade. The F5E/F was perfectly adequate for anything which China, at that time, was able to put into the air. They still haven't finished their F-8 which Grumman, I understand, is working on along with a few other subcontractors. The best they have is the MiG-21. That is no great threat to Taiwan, nor was it at the time.

Q: How was it resolved?

HOLDRIDGE: It was a reformulation of the joint Shanghai communiqué in which the Chinese stated that Taiwan was a part of China. This was their long-held position, and we said that we had agreed with this position. There was no problem with that because it was in the Shanghai communiqué. The Chinese then expressed a resolve to continue to pursue the reunification of Taiwan with the mainland by peaceful means -- continue the policy.

We said, "Under these circumstances, we would then find it possible to conduct arm-sales policy toward Taiwan, which would result in no increases in either quantity or quality, and looking to an ultimate resolution of this question."

Q: Wasn't there a congressional resolution at this time with regard to this issue?

HOLDRIDGE: There could have been.

Q: In any case, that resolved the issue.

HOLDRIDGE: Yes. I had to present this joint communiqué. We didn't know until about three days before it became ok to have something, that we were going to get one. The problem was this August 21 date which came up. By August 21, 1982, the Air Force was going to have to notify Congress of the continuation of the F5E/F line. If we didn't have a joint communiqué to resolve this whole question of arms sales to Taiwan by this time, our whole relationship could have been plunged into chaos, if not worse. We had a tight deadline.

Al Haig admits in his book that the best thing he did for his country at this time was to take himself out of the position of Secretary of State. He was so disliked in the White House -- the suspicions were so intense -- that anything that Al would have sent over would have been thrown back into the teeth of the Department of State. Time would have been wasted.

In fact, Al actually opposed the visit of Vice President Bush to China in May of 1982, which happened to cut the Gordian knot. Maybe this is some explanation for why Bush was willing to send Scowcroft. Somebody has to take an initiative. In the course of a visit to other places in Asia such as Korea, Japan, Singapore, Australia, New Zealand, etc., the Chinese had agreed to accept the Vice Presidential visit, which was at the tail end. He went and was able to convince the Chinese that we were absolutely sincere in trying to find a resolution. We weren't trying to do them in, but we had our own domestic problems to take care of, as well.

Q: In looking back over the years, there has been a very stormy relationship with China. We've been dealing with a country that has had very much of a Sino-centric view of the world and still does. What you are saying, in essence, is that a constructive relationship between the United States and China is very fundamental. This is not only in dealing with the problems of today and in the long range. Cooperation between two such important nations -- the most populous nation in the world and the most powerful nation in the world -- is absolutely essential for all of humanity. But we are the ones that have to make the first move every time.

HOLDRIDGE: The Chinese are very much in the mood today -- as they were, in fact, over the years in which I have known China -- as Japan was prior to World War II. You were there as Ambassador Drew's secretary. You know that the Japanese had this terrible chip on their shoulder. They felt that they were being looked down on by others, that they had their own consciousness of their national heritage and national worth. The Japanese were in a very bellicose and belligerent mood -- stripping American women in Tientsin, etc., which occurred at the time of the war between China and Japan in 1937. They had to show the outside world that they weren't going to be pushed around.

China is in something of the same state of mind now. If they were confident of themselves and of their own system and situation, they wouldn't be so difficult to deal with. But, at a time when they are still going through what John Fairbank calls "China's long revolution," which began in 1800 with China finding it necessary to come to terms with the outside world, it is up to us, I am afraid, to make the first move. The Chinese are not likely to do it themselves under the circumstances of the psychological conditions which prevail in Beijing.

Q: In essence, you think that President Bush did the right thing by sending -- HOLDRIDGE: I think it was a very courageous move. I think it was correct, and I hope it succeeds. I hope the Chinese understand, though, for it to succeed, they have to respond.

Q: Could you explain what the situation is right now?

HOLDRIDGE: The sudden appearance of Scowcroft and Eagleburger in Beijing -- unannounced -- like the circumstances surrounding the Kissinger visit to China in July of 1971, has inspired enormous criticism in the American press, the liberal wing, and the conservative wing.

Q: Why has this inspired criticism?

HOLDRIDGE: This is in the wake of the Tiananmen episode last June 4, when the Chinese used military force to suppress the student demonstration. I don't know how many Chinese students were killed, but there were numerous killed. There is revulsion and abhorrence on the part of the United States --

Q: It is whipped up all the more by the presence here of tens of thousands of Chinese students from the Chinese mainland.

HOLDRIDGE: There are 40,000 Chinese students. Now the President has vetoed a congressional bill which would have allowed these people to stay on indefinitely, pending some kind of a return to normalcy on the mainland. I think the President was quite correct in vetoing it. He can handle this problem administratively.

The same thing is true about sanctions. If you codify into law measures which are regarded by the Chinese as hostile to them -- anti-Chinese, which interfere in their own internal affairs -- the Chinese are bound to take note and respond vigorously.

Q: This was so true of the Japanese with the Oriental Exclusion Bill back in 1924. The Japanese never forgot that. That is why I continually pointed out the dangers of the position that we took at the World Population Conference in Mexico City when we identified the Chinese as being the principal culprits, etc. This is a kind of slap in the face that these Oriental countries remember forever.

There is, however, a kind of xenophobic attitude. There is also a feeling, in the case of the Japanese, that they are unique and different.

HOLDRIDGE: That is one of our great problems in dealing with Japan today, and why the Japanese are more competitive. A Japanese businessman, going out into the world, thinks of himself as a samurai, serving the interests of the shogun. He is doing his bit, not just for his company but for Japan. The American is out to make money. If he can't make money under existing circumstances, he throws in the sponge and goes elsewhere. Not the Japanese.

The Chinese have something of the same attitude. I was at a conference just the other day when a young lady was talking about Southeast Asia and the climate for investment there. She began to wax eloquent on the talents of the Chinese. She happened to be from Singapore, married to an American. I thought to myself that she was really laying it on pretty thick. There is this chauvinism on the part of the Chinese in which they think that they can do anything, given the right conditions, and probably better than the rest of you people can.

Q: They also have a very strong sense of the injustice at the hands of the imperial West. They have never forgotten that. That is understandable.

HOLDRIDGE: That was the first issue we ran into after opening up the liaison office. We brought American Marines along with us.

Q: In other words, we had an awful lot of baggage --

HOLDRIDGE: We had a lot of impedimenta we have to shed. The American Marines, in their uniform --

Q: I think this is what President Bush understands. Having been over there in charge of our liaison office, he recognizes that we really have to make the first move. After a while, if you just sit back there and nurse your grudges -- where do you get? You just go into a long, frozen relationship and it doesn't help the Chinese people. It doesn't help the world at a time when we are going to have to have understandings with China on environmental issues, etc. A large segment of the world's population is involved here. I think the President is right in making the first move.

HOLDRIDGE: Not only is it in the interest of the United States, but it is in the interest of the Chinese people that the ideologues, who seem to have regained prominence, be cooled down. I have told you all along of the struggle between the more ideologically inclined and the more realistically inclined people in Beijing that we've dealt with over the years. After Beijing, the Tiananmen episode, the ideologues seem to have regained, if not the upper hand, certainly a lot more prominence. If we take this hard line, we run the danger of isolating those who would like to see progress continue toward a normal relationship with the outside world -

Q: And the flow of students continues to come here. This is terribly important --

HOLDRIDGE: They'll cut off the flow of students --

Q: It was the students that came to the United States for postgraduate training that saved Indonesia economically. By the same token, these students that are here now are China's hope. I think that's what the President understands.

HOLDRIDGE: We cannot afford to isolate ourselves and to let this situation continue -- to isolate the Chinese and force them back into a kind of a situation somewhat akin to what it was under Mao. That would be most egregious error.

Q: John, thank you very much.

JOHN WESLEY JONES

Nanking (1948-1949)

Ambassador John Wesley Jones was born in Sioux City, Iowa in 1911. He received a bachelor's degree from George Washington University in 1930 and joined the Foreign Service in the same year. His career included positions in Mexico, India, Italy, and Washington, DC, and was ambassador to Libya and Peru. Ambassador Jones was interviewed by Horace Torbert in 1988.

JONES: In 1948 after three years in Rome I was transferred to Nanking, China. This of course came as a great surprise to me and to most of the old China hands. But I learned when I got back to the Department that some of my old friends in EUR felt that Johnny Jones had been in Italy long enough, practically since 1935 - from 1935 to 1941 - then four years on the Italian Desk in the Department, and then back in Italy again for another three years, so all together it was about 13 years of unbroken Italian service. So they decided that I should have a change. Also, there was an effort in China to resist a Communist takeover with the increasing Communist influence there. It was felt that someone who had lived through the defeat of Togliatti in the elections in Italy in the 1940s might be a useful member of the staff to point out all the dangers and difficulties of permitting China to become another Communist power.

Q: And also you'd had some China training from your first boss, perhaps.

JONES: Not really. No.

Q: That's interesting. Could Kitty go with you there - to China?

JONES: Oh, yes. Because the Communists were still off in the west. All of the east coast of China was under the control of Chiang Kai-shek and his government.

We were given home leave en route to China in 1948 and for at least one month my wife and three children and I visited my family in Sioux City. My mother was still living there and my brother and his wife were there and were our hosts. Then we proceeded by train to San Francisco and then from San Francisco took a ship -- Dollar Line, I think it was, from San Francisco to Shanghai. In Shanghai we were met by Jack Cabot, who was the Consul General in those days, put on a train and proceeded to Nanking which was the capital of the Nationalist government in 1948.

Dr. Leighton Stuart was the Ambassador there in those days and Lewis Clark was the Minister Counselor of the Embassy. We were promptly moved into very attractive quarters of the Embassy compound just across the road from the Ambassador's residence and the residence of the Minister Counselor, Lewis Clark. Our next door neighbor in the Embassy compound was Livingston Merchant and his wife, Betty. Livy was the Counselor of the Economic Section and I was head of the Political Section.

However, in December of 1948 the Communists under Mao Zedong captured Peking where we had a Consulate General. And when this happened the Ambassador felt so concerned about the wives and children and about the imminent danger of Nanking as the next target of the Communist army that he ordered all wives and children to be evacuated to the Philippines. So within a very short time Kitty and the three children flew in a C-47 with the other wives and children to the Philippines where they were stationed in a kind of temporary camp on the grounds of the Philippine University. I visited them there Christmas of '48 and realized that they were not very comfortable living in rather cramped refugee quarters. My wife always referred to the place disparagingly as Camp P.U.

In any event, in January I was still in Nanking in the Embassy. My wife's family (my father-in-law was with IT&T after his retirement from the Marine Corps) had been transferred to Rome, so my wife and children sailed back to Rome to join her parents in Italy and I was left in the Orient by myself.

Q: You had to keep Jones in Rome as much as possible.

JONES: That's right. That was a long, difficult summer for me. Finally in August of 1949 Ambassador Leighton Stuart was evacuated, went out on a military plane back to the U.S. - Lewis Clark had moved with the government to Canton, which was where Chiang Kai-shek had established his government when the Communist armies kept moving nearer and nearer to Nanking. So while I was not the Chargé d'Affaires, Lewis Clark was the Chargé d'Affaires in Canton, I was in charge of what was left of the Embassy in Nanking after August 1, 1949.

I'm sorry I don't have my dates straight but I think it must have been in April of '49, I was there when the Communists took Nanking. To my astonishment, the Nationalist government had all left so that for 24 or 48 hours, (first time in my life) we were a city without any authority, no one to appeal to. By that time I had moved into Lewis Clark's former house in the Embassy compound, where the Ambassador's residence was as well. That was fairly well walled-around, a well fortified, well protected compound, and we still had some of the Marine guard with us. The thing that was the greatest danger was not the incoming Communist troops who had already crossed the Yangtze, but looters.

I remember standing on the high ground just inside the Embassy compound wall looking out over the city of Nanking and being horrified at all of the fires that had been set, most of them in empty houses belonging to officials of the Chiang Kai-shek government who had fled to Canton leaving their houses with some provisions and some furniture but empty and unoccupied. And after the local populace had ravaged these houses and looted them, they then set fire to them. We were advised by someone who had lived through incidents like this formerly in the Far East that the best way to keep looters away was to assure them that the place was occupied and that there were firearms inside. So, every 15 minutes or every half hour or whenever it seemed appropriate, the Marine guards would shoot their guns off into the air to let prospective looters know that this was not a place that was easy to attack. Because it was occupied and because it was armed, we were really never in any danger of looters coming near because they had so many other unoccupied places that they could go to. I never would have thought that I would welcome the advent of Communist troops into a city where I was living, but I can assure you that it was with some joy that I saw the Communist troops come into Nanking the next day. Order was very quickly restored.

It was possible for me, after a few days, to go out and go to the Chancery, which was outside the Embassy compound, and to continue to conduct business there. I used to walk back and forth to the Chancery during the days that the Communists were in occupation there, never with any concern or fear from local populace or from them.

Q: Did you establish some sort of a relationship with the commanding officer of the Communist groups? Or was it just a stand-off, so to speak.

JONES: It was a stand-off. No, I did not. Because we were still accredited to the government of Chiang Kai-shek so therefore I did not have instructions other than on local or personal basis to be in touch with the local military group, who were there in charge.

This was in April, I think I said.

Q: April of '49.

JONES: April of '49, yes, that was when the Communists took Nanking. And in September I received orders to report to the Department of State.

Q: One of the things that seems very interesting to me about this period is what did you do to keep yourself from going crazy during this time when you had no relations with anybody and in a sense not much work to do other than housekeeping?

JONES: We had a much smaller staff, of course, by this time because most of the staff had been taken by Lewis Clark to Canton. But we did have enough of a staff to keep this little section and what was left of the Embassy in Nanking going and what we did was report. And we were permitted, interestingly enough, to send out coded messages and to continue to use our communications system.

Q: Was this your own radio facility in those days or did they go out over commercial wires?

JONES: Tully, I think they went out over commercial wires. I must confess that I don't remember. This is probably written someplace in my letters home which I will read someday. [N.B. the U.S. and British Embassies in Nanking had their own radio facilities so they did not use commercial wires] But we were permitted to continue to communicate with Shanghai and with Canton and with the Department on what was developing in this area and what our British and French and Italian colleagues were doing. As the Communists moved south and took over Shanghai and then moved on toward Hong Kong, the Department decided that it should close its mission in Nanking and this decision was taken along with most of our allies, including the British government and the Italian government. So an evacuation ship was sent into Shanghai and most of us, the American Embassy and the British Embassy -- Leo Lamb was the British Chargé d'affaires, and the Italian Ambassador, Sergio Fenoaltea, and his staff, we all went out on the same train to Shanghai to board the evacuation ship which was sent there for all of the Western diplomats.

I can remember when I went to the Chinese Communist authorities in Nanking to get passage from the country and my train ticket to Shanghai, I showed them my diplomatic passport and I said that I was the American Chargé d'affaires in Nanking. And they said, we don't recognize you as the Chargé d'affaires. We do not recognize your government or any of its officials. But we will give you a permit, a pass, as an American citizen living in China, to get to Shanghai. So I left Nanking as Mr. Jones, as a non-official of the U.S. government.

When we got to Shanghai we still had a Consulate General there; they had not all been evacuated, some of their staff went out with us. I'm afraid I don't remember the name of the ship now but in any event we went on an evacuation ship to Hong Kong, which was still untouched and still a British colony. The first class on the ship was for the Chiefs of Mission. Since I was the Chargé d'affaires in Nanking and Leo Lamb was the Charge of the British Embassy, we and the Italian Ambassador were all put in one cabin which I think had four bunks. So first class was four bunks and the poor Third Secretaries and Vice Consuls were down in the hold of the ship. I went down once and decided I never wanted to go down again. When I got back up, I couldn't really complain about four to a cabin.

In any event, it was not a very long trip and when we got to Hong Kong we were welcomed there by --

Q: Whoever the Consul General was at the time.

JONES: Yes. And I know his name perfectly well, but --

Q: We can look that up.

JONES: I stayed in Hong Kong long enough to arrange my travel to Italy because I wanted to join my family there. I believe that my home leave orders covered enough of my travel ticket that I was able to pay for the rest of it to join my family. I arrived in Rome at the airport on October 3, 1949.

HENDRIK VAN OSS
Shanghai (1948-1950)

Hendrik Van Oss was born in 1917 in Pennsylvania and graduated from Princeton University. He joined the Department of State in 1942 and the Foreign Service in 1945. His career included positions in China, Vietnam, Malaysia, Austria, Uganda, Mozambique, New Zealand, the Congo, and Washington, DC. Mr. Van Oss was interviewed by Lillian Mullins in 1991.

Q: You were a Foreign Service officer in Shanghai in 1948-50. I understand, Mr. Van Oss, that this was your first post.

VAN OSS: Yes, it was our first post abroad. I had been in the Department for six years before that. I was newly married to Anne and we arrived as freshmen knowing nothing about what a post is like. I knew only a little bit about China.

Q: That harbor was and still is an important one on the east coast of Asia. Do you remember whether it was used very much when you were there?

VAN OSS: I don't recall that it was used very much for trading purposes, but don't forget that in 1948 China was in the last stages of a civil war. People weren't sending much in. However, Shanghai, itself, the post, the Consulate General, was a huge post. It was one of our biggest establishments in the world. I think only Paris and London were larger. It had a large economic section, so they must have been covering something. Probably by this time it was mainly what was going on in the rest of China, not so much worried about actual exports from and imports to Shanghai.

Shanghai was an important city. A cosmopolitan city. The Communists later said it was an excrescence or goiter on the body of China proper. It was different from any other Chinese city except that there were a lot of Chinese there, of course. There were also lots and lots of non-Chinese. There were many German Jewish refugees, White-Russian refugees, Iraqi Jewish refugees. It was a polyglot and fast moving city. A naughty city. A wicked city. A busy city.

Q: When you arrived in June 1948 the Nationalists were still there and all their ships were still there in the harbor. In 1949 didn't they withdraw all the ships out of the harbor and take them to Formosa? Do you remember that?

VAN OSS: I think you have to be aware of what it was like. There weren't many ships in Whangpoo River harbor. The harbor was very extensive and from what we saw in the Bund area, there were very few ships that came in. And when they did come in, like the General Gordon, a great to-do was made over it. So there wasn't a big fleet of commercial vessels just waiting there. Now there may have been in an earlier day, but certainly not in the time we were there.

On the other hand in Soochow Creek there were many, many sampans and other small craft with people living on them and things like that. But big ocean going vessels, there weren't very many. There were ferries that went across the river harbor.

Q: There were French and British zones I understand. Were they north of the city near the race course?

VAN OSS: Well, it is hard to remember. As I recall the old city north of the international city, which is where we had our offices and most of the large buildings and banks were, there was a French section and a British section.

Q: I have put the two race courses up here (pointing to a map of the city). I thought that might pin point something.

VAN OSS: Well, all I know is that we used to go to the race course and to get to where we lived we went past the race course on Bubbling Well road, but I would have thought it was more to the west.

Q: So you arrived in Shanghai in June 1948. The Nationalist hadn't left. What was your assignment?

VAN OSS: I was in the political section. I was a vice consul, third secretary...probably the only one in the Service at that time. My boss was a China hand named A. Sabin Chase who was pretty fluent in Chinese. There were several other people in the section besides myself including Fern Cavender, who was a staff officer doing political work. I can very well remember arriving in Shanghai on the President Cleveland, getting off on a crowded dock. There were no long lines or efficient treatment of passengers. You just got off the boat, made your way through a throng of people to the gate. As you had been warned you kept one hand on your wallet and the other hand on your wife and made your way as best you could. Everything was in great confusion, there was lots of noise. It was quite an experience.

Q: You mean there was no one to meet you at the dock?

VAN OSS: There was but you had to get through that initial throng to get to the place where they were waiting for you. We made it.

Q: Weren't you quite the envy of your colleagues in Washington going to such a romantic place?

VAN OSS: Oh, I don't know. I think they pitied me, thinking we would get killed in the war that was going on.

Q: You didn't have any Chinese language?

VAN OSS: No, but I had applied to be a Chinese language officer and had been accepted as such. But since I had already spent six years in the Department it was felt that I should get going on my so-called career. They told me I could take up the language in Shanghai after I got there. Well I did. I started studying it and got a couple of hundred words under my belt and then I was sent on a temporary assignment to Seoul, South Korea, to help gather documentation, microfilm documents, and other reference material in the government prior to the turning over of control by the U.S. occupying forces to the first South Korean independent government in August, 1948. I was part of a team of four persons. My job was to handle the biographic material. So I spent about six weeks there (Korea) right in the beginning of my tour in Shanghai.

When I got back to Shanghai I found that I had contracted hepatitis in Korea so I spent another six weeks or so in the American military hospital. By the time I got out of the hospital all hell was breaking loose. The Communists were advancing. They had taken Peking and were advancing down towards the Yangtze River and Nanking, which was then the capital of the Nationalist government. A lot of wives were being sent home from the Consulate General. Fortunately for me, Anne was working for the military attaché, so she was allowed to remain. But many people began to leave Shanghai at that time.

So really there was no chance to study the language properly, and I couldn't devote much time to it. Besides many people spoke English.

Q: You were reporting...?

VAN OSS: We were reporting the news of the progress, or lack thereof, of the war as we saw it from Shanghai. Of course there was a big political reporting section in our embassy in Nanking. And we had posts in Hangchow, Mukden, Tientsin, Tsingtao and Peking, and all of them were reporting too. Peking fell just about that time. So we knew pretty much what to expect. In other words the Department was not dependent on Shanghai for everything it learned about what was going on in China. But I dare say we reported just about as much as anybody else.

Q: Do you recall anything particularly that you were assigned to? I am just trying to get a picture of what a junior officer would be given.

VAN OSS: Yes. It is a little difficult to say. I did a number of things. First of all I handled all the biographic stuff because that was what I had done in the Department. I was the so-called "expert". Then I was the main liaison with what they called the Third Force...the liberal non-communist Chinese who we hoped would be friendly to us and a bridge between what we thought even then certainly would become a Communist government and the United States.

There was one fellow, Carson Chang, for example, who was the chairman of one of these third parties. He was an old man, a scholar. I remember his house was just filled with books. The rooms were like the stacks in a library. You had to weave your way between shelves of books. I used to go to see him and get his views on what was happening.

There was another liberal leader, Lo Lung-chi, who had tuberculosis. We were keeping him alive by sending him antibiotics. He was kept under detention by the Nationalist government in a hospital and we would visit him from time to time to deliver the antibiotics and find out what was going on with him.

Also I was protocol officer. John Cabot, the Consul General, appointed me protocol officer. That meant that I had to arrange the seating at tables for his parties. I had to meet people who were not quite important enough for him to meet but important enough so that somebody had to meet them. One of the things that I had to do was whenever Ambassador Leighton Stuart came down from Nanking I had to escort him back to the plane when he left. He came down quite frequently. He was a delightful old gentleman, a scholar and as you probably know a former president of one of the colleges in Peking (Yenching University). He probably knew as much about China as any man alive. So I got to know him reasonably well.

The other job I had to do was take care of Japanese repatriation. The Japanese who were either living in Shanghai or had been caught in Shanghai were being repatriated on a systematic basis back to Japan.

Q: Who was paying for that?

VAN OSS: Well, I guess we were to some extent. We were still very much in control of things in Japan. General MacArthur and his retinue ran the country. The repatriation was quite interesting because it was something I really didn't know much about. I would be in my office and a Japanese would arrive with a long list of names of candidates for repatriation that he would hand to me for approval. I would look at the list very studiously for as long as I thought was decent and then I would give my approval and he would leave. Then the listed Japanese would be shipped out on some ship that would take them back to Japan.

The most interesting development in that connection, and this was something that nobody else paid any attention to...as the Communists came closer to Shanghai there was a great deal of concern as to what should be done with Japanese prisoners of war. There was a prisoner of war camp right outside Shanghai which had all sorts of interesting people in it, including General Onuma (commander of Japanese land forces in China) if I remember his name correctly, and a number of admirals. The whole command structure of the Japanese army and navy that had been left in China after the close of the war. So this became quite a negotiation. General MacArthur sent a Colonel and a troop ship to pick these people up. I had to take the Colonel out to the prison camp and help him negotiate the prisoners' release with the Chinese general in charge. One of the important problems was that Onuma and some of the higher ranking Japanese had been tried in a Chinese court for war crimes, and had recently been acquitted so legally they were no longer prisoners of war, even though they were still in the prisoner of war camp because there was no way to get rid of them. The Colonel said he had been given orders to pick up the prisoners of war and nothing had been said about people who were not prisoners of war. He was not quite sure whether he was authorized to take them. The Chinese General was involved in this and thought they should be included. I expressed the view that it would be very difficult if they were still here if and when there was a change of governments as might happen soon. I suggested to the Colonel that he cable his superiors in Japan and check this out. He did so, indicating that the Consul (he promoted me) strongly recommended that the acquitted officers be taken along with the real prisoners. Of course, MacArthur was smart enough to see that this was the thing to do and agreed.

Another interesting thing was that one of the Japanese generals had suffered a stroke and was very seriously ill. One of the diplomats among the prisoners said that he thought we might lose him if we transported him out of his bed. We arranged for an ambulance to come and pick him up. We had to transport all of these people from the prison to the ship before dawn because we didn't know what the reaction of the crowds in Shanghai would be when we appeared with a lot of ex-Japanese prisoners of war.

Q: They would recognize them?

VAN OSS: Oh, they would know they were Japanese, yes. For all we knew they might attack them. We didn't have any soldiers as escort for protection. So we got some huge trucks and buses and drove them out of the prison while it was still dark. The Japanese command structure was still very much in evidence in the prison. The generals had their aides who carried their luggage. They had furniture, baggage, and quite a lot of possessions. It was like a tour. The prisoners and their belongings were all loaded on the trucks and I remember asking the Chinese General, "Have you any lists of names? Aren't you afraid that some one might be left behind?" He laughed and said, "Don't worry about that, they'll all be on those buses."

We got them out at dawn and over to the dockside. They were all lined up on the dock. The generals were very old men, I was surprised how old they were. They must have been in their sixties-sixties -- to me then that was old. They seemed feeble. They were taken on board. But all the others were lined up and had to go through the degrading experience of being sprayed for vermin, lice, etc. Then they were taken on board. I can remember that an American Brigadier General, whose name I have forgotten, came up to me and asked if General Onama was part of the group. I said that he was and was already on board. The American General said he wanted to go on board and shake Onama's hand because he was a fine soldier. So he did.

That was an interesting little episode as part of my duties.

It is a bit harder to talk about the political reporting because this was the sort of thing that the newspapers were doing. One thing of interest was that we were worried what would happen when the Communists came and took over the city. Mind you, I don't want to go into all the business of whether the Communists would win or lose because this was much more of an issue at home in the U.S. than it was in China. Over there there was no question about the fact that the Communists were winning. The arms and materials we were sending to support the Nationalists were being wasted. They were given to troops which eventually surrendered with all their weapons, so the Communists probably had more of our stuff than the Nationalists had.

So it was quite evident from the time I arrived that it was just a question of a few months. It wasn't just I who felt that way. It was evident to all of us including the Consul General. Of course we had to be a little careful how we expressed this view because there was a very powerful China lobby at home and a number of U.S. Congressmen were very much interested and very strong supporters of Chiang Kai-shek and the Nationalists. We couldn't just make it appear that we were selling him short. So we couldn't report as frankly as I am talking to you, although it was quite evident that we found ways of expressing our views that were more acceptable than these words would have been then.

We were worried about what would happen in the interim between the time that Chiang Kai-shek left and pulled out his troops from Shanghai and the time that the Communists came in. The specter that hovered over our heads was the thought that the Chinese in the old city, all the Chinese poor people and everybody would rise up and plunder the wealthier parts of the city. We were all issued carbines. It was a worry.

So a lot of what Sabin Chase and I were doing was trying to make contact with forces in Shanghai that would be able to exercise some form of control. This was expected to be just a matter of security for a day or a few days at most. We didn't expect that the turn over process would be lengthy. Sabin did most of this work because he spoke fluent Chinese and I did not. I did a lot of the reporting. He formed a contact with a Chinese Colonel who had close contacts with the so-called Red Gang of Shanghai.

To go back a bit...it is quite well known that there were secret societies in Shanghai generally referred to as the Triad. The most powerful group was called the Green Gang, and that was headed by a person called Tu Yueh-shun, a mysterious figure who controlled crime, drugs, the underground, and who was one of the powers behind the political scene in Shanghai. A sort of "godfather". He was also close to Chiang Kai-shek and his henchmen. There was a rival underground group which we called the Red Gang. I can't remember the name of its leader. But the Colonel whom Sabin Chase had contacted was in deep with the Red Gang leader and we arranged through him after a long process of negotiation that the Red Gang would take over and have its men out to keep things under control, prevent rioting, etc. Also, very important was the fact that Lo Lung-chi, whom I mentioned before, needed special protection. We felt that his life was in danger because he was under "protective" care by the Kuomintang. He was confined to a hospital room and the KMT had by this time put a companion in with him, an army officer who was supposed to keep an eye on him at all times. In fact we went up to see Lo while the army officer was there, just to see that he was all right and show the KMT and the army that the American Consulate General was interested in Lo's well being. We were worried lest in the final flurries of pulling out the KMT authorities would start shooting and kill him along with other opposition leaders. They actually did kill some people. People were shot on the street in the last moments of departure.

As it turned out the turnover was relatively quiet. The Nationalist Army and the police pulled out. The city was very quiet. The next morning the Communists came in. The only fighting that took place was between the Communists and the Nationalists at the point of embarkation where the Nationalists were getting on ships to retreat to Formosa. Lo Lung-chi was rescued, I presume, by the Red Gang because I have a picture of Sabin Chase, myself, Lo Lung-chi, the Red Gang leader, the Colonel and various other Chinese, all standing in somebody's garden celebrating Lo's safe escape. He was a very important man and later became a minister in the Communist government.

Lo Lung-chi was not a Communist; like Carson Chung he was a member of the Third Force we were courting hoping that they would remain friendly to us. When the Communists first took over they set up a coalition government. They obviously had their Communist hierarchy but they also appointed people like Lo Lung-chi and various other liberals. Lo Lung-chi was made minister of cultural affairs or something like that. Then when Mao Zedong years later encouraged criticism by suggesting that 100 flowers should bloom, Lo Lung-chi was one of the "flowers" who bloomed. He didn't have his bloom cut off, but he was ejected from the government and that was the last I or anyone else I know of heard of him.

The end of all this was typically Chinese. I think it was about the 23rd of May when the Nationalist leader Chiang Kai-shek held a "victory" march in which he paraded all his troops through the streets of Shanghai with their weapons. There were dancers, bands and all sorts of noise makers. It was called a victory march.

Q: You mean Chiang had a victory march in May of 1949?

VAN OSS: Yes, on May 23, one or two days before the Communists entered. So he had his face saving victory march and then pulled out. That night, the night after the victory march, we saw the police...the police station was right down the road from our apartment house which was right across the street from city hall...we saw trucks loading files and driving off into the distance. The next morning we got up and had breakfast as usual. It was very, very quiet in the city. Doug Foreman, a young language officer who had come in from some other post in China...a lot of our diplomatic personnel were leaving China at the time and going out through Shanghai so this was a collection point for people from other posts and Doug Foreman was among them, living in the apartment above ours in Hamilton House.

He and I decided to go down to the office, about a fifteen minute walk. We started walking down the street and heard a call. Anne was calling us from our balcony which was about eight floors up. She said, "Come back, there is shooting around the Consulate and they don't want anybody going to work." So we came back and went out on our balcony. Our apartment building (Hamilton House) was on one side of a square. On the other three sides of the square were the Metropole Hotel, the building that formerly housed our Consulate General, and the city hall, so it was an important square. The Nationalists had put a sandbag fortification right in the middle of the square, where the cross streets met. There were still some police manning that. We were looking over the wall of our balcony and saw some figures coming down one of the streets from a great distance. As they got closer we could see that they were armed and very much on guard, looking from side to side with guns at the ready. One man was unwinding a big spool of wire as he was coming along...this was for communications, not explosives. They didn't know what they were facing. They didn't realize that this part of the city was theirs for the taking.

They came to the sandbag barricade in the crossroads and lined up on all sides leveling their weapons at it. At a signal they ran over it, took the policeman into custody and disarmed him. Then they realized that they were home free and sort of relaxed. By that time a lot of bystanders had appeared on the scene, and the newly arrived Communist soldiers started to harangue the crowd.

That was the takeover. The only dangerous part was that shooting was still going on close to the Consulate General office which was quite near the point in the harbor at which Nationalist forces were boarding ships in retreat. I think about 30 bullets penetrated the Consulate, but nobody was hurt or injured in any way. The closest person to being injured was Doug Foreman and that was the night or day before. In the weeks before the takeover there was a lot of shelling going on and a lot of military activity. The Communists were advancing steadily and at night you could see explosions on the horizon. Very foolishly we used to go up onto the roof of our building and watch the tracer bullets and explosions in the distance.

Q: Like Baghdad today?

VAN OSS: Yes, very much like Baghdad today. In fact exactly like it except the explosives were not quite as big. On one of the last mornings I remember being wakened by several very loud explosions. Things that just rattled the windows and the bed. I thought we were being shelled. I got up, got my binoculars and tried to find a safe place on the roof to see what was going on. I saw that the Nationalists had blown up the docks, or some installations at the docks, possibly some ammunition dumps.

Towards the end we were on our balcony when we heard a bullet hit our building right up above us. A few seconds later Doug Foreman came down looking rather sheepish and bleeding from a number of little cuts on his chin. He had been standing by the window in the apartment above us and this bullet had hit the metal rim of his window and had shattered the glass. Tiny pieces of glass had cut his chin. That was the one casualty we suffered.

Q: How long did the fighting around the Consulate last?

VAN OSS: The fighting took about a day and a half, maybe less. But we were open for business, so-called, after that. You see, when I say we were "open for business" that is a euphemism because the U.S. government did not immediately jump to recognize the new state of affairs. Since we didn't recognize them, the Communist Chinese did not recognize us. We were no longer members of the American Consulate General, we were simply American citizens. While various things happened that made it necessary for us to contact Chinese Communist officials they never acknowledged that we were doing so in an official capacity. They would always ask, "Why are you complaining about so and so, why doesn't he come and complain himself." And we would say, "Because we are members of the American Consulate General and part of our job is to protect American citizens." They would reply, "Well, we will take note of what you say as American citizens and will take whatever action we see fit."

Q: Did they try to get you to leave?

VAN OSS: No, indeed. They were simply trying to put pressure on us to recognize them. If we didn't recognize them we had no business to transact with them.

Q: So they were well aware of what was going on in Washington?

VAN OSS: Oh, of course. They knew it and we knew that they knew it. This was all part of the game. We held on to our rights to the best of our ability, but we really didn't have any rights.

Q: But you said a lot of our officers had already left other posts. Did we actually close any other posts?

VAN OSS: Yes. We closed Hangchou...

Q: When did we close them, as the Communists came through?

VAN OSS: Yes, when the Communists came through. As I recall, the Communists were bombing Hangchou as one Consul left that city. In fact, I think one of the bombs came close to hitting his ship on the river.

We had problems in Mukden. Angus Ward, who was our Consul General in Mukden was put in jail for allegedly striking a Chinese citizen.

Q: Didn't he take his two dogs to jail with him?

VAN OSS: I would not be surprised if he tried. He was a character. His wife was there too if I remember.

Q: But we were not planning to close Shanghai?

VAN OSS: As of the moment we are talking about -- May, 1949 -- we still hoped, I think, that we could find some way of making contact with the new government, and seeing if we couldn't repair relations. We had hoped that for a long time but as the Communists advanced Mao Zedong had become increasingly anti-American in his pronouncements. One of their big slogans was "leaning to one side." This meant leaning towards the Soviets; that became a big thing with them.

We expected to be open for business and we proceeded on that basis. We tried to make contacts with the Communists but really didn't succeed. Then at some point around November, 1949, the Communists took over our Marine Barracks in Peking. The Marine Barracks had been awarded to us as a result of the treaty at the end of the Boxer Rebellion so we considered it American property. Our government issued a general ultimatum that either we would keep our property and our rights should be respected, or we would have no recourse but to withdraw all of our diplomatic and consular personnel. Of course the Communists had no intentions of giving the Barracks back and didn't, so we announced around December that we would withdraw our people.

From that time on just about all of our activities were related to closing down the Consulate General and arranging for our evacuation. We also announced to all American citizens in China that the bell had now rung and if they wanted to leave China we would take them out with us. Once we were gone we couldn't guarantee the safety of or be responsible for any Americans remaining in China. We couldn't answer for what might happen to them afterwards.

Some of the missionaries announced to us they they would stay. One of the things that I had to do was to help wrap up the USIS operation. There were a lot of books and information materials that I had to dispose of, including the USIS library. We turned most of the books over to the missionaries. They were just delighted to have them. As things turned out they too had to leave eventually. This was after I had left so I don't know much about their circumstances.

The business of trying to leave certainly was not easy because as American citizens, not as official personnel, we had to obey all regulations. And these were incredibly complicated. First of all you had to get an exit permit. To get an exit permit you had to have a residence permit. To get the residence permit you had to go and stand in line and get it...

Q: In person?

VAN OSS: Oh yes. Before this all you did was send one of the Chinese local staff down and they did everything for you. But this was where I learned to carry a paperback book with me wherever I went. Standing in line I got a lot of reading done. Once you got your exit permit you had to put an advertisement in the paper stating that you were going to leave on such and such a date. You had to have an exact departure date. This advertisement was supposed to indicate to anybody who had any claim whatsoever on you that you were going to leave and that you would settle all claims.

Now this wasn't as easy as it sounded because a lot of servants held their masters up and forced them to pay a year's separation pay and so on. A lot of the businessmen were being very brutally treated by their labor force. Kept awake all night bargaining, etc.

Fortunately we didn't have that trouble because we were on good terms with our cook and amah and gave them as much as we could...a lot of foodstuff and clothing...so they left relatively happy and they were decent enough not to hold us up for ransom. And a lot of others had similar relationships. But many of the businessmen and people who had been in Shanghai for a long time did not.

If the ship, or whatever it was we hoped to go out on, didn't arrive, then we had to redo the whole business every month. So we had to go through roughly the same procedure on a monthly basis. This was a not too interesting and rather painful process.

Q: How did you get a departure date?

VAN OSS: Well now this was another laborious process. It wasn't very easy because the Nationalists had imposed a naval blockade on Shanghai and were bombing Shanghai in a rather desultory fashion. They would send a plane or two over every day and drop one or two or five or six bombs. They had armed ships out beyond the harbor entrance to enforce the blockage. And, what was worst in our eyes, was that our own government didn't want to break the blockade even to help get us out. They were on the side of the Nationalists. We were sort of annoyed. We felt that our lives and welfare should have been uppermost in our government's mind and that it should have insisted that an evacuation ship be allowed to enter.

Well at one point we arranged for an old LST to come into Shanghai harbor, but somebody pointed out in one of the Shanghai newspapers that this was really a U.S. military vessel so the Communist officials said that they could not allow a military vessel to enter the sacred waters of China. So that plan was shot down.

Finally we worked out, after a long hard negotiation, a scheme whereby we were to go by train to Tientsin, leave Tientsin harbor by barge which would take us out over the bar where we would transfer from the barge to the General Gordon. That was quite an adventure. The exodus finally took place in April, 1950. We, the remnants of the Shanghai Consulate General, the Embassy in Nanking and one or two other posts, plus several hundred other American residents all descended on Tientsin by train.

This train trip was really some experience. We were in a first class parlor car with a table between every two seats. Anne and I were on one side of a table and Leonard and Helen Bacon were opposite us. There might have been two or three berths made up in the car which were used by some of the children. There was no water in the car and the toilet broke down. We had to go to another car to use the toilet, which was the oriental bomb-sight type which I am sure you are familiar with. If you aren't, there is nothing to sit on, it is just a hole in the floor.

The water eventually came back on but was apparently the only water on the whole train so

Chinese and others from other cars would troop through our car in long lines to get water. The trip took about 48 hours so we had to spend two nights on the train.

I remember one night I let Anne sleep on our seat while I slept on top of some luggage in the baggage room. Leonard Bacon delighted himself by finding a ladder which he put on the aisle floor to keep himself up from the filth, and slept on that. General Soule, our military attaché, slept standing up, giving his wife and daughter his seat.

Eventually we arrived in Tientsin and spent a couple of days there doing all sorts of chores including getting exit permits, having all our papers examined and our jewelry checked through customs, etc.

Q: Was there a hotel?

VAN OSS: Oh yes, there were hotels. This was no problem. Once we were in Tientsin we thought we were through free. But on our final morning we were gathered on the dock side with all the others and everybody was searched. Some women were taken into barge cabins, and were strip searched. We later found out that they were suspected of smuggling out jewelry. I was very nervous because I was not going to stand for that happening to Anne. I had made up my mind if it came to that I would raise as much hell as I could, diplomat or not. But fortunately it didn't happen. In fact we inflicted more damage on the Chinese than they did on us because we had a dachshund named Bao-Tse which we were taking out with us. He was in a little cage. The customs man ordered us to open the cage. We opened the cage; he struck his finger in and Bao Tse tried to take a nip out of it but fortunately missed. That gave us a great deal of satisfaction.

Anyway we got on the lighter and barges eventually. I remember at the last minute when we were all just about ready to embark there was a great commotion outside the gate to the dock. A man appeared who shouted in English that he was an American. He said, "They won't let me out. Take me with you." There was nothing we could do. Somebody went over to see who he was but the Chinese authorities took him in charge. He made a great fuss and eventually they led him away. He had his hands handcuffed and he raised them over his head so that we could see what had happened. I never did find out who it was, although somebody must have. One of the Chinese officials in the very calm, super-quiet manner that Communist authorities adapt when they know they are in control said, "You mustn't worry about them, we will take care of him and give him some education so that he can understand more how he should act toward the People's Republic of China," or words to that effect.

So then we embarked, there was nothing we could do to help this poor fellow. A number of us were on the tug boat which pulled two barges, loaded with the remaining evacuees. We got out over the bar into open water and there was the U.S. troop ship General Gordon waiting for us. But there was a minor storm brewing and the sea became turbulent. We tried to unload one of the barges. Captain Sam Frankel, our naval attaché, almost fell trying to make it up the ladder. So the tug boat and barges pulled away and we decided there was no point in trying to transfer people in the rough water. We spent the night on the tug and barges and waited out the storm. Nobody had expected this, nobody had any food or warm clothing. Anne and I were fortunate in having a blanket available which we shared with someone. The tug had no facilities for passengers and only one toilet. A lot of the women and children were below deck and practically all of them were sea sick.

Q: There were no seats or anything.

VAN OSS: No, we were lying right on the deck huddled under a blanket trying to keep warm and from getting sick.

Q: This was April?

VAN OSS: This was April, 1950. Walter McConaughy, who took John Cabot's place as Consul General, was a very fine leader. He later became one of our leading ambassadors. He set a fine example for us all. During the whole episode he was dressed immaculately with his necktie and jacket, but looked just miserable and grim, and I thought angry. I went up to him and said, "Walter I suppose you are trying to compose a telegram about the outrageous procedures that we have been subjected to?" He said, "No, Hank, I am much more concerned with the contingencies of the moment." He then walked over to the boat railing and punched his lunch, as they say. It was a miserable experience.

The next morning, the storm had abated. We climbed aboard the General Gordon and that was the end of the story.

Q: Not quite, you weren't in Japan yet.

VAN OSS: No, we didn't go to Japan, we went to Hong Kong.

Q: How long did that take?

VAN OSS: Oh, several days. On the General Gordon, we were living as the troops did, in stacked up bunks, with men and women in separate dormitories.

Q: And where was the dachshund?

VAN OSS: The dachshund was with us on the boat on the upper deck somewhere. I went up and exercised him every day.

Q: And there were about a thousand of you?

VAN OSS: Oh, I would have thought so but don't hold me to that.

Q: Give me a number.

VAN OSS: Probably more than that.

Q: Does that mean that everyone was gone? The Embassy was closed?

VAN OSS: All the official personnel were out. I would say almost all of the American citizens were out. But some were not. Some of the businessmen stayed. For example, there was a man named Bill Orchard who was head of the American Express bank in Shanghai. He had to stay because many Chinese had deposited money in his bank years before. In the meantime inflation had taken its toll. The bank wanted to return to them the actual amount they had originally deposited. But they said they wanted what the original deposit was worth now. So they wouldn't let him leave. He stayed in Shanghai quite a while.

Bob Bryan was a well-known lawyer and judge who was employed in the International section of Shanghai. He stayed and eventually was jailed for several years. He had a terrible time. His hair turned white and I think he got beriberi.

Q: To go back before you evacuated, can you tell us how the Department prepared for this Communist takeover which you said looked inevitable?

VAN OSS: Well, obviously by evacuating families and most wives and reducing personnel, cutting what had been a 200 man post down to about 30 or 40. I was lucky enough to be allowed to keep my wife; one other wife stayed. Both Anne and the other wife were working for the Consulate General and the military attaché, which was the reason they were allowed to stay.

Q: Was that Patsy Turner?

VAN OSS: Yes, Patsy Turner. Her husband was Vice Consul Dick Turner.

They also pulled out John Cabot, who had been our Consul General when I first got there. John Cabot was one of our best Foreign Service officers. He was a brilliant officer. A patrician in every sense of the word, which is obvious from his name. He was from Boston, of course. He had been ill for about a year before the Communists came in. The first few weeks or months after the Communists came in were particularly harrowing ones for various reasons. He was under great tension. So eventually the Department decided that it was time to bring him home. So he was transferred. He went out with Ambassador Leighton Stuart.

The person who should have taken charge after him was Sabin Chase, who was the next senior officer. Not only was he the highest ranking, he was also a Chinese language officer. But the Department in its wisdom, and I think in retrospect they were right to do this, decided that instead of putting Sabin Chase in charge, they would appoint Walter McConaughy who was the next highest ranking man at the Embassy, although ten or fifteen years younger than Sabin.

Walter McConaughy was a very fine leader and an excellent Foreign Service officer who eventually became Assistant Secretary of State for Chinese Affairs and Ambassador in various places, including Taiwan.

Sabin Chase was also a very fine officer but a very shy individual and rather soft spoken. He was not an administrator. He readily acknowledged that he knew nothing about it and wasn't really interested. He was a Chinese language officer, a political officer, an analyst, a scholar and those were his fortes.

McConaughy was put in charge and remained in charge until we evacuated the post. Sabin remained the entire time too and relations between the two of them were completely harmonious. Walter took Sabin's advice on all matters of substance and was meticulous in doing his best to keep Sabin from feeling hurt by having been passed over. I think probably Sabin was quite relieved not to have the responsibility of personnel, evacuation and countless administrative details that had to be handled.

So the Department pared the post down to the bone and kept those who they thought would be most able to withstand the tensions that were obviously coming up.

The interesting thing about this whole experience was that it gave me an insight into just what it is like to be in a communist country where the communist government starts from scratch. There are various impressions that I have and I will ramble on about them.

One of them is the noise factor. There were loudspeakers on every street corner and they were turned on incessantly. If it wasn't Chinese music and opera, it was propaganda. We had propaganda in loud Mandarin at all times during the day or night.

Another impression I have is the extreme thoroughness of the Communists. They intruded into every walk of life. They made people attend infinite numbers of political meetings at which Communist officials talked for countless hours repeating endlessly the same slogans and general theories.

The early stages of the Communist takeover didn't have much impact on us except for the fact that our government didn't recognize them and we thus had no official status. But we were not molested, cursed or pelted with mud. On the other hand we had to be very careful because one of the things they did early in the game was to take measures to inform foreigners, white men if you will, that they were no longer on a pedestal, were no better than anyone else. In fact, they were a little bit worse than the citizens of China.

Where this comes into play is that there were still quite a few beggars in Shanghai. Eventually I understand the Communists got rid of them, but they certainly hadn't at this point. The beggars were a nuisance even for the Communists. They would come up to you and would clutch you and do just anything you would allow them to get away with. In the old days you sometimes were forced to push them aside and go about your business. It was about the only thing you could do. Once the Communists had taken over this was no longer possible. The minute you so much as touched a beggar, no matter what he did to you, a policeman would appear and you would be taken into custody. This didn't happen to me but it did happen to a number of Americans and other foreigners. The routine was that they would be hauled before a political commissar, not a judge, and would be asked why they had molested a peaceful citizen of China. Then they would give their case. After that they would be fined or told to write a letter of apology and then allowed to go. But this was unpleasant. It was not great fun.

And, of course, one of the notorious episodes at the time was the Olive case. Bill Olive was a communications officer. On the day the Chinese Communists held their victory parade (without prior notice) -- about a month after the takeover -- Bill Olive happened to be in one car and Anne was following in another car to get gas at the godown where we had our gasoline supply. They had to cross one of those steep road bridges that goes over the canal or creek. Two soldiers jumped out at Bill Olive, who was in the lead, and tried to stop his car. They held up their hands. He either ignored them or didn't see them, drove over the bridge and was stopped on the other side. But Anne was fortunate enough to stop. Bill Olive's car then was sent along the canal on the other side and stopped. Bill put his hand out and motioned to Anne to get out of there, which she did. This was the last we saw of Bill Olive for a while. We didn't know where he was, he had just disappeared.

Eventually we found out that he had been taken to court, in fact was in jail. He told me this story afterwards. He was taken to the police station. All was well. He explained what he was doing. A police officer quizzed him. He asked if he could call the Consulate and just then the police officer was joined by one of these political commissars. The latter took over and claimed that Bill was trying to brush past guards of the Peoples Republic of China and interfere with the victory parade. By this time Bill was a little nervous and asked again to call the Consulate. The commissar said something like there isn't a Consulate any more, he couldn't call.

Then he told Olive that they were going to retain him for a night or two. Olive protested vigorously and the commissar ordered the guards to take him away. Bill struggled and grabbed the bench in front of the desk and knocked over a bottle of ink which, I guess, spilled onto the political commissar. He was then pulled back, thrown to the ground and beaten severely by the armed guards. They then took him and flung him into a jail with a lot of other detainees. That is how we found out where he was.

Later I think they put him into solitary confinement. I am not sure about that but anyway they wouldn't let him sleep. They kept the light on and kept taking him out for interrogation. This turned out to be the first instance of "brainwashing" that any of us had heard about first hand. They told him that the United States was worse than Nazi Germany and had committed grievous sins against the Peoples Republic of China. He, Bill Olive, as a representative of the U.S. government was just as guilty as that government. The grilling went on incessantly for several days. By the end of those days he was so beaten down...oh, and they made him write out endless numbers of confessions. By the end of those few days he could write out exactly what they wanted him to say, and almost believed he was as guilty as they told him he was. This was all in his mind, obviously. He was in pretty bad shape at that point.

Anyway to cut this short, I don't know exactly how long he was in jail but it was something like four or five days, perhaps a week. Eventually Sabin Chase and Bill Supple, our security officer, got him out. They almost got themselves arrested in the process, but they were able to get him released and bring him home. Olive was eventually evacuated from Shanghai. I am not sure what happened to him afterwards. I think he had psychological problems from then on.

This was a rather ominous event.

Q: So our diplomats were really in a very precarious situation?

VAN OSS: The Olive case was the only episode of that sort at the time and you could say that the authorities had some flimsy excuse because he did ignore their original instruction to stop his car. Later on, of course, after we Americans had left, the British stayed behind and were subjected to all kinds of embarrassing experiences. They were jailed, forced to kowtow, frog hop across the room and so on. Terribly humiliating.

Q: But the British recognized Red China and still they had this treatment.

VAN OSS: Yes, but it didn't come right away. It developed over time.

The other thing I wanted to mention about the Chinese Communists was the fact that they would take up several issues at a time and would go all out in support of these issues.

For example, if they were trying to stop dealing on the black market for silver dollars, they would make numerous speeches saying it was sinful to deal on the black market. They would write articles in the newspapers; children in the schools would sing songs about the sins of dealing in the black market. "Leaning to one side" became one of their slogans. Everything had to lean to one side. They would carry it to extremes in their parades by leaning with one shoulder...physically leaning to the left as they marched. Another slogan was "two steps forward, one step back."

Q: What did that mean?

VAN OSS: That is an old Leninist Communist slogan. Two steps forward, one step back. In other words every once in a while something might not work out, but then they would move forward even more.

Q: A great way to excuse your mistakes.

VAN OSS: Yeah. Again in their parade marches their drums would beat, dum, dum, boom; dum, dum, boom. You could see the people marching going two steps forward and then actually taking one step back, then two steps forward again and so on. It became a kind of dance.

Another policy aim, of course, was to go across to Taiwan, defeat the Nationalist forces and capture the "running dog," Chiang Kai-shek. Little kindergarten kids instead of playing ring-around-the-rosy, performed little skits about rowing across the straits, catching Chiang Kai-shek, and then pretending to beat up the child playing the part of Chiang with pillows.

Q: And, yet they never did it.

VAN OSS: No, they never did it. But that was still one of their aims at the time.

Q: What happened commercially? Did stores stay open, was food available?

VAN OSS: The economic situation in Shanghai had become deplorable during the last months of the Nationalists' regime. Inflation was just terrible. The rate would go from say one million yuan to one American dollar one day, to two million to one the next day. At one time Chiang Kai-shek put his son Chiang Ching-kuo in charge of Shanghai. Ching-kuo put in a new exchange rate and forced everybody to turn over gold in exchange for this new currency. He shot a couple of reputable businessmen who patronized the black market in currency. Of course by doing that it meant that nobody could buy anything in Shanghai because the shelves were empty since merchants could get more money by selling their products outside the city at black market rates than inside at the official rate. Eventually Chiang Ching-kuo was forced to lift the limits on the currency and inflation zoomed again.

When the Communists came in they tied the currency to the price at any one time of basic commodities...rice, cotton, tobacco and gold. So if you put a certain amount of money in the bank on a given day, you were credited with the amount of rice, cotton, etc. that that original amount of money could buy. So no matter what happened to the actual currency exchange rate you could always get the same quantity of the basic commodities as you were credited with when you had originally deposited. That pretty well did away with inflation within a very short time.

VAN OSS: Yes, I often wonder why we don't do something like it? Of course our inflation rate has never been that high.

During the period of inflation we used to call home in the U.S. at the beginning of the month. The bill would be equivalent of say U.S. $35 in Chinese currency. We would actually pay the bill at the end of the month. By that time the bill was only equal to about 35 cents.

Another thing the Communists did. They put a severe tax on all vehicles. So if you owned a car you were expected to pay something along the lines of $50 per month tax on that car. This doesn't sound too unreasonable today, but back when a vice consul's salary was something like $4000 a year, it was a heavy sum. So we sent our car home as did most other people and had to take pedicabs.

That really was one of the best things we ever did because we saw more of Shanghai that way than we ever would have seen in a car. In those days I think the Foreign Service spent a great deal of time dealing with other officials, driving in cars and living with the upper crust with very little idea of how the peasants, the poor, the lower classes lived. We used to take walks outside Shanghai and into the villages but there was very little Peace Corps-type community activity, which now I think every young Foreign Service officer probably does without thinking twice about it. We used to do that later at our African posts. But in our days in China we dealt mainly with the people who could give us the information we wanted and didn't worry too much about wandering about in the villages. And, of course, we couldn't; with the Communist war going on we couldn't travel very far beyond city limits.

Q: Did the Communists make any efforts to keep you from contact with the people?

VAN OSS: No, I don't think they made any conscious efforts but the mere fact that we no longer had access to cars except the official cars which took us to work, meant that we just couldn't...and we weren't allowed to travel. We had to have permission for any travel. The war was still going on in the south and we couldn't go down there and there was no point going out west. It was just a time when we were very severely limited as to where we could go, so that inhibited our contacts. And, of course, many of our contacts were afraid to come to us because they were afraid that something would happen to them. And many of our contacts were genuinely trying to get along with the new government, so they wouldn't have phoned us. They began to accuse us of the same things the government was accusing us of doing.

Q: Well, they were probably having to go to these political training classes and learning what to say.

VAN OSS: Yes, a lot of them were.

Q: What about the men in the street, the peasant class, did they seem to welcome this new government?

VAN OSS: I think anything was better for most of them than what they had under the Nationalist government.

Q: Except nothing did become better for them.

VAN OSS: Well, I don't know that I could dogmatically say that. I think probably economically they were better off in some ways. China was not Europe; its average standard of living was much worse than Europe's. The average person in China was poor. There certainly were many poor in the cities. In Shanghai after a typical winter's night the authorities collected bodies off the street of people who had to sleep out and had frozen to death. We saw a bundle in the street outside our house one time coming back from a walk. Our dog started sniffing at it. I went over to see what it was. It was a dead baby. The watchman at our place said it was probably a baby girl that the poor family had not wanted and had thrown out on the street.

There were wealthy businessmen who did very well under the Nationalists, but the man in the street didn't. So I can't say dogmatically that the peasants were worse off under the Communists. They were worse off in the sense that their lives were controlled; they had to obey regulations and couldn't do what they wanted to do, but they couldn't do everything they wished under the Nationalists either. Don't forget Chiang Kai-shek's KMT party structure was very similar to the Communist Party structure. Chiang Ching-kuo, Chiang's son, was trained in Moscow. The people who were affected adversely under the Communists, of course, were those who had money and owned land.

In the early months it wasn't all that bad for us personally. We were not treated the way we felt we should be as American consular representatives, but we weren't harmed.

Q: There was food.

VAN OSS: There was food. I know that soon after we left the beggars were disposed of in some way. They just disappeared from the streets.

Q: Not only was there bombing of the harbor during that time you mention, but also any number of factories.

VAN OSS: I wouldn't put too much stress on the bombing, it didn't amount to very much. It wasn't nearly as severe as the shelling just before the city fell, for example, although the Communists didn't have any planes so there was no bombing from the sky. After Shanghai fell to the Communists, the Nationalists sent over a few planes periodically to drop a few bombs. But we used to go down to the coffee bar in the basement of our Consulate office and use that as our bomb shelter when the sirens went off. Sometimes we would be upstairs and a plane would appear without a warning siren. On one such occasion, I watched a Nationalist plane bombard and sink a vessel in the river.

Carrying on about what life was like under the Communists, there wasn't very much in the way of entertainment, but there were a few Chinese operas we could watch. One of the good things that I can still remember was seeing one of the most famous old Chinese actors, Mai Lan-fang. He was in his declining years as an actor, in his late fifties, I guess. In traditional Chinese opera the female parts were taken by men and Mai Lan-fang was one of the most famous of all female impersonators. We saw him twice. He really put on a tremendous performance. He was graceful slender, made up to look like a woman, sang in a high falsetto, had all the stylized gestures that actors have in Chinese opera. The only trouble was that whenever he turned his profile you could see that he had at least two or maybe three double chins. That was the only sign of age.

Another thing we did for entertainment...there were a number of refugee musicians -- White Russians, German Jews, etc. In particular there were two Czech brothers who played the cello and the first violin, a Chinese female pianist who was very, very good, and an old White Russian violist. Walter McConaughy was a very accomplished clarinetist. Our hosts, the Abrahams, were Iraqi Jews who had made a small fortune as merchants in Shanghai. They used to have, I think once a week, chamber music sessions where people like us attended and played Beethoven, Mozart, Bach. Sometimes they would invite others in and play octets. That was very soul satisfying.

The rest of the entertainment was done by ourselves. We had parties, played bridge...

Q: Then you went to the race course I suppose?

VAN OSS: We did, but we went to the race course to play softball. I never saw a horse race in Shanghai. But I did play a lot of softball.

Oh, another thing we did...there was an American Club and a British Country Club. These combined forces after the Communists came in. The British Country Club was used in the winter because it had an indoor pool and various other indoor recreational activities. The American Club was used in the summer. The British would come out and join us. We had the usual contests in softball where the British played our game, and then we would play the British in cricket. I remember the cricket game particularly because the British came to bat first and hit the ball very far, but they didn't realize that as baseball players we Americans knew how to catch, so we caught all their long balls. They made only about five runs. We made about fifteen and won the first innings. But in the second innings the British had learned from their experience, kept the ball on the ground and made about 200 runs while we continued to make about fifteen.

Q: Was there a golf course anywhere around?

VAN OSS: There was, but I didn't play golf in those days. I did a lot of swimming in the American Club outdoor pool.

Q: I wonder who laid out the golf course? How long had it been there?

VAN OSS: I have no idea. I seem to remember that there was a golf course in the race course grounds. But I may be thinking of something else. But at any rate I didn't play golf. I have played golf since but not at that time.

Q: It just stays in my mind because I remember a diplomat who also had done a lot out in the Far East and was with us in Bucharest in the fifties and we had this little six hole golf course left over. The Communists had been persuaded to leave six holes of King Carol's eighteen holes. This diplomat used to say that this was the last golf course going East until you get to Shanghai. So that is why I ask, there must have been a golf course in Shanghai.

VAN OSS: One of the other things I might mention is that we lived quite remarkably well for a few months in Shanghai after the Communists took over because we had quite a large number of houses that we had acquired...German property that we had taken over after the war. We wanted to maintain these houses so a number of us who had been living in an apartment building were awarded houses. I got Ruben Thomas's house, he was the administrative officer who had left by this time. A delightful house out on what we called Amherst Avenue. It had lovely furniture, a walled yard, just a very nice comfortable house with a fireplace in each bedroom, central heating, etc. All officers had comparable quarters for several months. Then as the time approached for us to leave, and as things began to get dicier and less pleasant, we were all brought together so that we could be taken out more easily. We were collected into an apartment house owned by the Consulate General. That was all right too but not nearly as elegant as our Amherst Avenue dwelling.

Q: Did you get your personal belongings shipped out?

VAN OSS: Yes, we shipped them out when we left Hamilton House, the first apartment house.

Q: So ships were still coming in at that time?

VAN OSS: Yes, they were, but they had to run the Nationalist blockade. We thought we were very clever, and I guess we were, because we used a Soviet packing company. We figured that it would be more likely to be able to get our stuff out than an American company, although I don't think there was one there at that time.

Q: I wonder why there was a Soviet one?

VAN OSS: Well, this was owned by a Russian and Russian firms were beginning to come into evidence in Shanghai. There had been a Soviet Consulate General there even under the Nationalists.

Q: They had diplomatic relations with...

VAN OSS: Well, I think they still had some relations with the Nationalist government because I can remember one of the Soviet military attachés joshing Fern Cavender. Anyway, we used this Soviet packer. He packed up our belongings which didn't amount to very much in those days...mainly books. They were shipped out to Saigon which was our next post. We had hoped to be sent home on leave after Shanghai because we were all pretty tired out from being under considerable tension and working long hours. But we were assigned to Saigon. In fact, we were assigned to Saigon and ordered to leave at once at a time when there was no way any of us could get out of Shanghai.

Q: Was it that the Department was just unaware of what you were going through?

VAN OSS: I think certain clerks in the Personnel Section were told that I was being assigned to Saigon, so they went through process B and then sent the usual form cable. We still had some cables coming in through U.S. Naval ships that were still anchored outside Shanghai and able to relay them to us. This was about six months before we got out.

Q: Until when could you keep cable traffic to the Department?

VAN OSS: The Navy kept a ship offshore and we had our communications for quite a while, perhaps several months, after the Communists came in. One day we saw a police car and a bunch of soldiers in a truck approach the Consulate General...(We had already destroyed virtually all our files except the ones that we needed for our daily work. We burned stuff that had been in the Shanghai Consulate files for many years, including old narcotics records among others. It took us a couple of days to get rid of them. The neighbors complained because of all the smoke and ashes. Unfortunately, by this time it was too late to ship any of the stuff out. Anyway we still had our code room. We were allowed to send letters to our parents in fifty words or less by cable through the Navy services.)

We saw this car pulling up and knew at once that the police were coming in to close our code room. At that time we didn't know how far they were going to go. So I went up on the roof where we had an incinerator and took all the classified files left and burned them. As it turned out they didn't impound our documents, they just put a seal on the code room. So that pretty well shut us down. From then on we sent letters out whenever we could get them on a ship or whenever anybody left the place, in any way we could. Sometimes we tried the open mail and strangely enough most of our letters apparently got home.

Q: So then you had no communications with the Department?

VAN OSS: It seems to me we had people in Canton which was still open and we were able to get some stuff to them. But I just don't know how we did it after the code room closed. I don't think couriers were coming in. It may be that the Department just telegraphed through open wires and we did the same.

I remember at one point officers had to take turns sleeping in the code room for security.

Q: We now move on to the period of 1951-53 when he was Consul and Principal Officer in Kuala Lumpur, Malaya.

CHARLES T. CROSS
Taipei, Taiwan (1949-1950)

Ambassador Charles T. Cross was born in China in 1922. He attended Carleton College and Yale University, and served as a lieutenant overseas in the U.S. Marine Corps from 1942-1946. His assignments abroad included Taipei, Jakarta, Hong Kong, Kuala Lumpur, Alexandria, Nicosia, London and Danang, with an ambassadorship to Singapore. Ambassador Cross was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2001.

Q: When did you join USIS? What were your first assignments?

CROSS: June, 1949. I started in Taipei. We had been assigned to Chungking, but just before we boarded the ship on our way to Hong Kong, we were told that the assignment had been changed to Taipei because the State Department had withdrawn all our personnel from Chungking.

We were in Taipei from August, 1949 to January, 1950. My wife had gotten a job at the university. The tour was cut short for a very interesting reason. Matters were progressing quite well in Taipei. The U.S. had bombed the city quite heavily during the war, but the Taiwanese and the nationalists were moving along quite smartly in reconstruction. But the Department became rattled; it thought that the island would fall into communist hands. It sent a fellow by the name of Krentz, who had been in Taipei as consul general at one time. His task was to get us all to leave. The staff had met together and had assessed the situation in Taipei. We sent a message to the Department saying that in our view, the Chinese on Taiwan had decided to stick with the Nationalists. We called them "the distillation of defeat" in that they could have joined the Communists on the Mainland but did not. That suggested that they would oppose any communist takeover and that in our view, there was not a danger of Taipei falling into the wrong hands.

The Department, of course, did not accept our view. I said that I would remain in Taipei, but I would send my family to Hong Kong. That was not acceptable because the Department saw Hong Kong as also falling to the Communists. I then suggested Japan, but that was also turned down because it was under the Occupation. It suggested that my family be repatriated to the U.S.; that was not acceptable to us because we had no place to live there.

Finally, all of us who had families were transferred to other posts - all of which were by any standard far more dangerous than Taipei. We went to Jakarta in the middle of the transfer of power from the Dutch to the Indonesians. One family went to Saigon; one went to Rangoon where the Red Flag Communists and the White Flag Communists were engaged in a war. One family went to Seoul - just before the end of the Korean war. Ed Martin went to Burma. Dave Osborn went to Japan, I believe. Some of the CIA officers were sent to other posts. Some people sent their families to the U.S. and then sat in Taipei for many months - in perfect safety and comfort.

Q: This is a very interesting story. You said that it was the Department that misread the situation.

CROSS: Indeed. The decision was made at the highest levels of the Department.

Q: When you first arrived in Taipei, what was your assignment?

CROSS: My first job was to open some branch libraries throughout the island. I went first to Taichung and Kaohsiung to talk to owners of some stores. We opened USIS libraries in both places with locally-hired librarians. We gave them books and they were in business. On one occasion, I was sent around Taiwan - I was one of the first people in the consulate to travel all around the island. Now it can be done easily, but in 1950 the roads on the east side of the island were cut right into the cliffs. They were very narrow and some parts were still unpaved. Traffic had to be directed so that passage was open only in one direction - changing that direction every two hours or so.

Everywhere I went I was treated royally, as if I were the ambassador himself. The Chinese refused to accept the idea that even one as low in rank as I would not have some goodies to bring them. But our policy was that we were not going to do anything to support the Nationalists - at that time, anyway.

I took notes. I remember one case in which a Chinese army communications officer asked for some equipment. I told him that I thought we would not honor his request. He replied that when we sent communications equipment to Taiwan, we should make sure it got to him. By the time I finished this five day trip around the island, I found that we were again sending a lot of equipment to the Nationalists - some of which was communications material.

Q: Was there in late 1949, an obvious distaste for the Nationalists? Did people think they were losers who didn't have a chance? Was our policy under review?

CROSS: I think there was a desire to write them off, so that we could start all over again. There was a feeling that they would lose Taiwan because they had given up on the mainland. You have to remember that many of the losses on the mainland had much to do with defections. I think that experience weighed heavily on our policy makers. They didn't believe our "distillation of defeat" theory. The hard-core Chinese - Chiang Kai-shek, some intellectuals, some doctors, the western trained - didn't see it as we did. These people were less pro-Nationalist than they were anti-Communists. They were scared.

Q: Were there any signs at the time of frictions between the mainland Nationalists and the native Taiwanese?

CROSS: When I arrived, we talked to the Taiwanese in Japanese and to the mainlanders in Mandarin. I still had enough Japanese to carry on a conversation. The Taiwanese had been treated very badly by the nationalists, including massacres. The consulate was in a difficult position because we were under surveillance all the time. Yet we had to have contacts with the Taiwanese. We tried to discourage them from coming to our homes where they might be arrested. We would meet them casually in a variety of places.

Q: The nationalists were pretty tough.

CROSS: They were, but they were also tough on their own members. Any sign of doubt, particularly if it might result in a defection, was immediately squelched. The Nationalists had learned a lesson from their experiences on the Mainland. Even today, in China, you will find people who will do the right thing. Then and now, these people find ways of doing what they consider right even if the authorities don't permit it. They will pursue their education regardless.

There were some who worked for the Joint Commission for Rural Reconstruction (JCRR) - a joint American-Chinese endeavor which had been in existence on the mainland and was continued on Taiwan. They proceeded without government support and developed a land distribution program which became one of the most effective U.S. assistance programs anywhere in the world.

I think that the top KMT officials behaved in one way, while some of their subordinates behaved somewhat differently. Then there were the Taiwanese. The more enlightened KMT officials and the Taiwanese began to meet and slowly the two began to merge. That is the situation today; Taiwan has a Taiwanese president.

Q: You mentioned that your wife was teaching. What were her experiences?

CROSS: She taught at Taiwan Nationalist University - a large school. She taught American literature - novels. There were no American novels available on the island, so she typed out the "Red Badge of Courage" on a little typewriter and made 14 copies. Her classroom was without a ceiling - it had been blown up; a tarp was used instead. She also participated in an English language radio program; she was "Mrs. Chase." The role of a Mr. Lee was played by David Osborn, who at the time was also employed by USIS. The core theme of the program was that Mrs. Chase would meet Mr. Lee some place where they held a conversation. They would pronounce the words slowly at first and then in normal rhythm. At the start, they had no audience. After two or three broadcasts, their listeners totaled 20-30,000.

Q: Did you or your wife try to reach out to the Taiwanese or was it policy to focus on the Nationalists?

CROSS: We tried to meet as many Taiwanese as possible, but in her university class there were only a couple of Taiwanese students. The other dozen or so of her students were mainlanders who had already progressed some ways to knowledge of English.

Q: After you and your colleagues left Taipei, did we have any residual representation there?

CROSS: Indeed and it proceeded quite well with just the remnants of the consulate.

JEROME K. HOLLOWAY

Consular Officer
Shanghai (1949-1950)

Hong Kong (1952-1957)

Jerome K. Holloway was born in Pennsylvania in 1923. He received his bachelor's degree from Catholic University in 1947 and his master's from the University of Michigan in 1959. He served in the US Navy during World War II. He joined the Foreign Service in 1947. His overseas posts include Rangoon, Shanghai, Bremen, Hong Kong, Tokyo, Stockholm, and Osaka-Kobe. Mr. Holloway was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on June 16, 1989.

Q: Now we might move to your next assignment, which was Shanghai. This was when?

HOLLOWAY: This was in the spring of '49.

Q: How did you feel about this?

HOLLOWAY: Well, I was, frankly, exhilarated. Rangoon wasn't really all that exciting a post, and here I was being thrown into one of the world's greatest revolutions.

Q: Could you describe what the situation was at the point when you set foot in China?

HOLLOWAY: It was collapsing! The Nationalists were retreating everywhere. There was some talk of making a stand at the Yangtze, or south of the Yangtze. But as we later found out, the communists crossed the Yangtze with remarkably light losses.

There was, as you remember, the fight back at home was the China lobby. The Republicans, having lost the '48 election, decided to win the Chinese revolution instead. And there was tremendous pressure on the administration to do something to save the Chinese Nationalists.

Q: Well, what was our consul general? Who was running it? What was the staffing like?

HOLLOWAY: Well, the consul general was John Cabot, who, of course, had been deputy chief of mission in Yugoslavia. And as you probably know, our long-range policy, which was a very astute one, was to hope that Mao became a Tito, which, of course, he became a Tito in spades eventually. So we were right. "We," I mean the United States was right.

Q: Was this feeling transmitted to you and others? I mean, was he talking to you about Yugoslavia, or did you have much contact with him?

HOLLOWAY: No, relatively little contact with him. No, I don't ever recall. I was so far down the totem pole that nobody, I guess, paid much attention to me.

Q: How big was our staff?

HOLLOWAY: Oh, it was huge. We had had one evacuation, but I think there were still over a hundred Americans.

Q: What were you doing?

HOLLOWAY: I was doing consular work at the first part. I was pulled into economic work later. But the question was, what's going to happen? Here's Shanghai, one of the world's largest cities, a very complex city. It was the biggest city in the communist world, bigger than Moscow. How was this going to be run by these people who had come out of caves in the northwest of China?

I think we all made a mistake, the old China hands in particular, in thinking that they couldn't run this, that they weren't sophisticated enough. Fortunately for them, there was a very, very low level of economic activity. Because the Nationalists claimed to have mined the Yangtze. No one ever found any of these mines. And then, of course, they had a blockade, or port closing as they called it -- self-blockade, I guess you would call it in international law.

So that economic activity slowed, and this made, I think, Shanghai easier to run for the communists. They had many, many handicaps. They had a bias against cities, as you probably know. They'd been out in the boondocks for ten years, and they thought cities were sinkholes and cesspools.

Q: Of course, Shanghai was the sinkhole of sinkholes. I mean, we still think of it in those terms. [Laughter]

HOLLOWAY: And remember, extraterritoriality had only been given up in '43, and it was only given up because the Japanese had thrown us all out of those cities! [Laughter]

But the general level of the competence of the communists, heck, was higher than we expected. It was also a great relief once the city was captured, because there was some law and order returned. The last days of the Nationalists were pretty chaotic.

Q: What were you doing the last days of the Nationalists?

HOLLOWAY: Basically, putting signs up on American property, saying in Chinese and English that this was an American-owned house. We were looking at it as a matter of protecting American interests in China, which, of course, were extensive in Shanghai. Americans owned houses, businesses, and banks.

Q: Had these private Americans all left by that time?

HOLLOWAY: A great many had, but a great many had stayed. This was, of course, the big question, where we split with the British and where the split was to continue for years. Do you stay and try to do business with these people, or do you declare them beyond the pale and get out?

The British, who had never gotten along with the Nationalists as well as we had, they thought the communists might work out. We thought otherwise. But as you know, we were left there after the thing, after the capture, with the hope that there might be some eventual development.

Q: What sort of instructions were you getting? In the first place, we had rather strict immigration controls. So we trying to do anything to help Chinese Nationalists get out and go to the States, or was this pretty much just --

HOLLOWAY: No, but the main effort in the visa side was with Russians and particularly Central European -- Germans, Austrians, Czechs, most of whom were Jewish -- who had come to China in the '30s, and now, of course, wanted out. This was the main effort.

Q: Were you under any standing instructions to be more liberal? Because our rules were still pretty stringent.

HOLLOWAY: No, I think the American Joint Jewish Distribution Committee was very active, and I think they managed to put a little pressure on Washington, and Washington would then instruct us to issue this visa or that visa. But as far as I could tell, not having anything to do with the visa business -- thank God! -- it was a very, somewhat poignant -- as many of these people had just escaped with their lives from Hitler's Germany, and here they were about to be thrown back into the, under a Communist regime. It was not a very happy situation.

Q: What about the instructions? I mean, obviously at the time when the Nationalists were fleeing, the communists were coming in. Did the consul general call you together and say, "All right, batten down the hatches, here we go!" or "We're going to do this"? How did the consulate face this situation?

HOLLOWAY: Well, I think we tried to put a good business-as-usual face on it as we could. Except for one thing. And that was, we were not to, in effect, recognize the Chinese communists by any official act. And they, by their token, said "Well, you are no longer vice consuls or consuls. You are ex-vice consuls, or ex-consuls. You have no authority." Of course, we never were accredited to any government; we were still accredited to the Nationalist government.

Now, this kind of situation can go on, as the British did in Taiwan. They kept a consulate open there for ten years after they had opened an embassy in Peking on the grounds of the consul is assigned to a provincial authority, not to national authorities. So that had there been any political will to reach an agreement with the Chinese communists, we had plenty of time. Shanghai fell in May -- May 24th.

HOLLOWAY: '49. And the People's Republic was proclaimed on October 1, '49. So we had plenty of time to make up our minds whether we wanted to recognize them. We chose not to, as you know; we were going to let the dust settle, as Dean Acheson said. It was all, of course, tied up with the China lobby politics in the United States, and it became politically impossible for Truman to take that step.

Q: Did you get any feel for this battle back in the States?

HOLLOWAY: No. We saw very few newspapers. The English-language papers in China were very careful about what they printed. We relied on the Voice of America and the BBC. But I don't think we had any idea about the virulence of the China lobby fight.

Q: Although you officially weren't there, what was your view, as you were going through the streets of Shanghai?

HOLLOWAY: Well, first of all, as I said, a certain amount of relief that law and order had been restored. The Chinese Communist soldiers never bothered anyone. They occasionally were helpful. I can remember being out New Year's Eve with a Russian girl, and we were both in evening dress. We went to a party at the British Country Club. And afterwards she wanted to say hello to her father, who was out at the Soviet Club. And we took a pedicab out there. And when we were leaving -- it was about 2:00 in the morning -- the fellow was obviously -- the girl spoke Chinese, I didn't -- the fellow was obviously, literally going to take us for a ride. And a communist soldier came over and told him, "Look, you take these people where they want to go, and no nonsense." Now, maybe he thought we were Soviets coming out of the Soviet Club. But there were many incidents like that. They were there, they were country boys. But they were told to keep law and order and they did.

Q: Consulates deal with the local government, and at this point, of course, the local government was communist.

HOLLOWAY: We, at that time, required consular invoices for goods shipped to the United States. That was one of my jobs before I was put in the economic section. Well, the communists had taken a certain amount of tungsten and hair and Tung oil and all that, and they wanted to fulfill the old Nationalist contracts, state trading companies. Well, they sent somebody over to get a consular invoice on this shipment. Well, they paid the two dollars and fifty cents, and we put the consular invoice on it.

Q: You weren't going under any sort of harassment, to put pressure on you, at least at the beginning?

HOLLOWAY: Not at that time. Now, there were problems. We had some labor problems. The Navy had not paid off some Sikh guards, and they locked us in the consulate one day. But that was eventually solved.

It got a little dicey when the Nationalists started air raids on Shanghai. These were American planes, American bombs, American gasoline. They were B-24s; that's a fairly potent plane. And the Nationalist Air Force, which had never shown any capacity for accurate bombing in the fighting, suddenly became crack bombers, bombardiers! They hit the --

Q: Was there a suspicion that this was somebody else flying the planes? Were they?

HOLLOWAY: No. I'm fairly convinced that they were not. Just the Nationalist Air Force chose to -- not to make a pun -- to be above the fight, as far as the communists were concerned. But they were certainly -- they hit the American power plant in Shanghai. American Foreign Power had a plant at Riverside, a big plant. They knocked out the French power plant, which meant there was no light or heat in Shanghai in the winter. That, I think, had to create a problem.

In October of '49, we had not responded to Mao's call for recognition. And in retrospect, that was a mistake.

Q: If you had Americans there and all, somebody must have gotten in jail. I'm speaking as an old consular man.

HOLLOWAY: Yes, one of our vice consuls, Bill Olive. The day of the Chinese Communist Victory Parade, which I think was July 7, '49. Very impressive parade. He got arrested for going down a one-way street. There was some altercation. It wasn't altogether clear that he acted with all the discretion he might have, and they threw him in the poky and roughed him up. But then they released him the next day.

Q: So there wasn't a matter of someone being in jail, and the consul general, or somebody, have to go to the authorities, "I want access to him or her," or something like that?

HOLLOWAY: No, we had no problems like that. As you know, the Nationalist blockade was run by Isbrandtsen. American ships were coming into Shanghai. Isbrandtsen was running the Flying Cloud --

Q: Isbrandtsen being a shipping line?

HOLLOWAY: A shipping line, yes. Sir John Franklin, the Flying Independence. And these were fired on and hit and put on fire by the Chinese Nationalists outside of -- more outside of Shanghai. And our Navy would do nothing to help them. Isbrandtsen and Acheson got into a newspaper war, taking ads out, insulting each other. And in the end, Acheson got the Coast Guard to, in effect, say that the masters were hazarding their ships by going into Shanghai, and if they went in they might lose their ticket. And the Department said quite -- it's now been published in Foreign Relations -- that we would take no action which would lessen the effect of the Nationalist blockade of Shanghai. So we were taking sides by then.

Q: Things were beginning to develop. How did this play out in Shanghai and on the consulate there? We were helping the Nationalists and we were not recognizing this.

HOLLOWAY: Well, the final act came when the Peking authorities attempted to requisition French, British, Dutch and American property, which had been turned over as a consequence of the Boxer conventions at the turn of the century, for military barracks. And they wanted them back. We claimed they were American property and that they were confiscating American government property. And if they were going to do this, we were going to withdraw our consuls from China. Now, frankly, the political sophistication that came up with that kind of an argument is pretty low. The British, Dutch, and French figured a way to finesse it. We chose to make a stand on that issue, and Acheson was a lawyer, and he fought a good legal case. But it was a very bad political case. On the other hand, given our backing of the Nationalists, it was obvious there was nothing for us to do.

Q: Were you feeling that what you were doing was drying up? I mean, the invoices were going down?

HOLLOWAY: No, all that was ended. That was when I was switched to the economic section and then it became very interesting watching what the Chinese Communists were doing, particularly their attempts to stop inflation.

Q: How would you do that?

HOLLOWAY: You had access to all the commodity reports. We had our Chinese staff with all the newspapers being published. Prices were there. We were interpreting the Chinese Communists regulations for banking, for carrying on of export-import business. It was a whole new game, and you had to stay up with it. For instance, they introduced something called the parity deposit unit, which is sort of a commodity dollar. And they linked wages to an interest rate, to the price of four commodities: rice, cloth, coal, and firewood -- briquettes. And this worked. I later found out that the commodity dollar had been advanced as an idea in the United States, back in the Depression. But where the Chinese Communists got the idea, I don't know. The Hungarians had a tax that at one time that did this. But their ability to control inflation was impressive.

Q: Obviously, you were reporting on sort of factual things.

HOLLOWAY: They allowed us to keep our radio going. We had two Navy chiefs and a warrant officer running our radio. We had no problem communication-wise.

Q: Those who were reporting on political developments, were they beginning to get worried about the problem that later became to the old China hands, "Who lost China", and all that? I mean, were you feeling any pressure? Was there any, "I'm not going to report this"?

HOLLOWAY: Not that I know of, not that I was aware of. I was very impressed with the Chinese-language officers in our political section.

Q: Who were they?

HOLLOWAY: Sabin Chase was the senior one, who had been around for a long time in China. Doug Forman was one of the younger officers. These fellows were very smart. And at that time, I don't think they felt any pressures whatsoever.

Q: The consular general as a unit, did you get called together from time to time to sort of brief you in where we're going, and what you're doing?

HOLLOWAY: What happened was that, in July-August, Leighton Stuart was transferred back. He was the ambassador. At that time we had a large safety evacuation, and the only staff that was left, I think, was seven American officers. And that was the group that was to ride it out. So by that time, we were down to the bare bones. Walter McConaughy became consul general. He had been the deputy to John Cabot. And there were just very few officers left.

Q: You were one of those?

HOLLOWAY: I was one of those who stayed, yes.

Q: Well, had the Angus Ward thing happened up at Mukden?

HOLLOWAY: Mukden, yes.

Q: I think it was the tradition then was to get rid of all the married men, wasn't it, in times of trouble? I know, as an aside, when all hell broke loose in Palestine, when it broke, they got all the married officers out and sent all the single officers in. I mean, that's how we dealt with things in those days, and I guess you were --

HOLLOWAY: I was single.

Q: Or at least that, or you had a girlfriend on the side [Laughter]. So this was one reason why you were --

HOLLOWAY: I think that was one of the reasons I was sent there and one of the reasons I was kept there. I mean, I was cheap, I was expendable.

Q: This was very much an attitude at the time. A married man was a very movable commodity. Did you sort of keep a bag packed at that time, with the idea of, "They're going to do it us at some point"?

HOLLOWAY: All of the old China hands kept telling us, "It's going to be just like it was under the Japanese when Pearl Harbor came along. They're going to scoop you all up in the bag and you're going to be in the wardroom jail," or something like that. And everybody kept one bag that he could grab at the last moment.

Q: But you were continuing reporting?

HOLLOWAY: Continued reporting. We were then working very hard on the question of American businessmen who wanted to get out. And of course, as you know, the Communists squeezed them in some very, very elegant ways with taxes, or wage claims, or alleged pre-war deposits. Labor troubles. I found myself going around under instructions almost every day, to go see the fellow from Northwest Airlines and the fellow from Chase Bank, and what was the situation.

Q: Well, were we telling them to get the hell out?

HOLLOWAY: We never really did until we were ordered out. Then we really felt that they should go.

Q: When were you ordered out?

HOLLOWAY: In February of '50, We didn't get out until April or May of '50.

Q: But this was not the Chinese telling you to go. This was Washington.

HOLLOWAY: No, this was the State Department withdrawing us. And of course, we couldn't get out through Shanghai. We had to go up through Tientsin.

Q: Could you travel around anywhere prior to this?

HOLLOWAY: No.

Q: How about Shanghai?

HOLLOWAY: There were no restrictions on that. You could go out for a walk out towards (Inaudible), or anything like that. I had no problems with that. But you couldn't take the train to Hong Kong for the weekend or anything like that.

Q: Did you have contact yourself with Chinese officials? I mean, one can survive quite well without this in a way for a long time, and most work of consulates, although it's a credit to them, we really operate with the business community, and with the individuals.

HOLLOWAY: Individuals, the missionaries, business community. We didn't have any tourists, thank God. We had a few newspapermen and, of course we had the resident American business community.

Q: How about the missionaries? What was your impression of the American missionaries and how did you all deal with them?

HOLLOWAY: You have to distinguish in the missionary movement between the headquarters group, let's say, in Shanghai, and the missionaries out in the field. And they were two different breeds of cats. The missionaries in Shanghai, the headquarters, were pretty sophisticated, politically astute people, who were well aware of the power they had behind them in Washington. The missionaries in the field tended to be good-hearted, somewhat naive, but certainly men of good will, who were genuinely shocked. I talked to a lot of them when they came into Shanghai, after they lost their churches, and the Chinese had turned on them. They were quite shocked. I remember one doctor saying he was going back and go help, go to work for the UMW, the United Mine Workers. They needed doctors. "I'll treat Americans now. I won't treat anymore Chinese." And there was a profound disillusionment.

The Catholics were a little different. I knew Bishop Walsh, who, of course, stayed for twenty-one years.

Q: Yes. In jail, mostly.

HOLLOWAY: They had no families, of course, and they looked upon it as just a cross to bear, if I could put it that way.

Q: Were we trying to get the missionaries out?

HOLLOWAY: Yes. But after we were leaving, we pointed out that we could no longer protect them. Not that we could protect them very much when we were there. And we advised Americans to leave China. Obviously, some businessmen stayed. And in the case of one banker, Bill Orchard of American Express, he stayed for three or four years before he could get out. But Chase and National City kept on functioning to a limited extent. Many of these men, of course, this was their lives. They didn't have an institution like the State Department to go back to which would send you out to another job.

Q: We are a movable thing, so we can observe these things with a certain amount of objectivity. How did it come about that you left then?

HOLLOWAY: Well, we wanted to bring a ship into Shanghai. There were all sorts of problems about that, because, again, the Nationalist blockade, which had by that time been dissipated somewhat by the appearance, frankly, of Soviet fighter planes, and had chased off the Nationalist bombers, which was a great relief. This is something that's happened afterward. I mean, the Soviets have had to help their allies out with fighter planes in more than one place. And pilots. We were trying to bring the General Gordon of the American President Lines into Shanghai, and the State Department was going to charter it and take everybody out. And they just never could get permission from the Communists, or could solve the problem of whether the harbor was mined. It wasn't. The Chinese Nationalists had used this as a ploy in Changsha in 1930. They had said that they had mined the Yangtze. So we took the train to Tientsin, and got out through Tientsin.

Q: But in this time you were waiting, you weren't under a restraint or anything?

HOLLOWAY: No.

Q: It was just a move?

HOLLOWAY: Until the last couple of days, we had our radio and our coding facilities.

Q: Were you getting instructions that were trickling down to you from the Department of State about how -- was it kind of business as usual and you were left on your own? Or was there any attempt to sort of fine-tune from the State Department what we were doing there?

HOLLOWAY: No. I got the impression -- again, I was very low on the totem pole -- and the impression was confirmed when I got back to Washington, the State Department in the China desk was in a state of shock, and they just didn't know what to do. They had people in a half a dozen posts in China, and they just had to get them out. The amount of guidance they were getting from the Secretary or the President was minimal, because the administration was under fairly heavy fire from the China lobby.

Q: What was your attitude towards the situation in China when you left? I mean, personally.

HOLLOWAY: My own personal view was that this was one of the great events of history. I mean, good, bad, or indifferent, whatever it's outcome was going to be, I would have liked to have stayed around a little longer and watched it. [Laughter]

Q: Were some of the other people feeling somewhat the same way? I mean, glad to get out or really wanting to stay around and see what had happened?

HOLLOWAY: I think the younger officers would just as soon stayed around to see what happened. Obviously, the older, more mature fellow with family interests or career interests, something like that, they thought it was probably time to get out. It probably was time to get out! After all, the Korean War started in June of '50.

HOLLOWAY: Had we still been there then, we'd have been there until --

Q: A long, long time.

HOLLOWAY: A long, long time.

Q: Jerry, when you left Shanghai, what was your reception back in the Department and where did you go?

HOLLOWAY: Well, obviously the people in Chinese affairs, who didn't seem particularly interested in my experiences, as I said, I had a feeling that they were kind of shattered.

Q: This was 1950?

HOLLOWAY: This is just before the Korean War. And I was ticketed to go to Hong Kong, to continue my China reporting, the economic reporting, which I'd been doing, and was told by a senior officer in personnel that it might not be a bad idea if I gave China a slip for the next couple of years. He thought it might be uncomfortable. Of course, he was right. He suggested I go to Europe and pick up another language and then take a look at the situation, which is precisely what I did.

Q: Yes. What was the situation? You went to Hong Kong in 1952?

HOLLOWAY: Yes.

Q: What were you doing and what was the situation?

HOLLOWAY: The situation was that you had a China reporting unit in the consulate general in Hong Kong. It was, for the most part, made up of people who had served in China and in Communist China. I had the highest respect for the fellows who were in it. They were great fellows. It was about my best post. We played tennis, golf, squash, hiking. Beer was cheap. It was just -- everything was cheap. Hong Kong was a bit confining, but not all that confining. And everyone seemed to me to have a real interest in China and what was going on in China. And it was a very professional group.

Q: Who was the consul general then?

HOLLOWAY: When I first went, it was Julian Harrington. And he was succeeded by Everett Drumright. We talked about Drumright. As I said, the China reporting, I remember a fellow named Dick McCarthy started the translations of the China press, which had become an essential tool for anyone doing scholarship or research on Communist China. We had certain jobs to do. We were running the export control program on China. One officer, Bob Eller, was following the Americans who were trapped in China, were trying to get out. There were certain sub-specialties, but by and large, we were focused on -- we were the eyes and ears of the government for China.

Q: What were you doing?

HOLLOWAY: I was doing economic work, which I had been doing in Shanghai. It was during that period that the security apparatus seemed to me to be operating.

Q: You're speaking about the American concern about anybody having dealt with China, whether they were a security risk?

HOLLOWAY: That's right. I'll show you the sort of clumsy thing they did. The security officer would come around and start asking me about a fellow I'd served with in Shanghai, and what did he do in Shanghai and all that sort of thing. And then the next day, he'd go to that fellow, who was working in say the political section, and say, "Now, you served with Jerry Holloway in Shanghai. What did he do there? What was his ideology? Did he have any Chinese girlfriends or anything like that?" It was very clumsy, but enough to make things uneasy. And there were some incidents that were not very pretty.

Q: Can you describe any?

HOLLOWAY: Well, one fellow was asked to take a lie-detector test when he went back on leave, although I think that was the military that insisted on that. There seemed to be -- I wouldn't say an attempt to set us against each other, but Big Brother was looking over your shoulder in a way that he didn't used to. See, I was there in '52 to '57, and that was a bad period.

In the end, we were all cleared, no problem or anything like that, but it left a sour taste.

Q: You were obviously all part of the reporting unit, both on the economic side, which is yours, but on the political side. Did you have any feeling that you'd better make these reports, you had to be very careful about how you wrote these reports so it didn't sound like "Gee, they've come up with a good new idea in economics"? This wouldn't sit very well in Washington.

HOLLOWAY: Don't say that they're doing too well.

Q: I mean this was part of the ethos, or whatever it is.

HOLLOWAY: And for instance, there was this organization called ECAFA, the Economic Commission for Asia and the Far East, which was a U.N. subsidiary. It puts out an annual economic report on Asia. The State Department arranged so that we had a veto. We went over it in draft, to take out anything too favorable to the People's Republic. As you know, our policy was, as Walter Robertson, the assistant secretary expressed it, to keep pressure on the mainland in the hope that a revolt would ensue there, which we or the Nationalists could take advantage. Dulles spoke quite openly. You can read it in Ridgeway's memoirs, of how to invade China through Hainan, up thorough Korea. This was part of the keeping the Li Mi and the Chinese Nationalist Divisions in Burma resupplied.

It was our aim -- we were hoping for the overthrow of the Chinese Communist government, and to suggest that this government was fairly permanent was to fly in the face of policy.

Q: So although it wasn't explicit -- it was implicit -- you had the feeling that you were watching your reporting?

HOLLOWAY: It was easier on the economic side. On the political side, I think you weren't going to do any speculative pieces.

Q: One can read, as we say in the United States, the tea leaves. [Laughter]

HOLLOWAY: Yes.

Q: Despite this, did you find the morale good? Was it an intellectually lively group of people you were dealing with?

HOLLOWAY: Yes. One of the problems in Hong Kong was that the consular section was under a tremendous workload. You had 25,000 Chinese claiming American citizenship, that they had to deal with. And you had the refugee relief program. Those people really did work very, very hard, and without, as you know from consular service, not a great deal of thanks. It was a tough job, and it sort of divided the consular general into two sections: the consular section with this horrendous workload, and the political and economic, which was a fairly nice job.

Q: Almost an ivory-tower type of situation, as compared to the working stiffs. I might add for the record, that these 25,000 Chinese claiming American citizenship, many of these were fraudulent. They were fake documents, and they were coming from various towns in and around Canton.

HOLLOWAY: They were coached. It was just one gigantic fraud.

Q: They used to have hit squads of our people who would break into their houses with the Hong Kong police to grab their kochi books, telling which village they lived in and all this.

HOLLOWAY: Where the school was --

Q: Where the school was. It was very elaborate.

HOLLOWAY: The best story, though, were the Canadians, who required that you have no amoebic dysentery. No amoebas. Which required you were required to submit a clean stool. There was a place in Hong Kong that guaranteed a clean stool.

Q: They had stool producers, yes. Somebody at one point figured that there were very few Chinese women at the time, and each one of them had to have produced -- I think this was before the 1906 San Francisco earthquake -- each one would have had to produce something like 200 children or something like that, in order to produce the number of claimants to American citizenship.

HOLLOWAY: You mention the San Francisco earthquake. These Chinese knew every town in the West where the courthouse had burned town and there would be no records! [Laughter] "Oh, I'm from so and so, Montana, 1923."

"Oh, that burned down. We don't have any records."

Q: Yes. [Laughter] Did you get any instructions from the consul general, bringing you together? Did you have weekly meetings or something, where you would sort of chew over the China situation?

HOLLOWAY: Yes, particularly with Drumright, who, of course, had served in China, served in Chinese affairs. Drumright was very right wing, very conservative, and was a strong believer in Robertson's policies. But he was also intellectually interested in the problems. He had no sympathy for the Chinese communists, but he was certainly not prepared to say they don't exist.

Q: What was the thrust of your feelings from '52 to '57, about the survivability of -- were you, as a group, convinced that this outfit was here to stay? Or that the Nationalists are going to --

HOLLOWAY: No. Whatever was going to happen in Communist China, I think there wasn't one of us who had any illusions about the Nationalists. Even those who served in Taipei. They weren't going back to the mainland.

Q: What was the feeling about the Nationalists? You were getting obviously, pretty well second-hand. But the other people, what was the general feeling about perception of the Nationalists at this period?

HOLLOWAY: That they had not improved a great deal over their performance on the mainland. Now, this was not held by many of the top folks, particularly the ambassador in Taipei. He was in our staff meeting, visiting Hong Kong, telling us that, "Oh, our relations with the Nationalists are fine. Everything is great." And one of the clerks came in and called him out. There was a message that the Nationalists had just broken into his embassy and, among other things, had dropped the safe on his car!

Q: This was after an incident of --

HOLLOWAY: An Air Force sergeant, named Reynolds, was acquitted of murdering a Chinese. And the ambassador was there telling us --

Q: This is ambassador Rankin.

HOLLOWAY: Rankin.

Q: Yes, Carl Rankin.

HOLLOWAY: Carl Rankin. That this was all going to pass and blow over! [Laughter] And at that moment, his embassy was on fire!

Q: At the staff meeting, was anybody saying, "Well, this is all very good, Mr. Ambassador, but it looks like the regime is here to stay"? There was a certain keeping one's head down?

HOLLOWAY: No, nobody was going to tell him -- we weren't going to say the Nationalists were hopeless. But we were telling him that things were better on the mainland than perhaps our propaganda was making them out to be.

Now, you've got to realize that we were fooled, too. In '57, there was a bad famine in China and thousands died. We had no inkling of that.

Q: Because you were relying on papers and broadcasts.

HOLLOWAY: The British would interview Hong Kong, the Hong Kong police would interview Chinese refugees. We were allowed to interview non-Chinese, who were still coming out -- that was the division of labor -- but the British made available their reports. But this was very low-level stuff; as you know, these were mostly from Guangdong.

Q: Yes, which is the Canton area, the traditional --

HOLLOWAY: The traditional hinterland of Hong Kong. The foreigners were more interesting, particularly the White Russians, most of whom spoke Chinese and had gotten some fairly good insights. We were hearing that the Chinese and the communists and the Soviet advisors were not getting along from '53 on. They would detail arguments in this factory or that factory, where the Soviets said "Do it that way," and the Chinese said --

Q: The Soviets weren't there en masse at that point? Or were they?

HOLLOWAY: Yes, in '53, '54, '55 they --

Q: Did you view the Soviets as a great monolithic brotherhood with the communists at that point?

HOLLOWAY: No, no. As I mentioned earlier, our original policy was very sophisticated. We say that Mao was going to be a Tito. And this was done at the very highest levels in Washington. And it's been published in papers. Afterward, that's '49, you get into the mid-'50s, you had to start asking yourself, "Haven't we pushed the Chinese into the Soviet arms?" But we certainly did think of them as monolithic.

Q: But you didn't see, in your reporting and the others, any sort of rift coming between the Soviets and . . .

HOLLOWAY: No, except for these reports that the Soviet advisors couldn't get along with the Chinese. Now this turns out to be indicative of much deeper disagreements.

Q: Could you just quickly summarize where you went afterwards, so the reader can get an idea?

HOLLOWAY: Well, I decided that Chinese affairs was a dead end. And in '57, the Department sent me to the University of Michigan. Spent a year and got a Master's degree in East Asian Affairs; went to Japanese language school in Tokyo, was assigned to the embassy in Tokyo, then was consul, principal officer in Fukuoka. Went back to Washington, was in charge of INR, on charge of Ceylon, India and Nepal. Was then switched over to German affairs when the wall was built in August of '61. And stayed in German affairs and European affairs for another three years. Then went, as counselor of political affairs, to Stockholm and spent four years there. Came back and spent a year at Harvard at the Center for International Affairs at Harvard. Went down to Washington as Director of Regional Affairs for East Asia. Then went out and spent four years as consul general in Osaka. Then came back to the War College as the State Department advisor to the Naval War College.

My wife died, I retired and stayed on at the Naval War College. Been there for fifteen years now.

HARLAN CLEVELAND
Director, Far Eastern Aid Program, Agency for Economic Cooperation

Washington, DC (1949-1952)

Ambassador Cleveland was born in New York City and raised in the United States and Switzerland. He was educated at Princeton and Oxford Universities. During World War II he served on the Board of Economic Warfare, after which he held a number of senior positions dealing with Italian economic recovery, US and UNRRA assistance programs in China and Taiwan and NATO issues. He also served as Assistant Secretary of State for International Organizations and as US Ambassador to NATO. Ambassador Harlan was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1999.

Q: Well did you find yourself being somewhat cautious about shipping too much stuff to China because of the thought you were watching the front coming and seeing how this might not...

CLEVELAND: Yes, we had to be careful about that. We were mostly helping the areas that were clearly under nationalist control and Taiwan which was. But the general assumption was they were going to get pushed off the mainland, so when they did take over the Yangtze Valley and chased Chiang Kai-shek out, we then had the very delicate problem of making sure that our people got out in time but not bring them out prematurely so it would look as if we had torpedoed the nationalist boat. For several years thereafter I was given credit in some of the right wing magazines like Human Events for having helped lose China. The person that I'd helped lose China was this Republican businessman named Paul Hoffman, so the whole thing was hard to take seriously.

On the other hand, that was the Joe McCarthy period. I had in my files a wonderful picture, a very good photograph, of being awarded by the nationalist government a high decoration when I left. The communists didn't do anything similar, but the nationalists did. The picture was of Madame Chiang Kai-shek pinning this medal on me with the Generalissimo standing by with a broad smile on his face. I thought that at the first whisper of McCarthy trouble, I would rush down to the Washington Post and give them this picture and say please print it. Anyway, I never had to use it as it happened, but that story did follow me around for quite awhile. Even when I came back into the government in 1961 some of that was still hanging on and held up my security clearance for awhile.

Q: Were you having any problems with people under you who wanted to hang on until the very last in China? I mean, was there a problem getting the people out?

CLEVELAND: No. We had two very bright and sensible people there. The chief of our mission was the former mayor of San Francisco, Roger Lapham, a very delightful person, but also a very canny person. Our sort of chief operational guy had gone on a mission for us to China and then was hired as my successor in what was by then the Far Eastern Aid program. I'll come back to that in a minute. Those two were both realistic, business oriented people with a high sense of politics. So we didn't have any sort of sentimental hanging on in that business. We were very much on the same wavelength.

One of the things that happened while I was still responsible for the China aid program was that we had to narrow our sights to concentrate just on Taiwan.

Q: What type of things were you doing toward the end there to help Change Kai-shek?

CLEVELAND: Importing still a lot of food, and agricultural machinery. We were still supporting the dike building which hadn't been quite finished by then. We had people operating in agricultural industries service all over the country. We took that over as part of our program. It was a major program and we had several hundred million dollars of appropriated money. When we had to narrow our program to focus on Taiwan, we decided it would be a good idea to start aid programs in some of the other countries around China for the political purpose of shoring up any possible domino effect of the Chinese communists taking over most of China. We went up to the Hill in one of the strangest things I ever saw happen in government. Paul Hoffman and Dean Acheson went up to each of the four committees that had authorized and appropriated money for the China aid program. I went up with them carrying the briefcase, to make the case as Acheson said to one of the committees, "What you really meant when you said China in this legislation was the general area of China wasn't it." Well they said, "I guess that is right. I guess that is what we meant."

On the basis of those hearings, without any further legislation, we took a hundred million dollars of our China appropriation and diverted it to the Philippines which had a small program already, also Indonesia, Burma, and the three associated states of Indo China as they were then being called, Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia were included. We also put some more money in the Korean aid program which was already a big deal. This happened before the Korean war started, but there was already a sizable economic aid program in Korea, in South Korea. So the far eastern aid program was formed. It included the China-Taiwan responsibility and for these others as well. I was assigned to start these other programs and continue to manage the China program, so I became head of the Far Eastern aid program.

Q: You were doing that from when to when?

CLEVELAND: Well, it must have been from probably late '49 to sometime in the fall of 1950. Until after the Korean war started.

Q: It started in June of 1950. Was there any sort of priority for where the money would go? I mean when you were looking at this to help?

CLEVELAND: Well, the priority, of course, the biggest part of the money was going to Taiwan and Korea; particularly after the North Koreans had rumbled across the 38th parallel in their Soviet made tanks, it became very important to shore up the event as a security matter, to shore up the South Koreans with economic aid.

So for awhile I was responsible for a rapidly enlarging Korea aid program and a still very large Taiwan program as well as for the Philippines, Indonesia, Burma and so forth. The Taiwan program was being managed primarily through a thing we had developed and put into the legislation the year before called the Joint Commission on Rural Reconstruction which was a board of three Chinese and two Americans, which had begun to operate on the rural projects on the mainland quite successfully with land reforms.

But when the nationalist government got onto Taiwan, they were in a shocked condition. They were willing to apply much more radical measures to development. We helped persuade them to start a real land reform program and to combine it with a couple of other gimmicks that worked wonderfully well. The way it worked out, they would take the land from the landowner and actually give it to the people who were on the land doing the farming. They gave the landowner not money but shares in the industrial companies. The industrial companies were all nationalized, so this was before the word was invented, a privatization program. The land owners were baffled to be paid with this piece of paper saying they owned a machine tool company or something. So, they would stand around saying anybody, "Want to buy this paper?" That created a capital market. So in one fell swoop you had land reform, privatization of industry, and the beginnings of a major capital market in Taiwan. The Joint Commission of Rural Reconstruction also had a vigorous social program featuring a birth-control effort through the rural health clinics that were run by the JCRR. Women could come and get information and the primitive equipment that was available at the time, which was mostly, if you can believe it, sponge and vinegar. That was the main thing to prevent having babies. But I have really learned from that operation that if women are given the chance to and the information to decide if they want to have babies or not, they will definitely decide not to have so many babies because it sure turned out that way in that case.

The result of all these efforts in Taiwan was to make Taiwan almost a cameo case of successful economic development. Even the yields of rice in Taiwan in some places were better than Japan's. We had the advantage of an educated population because the Japanese had been willing for the Chinese on Taiwan to be educated even into higher education. Whereas, in their Korean colony, they were not willing to have them get anywhere beyond elementary school. What happened in Korea was that the government, as soon as they found themselves in the middle of this big war, realized that it was a technological war full of military technology; the generals in charge figured they had better get everybody educated so they could handle this stuff. So they decreed universal education for everybody up through high school and some help even for people getting into college.

Two or three years later, I was no longer involved in it directly, the Korean government of the day which was still dominated by the military decided they really didn't need to spend all this money on education now because the war had tapered off. So, they tried to turn it off. By that time the parents in South Korea had unanimously come to the conclusion that all their children were going to go to college, and it was just politically impossible to turn off. The result of that mandated universal education was like the result of a similar policy in the early 19th century in the United States. We became a great country not because of the amber waves of grain so much as because we were an educated population.

DAVID L. OSBORN
American Information Office
Taipei, Taiwan (1949-1953)

Office of Chinese Affairs (Taiwan)
Geneva, Switzerland and Washington, DC (1954-1957)

Political Counselor
Taipei, Taiwan (1958-1961)

Deputy Chief of Mission
Tokyo, Japan (1967-1970)

Consul General
Hong Kong (1970-1974)

David L. Osborn was born in Indiana in 1921. His career with the State Department included assignments to Taiwan, Japan, Hong Kong, and an ambassadorship to Burma. He was interviewed by Bert Potts on January 16, 1989.

Q: Why did the Department send you from Tokyo to Taiwan, in February of '49?

OSBORN: This, again, was probably a matter of language. The situation in China was disintegrating badly in 1949. It was becoming obvious that the government of Chiang Kai-shek - the KMT -- would very likely end up going to Taiwan; or at least that was a strong possibility. So it was of interest to the United States, and the Department of State, whether the situation in Taiwan would be stable enough to allow Chiang to take refuge there. The KMT's misrule in Taiwan, in 1947, had already provoked an uprising there, in which some thousands of people were killed; and there was some possibility that the Taiwanese might not exactly welcome Chiang Kai-shek.

At any rate, the Department of State wanted to get a fix on the situation in Taiwan. Now the people in Taiwan, at that time, spoke Japanese. They had been through the Japanese educational system, and it was possible to communicate with them in Japanese. I happened to be, probably, the most available Japanese language speaker at that time, so I was sent to Taiwan, where I was sent on detail down to the USIS Library, in Tainan. Tainan was the old capital of Taiwan, and a good place for establishing contacts with the Taiwanese population. So I went down there, and observed the situation, and began to get my feet on the ground in Taiwan.

Q: Would you like to remind our listeners when Chiang came over from the mainland?

OSBORN: Well, Chiang didn't come over from the mainland until December of '49. I was sent down there in February of '49. The situation on the mainland, from the standpoint of the Republic of China -- Chiang Kai-shek's forces -- continued to deteriorate. In December of '49, he finally brought his government to Taipei. At that time the situation looked very dubious still, but with the move to Taiwan the KMT forces pulled up their socks, and it began to look possible that the situation there might survive for some time. Although, at that point in time, almost nobody would have thought it would last as long as it has.

Q: When did your active engagement in foreign policy come about?

OSBORN: I became emotionally and intellectually "seized of" the Taiwan problem, by virtue of this assignment in Taiwan. It was impossible, in the Taiwan of 1949 and '50, not to become involved, virtually for one thing, the Taiwan problem -- that is to say, the China problem -- who had lost China? -- had begun to dominate the American political scene in 1949 and '50. So it was during this assignment that we were all -- on Taiwan -- debating the pros and cons of a United States commitment to Taiwan; the argument being between those who felt that the United States had been pouring sand down a rat hole in trying to help the forces of Chiang Kai-shek; and on the other hand, the forces of the China lobby -- loosely identified as such -- who argued that we had never aided Chiang Kai-shek enough, and we should now do more.

This debate was so powerful that we all became engaged in it. And then on top of that, in 1950 the Korean War broke out. This had the effect of freezing the positions on both sides of the Taiwan Strait. We feared an attack, so we put the Seventh Fleet in the Strait. The Chinese on the mainland saw the action as a United States declaration of hostility towards China, as a step towards seizing Taiwan.

Q: When did the Taiwan Straits issue actually surface?

OSBORN: That surfaced in its concrete form, with the positioning of the Seventh Fleet in the Taiwan Strait, immediately following the outbreak of war in Korea. It's important to note that from the Chinese Communist standpoint, we put the Seventh Fleet in the Strait before they -- on their part -- had challenged our position on Taiwan, militarily certainly. We put the Fleet there in anticipation of a Chinese Communist threat to Taiwan. So that was the origin of the question, from the Chinese Communist side. From our side the question also had a strong domestic-political component. That is to say, people were still arguing whether we were doing the right thing to support Chiang Kai-shek, or whether we should write him off as a bad bet.

The old China hands had -- during the war -- tended to favor working toward some kind of mutual understanding with the Chinese Communists, which would avoid conflict there. Whereas there were many people who assumed that conflict between us and Communist China eventually was inevitable, and that we should simply prepare ourselves for it. These debates were going back and forth, and that's how the Strait issue assumed its most urgent form.

OSBORN: By February of 1954, it happened that there was an opening in the political side of the Taiwan desk. They were in need of someone to fill it, because the question of the Mutual Defense Treaty -- with the Republic of China, on Taiwan -- was coming up; we had to negotiate that treaty. And the Department needed people with experience in Taiwan. Not many people knew the ins and outs of the Taiwan question as well as those of us who had been there during the formative period.

The fact that the desk was headed by Al Jenkins, at that time -- Al Jenkins being a person I had gotten to know during my assignment to Taipei -- probably helped. Anyway, I was picked up and put on the desk.

Q: And you stayed there . . . ?

OSBORN: On paper, I remained assigned to the Office of Chinese Affairs until the end of 1957. Actually, I stayed on the desk in the Department until 1955, when I went to Geneva.

Q: I was going to ask about this point in your career, in Chinese Affairs; what led the Department to post you to Geneva?

OSBORN: There it gets back to the Taiwan question. In 1954 there was a conference on Indochina and Korea, at Geneva. This was an important conference, and it was hoped that it would clear away a lot of the underbrush that had grown up between us and China, among other things. At the end of that conference, the Chinese Communists -- whose hostility to the United States had been somewhat reduced as a result of that conference -- and the United States -- which was hoping to at least put the blame for any hostility between us, clearly onto the Chinese Communists -- had a common interest in opening this conference, to deal with the issues between us.

On our side, we were concerned about the issue of American prisoners, some of whom had been taken during the Korean War, others had been taken in various ways on the periphery of China, and were being held by the Chinese. We wanted to seek their release. The Chinese -- for their part -- were most keenly interested in the status of Taiwan. So the talks were set up to deal with these issues.

The issue of Taiwan, which was labeled "The Renunciation of Force in the Taiwan Strait;" the issue of the detained Americans; and an additional issue was that of the exchange of newsmen. The Chinese -- for their part -- were urging the United States to permit American newsmen to go to China -- to permit the exchange of newsmen. Favoring the exchange of information was the popular side of this issue, so we and the Chinese jockeyed for position on it. We feared that dropping the bars would tend to erode domestic support for our own position on China. The Chinese were looking for "leverage" on Taiwan.

Q: Why in early 1957, did you leave Geneva and go back to the Department? It sounds as though this should have been a very busy period in Geneva.

OSBORN: By 1957, the Chinese had become fed up with the lack of progress on Taiwan. This coincided with powerful frustrations in China's domestic programs and its relations with Russia. China "put us on hold" and decided to try other means of attaining its objectives. Putting it another way, the Chinese lost faith in our good faith in seeking an answer to the Taiwan question. But they didn't want to abandon the talks because they still had hopes that at some future time it would be possible to resume progress toward a solution to the Taiwan issue. So they didn't drop the talks all together.

Now we -- for our part -- wanted the talks to keep going, as a kind of mailbox, where we could drop messages to the Chinese, when we felt the need to communicate with them. And this helped us to withstand political pressures at home. When people demanded that we negotiate with the Chinese, we could say, "Well, we're talking to them at Geneva -- or Warsaw," after the venue was shifted -- without any of the pitfalls of actual negotiating, which would have been difficult politically because of our right-wing in the United States.

Q: So you did go back to the Taiwan desk in '57?

OSBORN: I went back to the Taiwan desk, yes, that's correct. And I was still there when -- in the normal course of personnel processing -- I received a tentative assignment to Dacca.

Q: Now what happened to this assignment to Dacca, in as much as so far you were in Chinese and Japanese Affairs?

OSBORN: There was an incident in Taiwan, called "Black Friday," in which Chinese demonstrators sacked our embassy, and rioted and destroyed USIS; the usual round of incidents. It was a sensational affair, because the Chinese on Taiwan had been considered -- by everyone, ourselves included -- to be model clients of ours. And no one could imagine why they were doing this, especially since the Department of State had not received any adequate forewarning from the embassy in Taipei. It is not likely to make any embassy popular, if the embassy gets wiped out without warning.

It was felt that the embassy's political section probably needed a shake-up; at least some changes were needed. I was one of the changes that took place; I was sent out to be the head of the political section. That is to say, the political counselor.

Q: So upon your return to Taiwan, what were the highlights of this second tour?

OSBORN: The highlight of the second tour in Taiwan was the Taiwan Strait Crisis, of 1958. This was the time when the offshore islands of Quemoy and Matsu became household words. Despairing of negotiating an end to the Taiwan standoff, the Chinese Communists tried to pressure the KMT forces to withdraw, and abandon the islands. They apparently believed that if they put enough pressure on the Nationalist forces, then the Nationalists would defect or surrender; and this would have such an impact on the Nationalist government, that there would be a possibility of its collapse.

At any rate, the Chinese were putting terrific military pressure on the offshore islands, particularly Quemoy (Chinmen). And the United States became involved in trying to shore-up the position of the Chinese Nationalists. I was the fellow in the embassy -- as the political counselor -- who was responsible for following this situation, and sending the daily reports on it, as they developed -- to the Department. That was certainly the highlight.

Q: Was there one more highlight you'd like to discuss, during that tour? I think you had a nice visit from President Eisenhower?

OSBORN: Yes, we did, and we had some visits from Secretary Dulles. I recall particularly one thing about Secretary Dulles' visit of October, 1958. This was toward the end of the Strait Crisis. When Dulles talked to Chiang, the "Gimo" urged him to take a very stern military posture against the Chinese Communists. According to accounts circulating within the embassy, Secretary Dulles said to him, "Well, you know there's a limit to what we can do against them, without the possibility of having to use nuclear weapons, and of course, nobody wants that." Reportedly, from the Gimo's lack of reaction against this suggestion, Secretary Dulles got the impression that Chiang Kai-shek was not averse to contemplating this possibility -- if necessary. I think Dulles was quite taken aback by that. At any rate, from about that time on, we put increasing pressure on the Taiwan Chinese to accept their position in Taiwan with good grace; and to stop continually harping on returning to the mainland. The Chinese Nationalists -- for their part -- while they accepted the position, and did not really try to attack the mainland, or really seriously threaten to do so -- they would not commit themselves to accepting what they considered a two-Chinas situation. They became very strongly committed to maintaining their identity, as the one sole government of China. That was one highlight.

The other one, which you mentioned, was towards the end of that time, in 1960; the visit of President Eisenhower in 1960, en route to Japan. The President's visit, the first ever by a sitting President, had been scheduled to coincide with the ratification of the revised security treaty with Japan. The visit touched off unprecedented student demonstrations in Tokyo; Zengakuren -- the name of the student union in Japan -- became a household word in the United States. Television, the news reports, were full of these mobs of student demonstrators in Tokyo, surrounding the embassy, and so on -- besieging the Japanese government. At one point in the demonstrations, a Japanese female student was accidentally killed -- trampled by the demonstrators -- and her death led to an intensification of the rioting, and the protests. As a result, the visit of President Eisenhower had to be canceled.

I happened to be at the luncheon table when President Eisenhower's advance man -- Jim Haggerty, his press secretary -- was passing through Taipei on his way to Tokyo. Haggerty asked what was going to happen in Tokyo, whether the President's visit would go off smoothly or not. I told him not to worry; surely the Japanese police, who were very expert in these matters, would be able to take care of any problem. This was a case of "famous last words."

The cancellation of the visit was a big trauma. One incidental result was to put me back on the trail towards another assignment in Tokyo. One, it reminded me that I was supposed to be a Japanese expert, and I had just shown in my remarks to Haggerty, that I was in need of updating. Also, those riots, and the cancellation of the President's visit -- were among the things that led to the assignment of Ambassador Reischauer to Japan.

Q: Even though you're sitting in Tokyo, with all these exciting things going on around you, you never lost your interest in China policy?

OSBORN: No, it was impossible for me to lose my interest in China policy. China policy questions were so much a part of the whole cold war period. And certainly from the standpoint of Japan, China policy was a very important component of their relationship with the United States.

The Japanese conservatives had developed an odd interplay with the United States in regard to China policy. Conservative Japanese -- for political reasons, their own domestic political reasons -- did not wish to have to recognize Communist China. This would have been a victory for the Japanese socialist party; it would have caused all sorts of problems for the conservatives. But they could not oppose it publicly, because it was very popular with the Japanese people. This was a very interesting situation, that we had to monitor, and live with.

Q: You personally were deeply interested in what you liked to call the one-China policy?

OSBORN: Well, as far back as 1965 -- while in the Bureau of Education and Cultural Affairs -- it had occurred to me that the United States really should get off the dime on China policy, and start moving to work out a fundamental solution to the problems in our relationship. The only way to do that, I felt, was to find a way to set aside the Taiwan question.

So in 1965 I had tried to circulate a memo within the Department, urging that we declare a one-China policy; that is to say, we satisfy the Chinese Communists by accepting the fact that Taiwan is inalienable part of China, while simultaneously making it clear that we did not look with favor, and would not tolerate, a military resolution of the problem, on Chinese Communist terms. This I felt would probably be a minimum provision to satisfy the Nationalist Chinese, and their supporters. So I had been trying to promote this solution off and on, since that time.

In Tokyo, I also circulated memoranda, drafted "Mr. X" type articles, and talked to visiting Congressmen and others about this issue. But the fear of the Chinese Communist bugaboo was a very large part of the context of the Vietnam War, so nobody was willing to confront the Taiwan question, with the necessary determination, during that time. They were preoccupied with other matters.

At any rate, I had not lost my interest in the Taiwan question; certainly not.

Q: And then you were finally chosen to be consul general in Hong Kong? You went there in 1970?

OSBORN: This was a delayed fulfillment of personnel planning which had been underway before. Ed Martin had moved on from Hong Kong, to be ambassador in Burma; and I was sent out to take Ed Martin's place.

Also, certainly one of the reasons why I was interested in the Hong Kong assignment, was the fact that Hong Kong was considered a post of China watchers. I was sent to Hong Kong to be a China-watcher watcher. I spent a lot of my time agonizing over the Chinese representation issue, and over the issues of our relationships with China.

This was the period of the cultural revolution, which at one point made it seem as though the Chinese Communists were about to take over control of Hong Kong militarily. So it was a rather tense period.

Q: You were there, of course, for almost four years. It seems to me, I remember some very important visits?

OSBORN: Well, as I say, the pressures for a solution of the China problem had been building up, and building up. And finally, something had to be done about our relationship with China. President Nixon saw that, and of course, Secretary Kissinger saw that. This was the period during which Secretary Kissinger peeled off from a world tour, and went up to Peking; and held the initial consultations looking toward President Nixon's visit and the normalization of relations.

Q: You had been sent, of course, to Hong Kong to relieve Ed Martin when he was named ambassador to Rangoon. Did the same procedure happen to you?

OSBORN: Yes, in a way it did; I was sent to Rangoon in 1974, to relieve Ed Martin. For a brief period of time, it's my understanding that I was considered by Secretary Kissinger to be one of his staff aides; that is to say, to be the head of INR, in the Department of State. In October 1973, I was called back to meet with Secretary Kissinger in his office, as I was told, to see whether I would be given that assignment.

As far as I, personally, was concerned, I tried to make it clear -- and I think I succeeded -- that I would prefer assignment as ambassador to Rangoon, rather than having a Department assignment, at that time. Like most Foreign Service officers, I was conditioned to prefer overseas assignments. At any rate, that's what happened.

Economic Officer
Taipei, Taiwan (1958-1961)

Asian Communist Affairs
Washington, DC (1961-1965)

Lindsey Grant was born in North Carolina in 1926. He joined the Foreign Service in 1950 and served in Hong Kong, Taipei, India, and Cyprus. He was interviewed in 1990 by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

GRANT: I was in the Navy briefly at the end of World War II, and joined the Foreign Service, took the exams in '48. I came in -- you had to wait those days -- in 1949. I had been at Cornell for my undergraduate degree, specializing in history, specifically Chinese history.

Q: What had attracted you towards a career in foreign affairs?

GRANT: I was particularly interested in China, and this seemed a good way of working on China.

Q: Had you had any China experience in the Navy at all?

GRANT: No, my experience was in destroyer gunfire control in the Navy.

Q: You didn't shoot at anything around China?

GRANT: No. And there's very little application for that specialty in peacetime. [Laughter]

Q: You entered the Foreign Service in 1949. What was the situation at that point, as far as training to be a Foreign Service officer?

GRANT: I guess the best comment on that is that I had already picked up some Chinese before I joined, while I was at Cornell. I had to come in as a staff officer because of the wait to be an FSO, and I served in Washington on the Board of Examiners, as a matter of fact. Then when I went to Hong Kong, I had to pay for my own lessons, because they didn't have any money to pay for Chinese lessons, even as desperately as they needed Chinese speakers.

Q: You went to Hong Kong in 1950.

GRANT: March of 1950.

Q: You were there until 1952.

GRANT: I was there until 1952, went to Singapore, came back, and was there from 1955 to 1958, and in Taipei from 1958 to '61. All that period I was working on China.

Q: What were you doing in Hong Kong?

GRANT: I started out, actually, as a consular, as a staff officer, then got into political. I did economic reporting the second tour.

Q: How did you view China? If you were looking at the situation in China in 1950, this was the time of great turmoil and all. From the Hong Kong vantage point, how did we see the situation?

GRANT: Do you want me to talk about how we felt then, or how I see that period now?

Q: The main thing is I want to know how you felt at the time. Not what happened, but how you felt at the time.

GRANT: How I felt probably is somewhat irrelevant. I was very junior, just came out.

Q: What were you picking up?

GRANT: I came out, remember, of the environment of American universities in the 1940s. So I assumed that the communists -- I don't think I was under any misapprehension as to whether they were communists or not -- but I assumed that they were the wave of the future, and that's what most people did. I didn't have much respect for the Kuomintang when I got to Hong Kong. I slowly educated myself about both.

Q: How did this education take place? What were you absorbing and where were you absorbing this information?

GRANT: I was dealing with the Americans coming out mostly during that first tour, after I got into political, doing reporting on what they knew about the situation on the mainland. Also, incidentally, trying to figure out on behalf of the consular people who was still left up there. So my primary source of information was the departing Americans in that first tour, plus other nationalities that wanted to talk, and some Chinese who were knowledgeable and willing to talk to Americans. That was basically our source of information.

Q: What was the picture that was emerging for you there? We're talking about the education of a young officer seeing the situation, looking at the communist side and how you felt about them and how this perception changed.

GRANT: The situation we were in, in Hong Kong, was pretty dicey from a number of standpoints. One, you had this great unknown beast on the mainland that might or might not want to do what it talked about. That is, forcibly communize the world as fast as it could. You had, in the United States back in 1950, the beginnings of the 1952 election, in which the Republicans were running in part on the charge that the Democrats were soft on communism, had lost China to the communists. This assumes, of course, we ever had it. You had [Joseph] McCarthy, Senator McCarthy, the first McCarthy, accusing the State Department of being full of communists. I discovered recently that a lot of young folks don't know that there was one before Eugene.

Q: You think of Eugene, who was completely the other side of the spectrum.

GRANT: Yes. We were listening to missionaries and other Americans, White Russians, foreigners, generally, who were coming out of the mainland, leaking out. We had tried to get the Americans to depart long before the communists took over, but a number of them insisted on staying there. Our information was coming largely from these people, who were now being chased out of China by these so-called work teams, teams of young fanatics that the communists were sending in to consolidate their control of the countryside. China, remember, is 80% rural. They were getting rid of everybody that represented an alternative source of authority, including the old landlords, any natural alternative leadership. The technique was to mobilize the most radical poor peasants, to radicalize them, and to get them to accuse these people at huge accusation meetings.

One of the sources of authority, obviously, in a rural Chinese scene might very well be the missionaries. So they were setting them up, charging them with all manner of things, organizing the peasants to go by, and show themselves sufficiently pro-communist by spitting on the poor missionaries and so on. It was a rough experience, and they were coming out very shaken. But we were beginning to learn both of the roughness of the regime and also to recognize how totally they were extirpating any source of challenge.

The result was that those of us reporting -- I can remember feeling this very acutely -- figured it was our obligation to tell Washington that what we were seeing was a regime that was establishing itself very effectively in power, even though it was not a very attractive one in many ways. At the same time, you wondered whether your dispatch might suddenly turn up on the Senate floor being quoted or misquoted, quoted out of context by Senator [Joseph] McCarthy. Although I don't think any of us trimmed -- I certainly don't remember any trimming -- we wrote our dispatches with great care, and what we were saying was: "We feel this crowd is very rough - - I think I overestimated the degree to which they were communist, and underestimated that they were also Chinese -- but they are going to stay there."

Q: This is something that I think one should understand. I don't want to put words in your mouth, but our general thinking at the time was that there was such a thing as "a communist," almost all communists were alike and they were a menace, rather than thinking in terms of nationalities and then communism.

GRANT: This was certainly true, and this was, in a sense, the thing that legitimized the extreme anti-communist positions in the United States. They really did talk as though they wanted to take over the world. They had all that rhetoric -- I could quote it chapter and verse -- saying that they were going to get rid of us. This does encourage an adversarial relationship. Even after I should have recognized it -- it was much later -- it must have been about 1959 or '60 that I finally said to myself, "These guys, the Russians and the Chinese, really hate each other." And yet the schism really came when Mao went to Moscow -- it must have been 1956 -- '55, even -- and said to Khrushchev, "We can't afford your liberalization. We've got to keep the whip, got to keep discipline." And Khrushchev went ahead and did it his way.

I think that this triggered the schism, but in a sense, aside from a deep sense of cultural antipathy, the Chinese looked down on the Russians, as they looked down on other people, and felt themselves the civilized people on earth. At the same time, the Russians had the techniques and the Chinese had to use them. Even their economic organizational techniques were very much in the Russian mode.

It was only when that schism became evident, even to the slowest reader, that there was any real chance of American policy moving. This was long before that.

Q: You were mentioning that you were getting some glimmers of statistics and all coming out of Hong Kong. Could you talk a little about how you saw the reporting? Before the tape recorder was turned off, you mentioned cotton production.

GRANT: That was, actually, in the mid-1950s when I went back to Hong Kong from Singapore, 1955 to '58.

Q: As an economic officer.

GRANT: That's right. The first tour, there were really no data on China. The Chinese communists themselves had, I think, only the crudest of data. Later on, we learned that in spades. We didn't know how little they knew at the time. When I went back and was doing economic reporting, I guess the two things that one quickly learned is that the Chinese use statistics for political purposes. They admit it. They say, "Statistics must serve politics." They have a propaganda output that says, "We're doing this, this, and this," which you do well to take very much askance.

Things were, however, beginning to change by the mid-1950s, the Chinese -- I think it was December of 1955 -- put out the first tiny, slim volume of economic statistics. I remember it. It was like stout Cortez spying the Pacific, when all of a sudden this little book came into the office, right after Christmas, in Chinese.

I put all hands to work translating it and getting it to Washington. We began to get some data. We were also getting enough Chinese materials, like provincial newspapers for domestic consumption, not the propaganda stuff, which would give you an idea as to what the rations were in the market towns for pork, cotton, things like that. From this we began to construct some idea as to how the Chinese were doing. They were doing better than our official estimates admitted.

We had, I think, been too much misled by hope and by some old anti-communist reporting people, including our Chinese locals, who hated the communists, into thinking that the Chinese were doing much worse than we finally concluded. I remember this cotton report to which you refer, in which I finally put a covering memorandum on his long annual cotton report, and said, "Feng, the employee, is a loyal and capable fellow. I don't take him on lightly, but I really believe that the Chinese are producing a lot more cotton than his estimates show -- out of which you get the point that they may not be quite as cold and bare as his data would suggest." That was about 1956.

But the other thing we were also beginning to learn was that the official data did not necessarily mean what they claimed. Just after I left in 1958, the great leap forward started. I got back to Washington and found a lot of people believing their claims. I remember saying at the time -- I was horrified -- "They can't do it that way -- that simplistic effort to mobilize labor -- these people are putting out these data because they're trying to create a bandwagon." They claimed that they doubled wheat production in a year and things like that. I think we understood this in Hong Kong earlier than a lot of people in Washington did.

Q: You went to Taipei and you were there from 1958 to 1961. Our ambassador was Everett Drumright. Would you explain how he operated and looked at the situation?

GRANT: Everett Drumright was the most conservative of the pre-war crop of China specialists. As a result, [he was] about the only one who did not get rusticated in the McCarthyite movement. All of our bright shining young lights were forced out of the Service or forced like John Patton Davies off to irrelevant assignments. "Drum" was very much pro-Kuomintang, and I think he really hoped and perhaps believed that the Kuomintang was going to be able to go back.

For myself, I was doing economic reporting then and I was tremendously impressed, as I think anybody should be who looks at the performance, as to what they (the Chinese Nationalists) were doing even then.

You asked the question before as to how Chiang Kai-shek, with his dismal record on the mainland, did so well in Taiwan. I think the fact is that Chiang Kai-shek was a lot more astute than people thought. He was inarticulate in any language, including Chinese, but he did know that he had to make Taiwan work.

The Chinese Government had basically been frozen into immobilism during the anti-Japanese war, while they were up in Chungking. They couldn't move because powerful interests, including his in-laws, H.H. Kung, T.V. Soong, were skimming the economy of Free China and were not about ready to be interested in revolutionary movements to motivate people. They didn't come to Taiwan. He came on his own, by the way. We had really basically pretty clearly written him off in early 1950, and it was only the Korean War that turned that around. He arrived from the mainland on Taiwan. He had a free hand, and he knew it had to work, and he appointed some brilliant guys. Chiang Monlin, the head of the JCRR, (the Joint Commission on Rural Reconstruction), was really one of the great men I've ever dealt with, and Chiang Monlin earned the faith of the Taiwan peasant. They carried out a land reform, a very effective one. They did all the things that are needed to make land reform work, setting up marketing cooperatives, credit cooperatives, seed purchasing organizations. In other words, really mobilizing the farm sector. That was a tremendous advantage for Chiang Kai-shek. The Taiwanese anti-Kuomintang movement, the people who were trying to get the Kuomintang out of Taiwan, had very little support in the countryside because of Chiang Monlin.

They had a brilliant financial man, and I was trying to think of his name. Lord, I've forgotten it.

Q: You can fill that in.

GRANT: Yes. K.Y. Yin. He was the one who forced an honest system of foreign exchange control on Taiwan. He dismantled the preferential rates that encouraged those who could get their hands on money to get it out. He made it very difficult to move money out of Taiwan. He managed to force Taiwan's capital to stay right where it was, and he priced the Taiwan NTU (new Taiwan dollar) at a level that made Taiwan competitive economically. That's when their export drive began, based at first on processed agricultural goods.

I remember they learned about mushrooms, and their exports of mushrooms to the United States went from something like a couple of hundred thousand in one year, let's say 1957. They saw what they could do. They went up to about $6 million the next year. The next year it was heading for glory. Kennett Square -- the mushroom town in Pennsylvania -- was beginning to scream to their congressmen. I remember going to the Chinese and saying, "Listen, cool it. Move out. Diversify so you won't generate these resistances." But those two things, I think, the agricultural policy and the financial policy coupled together, and Chiang Kai-shek made sure -- he had some Neanderthal generals who would like to skim the system, a very popular custom among Chinese generals -- and he kept them in check. I think that that combination, along with a very educable and hard-working people, is what started what we see now. Now I believe Taiwan has the third largest gold holdings in the world.

Q: How did you see the American policy towards the problem of the two Chinas during the time you were there?

GRANT: I was in economic section and a bystander, but I think that the really critical turn was 1958, the straits crisis, created Chinese communists initiation of heavy bombardment of the offshore island by Quemoy, which, as you remember, is within short artillery range of Amoy Harbor. The Chinese communists, I think, saw this as a technique. If they could humiliate the Nationalists, they might begin to create enough political instability in Taiwan to get the Kuomintang to fall or at least become more amenable to some role for them in Taiwan.

I think that several things became very clear. I don't know how long it took me to learn them. I think it took me a year or two before I absorbed them. But one of them was rather amusing. The Nationalists had been taking Americans on tours of Quemoy and saying, "This is impregnable. We could last forever." As soon as the shelling started, they said, "We have just so many weeks left of shells and supplies. If you don't get in there and help us, it will go down. It will be terrible." This was a lesson, but I don't think that the administration of Eisenhower and Dulles was particularly anxious to lose Taiwan, having said what they had about the Democrats.

Several things happened. First off, we began to put pressure on the Nationalists to force them to do as much of their own supply as they could, but we did start moving to give them enough protection so they could save the island. When the communists saw the U.S. coming into this close proximity, I think memories of Korea were very clear on both their side and ours, and neither one of us wanted it repeated. They lifted the bombardment, without admitting it, away from the beaches so that we could get the supplies in, so that a crisis was not precipitated.

Meanwhile, we had finally to face the anomalies of our own position. By the way, on the politics of this, I would definitely refer you to others who I'm sure you've been interviewing. But the upshot was that Dulles had to say publicly what had always been privately clear, and that was we did not commit ourselves to the Chinese Nationalists retaking the mainland, nor even to them forever. In some very tough arm-twisting, before he left the island, he forced the Generalissimo to sign a joint statement saying that the Kuomintang would rely primarily on political means to recover the mainland. In other words, "Don't rock the boat." I think this was very important, because then it finally got us off this rollback syndrome. We couldn't talk rollback after that, after that and Eastern Europe in 1956.

Q: You're speaking of the Hungarian revolution.

GRANT: Precisely.

Q: In which we did not intervene, although there had been a lot of rhetoric about rolling back communism.

GRANT: Precisely. So in a way, both we and the Chinese communists had to learn to live publicly with the realities of the situation. That was a lesson that at least I derived from it.

You asked me whether this was generally the "school answer" in the embassy, and I would say no. I don't remember anybody drawing that publicly. Certainly with Everett Drumright, he was not about ready to make that leap, I think, personally.

Q: In your contacts with Chinese economic people, did you sense any feeling of, you might almost say, relief, now that they could get on with going about business and not take the great leap into the unknown?

GRANT: There were a lot of people in Taiwan who were delighted with that communiqué. One thing happened within weeks. We began to notice people started fixing up their residences. They obviously had read it and they said, "Uncle Sam ain't gonna put us back there. We are not going to be able to get back on our own. We're going to be here." I think that movement was just palpable. It went right through the community. Sure, my economics-oriented friends laughed about it. They said, "That takes care of the diversion. Now we can get on with it." I think that even for the hardest bitten return-to-the-mainland types, they learned it and they began to recognize that they'd better make their peace with Taiwan.

Q: What about the effect, as you saw it as an economic officer, both economic and political effect, of this very large-standing military force on Taiwan? Was this tolerated or was this a problem?

GRANT: They were getting so old that they finally had to retire. You'd see old sergeants that looked like they were in their fifties and sixties, and some of them were. Some of them began to melt into the countryside. I remember picking one up -- way back in a little village where I'd been out walking -- and taking him back to his base. He was a funny little character. He had a wife and a family in that village and was favorably known. I'm sure as soon as he could get out, he just retired to his village. There were a lot of old soldiers. There were hundreds of thousands. The Chinese, again, approached this rather well in some respects, under Chiang Ching-kuo, the son of the Generalissimo and his successor until his recent death. Ching-kuo is a wonderful politician and nobody's fool. He realized that you had to do something with these servicemen as they grew old. They created VACRS, we called it. I forget its title now, but it was an employment system for retired servicemen. They put them to work in the mountains, for instance, building roads, logging. They settled wherever they could find some niche for them, yet kept them in a group context. It was a barracks-type existence, except those like my friend who managed to get out. In this sense, they handled it quite well. They kept the people from becoming totally a drag on the society. They kept them, on the other hand, from competing too directly. So it was an effective operation.

Q: It sounds a little bit like the old Roman system of putting the retired legionnaires out on the borders, but having them cultivate and raise families and create loyal cadres in places where they might be needed.

GRANT: Taiwan isn't Romania. It wasn't 2,000 years ago. There wasn't that much space. There wasn't much to cultivate. But they did, actually, a little bit of special cultivation in the mountains. They created a mushroom farm. I told you about that. They did find ways of keeping them together and they did have that by-product. They had a loyal cadre that they could still turn back to if they needed. It probably minimized the cost. Sure, to carry several hundred thousand soldiers on an island economy of 15 million people was very difficult. I figured it out at one time -- I've forgotten the exact conclusion I came to -- but certainly the burden of carrying that military in economic terms, was not all that different in size from the amount of aid that we gave them. There would be differences, The aid was in foreign currency -- and so on. But it was a burden that they succeeded in handling, I think, very well.

Q: You left Taipei in 1961, the advent of Kennedy. In your reporting prior to that, which was during the Eisenhower Administration, had the concern about the McCarthyites and their later people pretty well died, as far as reporting it as you saw it?

GRANT: Oh, yes. As I say, after Quemoy, the Republicans felt enough tarred so this was no longer an issue. What had been becoming very clear, there were misconceptions on both sides, misconceptions as to what China was, misconceptions about our own policies. As for China, despite the rhetoric, they were pretty cautious. The longer I watched them, the more I was aware of this Chineseness. They feel themselves the center of the earth. "Chung Kuo" means "the central kingdom." They expect respect from others. They thought they should be playing a big role, even when they had no money to give away. They spent, I think, a billion dollars U.S. equivalent on the Tanzania-Zambia railway, which was strictly a prestige project. In other words, they were pulled by this image. But there were other things that even the slow reader could read. Take the Portuguese colonies of Macau on the China coast and Goa on the Indian coast. The Indians, whom we always think of as being a major democracy and so on, simply walked in and took Goa. The Chinese did not take Macau, and even kept the overzealous local communists from doing so, partly because they didn't want to rock the boat for Hong Kong. And they didn't want to rock the boat for Hong Kong because they were earning money through Hong Kong.

So there was a very strong strain of practicality, which I began to recognize once we saw the schism with the Soviet Union, and realized it was there, and once we recognized -- as a bureaucracy -- that the Great Leap Forward had not been a leap at all, it had been a disaster, and that the Chinese had a long way to go.

This was all coming together about the time that the Kennedy Administration came in. This was also the time when I first really became involved in policy. I was simply a junior officer out reporting. I got back in 1961 at the end of the year. We created first the mainland China desk, at the division level. Then within eight months, Joe Yager had come back from Taiwan and was running this area. We carved off the mainland China desk and made it the Office of Asian Communist Affairs, thereby giving it office-level status and beginning to admit that the Chinese communists existed. That created a place for a focus. This was all happening right then under the new Kennedy Administration. There was a feeling in the air that Kennedy would like to do something about China, but they hadn't really focused on it, so it was a wonderful time, in a way, the sense that people wanted something done, but didn't know quite what they wanted.

There were a number of things we began to do then. One of them was to put to rest this McCarthy thing you're talking about, about losing China. There was still a so-called Committee of One Million, which was a non-governmental organization, proclaimed itself a million strong - I thought it probably was lucky if it had a few thousand -- which was diehard pro-Kuomintang. You had people like Senator Knowland from California, who was sometimes called "the senator from Taiwan." There were a lot of redoubtable people who managed to sort of freeze this situation. One of the things that I focused on early on was: how do we break this myth? It seemed to me that if you could challenge the Committee of One Million and the extreme pro-Kuomintang people, directly, and they couldn't mount much of a counterattack, that you'd clear the way towards a more realistic policy towards China. The instrument came along. A fellow named Jim Thomson, who has been up at Harvard for years, was an assistant to the Assistant Secretary for the Far East, we called it then, Roger Hilsman. Jim and I and several others saw it very much in the same light. Jim saw an opportunity in a speech coming up in San Francisco to make the challenge, to throw down the glove, if you will.

GRANT: That's right. This was the Commonwealth Club of San Francisco, a good, respectable forum. He told me about it. There had already been a speech prepared, a standard 1950s-type rhetoric speech. We agreed, "Let's deep-six this and see if we can now say something about China." The Hilsman speech was December 1963, and it sounds real timid now. What that speech did was to say, "We don't love the Chinese communists. We think that they would be happier, and the world would be happier, if they had a more relaxed view of other people's rights to select their own government. But we think these people are going to be around and we're going to be dealing with them."

Now, there wasn't anything really new. Right from 1954, we'd been having ambassadorial-level talks with China. They started at that meeting in Geneva where Dulles refused to shake hands with Zhou En-lai, which has become a part of history. Sure, that was Dulles all over, this dramatic public position, but allowing the opening of ambassadorial-level talks. So we weren't saying anything very new, but we said it publicly. "These guys are going to be around. We plan to deal with them." In a sense, we challenged the conservative lobbies to do something about it, and they couldn't raise a whimper.

There was a pretty good press-alerting campaign under way. A fellow named Alan Whiting -- who was actually in the Research Bureau and shouldn't have been in press contacts at all, but he was quite a wheeler-dealer -- got the press alerted to this, so the press was ready and waiting. We got a tremendous reaction. If you're interested in how decisions are made, by the way, it's rather amusing. We cleared that speech with Governor Harriman, the number three officer in State, Under Secretary for Political Affairs, cleared it actually with his special assistant, who didn't spot what was so important in it, and said, "Sure, that looks innocuous enough." We never cleared it anywhere else.

Q: I think this is very important, because this is just what we're trying to bring out. In other words, this was something that was generated relatively low down within the bureaucracy, but the idea was using almost boilerplate-type language, but changing the emphasis and all, things we had been saying.

GRANT: That's right, to admit that they're going to be around and we're going to deal with them publicly, and just put it out.

Q: But then the idea, I take it, this was not just to say this, but this was also to get the press and say, "Look at it, fellows. Look at this speech closely. It means this."

GRANT: Right. Yes. Actually, one of my current pursuits has been decision-making in government, or foresight. I use this as an example. I speak of a couple of greased pigs with an idea. The government is full of greased pigs. If the listener to this tape thinks that government decisions are made in organized or rational ways, this is a good lesson.

We started it. He immediately, of course, told Hilsman what we were working on.

Q: In other words, he told Hilsman, "Look, this is real policy, although it may not seem like it"?

GRANT: Hilsman understood it. There was no problem there. We told Hilsman, "We're going to do a speech for you that's going to open it up."

Hilsman said, "Fine. Go ahead and work up the draft." He had his special assistant, Joe Neubert, take a look at it, had us keep him informed. But aside from that one clearance, as I say, we didn't go over to the White House and say, "We're about to really unload one on China." If we had, everybody would have probably wanted to get in the act.

What we did do was to create something that flew, and the Committee for One Million was barely heard from. There wasn't a whimper. Nobody complained. Everybody said, "Finally, the United States is getting its act in order."

It was right in line with what the Kennedy Administration liked, I mean Kennedy and his Irish mafia. This was forward looking, this was new. It was their kind of thing. They were quite happy with it, and we never heard any complaint from the White House of not having checked it out with them.

Anyway, that was the way we were trying to move it. We were trying to bring public policy into line with our recognition of the diplomatic realities.

Q: How did this fly? What reflections were you getting after all this of preparing the American public and all? What response was coming from the other side, from the Chinese?

GRANT: By the way, one of the things I was doing, I was out on the lecture circuit, talking wherever I could to TV, radio programs, to national organizations, meetings, and so on, to try to explain what we're about and getting good vibes from them. So there was quite a little operation going.

What we were also trying to do with the Chinese communists was to adjust the tone of our Warsaw talks a bit. We got very little response, to answer your question directly, but I'll expand on that a bit. I had, as were a lot of us young people at that time, been deeply impressed by [George] Kennan's containment policy for the Soviet Union. That was, I think, 1949. It was a very impressionable time for me. I remember believing, even from day one when I was in Hong Kong, that in a real world, the only way to deal with a threat like the Chinese communists is just that, to make foreign adventure -- real foreign adventure against our interests -- expensive and dangerous, but to make an evolution towards a less unfriendly condition promising -- to offer them that possibility.

We ran the preparation of the Warsaw talks from our office. David Dean, by the way, is back in town and could talk to this, because he was the one who actually did the drafting. It was the devil's own time to keep on finding things to talk about every month or two. I forget how often we met. But what we did was constantly pick up little themes. Like there was an epidemic in China. We had an embargo, of course, on trade with China. We said to them, "We are going to lift the embargo so that drugs can be shipped if you'll need them or are interested in having them." We had, of course, an embargo on travel with China. We got this lifted so journalists, if they could get in, could go. We were trying to find as many small ways as we could, just suggesting, "Sure, there's room here for dialogue."

The Chinese communists' standard reply -- and it was said in a thousand ways, a thousand times -- was, "There can be no progress on secondary issues until the primary issue, your occupation of our Taiwan, is resolved." But I remember writing to Marshall Green when he came in as Deputy Assistant Secretary -- my immediate boss -- that, "Unless we do this, we're in the worst of both possible worlds. We're scotching the snake, but not killing it, as Shakespeare said. We're avowedly hostile, but not willing to do anything about Chinese communist control of China. This will simply mean a hostile and not necessarily weak China. So we have got to move towards an explicit containment type of dialogue."

This was the language we were playing during 1962, '63, '64, until, unfortunately, the Vietnam problem came to intervene and you simply could not move very far on China, with us on opposite sides of the Vietnam issue.

Q: During this time, what was happening in China and how did we see developments within China? We're talking about 1961 to 1964.

GRANT: Basically 1961-1965, something like that. We were very slow to pick up the changes. In 1961, when I first got back, China had just been through the complete collapse of the Great Leap Forward. As we know now, millions of Chinese died. I think the total population even plummeted. The birth rate just slid down to nowhere, and this is all in more recent data. We didn't appreciate any of that. Again, I think that the field probably had a better sense of China than Washington. I, of course, had been working strictly on Taiwan for three years, but was in regular touch with our Hong Kong people. There was a lot of coming and going. Also with Chinese scholars. I was not nearly on target as to how bad things were, but I discovered that CIA was directing a national intelligence estimate which showed Chinese GNP still rising in 1960. I said, "This is absurd!"

So I think that there was a differential between the field and Washington, at least in my case. There wasn't the beginnings of a real understanding as to what was happening as we now know it from documents that have come out in the turbulence of recent decades. But it was very clear that a counterattack had been launched by the economic rationalists, if you will, and we were beginning by this time to recognize that it was by no means a monolith. There were these divisions. You could see Zhou En-lai coming back into prominence, and some of the other more conservative leaders. They went back and resurrected the vilified birth control efforts. They shifted their focus. I think their first one was on light industry and industry serving agriculture. There were several formally during the period, and I've now forgotten which ones came in what order.

But basically, this was a recognition that massive capital-intensive investment was eating up the resources, and they needed to get less capital-intensive solutions out faster. That was, I think, by everybody's standard, the reason. And it was true that during the early and mid-1960s, there was a quite rational discussion within China, and you could see this in their output, their regular international reports and reports of their meetings and so on, that they were trying in pragmatic terms to deal with their problems -- leaving, of course, the ideologues and the old ideologue Mao Zedong more and more frustrated with this descent of the revolution into the practical.

Again, we very seldom predict -- I think now or then -- what the Chinese are going to do. All the expert can do is get there faster with an explanation as to what just happened. It was a period of retrenchment and sanity, and we recognized it as such, and we spotted the cultural revolution for the insanity it was, much faster than we had the Great Leap Forward.

Q: Why is it that we have trouble understanding what's happening in China? Were there discrepancies coming, say, from our reporting, from covert sources and the ones we were getting from the Central Intelligence Agency? Did they have a different line than we had? Was this a problem?

GRANT: In that particular instance, that national intelligence estimate, the more optimistic view was coming out of the Langley bureaucracy.

Q: Langley being where CIA has its headquarters.

GRANT: In the field, I'm not so sure that there was that much of a divergence. I think that it would depend on the individual. I think we tended to be in communication and probably think very much the same way.

As to why we don't guess right, it's just an opaque society. I remember going to Cyprus after I had worked on China for years, and just being astonished. Or India. India was much more open. You could tell what was brewing. These people managed to keep it so close that we really didn't know.

Now, I've been annoying my old China-watcher friends since I've been out of the business, by saying, "We never guess right." This offends them. In fact, we did guess right on their external behavior, which has been much more consistent through all these periods than their internal. We recognized belatedly, as I mentioned -- certainly knew it by the early 1960s -- that the Chinese were going to be rather cautious in their foreign policy. We did guess right, certainly our office did -- Asian Communist Affairs -- and I did personally, when the dispute flared up with India in 1963, (I guess that was) the Indians having belatedly discovered that the Chinese were in a part of Ladakh that they thought was theirs.

Q: This is up in the Himalayas.

GRANT: That's right. It's the western tip of Tibet and the eastern edge of Kashmir. The Indians claimed it, but they hadn't been there enough even to realize that the Chinese were there and building a road through it. Then they tried to push the Chinese out. The Chinese were not to be pushed, and retaliated by the attack in NEFA, the northeast frontier territories of India just to the east of Bhutan. I can remember in that instance we said to ourselves, "The way the Chinese have been behaving, they have no advantage in getting too far into NEFA, certainly not in getting onto the Indian plain."

This was November, as I recall. The winter was coming on. Their supply lines were extremely extended. All they were trying to do was to warn the Indians, "If you won't make a deal that accommodates our interests in the west, we can cause you trouble in the east, where you're very vulnerable."

I remember saying, "They'll probably pull out. They don't want to spend the winter in that forward position. They don't want to get dug into it." That was a very wise move on their part. In Quemoy, they had seen the difficulty of how you back off an embarrassing situation if you can't stay there. So they just simply turned around and walked away. In that sense, we did make a prediction.

Also, the fact that they did not move overtly in Vietnam. Over this there was a tremendous debate. I was very much a dove on Vietnam, but not because of China. It was because I didn't think we could win. I had to take the responsibility for North Vietnam when we created the Office of Asian Communist Affairs, and North Vietnam, North Korea, and Outer Mongolia became part of my watching area. I then began to inquire about what we knew about the table of organization, the basic facts of life in Hanoi, and discovered we knew nothing. I thought this was catastrophic, and I was convinced by other friends that, in fact, we were in a very bad situation.

But I did not think that the Chinese were going to come in overtly. As a matter of fact, there was a very good intelligence estimate, or war game. It had a Greek letter -- I think it was Omega -- run out of the Pentagon, but with State, CIA, a lot of other participation. They played the game through sometime in the mid-1960s, and the way they played it, the Russians and Chinese kept putting in enough to counter our efforts, but just enough, and not moving beyond that, and we kept bogging down. If we had paid attention to that war game, we'd have gotten a very good steer as to how we should have behaved in Vietnam. It would have saved us a lot of heartache later on, because that's exactly what they did. So on external policy, I think we did better.

Q: Just to get an idea on policy. The Chinese were giving the Indians a bloody nose. You in your office were saying, "This looks like that's just what it is. This is not something that's going on." There has been the perception for years in the United States (or was in this period) that we're talking about a force that would go anywhere at any time and take anything. We were talking about communism. Were you having problems selling the idea of a limited punitive engagement in India to others within the State Department or the government?

GRANT: Carol Laise was my counterpart at the time. She was running the Office of Indian Affairs, whatever they called it. As I remember, she bought this as very possible. I don't remember an argument. For another thing, the Chinese did what we said they were going to do within a matter of ten days or so, so the issue was resolved.

Q: That's one nice thing about policy: it takes so long. [Laughter]

GRANT: What we had there was rather interesting. Galbraith, who was ambassador in India at the time, this is about the only time I'm aware of that he actually used his old White House connection effectively at all, but he was just dying to come down on the Indian side of this whole argument. He managed to force through a U.S. Government position endorsing the Indian view of the border, whereas our view -- and I think the India desk rather shared it -- was that this was none of our business, that we should have left that whole question of borders for much longer resolution between them. So in that sense, even though Galbraith was associated with Kennedy and with this whole new school, his instinctive view -- I guess it was probably "localitis" -- he simply wanted to take the Indians' position. He wasn't about ready to give a nickel to the Chinese.

Q: We had a secret agreement with the Indians that we would supply air support if the Chinese came barreling on. This came after the fact. Do you recall that?

GRANT: I don't, and I should have been aware of it. If I've forgotten it, that's rather odd, because that would be very important. See, in 1965 I went to India. I swapped jobs with Jake Jacobson. He came back to my job in Asian Communist Affairs.

Q: The reason I say that, this Monday, just two days ago, I had the first of what will be several interviews with Nick Veliotis, and he mentions this, this secret treaty which nobody seems to know about, when the Indians were saying, "We might want to take you up on this, because the Chinese are making noises." He referred to it and said we had this.

GRANT: I'll be seeing Nick again shortly. I'll ask about that, because I certainly don't recall there being anything, certainly nothing like a treaty.

Q: Maybe it was an agreement.

GRANT: I'm not even aware of an agreement. There may have been some sort of message at a very high level of classification that I was simply never briefed on when I got there. That is conceivable. The U.S. did some contingency planning, but I'm not aware we ever told the Indians. Maybe Galbraith just took it on himself to tell them. Nick was in Delhi.

Q: You might talk to him, because he brought this up.

GRANT: I am unaware of it. There were a bunch of things going on at that time, in which we had one sort or another of dealing with the Indians, but a lot of that is, I think, still classified. It's conceivable that this was some sort of exchange in this area. But I was aware of so much of it that I am surprised if there was anything really said.

Q: You might mention it to him. Again, looking at the Chinese external relations, a very important thing was, of course, the relations with the Soviet Union. How were we seeing it at the time?

GRANT: How were we seeing the Chinese relations?

Q: With the Soviet Union.

GRANT: I have never had any reason to question that once we recognized the schism, we read it fairly close to the facts. Generally they behaved toward the Soviets about the way we expected. For instance, in the troublesome Xinjiang problems and little border problems along the Amur River, the Chinese behaved towards the Russians about like we expected, which is to say, quite hostile. They weren't about ready to do anything with the Russians to resolve these little issues. The Russians were actually the ones who were probing periodically to see whether they could soften the confrontation one way or another. The Chinese kept saying, "Get your troops away from our border and maybe we can talk."

Q: How did this schism manifest itself and first come across your radar, you might say? You were in various jobs, but dealing with China. At one point, we felt that this was an indivisible bond, that communists were communists, and they were both together. Yet you're saying we hadn't realized how Chinese the Chinese Communists were. How did this show itself? When did you first see the reflections of the schism?

GRANT: I forget whether it was in the part of the tape that we lost that we touched on this before.

Q: I don't think we have.

GRANT: Okay. Yes, that's a central issue, because as long as the Chinese and the Soviets seemed to be part of a monolithic communist movement that was out -- as it regularly said it was -- to replace capitalism and us, anybody arguing policy had a very good reason to say, "You've got to do everything you can to make life more difficult for these people, to weaken them." The Hilsman speech moved, for instance, the whole slow opening up of U.S.-China policy, became possible only once we had recognized that that was a false view of the world and that this was not a monolith.

The Chinese had very grave differences with the Russians over policy. I think that they really were terribly bitter that they paid the price to save North Korea, and the Russians were the ones who became the tutelary power because of their ability to provide more aid. But it's an ethnic and national sense. The Chinese are very proud and do consider themselves to be the most civilized people on earth, and the Russians not. To have been, during the early 1950s, in this secondary relationship was terribly galling to them.

We can now date the schism pretty much to when Mao went to Moscow in 1955 or '56 (I forget which) and said to Khrushchev, who was embarking on liberalization, "Don't do it. It makes problems for us and we can't afford liberalization now. We've got to keep the screws on to get our problems solved, to get our economy going." And Khrushchev turned him down. That was undoubtedly the watershed out of which it all came.

We didn't perceive this -- at least I didn't -- and I don't remember even a serious statement within our government of the idea that there was a schism until -- and here I'm fuzzy. I wouldn't have been seeing a lot of this till I got back in 1961, but by the time I got back in '61 from Taiwan, I remember I was already convinced of it. I would say that it was probably in 1958 or '59 that I personally came around and said, "Yeah, this is real. I'm pretty sure it's real." And that probably was on the basis of conversations in Hong Kong or with people from Hong Kong.

Q: Was this slow to dawn on the State Department, do you think?

GRANT: I think that others were probably moving at somewhat the same speed. By the time that the Kennedy Administration came in -- I don't recall -- the best litmus of this would be whether you had other agencies or other people within the Department of State objecting to what we were doing in 1962 and '63, things like the instructions for the Warsaw talks, or the Hilsman speech itself after it came out, or various other policy moves.

I think that others perceived the split to be as we did: real. Consequently, they were willing to go along with it. When objections were taken to our policy proposals, it was usually for very different reasons. For instance, I was very anxious in the U.N. Chinese representation issue to see us get out of the way of what I thought was an inevitability. That was that the Chinese, despite their rhetoric, were not doing anything, really, to upset other people. I mean, after all, Burma. We've already spoken of Macau and Hong Kong. They leave them there simply out of self-interest. They learned their lesson very quickly about Taiwan. Burma, they never have given, until the present day, the Burmese Communists the kind of support they easily could have. Northern Thailand offered opportunities and they didn't exploit them. They did not move into Laos against the Vietnamese, although they were obviously looking at it, even building roads.

The fact that they weren't doing anything meant that more and more countries would leave us on the Chinese representation issue. The Third World was growing, more countries coming into existence who remembered colonialism, but didn't have anything against the Chinese, and thought of them as Third World. So I figured that we probably were not going to be able to hold our line for very long in the U.N. I thought it was anathema to adopt two Chinas, because neither the Republic of China nor the Communists would accept that; both of them would excoriate us. So I was trying to find a way to get others, in effect, to weld Republic of China into its position as best you could do it, while you let the Communists in. One of the techniques I proposed, one of the slogans, was "two contenders. We're not arguing that there are two Chinas; we're just saying that there are two people, both of whom say they're China, both of whom control some land; we're willing to let them both in."

I had resistance to that, but not from the whole China, the Far Eastern area. I had some problem with some of the more conservative people on the Republic of China desk, but a lot of people liked that idea. It was the German desk at EUR, European Affairs, that objected because of the parallel for East Germany. So by that measure, I would say that the world had turned, that the monolith image had gone enough so that except for a few sort of diehard redoubts, there were very few people arguing the unified communist threat by the early 1960s.

RALPH J. KATROSH
U.S. Military Assistance Group

Ralph J. Katrosh was born in 1927 and raised in Kingston, Pennsylvania. He attended Virginia Military Institute. From there, he joined the military and became a part of the Third Army Palace Guard. It was here in Europe that he developed a desire to join the foreign service. Upon returning to the States, he entered the Foreign Service School at Georgetown University. He then went to the State Department to work with China in Taiwan. He has also served in Burma, the Philippines, Malaysia, Israel and Vietnam. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on August 28, 1992.

KATROSH: That's right. While in Switzerland I was invited to a party given by the American diplomatic establishment there. I was sitting in a hotel in Interlaken with an Air Force lieutenant. We had just finished playing some bridge, and this fellow came up in a polished Ford and said, "Would you fellows like to go to a party?" "Of course." So we went. There was a beautiful buffet and a lot of glitter. I thought this wasn't a bad life, the diplomatic business.

That is not as flippant as it sounds because I always excelled in history. If I got less than a 98, I was upset. And geography. There are members of my family who were professional military who spent years roaming around Europe and China. I have always thought of these places, when a youngster, as being very romantic. That, plus the fact that I like history and geography, plus this display of rather nice living, prompted me to write a letter to my Dad saying, "Well, when I get out I think I would like to try to join the American Foreign Service." This was in August 1946.

In October 1946, the trials were over and I was getting ready to separate from the Army at the convenience of the government. I received a letter from Dad who said, "Look, friend, if you are going to do anything about a career you had better forget about this business of bouncing around Europe and get back home. I have a place for you at Georgetown and you probably could get into the February 1947 Foreign Service School class."

So I did. I came home and went to Georgetown and entered the Foreign Service School in February 1947, with every intention of joining the Foreign Service. Between 1947 and the early part of 1950, the stress, from my point of view, at the Georgetown Foreign Service School, was economics rather than the impending conflict between Communism and the Western world.

So between 1946 and 1950, I thought Foreign Service was all right, but if I went into business abroad I could make more money and still have all the ambience anyway. In 1950 I used some of Dad's contacts and applied for a job with General Motors. They said, "Fine." However, I wanted to go to China or to some other place in the Far East. I had been to Europe and didn't really want to go back there and count stones. General Motors said, "Sorry fellow, there is going to be a war in Korea and we are not sending anyone to Asia right now, but you can go to Latin America if you want to." I said, "I don't think I want to do that." I still know nothing about Latin America.

In 1949-50, Chiang Kai-shek was being driven from the mainland. The Chinese Nationalist government was looking to the United States for some succor but we weren't really ready to make a strong commitment. If you research US domestic politics at that time, the cry of the Republican Party was "Who lost China?" Of course, the Democrats got the blame for that.

At any rate Chiang Kai-shek left the mainland and arrived in Taiwan with absolutely nothing. The United States Government didn't want to make too much of a public move towards Taiwan at that time, so it agreed with China to set up a purchasing commission in the Department of the Army. The Department of the Army would furnish the Chinese government certain people who were expert in buying and selling things the Chinese would need to establish themselves in Taiwan. US personnel also would go to Taiwan and organize the Nationalist military remnants, which were disorganized. Believe me, it was a mess.

I applied and was accepted for this job. There were about 30 of us and we packed off to Taiwan in 1950-51. The State Department had an excellent attitude for dealing with Chiang at that time. The basis of our policy was, "Look fellow, we will protect you on Taiwan, but we are going to support you only to a degree that will allow this protection to be realistic. You have got to do the rest."

Lo and behold, Chiang Kai-shek did it. The first and most important thing that he did was to institute an agricultural reform program. If he had done so on the mainland, the Chiangs would still be ruling the place. What he did was to break up the landed estates on Taiwan, gave the land to the peasants, gave the landlords money and said, "You can't buy the land back, but you can do anything you want with it in terms of industry, banking and making money. But you can't have the land back." Well, you see what Taiwan is today. I maintain that it is all because of US policy goals in 1950.

Q: Did you have anything to do with the people who were helping doing this? We had gone through somewhat the same thing in Japan. Was this an offshoot? Was Chiang looking at Japan or we just putting an awful lot of pressure on him?

KATROSH: This was first. This preceded Japan. Taiwan was pretty much a going concern before Japan got into its program.

We put pressure on Chiang in that "this was the only option you have Jack." That was one of his nicknames, "Jack." "There is no other option for you. This is what we are prepared to do and this is what you must do if you are to receive US aid."

When I arrived in Taiwan there were four paved roads.

Q: This was in what year?

KATROSH: 1951. ...four paved roads. One in from the airport into the city, one running from the Grand Hotel through the city to the eastern side of the city. There was one taxi. The foreign journalists and top officials had some sedans. The rest of us drove either Willys panel trucks or Jeeps. There was absolutely nothing. The Chinese, though, I must say, fed us well and gave us quarters, field clothes, etc.

Q: In the midst of this Chiang Kai-shek was apparently trying to use the Korean War, which was really very hot at this time, to his advantage. There was an offer of "give us the training, the equipment and the money and we will put so many divisions into Korea." How did you all respond to this sort of talk?

KATROSH: Not a chance. That was strictly propaganda. Propaganda even in Chiang's eyes. His army when it came off the mainland was absolutely worthless and in 1951-53, he couldn't put together two divisions that would go anywhere. They had no uniforms, a minimum amount of ammunition, no artillery, no transport. They just had rifles, and some of the troops didn't even have that. Their navy...I think they had two or three LSTs, one of which I rode one time, and I think two DEs that sometimes sailed.

One of the things that did happen...there was just enough of the Chinese Air Force left on Taiwan and just enough of our fleet in the Formosa Straits...at that time we had a policy of physically separating the two sides...to force the Chinese Communists to keep a good number of their divisions in Fujian and Zhejiang Province. Also, the Chinese Nationalists held a number of offshore islands, many of which they still hold. On those offshore islands the Nationalists built up a guerilla force which raided the China coast and captured small Chinese Communist and other flag merchant vessels.

Q: This is Quemoy...?

KATROSH: Quemoy, Matsu, Wu Chen, Poichuan. There is a string of them, most of them lighthouses, but the sizeable one, of course, was Quemoy. Tachen was very small but very strategically located off the coast of Zhejiang just outside the port of Wenchou.

There was a rather effective blockade of the Fuchou and other Fujianese ports. Butterfield and Swire used to love to run blockade runners into the Formosa Straits and try to cut into Amoy or Fuchou on a dark night. The Chinese Nationalist guerrillas would bring these ships to one of the offshore islands and steal their cargo and send the ships back to Hong Kong saying, "Don't try it again."

The guerrillas on the islands would take the cargo that they stole from the steamers to Hong Kong and sell it. They then would buy provisions. They were fully self-supporting...they weren't going to get a heck of a lot out of Taipei.

The British complained to us that the situation was getting expensive and they didn't want to confront the Chinese Nationalists or us with a military escort for these ships. They wanted us to tell the Chinese to back off. Eisenhower did and that silliness, up to a point, ceased.

But at the same time the people on the offshore islands became even more dependent on Taiwan, because most of those islands...I have been on a number of them and they are not self-sufficient, particularly if you have more than the basic population in residence. If there is a military unit or guerrillas, then you have to send additional supplies to the islands.

This went on all through the Korean War. The Taipei government, of course, when we had tens of thousands of Chinese Communist prisoners in Korea, went up there to try to entice as many of them as they could to defect. My recollection is about 12,000 of the hundreds of thousands did. But this action had no real effect on the Korean War.

The Chinese Communists tried to take Quemoy soon after Chiang left the mainland. An old Chinese general, Hulien, one of the few good ones, beat them back. Quemoy is in Amoy Harbor and it is like holding Manhattan against the United States Army. The Chinese Communists didn't try to take Quemoy all through the Korean War, which surprised many of us in the area at the time.

In 1954, the first heavy Chinese Communist bombardment occurred. This was not the 1958 one when President Eisenhower sent in the troops. The public knew less about this earlier bombardment, although if you read the US foreign affairs records you will find an awful lot about it. They didn't invade, but they bombarded it quite severely. They could do that because of the location of the island.

China did retake the Ta Chens, the northernmost of the Nationalists' island chain. The Communists did that, I think, to free up any nonsense around the Shanghai approaches and Zhejiang ports.

They never bothered Matsu. It is a little bit tougher nut...it is a piece of rock sticking out of the water.

By April of 1955, Taiwan was a going concern and it was time for me to leave the "purchasing group." On reflection I thought the Foreign Service might be a nice place after all.

Q: What was your impression of the Chinese officialdom that you dealt with?

KATROSH: There were some brilliant exceptions, particularly the younger men educated in the United States, as well as some of the older businessmen. The military was hopeless, except for two or three generals who would fight. The military was still very corrupt, the troops had as yet no real stake in survival of the Chinese Nationalist government other than, for whatever reason, they would be shot if they defected to the Communists. Taiwan was the only refuge available to them.

I think by 1955 that began to change. The older group was moving out. Some of the younger men were taking the middle level positions. The army was beginning to induct younger people, even Taiwanese, at the enlisted level, not yet the officer level. We had a MAAG there and it was beginning to have an effect.

Q: The military assistance group.

KATROSH: Right. It was a very small group, I don't think more than 20 officers. They made sure that the Nationalist troops had uniforms, received pay, food and medical care. To the Chinese soldier at that point of history, this was very important, this was good living. A better living than many of the peasants.

Then we, the US, re-equipped the Chinese Air Force. Also a cadre was organized and trained for the Chinese Navy. Things began to look up for the Chinese military. So I would say from about 1955 on, they became a more reliable force. But prior to 1955 they were absolutely worthless, really.

In 1955 I came back to the United States. By that time I had married and had a son born on Taiwan. I took lateral entry into the Department of State, which was expanding because this was the build-up years for the Cold War. I stayed in the States for a little while getting trained and acquainted with Departmental discipline and procedures.

ROBERT S. DILLON
Operations with Nationalist Chinese
Taiwan (1951-1954)

Ambassador Robert S. Dillon was born in Chicago, Illinois in 1929. He received a bachelor's degree from Duke University in 1951 and joined the State Department in 1956. In addition to serving as ambassador to Lebanon, his career included positions in Venezuela, Turkey, Malaysia, and Egypt. Ambassador Dillon was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1990.

DILLON: My family came from the Middle West. My mother and father were both born in Coffeyville, Kansas. I was born in Chicago during a brief sojourn for the family. I came to Washington when I was three weeks old and have always lived either in Washington or in northern Virginia. I mention the Middle West because there must be some of that in me, but I really consider myself a Washingtonian. I went to a Washington high school -- Western High School, as did my wife, Sue, whom I married in 1951. It is now called Duke Ellington School. In those days Western was one of the preeminent schools in the District. I would guess that a third of the student body when I attended Western came from the Virginia suburbs. Of course, the suburbs then were not as heavily populated as they are today. In the 1940's, Washington was a city different from today in the sense that people from the suburbs came to the city to "do everything" -- shopping, entertainment or as in my case, education.

So I grew up with people whose fathers worked for the government. Among them were a surprising number of politicians and congressmen and military officers, and even a few Foreign Service Officers. My father was a lawyer in private practice. But joining the Foreign Service was almost a natural consequence of my environment; certainly it was much more natural than for many people because I grew up in a government atmosphere.

I started my college career in 1946 at Washington and Lee University in Lexington, Virginia. After my freshman year, I went into the Army for eighteen months. After discharge, I decided not to continue at W&L -- it was an all male school at the time -- and transferred to Duke University, joining my future wife, from whence I graduated in 1951. That was during the Korean War. I had planned to go to law school -- "planned" is perhaps too grand a word. In fact, I considered law school but didn't have strong feelings about what I wanted to do. Just before graduating from Duke, I came to Washington, having decided to re-enter the military service because the Korean War was on. Having served for eighteen months as an enlisted man in a rifle company, all of it in the U.S., I was going to be careful about what the military might be willing to offer. I was looking for something more interesting than my previous experience. In the course of discussing options for officers' training programs I was recruited by a U.S. government agency for a program in Taiwan that assisted Chinese Nationalist irregular forces. They were looking for civilians or for officers who could be seconded to a civilian status, so that there would be no direct connection with the American military services. I qualified because I had some military experience -- I had been a small arms instructor for the last six months of my Army tour.

We went through training and then to Taiwan. I spent the last year of the war on one of the small off-shore islands on the China coast -- Tachen. Others went to Quemoy and Matsu. My island was the most northern one near the mouth of the Hangchow Bay. We trained and advised Chinese irregulars in raiding operations along the China coast. The idea was to deflect the Chinese communist army from Korea. Half of us were civilian and half were serving military officers. There were no distinctions among the group. We all wore Chinese military uniforms; our counterparts were Chinese officers. The major I worked for -- Robert Barrow -- who later became a full General and Commandant of the Marine Corps.

In most career services, including the Foreign Service, and certainly the military services, when members of those services are detached to work for another organization, you have to be very suspicious because the best officers will not be volunteered. The exception will occur if there is a senior service officer who is personally interested in the project and wants to do his best to make it succeed. The Marines are not perfect, but they had a philosophy which I always liked. They believed that if they were going to be represented in non-Marine groups or organizations, they would put their best foot forward and make their best officers available. Barrow was a good example of this philosophy. He had been an outstanding company commander early in the war in Korea. In World War II, he had been with an organization called SACO in China, behind Japanese lines. So he was well versed in irregular warfare operations and was recognized as an outstanding officer. In general, all the people I worked with were good.

Q: What was your impression of the nationalist irregulars?

DILLON: Mine was a worm's eye view. We were all very young -- I was one of the youngest. I was not greatly impressed by the Nationalist officers. They were scornful and inconsiderate of their troops. The troops were brave and suffered hardships with extraordinary good nature. I always think of the Chinese soldier as a little guy walking up a steep hill with a big mortar plate on his back. His officer walked up the hill, breathing heavily, staggering under the weight of a sidearm. We were not impressed with the Nationalist officers. There were occasional good ones.

We quickly became very cynical about political statements that we would hear. We were not of course very sophisticated, but we would hear unrealistic statements about how the Chinese Nationalists were prepared to unleash these mighty forces. Many of these statements came from American Republican conservatives. General MacArthur talked about landing a couple of divisions on the mainland. My group was involved on the ground, and indeed, in combat, with irregular Chinese nationalist troops. It was our considered judgement -- coming from a bunch of men the ages of 23 to 31 (we considered the latter to be a very old man) -- that no Nationalist intervention would have any effect on mainland China, except perhaps to get us into a lot more trouble than we were in already. None of us believed that the Nationalist government really wanted to fight.

One interesting aspect of our little operation was that we spent a lot of time trying to persuade the Chinese to do battle. We also had a hard time convincing them to attack "hard" targets. They preferred "soft" targets. Once when we did succeed in convincing General Hu Sung-nan to attack a truly significant target, our troops took a terrific beating. It was disaster, primarily due to the tactical incompetence of the officers who led the attack. They landed on the wrong beach -- events like that do occur. The reconnaissance was faulty, the maps were wrong. We landed on a sandbar across the river from our target and became exposed to enemy fire without cover. The Nationalists took a lot of casualties. This confirmed to them that it was dumb to do anything the Americans suggested. It made it that much more difficult to persuade them to attack hard targets although we continued to attack soft ones. My own duties were primarily reconnaissance and intelligence gathering.

The Korean war ended in July, 1953. Stalin died in March and I remember sitting at our camp listening to that announcement on the radio. Our immediate feeling was that his death was significant even though we didn't know precisely how. The end of the war a few months later gave the Americans an opportunity to end these irregular operations. It was then that the Nationalists became very active. Indeed the largest raid conducted by the Nationalist irregulars occurred after the war in August 1953. No Americans participated directly in that operation; it was disaster despite the bravery of the troops involved. The Nationalists were afraid that peace would break out. I talk about this period of my life because it is important to remember that my generation was very much influenced by the Cold War and the Korean War. Most of the Americans I was with on the off-shore islands were veterans of World War II, some not as combat troops, but certainly as members of a military service then the Korean War came along very quickly. As a consequence, even though I have just vented some cynicism about the Chinese Nationalists, we grew up with the strong feeling that we lived in a world constantly in conflict and in a sense war seemed very natural to us. As my colleagues and I went on to other careers, we never forgot this conflict between "good" and "evil" with us being "good", and our conviction that somehow, the "good" guys would win. It took me years to see the world through a different prism. Eventually, and I would guess that this was over twenty years ago, I came to see that the view of the world in East-West conflict terms was misleading and it was dangerous for us to see it in those terms. The United States constantly made policy mistakes, for example in Vietnam because of that mistaken view.

I had never heard of the "regionalists", but in recent years, I have been told that there were "regionalists" in contrast to the "East-West conflict" believers. I am essentially a "regionalist". Most of the problems I have been involved with over the years were essentially regional problems. One of the constants was Washington's tendency, especially at the senior political level, to see the world in east-West contest terms. It could have been Cyprus, Lebanon, Palestine, whatever. The tendency was to view each of these issues in an East-West context. Henry Kissinger was one of the preeminent policy makers who fell into this trap.

Harvey Feldman was born in New York in 1931. He graduated from the University of Chicago. He entered the State Department in 1954 serving in Hong Kong, Tokyo, Nagoya, and Taipei. Mr. Feldman was interviewed by Edward Dillery in 1999.

FELDMAN: That led to a conversation about the Foreign Service. It sounded interesting; so I asked how one became a Foreign Service officer. He told me that you had to take an exam given once a year in December; if you passed it, you would be called in for an oral interview; if you passed that, you would be given a commission as a Foreign Service officer. I asked how one applied and he told me.

So I wrote a letter and in the fullness of time took the exam and passed it. I had never expected to join the Foreign Service, but once having passed the written, I went on to the orals. I went to Washington at my own expense. At that time, candidates had to arrange their own travel and accommodations - this was 1954. I remember that I stayed in a rooming house called the "Allen Lee" - probably at the corner of G and 20th or 21st or 22nd. You have to remember that I really didn't care whether I was going to join the Foreign Service or not; my plans at the time were to get a Ph.D. in Chinese studies from the University of Chicago. I do remember that my panel was chaired by someone with the wonderful name of Cromwell T. Riches. I thought that that was a perfect name for a Foreign Service officer. The first question that I was asked was whether "Red China" should be recognized. I thought about an answer for a bit. I decided to tell the panel what I really thought. So I said it that I thought it should be recognized. Several of the panel members became very upset with my answer. They wanted to know why I thought we should recognize that country. I pointed out that the Chinese were fighting us in Korea, but that no one seemed to know why they had done so. I suggested that it would be preferable to be able to talk to them directly to try to understand their motivations, rather than to guess what they might be willing or wanting to do. So we got into a good discussion, which seemed to flow pretty smoothly for the rest of my time. Eventually, the examination ended and I was asked to wait outside the room for a few minutes. After about 15 or 20 minutes, Mr. Riches emerged and told me that I had passed, although he said "There were some committee members who did not like the way you slouched in your chair. I thought for sure that the issue of "Red China" would be the problem; I was quite surprised by the comment about my demeanor.

After having received my MA, I decided to move forward to try to get a Ph.D. I didn't know whether I would ever get into the Foreign Service. It turned out that I had a major disagreement with the Chairman of the Chinese Language and Literature Department at Chicago - a professor named Herlee Glessner Creel. His specialty was early archaic China and especially interpreting oracle bones, which are inside tortoise shells, which were used for divination - one would carve on them in ancient Chinese characters questions like, "If the King goes hunting today, will he be successful?" Then the questioner would throw the shell on a fire and the results would be interpreted by the cracks in the shell. Creel was famous for a book that he had written called "The Birth of China."

So Creel was indeed a great scholar in oracle bones and in trying to decide what the culture of ancient China might have been. He wanted me to join him in his research since I was the departmental fellow who was going to be working directly with him for my Ph.D. I didn't think that this was the most interesting avenue to pursue. I told Creel that I really wanted to work on 19th Century treaty ports in China. That turned into something of a dust-up. This all took place early in the fall of 1954.

About this time, I got a phone from the Department of State asking me how soon I could be available to enter the Service. I said: "How about in two weeks?" That was too quick for them, but the caller said he would be back in touch with me. I should mention that at the time, I was married with one little child about a year old. We were living in a small, rented apartment. No one had told me that when you went overseas your furniture would accompany at Department expense. So we sold our furniture and waited for the call from the Department. And we waited; and we waited. We went from early October to mid-November waiting for that call.

The call came and I was asked to report for duty immediately. I was informed that my first assignment would be Hong Kong as a Refugee Relief Program investigator. I said "Okay." A couple of weeks later, at the end of November 1954, I found myself in a 19th Century Treaty port called Hong Kong.

When I arrived, to my great delight, I was told that I would not be a Refugee Relief Program investigator, but rather that I would be a Vice Consul - the passport officer.

Q: Let's go back in the story. Did you ever stop in Washington on your way to the Far East?

FELDMAN: I did; I had a one week program for secretaries and clerk typists. During the course of this orientation, one of our lecturers asked whether there were any Vice Consuls in the class. I raised my hand; I was the only one. All the rest were staff personnel. The lecturer expressed some surprise. After that one week, I was given airline tickets for my wife, my son and myself. We flew on a Boeing Stratocruiser - the one with the sort of belly lounge. We had bunks; my wife and son were in a lower bunk and I was in the upper. We took off from Washington; it was an incredible flight. From Washington, we flew to Pittsburgh, then Chicago, Minneapolis, Portland - or somewhere on the West Coast - someplace in Alaska, and finally Misawa (Japan). Unfortunately, my son got real air sick and threw up all over my wife. When we debarked in Misawa, she got off wearing a bathrobe. When the plane was cleaned, we got on board again and flew to Tokyo where we got off again. We stayed there for a day in a hotel. Then we reboarded, flew from Tokyo to Okinawa, then to Taipei and on to Hong Kong. The whole trip took about two and a half days.

Q: Did you any have feeling for what a Consulate General was like? How it was organized?

FELDMAN: I had no idea. I didn't know what to expect. I was simply delighted to be going to a 19th Century Treaty Port which was after all what I wanted to study. I guess first posts are always very special and Hong Kong will always be very dear to me. In those days, Hong Kong was one of the most delightful cities in the world. The population was about a million. The tallest building in town was probably 16 stories high. The air was clear - no smog. When one swam at night, the water was phosphorescent. It was beautiful. There were wild monkeys and deer on the island. It was truly like being in heaven.

The only problem was that when we arrived we were put up in a "leave" flat - a CG rented apartment that happened to be vacant because the tenant was on leave. This was the beginning of December. Now I was just 23 years old, first time out of the U.S. with a wife and one year old child. We were essentially left to our own devices in this apartment on the Peak - No 9, Coombe Road. We had no idea how we would survive - where to get groceries, etc. No one told us anything - no welcome wagon.

Fortunately, there was an American family in the same apartment house - Robert and Meg Aylward. There were experienced hands and had been in the FS for at least a dozen years. The first thing they did was to lend us a crib for Ross Christopher - who is now 45. They gave us the phone number of something called the "Welcome Company" - a grocery store which delivered on the Peak. We could order everything by phone, which we did. Pretty soon, we settled in another apartment because the tenant of the one we occupied returned from leave. We moved to a place in Kowloon - 222 Prince Edward Road. Living in Kowloon was like living in the Bronx - only Chinese. It was a horrible place - far worst than the student housing at the University of Chicago. It was later condemned as unsanitary by the U.S. Public Health Service.

So I made my views known to the administrative officer; I just wasn't going to live there. I complained loudly and strongly enough that I was told that I had a housing allowance and could go to rent a place. We looked and found a place that we liked, which was within our housing allowance. We had no furniture, but it turned out that our allowance included an amount that could be used to rent furniture. We did that; we rented a little two bedroom flat in Repulse Bay - five minute walk to the beach. We rented furniture and it was like being in heaven. It felt as if we were living out in the country. We listened to the cry of barking deer at night and sat on our balcony and watched the stars. There were all sorts of wild birds that I had never seen before. Carol and Ross Christopher could go to the beach at Repulse Bay every day. We had lovely neighbors. It was great.

Q: Probably the best housing you ever had in your career.

FELDMAN: I had better housing later, but there was something very, very special about that apartment in Repulse Bay. As a matter of fact, there was something special about going to Hong Kong as a very young officer, with a wife and year old son. It turned out that for Ross Christopher, his first language actually was Cantonese, which he learned from a Cantonese amah whom we hired shortly after our arrival - English was his second. We also hired her husband who was a cook from Shanghai. I think that illustrates better than words what prices were like in Hong Kong in those days. There, I was - a brand new Vice Consul - starting out at the magnificent salary of $4,200 per annum - something like that - we had a great apartment and for $50 per month were able to engage the services of a fantastic cook and a Cantonese amah.

My wife, Carol, would toddle off with Christopher almost every day to the beach; I was picked up by car and driven to the Consulate General - 26 Garden Road - where it is still today, although it has been remodeled a couple of times since. I was lucky enough to live along Island Road; some people lived as far as Stanley which was way beyond Repulse Bay. So the person who lived the furthest out drove a car - an office station wagon - along Island Road and picked up other members of the CG and took us to the office building.

Q: How did you get around when you weren't picked up by your colleagues?

FELDMAN: By bus. It was an easy way to get around.

Q: When you got to the CG, what kind of orientation did you get?

FELDMAN: None. I was in the Passport section; I was given a number of cases to review. These were primarily cases of Chinese who were claiming American citizenship because their parents had either been born in the U.S. or had emigrated and become U.S. citizens. There was a considerable amount of fraud in Chinese immigration. I was to review the cases, interview to applicant and forward a recommendation to the Department on whether it was a legitimate case or not. I did that for about my first three months; I actually got a commendation from the Department for a judgement that I had made on a particular case - I don't remember anything about the case except that I got a commendation. I do remember that my judgement on this case was to grant the passport.

I think it is worth remembering the mind-set of the times. A large number of people doing visa and passport work had a definite bias against issuing either visas or passports. They wanted to keep the foreigners out of the U.S. at all costs - everyone is a fraud; all visas applicants will overstay; all passport applications are fraudulent - the slots on the waiting list are sold. The theory was that a grown male would have been let into the U.S. - around the beginning of the century or at least before WWI before the various exclusion acts went into effect; he would settle down in the U.S. and return to China every couple of years; when he re-entered the U.S., he would be asked by the INS officer whether he had children in China. The answer would invariably be "Yes;" for every nine months he spent in China, he would have a child - or if he had been in China for less than nine months he would say that his wife was pregnant. That was called "creating slots" - i.e. making someone, presumably his child - eligible for an American passport. These "slots" then stimulated a thriving business because they were sold; the necessary documentation was then provided which allowed other people to enter the U.S. illegally. This was the nexus of Chinese immigration into the U.S. The vice consul's job was to pass judgement on whether the application was legitimate or fraudulent.

On the basis of my work in the Passport section, I was moved into the Visa section which was considered to have more responsibility because it was the area which attracted the greatest fraud temptation. In the Visa section, the attitude was, as I said, that anyone going to the U.S. would try to stay and therefore should be kept out entirely. I didn't quite take that attitude. I generally tried to figure out whether there was some reasonable basis for issuing the visa. The cases I was given, at least at the beginning, were those of wives and children of American citizens. They were not too hard to figure out.

Later, when I was assigned to non-immigrant cases, that was a bit more difficult. As it happened, one day I got a call from the Consul General - Everett Drumright. He was from Oklahoma. He said that I had turned down an application from the child of one of his friends. He asked me to reconsider and issue the visa. I argued with the CG over the phone. I must say that I don't remember now whether I did issue that visa; I just remember having the argument with the CG - everyone thought I was crazy to do so.

As it happened, a few weeks later, a circular instruction came from the Department saying that all posts should have a program for rotating junior officers through the various sections, so that they would not be stuck in one job for their whole tour. In particular, the circular emphasized that it would be very useful to transfer officers from consular work into political or economic work. Very shortly thereafter, I got a call from the CG's secretary asking whether I would be interested in working in the political section. I was delighted; in retrospect, I think the reason I was offered this opportunity is because I was the only vice consul's name known to Drumright.

So I joined the political section; I think I was the sixth American officer in the section. It was headed by an FSO-3 - Larue (Larry) Lutkins - an old style Foreign Service officer. His deputy was Bill Magistretti. These people seemed to me to be like semi-gods. They knew some Chinese, although not as much as I did. Magistretti was a Japanese language officer, but his Chinese was not great. One interesting aspect was that all of the other five officers spent all of their time on mainland China matters. I, as the most junior member, became the Hong Kong-Macao reporting officer. That meant that all of the others did their analysis based on what was printed by communist China's newspapers - particularly the "Peking's Peoples Daily" and "Gulangming" and other newspapers. Occasionally, as a treat, they were allowed to go to the railroad station to interview recent arrivals from the mainland.

This seemed incredibly dull work to me. I was delighted with my assignment, in part, because I got to travel with the CG. When he went to call on the Governor, for example. I was the note-taker. I got to interview senior members of the Hong Kong government - all on my own. Once every six weeks or so, I would go on my own on the ferry to Macao where I would meet with the Governor and other interesting personalities. I could tell stories about Macao forever. That was just a marvelous experience. It was one of the best assignments I ever had in 32 years in the Foreign Service; it was truly a delight.

Q: Before we hear the stories, tell me what you produced?

FELDMAN: In those days, it was despatches and airmgrams; occasionally, I would draft a telegram. There was also the WEEKA - a weekly summary of events and analyses. Having just left the University of Chicago, I was used to doing research; that was second nature to me and I think I was pretty good at it. I produced a large number of fairly lengthy despatches. Some one recently called to my attention one that I had drafted in 1956 on Triad Societies in Hong Kong. The Triads were the Chinese versions of the Mafia. I wrote a major analysis of the Triads which apparently became well known in the Department. I drafted other messages on various topics; in general I reported on what was going on in Hong Kong.

Q: Did you get any commendations for that?

FELDMAN: I don't remember, but I did get promoted in 1956. That was considered pretty rapid.

Q: How about Macao? How was that?

FELDMAN: Macao was a little sleepy Portuguese enclave, sort of a museum-like depository of Portuguese hopes for an empire. Macao, something like Hong Kong, was full of the zaniest characters that one could imagine. The "dictator" of Macao, the man who ran Macao, was Pedro Jose Lobo. When I knew him, he was probably in his late 50s; he had been a foundling who was discovered on the porch of a house occupied by a Portuguese Army captain in Timor. The Captain was later transferred to Macao; Pedro was raised there in a series of Catholic schools. When he was old enough he became an apprentice in a local bank - the Banco Nacional Ultramarino. Pedro was a person of innate skill and cleverness; he rose in the ranks. In the 1930s, the Governor of Macao was looking for some one to take over the opium monopoly - which was legal at the time. The previous incumbent had exceeded the allowed limits of "skimming." The job went to Pedro.

I heard all of these storied from Pedro himself because we became very friendly over the course of two years. Pedro "skimmed" the opium trade enough to accumulate enough wealth, but stayed within allowable bounds. With his income, he bought other monopolies in Macao - the water works; the salt monopoly, the tobacco monopoly and ultimately he bought Macao's sole radio station - Radio Villa Verda.

When WWII came along, Pedro was nominated by the Portuguese to negotiate with the Japanese. He was successful; he managed to buy the Japanese off so that Macao was never occupied. It was during this period that he became enormously wealthy by buying Hong Kong dollars at discount; he then just hoarded them, probably in his garage. On the side, he and his Chinese gangster partner, Y.C. Leung, ran an air-rescue service for downed allied airmen. He assumed that the allies would win in the end and would feel some kind of obligation to him. He was of course right in his bet. After the end of the war, Y.C. was duly decorated by the British - an MBE, I think. Both accumulated great wealth and lived happily ever after.

One of Pedro's most charming characteristics was that he composed music. He did this without being able to play any instrument. He had a musical "secretary;" when he was in the mood he would hum a tune and the secretary would transcribe it into notes. After it was orchestrated it would be played for the private entertainment of his guests and then later played on his radio station. He composed all sorts of music, including a five act opera based on the founding of Macao; it was called "Avanti Lusitania." Before I was transferred to Japan, as a sign of affection, Pedro presented me with his collected works on 78 rpm records; they must have weighed fifty pounds at least. Unfortunately, it was so heavy that we left the collection behind in our apartment in Repulse Bay when we left Hong Kong in 1957.

That station was used for other purposes as well. Pedro became a gold smuggler. He would buy gold at one price in China or the Philippines or Hong Kong, wherever it was cheap, and then flown by his private plane to India and sold there by his agents. It was what today might be called "arbitrage." That added to his wealth.

There was of course an official government in Macao run by the Portuguese, but Pedro was the power. He was the Minister of Economic Affairs working theoretically for Portuguese governor - whom I would see periodically. There was a senate - "the Leal Senado" (the loyal senate).

We didn't have much of an interest in Macao, except insofar as it was suspected to be a way station of the heroin trade route out of Southeast Asia. I don't think it was, but there were American officials who were very suspicious. Macao was involved in so many other things that it probably didn't have time for heroin.

It was a very corrupt place. One of my earliest experiences there - on my first trip there, I think - I was approached by a cop who offered to sell me his service revolver.

Q: Back to Hong Kong. What were the domestic policies there?

FELDMAN: In those days, Hong Kong was a very tightly run ship. The governor was Sir Alexander Grantham, who was, until the last governor, probably the most famous Hong Kong governor, although even more famous at the time was Sir John Copperthwaite, the Financial Secretary. It was he who laid the foundation for Hong Kong's great prosperity. He was a disciple of Ludwig Von Mises and the Chicago school of economics - although Sir John would never have called it that. Both he and Chicago supported minimal government, minimal interference, minimal taxation, laissez faire. It worked very well.

Copperthwaite was once asked why he did not collect more detailed business statistics. He asked: "Why would I want them? I have no intention of using them." Up to today, Copperthwait's laissez faire philosophy ruled in Honk Kong to the point where it became clearly the freest colony in the world. Hong Kong's economic development is a marvel since the territory is essentially a rock across a narrow channel from Kowloon, a peninsula. The city couldn't feed itself; it couldn't even provide its own drinking water. When I first arrived in Hong Kong, we were allowed to open the tap for drinking water for a half-an-hour each day. By the time, I left, we were allowed to open the tap for an hour every third day because water was so scarce. It wasn't until the 1960s, when Hong Kong concluded a deal with mainland China to import water, that there was potable water every day.

But this shortage made very little dent in the fascination of the place. It was the most delightful place. Hong Kong was full of the wildest and most improbable characters who had come from China to get away from the Communists. So the city was filled with Chinese, Americans, British and White Russians. Among the Chinese the most prominent were the Shanghai manufacturers. The city was enormously lively; everybody had a story and they were all fascinating.

Q: Were there any signs at the time about the possible relationships between Hong Kong and the mainland?

FELDMAN: No. In fact relationships were tense. The feeling was that the Chinese might invade at any time. In the 1950s, no one in Hong King was really sure how long the territory would survive as an independent entity. Some thought it might last until the 1960s; others were even more pessimistic than that. So there was a sense of contrived gaiety about life in Hong Kong.

Q: I assume that there were informal contacts with the mainland Chinese?

FELDMAN: I don't know that in fact there were. The police were pretty strong; the British Army had a garrison there. So I don't think there was very much smuggling. In those days, the U.S. had an embargo against Chinese goods. So one of the CG's principal occupations was to verify the origin of goods being exported to the U.S. from Hong Kong. That function and the consular services were really the bread and butter of the CG. Honk Kong is a major port; we provided shipping and seamen services. In fact, for a brief period, I was the shipment and seamen officer; that was a sort of delight. I had two local employees working for me - actually I worked for them. Between the two, they had more than 50 years of U.S. government service; I had maybe fourteen months. George Efrimou came from Qingdao; when we evacuated that town, he was not able to join the evacuees. Later, a U.S. Navy destroyer was sent to Qingdao to pick up Efrimou and his family - that is the way the old Foreign Service used to work; it hasn't worked like that for a long time.

Q: How big was the consul general at the time?

FELDMAN: I would guess 50 or 60 people. It was a pretty big post, although nothing compared to today when we have probably 300 or more employees there. I think it is still our largest CG in the world.

Q: I know that it and Jerusalem have an independent status. Both are headed by officers with the rank of Chief of Mission.

FELDMAN: Right. In my days, Drumright had the personal rank of ambassador.

Q: Of course, in those days there was no U.S. ambassador in China. Theoretically, Hong Kong was a UK dependency, but I gather we didn't do much business through London.

FELDMAN: We never communicated with London. It did get carbon copies of what we sent to the Department, but we never communicated through London the way messages from a normal CG go through an embassy on the way to Washington. We were quite independent.

Q: How long were you in the political section?

FELDMAN: I was there from sometime in 1955 until I transferred in the summer of 1957 - almost two years. It was a great time; I enjoyed it enormously.

Q: Thank goodness, you had that argument with the Consul General. How were your relationships with Drumright after you transferred to the political section?

FELDMAN: Actually, we got along very well. As I said, I became the notetaker for his meetings with Hong Kong's government. Drumright was very wealthy. He came from a town in Oklahoma named after one of his predecessors. The family owned oil wells. One day he asked me what clubs I belonged to. I must have looked at him blankly because he repeated the question. I told him that I didn't belong to any clubs. He said, "Well, join some!!" That I did; I joined the Foreign Correspondents club and the Yacht Club. In fact, I am still a member of the Royal Hong Kong Yacht Club because when I left in 1957, one could purchase a permanent lifetime membership which was valid while you were not in Hong Kong - a non-resident member. The price was 100 Hong Kong dollars. My membership reflects this; it reads "F07."

Q: I assume that means you were the seventh non-residential member.

FELDMAN: Correct. So I had a very merry time in Hong Kong. In those days, Hong Kong had a population of about 1 million. The cream of society was about 10,000 people - Chinese and British and a few others. You could get to know them quite quickly. Having a grand official position, "American Vice Consul," gave one all kinds of entree - never mind that a vice consul was at the bottom of the totem pole. Nevertheless, I was an official representative of the U.S. Government and that was worth a lot. We made many friends, many of whom we still have. One of my closest friends in those days was a Chinese named Bobby Ho. He was the grandson of the first Chinese to be knighted - Sir Robert Ho Tung. His father was a general, who had attended Sandhurst. He had some bad experiences with British racism and renounced his British citizenship and became a Chinese Nationalist general - General Hosailai. He was the Quartermaster General of the Chinese Nationalist Army during WWII. After the war he represented the Republic of China on the UN Military Affairs Commission. He was one of the Chinese representatives at the Japanese surrender on the battleship "Missouri." His son became my very good friend.

Bobby went to Hamilton College in New York and the University of Pittsburgh. Later he joined the family newspaper in Hong Kong - "The Hong Kong Commercial Daily." He was also active in insurance and real estate and other ventures. He is now retired and lives in Vancouver. He left Hong Kong shortly after the British signed the agreement on the return of Hong Kong to China.

Q: What things led to your next assignment?

FELDMAN: I knew some Chinese, although I must say that which I learned at the University of Chicago was classical Chinese, which is of little practical use today. I decided that I had enough Chinese for a while and thought that it would be very useful to study Japanese. So I applied for Japanese language training and the Department agreed with the stipulation that I first serve a tour in Japan - to see whether I really wanted to specialize in Japan.

So I was assigned as economic officer and vice consul in Yokohama. We sailed from Hong Kong - I think it was on the "President Wilson" - up to Yokohama on the way to the U.S. for our home leave. When we got to Yokohama, the Consul General - Lionel M. Summers - got on board because he too was returning to the U.S. for home leave. Naturally, I introduced myself as his new economic officer. During the course of the voyage, Summers asked whether my wife and I played "Scrabble." In fact, Carol and I were sort of "Scrabble" demons. So I said that indeed we did play the game. That began a series of "Scrabble" games between the Summers and the Feldmans.

We made the mistake of beating them very badly several nights in a row. That ended the "Scrabble" games. When I got to Washington, I was informed that my assignment had been changed. I was no longer going to Yokohama, but rather to Tokyo as a visa officer. I protested, but I was told that it was an "appropriate" assignment. There is a marvelous line in American literature from a short story by Ring Lardner called "Alibi Ike." It goes: "Shut up, he explained." That is what Personnel said to me.

After home leave in Chicago, we sailed to Japan - I think it was the "President Hoover" - and reported for duty at our embassy in Tokyo as a vice consul and visa officer. I went to work for a Virginia Ellis, who was in charge of the visa section. We became rather friendly; in fact, one afternoon during a cocktail hour, Virginia remarked that if she had full powers, she would never issue a visa to a Chinese, or a Japanese, or a Jew or an Italian - and maybe a Greek as well. I pointed out that I was Jewish. Her response was: "Present company excepted." But these comments represented her attitude toward visa work.

One of the matters which took up much of my time in Tokyo was the pre-clearance of Japanese brides of GIs. In those days, if a member of the U.S. military wanted to marry a foreigner, he had to get military permission to marry. Before that permission was granted, the fiancée had to fill out an application which was sent to a visa officer to review whether there were any grounds for ineligibility. There often were because many of these hopeful brides were found in brothels by a GI. There was a prohibition - in law - at the time against issuing visas to women who had been prostitutes. Later on, a waiver of ineligibility was adopted, but in 1957 no such waiver existed and those women were ineligible.

There were an awful lot of women who were ineligible. After the waiver came into effect, we could deem the applicant to have participated in prostitution, but that fact could be waived, allowing the GI to marry the foreigner.

The most interesting visa case I had in my tour did not deal with a Japanese bride, but something that grew out of Chinese history. You may have heard of the "May 4th" movement. In 1919, on that day, there were huge student demonstrations in Peking occasioned by the Minister - Tsao Rulin - responsible for mining. He had been accused of having received bribes from the Japanese who were interested in a "sweetheart" deal on some important coal mines in northern China - the Kailan mines. This set off a series of student demonstrations protesting the deal with the Japanese, the Versailles Treaty, which confirmed foreign "concessions" in China, China's weakness, and foreign pressure. The "May Fourth Movement" remains a watershed in Chinese history. One day, a visa application was given to me; it was from a father of an American citizen - Tsao Rulin. Tsao had lived in Japan after he left China in the 1920s. During the war, he lived as a house guest of Shigeru Yoshida who was later to become a Prime Minister. Tsao had several children; one, a daughter, after the war married an American soldier, moved to the U.S. and became an American citizen. She later petitioned for her father to come to the U.S.

When the visa application came to me, I saw no reason to turn it down. He hadn't committed any crime under American law. He was one of the most notorious figures in contemporary Chinese history, but I didn't see any part of the law that might lead me to reject the application.

I had had a similar case in Hong Kong - that is, one involving a famous historical figure. One of the visa cases I had there was from a Chinese citizen who was using the name De Vee Sing. I didn't recognize the name in the Shanghai dialect, but when I saw the Chinese characters, I knew that the applicant was Tu Yueh-sheng, who had been the head of the "Green Gang" in Shanghai in the 1920s. That gang was notorious for prostitution, drugs, protection rackets, etc. In this case, I was delighted to refuse this application.

Q: There were no repercussions?

FELDMAN: No repercussions.

Q: What were the arrangements when you arrived in Tokyo? Had there been any improvement from what you experienced when you arrived in Hong Kong?

FELDMAN: By this time, I was an “old” hand in the Foreign Service. I had served one tour. I knew consular work. I didn’t need a whole lot of schooling. I moved into the Nonomiya apartments. You arrived sometime after I did and we had adjacent offices. That was the beginning of a friendship that has lasted some 42 years. You and we lived in the same apartment buildings; our children grew up together. I think you were the first to describe those apartments as “shabby genteel.”

Q: Did you see any improvement in the care and feeding of FS personnel from that which experienced in Hong Kong?

FELDMAN: None that I remember. You must remember that when I joined the Foreign Service, I didn’t have the foggiest notion of what it would be like and therefore had no expectations. I was just coming out of graduate school and I would be paid $4,200 - that was an incredible sum of money - especially how far it went in Hong Kong.

I don’t remember what my salary was while in Tokyo - probably $1,000 more. I had been promoted to FSO-6 on the new pay scale. I was one of the FSO-6s who had to go back to FSO-7 and then I was promoted back to FSO-6.

Q: Before we leave your Japan tour, what are your feelings about the differences between Japanese and Chinese people?

FELDMAN: They are completely different. For example, although the Japanese language uses Chinese characters as one of their three writing systems, the fact is that the languages are entirely different. Japanese is a polysyllabic agglutinative of language with a highly complex grammar - e.g. adjectives have tenses. Chinese is monosyllabic, not agglutinative, and had practically no grammar at all. As you might expect, people who grow up with these different languages think completely differently; their social systems are very different. There is no similarity between the two.

Japanese and Chinese may physically resemble each other, but so do Americans and Turks. But in both cases, the people are completely different. What motivates one will not motivate the other and vice versa. There is just no similarity between the Japanese and the Chinese.

Q: Might that lead you to believe that close relationships between the countries is not likely to ever happen?

FELDMAN: I wouldn’t necessarily reach that conclusion because just as I was able to learn enough about Japanese and Chinese culture to be able to act in either culture, establishing rapport with both and able to negotiate with both as I did later in my career, so a Chinese or Japanese can also. That is what diplomats do. I guess one of the things diplomats have to do is to take themselves outside the boundaries of their own culture and learn how to operate across cross-cultural divides. American diplomats do that; Russian diplomats do that and so do Chinese and Japanese diplomats.

Q: Let's go back a second. What can you tell us about the Prime minister's visit?

FELDMAN: One thing I remember about that was the discussion about the exchange of gifts and the toasts. For some reason, I was chosen to write President Kennedy's toasts and the welcoming speech. As I mentioned, I had a degree in classical Chinese so that I knew some of the "tag" phrases that were loved by both the Chinese and the Japanese. I worked these old proverbs into the text because I knew that the Japanese would recognize their origins and meaning. I had read Japanese texts extensively as well and that enabled me to stick in all sorts of quotations and references. That was fun; that was the first time I had ever heard the president of the United States pronounce my words. That was a special thrill.

Q: Let's talk a little about the Chinese language training.

FELDMAN: It began with approximately nine months of training at the Foreign Service Institute which was then located in a revamped parking garage under Arlington Towers. Our teachers were Miss Oyang and Mr. Li Mi. After that period, I went to the FSI field language school in Taiwan for another 15 months. The school was in Taichung, a city in central Taiwan. It was then a pretty rural environment; I don't know what the population was then. I would guess a couple of hundred thousands which for Chinese cities makes it only a village.

We rented a house; houses were sort of passed on from student to student. It was on Gold Mountain Street which was surrounded by rice paddy fields. I still remember that every couple of weeks or so, the farmers would dump night soil on the paddy fields around the house. The odor was just awful. Taichung was in the part of Taiwan which has a year round hot climate. Nevertheless, we had to close all the windows and tried to breath as shallowly as we could. We had no air conditioning. The Department did not provide it.

Q: What was the school like? How many students?

FELDMAN: I guess that we had ten or twelve students. Harry Britain, a USIA officer, was there. Don Ferguson, an FSO, was there. Harry Thayer who later became the director of the office of Chinese affairs and after that, ambassador to Singapore and later director of the American Institute in Taiwan, was a student. Roger Sullivan, who became a deputy assistant secretary in EA/P and later was an NSC staff member, was there. Peter Colm, Bill Durker - who quit early on and last I heard was a professor of Southeast Asian history at Penn State.

It was a good group of people. We had some good teachers, several of whom were Manchu from Peking - now Beijing. They spoke a kind of Beijing slang and that is what they taught us. They also taught more formal Mandarin, but we learned a lot of Beijing slang because that was what these teachers spoke. I can still amuse Chinese by inserting some Beijing slang - circa 1945-1950 - into a conversation; that always get a laugh.

Q: In Hong Kong, we used Cantonese. I remember you saying that we really didn't do anything in Cantonese. Was Mandarin that different?

FELDMAN: Mandarin is a totally different language. Mandarin is as different from Cantonese as for example, German is from Swedish. In fact, it is probably more dissimilar than that. We speak in terms of Chinese dialects; in fact there are four major Chinese languages - not dialects, but distinct languages. Each of these four languages has its own dialects. The Chinese language that I learned was Mandarin, which is probably spoken by more Chinese than any of the other languages. The other three languages are the Shanghai language - sometimes called "Wu," Cantonese which in Chinese is called "Yush," Min, which comes in two major languages - "Minan" spoken in the south and "Minpei" spoken in the north. There are several million people who speak those languages; the language spoken in Taiwan is actually "Minan." So there all these different languages - all distinct and very, very different from each other.

Q: But if you speak Mandarin, can you get along everywhere in China?

FELDMAN: Not necessarily. You can get by in most of China, but there are places where you would not be understood. These languages are not mutually intelligible. You have to learn them as separate languages the way a Frenchman learns Portuguese. Very often, when Chinese from different provinces speak, they will draw Chinese characters on their hands to aid intelligibility.

Q: But if you would learn only one Chinese language, it would be Mandarin?

FELDMAN: Yes because that is the official language of China. But if you wanted to live in Hong Kong, for example, you certainly want to learn Cantonese because a lot of the natives don't speak Mandarin. - all they speak is Cantonese. In fact, some will speak Cantonese and English and not Mandarin. There are very few who can speak both Cantonese and Mandarin and practically none who speak only Mandarin unless they are very recent refugees from China. Similarly, if you visited Singapore, you would have to know Hokkien, which is a variation of "Min."

Q: How did "Min" get from Fujien to Singapore?

FELDMAN: Fujien is on the coast and people emigrated from there to other South Asia countries.

Q: What was your evaluation of the program after you finished learning the Chinese language?

FELDMAN: Chinese ought to be an easy language to learn. But as I said before, the teaching material was not terribly good. I was not impressed by that material as I had been by the Japanese teaching material. The Chinese texts were unnecessarily complicated.

There was another difference. I had never really learned to read Japanese, but had to spend a lot of time learning how to read Chinese. Chinese is easy to speak, but very difficult to read because it is ideographic. All one can do is to memorize characters, which have multiple meanings. They work in sets because in Mandarin there are only 600 sounds you can make. So you have to have combination of characters - each character is only one syllable. But because there are so many words which sound the same - so many homonyms in Mandarin - it becomes very difficult to work with it. You spend a lot of time memorizing; we had to memorize something like 20 characters each day. So at the end of the two years, you are able to read not only all of the newspapers, but also diplomatic notes. In fact, I could even write a diplomatic note. I could do simultaneous translations, because we had a special course for that.

But these are skills that evaporate very, very quickly if you don't keep them up. For about three months after graduation from the school, I could do simultaneous translations, but not after that. I could only do consecutive translations after that. As I said, I could translate diplomatic notes; in fact, I did that on my next assignment which was with the embassy in Taipei. But once you stop doing that, you also forget because Chinese diplomatic notes are written in even more stilted form than those written in English.

Q: So you were then assigned to Taipei. Was the move easy?

FELDMAN: The move was easy. It was essentially pack up and move from Taichung to Taipei - a distance of approximately 100 miles. The family - my wife Carol and our two children - moved up to Taipei. We had a very lovely house with a red moon gate in an alley off Renai Lu - "renai" means "loving humanity." It was a very pretty house.

I was assigned as the political-military officer in the embassy, at a time when a "Status of Forces" (SOFA) agreement was being negotiated. That was an interesting assignment, which I enjoyed. My boss was Robert Lindquist - the head of the political section. He wasn't particularly attractive, either as a person or as an officer. I was negotiating with Frederick F. Chien-Chien Fu - who was then the junior officer in the North American affairs bureau in the Foreign Ministry. He later became foreign minister; he also served in Washington as the director of Taiwan's unofficial office and later became chairman of the Commission of the Economic Planning and Development; he also served as Speaker of the National Assembly. He is now the president of the Control Yuan, which in Taiwan is a combination of our General Accounting Office and a government wide Inspector General.

Fred and I did the basic work negotiating this "Status of Forces" agreement. Our respective bosses - Lindquist and Tsai Wei-ping - took credit for it. But still it was a very interesting assignment.

Q: What was the involvement of the respective military?

FELDMAN: I chaired a U.S. drafting committee which included the legal officer of the Military Advisory Assistance Group (MAAG) in Taiwan as well as the legal officer of the Taiwan Defense Command. In those days we had a very elaborate military structure in Taiwan. The MAAG was involved in providing military assistance and training. Then there was the Taiwan Defense Command because under the Mutual Defense Treaty that we had with the Republic of China we basically assumed responsibility for defending Taiwan from the People's Republic of China (PRC). We had several military bases on the island; we had an air base in Tainan; we had a major air base outside of Taichung. We had the 13th Air Force located on Taiwan. We had naval bases in Kaohsiung, in Tsoying and in Chilung. We patrolled the Taiwan Straits with ships from the Seventh Fleet. They would come in and out of Taiwan ports. U.S. aircraft would patrol the Straits. There were a lot of joint planning and many joint exercises.

In terms of drafting the agreement, naturally the military had a very large input.

Q: Had there not been any "Status of Forces" agreement before that?

FELDMAN: No.

Q: How long had the U.S. military been on the island?

FELDMAN: The U.S. military came in right after the Korean War. So there had been about 10 years without agreement. Basically, what had happened was that in January, 1950, President Truman had said that we would not get involved with Taiwan and that we were out of the Chinese civil war and would stay out. But then on June 25, 1950, North Korea invaded South Korea. One of the first things that happened after that was that Truman interposed the Seventh Fleet between Taiwan and the mainland because it appeared at the time that the North Korean invasion might herald a total attempt by the communist world to take aggressive action in the Far East, including an invasion of Taiwan. General MacArthur had argued very strongly that the PRC must not be allowed to control Taiwan. So the Seventh Fleet was ordered into the Straits. By the end of 1950 and the beginning of 1951, we began the negotiations for a Mutual Defense Treaty (MDT) with Taiwan. The senior U.S. negotiator was John Foster Dulles who became secretary of state in the Eisenhower administration. I believe that the MDT was actually signed in 1953.

Q: How come it took so long to think about a SOFA?

FELDMAN: The ROC was pleased to have us on the island under any guise that it wasn't until much later that it began to think about such matters of whether its courts shouldn't have jurisdiction over crimes committed by GIs etc. At the beginning, the ROC was so overjoyed to have an American military presence on the island - so happy to have American troops to protect them from the PRC - that it didn't raise any of the issues for many, many years.

Q: When did your assignment to the embassy start?

FELDMAN: It started in 1963. The negotiations had already been underway for a few months by the time I got to the embassy. So I was very close to the beginning of the process. I did not get to complete the negotiations because I was transferred to Hong Kong in 1965. By that time, we had just about finished the draft treaty.

Q: Were the problems created by our military presence make the negotiations difficult?

FELDMAN: You must understand the Chinese view of themselves. As far as the negotiations were concerned, there was an awful lot of nationalist fervor on the ROC side. They still regarded themselves as the sole legitimate government of all of China. They were very careful to assert themselves in every possible way. So the negotiations were not the easiest, but they were not that difficult because we always had the trump card of withdrawal from the island if the ROC made things too difficult - which of course was the last thing they wanted. So on any issues that were crucial to us, we got our way.

Q: How about the internal politics on Taiwan at the time?

FELDMAN: Taiwan at the time had pretty much a one party dictatorship - quite stern at that. The Kuomintang (KMT) - the Nationalists party - was the only legal party other than a few tame offshoots. The island was under martial law. The Taiwan Garrison Command, which was responsible for the enforcement of the martial law, could essentially do what it wanted. Although there was a sign at the airport which said "Welcome to Taiwan: the home of free China," Taiwan could not be considered "free." It was a one party dictatorship. It had been called a "soft" authoritarianism; it actually became that some years later. Under Chiang Kai-shek, who was in charge at the time, it was a fairly hard authoritarian regime; it was not "bloody" minded - it didn't kill opponents - at least not very often. There were a lot of political prisoners kept on a place called "Green Island." There were few executions and those were people whom the regime had reason to believe that they were PRC spies.

Q: What about the indigenous Taiwanese? Were they even in sight?

FELDMAN: Of course there were in sight. They were 85% of the population. Although my official dealings were with the government, of course, and particularly with the North American Bureau of the Foreign Ministry, I and most of my colleagues in the embassy felt considerable sympathy for the ordinary Taiwanese.

Essentially, the "mainlanders" (that is the people who had come from the mainland with Chiang Kai-shek after they lost the civil war) - the 15% of Taiwan's population - ran the Taiwan government. They staffed nearly all of the positions. All the senior military positions in the military were occupied by "mainlanders." Only the draftees were Taiwanese. indigenous.

The Taiwanese ran the economy. Taiwan was just beginning to change from a wholly agrarian society into one built on light industry. What had happened was that the Nationalist had pushed through land reform. This was billed as one of their greatest democratic innovations. It was that, but a major reason for land reform was to break the power of the wealthy Taiwanese land owners. That is what happened, but unlike the mainland, where the land owners were executed, the Nationalist bought off the Taiwan land owners. They gave them government bonds and shares of government-owned corporations. So, in fact, the Nationalists transformed the Taiwanese land-owning gentry into a Taiwanese entrepreneurial class. These were the people that were the pioneers in the industrialization of Taiwan. Initially, they focused in textile production and other exportable items using the resources they had received from the government.

That is the origin of Taiwan's transformation from an agrarian society to a light industrial production nation. By the time I left in 1965 - the same year during which we ceased economic assistance to the ROC (it was "graduated") - this transformation was well established, after only four or five years. Another thing happening was the return of students from American universities and graduate schools. They transferred both government and economy.

Q: Is that because most of the “mainlanders” were of bureaucratic inclination - not entrepreneurs - or was there some other reasons?

FELDMAN: Most of them were government officials and military officers. The “mainland” entrepreneurial class had come to Hong Kong, not Taiwan. They developed Hong Kong as light industry exporting base. Within the cadre of the government bureaucrats that fled to Taiwan were people who did become involved in economic issues because the Nationalist government, when in power on the mainland, had operated banks and some industries. They transferred those skills to Taiwan and replicated what they had done on the mainland. The government established banks on the island; it founded the China Steel corporation, China Petroleum, Taiwan Sugar and something called Taiwan Tobacco and Alcohol Monopoly corporation which made beer and cigarettes. So some of the bureaucrats also became economic powerhouses.

Q: Was there a conflict between government owned industry and privately held industry?

FELDMAN: Not much. The government part of the economic sector is just beginning to fade out starting a couple of years ago as the government began to privatize the major government corporations. There are still many that are still government controlled. Many will continue to be quasi-government controlled. For example, in the telecommunications industry, the government will continue to control a 30-40% interest in China Telecom.

Q: Did the land owning class have an affinity for business?

FELDMAN: What happened was that it sent its children off to be educated in the U.S., as did the “mainland” government bureaucrats. Pretty soon, these students returned from Wharton, Harvard, MIT etc with MBAs or other degrees. That started the second transformation of Taiwan’s industry from a mainly import-substitution one to an export driven powerhouse. I am now talking about the late 1960s and early 1970s.

Q: On the political side, did you in the early 1960s, observe a Taiwan independence movement?

FELDMAN: The Taiwan independence movement existed primarily outside of Taiwan because anyone on the island suspected of being associated with it was subject to arrest and imprisonment on Green Island as a political dissident. There was a Taiwan independence movement (“TIM”) and something called “World United Formosans for Independence (“Wufi”). “Wufi” was mostly a U.S. based organization and TIM existed mostly in Japan.

Q: There was no pretense of democracy?

FELDMAN: There was a pretense of democracy. There were local elections - village and county - but there always was a question of who could enter the race. Essentially, only KMT members and independents approved by the KMT, could get on the ballot. The elections tended to be pretty much rigged.

The parliament is called the “Legislative Yuan.” Most of seats in that body were held by those who had been elected on the mainland in 1947. As I said, the government in Taiwan still considered itself to be the government of all China; so I would be invited to have tea with the “Senator from Chingdao” or another town or province on the mainland. This was 1964. But Chinese live a long time. What would happen is that if the representative from Chingdao died, the person who had been the runner-up, if still living and on Taiwan, would take that seat. That is the way things were done until much, much later in the 1980s.

Q: Who was the ambassador?

FELDMAN: Our ambassador when I was at the language school was Everett Drumright, who had been my CG [consul general] in Hong Kong. By the time I joined the embassy, the ambassador was a former admiral, Jerauld Wright. In between, Alan Kirk had served as ambassador; he was also a former admiral and had been appointed by President Kennedy - and FSO Roger Kirk’s father. Kirk ran afoul of Chiang Kai Shek who refused to receive him; so in the end the U.S. government had no choice but to remove Kirk and replace him with Wright.

Q: How large was the embassy?

FELDMAN: I really don’t know. The political section had about five people; the economic section about the same. The consular section was somewhat larger - six or seven. There was a fairly large CIA station, headed by Ray Cline. Then there was the MAAG, and AID mission until it was phased out.

Ray Cline had the closest relationship with the ROC government. He had a particularly close relationship with Chiang Ching-kuo, the “Gimo’s” son and heir, who became president in 1975. Jerauld Wright never seemed to do very much or be around very much. Essentially he would go to the officers’ club and drink with his old Navy buddies. He was not much of a presence in the embassy. Ralph Clough, the DCM, pretty well ran things. Ralph now teaches at SAIS.

Q: Besides the Status of Forces agreement, were there any other major issues between the two governments? They undoubtedly encouraged us to keep our hard line on the PRC.

FELDMAN: They did. They also periodically would stage a commando raid on the China coast. Usually, their commandos would be entirely wiped out, but the ROC always claimed major success. They had troops on off-shore islands - Matsu and Quemoy - and a number of smaller islands. We kept trying during my tour to convince the ROC to withdraw from these islands. They did from the smaller islands and they reduced the number of the troops on the two main ones. But in fact, there are garrisons on Matsu and Quemoy still today.

Q: Are there any other comments on your Taiwan tour that you would like to make?

FELDMAN: There is one other item I might mention. In 1965, there was a tie vote in the UN on the “important question” resolution. This declared that any change in deciding who would represent China was to be considered an “important question.” The movement to admit the PRC had started earlier and build up to the tie vote in 1965. But the great “Cultural Revolution” took place in 1966 - the era of great madness on the mainland. At that point, China seemed to be in such disarray - chaotic and insane - that the votes in support of seating it in the UN dropped precipitously.

Q: Was diplomatic representation in Taiwan at that point affected by some countries which recognized the PRC?

FELDMAN: Yes. For example, there was never a British embassy in Taiwan. They had a consulate in Tanshui (Tamsui), which was a little town about 20-30 minute drive from Taipei on the seacoast. That consulate had been there for about a century. The British were one of the first to recognize the PRC and never established an embassy in Taiwan, primarily to protect their interests in Hong Kong. Also the Labor Party was in power in 1949; it may have felt some affinity with the Chinese communists.

Q: The British have always been in the forefront of accepting the fait accompli and accepting de facto situations.

FELDMAN: I guess that is right. But in the Chinese situation, the British had had some bad experiences with the Nationalists going back to the general strikes of the 1920s which spread to Hong Kong. The strikes took place in major cities, like Canton, Shanghai and Hong Kong. So the British never really liked the Nationalists from that time on.

Q: How about some of other allies, like the French?

FELDMAN: De Gaulle changed French policy in 1965 after the tie vote in the UN. He shifted recognition from ROC to the PRC. The French left Taiwan that year and that was the first major defection. The ROC in those days had its own version of the Hallstein doctrine; that is if a country recognized the PRC, the ROC would break relationship with that country. Twenty years later, the ROC was not so picky; it was glad to have relations with any one that would do so. But in the early 1960s, it still maintained that countries could have relationship with the ROC or the PRC, but not both.

The French broke their relationship, but no others did, again because the “Cultural Revolution” on the mainland gave everybody pause, particularly when the Red Guards surrounded foreign legations and even assaulted some of them. So no one was going to establish a mission in Beijing. The “Cultural Revolution” started in 1966, after I had left Taiwan. I was by then in Hong Kong which became a locus of the “Cultural Revolution.”

Q: So after your tour in Taiwan, you were appointed to a position in Hong Kong. How did that come about?

FELDMAN: I mentioned that Hong Kong was our first post and one is usually in love with his or her first post. My wife, Carol, wanted desperately to get back to Hong Kong. In those days, there were discussions of a unified Foreign Service encompassing both State and USIA personnel. Volunteers from USIA were solicited to take State Department assignments and vice versa. I volunteered on the understanding that I would be assigned to Hong Kong. And that is what happened in 1966.

We had home leave in 1965 and at the beginning of 1966, I was assigned to USIS-Hong Kong. It as a very mixed experience. It was a tour of five years which combined great difficulties and sadness and some elation as well.

I was first assigned as “book publications” officer. The PAO, Ken Boyle, had been a classmate at the Taichung language school. His wife, Betsy, had been the linguist at Taichung. But I was assigned to work for someone whose name I have forgotten. I was the junior publications officer and he was the senior book officer. In those days, we were actually writing books and commissioning books from others. It was part of the anti-PRC propaganda effort by USIS-Hong Kong.

I didn’t fit into this program terribly well. I did write a book, after a contract with a Brit named George Patterson fell apart. It was to be a book on border conflicts between the PRC and the USSR. He turned in a manuscript which was pretty much unusable. I had to re-write the whole book. It was entitled “The Unquiet Frontier.” Patterson’s name was kept on it, but I actually wrote it.

But I didn’t get along with my boss and he gave me a terrible efficiency rating. It was sufficiently bad so that I ended up in the lowest 5-10% of my class - for the first time ever. I received a warning letter. I was obviously very unhappy. Ken Boyle reassigned me to be the Press Officer, which suited me very well. I enjoyed that assignment.

Shortly thereafter, Ken Boyle was replaced by Sandy Marlowe. Sandy and I got along splendidly. We just had a great relationship - almost like a father-son relationship. He was considerably older and was on his last assignment prior to retirement. He had no China experience; his last post had been in Germany - I think he was the PAO (or deputy PAO) in Bonn. We got along like gang-busters. I was the Press Officer during the Vietnam war. There were approximately 110 correspondents residing in Hong Kong. Some of them would dart off to cover the war on the ground. Others covered Vietnam from Hong Kong from their hotel rooms.

Sandy was a real “Vietnam hawk.” I was not much of a “hawk”; in fact I was not a “hawk” at all. I enjoyed dealing with the press; it was great fun. I became a sort of “big wheel” in the foreign correspondents community.

Q: What did the Press Officer do?

FELDMAN: The Press Officer issues press releases, but most of his time is taken up by fielding questions from the local and the foreign press. There was also a lot of “schmoozing.” I would go out and have lunch with Chinese editors or western foreign correspondents. I had a wide circle of friends and I really enjoyed being the Press Officer.

My Book Officer job lasted about nine months - or a year. In 1967, I became the Press Officer and did that for about a year.

Q: Let me interrupt for one moment. In the posts in which I have served, the Press Officer was a pseudo member of the political section because so much information comes to that section. Did you have responsibility as being the spokesman on Hong Kong matters?

FELDMAN: I was the spokesman, but our Consul General, Ed Rice, essentially believed that if you saw the name "American Consulate General" in a local newspaper, it indicated that the Press Officer was not doing his job. As far as he was concerned, the Press Officer's primary responsibility was to keep the American Consulate General out of the press. I thought that was rather difficult to do. Whether his policy was good or bad, was immaterial. The world does not work that way. Ed would inevitably be upset and I was the one who would get angry telephone calls, but there was nothing I or anyone else could do about the press.

But I did have a lot fun in many ways. I might just relate one story as an illustration. Congressman Passman came to Hong Kong. He was a powerful member of the House Appropriations Committee. For some inexplicit reason, I was assigned to take Passman to Macao. His excuse for going there was that we had a refugee operation run by the Catholic Relief organization and funded by the U.S. What he really wanted to do was to look for a Chinese prostitute. To do so in Hong Kong would have run the risk of discovery; Macao was much safer. So to cover his real purpose, he also visited the refugee center.

When we got back to Hong Kong on a Friday evening, he wanted to hold a press conference the next day. He didn't care about the local press; he wanted the American correspondents. To hold such a conference on a Saturday morning, was just not realistic - they were just not going to attend a Saturday press conference for Passman or almost anyone else. So I phoned around to some of my friends. I got the local representative of Bulova Watch Company, who happened to be from Boston. So he came under the guise of being the correspondent for the "Boston Globe." I got other friends also to attend and to play the role of correspondents and introduced them as representing one or another American newspaper. They were great; they gloated in their newfound glory. They asked question after question. I must say they were tougher and more interesting than the regular working correspondents. At the end of the conference, Passman wiped his sweat from his brow and said to me: "That was a great press conference and you said it wouldn't happen!"

Another story concerned the time that Richard Nixon came through on his way to Vietnam. This took place in February, 1967. The presidential campaign - for the party nomination - had already started. Ed Rice, who was an old China hand, despised Nixon; he was not going to have anything to do with him. So he sent me to the airport to meet him - former Vice President and senator. I went to the airport and met Nixon. I had been clever enough to burrow the Rolls Royce from the Mandarin Hotel to take us from the airport. That put me in his good graces. He was staying at the Mandarin, so to get that service was no great feat, but I am very glad that we did that.

He liked being taken to the hotel in the Rolls Royce. He was accompanied by Ray Price who was his speech writer. Nixon stayed for a couple of days. He left on a Sunday. I asked the Mandarin to make the Rolls available again. We went to the airport. Nixon was supposed to fly on an Air France flight to Saigon. It was supposed to leave around 9:30 a.m. We got to the airport at about 8:30 and went to the VIP lounge. We were then told that the flight was delayed for about a half-hour or an hour at the most. Nixon turned to me and opined that we would not leave before noon. When I asked him why he thought that, he said:” If anything bad can happen to me, it will.”

The three of us set in the VIP lounge and waited. Nixon was right; the plane did not leave until noon or even later. Every once in a while we would walk around the airport which on a Sunday morning was essentially dead - even the shops were closed. So there was really nothing to do, but sit in the VIP lounge and chat. He asked me a number of questions about China after he found out that I knew something about it.

Q: Let me ask you about your house during your second Hong Kong tour.

FELDMAN: It was a lovely house. When we returned to Hong Kong in 1965, we were told that the second floor of a two apartment house might be available, but we might have to wait a bit because the tenant, the Agricultural Attaché, would be moving out in about a month. We looked at the quarters; they were absolutely marvelous. It had three bedrooms, three baths, a large living and dining rooms, nice kitchen, but what attracted us the most was that the house was on a little rise in the Stanley area - in the back of Hong Kong. It was on Stanley Mound Road - ”Mound” because it was smaller than a hill, but elevated nevertheless. It was elevated enough so that with the gorgeous wrap-around veranda that the apartment had, we could see both bays - Stanley is a peninsula and we could see the waters on either side.

That was truly marvelous. I would come home from work in the evening and I could see fishing boats on the water, even in the dark when they turned their lights on to attract the fish. I would sit on the veranda with a drink and watch for a long time those lights bobbing on the bays. It was quite beautiful. There was also a very large garden and for the first time in my life I tried hard at gardening, which I’ve come to love in retirement.

But I should add that something very sad happened in Hong Kong. My first marriage came apart. Carol had been a ballet dancer before we were married and before we joined the Foreign Service. She loved to dance, but she couldn’t perform as the wife of Foreign Service officer, in light of our constant moves. She would get started with a teacher or by forming a troop, but it became increasingly difficult as we got older - in our thirties. Physically, it just became too tough. She became very depressed. There was even an automobile accident which just might have been a suicide attempt. By the end of the second Hong Kong tour, she had decided that the Foreign Service life was not for her. When we returned to Washington for my next assignment, we separated and subsequently divorced. That was very sad, particularly because we had two children - Ross Christopher and Peter Dylan. Although both were away at school, it was tough on both, particularly on Peter. It had a major and harmful effect on his life.

Q: That really illustrates the difficulties of Foreign Service life, especially in the days when the spouses wanted to have their own careers. These days, many do that, but not in the 1960s.

FELDMAN: These days, the Foreign Service is a bit better, although it is still tough for parents. In the old days, the officer’s efficiency report very often commented on the spouse and her suitability for Foreign service life. It was particularly difficult for a spouse interested in the creative arts. Within that category, I suspect it is particularly difficult for a dancer because of the physical demands.

Q: I think you are right because not all posts offer opportunities for a dancer. Let us go to the next assignment.

FELDMAN: I was assigned to Washington in the Office of UN Political Affairs. I was to work particularly on the question of Chinese representation in the UN. This was 1970 when the U.S. was still supporting the membership of the ROC on Taiwan and trying to keep the PRC out of the UN. The tactics that we used was our insistence that the representation issue was “important question.” We would lobby our friends and allies each year to support our position that the issue of which of the two governments would represent China in the UN was an “important question” within the meaning of the Charter. The Charter stipulated that an “important question” required the approval of two-thirds of the UN General Assembly members.

I should mentioned that the ROC even in 1970 still claimed to be the sole legitimate government of all of China, just as the PRC made the same claim. In both cases, all of China included Taiwan, as the PRC still claims today. The ROC no longer makes that claim; it restricts its sovereignty to the territory it actually governs - Taiwan and some islands.

My responsibility in 1970 was to organize support for our “important question” position; we did that through representations in various capitals, using demarches. Then I was to go to New York to coordinate strategies.

It quickly became apparent that our policy was receiving less and less support. The number of countries that were switching recognition from the ROC to the PRC was growing each year. By 1970, a majority of UN members recognized the PRC; that made it even more important that we stick to the “important question” position which required the two-third majority. It was also clear that the day when we could not muster a two-third majority was rapidly approaching. So I began to write a series of internal memoranda addressed to other members of the Bureau of International Organizations (IO), suggesting that we switch to a policy of dual representation. In fact, we would say that both the ROC and the PRC should be both represented in the UN.

In 1970, my suggestion was flatly rejected. We held to our usual position that year, although several of our allies, like Belgium and Canada, urged that we switch to dual representation. We didn’t and we won very narrowly. Our weak position became even clearer as we entered the spring of 1971; it was by then certain that unless we changed our policy, we would be outvoted in the next General Assembly session.

The NSC asked us to study the question - a National Security Study Memorandum (NSSM) - which we did. We provided the options: a) we could continue our past policy and probably lose (that might have been ok because we would have gone down fighting); b) try something new like dual representations. In our view, these were the only two options; there were not the expected “three options.” It was either sticking to our position and being out-voted, or try dual representation. There might have been a variant, which Kissinger might have liked, which was to follow the old policy, but not to try too hard. Unbeknown to us, while we were writing the NSSM, Kissinger was already working on the details of his “secret” trip to China to be worked out through the good offices of Pakistan.

When we had finished the study, we sent it to the White House. Our recommendation was for option “b” - dual representation. We made a strong case for that course saying that both governments should be seated pending some final resolution of the two governments’ dispute - e.g. reunification of China. We cited the example of what had been done for North and South Korea, and East and West Germany. We believed that these models could be replicated in the China situation and that we could muster enough support in the UN to pass our resolution of dual representation.

We waited for an answer. We waited, and waited and waited. Finally in early July 1971, I asked permission from the head of IO-UNP, Jack Armitage, to take some leave. He approved my request because nothing seemed to be happening on the question of China representation. I went to Chincoteague with the family. One day as I was sitting in the kitchen of our cottage, I heard on the radio that Henry Kissinger had been in Beijing and that Nixon would be going to China the following year. I was absolutely flabbergasted and shocked and wondered what would happen to our UN policy.

I hurried back to Washington. Still we had no answer from the White House. Instead we were told that the president was going to send a special envoy to Taiwan to see Chiang Kai-shek to discuss with him the dual representation policy and to hopefully get his agreement. Robert Murphy, the former ambassador, was chosen for this task. He was very distinguished and crusty. Murphy went, only to be told by Chiang Kai-shek that he would rather be a piece of broken jade lying smashed on the floor than a whole tile on a roof. Murphy said that he agreed with the Generalissimo’s position. So instead of giving an objective analysis of the situation, Murphy basically bolstered Chiang Kai-shek’s belief that if the U.S. worked hard enough, the ROC position would win again.

It was fairly clear that regardless of how hard the U.S. might work for the “important question” resolution, it would not win enough support. But we were still stymied at the end of July. If we were going to be successful in selling the dual representation proposal, we had to start very quickly, making demarches through out the world. It wasn’t until sometime in early August that we got the go ahead from the White House to start the process to gaining support for dual representation in the General Assembly. We raised the question of what was to be done in the Security Council - who would get the China seat there? We were bound to be asked that. The answer was that we would cross that bridge when we come to it. That was not enough guidance; we had to know what we would say to countries who wanted to know what would happen in the Security Council. The answer came back that the Security Council would decide on its own membership. We then noted that we would have to vote on the question; what would be our position? The NSC told us to say that we had not yet made up our minds.

It was also unclear whether the ROC would help us in our efforts. That they didn’t have too many friends, but they had some.

Q: I would like to make a point at this juncture. The timing of all actions on China representation hinge on the meeting of the General Assembly which starts in early September.

FELDMAN: That is right. The General Assembly convenes on the third Tuesday or Wednesday in September each year. So here we were in August, without clear directions. We were prohibited from saying anything definitive about our future position in the Security Council. It was unclear whether the ROC would help us in our efforts, but we were told to proceed.

So we did. A task force was formed under the chairmanship of Martin Hertz, the deputy assistant secretary in IO. He was nominally in charge, but the actual day to day operations of the task force was my responsibility together with Linwood Starbird, another FSO and a Chinese language officer, who at the time was working on the ROC desk in Bureau of East Asian Affairs (EA). I was also helped from time to time by Tom Shoesmith, who was the country director for ROC affairs - later ambassador to New Zealand. But essentially Starbird and I did all the work; we were the ones who held the meetings with representatives from just about every embassy in Washington. We were trying to explain our policy.

Basically the issue was framed not as the expulsion of a member (ROC) and the admittance of a new member (PRC). The question for years had been framed as "How is China to be represented in the UN?" In earlier reiterations, the next question would have been "Is it to be represented by the ROC or the PRC?" In 1971, we reframed the issue to "China exists in two parts: one government in Taiwan, one on the mainland. Each of these parts should be represented in the UN, until some resolution of the status of the two was found." We used, as I said earlier, the East-West Germany model.

That is what we explained. The immediate question asked us was what position would we take on China's Security Council seat. Our answer was that the Council would have to decide its own membership and we would make our decision when the issue was to be discussed in the SC. It wasn't until the General assembly had already convened in September, that we were finally allowed - by the White House - to say that the SC would decide the issue of representation, but that we felt that the PRC should properly occupy the SC seat. That made our sales job a little easier.

Then there were technical questions such as "Should we do the "important question" resolution again or should the GA just vote on the two competing resolutions - i.e. the Albanian resolution which called for the expulsion from the UN of the "representatives of Chang Kai-shek" - it did use the term "The Republic of China" - or the U.S. and others resolution, which called for the seating of both the PRC and the ROC. We finally took the position that the issue should remain an "important question."

Then came the issue what would happen after the passage of the "important resolution." Was it advantageous to take up the Albanian resolution first and have it fail to gain support of two-thirds of the UN membership which make the passage of our resolution much easier? Or should our resolution come first and hopefully gain the two-thirds majority? We consulted with most of the governments in the world; I was working around the clock and so was Starbird. These were heady days for a mid career FSO (I think I was an FSO 3 at the time.) My home phone was linked by the White House Communications Agency (WHCA) so that I could receive directly calls from all over the world at all times of the night - and I got lots of those. This was great stuff for an FSO who had not too long before been placed in the lowest 5% of his class. I was giving daily instructions to our representative in New York; his name was George Bush. I used to say :”George, we would like you to do this or that” or “George, please go see so and so.”

One day, towards the end of September, John Holdridge, a member of Kissinger’s NSC, asked me to have lunch with him. This was very unusual; I had never been invited by Holdridge, whom I had known for years, to break bread with him. So we met in a little sandwich shop near the old Executive Office. He wanted to know when I thought that the vote on dual representation would come up. It is always difficult to figure out what the GA’s schedule might be, but I said that if I had to guess, I would say the first or second week in November. I later learned that Kissinger decided to make his second visit to Beijing sometime late in the first week or early in the second week in November. It was announced that he would be there at the time; it was exactly when the UN vote on dual representation took place.

We lost on the “important question” issue by 55 countries in favor, 59 opposed, 15 abstained. If we could have switched two voted from the “opposed” column to the “in favor” one, there would have been a tied vote which under the UN rules would have given the victory to the proponents. We came that close even with Kissinger in Beijing negotiating with Zhou En-lai. Someone asked me later what it was like to live through these days. I said that it was like being in a race with the coach having instructed you not to leave the starting line even while the other runners were off. Then when the others had taken a good lead, the coach allowed his runner to go. Strangely enough the late starter caught up and in fact even took a slight lead when the coach called the runner to the sidelines and instructed him to put on a weight belt. Again, the late starter catches up again, only to have the coach stop him to add more weight to the belt. That was about the way our UN process went. I think that except for Kissinger’s visit, we would have won the “important question” issue and then we could have won on the dual representation question.

People have asked me that if we had won on these two questions, would the PRC have joined the UN? - it had in fact rejected our compromise. If they had not joined, the issue of UN representation would have been left unresolved. My answer was that even under those circumstances, a lot would have been resolved. We would have made it clear that U.S. policy was to have relations with both PRC and the ROC. That would have had a major effect on what our situation is today - which I will discuss later. We recognize the PRC, but not the government on Taiwan. We refuse to recognize Taiwan as a state - as it is. So had we won on dual representation, history would have been far different. I think that ultimately, had we insisted on dual representation, the PRC would have joined the UN just as we had East and West Germany and North and South Korea. But that is not what happened.

Q: Let me go back in the story to the time when you made your initial recommendation. What were the internal dynamics in the Department when you went to the NSC with your recommendation for dual UN membership? What did EA think of it?

FELDMAN: EA at the time was headed by Marshal Green; his senior deputy was Winthrop Brown. They weren’t completely sold on the idea, but they didn’t oppose it. They were guardedly in favor of dual representation. Later, after we had permission to proceed with that proposal, I toured a number of countries in the company of that very elegant and distinguished FSO, Winthrop Brown. In those days, a deputy assistant secretary of State was a mighty and powerful figure. A DAS was a very senior officer and probably had served as ambassador once or twice, as Brown had - not like today when a DAS tends to be a 32 year old refugee from Capitol Hill or a White House intern.

There was opposition to the proposal primarily from Louise McNutt in EA. She was the daughter of a former secretary of the interior and governor of the Philippines. Louise felt very strongly that this was a terrible thing to do to an old ally - the ROC. I could not persuade her that the proposal was not an insult to the ROC; we were trying to preserve a place for it in the UN.

Q: I just want to note for the record here that Louise McNutt was a relic of earlier days when Ruth Bacon was around. She was there when I first came into EA which was then headed by Walter Robertson. I thought then the first priority in EA was to keep mainland China out of the UN. That explains McNutt's position.

FELDMAN: We used to joke that the role of Ruth Bacon and Louise McNutt was not only to keep China out of the UN, but to keep it out of everything including the International Jock-strap Convention, had there been such a thing.

The other bitter opponent was Jay Long, a colleague in IO in the same office that I was in (UNP). His position was more nuanced. Jay simply felt that it was unbecoming to switch from complete support of the ROC; he wanted the U.S. to continue its old policy and if that meant a loss in the UN, so be it.

Those were the two principal voices in opposition. Louise fortunately could not persuade the assistant secretary or his deputy to oppose the proposal; neither could Jay Long persuade the IO leadership - Martin Hertz or Sam De Palma, the assistant secretary.

Q: What were the repercussions after the vote?

FELDMAN: On the day when our position on the "important question" was defeated, the ROC delegation announced it was withdrawing from the General Assembly. This was a typical Chinese ploy - "you can't fire us; we quit." But that didn't stop the GA from approving the Albanian resolution - by a very large majority (something like 75 in favor and 30 opposed). The technicalities of this outcome were interesting. A vote in the GA applies only to the GA; it does not apply to any other UN body, except those which are essentially sub-groups of the GA - certain committees and commissions. All the UN specialized agencies are independent of the GA. So what happened thereafter, Secretary General Kurt Waldheim - of odious memory - sent out a memorandum to all of the specialized agencies summarizing the actions of the GA and requesting that each of the specialized agencies consider whether they wished to follow suit. Just about all of these agencies, over the period of the following two years, did oust the ROC except two: the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund - both only loosely related to the UN. These financial institutions use weighted voting; i.e. the number of votes depend on the amount of the contributions. The U.S. today has 17% of the vote; I think in the 1970s, we had 20%. For the next nine years, the ROC remained a member of these two financial institutions even though it was no longer a member of the GA or the Security Council or any of the specialized agencies.

Q: What about relations between IO and the UN mission? What was your view from Washington?

FELDMAN: During the CHIREP debate, there were no problems. At the conclusion of the 1970 GA, I had been asked whether I would take an assignment to our UN mission because it was clear that there would be a major battle in China representation in the following meeting. I had first agreed, but then I had to change my mind because it was during this time that Carol and I were going through marriage counseling in the hopes of saving our marriage. I just couldn't go to New York. I was asked to find someone who could fill the China portfolio in our UN mission. I asked Harry Thayer, a distinguished FSO, a Chinese language officer - he was a fellow student at the Taichung school. Harry did go and joined the political section. We worked very closely in the following twelve months and we never had any problems - unlike what I saw later when I was one of the ambassadors in New York. We worked very cooperatively. George Bush was an easy person to work with. He never took umbrage at the fact that a mid-career FSO was in effect giving him his instructions each day. So I had a very good relationship with our UN mission.

Q: Then what was your next assignment?

FELDMAN: As soon as the vote had taken place in the UN, I was assigned to a working group which dealt with President Nixon's February 1972 visit to China. I was asked to write the background papers on U.S. relations with the ROC. I was hoping I would be invited to go on the trip. The Secretary of State was William Rogers, a very nice guy, who I would have to say understood almost nothing about China and our policy. He had, as is well known, been cut entirely out of the action by Henry Kissinger.

Rogers was going to go on the trip as was Marshall Green. As a member of the working group, I had to brief Rogers on the situation and what issues might arise in Beijing. Alexis Johnson, the Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs, was also one of the briefers as was Al Jenkins, the director of the Office of Mainland Communist Affairs - i.e. the China desk. Marshall Green briefed A/SO. I was obviously the most junior member of this group. Rogers would postulate different scenarios - "If they say this, can I say that?" It was a total clanger. Johnson would sort of hem and haw as did Jenkins. Marshall would sort of dodge the question. So it was left to me to tell Rogers that his answer was not quite appropriate; he then wanted to know what was wrong with his answer. So I would try to explain while the others would just sit and nod. But I was left exposed as the "expert." In the end, I was cut from the list of the people who would go to Beijing. The special working group disbanded at the end of January.

Q: What happened next?

FELDMAN: In 1972, I was invited to join the Policy Planning Staff (S/SP) to be the China expert. I accepted and stayed there for about one year until early 1973. Then I was assigned as political counselor in our mission to Taiwan.

Q: What was the role of S/SP in 1972?

FELDMAN: The role of S/SP depends on who the secretary is and who the director of the staff is. In my time, we did very little policy planning. This was the grand era of quantification. I forget what silly acronyms we gave to these exercises, but we had to assign numerical values to everything the Department did. We had to break down all the embassies' tasks and assign numerical values to them. Somehow, we were supposed to make these numbers add up to something meaningful, but I have yet to understand what they were supposed to do. That was what S/SP was deeply involved in 1972. It also wrote speeches for the secretary. It didn't do much else.

This was not my cup of tea. I was never a math major. I participated fitfully in the number exercise and occasionally I would even have a chance to write some policy papers on U.S. relations with China and Taiwan. This did not happen to often.

Sometimes I would get dragged off to a meeting in some other part of the world. In late 1971, I remember Bill Cargo, the director, took me to a NATO planners' meeting because one of the subjects to be discussed was China. That meeting took place in Germany. It was my first time in Germany - or Europe for that matter. We were taken to a castle (a Schloss) somewhere down the Rhine. This did not look like a Disney version of a castle; it looked more like a large house. It had belonged to the Hohenzollern family - the home of the former rulers of Germany. It was a very pleasant sojourn.

This was during the days of the Bader-Meinhoff gang and the "Red Army faction." So we had a tight security process to protect all of these NATO planners. There were a lot of hard-looking Germans with crew cuts walking around carrying briefcases with one hand stuck inside them. I kept on thinking how strange this situation was; under other circumstances, I, as an American Jew, would not have been guarded by some German security types. But it was fun. I remember that at lunch and dinner each table had a pitcher of local wine. That was great.

Q: How did your assignment to Taiwan come about?

FELDMAN: Bill Gleysteen, to whom I use to call the "finest Foreign Service officer of his generation" was the Deputy Chief of Mission (DCM) in Taiwan. (In 1973, we still had an embassy in Taipei.) He asked that I be assigned to Taipei as political counselor. I was delighted with the assignment; my marriage was over and I was divorced. In fact, during my S/P days I was living in a basement apartment in Adams-Morgan - I referred to it as my "cave." I was just scraping by since most of my income went to my ex-wife. I also was paying for private school for my two children. So I was happy to get an overseas assignment where my housing would be provided by the government.

I was very happy to work with Bill. The ambassador was Walter McConaughy, who was a strange person. He had been involved with China for many, many years. He had begun as a junior FSO in China in the 1930s. He had worked in many consulates in China. During the war, he remained in the Service and held a number of different jobs. After the war, he became director of the Office of Chinese Affairs. So he had been involved with China for about 40 years; he never learned a word of Chinese. I referred to Chiang Kai-shek as "Chee-Ang." McConaughy was from Alabama and that didn't help his pronunciation. The basic Chinese "thank you"

(Hsieh-hsieh) would be pronounced as “Chi-Chi.” That was somewhat disconcerting when one realized that he had been working in the Chinese vineyards for 40 years.

He was on old line FSO. At this point, he was not too deeply involved; Gleysteen ran the show - fortunately. I had a strange political section. The best officer - Joe Lake - in the section was also the most junior. Much later, he became the DCM in Bulgaria, ambassador to Mongolia and then Albania. He retired about a year ago after a stint as “Diplomat In Residence” at the University of Texas at Austin.

Joe was the most junior and most valuable member of the staff. My deputy was not much good; I had a integrated “spook” - CIA man who had a marvelous gift of gab, but never did any work. Whenever I would ask him to do something, he would say that he would love to do that, but that he was really tied down by his other job. I said I understood; one day, the CIA station chief came to me to say that I had to stop loading his man down with so much work; he was so busy that he couldn’t do any of the CIA work. I don’t think I ever learned what this officer was doing, but he was a “good old boy” from Arkansas; he taught me how to hot-wire a car.

Q: What were the issues at the embassy at the time?

FELDMAN: President Nixon had been to Beijing; the Shanghai communiqué had been signed and issued. The key phrase in that was that the U.S. recognized that the Chinese on both sides of the Taiwan Straits agreed that there was only one China of which Taiwan was one part and that the U.S. did not contest this conclusion.

By 1973, 18 months after the presidential visit, after several Kissinger’s visits to the mainland and after the PRC’s entrance into the UN, most countries had switched from Taipei to Beijing. Only a few continued their formal relations with the ROC. Those that had established relations with the PRC had recognized the PRC as the sole legitimate government of all of China, including Taiwan. The PRC insisted that this phraseology be included in all recognition communiqués.

What the embassy was doing was essentially trying to get the people on Taiwan used to the idea that the day was coming when “we would complete normalization.” - a euphemism that indicated that we would switch recognition ourselves from Taipei to Beijing. That was U.S. policy. An illustration of the consequences of this policy was the departure of the 13th Air Force which moved its headquarters from Taiwan to the Philippines.

When I arrived in Taiwan, we had major Air Force units on the islands. By the end of 1973, they were gone. We had a large MAAG in 1972 - something like 6000 officers and men - ; by the end of 1973 it was down to 2000 and declining. We had nuclear weapons on Taiwan which were stored on an Air Force base in the south. By the end of 1973 or the beginning of 1974, I was assigned to oversee their removal and their return to U.S. territory - probably to Hawaii.

So it was quite clear that we were reducing our presence on Taiwan in major ways. We had established a liaison office on Beijing; we had appointed David Bruce, a senior and distinguished diplomat, to head that office; he was followed by George Bush. So I thought it was quite clear that had “Watergate” not intervened, normalization would have been completed by the end of Nixon’s second term. There was no doubt that that was what was going to happen. So part of the embassy’s task was to prepare the people of Taiwan prepared for that day.

Q: How did they take to our efforts?

FELDMAN: We had go through a funny dance. Every time we would hint that “normalization” was coming, the government would issue a statement denying that such action would ever take place. So we had a push-pull situation with us saying that it was going to happen and the ROC denying it. The result was confusion for which both the ROC and we paid a price during the Carter administration when we did break relations with the ROC, because the people in Taiwan were not sufficiently prepared for this break - nor were we, I should say.

Walter McConaughy was replaced in the spring of 1974 by Leonard Unger who had been our excellent ambassador in Thailand. He did a very good job in Taiwan.

I had a very good time at the embassy. I was in Taiwan as a bachelor. I had remembered Taiwan as a straight-laced society of the 1960s, when I first served there. By the 1970s, it was different standard. I was having a marvelous time dating Chinese women or expatiate foreigners. Ultimately, at a volleyball game, one Saturday afternoon at a home of a friend, Tony Tidei (which sounds like “today,” which in Chinese is Jintien; so he was known as Tony Jintien)... He had a house in Tanshui, a suburb of Taipei. We had constructed a volleyball court and a swimming pool on his property. For the swimming pool, we dug a monster ditch and lined with a tarp and filled it with a hose. It was a primitive swimming pool, but it felt good after a hot day at volleyball.

One day, I met an American graduate school, Laurie Sherman, who had received her BA in Chinese studies from Cornell University. She was in Taiwan working on her Chinese language at a local Chinese teachers college. We dated a couple of times. During one volley ball game, she sprained her ankle severely. So I took her to a hospital and that was the beginning of an increasing friendship and she ultimately moved in with me. Not only was that acceptable in Taiwan, but even the Foreign Service accepted it. Not many objected to the fact that we were “living in sin.” I would take Laurie to embassy parties and dinners; no one said anything about it and it worked our very well. In 1975, when I was transferred to Washington, we got married.

Q: What was embassy life like after all of the other missions were closed?

FELDMAN: We never had that much to do with other missions. So we may have missed them, but we were certainly not lonely. Also, by 1973, there weren’t that many left. Fortunately, for the political, economic and commercial sections, our focus was all on the Chinese of Taiwan. We just didn’t spend much time with other missions. We spent a certain amount of time with other U.S. government employees, such as the MAAG, the Taiwan Defense Command, which still existed, but most of our time was devoted to the local people.

The local people could be divided broadly into two groups: The Taiwanese and the mainlanders. The Taiwanese were descendants of Chinese who had immigrated to Taiwan in the 17th and 18th centuries - and a few in the 19th century. But most of their ancestors had come to the island between roughly 1640 and 1820.

The mainlanders were those who had followed Chiang Kai-Shek to Taiwan in 1948 and 1949 after the Nationalists lost the civil war.

This different ancestry resulted in a division of labor. The mainlanders ran the government and occupied the higher positions in the military and security services; the Taiwanese ran the economy.

That had occurred in a strange historical process. The Chinese Nationalist took over the island after WWII when General MacArthur authorized Chiang Kai-Shek to accept the surrender of Japanese troops on Taiwan. Taiwan had been ceded to Japan by the Chinese empire after the Chinese lost the Sino-Japanese war of 1894-95 (under the Treaty of Shimonoseki). This treaty stipulated that Taiwan was ceded “irrevocably” by the empire of China to the empire of Japan. Thereafter, it was ruled as a Japanese territory in the same way that Hawaii and Alaska were U.S. territories.

After WWII, Nationalist troops accepted the Japanese surrender and were warmly welcomed for the most part by the people of Taiwan. That warm welcome did not last very long because the Chinese troops behaved very badly - plunder, rape, robbery. There were a series of incidents culminating in the February 28 incident of 1947. That incident started when some Chinese Nationalist troops roughed up some Taiwanese street hawkers. A crowd gathered, surrounded the troops and roughed them up. That started communal fighting. Ultimately, the Nationalist garrison was reinforced with more troops from the mainland. A large number of Taiwanese were arrested and shot.

As may have guessed, there was a certain amount of bitterness between the two people. During the communal fighting, about 10,000 Taiwanese were massacred, including intellectuals, middle class, etc. When Chiang Kai-Shek arrived in Taiwan, he and his government tried to smooth things over. One of the actions the government took was land reform. It hoped that through this, the allegiance of the small farmer could be enlisted. At the same time, land reform would have broken the power of the land magnets. It worked very effectively. The government did not confiscate the land, but actually purchased it from the owners using government bonds and in some cases, stock in government corporations.

We have always referred to Taiwan as having a “free economy,” in fact it was not. It was at best a mixed economy with major government corporations in many sectors. For example, there was a Taiwan Power - government owned - the only electric utility on the island. As I mentioned earlier, there was a Taiwan Sugar monopoly, China Petroleum, the Taiwan Wine and Tobacco Monopoly corporation; some banks were government owned. So many land owners were paid in shares in these government monopolies making them sort of joint public-private enterprises - with the major stockholder always being the government.

This government action created a Taiwanese entrepreneurial class which over time used its investments wisely and created the entrepreneurial economy of the island, leading to the division of labor I mentioned earlier, which by 1973 was quite evident. A principal function of the embassy was monitoring Taiwanese-mainlanders relations. Of course, that was not that easy since in the political section we only had one officer who spoke Taiwanese. As I said, 85% of the population of the island is Taiwanese, who spoke their language either as their first or only one. The American Embassy, in its political section, had just one officer who spoke the native language. As a matter of fact, he was the only officer in the entire embassy who spoke Taiwanese.

Q: I am kind of surprised that we had any officers who spoke Taiwanese. How did that happen?

FELDMAN: Earlier wisdom had decided that some officers should be trained in Taiwanese. I might mention that we never had trained anyone in Cantonese despite our large presence in Hong Kong - the world's largest consulate. I mentioned earlier that Cantonese is Hong Kong's principal language. Until sometime in the 1970s, we never trained any officers in Cantonese; we taught them Mandarin, which was not spoken in Hong Kong. That is the State Department's logic. It is part of the Department's drive for irrelevance.

So we had the one officer who spoke Taiwanese. He was very proud of that fact, but he was thoroughly lazy; he never did a lick of work. That was too bad.

Q: Was there any unrest while you served in Taiwan?

FELDMAN: Yes, but sub-rosa. It didn't really boil over. No political parties were allowed on the island except for the Chinese Nationalist Part (the KMT). Taiwan was under martial law which was enforced by the Taiwan Garrison Command General Headquarters. Chiang Kai-Shek was president and there was no question he would remain so until his death. His son, Chiang Ching-kuo, was the deputy prime minister who ran the day-to-day operations of the government.

His other son, Chiang Wai-kuo, had a leading role in the military. He had been trained in a German military academy in the 1930s. He had been commissioned as a second lieutenant in the Wehrmacht and had taken part in the invasion of Poland. He was then called back to China.

The Chiangs ran a pretty tight ship. The press was totally fettered; all the media was captive. There were only three TV stations: one was owned by the national government, one was owned by the provincial government and one was owned by the Chinese Nationalist Party. There was press censorship. Taiwan had all of the attributes of an authoritarian martial law state. It may not have been as harsh as the regime on the mainland. A friend of mine described the Taiwan situation as "soft totalitarianism". People were not usually assassinated; there were midnight knocks on doors resulting in time in jail, but you weren't killed. The prisons were not harsh; they were far better than the dungeons on the mainland. Political prisoners were not mingled with murderers so that they weren't beaten bloody. Nor was a political prisoner put in the same cell as inmate with tuberculosis, as was the case on the mainland. There were political prisoners on Taiwan; as I said, they were usually sent to Green Island - not hard, but jail.

Q: Did the embassy ever get into trouble dealing with the Taiwanese?

FELDMAN: Oh, yes. We usually dealt with rich Taiwanese businessmen; that was ok with the government. If we dealt with known dissidents, the government would complain. Very often, I or Bill Gleysteen would be summoned to the Foreign Ministry to hear their complaint about this or that officer having been seen in the company of some notorious “criminal element” - i.e. political dissident. We did of course see some of those dissidents; we did not regard them as “criminal elements.” In the pursuit of our mandate to report on political developments on the island, we felt we had to speak to a wide variety of political opinions.

Q: How would you characterize our relationship with the government at this time?

FELDMAN: By this time, the UN action that I described earlier had already taken place. They could see that “normalization” with the PRC was moving forward. We had pulled the nuclear weapons off the island; our military presence was being diminished. It was fairly clear what was happening. So our relations were rather touchy. The ROC was highly suspicious. Human rights was not yet a major part of our foreign policy, but every once in a while we would mention to the ROC that we considered the arrest of people just because they held views contrary to those of the government or the KMT as not “comporting with the traditions of free China.”

Q: Was there anyone in the government who could foresee the day when more Taiwanese would participate in the discussions of their future?

FELDMAN: There were people in the government who knew that that would have to happen. One of the principal people who recognized the future was Chiang Ching-kuo. That is a whole story in itself. In fact a friend of mine, Jay Taylor, former FSO, has written a book on Chiang Ching-kuo; I saw the manuscript which was 850 pages long. It is being published by Harvard University Press and will be out by the end of this year. It is a marvelous book. I want to talk at great length later about Chiang Ching-kuo because he more than anyone else laid the foundation for the democratization of Taiwan.

Chung Ching-kuo had come to the conclusion sometime in the 1970s that the Kuomintang (the Chinese Nationalist Party) could not be the kind of Leninist vanguard party that it had been. Had it done so, it would have atrophied and withered. He thought that the KMT had to become a majority party which meant that it would have to be a Taiwanese party to reflect the population on the island. So he began to bring Taiwanese into the party, promoting them to positions of responsibility. His senior assistant in this process was Li Huan. Together the two worked assiduously to identify promising Taiwanese, one of whom was Lee Teng-hui, the former president of Taiwan. Lee had studied in Japan at the University of Kyoto. When he returned, he finished college after the war at National Taiwan University. He did graduate work in the U.S. at Cornell. Then he went to work for the Joint Commission on Rural Reconstruction. This was a joint ROC-U.S. commission. Eventually, he became one of the senior staff members; he was then identified as a “comer” by CCK and Li Huan. He became Minister without Portfolio; later was appointed as mayor of Taipei and subsequently governor of Taiwan. Then in 1986, when CCK became president, he made Lee his vice president. In those days, the president and vice president of the ROC were not elected by popular vote; they were elected by the National Assembly. Lee was not the only Taiwanese that CCK promoted; he brought a whole bunch into the KMT and the government and indeed increasingly into the military - which previously had been the exclusive preserve of the mainlanders.

As time passed, CCK, finding himself growing old and more infirm, came to the conclusion that his legacy would have to be a democratic system in Taiwan. He wasn't going to move very rapidly toward this goal, but he wanted to get there step-by-step. So in the middle 1980s, he began tolerating - not encouraging - opposition political activity. Opposition parties were still banned on Taiwan which was still under martial law. But opposition elements were allowed to contest elections as independents. These people became to be known as the Tang Wai literally "those outside the party." They could not organize officially as a party, but they did form an association of like-minded political figures. They first tackled local elections. Then came the question of the Legislative Yuan - the Parliament. This legislature was essentially the one that had been elected in 1947. The same people occupied the seats; for those who had died, the runner-up in that 1947 election took the seat - or the runner-up-runner-up, etc. As I mentioned earlier, the Taiwan legislature was still one that represented cities and provinces of the mainland. It was very strange.

The government started a system of supplementary parliamentary elections to increase the number of Taiwanese in the national legislature. But the "old thieves" were still in majority collecting their pay-checks. Most of them were old and feeble and very few would show up for the parliamentary sessions. In October 1986, Chiang Ching-kuo, in an interview with Meg Greenfield of the Washington Post, said that martial law would be ended by the end of the following year. And it was. He died in January 1988. He had been very ill having suffered from diabetes and insomnia; he was growing blind; so that in the last few years of his life he was in very bad health. But his mind was still sharp. He basically planned the step-by-step procedure transforming Taiwan from an authoritarian one-party dictatorship to a full fledged democracy that it is today.

As I suggested earlier, CCK had chosen Lee Teng-hui as his vice president and heir. I wonder if he knew that Lee in his youth, as a student, had been a member of the Communist party. But then so had Ching-kuo himself, who had been sent to Moscow for education in the 1920s. Lee carried the reforms forward, but the guiding spirit and the inspiration was clearly Ching-kuo. He had come to the conclusion that democratization was the only way which would allow Taiwan to survive. It had not only to liberalize its own internal political processes, but had to be a model for the mainland. Ching-kuo was not a Taiwanese patriot; he was not Taiwanese at all. He was a Chinese patriot. He did not believe in dictatorships - at least in theory. He did like to run the country as he saw fit, but he also saw himself and his legacy as the leader that transformed first Taiwan and then subsequently all of China to a more democratic system. He hoped that Taiwan was to be the model which the mainland would emulate.

He knew all the mainland leaders. He and Deng Xiaoping had been students together at Sun Yat-sen University in Moscow. So he knew the entire communist leadership, as well as the Soviet Union leadership. He had negotiated with Stalin on behalf of his father. He felt very strongly that communism in China had to be replaced by a more democratic system. I don't think he thought that China would become anything like the U.S.; his idea of democracy was much closer to that of Lee Kwan Yew of Singapore, but he wanted to end KMT dictatorship on Taiwan, as well as communist dictatorship on the mainland.

Q: Did he want reunification?

FELDMAN: Absolutely, but under his version of a democratic system. He was a very remarkable man. He was a skilled politician, far smarter than his father, who was best known for his stubbornness. His father regarded himself as the heir to the long line of Chinese emperors. Ching-kuo was sent to the Soviet Union in his youth and had worked there in an automobile factory. He never saw himself as an emperor of China. When he returned to China in 1937, he immediately started cooperatives. He later he was assigned to administer provinces under his father and was quite successful for the most part - to the degree he was given any flexibility. We in the U.S. government did not foresee CCK as the herald of a more democratic ROC. But that was in fact what he became. He worked at it and left it as his legacy which was continued by Lee Teng-hui, who was a very idiosyncratic person - to some degree, more autocratic than Ching-kuo. Lee is a deeply religious Presbyterian who believes that God selected him to be the president and who talks to him. Ching-kuo never believed that God had selected him. He was far too skeptical and pragmatic for that. He was not a "true believer." He had been disowned by his father for many years and isolated in the Soviet Union. He married a Russian woman. So he was totally different from his father. He had a much appreciation of the world than his father did and I think he also understood the world better than Lee Teng-hui. CCK was not self-righteous; Lee is. He certainly did not believe that he was God's anointed. He had an idea of what ought to be and that was his goal.

Chiang Ching-kuo was a very fascinating character. There is an absolutely marvelous biography which I read in manuscript which is to be published at the end of this year. It was written by Jay Taylor, a former FSO. He is a Chinese language officer; he did a lot of interviewing and had access to a lot of personal papers. It is a thoroughly marvelous book.

Q: What did CCK think of the U.S.?

FELDMAN: He regarded the U.S. as Taiwan's protector, preceptor, and model and Taiwan's great problem. I think he probably sympathized with that marvelous saying of Benito Suarez: "Alas, poor Mexico, so far from God; so near the United States." CCK had to depend on the U.S., but the U.S. was on occasions not dependable. Our withdrawal from Vietnam was deeply disturbing as was the way we treated Taiwan during the Nixon-Kissinger years and the Carter-Brzezinski years. It was shameful; no question about that. But CCK was stuck with us and there wasn't much he could do about it.

Q: After Taiwan, where were you assigned?

FELDMAN: I was assigned to Bulgaria. One day, I got a telephone call in Taipei from Personnel asking me whether I wanted to be "GLOPed" to Bulgaria

Q: So then you were transferred to Washington?

FELDMAN: At the end of summer of 1977, having been in Sofia for just two years, I was transferred to Washington as director of the Office of the Republic of China Affairs. I had been specifically requested for this position by the man who had been my DCM in Taipei, Bill Gleysteen, whom I mentioned earlier. As I said, I think Gleysteen was the finest Foreign Service Officer of his generation. Bill was then the senior deputy assistant secretary in the Bureau of East Asia and Pacific Affairs (EA). The assistant secretary was Richard C. Holbrooke. That was a very interesting assignment. It was in this period that we completed the “normalization” process and created the new institutions that now regulate America’s relations with Taiwan and with the PRC.

On my first day on the job - very shortly after Labor Day, 1977 - I was called to Holbrooke’s office, where I met him for the first time. I was informed that my principal task was to create a way of maintaining all the necessary U.S. relationships with the ROC, without having any official U.S. representation on Taiwan. Subsequently, I learned that the reason for this was that in August, 1977, Secretary Cyrus Vance had been in Beijing and had told China’s “maximum” leader, Deng Xiaoping, that the Carter administration was prepared to move rapidly toward “full normalization” of relations. That meant the recognition of the PRC as the sole government of China. But Vance added that the complexity of our relations with the ROC meant that we would have to maintain a small office - e.g. a liaison office or a consulate or something like that.

Deng immediately denounced this. He called for the “record of conversation” between President Ford and himself, along with Secretary Henry Kissinger, which had taken place in 1975. He asked someone to read to Vance in English the section of the Chinese transcript in which President Ford had promised that upon normalization of relationship between Washington and Beijing, the U.S. would have no official representation of any kind on Taiwan. So that was the reason for the marching orders I got from Holbrooke. I was told that I had six weeks to come up with a scheme; I was further told that I should not consult any one at all - not even a lawyer. I was to do this all by myself.

So in between handling the normal tasks of a country director, dealing with a country which was an active trading partner for the U.S., where we had a significant number of U.S. military (a large MAAG) and a large CIA station and a sizeable consular work-load, I had to come up with this scheme.

I did come up with something. The Japanese when they had derecognized Taiwan and had recognized the PRC, had established a small “unofficial” office, called the Japan Interchange Association on Taiwan. So I took that as a model and modified it in recognition of our much more complex relationships. The three or four person office that the Japanese had would not be nearly enough for our workload. Sometimes people have told me that all I did was copy the Japanese; that was not quite correct.

I designed a non-profit organization, chartered somewhere in the U.S., that would have a Board of Directors, appointed by the secretary of state - and who could also be removed by the secretary - funded as a line item in the State Department budget. It would be staffed by government employees - primarily Foreign Service officers - who for the period of service in this new entity, which I called “The American Institution,” would nominally be on leave-of-absence from their agencies. I divided the “Institution” into various sections taking the basic template of an embassy, but changed the names of the sections to give it a somewhat different character. For example, the political section became the general affairs section; the economic section became the commercial and business section; the USIS became the cultural and information section; and so on.

I assumed that we would continue military sales. U.S. laws requires that when you sell military end -use items to another country, we have to have some kind of military presence there to monitor the use of these items. I therefore maintained a MAAG, but gave it a different name.

So within about a month after my conversation with Holbrooke, working at night and on week-ends and during the few minutes available during the day, I wrote a about 20 page description of the new entity and how it would function. I gave it to Holbrooke who patted me on the back and said that this was fine. I didn't hear another word about it for a long time.

My principal problems in trying to manage our relationship with Taiwan, were threefold: 1) economic and trade where we had a substantial trade deficit (I think we were doing annually about $40 billion worth of total trade with Taiwan and our deficit was running $15-17 billion per annum). So I had to plea with the ROC to buy more U.S. goods. I remember particularly that at one point Taiwan's flag carrier, China Airlines, was trying to decide whether to buy DC-10s or a Airbuses. I lobbied very hard for the DC-10 which they finally bought. Shortly after that, there was a series of crashes of DC-10s around the world which made me feel somewhat queasy, after the hard twist I had applied to China Airlines.

That was one area of difficulty. Another concerned the stream of CIA reports about ROC's attempts to develop nuclear weapons. This was done secretly at a facility called the Cheng Shan Institute. We had tackled this issue once before; we had told the ROC that they had to discontinue all of their efforts in the nuclear area. It promised it would, but we later found that the program had restarted. My deputy, David Brown, was particularly knowledgeable in this matter. We tightened the screws very hard on the ROC; we threatened all kinds of dire consequences if the program was not terminated.

One of our threats fell in the area of arms sales, which we used as a club in the nuclear arms issue. I think that the promised squeeze in this area was one of the principal reasons for the dismantling of the project. In general, arms sales was a problem because it was quite clear that there had been a pattern built up in the Kissinger era which continued under the Carter administration. This pattern called for the denial of any arms and military supplies to Taiwan that the administration believed would offend or create problems with the PRC. This was another example of the State Department's pension for premature capitulation, especially when it came to dealing with Beijing. Bureaucrats would sit down and decide for themselves if an action might offend Beijing; that would put an end to any proposal that ran into such guesswork. We didn't hold consultations with the PRC; this was only an intuitive feeling that the PRC would react negatively to a particular action. In the case of arms to Taiwan, this meant that the ROC Air Force was stuck with the F-104G (the Lockheed "Starfighter" which the Germans had called the "Widow Maker") and the F-5E and F.

The F-104G plane had been designed in the early 1950s; in fact, I was vice consul in Nagoya in 1958 when the Japanese made their first buy of this plane. It was a fine plane for its time; it had very good speed, but it was not maneuverable and it had no all-weather capability. The F-5 was a very nifty light-weight fighter, also of the 1950s era. It was very short range and also did not have all weather or night capability.. Neither of these planes could fire a stand-off missile. Both would have to come close to their target before firing and engage in a “dog fight.” They had a fairly rudimentary capability of firing a “Sidewinder;” the ROC pilots had to climb on the enemy’s aircraft tail; then the missile could be fired once it had accessed the heat of the enemy’s plane exhaust. The version available to U.S. pilots enabled them to fire the “Sidewinder” from anywhere around the enemy plane; it was “smart” enough to hit the enemy from any angle.

So the ROC did not have an all weather fighter capability; it could not fire a “stand-off missile” and had a rather crude version of a “Sidewinder.” Yet its principal defense need was in the air, over the Taiwan Straits and perhaps even over Taiwan itself. To break the bureaucrats’ mindset on such issues was a real task. Even simple kinds of arms, such as a long range/slant range reconnaissance camera, was a fight. The ROC had been asking for such devices for many, many years; for one reason or another, the Department kept denying the request. This made no sense at all. Without such a camera to do aerial reconnaissance, you had to fly over what it was you were reconnoitering in order to get pictures. With a slant angle camera, the ROC pilots could remain over the Straits. So there was an awful amount of nonsense in our arms sales policy to the ROC. The assumption in much of the bureaucracy was that whatever the ROC wanted, it probably should not get. This was the mind-set that I found when I became country director.

When I discussed my role as chief of the political section in our embassy in Taipei, I mentioned the draw-down of American forces and the reduction of installations on the island. This process was still continuing when I became country director for the ROC. At this point the Taiwan Defense Command - the entity responsible for defending the island against attack - was down to a handful of people.

As I suggested before, the Carter administration maintained the policy of getting “into bed” with the PRC. The one major difference between the Kissinger approach and the Brzezinski one to the U.S.-PRC relations, was that Kissinger saw this issue as part of a global strategy. Brzezinski was really interested in some form of military-to-military relationship even though the PRC was militarily rather weak. But I don’t think that Brzezinski ever saw this deficiency; he thought in terms of PRC military forces on Soviet borders actually distracting the USSR. He foresaw a far closer military-to-military relationship than anyone else had or did. So the question of arms supplies to Taiwan was even a more fraught problem as far as he was concerned. Brzezinski put all kinds of pressure on the State Department to simply deny whatever it was that the ROC wanted, unless it was something like rifles and hand grenades.

This raised another interesting conundrum. The ROC at this time was still an authoritarian dictatorship, with all of the attributes to such a regime - political prisoners, government controlled press, etc. That ran directly against the Carter administration’s human rights policy. So from that point of view, even the rifles and hand grenades should not have been approved even if Brzezinski was prepared to allow it. I should note that, although Taiwan was undoubtedly an authoritarian regime, the PRC was a totalitarian state, under repression far worst than Taiwan, but the Carter administration never took notice of their violation of human rights.

One of the black marks against President Carter personally, as well as the entire administration, was his failure to do anything about the case of Wei Ching-sheng. He was one of the people who had put up posters during the “democracy wall” of Europe, which had been put up in Beijing. He was the one that called for a fifth “Modernization”, in addition to the four that Deng had proposed. That fifth would have been democracy for China. Wei, who was an electrician, but not the descendant of a working class family - his parents were members of the senior cadre of the Communist Party - was tried, convicted of sedition for daring to suggest that democracy was necessary for China, and was sentenced to fourteen years in prison. The Carter administration was almost silent on this obvious violation of human rights. It said nothing when Wei was arrested; it issued a very weak statement when he was sentenced expressing regrets that Wei was given such a long prison term. No regrets about the conviction.

So as far as human rights were concerned the Carter administration took an entirely different track when it came to the situations in Taipei and Beijing.

Q: How did the criticism of the human rights policy manifest itself?

FELDMAN: It provided “excuses” - I use that term deliberately - for not supplying defensive arms that Taiwan needed so that a military balance of some sort could be maintained in the Taiwan Straits. I call it an “excuse” because the real reason why these arms sales were not approved was because the Carter administration was concerned about upsetting the relationship with the PRC that Brzezinski had considered so important.

Q: What were the violations the ROC was accused of?

FELDMAN: It was political prisoners, repression of attempts to develop an opposition party, control of the media, although I must point out that the press on Taiwan was freer than that on the mainland. While the ROC owned one newspaper, there about twenty others that the government did not own. These papers operated on a self-censorship basis rather than pre-censorship. Basically, there were well-known parameters and as long as the media did not criticize the Chiang family, as long as there was no call for Taiwan independence, as long there was no protest against media control, the press could say almost anything it wanted to say. The media could certainly criticize the government’s economic policy, it could criticize foreign policy; those subjects were not off-limits. So the Taiwan press was far less tightly controlled than that on the mainland, but the Carter administration never raised a peep on what was happening in the PRC.

One can work this arms sales-human rights nexus in a totally different way. I got very friendly with the head of the ROC military purchasing mission in Washington, General Wen Hai-hsiung (known usually as Pat Wen.) He had graduated from Virginia Military Institute - as had his father who had also been a general in the Nationalist army. Pat had been a military assistant for Chiang Ching-kuo who by now was the president of the ROC. He had in fact a direct line to Chiang. So I would tell Pat, whenever there was a violation of human rights, that here was little or no chance of the U.S. approving whatever arms sales was being considered at the moment. It would have been foolish for me even to try to get approval if some dissident had just been arrested or if there had been any other violation of human rights. Pat would immediately report this back to Chiang Ching-kuo and others in Taipei; sometimes the arrested person would be released and I could then submit my memorandum requesting approval of the arms sale under consideration at the time. It was through this kind of process that I managed to get the slant camera approved as well as some of the other more minor systems and supplies. And of course, several people who might have been in serious trouble were released.

The big issue, as I mentioned earlier, was the fighter plane. The ROC wanted F-16s, which had been brought on line earlier on the decade. It was the hottest plane in the U.S. Air Force inventory. I knew they would not get the F-16. Northrop was the builder of the F-5; so I met with its representatives. I asked Northrop what could be done to give the F-5 an all weather capability and to give it the avionics so that stand-off missile could be fired from the plane. The Northrop folk thought about my questions and came back telling me these features could be added without too much difficulty. It would replace the present two engines with a more advanced GE engine. The one to be used in the next U.S. fighter model - the F-18. It would require a slight enlargement and reconfiguration of the fuselage, but that was doable. Then the wings would have to be strengthened and given different hard points; the new avionics could be added and so could the new missilery. In fact, the new F-5 could be given the features that the ROC found lacking in the standard model. I asked whether the new design would still make the plane look like an F-5 so that it could be still sold as such a plane and be designated as an F-5G. Northrop saw no problem with that; the F-5E and F which were being sold looked different from the original A and B models.

I began a major drive to have the Department approve the F-5G. At the same time, I also pushed for better command and control facilities and equipment for the ROC Navy and for a more advanced missile - the "Harpoon" - which was an anti-ship missile which could be fired from shore or a ship. These three end-use items became the center of the arms sales package that I was preparing for White House approval. This was an exception to the normal arms sales approval process; in the case of sales to the ROC, all had to be approved by the White House.

The first battle was to obtain approval from my colleagues in the Department. There were a number of offices, including the PRC desk, which wanted to oppose sales of the magnitude I had in mind. I worked very hard on my friend Harry Thayer, then the PRC country director. I finally managed to get his concurrence. Then I had to convince Roger Sullivan, the deputy assistant secretary in charge of the Northeast Asia area. He finally also agreed. Holbrooke was prepared to submit the memorandum.

Then I had to tackle the toughest problem of all: Michael Oxenberg, the NSC staffer responsible for China affairs. It took me a long time to persuade Oxenberg just to allow this proposal to go the president. He could have just returned the memorandum to the Department saying that the proposals were not consistent with U.S. policy. I suggested that if he disagreed with our recommendations, he could say so in his transmittal note to the president, but at least we should give the president an opportunity to make a decision.

I finally got the package approved by State, in a big high level meeting. I was not present at that meeting but I was briefed and read the minutes. Vance and Brown, the secretary of Defense, chaired this meeting. Les Gelb, the director of the Bureau of Politico-Military affairs, and Dick Holbrooke attended. The decision of this meeting was that the memorandum could be forwarded to the White House. It then landed on the NSC's doorstep. One of the NSC staff members was Jessica Tuchman Matthews, daughter of the famous author, Barbara Tuchman. Jessica is now the president of the Carnegie Endowment Institute. She added a memorandum of her own to my package opposing the sale of the F-5G. She called it a violation of presidential policy as the development of a new weapon system for export-only since it was a plane that the U.S. Air Force was not planning to buy. That was a violation of Carter's policy. The U.S. Air Force was not going to buy this or any version of the F-5 was that it was inferior to the F-16. Of course that was exactly the reason why we had recommended the sale. The F-16 would certainly not be approved, so it had to be a less capable plane. And if it was, USAF would not buy it. Catch 22.

The memorandum came back for the president disapproving the sale of the airplane and the sale of the "Harpoon." There was also a note from the president suggesting that we suggest to the ROC that it initiate discussion with Israel on the possible purchase of the Kfir, which was a modified version of an F-4 - a 1960s design. In any case, the Israelis were not going to sell any major weapons systems to the ROC because they were working very hard on improving relations with the PRC. So there was no way the presidential suggestion would fly. Carter did approve some of the more minor parts of the package, but the major items were turned down.

The memorandum had been sent to the White House sometime in June, 1978. It had taken me almost a year to get to that stage. It sat in the White House until the end of August; I think it was in early September when it came back with Carter's decisions. That was a real heart-breaker. After my tour as director of the ROC desk, the issue arose again during the Reagan administration. In January 1982, the advanced fighter proposal again was turned down because of fears of the PRC reaction. Instead, the ROC was given a co-production agreement to manufacture more F-5s (which they were already doing) and was told that the U.S. would assist them in designing a fighter plane of their own. Thus was born the Indigenous Defense Fighter (IDF). The ROC has in fact produced a couple of hundred of these planes. It is a greatly inferior airplane. For example it did not have an all weather capability and had some other major deficiencies. It is not much of a weapon.

Q: Is that what they are using today?

FELDMAN: No. The situation finally reached the point at which the discrepancy was so great that people at last began to see that this weakness was tempting the PRC to begin an air campaign over the Straits. So the question re-emerged in the Bush administration. At that point, the choice was either an F-16 or an even more advanced plane. Matters came to a head in 1992; shortly before the Republican Convention, at which Bush was to be nominated as a candidate for president for a second term. General Dynamics informed the White House that if there were not be any approval of the sale of F-16s to the ROC, it would have to close the production line in Texas, where the F-16s were built. GD said it would close the line in June - the convention was scheduled for July; at the same time the company was going to buy ads in Texas newspapers explaining why it was taking such action. That gave the White House some pause and later in June, 1992 it announced it was considering an F-16s sale to the ROC. The production line was not shut down.

I should note however that the F-16s approved for Taiwan was not the latest version of the aircraft, but an earlier version called F-16 A&B. What the ROC finally got was an F-16A&B with an advanced package which brought it close to an F-16C&D, but allowed the administration to say it was an inferior model. The game goes on.

Let me go back to 1978 and talk about what else was going on. My memorandum on the establishment of new institutions to carry on ROC-U.S. relationships had gone to Holbrooke, as I have mentioned, in October 1977. There was nothing going on the “normalization” front. My work consisted of the usual duties of a country director. I traveled to Taiwan a couple of times - 1977 and 1978. I had the usual conversation with the government and the embassy. But nothing seemed to be moving on getting U.S.-ROC relations on sounder footing.

There were a couple of other things going on. For one, the Panama Canal Treaty was being renegotiated and secondly, the Middle East problems loomed large. It is very difficult for any administration to handle one major foreign policy challenge at any one time, much less two. It didn't have time for anything else, including “normalization.” I think that in September the Panama Canal Treaty was ratified by the Senate; at the same time, Camp David took place. With these two triumphs behind him President Carter turned his attention to the China issues. I think that is probably one of the reasons why the F-5 proposal got turned down. I learned later that in September, 1978 negotiations toward “normalization” re-started in Beijing.

On December 15, 1978 I arrived at the office around 8 a.m. - my usual time. As I began to pour myself a cup of coffee, I was summoned to Holbrooke's office. I was told to call Ambassador Unger in Taipei and instruct him to seek an immediate appointment with President Chiang Ching-kuo in order to inform him that around 9 p.m. in the evening (our time) the U.S. president was going to announce that negotiations on “normalization” had been concluded and that the U.S. on January 1, 1979 would de-recognize the ROC and would recognize the PRC as the sole legal government of China.

I had some inkling that something was going on because starting sometime in September, under instructions from Secretary Vance, I and the legal advisor, Herb Hansell, went to New York secretly once every couple of weeks to discuss the terms of “normalization” with Herbert Brownell, who had been a close advisor to Thomas Dewey. He was a well known Republican lawyer; the Attorney General under Eisenhower. Vance thought that if a prominent Republican would testify on behalf of the administration's China policy following “normalization” and the various actions that followed it, the storm against the policy might be abated. He had talked privately to Brownell and had found that he was sympathetic. That led to Vance's instructions to consult with Brownell on aspects of what later became the “Taiwan Relations Act,” including my ideas about the American Institute on Taiwan. Hansell and I held three or four consultations with Brownell from September to December. He was generally in agreement with our proposals.

That was not a surprise to me. What was the surprise came when Holbrooke told me that the president would be announcing that night - December 15, 1978 - that negotiations had been completed and that we would be de-recognizing Taiwan on January 1, 1979. Previously, Ambassador Unger and I had argued very strongly, with Holbrooke and others, that we would have to give Chiang Ching-kuo at least two weeks' notice so that he could prepare his people for the bad news. He had to have at least that much time to convince his people that the sky was not about to fall and we had to have the time to explore with the ROC what institutions and structures would be established to continue a relationship and how they would work.

Instead, I was told that there would be no advance notice, no discussion of alternatives, but we would be making a public statement of our position, giving Taiwan a two weeks' public notice before de-recognition. That was hardly what Unger and I had argued for. As soon as I left Holbrooke's office, Roger Sullivan and I got on the telephone to try to get in touch with Unger. This was about 9:30 a.m. our time which would have been about 9:30 p.m. in Taiwan. Unger, who had always been very careful to let his staff know where he was going to be, on this day had not told the Marine Guard where he was to be found. The duty officer had no idea where the ambassador was. Later, Unger insisted that he had left word where he could be found, but that some snafu must have happened in the embassy. I don't know what the truth was, but in any case we could not talk to ambassador.

In fact, Unger was at a dinner dance at the American University Club; that was not a private affair nor was there any reason for the staff not to know. When he returned to the residence at about 11 p.m., he was found by Mark Platt, the political counselor. We talked to him on the phone and asked him to get in touch with Taiwan's president to alert him to Carter's announcement. Unger's first question was : "What happened to the two week's notice?" He was told by Sullivan the same thing that I had gotten from Holbrooke, namely that we were giving a two weeks' notice; it was just not secret.

Furthermore, the "normalization" and de-recognition communiqué declared that the U.S. acknowledged the PRC's claim that there was only one China of which Taiwan was a part. This has been greatly misunderstood especially by successor administrations. When the U.S. said that it acknowledged the PRC's position, it did not say that it accepted it. Those are two entirely different policy expressions. An acknowledgment of the PRC position was a polite way of saying : "We hear you; we understand that this what you claim. We will not contradict it, but we make no statement on our own position." The usual way this U.S. statement would be translated into Chinese was to use the three character phrase "renshr dao" ("we acknowledge") The PRC tried to pull a fast one; in their Chinese version of our communiqué, they used a two character phrase cheng ren (or "recognized"). This a phrase that is used when speaking of a recognition of a government. When the two character phrase appeared in the PRC text, the U.S. Liaison Office in Beijing should have immediately expressed its disapproval of the PRC text. The head of that Office was Leonard Woodcock, formerly of the United Automobile Workers' Union. The DCM, J. Stapleton Roy, at the embassy at the time was someone who had been born in China, had grown up in China and was therefore bilingual; he had served in Chinese language positions for most of his career. He was completely aware of the difference between the two phrases. Roy should have immediately pointed out that the PRC had mis-translated the American text, but I am firmly convinced that because he was so keen to achieve "normalization," he did not point out this very important mistranslation. So the official Chinese text of the communiqué included the phrase cheng ren ("recognized"). This has created no end of mischief in the PRC-U.S. relationship because in effect the two versions of the same communiqué say different things. The Chinese version uses the word "recognition" of the PRC claim of one China, whereas the English version says "the U.S. acknowledges the PRC contention."

As time went on, even the word “acknowledges” has been misinterpreted by spokespersons of various administrations, including the present one. The Clinton administration has said from time to time that the U.S. has “accepted” the PRC view that Taiwan is a part of China. In fact, officially, the U.S. has never “accepted” the PRC view; we have only “acknowledged” it.

Unger tried to get in touch with the Foreign Ministry’s duty officer immediately. That took a while, but he finally got to him, he told the officer that as a matter for great urgency he had to see President Chiang. Ching-kuo suffered from insomnia. In fact, he was not in the best of health - he was diabetic, etc. No one wanted to really wake him up if he fell asleep. So Unger had some difficulties conniving the president’s staff that he really needed to be awakened to get the U.S. announcement. Finally, about 2:30 a.m., Unger got to see the Taiwanese president. He told him that in approximately seven hours, President Carter would be announcing “normalization” with the PRC and the de-recognition of Taiwan. It was an awful way to treat a loyal ally, as the ROC had been.

For example, when Nixon and Kissinger had negotiated their deal with the Vietnamese in Paris, which theoretically was supposed to end the war, we had stated that on a date certain, there would be a cut-off of arms to the South Vietnamese. We then turned to the ROC and asked it to give all the arms it had to Saigon. The ROC agreed and they sent practically all of their F-5s (which we later replaced.) But the ROC did not argue with our request; it did what had been asked of it. It fully cooperated; so our de-recognition action and the way it was done was hardly acceptable. It was pretty bad; no question about it.

A political storm broke out in the U.S. as well. There were many people in Congress that were furious with the Carter administration. One of them Senator Dick Stone (D-FL). He had in the past been consistent in his objection to “normalization.” As a Democrat, it was thought that he should have supported the administration. If Democrats were going to criticize “normalization” that was not a good omen. Holbrooke instructed me on Saturday morning - December 16, 1978 - to rush to Miami to try to placate Stone. I left on Sunday morning; I was met at the Miami airport by my father and step-mother - she recently had a hip operation and was therefore walking with a walker, while my father used a cane. They drove me to the downtown Miami hotel where I was to lunch with Dick Stone and his wife, Marlene. So I walked in very slowly followed by my parents. The Stones were waiting for me. He looked up at me and said, “Where did you find these people? In central casting?” I then introduced my father and step-mother. Stone wanted to know in what condominium they lived. He was told that it was “Jade Winds.” Stone, of course, said that that was his favorite condo in all Miami. My father suggested that it should be because he (my father) “had gotten all of the tenants to vote for you in the last election.”

Q: That is very funny. You obviously carried out your mission better than Holbrooke could have expected.

FELDMAN: Right. I think that was a very amusing story.

In any case, it was not surprising that the ROC reacted very badly. It was a bitter pill to swallow and we didn’t force it down their throats in the most understanding way. The ROC was angry and felt that it had been treated very badly. It was deeply concerned about the future. There was immediate capital flight; the stock market crashed; the real estate market crashed. The economy nosedived - all because the Carter administration had mishandled the process.

A few days afterwards, the Carter administration decided that it would have to send a special emissary to tell Chiang and the ROC that the world had not come to an end. It was decided that Warren Christopher, the deputy secretary of state, and Roger Sullivan would go to Taiwan for consultations. I argued very strongly against this action. I thought it was a grave mistake; the ROC was so ferociously angry that Christopher would not get a good reception. I thought a far better idea would have been to invite the ROC to send a high level delegation to Washington for discussions. I was over-ruled; Christopher and Sullivan left for Taipei. On the ride in from the airport to the embassy, they were assaulted by mobs. The car was stopped and pelted with eggs and other debris; the car was rocked and mobs shouted at its occupants. I am told that it was a very frightening experience. That demonstration was undoubtedly organized by the Taiwan Garrison Command - no demonstration would have been possible on Taiwan without government approval - if not active participation. But it reflected general public sentiment.

The discussions were not fruitful, to put it mildly. In the end, without admitting as much, the administration followed my advice by inviting an ROC emissary to Washington for negotiations. Taiwan sent the senior vice minister for foreign affairs, Yang Hsi-kun, a wonderful gentleman. We negotiated with him the arrangements which essentially still govern today's relationships between the ROC and the U.S. The ROC efforts at this juncture were motivated largely by the desire to deal with the panic that had erupted on Taiwan with the economic consequences that I mentioned earlier. The way the Chiang administration felt it could deal with the situation was by continuing to assert that despite the shift in diplomatic relations, there was still an official relationship between the U.S. and the ROC.

Yang Hsi-kun's marching orders were to somehow get us to say that whatever was being said about the new relationship, there remained some official connection. We, on the other hand, were aiming to get the ROC to accept the new situation - e.g. deal with the U.S. through the American Institute on Taiwan (the new name for my American Institution proposal) - by establishing a parallel institution in Washington. The relationship after January 1, would have to be conducted through these two nominally unofficial organizations. At the same time, we were negotiating on such things as the continuing of treaties and agreements, continuation of arms sales, enriched uranium fuel for their nuclear power reactors, etc. Under our arrangements with the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), after the ROC's expulsion from the UN, it was only the U.S. which could sell enriched uranium to Taiwan because IAEA inspectors were technically not allowed to inspect atomic energy installations in non-UN member states. Somehow, we worked out a new arrangement with the IAEA which allowed us to include IAEA inspectors in U.S. delegations which periodically went to Taiwan to inspect the ROC's nuclear power plants. That was how an international inspection regime was maintained allowing the ROC to claim that it was still under an IAEA regime. But this convoluted scheme allowed only the U.S. to sell the enriched uranium and U.S. law allowed such sales only to "friendly" governments.

U.S. law allowed arms and military supplies to be sold only to "friendly" states. There were similar restrictions in respect to Ex-Im Bank loans, to Overseas Private Investment Corporation (OPIC) guarantees and other U.S. government programs. The problem was of course that we had just de-recognized the ROC; legally, we did not recognize it as a government nor Taiwan as a separate nation. We decided that these anomalies had to be fixed by new legislation, which became known as the "Taiwan Relations Act." I mentioned earlier our conversation with Herbert Brownell on this issue. Now the challenge was to convince the ROC that these problems could and would be taken care of in the legislation.

The sticking point was whether the relationship had "qualities of officiality," which was what Yang Hsi-kun's orders were to insist upon. We could not accept such a formulation because we had promised the PRC that we would not have any official relationship with Taiwan. I should point out that the PRC would not accept "normalization" if in addition to de-recognizing the ROC, we did not also agree to three demands: 1) that we would withdraw all American forces from Taiwan; 2) that we would withdraw all official governmental institutions from Taiwan and 3) and that would abrogate the Mutual Defense Treaty.

The Carter agreed to demands (1) and (2), but said that the U.S. could not abrogate the treaty. We would terminate the Defense Treaty in accordance with its provisions - i.e. giving one year's notice. And that is what we did; on January 1, 1979, we informed the ROC that we no longer recognized it and that we were withdrawing from the Mutual Defense Treaty in a year's time. When Deng Xiaoping heard this, he swallowed hard and pointed out the obvious - our defense treaty would remain in effect until December 31, 1979. We told him that there was no other way out. He demanded that for that year we would not approve any new arms transfers or sales. We accepted that compromise. So in 1979, we had a defense treaty with an entity which we did not recognize and we would not sell or transfer any new arms. Thereafter, we would sell arms to a government we did not recognize. That was "creative" diplomacy or complete idiocy - I don't know which is the most apt description.

We convinced Yang Hsi-kun that we would take necessary measures to take care of government loans and to continue our sales of enriched uranium. We also promised to sell arms after the expiration of the Mutual Defense Treaty. That left the question of "officiality." We argued about this over and over again; at one point I said to Yang - privately in the corridor - that he and the ROC could say whatever it wished about our relationships; we could not control that. We had to say that there was no "official" relationship. I also told him that if the ROC insisted on defining its representation in Washington as "official," U.S. government officials could not talk to it. But if the Taiwanese institution were deemed to be "unofficial", we could of course have discussions with its staff.

It was on this basis that we eventually came to an agreement. Each side said what it wanted to say. The other question that had to be resolved was the question of names. We asked what the ROC would call its "unofficial" office in Washington. They said that since we were calling our entity "The American Institute in Taiwan", they would call their institution "The Republic of China Institute in America." We had to say that that would not work; we could not deal with any entity with the name "Republic of China" in it. We suggested that they use the name "Taiwan" as in "The Taiwan Institute in America." That was not acceptable to the ROC which said that it represented the Republic of China, not Taiwan. We discussed this matter at great length. Finally, the ROC delegation, in the corridor again, asked for our suggestion. I had a brain-storm. I said that the Ministry of Foreign Affairs was a good model; the division that handled U.S. relations was called the “North American Affairs” bureau, not “American Affairs.” So I suggested that the institute be called something like “The Institute for North American Affairs.” I noted that it could even be headquartered in Canada. The ROC delegation took my suggestions half-way; it finally called its institution “The Coordinating Council for North American Affairs.”

Subsequently, I and my colleagues were blamed for the ROC’s decision. They said that we had given them the name for their entity; we allegedly had insisted on the phraseology “Coordinating Council for North American Affairs (CCNAA).” So we forced on them a very unwieldy name. I had to repeat that the decision was the ROC’s, not mine. I did admit that I suggested a name or two, but the final name was their invention. Much later, the ROC obtained our permission to rename the Institute as “The Taipei Economic and Cultural Relations Organization (TECRO),” which is the current appellation. The ROC saw that as a great advance and improvement over CCNAA. When the announcement was made, I commented that I thought their entity represented a country and not just a city.

I might mention that starting in mid-December, 1978, Hodding Carter would have me brief the press from time to time on the negotiations, the new arrangements and what might happen. At one of those briefings I was asked by Lester Kinsolving, a well known correspondent, the following question :” You have said that on January 1, 1979 we would not longer recognize the Republic of China on Taiwan and that we would then recognize the People’s Republic of China in Beijing. I note that that when it is here 11:59 p.m. on December 31, 1978, it is already 11:59 a.m. of January 1, 1979 in Beijing. Does that mean that for that 12 hour period, we recognize the PRC in Beijing and the ROC in Taipei simultaneously?” I looked at Carter and asked whether I could go off-the-record. Carter agreed. So I said: “Kinsolving, it beats the shit out of me!” This became known as the “Feldman exception.”

While these negotiations were going on, our embassy in Taiwan was in limbo. It had ceased to be an embassy on January 1, 1979. Leonard Unger, our last ambassador, left Taiwan on January 19, 1979. So the embassy was in a nebulous state. Bill Brown or Mark Pratt should be asked how that felt. That situation continued for more than 3 months (January 1-April 10). Then the Taiwan Relations Act was passed by Congress; that converted our representation from an embassy to AIT. That allowed the Executive Branch to pay its employees in Taiwan; for the three months period, there was a hiatus during which we could not make major expenditures; e.g. rent on embassy housing. We had to persuade the ROC, whose housing we were occupying and whom we had just mortified, to let our people remain in their quarters without due compensation being paid. There were other U.S. debts that had to be left unpaid for this three months’ period. We also had to obtain ROC permission to allow our people to drive in cars displaying diplomatic tags, etc.

It was a totally weird situation. Until the necessary legislation was passed the situation of our people in Taiwan was pretty bad.

Q: No diplomatic immunity?

FELDMAN: Technically, they did not have diplomatic immunity. In fact, we did work out an arrangement which allowed their personnel in the U.S. to keep their diplomatic immunity and our people in Taiwan were treated the same way.

Let me now turn to the Taiwan Relations Act. I mentioned earlier I had done some initial work on designing the entity that would represent us in Taipei after “normalization” with the PRC. That became the American Institute in Taiwan. I also mentioned that my proposal laid fallow waiting for something to happen, but that in the meantime we were consulting secretly with Herb Brownell on the possible shape of the new legislation. When Carter announced “normalization”, no draft legislation actually existed. We had some ideas, some which had been written down in memoranda by me to Hansell and some which had been generated within the Legal Advisor’s Office by Lee Marks, who was the senior deputy to the legal advisor. But we did not have even a draft of a legislative package.

So the first thing that had to happen after the Carter announcement was to draft the necessary legislation which would allow us to maintain contact with Taiwan, albeit on an “unofficial” basis. There were some 60 agreements between the U.S. and the ROC dealing with mutual defense, double taxation, commercial arrangements, airline arrangements, etc. The question was what would happen to these agreements following “normalization”. As the prospects for “normalization” had improved over years, legal scholars had written all kinds of papers. For example, Jerry Cohen, a friend, made the rather absurd argument that following “normalization” all treaties and agreements the U.S. had with the ROC would cease to apply to the ROC but would instead apply to the PRC. I teased Jerry about this position which I considered ill founded. For example, did he mean that we would automatically have a mutual defense treaty with the PRC? Other scholars had postulated that all agreements would lapse with our de-recognition of the ROC. We didn’t want them to lapse. In the end, we said that they would continue in force unless amended. No one objected. No court case challenging this view ever took place.

The next question was whether our position on these agreements could be supported under international law. To test that, some one would have had to sue the U.S. By whom and where would this suit be filed? Lee Marks and I had written a memorandum on this issue which became the basis for the provisions included in the Taiwan Relations Act.

Furthermore, we were the only country that was able to sell to Taiwan enriched uranium fuel, as I mentioned earlier. I have described the arrangements we finally developed to enable the IAEA inspectors to participate in an inspection regime. Our legislation had to amend U.S. law which limited sale of uranium to “friendly states.” Same went for arms sales. The Taiwan Relations Act stipulates that “for all purposes, including actions in any court of the United States, the Congress approves the continuation in force of all treaties and other international agreements, including multi-lateral conventions, entered into by the United States and the governing authorities on Taiwan recognized by the United States as the Republic of China prior to January 1, 1979.” That was based on our draft.

We also put into our draft that “nothing in this Act nor the facts of the President’s action in extending recognition to the People’s Republic of China, the absence of diplomatic relations between the people on Taiwan and the United States or the lack of recognition by the United States and attending circumstances there to, shall be construed in any administrative or judicial proceeding as the basis for any United States government agency, commission or department to make a finding of fact or determination of law under the Atomic Energy Act of 1954 and the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Act of 1978 in order to deny an export license application or to revoke an existing export license for nuclear exports to Taiwan.”

We did something similar in regard to arms sales. In fact, we included a general catch-all phrase which in the section on definitions said, ” The term Taiwan includes, as the context may require, the islands of Taiwan and the Pescadores, the people on those islands, corporations and other entities and associations created or organized under laws applying on those islands and the governing authorities on Taiwan recognized by the United States as the Republic of China prior to January 1, 1979 and any successor governing authority including political subdivisions, agencies and instrumentalities thereof.”

These omnibus authorities which would come into effect upon passage of the legislation and would allow the U.S. to maintain the treaties and agreements in effect between the U.S. and the ROC prior to January 1, 1979. We also added language which said that for the purposes of the Immigration and Naturalization Act, Taiwan would be considered separately from the PRC. But what our draft did not include was anything about a security commitment to Taiwan on our part nor did it spell out in law our intention to continue to sell arms and military equipment to Taiwan.

We sent to Congress our draft legislation, which we called the “Omnibus Taiwan Act” - or something innocuous like that. It was drafted essentially in the legal advisor’s office, by a committee co-chaired by Lee Marks and myself. Our draft was sent to Congress about the middle of January. In the meantime, the ROC government had been talking with its congressional friends, including Senators Stone and Goldwater (along with Terry Emerson, his staff aide), Congressman Lester Wolfe, who chaired the East Asia sub-committee of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, and others. Some of these conversations took place directly between the ROC representatives and the members of Congress, but more often it was done through intermediaries, like Ray Cline whom I mentioned earlier. Ray had also been director of INR in the Department; he had been a national intelligence officer and had been a senior CIA officer. At this time, he had his own consulting firm. I am sure that there were others as well. This group of congressmen were considering all sorts of amendments to our draft legislation. When our package landed in Congress, it was firmly denounced - Congress was still angry with the Carter administration for the way it handled “normalization” particularly the way it handled the Dole-Stone amendment. That amendment was attached to the State Department authorization bill of August, 1978. It said essentially that any alterations in the status of U.S.-ROC relations “shall be” a matter of prior consultation with the Congress. Carter ignored this entirely, even though it was in an Act of Congress, that he had signed. That was one of the reasons why Congress was particularly angry.

Congress took our draft and began to add to it. In effect, it created, by legislation action, a treaty between the U.S. and the ROC. In a very clever way, amendments were added that we should always be aware of. They defined the parameters of the three cornered relationship - the U.S., the ROC and the PRC. In the section called “Findings and Declaration of Policy,” Congress said, ” It is the policy of the United States to declare ( that) the peace and stability in the area are in the political, security and economic interests of the United States and are matters of international concern.” That phrase “international concern” is very important because the PRC had and continues to argue that whatever it does with regard to Taiwan is a matter of China’s domestic policy. Congress refuted that argument in 1979 by saying that it was an international concern.

Furthermore, the bill says: “To make clear that the United States’ decision to establish diplomatic relations with the People’s Republic of China rests on the expectations that the future of Taiwan will be determined by peaceful means. To consider that any effort to determine the future of Taiwan by other than peaceful means, including by boycotts or embargoes, a threat to the peace and security of the western Pacific area and of grave concern to the United States.” The language “threat to the space and security” is taken directly from Chapter VII of the United Nations’ Charter, and applied to the area. It provides a justification for taking action to halt aggression.

It goes on to say :”To provide Taiwan with arms of a defensive character and to maintain the capacity of the United States to resist any resort to force or other forms of coercion that would jeopardize the security or the social or the economic system of the people on Taiwan.” I have heard Kurt Campbell, the present deputy assistant secretary of defense for international security affairs, cite that portion of the Taiwan Relations Act as requiring the maintenance of the forces that we now have in the Pacific area. I had never heard that theory before from any senior official in either Defense or State. Note the use of the phrase “the people on Taiwan.” This is a phrase that was inserted in the omnibus bill by Chas Freeman. Chas took the position that if we said “the people of Taiwan” that implied that Taiwan was a state. So we should not use that phraseology. Of course we would not use the words “the people (or government) of the Republic of China;” so Chas came up with the final wording. Roger Sullivan and Dick Holbrooke approved.

This history came back in a rather amusing fashion during the hearings on the Taiwan Relations Act. Senator Stone asked Herb Hansell, the legal advisor, who was testifying on the bill, who the people on Taiwan were - ”why was that phrase used? If we are selling or leasing a destroyer to the people on Taiwan, who are we selling or leasing it to? Is it the chamber of commerce? Is it six or seven people on the street? Who are the people on Taiwan?” Hansell stumbled and hemmed and hawed and was finally forced to admit that the phrase at least included the governing authorities on Taiwan. I always thought it was a dumb phrase; it was one of the egregious interventions that really accomplished nothing, but held us up to a certain amount of ridicule. It is a prime case of an FSO employing the strategy of preemptive capitulation.

Let me talk about some of the other key aspects of the Act that were inserted by Congress. For example, “Nothing in this Act shall contravene the interests of the United States in human rights, especially with the human rights of all of the approximately 18 million inhabitants of Taiwan. The preservation and enhancement of the human rights of all the people on Taiwan are hereby reaffirmed as objectives of the United States.”

Then there is a section called “The Implementation of U.S. Policy in Regard to Taiwan”(Section III). This is particularly important and says :”In furtherance of the policy set forth in Section II of this Act, the United States will make available to Taiwan such defense articles and defense services in such quantities as may be necessary to enable Taiwan to maintain a self-defense capability.” That language was not in the Department’s draft, but was added by Congress. What Congress was concerned about was that the Carter administration and succeeding administrations would in effect negotiate with the PRC what might or might not be sold to Taiwan. In fact, the PRC has on many occasions attempted to insert itself into such negotiations. The law says :”The President and the Congress shall determine the nature and quantities of such defense articles and services based solely on their judgement of the needs of Taiwan in accordance with procedures established by law. Such determination of Taiwan’s defense needs shall include review by United States military authorities in connection with recommendations to the President and the Congress.” (That was the message to keep the PRC out of the arms sales to Taiwan). Furthermore, the Act says: “The President is directed to inform the Congress promptly of any threat to the security or the social or economic system of the people on Taiwan and any danger to the interests of the United States arising therefrom. The President and the Congress shall determine in accordance with Constitutional processes appropriate action by the United States in response to any such danger.” What is interesting here is that successive administrations have never informed the Congress of any threat to the security or the social or economic system of the people on Taiwan, not even when the Clinton administration sent two carrier task forces to the Taiwan Straits area in March, 1996 because of the direct threat to Taiwan by Chinese missile tests which had missiles landing within fifteen to twenty miles of Taiwan’s ports. The Clinton administration did not state that there was any danger to the security of Taiwan because it did not want Congress involved.

I could go on and on. The key is that the Act shows what Congress was thinking. It was writing a treaty, as I suggested earlier. It was delineating the parameters that would limit the future relationship of the U.S. to the PRC on actions that the latter might take against Taiwan. This was especially necessary at the time because Brzezinski’s view (as well as Michel Oxenberg and many others) was that Taiwan was really of secondary importance to the U.S. and its future was not really of no concern to us. In fact, the best thing that could happen, in their view, was a Taiwan acceptance of PRC terms for reunification - a rather cavalier dismissal of the fate of 18 or 19 million people. I always viewed this position as a kind of racism that we would not be concerned with the fate of these 18-19 million people at a time when the U.S. was making strong representations to the USSR with regard to human rights in its own country, its treatment of Latvia, Lithuania and Estonia, etc. The Carter administration showed great concern for the fate of Europeans and Soviets, but didn’t seem to give a damn for the orientals who lived in Taiwan. I found it offensive and essentially racist.

Q: Tell us a little about the dynamics of sending the draft legislation to Congress? I assume that there was a debate about that in the State Department. Who were the major players in Congress?

FELDMAN: The key Congressional members were: in the Senate: Alan Cranston, who was I believe the Democratic whip; Edward Kennedy another good Democrat; Claiborne Pell, later the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee; Bob Dole, the Republican minority leader; Barry Goldwater; Jake Javits, a delightful senator from New York and the ranking minority member of the Foreign Relations Committee. He was also the major player; Cranston and Javits in fact managed the legislation in the Senate. Frank Church, who chaired the Foreign Relations Committee, basically ceded to Cranston and Javits. I think the latter was the key senator in the passage of the Act.

On the House side, Clem Zablocki, the chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, was a major player as was Lester Wolff, the chairman of the Asian sub-committee, who became the floor manager for the bill. Also Dante Fascell, the next ranking Democrat on the Committee; Ed Derwinski, a Republican, played a key role. I should note that the Democrats were trying to pass a bill against the Administration, allowing the Republicans essentially to watch from the side lines.

There were some key staffers who were very active: Chris Nelson and Jim Przystup, of Wolff's staff - the latter is now professor at the National Defense University; before that he was the director of Asian studies at the Heritage Foundation and earlier a member of the Department's Policy Planning staff during the Bush administration. Nelson now writes a newsletter on Washington politics for a number of clients - particularly Japanese. Jon Holstein was also a player; he also was a member of Wolff's staff; he now works with Wolff in his consulting business. Goldwater's staffer, Terry Emerson, was also deeply involved and helpful.

Interestingly enough, the State Department nominated two people to represent it in the negotiations leading up to the passage of the legislation. One was Jim Michel, the deputy legal advisor; he later went to AID and then became our ambassador to Guatemala. I was the other Departmental representative. If Brzezinski and Oxenberg had followed our negotiations very closely, they would have yanked me out, torn the epaulets off my shoulders and broken my sword across their knees. Essentially, I was agreeing with the language that the Congress was drafting which I don't think was really what the White House wanted. Jim would usually defer to me but he did question on occasions whether certain words would really be acceptable to the Administration. I would assure him that it might be a hard sell, but that I thought it would be approved. In fact, Brzezinski and Oxenberg - and to some degree even Holbrooke - were horrified when they saw the final product, but by then it was too late.

The PRC was furious and denounced the bill as it was being written. President Carter threatened to veto the legislation, but the Congress passed it overwhelmingly - something like 350 for and 50 against in the House and 85 to 2 in the Senate. It was obvious that any veto would be overridden. On the tenth or twelfth of April 1979, the Act was signed into law.

Ever since, there has been a great tension between what the Act specifies and the three communiqués signed by three Presidents and the PRC. The first was the Shanghai communiqué of February, 1972; the second was the "recognition" communiqué of January 1, 1979; and the third was signed on August 17, 1982 by President Reagan. These documents are basically at odds with the Taiwan Relations Act. Successive administrations have maintained that their policy towards the PRC was based on the three communiqués and the Taiwan Relations Act, but this is somewhere between difficult and impossible because of the inherent contradictions in the documents.

This is most manifest when you watch the present administration - Clinton's. For example, look at the three "nos" that Clinton enunciated before a Chinese audience in Shanghai in June, 1998.

He said that U.S. policy was to support the “one China” concept; that we would not support Taiwan independence; and that we would not support Taiwan’s efforts to enter any international organization that requires statehood as a basis for membership. The White House have argued that this is just a continuation of past policy. It is right in part, but only in part. The Reagan communiqué says that the U.S. would follow the “one China” policy, not a “two China” policy - Taiwan and the PRC - and would not support Taiwan’s independence. But it doesn’t say anything about Taiwan’s membership in international organizations.

Let me read what the Taiwan Relations Act says on this issue. In Section 4 (d) Congress wrote :”Nothing in this Act may be construed as a basis for supporting the exclusion or expulsion of Taiwan from continued membership in any international financial institution or any other international organization.” At the time this was written, the ROC was a member of the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and the World Bank. It had continued this membership for all the years following its expulsion from the General Assembly, making the point that a country did not have to a GA member or indeed the UN to be a Bank or IMF member. It had continued this membership primarily because it had the support of the U.S., which in light of the weighted voting system, gave the U.S. a great percentage of the votes. I think in those years our vote equaled 20% of the total - now it is down to 17%. It was in the year following “normalization,” when we ceased supporting the ROC’s membership, that Taiwan was expelled from the international financial institutions.

The language in the Act is written in negative terms, but it has to mean that Congress considered that Taiwan was fully qualified to be a member of all international organizations. That should have been U.S. law. But the policy of the Clinton administration runs completely contrary to the law of the land. Furthermore, the Act says in many points that as far as U.S. law is concerned the governing authorities on Taiwan recognized as the ROC before January 1, 1978, shall be considered as a government of a nation. So in law the government on Taiwan is considered to be the government of a state. That raises the question on what basis can the Clinton administration follow its policy? It can because the Executive Branch does what it wants to do, but it is in direct contradiction with the Taiwan Relations Act. So we have a basic conflict between the communiqués and the Act; it has been left to each administration and each Congress to deal with these contradictions. I submit that one of the reasons why such a situation exists - i.e. the conflict between administration policy and congressional sentiment criticizing U.S. China policies as expressed in the Taiwan Relations Act and resolutions approved by lopsided margins - is because of the disconnect between the law and the communiqués. The tendencies of administrations after January 1, 1979 has been to conclude that the relationship with the PRC is so supremely important that the law has to be ignored. You can also see that theory at work in the way the administration ignores laws applying sanctions to missile sales by the PRC.

Q: What was the reaction of the ROC to the passage of the Act?

FELDMAN: Interestingly enough, it considered the Act to be totally inadequate because it did not restore an official relationship between it and the U.S. That was the initial reaction. As time went by, it grew to love the Act to the point when five-ten years ago, it began to suggest to countries that broke relations with it and established relationships with the PRC many years earlier that they adopt legislation and institutions similar to what the U.S. had done. We are now in May 1999 and last month we celebrated the twentieth anniversary of the Taiwan Relations Act with praise heaped upon it by the ROC and all commentators, including President Carter who visited Taiwan at the end of March of this year during which time he took credit for the Act - despite the fact that he had 20 years earlier threatened to veto it.

Q: What about the PRC?

FELDMAN: It still damns it as a direct contradiction of the communiqués as it describes as the sworn word of the U.S. Of course, it doesn't make any difference how many times the situation is explained to it, it doesn't quite sink in that a communiqué is a statement of administration policy, whereas the Taiwan Relations Act is the law of the land.

Q: What about implementation? What happened after the Act was passed?

FELDMAN: It has been spasmodically implemented. As I pointed out, administrations completely ignored the legal requirements of the law as it applied to the ROC's membership in international organizations.

We had after the passage of the Act final negotiations with the ROC on the establishment of the new institutions required to conduct bilateral business. Sometime in early February, we concluded these negotiations with the ROC agreeing to establish the Coordination Council for North American Affairs, but we could not proceed in establishing the AIT until the TRA was passed in mid-April. Then we could formalize the transition of an embassy to the AIT. In February, I think, our staff moved out of the embassy compound to what had been the MAAG and the CIA (called something like the Naval Auxiliary Communications Center) compounds - a symbolic gesture to show that our embassy had ceased to function. We had not made any changes in personnel by this time; after AIT was established the Department selected Chuck Cross to head it up - he had retired from the Foreign Service sometime in 1971 after he had completed his tour as ambassador to Singapore. David Dean became the head of AIT's Washington office. Finally, the staff was paid.

Q: Did the staff just continue, although in a new status? Did you and your staff just moved over to the AIT?

FELDMAN: No, we stayed in the Department. The Office of Republic of China Affairs was folded into the Office of Regional Affairs and thereby ceased to exist as a separate directorate. It was renamed some thing like the Taiwan Coordination Staff. I had argued very strongly against Chas Freeman whose proposal was to fold the ROC office into the Office of Chinese Affairs. I won that argument and therefore I and my staff became part of the Regional Affairs Office in EA. I stayed on briefly; it was made eminently clear that in the interest of smoothing relations within the Executive Branch and to give further indication of our break with Taiwan, I should move on.

Paul Kreisberg was born in New York in 1929. He received his master's degree from Columbia University in 1952. His overseas posts include Bombay, Hong Kong, Karachi, Dar es Salaam, and New Delhi. Mr. Kreisberg was interviewed by Nancy Bernkopf Tucker and Warren I. Cohen on April 8, 1989.

Q: In that case, let's go on to the period where you were in Taiwan studying language. I assume that with your interest in China, that you were an observer of what was happening around you, and you weren't just studying language. What were your impressions of Taiwan in that period? Economic conditions, political conditions, strains between the local population and the mainlanders, anything like that.

KREISBERG: Well, first was that it was a period of intense public propaganda. Everywhere that you went, there were posters and signs to support the government in Taiwan, to oppose the People's Republic of China, to "Gloriously Return to the Mainland" [Kuang Fu Ta Lu].

There was a considerable degree of tension between Taiwanese and mainlanders, very little speaking of Mandarin in the streets. And few of the people that I knew didn't speak Mandarin at all, or if they did, with a very strong Taiwanese accent.

I had been divorced just before I went there, and I was going around with a young Chinese woman at the time. Her Chinese was absolutely execrable. I mean, it was just dreadful.
[Laughter]

Q: Your contacts were mainly Taiwanese, then?

KREISBERG: Those were the people who were mainly in Taichung. The concept that the embassy had was they would put us into a place where there were not a lot of foreigners, so our Chinese would not be polluted. But they hadn't really thought about the fact that there weren't many mainlanders there either. So the main good Mandarin was being spoken at the language school.

There were military around, and we saw a fair number of them but not socially. But there wasn't any violence. We never saw any overt expression of tension between the mainlanders and Taiwanese.

It, of course, was a period of very low development in town. Very few cars. Most people rode bicycles or bicycle driven rickshaws. The outskirts of the town where the language school sat at the edge of a rice paddy, was about half a mile from the very center of town. The whole population of Taichung at that point was probably under a 100,000, and now it is a city of well over a million, an industrial and major administrative center. It is the contrast and the change over the last thirty years that is striking.

Q: Tunghai University hadn't been built yet, had it?

KREISBERG: It had just been built, and opened while I was at the language school. We were able to go out and speak to people there because there were more Mandarin speakers in Tunghai. It was, of course, very difficult to, and absolutely illegal, to listen to Radio Beijing or any of the other Chinese communist radio stations. It was illegal to have materials from China. We weren't able to look at the People's Daily. We weren't able to have FBIS there. So my knowledge of what was happening actually in China was that the language school was sharply curtailed. I picked it up only when I went up to the embassy where the people briefed us.

Q: Rankin was still there, wasn't he?

KREISBERG: Karl Rankin was the ambassador for part of the time. [Everett] Drumright, who had been my Consul General in Bombay a few years earlier, was there subsequently as Ambassador.

Q: Do you have any recollections of impressions? Did you meet with Rankin or Drumright?

KREISBERG: My relations with Drumright were not good. He was an aloof and chilly person, intensely anti-communist and anti-PRC.

I violated his instructions at one point in Bombay by allowing an American newspaperman on a Fulbright scholarship to return to the United States via Europe to keep some appointments he had made there, even though we had been instructed to amend his passport so he would have to go directly back to Washington in order to testify before the McCarran Committee. He had been suspected of spying for the Chinese Communists or the Soviets. I thought this was probably absurd but in any event he said he had a brief commitment at the University of Rome or the University of Bologna. I said I didn't see any reason why he shouldn't fulfill those commitments for a few days. Drumright and I had a big fight about that. The newspaperman was eventually cleared but the experience dramatically affected his later career.

Q: I don't know if it is really important, but do you remember the name of the journalist, by any chance? We can probably find that out.

KREISBERG: Yes, it was Amos Landman and his wife Lynn. He and his wife were wanted because they had written a book together in Shanghai in the late 1940s and were being accused of having had connections with a Soviet agent in Shanghai at the time.

Q: Yes, I have read the book, indeed.

[The book referred to is Profile of Red China (New York: Simon and Schuster, 1951).]

If I were to ask you to reflect a bit on what sort of an officer Drumright was, is that typical of the way he ran...

KREISBERG: Very rigid. He ran things absolutely by the book. Very conservative. He, of course, had been one of the staunchest opponents of the communists and strongest supporters of the KMT national government while he was in Nanking. The man became a strong policy enemy, and, I think, not a personal friend of any of the China officers who subsequently were dismissed, or cast into oblivion, by Senators McCarthy and McCarran.

Q: Did you ever have a sense, you may not have heard it at the level that you were able to penetrate, but I know that Washington was sometimes unhappy with Karl Rankin for giving too much support to the Kuomintang and forgetting which government he represented? Were there similar concerns about Drumright?

KREISBERG: I don't remember.

Q: When you went to the embassy, did you deal with other officers there? Is there anyone else that you recall that is worth mentioning?

KREISBERG: No, not really. I can't remember any of the people who were active at the embassy at that point.

My reasons for going up to Taipei, basically, were just to pick up some food -- the supplies in Taichung were much more limited than they were -- or packages or mail. I was only there for ten months. I was not there for the full two years because I had had two years of Chinese before I went to Taiwan. So I was the first graduate from the language school in the post-China language school years.

Q: Did you have any contacts at all with the American military mission in Taiwan in that period?

KREISBERG: No, not at that period.

Q: Being in Taichung, perhaps you would have had an opportunity to observe Taiwan independence movement activities, if there were any.

KREISBERG: There was nothing to be seen at that point. I mean, there was a great deal of consciousness of what had happened back in 1947, but everyone was very quiet, they had really been cowed and there was virtually no discussion of it in any language that I understood.

[Laughter]

My guess is that there probably was a certain amount in Taiwanese or Japanese. That was a period in which a fair number of people spoke Japanese. And you heard a good deal of it in the streets.

Q: Were you at all sensitive to any tensions between the Taiwanese or Chinese and Americans?

KREISBERG: Between Taiwanese and Chinese and Americans, no. No, I saw or at least felt none.

Q: Because, of course, by 1957, you had riots against the Americans, but you...

KREISBERG: That's right. At that point -- this was 1955 -- there was nothing to be seen of that sort.

Q: Not even after the withdrawal from the islands and the Strait crisis and the anger about it?

KREISBERG: No. I literally saw nothing and heard nothing about it. In retrospect, we were really quite isolated at the school!

Q: Was there any other fallout of the Taiwan Strait crisis of '54-'55 that came to your attention while you were there? Were you actually there during the latter part of it?

KREISBERG: I was there, quite frankly, because, although I had been drafted into the Army to go to Korea, my draft board thought that going to Taiwan was as brave and heroic at the time as going to Korea. And I didn't disabuse them of that. [Laughter]

Taichung really was a backwater. It was as if the politics of Taipei and international relations just skimmed right over it. I learned much more after I left Taiwan and went to Hong Kong about what had been going on then than I ever was conscious of in Taichung. It is a marvelous illustration of how one can live in a middle of a tense area and really have no awareness of it.

Q: Okay, then, why don't we move on to the period that you were political officer in Hong Kong. Perhaps we could start with a brief discussion, and then if you want to go back to explore some of these, what the major issues were that you were following while you were in Hong Kong.

KREISBERG: We, of course, were not terribly much involved in U.S.- China relations. There was virtually nothing going on at the time. The consulate was engaged in two things. One, in monitoring internal unrest in Hong Kong. Shortly after I arrived, there were major demonstrations, rioting in Kowloon directed at foreigners and at the British, and in which it was assumed that the Chinese communists had played a major role.

But the major work that I did was in evaluating Chinese internal domestic developments and change. So the principal period on which I was writing was during the period of full cooperativization of agriculture, the 100 Flowers Movement and the anti-rightists crackdown after that, and then the beginning of the commune movement and the Great Leap Forward of '59 and '60.

Q: Can I go back and pickup just a question that occurred to me when you talked about the internal situation in the colony of Hong Kong? The riots that you observed and then subsequent efforts towards the end of the '50s and early '60s when the Chinese allowed large numbers of refugees to cross the border...

KREISBERG: Right.

Q: Because of their food shortages. These seemed to Americans as efforts by the communists to destabilize Hong Kong. And yet the Chinese never took Hong Kong back. Do you have any sense of why they would have been encouraging this kind of activity?

KREISBERG: It was a period, of course, in which the United States was very hostile to China. The interpretation that the British encouraged, and that we accepted at the time, was that China wanted to make life as uncomfortable for the British as possible in the hope that this would increase the willingness of the British to negotiate an early withdrawal from Hong Kong. Now whether there were ever any direct feelers to the British on this or not, I don't know.

If you haven't interviewed Harvey Feldman, you might want to do that, because Harvey was much more involved and directly responsible for the internal Hong Kong scene than I was.

Q: As long as you mentioned Harvey Feldman, who else was there at the consulate at that period, and what other sorts of things might they have been doing at the time? What were their responsibilities?

KREISBERG: Well, the head of the political section was Harald Jacobson. His predecessor was LaRue (Larry) Lutkins. Larry was there just briefly after I arrived. He lives in Fairfax.

Robert Yoder, who lives up in Vermont, was there at the time. Thomas Ainsworth, who is retired from the Service and lives here in the Washington area, was there. Let's see. Drumright was also the consul general in Hong Kong. Drumright and I kept following one another around.

Q: Whiting wasn't there, was he?

KREISBERG: Alan Whiting was there much later. He was there six or seven years after that in the mid-1960s.

Edwin Fried, who was at Brookings, was the head of the economic section. Lindsey Grant was there; he was my predecessor as the Director of Chinese Affairs. But those were the key people who were there.

Q: Do you have any idea where Grant is these days?

KREISBERG: Grant lives in Bethesda.

Q: Was the entire attention of the consulate really focused at internal affairs on the mainland?

KREISBERG: [Kreisberg shook his head negatively.] No, the consular section was extremely busy with visa applicants and there were moderately active commercial and USIS sections. But the bulk of the work of the political, economic, attaché offices and of the CIA station was on the mainland.

Q: How did you get information? What were your primary sources?

KREISBERG: Well, there were four. One was the China mainland press and the Soviet-China mainland magazines, which we were responsible for. I was in charge of that activity for a year and of buying that kind of publication, and of maps and telephone books. The second was, most of which could not legally be exported from China, the FBIS, which, of course, was the broadcast system. The third were the British interrogations of refugees and other people who came across, which were made available to us. And the fourth were miscellaneous "walk-ins", people who themselves had either got into China to do business and then came out and talked to us, or who came in to try to sell us something, and at the same time, were telling us things that were going on. Those were the four key ways. And, of course, more covert intelligence information.

Q: Did you have your own refugees? Did you have a program for interviewing them yourselves?

KREISBERG: The refugees all came to the British. The only people who came to us were incidental "walk-ins". Sometimes the people were then passed on to the CIA and were then rehired but I almost never saw them then.

Q: I was thinking of a later time when Dick Solomon and Mike Oksenberg were going in and talking to refugees. You didn't have anybody who was going in to do that?

KREISBERG: There was little of that going on at this time.

Q: How extensive was the cooperation with the British?

KREISBERG: Very, very close.

Q: And that would be both at overt and covert levels?

KREISBERG: Yes.

Q: Were their assessments of what was happening inside of China very different from American views, since their policy towards China was fairly different?

KREISBERG: No, I don't think so. I think that the general assessment of the community tended to come together around a fairly common center. There, of course, were a lot of other people who were following China. Father Ladany was turning out his China News Analysis at that time.

The university, whatever it is called...

Q: Research Center.

KREISBERG: Well, I'm not sure it was called that at the time. It kept changing its name. It was relatively small.

Q: Field Services.

KREISBERG: Something like that. And they were following it. But there was a fairly common center of interpretation of what was going on, certainly in the period from, I would say, '56 to '59. There began to be some divergence after '59 over what had been responsible for the turn to the Left and the crackdown by Deng Xiaoping and Mao on the rightists and then the movement toward the Great Leap Forward.

There was a lot of uncertainty as to what one could believe about the Great Leap Forward. At that time, the viewpoints really began to diverge quite widely. It centered around what people's own personal ideologies were in part. That, I think, continued for much of the early part of the 1960s.

Q: Did the British themselves ever give you a sense that they were trying to convince you that their approach to China was a better one? Was there any discussion of the difference of American and British policy?

KREISBERG: I never got a sense that there was a strong difference when I talked to people in the intelligence side of the British community in Hong Kong. But I admit I saw relatively little of the senior British political levels -- the Political Advisor, the Chief Secretary, or the Governor. That was left to the Consul General, or the head of the Political Section. But I saw nothing in our reporting that suggested serious differences.

Q: You arrived in Hong Kong after the event, but was there any continuing impact of the Bandung Conference and China's effort to reach out to other Asian nations? Did that have an impact in Hong Kong?

KREISBERG: I didn't sense it. It wasn't the area that I was working on. I mean, we were all following Chinese foreign policy. But what you really have to remember is that we in Hong Kong knew what was going on in Chinese foreign policy from our reading of what the Chinese were telling the rest of the world. So none of us had any sense of confidence as to the accuracy of our interpretation of Chinese foreign policy. It was obviously what the Chinese wanted us to know. There were other places where people had better information on Chinese foreign policies, or thought they had.

Q: Where?

KREISBERG: Well, I think in different embassies -- Delhi, Paris.

Q: From local contacts?

KREISBERG: Yes. Hong Kong was really far away from Beijing. It wasn't really used by China as its center for international foreign policy activities.

Q: Did you have any contacts in Hong Kong with people known to be from the mainland who were attempting in any way to...

KREISBERG: No. We were instructed to stay far from them, and they were instructed to stay far from us. One of the "great moments" in U.S.-Chinese diplomatic relations was when permission was given -- I think this was in the mid-1960s -- for someone from the consulate to meet with Fei Xiaotong, the Publisher of the Communist-controlled Ta Kung Pao newspaper in Hong Kong. The degree of isolation that was imposed was almost complete. We knew no one and were supposed to know no one from the Bank of China or from New China News Agency. It was a period of great ideological intensity. Not as great as between 1950 and 1955, but the instructions were still, "You will not have contact with, discuss, shake hands with anybody from the People's Republic of China."

Q: You know, Alan Whiting has said -- I interviewed him -- and he mentioned that it could be perilous to your career within the State Department if you could be heard speaking of Peking or Beijing rather than calling it Peiping. So that same sort of sense was true in the field?

KREISBERG: Yes, if you used it in written reports. My recollection is that in the office we often used "Beijing" simply because so much of the material we worked on used that form.

Q: A related question since you were monitoring radio and articles closely. One of the things that we have come across is a question over whether there were efforts by Zhou En-lai and the government to devise a peaceful solution to the Taiwan problem along the lines of "one China, but not now," in the late-1950s. There is a speech that Chen Yi makes that Rod MacFarquhar has in his book that indicates some interest in following that sort of a line. Did you come across that? [Sino-American Relations, 1949-1971 (Newton Abbot, England: David & Charles, 1972)]

KREISBERG: I don't recall that now, Nancy. I mean, the one speech that Chen Yi made that -- and it is conceivable that it was the same one -- but I remember a different part of it which struck me. I thought it was about 1960 or '61, which would be a little after this. It was when Chen Yi, in effect, had adumbrated the coastal development strategy and gave a speech in which he spoke of Shanghai as a prospective international center for trade and commerce, which would be opened up in ways that would be broader and more favorable than other parts of the country. It was a one-time speech he made. It was never repeated. Obviously, it was Zhao Ziyang before his time. I don't remember the Zhou En-lai speech, no.

Q: Since your main focus was domestic affairs, I wasn't intending really to ask about that. But did you have a sense that, in watching these major developments going on in China, was there a feeling that the Chinese government was going to be so destabilized that there might indeed be a change or that anything of that magnitude was going to happen?

KREISBERG: Never. Nor from any interviews that we ever got.

Q: So there was a conviction then, amongst the officers, that China was going to be a continuing presence and that you would have to go on dealing with China?

KREISBERG: Absolutely. A broad consensus, I think, among most of the professionals that the sooner the United States began dealing with China, the better. The question was always how we were going to be able to create a strategy that would enable us to achieve this. But with Walter Robertson as the Assistant Secretary of State, it was a subject that one could not possibly put in writing.

Q: So discussions on the subject were going on in Hong Kong?

KREISBERG: Yes, no question about it. We were aware -- although some of us were aware later than others -- of what had been happening in Geneva with Alex Johnson [U. Alexis Johnson, U.S. Coordinator for the Conference and Ambassador to Czechoslovakia 1953-1957] specifically proposing normalization to John Foster Dulles in his bathroom. A great bathroom story.

Q: Would you elucidate us on that?

KREISBERG: At one point during the Geneva talks when -- what was it, '54-'55 -- Dulles was in his bathroom taking a bath, and Alex Johnson came in to describe the conversation he had been having with, I guess it must have been, Wang Bingnan at the time. He essentially said that the Chinese were willing to strike a deal on normalization, which would involve release of prisoners and meeting of virtually all the conditions that we had set. He recommended to Dulles that we accept it and begin the negotiations on that. And Dulles categorically and said, "No, we will not do it."

Q: Was there any understanding at that point on what would happen with Taiwan?

KREISBERG: You probably ought to go and talk to Alex Johnson because I don't think Alex put this story in his book.

Q: No.

KREISBERG: That was an issue that was simply going to be resolved. How had not been set. It would have meant that we would have broken our relations with Taiwan, or that we would have some other kind of association with Taiwan. Conceivably where we are now except twenty years earlier.

Q: When did this occur?

KREISBERG: Well, it was obviously when Dulles was in Geneva, so it must have been '55. I love the image of Dulles lying in his bathtub while Ambassador Johnson is sitting on the toilet. It was obviously one of these large Swiss bathrooms.

Q: As far as you know, did Dulles give any reasons for not willing to explore it?

KREISBERG: No. One could reconstruct what all of his reasons would have been. Having refused to shake Zhou En-lai's hand, it is not surprising that he would not be interested in normalization.

Q: One of the things I was going to ask in a moment, so I will do so now and came back to some other things, but as sort of a summation of your '56 to '59 service. Some recent work that is being done by scholars in the U.S. and indeed some scholars in China as well beginning to look at this, too, and some of my own works indicates that Dulles was not quite as inflexible as, at least the historians, have portrayed him until now.

He entertained a considerable degree of distrust and dislike for Chiang Kai-shek and found the association with the Nationalist Chinese uncomfortable. He was willing to be a bit more flexible on Communist China. That he did, indeed, explore possible ways of getting China into the United Nations without having to throw Taiwan out. That he was moving towards what we would call a two-China policy.

KREISBERG: That is interesting. I never heard that. Miss Ruth Bacon, who, of course, was for years the eminence grise in the Bureau of Far Eastern Affairs for keeping PRC out of the U.N., never gave me any hint that she had ever been asked to consider alternative contingencies. This was a subject that she and Louise McNutt -- have you interviewed Louise -- felt they had categorical assurances of support on from Dulles and Dean Rusk.

Q: I haven't interviewed her. I know her.

KREISBERG: Louise is the great residual memory on everything having to do with U.N. policy toward China. Ruth Bacon, I think, either has died or at least retired out of Washington. But your comment is new to me; that is interesting. When was that? When would that have been?

Q: Well, it is sort of an ongoing process, particularly the most notable occasion I can think of right now is just before -- was it Senator George -- he retired as Chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and just prior to that. So it should have been '56. Dulles talked with him about the possibility of his introducing the subject in the Senate and working at it.

KREISBERG: That is fascinating.

Q (TUCKER): Then George decides not to run again, retires, and Dulles doesn't pursue it.

Q: And we found some collaboration of that, because Rusk told me that Dulles approached him to go to the Democratic leadership and see if they would join him in a bipartisan effort.

KREISBERG: And was Rusk supportive of that?

Q: Apparently; he discussed it with the White House.

KREISBERG: That is funny.

Q: It fell through because George was challenged in the primary by Talmadge and withdrew and just dropped out of it altogether.

KREISBERG: Totally inconsistent with Rusk's great comment to one of the senior officers in the secretariat of the Department back in 1967 -- '66 or '67 that there are some young officers in the Department of State who are trying to persuade us to change our China policy, and we are not going to do it.

Q: Yes. We actually want to come back to talk about Rusk, but a little later.

Before we go on, what does happen around 1957 is a breakdown in America's efforts to isolate China on trade policies. There is some indication, now that we have gotten into the records, that Eisenhower actually was in favor of dropping the embargo entirely. Dulles was less inclined in that direction, though persuaded that in certain cases, trade might, in fact, be a good idea. Did this have much impact in Hong Kong?

KREISBERG: It doesn't ring a bell in my head. This is the kind of thing that Ed Fried is probably worth talking to about. My guess is that policy musings of that sort, and at that level, never got to anyone in the field, or even very far down into the Washington bureaucracy, anymore than it does now.

Q: One other sort of related question to Bandung which you mentioned not having thought of very much. But one thing that does become a bit of an issue in Hong Kong itself is there was an alleged effort to assassinate Zhou En-lai as he flew to the Bandung conference. There is some indication that the Kuomintang was involved with that and that the CIA may have been involved.

KREISBERG: I remember the incident and discussion of it. But I do not remember ever having seen any intelligence information that shed any light on what actually happened in that incident. I never talked to any of the British intelligence people about it.

Q: We saw some British intelligence records last summer. It seems quite clear that it all happened, and that all these different people were involved. But then we haven't been able to make the next step on that.

What did you know about covert operations against the mainland? To the degree that you can talk about it.

KREISBERG: Before I joined the Foreign Service, I was interviewed for the Central Intelligence Agency. One of the many reasons I didn't join was they tested me on my loyalty and my commitment by asking whether I would be willing to be dropped by parachute into Sichuan. My target would be to organize a group of anti-communist Kuomintang soldiers who remained up in the hills in Sichuan and work with them in a number of operations and then exfiltrate myself, if necessary, out through Burma. They looked at me, and they said, "Would you be willing to do that?"

And I said, "No." And that was the end of my interview. [Laughter]

Q: If you said yes, you might have had to do it.

KREISBERG: Right! The plausibility of it was that this was about a year before [Richard] Fecteau and [John] Downey had a parallel experience, but at the other end of China.

I don't know anything about the details of what CIA was doing. But there was a very active program involving infiltrating people into China with specific targets -- largely military, not surprisingly, at that point.

Q: Sabotage might have been...

KREISBERG: No, I don't think there was sabotage. I think it was largely intelligence. What do the Chinese have? Where do they have it? Is there any indication they are working on nuclear -- even at that point, obviously, this was a constant source of concern -- nuclear weapons? Where troops are being based. It was a standard semi-war kind of intelligence operation that we engaged in.

Q: Run out of Taiwan, I assume?

KREISBERG: Some things were run out of Taiwan. Some of those, obviously, gave us the documents. There was a lot that was run out of Hong Kong. Hong Kong was a very big station at the time. The person who you might want to talk to about that is Peter Sichel and Claire George.

Claire George lives here in Washington and was, until about six months ago, the Deputy Director for Operations at CIA. But at the time, he was a junior officer in Hong Kong.

Peter Sichel was the head of station, and he is now in the wine business in New York.

Q: You mentioned documents. Could you explain what those documents are?

KREISBERG: The Lienchang documents?

Q (TUCKER): Yes.

Q: The ones John Lewis...

KREISBERG: Yes, John Wilson Lewis. The materials that were picked up as a result of a Chinese Nationalist operation into Fujian against the county seat of Lien-chang county. This produced what at the time, and perhaps even still, was one of the most useful collections of documents on Chinese policy. It enabled people to have a sense of the difference between implementation at grassroots and policy directives at the center. It focused on the enormous gap between what the government wanted to do, and what was actually being done.

Q: Who were the operatives that were being put in? You mentioned that they asked you whether you wanted to go in and train a group covertly. I would assume in information gathering, that it was difficult to drop an American in who wouldn't be spotted quickly.

KREISBERG: I have no idea whether they did much of that. This was during the Korean War. My impression is that certainly after Downey and Fecteau, they were extremely cautious about having any Americans directly involved.

Q: You can find some stuff in the Koo papers on who the Americans are [Ambassador V.K. Wellington Koo Papers, Columbia University]. Not that were going in, but that were going over to Taiwan and preparing groups to go over.

Q (TUCKER): Do you know anything about the operations that were going on? You mentioned that they would have pulled you out through Burma. Anything about the operations that were going on with the Kuomintang irregulars in Burma at the time?

KREISBERG: No.

Q: Anything about a company called Sea Supply that was dropping...

KREISBERG: No, I don't know. You have now exhausted my operational knowledge.
[Laughter]

Q: Did you know Ray Cline in that period?

KREISBERG: Yes. I have known Ray Cline for, oh, 35 years. Ray was in Taipei while I was studying Chinese. On one of his many tours in Taiwan.

Q: Why was he so successful at what he did?

KREISBERG: Gosh, I don't know. I mean, he obviously has a very reassuring personality and is very low-key. I assume that he was, in classical operational terms, an effective person on the ground. His career, of course, was primarily as an analyst. What always struck me as being curious about Ray is that he didn't know Chinese. But he was nevertheless...

Q: He didn't know any Chinese?

KREISBERG: No.

Q: I didn't realize that. I thought he had established a fairly close relationship with Chiang Ching-kuo.

KREISBERG: Always through interpreters.

Q: Interesting.

KREISBERG: Pat Wen probably was a key interpreter when he was over there. Although Pat mainly worked, I think, with the Generalissimo.

Q: I got set up with something Jim Ireland introduced me to when I worked there. Trying to set up something where I would write a biography of Ching-Kuo, and Pat was the go-between on that. This would have been about '65 or '66.

KREISBERG: Harvey Feldman was, I believe, considering writing a biography of Chiang Kai-shek. They agreed to open up all the Kuomintang archives to it. But he has not committed himself to do it. What is worth knowing is that the KMT is prepared to open up those archives to the right person.

Q: Interesting. Before we go on, one last area of concern, a major one, is the Quemoy and Matsu crisis of 1958. I imagine that even though you were focusing on internal issues, this was something that you also paid some attention to at the time.

KREISBERG: Yes. But, you see, what we were doing is, essentially, reporting on, analyzing, and picking up through intelligence and interviews information on the Chinese intentions during the Quemoy- Matsu crisis. The operational side of it was, obviously, out of Taipei since that was there the main policy was being developed. We were not, to my knowledge, doing anything on this other than informing them of what our judgments were of Chinese policy. Our judgments were, as I recall it, that they, in fact, did not intend to seize the island. That the effort was to try to frighten the KMT off the island and was to test...

Q: We are just talking about perceptions of PRC and tensions in the Quemoy and Matsu crisis. You were saying that the Chinese were not planning to take it violently, but were hoping to scare...

KREISBERG: That was our judgment.

Q: ...Chiang Kai-shek away. There are some very recent indications, some research by a young scholar named He Di...

Q: He is He Kang's son, so he has got access to the actual participants.

KREISBERG: He Kang is the guy who has taken...

Q: The Minister of Agriculture.

KREISBERG: The Minister of Agriculture. What is the He who has taken Huangxiang's place?

Q: I don't remember offhand.

KREISBERG: It is another He.

Q: Yes. This young man is with the Institute of American Studies at CASS [Chinese Academy of Social Sciences], and he has done some research on this period which suggests that the Chinese did not want the islands and wouldn't have wanted Chiang Kai-shek to evacuate.

KREISBERG: That was our judgment at the time. Politically, if there had been a severance of the offshore islands from Taiwan, it would probably have intensified the probability of a political separation of Taiwan from the mainland. What the islands represented was the link of China with Taiwan. So it was a question of intimidation.

Then the question is what Beijing would have done had the KMT actually decided to pull out. We could never quite figure out where that was going to take them. And, of course, it was never clear to us precisely why they were running this risk. There is some evidence, as I recall it -- which came out later, but I don't think we thought it at the time -- there were differences inside the party over this whole exercise between the Minister of Defense...

Q: Who was Minister of Defense? Peng Dehuai?

KREISBERG: Peng Dehuai, yes. Between Peng Dehuai and Lin Biao and Mao at the time.

Q: And Zhang Aiping had some ideas about what should be done. Were there concerns about any Soviet involvement at the time?

KREISBERG: Well, subsequently, obviously, it became clear that that was one of the key issues, whether the Soviets were going to support China. All that we were able to see was what the Soviets were actually saying. And our interpretation from what the Soviets were saying was that their support was very lukewarm. That, obviously, was the key issue. And, subsequently, I gather, this was one of the key concerns for Mao in his ultimate break with the Soviets. But we knew nothing more than what we were reading in the press at that time.

Q: One of the interesting questions that I've pursued with a number of different people was at what point the Sino-Soviet split and the growth of serious tensions in the relationship begins to be a serious consideration in the minds of American analysts of China. Was the evidence that you saw in relationship to this crisis something that made you start thinking about...

KREISBERG: Well, we began thinking about the serious problems in Sino-Soviet relations back in 1956. There had been a widespread assumption that Sino-Soviet relations were strained as early as 1952 coming out of the Gao (Gang)-Rao (Shushi) case, in which it was widely assumed there was Soviet involvement. Before that, although I wasn't there, I had been told by people that there was an assumption among professionals, but not at a high political level in the U.S. Government, that something had gone wrong between Mao and Stalin in the long Mao stay in Moscow, without publicity, and almost by himself, in 1950-1951.

Certainly the way in which the Chinese handled the disturbances in eastern Europe in 1956. The very fact that Zhou En-lai was involved. Who else? It was Zhou. Who else went off to Eastern Europe at that time? Was it Deng Xiaoping? No.

Q: No, I don't think so. I'm not sure.

KREISBERG: It wasn't Deng. There was another Chinese who had gone off to eastern Europe besides Zhou. But the degree of involvement by the Chinese in the eastern European crisis suggested to us that there was likely to be considerable tension between the Chinese and the Soviets over that issue even though Zhou was supporting the Soviet Union in its effort to regain control, both in Hungary and in Poland.

So the issue of Sino-Soviet relations being strained, I think, was one that we were watching with great care throughout the latter part of the 1950s.

Q: How far did you expect those strains to go? Did you really expect a rupture?

KREISBERG: I don't think any of us expected it to go to the point of Soviet withdrawal, which it did in 19...

Q: '60.

KREISBERG: '60. And then, of course, when the ideological war began in the pages of Pravda and the People's Daily, then it was clear that the relationship was almost out of control. And the astonishing thing was, in spite of all that, that for several years, there continued to be a great reluctance inside the U.S. Government to acknowledge that there was a Sino-Soviet split. There was a widespread view that it was all a fake. It was a fraud being perpetrated for western consumption, an argument that drove the professionals out of their minds.

Q: You mentioned earlier the problems with having Walter Robertson at the helm. Was he one of those who shared that sense that it was all a fraud?

KREISBERG: Yes.

Q: Was he hostile to reporting of the kind that would suggest this was real?

KREISBERG: He just shrugged his shoulders and said, "These guys just don't understand." There is an ideological affinity. They are arguing, but that doesn't change the fact that there is a Sino-Soviet conspiracy, which then went on well into the Vietnam years with Dean Rusk being convinced as late as 1963 or '64 that what was going on in Vietnam was simply part of the Sino-Soviet expansion of communist power.

Q: What about Walter McConaughy? Does he share Robertson's...

KREISBERG: Yes. There was this cable of Drumright, McConaughy, Rankin, Robertson and Rusk. There were the five of them who really dominated American policy toward Asia between 1950 and 1968. It was only after that group passed from the scene, that it became possible even to begin talking about a change in policy.

Q: Did you, sitting in Hong Kong, have any sense that there was a real danger of a larger war with China in 1958?

KREISBERG: No. None of us saw any possibility of a larger war.

Q: Did you take serious...

KREISBERG: I have read the studies that have been done by Mort Halperin, and [Mort] Abramowitz and a lot of other work that has been done. I don't think any of us sitting in Hong Kong saw war as being on the horizon. In fact, it may well have been closer than any of us thought it was. But at the time, we didn't see it.

Q: We just finished off with the Hong Kong years, and we wanted to talk a bit about the coming of the Kennedy Administration. We were interested in whether you saw any real shift in American policy with the incoming administration, perhaps even after Dulles' death at the very end of the Eisenhower period.

There is a debate in the field between a practitioner and a scholar. Jim Thompson essentially blames Dean Rusk for the lack of progress in Chinese policy. That is something that you alluded to in the earlier interview. Whereas Warren, in the writing that he has done on Rusk as Rusk's biographer [Warren I. Cohen. Dean Rusk (New York: Cooper Square, 1980)], points the finger elsewhere and says that really the blame for the lack of progress belongs with John Kennedy. What would be your sense of that?

KREISBERG: I have no sense of Kennedy. What I said about Rusk was what I remembered about Rusk. Rusk was sufficiently closed mouthed, and I was sufficiently junior that I don't have any recollection of Rusk ever giving any hint that he would have liked to have gone further than Kennedy would let him. My most active conversations and dealings with Rusk on this issue were after Kennedy had died.

Q: When you were director?

KREISBERG: Right. So in that period from '61 to '63, I don't have any sense of this whatsoever. There is theory, which some people have described as fact in some of the Kennedy biographies that you know better than I, that Kennedy was going to move on China after 1964. I had never seen anything to support that other than the allegation by biographers. My recollection is that nobody has ever come up with a letter or memorandum or anything in writing from either of the Kennedys.

Q: No, I have been looking, actually, assiduously for that.

KREISBERG: I bet you have. I would have thought that if there was something in writing, somebody would have found it.

Q: Again, maybe you were too junior at the time and not directly involved, but do you have any recollection -- there was, apparently, in 1961, a secret promise by John Kennedy to Chiang Kai-shek that if the issue of Chinese representation became a serious one at the United Nations, that the United States would use its veto power to keep the People's Republic out of the U.N. Do you know anything about that?

KREISBERG: I don't. I remember having heard that, but I don't have any recollection of where it appeared. The person who would know the answer to that is Ruth Bacon. I assume you have asked her.

Q: That is something for the future.

KREISBERG: Ruth Bacon or Louise McNutt. They were the keepers of that kind of information.

Q: So you wouldn't know any of the background on why that promise would have been made?

KREISBERG: I would not have been surprised by it. I mean, it was totally consistent with everything else we were doing.

Q: Who, in your recollection, were the key figures in China policy making at the time in the Department that you were dealing with?

KREISBERG: We are talking about the INR years?

Q: Yes, the INR years.

KREISBERG: You really have to remember that I was still really a junior officer. I had been in the Foreign Service for eight years. I was just a drone down in INR writing papers essentially on internal Chinese politics. I dealt with Oscar Armstrong, who was the head of the office at that time, and rarely with the people on the desk.

Q: Really? Because when I was in the Department...

KREISBERG: We were in a different building. We were in the old INR offices on 23rd Street -- a building which was subsequently torn down -- where the WHO building is.

Q: So there wasn't much cooperation between INR and the desk?

KREISBERG: Such interchange as there was was at the Lutkins-Joe Yager level. Again, you might ask Joe Yager or Armstrong.

Q: What sort of an officer was Armstrong? What was he like to work with?

KREISBERG: He is a very capable guy, very cautious, very careful, meticulous. I never had a strong sense of what his policy preferences were. There is a whole generation of Foreign Service officers who had gone through that terrible period at the beginning of the 1950s who were more cautious than young officers in voicing their views on policy.

Q: One of the things that occurred to me as I was reading some of the memos that we'll talk about in a little while was the position of [W. Averell] Harriman vis à vis the Laos negotiations in Geneva. There were suggestions in some interviewing that we did in China in 1988 that Harriman was a good guy coming out of those negotiations, and that the Chinese had really appreciated his position. Did you have any sense of that?

KREISBERG: No, I have none.

Q: One final thing perhaps then. There was an article written about a year ago in the Journal of American History by a young Chinese-American scholar in which he talks about John Kennedy's preoccupation with the development of the Chinese atomic capability. He suggests that Kennedy and his people were so concerned about that that they actually considered a joint military expedition with the Soviets to prevent its development. [Gordon Chang "JFK, China, and the Bomb," Journal of American History, 75 (March, 1988)].

KREISBERG: Well, the expression on my face tells you that I had never heard that before.

Q: Were you doing studies of the Chinese development of the bomb?

KREISBERG: We never did anything on it in that period from '61 to '63. It was done elsewhere, in CIA's office of National Estimates where, I seem to recall, the expectation in the early 1960s was that China was 5-10 years away from a nuclear test.

Q: A final question on this period. In this packet of documents that you have shown us, there is a memo in March of 1970 from you to Winfred Brown, which is one of the most interesting, which talks at some length about the negotiations on Laos and the series of stages through which all of this had gone. It gives the distinct impression of considerable Chinese cooperativeness on the subject. We were wondering, in light of that, was there ever any attempt to capitalize on that? Were there questions asked of you to see how this could be...

KREISBERG: No. The issue was never raised.

Q: When did you find out about those Wang Bingnan informal coffee chats? I assume not when you were in INR. That was something you heard about later?

KREISBERG: My guess is -- and I really don't remember, Warren- -that they appeared in files.

Q: That you went through afterwards.

KREISBERG: Yes, which we went through. One of the things that we did in the late 1960s in OSA and which is available somewhere -- and I have not asked for it -- is a comprehensive history and review of all the conversations with the Chinese in Geneva and Warsaw, which we worked our way through, both by subject and by time. We had those in two large binders that we used as our basic reference books.

Q: Do you remember when those were pulled together?

KREISBERG: They were pulled together in '68 or '69. I think '69. Then we kept them up to date until the Warsaw talks closed down in '71. Now they may have been kept up after that, but I suspect not. Those would be useful to have, I would have thought.

Q: Yes. I doubt though that they would give them to you on the grounds that this was foreign government material.

KREISBERG: That may be.

Q: After your INR period, you go off to the University of Pennsylvania, and you are studying about Pakistan from 1963 to '64, and you are posted to Pakistan itself.

KREISBERG: I was in INR while the Sino-India War was going on, and a constant series of meetings and discussions and arguments with Rhea Blue, Alan Whiting, and Oscar Armstrong about the whole Sino-Indian border issue.

Q: On those discussions in those meetings, what were the key points of contention?

KREISBERG: Well, the basic issues were, first, who had started it, who was responsible for precipitating the crisis? What we should say to the Chinese about it in Warsaw, what involvement we should have in the conflict? Was it an area where we should become involved? How dangerous was it? And what were the Chinese objectives and motives?

Basically, the INR position through that whole time -- which, as I recall it, all of us who were involved shared -- was that it was unlikely that the Chinese were (A) going to thrust down into the plains of India; (B) try to hold on to most of the territory that they seized in the eastern sector or even a number of the areas in the western sector; and (C) as a result, that we should limit whatever engagement we -- some of the people in the Department, including Rusk and, I think, Kennedy -- were pushing for.

We, of course, ended up, in the Harriman mission, in proposing that we provide some substantial assistance to the Indians. But I don't think that anyone at the professional level in the State Department ever believed, ultimately, that the Chinese saw this as a major way of extending ultimate control down into India, which was the line the Indians were trying to push.

Q: Was there very much conflict between, let's say, the China desk and the India desk over what all of this meant? Did the India desk feel the threat was more serious than the China people?

KREISBERG: The India people saw it more seriously. They saw it as a political opportunity to strengthen ties with the Indians. It was complicated by the Taiwan Strait crisis of '62 as well. So there was a question as to whether we were seeing a variety of Chinese moves to push outward. My recollection is that INR did not think that's what we were seeing.

Q: So this is a more isolated conflict?

KREISBERG: That's right. Each one of these as having their own causes. There, obviously, was also, I think, the beginning at that time of some question as to whether -- particularly as the Soviets backed off from supporting the Chinese -- there might be a possibility of moving the Chinese and the Soviets further apart from one other. But my recollection is that that was not a big theme. It was not pursued in any major way.

Q: Did the White House push very hard? You mentioned that you thought Kennedy and Rusk both saw this the same way. Did the White House push this?

KREISBERG: They saw this as more threatening. Rusk's view consistently was that the Chinese were expansionists. I have a less clear picture of what the NSC staff saw. My guess is that Jim Thompson, who handled Asia for McGeorge Bundy at that time, would not have seen it in that way. But Rusk saw every Chinese move as part of a broad conceptual Chinese expansionism.

Q: Could you reflect for a moment on the 1962 Straits crisis? How seriously was that taken? Was it seen, again, as a momentous thing that the United States had to respond to?

KREISBERG: Well, it wasn't seen as serious as the 1958 situation was. It was much shorter in duration. At this point, honestly, I do not recall personally aside from the sense that there was a Rusk view that we needed to swiftly exhibit our strength and show our support for Taiwan. There were, inevitably, conversations in Taipei about the opportunity that this might pose, particularly given the economic distress in China in '60, '61, and early '62. But I don't recall that it was an issue on which a great deal of concern was exhibited.

Q: I gather that the Warsaw talks were used to alleviate the crisis. Do you know anything about...

KREISBERG: I really should remember that, and I don't. That's one of the things that I remember is in those files that I remember having looked at at the time. Fortunately, when you are doing history, you are looking at things more intensively in the past than when you are doing current policy. In State, you are looking at what's around you at the moment. So I just, honestly, don't remember that other than my recollection is going back and looking at all of those files is conviction that the Chinese never really were fully committed, at any point, to taking the offshore islands. Indeed, they saw the disadvantage of taking the offshore islands in terms of severing the link between Taiwan and the mainland.

Q: But your major focus wasn't Taiwan, so perhaps you don't have a sense of this.

KREISBERG: It was all done in the same office, but I wasn't working on Taiwan.

Q: Yes. My impression of the crisis in '61-'62 is that Taiwan had a large role in initiating that whole process. Does that, in any way, worsen relations between Washington and Taipei?

KREISBERG: Not that I recall. Nothing could worsen negotiations with Taiwan in those periods.

Q: [Laughter] Because it was too important, or because it was so bad already?

KREISBERG: No, they were good. There just wasn't anybody who wanted to see the relationship get worse. It was a very protected relationship.

Q: Do you have a sense of people's opinion of Chiang Kai-shek and the government? Was it a question of overlooking problems, because it was so important? Or the people just didn't see...

KREISBERG: My sense was that there was a great sense of disinterest in what was happening on Taiwan except in terms of stability. The only interest we had was stability.

Q: When you go off to Pakistan, is your focus there on Chinese-Pakistani relations, or are you concentrating on Pakistan?

KREISBERG: I'm across the board.

Q: Can you say anything about the development of Chinese-Pakistan relations in that era?

KREISBERG: Pakistan is a very bad personal period in my life. It was just not a period that I have a deep, abiding affection or memory for. So scratch Pakistan.

Q: Can you talk about the creation of the Office of Asian Communist Affairs? From what you said last time, one of the main reasons for that decision was unhappiness on Taiwan's part about having a PRC desk. Were there any problems created by the separation of the ROC from the mainland in terms of the bureaucratic handling of these issues?

KREISBERG: Yes. The consequence of abolishing the China desk, which covered everything, was to turn the focus of policy attention much more on the People's Republic of China in terms of a gradual move toward normalization. That was not the reason it was done. There was a question, of course, of dealing with North Vietnam and North Korea at that time. The concept was that there ought to be an office that dealt with all the communist countries. In a way, it was a backward, more conservative way of looking at it. "These commies ought to be dealt with separately than good countries like China. So we will deal with the China desk, which will be our friends, and then we will have this other desk over here, which are the enemies."

But the consequence, obviously, was that once you set up an Asian Communist Affairs Office, there then became, if you will, a lobby that was primarily interested in that area and not just in dealing with it as an enemy, but expanding and broadening and increasing the levels of contacts with it. A few things began happening as a result of that.

Lindsey Grant in the Asian Communist Affairs Office argued very strongly on the dangers of the escalation of the war after '63. Essentially, North Vietnam was taken away, in a de facto sense, from Asian Communist Affairs by the end of '64.

Lindsey Grant was moved out of the Office of Asian Communist Affairs, because of a blowup that he had had with Bill Bundy. He kept sending memos up saying, "You know, what you are doing is wrong. It is going to lead to disastrous consequences. We are not going to be able to control the escalation. This isn't a Chinese-Vietnamese-Soviet move to expand power. The dominoes theory doesn't work." The subsequent analysis of the Vietnam War, I think, was anticipated by a number of these memos that Grant had written.

Eventually, Bill Bundy said, "You are spitting straight into the wind, and it is blowing back in my face. Quit it."

Lindsey said, "As long as I am here, I feel the need to continue to say what I think about the policies." So they moved him out. He was replaced by his deputy, David Dean, who stopped spitting even though he shared Grant's view, as did I.

But the basic responsibility for dealing with North Vietnam was moved over to the Vietnam task force. For similar reasons, although less dramatic, much of North Korea was moved over to the Korean desk, which made a lot of sense, because no one was doing anything with North Korea anyway. That turned the Office of Asian Communist Affairs, essentially, into a Communist China, Mongolia, Hong Kong office. The consequence of that was that we increasingly focused all our attention on what we could do to moderate, improve, change our relations with China and Mongolia.

We worked equally on China and Mongolia. We got awfully close to normalizing relations with Mongolia, working with the Soviet desk, which was also sympathetic with that goal. So we got a group of young foreign service officers, Stapleton Roy among them, sent off to Mongolian language training at the University of Washington. We got permission to bring a Mongolian minister down to Washington from the U.N. and had him talk to a number of people down in Washington. Actually, by the end of the 1969 we had gotten approval to go ahead with the move to normalize relations with Mongolia. The Mongolians, who originally were enthusiastic, turned us down, apparently because the Soviets didn't want it to happen.

But in the meantime on the China side, first David Dean and then myself began, as I said, focusing primarily on China. We felt we had to move incrementally, in small steps. If we could move in largely symbolic steps that gradually began to signal to the American public and the Chinese a change in the background noise on China, we might eventually get to the point of moving on substance. So we concentrated on tiny things like changing the use of Beiping to Beijing, which seemed a great victory at the time. It was in fact seen as an important symbolic move both by Taiwan and China. It was very hard to do. It was incredible the amount of energy you had to put in order to change two or three consonants and a vowel.

Q: I would like to come back to that, but let me ask you a couple of things about the bureaucracy before we talk more about the substance. Given that the Asian Communist Affairs became sort of the commie desk in the Asian area, was there any negative side effect of being posted -- did people not want to be on the desk? Were there any negative career implications?

KREISBERG: Not that I ever saw. There was much more interest in coming to what you call the commie desk than there was to the China desk (Taiwan).

Q: How about flow of information? Was there much cooperation between the two desks on China?

KREISBERG: There was a great deal of tension between the two desks. The people who were on the China-Taiwan desk saw everything that we were doing as, essentially, a threat to U.S. relations with Taiwan. The embassy in Taiwan was constantly staffed by very strong conservatives who did everything they possibly could to encourage -- and backed in the Department by Ruth Bacon and Louise McNutt from the Office of Regional Affairs. Ruth had the advantage of a long, personal relationship with Dean Rusk going back to the early '50s. So there was a constant sense, which we could never fully document, that whenever things looked as if they might be about to shift in the process of going through the EA bureau that Ruth would go up and have a drink or lunch with Dean. Rusk would have a chat with Bill Bundy and back it down. It was obviously made more complicated by the Vietnam War, which Rusk saw as his overriding policy priority.

I have never been able to fully decide -- and you guys may have a better sense of this than I, especially you, Warren -- as to whether Rusk genuinely believed what he said about the China-Vietnam relationship and this being part of a global communist thrust. Rusk was, on the face of it, extremely reluctant to acknowledge the Sino-Soviet conflict longer than almost anyone else that I knew. Whether he genuinely believed that or whether it was a face that he put on his analysis and his policy in order to rationalize the deeper engagement in Vietnam to which he was committed is simply not answerable by me.

So global communist expansionism then was equally bad whether it was China by itself or China and the Soviet Union or China and Vietnam.

Q: It didn't make a lot of difference to us. There was no way to play them against each other. They were all hostile to us.

KREISBERG: But he saw China genuinely pushing Vietnam?

Q: As far as I can make out.

KREISBERG: We were never able to convince him that the Chinese were no more enthusiastic at the idea of a spread of Vietnamese power and influence in Southeast Asia than we were.

Q: I never got any sense that he saw that. The only thing that comes up at all that Nancy, I think, has gotten in her questions is the business of calling in Alan Whiting and trying to signal the Chinese that we were not going to go after them with our stuff in Vietnam. We were trying to avoid drawing them into the war in Vietnam. The indications are that it was a successful exchange of signals. So that you have come to terms with the fact that the Chinese are not terribly concerned about what's going on as long as you don't threaten them. If that is, in fact, true, and we have some doubts, then it would seem that something had gotten through to him that Vietnam was not an extension of China.

KREISBERG: Yes. I never got that.

Q: He would still probably say, "It doesn't make any difference. The Chinese are hostile to us.

The Vietnamese are hostile to us. We've got to stop them both."

KREISBERG: Yes.

Q: One final question along those lines. Was there much interchange of personnel between the two desks?

KREISBERG: Very little.

Q: So people tracked separately.

KREISBERG: We got their cable traffic, and they got our cable traffic. But that's only the tip of the information iceberg.

Q: What was your cable traffic? I mean, since we don't have anyone in China.

KREISBERG: Hong Kong.

Q: You are getting your traffic from Hong Kong?

KREISBERG: Yes.

Q: Are you getting traffic at all from, let's say, the British, who do have people in China? Was there much of that?

KREISBERG: We got a fair amount of information from the British through the intelligence net. We got the full flow of interviews with refugees from China into Hong Kong. It's interesting. I, frankly, have never thought about this. I don't remember having seen much British telegraphic traffic relating to policy issues at all. If it was coming through, it wasn't coming to the desk in '65, '66, '67. Now we, obviously, were following the British experience with the embassy being taken apart and partially burned. But I don't remember policy traffic.

Q: You spoke just a few moments ago about a policy of incrementalism, trying to make small changes to build towards a relationship. When you became, first, deputy director and then director of the office, was there a point at which you got some sort of a policy mandate from above that said you will go this way or that way?

KREISBERG: None. Everything that we did we, basically, initiated ourselves. Either it went through, or it didn't go through. But there was never anything that came down from above saying do this, do that. That was true even in the Nixon period, '69, '70. Whatever we did, we did. There was never any guidance from the White House that, you know, it's time to move on this or that or the other thing, with one exception. That was the renewal of the talks in '69 chasing the Chinese ambassador down the staircase.

Q: Could you elaborate on that?

KREISBERG: That was -- let me see. Our ambassador was...

Q: Jacob Beam?

KREISBERG: No. After Jake Beam.

Q: Was it Stoessel?

KREISBERG: Yes. Walt Stoessel was sent instructions by the White House -- in this particular case, we saw them -- saying that he should inform the Chinese ambassador immediately that we were prepared to renew talks in Warsaw. He got these instructions on the day that he was going to a concert to which the Chinese ambassador was also going. His plan was to pass the message to the Chinese ambassador quietly after the concert. But the Chinese ambassador left early! This was in November '69. Walt saw him leaving, ran out of his box, and chased the Chinese ambassador down the stairs of the concert hall, catching him as he was about to get into his car. He passed him this message saying that the US was prepared to renew the talks.

The Chinese ambassador took the note and took it away in the car with him. He didn't read it until he got into the car. He then sent back a note to us a few days later, obviously after he had checked with Beijing saying he agreed to resume the talks.

Q: That's interesting. That's not quite as low-key, I think, as Washington. [Laughter]

KREISBERG: It was very dramatic. [Laughter]

Q: Was, then, this decision to renew the talks, one that originates in Washington in the White House?

KREISBERG: That originates in the White House. We had wanted to do it, but we had not been able to get the Chinese to pick up the ball again. That the contact was renewed was a result of the exchanges, such as they were, between the President and [Nicolae] Ceausescu and the President and Charles de Gaulle, which were not made available to anybody in State. We, at the desk level and, I think, at the Assistant Secretary level, were totally unaware of what was going on. Bill Rogers was the Secretary of State, and my guess is Bill Rogers may not have known. I never asked Bill Rogers.

Q: So this came as a surprise to you?

KREISBERG: It came as a surprise to us that -- well, the message was sent out through State channels, so we knew that the message was being sent. It was one of those cables that simply said, "Text received from the White House." I had talked with people that were in the National Security Council. Their view was, "Why don't we try and renew these talks?"

Our response was, "Fine." We were always willing to make a try. We had been trying on several previous occasions. Remember, the Chinese had broken off the talks early in the year. We had, I think, on at least one occasion, maybe more than that, suggested that we renew talks, and there was nothing going on on their side. Then this erupted on our side, and they accepted and then we went straight into the two meetings in January and February.

Q: Can you say anything more about those Nixon-de Gaulle, Nixon-Ceausescu talks?

KREISBERG: No, I know nothing more about those than I have read in other people's writings and what Kissinger and Nixon described. I have no idea beyond that. Maybe Ceausescu's files will tell us more about it.

Q: From the packet of documents that you loaned us, there were a couple of them in the spring of 1970, which, I think, I'm not sure if in both cases, you drafted. One was from Rogers to the White House. The other was from Marshall Green to Rogers.

KREISBERG: I drafted all of those.

Q: Okay. Both of which seem to suggest that Nixon was out in front, and that perhaps there was some effort to slow things down, or at least get more of a quid pro quo, for what was happening.

KREISBERG: Yes.

Q: Could you reflect on that?

KREISBERG: My recollection at the time is that there were two things. First of all, I don't want to remember more than I think I do remember, but there were two or three key issues that strike me. One is we really were not sure what was driving the Chinese at the time. We were surprised when they seemed much more interested in moving ahead in January, than we anticipated. And because we didn't really know how far they were going to go. We were more cautious in how far we wanted to go on our next step than the White House was. Partly I suspect, our imagination wasn't leaping quite this far. We had said, "Well, let's move the discussions to a higher level in Warsaw. Let's send a special emissary, which, frankly, I did anticipate would be the Secretary of State or the National Security Advisor, to Beijing. John Gronouski thought it would terrific if he could go to Beijing. I remember that. Or Walt Stoessel would want to go. The White House was the place from which the suggestion of focusing on a high-level representative to Beijing came from. They said, "That's really where we want to have this focused."

Q: So from the White House rather than from the Chinese?

KREISBERG: From the White House. The Chinese came back and said, "We are prepared to have a high-level emissary."

And the White House, basically, said, "Fine." That came as a surprise to us in State.

Marshall Green, as the Assistant Secretary, was actually shocked at the pace at which this was moving. Marshall had two main concerns. One was that State not get in front of the White House. He thought that we were pushing faster than the White House was pushing. The reality was the other way around.

And, secondly, he was very reluctant to have us go one step further unless it was clear that we were going to inform the Japanese, because he saw this as seriously damaging our relationship with Japan if we changed policy toward China with no advance warning. He argued back and forth with the Secretary and with the National Security Council staff for a month on whether we should have our third meeting with the Chinese in March.

The meeting was not held in March in large part because of the argument that Marshall was having with the NSC over whether to move forward. Then it was put off until April. But we would suggest a date, then Chinese would suggest another date. That was part of the tit-for-tat style Beijing used. We knew that no matter what date we ever proposed, the Chinese would always propose another date. I concluded that even if it turned out to be exactly the date they were thinking of, they would still pick another date so the initiative would then be in their hands. We, basically, had no problems with their dates except for the question of a Chiang Ching-kuo visit in April. That was an area of sensitivity and a lot of pressure from the China desk, the Taiwan desk.

Q: The question of the Japanese. It only arises in these documents, I think, twice. It comes up that we really should, perhaps, be telling the Japanese more. Where is the decision coming from not to tell the Japanese more and on what grounds?

KREISBERG: It is coming from the NSC. The NSC is basically saying, "We want this held on an absolute need-to-know basis. When the Chinese, Taiwanese come in, when the Japanese come in, when the French or the British come in, tell them nothing. No one should know what we are doing." That is the instruction from the NSC.

That makes us all at State very uncomfortable for three reasons. One, none of us particularly liked lying. Second, we all saw this as being absolutely critical politically to the Japanese. No disagreement on that among any of us. Third, we saw the political problems being magnified with Taiwan given the support that they still had on the Hill if this simply came fresh out of the air with no prior warning. The other side of it was that we knew that if we briefed Taiwan, they would leak it. We would then have a major problem. So we were unhappy about Taiwan, but willing to hold on.

But on the Japanese side, I remember, there were a number of fierce arguments over whether the Japanese had ever leaked anything. Basically, people at State were saying, "None of us recall a single instance where we had ever told the Japanese anything really secret which they had then leaked." And with the NSC saying, "We can't trust the Japanese, so we don't want them to know."

Q: Would you say that the people at NSC were less aware of what the potential implications of not telling them were, or was secrecy so dominant that it didn't matter?

KREISBERG: Secrecy was so dominant that it didn't matter.

Q: Largely Kissinger's personality, I assume.

KREISBERG: Yes. I think it was Kissinger and Nixon. I am not sure who was the more paranoid about secrecy. My guess is that Nixon is probably more paranoid about secrecy than Kissinger. I have been reading the biographies of these people.

Q: It's hard to keep track of which one seems worse. What about the Soviets? It is clear, again from these documents, that you are aware that the Soviets are nervous and unhappy about what they think is going on here.

KREISBERG: Yes. You see from some of these memos that we flag the fact that there is a Soviet dimension to the question of moving forward with China. But one of the key differences between State and the NSC is that we in ACA saw the process of normalization with China as mainly being beneficial to us in an Asian context. It is clear, in retrospect, that the Asia context was minor from the White House point of view. They saw it mainly in Soviet terms. That was an issue that never surfaced in debate. The European bureau was totally out of this. There was never any engagement with the Soviet desk in anything we were doing with China. My sense is that they didn't know anything about what Kissinger had in mind in terms of using this as a China card.

Q: So they were really uninvolved in it entirely?

KREISBERG: The strategic approach that we in State were taking and that Kissinger was taking was really quite different. We saw the Soviet Union as one factor, but not the driving one. He, obviously, saw it as the driving one. I have subsequently argued with people who were on the NSC staff -- with Hal Sonnenfeldt and Bill Hyland and with Henry Kissinger himself and with Dick Solomon -- over how important, in reality, the China card was in our Soviet relations. I have never been totally satisfied with their arguments, and they, obviously, have always shrugged their shoulders and said, "Kreisberg, you really don't understand anything about geopolitics."

Q: From where did the new formulations on Taiwan come? You suddenly get new language about force reduction and about the need to acknowledge that there is only China.

KREISBERG: We made it up.

Q: Again, was that from within or from the White House?

KREISBERG: Totally in our office. All of that language and that whole conceptual approach was invented in the office. What we were looking for was language that would enable us to bridge the positions that the Chinese had been holding for the previous decade without, ultimately, giving away the store so far that it would be totally unacceptable on Taiwan or on the Hill. So we just played these word games. Eventually, obviously, we found that if you played the right word games, it would work. Essentially, each side was holding on to its own position, but changing around the way that you talked about them in such a way that everyone's face was being saved. That was our intent, and, ultimately, it turned out to be successful.

What was interesting about this is that throughout this entire game, I never met Kissinger. I would talk from time to time with Solomon. But the first time I ever met Kissinger was in Delhi. Kissinger came over there, and we were all receiving him at the airport. Pat Moynihan introduced Kissinger to me, and Kissinger stopped and said, "Ah, yes, Kreisberg. I know your name well." There was the typical enigmatic Kissingerian smile. He nodded and then went on. That was the end of the dialogue. [Laughter]

We were going in the same direction as the White House. They saw that. All they really needed to do was watch what we were sending over and see whether it meshed with things that they wanted. As long as it did, they were prepared to let it go forward. You can see in some of the draft cables words were crossed out, and new words were written in. The words that were written in were basically NSC changes. There are not a lot of them. But they are NSC changes, and they are interesting changes.

Q: You referred once or twice in passing to Congress and the need to be concerned about the China lobby types.

KREISBERG: We never talked to anybody in Congress.

Q: There was no effort to cultivate those people who were more favorable on...

KREISBERG: No. We went our own way. It is possible that someone on the White House staff was doing briefing, but to my knowledge, nobody in State was.

Q: The Congressional Liaison Office (H) did not come to you and say...

KREISBERG: They weren't involved. They weren't cleared for this. This is all Secret/NODIS stuff. There was nobody in H who was cleared for it. It is conceivable that the Secretary was doing it, but I doubt it. That Secretary of State was also not that deeply involved and was not being used for congressional contacts. And Kissinger was never that close to people on the Hill. As far as I am aware, there was nobody on the Hill who was aware of this, which may be one reason why when it all finally broke, there was a lot of surprise and a certain amount of broken crockery.

Q: Kissinger used Fulbright a lot. It might be worth checking that one out. Given that things seem to be moving the way they are and that the Chinese seem to be responsive, and all of this is going on, why was it necessary, ultimately, to use Pakistan to get Kissinger into China?

KREISBERG: I never understood that.

Q: [Laughter] Oh. I wanted a revelation.

KREISBERG: No. I could never figure it out. You obviously want to talk to Winston Lord, unless you already have, and get his personal view of why they went that route. I think in large part it was Kissinger's obsession with secrecy and the feeling that if he went into China by the back basement door, that it was more likely to be secret than if he went in any other way. That may be true. I mean, if he went in from Hong Kong, it was more likely to surface. If a Kissinger plane took off from Hong Kong or Korea and disappeared, people would know about it. I guess, in theory, he could have flown out of Kadena in Okinawa or out of one of our air bases in Korea. It sure as hell wasn't the most convenient way to go. But I think the only reason for it was secrecy.

And the only reason for the secrecy was amore propre. Once you've decided to make the visit, and once it is clear that the Chinese are willing to have you come, it is inconceivable you can hold the secret indefinitely. But they wanted it to come as a great headline. I think part of the strategy was that by having it emerge that way, public excitement would sweep away a lot of the uncertainty, suspicion, hostility, criticism that might otherwise have accrued.

Q: To go back a little bit to the pre-Kissinger visit. I was under the impression that Nixon had hoped to use better relations with the PRC to help get out of Vietnam. Yet, in these memos...

KREISBERG: Nothing of that appeared.

Q: No. In fact, there seems to be a specific effort to avoid raising Southeast Asia as an issue with the Chinese. Do you have any idea why?

KREISBERG: No, I don't. This question has also occurred to me. The only explanation that I can make is that it's something that Nixon may have thought that he could do directly or do indirectly through Kissinger, and he didn't want to involve State again. This, then, comes down to this whole question of secrecy. But it doesn't come out in Kissinger's book. There is no sense from Kissinger either that we were going to use the China talks directly with relation to Vietnam.

There was a sense that somehow it was thought that if we were able to improve relations with China, that we would indirectly diminish the Chinese interest in supporting the Vietnamese. That it would happen, not that it was an objective to talk about Vietnam a lot with the Chinese. Every time we did talk about Vietnam with the Chinese, the Chinese said the standard things, as you see in the cables and memoranda on the talks with the Chinese. That's literally all that I know. The subject never came up in instructions. Winthrop Brown, the Deputy Assistant Secretary handling Vietnam in the Far Eastern Bureau were raised. Nobody ever asked us to do much on it.

We looked at Laos, as you saw from that Laos memo. The decision, essentially, was made not to do much on Laos.

Q: Was there an awareness that there were problems between Vietnam and China that might diminish the Chinese ability to serve American purposes, were that to arise? I mean, how was the Chinese-Vietnamese relationship seen?

KREISBERG: By whom?

Q: By people in ACA.

KREISBERG: Well, as I said, this was at a time when, for several years, ACA had been taken out of the Vietnam net. I never had a sense, however, that there was a consciousness in State of the growing level of Vietnamese-Chinese tension.

Q: And not at the White House then either?

KREISBERG: Not at the White House either. I mean, the Chinese were continuing to give the Vietnamese aircraft refuge. There were Chinese anti-aircraft gunners and logistics people in North Vietnam. In principal, there was no reason why anyone should have seen tension growing.

Q: We mentioned it before, and perhaps we answered it -- tell me if we did -- Alan Whiting has talked about the process of signaling between China and the United States. That nobody wanted to go to war over Vietnam or in Vietnam with each other. Were you involved in any of that at all? Were you aware of what was happening?

Q: Wang Bingnan seemed to be confirming that in our interviews with him.

KREISBERG: Well, we constantly were saying in the Warsaw talks and in public that what we were doing was not designed to threaten China.

Q: You say reference to reassuring the Chinese.

KREISBERG: We said this over and over.

Q: The Warsaw talks are a vehicle for that.

KREISBERG: Yes. The idea that we are telling China we are not threatening them is one that we are using continuously. It is less clear to me how the Chinese are using the Warsaw talks to communicate on Vietnam to us. Although in things that they write, the Chinese led Alan Whiting and, I think, others to conclude that the Chinese are defining what the terms are under which they might feel compelled to become involved. Everybody is setting limits. I think that is right. So I think that we were all aware when we saw things that the Chinese said, what they were telling us. In part, that was one of the reasons we kept telling them that we do not plan to expand the war.

Part of the issue is that after 1966, certainly '67, and until the great Hanoi-Haiphong bombing raids in the early '70s, I don't think any of us were terribly concerned about that issue. I mean, we didn't see the Chinese coming into the war in Vietnam in any deeper way. As a matter of fact, most of us were surprised as we found out to what degree the Chinese had engaged themselves. It was a surprise that the Chinese were doing as much as they were doing on the ground. Basically, we didn't anticipate that the Chinese wanted to expand the war or to become engaged. We certainly didn't want a fight with them.

And when occasionally there would be discussions over whether to we take out the Chinese airfields in Yen-an where Vietnamese planes were being stashed -- this was always a clear question: do we want to bring the Chinese in? How dangerous are those fighters? How effective are they being used? Obviously as the war went on, they were less and less effective. Even the Defense Department never really made a big issue of it.

So, no. I think we all saw the Vietnam-China issue as one that we needed to flag, but one that was, essentially, peripheral. Because most of us, I think, on the desk and at the EA bureau level saw the Chinese, at most, as wanting to use the Vietnam War as a lever to weaken the United States, but not to expand the war and not to risk war with us. And when we talked about it in Warsaw, they never wanted to say very much about it other than to support the Vietnamese and say, "You've got to get out of Vietnam." It was never a terribly productive issue for us to talk about.

Since the issue wasn't productive, we on the desk tended to put Vietnam to one side and say, "Now where are the areas where we may be able to signal that we want to make progress?"

Q: How important were the Warsaw talks?

KREISBERG: I am probably the wrong person to ask, because we were running them, so we thought they were important. At the same time, they were frustrating, because so much of the time we were just talking past one another. I guess I saw them as being important primarily in 1970.

And they were important in a negative sense in that when the Chinese suspended talks and let long periods go by without any taking place, this left us feeling that the prospects for making any progress were low. And, obviously, the rationale for our arguing for moving forward on policy change with Beijing diminished. It was very hard, if they wouldn't even meet with us in Warsaw, to make the case that there was a possibility for making progress. So '68 and '69 were very bad years, primarily because of the Cultural Revolution. That was really a great setback for any strategy aimed at stabilizing and normalizing the relationship.

Q: Were there any plans in your days with ACA for taking out the Chinese nuclear facilities?

KREISBERG: None.

Q: Rusk's concern with a billion Chinese...

KREISBERG: No. If that was discussed, it was never discussed with us.

Q: The whole question, I guess, is one in Kissinger's memoirs: the idea that the Soviets approached us to talk about doing precisely that. Had you ever heard anything about that?

KREISBERG: I heard about it after the fact. I knew about it while I was there. That contact and the response were handled in the National Security Council, not at State. I think if I were to sum up what State did at that point, the White House clearly had its own agenda, which they wanted to conduct with the Chinese. What we were used for is as an idea factory to provide language and provide some conceptual approach to moving the relationship forward, but without telling us why they wanted to move it forward. To let us make up our own rationale, and make up our own reasons, but using the language that we produced, because nobody over there had the time or maybe they didn't have the confidence. Solomon probably could have done it, but perhaps he had a lot of other things to do more important than that. So they used a lot of our ideas in substance.

At the time, we thought we were driving the car. But it was kind of like learning how to drive on a dual-controlled car. In reality, it turned out that somebody else was doing the driving, and we were only turning the wheel. Whenever we didn't turn it far enough, someone would turn it a little bit further. And when we were not going fast enough, someone else would put his foot on the accelerator.

Q: You mentioned before we got on the tape something about the draft of the Shanghai communiqué. Could you talk a little bit more about that?

KREISBERG: That is one of the things that does not appear in here. What we did was to draft, essentially, much of the key language on Taiwan that ultimately was pulled out into the Shanghai communiqué. And at one point, John Holdridge told me that when they were drafting the communiqué, they had gone back to what we produced in early '70 and literally, lock, stock and barrel, plugged it into the Shanghai communiqué, which was the "Chinese on both sides of the Taiwan Straits" language and "As tension declines, forces will be removed" language.

Our intent had been, at the meeting scheduled for March and then subsequently for April, to float that language with the Chinese. And we never had a chance to do it. So the first time it saw the light of day, actually, was in '72. I don't whether Kissinger used it in '71.

I never actually went down and read the memoranda of conversation on the Kissinger and Nixon visits. I kept meaning to go down when I was...

Q: I wish you had.

KREISBERG: On the policy planning staff. They pulled the stuff aside, and they had it in a file in the East Asian Bureau. I cannot actually tell you from my own memory what he did and didn't say.

Q: So all the credit that Deng Xiaoping has gotten for "one country, two systems," really should go to your office?

KREISBERG: No. The "one country, two system" line we never thought of. It would be interesting if we had, but I don't think we would have come up with "one country, two systems." We might have come up with a concept of "one sovereignty, two governments" kind of thing. Something that looked like the British Commonwealth. I mean, if we had actually gotten to that point.

The other line we designed that appeared in the Shanghai communiqué was on the settlement of the Taiwan issue by peaceful discussions between both sides and by the two sides themselves. Our concept of how we should proceed on Taiwan was to disengage the United States from direct involvement in resolving that problem. If the whole thing was going to work, it was that Taiwan was to be put to one side. It was no longer to be an issue. If we could get to that, then we saw how we would be able to work our relationship with Taiwan and with China.

The concept of how we dealt with Taiwan itself was -- well, we can get to that later. That was an issue on which there were a lot of arguments, but that didn't surface until the late '70s. The Policy Planning Staff had a different view from the East Asian Bureau and the White House at that time. We lost. Cy Vance was on our side for a period of time, and then he backed away. But we can get to that.

Q: I would like to come back to that in just a minute. Before we leave this slightly earlier period, I guess, I would be interested in knowing in terms of the Warsaw talks over time. You have Gronouski, you have Cabot, you have Beam.

KREISBERG: With Cabot, it was...

KREISBERG: Cabot, Gronouski, Stoessel, Beam. I think.

Q: I think that's right. Do you think that those personalities have any real affect on the way the talks worked? Do you see anything that is worth recording on these various people?

KREISBERG: They were such totally different characters. My guess is that the Chinese probably felt most comfortable with the career people, with Cabot, Beam, and Stoessel. Gronouski, I think, constantly threw them for a loop, because he made jokes. He just had a personality that, I think, they never could quite figure out. But I don't think they made much difference, any more than the Chinese ambassadors made any difference. These were really "made in Washington and Beijing" conversations.

There was no free dialogue whatsoever. People made their presentations, then they commented on their core presentations in set pieces. Then they commented on the comments of the presentations in set pieces. The only time they began to shift a little bit was when we began to have a private dialogue after the meetings in '69, '70.

All that the talks did, in retrospect, after the early days -- they were really quite substantive in the 1950s, because we were dealing with some very concrete issues. But after that, in the 1960s when they moved to Warsaw, they were simply means of a private conveying of messages. That's all. It could have been done anywhere, and it could have been done in a lot of other ways.

The fact that we were meeting face-to-face was important, I think, in and of itself. It was the only way in which Americans and Chinese were able to talk to one another, since everybody was under instruction not even to say hello in any other context. But as a substantive channel, it was probably about as low a level of substantive diplomatic exchange as you can find.

Q: I spent some time last year reading John Cabot's diaries, and he was quite upset when Gronouski replaced him, both, I think, for career reasons and because he thought Gronouski was totally inappropriate. That kind of thing didn't matter in the Department.

KREISBERG: It didn't make any difference. The Chinese must have raised their eyebrows at this Pole and wonder what a postmaster general had to do with bilateral negotiations. It might be interesting to ask whether the Chinese thought the negotiations were being downgraded by bringing in somebody like Gronouski or upgraded by bringing in somebody who was a personal or political appointment of the President.

Q: They probably debated that for two weeks. Again, you mentioned also that the personality of the Chinese representatives probably didn't matter much. Did you have any sense of Wang Bingnan as an individual?

KREISBERG: I never dealt with Wang Bingnan. David Dean and Lindsey did. But my sense, from reading the memorandums of conversation and of the talks and from talking to them, was that he couldn't have made much difference. When the Chinese wanted to express nastiness, nastiness was expressed. When they wanted to be relaxed, relaxation was expressed. That was true whether they had a chargé d'affaires or an ambassador. I don't think we ever conducted these with chargé d'affaires. We never, I think, thought that was an appropriate thing to do. The Chinese didn't give a damn.

Q: Well, we did, at one time, lower the level in the '50s when Ed Martin was involved for a brief period of time.

KREISBERG: That's right. Ed Martin, of course, was a minister at the time.

Q: I am inclined unless you have, again, some China side to it, to skip over Dar es-Salaam. Is there anything --

KREISBERG: The only funny thing about Dar es-Salaam was that there was a widespread speculation in the diplomatic corps that when I went down to Dar es-Salaam, that we were shifting our talks down to Dar es-Salaam. I was being sent down there because there were 20,000 Chinese in Tanzania, and we saw that as a major point of importance for us. That did not last very long. I mean, it was incredibly stupid, and I thought more funny than anything else.

Aside from that, I had no contacts with the Chinese. They refused to talk to me in Dar es-Salaam. I'm sure they must have been under instructions not to. So let's skip over Dar es-Salaam.

Q: That takes us to the period, 1977 to 1981. I guess the basic question to ask is what was your role vis à vis normalization with the People's Republic.

KREISBERG: Well, the Policy Planning Staff was deeply involved in the process of putting together a strategy. The person to talk to about the initial drafting of that was Alan Romberg since it began in January of 1977, and I arrived in Policy Planning in the middle of April. So a good deal of the drafting had already been done by Alan and Stape Roy.

My sense was that, at that point, there were no serious issues. The decision to move ahead and exactly the way we eventually did move ahead, with one exception. The only issue which became a point of major debate and major controversy was what relationship we were going to have with Taiwan.

It was clear that we were going to have to break relations with Taiwan. We were going to have to terminate the treaty, withdraw the few military forces that remained there. But it was also clear that we were going to have to find a way to maintain all the substantive relationships that we had with Taiwan. How were we going to do that? The bottom line was whether we dealt with Taiwan in a totally informal way -- as we eventually did -- or whether to try to maintain some form of official representation by having a consulate general or some other presence -- an "interests section" -- there. And, basically, tell the Chinese, "We recognize you as the sole government, but there are other places in the world where we have had consulates where we have not had diplomatic relations. And that is what we intend to do."

My preference, and that of the Director of Policy Planning Tony Lake and the case that we argued strongly with the support of the legal bureau to Cy Vance, was that we ought to try to hold on to a consulate general or some formal status. That we might, ultimately, have to back away from that was clear, but the issue that we felt we should put to the Chinese was that we wanted to hold on to a consulate, and see if we could make that wash. The bureau view, supported by Mike Oksenberg in the NSC, was they didn't want to get involved in that. It wouldn't work. They wanted to go to a clean break and establish the kind of relationship that the Japanese, the French, other countries had with the Chinese. Travel agencies and whatever else you want to have.

That issue was very hotly argued. Cy Vance, as a lawyer and seeing that an American institute in Taiwan format was getting us into absolutely new, fresh, uncharted, highly peculiar, and very complex legal waters, also thought it would be preferable "to see if we can do it with a consulate general?" Eventually, Cy changed ground and said, "Well, I guess if we try to do it with a consulate, it really is going to be very hard to make the case that the U.S. doesn't have an official relationship with Taiwan." "The official relationship," the opponents argued, "would be the key single issue with the Chinese."

My view at the time was that that was right, but that we should not let the Chinese view on this totally drive us without at least trying it. If we tried it, we could have made the case on the Hill that we had made an effort, and we eventually had had to back away. But that was not the way in which it went. So that was the only issue on which there was a major debate.

The second point at which the issue became heated was what the Taiwan relations act should look like. The Dick Holbrooke-Roger Sullivan version was that it should be leaner, sparer and vaguer than it turned out to be. Again, the Policy Planning staff and the legal office and H argued that wasn't going to work.

Q: Congress wouldn't buy it?

KREISBERG: Congress wouldn't buy it. But the East Asian Bureau decided, again, with Oksenberg on board, to try because at this point -- although Holbrooke and Oksenberg detested one another -- there was an agreement that we ought to go for the deal that would be easiest to work with the Chinese. The Chinese weren't going to like anything, so the less it looked as if we were perpetuating the language of the treaties, particularly those relating to security, the one that bothered them the most, and the less there was that implied a continuing U.S. commitment to Taiwan, the better off we would be. So that was the version that eventually the President signed off on.

Eventually, the executive branch backed up the entire nine yards and bought on to whatever Congress wanted, which, essentially, was all the U.S.-Republic of China treaty and agreements language less the references to an official relationship.

Q: Before we go on, let me just go back on the question of Vance shifting his position on whether to go for a consulate or an informal relationship. Do you have any idea what pushed Vance over the edge? Was it White House pressure, or was it his own judgment?

KREISBERG: I don't know. The meeting at which he changed his mind was one that I didn't sit in on. It was with Tony and Dick Holbrooke and probably Peter Tarnoff and a couple other people.

Q: What were their positions at the time?

KREISBERG: Tony Lake was the director of the policy planning staff. Holbrooke was Assistant Secretary for East Asian Affairs. Peter Tarnoff was the Executive Secretary for the Department. My guess is that Warren Christopher as Vance's key legal and Congressional advisor and the Deputy Secretary of State, was probably engaged in this as well, Christopher was Vance's key man on the Hill on all major issues involving treaties and agreements. While the drafting was done in EA, the negotiations were largely done through Christopher. Herb Hansell, as the legal advisor, was involved as well.

Q: Again, to go back to something you just had said before we go on. The Holbrooke-Oksenberg dislike, how important a factor is it? You say that, nevertheless, they ended up on the same side of this particular question. Is it an important factor in the normalization process?

KREISBERG: In the last analysis, it is not. Bureaucratically, it is important, because they were constantly working behind one another's backs and hiding information, being devious in the way in which they dealt with information. It in part personal, in part protection of bureaucratic turf with Oksenberg protecting Brzezinski and Brzezinski's direct links with the President, and Holbrooke protecting Holbrooke. Less Holbrooke defending Vance. A lot of the issues were petty. Some involved substance.

The question, for example, of what kind of security relationship we wanted to have with China was one of those. The White House wanted to build a security relationship with China. State, in this case both SP [Policy Planning Staff] and the EA bureau and Vance, were much leier about the risks of doing that. And, certainly, the Soviet bureau was very leery about it. The White House wanted to move ahead on China first and foremost. Holbrooke thought we could move ahead on Vietnam and get Vietnam and still get China.

So in September and October, there was an enormous amount of tension with the White House constantly pushing to put China first and with Vance and Holbrooke trying to work out something with the Vietnamese. Holbrooke's conversations with the Vietnamese in September were intentionally designed to try to tell the Vietnamese that it was now or never. He felt that he had gotten the go-ahead from them. That was one of the key issues.

Then Brzezinski and Oksenberg had been consistently arguing that we needed to be able to promise the Chinese that there was going to be a substantive security relationship for two reasons. One is it was in our interest to know more about what the Chinese military was doing. And, ultimately, perhaps -- this was coming in part from Defense as well -- to be able to use China as a base against the Soviet Union. The Air Force wanted landing rights in China. The Navy wanted to call at Chinese ports. The question of aerial and electronic reconnaissance that might be conducted over China and targeted at the Soviet Union was raised in the U.S. Government. The idea of flying over China in order to get to Pakistan, without going all around Southeast Asia, en route to the Middle East was attractive to the military. The possibility of more intelligence facilities -- all was being actively discussed, but at very secret levels in Defense and with NSC support and encouragement. State's view on this was much more conservative.

Oh and finally, the concept, from the White House side, that in the long run, a major constituency that you needed to have on your side in China was the military. By offering supplies, cooperation, training, and equipment, whatever, that you would, in effect, engage the Chinese military with the interest of U.S.-Chinese relations.

Some of these arguments washed in State, and some of them made everybody very nervous. Several made me very nervous. I was simply not that confident that in the long run, our interests with the Chinese would be so much in parallel that I wanted to strengthen the Chinese military. Moreover, the view of the European bureau, which I shared, was that it was not in our interests to build up Soviet fear of China by strengthening the concept of the U.S.-Chinese global strategic alliance. That what we wanted to do, when appropriate, was to move in parallel with China, not in alliance.

This is one of the reasons why Vance was attracted by the idea of moving first with Vietnam and then going on to China. It wasn't that he was so engaged on Vietnam, but he was engaged with the Soviet Union. And he would have preferred to put off the China connection until after the meeting that he had scheduled with Gromyko in December. But Vance kept losing each time with the President who clearly wanted to move ahead on China as the great new, fresh capstone in his foreign policy initiatives.

Q: How does Vietnam get lost in all of it?

KREISBERG: Well, Vietnam gets lost simply because the Vietnamese waited too long to make up their minds, and the President made the decision that were going to move first on China. That was precipitated by Deng Xiaoping's in effect saying in late November, I think, "This is the time to move, and we want to move now. You better move now or the door will close." That, then, was followed fairly quickly on Deng's trip to Washington by an indication of the Chinese plan to move against Vietnam after Vietnam's occupation of Cambodia, a step which totally turned everybody off on Vietnam.

And, of course, the NSC staff was able to argue, "You see, we saved you guys, because if you normalized with Vietnam and then they had moved into Cambodia, wouldn't the President have looked like an absolute fool?" Which he might have, in fact.

Q: He did, anyway. How much influence would you say that SP had in that period?

KREISBERG: SP was engaged and had some influence because of Tony Lake's direct tie with Vance. But the key player was the East Asian bureau and Dick Holbrooke, an absolutely outstanding bureaucratic gunfighter. He fairly consistently won on all Asian issues. Tony Lake had made a decision he was not going to fight Dick Holbrooke on most issues in Dick's area, and there were only a few on which he was willing to take him on. Tony wanted to move ahead on Vietnam, and if something could have been done in October, he would have pushed very hard on that. As it was, the Vietnamese, as you know, kept stumbling over their own feet, and they kept thinking they could get more out of us than we had given so far, and ended up by losing it all for a decade. Whenever push came to shove, Tony basically backed off.

Q: You mentioned a few moments ago the concern on the part of the Department and Vance about not making the Soviets nervous about an increased strategic relationship between China and the United States. Was that not one of the motives that the White House was pursuing?

KREISBERG: Sure. That was the major point of tension between Vance and Brzezinski. No question about it. Vance saw the possibility of improving of Sino-U.S. relations. Brzezinski saw the Soviet Union as becoming increasingly threatening, and argued the focus of U.S. policy should be on surrounding, weakening, and diminishing Soviet power. It was the fundamental issue of the administration and fought out in arena after arena.

Q: How much warning did you have that you were going to end up with the Taiwan relations act? You mentioned that the Department was engaged in drafting something. Who initiates that process?

KREISBERG: The drafting was done by L and EA. I mean, Vance basically saw this as a technical policy issue and assigned Hansell and Holbrooke the responsibility for doing it together with the congressional bureau. Policy planning was, essentially, out of that loop except when we saw the drafts as they went through, and we put our nickels and dimes on the table. But it was just nickels and dimes. The really strong currency was in the other bureaus.

Q: Was there much White House concern about this? Did they care?

KREISBERG: The principal thing the White House wanted was that it be done without a lot of blood on the floor. As happened repeatedly in the Carter Administration, their intelligence on what was going to be necessary on the Hill was bad. I think the Carter White House probably handled the Congress about as badly as any presidency that I can recall in the last forty years. Anybody who really had their heads screwed on should have seen the way the wind was going to run in the Congress. And they would have seen it if they talked to enough people about it.

But it was a draft that was done in secret and put together in State and in the NSC. Again, with Brzezinski and Oksenberg, along with Holbrooke and L, driving a simple version. It had the consequences that you saw.

Q: And there is no effort to deal with the congressional staff on the drafting stage or any of that?

KREISBERG: The initial draft was brought over to the Hill as a draft without congressional input. As soon as they brought it over, they began getting a lot of flak, and a lot of people saying, "This doesn't go anywhere nearly far enough. We are going to have to totally rewrite this." There was an effort on the part of the administration to fight for and defend the draft that it sent over.

Q: When you finally get a relations act that looks quite different, there must have been consternation on how to present this to the Chinese and how to make the Chinese realize that, you know, it is not our fault, Congress did it.

KREISBERG: The Chinese are screaming at this all along. I mean, they are seeing this process. It is out there in public. They've got a liaison office, and they are coming around and saying, "We really don't like this. This is a real problem." I do not have a personal knowledge of the conversations that took place on that.

Q: I guess part of my curiosity is that it seems to me that, until really quite recently, the Chinese haven't fully understood the division of powers between the Hill and the Department.

KREISBERG: Nobody understands the division.

Q: [Laughter] Okay.

KREISBERG: Including in this country. That is absolutely right. I constantly have foreigners come to me and ask me questions or ask why Congress was doing this and can't you do that, which reflect absolute, total ignorance of the way in which the Congress functions. To this day, many Chinese do not understand what the Administration's role is on legislation attacking China. They are convinced that the President can turn off Congress.

Q: We did get a fairly sophisticated analysis from Li Peng on the Tibetan question in '86 in which he said, "Oh, we understand that's Congress." We were surprised at that.

KREISBERG: That is interesting. It is totally unclear to me, and has never been clear to me, whether Kissinger and the President, Oksenberg and whoever else was involved, thought about what the effect would be on China in sending troops to Cambodia in 1970. You know, I have never asked Oksenberg that question. It would be interesting.

Q: This would be Dick Solomon then.

KREISBERG: Dick Solomon, sorry. I have never asked Dick Solomon or Kissinger that question. It would be interesting to know. It so irritated to me. I mean, that was the reason that I asked to leave the bureau. I knew that the Chinese would come back on to the scene eventually. But I also knew that it was going to be at least nine months or a year. After five years, I'd had enough of that. I specifically asked to be sent as far away from China as possible, which is the reason they sent me to Dar es-Salaam. The irony is of sending me down where there were more Chinese outside of China than any other place in the world outside Asia and North America.

Q: This reminds me of one memo that you drafted -- I think dated May of '70, it might have been a little earlier -- in which you say something about the importance of improving relations with the People's Republic of China as being one of the driving forces for all of this. I was curious as to whether there was something in particular in April or May of 1970 that you had in mind.

KREISBERG: The reason for writing that memo was to write a broad conceptual piece on what we are up to, what the reason for all of this was. There is another memo that they did not declassify, as I recall it -- or maybe it is also part of that memo, which they took out -- in which I said that there is a down side to this. It is possible that having normalized relations with the Chinese, that the Chinese could feel that they were now free of danger from the United States. They could take a more active, and not necessarily friendly, policy stance in Southeast Asia in dealing with Cambodia, with Thailand, other countries in ASEAN.

But the principal argument that I was making was that in the long run, which is, I think, the principal case now for maintaining good relations with the Chinese, is that the principal reason for viable and friendly ongoing relations with the Chinese is that they are important to the stability and security of the region as a whole. That is overwhelmingly the long-term primary objective we had. It is not the great global role that China will play, because China is not really playing a great global role. This was the reason for my arguments, subsequently, with Kissinger and Solomon and the people on the Soviet side. That whatever short-term gains we might make vis- a-vis the Soviet Union, the long-term interest was Korea, Japan, Southeast Asia. The stability of China and China's foreign policy was critical in that area and secondary elsewhere. So that was what I was trying to say in that piece.

Q: Is there anything that we should have asked you about?

KREISBERG: No. You have asked me more than you should have asked me. I probably told you more than I know. [Laughter]

I wish my memory on some of these things was better.

Q: It's been great.

KREISBERG: I really think you ought to try to do these things as soon as possible after people leave the government and not wait for ten years. I should have actually sat down and taped what I knew.

Q: Did you keep diaries? No?

KREISBERG: If you go around the Foreign Service, you will find among retired Foreign Service officers that virtually everyone regrets that he didn't keep a diary. There is just so much going on. I have never been able to understand how people have the time to keep diaries.

Q: Pre-World War II they all did. It was wonderful.

KREISBERG: That's right. Well, the answer is that the total flow of information in those days was so much less that you could have the time to do it. But as useless information proliferates in boundless form, you don't have the time to do more constructive things. You spend all of your time reading this incredible detail that has no long-term value at all and not much short-term value. The opportunity to sit down and write ten thoughtful pages a week on policy issues just isn't there. So, no, I did not, and I don't know anybody who has.

Q: If it is any consolation, I have read hundreds of these things, and your memory is better than 99%.

KREISBERG: God help the historians. Most of it really is in the files. The most important files are the internal agency-to-agency files. I mean, if we could get copies of all of the memoranda that went between State and NSC and all of the memoranda that went internally within State, you would know a lot more. Those are the ones they will not give up. Memoranda that I wrote for Tony Lake or that I wrote to Dick Holbrooke or that Holbrooke wrote to Cy Vance really will reflect much more of the tensions in the system than things that are formal papers. I am surprised that they did free up some of these things that State sent to the NSC. I have asked for all of the stuff from the NSC to State, and I asked for that three years ago. None of that has surfaced.

SEYMOUR I. NADLER
Information Officer, USIS
Taipei, Taiwan (1954-1956)

Seymour I. Nadler was born in New York in 1916. As a Foreign Service Officer, his assignments included Taiwan, Washington, DC, Argentina, and Turkey. Mr. Nadler was interviewed by Jack O'Brien on November 21, 1989.

NADLER: In early 1947, I was a vice consul in Tientsin, China, in charge of the visa section and also working for another agency. I returned to the U.S. in early 1949 and in 1951 was given another dual assignment, this time in Singapore. The other part of the dual assignment was with USIA and I discovered that I was liking this part of the work more and more.

I returned to the States in mid-1953. In 1954, I became CPAO in Taipei, Taiwan. This was not a dual assignment, and I suppose it could be considered my formal entry into USIA.

Q: Was there at that time in Taipei a well-established USIS establishment?

NADLER: Yes, there was a well-established post, actually three posts. The main one was in the capital, Taipei. We had our own two-story building, apart from the embassy, complete with library. We had an active exchange program the works.

Q: During that period was there a difficulty between relations of the Republic of China as it was then now and still is and the United States that caused you difficulty, special difficulty?

NADLER: I wouldn't say it caused us special difficulty except from time to time, when the Chinese understandably were very sensitive to anything that might be perceived as a change in the U.S. attitude toward what they called the Republic of China on Taiwan and support for their military operations, political plans, and so forth. At that time, one of the worst things that could have happened -- did happen a bit later -- was adoption by the U.S. of the concept of "two Chinas."

Q: As you pointed out, we had three posts there. Was each one a post with a library and the usual facilities for press releases and so on?

NADLER: I suppose you could say yes, but the major activity was out of Taipei, the capital, and one of the three posts, Kaohsiung, in the south, was primarily the locale of the State Department's FSI Language

NADLER: People who had studied Chinese in the States were sent to Kaohsiung to complete their studies. Thus, the activity of USIS there was of a more modest nature, but it did rely very heavily, as I think back, on the library.

Frank N. Burnet was born in New York in 1921. He joined the Foreign Service in 1951 and served in the Philippines, Thailand, Laos, Vietnam, Taiwan, and Washington, DC. Mr. Burnet was interviewed in 1990 by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

BURNET: Let me go back a moment in my career. When I was in the basic officer's training course, I was drafted into sort of an experimental Chinese language course.

I don't know whether you know Sollenberger. He used to be the head of the FSI. Anyway, he had a deep China background, and he had gotten some oriental linguists together to teach a course in a dialect of Chinese, which was a southern Chinese dialect, not Cantonese but the Amoy/Hakka dialect.

Anyway, I did this five days a week for six weeks. And so, without any written materials, we had all of this spoken Chinese thrown at us, and we learned a certain amount of it.

In my case, the theory behind drafting me was that this dialect of Chinese is the one spoken by overseas Chinese in the Philippines. So I had that background. And Sollenberger and Nick Bodman (the linguist) encouraged me, at the end of that six weeks, to apply for long-term training in Mandarin, which I did do later on. So I had applied for it, and six months after I arrived in Paris, this approval came through. After the loss of China mainland in 1949, the new Chinese language school was organized in 1955, and I went to Taiwan with the first group to attend this school.

Q: Could you describe a bit about how this first group that you were with felt about China and all. What did you expect when you were doing this?

BURNET: Well, let's see this was way back in 1955. When I was finally brought back from Paris, it was the end of '54, and the course started in January '55, as I remember.

We were a small group, six or eight of us, and we all thought it was possible, within five years, maybe, at the most, ten years, China would be opening up again. (And of course it was far from that. Our time scale was off by at least ten or 15 years.) So we were all enthusiastic.

Most of us did not have any background in China. We were sort of starting out fresh. We realized that whereas you could study many Oriental languages which would have very little applicability outside of the country which speaks them, but studying Chinese could prove useful almost anywhere in the world. That's indeed the way it turned out.

Q: In the first place, it was Mandarin, is that right?

BURNET: Yes.

Q: How did you feel, because you hear about all these different dialects, and people in the south don't speak Mandarin and all that. Was that a bone of contention with the officers who were being trained or not?

BURNET: No, this is what you would want to do, because Mandarin is the official or national language. Any Chinese with any education is a speaker of Mandarin. It is the lingua franca of all of China, so that wherever you run into Chinese people you can turn on the Mandarin and you can make yourself known and feel comfortable doing it. Also, those Chinese who are not native-speakers of Mandarin look up to anybody who speaks the national language, so we automatically, if undeservedly, got their immediate attention and respect.

Q: Your first assignment then was where and when?

BURNET: Following the language training?

Q: Yes. Could you explain a little, what did the language training consist of?

BURNET: We started off. In Washington, about three months of really basic Chinese, learning the patterns of the language.

But, when we were sent out to Taiwan to this small town in the center of Taiwan, called Taichung, where the American Language School was set up (this was the very first class), we spent about six hours a day in classroom work and two or three hours at home at night.

The drill, of course, in classroom in those early months, was largely spoken. But, at a fairly early stage at the language school we started learning Chinese characters. And that took an awful lot of just bone-work, just memorization, and doing an awful lot of writing of characters over and over again, like a child.

The FSI system which we used is to try to replicate what a child does when he learns the spoken and written languages, by repetition, by "internalizing" sentence patterns and through drills. An awful lot of class work was involved in drills. It was sort of fun. We had five or six people in the class. You have, I'm sure, been exposed to this.

Q: I went to the Army Language School for a year, taking Russian.

BURNET: So you know the method that's used. It's the drill method, the basic sentence method.

You have to stay on your toes. Because, if you've got a good instructor he goes right around the room, sometimes not even in order, taking a sentence pattern through a substitution drill, and if you haven't paid attention to what the guy before you has said, you could be quite embarrassed if you forgot -- "What was that, sir? What were we doing?" So you have to stay alert.

Q: How did you feel when you came out? Did you feel pretty good about the grasp you had of it?

BURNET: I felt very good about it. I think that they had done a good job in training us to use both social and political Chinese. We were able to do our job.

***

Q: Your first post was then to Bangkok from '57 to '59. What were you doing there?

BURNET: I was in the political section, and we had an assignment there which was called the Chinese Language Officer slot. There had been several incarnations before me.

So my job was to get in touch with the local Chinese communities. Something that I very quickly got into, because my predecessor was being given a number of farewell entertainments by members of the Chinese community, and those were usually large affairs.

I remember when I got to Bangkok, it was six, seven, eight nights in row, feting my predecessor's departure and my arrival. And, as you know, at these Chinese affairs there's an awful lot of drinking and eating.

One thing you'll have to say about the Chinese is that they don't believe in drinking without eating, so that nobody really gets into trouble. But you have to have a cast iron stomach for all of the ganbei-ing, the chug-a-lugging of warmed rice wine -- or even Scotch -- that you'd do.

It was kind of hard on me physically, but I quickly got to know who the leaders were in the Chinese community.

Q: What was the importance of the Chinese community in Thailand to us?

BURNET: You see, this was in the period of the Cold War. And Southeast Asia and Thailand, being among the dominoes, we were interested in at least keeping the status quo.

We were worried about the Chinese community. We thought that this was a group of people who could easily be used by the mother country for subversion, in all kinds of ways, to bring about a change of allegiance in this part of the world. And we were there to try to see that Southeast Asia would hold together.

So we were interested in the way China, the mainland, Beijing was working on the Chinese community to make some headway with them. Taiwan, on its part, was trying to do a little bit. And our job was largely to try to work with those Chinese who were more or less favorably disposed to us and keep them in our camp. So we had to know them, know what was going on, see who was making the inroads and to what effect, and report this back to Washington.

Q: Well, how did you view the Chinese community there? Was it a strictly business-type community, really had very little connection with the Thai community, and did it play much of a role in Thailand?

BURNET: It played a very large role. All of the Chinese, even the formal community leadership, were deeply involved in business, and deeply involved with Thai Government officials.

They sort of wore two hats you could say: they had their Thai hat and their Chinese hat. I think the bigger and the fancier hat was the Thai hat, because this was where all their money was made.

All the Chinese knew each other and they monopolized trade. They were also connected by networks all the way back to China. There was a symbiotic relationship between the Thai and the Chinese as they needed each other.

The Chinese, being the superior businessmen, knew how to do business with one another, but they all had partners or associates who were Thai. So they could do business with one another in a way which really had nothing to do with the formal Chinese organization but be protected from arbitrary acts of the Thai Government.

But yet it was in the Chinese associations, the communities, that you got to know these people. My language and area training gave me easy entrée into that, but you had to know both sides of these Chinese leaders' lives.

Q: Well, did you feel at the time that the Peoples Republic of China, the Communist Chinese were making serious inroads into this group one way or another?

BURNET: They really weren't. There were not too many positive signs that they had any great effect on the general Chinese population. But yet you never knew for sure which way they were going. There was always the fear that they could get an inroad, maybe take over a newspaper or a Chinese school, so that we weren't too comfortable-feeling. Washington put a lot of time and effort into devising programs to keep the overseas Chinese lined up with the free world. But the attitude of the Thai Government was by far the most important factor in determining their loyalty.

Q: Well how did the political section view the stability of the Thai government? We're talking now from '57 to '59.

BURNET: Well of course when I arrived it was very unstable, because you had a very strong and powerful leader, who was long since past his peak, Pibul Songgram. And you had younger people coming up in the military, more ambitious and very powerful in the number of troops they commanded.

About two months after I got there, there was a coup (called a "coup de repos" because it was peaceful) which overthrew Pibul, and Marshal Sarit and his group came in. So there wasn't a feeling of stability when I arrived. There was a very definite feeling that a coup was coming, that there were going to be big changes in the works. So we were very anxious to report this to Washington.

There was a problem in that the then-Ambassador, having been there almost two years by that time, had become very close to Pibul.

Q: Who was that?

BURNET: This was Max Bishop. I remember one of the first things that I heard when I arrived in the political section was: Look, we've got a problem. We can't really report what's going on, because the Ambassador won't approve any reporting which is critical of Pibul or suggests he's on the way out.

The way we were to get out the story of what was going on in Bangkok and elsewhere in Thailand was to write memcons, because no one interfered with getting your memcons back to Washington. So the chief of our political section said, "I want you to get out lots of memcons and get the word across as to what's going on."

Q: The idea of a memcon, you're making no judgment. This is, you're talking to somebody, this person said we've got a problem here, and so you're just reporting the facts, ma'am, type of thing.

BURNET: It's legitimate reporting; however you hoped that there were things said in these conversations that would obviously lead to a conclusion of some sort.

Q: And you would be picking the people, too, to some extent.

BURNET: Oh, yes. You picked them, and then of course you knew what you wanted to ask them. So you pointed them in the direction, perhaps, where you were seeking information.

Q: Well now, often when you have an Ambassador who you feel has gone so committed to almost one side as you see another situation, there is not only the memcon route, there are other ways. When the desk officer comes to visit, or... Did you find there was much of this going on, too? Were people going on home leave and would...?

BURNET: You know, I don't remember that there was much contact back and forth in those days. I don't know just why there wasn't. I remember the chief of the political section had just returned from home leave, and... But still things were very unsettled in Bangkok. We were all concerned about what was going to happen, although in the event it went fine.

A continuing embarrassment for the political section was that up to the moment Pibul fled Bangkok in his sports car (to Cambodia) we could not send any reporting cables to Washington. By that time we should have sent many "Flash" cables! Finally, the Ambassador sent one which said simply, "Trust Department has seen reporting in other channels." A further irony was that a prominent U.S.-financed facility in Bangkok -- widely believed by the Thai press to be a CIA activity -- was attacked and wrecked by elements of Sarit's coup group. This was because it was a symbol of American support to the national police which was led by Sarit's arch-rival for power, Colonel Phao.

Q: How about when Sarit came in. Did that make much of a difference?

BURNET: Well, it certainly did. The Ambassador at that time realized (I think he realized) that he had made a mistake in not giving us a little more head in our reporting. So there was really no problem after that. Of course it was a totally new situation. There was lots of work for everybody to do to get to know the new crew. So we had a free hand. It was not long before Bishop was replaced by U. Alexis Johnson.

Q: How did you view Sarit and company when they came in?

BURNET: I think we had no particular animus against him. And we were certainly disposed to burrow in and to get to know him and the people behind him. Of course the Chinese were doing a lot of shifting of ground in the same way. I was interested to see how the Chinese were viewing Sarit, and how they were making their accommodations and so on. So it all fit. Every Thai leader certainly had his Chinese who associated with him, a whole group of people who had sort of made his money for him. The new military leadership were also involved heavily in business and had their Chinese associates.

Q: Well then you moved from there to the Far East Bureau. Was the division called the Bureau of the Far East then? When did you move out of INR? I have you going as Staff Assistant to Governor Harriman in the Far East from '61 to '63.

BURNET: Yes, I went to the Bureau of Far Eastern Affairs. We then called it that instead of East Asia and Pacific as it's now called... Jeff Parsons was Assistant Secretary. Dick Ericson, who was sort of a chief of mine in INR, had become his Staff Assistant. In those days, the Assistant Secretaries had only one Staff Assistant, as opposed to today when they have several. He told me that there would be a vacancy after Jeff Parsons was replaced by Walter McConaughy. Then Dick went off to become a special assistant in one of the Deputy Secretary offices. And so there was a vacancy there, and he said, "How would you like to be Staff Assistant for Walter McConaughy?"

And I said, "Sure."

So I went and had an interview and eventually got the job. And then Averell Harriman replaced McConaughy. I was there for the two years that Averell Harriman was the Assistant Secretary for Far Eastern Affairs.

Q: In two of our interviews we discussed from two points of view the situation in Korea in '61. I have an interview with Marshall Green in which he talks about being left without instructions of what to do when there was a coup that overthrew the government that succeeded Syngman Rhee. It was a democratic government, and Park Chung Hee took over. Then we have an interview with Donald McDonald, who was the Korean desk officer, and talking about, as it was termed, almost the near-paralysis of the Bureau of Far Eastern Affairs about what to do to our man in Seoul when there was a rapidly changing situation. How did you see it?

BURNET: I, of course, was kind of a little bit off on the side there, but I was reading all of this traffic back and forth. And I had the feeling that Seoul, or rather the Charge or whoever was writing the cables, felt that they were kind of left a little bit high and dry.

Q: That was Marshall Green who was Chargé, because actually McConaughy had gone back to Washington and had not been replaced. Sam Berger eventually was sent out there.

BURNET: That's right. I had forgotten that. I think there was sort of a softness in the leadership back in the Department. I can't give any specifics, though.

Q: I was wondering whether you had any feeling for this initial period, because the Kennedy

Administration had just taken over, and it was often at that time sort of the Foreign Service contingent was waiting to find out what their new masters want. And it was unclear to begin with, because Harriman was Ambassador-at-Large, or was not in charge of Far Eastern Affairs at that first point.

BURNET: No, but he was heading the negotiations going on in Geneva over Laos. He left Bill Sullivan in charge 1/ and came back to become Assistant Secretary in FE. Of course I became associated with him when he came aboard since I was in place as staff assistant under Walter McConaughy. McConaughy leaves; John Steeves is Acting for a while; Harriman arrives. I stayed on as the Staff Assistant. By the time Harriman came in I think we were pretty well settled in for this new Administration in Seoul. This was before Park Chung Hee. I can't remember now exactly when. I think it was about a year later, well after Rhee was thrown out, that Park pulled his coup. I'm a little bit... [RHEE RESIGNED APRIL 27, 1960. PARK TOOK OVER AS ACTING PRESIDENT MARCH 24, 1962]

Only a few months before the Governor had rather suddenly made Sullivan his deputy chief of delegation, replacing John Steeves. We heard that the Governor was very displeased when told that Steeves had given the Soviets a tongue-lashing when he was Acting Head in Harriman's absence.

Q: I think that was it, but they had a democratic, but a very weak democratic...

BURNET: A civilian, John Myon Chang, headed the new government, I remember.

Q: And then the coup came. And for about three days you had Marshall Green, who was saying, "We support democracy." But he was getting no particular support from Washington, because there were those who thought: Maybe they need a strong military dictatorship there. Although Park Chung Hee was an unknown factor. It was a lack of instructions from Washington. This was before Harriman was in there. It was McConaughy.

BURNET: Yes, it was before.

Q: Did you have any feeling when Harriman came on board, replaced McConaughy, that he was coming in to sort of sweep things clean or to really take charge? How did you feel about this?

BURNET: I think there was a feeling that at last we had somebody who had some political clout, particularly vis-à-vis the White House. So there was this feeling that at last we'll be able to get something accomplished and we will get things done, because Governor Harriman could really see that these things were done. Laos was a bone of contention with the USSR and it was thought that the Governor, knowing the Russians, could work out a compromise.

Although it's funny, this is in the period when we were worried about dominoes falling in Southeast Asia, and the Geneva Conference on Laos (1961-62) was ongoing. Harriman was trying to compromise with the USSR in Geneva and McConaughy was Assistant Secretary with responsibility for the ongoing negotiations. Bill Sullivan, who later on became our Ambassador to Laos, used to joke around the Bureau that we had two choices at this point in our history: We could either "falter with Walter or cave with Ave!"

Q: "Walter" being Walter McConaughy.

BURNET: So there was the changeover, you see, between the two. That crack was just for our own amusement. There was a good feeling about Harriman's coming in. Of course he was much too senior a gentleman and, really, to take that job. He had once been Governor of New York and was Secretary of Commerce in Roosevelt's cabinet after all.

Harriman, I think, really thought that here we were in a struggle with the Soviet Union over a little corner of Asia and that he, Harriman, knew the Russians and knew how to deal with them. And he knew how to strike a bargain. So that was his job.

Q: Of course he had been Ambassador during most of World War II.

BURNET: Yes, he said, "The President [Kennedy] has given me this job, because we can get along with the Soviet Union and we need to buy some time in Southeast Asia." This is what he set out to do. He succeeded, eventually, in achieving modus vivendi with the Soviets on Laos at the Geneva Conference of '62.

Q: There was a tremendous concentration on affairs in Laos in that period, wasn't there?.

BURNET: Yes, because this same view of Laos was seen from Moscow. Moscow was putting in a lot of effort, a lot of material, and a lot of people into that scene too. They had a supply line going into Laos, just as we did. They were flying things in: ammunition, equipment, and God knows what prestige was engaged on both sides.

Q: At that time why did we think of Laos as being so critical?

BURNET: Well here you had a situation on the periphery of China. This is where the Free World sort of rubbed up against the Communist world. And we thought that if we showed any sign of weakness we were going to lose out and bring the domino theory into play. And if we didn't show some strength, stand up to the Russians some way, we were going to lose the whole area.

Q: So it wasn't Laos per se.

BURNET: It was not so much Laos per se. Laos, you might say, was sort of the point man in the group of countries out there.

Q: You were around when people were thinking about things there. How did we see the Soviet Union and China? This would be '62, '63. Did we see them walking in lockstep?

BURNET: I'm afraid we saw them pretty much as a Sino-Soviet Axis. That they were working in lockstep, as you say. That they didn't make many moves without consulting the other, and that there was such a thing as a monolithic view of Communism. So I don't think that we really understood the long adversarial history behind these two great powers.

Q: In a way, after all, we'd gone through the process of Tito, back in '48 or so when Tito broke off. Here was the equivalent to Mao Zedong and a world leader. Obviously a much smaller country, but still. We have a good example of the forces of nationalism coupled with Communism. America has a long history in China, and studies and all. Were people talking? If not in the State Department with the China experts, were we talking about this, or had we sort of been fixated or something?

BURNET: I think we were fixated. I mean here's Governor Harriman, who had an intimate knowledge of the Soviet Union. He loved to talk about his wartime relationship with Stalin. He also knew something about the Chinese, although academically speaking he wasn't an expert on China.

But he had, after all, been there, I think before World War I, maybe, with his father. His father was in the railroad business. So that he was just a young man in that period.

But I don't remember Harriman's making a pitch that there are good reasons why China and the Soviet Union should not get along together. You know, Stu, they're ancient enemies, they occupy parts of the same huge land space, and so they're natural adversaries. I think that the idea of a Sino-Soviet Axis was very deeply imbedded in our world outlook. It was a convenient way of looking at the problem and it also reflected our fears.

Q: Well this continued, despite all evidence to the contrary, in our whole involvement in Vietnam. Inability to realize the enmity between the Chinese and the Vietnamese, which was the same...

BURNET: That's right. The same phenomenon there. Absolutely the same phenomenon. Despite lots of evidence to the contrary, which had been accumulating since about 1960 when the Soviets pulled their aid, lock, stock, and barrel, out of China. There were beginning signs of friction, but that didn't seem to make any difference. We kept to our view. Once you've made an investment in the opposite view, it's very difficult to change your mind in the middle of this process.

Q: Again, you had taken Chinese studies. Were any of these ideas perking within the Chinese group?

BURNET: They were. And the seeds were certainly planted early on in my Chinese training in the Foreign Service Institute. We were in touch with academics there who said, "Now look, you don't hear much about it now, but there are great sources of friction between China and the Soviet Union."

And they went back into some of the problems in history in the areas along the Manchurian border, where there are great unresolved border issues. The fact that they share the same land mass creates a natural kind of enmity between these two people.

So we were exposed to these ideas from the very beginning in my Chinese studies. But I'm not so sure that it made a very strong impression on many of us.

Q: What was Harriman's operating style, from your vantage point within the department and elsewhere?

BURNET: He's not a man of words. I think he's pretty much a man of action, in the sense of getting hold of the person who was vital to a particular problem or job that you had to do. Getting the right word to the right person at the right time. He's very good at that. He, of course, is extremely well connected all over Washington.

As part of the job, he made it very plain to me that I was going to be asked to do certain things. He didn't say so in so many words, but when he wanted something done, it was to be done.

And if it meant sneaking a piece of paper outside of the normal chain in the State Department directly to the White House, he'd say, "Frank, I want you to get this over to so and so in the White House right away." And he said, "Don't mention this to anybody in SS."

Q: "SS" being the secretariat which normally covers the distribution of papers.

BURNET: The paper chain would go from the Assistant Secretary level on up to the Secretary in SS, where it would be properly recorded and reproduced, and then sent in proper fashion, in their own sweet time, to the White House.

Well, lots of times in a fast-breaking situation there wasn't enough time for that, so he would ask me to take this over to Brom Smith, or whoever, in the White House right away, and I'd do that.

But he was frequently on the telephone to the White House, or telephone to God-knows-where. He was quite a doer. Lots of meetings held in his office. We'd have people coming in almost every day from CIA, certainly from AID. In those day, Laos took up an inordinate amount of time. That was the hot spot and involved all of us quite a bit.

Q: Well then, you went to the hot spot, didn't you?

BURNET: Following that, that's right. It was '63. I was coming up for an assignment again. Governor Harriman was moving up to Under Secretary for Political Affairs, and it came clear to me that whoever came in to succeed him would bring in his own staff. So it was a natural time for me to go. I was interested in going back to Asia. I kind of thought that Harriman had the right idea in what he was trying to do. And I thought I'd like to go to Laos. I had the French language background, so that it seemed to me a good assignment.

ROBERT MCCLOSKEY
Investigator, Refugee Relief Program
Hong Kong (1955-1957)

Ambassador Robert J. McCloskey was born in Pennsylvania in 1922. His Foreign Service career included positions in Hong Kong and Washington, DC, and ambassadorships to Cyprus, The Netherlands, and Greece. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1989.

MCCLOSKEY: A member in Congress, who I used to cover up there in Easton, Pennsylvania, and who I was chatting with about how nice it would be to be an American correspondent in Europe, said, "Why don't you think about the Foreign Service?" Then that was the start of something that lasted about 26 years. Then I got back to newspapering when I retired from the Foreign Service in 1981, by going to the Washington Post as the news critic of the paper. But I was never very far away from the newspaper business, or as news took on that awful word "media," because for something like ten or eleven years, I served as the spokesman for the Department of State. So I have some understanding of both sides of the street.

Q: What was your first assignment in the Foreign Service?

MCCLOSKEY: To the American consulate general in Hong Kong, as an investigator in the old refugee relief program in 1955.

Q: With Lorrie Lawrence and company?

MCCLOSKEY: Lawrence and others, yes. By a funny turn of events have been associated now for the last four and a half years with an agency that used to be exclusively a refugee agency, a private American agency, Catholic Relief Services. So I have a way of returning to earlier concepts and pursuits.

Q: While you were in Hong Kong, I wonder if you could just explain a little of what you all were doing -- I speak as a formal consular officer myself -- of consular work that was unique, that Hong Kong operation?

MCCLOSKEY: Yes, in 1953 the Congress passed some new refugee legislation that set quotas around the world for a period of three years. The total ran into several hundred thousand. In Western Europe, the quotas were broken up among individual countries. That's where the larger numbers were. There was one quota, however, to embrace all of the Far East, and Hong Kong had its share. It was on the order of fifteen hundred to two thousand, I believe, who were eligible for admission through the refugee relief program as part of the Hong Kong quota. These were mainly Chinese refugees from the mainland, who had made their way into Hong Kong beginning in late 1949 when the communists took over. The refugee program began in 1953. The special refugee program ran until the end of 1956. Other than Chinese nationals, there were a few more of the more exotic people of the world, white Russians, and others of European origin who had made their way into and lived in mainland China up until 1949 or the early '50s.

We processed the applications for visas. The regulations were that the individual or the family had to demonstrate that there was a sponsor in the United States who would look after the person or the family. I believe there had to be a certificate from the Labor Department that showed there would be work available to the individual or the family leader, mother or father.

Q: What was your impression of government operations of that sort and at that level?

MCCLOSKEY: I had the sense that the quotas were not very well balanced around the world on that particular program. It got me to wondering for the first time, I suppose, how much politics played in humanitarian issues. Surely, there were greater populations who were made refugees as a result of World War II in Europe than there were in the Far East, particularly with regard to China from 1949 on.

I had the sense, and this is hindsight, understand, that if this is the way government is run, it's damn near as chaotic, at times, as putting a newspaper together. That specific program brought in a lot of people, who stayed for only the life of that program, and then left government. But it worked, however untidy it was at times, and again from that vantage point, that part of the world could have used many more numbers than were allotted to it.

Q: I say this because I started out in 1955 as a refugee relief officer, and in Europe a significant proportion were given to refugees who, of all places, were in Italy, which was not a refugee place, and to The Netherlands, mainly because of Congressional pressures from people who had relatives there. How did you end up in the press business, starting off in this other field?

MCCLOSKEY: I had a desire to stay longer in Hong Kong. I arrived there in 1955, and this program expired with the legislation at the end of 1956. I had undertaken to learn Chinese. I was quite satisfied and, in fact, sought to stay on there as a USIA officer. That did not work, not because the people there didn't want it, but the people in Washington couldn't agree on it.

I came back, and was assigned to the UNESCO relations staff, which made me seriously consider leaving and getting back into the newspaper business. But I stuck it out for about a year, when I was asked whether I would be interested in joining the staff of the office of news in the Department, and said, "Yes, I would." And that's the beginning of a long association with the news operations of the State Department.

RICHARD ST. F. POST
Consular Officer
Hong Kong (1955-1958)

Richard St. F. Post was born in Spokane, Washington. He graduated from Harvard University and entered the Foreign Service in 1952. His career included positions in Somalia, Hong Kong, Swaziland, Lesotho, Angola, Canada, Portugal, Pakistan, and Washington, DC. Mr. Post was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1990.

Q: You had a tour from '55 to '58 in Hong Kong. What were you doing.

POST: As I said, we were all interchangeable parts, and that was my consular duty. I was still picking posts by their exotic name.

Q: What was the impression of the People's Republic of China, as far as you saw it?

POST: It was a nasty piece of work. They were a hostile presence. A very large hostile presence. Looming over us. We had virtually no contact. Except of course the Communist Chinese bank was right in the middle of Hong Kong. They had put it right up next to the Hong Kong Shanghai Bank, which had been the tallest building in Hong Kong. They put it up right next to it and had it two stories above the Hong Kong Shanghai Bank. We were conscious that there were Communist Chinese there. One was more aware of their presence when you went on trips to Macau, the Portuguese colony. To get there you had to take a ferry boat. Now they have hydrofoil. But in those days it was an overnight trip, generally, but very pleasant. You get to Macau and I remember the first time we went there, we were in a Chinese hotel, of course you are never very far from the water in Macau, and all night long, there was firing going on as Chinese refugees swam across that harbor from the other side, which was the Chinese side. The closest thing I came to have anything to do with China was interviewing people who came back, one or two Americans who had been imprisoned in China and who had been released while I was there. I then had to go up to the Lowu border, Lowu is a little town on the train station, the train comes down from Canton, stops at Lowu. I had go up there and certify to the British authorities that the person had not lost his or her American citizenship. And then take them back to the Consulate and ask them what had been going on. It was a pretty grisly picture that they painted.

DEREK SINGER
Assistant Training Officer, USAID
Taipei, Taiwan (1956-1958)

Mr. Singer was born in New York City and graduated from NYU and SAIS. He served in numerous USAID missions in Zaire, Kenya, Ecuador and Cameroon. He was interviewed by W. Haven North in 1999.

Q: What was the position in Taiwan?

SINGER: I was going to be a program officer, an assistant program officer, to begin with, which was something my SAIS MA and brief field experience seemed to qualify me for. I knew that this would be a challenge, but I was enthusiastic about it. Indeed, when I got off the plane in Taipei, a few weeks later, the person who met me said, "Oh, great, we are really happy to see our new Assistant Training Officer." I said, "No, I'm supposed to be the new Assistant Program Officer. Here is the letter that identifies my new job." So my new boss said, "That is okay, but the training position is more important right now, since the man who had it before had to leave very suddenly, and Washington can't replace him immediately. As a result, we have decided to give you that job." When I heard that, I began to wonder about AID's comparative advantage in its staff planning and career development. However, I agreed, and it turned out to be an excellent job and a good introduction to the foreign service. I was working for an extremely good person career officer named Cameron Bremseth who, at the time, was the Mission training officer. I don't know if you ever met him.

Q: No.

SINGER: Cam was a very good man, indeed. At that time, in the 1950s, in particular, AID was putting a lot of emphasis on human resources, training and education as a package that we had a significant number of senior as well as mid-level American staff, filling Mission positions in this area. Rather than today, where most, if not all, training positions are filled by nationals.

Q: This was when?

SINGER: This was in 1956.

Q: So, this is with ICA?

SINGER: Right.

Q: What was the situation in Taiwan at the time?

SINGER: A large, well-staffed American AID mission doing all kinds of things in fields such as civil engineering, construction, agriculture, a lot of health work, and even some food for peace work was underway. Taiwan was an ex-Japanese colony, recently liberated after World War II. But, the Japanese had occupied it and kept it pretty rural without economic development, much less industrial development, being on their minds at all over those decades. They didn't want competition with the home islands of Japan. They had, in fact, occupied Taiwan, calling it Formosa for 50 years, since 1895 when they took it over. Today, Taiwan is obviously a vastly different place - big, bustling, prosperous and definitely industrialized. We wouldn't think of having an AID Mission there today (not even considering the politics).

Q: The reason we had a big program there was?

SINGER: Because they needed it and after World War II, we wanted to show, of course, that we were perfectly capable of and interested in picking up and helping develop the ex-Japanese colonies around Southeast Asia. So, the Taiwan Experiment, as it was called, was a big one. It was an interesting one, certainly to cut my teeth on in terms of development work. They had a lot of American military there as well, a big American military presence. So, there were a lot of Americans all over the place. Nevertheless, much of the time, we would get around in rickety old taxis because we didn't have our own car for the first year or so, or even in pedicabs or rickshaws. As a matter of fact, they were quite prevalent in this rural little country, with a rural little town as its capital, where we lived for two years. Our second child was born there, by the way. So, we also have particularly fond memories of Taiwan. I mentioned Japan a couple of times. I was sent on TDY, temporary duty, to Japan for a four-month period during my two year assignment to Taiwan. We actually had an operating AID mission in Tokyo, though a good deal smaller than Taiwan's. Partially, it was there for political purposes, but basically it was for training purposes. We were very interested in providing advanced, technical training to the Japanese and, as time went by, "third country training" in Japan to other Asians. Since I was, in fact, a training officer, I was sent on temporary duty to replace the regularly assigned American training officer in Tokyo. That was also very interesting.

Q: What did a training officer do in a place like Taiwan?

SINGER: Well, one of the big things I did was to run an English training program. I did that both on Taiwan and, in what turned out to be my next assignment, in Costa Rica, for much of my time. I also did a lot of screening, interviewing, selection, and placement of Taiwanese and Chinese participants. Of course, the Taiwanese were the people actually born there, while the Chinese were those who came over from the Mainland, escaping the Communists with General Chiang Kai-shek in 1949. Anyway, it was a very busy job. We also did follow-up studies to try and see what was happening and how well the participants had been doing after they came back.

Q: You sent them to the States?

SINGER: We sent them to the States and sometimes to third countries.

Q: Were there any particular fields that were prominent?

SINGER: Once again, the same field as I stated a moment ago, which reflected our Mission's country priorities. We were especially heavy in such technical areas as engineering, municipal construction, road building, dams, water supply, health and agriculture.

Q: Any people stand out in your mind that you were involved in sending for training?

SINGER: Well, there are several with whom we do keep up still on sort of a Christmas card basis. Perhaps, the most interesting thing there though, now that you bring it up, was that there was also something called the "Chinese Army Officers' Language School." I remember "China" was used, not the word "Taiwan" or "Taiwanese", since at that period the people in control insisted that this was the "real China" (and many still do). This was "Free China", represented by the legitimate Chinese leadership that had escaped with Chiang Kai-shek in 1949. These people were convinced they were really still running China, and they just happened to be temporarily in exile from the Mainland to which they would soon return. Generally, the Mainlanders ran the country. In any case, my wife became a teacher at this school. She spent a lot of time, four or five days a week, teaching, and she got to know a lot of young Chinese officers.

Q: Teaching English?

SINGER: Teaching English, yes. Though other subjects were being taught, of course, by our own military mission, which was sizeable in Taiwan at the time. One day Ruth brought home an officer student. The young man took one look at our Taiwanese, I mean Taiwanese (not Chinese) maid, Skekko. She was about 16 or 17 at the time, he was about 21, and he asked her out. They fell in love, got married and we still keep up with them. They have several children. He rose through the ranks to become a top army general. My wife took a trip back to Taiwan a few years ago, while we were living in Kenya, as a matter of fact, and was wined and dined and shown all around the island there by our ex-maid, the General's wife, in a chauffeured car - basically treated like royalty. So, that was one of the unexpected pay-offs with people whom we got to know and meet on that beautiful island.

Q: What kind of numbers are you talking about, of the people we sent for training?

SINGER: Oh, well. As far as I can remember, we were into the hundreds on a yearly basis, several hundred a year, in different fields and areas. So, adding them all up, we are talking about trying to follow and setup records for several thousand people by the time I got there. The mission already had been operating for five or six years. We must have trained the majority of the future technical industrial, scientific and engineering leaders, in particular, that now run that country.

Q: You say, they are running it now?

SINGER: Right. They are running it now. We obviously tried to lean over as much as we could to train Taiwanese, native born Taiwanese, along with the mainlanders from China, and I think that strategy worked. It contributed, in an important way, towards an overall policy now, whereby the Taiwanese and the Mainland Chinese are now sharing power in Taiwan. I think the Mutual Security Mission to China did our best to help bring this about.

Q: Were there any particular issues that stood out in your mind that you had to address during that time?

SINGER: Well, let's just say that Taiwanese and Chinese, alike were very cooperative with us. I mean we had very few problems compared to some that I did have later on in the training and education field, in which I stayed for a number of years. But, we had very, very, few problems in Taiwan. They were all extremely eager to study abroad. They worked diligently to prepare themselves, particularly in acquiring the English they needed to have to gain acceptance at most American training institutions, especially the universities, which in the 1950s were not accustomed to many foreign students. They were not really welcoming, perhaps, of those who had language problems, in particular, when they sought to get into graduate study programs. We tried to stick to graduate students as much as we possibly could because, even then, in its sort of rural post-Japanese colonial state in the 1950s, there were a number of undergraduate institutions, colleges and universities that Taiwanese could go to. We are including Japan, by the way, where they were still welcomed. So, the mission tried to stick to graduate studies and, as I said, we were pretty successful.

Q: Do you think they were pretty well prepared before they went for training?

SINGER: They were quite well prepared. Their basic grounding in their professional fields was good. Most came from these national institutions, which had been founded by professionals during the 50 year Japanese occupation (1895-1945). So they had a pretty strong undergrad education, but mastering English sufficiently was the trick. Little or none was taught during the long Japanese occupation. That is why there was so much emphasis, not only in that Army Language school, but in our AID and USIA-run language schools, as well. The British Council had a big program as well, and there were many small private schools to teach English that were also springing up, too. Training students in the English language was extremely important, and they realized it was the key to getting into good graduate schools in the English-speaking world.

Q: Any particular views about the Taiwanese culture?

SINGER: Well, it was a tapestry of many cultural artifacts, rich local cultural traditions, with many changes also introduced from the Mainland when the hundreds of thousands of Chinese came who had escaped in the late 1940s (ending in 1949 with the evacuation), the Japanese heritage, and an interesting aboriginal culture native to the island. Overall, yes, there was plenty of "culture." There is also an indigenous Taiwanese culture, derived from the few thousand indigenous Taiwanese, fairly primitive people who lived in the mountains. I'm sure there still are. They had a certain amount of cultural, artistic tradition as well.

Q: What were the characteristics you saw in those days that might have suggested why Taiwan blossomed so rapidly and so successfully?

SINGER: Well, that is an excellent question. Frankly, I was not clever enough to foresee, although perhaps others did, what was going to happen. Our assistance programs, military and civilian, of course, helped a great deal to rebuild the infrastructure within that island that eventually gave it the chance to industrialize and to become strong and diversified.

Q: You're talking physical infrastructure?

SINGER: Yes, physical infrastructure. Training programs and those of many other countries and activities also helped to prepare the human infrastructure necessary, and investment capital was available.

Q: Were we involved in local education institutions, as well ?

SINGER: We were, particularly the missionary groups which were quite active in Taiwan, especially after they had been thrown out of the Mainland by the Communists when they took over. In the late 1940s, early 1950s, they threw them out. Many of them came to Taiwan, started school, most of which were subsidized by those who contributed from American churches to their missions' operations overseas. Obviously, they were out to proselytize, but they also educated, provided health care, and imparted technical training as well to a lot of Taiwanese. That helped a lot. There was a big missionary infrastructure.

Q: Was our foreign assistance program supporting development of any indigenous educational institutions ?

SINGER: Well, now you are taking me pretty far back here. As I recall, yes, we were. I know that there was an active education office, but it was not the same as mine. We had such a big mission there. We must have had, I don't know, 40 or 50 direct hires, as such, at that mission, at the time. We were spread out and we were, to some degree, compartmentalized. Obviously, we all concentrated on our particular concerns. My concern was preparing people for international study of one kind or another through our well-staffed training office. It was not the same as the in- country education office. I didn't get that deeply into knowing what they were doing, but I do know there was support for building up local training and education organizations, teachers' colleges, etc.

Q: Anything else on that experience? That was quite a beginning.

SINGER: Well, towards the end of my first two year tour at MSA, our Mission Security Mission to China, specifically, MSM/C was the name of our mission. It may have been part of MSA, overall, but that is what we were called. Anyway, towards the end of that first two year tour I had with AID, I was asked whether I wanted to sign up for another tour, because four years at an AID post was not the standard it later became. Still, it was normally a question of an officer just saying "yes", if a mission wanted you to stay. That was the way the system worked at the time. Well, I preferred to go to the "real" Southeast Asia. Remember, I had studied places like Vietnam, Cambodia, and Laos, Thailand, Indonesia, and so forth. I was particularly interested, intellectually at least, in Southeast Asia somewhere to the south of where we were in Taiwan. We had missions in all of those countries at the time. So, I said, "I would kind of like to find out whether there is anything open there." I had met a fellow named Lee St. Lawrence, I don't know whether that is a name you remember or not.

Q: Yes.

SINGER: He turned out to be the Director in Laos at the time. I wrote to him saying, "I am kind of interested, if you have a slot open there in Laos, to join you there after Taipei." He wrote back, "Sure, that would be fine. I am interested and we are building up our mission here." So, I told Ruth and the two children to get ready for Vientiane, and we sent sort of a courtesy message to AID Washington (or MSA Washington), to tell them, you know, "Singer is interested in a switch." The mission in Taipei said, "We would like him to stay, but we would release him." We figured that would be a quick turnaround, that Washington would come back and say, "Okay, fine." That is the way it had happened before: if everybody was happy, no problem. This time, though, Washington came back and said, "No, we want Singer to go to Costa Rica. We have looked up his record and found that he speaks Spanish, and we need a Spanish speaker with some background in international training to go to Costa Rica now as the Training Officer." Again, remember training was a pretty important at AID missions, most of which had one or two American direct hire training officers. So, I looked up Costa Rica in the atlas and, as it looked like a pretty nice place, I said yes. My boss said, "This is the first time we ever heard of Washington interfering in a field-arranged transfer when everybody else had agreed. But, if you are happy with that, go ahead." So, we decided to go back to Latin America, and San Jose was certainly worth it!

JAMES MOCERI
Deputy Public Affairs Officer, USIS
Taipei, Taiwan (1956-1959)

James Moceri was born and raised in Washington, DC. He entered into the USIA in 1951. His career included positions in Bari, China (Taiwan), Sudan, and France. Mr. Moceri was interviewed by G. Lewis Schmidt in 1990.

MOCERI: Well, so much for my Italian reminiscences. In 1956 I knew that if I remained in the Italian program I could expect nothing more than a third tour of duty as a branch PAO, regardless of Nordness's high regard for my capabilities. I also sensed that there were people in the service who thought of me as a narrow Italian specialist. More importantly, I was convinced that I had to learn and understand a good deal about our Washington operations before returning to the field in whatever position of responsibility. And I was very much concerned about the problem of guiding my daughter, who was just turning sixteen after seven continuous years in Italy, through a probably difficult reentry into American life and the American school system. I expressed all these concerns to Ned Nordness and emphasized that I needed a firm commitment that I would be assigned to a position in Washington. In due course I received the assurances I sought from Nordness. I left Italy at the end of 1956 with great regret, especially in the wake of the Hungarian and Suez crises, but with peace of mind over the prospect of a Washington assignment.

My travel orders read "for home leave" to be followed by consultation in Washington. When I returned to Washington in 1956, I was dismayed to learn from the personnel office that there was no assignment for me in Washington. In fact I was being scheduled to go to Bombay as the cultural affairs officer at that branch USIS office. The news outraged me, and I boiled over with anger. I flatly refused to go. Such a personnel action was utterly senseless. It was idiotic to send me back into the field, still with so little knowledge of, let alone experience in, Washington operations. My performance in Italy had been openly praised by people whose opinion I valued. To the considerable satisfaction of the country PAO and the Ambassador I had for more than three months managed and in some respects improved a USIS country program with a staff of 48 officers (almost all of whom outranked me) and a $6 million budget. Why in the world should I accept a position ranking below the one I had occupied in Florence (with all its complexities) for virtually five years? After much fruitless discussion I was summoned to the office of the area director for the Near East and South Asia, Hunt Damon. A lengthy, icy discussion failed to change my mind. Ending the discussion, Damon angrily informed me that he would see to it that I would regret my refusal to the end of my Agency career.

While the Office of Personnel was working out my personnel problem, I was assigned to a seminar on communist theory and practice. Nothing about that three-week course, including the appearance of Lyman Kirkpatrick reputed to be the governmental authority on communism, served to alter my rather low estimate of the level of intellectual discourse in the Agency. I had, after all, spent a rather considerable part of my graduate work on the political and intellectual history of Europe in the 19th century, including the origins and growth of Marxist thought and influence in pre-Fascist Italy; and I had lived for seven years in virtually daily proximity to the communist presence, polemics and threat to the democratic institutions of Italy.

Finally, the Director of Personnel, L.K. Little, called me in to inform me that I was being offered an overseas assignment that took care of most of my previous objection. The position was that of deputy PAO in Taipei. L.K. Little informed me that the PAO, Ralph Powell, had such extraordinary access to the highest levels of the Chinese Nationalist government that his intelligence information and political advice were vitally important to the ambassador on a virtually daily basis. This was summed up in the rather crude phrase, "Powell practically sits on the Ambassador's lap." The enormity of the claim would have been apparent to anyone who had the slightest acquaintance with Ambassador Rankin. I was also reminded how important all this and anything that strengthened this relationship were to the success of the Dulles-Robertson policy on China. This argument I found absurd: I had long held the opinion that our China policy was as meaningless as the Dulles "rollback" policy for Eastern Europe. Nevertheless I finally realized I had no realistic alternative. For once I received a decent set of country program briefings from an area office, IAF, particularly from Jim Halsema and Jack O'Brien. Everyone, especially George Hellyer, the Area Director, impressed on me the importance to the Agency that I run the entire USIS Taipei program on a daily basis for Ralph Powell. Unfortunately, I soon learned, at no little cost to myself, nobody bothered to convey that message -- delicately or indelicately -- to Powell.

After an exhausting 26-hour flight from Seattle (attributable to powerful head-winds over the North Pacific) we arrived at the Taipei airport at 8:30 in the morning. We were met by Powell and his wife. Powell rushed us through customs because it was imperative that I be at the Ambassador's 9:00 o'clock staff meeting. I never did understand why. Mrs. Powell insisted that after checking into the Grand Hotel my wife begin her rounds of diplomatic calls that very morning. When I asked for assistance in locating housing, both the Embassy administrative office and Powell, himself, told me to check the English-language China Post newspaper and have my wife order a pedicab through the hotel. If I thought all this strange indeed, I was only beginning to learn how really weird was the environment in which I would have to work.

The USIS staff initially regarded me with some suspicion, the outsider, the newcomer who had to prove himself to them. I quickly realized that I would have to prove to each staff member, as tactfully as possible, that I knew his work and the nature of his responsibilities as well as he did. And I soon learned that with the exception of the executive officer every member of the American staff was new to the Agency and on his first assignment. I found it inconceivable and unconscionable that Washington could ever have allowed such a situation to happen. Within weeks I felt I had won their confidence as they began to understand that I cared about their work and their problems. Neither then nor later was the Chinese staff a problem.

Within days of my arrival I had my first intimation of the difficulties I would have to anticipate in carrying out the USIS program in the name of Ralph Powell. He came into my office one day holding in his hand a copy of a routine cable from Washington on a rather minor program matter. He informed me that this was a personal message to him from the Agency Director and I should handle the matter in that context. I soon discovered that he indeed believed that any communication from USIA Washington bearing the name of the Director was a personally directed message to Powell. The day after his first trip away from Taiwan since my arrival in Taipei he stormed into my office to accuse me of concealing a telegram from him. I patiently explained why the Embassy system of handling telegraphic traffic made it impossible to conceal a telegram for a senior official. I realized that he found my explanation unpersuasive. Before long Powell began accusing me openly and sometimes in the presence of others of systematically turning the staff against him. Our relations became increasingly strained during the rest of his tour. Because there was so much in the relationship that struck me as irrational and almost unbelievable I decided never to give as much as a hint of these problems to anyone in or from Washington. Well after Powell's departure from Taipei, Jim Halsema told me privately that IAF had been well aware of the difficulty and had been impressed by the fact that I had maintained a total silence on the subject. And I mention the matter here only because it is so illustrative of the consequences of errors in personnel selection.

Despite these problems I did over time succeed in giving our USIS program some shape, substance and coherence. I had to establish as an operational reality the concept that USIS Taipei was not an appendage of the USAID to satisfy whatever public relations whim it entertained. Learning that the single largest charge against our program budget was the cost of publication materials extolling the accomplishments of the Chinese Nationalist regime and sent to our Southeast Asia posts for distribution to the overseas Chinese communities, I determined to check this out with other S.E. Asian posts. Visits to those posts and discussions with the PAOs convinced me that the materials were neither wanted nor used. The most frequently adduced reason was that the host government for nationalistic motives resented the distribution of such materials. I succeeded in abolishing the program and diverted the funds to other program needs.

Perhaps my most important and enduring accomplishment -- certainly the most time-consuming - - was the design and refurbishing of new USIS facilities, both expanding and increasing the efficiency of our program capabilities. In the wake of the destruction of our USIS offices allegedly by a "rioting mob" just two months after my arrival in Taipei, the Taipei regime eventually ceded to USIS the use of the long-abandoned great fortress headquarters of the former Japanese governors-general of Formosa. The huge building was in such a state of disrepair that it had to be stripped to the skeleton frame and the entire interior reconstructed to serve efficiently our staffing and programming requirements. Because the Embassy building interior had been effectively wrecked in the same incident, the Embassy administrative staff claimed it could give me no assistance in the task establishing our new USIS headquarters. The entire burden of that task fell on my shoulders: locating and hiring a local Taiwanese architect-consultant, contracting for and supervising the extensive physical alterations, establishing all our design needs, scouring and acquiring in the Hong Kong markets all the furnishings and equipment. The final results were judged even by the Embassy staff to be impressive and handsome.

A word of explanation is required here to rectify the gross misconceptions surrounding the incident in which the Embassy and USIS quarters were destroyed on that Black Friday of May 1957 and the events leading to that incident. The incident had its origin in an event that had occurred a very few weeks before: an American sergeant had shot and killed a "Peeping Tom" Chinese coolie. Publicly, it appeared to be a commonplace, minor tabloid story with only two mildly titillating aspects, a glimpse of sex and the resulting confrontation of a white American soldier and a non-descript Chinese male. The facts were quite different: the Chinese was a colonel in the intelligence organization headed by Chiang-ching-kuo, son of the President, and he had been shot in the back, probably as a result of a quarrel over the division of spoils from an illegal activity. A subsequent Ambassador's staff meeting dealt entirely with the question of how to handle the episode discreetly and with the minimum damage to American-Chinese relations. After listening to much discussion and very conscious of my position as an absolute newcomer, I suggested and argued for a two-step solution: first, the Embassy should make a formal apology to the Chinese government, extend its deepest regrets to the widow of the colonel and offer an appropriate monetary compensation in accordance with Chinese tradition and practice; and second, the American should be tried as soon as possible in an American court-martial in Taipei, found guilty of murder, removed immediately from Taiwan, and at an appropriate time allowed to appeal the verdict in another military jurisdiction. The Ambassador seemed at least interested in my proposal, but the military present rejected it in the most vehement terms, draping themselves in the honor of the American flag and the military code of justice.

Within a very short time the court-martial, open to the public, was convened. A verdict of "not guilty" was brought in. The Americans, the great majority of the public present, rose to their feet and cheered. According to all reports, the few Chinese present maintained a stunned silence. The next day, Black Friday, the Chinese authorities took their revenge or, as I put it then, taught a lesson the Americans could neither ignore nor forget. At about ten that Friday morning a group of about twenty stalwart Chinese males, armed with crowbars, entered the Embassy building and proceeded to smash everything in sight. A few Americans, who tried to hide in the building rather than attempting escape, were injured. In the meantime a large, orderly and very quiet crowd of Chinese gathered around the perimeter of the Embassy ground to watch the unfolding spectacle. For that day and the entire weekend the American community was rife with reports of a rioting Chinese mob in the tradition of the anti-foreign Chinese riots around the turn of the century. The American media, as far as I could tell, indulged the same fantasy. There was not a shred of evidence of any rioting anywhere in the city.

On hearing of the activity at the Embassy, I decided to keep the USIS facilities open as long as possible without endangering the staff or Chinese in our facility. Late that afternoon at about four o'clock I was informed that the Chinese "wrecking squad" (as I even then referred to it) was leaving the Embassy and apparently was headed in the direction of our building. Quietly I ordered our office closed, sent everyone home, secured the building and left the premises at four-thirty. Half an hour later the wrecking crew arrived, accomplished its mission and vanished. It could hardly escape my attention that the USAID building was not a target. The following week I began an intensive search for photographic evidence of the behavior of the Chinese crowd at the Embassy. I soon had a collection of twenty or twenty-five photos, collected from various sources. From that evidence the only conclusion that could be drawn was that a group of perhaps two hundred Chinese men, women and children had gathered or been gathered to watch -- without the slightest sign of emotion -- an interesting spectacle. I sent all the photographs together with my report on the damages to USIS to USIA Washington. When I left Taipei two years later and checked into Washington, I asked about the photographs. They could not be found.

Because I took very deliberate care not to circumvent my PAO, I saw little of Ambassador Rankin during these events and for the remainder of his tour. My impression was that at least outwardly he did not display the agitation and outrage that much of his staff wallowed in.

I had established, I thought, a good working relationship with him. I had developed respect for the man because he was judicious and calm and, I think most importantly, he knew what the limits of embassy influence really were. He had no illusions on that score. On my final meeting with him, a courtesy call just prior to his departure -- I'm jumping ahead, now, chronologically -- he said to me, "This has been an interesting tour, but the decisions affecting the fate of this island are not made here. They are made in Washington, Moscow, and Peking." Here was a man who understood clearly the limits of his power and the influence of the American Embassy.

I mention this because I'd been urged by members of the political section of the embassy to turn my attention and USIS activities to the Taiwanese people, as distinguished from the mainland Chinese, and convince them about the value of democracy and the institutions of democracy and so on, and how America was really their friend. All of which, I regarded as utter nonsense, because there was no way that the Chinese Government was going to allow me to approach the Taiwanese population, which, at that point, was being held down very, very firmly.

On the other hand, there were taking root within that society, a number of rather important democratic patterns or practices, at any rate. These became possible because Chinese mainlanders were carrying out in Taiwan what they failed to do on the mainland: a very aggressive and effective land reform program, and setting up agricultural cooperatives, because no peasant could own more than approximately three acres of land.

The agricultural economy had to have credits if it was to rise above the subsistence level, feed a burgeoning population and generate foreign exchange. Through the cooperatives, the farmers themselves started pressing for measures. They needed credits. They needed fertilizer. They needed seed and tools. And pressuring the Chinese Government -- the Chiang Kai-shek government -- brought them such returns. This was democracy in action at that level. It was shaping the practice of democratic discussion and debate and the arts of exerting pressures on governmental entities. I regarded that as something that had to come out of the soil of Taiwan itself. It was not something any USIS operator was going to instruct a foreign populace about. [Laughter]

Q: Was the Chiang Kai-shek government at all responsive to those pressures?

MOCERI: They had to be, because they needed the food supplies for them and for the fastest growing population in the world and they needed the export earnings.

Q: So they really did give them some break, then?

MOCERI: Oh yes, they did. And that is why the Taiwanese Nationalists, who called for the overthrow of the government and so on, all from the safe haven of the Japanese islands, were, I think, off base. Democratic practice cannot be imposed even by an exile movement, because the democratic practice has to have grass roots. It has to be born in the soil and be nurtured in the soil, in the land and the spirit of a nation. And in Taiwan of the fifties it was slowly, in this way, forming. And we can see the evolution of this process even now for I think what is happening in Taiwan today goes back to those early roots.

Q: I was just going to say, that was laying the groundwork and the foundation for the economic miracle that has been wrought in Taiwan.

MOCERI: Precisely, you see. Because it was those exports, the exports of that food, because they proved capable of producing far more than the needs of the island, far more. You know, they could routinely get three crops of rice every year. This fueled the exporting to Japan and to Korea and so on.

An interesting aspect -- another aspect that I'd seen -- of the agricultural revolution, was that the landlords, the great 300 families -- and I don't know whether they were 300 more, plus or minus something -- were given what seemed to be worthless bonds by the Chinese Government. These were, in effect, holdings in paper enterprises that then became the capitalist vehicles responsible for creating the light industry of Taiwan. These were the people who then became the owners and managers of the new industrial enterprises.

So there's a displacement of a class. And that displacement eventually created the opportunity for a different type of economic adventure, which then became the basis for Taiwan's remarkable industrialization, none of which people in '57, '58, and '59, when I served in Taiwan, could have foreseen.

Q: Not only could they not foresee it, but I don't think they fully understand, yet, what the base of that sudden explosion of industrial accomplishment has been or from what it came. I don't think it's fully realized to this day.

MOCERI: Well, that leads me into another thought. I wanted to get...

Q: Before you get into the other thought, just as a matter of curiosity, where was Ralph Powell in all this, during that time? And what happened?

MOCERI: Well, Ralph Powell's tour came to an abrupt end in 1958, during the Far Eastern Ambassador's Conference, which that year was held in Taipei. George Hellyer came out. Drumright was then the ambassador. The director of the Agency came out.

Q: By that time, Larson had probably been replaced?

MOCERI: Yes, he'd been replaced.

Q: It was George Allen that came out?

MOCERI: Yes, of course.

Q: He was the new director.

MOCERI: Well, I had asked my wife to set up a luncheon for Allen and Hellyer and the entire USIS staff at our house. We had luncheon there, in a fairly modest house, prepared by Modesta. And we knew, we all sensed at that luncheon, that all was not well. Of course, Powell was there.

What happened? About midway in the conference, Drumright called in George Hellyer and George Allen and said, "I want this man removed and I want him removed immediately."

Well, then it couldn't be done during the conference, so they asked for a week's time to get him out. Drumright simply could not tolerate him. He wanted him out of his hair. Now, I think that both Allen and Hellyer, reluctantly, had to abide by his request because Ambassador Drumright said he'd take it up with the Secretary of State if they weren't prepared to satisfy his wishes. That marked the end of Ralph Powell's career in Taipei.

Q: I think it marked the end of his career in USIA.

MOCERI: Yes, it was very brutal and very sad, in a way. I'd had terrible difficulties but, you know, I felt sorry for the man. But I later learned that we as a government do not do these things very gracefully. [Laughter] I learned that, particularly, in the Kennedy Administration, by the way.

Q: But then did you become the PAO?

MOCERI: I was made acting PAO. So I functioned with that transitory title for the remainder of my tour because, I think, Drumright may have made it known he wanted eventually to bring in USIS people he knew. And after the Quemoy crisis broke out, he brought in Dick McCarthy on a special detail and John Bottaeff as his deputy. I was phasing out, by that time. They were there, presumably, to help. But I couldn't quite understand why I needed that help. [Laughter] I and my information officer, Lucien Agniel, could have managed quite well. I knew the problems and knew something of the Quemoy crisis and the reasons for it and what the Chinese were trying to do.

Now I am reminded that I must refer to certain earlier episodes including a terrible dispute with Ralph Powell and the deputy chief of mission, a man named Pilcher, who was our chargé d'affaires for the period between Rankin's departure and Drumright's arrival.

Q: Oh, Jim Pilcher?

MOCERI: Jim Pilcher.

Q: Who had been the supervising consul general in Japan when I was in Japan, 1952-56. So I knew Jim very well. A Georgian.

MOCERI: Well, I don't know what your feelings are, so I hope you won't be offended by anything I say.

Q: I liked him personally, but I had reservations about his capabilities.

MOCERI: One of my early introductions to official American attitudes toward the Chinese occurred at an evening in Pilcher's home with the director of Chinese information and several other dignitaries, Powell, and myself. I was appalled to hear Pilcher, at one point, as we sat around after dinner, telling the Chinese about the glories of their own civilization and how civilized they were when we, in the West, were still swinging from the trees by our tails. You know, this is not conversation at some casual bar. This is the American deputy chief of the American mission, talking to a representative...

Q: Representative of the government.

MOCERI: ...foreign government. I'd never heard anything like this in my life. I couldn't believe what I was hearing. And I thought to myself, "Well, this is a consequence of the Dulles-Robertson line. We have to kowtow, in the traditional terms, to representatives of the Chinese Government.

Q: What did Ralph Powell say to that, by the way?

MOCERI: Nothing. Nothing.

Q: Nothing?

MOCERI: Nothing. When I gave vent to my surprise the next day, he couldn't understand what I thought was wrong about this. Now I really began to wonder whether it was really to be my fate in the foreign service to be repeatedly caught up in some very odd situations. I must recall here a couple of the odd things that had happened to me in Italy. An inspector-general recommended in 1953 that I be sent back to the United States for re-Americanization -- a recommendation based solely on a conversation during the course of a luncheon that he arranged for me to have with him in Rome, in a cafe in Rome. The luncheon was to be in place of the inspection he had not done at my post in Florence because his wife had wanted to use that day for shopping. He started out with a question about Italian politics. So I proceeded to lay out for him all the essential elements of the Italian political structure and what was happening in the world of Italian politics. Assuming from the questions he kept addressing to me that he really wanted to know something of the political geography of Italy I went on at some length. And on that basis, he decided that I was much too involved in Italian affairs, I reflected an Italian attitude and needed to be re-Americanized.

Q: Who was the inspector?

MOCERI: Fred Oechsner.

Q: I don't think I knew Fred.

MOCERI: He had been head of the AP bureau in Berlin, if I'm not mistaken, in the 30s. A very fine gentleman.

Q: Was he the public member of the inspection team?

MOCERI: No, he was with the State Department. He was the State Department inspector with the responsibility of inspecting USIS activities in Italy. There was no team.

Q: I see.

MOCERI: Then later, before leaving Washington for Taipei, a woman in the Office of Personnel suggested I look in my personnel file. That's how I learned about this. I also learned that after I had been in Rome as acting country PAO for three months -- or at that time, and in spite of what people knew about my relationship with Mrs. Luce -- an Embassy panel sitting in Rome had recommended that I be discharged from the Service.

At any rate, these incidents may help, in fact, to understand why I took so intransigent a position in two clashes that I had with Ralph Powell and Pilcher over what I viewed as the proper execution of my own responsibilities. I invoked my rights, as a Foreign Service officer, to report to Washington what I had observed and been told, that was of direct concern to U.S. policy interests.

One of the reporters -- I don't want to confuse names, so I'll leave them unnamed -- had been given very rough treatment by the Chinese Government. He had a solid reputation as one of the best American correspondents in the Far East. Based in Hong Kong, he had come to Taipei to cover Taiwanese developments in a series of articles for the New York Times. The Chinese did everything to keep him from getting out of his hotel in Taipei.

I thought, you know, "This is idiotic on the part of the Chinese." Here is a correspondent who has an excellent reputation in the Far East. And he's writing for the most important newspaper in the United States. Give him assistance. You know, maybe there are certain things you don't want him to get into, but there are ways of handling this.

He was absolutely livid. He had planned to spend a considerable amount of time on this particular assignment. And he realized that they weren't going to let him get out of Taipei for anything. He voiced his complaints to our press officer, Lucien Agniel. Agniel came to me with this story and I said, "Well, this has got to be reported. It's too serious. Washington ought to know about this. Because, obviously, the correspondent is going to get in touch with his home office. And there are going to be inquiries. Both USIA and the Department ought to be aware of this."

Well, neither Powell nor Pilcher would let me send the message. I had drafted it over my signature and I wanted it forwarded. Well, I insisted on what I felt were my right as a Foreign Service officer and said, "Look, I'll file a protest on this." So they gave in and finally sent it in.

Not very long after that the question of Drumright's appointment as ambassador to Taipei came up. The Chinese Government had given its agrément to his appointment, but he made some unfortunate remarks in Hong Kong, before coming to Taipei. Reportedly he had indicated that the Nationalists would not find him the soft touch that Rankin had been. They'd find him very hard to deal with. They certainly weren't going to get the fighter planes that they'd asked for and that Rankin had promised them. Rankin was great at delaying tactics and he just kept delaying, delaying, delaying, which was proper because they couldn't take offense at that. He'd cite complications, difficulties, bureaucratic procedures, all kinds of reasons, you see.

Well, obviously, the Chinese in Taipei got wind of what was being said in Hong Kong. They had very good sources in Hong Kong. They came to Lucien Agniel and me to express their dismay and their disappointment. The editor of the Chinese Post, which was the local English-language paper, and other informal emissaries, were sent to the two of us.

So I drafted a message about this and wanted to send it to both State and USIA. Obviously, this development had to be of concern. Washington has to know about these things. The Chinese had wanted very deliberately and quite unofficially to get their unhappiness on the record. It was inconceivable to me that the information I had should or could be withheld from Washington. Our people there had to know that, as I put it, "there's a buildup of resentment here and this is a problem that's going to have to be dealt with."

Powell and Pilcher categorically refused to let me send the message. We had a long, heated argument, which degenerated into a shouting match. I had stopped smoking; it had been three years since the last smoke. When Powell accused me of treason -- and the word "treason" was used -- I was so outraged that I smoked three cigars and two packs of cigarettes that day.
[Laughter]

I promptly wrote an undated letter of resignation. I said, "I want this letter to be on the ambassador's desk, Drumright's, when he arrives. If he thinks my action has been wrong he can put a date on it, and my resignation will be effective as of that date." I said, "I can't work like this."

Well, you can imagine the acrimony. They finally came up with a shrewd, diplomatic solution for the problem, because I was so adamant. They said they would send my message to Drumright in Hong Kong. And then Drumright could do with it as he pleased. Well, on that I caved in because I felt I couldn't -- beyond a shadow of a doubt -- call them liars. I didn't believe they would, but I also couldn't prove that they wouldn't. So the matter ended there.

You can imagine the acrimony on both sides. And I thought, you know, here was another bitter lesson to me on the problems of getting distasteful information back to Washington. It's a question of reporting -- what do you report? Do you report only what the people in Washington want to hear? Or what needs to be known? And I felt my information needed to be known. The ambassador needed to know it. And the State Department needed to know that there was Chinese resentment. It wouldn't have taken much to figure this out.

Well, I'm, I suppose, casting the net of my recollections too wide for you. But I think USIS officers do find themselves in positions like this.

Q: I think they do.

MOCERI: And this raises some real questions. This is why I always felt we should be integrated with the State Department. There should not be the division between the political and the information, cultural; we should be integrated physically and functionally, as well.

Q: Well, you know, I don't thoroughly agree with you on this point. I think that had you been within the Department, you would have been subject to the same kind of repression and, perhaps, more so, because then you would have been in deliberate opposition to and in contravention of your superiors' recommendations and decisions. I don't think you'd have been as well off as you were as an independent. And that, of course, was the whole basis for the separation of State and USIA.

MOCERI: You may be quite right about this, in terms of the practicalities of the problem. But my experience, as other experiences I've had, do raise this question as a problem that has to be addressed, and addressed in fairness to the United States Government itself. It has to be addressed in whatever other kind of relationship is established.

Q: I think that the situation is not nearly as bad today as it was 25 or 30 years ago. What you were seeing, at that time, was the last gasp of a whole bunch of the old-line ambassadors, many of whom you know were holdovers from the pre-war years. They were ending their careers, and they felt like that. And that's the way they were always going to feel.

The newer ambassadors, who have come on since, and that includes some of the political ambassadors, have been much more accommodating; not only accommodating, they have insisted that USIA take a very definite role in the determination of policy and in the explanation of what was going on. And they have respected the PAO's analyses, sometimes to the detriment of the political section.

So I don't think that the condition holds to the same extent today that it did then. But I, also, encountered situations where you, simply, could not make a recommendation to an ambassador. He would not have it. That was all there was to it. And one of our best PAOs, Willard Hanna, who was in Japan at the time, resigned over that very kind of a conflict with John Allison, when Allison was ambassador there.

MOCERI: Well, to the second of the two episodes worth mentioning: the Open Skies exhibit. I insisted that the Agency was promoting it for all it was worth. It was very important to us. I insisted that we schedule this exhibit. I went over considerable opposition on everyone's part in the embassy. I did stage the exhibit. And the Chinese were fascinated by it; fascinated by the photography involved, and the potential of the Open Skies exhibit.

See, there again, determined opposition. The Chinese information office finally agreed to it. And we did have it. And it was, probably, the most successful -- in terms of audience attendance -- the most successful exhibit we ever staged in Taiwan. This leads me quite naturally into mentioning the assessment that the Chinese made of my own position and work there. Shortly before I left, two CIA officers -- you know, there was CIA all over the place...

Q: Their CIA or our CIA.

MOCERI: Our CIA. [Laughter] And they came to me and they said, "Now that you're leaving, you may be interested in what the Chinese think of you. And we've talked to a lot of officials." I assumed they had. [Laughter] By the way, Ray Cline was the head of the CIA operation in Taiwan at the time.

And these two said to me, "They say you're a very hard man to deal with. But you're also very fair. You won't do anything that you're not convinced is in the interest of your government. But the one thing they like is that they can count on your word. If you've said you'll do something, you do it." I thought it was high praise.

Q: Did you say, "Would you put that in writing?" [Laughter]

MOCERI: I never thought of that at the time. [Laughter] Well, from there I went -- I thought I was going back to the States. I had talked to Bill Copeland, who was at the moment our new area director, then visiting us in Taipei on his first visit to his field posts. He wanted to know what I wanted to do. This was the first time any Washington official had expressed an interest in what I might like to do in terms of possible assignments. So I told him about the things I wanted. He asked me to write a memorandum to him, sort of a personal letter, outlining my background and my interests and what I would like to do.

You know, I considered myself, I believed what I was told when I came into the Agency, "You're available on a worldwide basis." I felt it wasn't up to me to stay in one particular area. I certainly welcomed the prospects of experience in different parts of the world.

The problem with that is that you don't build up the ties with a group of people who gravitate in a given area, as in South America, for instance. You remember that for all practical purposes we had a Latin American junta in the Agency that made South America its province.

NORMAN W. GETSINGER
Chinese Language Studies
Taichung, Taiwan (1956-1957)

Commercial Officer
Taipei, Taiwan (1957-1961)

Norman W. Getsinger was born in Michigan in 1919. He graduated with a BA from Harvard University in 1941, and served in the U.S. Navy overseas from 1941 to 1946 as a lieutenant overseas. His assignments abroad have included Cairo, Rome, Taichung, Taipei, Ankara, Seoul, and Hong Kong. Mr. Getsinger was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2000.

Q: You were in Taichung from when to when?

GETSINGER: From 1956 to 1957.

Q: How did you find the course at that point?

GETSINGER: Excellent. The language school was great. The important thing was to have it in Taichung, and to keep it away from Taipei, so that the ambassador couldn't call upon our services. That isolation was so important. We really did value that. At that point, our wives were allowed to come back into the language school at night, and study Chinese, using the instructors that we used during the day time. They became very proficient.

Q: Well, that was very important. Well, when you take language studies, you are not only learning a language, but you are learning a culture. What were you getting from your teachers about China?

GETSINGER: The language school, of course, was under the control of teachers who had come from Beijing and they were all extreme nationalists. We would, every now and then, snicker about the communists. They would be forced to show us how the communists were altering the language. So, when we would go to our posts, we would be equipped to handle the language, not only spoken by the nationalists, but by the communists as well.

Q: This is always a problem when you have... I got Serbian training from some Serbs who would have been happy with Milosevic. We were going to Tito's Yugoslavia and they were rejecting words that we knew they were using. Chiang Kai-shek was in full force at that point. Were you getting any feel for how things were going in Taiwan, at that time?

GETSINGER: Very much so. We certainly were. You can't work on a small island, even if you are isolated, and have studied the language, without getting in touch with the ferment among the Taiwanese, and their feeling about the overlordship with the mainland group, that came over with Chiang Kai-shek. There was one incident I think I should get into. There was the sacking of the American embassy in Taipei by the nationalists. This was at a time when the offshore Islands crisis was pushing on it, and we needed to have this kind of togetherness if we were going to face up to that crisis. The reason the embassy was sacked, of course, is well known. We had a military advisory group, a Chinese officer was accused of spying on the wife of one of our officers, and he was shot. Then, the American officer was acquitted and sent out of the country. I don't know whether this is in the official record, but we know, at that point, the Chinese mob boiled over and it was Chiang Dinghai, who was then the president's son, who was in charge of intelligence, who decided there should be a demonstration in front of the American embassy to protest this. The demonstration got out of hand, who got into the demonstration, we are not quite sure. But, there were inflammatory broadcasts over a tape, to the mob, and the mob took over. That was the most complete destruction of an embassy we have had in many years of Foreign Service history. It was completely shattered. The officers and the staff took refuge in the bomb shelter and thank God, they were able to shut the bomb shelter door, but they were buttoned up in there by a steel door. Eventually, they opened the door to get out, because of course they were trapped in there. They were beaten up, and you could see American personnel of the embassy with bandages all over them. When we came up from the language school to clean up the embassy, you could sweep up top secret documents in the courtyard of the embassy. They threw the safe out of the code room and burst it opened, and scattered stuff all over. But, that is just an indication of the fact that you cannot push the Chinese too far. You cannot rob them of their self respect.

Q: You sort of learned that with your mother's milk, at least, that the language thing... Of course, you had had this before, working with UNRA, that dealing with the Chinese was really a different matter than most other countries.

GETSINGER: Oh, absolutely. I feel so sorry for people who are involved in Chinese affairs, who don't have the language. I think Chris Patton, who wrote this remarkable book about how he was trying to make a home...

Q: He knew he was the last governor of Hong Kong.

GETSINGER: He was very good at understanding the Chinese, but throughout the book, he is apologetic and shamefaced about the fact that he didn't speak Chinese. He would have been a much better governor, and certainly would have written a better book if he had the language.

Q: Did you have much contact with Taiwanese, as opposed to mainland people?

GETSINGER: I went from the language school to the embassy, and I was four years in the embassy.

Q: We will pick up that on the next session.

GETSINGER: But, certainly all of us on the island, whether we were in Economic Affairs or USIS, or anything else, were working with the Chinese, both the Taiwanese and the mainland.

***

Q: Today is the 25th of February 2000. Norman, we are going back to 1957. We have already talked some about it, but could you talk about how the embassy operated and what was driving American policy in Taipei, when you got there, and how did you operate it?

GETSINGER: I think the central feature of where we were with the Kuomintang, with Taiwan, at that point, is that we were working hand and glove with them. We have seldom worked as closely with the foreign government, as what we were working with, in Taiwan. One good example is the Joint Commission for Rural Reconstruction (JCRR). That had representatives appointed by Chiang Kai-shek and our president. They worked side by side to revise the whole of the agricultural policy in Taiwan. It was very, very close. Those of us who were there at that time were very excited at the idea that we were helping to build a new kind of Chinese society on that island.

Q: Let's take reconstruction, at that point. I would think that, and correct me if I'm wrong, something into the favor of being able to do this was that this has not been an area where Chinese landlords have been able to get their fingernails into, because the Japanese had been there. In a way, it had been protected from mainland Chinese power people coming in and grabbing off the best pieces of land, or am I wrong?

GETSINGER: A little bit. Actually, what had happened is that the Japanese had decided to build up a land of aristocracy of the local people. That this was the way they could have control. When the nationalists came over, there were large landed estates, belonging to the Taiwanese. Then, the question came up of how to do a land reform. The land reform in Taiwan was remarkable because it changed the whole economy around. They disenfranchised the landlords, and they gave them pieces of the industrial establishment that the Japanese were leaving behind. So, they kind of turned their hats around, on being landlords to industrialists. This was done completely bloodlessly, whereas on the mainland at the same time, they were accomplishing their land reform by shooting all the landlords.

Q: Well, I suppose it was handy in the way you could come in and the Taiwanese, at this point, were basically a separate group, and going down, their leadership didn't have that much at stake in this property. So, they could sit back and say, "Let's have some reform over here," because it wasn't going their particular way.

GETSINGER: I happened to be on the island during a very early period. I was over there in 1947, and I arrived there just after the first troops had come over from the Kuomintang, and were having trouble with the Taiwanese. There was a revolt by the Taiwanese. The Taiwanese all refer to it as "RR Bong," February 27, 1947. What happened was that the gentleman who was in charge of Chiang Kai-shek's troops decided to eliminate this kind of opposition, because at that time, Japanese was the language of the island. After 50 years, everybody brought over the Japanese to occupy the island. So, the natives looked Japanese, spoke Japanese, and had collaborated with the Japanese in World War II. So, he took this as a revolt that had to be put down, if he was going to establish a base for Chiang Kai-shek. So, there were a large number of executions. We don't know how many, but something in the neighborhood of 20,000 Taiwanese. It was all of the intellectuals, the people who had established this ferment. So, here were the Taiwanese, even at that time, trying to establish some kind of independence.

Q: Now, what was your job at the embassy, to begin with? What were you doing?

GETSINGER: Oh, I was very lucky to come up from the language school to one of the posts where they put Chinese language officers, where they spoke Mandarin. I decided that the best job, and it was kind of open at that point, would be to be the commercial officer. I was excited at the idea of helping with the transformation of the economy, and getting American participation started in Taiwan. So, that was my job for four years.

Q: Who was the ambassador when you arrived?

GETSINGER: I believe it was Everett Drumright.

Q: He was an old China hand.

GETSINGER: Yes. He had been to the language school in Peking.

Q: You mentioned this 12-school operation of the Kuomintang. Was there any feeling among the embassy people you dealt with, you included, that Chiang Kai-shek was our boy, but he sure blew it, and did a terrible job in China, and this is not a terribly good horse to be riding?

GETSINGER: Yes. My view, and I think most of us who worked with the Kuomintang at that point, was that they had learned their lesson in China. What we had was a new Chiang Kai-shek and a new Kuomintang, and in a very real sense, it was. He agreed to pass, and we were all working on this, a foreign investment law, which in affect says that foreign devils are welcome to enter the central kingdom and exploit our resources and take out exorbitant profits. That is what it mandated in a way. Yet, he passed it, because he knew that if his regime was going to survive on that island, he was going to have American participation needed.

Q: Let's talk about the investment policy, which you were trying to promote. Was there a difference between the mainland Chinese, who were political leaders, military people and all, and the Taiwanese? They were all of Chinese origin. When you say Chinese, you always think of entrepreneurs par excellence, but did you see a difference in the approach, toward investment business and all?

GETSINGER: Not really, because I think that is part of the economic culture of the Chinese. The Taiwanese were very good businessmen. I let a number of American companies join investments with the Taiwanese. But, as an example, Stu, of how well we worked with the Kuomintang regime there, is that I decided one way to get investment problems solved was to set up what I call the investment lunch. I would sit down once a week with the leading investment authority of the KMT and I would have a little menu of the problems that American companies were having in Taiwan. We would go over this menu and he would send instructions to with his number two person, who would be there, that these things would have to be fixed. That is the way we did things. We sat down, had lunch, and jointly resolved the problems.

Q: One hears about the Kuomintang before, about it being a vast bureaucracy and an awful lot of squeeze included in this. Were you seeing people who were trying to do it differently?

GETSINGER: Absolutely. I think the proof of that, of course, was the very rapid increase in productivity in the economy of Taiwan, and how, even then, it was beginning to show tigerish traits. They moved up very rapidly. In fact, it wasn't simply because we were doing things in the embassy with helping an investment, but it was because we had a very successful aid program, possibly the most successful aid program that the U.S. has ever had. Dollar for dollar, in terms of results, it was marvelous in Taiwan. It was because we had this very close working arrangement, so that we could make things work. It didn't take the Taiwanese very long, I mean the Chinese in Taiwan, before they had reached the takeoff stage. We finished our aid to Taiwan. It was one of the first places we did. So, it's a complete success in that regard.

Q: You mentioned a takeoff stage; this refers to a small book by Eugene Rostov, I think, who talked about countries achieving economic growth with a certain amount of literacy, and expertise in investment and all that. At a certain point, they no longer needed assistance, they could generate their own.

GETSINGER: Exactly, and that is what happened.

Q: Who was investing? At that point, you were trying to get Americans to invest. How did you go about this?

GETSINGER: We had, with the Chinese, established an investment center. I spoke about the investment lunch, which was promising. But, one thing we were able to do was to establish an investment center. When a potential investor came to my office, we would take them down to the investment center, in downtown Taipei. They would indicate what they needed in the way of utilities, labor, raw materials, semi-manufactured, and the whole process of the investment was laid out right there. They never had anything like that on the mainland, I can assure you. But, we could do that stuff.

Q: How about the overseas Chinese? Were they interested in Taiwan, or were they sort of playing a watching game, at this point?

GETSINGER: We had a lot of interest, of course, from Hong Kong. At that time, most of the money in Hong Kong was pro-Taiwan. So, there was a very good connection there.

Q: How about in America? Was there much of a Chinese community with money in the United States, at that time?

GETSINGER: It's interesting. The one thing we Americans were always fighting, at that time, in Taiwan, was the rivalry between Taiwanese and mainland people. The Taiwanese were pushing for independence. They were pushing for the idea of having an opposition party. Chiang Kai-shek's police would keep arresting them. We, the Americans, would give them refuge. So, here we were, working with an autocracy, but trying to push it toward a democracy. The way we would do it was to give [assistance] to the Taiwanese. So, when you speak of what kind of activity there was in the U.S. in relation to Taiwan, there was a lot of agitation. The Taiwanese would escape Chiang Kai-shek's police. They would find refuge in the United States. The Chinese community in the United States, with regard to Taiwan, was clearly divided between the pro-Kuomintang and the pro-Taiwanese. So, there was a civil war within the civil war, going on.

Q: How did you feel about Drumright? Was he too close, just right, or distant from Chiang Kai-shek and the way he was leading the embassy at that time?

GETSINGER: I would say that he was just about right. Drumright was beloved by the Chinese. He was so close to the Chinese, but he needed to be because this was the way we were operating. We were not operating at a distance. We were embracing those people. We had, in addition to the embassy and the aid mission, a huge military advisory group and a tremendously large intelligence station. The intelligence station in Taiwan was as big as stations we have ever had abroad. They, in a sense, were helping Chiang Kai-shek operate some of these raids on the mainland. So, at that time, the policy was kind of supporting Chiang Kai-shek return to the mainland. At the same time, supporting the Taiwanese' desire to be independent, and that's important.

Q: The Korean war had ended not too long before, around 1953 or so. Did Korea serve as any example, or have any influence there, South Korea, or was it just something over the horizon?

GETSINGER: I think it was quite far up the horizon. Between Taiwan and Korea, of course, there is Japan. The Japanese influence on the island was still very strong. Most of the trade, at the beginning, was with Japan, because here was an ex-colony. That is what happens with colonies; they have this tremendous trade.

Q: Did you get involved in visits? In the United States we had our own., I don't want to call it Civil War, but difficulties. You had the China lobbies, representative Walter Judd and others. Then, you had the "Who lost China," the McCarthy thing, which was petering out. Were you feeling the effects of either of these things, with visitors or watching how you reported, or anything like that?

GETSINGER: I think we probably did have, Stu. I don't really have too strong a view on that.

Q: I meant, did you have quite a few visitors from the United States?

GETSINGER: Yes, they were pouring in. This was our China. This is what we had to work with, in the way of China.

Q: On the part of the American investors, was there concern that they would take a look and say, "Is this place going to fall to the mainland Chinese?" Was that something you had to address?

GETSINGER: It certainly was. Of course, the Taiwanese and the Chinese, themselves, were very concerned. At that time, there was absolutely no economic connection with the mainland. Of course, then things began to change.

Q: But, really quite a bit later.

GETSINGER: Quite a bit later, and of course, still more or less indirectly through Hong Kong. There is no direct trading.

Q: How about the Quemoy-Matsu business, during this 1957 to 1961-period?

GETSINGER: As you recall, I had been involved, when I was down in Tai Taijung at the language school, in evacuation preparations. This was 1957, 1958. Then, the big problem, which was out of my sphere, was to get Chiang Kai-shek to remove so many of the troops from Quemoy, which sits in the harbor of mainland China, and get them back to defend Taiwan. It gradually developed that mainland Chinese on Taiwan felt that they should keep the troops Quemoy, because that represented the connection to the mainland.

Q: Did you find, for investment and all, were you working with the Department of Commerce much, or was this pretty much it, of self-sustaining operation?

GETSINGER: Of course, we had good connections with the Ex-Im Bank. At that point, Ex-Im Bank thought that this was their job to develop the economy in Taiwan. So, there was a lot of Ex-Im money that came in.

Q: Were we at all concerned, at that point, that we might build up Taiwan to be a rival of the United States? I think, particularly with something like textiles... I mean, at that point, we had substantial textile business, particularly in the Carolinas, and all. Was this a concern?

GETSINGER: I don't think so. But, we did have with Taiwan all of the problems that we have had with the mainland of China. There was, initially, a great textile industry in Taiwan. There was the question of whether the Taiwan textiles were undermining our textile industry, but that is occurring now with China. That was a very labor intensive type of industry, which eventually moved out of Hong Kong, and over to the mainland, but we had trouble with copyright and patents. That was a terrible problem. The first time that the Encyclopedia Britannica was pirated was in Taiwan. They did a marvelous job of taking the whole Encyclopedia Britannica and reproducing it.

Q: I remember, I think, most of the Foreign Service profited by having these pirated editions, which they had picked up in one place or another. But, what were you doing? Were you going down and trying to ferret it out, or pounding the paperboard?

GETSINGER: Oh, we had remarkable success in just facing up to the authorities in Taiwan, and making them change their regulations. Who is this old gentleman who is so involved in Hollywood? This is a gentleman who pushes motion pictures. He came over a number of times to Taiwan, and I worked with him to try and raise the admissions in Taiwan.

Q: Jack Valenti?

GETSINGER: Jack Valenti, yes. Jack came over maybe a half-dozen times, because this was one of the major outlets for Hollywood.

Q: They were pirated films?

GETSINGER: They were not only pirated films, but the main problem was that they were not charging the admission price. You could get in for a few pence or a chopstick. That didn't make sense. Hollywood was really looking forward to making some profit over there. So, we got them to jack up their prices.

Q: During 1957 to 1961, was the embassy sacked during this period, or did this come a little later?

GETSINGER: Yes, remember that is what we discussed at our last meeting.

Q: We did discuss it, that's right. That was early on. While you were the commercial officer, were you keeping an eye on political developments?

GETSINGER: Oh, we all had to get involved because... LBJ came over and we had to put together a control group for LBJ. I remember a wonderful scene. He was the Vice President. When he came over, he loved to press the flesh. He would get in a pedicab and start down the main street of Taipei, headed for a mob of Chinese, and they would see this great huge Texan coming along with a 10-gallon hat, and sitting in the back of a pedicab, and he would jump out of the pedicab, and would rush forward to shake hands. The mob would melt. He couldn't get to a single hand.

Q: You were there during the Kennedy-Nixon debates, which centered at one point on Quemoy and Matsu. There were peculiar little things that happened, and all of a sudden he became the center of the universe, as far as political candidates were concerned. How were Kennedy and Nixon seen from the Chinese perspective?

GETSINGER: At that point, because Taiwan was our China, we were pouring everything into China. Eisenhower came over as the President, and we were in the control group for him. They just loved having this American attention. It looked, at that point, as if Taiwan would be our China forever. I remember one of the problems that occur with Foreign Service officers in the control group with a presidential visit is that some of the guys who came over with the president wanted to find out where the girlies were. So, you have to measure whether you can do anything pimping as a Foreign Service officer. But, you can do it by indirection, just indicate that...

Q: I'm told, you sort of point them toward the embassy drivers, or something like that.

GETSINGER: I remember there was a hot spring's resort, just outside Taipei, and you could put them up that way. Let me tell you about one incident that is rather interesting.

Q: Yes, please.

GETSINGER: To show you how close we were and how Drumright was as an ambassador, Drumright was giving a very large cocktail reception. It was getting down toward the end of his period there. He assigned me to stand at the door as one of the junior Foreign Service officers. He said, "A lot of these Chinese, I don't know, but they all know me. They will all come rushing forward, and I won't know their names. I tell you what I want you to do. You stand at the door, and you stop every one of them as they come in, introduce yourself, get their name and then pass the name to me." Well, it was going very well, until a rather short, stocky Chinese came in and he tried to walk right around me and rushed by me. He started toward the ambassador. I knew what my instructions were, so I kind of lined him up against the wall, and said, "I don't believe I have gotten your name." He said, "It's Chang Ching-kuo." Well, Chaing Ching-kuo was the president's son. Chaing Ching-kuo was head of the secret police. I said, "Pass, friend."

Q: How did you find, during this time, the hand of the secret police and all? Was it a heavy hand?

GETSINGER: Oh, it was a very heavy hand, very ubiquitous. To equate Taiwanese independence types with the communists was very easy. In fact, at one point, Kuomintang was trying to find a connection between the communists in Beijing and the Taiwanese independence types seeing it as a way to weaken Chiang Kai-shek's regime, so he couldn't recover the mainland. Oh yes, they were all over the place. My wife, who at that time was married to someone else, and so was I, and we both lost our mates later; but her husband at the time was with the CIA in Taipei. At one point, there was a midnight knock at the door and it was Henry Gau. Henry Gau is one of the leading Taiwanese independent types. He said that they were after him, and asked if we would let him in for a while, until his people could get him away. He stayed with us for 24 hours, until he was able to exit through the back door. Six months later, Henry now became the mayor of Taipei. What the Kuomintang had to do was to permit some freedom of expression and some freedom of candidacy, even though there was no opposition party. But, you could be an independent. The Taiwanese kept developing these independent candidates. So, here was this guy who was taking refuge, and six months later, he was the mayor. They called it a democracy holiday. If you, as a Taiwanese could get yourself elected, then they couldn't arrest you. But, if you failed in your candidacy, you were lucky if you ended up in Green Island.

Q: Speaking about the officers in the embassy, how seriously did you take the slogan of "back to the mainland?" Were you seeing that Taiwan would develop its own government, and it would go on that way, or were you seeing a fairly early collapse of mainland Chinese and communists or what?

GETSINGER: I think, during the period I was there, still very early, we were very much caught up in the idea that Chiang Kai-shek might have a chance to get back, because after all, the communist rule on the mainland was failing miserably. They had the great leap forward and terrible starvation that occurred there after. So, it looked like the thing would be falling apart, and Chiang Kai-shek might have a chance to get back. Then again, our agency people on the island were helping them develop a spy network and an infiltration at work that went in and the intelligence in Taipei was very good on what was happening on the mainland. The possibility that Taiwan would find itself independent under self-rule only came when Chiang Kai-shek's son, years later, decided that the only way they came to keep power was to share it with the Taiwanese.

Q: There was a remarkable change around, a gradual move, so today we are waiting for an election which will probably put the final stamp on an independent Taiwan.

GETSINGER: Of course, those of us who are interested in the island, can go back and look at a lot of the history, but there was a point when after the island was ceded to the Japanese, the Treaty of Chimwini Decree in 1895, the Japanese came down to take over Taiwan, and there was a resistance. There was a short period, I think it lasted for 45 days, to free Taiwan. It was the Republic of Taiwan who established it, and the Japanese troops came in in the north and just marched down the island and eliminated it. But, here was an island that was 50 years under the Japanese, 50 years under the Kuomintang. During the period when it was a province of Taiwan, it was a very big period, only something like 30 years. The Dutch were there on the island.

Q: How well were you informed of what was going on on the mainland? This was during the period of the great leap forward, and we had our consulate general in Hong Kong, which was processing this. Did we have a pretty good idea of what was going on in China?

GETSINGER: Oh, I think so. I think the intelligence network that Chiang Kai-shek had established, together with our Central Intelligence Agency support was an excellent one. We were really getting information. That changed by the time I went to Hong Kong, later in my career. Hong Kong has become the center, and the network was established through that area.

Q: By the time you left in 1961, was there a pretty free enterprise system in place, at least as far as small entrepreneurs?

GETSINGER: A very good free enterprise system. It was really moving ahead very rapidly. I think this was why assignment to Taiwan at that time was so exciting for Foreign Service officers. You were part of something that was happening because you were part of the governmental structure as well. It is the kind of thing we had later in Korea, when we were working so closely.

Q: 1961 or 1962 was when things really started moving there. I take it that during this time, you weren't seeing a solid leftist movement, a communist sympathizer. This just wasn't on Taiwan.

GETSINGER: No question, but there was a very strong developing Taiwan independence movement. The Taiwan independence types would be under house arrest, and then they would escape and flee to the United States to join the Taiwan independence movement there. So, Chiang Kai-shek could never really suppress it. That's why his son, when he took over the presidency, decided that the only way they were going to get anyplace with strengthening the position of that island, was to accept the Taiwanese in the government.

Q: But during this time, it was pretty much mainland Chinese, Kuomintang people were running everything.

GETSINGER: These were the people who were chasing, by their mainland experience. These were people who were basically anticommunists. They really hated what was going on on the mainland. They really felt they had to create something different on Taiwan.

Ambassador Marshall Brement was born in New York in 1932. He received a bachelor's degree from Brooklyn College in 1952 and a master's degree from the University of Maryland in 1955. Ambassador Brement joined the Foreign Service in 1956. His career included positions in Hong Kong, the Soviet Union, Singapore, Indonesia, Vietnam, and an ambassadorship to Iceland. Ambassador Brement was interviewed by Thomas S. Estes in 1989 and by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1990.

Q: Well, fine. I took that old three and a half-day test so I know what you missed. The old biographic register shows that you entered the Foreign Service in 1956. You began to study Chinese at the Foreign Service Institute and in 1958 you were sent to the FSI field school in Taiwan. Can you tell us something about why you decided to study Chinese?

BREMENT: Well, again, it was sort of an accidental turn in my career. I came in, in March of '56, and took the old A 100 course for beginning officers and then was assigned to the Bureau of Far Eastern Affairs. I'd asked to go overseas but they said, "No, you have to go to Washington," and I was simply assigned to FE where I was the assistant staff assistant. The staff assistant was first a fellow named Newt Waddell, and then Owen Zurhellen, to Walter Robertson who was Assistant Secretary for Far Eastern Affairs and a very dynamic and polished Virginia banker gentlemen who'd been in Chungking during the war and then worked for General Marshall when he had his mission to China and had very, very strong views about China.

In any case I worked on his staff, partly as a staff assistant and partly as the author of the Far East Section of the daily secret summary, an old publication of the Department where I essentially summarized cables on a daily basis -- important cables on the Far East to be read by the principal officers of the Department; and also wrote a weekly item on subjects of interest dealing with the Far East, an internal publication the Department put out at the secret level called "Current Foreign Relations". This was an excellent introduction to a Foreign Service career because it gave me the full range and the full sense of what was going on in a major geographic bureau of the Department. I was mildly interested in the Far East when I came in but I was pointing towards Europe. But this indeed awakened an interest in the Far East for me and so I applied for Chinese language training, and had a great deal of trouble getting in, by the way. It was only that I was working for the Far Eastern Assistant Secretary which allowed me to get into the course. Mostly because the head of Personnel at the time, whose name escapes me, had been an inspector and he'd inspected the language school in Yokohama and he found that of the four graduates two of them had decided it was a terrible mistake to study Japanese and wanted to go somewhere else. And I'd never even been overseas -- I'd never been anyplace outside the United States except Canada or Mexico. And he decided that before I do something like take two and a half years of the taxpayer's money to study...

Q: That's why I asked. It's unusual.

BREMENT: ...I'd better at least look around and get a sense of the area, which was sensible enough. But there were no particularly attractive assignments at that time and indeed I felt that my exposure to the Bureau and to the general area was such that I knew what I was doing. So Walter Robertson, who was quite a desk-banger, and could handle a meeting, I would say, better than anybody I've ever seen in the U.S. Government...

Q: Yes, I knew him.

BREMENT: ...in terms of getting his way, he almost always did. He got his way. So I entered Chinese language training and spent nine months at the Foreign Service Institute and then 18 months at the field school in Taiwan where we studied Chinese every day.

Q: That interested me because I studied Mandarin in Peking, China when I was in the Marine Corps. And then after that you...

BREMENT: After that I was assigned to Hong Kong. I had wanted to go to Taipei actually, but I couldn't complain too much about being assigned to Hong Kong. My first year in Hong Kong I was assigned to the Political Section of the Consulate working on China. Of course, in those days we had no relations with China and Hong Kong was the premier China watching post of the Department. In my first year I was in charge of the unit which published the survey of the China Mainland Press which was the standard source of reference both for the government and for the academic community on current developments in China. I had ten translators and 20 typists and we had a subscription list of about 600 and we turned out 60 or 70 single-spaced sheets of paper a day. I found that great fun and a great way to learn about China and my translators were an enormous source of knowledge. I only spent a year at that, then went off on home leave, and came back. And then I spent two years in the Political Section working on internal political developments in China.

Q: Do you still keep up your language?

BREMENT: Well, it's difficult. I've been learning languages wherever I've been for so long and they sort of drop away when they're not being used. But I would say that I certainly have day-to-day Chinese. I will always have that because I've raised three small children in a house where the servants spoke nothing but Chinese. So I'm still a pretty good man in a Chinese restaurant. But in terms of reading political editorials I'm not what I used to be.

William J. Cunningham was born in California in 1926. After serving in the Navy from 1944-1947, he received his Bachelor's degree from the University of New Mexico in 1948 and his Master's in 1950. He joined the Foreign Service in 1949 and his career has include positions in Prague, Paris, Tokyo, Taipei, Phnom Penh Saigon. Mr. Cunningham was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on March 17, 1997.

Q: Tell me about your duty in the active Navy.

CUNNINGHAM: I was assigned in July of 1946 to the USS Incessant, AM-248, a steel hulled seagoing minesweeper. It was built on what was called a PCE hull, or patrol craft or escort. I reported to the ship at Terminal Island, California in July of 1946.

Q: This was in San Francisco?

CUNNINGHAM: No, it was in Long Beach Harbor adjacent to the Port of Long Beach. I reported to the ship and I was told that we were to take the ship to Shanghai and turn her over to the Chinese navy under the assistance program the U.S. had with the Nationalist Government of China at that time. The civil war between the Nationalists and the Communists was in suspense at that time. General Marshall was in the midst of his ultimately futile effort to mediate the conflict between them and to persuade them to form a coalition government. This ship had been captained on most of its previous voyages by a man who was described to me as an eccentric individual and who was no longer the commanding officer at the time I reported aboard. Just before relinquishing command of the Incessant he ordered the shipyard to remove all of the sweep gear, and all of the armament from this ship. When I boarded this ship it was essentially a nice yacht. It had no functional purpose whatsoever. We couldn't lay mines. We couldn't sweep mines. We couldn't shoot at anybody except with a couple of Garand rifles and side arms that we had on board.

Anyhow, I went on board this ship and we were to set sail a couple of weeks later for Hawaii with a crew of four officers and one third the number of ratings that was authorized for that kind of vessel. We had one quartermaster, one storekeeper, one engineer, etc., etc., all down the line. Off we went with a flotilla of three other vessels, the same class, the same type, except they were equipped for minesweeping. It took us two weeks to get to Pearl Harbor. We went through a terrible storm outside of the port of San Pedro in the California channel there. I was never so sick in my life. I had to stand watch and I was absolutely delirious. Somehow after a couple of days things calmed down, and I did too, and the rest of the trip went off all right.

I don't think people nowadays realize what bad shape the U.S. armed forces were in at that time. The shortage of qualified personnel in all ratings on our ship was just one example. An Essex class aircraft carrier was berthed just opposite the Incessant in Terminal Island. That carrier had a rust spot that went from water line to the top of the conning tower and spread over nearly the entire side of the ship. It was less than a year after Japan's surrender and the end of hostilities, but our ships could barely get underway and the U.S. did not have a single combat-ready division. The speed of demobilization had a disastrous effect on our combat readiness.

It took the Incessant two weeks to get to Hawaii. I think I was the first guy on the ship to sight land on that cruise. We went into Pearl Harbor and we were told that we were to sail for Shanghai in three days. I was the supply officer and before the last mooring line was made fast to the wharf I hit the dock running to find a warehouse from which to restock the ship. We were there a month, as it turned out, and at the end of that time we were told that we were not going to Shanghai though the other ship three ships in the group were. We were being sent to Bremerton, Washington to decommission the ship.

We left for Bremerton I guess some time in August or September in the company of two other ships. On the way up there one of the other ships - - the Pirate - - lost main power completely. They had a complete engine breakdown. We were three or four days out of Bremerton at that point on the high seas. Since the Incessant had a clear after deck, thanks to the removal in Terminal Island of all sweep gear and armaments, we were designated to take the Pirate under tow on the high seas. Thank God it was a calm day. We had to get a thousand foot steel hawser across to the Pirate, which we did, although our crew of mainly first and second class seamen had no training for this sort of operation or experience with it. We started the operation about noon and just before sundown everything was secured. We made our way safely into Bremerton where we did decommission the ship in November of 1946. It took them a month or so to decommission the ship.

Finally toward the end of November, about Thanksgiving, I got orders to report to Tiburon, California to the Harbor Defense School where I went to learn how to manufacture anti-torpedo and anti-submarine nets and how to put them down. That training period lasted about three months. Again, there was a long hiatus from the end of the training period until onward assignment. It was very boring hanging around the BOQ and the officers club there. It was not far from San Francisco but we were not able to see it and it took a long time to get in there by bus, the only means of transportation available to us. I was finally assigned to the USS Cohoes, AN-78, a seagoing net tender. Two officers only were assigned to these ships, so I was the Executive Officer, barely 21 years of age.

I arrived in Seoul about a week before Thanksgiving and I remember the Thanksgiving edition of Stars and Stripes. The banner headline was "We Stand on the Yalu" and that was the point. That was the high tide of the U.N.-U.S. military campaign into North Korea. They had gotten all the way up to the Yalu River, the border between Korea and China, about that time. We stood there for about 24 hours and then the Chinese came in and the whole retreat began. As I said, I spent the first two weeks in this personnel office trying to get things set up to ship people into Korea and staff the embassy. After the retreat from the Yalu began, things turned around and I spent the rest of my time in Korea shipping people out as fast as I could.

I remember from that time, and it was quite a traumatic experience, seeing truckload after truckload of U.S. army trucks of soldiers coming through Seoul, right through an intersection about one block from the Embassy, headed south - - across the Han River. You have to understand that the ground freezes by the end of November in Korea. It is a cold place. These soldiers were standing up in open trucks being moved from the north of Seoul, through Seoul, and across the Han River. These poor fellows were dazed. Here was the great victorious American army and they did not know what had hit them with the Chinese coming into the war in the north. It was a very disturbing experience to see this happening.

Q: For the Far East?

CUNNINGHAM: Yes, for the old Far East as we called it, the Bureau of Far Eastern Affairs, now the Bureau of East Asian Affairs. I worked there in some administrative capacity backing up the general services people in the area of Southeast Asia of which I had been familiar. We had an office in the old temporary buildings along 23rd Street. I was living somewhere up on Meridian Hill in a rooming house and sort of pondering what my future was going to be. I was getting ready to take the Foreign Service exam again.

One night November about 11:00 P.M. I was sound asleep and the phone rang. I answered it and it was David Osborn who at that time was serving on the China desk. He said, "Bill?" I said, "Yes?" "How would you like to study Chinese?" I said, "David, I've always wanted to study Chinese. I've wanted to study Chinese for several years." I'd been putting that in on my preference report as the language I next wanted to learn. I had decided that when I was back in Hokkaido working for David in the early '50s. He said, "That's good because there was a meeting this afternoon to select the next class of Chinese language officers and I put your name in." That was the second class to be selected after the Foreign Service Institute reinstated its field language school and its own internal Chinese language program. Up until that time they had been sending people to universities to take Chinese language training. One class had gone through in 1955, and I was to be in the class of 1956. I said, "That's great." I hung up and went back to sleep.

The next morning I woke up and I thought, did I dream something? I called up Osborn and said, "Did you call me last night and tell me I was going to be studying Chinese?" He said, "Yes, I did. Have you changed your mind?" I said, "No, no, no, absolutely not. I definitely want to do it."

There is a little aphorism in Chinese about the great Taoist scholar, Zhuang Ci. Zhuang Ci falls asleep and has a dream that he's a butterfly. He is a beautiful butterfly and he flies all about, samples all the flowers, and so forth. It was an extremely realistic dream. Then he wakes up and from then on Zhuang Ci, the teacher, says I do not know whether I am a butterfly dreaming that I am Zhuang Ci or whether I am Zhuang Ci who dreamt that he was a butterfly. That was sort of the way that I feel about this conversation that I had with Osborn that late night.

Q: Tell me, you had not taken the...

CUNNINGHAM: I had not taken the Foreign Service exam. It is a mystery to me how as a staff officer, at that time I was an FSS-9, I was selected for Chinese language training. There were six of us in the class. There were four of us Foreign Service people, Dick Donald, Dick Nethercut, Jim Rousseau, and myself, plus Fred Fisher who was a USIA Foreign Service officer, and Bill Rhoads who I think was a CIA officer. I was Foreign Service staff. I must have taken the Foreign Service examination that fall but I don't think I had the results yet; this becomes important for the following year. In any case I began Chinese language training in January of 1956 as a Foreign Service staff officer, class nine. It was, I reckon, the influence of David Osborn who had become a mentor of mine by that time and whose work I very much admired and respected, that I got into that line of work and got that opportunity. I started studying Chinese and I did sort of all right.

That December something else very important happened. I attended a Christmas party late in December here in Washington that was given by three young women who were working at VOA at that time. A friend of mine who had been with me in Korea and Cambodia, Donald Riley in USIS, was invited and he said, "Why don't you come along?" I said, "I don't feel like it." He said, "Oh, come on, you'll enjoy it." So I went.

It was up in an apartment house on Connecticut Avenue. There was a very attractive young lady at that party whom I wanted to meet, and I did get to meet. Her name was Patricia Sloan. She was on home leave from Florence where she was the assistant cultural officer. She had been staying with some people who worked at VOA where she had been employed before going overseas with USIS, and who were also invited to this party so she came along with them. We met at that party. I engaged her in conversation and invited her out to dinner afterwards. To make a long story short, we were married the following July, and we still are. She's here with me this week in Washington and we are going to our granddaughter's eighth grade graduation tonight.

Anyway, I went into Chinese language training in January of 1956 very deeply in love with Patricia Sloan, studying this hard language, distracted by this, and I was up for the oral boards in April of 1956. I had passed both the language and the written portion of the examination by that point and I think by then it had been reduced from a three-day to a one-day operation. I came up for the oral boards in April of that year and they started asking me all kinds of questions about American history, economics, economic analysis and so on. I wasn't prepared and I failed.

It was the worst experience of my life. Here I was, I had met the girl of my dreams, I was going to get married the following July, and I was in Chinese language training which is something I had always wanted to do. I had been in the Foreign Service seven years. I liked it and I wanted to continue in it and I failed this. I was absolutely crushed. I didn't know what I was going to do. I must say my wife, at that time my fiancée, could have said to me at that point, "Sorry, where you are is not where I hope to be." She could have gotten out of it at that point but she was very loyal and she did not desert me. She encouraged me.

After about a week of hearing me moaning and moping around she said, "You've got to get your act together. You've got to do this thing and do what it takes to get through." I went to see Max Krebs, the Executive Director of the Board of Examiners at that point, who was I guess on the Board of Examiners. He said to me, "Bill, we've got to have Foreign Service officers who know American history, who understand our economic system. If they are going to represent us abroad they are going to have to know those things, and you didn't do well. Everybody thought it was going to be a very easy interview so we are just as disappointed as you are. It's up to you. You've got to correct it." I said, "What do I do?" He said, "Night school. Take a course in economics at American University or GW." I said, "But I'm getting married in July." He said, "If you want to be a Foreign Service officer, you've got to do it. There are some books you should read, too. Henry Steele Commager."

: American Civilization I think.

CUNNINGHAM: Yes, right. "So get to work." I went back to FSI and told Howard Sollenberger what had happened and what I would have to do. I got Commager's book. I found a night course in macroeconomics at American U. We completed our wedding plans. The other five who were in the language course were sent on to Taiwan in June. There would only be six months training and that would be the end of it. Another class was not to begin until the following January. I was kept in FSI and there I think I am grateful to Howard Sollenberger who saw some potential. Howard even arranged for my fiancée, later my bride, to have some limited Chinese instruction during her lunch hour. She worked in the old Walker Johnson Building on New York Avenue. The FSI in those days was located in the three little apartment buildings at the corner of 21st and C Streets, NW.

I was doing all right in the language by that time. I was doing all right in the language by that time. As a matter of fact I was one of the best students in the class. Maybe not the best but they liked my work and they saw potential. They saw that I could make it. Sollenberger arranged for me to continue to study one-on-one with a Chinese tutor there in FSI while I got my status worked out.

At this time also the Wristonization program was going on and somebody said it me, "Apply for Wristonization. You are eligible." I thought I would really like to be a thorough Foreign Service officer and do it the way everybody else has, but I'll do that to have a holding spot. I put in my application for Wristonization. I got married.

I came up for the oral board for the Wriston exercise in about September of 1956. By this time I was married, I had completed the summer night course at GW, I continued my Chinese language studies, and I had been reading American history. They put me through an oral examination the likes of which I had never had before or since. It seems to me there was a board of three or four of them, and it was over in the old Walker Johnson Building, a Marine Corps building at one point in its history, on New York Avenue where USIA was headquartered. By the time that interview was over, my head was spinning. I felt like I had been put through the third degree. I think even the lighting effects in the room were almost like that. It went on, and on, and on. It felt like it was three hours that I was in there, and they asked me everything.

Q: Do you recall some of the questions?

CUNNINGHAM: They asked me about American history, the economy, and the acquisition of the Florida territory. I guess they asked me about what I had been doing in the Foreign Service, my career experiences in Asia, and all sorts of other things. I guess they were testing my powers of analysis as well as my general knowledge. It was rigorous and by the time I got out of there, I had the worst headache I ever had and I almost didn't care whether I passed or failed because I was so washed out by the experience.

Then I heard nothing. Weeks went by and I continued to study Chinese. We were settling into our marriage and going through all that adjustment. My wife continued to work at USIA in the exhibits division. We worried about this thing and finally come November, I still hadn't heard anything so I went to see Randolph Kidder who was in some position in the Department at that point. I had known Kidder in Indochina. He had been in Saigon as first political counselor, and then as DCM when McClintock was sent to Cambodia.

Kidder was in some part of this Wristonization process so I said to him, "Here is my situation. This has been dragging on. I don't know what is going to happen. I don't know where my career is going but whichever it is, either in or out, I would just as soon know as soon as possible. If it's out, I have to make other plans. I am resigned to that if necessary." He said, "Well this is supposed to be a merit process and it is not supposed to be subject to any kind of personal intervention." I said, "Can you find out what's going on and what the time line is on this thing?" He said, "Well, let me see." About a week later on a Saturday morning I received a phone call at home. He was calling me from home and he said, "This conversation is not supposed to take place but don't worry about your status; you will be Okay." And that is all he would tell me, so I said, okay, and I thanked him. That was typical of Kidder. He was considerate of the staff people, the younger ones who were coming up. I don't mean that he was an easy mark, or that he held us to a lesser standard. But he did look out for his people, as any good leader or supervisor should.

A few weeks later I received transfer orders to go to the language school in Taiwan and join my class. I was still a Foreign Service Staff then; that had not changed. After I arrived in Taiwan in January of 1957 and reported in to language school, official word finally came through that my appointment as a Foreign Service officer had been approved. Then I had to have the oath administered so that my pay status could be changed. Nicholas Bodman, the Director of the Language School, apparently was not authorized to administer the oath. Paul Popple, with whom I had served in Saigon and who had been a good friend there, was the senior officer among the language students, so I asked that he be designated to administer the oath, which he did between classes on a gloomy, chilly January morning in the little front office of the language school. The surroundings were, if anything, less pretentious than those in which Marvin Will had first administered the oath to me in that old temporary building in September 1949. There was no ceremony. I went back to class right afterwards. It was very much in contrast to my first commissioning ceremony in the Navy at Albuquerque ten and a half years previously. After almost seven and a half years and many attempts, I was finally a Foreign Service Officer.

I also - and this is very important to me - during this interlude I took the Foreign Service written examination one more time. It came along again in December and was administered at Georgetown University. I took the exam because I didn't know how this process was going to turn out. Even if it turned out okay I still wanted to say I passed the Foreign Service examination all the way through. I took the written exam - by then only a one-day affair - in December 1956, and I did pass it. By then it was not necessary to have a language qualification to be appointed an FSO, but I had met the qualification in French and was training in Chinese, I had been through a rigorous oral board, and through a written examination, which I passed at least three times. I figured that I had covered all the bases, at least to my satisfaction. I had made the record that I was qualified to be a Foreign Service officer.

Q: You were where in Taiwan?

CUNNINGHAM: Taichung.

Q: You were there from '57 to when?

CUNNINGHAM: I was there from January of 1957 until the end of July 1958. The language training program at that time was somewhat longer than it is now. In those days we took six months initially in the U.S. and two more years at the field school in Taichung.

Q: Could you tell me a little bit about your impression in how the school worked then?

CUNNINGHAM: The headmaster was Nicholas Bodman who was a Ph.D. in linguistics from Cornell, as I recall. He was a specialist on languages of south China, but he also knew Mandarin.

It was a very good program. Bodman was a very strict scholar. He was not a career Foreign Service officer. FSI hired scholars to run the school in those days. It was pretty rigorous training. I think the school operated well, and operated effectively.

We used standard texts that were produced by Yale University, and there were more materials that were produced by the faculty there. The teachers were all young Chinese who were university graduates for the most part or were university people in the sense that they had university education though they may not have been able to complete it. They were all from north China because that was the approved standard for the Chinese language, the official language.

We attended class in groups of three and four for four hours a day, and these were usually in the verbal language. Later on we also had some courses in learning to read Chinese characters; we had been studying that in Washington as well. I guess we all had a command of somewhere on the order of 300-500 characters by the time that I got to Taiwan. I was able to catch up with my class relatively quickly. I was a little bit stronger on some points, and a little bit weaker on others. They were there and of course they had more exposure to the spoken language than I had in Washington. I had a little bit more exposure to the written language than they had by that point, but I was not out of sync with them. We had two hours of one-on-one tutorials. We also were expected to do about four hours of homework every evening.

We were also expected to do some reading on the area, on China. There were certain books that were recommended but there was no standard requirement, which I think, was probably a mistake. There should have been certain core books that we all had to read. We were given a choice among a wide array of books to read. There weren't so many books on China in those days. The literature is vast, enormous now, by comparison.

We had speakers come in. Bodman used to arrange for speakers to come in, people from the embassy to brief us from time to time, or other travelers from Washington who might be coming through, or people from Hong Kong, and sometimes local people would come in. I don't recall that any of those were in Chinese. Occasionally we would have a field trip, about three or four a year, to go out and visit villages or some locality and get exposed a little bit to Chinese life and institutions.

It was a very enjoyable experience. We were not part of the embassy. We were not a functioning diplomatic post. We were a school and we didn't have responsibilities that took us away from our studies. It was a comfortable and enjoyable life.

Q: In all of this language training one of the big things is learning from your teachers about the culture and all of that. Were you getting any feel for the Nationalist, the KMT regime in Taiwan, and then what was happening in China itself?

CUNNINGHAM: Yes. Well so far as the culture is concerned, the language text incorporated a lot of cultural material into it like behavior and how to conduct yourself in dealing with people. We did study political questions when we got more advanced. When we got to the point where we could read Chinese newspapers they became part of our daily text so we picked up a lot of contemporary political information from that, and we had periodic briefings at the embassy.

First of all it was illegal in Taiwan at that time for anyone to be in possession of anything that was printed or published on the mainland. One of the big questions was how were we going to learn simplified characters and the literary style of mainland publications if we couldn't study them? The school by the time that I arrived there had worked out an arrangement with the local authorities that made it all right for our instructors to use People's Daily in the school as a textual material but it could not leave the premises.

The teachers for the most part were pretty interested in what was published in People's Daily and they weren't necessarily accepting of it. They all had their own bitter experiences at the hands of the communists, but they hadn't always had good experiences at the hands of the Nationalists and they had their reservations and objections. These were intellectuals, well informed people, well educated people, so they had their criticisms of the KMT and its policies particularly in China, but also some of the things that it was doing in Taiwan. That didn't mean that they were pro-Communist, but they credited some of the critiques of the communists with being accurate and on point when it came to the Nationalists.

In class you could get them to talk a little bit about this, some more than others, but everybody was very cautious about it. Not only that, there were some among the faculty who were considered to be pro-KMT, though not necessarily agents of the regime. That meant that some faculty would not discuss certain matters in the presence of other faculty and it had to be understood among us that we should not attribute things, certain comments, to certain members of the faculty when talking with other members of the faculty. You had to be somewhat circumspect. This was kind of a constant undertone in the school.

I remember one time later on when I became the Director of the Language School, Yeh Kung-chao (aka George Yeh), who had been foreign minister and then was the ROC ambassador to Washington, was home on a visit and he came to the school. We were showing him around. Edgar Snow had recently been to Beijing and had interviewed Chou En-lai.

CUNNINGHAM: No, Snow was an American citizen, a native, I believe of Kansas City. He was the author of Red Star Over China and others. He had been a correspondent in China for the Saturday Evening Post in the 1930s and had very close ties to the PRC regime and the Chinese communists, dating from the days that he had known them as revolutionaries. He was a well-known authority on conditions in China at that time but with a particular point of view. In any case, he was considered a leftist in American circles as well as in international circles.

Anyway, Snow, on one of his visits to mainland China, had a long interview with Chou En-lai, which had been published in Life magazine. One of our jobs at the Language School was to train interpreters for the Warsaw talks, which were going on at that time. This is a later period in 1961 to 1962 but it is germane to the point we were discussing. At that point I was Director of the language school so I instructed the two teachers, who were preparing our interpreters, to take this article and to translate it into Chinese in order to get the flavor of how the PRC would discuss relations with America and the kind of line they would take, so the teachers had done that. They then developed a simulated dialogue between Snow and Chou that would be used in the special interpreter training course that we were developing.

I was taking George Yeh around the school, and we came to the classroom where this text they was in use. I explained to Yeh what was going on. This caused a pall in the classroom for a moment there and then Yeh said something like, "That's very interesting. You can certainly get their line in that way." He was a sophisticated enough man to understand what we were doing. But his hesitation, and the hint of discomfort in his expression, was emblematic of the constant undertone of tension in the school about issues involving U.S.- PRC relations.

Q: When you were sitting around having a beer with your fellow students and all, what was the feeling at that point about eventual relations and all with communist China and all?

CUNNINGHAM: We expected in those days that they would come about fairly soon. As I say, I was in the second group to go into language training. The FSI was taking in roughly six officers a year into language training on the assumption that relations with the PRC would be reestablished soon one way or another, and I'll come back to that in a minute. We had 14 or 15 consulates in China prior to the Communist take over and all of us in training assumed all of these posts were going to be reopened so the U.S. would need a lot of Chinese language officers. We thought there was a sky-is-the-limit sort of opportunity for us.

This was 1956-1957. The Korean War had ended in an armistice in '53. The war in Vietnam had ended in an armistice in 1954. The Warsaw talks had begun soon after that in 1956 or 1957, and they were regarded as an avenue towards the resumption of relations with the PRC. The thought was that we were moving closer to this.

It was very clear by then that the United States was not going to back an invasion of the mainland by Chiang Kai-shek. That was not fully accepted by the Nationalist Chinese establishment at that time. It did not become fully accepted until after the Quemoy bombardment in 1958. There was also a feeling that the Nationalist regime on Taiwan was not really fully established; it was kind of in a precarious situation and it might not last, and Taiwan might very well be absorbed into the PRC in some fashion. It is not that the United States was supporting that by any means, in fact quite the contrary, but no one in the mid 1950s expected that the Republic of China would still be around in the 1990s. You couldn't get anybody to take a bet on that at all. Taiwan in those days was an agrarian economy with a very limited industrial base. The standard of living was very low. It was a poor area. People did have enough to eat and they had reasonably good housing, shelter and clothing, but this was a backward area. No one in those days had the vision of what Taiwan has become today.

We were preparing in the expectation that within our careers we would be serving in the People's Republic of China. It was not until two things occurred, principally the great leap forward and the hard-line campaigns that began to come out in the PRC at that time, and the escalation of hostilities in Vietnam – and this was after we were out of training and into regular diplomatic work – that it became pretty clear that it was going to be a long time until any relationship with China was restored. In those days we sort of expected that we were going to be serving someplace in China in our careers and that it would be within a few years.

Q: I take it that as far as the officers were concerned who were taking this, there was sort of - maybe it is wrong to characterize it - a certain distance between the new Chinese language officers who were coming out and the Nationalist government. Yes here it is but this is not necessarily something that you want to embrace whole-heartedly.

CUNNINGHAM: Yes, that is a very good point. Most people finishing their language training had wanted to be assigned to Hong Kong, or one of the other watching posts that we had.

Q: Burma, Indonesia.

CUNNINGHAM: Yes, something like that. It was not the first desire or preference of anybody in the embassy at that time to be assigned to the American embassy in Taipei. The Chinese language officers in the embassy in Taipei when I arrived in Taichung had gotten their Chinese earlier on. Bill Gleysteen, the consul general, was one of them. He may have taken a little bit in this program but that was just brush-up. I think Bill Thomas might have been there in the economic section but I'm not sure of that. Paul Miller, Sandy Peaslee, Carl Nelson, there were very few people in the embassy in Taipei who were products of the Foreign Service Institute's Chinese language program at that time.

By the time that I finished I wanted to go to the embassy in Taipei. The reason that I wanted to go there was that I felt the opportunity to further improve the language would be greater there than it would be in going to Hong Kong, which was the major other alternate preference of most of the people. Most of the other people in the class wanted to be assigned to Hong Kong because then they would be getting into PRC affairs. They would be watching China, and they would further improve their knowledge of what was going on in the PRC. The main interest on the part of the group was in the PRC; it was not in the Nationalists, not in Taiwan. They weren't interested in that situation.

Q: When you got out in July of '58, what happened?

CUNNINGHAM: I was sent to the American embassy in Taipei and put in charge of press translations in the embassy there. Once again, I was serving under David Osborn, my mentor from my assignment in Hokkaido eight years previously. Osborn was the Political Counselor, and I was Second Secretary of Embassy. I was also to be responsible for reporting on domestic politics in Taiwan. Ten days after I arrived, the bombardment of Quemoy broke out. By this time Everett Drumright had been assigned to Taipei as the American ambassador. The American embassy had been attacked by a mob the previous year and sacked. Karl Rankin, who had been chargé for a long time, had been named ambassador, left in some disgrace as a result of this, and Drumright was brought in.

Drumright's influence was very important in that embassy in two or three ways. First of all, he was regarded as a strong supporter of the Nationalists and he had had that identity all the way through his career. I think there were two other important contributions that Drumright made to the operations of the embassy. One of them was that as soon as he got there he said, "I want as many Chinese language officers in the embassy as we can possibly have.” He wanted every substantive position filled by a Chinese language officer. There were six at the time that I reported in August of 1958. As I recall, they were David Osborn, the Political Counselor (he knew Chinese well, but was not as fluent in it as in Japanese) the First Secretary in the Political Section Alexander C. (Sandy) Peaslee, Carl Nelson, Norman Getsinger in the Commercial Section, and two others, whom I do not now recall. By the time I left there were 13. Drumright was absolutely right about having the number of language officers he demanded. It made a significant difference in the way that the Embassy worked, in the conversations that went on among us, in the way that we worked among ourselves, in the way that we exchanged views and perceptions of issues and personalities in Taiwan, and in our perceptions of what was happening in China. By the time Drumright had been there a couple of years it became commonplace for us to work in terms of the Chinese language in discussing what was going on in Taiwan. The communication among us, and the way in which our analyses developed, were very much improved as a result of that. So was our rapport with the Chinese community, with the government, with officialdom, and everybody else with whom we worked. All of that was much stronger as a result of Drumright’s emphasis on language capability. He set a high standard in that regard.

He did another thing that strengthened our relations with the government and the Chinese community. There were frequent automobile accidents in Taiwan involving usually American official vehicles, but sometimes vehicles driven by private Americans, where somebody would get injured. It was a very crowded city. The traffic situation was very bad in Taiwan at that time. There was a lot of mixed traffic with ox carts, bicycles, cyclopedes, trucks, and automobiles. There was very little regulation. People would get injured. They would be hospitalized. There would immediately be an outcry against the Americans that somebody had been irresponsible. They were very sensitive about this. The viewpoint of the Chinese was, you have this enormously powerful machine at your command and you should be able to make it behave. You have so much power you should be able to control that power and not allow accidents to happen. In Chinese mentality the accident is always the fault of the more powerful figure. It is not the result of your conduct; it is the result of who has the greater power advantage.

This was a very sore point in our relationship with the Chinese community there. Soon after Drumright arrived he said, “We are going to do two things. First of all whenever somebody is injured by an American vehicle of any type, an official vehicle of any kind or anybody in the American official family driving, we are going to immediately visit that person in the hospital and offer condolences. This is not an admission of guilt, we are just going to say we are sorry that this happened and show our compassion in that way. Second, we are going to make an ex-gratia payment. That is to say it is sort of like noblesse oblige in our system. It doesn’t represent admission of guilt or responsibility, but it recognizes that someone has been injured and that we want to show our compassion in that way.”

He arranged for a fund to be set up which was financed by liquor sales through the commissary so that there was in effect a kind of surcharge that came off of this. That went into a fund, which was then used for the purpose of these ex-gratia payments. It was a set-aside, you might say.

He became known for that and often times when such incidents did take place the newspapers would publish a picture of the representative of the ambassador and whatever organization it was that was involved in the accident, calling on the person in the hospital, presenting flowers, and making an expression of condolences. I think in a few instances Drumright made some of those visits himself. That did a great deal to promote good relations with the community as a whole in Taiwan. I think Drumright deserves a lot of credit for all of that.

These were things that Drumright instituted because he realized that the Chinese should not perceive us as a kind of imperial authority or colonial authority. He felt that some of the things that had gone on prior to that had given that perception.

Q: Extraterritorial privileges.

CUNNINGHAM: Yes, the extraterritorial privileges and all of that. He wanted to erase that kind of stigma, or at least blemish, or at least counteract that to the extent that he could. He was very insistent on that kind of an approach toward the Chinese.

Q: Was this also to diffuse the riot that had sacked the embassy?

CUNNINGHAM: Oh yes, definitely.

Q: Could you explain how that came about and if it had any reflection down at the school?

CUNNINGHAM: This is pretty sketchy because I was not involved in this; I was at the language school at the time. What happened was that one evening an American sergeant who was in the provost marshal's office in the American military advisory group in Taipei, shot and killed a Chinese whom he accused of being a peeping tom who had been peeping in the window at the sergeant's wife in their quarters. He went out, shot this man, and killed him. It turned out that the man who was shot was a member of the intelligence service of the Taiwan Garrison Command, the supreme military authority at that time, which was under the direction of Chiang Ching-kuo, the son of the President, Chiang Kai-shek. The Nationalists had declared martial law when they moved their capital to Taipei in December 1950. Their rationale was that China, including Taiwan, was in a state of civil war, warranting suspension of civil rights.

The sergeant was subjected to a court martial by a U.S. military court in Taipei. There was a great outcry that he should have been tried in a Chinese civil court, but under the US – ROC status of forces agreement that could be done only if the U.S. waived jurisdiction. The U.S. would not waive jurisdiction and therefore this man would be tried in an American military court and subjected to a court martial. He was not convicted of homicide. The trial was witnessed of course by members of the man's family and others. There was a very strong feeling in the Chinese community that he was guilty and should be convicted of homicide.

As soon as the verdict had been handed down U.S. military aircraft evacuated the sergeant from Taiwan immediately, I think within hours of the verdict. That effectively removed him from any possibility of being subjected to a judicial process under the Chinese system. There was resentment about this and the next day a crowd gathered outside of the American embassy compound protesting this action as unjust on the part of the United States and accusing the Americans of all kinds of bad deeds.

The protest was very interesting because it was about six months after we arrived in Taiwan and the students at the language school were scheduled to make a field trip to Hong Kong. We had all traveled to Taipei and had been in hotels the night before when all this build up was going on. I think it was the night of the day the trial took place and the sergeant was evacuated from Taiwan. There were an awful lot of people in the streets the following morning as we were going to the airport to get on the plane.

In order to make the field trip, I had driven up to Taipei with my wife in my 1956 Plymouth Coupe purchased through the American Foreign Service Association's diplomatic purchasing program. We had arranged with a chauffeur from the American embassy to drive us in my car to the airport so we could board the plane, then he was going to drive it back to the embassy and put it in the compound for safe keeping. Well he did. He got it back to the compound, and drove it in the gates about 15 minutes before the mob came over the wall. It was safely inside the American compound. It got beat up a little bit in the ensuing disturbances but it was not burned or basically damaged. I did receive damages from the Nationalist government and bought a replacement automobile as a result of that.

Anyway, the mob came over the wall and they sacked the American embassy, in effect. They didn't burn it but they smashed it up very badly. The thing that was particularly symbolic was that the ambassador's limousine was parked in the port-cochère. The car was moved out, turned upside down, and a three-way combination safe was pushed out of an upstairs window and dropped onto the overturned ambassador's limousine. I think this was a definite symbolic act on the part of the people who had taken over the embassy. Embassy order was restored and the people were evicted from the compound. Americans have always been told that hooligans committed this sort of thing.

Of course by this time all of us from the language school were in Hong Kong, and the next morning we were reading in the newspapers that the American embassy in Taipei had been sacked immediately after our departure. Everybody in the consulate general wanted to know what in the world was going on, and what this signified for the relationship between the United States and the Republic of China, and the PRC as well. That is sort of a thumbnail sketch of the story.

Q: What was the general belief? That this was done with the tolerance of the Nationalist government?

CUNNINGHAM: Yes, the general belief was that nothing like that would happen in Taiwan unless the government was willing to allow it to take place. Now the government may not have intended that it go as far as it did. They might have intended for it to be a protest demonstration that would not get out of hand. It may have gotten out of hand and gone somewhat farther than they intended. You have to understand that emotions were running very high over this. This man who had been murdered had been a member of the intelligence service and there were a lot of people who felt strongly about his death and about the way the whole affair had been conducted. As to the merits of the case and as to whether the sergeant should have been convicted or not, I can't really comment because I don't have a clear enough recollection of it.

Q: Just one question before we finish this language school time. Were there any sort of half-life lingering problems about being a China hand from the McCarthy times by the time you came in or was that pretty well over?

CUNNINGHAM: I think there still are, frankly, in a manner of speaking. Everybody in my time who specialized in Chinese was conscious of what happened to those people. I don't think very many of us knew them personally though some of us had the opportunity to get to know some of them later on. I think that there was the unspoken feeling that there was a line that you had to be very careful about, particularly in the 1950s, in dealing with Chinese affairs, in dealing with the PRC.

I remember very well that this was the period of the so-called three Walters: Walter Robertson, the Assistant Secretary for Far Eastern Affairs in the Eisenhower Administration; Walter McConaughy, the Director of Chinese Affairs after Edwin Martin, and Walter Judd, former American medical missionary in China, a close friend of the Chiang family, and then U.S. Representative from Minnesota in the Congress. All three of them had very strong views about the People's Republic of China, the Chinese communists, so one wrote and analyzed in consciousness of what their attitude was. That doesn't necessarily mean that you slanted the reports, but what I think it means is that if you are going to recommend a particular line of action or a particular policy, you had to work very hard to have the documentation, the support, and the argument for it lined up. Drumright was regarded as being sympathetic or congenial toward, or receptive to, compatible with, the thinking typified by the "Three Walters". We felt that probably the United States did not challenge or question the basis of ROC policy and the kind of line the ROC wanted us to take.

Q: ROC being?

CUNNINGHAM: The Republic of China, the Chinese Nationalists of Chiang Kai-shek. They didn't want to challenge that as objectively as we might have, had this whole period been absent from the relationship.

Q: There was a very strong China lobby too, particularly in Congress with Senator Noland of California, Walter Judd of Minnesota, and others. Walter Judd was from a missionary background.

CUNNINGHAM: Medical missionary, yes. I met Walter Judd in Saigon during the time that I was there. Walter Judd knows China and knows the Chinese people, there is no question about that, but he had a particular point of view. I guess that is it; we were conscious of the point of view in doing our work and in doing our reporting and analysis.

You mentioned the China lobby. The China lobby was very strong, very influential. You had to reckon with it also. That is to say you had to be conscious of the atmosphere in which your reports and analyses were going to be read in Washington and that in the background were the lingering influences of the 1940s China lobby. In fact also in the background was the continuing influence of the successor to the 1940s China lobby, and that China lobby still operates today. In fact we've got at least two China lobbies that are operating in the United States, not as an organized entity, but as a body of opinion. That has an influence upon the thinking, or at least attempts to influence the thinking, of the United States government and the American people with regard to China.

Q: I might just add a footnote. In a way it is similar to the one other one, which would be dealing with Israel. It is the same sort of understanding about the atmosphere in which you are dealing, a highly political, a highly charged atmosphere that one has to understand.

CUNNINGHAM: That's right, politically charged, and sensitive, and you have to be conscious of that, absolutely.

Q: It only is interesting in developments later on, was there much contact between the embassy during this time that you were with the embassy in Taiwan, and the Taiwanese?

CUNNINGHAM: I was the first Taiwanese language officer in the embassy. The last four months that I was in Taichung in the language school, I asked to spend half my time studying Taiwanese because I knew by then what job I would be going into. The last month that I was there I lived in Lu Kang, one of the first villages settled by people coming across from the mainland in the 17th century. The Taiwanese that was spoken was considered as the authentic version of the language. My Taiwanese was never as good as my Mandarin. I continued my Taiwanese studies in the embassy and had a tutor, as a matter of fact.

I got to know many of the leading Taiwanese opposition figures very well. I was the only embassy officer that ever was in contact with some of them. These were senior people who had also fought Japanese rule in some instances, though not all were in that category. But they were all united in their opposition to the undemocratic rule of the ROC in Taiwan. Again that was the sort of thing my KMT Chinese contacts often questioned me about, this work that I was doing. At one point I had to be somewhat circumspect about this because the intelligence services of the KMT were constantly feeding stuff back to the embassy saying, "Cunningham was seeing certain people and we wonder what is going on? Does this represent a decision by the United States to support the Taiwan independence movement, Thomas Liao and other people overseas who were Taiwanese Nationalists?"

Yes, that was a sensitive area but it is to Drumright's credit that he did not tell me to not have contact with these people. I think that Osborn, who on an earlier tour to Taiwan developed some of these contacts and was conscious of their views, felt that it was important to know these people and to at least allow them to be in contact with the U.S. government and feel that they were getting their point of view across. I think that he persuaded Drumright to allow that, but at the same time the word would come back to me that this kind of report had been coming into the embassy and that they were wondering what was up and maybe I should back off a little bit for a while.

As an example, there was one time when Lindsey Grant, an economic officer in the embassy and a Chinese language officer for whom I worked later on, and a couple of other fellows from the embassy and I, took a cross-island hike on what was known as the power line trail; it followed the Taiwan Power Company's east-west transmission line across the island. The mountains are very high. You got up to 10,000 feet. Lindsey is a great hiker and so he said, "We've been talking about doing this," so we finally took the power line trail hike across the island.

After this hike when we got back, the report got back to the embassy that Cunningham had been up in the mountains and he had been talking to people up there so he must also know how to speak mountain languages. Mountain languages are the aboriginal languages of the Melanesian people who had migrated to Taiwan even before the Chinese had arrived in the 15th century. It was that kind of fantastic thing that was coming back to them. I was regarded as a questionable character in that respect by the KMT authorities.

Q: Just to finish up this part, and then we will wrap this up for this session, you started in '58 going to our embassy in Taipei?

CUNNINGHAM: I was assigned to the embassy in August of 1958. I was put in charge of press translations. My job was to produce a consolidated press translation comparable to the summary of the China mainland press produced by the Consulate General in Hong Kong in those days. I did that and I ran it for about three years. In 1961 I was sent back to Taichung as Director of the Language School. That came about because the then Director, Howard Levy, who also knew Japanese, was transferred by the Foreign Service Institute on an emergency basis to Yokohama to take over FSI's Japanese language school there. There was a sudden, unexpected vacancy there. I went for one year as Director of the language school to fill in until FSI could get a professional scholar to come out and run it.

Q: We'll pick it up the next time at that point. What are some of the subjects that we might pick up next time about Taipei?

CUNNINGHAM: One of them is the change or the affirmation of the policies of the KMT with regard to return to the mainland in the wake of the Quemoy bombardment. Also Secretary Dulles' visit in the fall of 1958, including what happened at the state dinner for Dulles. That was one of his last overseas trips by the way. We should also cover the China Democratic Party and its rise and what happened in opposition politics during those three years when I was covering that. The establishment of what was involved in setting up the daily press translation service in the American embassy from 1958-59. The visits of Eisenhower and Lyndon Johnson, both of which occurred during this period of time. One of them happened after I had gone to Taichung and I came back to work on it. Those were some of the things that I can think of now. Also, the whole business of Taiwan's economy taking off during this period and the decisions in regard to the economic development of Taiwan during that period, and the encouragement of a consumer economy in Taiwan by the U.S. government and USAID.

***

Q: Today is the 22nd of March 1999. This interview is taking place in Houston Texas. Bill, before we move on to the taking over of the Chinese training in 1961, you had some remarks you wanted to make prior to that about things that had happened.

CUNNINGHAM: If I can remember them in order. The first was the affirmation of the return to the mainland policy of Chiang Kai-shek and the KMT in the wake of the Quemoy bombardment. I think I may have said previously that I arrived at the American embassy in Taipei on transfer from Taichung, which is only 100 miles away, about ten days before the outbreak of the bombardment of Quemoy on August 24, 1958. The date sticks in my mind; it is unforgettable.

The bombardment of Quemoy caused great alarm at the time particularly because it was not clear whether the PRC was attempting to reduce the fortress of Quemoy preparatory to conducting an amphibious operation against the islands, particularly against Quemoy, which is right in the mouth of the harbor of Amoy and effectively blockades it. It is only about a mile and a half offshore. That whole question of whether an actual invasion was going to take place; the issue of whether or not under the treaty of mutual defense that the United States had with the Republic of China on Taiwan at the time, was applicable to Quemoy or not; and the obligations of the United States to its ally, the Republic of China, under those circumstances; all of those things were very much at issue.

Of course it is important for people to understand historically that every incident that occurred in the Cold War, particularly any incident involving the use of armed force, was automatically regarded as a litmus test of the reliability of the United States as a supporter of its allies all around the world in all of these mutual defense treaties that we had concluded from Europe to Japan and Korea by that time. What we did in the Taiwan Straits inevitably would be looked upon by every other ally of the United States as a test of the reliability of the United States under any kind of armed attack. Nowadays in 1999, the eve of the 21st century, it is very hard for people to understand the atmosphere of that time, so it is important to put that in context.

Q: What was our analysis at the time out of our embassy on Taiwan about what was the intention of the People's Republic of China?

CUNNINGHAM: Actually what we were concentrating on more was what would the Republic of China do in response to it? It was this kind of situation where in the technical sense, in terms of international relations, the legitimacy of the Republic of China was under attack by the PRC. The position of the Republic of China's government, Chiang Kai-shek's government, the Nationalists at that time, was that China was in a state of uncompleted civil war and the PRC regime in the legal sense, in the juridical sense, was a rebel rump organization that was attempting to overthrow the legally established constitutional government of the Republic of China. Therefore the Republic of China had the obligation in defense of its national sovereignty and constitutionality to suppress this rebellion. That was the official position. So long as there were no on-going hostilities between the two sides that was simply a formal position without an actual policy of implementation, you might say.

Not only that, the U.S. Seventh Fleet was "patrolling" the Taiwan Strait. Initially it had been sent there to prevent the outbreak of hostilities initiated by either side back at the time of the Korean War. The situation had changed by 1958. By 1958 the treaty of mutual defense between the United States and Taiwan had replaced the earlier order to the Seventh Fleet of President Truman. In effect the Seventh Fleet was acting more as an ally in defense of Taiwan's territorial integrity and immunity from attack than it was as a buffer. Its mission was no longer as it had been at the outset to prevent the Nationalists from initiating an attack on the mainland so much as it was to protect Taiwan from an attack by the PRC against Taiwan.

Q: Who was the ambassador at that time?

CUNNINGHAM: The ambassador at that time was Everett Drumright. Drumright had arrived the previous May having previously been consul general in Hong Kong.

Q: An old China hand.

CUNNINGHAM: Yes, an old China hand from the 1930s, trained in the language school in Beijing. Interestingly enough Drumright was in China at the embassy in Chungking during the Second World War in the 1940s when Clarence Gauss was the ambassador there and when John Stewart Service, John Carter Vincent, John Paton Davies, Jr., and all of the other famous China hands were serving there. During part of that time the Dixie mission was sent from Chungking to Yen-an. It included John Stewart Service and I think Raymond Ludden and David "the dog" Barrett the military attaché, a very colorful guy, and I think John Carter Vincent though I'm not sure. During this same period they were in Yen-an, the wartime headquarters of the Communist Chinese Party, in the winter of 1944-45, Drumright was in Sian at the U.S. Consulate there, perhaps as principal officer. Sian is not far from Yen-an; both are in Shaanxi province.

In fact many years later - - in 1980 - - when I visited Sian I happened to go to a restaurant for dinner with a senior Communist Party provincial official, and he said, "This is the restaurant that Chou En-lai used to like to come to when he wanted to get out of Yen-an and come down to town."

But Sian at that time was under Nationalist control. It was the Nationalist outpost for watching what was going on in the communist headquarters in Yen-an less than 100 miles away. Drumright's formation in Chinese affairs during the winter of 1944-45 while the Dixie mission was in Yen-an was very much under the influence of the Nationalists. So it was the Chungking and Sian experiences and relationships developed at that time, as well as the policy positions in the late 1940s with which Drumright, then in the Department, was associated that made him very much a welcomed figure when he arrived in 1958 in Taipei from Hong Kong.

Q: During this '58 to '60 period, were the expectations that the Nationalists would try to do anything, launch any attack, or was that pretty well over?

CUNNINGHAM: That was the key question in August of 1958 when the attack began. There were people in the leadership of the Kuomintang who saw this attack upon Quemoy as a military provocation that would justify military action by the Nationalists against the China mainland. In other words, here was an opportunity that would provide them the political cover necessary to actually implement the campaign for recovery of the mainland that the Generalissimo said was his obligation and constitutional mission. In the embassy in Taipei at the time, we were very much concerned as to whether the Nationalists were really going to try to do this.

One of the first things that happened was additional units of the U.S. military were moved to Taiwan soon after the attack began. We beefed up our units there from about 10,000 men to about 13,000. We moved some combat air force units from Clark Air Force Base into air bases on Taiwan. That was intended as a warning to the communists, the PRC, not to try to attack Taiwan.

There is something that is very important to understand here historically. The treaty of mutual defense concluded in 1953 between the United States and Taiwan covered only Taiwan and the Pescadores. The Pescadores are about one-third the way across the Taiwan Strait to the mainland, and juridically are part of Taiwan. China had ceded them to Japan in 1895 along with Taiwan itself. The mutual defense treaty did not cover the offshore islands of Quemoy and Matsu. Those were the responsibility of the Nationalists and the Republic of China.

The other interesting thing about it is that under the doctrine of the United States at the time the juridical status of Taiwan and the Pescadores were “undetermined.” This came from John Foster Dulles, the great international lawyer. There was absolutely no question about the juridical status of the offshore islands of Quemoy and Matsu; they are juridically Chinese territory and everybody recognizes that. They are not part of the province of Taiwan. Quemoy and Matsu are part of the provinces of Fujian and Zhejiang on the mainland. The treaty of mutual defense did not cover Quemoy and Matsu. Militarily they were the responsibility of the Republic of China.

Also, if the PRC were to take those two islands militarily, in a symbolic sense they would have removed from territory that, as part of the mainland provinces, was indisputably Chinese. That would not of itself have destroyed the Nationalist, or ROC, government, but would have left it in control only of territory which both claimed, but which had not been retroceded to either Beijing or Taipei by the San Francisco and related Peace treaties. In a conceptual sense separate status for Taiwan, including the Pescadores, would have gained some moral legitimacy. You can see how that line of argument could have developed. This kind of symbolic issue was part of the mix at the time.

Our job in the American embassy was on the one hand to shape the response of the Republic of China, the Nationalists, in such a way as to discourage any attack upon Taiwan itself by the PRC. In other words we did not want to get into a situation where we would come into armed conflict with the Chinese. That was the first thing. The second thing is that in encouraging the Republic of China, or dissuading the Republic of China from doing anything that would involve us with direct combat with the PRC, we also wanted to leave the responsibility for the defense, for actually military combat, with the PRC entirely in their hands. But we didn't want them to use the military action as a pretext for committing themselves to a military campaign against the mainland. It was all very complicated and very delicate.

Q: How about at your level, and other officers at your level, were you trying to make this point or were you leaving this to the ambassador?

CUNNINGHAM: We were following it very closely. We had a very small political section. There were four officers there. David Osborn, now deceased, was the counselor for political affairs, and Sandy Peaslee, also now deceased, was his principal deputy. A man by the name of Carl Nelson, who is still living in Florida, was the third officer, and I was the junior officer. Dealings with the ROC leadership all was being carried out by the ambassador, the DCM at the time who I think was Joseph Yager, and David Osborn. They were the people who were dealing with the top levels of the ROC, and I should make it clear here that Ambassador Drumright, despite his antipathy toward the PRC and his sympathy for the ROC, was loyal to U.S. policy and carried it out effectively. Most of us in the Political Section were following the popular reaction to this. I was very new on the scene. I was really trying to get my bearings at this point trying to figure out what was going on.

The main point right here is that in October 1958 things got very tense. This bombardment went on and on. At one point the Republic of China was accusing the United States of disloyalty to its allies. As long as the bombardment went on the question came up, how was this garrison on Quemoy going to be sustained? These guys had to be resupplied. Artillery was being fired off at a great rate. The PRC was attempting to blockade the island of Quemoy by bombardment. How were supplies going to get out there?

What it really came down to eventually after a lot of back and forth between Washington and Taipei, and also between the embassy and the Nationalist government, the ROC government, was the ROC's responsibility to resupply Quemoy. The ROC's response to this was, what the hell kind of an ally are you? Here our soldiers are in danger out there on the front lines and you are not going to help with the resupply? You are not going to help send in ammunition? We said, "Well, that is the other side of the Strait and it is not covered by the Treaty." This really helped to define the application of the Treaty very clearly.

What finally happened was that it was decided that the vessels of the Seventh Fleet - I think it was probably one destroyer escort - would convoy the resupply vessels of the ROC navy from Taiwan up to a certain line in the Strait of Taiwan. From there on they had to make the run for the beach, basically, on their own with whatever protection they were able to provide.

Then the question came up, where do we draw the line? Is it the territorial seas? Well all right, the U.S. decided to draw the line at the territorial sea limit. We could convoy these vessels so long as they were in international waters but the demarcation point then came to be the territorial sea limit. Well, whose territorial sea limit?; according to what interpretation? At the time the U.S. interpretation was three miles. Three miles from where? Three miles from the beach line at Quemoy, or three miles from the beach line over on the other side of the strait on the mainland? If we got that far over it was certain that any U.S. vessels would come under fire from shore batteries on the mainland. We didn't want to get involved in this thing so we didn't want to go that far. There was some talk at that time about the six mile limit and I think the U.S. was pushing this as a compromise to the proposal for a twelve mile limit advocated by some countries at the time as an international standard, but that hadn't really been recognized yet. Even then, again it was the same thing, six miles from where?

I think at this point this dispute became public and Beijing came up on this, the New China News Agency, and pointed out that so far as they were concerned the territorial sea limit was 12 miles. Well again it was 12 miles from where? Could it be the beach line at Quemoy or could it be the beach line on the mainland. In retrospect, and perhaps at the time, I think this PRC announcement was intended as a signal to the U.S. that Beijing did not want to have a military encounter with the U.S. Setting the twelve mile limit from the point on the most extreme seaward point of Quemoy at low tide would, if respected by the U.S., put American navy vessels at just about the extreme range of PRC shore batteries, if not beyond their range.

Frankly I can't remember how all of that sorted itself out, but at any rate at the time that it was finally sorted out, U.S. vessels did actually escort the re-supply vessels from Taiwan out into the Taiwan Strait and they stopped at a certain point. I do not remember now how that point was defined but in any case it was very carefully calibrated to take into account all of these conflicting interpretations and it was done in such a way that it did not commit the U.S. to recognize any particular territorial sea limit. In other words it was a political decision and it was made pretty clear. I'm pretty sure that by this point the PRC understood that we weren't going to put ourselves in any situation that would compel their shore batteries to take our vessels under fire. We avoided it in that way. We fuzzed it up in that true American diplomatic sense.

The second thing is that while all this was going on there was a contest for control of the air over the Taiwan Strait. We supplied the Republic of China air force with sidewinder missiles, which they used to great effect. I think the kill rate was something like 30-to-one in the air battles over the Taiwan Strait. That meant then that very early in the battles it was not possible for the PRC air force to attack any re-supply lines from the air. I think that helped us in our negotiations with the ROC to determine this political demarcation point in the waters of the Taiwan Strait. It was very complicated business.

The media in Taiwan was controlled so they would release statements by "political" figures, leading military strategists and so forth, in the press there intended to psychologically coerce us into adopting the position most favorable to them. It was not always the one that our military wanted to adopt. The military did not want to get into a fight with the PRC at this point.

Drumright's job was very delicate. On the one hand he was recently arrived, he had very good credentials with the ROC, they liked him. He was on good terms with the Gimo. They thought he was okay. He was reliable. He wasn't one of the China crowd in the State Department that was trying to sell out the Gimo. He didn't have that identity at all. In order to maintain his access to them he had to retain that image with them.

On the other hand he had to utilize it to cool off the hot heads, most particularly a fellow by the name of Tiger Wang who was the commander of the ROC air force at that point and was a real gung ho sort of a person. He talked publicly as though he was ready to order his forces to go across the Strait and lay PRC military installations waste. He seemed to figure that they could. Of course when the ROC air force got the sidewinder air-to-air defense missile, which proved extremely effective in dogfights with the PRC air force, that made them feel even more invincible. Drumright had to sort of cool off that element within the ROC military establishment; I think there were a lot of generals who wanted to gain favor with the Gimo (Chiang Kai-shek) and avenge the defeat they had experienced on the mainland ten years earlier.

It is very difficult for a soldier. Your comrades are under attack and you want to protect them; you want to show that you are tough and strong and you're militant and all the rest. On the other hand I think there were some cool heads among the ROC military who realized that this could be a pretty sticky operation if they really got into ground combat with the PRC. They weren't itching for it but on the other hand they had to look like they were really going to make a big scrap out of it if it really took place.

For a period from the beginning of the artillery battle in August until October when John Foster Dulles came out on his trip in 1958. Dulles was ill with terminal cancer at the time. He had either just been to Rome for the funeral of Pius XII or he was going there after his stop in Taiwan. Three months later he resigned and Christian Herter became secretary of State. Dulles was a sick man and he came out at a crucial point when this whole matter of the outcome of the battle was undecided; that is the political outcome, the military outcome. Would it be extended to the mainland? Would we get involved? By this time we had units of the Fifth Air Force, combat units, on Taiwan. We had beefed our military up by about 3,000 people. In effect we were saying to the PRC, if you are going to make a fight out of this we are ready to go.

Dulles came out for these negotiations with the Generalissimo. I remember this period very, very well indeed. I do not know the content of his conversations with the Generalissimo but they were very intense, and of course the Nationalists greatly trusted Dulles. The fact that he made the trip, it seems that it was necessary for him to go and say to them, on the one hand we are not going to abandon you, but on the other hand you must understand that we are not looking for a new opportunity to enter into combat with the PRC. We understand that you have to protect the position that you have adopted and we are not trying to in any way diminish that or detract from it but we are not going to back you up militarily if you carry this fight to the PRC on the mainland. That was the implicit message, I believe, Dulles came out to convey. He left and the issue was still in doubt. No one really knew whether the Generalissimo had taken this on board and was going to go along with it, or not.

At that point, I believe it was after Dulles had left, the Generalissimo called in the AP correspondent in Taipei, a man by the name of Spencer Moosa. Moosa was a man of uncertain nationality who had been covering China for the AP for a very long time, including on the mainland. Some people say he was Lebanese. Some people say he was Russian. He had a wife who had another nationality and all. He was one of these strange people who floated around in the atmosphere of the 1930s and 1940s China.

Moosa was a seasoned and responsible journalist, and he had the trust of Chiang Kai-shek. When the Gimo had something that he wanted to get across indirectly, he would do it through Moosa. We had learned to watch Moosa's reporting very carefully. Most of the time it was pretty mundane and there was not much in it, but every once in a while there was an important story. Moosa would be the reporter to cover it, and of course we would interview Moosa to get a fuller background on this sort of thing. As I remember Moosa was not particularly forthcoming. He would dissimulate very skillfully under those circumstances in part to protect his access to the ROC.

At any rate after Dulles left the Gimo called Moosa in for an interview that was put out in question and answer format – and this was very unusual. I think it was put out on the 20th of October 1958 if I'm not mistaken. It seems to me that's the date, right about then. I'm not sure whether Moosa actually saw the Gimo or whether he submitted questions in advance and then called on the Gimo and the Gimo said in response to question number one this is my answer, etc. It was quite lengthy. Ten to 15 questions were asked and responded to in question and answer format. It was put out by AP, the Central Daily News, and the Central News Agency of Taipei.

We had a big debate within the political section over this interview as to what it meant. I was in on it. Carl Nelson was in on it. Sandy Peaslee was in on it. I don't know if Dave Osborn was in on it or not. We disputed it back and forth. The reason I remember this is that it came out on a Friday and in those days we were always doing the Weeka every Friday.

Q: That's the weekly report, a round up of the week's news.

CUNNINGHAM: Everything. Political, economic, psychological, military, and so forth. We had a big debate over this. This came out just as we were preparing the week-up so we had to get out a report on it, and we also had to get it into the week-up. Because it came out on a Friday we had to get it right for that weekly report that had to go out every Friday afternoon. It had to be ready about 3:00 for all the top levels to sign off on.

We had this furious debate over it and I can't remember the particulars of it, but I'm going to take a little credit for it myself here as the junior officer of the embassy, newly arrived, less than three months on post by that time. Carl Nelson was on one side of the argument. Carl is a man I like very much, a wonderful man, and a good friend. Carl put a particular interpretation on the interview and I won't try to characterize it now because I don't remember it exactly. What I remember saying in this debate that we had in the political section was, "But Carl, if that was what Chiang Kai-shek meant, he would not have said this," and I pointed to a particular paragraph. It turned out that I had spotted the key phrase in the paragraph which maintained the Generalissimo's political position vis-à-vis the PRC, but he plainly wanted it to be inferred that no broader ROC military action was going to take place. That is to say that no attempt to extend military action from Taiwan on the offshore islands to the mainland was going to take place.

That interview is absolutely vital to understanding the outcome of the Taiwan Strait crisis. The interpretation that was sent in from the embassy was the interpretation based upon the sentence that I had identified. It amazes me still that all the officers in the political section, far more experienced than I, didn't see that, but I was the guy who saw it so I will take a little bit of credit for myself on that one. Soon after that took place and after this was made clear and became the prevailing interpretation within the diplomatic establishment, the gun battle began to taper off. In other words both sides got the message that nothing more was going to happen and eventually it came down to the alternate day shelling, propaganda shells, lengthening periods - such as holiday seasons - of suspended shelling, and all that kind of thing.

The other thing that happened, and it is very important to remember during this period of time, the deputy chief of mission was not Joseph Yager. The deputy chief of mission was a man by the name of Sterling Cottrell. Cottrell was a Latin Americanist. He had never been in Asia. I don't know how it was that he came in or how he was assigned but he arrived more or less simultaneously with Drumright. Cottrell was the kind of guy who liked to ingratiate himself with the embassy staff. He did all kinds of things that, now I realize as I've learned more about Latin America, were kind of in the Latin America macho style which really doesn't go over in East Asia, and it didn't go over with Drumright either.

At any rate, the last thing that happened before Dulles went home in October of 1958 was that the Generalissimo had him to dinner up at the residence. It was very formal. Of course the ambassador was there, Cottrell was there, the commander of the Taiwan defense command, and the head of the military advisory group were there. All of the top brass were there and I've forgotten who else. There were toasts exchanged. I guess first the Generalissimo as the host offered a toast. This was done in a very formal way and of course there was an interpreter, a prepared text, and all the rest. The secretary did not have a prepared text so he extemporized in response. The exchange was substantive. It related to what was going on at the time, and was very important. Drumright of course with all of his years of experience recognized this and recognized the importance of the nuances in this exchange.

After the dinner was over everybody came back to the embassy still in black tie. Drumright turned to Cottrell, his deputy and said, "Okay, write up the report of this exchange particularly the secretary's statement." Cottrell said, "I'll do the best I can from memory." Drumright turned to him and said, "You didn't take notes?" Cottrell said, "No, I didn't take notes." Drumright had just about had it with Cottrell by then. He was furious and said, "That means now that we have to rely on their version." (End tape)

There's another thing about my responsibilities in the embassy that I ought to cover. I had two responsibilities. The first was to set up the daily translation of the Chinese press.

In Hong Kong there was the daily translation of the China mainland press, the summary of the China mainland press, as it was known. It was a very distinguished operation, well established, and highly regarded. Drumright had been accustomed to that as consul general in Hong Kong. When he arrived in Taiwan he found that there was no comparable publication in the American embassy in Taipei.

There were at the time seven or eight daily newspapers. Six of them were morning papers and two of them were evening papers. They ran the gamut the Central Daily News, the official organ of the Kuomintang party, to an independent paper called the Ta Kung Pao, the great public newspaper, which was an opposition organ to the extent that one could have an opposition organ at the time. The other newspapers fell somewhere in between the two. Some were independently owned. Some were pro-government. One was an economic daily newspaper. Two of them were evening papers.

The Taiwan Defense Command, the Naval Auxiliary Communications Center, which was the CIA operation in Taiwan at the time, the American embassy, and the U.S. Information Service, each had a press translation operation and each was publishing its own summary of the Chinese press. Some were publishing them twice a week, some once a week, some three times a week, and so on. They were all independent publications.

When the bombardment of Quemoy broke out in August of 1958 right after I had arrived, Drumright turned to me and he said, "I want a single daily summary of the Chinese press. You do it." My Chinese was reputed to be very good at that point. I said, "Yes sir." I sent out word to the supervisors of the translators of what the ambassador said, and then I called in these translators from all these different organizations.

The translators were all very highly educated Chinese. I believe they were all from the mainland. Many of them were graduates of foreign universities; St. John's in Shanghai and other Western-established universities. Some of them had advanced degrees. Their English was really superb in all cases. I told them first of all what the ambassador's wish was and they all said, "But our press translation is the best one so why don't you turn this over to us?" I said, "No, the ambassador wants this to be an embassy operation and he has directed me to take charge of it." You must understand that many of these people not only were highly educated but several of them were older than I, and a few were old enough to be my father. This was a very Chinese relationship. I said to them, "But this is what the ambassador wants and we have to cooperate with the ambassador." They were unhappy with this and they said, "We have to go talk to our chiefs," and I said, "Of course."

They went back and they talked to their chiefs. We were going to have another meeting in a day or two. In the meantime the ambassador was wondering where the hell was this consolidated daily translation of the Chinese press. I kept saying, "We're working on it. It takes a little while to get it organized."

One of the big problems was, were they all going to be concentrated in one location or not? If so, who was going to be the number one among them because there were four number ones here in this situation and somebody was going to lose face. It all took a great deal of negotiation. We hashed this thing around for a couple of weeks.

Finally the situation that we hit upon was that the embassy would produce the daily translation of the Chinese press. The Naval Auxiliary Communications Center had the superior publications facility so they would be the publishers of it, but the embassy would be responsible for editing the summary of the daily Chinese press. The translators would continue to identify articles that were important, intrinsically and particularly for the missions of their respective organizations. There would be a morning consultation by telephone among all the chief translators in these respective organizations and we would reach a consensus as to which articles were going to be translated, which group would do each, and then published. All the copy would be relayed to the Naval Auxiliary Communications Center by a certain time so that it could go into the publications operation that they had over there. That is the way we resolved it.

The other thing was that at one meeting with the translators I said, "Now I would like to conduct our meetings in Chinese." They all looked at me and said, "But our English is better than your Chinese." I said, "That's right it is, but I've worked very hard to learn Chinese and if I don't use it, it is not going to get better. It is going to deteriorate." They insisted that we should work in English because that would be more convenient for me. I said, "Well, if we work in Chinese it is more convenient for you." "Yes, but your Chinese is not up to our English." We discussed this back and forth also and we decided not to try to resolve it on the spot.

Eventually the resolution of that was that when it became convenient for us to work in Chinese, we would work in Chinese. When it became convenient for us to work in English, we would work in English. There was really no formal decision to go one way or the other but each of us would respect the sensitivities and wishes of the other parties. That was very good for me because then I was able to spend about 40 to 60 percent of my working day working in Chinese with the interpreters. If we had to go into English we would go into English in order to get the point across, but I would learn and they would learn. It became a mutual exchange, very professional. My Chinese benefited a great deal from it. And I believe that we all developed a close personal and professional relationship based on mutual respect. We produce an excellent publication, one that all the users regarded highly and of which the translators and I were proud. It was a first class operation and the Ambassador was pleased with it. Nearly all the complaints we ever got were when some breakdown made the summary late in reaching the reporting officers. Those instances were rare. We were proud of meeting our deadlines.

For three years I scanned every day eight Chinese newspapers selecting articles for translation, and we would put them through this system. It worked very well, in fact so well that by the time Vice President Johnson arrived almost three years after it went into operation, we were able to turn out this 30-page edition in which his aides found a potentially offensive article. I don't think it was offensive.

Q: You mentioned Bill about the visit of Eisenhower. This was the trip he made where things didn't go right in Japan and all. Could you talk about that?

CUNNINGHAM: That was October of 1960 and Eisenhower came. By that time things had improved a good deal in the overall China situation. That is to say the every other day bombardment of Quemoy was taking place; just a few shells a day. By that time they may have even been down to a point of firing propaganda shells only. In any case Americans were visiting Quemoy regularly and within any fear of danger. It was not exactly a tourist stop but a routine visit spot for visiting congressmen and people like that.

Economic conditions in Taiwan had also begun to improve by then, very, very modestly I must say because the standard of living was still quite low in 1960. Taiwan was beginning to develop export trade zones and there was beginning to be a little bit of improvement in the living standards of the middle class. People were kind of settling in.

It was also pretty much accepted by that time that while the government would continue to talk about recovering the mainland and eliminating the bandit regime in Beijing, it wasn't going to do anything militarily. While it would maintain a very strong military force, the military force would have a defensive configuration and not an offensive configuration.

At that time we were also having regular conversations in Warsaw with the PRC; the ambassadorial level private talks were taking place. The war in Vietnam had not really begun, had not really heated up at that time. There was no fighting in Korea; the DMZ was stabilized. In general there was an atmosphere of well-being and peace in most of Asia. The main issue at that time, which is somebody else's responsibility to talk about, was the revision of the security treaty with Japan which of course led to the failure of Eisenhower's visit there; it didn't take place.

Eisenhower arrived in Taiwan; it was to be his next to last stop before the planned visit to Japan.

It had been programmed as part of the trip. It was very important. A sitting United States president had never before visited any government of China. The highest ranking sitting U.S. official ever to visit a government of China had been Henry Wallace who visited Chung-king in the 1940s while still Vice-President in Roosevelt's third administration. We might note parenthetically that Ulysses S. Grant visited China after leaving office, so he technically was the first U.S. President to visit China, though not a sitting President at the time.

Q: His round the world trip.

CUNNINGHAM: Yes. Roosevelt sent Wallace out to find out what was going on out there and to try to keep the Nationalists in the war against the Japanese.

Eisenhower's trip was a very big deal. Of course Eisenhower was very well liked and respected in Taiwan. I am sure there were things of some substance that took place on that visit but it was largely symbolic. After all Eisenhower had less than a year to go in office and he was too prudent a man to make any long-range commitments for the United States.

The whole thing was an opportunity for the Republic of China to show itself off internationally. There was a big international and American press corps following Eisenhower. There was very heavy coverage. There were parades and there were rallies. It was all very friendly. And the weather was excellent for all the outdoor activities of the visit. Eisenhower laid a wreath at the tomb of the unknowns, or the war heroes in Taiwan. Someone remarked to me, one of our Chinese staff from the American embassy, said, "Well this is a great show. It is two old soldiers getting together and kind of carrying off the ceremonial functions in that manner."

Eisenhower helicoptered in from a cruiser - I think it was the Helena that he was traveling on at the time - from off the East Coast of Taiwan. The Helena did not come up the Taiwan Straits. It stayed well clear of any provocation of the PRC. I think that looking back this was after all only two years after the bombardment across the Taiwan Straits so there were great pains taken to reassure the PRC that while this was a visit of solidarity, it was not meant as a provocation to the People's Republic of China. I don't remember anything in particular of substance in the case of that visit. It proved useful as a dress rehearsal for Lyndon Johnson's visit the following May when he came through Taiwan.

Q: How did that one go? By that time he was vice president.

CUNNINGHAM: By that time Johnson was vice president. He was sent out by Kennedy in April or May to find out what was going on in Vietnam because by '61 the situation was beginning to deteriorate somewhat there. Johnson came out and came to Taiwan. He did not go to Japan because the whole business of the failure of Eisenhower's visit was still too tender for him to risk that. He came to Taiwan. I think it was his first stop in Asia because then he went to the Philippines, Vietnam, and someplace else in Southeast Asia, probably Bangkok, which would have been a logical stop with Thailand being a SEATO ally at the time. I've forgotten what the rest of the itinerary was.

By the time that Johnson arrived, I had begun my duties as Director of the language school in Taichung. I had not moved my family to Taichung yet, and this was fortunate. Drumright called me back to Taipei to serve as Johnson's interpreter on the trip and also to coordinate special editions of the summary of translations of the daily Chinese press coverage of Johnson's visit. Because three years previously at the time of the Taiwan Strait crisis I had set up the daily translation of the local Chinese press at Drumright's direction I knew all these translators, the whole operation. I had run it for three years and this was kind of the final act. We ran an expanded version of some 30 pages or so.

This visit was quite unlike the Eisenhower's sedate, formal program. Johnson arrived in his campaign style, and he wanted to press the flesh with everybody. It was a very hot day. I was at the airport when he arrived.

One of the first things that happened involved the first edition of our special translation summary. The Johnson party, the Secret Service, took over the Grand Hotel, which was the only respectable hotel in town at the time, for the vice presidential party. Because Johnson arrived on somewhat short notice, that meant that the reservations of several other people, who had been booked into the hotel, had to be canceled. We were told to cover everything in the press summary, and every article that was related to Lyndon Johnson. Everything. Those were the orders that came down so I passed the word along to the translation staff. They loyally gathered up everything and they translated it.

Our initial edition of these translations, the arrival one you might say, we included a little article that some enterprising reporter from one of the six Chinese newspapers in Taipei had written concerning his interview with American visitors who were asked to vacate their rooms in the Grand Hotel for Lyndon Johnson. While they grumbled a little bit about it, one of them said – and this was highlighted in the story – “Well after all he is the vice president and this is an important visit. I guess as American citizens it's inconvenient for us but we ought to give way for the vice president of the United States.” This article appeared on the last page or the next to last page of this multi-page edition which came off the press just a couple of hours before Johnson was going to touch down. Before it was printed, the senior editor, Donald Wu, called the article to my attention and asked whether it should be included. In light of the orders we had received, I decided we should go with it. Donald, who was a veteran journalist, I suppose told the publications staff to bury the article in the back of the edition.

We rushed 30 or more copies of this edition out to the airport and somebody on the staff made sure that there was at least one copy in every vehicle in the presidential motorcade. Somebody on Johnson's staff looked through this translation edition and found this article on the next to last page. A howl went up and they said, “Oh my god, Lyndon will go through the roof if he sees this. Retrieve all of those. Get them out of there. Get them out of the vehicles.” Somebody else had to run around and gather all these things up and get them out of the motorcade. I think despite this desperate precaution some newspaper guy who was in the traveling party got a hold of one copy and put the story on the international press wires so it was played back to the U.S. press.

At some point in the visit or before everybody who was accompanying Lyndon Johnson had finally left, one of the Johnson retinue went to see Joseph Yager, the deputy chief of mission at the time, and upbraided him for including this article in the press summary. “Why did you do this?” and so on. Joe Yager looked this thing over and he said, “After all it was published and it wasn’t uncomplimentary to the vice president. I think we did the right thing by putting it in.” The matter stopped right there. There was no further consequence after that. My career did not end at that point, thanks to Joe Yager, who was one of the best bosses I ever had.

As head of the translation section, the guy in charge of translation, there were three other things that happened. I was told to arrange for the translation into Chinese of the joint communiqué to be issued at the end of Johnson’s visit. Johnson was in Taiwan about 36 hours as I recall. The night before the day that he was to leave I went up to the Grand Hotel and started asking around, “Where is the text of the joint communiqué?” I was told it was up there some place. I looked around, and looked around, and finally somebody said, “Well, Horace Busby, Johnson’s speech writer, is up there and he’s got it.”

I went up and found Busby in his room at the Grand Hotel, which had been turned into kind of a workshop at that point with half a dozen people sitting around, going in and out. Busby was sitting there under a lamp with his typewriter, which was not electric as I recall, typing away at something. I said, “I’m here to get the joint communiqué.” He said, “It’s not ready yet. You just wait.” So I sat down and waited. This was about 9:00 at night. I waited while Busby was working on other things.

Finally he pulled out a piece of paper and came to me and said, “I’m working on this speech that the vice president is going to give tomorrow at 2:00 in the afternoon to the youth rally,” or something like that, “why don’t you look it over?” I looked it over. I read the speech and thought, I don’t know how this is going to go down. I was supposed to interpret for the vice president at the speech too so I had to know this text. Lyndon Johnson, now that I’ve been to Texas and know more about his personal background, carried on at great length about how poor the people in Taiwan had been and how much better their life had become. He talked about “you didn’t have this, and you didn’t have that, and you didn’t even have shoes!”

I thought this particular line, “you didn’t even have shoes,” was not going to wash to the audience that he’s going to be talking to because the Chinese have got a thing about shoes and feet and so on, the whole bound foot syndrome. Lyndon Johnson was simply not attuned to the sensitivities of Chinese culture, so I just deleted that sentence from the text without saying anything. I just crossed it out so that it wouldn’t get translated into Chinese. I think I gave it back to Busby but I’m not sure. I believe we handled the translation of that text into Chinese also, so perhaps I just sent it downtown to my staff. It did not appear in the text that the vice president used nor was it in the version published in the Chinese press, I know that.

The second thing that happened was along about 2:00 in the morning I was still sitting there wondering where this joint communiqué was. I kept calling my translators saying, “Don’t let anybody go home because I haven’t got it yet. Make sure somebody is there because I am going to bring it down. The deadline is very short and we are going to have to get it out, press lines and all the rest.”

Bill Crockett who was undersecretary of State for administration at the time, or deputy undersecretary of State, a high-ranking official, had come in from the state dinner about ten thirty or eleven p.m. and had fallen asleep sitting in a chair, still in his dinner jacket, just about two seats from me in the room there. He had a piece of paper in his hand when he fell asleep. I didn't pay much attention to it. At 2:00 or 3:00 in the morning, Busby got up from his typewriter, walked over, took the piece of paper out of Crockett's hand (Crockett was sound asleep and didn't know this had happened at all.), gave it to me and said, "Here is the joint communiqué. I guess you had better go get it translated." I said, "Fine. Thanks very much," and off I went. Only much later did I realize that I had the only existing copy of the joint communiqué. I have no idea how it got into the room or why it had been given to Crockett. He surely was not the appropriate member of the party to review it.

Downtown I went to where my translators were and I said, "Okay, here it is. Translate this thing and get it out. Let me know when it is finished and I'll get a copy of it and get it back to wherever it is supposed to go." I wasn't given any instructions about this by Busby. I wasn't told to bring it back to him. Busby just said here it is, go get it translated, so off I went. Anyway, then I went home. It was getting toward dawn by this time. I had a shower. I was going to have other things to do. I was going to have to interpret for Johnson later in the day. I didn't even get to bed. I went home, had a shower, and had something to eat.

About 7:00 in the morning the telephone rang and it was Joe Yager, the deputy chief of mission. He said, "The vice president wants the joint communiqué and I understand that you've got it." I said, "Yes, Busby gave it to me and said go get it translated. I've taken it down and they have it and are translating it." Yager said, "The vice president wants the joint communiqué." I said, "Okay, we'll get it up to him." By that time fortunately there were photocopy machines, Xerox, so we could make a copy of it.

Physically the joint communiqué was in downtown Taipei at the USIS press office where all the translators were and the vice president was 45 minutes away at the residence of the president, the Gimo, up on Grass Mountain east of town. I said, "Okay." I called up my head translator and I said, "Photocopy that thing. Get a driver, send it out to Mr. Yager at the president's residence in Tien Mu, and make sure it is delivered to him." I thought it would all be okay, and I resumed my breakfast.

Ten minutes later the phone rang again. It was Joe Yager again. "The vice president wants to know where the hell the communiqué is." This was obviously a direct quote, because Joe Yager was not given to hard language, especially when dealing with his staff. I said, "It's been copied. I've given instructions and it is on its way. You guys are 45 minutes away. It will get there in due course." I got three more calls I think before that thing finally arrived, and I assumed the vice president was satisfied.

There is a follow-on to this. My assumption was incorrect. Johnson was upset and stayed that way. Three years later Lyndon Johnson became president of the United States as a result of Kennedy's assassination. By then I was working on the Republic of China desk in the Department of State. My boss at that time, Paul Popple, now deceased, my neighbor and friend from my days in Saigon and Taichung. Paul had been on Lyndon Johnson's staff when he was a senator, and when Johnson became president he gathered up as many of his former staff members as possible to join the White House staff. He wanted Paul to handle his correspondence, so Popple did.

After Paul had been there a couple of months he said to me, "Bill, the president keeps talking about this mishandling of the joint communiqué in Taiwan. What is this all about? You were there." I said, "Paul, let me tell you, this is what happened." He said, "The president keeps inquiring about that and he is determined to find out who was the bastard that STOLE," and those were Johnson's words "the communiqué in Taipei." For the rest of the time that I worked in Washington I feared that the next telephone call was going to be Lyndon Johnson on the line saying, "You bastard I've found you now!" From time to time I would hear this feedback that Johnson was still looking for the guy who stole the communiqué; and he never found me thank God. It says something about his ability to retain the tiniest details and the way in which he reacted to things when they didn't go as he wanted.

There were two more things that happened on that visit. The afternoon that Johnson arrived after we got him to the hotel I was to escort him. We were to take him down island to a nearby town where the headquarters of the Joint Commission on Rural Reconstruction was located. They had a big display hall there. This was a joint U.S.-ROC organization set up to bring about the improvement of agricultural methods - crop methods, improvement of livestock, and all that sort of thing - in Taiwan. It worked very well. It was very effective. It was one of the best organizations that we ever set up under the mutual assistance program.

I had scoped out the place a couple of days ahead of time, or a week or so ahead of time, and I knew the whole lay of the land. I had been there with the advance party and knew what the vice president was going to do, and so on. We arrived in the town. Johnson leapt out of the car, started working the rope line, and shaking hands with people. I was alongside of him interpreting for him.

The first thing, he said to some young woman who was there, a high school girl, "How do you get along?" What he meant was how do you survive here, what is your livelihood, and that sort of thing? I tried to interpret that for him and he was firing questions right and left. The girl said, "We don't do anything." I interpreted that back to him and he couldn't quite grasp that. It was sort of a non-conversation but he was trying to be friendly. His style was so aggressive in the way that he approached people that it put all of the Chinese on their guard just automatically. He was eager to show that he was pressing the flesh campaign style and I could see immediately this chemistry was not working.

We then started up towards the exhibition hall where the director and staff were waiting to show him what the Joint Commission of Rural Reconstruction had accomplished. The crowd was lining the streets and the Chinese police officers were shouting to everybody, "now don't move; stay where you are." They didn't want any spontaneous demonstrations there. Johnson looked at this big street with people lined up on both sides and he turned around and said, "You all come on!" as he headed up. The Chinese police immediately began shouting, "Don't move! Don't move!" in Chinese. Johnson turned to me and said, "Why won't they all come along?" I said, "Well, they are being very polite," not trying to tell him that the police were telling them to stay put. He said, "Well, how do you tell them to come on?" I said, "You say lai, lai." So he started shouting, “Lai, lai.” The Chinese police began shouting even more loudly, “Don’t move! Don’t move! Stay in your places!” I could see what was going on so I said, “We had better hurry up there Mr. Vice President and get into the exhibition hall because they are waiting there.”

We went through this exhibition hall with Johnson firing questions, me interpreting. The poor guy who was supposed to explain everything to him was absolutely petrified by the whole experience and was attempting to respond, I was interpreting. It got done, let’s put it that way. I’m not sure that the vice president learned anything from it. I think that the poor guy in charge of the exhibition hall went home, went to bed, and had a drink immediately after it was all over because it was such an overpowering experience. That was the second thing that happened.

The last thing that happened was that when it came to 3:00 the following afternoon, time for Johnson to make this big speech which I was supposed to interpret, Drumright looked at me, looked at the speech, and said, “I think we had better get Commander Wei to do this.” I was a bit crestfallen at the time because I had been preparing very hard to interpret for the president. I think Drumright made the right decision at that point because although my Chinese was very good - I was a four-four on the FSI system at that point – it would have been a challenge to interpret for Johnson, a very difficult challenge as a matter of fact because his style was so colloquial. I think that Drumright made the right decision.

It is always best in interpreting to be going into the native language of the interpreter. That is to have someone interpreting into his or her native language rather than into a foreign language. I feel strongly about our people, particularly in dealings with the Chinese, having their own interpreters present but I think in retrospect that Drumright was wise. I was tired by that point and I think he understood the kind of stress. I think Drumright was also kind of stressed from dealing with this vice president, this Texas original so-to-speak. Commander Way did a splendid job. He was well known. He had been educated in the United States, and all the rest. He carried it off and gave it the right kind of flair for the audience and the people who were there. I don’t think again that anything of political importance other than the symbolism of Johnson’s visit occurred at that time. I don’t think that he made any particularly important substantive statements in the course of his visit. Everybody was very much relieved when it was all over because it was kind of a whirlwind trauma.

I was the first guy to experience Lyndon as an interpreter on the trip. The stories that came back from all the people who had the responsibility in other countries down the line, very much reflected the kind of experience that I had with Lyndon Johnson. It contrasted with the Eisenhower trip in the sense that the Eisenhower trip was very well organized, very smooth, there were no incidents of mix-ups over joint communiqués. It ran in a very orderly and disciplined fashion whereas the Johnson trip was kind of serendipitous. We were fortunate in the sense that Eisenhower had come there only six to eight months previously because as I say it was a dress rehearsal for what we had to do for Lyndon Johnson.

The other thing that happened during my assignment in Taiwan was the suppression of the China Democratic Party. I was the first Taiwanese language officer in the embassy. The regimen at the language school in Taichung was to take two years of Mandarin language instruction after having an initial six months in Washington. I knew by the spring on 1958 that I was going to be assigned to the American embassy in Taipei. I asked to be assigned there as a matter of fact. The political counselor was David Osborn, with whom I had worked in Japan and who had been responsible for me starting Chinese language studies. I went to him and I asked for an assignment there, and that was arranged.

My reason for asking for that was I wanted to continue to develop my Chinese. I had learned by then that the officers who were sent to Hong Kong worked mostly in English. Hong Kong was mostly a Cantonese-speaking city in the 1950s, not a Mandarin-speaking city, and the language officers assigned there didn't have very much opportunity for the use of the spoken language. Their facility in the spoken language would gradually begin to deteriorate the longer they stayed in the consulate general. They relied very heavily on the translation staff there so they didn't work in the written language a great deal of time either.

That wasn't really what I wanted to do. I wanted to be more a part of the local scene. I may have been influenced somewhat by my earlier experience in Southeast Asia, where - particularly in Cambodia - I had become accustomed to getting around in the local community and associating with the people. The thinking among many of my colleagues at that time was that someday the mainland was going to open up and if we go to Hong Kong we are going to be right into what is going on in the PRC, in the big China, and this was a way of preparing for that experience. I acknowledged certainly the importance of that argument and also the importance of learning about the PRC from a professional standpoint, but I was attracted more to the experience of Chinese culture in so far as I would be able to participate in it in Taiwan, and it looked to me like that was a better chance. So that was why I asked to be assigned to Taipei.

The second thing was that I knew that when I went there I was going to have to cover what was called domestic politics, which meant opposition politics, which meant Taiwan politics. I thought I ought to learn Taiwanese in order to be effective as a reporter and an analyst on domestic Taiwan affairs. For the last three months that I was in the language school I devoted my study to Taiwanese. The last month that I was there I went down to a little town on the west coast of Taiwan, a place called Lukang. Lukang had been one of the earliest ports on Taiwan settled by people coming across from the mainland in the 17th century. The Taiwanese there was said to be of the purest sort, so I went to live down there for a month in order to immerse myself in that. My Taiwanese was never as fluent as was my Mandarin and I relied much more on my Mandarin for my work in Taiwan than on Taiwanese, but the knowledge that I had of Taiwanese represented something to the Taiwanese people in Taiwan, the natives of Taiwan. It served as an icebreaker for me to establish relationships in my reporting responsibilities in the next three years that I was in the embassy.

The thing that I want to mention at this point is - and it is important for what is going on right now in 1999 - when I was in Lukang one man I met was a man who was the secretary general, that is to say the chief aide, to a man by the name of Koo Hsien jung. I've forgotten the gentleman's name now though I probably have it someplace in my files. Koo Hsien jung was a very wealthy Taiwanese who had prospered during the Japanese occupation. He had owned lots of sugar plantations and other things in Taiwan. His principal residence, his manor you might say, was in Lukang. He was a native of that town.

This gentleman whom I met took me out there one time and took me through this house, which dated back to sometime in the 1930s. It was one of those houses that was representative of the Asian, and principally the Japanese, taste in European style furnishings, decorations, home design, and all that sort of thing. It was a very elegant house with very nice things in it. It was a little bit run down at that point but still you could see that there was a great deal of class and wealth in this house.

When the Japanese arrived in Taiwan in 1895 after acquiring it as a result of the Treaty of Shimonoseki that ended the Sino-Japanese war, Koo Hsien jung was one of the Taiwanese collaborators with the Japanese. He had helped guide them in finding their way, so to speak. He was the pathfinder, that's how it was described to me, for the Japanese. He of course prospered and profited greatly in the economic sense from that association with the Japanese during all that period of time.

He had four sons and one of them was a man by the name of Koo Chen fu. Koo Chen fu was the one who remained in Taiwan; the other three brothers went overseas. Koo Chen fu had had a Japanese education. He is fluent in Japanese. I think the other sons probably had a Japanese education also in Japan at Tokyo Imperial University. Koo Chen fu was also fluent in English. He had very good, very polished English.

In the 1960s Koo Chen fu was president of the Taiwan Cement Corporation. It was a government corporation in which landowners had been given stock during the land reform program in exchange for the surrender of their lands in Taiwan so that land could be distributed to those who were actually tilling the land. The Koo family lands were exchanged for this stock, and as a consequence of the large holding he acquired in Taiwan Cement Corporation, Koo Chen fu became general manager of the Corporation.

I also knew Koo Chen fu through the Taipei West Rotary Club. There were five Rotary Clubs in Taipei. As you know Rotary always invites local diplomatic officials to become members. The Taipei West Rotary Club was the Taiwanese-speaking Rotary Club. The other four were Mandarin-speaking Rotary Clubs. There was east, north, south, central and west. All the members of the Taipei West Rotary Club were Taiwanese-speaking. Since I was attempting to cultivate the Taiwanese community as a Taiwanese language officer at the embassy, I joined that club and they very much welcomed me there. Koo Chen fu was a prominent member of the club.

What was very interesting was whenever he made a trip to Japan, which he visited frequently in a business capacity, he would come back and he would report on his trip to the members of the Taipei West Rotary Club. He would do this also when he went sometimes to Hong Kong or sometimes to Korea, or other places. He would come back and make a report to our club, which used to meet on Saturdays at noontime. He was always listened to with very great respect. He was identified in the Taiwanese community as somebody who was a prominent Taiwanese with very close ties to the KMT, the Kuomintang - I think he is probably a Kuomintang member, as a matter of fact, and had been – but also with close ties to the Japanese establish, particularly the conservative wing of the Liberal Democratic Party, the wing of Nobusuke Kishi and Eisaku Sato, two prominent post-war prime ministers. He had good access to those people and with the leadership of the KMT, and to the prominent figures in the Taiwan opposition, not the independence movement but the opposition movement, the non-KMT, or what they called the non-party party. He is a very smart man. I got to know him well and interviewed him. He has become an extremely successful financier in Taiwan.

Koo is now the chairman of the Straits Exchange Foundation in Taiwan, the private organization set up to conduct the talks with the Association for Relations across the Taiwan Straits. The SEF is closely affiliated with the Mainland Affairs Council, a government organ with a mission comparable to that of the SEF. It is Koo who visited the PRC in his capacity as SEF chairman last fall. He called on President Jiang Zemin in Beijing and told him he really ought to learn more about democratic systems if he wants to understand how things are going in Taiwan these days. Koo has also represented Taiwan as two or three APEC heads of government meetings.

I think this family history is extremely interesting. I don't think that this is widely known at all. I think that I am one of the very few people who know. I am sure that there are many Taiwanese who know Koo Chen fu's background. It is public knowledge privately kept in Taiwan. It is very interesting that someone whose father was the chief collaborator with the Japanese and helped them establish themselves in Taiwan, now has become designated by the Kuomintang as a principal go-between in their negotiations with the PRC. I think that his position gives him a great deal of resonance among older group of the Taiwanese community although I don't know about the present active generation.

Q: What was your feeling with this non-party party at that time?

CUNNINGHAM: First of all I got to know many of the political leaders in various parts of Taiwan and in Taipei also. I was introduced to them in some instances by my chief, David Osborn, who had known them when he served in Taipei earlier. I was also introduced by some of the CIA people. My job was, first of all, to be in touch with them so they would feel that their views were known in the American embassy and known to the U.S. Department of State, the American diplomatic establishment. My job was not to encourage them in any way in their political ambitions.

Now there were splits among them. Some of them of course were very plainly in favor of making Taiwan an independent country and displacing the Kuomintang rule there. They were in effect anti-Kuomintang, but they could not say so publicly. Many of them were very skillful in criticizing policies of the Kuomintang and of the Nationalist government, and at expressing their disaffections without going so far as to expose themselves to the charge of treason.

In the 1950s a gentleman by the name of Lei Chen, who was a publisher and journalist, established a weekly newsmagazine in Taipei called Free China, Tsu Yu Chung Kuo. This magazine was a vocal and open critic of the Kuomintang and the Nationalist government. It was very well written and edited and highly regarded for its literary quality and journalistic quality. It was widely read by the intelligencia in Taipei and in Taiwan, as well as by the people who were not members of the Kuomintang and who were critical of Kuomintang rule. The magazine reflected their views. It was a considerable irritant to the Kuomintang and most especially to Chiang Kai-shek.

I never met Lei Chen. Lei Chen was a vocal critic, an avowed critic of the Kuomintang and he did not hesitate to make his disaffection known. What he was criticizing was the inconsistencies of policies of the Kuomintang, particularly the limitations upon personal freedoms that were guaranteed to people in the constitution under the martial law conditions in Taiwan at the time.

In 1959 soon after the Taiwan Strait crisis had moderated, Lei Chen became active in the formation of an opposition political party called the China Democratic Party, Tsu Yu Min Chu Tang I think it was called. In effect Tsu Yu Chung Kuo, his journal, became the organ of the nascent political movement. I think in fact they actually attempted to register the party or maybe they even did register it as a legal party in China. It showed signs of becoming a very powerful party. That is to say it would be a party that would have a mainlander leadership, non-KMT leadership, of people like Lei Chen or other intelligencia and the very few opposition politicians of a mainlander nature that there were in Taiwan at the time, and a very large Taiwanese constituency. By large I mean running in to the hundreds of thousands. It would have a considerable following among those who identified themselves as the “non-party party,” which was pretty evident soon after it got going. That was very alarming to the KMT and also particularly to the Gimo.

The formation of this party coincided also with a constitutional crisis in Taiwan. The KMT was operating under the 1947 constitution that had been adopted in China in a popular referendum carried out through most of China, and with officials elected to public office under that constitution at that time who had traveled to Taiwan with the Gimo. In effect they used to say, they were following the practice of the Long Parliament of the reign of Charles the II and Oliver Cromwell, although the KMT did not follow policies comparable to those of the Long Parliament.

The KMT held that it had been elected constitutionally to office. It was not possible for the Government to hold elections in the territory of China. The constitution, adopted by referendum in 1947, said that elected officials shall continue in office until duly elected representatives are able to take office. Well you couldn't have elections, so nobody could be elected to take their office, so therefore they continued in office and that was the logic that they were using.

Q: And everyone in it was quite happy.

CUNNINGHAM: Everyone in office was quite happy with that. However, under the terms of the constitution the president was limited to two terms and his term was expiring in 1960. The question came to be, what can we do about this situation? It was inconceivable, most particularly to the Gimo, that anyone else could be president at that time. An amendment to the constitution would be required to remove this impediment. The National Assembly, a directly elected body roughly comparable to our Electoral College, had the authority to amend the constitution. But the membership of the National Assembly living in Taiwan or overseas, was less than the quorum specified by the constitution.

This is all covered in our reporting from the embassy in Taipei by the way. I did much of the reporting on this: how the constitution was “legally” or constitutionally amended despite the lack of a sufficient quorum in the amending body which was the national assembly; how this was done and judged to be legal so that the Gimo could succeed himself for a third term and indefinitely thereafter and in effect become president for life. That was all “handled” at that time. There is reporting to document it so we need not go into that.

The formation of this party came along just at this time when everybody was conscious of the constitutional crisis that was arising and before it had actually been resolved. Needless to say, Free China Magazine and the China Democratic Party were highly critical of this entire procedure and denounced it as another symptom of the undemocratic nature of the KMT regime. In that sense the formation of this party was a politically threatening development to the KMT. Taiwan was not a democratic society in those days, and opposition to its policies or to Chiang Kai-shek was equated with subversion at the behest of the Chinese Communists. It made no difference that the PRC was at the time in the midst of the Great Leap Forward, which was for it a political crisis, and not really in position to interfere directly in the political life of Taiwan. The perception of real opposition was enough to provoke the Gimo’s paranoia.

The upshot was that Lei Chen was arrested on charges of communist subversion. It happened on a Sunday afternoon, and a friend of mine, Dr. Chang Yen-tien, a U.S. educated professor of agricultural economics at the National Taiwan University, and his wife were visiting us that afternoon for tea. Somehow the radio was tuned in - or perhaps at some point that afternoon the cook came in to tell us - and we heard that Lei Chen had been arrested. My friend, who I believe was a party member, a KMT member, or at least he was not in opposition to the KMT, was absolutely aghast. I can still see his expression when we heard that Lei Chen had been arrested. It just ended the conversation. Nobody said anything more and he and his wife excused themselves shortly after that and went home.

It had a profound, shocking effect on the intellectual and political class regardless of party in Taiwan at the time. It had been a long time since anything like that had happened under the Gimo and it was a severe warning. I think very quickly the publication of Free China, Tsu Yu Chung-kuo ceased. Maybe it has reappeared since then, but it stopped publishing at that point. That whole intellectual and political community around Lei Chen more or less dissolved and evaporated.

He was taken into custody. As the guy who was doing domestic political reporting it was my responsibility to follow this case and report on it. Lei Chen was tried in a military court. I did about a 50-page report on that trial. It was difficult to do because word came down from Drumright that no one in the embassy – though I think it was specially intended for me – was to have any communication at all with Lei Chen’s adherents and supporters, and the intellectuals around Lei Chen; there were several particularly at National Taiwan University. I operated under those restrictions but I nevertheless had to find out about the trial. The other officers in the political section, and I think particularly David Osborn the political counselor, in effect tacitly approved of reporting on the case. It was accepted that the case had to be reported and they more or less said, here’s what the ambassador says, just be circumspect in the way in which you collect the information.

I did not live in an American compound. I had made that decision when I moved to Taipei in 1958. I lived in a Chinese neighborhood. One of my neighbors was a magazine editor. One was a university professor. One was a national assemblyman. One was a police officer. One was a customs official. I had many contacts in the community of that sort. Also, I happened to be living just a short distance from the language program operated at that time by Cornell University under a Ford Foundation grant for American graduate students who were studying Chinese. Most of them were studying Chinese at this school but they had a lot of contact with National Taiwan University and with the faculty and intellectual community out there.

Relying upon all of these second hand and third hand accounts of what was going on, I was able to put together the details of Lei Chen's trial and the arguments that were going on. Word of mouth communication is wonderful. It operates. It is very reliable in China and you just have to be very scrupulous in collecting all of this and in doing your analysis and comparisons. Also the newspaper Ta Kung Pao, the great public daily which I had mentioned earlier as one of the papers that I scanned every day, somehow or another was able to obtain the transcript of the trial and published it verbatim, which I used then as part of my reporting.

What it comes down to is this: Lei Chen was convicted of communist subversion upon the testimony of one single government witness who said that he had conveyed a letter from somebody in the PRC to Lei Chen. This contact was sufficient to prove a violation of the martial law decree under which Taiwan operated at that time and which categorically forbade contact of any kind - - direct or indirect - - with the PRC or the CCP. Lei Chen was convicted and sent, I suppose, to Green Island where most political prisoners were imprisoned in those days. He was sentenced to 20 or 25 years. I remember reading of his release, or impending release, many years later, and I think it may have even been after Chiang Kai-shek died. I don't know whether he is still alive or not. That trial was a real kangaroo court, and the verdict really ended the China Democratic Party.

There were a couple of meetings afterwards of the remaining leadership of the party, one in Taipei and one in a place called Feng-Yuan, at that time a remote rural town down in central Taiwan, at the home of one of the movement's leaders. That was an important meeting. I learned through my sources of the people who had been present at that meeting so I went to interview them discretely. They were very reluctant, of course, to talk about any of this at this time. It took a lot of effort on my part to assure them that I would respect their confidences.

After the suppression, Lei Chen's arrest and conviction, there was a split in the movement. There were actually three components to this split. Taipei was mainly a Mainland Chinese city at that time although the Taiwanese population of Taipei was the majority population, it was about 60-30. But they were not the power holders in Taipei. Those leaders of the movement for the new party who lived in Taipei were very conscious of the pressure of the government. They thought that the suppression made clear that it was time, in effect, to just call off, not to continue to push things, to lie low and wait for a better day, and to more or less keep the structure of the party intact but not to push for any further agitation or activity of any kind. The people in the south, particularly from Tainan southward through Kaohsiung and into Pingtung Prefecture, all of which is heavily Taiwanese, were the ones who said, "No, this is the time we ought to push harder. We ought to really try to push our cause. We think that the arrest of Lei Chen shows the fear of the government, so we shouldn't let up the pressure at this point." There were some vocal people in that group whom I knew also who were advocates of that, particularly the mayor of Tainan at the time, the Yeh Ting-kuei.

I did a report also on this meeting and in my analysis after and we labeled these factions the “go-fast” and the “go-slow” sections with the go-slow people being the northerners, so to speak, in the capital, and the go-fast people being the southerners elsewhere. The southerners, the go-fast wing, was egged on by a group known as the Taiwan Independence Movement that was based in Tokyo and led by a man named Thomas Liao. There was a Liao family and three Liao brothers who go back to the uprising against the government in 1947 and who had to go into exile afterwards. There were remnants of that movement in the United States and in Japan still. They were all in favor of course in pushing the independence line. They were out and out for the independence of Taiwan. They were in favor of supporting the go-fast wing, the southern wing, of this new opposition movement.

The northern wing prevailed. It prevailed in part because economic conditions in Taiwan began to improve as a result of the U.S. economic assistance programs and as a result of the policies of the government, which at that point began to shift first of all towards industrial development and offshore manufacturing. In other words it was like what we call the Maquiladora program here in Mexico and in Texas. They were setting up export production zones where the components of foreign products could be brought in, finished, and then shipped out. It would provide employment to excess labor in Taiwan and bring earnings into the local economy but it would not add to the imported consumer goods on the local markets. There were still very heavy duties and restrictions on imports at that time. The infusion of that money into the economy along with the U.S. assistance program provided much of the capital that was necessary to develop Taiwan’s economy.

The other component of this is that at that time in 1960-1961, but particularly in 1960, U.S. economic assistance policy in Taiwan shifted toward encouraging the government to develop a consumer economy. There was a very important speech given by Wesley Haraldson, the head of the AID mission, at what was called the Friends of China Club, one of the other principal hotels in Taipei. It was to a civic group. I don’t think it was to a Rotary Club meeting but it was to something like that. It was a forum where Haraldson very strongly advocated the merits and the benefits of a consumer economy and in effect he said, “You’ve got to develop a consumer economy. You’ve got to become consumers.”

His advocacy of that point was very important because it gave encouragement and support to an element within the ROC government at the time that also saw this as the way to improve Taiwan’s economic condition and to get away from the sort of situation where you were attempting to develop a garrison state; an austerity economy where you sacrificed everything in order to support a military establishment whose purpose was going to be to recover the mainland. Of course local Taiwanese business people were in favor of this also, and that is where much of the wealth was as a matter of fact; in the hands of the Taiwanese, not in the hands of the mainlanders. It used to be commonly said in those days that the mainlanders have the power and the Taiwanese have the money. There was a great deal of truth to that in that comparison.

We were very fortunate in that time in Taiwan because the leadership in the economic elements of the government, the government organization that was set up to handle U.S. economic assistance, the ministry of Economic Affairs, the finance minister, and so forth, were staffed by people who had been educated at the London School of Economics, Columbia, Harvard, Yale, in Europe, and in various places like that. They were forward thinking. They were Keynesians. They had been exposed to the Keynesian idea of economic development and expansion. Haraldson I think in that sense was a Keynesian also. Philosophically the leadership of our economic assistance mission, our AID mission, and the economic leadership of the ROC government, were in tune with one another. They both were, of course, out of sync with the KMT's political philosophy of austerity and sacrifice, which was of a different order, but these "Keynesians" managed to prevail.

By the way, Haraldson was also supported by Joseph Yager, the deputy chief of mission. Yager was not a China specialist. He was an economist. He was one of those people who were Wrinstonized into the Foreign Service in the 1950s. After his service in Taiwan he became the director of East Asian Affairs in the Bureau of Far Eastern Affairs, as it was then called, in the Department of State. Yager and Haraldson were very much both of the same mind as economists as to what the economic future of Taiwan should be. Yager was very much trusted by Drumright. I think that trust between Yager and Drumright was very important in influencing the development of American policy at that point and in helping Taiwan to become an economic powerhouse that it is today.

We talked at that time – and I mentioned it in an earlier tape – about the “takeoff” of the Taiwan economy. Walt Rostow had published his book.

Q: Which was a series of indicators, Iraq was one of those ready to take off.

CUNNINGHAM: Yes. And Taiwan was identified as an economy that was on the verge of takeoff, by many people, Rostow included, at that point. It is very interesting because a man by the name of Paul Sturm, whom I had known in Vietnam ten years previously and who was an old time Foreign Service officer, was the head of Embassy Taipei's economic section. Sturm had been consul general in Hanoi, as a matter of fact, in the 1950s and then somehow got to Taiwan. He was not a China specialist. He was not an Asia specialist. He was one of those people who was a Europeanist. French was his language; that's how he got to Vietnam. That's the way things worked in the Foreign Service in those days.

I remember very, very clearly in a staff meeting in the embassy conference room in Taipei, a large meeting involving most of the substantive officers at the embassy, chaired by Paul Sturm on the question of Taiwan's economic takeoff. Sturm said very clearly, “I do not see this happening at all. I think that Taiwan's economic takeoff is going to be like the gooney bird on Midway Island. It runs down the runway flapping its wings but never gets airborne.” He made that pronouncement about the fall of 1960 or the spring of 1961. Well, God bless Paul Sturm, rest his soul in peace, but here is Taiwan today one of the “Tiger economies of the 1980s and '90s and one of the few economies that has survived the East Asian economic crisis of the last two years very successfully indeed. They seem to know how to make economic policy out there very, very well.

Q: I want to go back to the arrest of Lei Chen. Today in the 1990s, or in the 1980s even, we would have been all over the Kuomintang government protesting saying this isn't the way to do this. You couldn't have sat still for it. What about at that time, was there any effort or movement at all to say really we should tell Chiang Kai-shek that by doing this he is squelching democracy and that this is a bad thing?

CUNNINGHAM: I'm glad you asked the question because it reminds me of something that I should have mentioned earlier. I know that it was certainly widely recognized among the Chinese intelligencia that this was an unjust accusation and action. Even for my translators with whom I worked on a daily basis and who helped me a lot with gathering information on this case felt this way. Although it was never explicitly said, they were very quick to point out those things that were clearly unjust about Lei's case, as were other people with whom I came into contact. There was a lot of head shaking among my peers, that is to say second secretaries and so forth in the American embassy, over this thing.

I think at the time when the trial was either nearing the end or when the verdict had been delivered and sentencing was going to take place, I've forgotten exactly at what point it was, but near the climax of this trial, I sat down and I wrote a short memorandum to David Osborn, the political counselor. (I was second secretary in the embassy at this point) I wrote to the effect that "We claim to be supporting democracy against totalitarianism and repression all over the world. We claim that this is a democratic state in Taiwan and yet this blatant injustice is taking place." I don't know if I put it this eloquently and I'm probably embellishing it a bit but the thrust was this, "Very clearly here is this unjust decision. Clearly this has been a rigged trial. It's a kangaroo court. It is a judgment that would not stand up in any court of law. I believe that the American embassy has the obligation to say something to the Chinese government about this and we ought to do something." My memo wasn't very long; it was just a short paragraph less than a third of a page. It was very clear from all the reporting and all that data as to what was going on.

I wasn't very clear as to what we might do or could do. I remember I typed this up myself on those letterheads that we had at the time for internal office memorandums. I took it up to David's office. A short time later he brought it back to me in my office. That in itself was unusual because I was located in a wing of the embassy building separated from the suite where most of the Political Section was located. David handed the memo back to me and said, "This isn't going to go anywhere. If I send it on through, you know how the ambassador (Drumright at the time) is going to react to this. It is just going to cause a lot of trouble for yourself. I think you ought to pull it back."

Drumright had a point of view that simply would not allow any questioning of the conduct of the Nationalist government on points of this kind, or any challenge to them. He just couldn't see that it would lead to anything productive and he couldn't see that there was any U.S. interest in making any objection to that. He really had wanted us to stay far away from this trial and not become involved in it. My reporting on it, which I am happy to say was supported and encouraged by David Osborn and the other officers in the political section, nonetheless had to be very circumspect. That's why I say if you did any reporting it had to be well documented. I worked hard to prepare a thorough, objective, and completely documented report, but I had to gather my information in a very circumspect way and in a way that did not show or indicate any intervention on the part of the United States government into this proceeding. This was one of those sad examples of the reluctance, even resistance, all too frequently in my experience at least to consider analysis, opinion, or views advanced in good faith and in loyalty to our government, but critical, or at least, questioning of our policies.

I did take my memo back from Osborn. He was realistic I suppose. I have never been happy about that. I have no doubt as to how Drumright would have reacted if it had gone through. I don't know what would have happened but I felt vulnerable at the time. That statement by Osborn, I don't think that there was a chance that the ambassador would have accepted it. I don't know whether the ambassador would have referred the question to Washington at all. He could have said a member of my staff thinks there is something wrong here and we ought to look into it and maybe say something. I don't think Drumright would have done that. I think Osborn was correct. There wasn't any dissent channel in those days at all. There was no way that a junior officer who thought that somebody in the government ought to have a second look at this, could get that kind of a recommendation through, so there it was.

A year or two later when I came back to Washington, my colleagues on the desk and I had a chance to talk about it among ourselves. Everybody recognized that this was a rigged trial, it was a trumped up charge, and the verdict was a foregone conclusion. It was entirely political. It was unjust. It couldn't be defended under any terms whatsoever.

Drumright was not highly regarded by the China specialists in the service at the time. They thought that he was overly swayed by the Nationalist's position; that he wasn't able to see what was truly happening in social and political terms in China as a whole; and that he was overly partial to the Nationalist's position. That's a judgment of history. He was certainly well liked by the Nationalists and regarded as somebody who was friendly to their cause. Most of the China specialists did not think that Drumright was realistic in his analysis of the Chinese situation from the American viewpoint.

Q: This of course is part of the reason why Ambassador Drumright had the reputation of being a hardliner as far as China was concerned, and in a way a bit of a dinosaur.

CUNNINGHAM: Overly subject to the line of the Kuomintang.

Q: Yes. But it also points out something that maybe he was representing. I've heard it said that when John Kennedy came into office President Eisenhower said to the effect, "I'm going to support you in foreign policy but don't mess with China." Kennedy came in with a very small majority. He barely made it and it was sort of disputable. It was felt that Kennedy didn't feel that he could fight many battles. The China lobby and all this was just not one of those battles that he was going to fight, and he didn't.

CUNNINGHAM: Yes, and it's very interesting. We should talk a little bit about that episode because Drumright lost his job soon after Kennedy came into office. Johnson came to Taiwan early in the Kennedy administration, May or June of 1961, and Drumright was the ambassador at that time. Drumright stayed on until about 1962.

Somehow or another it was told to me at the time (and this needs to be investigated) that the administration decided that the right move for us at that time as a way of showing some kind of opening to the PRC, some desire to get through to them, was to recognize Mongolia as an independent country. Donald Zagoria had published his book on the Sino-Soviet split and there was a certain community within Washington who believed that the Soviets and the Chinese were falling apart. This rupture was as a result of the Quemoy bombardment in 1958, of Mao's wish to use nuclear weapons at that time, Khrushchev was horrified by this, and so on. There was some thinking along those lines and the idea of recognizing Mongolia was seen as a way of exploiting this split between Beijing and Moscow. The administration decided that it wanted to recognize Mongolia and this became the first big irritant in the relationship between the Kennedy administration and the Republic of China.

Everybody in the China business at that time, regardless of political persuasion from Drumright to the most leftist, knew that the quickest way to offend any Chinese is to somehow or another interfere with their claim to sovereignty over part of what is considered sacred Chinese territory. I think by that time, 1961 or 1962, the PRC had probably recognized Mongolia and established diplomatic relations with them as a way of gaining access to the international community, but Mongolia at that time was not a widely recognized country at all. I think it was only Soviet bloc countries that maintained diplomatic relations with Mongolia. And the KMT considered it sovereign Chinese territory, and still does today. The latest yearbooks published by the government on Taiwan contain maps showing Mongolia as part of China.

Q: I think it was also in the UN.

CUNNINGHAM: No, I don't think so at that time. Anyhow, so far as the Republic of China was concerned, Mongolia was a Chinese territory and that was certainly true of the entire KMT establishment. There was no sympathy in the Republic of China for the U.S. establishing diplomatic relations with Mongolia. I think the people in the Kennedy administration just did not understand. They were looking at the PRC-USSR relationship and they were thinking only about that. They did not realize the explosiveness of this question in terms of our relationship with Taiwan. Drumright tried to explain this and in that respect I think he had the support of everybody in the embassy because we all- (end of tape)

Drumright made it pretty clear in his reporting to Washington that this was a no-no. By that time I was director of the language school in Taichung so I was not involved in this. Well you know how it is with new presidents, new administrations, new parties in power, and so forth, they don't really welcome reporting and analysis that is critical of something that they have decided is going to be a leading point of their policies.

Meantime the ROC ambassador in Washington was George Yeh Kung-chao, a very distinguished man who had been foreign minister. He was a very urbane guy and was very much respected by everybody. He was trying to explain to his government, to Taipei, why the Kennedy administration wanted to do this, what their thinking was, and to recommend ways to them to deal with it.

I think at one point the vice president of the ROC, Chen Cheng, was sent to Washington to try to explain the situation to Rusk, or Kennedy, or Mac George Bundy, or somebody at this point, "the best and the brightest” of those who were in Washington at that time. Well, they didn’t get it. They weren’t understanding it at all. Meantime back in Taipei the ROC was not understanding it either. There was a complete mutual non-communication on this whole question.

From the standpoint of Washington, Drumright was doing a lousy job of putting the point across to the ROC. From the standpoint of Taipei, Yeh Kung-chao was doing an equally lousy job of putting the point across to Washington. I think it was one of those situations of what the hell kind of ambassadors are you people if you can’t get this across? The problem was that both of them were holdovers from a previous time. Yeh Kung-chao was a holdover from the Eisenhower time in Washington and Drumright was a holdover in Taipei from the Eisenhower time. On the part of both capitals, our ambassadors were not persuasive the way ambassadors were supposed to be; they weren’t turning the other party around.

The first thing that happened was that George Yeh was called back for consultations, presumably for a week. He had this week of consultations in Taipei and then while they thought about that he decided to take a tour of Taiwan and just do a little sightseeing. He came to Taichung and visited the language school. I thought this was a marvelous opportunity for the Chinese ambassador in Washington to talk to these language students. I took him all through the school and showed him around then he talked to the students.

He did not bring up the question of Mongolia specifically but he said, “You know it is very difficult being a diplomat because the problems that come up for us in diplomacy in many cases are just a lack of communication. My advice to you as diplomatic officers is to work very hard maintaining good communication. If you’ve got good communication then problems will take care of themselves. It is just a matter of understanding things clearly.” I think what he very clearly had on his mind was that he understood that both sides just weren’t getting it and there had been a breakdown in communications between Washington and Taipei on this question.

It is very poignant because Yeh Kung-chao, to my knowledge, never left Taiwan after being recalled. He was a calligrapher and a bamboo painter, and so as many Chinese gentlemen do, he went into a sort of gentle retirement in Taipei and devoted himself to bamboo painting and calligraphy. Several years later he was made a minister without portfolio of the government but he never went abroad again, even for a short visit. He had offended, or failed, the Gimo, and was thereafter confined to Taiwan. Later he did become a Minister without portfolio in the ROC government, perhaps in the administration of Chiang Ching-kuo.

Almost concurrently Everett Drumright was recalled to Washington. There was a big sendoff for him. One of my colleagues, a man by the name of Sherrod McCall who was a Chinese language officer and who at that time was assigned to the embassy in Taipei as a second secretary in a different capacity from what I had (I think he was deputy chief of the political section) told me about Drumright’s departure at the airport when he was leaving for Washington. He said, “Bill, you know Drumright just did not understand what had happened to him. He was uncomprehending of the situation. He was breaking down.” Sherrod was Drumright’s principal aide and briefcase carrier. He said, “I had to say to him, ‘Mr. Ambassador wipe your nose.’ He was becoming very emotional over this thing and he simply didn’t get it.” Of course Drumright was recalled and he never came back to Taiwan in an official capacity, although he did make a number of trips there and always was well received. He was replaced as ambassador by Alan Kirk who was a Kennedy protégé, so to speak. As a footnote, I recall that some years later Sherrod told me that while serving as Drumright's aide he had a chance to review the files and papers that the ambassador kept for his personal reference. Sherrod remarked on that occasion that he came to see a side of Drumright that the rest of us did not see, and Sherrod remarked, that the insights so gained caused him to "respect and sympathize with Drumright." Sherrod never said more than that, so I don't know to what he had reference.

Q: It wasn't Admiral Wright? It was Kirk?

CUNNINGHAM: Admiral Wright succeeded Kirk. It was Alan Kirk. Alan Kirk had been commander of the allied flotilla in the British Channel on D-Day and got to know the Kennedy family in that way. He was long retired. (There is a little more to the Mongolia story too, by the way.) The administration made the judgment that they wanted a senior military officer out there as ambassador to establish communication with the G-Mo. In other words the Gimo would look upon a military officer as a kind of professional peer, not a State Department diplomat. That was the reason for the selection of Kirk. He went out there at some point.

When I was working in the Bureau of East Asian Affairs later on in the '60s while Harriman was assistant secretary for East Asian Affairs, there was some point at which Kirk questioned one of our policies. I've forgotten exactly what was the question at that point. Harriman blew up and said, "Send Kirk a telegram and tell him it is time to get on board American policy."

On the Mongolia thing, this question continued to come up throughout the Kennedy administration. It did, by the way, make good policy sense to recognize Mongolia if we wanted to exploit the Sino-Soviet split, once that became clear and was accepted as a reality in Washington. Mongolia was definitely a Soviet satellite, but with the Soviets and the PRC at loggerheads, Ulaanbaatar could have been bolstered somewhat by greater international acceptance. So there was a rational basis, at least in hindsight, for promoting this idea. Recognition of Mongolia would not have helped our relations with the ROC, but it couldn't afford to protest overly, and it would not have been seen by the PRC as an overture from us to a better relationship.

I remember very well, I think I was working on the Mainland China desk in the later part of the 1960s sometime between 1965 and 1967, and again we revived the question of recognizing Mongolia. Now this was after the Chinese had detonated their nuclear device, after the signing of the partial nuclear test ban treaty in 1963, and after the split between the Soviet Union and the PRC as acknowledged by everyone. Again this issue of recognizing Mongolia arose and we actually sent a fellow by the name of William A. Brown to study Mongolian at the University of Washington where there is a Mongolian language course.

CUNNINGHAM: And drew the 38th parallel and had that kind of exposure. It may be there that they looked to him for policy advice. Averell Harriman was appointed as assistant secretary for East Asian Affairs and was in that capacity when I reported into the Department of State in 1962.

He obviously didn't know anything about it either. His dad had built railroads in China but I don't think that Averell Harriman had that much knowledge about it. His principal deputy at the time I think was Ed Rice, now living in Tiburon, California, long retired. He was a China specialist – one of the old timers, trained in Beijing in the 1930's. I think it was Rice, though I'm not sure. Above the working level there really wasn't anybody that I can think of who was really up to it on Asia and had had the experience on the ground and knew things.

That is the legacy of the McCarthy period and the clean sweep that was made of Oliver Edmond Clubb, John Stuart Service, John Carter Vincent, and all the rest of them at the time. There wasn't anybody left to come to that level. Bob Barnett was the deputy assistant secretary for Economic Affairs in the Bureau of Far Eastern Affairs and he is one of the trio of Doak Barnett...

Q: Who just died ten days ago.

CUNNINGHAM: Yes. Then Hilsman, with cigar in his left hand, briefing memo in his right hand, and Tsiang to his immediate right, put his left foot up on his right knee with the sole of his shoe pointing in T.F. Tsiang's face. This was Hilsman's awkward way of attempting to be at ease with a visitor, whom I suppose he realized was a man of some distinction in his own right. Hilsman started on his spiel, and the subject had something to do with China's representation in the United Nations - - our constant operating preoccupation. After making a few opening remarks, Hilsman turned to me and said, "This is what you wanted me to say isn't it?" I said, "Well sir, you had the memo." T.F. looked at me and looked at him, and I suppose wondered just how much reliability there was to U.S. backing for the ROC. It was an extremely graceless exchange, even rude. I don't think Hilsman - - in his own self-consciousness - - had any understanding that his effort and bonhomie was not only transparently artificial, but tasteless as well.

Hilsman used to go around the bureau and he spoke of everybody in Washington by their first name: Jack, Bobby, Mac, Chet, Chip, this, that, the other, as though he had a personal and intimate relationship with each. You were supposed to know by his first name dropping that he was very close to the high level people in the Department then and in the Administration. He would speak about everybody very familiarly.

After Kennedy's assassination, it quickly became clear that Hilsman's manner was complete sham. He delivered a major speech mainly on China policy in December 1963. This speech was mainly drafted by Lindsey Grant on the Mainland China desk, but evidently was not fully cleared by the White House, newly taken over by Lyndon Johnson. When Hilsman made that speech, which contained language more forthcoming to the PRC (I have it somewhere in my files I'm sure) than had been the case up to then and at that level. Everything hit the fan in the White House, and Roger Hilsman was very quickly replaced by Bill Bundy as assistant secretary for East Asian Affairs. I think at that point Hilsman went off to Columbia University or something. He was out of the government.

McNamara in his book had also stated that we didn't know what was going on in Asia.

Q: I've had other people say the hell he didn't. Some of the stuff he was told but he just chose not to listen.

CUNNINGHAM: A fellow by the name of Lou Soros, I think, who was in INR at the time wrote an op-ed. piece for the New York Times soon after McNamara's book was published saying, "I sent these memoranda up and this was our analysis and recommendation at the time. They were rejected, disregarded, whatever, but our analyses were being sent them." It was there. The point is I think, at the time there was the knowledge available in the Department of State, and it was good and sound. The language and area training program had been ongoing throughout the 1950s and had been producing capable China specialists who were all over East Asia at that point, but all were at the working level, none at the policy level. The knowledge was available. Then there were people like Art Hummel. I've forgotten where Art was during the Kennedy administration but he was someplace out there. There were people who knew, who understood, and who could have provided advice but somehow it wasn't getting through; it wasn't received.

Q: There was a certain arrogance too as there is in an awful lot of administrations, I have to say.

CUNNINGHAM: Yes.

Q: I think we might stop at this point. I'll put at the end here that we covered a little bit of when you moved back to Washington. We're talking about the early '60s, '61, '62 when you came back to be on the China desk. Is that right?

CUNNINGHAM: That's right. I came back to Washington in July or August of 1962 to take up my duties on the Republic of China desk, which we had at that time. We also had a Mainland China affairs section. We have ever since the 1960s, I believe, had two China sections, and still do in effect in the Department of State.

Q: We'll talk about that. We've already covered Taiwan, the Mongolian situation of should we recognize it or not during the time when you were on the China desk, and we've talked a bit about Roger Hilsman. We'll pick it up then.

***

Today is the 3rd of June 1999. Bill you were on the Republic of China desk from when to when?

CUNNINGHAM: From summer 1962, I think probably the first of July though maybe a little earlier, until 1964 or 1965 at which time I switched to the mainland China section and served there through 1966. I went off to Columbia University for a sabbatical year at the East Asia Institute in January of 1967.

Q: We're not sure whether we've covered it or not but you might talk about the representation problem.

CUNNINGHAM: My main responsibility during the time that I was on the Republic of China desk was to ensure that the Republic of China retained its seat in the United Nations and in other international organizations both within the UN family, as we call them, the 13 specialized agencies, and other international bodies that were not related organically to the UN system but nonetheless which had a symbolic political importance in the international scheme. The thinking at that time was that if the PRC gained a toehold in any international organization no matter how insignificant and unrelated to the United Nations, that would be the first domino so to speak. We looked at it more as subverting the international system from the bottom up getting into the roots and gradually getting all the way up into the branches and the trunk of the tree, of the system.

Of course every year our big push was to deal with the annual challenge to the credentials of the Republic of China in the United Nations General Assembly. By the time that I reached the desk in 1962 this process had achieved a standard rhythm and a routine scenario. Along during the summertime the ROC embassy would approach the Department of State to say that the General Assembly session is coming up and we want to make sure that everything is in order. This was a discreet way of reaffirming the assurance of U.S. support for the ROC's position as the legitimate representative of China in the United Nations. This approach usually was made at the desk level – and to me when I got into the job. That routine demarche would trigger a circular telegram generated by the Republic of China desk, which had to be cleared with every bureau in the Department as well as with the Bureau of International Organizational Affairs. A man by the name of Bert Wabeke in the IO bureau was my counterpart, and I worked with him on this China representation question. We would circularize all of our posts abroad to warn them that the General Assembly session was coming up and that there would be a challenge to the credentials of the delegation of the Republic of China to sit in the General Assembly.

Now the Security Council was never an issue in these circulars because China is a permanent member of the Security Council and the UN charter in fact identifies the Republic of China as the permanent member of the Security Council. It is a continuing body and there would never be an issue of the credentials of the representative of the Republic of China in the Security Council unless there was a change in permanent representatives. We'll come back to the Security Council and the difference in a moment and continue with the General Assembly.

Our circular telegram would go out instructing our embassies abroad, those that were in capitals of countries friendly to the Republic of China and friendly to the United States, were known supporters of the position of the Republic of China or opponents of the PRC, to go into the Foreign Ministry and say, now we are counting on you to support the credentials of the Republic of China delegation in the forthcoming General Assembly session and this is why we think you should. We would fashion a series of arguments to support our position that the Republic of China should be the representative of China in the United Nations, usually citing the misbehaviors of the People's Republic of China as one of the principal arguments against this. Their conduct had shown that they were not peace loving people and that they were not entitled to represent the Chinese people in the General Assembly.

Q: I would imagine that one of your jobs on the desk would be to collect the problems of each year, to keep a list. Every time you read that something had happened in someplace you would sort of jump up and down and add this to your list.

CUNNINGHAM: That's right. Burt Wabeke and I kept a running log of the misbehaviors of the People's Republic of China and the things that they were doing that we thought that we could use as arguments against a change in the representation of China. Now the period that I was there in 1962 to 1964, a period of about two or three General Assemblies, of course was the end of the great leap forward and the beginnings of the Cultural Revolution in China, so it was easy to come up with all kinds of evidence saying, "Look how these people treat their own. Can you imagine what harm they are going to do to world peace if they get into the United Nations?" We would send this out and we would ask for responses.

Then of course we would tally everything that came in. We had several categories: those that were very firm and that we could count on and that were reliable; those that were perhaps wavering a little bit and indicated some uncertainty; those that were sitting on the fence; and those that we knew were a lost cause, the Warsaw bloc for example and the Soviet Union. I think India was a strong supporter of the PRC, as were Indonesia, third world countries, members of the African-Asian bloc, and so on. Anyway we would tally all this up and we would sometimes go out with a second round to the ones that looked a little bit shaky or uncertain and follow-up with them. Our objective was to get as many firm commitments as we possibly could by the beginning of the General Assembly session.

We also would look very carefully at those that we counted upon for support to see whether they had paid up their assessments to the United Nations and thereby would be able to vote. There were some countries that would fall in arrears. Another track that we would follow was, "Make sure that you pay your UN dues. We are going to count on you for this vote and you had better get your payment in there." We would follow up on that. We would then of course lobby the delegations at the General Assembly in New York. Normally the bureau would deploy a liaison officer to go up there. I had that duty during the 17th General Assembly. One of the principal duties for that officer of the Bureau of East Asian Affairs was to go around and lobby all of the delegations on the Republic of China question.

What would happen in the General Assembly is that the reports of the credentials of all delegations would be sent to the credentials committee of the General Assembly, which would then examine them to ensure that the credentials of each delegation were in good order. I think that committee was appointed by the president of the General Assembly. Our delegation would be in touch with the president of the General Assembly to find out who was going to be on the committee. We wanted to make sure that we had the right balance in terms of China representation on the committee so we would get a favorable vote out of that. Of course, all General Assembly committees have to be carefully chosen to reflect the balance of persuasions in the United Nations by region, stage of development and political outlook. The committee would consider the credentials during the entire session and finally toward the end of the General Assembly session the credentials committee would make its report to the plenary of the General Assembly. The General Assembly normally does not overturn committee reports; it rubber-stamps them for the most part. It is very difficult to open up a committee report in the General Assembly; the rules make it difficult to do so.

Of course the report of the credentials committee of the General Assembly would be the occasion for the debate on the legitimacy of the Republic of China to sit in China's seat in the United Nations. We would have to prepare the U. S. delegation with a statement, and arguments, and respond to whatever challenges would be brought up by other countries and supporters of the PRC in the General Assembly debate. My job was to maintain close contact with the ROC embassy in Washington D.C. to keep a running tally on all the members of the General Assembly, to follow up on the instructions to the field, to make sure that the right instructions went to the delegation in New York, to work with the Bureau of International Organizational Affairs on that, and then to do all of the back stopping that was involved and that was in two dimensions. One was to watch what might be going on in let's say, if there is such a thing, the International Rose Fanciers' Club where there are national representations of some kind or other just to make sure that somebody didn't try to sneak a Chinese communist delegation into whatever seat was legitimately occupied by the Republic of China.

The other thing that we followed very closely during this time was the policy toward China of newly independent countries because the decolonization process was going on. I got so good at all of this that I knew the names of every foreign minister in Africa and the capitals of every country there. I could reel them off in my sleep because I was sending off telegrams all the time to our embassies out there saying, "Now make sure that the foreign minister understands who are the good Chinese and who are the bad Chinese and that they work very closely and establish diplomatic relations with the Republic of China." Of course the ROC was doing its bit during this time too. It wasn't all up to us. They deserve credit.

My very good friend Yang His-k'un, whom I saw in August of '98 when I visited Taiwan, very old now and fully retired, was the Vice Minister of Foreign Affairs of the ROC. I believe he was Director of UN affairs Bureau in the foreign ministry when I served in Taipei and then later on he became a Vice-Minister and Ambassador to South Africa. He was the best known Chinese in Africa, better known on a personal basis than Chou En-lai. This was because Yang had been in the UN Secretariat in the 1950's and had been a member of UN visiting missions going out to these countries while were still colonized, helping them prepare for independence. The UN sent out these missions to help set up their governments and prepare them for self-government. Yang got to know all those people who were leaders politically in those days, but were nobodies internationally, and who later on became foreign ministers, prime ministers, etc., etc. He was great friends with all of them. Yang would go off every year on a grand tour of Africa and other countries, but particularly Africa, seeing all his old friends and jollying them up. Yang was an extremely good diplomat. He was a very effective man.

As the economy of the Republic of China improved it also introduced a number of aid programs, particularly agricultural assistance programs, in these countries. The Republic of China government had had very good success with land reform and agricultural development in Taiwan. They had good, legitimate programs to show like crop improvements, livestock improvements, pest control, seed development, land use methods, and so on. They extended technical assistance to a lot of countries in Africa to build cordial relations with them. There was kind of a competition which I monitored very closely.

I worked on three levels. On the General Assembly level, on watching the international organizations with governmental representation that were not UN related but nonetheless were official organizations in the international community. I worked with the Republic of China embassy to follow up and to coordinate our efforts with them and to consult with them. It was a full time job as liaison with the ROC embassy, monitoring the UN agencies and other unrelated international organizations, and working with our embassies in the developing countries as they established diplomatic relations upon independence. I also was just kind of monitoring what was going on in China and what was going on internationally as it related to this China representation issue.

Q: You moved over to the Mainland China desk from '65 to '67?

CUNNINGHAM: Yes. From early '65 or late '64. I was essentially two years on each desk.

Q: What was going on in mainland China because I get confused about when the Great Leap Forward stopped and the Cultural Revolution started? What were we seeing in China and how were we interpreting it? How did we see it developing at that time?

CUNNINGHAM: There were three issues involved at that time. The first was that the Great Leap Forward had ended about 1962 or 1963 catastrophically, as we now know. There was a famine during the last years of the Great Leap Forward and according to some statisticians the population of China shrank by a couple of million during that period of time from 1960 to about 1963 or 1964. Then of course there were recriminations within the Chinese political structure and inner councils as to what had caused this setback, the failure of this policy, and what the remedy should be.

The upshot of that was the great Cultural Revolution in which Mao Zedong went over the heads of the Politburo and the political leadership of the PRC to the populace as a whole in an attempt to do two things. One was to counter the criticisms of those who blamed him for the failures of the Great Leap Forward, this utopian scheme that he had, and secondly to reinvigorate what he felt was the flagging revolutionary spirit of the population. He launched the Red Guard movement and the little red book studying the thoughts of Mao. Of course he had lots of people helping him who were dependent on his success for the future of their own political careers. I suppose some people – there are in every organization and every society – were true believers in the doctrine.

Q: How did we see Chou En-lai at this time?

CUNNINGHAM: Chou En-lai was highly regarded in the community of China specialists, that is to say within the government and also within the scholarly community. Chou was looked upon as the moderator, the urbane, the cosmopolite, the man who understood how the world worked and who knew how to accommodate the relationships between societies that were different ideologically, economically, and politically, from China, always to China's advantage. He was seen as the go-between, the mediator, and he was idealized in this role by a lot of people including myself at that time.

Q: Did we see him as a creature of Mao's?

CUNNINGHAM: No, we did not see him as a creature of Mao. We saw him as a partner. As somebody whose advice was very influential with Mao Zedong and as somebody who could not act on his own, but who exercised a great deal of influence over the direction of Chinese policy and in a way as a counterbalance to the ideology and the utopianism of Mao Zedong. The main interest I think in the Department of State, and particularly on the China desk, was Chou En-la's role in international relations and in China's foreign policy, not so much his role in domestic policy. Obviously he had a great deal to do with domestic policy and had an important role there because he was the Prime Minister, but we emphasized more what he was doing in the international field than what he was doing in the domestic field. The transition from the Great Leap Forward to the Cultural Revolution was one major preoccupation, one of the major centers of attention of the Mainland China desk at that time.

The second concern of the Mainland China desk was China's policy towards the war in Vietnam because it was in 1964 that things really began to heat up in Vietnam. We were moving towards the decision to commit ground troops there. The Tonkin Gulf incident, the alleged firing upon the USS Turner Joy, I think took place in the fall of 1964 if I'm not mistaken. I get a little bit mixed up on the sequence of events. That was a watershed event; the retaliation and the air strikes against the North Vietnamese in retaliation for the firing upon the Turner Joy. We were moving into that and we were watching very closely. Would the Chinese come into the war or would the Chinese not come into the war? How would they behave towards this? The backdrop for that was the Sino-Soviet split, which was worsening all this time. How the Chinese- (end of tape)

The second preoccupation was what the Chinese would do with or in opposition to the Soviets with regards to supporting Vietnam. It was a triangular game there. The Chinese obviously did not want the Soviets to gain the predominant position in Vietnam and in effect outflank them and become the second major player in Southeast Asia in counterpoint to the United States. On the other hand, the Chinese were weakened by the Great Leap Forward. They were in the throes of the Great Cultural Revolution and things were going haywire all over China. The transportation network was severely stressed. The Vietnamese were pleading for material support of all kinds, logistical support. The Chinese were shipping a lot to the Vietnamese by various means. And then the Russians were expecting the Chinese to ship the Russian logistical support through China to support Vietnam. The Chinese were not up to handling all of that. Their capabilities were strained by domestic requirements and there was an overburden that they simply could not handle. But, if they protested too much or resisted too much on those grounds, this would be looked upon by the Soviets as failing to support a fraternal socialist people against the imperialistic American aggressors and would be looked upon by the Vietnamese as a betrayal and provide an open door for Soviet influence to increase in Southeast Asia, which the Chinese did not want.

This whole triangular, complicated relationship was going on there and we were paying a lot of attention to trying to figure out what the Chinese were going to do and how they were going to behave in this situation as it affected our interests in Southeast Asia and Vietnam. I participated in a couple of war game exercises relating to this program. Two of them in the Pentagon during that time. They took place down in the basement of the Pentagon where people tried to project certain scenarios of one sort or another. Much of it was directed towards what would the Chinese do if...?

Q: What was our feeling then. Here you have a China which you describe as not being able really to take care of its own and yet in the Vietnam War we were projecting a China that was in a sense trying to increase its empire. We considered it a threat all over. It wasn't just Communism, but the Chinese themselves.

CUNNINGHAM: Well, there were two trains of thought and I think each gave some credence to the other. One was that China was too weak, did not want to confront the United States, had done so in Korea and learned the difficult lesson militarily, and just did not want to go to war with the United States. So, the Chinese could be expected to support the Vietnamese as fraternal allies against the "American imperialists" but would not commit their own forces or get themselves into a situation where Chinese blood would be shed as a result of American weaponry or military action. They would avoid that contingency.

On the other hand, there was a great deal of extremely hostile propaganda coming out of China at that time directed at United States policy in Vietnam. Much of this propaganda was whipped up by the fervor of the Great Cultural Revolution that was going on in China at the time. The Great Cultural Revolution was a rejection of all things Western and led to the destruction of every vestige of Western influence that anyone could find in China including the destruction of all pianos. Anything that was corrupt, bourgeois, alien, Western in any way was either criticized and denounced or destroyed. People were hounded to denounce such ideas. That campaign meshed with the tenor of the Chinese propaganda or pronouncements with respect to the American involvement in Vietnam.

So, it was puzzling. You could make the argument that the Chinese were whipping themselves up to get involved militarily in this thing and at the outset you really couldn't be sure because you could see both sides of this equation and either scenario had a certain amount of credibility to it. So, we had to play it by ear and keep testing this thing as we went along.

One of the main ways of testing it was through the ambassadorial level conversations in Warsaw that went on at that time. During the early part of the 1960s, the period that I was on the Mainland China desk, those conversations were held pretty regularly about once a month. I was not involved in the preparation of the instructions for our representatives at those talks. It was Ambassador Cabot who conducted them at that time. But, I would see them as they went out and I would see the readout as the reports came in. I was not involved in briefing the Republic of China embassy, which we regularly did at the deputy assistant secretary level. As soon as we got the report from Warsaw, the embassy would get a call to come over to get briefed on it. So, I was close to all of the output and input to it. These conversations, when the transcripts become available, are going to be pretty polemical on both sides. What we were doing on our side was countering, debunking, and denouncing the arguments that the Chinese had made in the previous round. You know, "You said so-and-so and here is our response to that." These transcripts, particularly the Chinese, then were very carefully analyzed. to see what clues they might give us toward the direction the Chinese were taking in regards to Vietnam and in regards to their relationship to the U.S.

But, there were other things that we did through Warsaw to make sure that after a while nobody stumbled on the trip wire. For example, there was one instance in which a U.S. aircraft flying a mission over the South China Sea fired a missile and the thing went astray and went into Chinese airspace. The Pentagon let us know about that right away and we fired off an urgent message to Warsaw to inform the Chinese embassy that a missile had gone astray and entered Chinese air space and probably landed somewhere in China. It was a mistake and there was nothing intentional about this. Please understand that it was not an attack on the PRC but just a misfire. I think there was an incident where a U.S. pilot either overflowed Chinese territory in South China or was downed by anti-aircraft fire or something. We very quickly notified the Chinese of this also. What we began doing was working very hard to reassure them that we had no hostile intent towards the PRC.

In the meantime, of course, there were some people in China who were talking about the development of nuclear weapons and nuclear capabilities and making very strong statements in this regard. But, now in retrospect we realize they were of a defensive nature and were not intended to be threatening or illustrative of Chinese intentions towards the U.S. and Vietnam. But, at the time that attracted a lot of attention. We were trying to figure out just what they meant by making such volatile and inflammatory statements.

I would say that a considerable part of the energies of the Mainland China desk during those years was directed towards the Chinese policy in Vietnam. I used to prepare every morning a short memorandum digest for the assistant secretary based upon incoming overnight telegrams and FBIS readouts. I would get in before the opening of business, the Department used to open about 8:30 in those days and Bill Bundy, the Assistant Secretary for East Asia, had a 9:00 am staff meeting. I would try to get in before 8:00 and pick up the overnight take from FBIS and pick up the telegrams. I would skim through to see what there was in there that should be drawn to the assistant secretary's attention and provide a little bit of interpretation or précis - this is what this means. Some of my memos were good and some were bad, but it was a kind of daily grind that you had to go through. The key thing in all of those was what's new in regard to Vietnam today from the China standpoint. That was the main thing that I worked on.

Other things that we worked on, and I am reminded of this because I saw Art Dornheim yesterday at lunch. Art was on the desk with me and he was the guy who was responsible for monitoring the embargo on trade with the Peoples Republic of China. Of course, when we instituted this embargo in the 1950s it was as hermetically sealed as you could possibly make it. In fact, it was so tight that afterwards people realized that it didn't allow us to buy the "Peoples Daily" in Hong Kong, so we couldn't translate the thing to find out what the Chinese were saying. There had to be exceptions granted.

Another thing that was going on during those years on the China desk, and it influenced me later on, was that we were trying to find small ways in which to gradually ease the limitations upon contacts with the PRC because we felt that if the PRC were too confined, too constricted in its contact with the outside world the new generation rising up since liberation in 1949 and gradually taking positions in the bureaucracy there would not have a true perspective on the United States and the outside world. It was considered unhealthy for the future of China's relationship with the world for it to be completely sealed off from what was going on.

For example, and this is an extreme example but it is representative of both the restrictions and of the lengths to which we went. Art was responsible for monitoring the embargo on trade with the PRC, which was total. There was an instance in which a 12 or 14 year old boy, who was a pheasant fancier out in South Dakota, sent a letter to somebody in the Department of State, probably the secretary, and it ended up on Art Dornheim's desk. In the letter this boy said that he knew there were pheasants in North China, as there are pheasants in South Dakota on the prairie. He had been corresponding with a counterpart in North China who was a pheasant fancier and this counterpart was willing to exchange pheasant eggs with him so that South Dakota pheasants could be hatched in North China and North China pheasants could be hatched in South Dakota. The boy wanted help in getting an export license from the Department of Commerce that would lift the ban for strategic purposes on trade with the Peoples Republic of China to allow a non-monetary exchange of pheasant eggs between the U.S. and the PRC by this young boy and his pen pal in North China. That is illustrative of the extremes to which we went to prevent any commercial contact whatsoever with the Peoples Republic of China under the Trading with the Enemy Act. Art Dornheim worked on this thing and succeeded in getting an export license for the exchange of pheasant eggs. He did things like that periodically. There was a little tally that we kept there in the office. Each one of these successful cases represented a further step in removing barriers to contact between the U.S. and the PRC. Very incremental barriers.

Of course, there were times when there was a natural disaster of some kind or other in the PRC and we offered humanitarian assistance, medicines and food assistance. In most instances the Chinese declined those offers, but in making them we were assured we would be able to obtain an exception to the ban on commercial exchanges or exchanges of any kind with the People Republic of China to permit that sort of thing to go forward. And, I'm sure there are other instances, but I don't recall them offhand now, of steps that we took to increase communication with the PRC.

We also used to assiduously scoop up every scrap of information we could from any traveler who went to the PRC of any nationality who had had contact with people at the top levels. For example, Felix Greene, who I think is a British or New Zealand correspondent, made a couple of trips into China in the 1960s and when he came out he would be contacted by the consulate general in Hong Kong and be debriefed fully. They would report back and we would have some questions to be put to Felix Greene wherever we could find him. We used to debrief Edgar Snow, who made a couple of trips to China, in Hong Kong, and I think in the U.S. He was exhaustively debriefed each time. There was a Yugoslav correspondent in Beijing whose reports we used to find very, very informative. He had good contacts in the establishment there and his news reports and analyses were very useful to us in understanding what was going on in the PRC. But, all of this was a laborious process, not only on our desk but in FBIS, INR, the CIA and every other open source we could possibly find to help construct from all the available information some kind of a picture of what was going on in the PRC, what they were thinking, what they were believing, who was important, who was under attack within the establishment, etc. Then to attempt through third parties to validate, verify or discount some of these impressions. It was like diagnosing a patient whom you couldn't see or touch.

Q: What was the attitude on the China desk about eventually recognizing China? I would have thought with the turmoil within China this didn't feel like a good time that you could really get very far with anything.

CUNNINGHAM: There were two schools of thought, both, I think, within the Mainland China section and more broadly within the bureau and particularly between the Mainland China section, the Republic of China section....we can broaden it out a bit more. There were really four, maybe five, corners to this analysis. The Republic of China section, the American embassy in Taipei, the U.S. consulate general in Hong Kong, and the Mainland China section in the Department of State. I think you might say the body of China advisors, scholars and analysts who are close to the diplomatic establishment in Washington, including the intelligence community. People like Doak Barnett at the Brookings Institution, other respected people who were very good analysts, had spent time in China, devoted their lives to studying it, provided much of the background material and were in regular communication with the Department of State, particularly with the Mainland China desk. There were some who were cordial to the idea of actively seeking to broaden contact with the PRC with the eventual goal of establishing formal relations. Cognizant, of course, of all the difficulties that would be involved in that in terms of our relationship with the Republic of China, in terms of symbolism with regard to the cold war as a whole, in terms of perceptions of the PRC and what our motivations were, and everything else that you can think of. And then there were other people who were very wary of this idea and did not see any redeeming features in the PRC establishment that would warrant initiatives on the part of the United States. Did not even think they would be reciprocated by the PRC. They weren't necessarily against the idea.

I was one of those who was wary and had serious reservations about this. My reservations were very strong at the time that I joined the Mainland China desk, but over the two years that I worked there those reservations moderated when I understood better what was going on. So, using myself as an example of those who were very conservative and reserved about this idea, initially when I first joined the China desk in late 1964 ...I wanted to work there in order to be a true China specialist, but I did not go there with the expectation or intention that I would contribute towards the development of a relationship with the PRC. Rather, I would go there with the expectation that I would be working in a very guarded fashion with regards to the initiatives and what the PRC might try to do. But, the more you worked in that field, regardless of your persuasion, the more you came to realize that this is a country that cannot be ignored. It is there, you have to deal with it, you have to cope with it some how, and I did not leave that job with any understanding of how that might be done, any formula for doing that, but what I did leave there with was the belief that things would have to change and we would have to move in that direction. Somehow or other an accommodation of some kind was going to have to be reached in dealing with the PRC.

So, I believe that is a fair description of the classifications. I do not recall that there were ever accusatory relationships among the people who were the China specialists of my generation who worked on this problem. We were a special generation because for the most part, almost all of us had had no experience on the PRC mainland. Our only contact and understanding of Chinese personalities and attitudes was formed through study in graduate schools at universities in the United States such as Columbia, Harvard and Yale. Burton Levin, for example, a very good friend of mine and colleague of this period, is an example of that. Burt is a graduate of Brooklyn and did graduate studies at Columbia University in the East Asian Institute, a very fine institution. And there were others like Morton Abramowitz, who got his training at Harvard. So there were people who had that kind of background. There were some people like myself who didn't have that academic background but had some kind of experience in Asia and then came into the Chinese language program under FSI auspices studied Chinese and did area studies, which was more or less self-selected reading and some lectures in the Foreign Service Institute at that time. That was true of several dozen of the China specialists who came into the service in the 1950s or at the end of the 1940s and worked all through this period ('50s, '60s and into the '70s) to some extent under the guidance of people like Al Jenkins and Graham Martin and others who had served in China as very junior officers in the 1940s. We had the benefit of their wisdom and viewpoints. And people like Ed Rice, who was trained in the 1930s and worked on China in the 1940s. What we were deprived of was the experience, and the vision and viewpoint and understanding of people like John Stuart Service, John Davies, John Carter Vincent and others who were very strong China specialists but who had been eliminated through the McCarthy purges of the early 1950s. We didn't have the benefit of that kind of guidance and mentorship in developing our points of view. That was a handicap.

I don't mean by that that we necessarily would have bought their viewpoint, but it was a gap in the development of our capabilities. All the time that I worked on China affairs I was always very conscious of what I didn't know. From what I learned through my contacts and work in Taiwan and my studies and other experiences in Asia I think I developed a pretty good understanding of the Chinese mentality and personality, their outlook and philosophy. I have great respect for my colleagues with whom I worked during that period and many of whom have very fine minds and understanding of things, but I don't think that there were any "greats" among us on the scale of people like George Kennan with regard to Russia and the Soviet Union, not that level of thoughtfulness, and probity and understanding. Maybe there never will be, I don't know.

Q: Speaking of the Soviet Union, from the China desk, how seriously did we at that time look upon the differences between Red China and Red Soviet Union?

CUNNINGHAM: I don't think that we accepted the Sino-Soviet split until the partial test ban treaty was concluded in 1963. Donald Zagoria had published his book about 1960 or 1961. It came out just at the beginning of the Kennedy administration. Even by the time that I reached the China desk in 1962, this thesis was very widely disputed and discounted within the Department of State.

Q: His thesis being?

CUNNINGHAM: That the Chinese and the Soviets had reached an irreconcilable division between them and that they should not be looked upon as common allies but rather as potential adversaries of one another. That point of view was very widely questioned. It was not accepted as the basis of our policy, certainly, at the time I arrived on the China desk. We still saw areas of cooperation between the Soviet Union and the Peoples Republic of China, but then when the test ban treaty took place and Harriman went to Moscow to sign the treaty, the Chinese denunciation of the Soviets for entering into that convention was fierce. From that time on, I think the general view changed and it became accepted that the Chinese and the Soviets had reached a point where they could not be regarded as working hand in glove with one another any longer. There were serious points of dispute between them. There were border clashes. And, of course, in October of 1964 the Chinese detonated their own nuclear device, which the Russians did not like at all and which exacerbated Soviet fears of China. Again, this background became very important in the analysis of Chinese and Soviet behavior in regards to the Vietnam War. I think people have to understand it was a very complex puzzle that we were trying to figure out at that time as to how each party would behave and how this would affect the outcome of our war in Vietnam.

Q: Were you on the China desk ever sitting together with colleagues on the Soviet desk and running through notes to see if there were any changes on how things were going, or was this each done on its own?

CUNNINGHAM: That is a very interesting question. We did not have a lot of communication with the Soviet desk on a regular basis. That is to say, we didn't get together with them daily and hash things over. But, we did have contact with them. I think at some point we deployed a China specialist to the embassy in Moscow.

Q: Yes, I think Bill Brown was one.

CUNNINGHAM: Bill Brown was one. Stape Roy was another.

Q: But at the desk level? You were in the same building.

CUNNINGHAM: That's right and around the corner from each other. I remember going over there from time to time with telegrams to clear and getting kind of a quizzical response from people on the Soviet desk. It was sort of, well, you people don't really understand the Soviet mentality because what you are saying in regard to this particular problem is a little bit out of the context of our understanding of the Soviets and the Soviet mentality. And, our comment was that they didn't understand the mentality of the Chinese. This was not a hostile relationship, but there was a clear perceptual separation, you might say, that I think to some extent militated against a close coordination of effort on the part of the U.S.

Q: I was just thinking. The State Department and the Department of Defense usually had one of their assistant secretaries having breakfast together once a week or so. I would think that you should have had almost the equivalent of that at some place with a relative senior person in the China and Soviet areas. Just getting together and talking to each other once a week or something like that.

CUNNINGHAM: There wasn't a rivalry, but I cannot recall any systematic coordinated attempt to cultivate on the part of the Bureau of East Asian Affairs a relationship with the Soviet desk. Obviously we cleared telegrams back and forth and obviously we communicated with one another, but I cannot recall that we ever made a systematic effort to understand the point of view of the other and to talk it over and to get together on a regular basis. In fact, I do not recall on the part of the Bureau of East Asian Affairs any systematic, organized attempt to compare, discuss or contrast our understanding of what was going on in our region with the understanding held by officers in other regions like South Asia. After all there were Indian-Soviet border clashes during this time. We didn't have a cross cultural approach at that time to the fashioning of our policy. Maybe that is one of the weaknesses of our organization institutionally of the Department of State that by dividing the world into regions we have to some extent compartmentalized the development, fashioning of our policy with the countries of those regions.

Q: From your perspective at the time, what was the role of Dean Rusk? He obviously had concerns in Asia, but one has the feeling that he was working so hard with Vietnam that the rest of Asia kind of fell by the wayside as far as his focus was concerned. Did you have any feel of input there?

CUNNINGHAM: As the 1960s went on, Vietnam more and more took over the foreign policy agenda of the U.S. Rusk more and more devoted himself to being the prime defender of the administration's policy in Vietnam. Part of that was the personal relationship that Rusk had with President Johnson. My understanding at the time was that there was a very strong bond of trust and fraternalism you might say between the two of them. Rusk could be counted upon any time that the question of Vietnam came up to go right down the line in the most rigorous defense of the U.S. position in regard to Vietnam. The prime example of that was the hearings in the Senate foreign relations committee conducted by Fulbright on the Vietnam War. At one point I think Rusk was up there perhaps two full days, maybe longer. He was questioned in exhaustive detail by Fulbright principally but also by other members of the committee as well. He was staunch and unyielding in defense of the administration's position in those hearings.

I suppose that more and more our relations with other countries in Asia came to be measured by their attitude towards our policy in Vietnam. It is not that we had no bilateral interests, obviously we did and attended to them, but the Vietnam War became an all-consuming consideration in setting the tenor of our relations with the other countries in the region.

Q: In January 1967?

CUNNINGHAM: In January 1967 I left the Bureau of East Asian Affairs and went to Columbia University under the FSI auspices to do a year of study on East Asia. I was there for the entire year. Normally people go at the beginning of the fall semester and stay through the academic year, but our 5th child was due in October 1966 so I had the opportunity to do this sabbatical year but I asked to have the beginning of it deferred until the spring semester began so that I could be home for the birth of our 5th child and help with things around the house. That was granted and as a consequence I had not only the spring semester and fall semester of 1967 at Columbia, but also the summer session there.

Q: Columbia, 1967. Everything went explosive the next year didn't it?

CUNNINGHAM: Yes.

Q: How did you find it from your perspective and what you were doing at that time?

CUNNINGHAM: The Vietnam teach-ins had already begun the previous year. The campus movements of opposition to the Vietnam War got underway in 1967 and there was evidence of that all over the campus. Of course, other things were going on, too. This was the period of the civil rights movement in the United States and that was picking up a lot of steam. The civil rights act had been passed two years previously, so there was a lot of agitation about that. and the two tended to play into one another in some respects among student activists. I can't recall ever being personally confronted by anybody over our policy in Vietnam, but there was obvious growing of dislike for it both among faculty and students on campus. Among the faculty at Columbia there was again a difference of opinion about what we were doing in Vietnam, where this was leading, and I can't recall too clearly now, what the various opinions were. I personally was cordially received by all the members of the faculty in the East Asian Institute and elsewhere and got to know many of them very well. There were a few occasions when I was called upon to discuss U.S. policy in Vietnam, about which I had serious misgivings, myself. After all, I had been in Vietnam during the French war against Vietnam and I saw how that turned out. And, as I think I said previously when I was called up to Bill Bundy's office one day in the '60s and was told that the marines were going to be landing, we were going into Vietnam with ground combat forces, I had a sinking feeling that this thing was not going to work because of what I had observed during the earlier period when the French were fighting on the ground against the Viet Minh. So, I had mixed feelings about it. When called upon to explain the administration's Vietnam policy, I, myself, had serious reservations about the wisdom of that policy and what the outcome would- (end of tape)

I left Columbia University and went on to my post at Tokyo in 1968 just before the Tet offensive, which was the big turning point in Vietnam. There was obviously rising discontent and it was quite evident on the Columbia University campus, particularly in the fall of 1967 academic year. By that time I was getting busier with my studies and I decided to do a monograph on the attitude of the Chinese Communists towards the United Nations in the period prior to liberation leading up to the beginning of the Korean war. So, I was pretty well buried in research on that and going home on weekends to help out with the family and a lot of personal preoccupations. So, I wasn't seeking opportunities to get involved in foreign policy discussions up there.

I do remember one time when I was asked, to go up to Providence, Rhode Island with two others to speak about our policy in Vietnam to a church group on the campus of Brown University. This was in the fall of 1967. I agreed to do that. It was a trying experience. My point was that our main motivation for getting involved in this action from my own personal observation and what I understood of U.S. foreign policy was to counter a force that was hostile to the ideals and purposes of American democracy. We were fighting people who were inimical to our way of life.

One of the other two people on the panel who had been sent either by Washington or was from Washington complimented me on the presentation that I had made and thought it was very good and that I would have to write it up, because it was extemporized, and send it into the State Department, which I did. I don't know if it ever went anywhere or saw the light of day again.

Also, coincidentally, during that time, I made a month long trip in January to Australia. The International Congress of Orientalists was holding a meeting in Canberra, Australia. This is a conclave of all the people who specialize in Asian studies from all around the world. It is a venerable organization that goes back to the 19th century. I had attended a session of the Congress that was the first one to be held in the United States at the University of Michigan in 1967, when I was at Columbia. I thought this was a neat organization, they were meeting in Canberra, and I had never been to Australia. I decided that I would like to attend the Congress and present a paper on the manuscript that I had done while at Columbia University on sabbatical in 1967. My topic was Chinese Communist Party attitudes towards the United Nations up until the time of liberation in 1949 and the Security Council vote on Korea in December 1950. My proposal was accepted. I got a conference rate on an airline ticket and worked out a lot of things and flew to Canberra about January 3. I also wanted to take advantage of this trip to visit other places in Southeast Asia and was gone about a month. I went to the Philippines, where I had never been, Papua New Guinea, Indonesia, etc.

Two interesting things happened on that trip. One was when I presented my paper at Canberra. We knew from Foreign Service reporting that the Romanian consul general in Sydney at that time was a well-known China specialist who had served in Beijing. We were interested in his views of what was going on in China. Romania was one of the countries that Nixon was cultivating and thinking about using as a channel to China, although none of us knew that at the time. It turned out that this consul general's wife was in the audience when I gave my paper and she had been with him when he was in Beijing and was to some extent a China scholar in her own right. She was interested in my paper and we had a little conversation about it afterwards. She and some others were interested in whether or not this was some kind of a signal that we were sending to the Chinese, since it was the first secretary from the American embassy in Tokyo who was presenting the paper? Well, it was no signal, but on the other hand since I was a China watcher and specialist, I was not averse to taking advantage of any opportunity that came along to use my little paper as a vehicle for having broader discussions about China. The Romanian lady invited me to visit her and her husband in Sydney after the Congress. When I got to Sydney, I called the Romanian Consulate, but I was not able to make contact with the Consul General or his wife, so no conversation ensued.

On the way back to Tokyo from that conference I stopped in Taipei. Walter McConaughy was the American ambassador to the Republic of China at that time and Bill Thomas was the DCM. I went around to the Foreign Ministry to see my old friend, Yang His-k'un, the Vice Minister who had for so long worked so hard in Africa for so long to retain support for China's representation in the United Nations. He welcomed me and we had a long conversation in his office, during which he said, "You know, this situation in the General Assembly is a real worry to us and the vote is getting awfully close and we are not quite sure what to do. We have to think of something. You know, if someone at the level of the U.S. vice president [who was Spiro Agnew at the time] could propose or float the idea of two seats for China in the general assembly as a way of addressing the problem that is coming up, that would open up this alternative for discussion here in Taiwan." I believe that Agnew was to make a visit to Asia a few weeks later, and Yang's idea was that Agnew would raise the idea in the course of his trip. I was quite surprised that Yang made this statement. Of course, he was talking to me as a friend. I was not from the embassy or on any official business. I had just dropped in to see an old friend. We had about a half-hour of conversation.

I immediately went back to the American embassy and saw Bill Thomas and said, "This is what vice minister Yang His-k'un said to me," and Bill said, "Let's go in and see the ambassador about this." So, we went into the ambassador's office and he said, "Mr. Ambassador, Bill Cunningham has been over to see his old pal vice minister Yang." McConaughy knew who I was and said, "Yes. Tell me what he said." So, I recounted the whole thing. McConaughy said, "We have to report this right away. This is a very important conversation, Bill. I am very glad you came back to tell us about this." The interesting thing about that was that McConaughy did not resist the idea at all. Now, you know, I've earlier described how we in the China crowd used to speak about the policy of the three Walters--Walter Judd, Walter Robertson and Walter McConaughy --all hard-line supporters of the Nationalists and resolute opponents of the Chinese Communists. So, it was quite surprising to me that Walter McConaughy was receptive to the idea of a two China maneuver in the general assembly as a way of saving the position of the Republic of China in the United Nations and addressing this problem - - surprising because it would mean a radical departure from the official ideology of the Nationalists and entry for the Chinese Communists onto the world stage. .

So, that telegram went off to the Department of State. I think as a matter of fact Bill Thomas asked me to sit down and dictate it to Sally Smith, his secretary at the time and another able Foreign Service trouper who had served with other China specialists and me from Tokyo to Singapore. I dictated the cable, and then Bill signed off on it. Of course, by the time I got back to Tokyo, everyone in the Embassy everyone was asking questions about what I had been doing being gone a month and then monkeying around in China policy. My answer was that I was just visiting an old friend. After I got back to Tokyo people came out from Washington and the buzz was what are we going to do about China in the United Nations, etc. So, that was what I was focusing on.

This brings us to the 7th of April 1971. Three o'clock in the afternoon I am sitting in my office when the phone rings. It is a telephone call from Frank Donovan, now deceased, who was the press officer in USIS. Donovan said to me, "Bill, the Italian press agency has just moved the story to the effect that the PRC table tennis team playing in the international matches in Nagoya has invited the U.S. table tennis team to visit China." I said, "Yes." Frank said, "Well, we are going to be asked about this. What should we say?" I said, "Frank, just tell them we know about it." He said, "That is not enough. We've got to say more." By this time something had begun to percolate in my mind and I said, "Okay, Frank, tell them we know about it and that if they decide to go it will not be against United States policy." I stopped and started to say, "Well, we can elaborate that a little bit." And Frank said, "That is enough. We don't need to say anymore." I said, "Okay," and hung up.

Then I thought to myself, "I better be able to back this up. I know I have seen something in print somewhere to this effect and I think I am sure of my ground." I started looking around and found in my bookshelf the statement I was looking for. It was in the annual report on the foreign relations of the United States from the President to the Congress. This is a series that Kissinger started up when he was the National Security Advisor, and there are three or four volumes in that series, one for each year of Kissinger's tenure. The Department of State put out a parallel report, a thicker and more detailed report also for each of the same years after the presidential reports started coming out. Well, there in the report of the President to the Congress was the statement that the United States is open to educational, cultural and athletic exchanges with the Peoples Republic of China. Just one sentence to that affect. I thought, there it is. Table tennis is a sport, an athletic event, and we have said that it is okay to have exchanges with them. They have invited the American team, and there is no policy reason why it shouldn't go. I was right. Then, as I further looked at this I thought, "Well, you know, I hadn't really focused on this sentence before." I then recalled the pheasant egg exchange I spoke of earlier. I thought to myself that my colleagues back there on the mainland China desk in the Department of State have been working away in incremental fashion to develop language that would open the door just a little more to contact with China, and had finally managed to get this short sentence inserted into a high level statement of the U.S. government. This was the sort of thing that the desk would try to do to gradually and more or less below the radar to open up channels and opportunities for communication with the PRC." That is all I thought it was at the time. I had no knowledge of anything that Henry Kissinger was doing through back channels with Yahya Khan, the president of Pakistan.

Okay, I had just found this statement and hadn't even sat down at my desk yet when the phone rang again. It was Alan Carter, who was the public affairs officer in Tokyo. Carter said, "Frank told me about his conversation with you and what you said." I said, "Yes." Carter said, "Don't you think you have gone awfully far?" I had the text in front of me by now, and I read the sentence to him. He said, "I don't know about that. It has gone very far." I said, "Alan, this is an official, public statement of United States policy." By this time I was getting a little bit assertive about this because having found this sentence I couldn't see any basis for the Embassy to issue a statement saying the team can't go or throwing cold water on that. It would be the wrong thing to do and would be denying the validity of a statement of the government and that would send the wrong signal to the Chinese. I said, "I think this is what we should say. Here it is. It's a public statement. How are you going to go against that?" Well", Carter said to me, "You had better talk to the ambassador." I said, "Okay, I'll go talk to the ambassador."

So, I hung up and started out my office down the corridor to the ambassador's office. I walked in and said to his secretary, "Is the ambassador free? I have something I want to ask him about." She said, "Oh, you might as well go on in, everybody else is in there." I thought this was a rather strange statement but went on in. The ambassador's office was a room at least 50 feet in length. It had been the formal waiting room when the embassy was built and the secretary's office had been the ambassador's office. But the rooms had been switched around at some point.

Ambassador Meyer was standing behind his desk at the far end of the room just hanging up the telephone as I walked in. Seated in a corner to my right on a couch were two full bird colonels of the United States Army, both in full uniform. The two colonels looked up, startled by my bursting into the ambassador's office. They looked at me, then looked at him. I started to say something to the Ambassador and he said, with more than a hint of exasperation in his voice, "All right, go ahead and put out the statement." I said, "Okay," and turned to leave the office. As I was going out the door, I heard Meyer almost shout "And, you know what you might do when you put it out is ask why they don't invite the Republic of China too. A bunch of damn Communists." I said, "Yes, thank you, sir," walked out, and closed the door.

I never asked Alan Carter, at least I don't recall asking him, but I assume that I no sooner walked out of my office than Carter called the ambassador to tell him before I got there what was going on. I never had the opportunity at that moment to discuss this matter with Ambassador Meyer at all. Walking down to his office, I must confess that I was a little bit apprehensive about what he might say and how I was going to present this thing to him. So, I was quite taken back by his response.

Not only that, Meyer's comment about inviting the ROC players to the Mainland reflected an awareness of a controversy in Nagoya over the participation of the Chinese teams in the table tennis championships. The Japanese were hosting this event and the PRC players wanted to attend, and I recently have found out that the Japanese wanted the PRC to attend because the Chinese were the world champions, and if they didn't attend the matches would be a dud. Again, this was 1971 and the Japanese were trying to promote their position internationally and they did not want to have a table tennis match that was going to be a flop, meaningless because the world champions were not present. So, they had made a demarche to the Chinese to encourage them to attend. But, I didn't know any of this at the time. I did know that when the PRC indicated that they would attend, that then the question of the attendance of the ROC team became an issue. The ROC team, which had been invited, was then dis-invited from the matches and did not attend. I knew this subliminally, but I hadn't been paying any attention to it. Meyer apparently was clued in to all of this and was familiar with it. How, I don't know and I am going to have to ask him about that because I am now getting back to doing research on this episode.

So, I walked out of the Ambassador's office and back to my office and sat down waiting for the phone to ring. I waited for somebody to call and say that such-and-such a paper had noticed this story and wanted to know the position of the United States government, etc. Nothing happened. Nobody called. I was expecting the Ministry of Foreign Affairs to call up to ask what we were going to say. I finally called Frank and asked if any of the press had called. I think he told me no, nothing has happened. Then I began to worry a little bit. I thought that when this thing bursts I want to make sure that we get the line out that I have authored and has been approved by the Ambassador, because it was beginning to dawn on me that it would be important in terms of the relationship with the PRC. In other words, I didn't want the PRC to get a negative answer on this because that would cut against the public statements that had been made by the White House and the Department. I didn't want somebody who was uninformed responding to this question either. So long as it was a business day and we were in session we could be pretty sure the question would go to the right place and the answer would come out right, but beyond that I didn't know. Only four people, Ambassador Meyer, Alan Carter, Frank Donovan, and I knew and had agreed how to respond.

Also time was running and I began to realize I had better get a report to Washington on this, but at that point it was a non-story. There was a press report that was available to Washington DC through FBIS to the effect that an invitation had been extended which begged the question of what the response had been or would be and I had nothing to report in that regard. I couldn't even report that we had been asked and had said something which would more or less set the tone for this matter. So, I was in a bit of a dilemma. The day ended, people went home, I was working late cleaning off my desk. About 6:30 Bob Immerman walked into my office and handed me a slip of paper and said, "Call this telephone number and ask for this person." I said, "What is this all about?" He said, "Just a minute ago I was walking out of the embassy, crossing the lobby and the marine guard was muttering something about people wanting to go to China.” Now, Immerman had known what had been going on during the afternoon. That word had gotten around because I had informed the other people in the political section as to what was happening. So, it was sort of the buzz in that part of the embassy at the time. And, I guess Sneider was aware of it also. Nobody had told me boo except Alan Carter who said he thought I was going awfully far.

So Immerman heard this marine guard was muttering something about people going to China. (Parenthetically, I should note that at that time the marine guard was not encased in a bulletproof pillbox in the middle of the chancery entrance. He sat behind a desk to one side of the lobby, and his mutterings were perfectly audible to anyone walking across the lobby.) Immerman went over and asked the marine what this was all about. He said, “Oh, some guy called up and wants to go to China and was looking for the duty officer. I gave him the number.” Immerman said, “Did you get the man’s name and telephone number?” The fellow said, “Yes.” Immerman said, “Write it on a piece of paper.” The marine did and handed it to Immerman who brought it up to me.

I called that number in Nagoya and got Graham Steenhoven, who was at the time the President of the U.S. Table Tennis Association. I told him who I was. He said, “Thank God you called. I have been trying to reach the American embassy and I can’t get a hold of anybody. We got an invitation to go to China and I want to know whether or not it would be against U.S. policy for us to accept.” He said he was barricaded in his hotel room, and the team was outside excitedly pounding on the door. I said, “Mr. Steenhoven, I am aware of the press report that you had gotten the invitation, and if we are asked by the press, this is what we will say.” I repeated to him what I had told Frank Donovan. I read the two statements to him. He said, “You are saying that we should go.” I said, “No, I am not saying that you should go. You are private American citizens and it is up to you to make up your minds for yourselves as to what you are going to do. You make the decision. I am not making it for you. The U.S. government is not going to tell you what to do about this. What I am saying is that the U.S. government has said that we are open to athletic exchanges with the Peoples Republic of China.” He said, “Okay. It won’t be against U.S. policy if we go.” I said, “No, it will not.” He said, “Thank you very much and hung up.”

Then I called Armin Meyer at his residence and said, “Mr. Ambassador, I have just now talked with Mr. Steenhoven, President of the U.S. Table Tennis Association, in Nagoya.” I started to tell him more when the Ambassador interrupted and said, “Bill, can you speed this up, I’m late for a reception.” I said, “Okay, Mr. Ambassador, this is the bottom line. I read him the statements and he said, ‘If they go it is not against U.S. policy?’ and I said, ‘That’s right.’” Meyer said, “Fine. Call Al Jenkins in Washington.” Alfred LeSesne Jenkins was the Director of Mainland China Affairs at the time. It later turned out that Al Jenkins as a foreign service inspector had inspected Armin Meyer in Teheran and the two of them had hit it off very well and Meyer knew that Jenkins was the China desk officer. I said, “Mr. Ambassador it is early in Washington, they are not at work yet.” He said, “Call him anyway.” I said, “Okay.”

So, I called Jenkins. I called the Department of State’s operation center and as I was doing so I thought that this is going out over the international telephone net and everybody will pick it up. The Japanese will pick it up. Do we want that? Well, we want them to know in some way or other and this is kind of a face saving way for them to find out and maybe they will call me so that I can tell them what is going on. I wasn't going to take the initiative to call anybody in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and tell them what we were doing. That would look like we were pushing it and I didn't think we should give that kind of a signal. I will come back to this in a minute.

Then I thought the Russians are going to find out about it for sure, but that is okay. We don't mind if they know that we are getting closer to the PRC. In fact it has been part of our policy over the last few years to exploit differences between the Soviets and the PRC. And then I thought, well will the PRC know about it, hear about it? Well, maybe and maybe not, depending on their technology. But, if they do so much the better because they will know that we are positive to this idea. Then I wondered if the ROC would find out about it. I thought maybe they will because they have good enough technology by now that they can and if they do, so much the better also because it saves us the pain of breaking the news to them out of the blue. So, I saw no reason not to make this phone call, which I did.

The operations center answered and I told them that I wanted to speak to Alfred Jenkins who is head of the China desk. The fellow said to me, "Sir, you know it is 5 o'clock in the morning in Washington and he is at home." I said, "Yes, I do know that." He said, "You want us to wake him up?" I said, "Yes, I do want you to wake him up." He said, "Okay," and patched me over to Al Jenkins home phone out on MacArthur Blvd somewhere in DC. The phone rang and rang and rang for a long time. This was in the era before answering machines. I'm not sure what would have happened had one of those devices been attached to Al's phone.

Finally a very sleepy but recognizable voice answered the phone. I said, "Al, this is Bill Cunningham in Tokyo." He said, "Yes. It is early morning here." I said, "I know. The PRC has invited the American table tennis team to visit China after playing in the championships in Nagoya." He said, "Yes." I said, "Ambassador Meyer wanted me to call you and tell you about this." He said, "Yes." I said, "I have talked to the head of the table tennis association and told him that if they decided to accept the invitation it will not be in violation of U.S. policy." Al said, "That sounds about right," and hung up.

I thought to myself, "My God, he doesn't know what I said. He hasn't gotten it because he very clearly hung up without reacting to the most important event in U.S. – China relations since the Warsaw talks began." So, I thought now what do I do? Do I call him back? I was very worried because Jenkins would go into the office, and any telegram that I send or press report that gets there is going to be waiting for him when he arrives. His telephone is going to be ringing off the hook and all kinds of people are going to be asking him what the hell is going on. The White House is going to be after him. At this time I was still thinking of Richard Nixon and the White House in the anti-Communist hard-line mode. I didn't know about the Kissinger back channel thing and I hadn't really focused on the "Foreign Affairs" article Nixon wrote in 1967 either. I assumed that this news was headed toward an environment where it would be welcomed only on the Mainland China desk, and only there would there be people who could manage the implications and repercussions in constructive fashion. This all sounds very peculiar thirty years later, but the political atmosphere in the Washington of the Vietnam era was highly charged and volatile with respect to dealings with any of the communist countries.

I was really concerned now, but I figured I had to prepare a telegram to send out to report. Then it suddenly dawned on me that Herb Levin, who had worked with me and was my China colleague, now was on the national security council staff in Washington. So I called Washington again and asked to be patched over to Herb Levin's home. I got Herb who was fully awake, in fact finishing his breakfast and soon to go out the door to get in the White House car to go to work. I told him what was going on and he said, "Hah!" Great! Send your telegram, mark it this way, say this, say that, and I will take care of everything at this end of the line." So, I said, "Okay, that's great."

I called my wife to say I was going to be late that evening and prepared my telegram. By this time everybody had left. I was alone in the offices, the secretaries had gone, etc. It was before optical character scanners for transmitting telegrams had come in so I prepared to type up the telegram on a green telegram form neatly enough so that the guys in the code room could encrypt it. I set to work preparing what turned out to be the first of several telegrams that evening. I was working on the first one and all of a sudden here appeared my wife in the office with my supper. When she came in I told her what was going on and she was excited and thrilled to hear about it but I told her we couldn't talk about this to anyone. We have to keep it to ourselves. She, of course, is very trustworthy and discreet.

So, I prepared my telegram and it seems to me there were two or three that I sent that evening and I can't recall why I was sending that many and included the whole circuit – Hong Kong, Taipei, Moscow, London, where we had a China watch, Paris and a few other places – and sent this thing off slugged for Washington in the way Herb had told me to send it. I think I may have sent more than one. I think I sent one just to say that there was a press report and that we were going to respond in a certain way based upon the statements in the president's report and the secretary of state's report because that was more or less kind of an open unclassified sort of thing. The press report and the statements were unclassified and our response would become unclassified anyway so there is no reason to make that highly classified. I also wanted to be sure that the line we had decided upon in Tokyo (and by then with Herb Levin in the White House also) would get the widest possible distribution and thus become the governing statement for all U.S. sources. Then I did a more in-depth, classified report on my conversation with Steenhoven in Nagoya.

I had given Steenhoven my telephone numbers and told him to call me any time if he needed any help. It may have been that evening that he called back and said, "Well, now, if we go to China, accept their invitation, they are going to expect a reciprocal invitation from the United States. Can we invite them to come to the United States and tell them they will be able to come?" I said, "Well, that's a problem. I will have to put that one up to Washington." Steenhoven was a very experienced man and had been in international table tennis activities for a long time and he was aware of the section of the McCarran Act, at that time the governing version of the U.S. Immigration and Nationality Act. It required a prior clearance by the Department of Justice of anyone coming from a Communist country to the United States to verify that it would be in the national interest to admit this person and would not represent a threat to the security of the United States, or something to that effect. So, I knew you couldn't invite anybody from one of these countries to come to the U.S. unless prior approval had been obtained from the Department of Justice. Well, how do you get prior approval from the Department of Justice if we hadn't told the Chinese yet that we were going to accept their invitation and in return invite them to the U.S. So, I said, "I cannot tell you that they indeed will be admitted to the U.S. if you extend an invitation. I understand the issue here, but I do not have the authority to answer your question. I will put it to Washington." So, another telegram to Washington.

Finally, about midnight I managed to get home and went to sleep. At three o'clock in the morning my telephone rang and it was Al Jenkins now fully alert saying, "We got your telegrams in here and we understand the problem concerning reciprocation and are working on them. We will be getting something out to you but we wanted to let you know that this will be managed." I guess he asked me a few questions and I said, "Okay. Thanks for telling me." I didn't know that I really needed to know this at 3 o'clock in the morning, but I didn't complain; Al Jenkins, now deceased, was a decent fellow.

In the morning then, about six or seven o'clock, either I got a phone call from Steenhoven or I called him. I think I called him at his hotel in Nagoya and told him that I had heard from Washington. That they were aware of the invitation and concurred in what I had told him and that they were also aware of the problem of the reciprocal invitation and this matter would be worked upon during the day and I expected to have fresh news later on. I asked him where could I get a hold of him. He said, "Okay. Thank you very much." He was excited about all of this.

I got myself to the office and I think sometime that day a suitably worded instruction came in from Washington with regard to the matter of clearance in advance of the invitation of unknown people who might be coming to the United States to play table tennis with Americans. I passed that information on to Steenhoven. In other words, giving him the green light to go ahead and extend the invitation, he wouldn't be embarrassed, somehow we will work this thing out.

Then I started getting telephone calls. I was asked by the Foreign Ministry, Hiroshi Hashimoto, who was the head of the China desk at that time, if this was a change in our foreign policy towards China. I said, "No, it is not a change in U.S. policy. Our policy has been publicly stated for some months." In other words, you guys should have been doing your homework; here it is in an open text. So, when the invitation came from the PRC side it was obvious that the American table tennis team was completely free to accept the invitation and as a matter of fact I spoke with them and told them it was their decision as private American citizens whether they should go or not. We are not telling them what to do. Well, I was questioned up and down by the Foreign Ministry several times that day about this statement.

Then, of course, the press began to call and in particular Bernard Krisher, who at that time was the "Newsweek" bureau chief in Tokyo. We got into a whole lengthy discussion of U.S.-China relations over the last 20-25 years. Bernie, who is a very good personal friend, was trying to get me on the record. He wanted to quote me by name. I said, "No, you can't quote me by name." "Well, then on background a U.S. government official?" I said, "No, I won't agree to that either." "Well, senior foreign affairs observer?" I said, "That's okay." My reasoning was this. I did not want in any way to identify at that point official representatives of the U.S. government with the response the table tennis team was giving to the Chinese. My fear was that the Chinese might think that it was some sort of a put up job in some way to lure them into a relationship that they did not want. At that point I did not know what the PRC wanted. I didn't know the background of this invitation. I had no way of evaluating it. I didn't know its significance and I didn't want to scare them off and spoil the opportunity. I felt we had made this statement and said we were open to it for the purpose of precisely broadening contact with them and opening something up. I thought that if the PRC got the impression that we had put the U.S. table tennis team up to it in some way or even encouraged them in any way, the Chinese would back off.

One has to understand the context of the time. After all, the Vietnam War was at its height and there was an extremely bitter relationship between the U.S. and China over the Vietnam War. The Warsaw Talks had been suspended for over a year. There was almost total non-communication between the two sides and there was an antagonistic atmosphere. The UN representation question was on the downhill. So, we were operating in very uncertain waters at that point and I didn't want to do anything to disturb matters. I was very careful to avoid any sort of official identification with what the table tennis team was doing. I wanted to make it appear entirely and completely a private initiative. Bernie Krisher has been to this day that I would not allow him to quote me by name because it tended to spoil his story. He reminds me of this every time I see him. But, that is okay, he is a good friend. And, of course, the foreign diplomatic corps began coming around and asking me what was going on.

Then I realized that none of these people on the table tennis team has ever been to China and they don't know what to expect. I thought to myself, I have to talk to them and give them some kind of a briefing. They may just think they are going to play table tennis over there. They don't understand the significance of this trip. They don't understand that they are going to be the first group of Americans to get into the PRC for a very long time. Somewhere along the line I contacted Steenhoven or he contacted me, and I said, "By the way, we will have to validate your passports for travel to the Peoples Republic of China because you have a prohibition in your passports for travel there." He said, "Yes, we are aware of that." I said, "I would appreciate it if the passports could be brought around to the American embassy in Tokyo before you leave." They were going to have to come back to Tokyo in order to leave for China via Hong Kong. We made a date and he said that they would come in around 10:00 on Friday morning to bring the passports to be validated. That was a way of getting them into the embassy, again ostensibly of their own volition, and for me to have the chance to talk to them about the trip to China.

Somebody in the embassy said to me, "Aren't you going to go down to the gate and meet them?" I said, "No. Why go to the gate and meet them? That makes it appear as if the U.S. government was pushing this thing publicly and that is not what we want to do because I don't know how the Chinese are going to react to it." As you may know the consular section of the embassy was down the street, two blocks away from the chancery up on the hill. Ordinarily, somebody who wants to get his passport validated would not have come to the chancery at the top of the hill; they would have gone to the consular office two blocks down the street. But, I had carefully instructed Steenhoven to come up to the chancery. Someone said to me, "Why are they coming here on consular business? Why not send them to the consular section?" I said that I wanted an excuse for them to come to the compound so that I can see them privately and without having to go down there. We can get a consular officer to come up here to do whatever has to be done. I was under the assumption that something formal would be done to validate these passports for travel to the Peoples Republic of China. There might be a seal attached and a signature of some kind, statement or what not. Well, somebody did come up from the consular section with a felt pen and just crossed out words “those parts of China under the control of the Communist Party” and did not initial it or put a seal on the passport. Anyone could have done the same thing without coming into the American embassy. That was a bit of a let down but somewhat beside the point.

Steenhoven was shown up to my office together with a man by the name of Rufford Harrison, who was the U.S. delegate to the International Table Tennis Federation. They came into my office and sat down. I had one hour only to talk with them about this event and explain the significance of it to them. The first half hour was entirely consumed in responding to their questions about logistics of the trip -how they would be treated, how to conduct themselves, etc. - completely off the political subject all together. I was impatient to tell them, “Look, you guys are embarking upon a mission that is of very high importance to the United States and to our relationship with China.” So, we discussed for a half-hour these mundane things about the food, water, hotels, shots, diseases, etc. I answered them as best I could. They were particularly concerned because it was after all toward the end of the Cultural Revolution and there were a lot of very visible manifestations of anti-Americanism in China and they were afraid of being attacked in some way by the Chinese. They didn’t know how they would be treated. I said, “Look, you would not have been invited if they wanted to abuse you. You are going to be very well taken care of. The PRC has an excellent record of being extremely hospitable to anyone whom it invites and this is in effect an official invitation because sports in the PRC are under the control of the ministry of sports of the government. I think you will have a very enjoyable time.” They were much relieved by this.

The American press corps, there were only a few in Tokyo at the time -- John Rich of NBC, who was an old timer, a veteran reporter in Asia and knew the area very well, and, I think Bernie Krisher and one other correspondent -- wanted to talk to these two before they left. I saw no problem with this if they were amenable to being interviewed by the press and Frank Donovan actually brought John Rich up to the second floor of the embassy. He was in the corridor just outside my office. So, when I finished talking to Steenhoven and Harrison there was sort of a handoff to John Rich. They went out the door and he took them to be interviewed some place else after which they left immediately for the airport to meet up with the rest of the delegation and to have a lunch with their Chinese hosts before boarding a plane to fly to Hong Kong and enter China.

In the conversation with me, Steenhoven said, “You know, they are going to give us gifts when we get over to China and we have to have something to give them in return. We haven’t got anything. We have handed out all the souvenirs that we brought with us at the tournament down in Nagoya. Can you help us in any way? We don’t even know what they might like.” I thought a minute. At that time ballpoint pens were a big deal in China and if you could have an American-made ballpoint pen that was really great. Steenhoven and Harrison were thinking of going out and buying something in Japanese shops somewhere. I said, “No, no, no. You want to have something that is American to give to them. Something that has an American brand name on it. That would be very significant because they haven’t got anything like that in there.” “Where are we going to find that sort of thing?” I said, “Wait a minute.” I called up the administrative officer of the embassy and said, “Danny, we have to get all of the American trademark ballpoint pens we can find anywhere in the Tokyo region to send with a group of people who are going China.”

I gave him a brief explanation and asked if he could take care of that. He said, "I will handle it." I said, "Okay. I will send somebody to pick these things up and deliver them to the delegation." So, I told Steenhoven that we would have ballpoint pens for him and I think there was something else I thought of too, but I can't remember what it was now.

Danny wanted to deliver these ballpoint pens to me to take to the delegation out at the airport. I said that I couldn't do that because we didn't want an American official doing this and I would have to find someone else to do it. So I called our number one Japanese assistant in the political section to my office and said, "I have something that I want you to deliver to the American table tennis team that is going to China. Go down to the administrative office and pick up a package that will be there for you and take it to J. Graham Steenhoven who is president of the U.S. Table Tennis Association. You will find him either at the Tokyo Prince Hotel or out at Haneda airport in the passenger lounge or some place like that." He said, "Okay." He didn't ask me too many questions about what was going on although he had a rather knowing look. Off he went.

The follow up to that story is that it was just before Easter and I heard from some source later on that there were complaints all over the Tokyo region that no ballpoint pens were available in any of the post exchanges or navy commissaries.

Then the storm really broke and everybody was after me to find out what was going on. The press, the Japanese Foreign Ministry were calling me. We were monitoring the Japanese press reports of what was going on with the table tennis team in China as well as the Chinese press reports. We were reporting all of this stuff. The American reporters all asked to go with the American table tennis team but they were not able to get permission from the Chinese and were terribly disappointed. The American press corps in Hong Kong had a similar turndown. Meanwhile the whole Japanese press corps managed to get into China and follow these people. Krisher was very smart. He had somebody on his staff who was Japanese but fluent in Chinese and managed to get him to go along. Therefore, Krisher was getting first hand reports back from China, which he then used to scoop every other American publication.

The team was in China a week and then came out traveling from Hong Kong back through Tokyo on its way back to the U.S. Before the team had left for China, Kissinger sent out a top secret instruction to the consulate general Hong Kong that told them to stay away from these people going into China and departing China. The consulate general and my good friends there were all geared up to interview these people going in and coming out and here they get an instruction from the White House saying to stay away and have nothing to do with these people. If I'm not mistaken I think the instructions said that all contact should be confined to the channel that has already been established with the table tennis team, which meant me. I made an arrangement with Steenhoven that he would call me when he came back through Tokyo on his way back to the U.S. so that I would get a readout of what happened in China. Of course, the Chinese publicized everything that went on very heavily. They treated this group royally with hearts and flowers all over the place and cheers everywhere they went in China. The Chinese table tennis team arranged for them to win many of the matches. They were fed very well.

They arrived back in Tokyo on a Saturday evening. Steenhoven called me at home and told me he wanted to see me - - that he had an important message. They were leaving the following afternoon to return to the U.S. They were going to have to leave the Imperial Hotel around 11:00 in the morning to get out to the airport. I said to Steenhoven, "Let's have breakfast tomorrow morning. I will come by the hotel in a taxicab. I will not come in to find you in the lobby. You wait for me on the street corner. We will then come back to my house and have breakfast here and you can tell me what happened. Then I will take you back to the hotel and you can then go on your way." So, that is what we did. I pulled up to the hotel and Steenhoven was there and jumped into the cab and off we went to my house. I didn't want to use an embassy car, again not wanting to give any hint or public evidence of U.S. official interest in this event. When he got in the cab the first thing he said was, "They want to come to the United States and have accepted our invitation to come to the United States. Not only that, they gave me a message to take to the president." I said, "Okay." When we got back to my house, we had breakfast and Steenhoven gave me the full readout on the visit. I got him back to the Imperial Hotel and then went to the embassy and wrote up the report of my conversation with him.

He asked me if I could arrange for them to have the courtesy of the port upon arrival in Los Angeles because they were not bringing anything back of any value but everybody is terribly tired and worn out by this whole experience, emotionally and physically, and if we don't have to go through the long customs routine to get back into the United States it would be a relief. So, I included that in the telegram. Whether they received the courtesy of the port, I don't know. I think they probably did.

They left Tokyo and John Richardson, who was assistant secretary of state for cultural and educational affairs, flew out to Los Angeles and welcomed them at the airport. There was the evidence of the Department of State, the U.S. government, at an official level welcoming this gesture on the part of the Chinese. I think that was finally appropriate at that point. There had been many other statements out of the Department of State and the White House in the course of the week or two that they were in the PRC.

My experience with this whole thing was not over yet because then I had an endless stream of diplomats from the diplomatic corps coming around to interview me about how was our policy towards China changing. What I was telling them was what I had said all along. This is just an athletic exchange. There is no political significance to it. The United States has said it is open to these things in the President's and Secretary of State's reports. I was interviewed exhaustively by the foreign diplomats and the ministry of foreign affairs. I left Japan on June 21, 1971 on transfer to the U.S. I was fully truthful with everyone with whom I talked about this table tennis exchange and what I said it was and meant. Yes, it did indicate a warming of the relationship between the U.S. and the Peoples Republic of China. The Chinese were indicating that they wanted a closer relationship. It was a significant development, but it was simply a people-to-people exchange not something organized by the U.S. government in any way. It was spontaneous. We particularly assured my colleagues in the ministry of foreign affairs that this was the case. So, I went home.

In the middle of July on home leave I was sitting in my mother's kitchen in California, and the evening news came on. It was announced that the President would have an important statement to make. The President came on and said that he wanted to let us know that Henry Kissinger was just back from a secret visit to China and he has done this, that and the other. I thought, oh my God, everybody I told in Tokyo that this was an ordinary people-to-people exchange will not believe me at all. That was one of several of what the Japanese call "Nixon shocks".

Q: And you were lucky you weren't in Tokyo.

CUNNINGHAM: Yes, but I felt sorry for my colleagues who were left behind holding the bag that I had set up for them. However, that's life.

I am planning to write all of this up because a lot is being written on the whole ping pong exchange, mostly by Chinese. I will say here on the record, again you asked about Chou En-lai and how he was regarded. The standard interpretation in "Henry Kissinger's White House Years," and in John Holdridge's "Crossing the Divide," which is the account of the rapprochement between the U.S. and the Peoples Republic of China, is that Chou En-lai was responsible for this exchange. That he is the one who had promoted it, engineered it, and worked it all out. This is not true. This is not to say that Chou didn't have a hand in it, but I have from three separate, independent sources, two of them PRC sources, that it was Mao Zedong who promoted this- (end of tape)

-exchange. One of my sources who at the time was the Deputy Director of the U.S. desk in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, told me that in a meeting he attended, Chou En-lai promoted all the arguments against doing this. I think that this shows something about Chou En-lai. I think he was a guy who knew how to play it safe and that he was not a risk taker and that he was not a policy initiator on the part of the PRC. He read the mind of Mao Zedong, to whom he was very close for many years. He read it accurately all the time and he survived because he was so good at reading Mao Zedong's mind and he was very careful to protect himself against any repercussions that might come out of decisions that Mao made or indeed against having gotten out in front of Mao's thinking and taken some initiatives on his own in advance of what Mao intended to do or different from what Mao intended. So, I believe as more study is done that the role of Chou En-lai will be shown to be somewhat over rated in respect to U.S.-China relations.

There is also something else here that I have got to run down and I am going to see Rufford Harrison about it in a few weeks. Harrison is of the opinion that the whole thing was a put up job. He recounts an exchange with the Chinese about the invitation that I never heard about at all. In other words he says that he was the first one to be sounded out by the Chinese with regard to the invitation, and it was not Graham Steenhoven or somebody else who received the invitation from the Chinese. There is a story to the effect that one of the U.S. table tennis players was the one to receive the invitation, or that it was floated to one of them, something of that kind. But, according to Harrison he was the one who was first approached by the Chinese.

Q: Who was Harrison?

CUNNINGHAM: Harrison was an official of the U.S. Table Tennis Association who at that time was the U.S. delegate to the International Table Tennis Federation. Steenhoven was the president of the U.S. Table Tennis Association.

The odd thing about this is that John Ehrlichman's book, "The China Card," according to Harrison, recites verbatim both the circumstances and the content of the exchange between Harrison and the Chinese side with regard to extending the invitation. Harrison says that this account is accurate. But, I never knew about it and I don't know how it came to the knowledge of Ehrlichman, through what channel. What I also don't know about is that Harrison said that upon receiving this overture from the PRC that he called the American embassy during business hours and talked to someone who said that it was no big deal to go ahead. There was no registered surprise at all at the invitation. I have no knowledge of who he talked to. I was not the one to whom he talked. So, I am going to see him the week after next and interview him in great detail about all of this and try to figure this out. I am not really ready to say that it was prearranged as is alleged in Ehrlichman's book, "The China Card," because I don't quite see how that could come about and to say it was prearranged does not square with some other things that I have heard about this exchange. But, I also don't know how to account for what happened to the telephone call from Harrison. I was the China watcher in the embassy. That was widely known by the spring of 1971. I had been there three years. Anything regarding China should have come to me if it went to anybody in the embassy. The embassy was a very professional place and we didn't have slip ups of that kind.

Q: Such is oral history not only on tape but also people's memories.

CUNNINGHAM: Anyway I am going to go into this and see if I can ascertain what actually happened. There are some odd things. I go back to the point that the ambassador made to me when I walked into his office. He didn't ask me why I was there. I assumed it was Alan Carter he was talking with but I don't know that. When I walked in he had some understanding of why I was there and before I said anything to him he told me to go ahead. If he was taken as unawares by Alan Carter's call as I was when I got the call from Frank Donovan, to me it would have been somewhat out of character for Armin Meyer to respond as he did. Eventually I will talk with Armin Meyer also about this because I'm curious about some of these things. Maybe there is really not anything there and maybe Harrison's assumptions will hold no water at all, but I want to find out a little bit more about this. In any case I want to write up as accurate an account of my experience as I can. So, that is more or less all there is to the Tokyo story.

Q: Okay. Where did you go when you came back?

CUNNINGHAM: Let's just recount quickly what happened to me in the balance of my career. From Tokyo I came back to the senior seminar on foreign policy. I had received notification in the spring of 1971 that I was nominated for it and asked whether I would accept the nomination. I was inclined to decline the nomination because I wanted another overseas assignment. I wanted to move up to a political counselor job some place. I thought I was ready for it. Bill Sherman told me in no unmistakable terms that I should accept the invitation because, he said, that it is an honor. So, I went into the senior seminar on foreign policy. It was enlarged by five officers that year because it had always been 25 and our class was 30. I was one of the first class-3 officers in the old system to be appointed to senior seminar. After that I was deputy director of the senior seminar for one year. Sam Berger was the director.

From there I went to CU (Bureau of Cultural Affairs) and was on the East Asia desk for a year. That was my out of area tour under Kissinger's global outlook policy. At the end of one year there the director of that office was transferred and I was expecting to move up from deputy director to director. I was moved up but not to head of that office. David Hitchcock was brought in instead. He is a fine man, I respect him, and well qualified for the job. I was instead put in charge of the Office of Youth, Non-sponsored Student and American Specialists program in CU, which I did for three years. During that time I negotiated the incorporation of the East-West center in Honolulu as a public, non-profit corporation.

From CU, in 1977, I was sent to New York to the U.S. Mission to the United Nations where I was assigned to the resource management section. That is the section that deals with UN budgets and personnel issues and represents the U.S. in the 5th committee of the UN general assembly. A counselor headed the section and I was his assistant. David Stottlemeyer was the counselor of mission for resource management and I was his number two. David Stottlemeyer was not well received by the new administration in 1977 and the new leadership.

Q: The Carter administration.

CUNNINGHAM: Yes, and Andrew Young was the new UN representative. Someway or other David Stottlemeyer was not looked on favorably by them or they wanted to move him aside in order to bring in one of their favorite people. Soon after I arrived Stottlemeyer was sent to Washington, so I filled two jobs, the deputy job and the number one job for a year. At the end of that year I was hoping again to move up to the chief position but that was not to be because the Young team had someone they wanted to serve in that position and he was brought in July 1978.

By then I had almost thirty years in the Foreign Service. I had over three years of creditable (for retirement) service in the Navy. There was a pay cap in effect and salaries were frozen. I had tried when we opened up the Liaison Office in Beijing to get posted there and was told that everyone else who was a China specialist hoped to get posted there and there were five or ten officers applying for every job. In the senior grades they had 20 for every job. I was not one of those selected to go. I can't quarrel with that because the people they chose to go were very good people, some of whom I had helped train when I was running the Chinese language school, so I respected the choices. The Department of State had initiated the outplacement program. We had an over abundance of senior officers. My family situation was changing so I decided that maybe it was time to think about retirement and I went into the outplacement program in 1979, after one year as acting director and one year as deputy director of resource management. It became very complicated for me and I did not have any really significant policy experience for the rest of my time at the U.S. mission to the UN. In fact, for most of that time I was on detached duty working in the outplacement program from New York where the company that was running it for the Department was headquartered. Rather than be brought back to Washington to go through the process I thought it would be more practical for me to look from there.

The short of the story is that in 1981, I received an offer or indication from the University of St. Thomas in Houston that they might be interested to receive an application from me for the directorship of their newly established center for international studies. I did that and was brought down for an interview that August, was asked for references in September, and in October I was offered a contract which I signed at the end of the month. I retired in January 1982 and went to Houston and immediately went to work as director of international studies.

Q: Looking at the time and the fact that you are up from Houston, why don't we concentrate on one aspect if you don't mind. That is about resource management at the UN. Management of the UN is a big problem. What were you doing and how did you view it?

CUNNINGHAM: Good. The 5th committee is the best seminar on the United Nations going because every unit of the UN has to come down and present a budget request and justify that request. I was in position to learn what every single part of the UN secretariat does and to get to know the heads of each of those organizations.

At the end of my active duty Foreign Service career I had one last encounter with China. After the PRC took China's seat in the United Nations Security Council several peace-keeping resolutions were presented for Council action. Usually the Security Council approved these resolutions by consensus. The U.S. and the Soviets had given up making peace-keeping an issue between them in the Security Council. Toward the end of the 1970's the Security Council adopted the practice of having informal, closed door consultations on major issues, such as, for example, the Israeli invasion of Lebanon in 1977-78.

Each time a peace-keeping resolution came before the Council, the PRC Permanent Representative would abstain. Early in the 1970s, the Chinese also would explain their abstentions. As time went on, they continued to abstain, but stopped making statements in explanation. In the Fifth Committee, where I had been assigned, the PRC delegate would speak against the requests of the Secretariat for funds to finance peacekeeping missions, and he would consistently vote against them also. Then, late in 1981 the PRC, without explanation or comment of any kind, stopped opposing requests in Fifth Committee for peacekeeping funds, stopped voting against them and stopped abstaining in the Security Council.

The matter had gone almost completely unnoticed in New York, except among a few careful observers, and I suppose it was thanks to one of them that this change came to my attention.

It was not my responsibility to report on Security Council matters, but I was very curious about it and intrigued, so I did a little study of it. Then, and I do not recall how, I learned that the change was a calculated decision and that Pakistan had somehow been involved in it.

During the time that I served in the Fifth Committee India and Pakistan were represented by profession diplomatic officers, both of whom had been trained in Chinese, as I had. This became a bond among the three of us, and got to know one another very well. Both of my colleagues were very capable officers. So when I learned that Pakistan had something to do with this change of Chinese behavior on peacekeeping issues, I went to my Pakistani colleague, whose name I do not now recall. It turned out that he had been personally involved in bringing about the change. He told me the whole story, and I prepared full report to the Department on the matter. I also complimented him on his initiative and his accomplishment, which was indeed a genuine and important contribution to the strengthening of the United Nations. My Pakistani colleague told me that what finally brought the PRC around was the argument that China's opposition was depleting its political capital among developing nations, who generally favored and supported the peacekeeping role of the United Nations because it reduced the risk of superpower conflict.

The press did not notice this change until some weeks or a few months later. Some weeks or a few months later I noticed a New York Times report on the change in PRC behavior. By then I was in Houston and well into my new career. It gave me some satisfaction to know that in just about the final act of my Foreign Service career I had scooped the New York press corps and, apparently, most other missions and delegations to the United Nations.

Q: I think we might close at this point. Thank you very much.

CUNNINGHAM: You are welcome.

This manuscript which is almost entirely based on personal diaries, memoranda, letters and notes, almost all of them preserved and filed by my invaluable assistant and secretary over the years, Emma Johnson.

I am also greatly indebted to a number of Foreign Service China language/area specialists -- especially Jack Service, John Lacey, Lindsey Grant and John Holdridge -- with whom I served at one time or another and from whom I learned much. Bob Martens, a Foreign Service Soviet specialist who interviewed me for my oral history, deserves special mention for his enlightening assistance. However, any errors or shortcomings in this manuscript are certainly my own.

It is to be hoped that this record, along with those of other Foreign Service Officers involved in China policy, will be made widely available to scholars, diplomats and others. Perhaps, some day, a complete record of the Foreign Service's role in China policy can be assembled, from the dark days of World War II and subsequent McCarthyism to the brighter days of the 1970's and 1980's brought on by the rise of pragmatism in Peking and of maturity in Washington.

Chapter I

Working with Robertson and Dulles; the Taiwan Strait Crisis of 1958

My involvement in China policy dates back to 1956 when, on leaving the National War College, I was assigned as Regional Planning Advisor for the Far East working in the State Department's Bureau of Far Eastern Affairs. The Bureau at that time was dominated by Assistant Secretary of State Walter Robertson, the quintessential Virginia gentleman, a banker by profession, who had powerful connections in the Administration and Congress. Robertson's overriding interest in world affairs was to uphold the position of Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek as President of all of China, even though Chiang and his defeated Nationalist forces had fled the mainland in 1949 to take refuge on Taiwan, China's island-province.

Because of Robertson's Sino centrism and because I had to draft a number of his speeches, I was automatically drawn into China-policy issues -- especially those relating to the defense of what we called Free China or the Chinese Nationalists (Chinats) or, most correctly, the Republic of China (ROC), as opposed to the Chinese Communists (Chicom) or the Chinese Reds, or, most correctly, the People's Republic of China -- a term we rarely used in those days.

For me, this was not an assignment I contemplated with unalloyed joy. I liked Robertson personally. He was kindly and thoughtful towards all members of his staff. He was also a strong defender of the Foreign Service at a time when many Foreign Service Officers were still reeling from the effects of McCarthyism. All 14 of the Ambassadors in his area (East Asia and Australasia) were careerists -- a record never before or since achieved by any bureau in the State Department.

I was also fortunate in having Ambassador J. Graham Parsons as my immediate superior. He was Deputy Assistant Secretary of State at that time, and was to replace Robertson in 1959. Jeff Parsons was one of the ablest officers in the Foreign Service, articulate and a master of diplomatic practices, so essential in our business. On the other hand, Walter Robertson's single-minded dedication to upholding the position of Chiang Kai-shek as the President of all of China was one I could not altogether share, and writing acceptable speeches taxed my New England conscience to its limits.

We also expended vast amounts of diplomatic capital on upholding the ROC's position in the United Nations as the sole legal representative of all of China; and our highly visible military presence on Taiwan, especially in Taipei, was bound to affront the nationalistic feelings of people on Taiwan. It certainly affronted the sensibilities of foreign diplomats like the Japanese Ambassador who was billeted in a U.S. military area in the center of Taipei identified on large billboards as "Freedom Village."

I happened to be visiting Taipei in May 1957 as a member of a Presidential Mission headed by Frank Nash, Assistant Secretary of Defense, which was looking into problems related to our world-wide base presence. Just as we were being reassured by the U.S. Chargé d'Affaires in Taipei that there was no problem with the public over our base presence in Taiwan, our Embassy was attacked by a mob which sacked the Embassy, beat up some of our personnel hiding in the basement, and scattered official U.S. files all over the streets of Taipei. This mob action was touched off by the shooting of a Taiwanese peeping-tom by an American sergeant, who was then acquitted by an American military court in Taipei amidst the cheers of his compatriots and in the presence of the peeping-tom's weeping widow and her friends.

Armed with evidence like this, the Frank Nash mission came up with convincing conclusions and recommendations that did much, world-wide, to help lessen friction over the presence of U.S. bases overseas.

Another China-related issue of major interest to my office at that time was evidence of a growing split in Sino-Soviet relations. I twice visited the Rand Corporation at Santa Monica, California, where a team of experts was analyzing Peking's reactions to the launching of Sputnik in 1957. It was increasingly clear to these experts (including my former State Department colleague Alice Hsia) that China efforts to share in, and benefit from, Soviet technological break-throughs were being rebuffed by Moscow. Two China delegations returned to Peking empty-handed. This was briefly followed by Chinese propaganda broadcasts calling for a nuclear-free Far East, but it was clear that this line, probably parlayed to Peking by Moscow, was in conflict with Peking's own aspirations to become a nuclear power.

It was not until the following year that I became directly involved in the formulation of U.S. policy toward China. This occurred during and after the Taiwan Strait Crisis of 1958 when I fortuitously became Secretary of State John Foster Dulles' action officer at the working level dealing with the crisis.

I will undertake to describe this incident in some detail because existing accounts (at least the ones I have read) are incomplete with regard to how Washington policymakers grappled with the crisis.

***

For several months before the Chinese Communists (Chicoms) opened up their artillery barrage against Quemoy on August 23, 1958, I had been chairing a working-level interagency task force (State, Defense and CIA) which was one of several established by the White House to examine U.S. capabilities to cope with two or more simultaneous military crises in various parts of the world. One of the scenarios our task force had just completed related to a Chicom aerial or artillery interdiction of the Quemoy island group (Big Quemoy, Little Quemoy, Tatan, Ehrtan and Tungting) held by the Nationalists but located just a few miles off the shore of mainland China.

So when in fact an artillery interdiction was launched against the Quemoy group where one-third of the Nationalist forces was stationed, I was able to submit to Jeff Parsons that same day our agreed task force recommendations on U.S. countermeasures. These recommendations called for a cautious escalation of U.S. naval and air support operations as necessary to protect Taiwan from a Communist take-over. Parsons and, subsequently, Robertson approved the recommendations which were forwarded to Dulles. However, Robertson commented to me that the U.S. would, of course, never make first use of nuclear weapons. I found this remark rather astonishing coming from one of our leading hawks.

Dulles, flying down from his vacation retreat on Duck Island in the St. Laurence River, immediately called a meeting in his office. He had obviously read our recommendations but his first concern was legal. What were our defense obligations towards the offshore islands of Quemoy and Matsu? What restrictions applied to the involvement of U.S. forces in their defense?

These small offshore islands were not included in the US-ROC Mutual Defense Treaty's definition of the treaty area, but a subsequent joint resolution of Congress in January 1955, at the time of the first Taiwan Straits crisis, authorized the President to employ U.S. armed forces in the protection of not just Taiwan and the Pescadores but also "related positions and territories in that area."

Dulles had no difficulty in making a legal case that the joint resolution covered the offshore islands in this crisis, since Peking, in attacking them, announced that its objective was Taiwan. The President and Congressional leaders agreed. Establishing rules for the engagement of U.S. forces was more difficult.

The Quemoy group of islands was so close to mainland shore batteries that they could be blanketed with enemy shells, although there was no evidence of any impending Chicom landing operation against those islands. In fact, the shelling occurred immediately before the typhoon season when amphibious operations would have been most precarious. It was fairly clear that Peking did not want to take the islands unless, in doing so, it brought down the government on Taiwan.

Peking's evident intent was interdiction of the offshore islands: to prevent provisions, including food and ammunition, from reaching the defenders, thereby wearing them down to the point of surrender which in turn would precipitate a collapse of morale on Taiwan and a takeover from within by the Communists.

The problem therefore came down to one of resupplying the embattled Quemoy group, a task that was beyond the capability of the Nationalist Navy which was not only poorly led at that time but had to contend with incessant bombardment of the Quemoy group by Soviet-manufactured artillery, rough seas and alleged 27 foot tides which further complicated the landing of supplies on the islands. Thus it was arranged that the U.S. Navy would escort Chinese resupply convoys to a point three miles offshore from Quemoy but would not enter Quemoy's territorial waters. Nationalist vessels had to cover the last three miles on their own, loaded with supplies including shells for Quemoy's 8" howitzers and other guns.

Secretary Dulles, acting under President Eisenhower's instructions, decided against U.S. air operations in the Taiwan Straits and reached agreement with Taipei that U.S. and Nationalist planes would not overfly mainland China, thereby ruling out air attacks on Chicom shore batteries. One important reason for this decision was that there was no way of silencing these batteries short of use of nuclear weapons or extensive air-drops of napalm bombs, actions

President Eisenhower strongly opposed. It was also increasingly apparent that Chicom air capability was being used with great restraint, there being no bombing of any Nationalist-held territories.

Our limited rules of engagement reflected awareness of the lack of support in the United States for getting involved in a war over distant islands that "weren't worth the life of a single American boy." Nor did we have international support beyond that of the Republic of China on Taiwan, South Korea and South Vietnam. Governments of key nations allied to the U.S. like Great Britain and Japan were correctly restrained in their criticisms, but public opinion in these countries was highly averse to U.S. involvement.

Secretary Dulles was accordingly bent on finding some diplomatic course of action to bring the fighting to a halt. He set little store by what the periodic US-PRC ambassadorial-level talks in Warsaw could achieve on this issue, though he appreciated that their publicized existence offered relief from criticisms that the U.S. was out of diplomatic contact with the Peking government on this and other issues.

Very early on the morning of September 7, 1958, I received a phone call from Dulles, who had evidently had a restless night, suggesting that it might be best for the U.S. to take the issue to the United Nations, since the General Assembly would be reconvening the following week. Dulles mentioned the possibility of having the British and French introduce a resolution in the UNSC calling for a UN-supervised cease-fire and neutralization of the offshore islands.

I was strongly opposed to this suggestion which both Peking and Taipei would reject out of hand, and it would impose great strains on our relations with Taipei which in turn might strengthen the case for Peking occupying China's seat in the UN. However, I said nothing about all this to Dulles over the phone but replied that he would have our Bureau's reactions as soon as possible. I forthwith prepared a memorandum, approved by Jeff Parsons and signed by Robertson, pointing out the negative factors entailed in Dulles' suggestion and alternatively recommending that we ask the British and French to introduce a UN resolution welcoming Washington's and Peking's discussions of this issue at Warsaw and urging that the issue be resolved between Peking and Taipei without further resort to force. Also included in Robertson's memorandum was a suggestion that our side might at some point in the near future take unilateral and unannounced moves such as shifting our regular Taiwan Straits patrols further away from Chicom territorial waters, and the Nationalists suspending artillery fire from Quemoy, to see whether this invited any reciprocal moves from the Communist side.

However, before any of these strategies could be pursued, our attention focused on the immediate, urgent issue of Quemoy running out of supplies. The daily consumption of supplies by the 80,000 military and 45,000 civilians on the Quemoy group was estimated at 700 tons and yet, since August 23, only 125 tons had been delivered to Quemoy. This appalling record was ascribed to all the usual reasons -- bad weather, tidal conditions, heavy shelling -- but it also occurred to some in Washington that Taipei was deliberately holding back, or providing us with false figures, in an effort to get the U.S. more involved in the islands' defenses.

Our Joint Chiefs of Staff could see no reason why, with the exercise of guts and ingenuity, the Nationalists, under existing rules of engagement, could not off-load up to 1,000 tons of supplies a day under favorable weather conditions. Admiral Arleigh Burke recommended new ways of delivering supplies, including floating them ashore.

Over the next two weeks there was some improvement in deliveries but not enough to prevent, according to Taipei's reports, an alarming run-down in the availability of food and ammunition on the Quemoy. By September 28, Taipei reported that only a few days of supplies remained. Cables from the American Embassy in Taipei were full of dire warnings.

It was at this point that Secretary Dulles decided to go to New York to take the issue to the UN along the lines he had suggested over the phone on September 7. However, the very day he left for New York, I received word from a colleague in CIA that a reliable report had just been received from Quemoy stating that its supply situation was nowhere near as desperate as we had been led to believe. There were several weeks of supplies on hand, most of them stored in the extensive network of tunnels on Quemoy.

Robertson asked that I deliver this information in person to Acting Secretary of State Christian Herter who immediately called a meeting in his office. There it was decided that I should go to New York to bring these developments to Dulles' attention, with a recommendation from Herter that Dulles might wish to postpone any UN initiative.

I was met in New York by Ambassador Philip Crowe of USUN who took me to Dulles' suite in the Waldorf. When Dulles heard our reports, he canceled scheduled meetings with the British and French Ambassadors to the UN, returned to Washington, and called a meeting that evening at his house. The star performer at that meeting was Admiral Burke who was very up-beat on prospects for resupplying the Quemoy, mentioning for the first time in my hearing the fact that two of the Navy's LSDs (Landing Ship Docks) were about to arrive on station in the Taiwan Straits. These huge landing ship docks could contain dozens of amphibious landing craft, manned by trained Nationalist crews, which would run up on the shores of Quemoy with supplies.

Meanwhile spirits on Taiwan had been lifted by the deadly effectiveness of several Nationalist fighter aircraft on patrol, whose U.S.-provided Sidewinders downed five MiG 17s.

It was against this background that Peking radio announced on October 6 that it was temporarily suspending its bombardment of the offshores, emphasizing that its action was taken to spare the lives of Chinese compatriots inhabiting those islands. Our side immediately reciprocated by suspending U.S. convoy activities and modifying our naval patrol routes in the Taiwan Straits.

The outlook remained unclear, and when Dulles departed on October 20 for Taipei, via Italy and England, Peking announced the end of its cease-fire on the alleged grounds that one of our LSDs had intruded into the territorial waters of Quemoy (Dulles included Italy on his itinerary to attend DeGasperi's funeral. His brief stop-over in England prompted a black-bordered box on the front page of the London Times headlined "England's Darkest Hour" and reading as follows: "Asked today why he had come to England, Secretary Dulles replied that his plane came here to refuel.").

On October 25, following the issuance of a joint US-ROC communiqué at the conclusion of Dulles' visit to Taipei, Peking announced its intention to observe a cease-fire on the offshore islands on odd-numbered days. Taipei retaliated by firing on occasional Chicom vessels from batteries on Quemoy.

This curious arrangement left each of the Chinese governments with the satisfaction that it was master of the situation, but we had no idea of how long this arrangement would continue. Thus, when Dulles returned from Taipei, his first concern was to preserve the relative calm while doing everything he could to get the bulk of Chiang's forces off the offshore islands. On the other hand, we felt we had to be careful in handling this effort, lest sharp open differences between Washington and Taipei tempt Peking to renew the bombardment.

I well recall Secretary Dulles' comments on his return to Washington: "If nothing is done now and then a year-or-so hence the Chicoms again attack the offshores, it will be extremely difficult for us to give the ROC any military support. Already we have had to strain our relations with Congress and foreign governments to the breaking point. Our experience with the offshores was agonizing enough in 1955. It is worse today. We can't go through this a third time."

Our efforts to effect a drastic reduction in the garrisons on the offshore islands never succeeded. There was an eventual sizeable reduction, but meanwhile we came to appreciate that the Chinese in their own peculiar way had found a solution of turning their hot war into an endless propaganda battle -- of propaganda shells, blaring loud speakers, and balloon-delivered leaflets. Peking also issued a long series of "serious warnings" to the U.S. every time one of our naval patrols in the Taiwan Straits came within Chinese mainland territorial waters as defined by Peking, but not by Washington. The serious warnings had nearly reached the thousand mark by the time President Nixon's trip to China was announced in 1971. Thereafter the warnings ceased.

In retrospect, I have often wondered whether Moscow had any hand in Peking's decision to halt the heavy bombardment of Quemoy. We know that almost all the 580,000 shells fired on the islands were produced in the Soviet Union, and that the first signs of serious Moscow-Peking differences appeared soon after the Soviets launched Sputnik in 1957, about a year before the 1958 Taiwan Straits crisis. It is possible that Moscow imposed conditions on its support of Peking's offense. However, we assumed during that crisis that Peking had Moscow's unqualified support. Moscow said little to suggest otherwise. In fact, Khrushchev warned on several occasions that any use of nuclear weapons would not go unanswered by the USSR. (Peking exploded its first nuclear weapon in 1964.)

***

Finally, a few comments about Secretary Dulles' handling of the crisis. I was deeply impressed by his excellent working relations with President Eisenhower, as well as with his associates in State, Defense, and CIA (headed by his brother, Allen). On several occasions, near the conclusion of meetings in his office, Dulles would pick up the secure phone and tell the President of our conclusions and solicit his comments or, where relevant, his approval. Dulles thus made it clear to all present that he was acting under Eisenhower's orders. That, in turn, strengthened Dulles' position with all his associates.

I was also impressed by the way Dulles took charge of the problem, making it his personal responsibility to work out a peaceful solution, losing many hours of sleep in the process. Yet he sought advice from his associates. I recall how Gerard Smith, at that time Director of the State Department's Policy Planning Staff, used to argue almost instinctively against the emerging consensus of several of our meetings. Dulles seemed to welcome the ensuing debate which helped to fine-hone the final decisions.

Diplomatic biographer Sir Harold Nicholson once wrote that the worst kind of diplomatists are zealots, lawyers and missionaries; and the best kind are humane skeptics.

In his first years as Secretary of State, John Foster Dulles seemed to fall clearly in the first category. He was a dyed-in-the-wool lawyer with a cold-war missionary zeal. For him, countering Soviet aggressive acts gave rise to a new term in diplomacy: "brinkmanship." He stonily refused to shake the extended hand of Zhou En-lai at Geneva in 1954 -- an insult never forgotten by Zhou. He was also associated in the minds of many of us Foreign Service Officers with Senator McCarthy and his ilk who pilloried the Foreign Service and hounded out of office several of our best China specialists whose only "crime" was the accuracy of their reports out of China during World War II, predicting the decline of the Chinese Nationalists under Generalissimo Chiang and the rise of Mao's Communists.

John Foster Dulles may be remembered by history as one of our most zealous, hard-line Secretaries of State, especially in his dealings with Moscow and Peking, but from my vantage point, in the next to last year of his life, he appeared as a man of moderation and reason, an able practitioner of diplomacy as well as of law.

Chapter II

Need for a New Look at Our China Policy

After two stormy years in Korea, I arrived in the relative political calm of Hong Kong where the U.S. Consulate General served as our government's eyes and ears covering events inside the vastness of China. The steady stream of refugees from mainland China provided a wealth of information about economic conditions in China -- information made available to us through Hong Kong government and private sources -- as well as receiving an assortment of sometimes useful information contained in the masses of periodicals, newspapers and letters that reached Hong Kong from all parts of China. We had on our staff 21 people whose sole function was to translate and analyze these written materials.

For me, being head of a large staff comprising some of our most experienced Foreign Service Officers in Chinese affairs, provided a unique opportunity to listen and to learn. I well remember my first lesson, shortly after my arrival in November 1961, when India seized the Portuguese enclave of Goa. I was alarmed that China would now feel impelled to seize the Portuguese enclave of Macao, some 30 miles from Hong Kong. Since I was also U.S. Consul to Macao, my responsibilities to the several dozen Americans there would seem to involve ordering and assisting in their immediate evacuation. But the head of our Political Section at that time, Dr. Harald Jacobson, recommended otherwise. In fact, he was completely confident, as was Jack Friedman, our Macao expert, that Peking would not take Macao, for such a seizure would precipitate a collapse of business confidence in Hong Kong and a resulting loss of almost a billion dollars a year which Peking was making at that time (today it is many times that) through its business ties with Hong Kong. In other words, Peking was not about to kill the goose that laid the billion dollar golden egg and which was China's principal source of foreign exchange. So, abiding by Jacobson's recommendation, I wired Washington our conclusions in order to head off likely pressures from the State Department for evacuating all Americans in Macao.

The early 1960's was a period of deepening turmoil and economic disaster in China, due in part to Mao's ill-conceived Great Leap Forward -- a desperate effort to achieve rapid modernization through forced-draft industrialization, including a program for building thousands of small furnaces designed to produce steel. Agriculture was badly neglected in the process, resources squandered, and the whole effort collapsed leaving ruin in its wake.

Analysts in our Consulate General estimated that China's grain production (including potatoes) in 1961 was 160 million tons which was some 30 million tons short of levels required to provide China's teeming population with an adequate diet. Our analysis, based on a variety of sources (especially comprehensive weather reports and interrogations of thousands of refugees about their daily food consumption) was challenged by Joe Alsop in his syndicated columns as being too high, but we were vindicated a year later when Zhou En-lai told Lord Montgomery that grain production in China in 1961 was 160 million tons.

I arrived in Hong Kong thinking of China as a powerful threat to its neighbors -- purposeful and single-minded in its expansionist design. But I soon learned that the Communist regime was floundering, and that its attempts to disperse "surplus" urban dwellers to the farms had deepened discontent among urban and rural dwellers alike. The touted public discipline of China was decaying, as evidenced by signs of growing corruption, bureaucratic indifference, and general laxity that permeated even the youth and armed forces. Of course the capacity of the Chinese people to endure privations was legendary, and China's ability to exploit troubles along its borders unchanged, but it was clearly not the fearsome dragon conjured up in the minds of many Americans.

More importantly, China no longer had an ally in Russia. The Sino-Soviet rift that made its first appearance after the Sputnik launching in 1957 had, by early 1962, reached the stage where it was beyond the ability of our Consulate General translators to find expressions in English equal to Peking's scatological denunciations of the Kremlin.

Many of us in the Consulate General felt that we overly advertised our concern and worry over China's aggressive power -- and that this invited bluster, threat and intervention from the Communist side. Psychologically we would be in a stronger competitive position if we appeared to be less harried and worried over Peking's threat. We would also stand to gain greater international support for our position if our views were expressed in more objective, factual and unemotional terms.

At the same time, we fully supported continuation of a U.S. policy of firmness in the defense of "free world" positions and maintaining adequate capabilities for pursuing that policy successfully. We did, however, weigh in strongly against unnecessary provocations of Communist China, such as the occasional sabotage operations being conducted by the Chinese Nationalists from Taiwan against targets on the China mainland. These operations were not only fruitless, but they damaged the Republic of China's international standing. Moreover, such operations, to the extent they involved Hong Kong, could endanger Hong Kong and were deeply resented by the Hong Kong government.

A golden opportunity to present these views to key figures in the new Kennedy Administration occurred in the Spring of 1962 at a meeting of all our East Asia/Australasia Chiefs of Missions at Baguio in the Philippines. This meeting was presided over by Under Secretary of State Chester Bowles and Assistant Secretary Averell Harriman, both of whom reacted favorably to my presentation of how we in the Consulate General evaluated the scene in China and its implications for U.S. policy. This established a useful meeting of minds between our Consulate General and policymakers in Washington.

One of the effects of economic setbacks in China was the way it stepped up the flow of refugees to Hong Kong. This problem continues today, but at no time did it reach the levels of mid-1962. A principal reason for the great surge of refugees into Hong Kong from the adjoining province of Guangdong in 1962 was a severe drought in South China coinciding with a temporary breakdown in the ability (or willingness) of PRC officials in Guangdong to restrain the flow of refugees -- many of them young people who had been forced out of the cities to live in rural areas. It appeared for a while that the Chinese authorities had decided to allow them to flee to Hong Kong, if only to ease pressures on food supplies and to lessen problems for China created by these disgruntled elements.

The numbers of refugees got so large that the Hong Kong government constructed massive barriers of concertina wire all along its land frontier with China. But every night the refugees merely threw planks across the wire and swarmed in, only to be rounded up by the Hong Kong garrisons and forced back into China (although many eluded the Hong Kong police and managed to get into the city of Hong Kong).

At first, the Hong Kong Government forbore from making any representations to Peking on this appalling situation, evidently fearing that Peking would reject Hong Kong's protests, and Hong Kong would then have to live with the results. Besides Hong Kong had only the status of a colony, and had to deal with Peking through London. Meanwhile, I was receiving expressions of concern from the State Department which was torn between wanting Hong Kong to accept refugees as a matter of principle, and a sober awareness of how such huge numbers of refugees could turn Hong Kong into another Gaza Strip (Curiously, U.S. media gave this dramatic human interest story almost no coverage. This included the New York Times whose managing editor, Turner Catledge, visited Hong Kong just as the refugee crisis ended. When I told him what had happened, he turned to his Hong Kong correspondent to ask why this wasn't reported. The correspondent answered that evidently the New York Times editors did not consider the story newsworthy because he had filed daily reports to New York.).

Washington was quietly urging London to take the issue up with Peking, but Hong Kong recommended otherwise to London. As I learned from Murray Macle hose, at that time political adviser to Hong Kong's Governor Black (later Macle hose became one of Hong Kong's most effective governors), Hong Kong had reason to believe that Peking would soon, on its own initiative, restore controls along the Hong Kong frontier because of the bad press China was receiving world-wide, with millions of Chinese seeking to escape China. Governor Black's policy proved successful, but not before 170,000 Chinese refugees had succeeded in sneaking permanently into over-crowded Hong Kong in the period of one month.

It was instructive to observe the interrelationships between authorities in Hong Kong, Peking and Canton (with whom Hong Kong transacted most of its business with China). Many practical issues had to be addressed on a day-to-day basis between Hong Kong and Canton relating to trade, transportation, migration, water supply and finances. All these issues were handled by Hong Kong officials with low-key common sense in a way best designed to avoid affronting its giant neighbor. There was recognition on both sides of the compelling material advantages in peaceful co-existence, even though Hong Kong's spectacular economic success story on the very doorstep of backward China was, in itself, an affront and provocation. Hong Kong was at pains to pay for the water piped in from China (about 20 to 25 percent of Hong Kong's requirements), even though China offered to provide this water free of charge. Hong Kong wanted to ensure that China had a material stake in continuing the water supply in order to minimize chances that China might cut it off at some point in order to impose pressures on Hong Kong for whatever reason. To me, this was convincing evidence that constructive relations with revolutionary Communist China were possible for the United States provided Peking came to see compelling material (especially strategic) reasons for such relations.

Not only were we mighty busy those days with refugees, consular work, textile negotiations, and countless visitors, but I had to meet, wine and dine the many Congressional delegations who were attracted to Hong Kong. We also put on some good briefings for VIPs on developments in China, including our policy conclusions. We found that almost all the Congressional visitors shared our views on U.S. policy implications. (One of these visitors, Congressman John Rooney, who was Chairman of the House Subcommittee handling State's finances, indicated to the State Department that he would welcome my appointment as Assistant Secretary of State for Administration. I was called back to Washington where I resisted pressure from the top brass of the Department to take the job. I resisted because I had no qualifications for it other than Rooney's blessing. I returned to Hong Kong, rather apprehensive as to my future career.)

During my 21 months in Hong Kong, I had lengthy discussions with my deputy, John Lacey, who was not only an excellent administrator and negotiator on U.S.-Hong Kong textile issues, but whose views on China policy were practical and forward-looking. We drafted a message to Washington in February 1963, in which we posed the question whether we were missing any opportunities to abet forces in China that might be seeking pragmatic changes.

We then recommended seven specific ways for enhancing our capacity to influence attitudes in China in a desirable direction, though admitting that even their combined effect might be very slight in the immediate future.

The final two paragraphs of our airgram came close to being prophetic.

"Distasteful as it has been for Mao and his cohorts, they have already been obliged to make some concessions basically in conflict with their ideologies. When the hard-line doctrinaires no longer dominate the scene, the influence of pragmatism may well intensify. Our present containment policy should be aimed at abetting that process.

"All this argues for a policy of continued constraint which allows and encourages change with mainland China..." We also urged a review of American regulations relating to Americans wishing to travel to mainland China and to do business with China.

Many of us in the Consulate General were struck by the folly of American policy preventing our newsmen and scholars from visiting China -- not that they would likely be admitted, but a relaxed U.S. policy would make it clear that it was China's fault, not ours, that China was closed to much of the outside world.

We also were critical of the U.S. foreign assets control regulations which we had to administer in Hong Kong. These regulations made it illegal for any American individual or corporation to buy, even in Hong Kong, any article originating in mainland China.

On one occasion I had to phone the Texas owners of the new Hong Kong Hilton to point out that they already had on the walls of their new hotel (which was about to open) Chinese mainland artifacts which would have to be removed under U.S. law. It was to the credit of the Texas owners that they uncomplainingly agreed, even though, in disposing of the artifacts, they took a considerable financial loss.

As mentioned earlier, there were officials in the State Department who shared these views, and it was a pleasant, but not an altogether unanticipated, surprise when I was called back to Washington in August 1963 to be named Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for the Far East, charged with taking a new look at U.S. policy toward China.

Chapter III

Efforts in Washington (1963-65) to Modify U.S. Policy Towards China

On returning to Washington in September 1963, I was named principal deputy to Roger Hilsman, Assistant Secretary of State for the Far East, who had an extensive background in research and intelligence and was a personal friend of President Kennedy. Hilsman wanted me to devote most of my initial time to a China policy review, naming as my principal assistant, Lindsey Grant, a brilliant young China specialist. We also received generous help from Jim Thompson (on detail from Harvard) and Joe Neubert, Hilsman's assistant. We held periodic meetings with leading American scholars knowledgeable about East Asia, a practice our Bureau was to continue for many years.

Our first move was to reorganize State's Bureau of Far Eastern Affairs in order to give greater attention to Communist Asia. At that time we had only two officers (out of the hundred or more in our Bureau) who were devoting their full time to Communist China and none of our officers were giving much time and attention to North Korea, North Vietnam and Mongolia, even though Communist Asia comprised two-thirds of the land area and population of East Asia. We accordingly established a new office called ACA (Asian Communist Affairs) whose four officers were responsible for mainland China, North Korea, North Vietnam and Mongolia. We also managed to have two able Foreign Service officers sent to Moscow for several years of instruction in Mongolian, but our recommendation for establishing U.S. relations with Mongolia, accepted in principle by key officials like Governor Harriman, encountered years of delay in implementation.

U.S. diplomatic contacts with the Chinese Communists at that time were confined to the ambassadorial level talks at Warsaw which had been going on intermittently ever since they started at Vienna in 1954. These talks achieved only limited results but they ultimately succeeded in bringing about the release of all but two of the Americans held in mainland China. They further provided a forum for clarifying our position on certain issues, especially a peaceful resolution of the Taiwan problem. Above all, they enabled the U.S. government to say quite truthfully that we had, in Warsaw, more opportunities to meet with Peking officials than had most governments which recognized the Peking government.

Maoist doctrine sharply circumscribed what new courses of action were open to us, and our ability to influence events inside China were almost nil. But, over the longer range, opening China's contacts with the outside world could have more of a salutary impact than a negative one; and it seemed important that we at least demonstrate to the world that Communist China's isolation from the world was self-imposed and not the result of U.S. policies to contain Chinese Communism. This was not easy to do. The United States had taken the lead year after year in trying to keep Peking out of the United Nations. We had also taken the lead in establishing COCOM controls designed to prevent any strategic materials from reaching Communist China from the Free World. Carrying out these policies involved constant pressures on friends and allies, contributing to a rather widespread impression that it was U.S. policy to cut off Chinese contacts with the outside world.

This, in fact, was not our policy. In 1959, the U.S., at long last, allowed 25 selected newsmen to have restrictions removed from their passports to permit them to visit mainland China. For months they sat it out in Hong Kong seeking Chinese visas. None were granted. In 1962, we announced that we would give favorable attention to any bona fide Chinese request for purchase of U.S. wheat or other grains. Peking never responded.

The first substantive policy recommendation which Grant and I made to Hilsman on October 10, 1963 was that our government should seek to lift all U.S. travel restrictions. This would be a world-wide change in travel policy, and would not be presented as an initiative to "liberalize" U.S. policy towards Communist China (or other Communist countries) for this would be immediately interpreted as a softening of the U.S. position. Nor did we proclaim that our efforts to broaden contacts with mainland China were based on the assumption that they would probably be rejected. We did these things because of their intrinsic merit -- to break down barriers between nations and peoples, to broaden knowledge and understanding. Privately, we could explain that our changes in travel policy were designed to show our strength and confidence at a time when China was fearful of outside contacts because of the ferment brewing behind the curtain.

Recommendations for liberalizing rules governing travel of Americans was not a new idea. The Legal Adviser's Office (L) and the Bureau of Security and Consular Affairs (SCA) had already favored the idea when it was first advanced in a more modified form by Hilsman in June, 1963. However, Governor Harriman (Under Secretary of State) believed that a formal modification of existing regulations would stir up too much adverse attention. He recommended that the State Department quietly adopt a more permissive policy governing exceptions to the current travel ban, and that is where the matter stood when Lindsey Grant and I became involved.

When we met with representatives of the Legal Advisor's Office (L) and of the Bureau of Consular and Security Affairs (SCA) on November 4, it was concluded that any attempt to issue passports without travel restrictions to only those applicants approved by the State Department would raise constitutional questions. The Legal Advisor also felt that any changes in existing practice would require consultation with appropriate committees of Congress.

Abba Schwartz (SCA) and I agreed with L's reservations. We also felt that a great deal of the advantages we sought would be lost through a surreptitious approach.

Early in December, 1963, the matter was brought by Mr. Chayes (Legal Advisor) to the attention of George Ball, Acting Secretary of State. Mr. Ball enthusiastically supported a proposal for a total removal of travel restrictions and obtained telegraphically the approval of Secretary of State Rusk. The issue was now up to the White House.

I recall attending a meeting later in December attended by top State Department representatives and by Attorney General Robert Kennedy. At that meeting Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs, Edwin M. Martin, convinced the Attorney General and the Secretary of State that an exception would have to be made in the case of Cuba because of an existing agreement among members of the Association of American Republics banning travel to Cuba. This effectively ended our efforts to change travel policy, because the administration did not want to change travel policy unless it could be done on a world-wide basis. Moreover the death of President Kennedy had an overall dampening effect on any proposals for policy change.

All we could do at that stage was to press for liberalizing exceptions. In that regard we succeeded in having U.S. passports validated for travel to mainland China for three categories: representatives of accredited news gathering organizations; family members of Americans in prison in China; and, in 1965, U.S. doctors and public health experts.

Our Bureau was similarly frustrated in its efforts to ease restrictions on U.S. trade with China, starting with putting medicines and foodstuffs on general license. We did not think China would make any U.S. purchases in the light of its "buy anything but American" policy, but it would create a useful precedent if at some future date the Chinese would wish to move away from their present frozen hostility.

In one important respect we succeeded. That was in recommending that our public treatment of Communist China be more moderate, civil, and factual. This was reflected in a key speech made by Roger Hilsman at San Francisco on December 13. At first Secretary Rusk was annoyed over Hilsman's failure to get top-level clearance, but public and press reactions to the Hilsman speech were so overwhelmingly favorable that the Secretary reflected the same points of view in a speech he made on February 25, 1964. Meanwhile, we sent guidance to our Embassies on the importance of making it clear that it was the Chinese Communists, not the U.S., who were bellicose and unwilling to accept a world of diversity, as well as the importance of U.S. officials speaking more coolly, factually and civilly about Communist China in order to gain maximum credibility.

In retrospect there is little question but that our efforts in 1963 to liberalize U.S. policy toward mainland China failed due to major events on the other side of the Pacific.

Even if President Kennedy had served out his full term in office, it is unlikely that any major revisions in existing China policy would have occurred during that term. It is true that his thinking about China paralleled that of his associates like Harriman, Bowles, Ball and Hilsman. On the other hand, he was being drawn more and more into the vortex of Vietnam, and Vietnam was to claim the full attention of President Johnson. With Peking evidently giving strong support to Hanoi, it seemed all the more unlikely that any U.S. Administration would or could make substantive changes in China policy.

More importantly, in 1964 Mao Zedong and his entourage of ideologues were intent on revising the across-the-board liberalization of the early 1960's. The Socialist Education Campaign -- a precursor of the Cultural Revolution which was launched in late 1965 -- sought to carry out class education of youth, eliminate bourgeois influence, and stamp out "the spontaneous tendency to capitalism." This coincided with China's successful nuclear weapons test in 1964. The opportunities we saw in 1962 and 1963 for improving long-term U.S.-Chinese relations were now fast disappearing. U.S.-China relations were about to enter the deep freeze of the Cultural Revolution which lasted until the early 1970's.

In a well-publicized speech I made at Princeton University in May 1965, I said: "Peiping's policy toward the U.S. is very simple. It is one of avowed hostility. It does not allow even for the working out of lesser problems in our relations... As a Chinese Communist document puts it, 'we do not wish to settle our disputes with the United States on a piecemeal basis; else we will undermine the revolutionary fervor of our own people. When the time comes for a settlement, it will be done all at once.'"

I did not realize at the time how prophetic that underlined statement proved to be: China, in 1971-72, decided it was time for a settlement with the U.S. "all at once" in the form of the Shanghai Communiqué of February 1972.

A further obstacle to U.S.-China relations in the period 1964-65 was the war in Vietnam. As I wrote in May 1965 in a memorandum to Bill Bundy who had succeeded Hilsman as Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs: "The Chinese Communists see the U.S. as caught on the flypaper of South Vietnam, and they do not want to see us wriggle off through negotiations and settlement." On the other hand, Peiping was concerned that the Soviets were moving into Southeast Asia in a way designed to rob Peiping of the fruits of victory. What we didn't appreciate in Washington was the growing tension between Hanoi and Peking.

As usual, our Consulate General in Hong Kong had the clearest view of trends in Communist Asia. On returning in late 1964 from a meeting with Consul General Ed Rice and his Hong Kong staff, I reported their view that Hanoi was definitely opposed to any large presence of Chinese Communists in North Vietnam -- "in fact a threat of their coming in might be a major inducement for Hanoi to come to terms with us." The Consulate General also believed that "our bombings of the north are making the North Vietnamese even more tough and resistant, and the only merit of the bombings is temporarily to bolster morale in the south." The Consulate General foresaw little likelihood of any real settlement of the war being reached at the Conference Table, given the positions of Hanoi and Peking.

The following month (June 1965) I was named U.S. Ambassador to Indonesia, an assignment that unexpectedly was to involve me, once again, in U.S. China policy.

Chapter IV

the Aborted Communist Coup in Indonesia -- the China Connection

At the time of my appointment to Indonesia in June 1965, the U.S. was deeply preoccupied with Vietnam. Washington never did focus on Indonesia as a potential Communist country, even though it was headed in that direction.

It is true that President Sukarno's words infuriated Washington as did Indonesia's armed confrontation with Malaysia, the attacks on foreign missions in Jakarta, plans for expropriating foreign companies including Caltex and Goodyear, Sukarno's raging at my predecessor Howard Jones "to Hell with your aid," Indonesia's walking out of the United Nations and its agencies, and its increasing alignment with China and other forces hostile to the United States. But these were considered by many in Washington to be the antics of a vainglorious man -- a dangerous man, to be sure, but not a very serious man, rather one who sought the world spotlight.

The Chinese Communists took Sukarno far more seriously than we did. They recognized Indonesia to be a significant potential Communist state and ally. By 1965, the Indonesian Communist Party (PKI) had become the largest and most influential political force in Indonesia, as well as being by far the largest Communist party outside the Sino-Soviet blocs. The PKI favored Sukarno, and he them. On one occasion when Sukarno was referring to PKI leader Aidit, he shouted before the crowds at Senayan arena: "I wish I had a thousand Aidits." Sukarno's drift toward Communism also related to Indonesia's imminent economic collapse due to inept policies, extravagance and mismanagement.

Even though Sukarno's avowed goal was to establish a NASAKOM government (acronym for Nationalism, Religion, and Communism), Washington continued to see Indonesia as a fractious element, not as a potential hostile force in the constellation of world power.

By late 1964, Sino-Indonesian relations were converging both at the PKI-CCP level and at the governmental level. At the party level, the PKI had sided completely with the CCP in the latter's view that revolutionary prospects were highly favorable in the former colonial world (especially Southeast Asia) and that the leadership of the world revolutionary movement was passing from Soviet to Asian hands. Differences with the Soviets were also reflected in positions taken by Sukarno's government, even though it continued to receive considerable Soviet aid, especially military hardware.

At the governmental level, Sukarno announced to the million or more people crowding Merdeka Square on August 17, 1965, (Indonesia's national day), the formation of the Peking-Jakarta-Pyongyang-Hanoi axis. This announcement was made in the presence of top officials of Communist Asia, including Chinese Foreign Minister Chen Yi. I realized in advance of this occasion that it would be used by Sukarno to blast the United States in a way that normal diplomatic practice would require my walking out of the pavilion where all the diplomatic corps was seated. But I had already decided, with Washington's telegraphic approval, not to give Sukarno that satisfaction, so I stoically sat it out, with press cameras trained on me.

During Indonesia's confrontation with Malaysia and the U.K., Peking was urging Sukarno to accelerate the radicalization of his policies, especially to use the confrontation as a means of establishing and arming a "Fifth Force," largely composed of Communist organizations, to be a counteragent to the Indonesian Army. All these developments polarized differences between the Indonesian Army on the one hand, and the Communists (PKI), supported by Sukarno, on the other. Sukarno became seriously ill in late August 1965 which immediately raised fears among the Communists (and probably the Air Force which was led by leftists) that, should Sukarno die, the Army would move in and crush the Communists. It was in that setting that the PKI planned a coup against the Army, almost certainly with the knowledge of the Chinese Communists and possibly with their approval.

On the night of September 30-October 1, 1965, the PKI hunted down and killed six of Indonesia's eight top army generals and seized control of Jakarta, announcing over the radio that the "September 30 movement" had taken control of the government in order to forestall a CIA-supported plot by the Generals to oust Sukarno and establish a military government. (There was no CIA or other U.S. foreknowledge of the Communist coup or of any General's plot to oust Sukarno. Army generals deplored Sukarno's Communist leanings but they would not challenge him or refuse to take orders.)

However the Indonesian army moved quickly against the Communist coup and suppressed it within a day or two. This left Sukarno weakened and suspect, and he eventually was replaced by Suharto, one of the two ranking surviving generals. Meanwhile the PKI was shattered and tens of thousands of suspected Communists, including a disproportionately high number of Chinese ethnics, were assassinated by anti-Communist forces mostly in the rural areas of Java and Bali. Here it should be pointed out that the Indonesians had a racial bias against the 3 million Chinese living in Indonesia. The Chinese were mainly resented because of their control of money-lending and retail trades.

The aborted coup was a devastating set-back for Communist China whose role in the coup was highly suspect. Twelve separate Indonesian delegations were in China at the time of the coup, including delegations headed by the Deputy Prime Minister, the Head of the Air Force, and the Head of the National Defense Institute. There was also a large PKI delegation which, unlike previous PKI delegations sent to China, did not include any of its top level officers who evidently remained in Indonesia because of the critical events about to unfold.

Most significant of all was the evidence, subsequently received, that the Chinese knew what to expect. According to Robert Martens, our Embassy's expert on Sino-Soviet affairs who has spent many months researching the events of September 30-October 1, 1965, the Chinese leadership at that critical moment, showed itself to be remarkably well informed. The Chinese reportedly had a complete list of the assassinated generals by 11 a.m. October 1, which was 5 hours before this information was announced in Jakarta. The list included the name of General Nasution (who had escaped assassination but whose inclusion suggests that the Chinese had an advance PKI target list.)

October 1 was also China's National day and it was apparently to be not only a day of celebration of past victory on the China mainland but it was also to coincide with a far-reaching new victory that would add the world's fifth most populous nation to the Asian Communist Camp.

The Communist failure in Indonesia was a severe setback for China, shattering its alliance with Indonesia and its hopes for a radical tide sweeping over all the developing world led by China. The famous Lin Piao speech of September 1965 had boasted that the world village was surrounding the world city, which meant an Asian Communist encirclement of the U.S. and USSR. A successful Sino-Indonesian alliance would also have created a giant pincer of China to the North and Indonesia to the south within which the American forces in Vietnam would have been caught. On the contrary, Indonesia under General Suharto crushed the PKI, gradually removed Sukarno, established a New Order in Indonesia with close ties with its neighbors and the West, rejoined the United Nations, and, along with Thailand, took the lead in forming the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN). Indonesia also severed diplomatic ties with China.

The extraordinary reversal in Indonesia in the period 1965-67 never received the international attention it deserved, especially in the United States, which was so totally preoccupied with Vietnam. Our Embassy in Jakarta was also at pains to warn Washington against taking any credit for what happened in Indonesia. The aborted coup was entirely an Indonesian performance in which we played no role whatsoever. Any U.S. government efforts to take credit for the reversal would only bolster Communist claims that the U.S. was involved in a plot to remove Sukarno and the PKI.

It is beyond my ken to estimate how the aborted Communist coup impacted on the Chinese Communist leadership. In the short run, it seems to have spurred China's self-destructive course toward the Great Proletarian Cultural Revolution, putting U.S.-Chinese relations in an even deeper freeze. But in the long run, these setbacks and excesses strengthened the hand of the pragmatists led by Zhou En-lai.

One other event occurred while I was in Indonesia that came to have a bearing on U.S.-China policy. That occurred in the form of Mr. Richard Nixon's visit to Jakarta in April 1967 where he was my wife's and my house guest for two days. When Mr. Nixon and I called on President Suharto, Foreign Minister Malik and others, Mr. Nixon took down notes on key points they made and when we got back to my residence, we had a long conversation on events in Indonesia and the rest of East Asia, especially China. Our conversation was tape-recorded by Mr. Nixon, and when I asked him what he did with all these notes and tapes, he replied that he had them transcribed, filed and cross-filed for later reference. For example, I told him that the rate of inflation in Indonesia in 1965 was 635%. He included that obscure fact in his Guam Doctrine press interview on July 27, 1969. His tape-recording was, of course, to lead to his eventual undoing, but I remember him as the best informed on foreign affairs of all the luminaries who visited Jakarta during my four years there.

This opinion of Mr. Nixon was reinforced when I read the article he wrote for the Foreign Affairs Quarterly's October 1967 issue. In that article, which began with a tribute to Indonesia's new leadership, Mr. Nixon made a strong case for the U.S. improving its relations with the Peoples Republic of China, a country with one-quarter of the global population and with extensive strategic, political and economic influence.

During my last few months as Ambassador to Indonesia, I was assigned to serve concurrently on the U.S. negotiating team to the Paris talks on Vietnam; and in March 1969 to being assigned as Assistant Secretary of State for East Asia and the Pacific, a position I held for four years.

This brought me back into the center of U.S.-China relations, working for a President who was destined to make those relations his greatest foreign policy triumph.

Chapter V

The Real Beginnings of Washington-Peking Rapprochement 1969-71

Three months service on our Paris delegation provided opportunities to meet President Nixon, Secretary Rogers and Dr. Kissinger (for the first time), and it was clear from the moment I met the President in Paris that he recalled our conversations in Jakarta two years earlier, calling me "low-profile Green" because of the emphasis I had placed on maintaining a low-profile American presence in Indonesia. I had also given a publicized talk to the American Chamber of Commerce in Paris advocating more "Modesty, Mutuality and Multilateralism" in the conduct of U.S. foreign policy.

Shortly thereafter, I was named Assistant Secretary of State, returning to Washington to replace my old friend and Yale classmate, Bill Bundy. But before I took over Bundy's job, I requested an opportunity to say farewell to friends in Indonesia -- especially Suharto and Malik. At the same time, I figured such a trip to Indonesia would give me an opportunity to visit other countries in my area of responsibility, and that, as the first emissary of the Nixon Administration to be sent to that area, I should be in a position in conversations with Asian leaders to reflect accurately the views of our new President.

I accordingly requested a private White House meeting with the President, which was granted.

But before going over to the Oval Office, I co-drafted with Ambassador Win Brown, my deputy, and with Bob Barnett, Deputy Assistant Secretary for East Asian and Pacific Economic Affairs (who had also been of invaluable assistance to me in Indonesia), an informal three-page memorandum setting forth what the three of us regarded as President Nixon's viewpoints on key policy issues of interest to Asian leaders. This memorandum was based on things the President had said or written or which we believed reflected his viewpoint (or should).

President Nixon approved my use of the memorandum but, just as he did so, in walked Henry Kissinger who was visibly annoyed by my having by-passed him in getting to the Oval Office.

Upon my return from a long Asian trip in April 1969 that included meetings with top leaders, I included in my written report to Secretary Rogers a statement that there seemed to be a universally held judgment among all the Asian leaders I met that China had never been in such a negative, truculent mood as it was at that time. Asian leaders felt that any hope of progress in establishing a constructive dialogue with China was out of the question until the Cultural Revolution subsided.

President Nixon pencilled "this is great" on my trip report when Secretary Rogers sent him an abbreviated copy, and the President directed Kissinger to circulate copies of the report to top officials in our foreign policy community.

The President showed continuing interest in achieving a breakthrough in our frozen relationship with the PRC. I recall that on our return from his meeting with Vietnamese President Thieu at Midway Island in early June 1969, President Nixon invited me to his cabin on Air Force One where for nearly two hours we discussed China and other Asian issues. The President was interested in the history of our efforts to achieve some thaw in U.S.-China relations. I also told the President about my recent meeting with the old Gimo on Taiwan, where President Chiang seemed out of touch with reality, at least on the Sino-Soviet dispute which he regarded as a collusive effort by China and Russia to delude and divide the West.

The President stressed that we should try to remove unnecessary irritants in our relations with China, but that we should not do this in a way that would unnecessarily provoke the USSR, or that was designed to exploit Sino-Soviet differences.

Shortly thereafter in late July 1969, I accompanied President Nixon on the Pacific-East Asian phase of his round-the-world trip. I had co-authored with Bob Barnett the so-called "scope-paper" for that phase of his trip, and much of the scope-paper's contents were reflected in Nixon's famous press backgrounder on July 25 at Guam, the first stop of his trip. In the scope-paper I had emphasized the great economic up-surge of East Asian countries and the growing ability of most East Asian countries to assume greater burdens for their own defense. I also said that our general position in East Asia should not be one of trying to solve East Asia's problems but rather of helping East Asia's problem solvers.

The President made several references to China in his backgrounder, including modifications he hoped to see in permitting travel of Americans to China and allowing limited tourist purchase of Chinese products.

But what undoubtedly interested Peking most in the Guam backgrounder was the President's thesis that (a) the U.S. would stand by its treaty commitments, (b) the U.S. would provide a shield if a nuclear power threatened any U.S. ally or a nation whose survival we considered vital to our own survival, and (c) the U.S. looked to the country threatened to assume the primary responsibility for providing the manpower for its own defense.

The President also left it clear that the U.S. should learn from the experience of Vietnam and not get caught in another comparable situation of "creeping involvement." "I want to be sure that our policies in the future, all over the world...reduce American involvement."

In retrospect, it is fair to assume that these statements of America's role in the world helped set the stage for the Chinese-American rapprochement that was to occur within two years of the Nixon Doctrine (I did not attend the President's press backgrounder in a hotel in Guam, but Nixon told the press that I would answer any questions they might have on the backgrounder.

The President also asked me to brief the large press corps accompanying him at our next two stops in Manila and Jakarta. This assignment was one I could scarcely handle since I did not attend the President's meetings with President Marcos or President Suharto. No one from the State Department was included in these meetings, not even Secretary Rogers or our Ambassadors.). During 1969, the Administration made a number of statements and moves, beyond those already mentioned, to create a better climate in U.S. Chinese relations. We publicly expressed our willingness to renew bilateral talks with the Chinese in Warsaw or elsewhere; and Ambassador Stoessel in Warsaw was authorized by the President to tell his Chinese colleague of the President's wish to discuss an improvement in relations. All these statements and positions, including liberalization of American travel and tourist purchases of Chinese products, were favorably received by the great majority of our newspapers and members of Congress.

Whereas the Chinese early in 1969 had castigated the Nixon Administration in the harshest terms, Peking attacks moderated in the course of the year. Previously, Chinese representatives conveyed to a number of foreigners their awareness that U.S. policy toward China was under review. However they also made it clear that the issue of Taiwan, including U.S. military forces deployed there, created a major obstacle to any Sino-U.S. rapprochement. We also received indirect official word from Peking that China appreciated U.S. restraint in not seeking to exploit the Sino-Soviet dispute and that the U.S. obviously did not see a Sino-Soviet war as being in its interests.

In late 1969 it was announced that the U.S. would automatically validate passports of persons in six categories for travel to the PRC. These categories were members of Congress, journalists, teachers, scholars, medical doctors and Red Cross representatives. On December 19, it was announced that foreign subsidiaries of American companies would be permitted to sell China non-strategic items of foreign manufacture, while U.S. companies were permitted to buy or sell Chinese goods within or between foreign countries but not to import Chinese goods to the U.S. U.S. tourist purchases of Chinese goods were allowed without limit.

All these and other moves to ease restrictions on U.S. travel and trade with China were instituted either by our bureau or by the NSC where a Senior Interdepartmental group chaired by my deputy, Ambassador Winthrop Brown, prepared a policy study for Dr. Kissinger as the President's Assistant for National Security Affairs.

Our bureau was encouraged by the interest shown by the President in all these moves to ease restrictions on U.S.-Chinese trade and travel, although we were pressing for a complete lifting of all travel restrictions on Americans desiring to visit China, and on all restrictions on Chinese bona fide visitors to the U.S. These steps were finally approved by the White House in March and April of 1971.

In the President's Foreign Policy Message to Congress in February 1970, Mr. Nixon declared that the U.S. aim was to establish a "more normal and constructive relationship with Communist China. He asserted that the U.S. had "historic ties of friendship with the Chinese people, and many of our basic interests are not in conflict."

1970 was not a significant year (like 1969 and 1971) in terms of changes in U.S. policies towards China, but 1970 must have been an important year for Peking's policymakers in determining the future course of China's relations with the U.S., Japan and the Soviet Union.

We concluded at our Chiefs of Mission meeting in Tokyo in July 1970, attended by the Ambassadors serving in the Western Pacific region and by Washington policy makers concerned with that area that:

- (1) Peking is on the defensive, being acutely concerned over the Soviet military build-up in Siberia.
- (2) Peking is worried that the U.S. will be pulling back militarily from the Western Pacific, and is much concerned over future Japanese capabilities and interests.
- (3) Peking is determined to heal the scars of the Cultural Revolution, and rebuild the Party and the economy. The latter will entail a trade relationship with the U.S. which advances China's development.

These and other conclusions of the Conference, which was attended by Secretary Rogers, were forwarded to President Nixon in a memorandum I drafted which concluded:

"We have no reason to apologize for the past. The very protection we extended to the nations of Asia these last two decades has now permitted us to draw back somewhat and, indeed, to focus on the dangers of our over-involvement (as in Vietnam) and unwarranted tutelage. This is not a question of getting out of Asia, but of finding the right way and right degree of staying in Asia.... We accept the risks -- and yet the ultimate safety -- of involvement."

All during 1970 and early 1971 we continued to pursue our talks with the Chinese in Warsaw -- to no avail. Kissinger raised with the State Department the possibility of sending a higher level emissary to Peking, but we questioned whether the Warsaw talks could ever produce such a result. Furthermore, in the absence of any clear signal from Peking that it would react favorably on any of the issues we had raised in Warsaw over the years, it was doubtful that any emissary would accomplish much. It never entered our minds in the State Department how far the President would be willing to go in personally involving himself in this politically sensitive issue.

All the back channel soundings that the President and Dr. Kissinger were making to Peking through third countries and various intermediaries in early 1971 were carried out under the strictest security precautions -- leaving us in the State Department completely in the dark, except for the Secretary of State who was kept informed.

On the other hand, we recognized that the massive build-up of Soviet military power in Siberia, hard along the northern frontier of China, was profoundly disturbing to the Chinese leadership. This would entail a re-evaluation of China's policy towards the great powers.

The first overt indications of a new Chinese policy towards the United States took a curious form. During an international ping-pong tournament in Japan in April 1971, the Chinese team invited the American team to visit China -- an invitation the U.S. accepted and reciprocated. Shortly thereafter, the White House authorized the State and Commerce Departments to liberalize foreign assets control regulations affecting U.S. trade with China. Win Brown and Bob Barnett spent many days with their Commerce colleagues working out necessary changes in the Federal Register.

U.S. policy towards China, and the Chinese representative issue in the UN, were major topics for discussion at our Chiefs of Mission meeting which I chaired in Baguio, the Philippines, May 17-20, 1971.

Walter McConaughy, U.S. Ambassador to the Republic of China on Taiwan, reluctantly concluded that a change of U.S. tactics would be required if there were to be any real chance of preventing the ouster or walk-out of the GRC at the UNGA session in October. Eight more countries had recognized Peking during the previous few months, and even the GRC itself realized that perhaps a dual representation formula (seating both Chinas in the UN) was its only chance for survival in the UN. However the GRC was adamant, according to McConaughy, on the subject of the GRC representing China in the UN Security Council -- a solution Peking would almost certainly reject.

Our Consulate General in Hong Kong, represented by Consul General David Osborn, made what turned out to be a remarkably prophetic analysis of the terms under which a Washington-Peking rapprochement could be achieved without the U.S. abandoning its commitments to the Republic of China.

According to our official account of the Chiefs of Mission Conference in 1971, Consul General Osborn said:

"Regarding the status of Taiwan, we should say that we do not disagree with claims of both parties that Taiwan is a province of China. We are deluding ourselves if we believe we can have good relations with the PRC without such a declaration."

As a second point, Dave Osborn said he did not believe we need remove our military forces from Taiwan completely to have better relations with the mainland. We must, however, start moving in that direction.

As a third point, he said we should de-emphasize verbally our bilateral security treaty with the GRC, while continuing to keep that treaty in force.

In the fourth place (Osborn concluded) we should continue to favor a peaceful resolution of GRC-PRC problems through direct talks, but we should low-key this in our public output. Usually it is better for us to say nothing and let the countries directly concerned work out their own problems.

Osborn and I agreed that Peking was now moving in a more pragmatic direction, making it probable that Peking would accept a U.S. position embodying the above four points.

Meanwhile, as earlier stated, unbeknownst to all of us in the State Department (except Secretary Rogers), Henry Kissinger and a few key White House colleagues were involved in highly secret preparations for Henry Kissinger's trip to Peking in June 1971.

The President had a passion for secrecy based in part on his distrust of the bureaucracy. Never was secrecy more strictly pursued as it was over preparations for the Kissinger trip, and with considerable justification. Had word leaked out, it might have raised all kinds of criticisms from the right wing of the Republican party, not to mention deep concern in Taiwan, Japan and other countries affected.

So I am not faulting Nixon and Kissinger for their secret diplomacy, although not informing people who are expected to be informed can give rise to some real dangers. Let me cite a specific example. I recall meeting one morning in June 1971 with several key members of my staff, one of whom mentioned that it had just been announced over the radio that Dr. Kissinger, who was in Pakistan on a round-the-world trip, had contracted a case of intestinal flu, and was therefore planning to take several days rest by motoring up from Islamabad to the Pakistan mountain resort area of Murree.

I commented to my staff that this was ridiculous -- that no one with what we used to call "Delhi belly" would take off on a long bumpy motor trip. I then observed blandly that Henry was probably off on a secret trip to China.

As soon as I said those words, it occurred to me that my impromptu speculation, if true, would immediately spread to the newspapers, and I would be responsible for the worst leak of the Nixon administration. So I quickly excused myself from my meeting, dashed up to Secretary Rogers' office, and told him what had happened. The Secretary paled visibly, for I had uncovered the truth. On his instructions, I rushed back to my office and swore all present to utter secrecy about my speculation. They kept the secret.

Such are the dangers of not telling officials of events occurring in their area of responsibility.

Right after the President amazed the world with his widely televised revelations in the summer of 1971 about Henry's trip to Peking and plans for the President to visit China the following February, I received a telephone call from Secretary Rogers who was with Nixon in San Clemente. He asked what I thought of the announcement. I said it was great, but that we were going to have problems with the Japanese. Secretary Rogers seemed surprised, pointing out that we had given Prime Minister Sato several hours advance notice of the President's announcement (as indeed we had to other allies). I said that the announcement nevertheless left Prime Minister Sato in a most embarrassing political position. For years we had been urging restraint on other countries about opening relations with Peking; and the Japanese, largely out of deference to us, had continued to vote in the UN against the seating of Peking's representatives in China's UN seat. And now we had secretly reached Peking before Japan (known as Sato's nightmare), exposing the Japanese government to the first of what were to be several "Nixon Shockus" that rocked U.S.-Japanese relations.

Anyway, I told Secretary Rogers that Dick Ericson (Director of Japanese Affairs) and I would work immediately on a draft message from Nixon to Sato explaining the reasons for tight security and apologizing for any embarrassments this might have caused our most important Asian ally. Our draft message, telexed the next morning to San Clemente, was approved by the President, but I doubt it did much to allay Sato's concerns.

In his memoirs published in 1984, Under Secretary U. Alexis Johnson, a former U.S. Ambassador to Japan and close friend of Sato's, revealed that he had been alerted by Nixon to fly out to Tokyo to give Sato advance notice in a way that would show special consideration for Japan. But, for some reason, the White House canceled the Johnson trip.

The President's announcement was an even greater shock to President Chiang Kai-shek and to the Republic of China on Taiwan -- but there wasn't much we could do to allay the shock. Indeed, the President's impending trip to China had the effect of completely undermining the position our government had taken year after year in marshaling international support for the Republic of China (Taiwan) retaining China's seat in the UN.

Not that I found this to be any great loss -- the eventual seating of the PRC was inevitable -- but we in the State Department were nevertheless under orders from Nixon in 1971, even after the President's China trip was announced, to do all we could to preserve the GRC's position in the UN. It took a lot of our time and effort -- and eventually we lost.

During the autumn of 1971, Jack Service, who in the 1940's was the most able of all the State Department China-language officers and who was later hounded out of the service by McCarthyism, made a trip to China with his wife, Caroline, as personal guests of Premier Zhou En-lai. I, as Jack's close friend from the days back in 1946-47 when we had served together in New Zealand, visited the Services on their return to Berkeley, California, where Jack gave me a blow-by-blow account of his China trip, as we walked all over the hills of Berkeley.

Jack met with the top leaders whom he had known from the World War II days when they were together in the Yen'an Caves. He found the Cultural Revolution rapidly subsiding. It was clear that Zhou En-lai, in particular, was preparing the way for serious productive talks with Nixon. The key issue would be Taiwan. Zhou recognized that the U.S. could not switch its policy overnight and that some evolution over time would be required. From Peking's viewpoint, it was absolutely essential that the U.S. not promote or encourage any Taiwan independence movement. If the U.S. looked for a successful outcome of President Nixon's trip, it must accept Taiwan as an integral part of China. Of less immediate consequence was the removal of U.S. forces on Taiwan.

Jack Service's account was of interest in many regards, especially his account of the notable improvements that had taken place in the lives of most Chinese people over the last two decades. Jack reported Zhou's surprise over the PRC victory (October 25, 1971) on the UN seating issue. The Chinese clearly had not anticipated this favorable result. During his conversation with Zhou En-lai on October 27, 1971, there were constant staff interruptions with regard to developments in New York and hasty arrangements for China's participation in the UN. I reported Jack's views to the White House, State and CIA.

Also during October Henry Kissinger made another trip to China to prepare for the Presidential visit and to do some initial work on the final (Shanghai) communiqué which was to set forth what was agreed to at the summit meetings.

Chapter VI

President Nixon's Trip to China, 1972

Nearly 200 people accompanied the President to China, including security personnel, administrative staff, press and others. The official party numbered 13, ranked as follows: President Nixon, Secretary Rogers, Dr. Kissinger, Presidential Assistant Bob Haldeman, Press Secretary Ron Ziegler, Presidential Military Adviser Brent Scowcroft, Assistant Secretary Green, Presidential Deputy Assistant Dwight Chapin, Speechwriter Pat Buchanan, Personal Presidential Secretary Rose Mary Woods, State Department Director of Asia Communist Affairs Al Jenkins, NSC staff member Foreign Service Officer John Holdridge, and Special Assistant to Kissinger, Winston Lord. But it was clear from our initial seat assignments in the Presidential plane that the White House was going to dominate the show and that the State Department was to take a back seat literally.

While in Hawaii en route to China, I had a useful meeting with Dr. Kissinger who gave me the benefit of what he had learned about negotiating with the Chinese, based on his two recent visits to Peking. Kissinger suggested our meeting in Hawaii since I would be assisting Secretary Rogers in handling what were known as the "counterpart talks" with the Chinese Foreign Minister and his staff. The counterpart talks dealt essentially with specific problem areas like trade, travel, consular affairs, property rights, while leaving broad strategic issues to the top level, namely Mao, Zhou En-lai, Nixon and Kissinger.

"Never," I recall Henry Kissinger saying to me, "use the language of the marketplace in dealing with top Chinese officials. Don't talk about deals or quid-pro-quos. Always talk about principles...That as a matter of principle we are prepared to do so-and-so, and that we would trust that you as a matter of principle would do this or that..." "The Chinese," he added, "are real puritans -- not like you New Englanders."

"Another thing," Henry added, "is that the Chinese have a lot of things to get off their chests -- decades of humiliations at the hands of the imperialist West. The Foreign Minister may well spend two full days sounding off on that subject before he is willing to get into substance. Don't interrupt him. Let him get it out of his system. If you interrupt to rebut him, he'll start all over again -- and you'll get nowhere." (He implied that this is what almost happened to him.)

That was Kissinger at his best -- astute, articulate, a master of manoeuvre. But he was also a megalomaniac, and as long as he was in the White House he lost no opportunity to build his power base at the expense of the State Department, undercutting the Secretary of State and shamelessly exploiting President Nixon's long-standing suspicions and prejudices against careerists in the State Department (despite our loyalty to all Presidents and our high respect for Nixon's extraordinary grasp of strategic issues).

For Secretary Rogers, the China trip had many humiliating moments, especially not being asked to accompany President Nixon (and Kissinger) to their only meeting with Chairman Mao Zedong. Secretary Rogers was uncomplaining because he did not want to add in any way to the President's problems.

The crowning achievement of the Nixon China Trip was the final communiqué -- known as the Shanghai Communiqué -- which was to become the charter of our new relationship with China. The format of the communiqué was in itself unusual. Each side -- first China, then the U.S. -- presented its contrasting view of the world scene and the main tenets of its foreign policies. This was followed by identifying areas of understanding and agreement. In this section the U.S. acknowledged that "all Chinese on either side of the Taiwan Strait maintain there is but one China and that Taiwan is part of China. The U.S. does not challenge that position." On the thorny issue of withdrawing U.S. forces and military installations on Taiwan, the U.S. stated this to be its ultimate objective, but related it to a peaceful settlement of the Taiwan question by the Chinese themselves: meanwhile the U.S. would progressively reduce its military presence on Taiwan as tension in the area diminished.

Credit for the negotiation of this document must go largely to Henry Kissinger and his Chinese counterpart Vice-Minister Chiao Kuan-hua. Dr. Kissinger went through the motions of consulting Secretary Rogers and the rest of the State Department contingent. From time to time Rogers and I would meet with Kissinger or we would receive sections of the draft communiqué for our comments, but at no stage did I ever see the entire draft until it was already approved by the President, Kissinger, Rogers and the Chinese leaders.

The first opportunity I was given to read the approved draft was on February 26, the day we left Peking for a one-day rest stop at the scenic city of Hangchow before our final day at Shanghai. When we reached our hotel in Hangchow, Secretary Rogers showed me the approved text. I read it rapidly, detecting a major flaw which I immediately drew to Rogers' attention. He agreed with me, and so did Al Jenkins. The flaw was simply this: although the U.S. reaffirmed in the text of the Communiqué its support for U.S. security treaty obligations to Japan, the Republic of Korea, the Philippines, SEATO and ANZUS, no mention was made of our treaty obligations to the Republic of China on Taiwan. This would almost certainly be seized upon by the world press, and especially by those in the Republican party who were opposed to the President's trip, (Even top cabinet officials like Vice President Agnew and Treasury Secretary John Connally had privately expressed strong concerns over the President's trip to China.) to charge that the President had sold the Republic of China down the river, that the U.S. had unilaterally terminated without advance notice its treaty obligations to the ROC, and that this could even be interpreted as suggesting to Peking that it could attack Taiwan without involving the U.S.

Rogers could see my point right away. He, too, remembered how Secretary of State Dean Acheson had come under heavy fire for excluding South Korea from a map showing those areas in East Asia of primary defense concern to the United States.

Secretary Rogers immediately put in a telephone call to the President who was staying at the nearby government guest house, but he got Haldeman on the phone instead. Haldeman refused to disturb the President who was resting -- besides, he said, the President had already approved the draft.

I was in a black mood that night at the dinner party given in the President's honor by the Hangchow Revolutionary Committee. Ziegler noted my mood and asked what had happened. When I told him, he evidently then got in touch with Haldeman.

Around 1 or 2 a.m., John Scali beat on my door and said that "all hell had broken loose in the Presidential suite." Evidently Haldeman or Rogers had got to the President about the issue, and the President was enraged.

According to Henry Kissinger's memoirs, the President was furious at the State Department for belatedly coming up with a long series of nitpicks about the Communiqué, and yet failure to correct these nitpicks, the President allegedly feared, might result in the State Department bad-mouthing the Communiqué. Henry depicted the President as "storming about the beautiful guest house in Hangchow in his underwear," swearing that "he would do something about that State Department at the first opportunity -- a threat he made at regular intervals since my first interview with him...."

Well, of course, there was no series of nitpicks -- just one major objection -- a point which, amazingly, no one had spotted until I drew it to Rogers' attention; and it is quite possible that the President's fury was directed at Kissinger for having put him on the spot.

The following morning, at breakfast, Secretary Rogers told me that he had managed to reach President Nixon late the previous evening to express our concerns. He said he didn't know what the President would do. After breakfast, we left for the airport to go to Shanghai. While proceeding to my plane, Henry Kissinger intercepted me. He was angry about what he termed my "poor-mouthing of the Communiqué."

For the first time in my three years of association with Henry, I did not hold back. "Since when was the Secretary of State offering constructive criticisms defined as poor-mouthing?" I further reminded him of the constitutional responsibilities of the Secretary of State to advise the President -- especially on an issue as critical as this, one that could affect the whole outcome of the President's trip.

"But you've been talking to Scali, who has no right to be involved," was Henry's weak retort, to which I replied that Scali had a right to know as press adviser to the President. Henry then did an about-face. He asked with a seeming genuine warmth if I would join him that evening in briefing the world press at the time of the issuance of the Shanghai Communiqué.

I replied that I would do so if the President so ordered. I was not happy about the prospect of being conspicuously identified with a communiqué I found badly flawed, and it was left unclear whether that flaw would remain in the communiqué.

So I arrived in Shanghai in an angry mood until it was revealed to me later in the day that Kissinger had worked out with the Chinese Vice Minister late the previous evening a way of handling the problem I'd raised.

I was also told that the President specifically asked that I accompany Kissinger to the press briefing and that I participate to the extent of summarizing what had gone on in the counterpart talks between Secretary Rogers and the Chinese Foreign Minister.

Kissinger never told me specifically what arrangements he had concluded with the Chinese side regarding the critical objection I had raised, but during our briefing of a large press gathering in Shanghai at 6 p.m., February 27, it simply took the form of an agreed removal of the offending sentence from the Communiqué and of Henry stating in answer to an anticipated question from the press, actually Mr. Kraslow of The Los Angeles Times who asked, "Why did not the U.S. government affirm its Treaty commitment to Taiwan, as the President and you have done on numerous occasions?" Kissinger answered that this issue was an extraordinarily difficult one to discuss at that time and place, but, he then added the key passage: "we stated our basic position with respect to this issue in the President's World Report, in which we said that this Treaty will be maintained. Nothing has changed on that position." Kissinger said he hoped that that would be all he would have to say on that subject -- and his request was respected.

Thus was adroitly averted what could have been a serious setback. Neither Henry nor the President ever thanked me for my initiative. President Nixon understandably acted as though the event never occurred, while Kissinger took it upon himself to leave history with a self-serving account of the incident -- one that is misleading and damaging to the State Department, and one that I am now, many years later, moved to refute.

In any event, this red-letter day concluded on a most pleasant note. I was asked to meet with President Nixon in his hotel room at 10:30 p.m. to discuss the trip which I was about to undertake with John Holdridge, in which we would call on the top leaders of all East Asian and Australasian countries in the course of two weeks to explain American policy in the wake of the Shanghai Communiqué and to answer questions.

The President was warm and gracious. He gave me instructions as to what I should say about his talks in China -- their frankness, their lack of double-talk, the fact that there were no secret agreements or understandings -- it was all out in the open as presented in the revealed record. He also urged that I stress America's constancy of purpose and its continuing search, in consultation with our allies, for "finding the right way to stay in Asia," and that under all circumstances we would stand by our commitments. He also gave me special instructions regarding Korea and Thailand.

In assigning John Holdridge to be my assistant, he ensured that we would be in a more authoritative position to answer certain questions relating to the top level talks with Zhou En-lai which John had attended as an NSC adviser to Kissinger and as an interpreter.

That was the last full day of the President's trip to China. He took off the following morning from Shanghai with all his party (save for John Holdridge and me) direct for Washington by way of Anchorage, Alaska.

For me, the most exhilarating and important moments of the trip all occurred that last day -- my final meeting with Henry Kissinger which turned out so satisfactorily, our joint briefing of the Press (in which he did almost all of the talking and answering of questions), and my final meeting with the President late that evening (February 27). But there was one other event that day which deserves special mention.

In the course of the afternoon, Premier Zhou En-lai made a personal call on Secretary of State Rogers in his hotel room which I was asked to join (Secretary Rogers' suite and mine were on the 13th floor, Kissinger's on the 14th floor and the Nixons were on the top floor, the 15th. The symbolism escaped no one.). In the course of this call, the subject of my flying direct to Tokyo from Shanghai was raised by Secretary Rogers. Our earlier application to the Chinese government for permission for this flight had gone unanswered. We realized the uniqueness of our application, for no plane of any nation had flown either way between China and Japan in the preceding 23 years. So when Bill Rogers raised the question with Premier Zhou in our hotel meeting, Zhou just smiled and said through his interpreter: "Mr. Secretary, you just go ahead and do what you think is right."

Zhou never gave his permission, but he never denied permission. He thereby established no precedent which someone else could invoke (The thought later occurred to me that Zhou's unusual courtesy call on the Secretary of State might have been prompted by concerns expressed to him by Nixon or Kissinger over the State Department's "poor-mouthing" of the Communiqué. In other words, Kissinger, in justifying to Chiao.).

It all worked out fine, and when, the next day, following President Nixon's departure, I took off in the President's back-up plane for Tokyo, Premier Zhou actually drove down to our plane to say farewell to John Holdridge and me. For the first time, in my hearing, Premier Zhou spoke English: "Goodbye, Mr. Green, have a good trip. Good luck." He knew I faced some difficult moments, especially when I reached Taiwan where I was scheduled to meet with President Chiang Kai-shek. I left China feeling that Zhou En-lai was perhaps the most remarkable of all leaders in terms of his broad command of world events and yet his extraordinary attention to detail.

Chapter VII

Aftermath of Nixon Trip -- Asian and U.S. Reactions

Arriving in Tokyo on February 28, John Holdridge and I were met by my wife and by special assistant, Paul Cleveland. We four were to make the long journey from Tokyo to Seoul, Manila, Saigon, Phnom Penh, Vientiane, Bangkok, Singapore, Jakarta, Sydney, Canberra, Wellington and back to Washington. From Tokyo to Singapore, we traveled in a small executive jet provided by the Commander in Chief of the Pacific. The rest of the trip was by commercial airlines.

The most challenging talks I had were in Tokyo and Taipei. As The New York Times put it on the day of our arrival in Tokyo: "The Japanese press is beside itself in frustration -- and the government is not far behind -- that Japan's overtures toward normal government relations with Peking have been spurned; while President Nixon has been welcomed. China professes to fear revived Japanese militarism and Japanese economic hegemony in Asia."

My meetings with Prime Minister Sato and Foreign Minister Fukuda were nevertheless warm and friendly, based on many years' acquaintance, even though they were under criticism in Japan for the way the U.S. had overtaken Japan in the race to Peking. They were also anxious for "inside" information regarding what had transpired in the summit meetings in Peking beyond what was already announced. This placed me in a bit of a spot because I had not been directly involved in the top-level negotiations with Zhou -- a fact known to the Japanese press. On the other hand, Kissinger and President Nixon had given me background and guidance, and John Holdridge had attended most of the summit meetings.

The Japanese government had already made favorable official statements about the Shanghai Communiqué before our arrival in Tokyo, and the government's statements after my departure would indicate that our talks in Tokyo had gone well in the sense of removing suspicions that there were secret deals in Peking, perhaps involving Japan, in reaffirming our defense commitment to Taiwan, and in suggesting that we had no desire to beat Japan in any race toward diplomatic recognition of Peking.

The two things I remember most vividly about our busy schedule of calls in Korea were: (1) the 90-minute grilling I had from the Korean Foreign Minister with regard to every detail of the President's China Trip, plus my assessment of each detail's implications, and (2) the friendly solicitude expressed by my old friend (and one-time adversary) President Park Chung-Hee regarding my personal safety when visiting Taiwan in view of the strongly adverse reactions he anticipated there.

I accordingly prepared careful talking points during the Seoul-Taipei flight in our 4-passenger jet -- points that I later checked with Ambassador McConaughy in Taipei before our meetings with top ROC officials. President Chiang Kai-shek refused to see us, but his able, level-headed son, Chiang Ching-kuo, who was Premier at the time and later President of the ROC, was our gracious, albeit dismayed host. I assured the Premier and Foreign Minister Chow that, while we had modified our policy toward Peking, we had not changed our policy toward the ROC with which we continued to have diplomatic relations and a defense commitment. We also expected to do even more to encourage trade and investment in Taiwan. In the Shanghai Communiqué we made explicit our view that there is but one China, rejecting any suggesting that we favor a two-China policy or a one-China, one-Taiwan policy. We do not pretend, I added, to know how the Taiwan issue will eventually be settled. This is a problem to be resolved by the Chinese on both sides of the Taiwan Strait. We only insist on the issue being resolved peacefully.

After a busy day of meetings in which these themes were stressed, and many questions answered by John Holdridge and me, I said to the Foreign Minister at our final meeting that I hoped his government would not convey an impression of dismay and bitterness over President Nixon's China initiative, for that would only give satisfaction to those who are enemies of the ROC and instill fears on the part of Taiwan's business contacts. The ROC has many strong friends in the U.S. and elsewhere, and it must remain that way.

Subsequently our Embassy reported that reactions in Taiwan remained skeptical but the "GRC leaders were impressed with Green's reaffirmation of the defense commitment and most interested in his comment that he believed Peking is prepared to accept the status quo in Taiwan for an indefinite period. Most important of all, the GRC leaders did not engage in a further public quarrel with the U.S. Private comments also indicated relief and a shift from earlier sharp criticism."

With the help of Walter McConaughy and John Holdridge, my difficult mission to Taiwan succeeded.

Our next stop after a scary flight through a tropical electrical storm was Manila, a scene of utter confusion. Mrs. Marcos was taking off for Peking just as we landed. Our ashen-faced Ambassador, Hank Byroade, explained that Mrs. Marcos was looking for new relations with Peking, now that the U.S. had allegedly changed its policy. Byroade also said that I was being served with a subpoena to appear the following day before the Philippine Senate to answer questions about "how the U.S. was reneging on its 2-China policy," which Foreign Minister Romulo had thought we were pursuing. The Philippine press reaction was shrill and irrational, urging that, since the U.S. had jettisoned Taiwan, the Philippines should now negotiate a deal with Peking.

According to the Embassy's telegraphic reports of my 36 hours stay in Manila, my meetings with Marcos, Romulo, the Philippine Senate, the press, etc. had been "indispensable in halting the snowballing erosion in Philippine confidence in U.S. Asian policy."

Our meetings in Vietnam, Cambodia and Laos were held in a calmer atmosphere and went off without incident, except for President Lon Nol's unexplained absence from Phnom Penh. I had little regard for him anyway and was glad to have my meetings instead with Sirik Matak, the Foreign Minister, a wise and courageous man.

The King of Thailand, reflecting the sentiment of his government and people, expressed to me profound skepticism of PRC intentions and of U.S. ability and preparedness to deal realistically with the Chinese. However on our departure from Bangkok after long separate meetings with the King, the Prime Minister, the Foreign Minister, the National Executive Council, the SEATO Secretary General, and the press, the Thai government released a statement describing our talks as "most satisfactory to both sides while at the same time creating excellent mutual understanding." The usually critical leading newspaper The Nation said I had done a "superb job in allaying suspicions." During my talks in Thailand I was in a position to provide private assurances that Peking was likely to reduce, and possibly terminate, material support for Communist insurgents operating in Thailand.

Our stops in Kuala Lumpur and Singapore were relatively uneventful but entirely satisfactory.

Indonesia posed a special problem in terms of Indonesia's deep suspicions of the Chinese, who were regarded as co-conspirators with the Indonesian Communist Party in assassinating 6 of Indonesia's top 8 generals in the aborted coup of September 30, 1965. On the other hand, President Suharto, Foreign Minister Malik, and the Army leaders welcomed Nixon's China Trip as offering hope for peace and stability. Press coverage emphasized my assurances that there had been no change in U.S. commitments and no secret deals.

In Australia there was no need to explain or justify the President's trip to China. It was widely accepted as a sensible move. However, Australia posed an interesting challenge since the leader of the Labor Party opposition, Gough Whitlam (who was Prime Minister during my assignment to Australia 1973-75) had adopted the position that Australia should now establish relations with the PRC. The leader of the Country Party was similarly interested in early recognition of Peking as giving Australia a diplomatic advantage in selling wheat and other farm products to the huge China market. I found myself in something of a quandary in justifying the President's opening to China on the one hand and advising caution regarding any Australian move to recognize Peking on the other. All I could do was suggest that Australia might be best advised to adopt a wait-and-see policy before any moves to break relations with the GOC on Taiwan in order to recognize Peking.

New Zealand, our last stop, was delightfully relaxing. After a useful 2 hour talk with Prime Minister Marshall and Foreign Minister Holyoake, the Prime Minister suggested that we conclude our talks on the Heretaunga Golf Course, which we did. Sir Keith Holyoake told the press that my "briefing was the best one he had ever heard in his life." This was a pleasant note on which to end a trip that had covered a dozen countries in fifteen days.

In looking back on this trip, my wife remarked on the wisdom of President Nixon in entrusting this mission to Foreign Service officers who were not only well-known personally to leaders of the Western Pacific region, but who were seen by them as careerists with no political axes to grind.

On our return to Washington, I reported to the House Foreign Affairs Committee and to the White House, before going on the nation-wide NBC program "Meet the Press." The President, when I met with him on March 23, along with Al Haig, Deputy Head of the NSC, and John Holdridge, was anxious that I play down the Taiwan aspect as much as possible in my "Meet the Press" appearance. He did not want me to make any headlines -- and I did not disappoint him in that regard. Al Haig called me up after my NBC performance on March 26 to say "they didn't lay a glove on you" which was the highest compliment I received for what I fear was a lackluster TV performance, given my instructions.

There was one further development in which I was involved in 1972, relating primarily to our relations with Japan, but also involved U.S. policy toward China.

Prime Minister Sato resigned in mid-1972 and was replaced by Prime Minister Tanaka who had already announced his intention to negotiate later that year with the Chinese on normalizing Tokyo's relations with Peking.

On August 30, 1972, I accompanied President Nixon to Hawaii where Nixon and Tanaka met for the first time, largely to get to know each other and to discuss issues of concern.

I recall that on our flight from San Clemente on Air Force One to Hawaii, there was a long meeting in the President's cabin attended by the President, Secretary Rogers, Dr. Kissinger, Under Secretary U. Alexis Johnson and myself, in which Alex did most of the talking. He had previously been our Ambassador to Japan and felt strongly that President Nixon and Dr. Kissinger had unnecessarily affronted the Japanese in the way we had suddenly shifted our policy toward Peking in 1971-72 without adequate consultation or even notification of Japan.

It was clear that Prime Minister Tanaka was now going to move rapidly, under strong internal Japanese political pressure, to normalize Tokyo-Peking relations. Some concern was expressed in our Air Force One meeting that Tanaka might normalize on terms adversely affecting U.S. interests, but President Nixon seemed surer than the rest of us that Tanaka and Zhou would act responsibly and that we should not press the Japanese on this issue at our forthcoming meeting at Kuilima, Hawaii.

Since the President's main meetings in Kuilima with Tanaka were strictly private and separate from the plenary talks, I have no way of knowing whether China-Japan issues were discussed. But, in any event, when Tanaka did go to Peking several weeks later, he was evidently under no pressure from the Chinese to accept terms that would create difficulties in U.S.-Japanese relations. In fact, China seemed to be at pains not only to improve relations with Japan, but also with the United States and between Japan and the United States.

Commencing then, in 1972, for the first time in memory, a foundation was laid for a constructive relationship between Washington, Peking and Tokyo; that is to say, between the world's most powerful nation, the world's most populous nation and the world's most economically dynamic nation -- all three of them having been at war with each other at some point earlier in this century.

Chapter VIII

Concluding Observations

When future historians contemplate the events of this century, few things will stand out more prominently than the interface between China and the United States. Barbara Tuchman's Stilwell and the American Experience in China captures all the frustrations of our war-time allied relations when she writes in her final sentence: "In the end, China went her own way, as if the Americans had never come."

Thereafter, for over two decades, U.S. relations with mainland China remained in a deep freeze. There was a brief period between late 1961 and early 1964 that offered some hope that relations might thaw a bit due to Chinese reactions to the excesses of the Great Leap Forward and to initiatives from the American side to enter into a more civil discourse with China. This period was marked by U.S. efforts to relax certain restrictions on American travel to, and trade with, China. It was also marked by U.S. pressures, known to Peking, to restrain our Chinese allies on Taiwan from raids against the mainland, especially during the period of economic and social unrest resulting from the collapsed Great Leap Forward.

However, it takes two to tango, and there was no evidence of Peking's willingness to relax tensions with the U.S. even during the 1961-64 period. The U.S. was nevertheless able to demonstrate that it was Chinese, not U.S., policy that was principally responsible for the continuing deep freeze in our relations.

The Chinese government was obviously averse to any gradual improvements in its relations with the U.S. As I pointed out at Princeton in mid-1965: The Chinese Communist leaders have remarked that when the time comes to improve relations with the U.S., "this will come all at once, inasmuch as to improve relations piecemeal would have a harmful effect on the Chinese people's revolutionary fervor."

Partly as a result of the setback to China caused by the aborted Communist coup in Indonesia in 1965, China entered into another dark period of left-wing fanaticism known as the Cultural Revolution which did not abate until 1969. Intensified efforts were made by China during that period to cast the U.S. in the devil's role in order to whip up mass fears of an external threat and thereby achieve national cohesion.

A major reversal of Chinese strategic policy occurred in the period 1969-71, brought on by increasing Chinese nervousness over Soviet intentions. The Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia in 1968, followed by the rapid build-up of Soviet military power in Siberia, especially in disputed areas along the Chinese frontier, created an atmosphere of war-panic in China. Air raid shelters were built on a massive scale. A CIA estimate of October 1969 placed the chances of a Soviet effort to knock out China's nascent nuclear weapons factories at about 1 in 3. Meanwhile, ever since Khrushchev came on the scene, China had been nervously observing U.S.-Soviet relations and was increasingly concerned that China might face U.S.-Soviet collusion.

It was against this background -- plus the growing influence of Zhou En-lai and the pragmatists - - that President Nixon's initiative was realistically possible of achieving success.

Just a few observations on why the President took this extraordinary initiative on China. Certainly it was out of line with the thinking of many in the Republican party. It also involved a lot of risks -- risks that secret preparations might leak to the press, risks that the highly publicized summit meeting might fail, risks of bad reactions in Japan, Korea, Taiwan or elsewhere.

Moreover, he was undertaking this trip at a time when the war in Vietnam was raging and when the U.S. was suffering heavy casualties at the hands of an enemy supported by Peking. Finally, his approach to China could be seen as a bit premature. Why not wait until Mao passed from the scene -- which seemed fairly imminent?

The very fact that the President took all these risks underlines the great importance he attached to a U.S.-China rapprochement. As he said to me on one occasion: "We simply cannot go on indefinitely in a hostile relationship with one-quarter of mankind, especially as the PRC grows in military power." There was a need to move promptly at a time when the Chinese leaders were fearful of a Soviet attack and when we could not allow the Soviet Union to take Sino-U.S. hostility for granted in its policy calculations.

The President also had sound internal political reasons for his China initiative which was widely popular in the U.S., especially in academic, press and other circles critical of our role in the long, bloody, fruitless war in Vietnam. For many months, China took the headlines away from Vietnam. It cast U.S. foreign policy in a positive light during a critical year for the Nixon Administration.

It must be remembered that President Nixon also had a strong sense of the mark he would leave on history. That was evident from my first meeting with him in Jakarta, with all his note-taking and tape-recording of conversations.

China's affirmative response to Nixon's initiatives related overwhelmingly to its fears of Soviet aggressive intentions and of possible Soviet-U.S. collusion against China. But other factors were also undoubtedly involved. One of them was the perceived advantage to Peking in having closer ties between Peking, Washington and Tokyo, both in economic terms and in terms of better ensuring that Japan's military capabilities would remain limited and confined to Japan's self-defense through its defense ties with the United States. This point came through to me loud and clear in a conversation with a top Chinese official in Peking during the Nixon visit. The Chinese have long memories, and surely one of the most painful of these memories is Japan's harsh occupation of North China and its half-century colonization of Taiwan.

President Nixon failed to recognize Japanese sensitivities in the sudden announcement of his trip to China. For years the Japanese had followed the American lead on China policy, even though they were anxious to get into the Chinese market through early recognition of the Peking government. It had been the nightmare of at least one Japanese prime minister that he would wake up one morning to find the Americans in Peking and the Japanese left in the lurch. It would have been possible to soften the blow to Prime Minister Sato and his government had President Nixon sent a personal emissary like Ambassador U. Alexis Johnson, who was well known and trusted in Japan, to explain the President's initiative at least a day in advance of its announcement. This would have given the Japanese government time to ready its public response, while underlining our respect for Japan's special interests in this important strategic move. I sensed that both Nixon and Kissinger compared the Japanese leadership unfavorably with the Chinese, seeing the Japanese as preoccupied with economic issues while the Chinese leaders thought in Nixon-Kissinger global strategic terms. It was not until Nixon returned to Washington from China that I learned that his obsession with keeping his China initiative secret was not, as alleged by Nixon, out of consideration for the wishes of the Chinese but for his own.

Some time after the President returned from Peking, I suggested through Under-Secretary Alex Johnson and Henry Kissinger that President and Mrs. Nixon might show their respect for Japan (and make amends for the Nixon shocks) by flying to Alaska to greet Their Imperial Majesties, the Emperor and Empress of Japan, who were stopping over at Anchorage for refueling en route by polar flight to Europe. This was the first time in history that any reigning monarch of Japan was to set foot on foreign soil -- and it was to be American soil. President Nixon took warmly to the idea (which he probably assumed was Kissinger's) and Japanese reactions were highly favorable.

A black mark in the President's China trip was the shabby way he treated his old friend and loyal supporter, Secretary of State William Rogers. American presidents in recent memory have had a tendency to rely considerably more on White House Staff than on government departments, but in Nixon's case it was carried to extremes, abetted in large part by the power-seeking Henry Kissinger who played on President Nixon's longstanding distrust of the Foreign Service. Ironically it was we in the Foreign Service dealing with Far Eastern affairs who were the most enthusiastic supporters of the President's China policy. After all, we had long striven for the goals reached during the Nixon Administration.

It was a curious coincidence that my 17 consecutive years (1956-1973) in dealing with U.S. China policy should have started and ended by working for two right-wing Republican lawyers -- John Foster Dulles and Richard Nixon -- both of whom started out their public careers as anti-Communist zealots with simplistic solutions to international issues, but both of whom ended their careers as international statesmen. It remained for President Nixon to shake the extended hand of Zhou En-lai in 1969, in dramatic contrast to Dulles' refusal to do so in Geneva in 1954, a slight Zhou never forgot.

U.S.-China relations had come a long way.

THOMAS P. SHOESMITH
Consular Officer
Hong Kong (1956-1958)

Thomas P. Shoesmith was born in 1939 and raised in Pennsylvania. His career in the State Department included posts in Japan, Hong Kong, South Korean, and an ambassadorship to Malaysia. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1991.

Q: You went to Hong Kong in 1956. Had you entered the Foreign Service by this time?

SHOESMITH: I was "Wristonized" [lateral entry into the Foreign Service under a program recommended by Henry Wriston, then Dean of Princeton] in 1955 and was assigned to Hong Kong as a consular officer. As I recall, that was something of a disappointment at the time, because other people who were working in my office in OIR [Office of Intelligence Research] and who were also Wristonized received appointments to Embassy Tokyo, doing political or economic work. I felt that I was being shunted off to Hong Kong to do consular work and, more specifically, to do citizenship and naturalization work. At that time there was a great effort being made to crack the problem of fraud in Chinese immigration. There were a great many Chinese coming to the United States. They were making application for citizenship, based on claims which had been established -- parentage claims that had been established -- in the prewar period. And it was apparent that there was a great deal of fraud involved in this. Of course, the U. S. Government was involved in a number of suits where these persons had been denied citizenship. So I was assigned as a citizenship and naturalization officer to interview people who were making claims for U. S. citizenship.

Q: That was quite an operation, wasn't it? You had almost unofficial police powers.

SHOESMITH: Well, we worked very closely with the Hong Kong Police. I don't think that they worried about search warrants and things like that. They used to go in and try to get papers and documentary evidence which showed that these people were not who they claimed to be. But that was a separate unit within the Consulate. Our work was more routine: examining people who claimed to be children of somebody, or examining parents, and asking long lists of questions to try to establish kinship or establish that there wasn't kinship. I did that for a year and then was transferred to Special Consular Services, working with Americans. When I got this assignment, as I said, I was disappointed, at first. I saw myself as being a political officer in an embassy somewhere. And that would have been great. In point of fact, it proved to be a very useful experience, because I got to know a good deal about consular operations and the whole range of consular services. Sometimes the work was very difficult and even unpleasant, because of these poor people who were trying so desperately to get to the United States. And my job really was to shake their story, if I could. Because many of these stories were fraudulent. But nonetheless it was a good experience. I was also accredited to Macao. We had an American, a young guy and his family who felt they would like to defect to China. They went to China through Macao. We were sent down there to find out what had happened. Those were interesting experiences.

Then, toward the end of that two years and in the expectation that my time in Hong Kong would be extended, I was reassigned to the Political Section. Of course, Hong Kong at that time -- this was 1958 -- was a very important listening post. It did a lot of political work on China, about which I knew virtually nothing. But there were lots of materials available to do the kind of research and analytical work that I had done in OIR.

But I was only there for about four months when I was told that I was being reassigned to Seoul.

David Dean was born in New York City in 1925 and graduated from Harvard. He entered the Foreign Service in 1951. He served in numerous posts including Kuala Lumpur, Rotterdam, Taichung, Hong Kong and Taipei. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1998.

Q: What business was your father in?

DEAN: My father started off as a cotton broker with Clayton Bowers and traveled extensively in East Asia to China and other places. Then he became a stockbroker until the crash of 1929.

Q: Grammar school, too?

DEAN: At first I went to schools in Stanford and Darien, Connecticut, and New York City. Then I went to the middle school and the upper school at Riverdale. It was a boarding school. After I finished, I went to Trinity College in Hartford, Connecticut for a year and then went into the Navy's V-12 program. The Navy sent me to Harvard. I stayed there for about a year or so and then opted for flight training. I returned later to graduate from Harvard in 1949. I went into flight training and finished as the war was ending, just as the Japanese surrendered in fact. I later served on the USS Atlanta and the USS Toledo as a naval aviator. Our ships were in the Pacific, based in Qingdao, China, with the Seventh Fleet.

Q: Had you had any opening or interest in the international world from school or your father's trade or anything like that?

DEAN: Yes, from my father's trips to East Asia, there were various artifacts around the house, but most of my schooling at Harvard was in English history and literature. I went to graduate school after the Navy at Columbia and studied in their School of International Affairs in Latin American studies. Before entering the Foreign Service, I never had any formal education on China or Chinese studies.

Q: In grammar school and at Riverdale while you were there, what sort of books interested you?

Did you read a lot?

DEAN: Yes, I read a lot, but mostly fiction. I read Sir Walter Scott, Robert Louis Stevenson, Conrad, Alexander Dumas, Kipling and G.A. Henty.

Q: Oh, yes, The Dash to Khartoum, With the Allies to Peking. It is interesting how many of a certain generation were inspired by Henty who was really for the British Empire, but it caught a lot of us, myself included.

DEAN: They were stirring books at the time for that age. I read mostly about American and European history and not a great deal about China.

Q: Did you get much shore leave when you were in these places?

DEAN: We were based in Tsingtao, which is in Shantung Province. There is a small seadrome there just between the outer and the inner harbor, and we worked there. That was the first time I met Chiang Kai-shek because the Chinese had one half of the seadrome and we had the other half. He came to inspect the Chinese half and we were introduced to him.

At that time, I was on the USS Atlanta. Coming in to the outer harbor, we had a pilot on board, but we misjudged the speed of the current, and when the pilot ordered the engines stopped and the anchor let go, the momentum of the ship was so great that all the anchor chain ran out and the pentails broke. They are used to hold the chain inboard, but they broke. In cases like that, there is always a buoy with a line attached to it which will bob up and show where the chain and the anchor are. But, some Chinese in a sampan came rowing out, cut the line to the buoy, put the buoy in his boat and rowed away! It took our divers three days to find out where the chain and the anchor were! They are really heavy. We recovered them eventually, but it was a very embarrassing introduction to Qingdao.

Q: Well, did you get much shore leave?

DEAN: Yes. Being based at the seadrome, we stayed at the Edgewater Mansion, which was a hotel and, of course, we observed what was happening in the city. By the time I got there, it was toward the end of '46 and beginning of '47, the communist forces were beginning to encircle the major cities, not only in Shantung but also in the northeast provinces. The Generalissimo's troops controlled the cities but the countryside was controlled by the communists. Of course there was martial law and a curfew every night. If you happened to be in a cafe or a bar or a restaurant, Chinese soldiers would come in at the curfew hour with fixed bayonets and drive everybody out on the streets and home. You may have seen some of these pictures with crowds of people fleeing from a policeman wielding a big bamboo stick. They really had enormous numbers of people inside the city. Qingdao had been ruled by the Japanese, and by the Germans before. They had many white Russians there. There were thousands of people from the countryside who came in to seek refuge, so it was really a crowded place. We weren't affected by the shortages or anything like that, but there were many poor people without food, and without shelter, so the conditions inside many parts of the city were not good. Our cruiser division would only stay for perhaps two or three weeks before we went on another voyage somewhere else, but during those times, I got to know what the city looked like and at least developed a real interest in learning more about the Chinese.

Q: What was the situation when you went up the Malaysian Peninsula?

DEAN: When we went ashore in Hong Kong, it was virtually a ghost town. Before the war, lots of the inhabitants had fled inland. Those who remained under Japanese control had taken almost every piece of wood out of the big mansions on the peaks and the hills surrounding Hong Kong. They had used the wood for firewood. They had taken out the window frames, the parquet floors, the doors, everything they could use to burn. When I got there, you would go up to the peak, and at certain times of the year, there is a lot of mist and fog. The fog was going in and out of these old houses which were vacant, and it really looked like a ghost town. I guess Hong Kong then had a population of maybe three or four hundred thousand people as compared to more than six million today. Anyway, things were very depressed in an economic sense as well. Further south was Singapore, a crown colony, which had also suffered under Japanese occupation. It was a very old-fashioned place. Raffles Hotel was the only place to go, the economy was flat. The British ruled it like a typical overseas possession. Singapore, Malaya, Borneo, and other places like that, truly had an old-fashioned society, almost like something out of the beginning of the century as described by Somerset Maugham.

Q: Did this pique any interest in you?

DEAN: Yes, indeed it did. After I left the Navy, I finished school at Harvard and then went on to Columbia for a master's degree. I then applied, at my brother's recommendation, for the Foreign Service. I got into the Foreign Service after I passed the examination. I went to the usual training course in late 1951. I guess it was two or three months later that I was assigned to Kuala Lumpur. I hadn't been to Kuala Lumpur in the Navy because it is an inland city, and my ship did not stop at Port Swettenham, which is the closest port. It was too small then. I was very pleased to be assigned to Kuala Lumpur. The Chinese must have been about 40% of the population, with about 50% Malay and 10% Tamil. The Chinese businessmen were running most of the economy.

Q: Do you recall how the oral exam was conducted in those days? Do you recall any of the questions?

DEAN: First they wanted to know what I had been doing. I told them that I was a naval aviator, that I had been out on the China coast. They asked what books I had been reading, in American literature particularly. They were interested in what sports I did. They had a big argument among themselves about the virtues of tennis and squash because I happened to play squash at the time. There wasn't a great deal of grilling. It was a very civilized and pleasant meeting. I guess it must have lasted an hour or so. I can't remember. Then they asked me to wait, and a little while later one of their secretaries came and said, "All right, they have accepted you." I think that was in the summer of '51, and I went into the class around October with people who became some of my closest friends.

Q: Who came in with you that you recall?

DEAN: Well, Paul Popple was one of my really close friends. He went off to Vietnam; and I went to Kuala Lumpur, but later we were in Hong Kong together. We lived in the same duplex. He lived upstairs; we lived downstairs. We were either dining at our place or having cocktails at his or vice versa. We became very good friends, with him and his family. He has passed away, but his widow, who lives in Italy, and my wife keep up a correspondence. We see their children whenever they come to the States. There were others, too whom I remember. It was a very short, intensive orientation course. Then I went off to Kuala Lumpur, and everybody went their separate ways.

Q: What about in the Malay group, I was wondering if you saw a political class begin to emerge?

DEAN: No, not then. The British were occupying all of the positions, not just of power but also administrative positions in the civil government, the police, almost every other aspect, including immigration control. Malays were not then a major power. That came later when the various Malay leaders were helped by the British to come to the fore. The British were running everything as far as government went at that time. It wasn't the Malaysians and it wasn't the Chinese.

Q: Were the British people you talked to sort of making noises about leaving at some point?

DEAN: No, I don't think they were thinking in those terms. This was early, you see, in 1951-'54. They were not really that much aware of the big forces going on around them in Southeast Asia and China, except by reading the newspapers, but they really weren't thinking in those terms.

DEAN: Yes, just at the end of '56. Our son Ken was born in Rotterdam shortly before we left for home leave at Christmas time of '56. I went into Chinese language training. That is why I had to smile when you said our facilities here were so much better; my training was in the basement garage of the Arlington Towers.

Q: You are talking about this interview which is taking place at the new Foreign Service Institute. Why Chinese?

DEAN: Because I had been interested in China through my service in the Navy traveling and staying in Qingdao, traveling along the China coast, meeting the Chinese in Malaysia, getting to be interested in their history and their culture. I had begun to take some Chinese lessons on my own in The Hague from an overseas Chinese who had come from Djakarta. His father had an automobile agency, and every time there was some economic downturn, Indonesians would come by with iron bars or even troops with machine guns and smash the windows of his automobile agency. They are still doing that with the Chinese. Today, with conditions as bad as they are, the Indonesian are still taking it out on the Chinese merchants who own most of the rice mills and most of the shops. Back then my teacher had received a scholarship from the Dutch government to come to Holland to study English. I was giving him English lessons and he was giving me Chinese lessons. So I applied for Chinese language training, went back to Washington at the end of '56, and went to the Foreign Service Institute for six months. It was a marvelous type of training they gave us, not only the language training which was very good, but also area studies. We had Doak Barnett, who became a famous figure among China scholars. He brought all of his friends down to lecture to us, every leading scholar you could think of at the time in the field of Chinese studies except John Fairbank who was ruled out by the Department.

Q: As a Foreign Service officer, what did you feel would be your future taking Chinese since we didn't have relations. The communist Chinese ruled the mainland, so what did you think about as a career?

DEAN: I felt it was inevitable that we were going to have relations with China and that indeed, for our national interests we should have them. I felt that very early on, and I feel it today. It just seemed to me to be common sense. But we also had other Chinese posts. We had our embassy in Taiwan then. I had visited it while on board the USS Atlanta when it was a Consulate General. We had Chinese language officers stationed in Singapore and various other places. We had talks going on with the Chinese in Geneva and then Warsaw. Later I was to be the counselor for those talks and write the instructions for them for four years. It just seemed to me it was an important enough place to have more attention paid to it.

Q: While you were doing this, this is pretty early on in terms of our developing a China corps. Were there any characteristics of the new China hands that you could see at that time?

DEAN: No, it was hard to see. In fact, in my own class, my friend Paul Popple had gone to the Chinese language school in the class before mine, and others who I came to know went there. My own class was a very mixed group. Some were from the agency. One was more interested in consular work rather than political or economic work and went on to specialize as a consular officer. One was an economic officer, but he left the service after awhile; he got fed up with it. Initially there were five of us. Four of them were left-handed. I was the only right-handed person in my class. It was difficult at Chinese dinners because our chopsticks would duel with each other.

Q: You say you were getting outstanding scholars, that Doak Barnett was bringing them in. What was the picture you were getting of China at this point?

DEAN: A pretty clear picture I think. Most people realized that Mao had purged the landlords, that there had been an enormous number of executions and deaths. They realized that he had first given the land back to the peasants and then took it back again from them. They realized that he was ruthless, that our own relationship was very poor, that China had forged a relationship with the Soviet Union, which at that point had not started to crack apart although a lot of people like John Fairbank said it would because they believed the Chinese leadership would eventually reject the Russians. I think they had a pretty clear idea of China. It wasn't a rosy picture by any means. It is just that there wasn't enough information, I think, to give one more than a general picture.

Q: Not too long before there had been the McCarthy attack on the China Hands. At the time you were talking about, was this something that you were all looking over your shoulders or was the topic of conversation or concern?

DEAN: Sure. I wasn't looking over my shoulders. I think all the people I spoke to were indignant about McCarthy and felt that it was really the fault of our own government to allow something like that to happen, one of the weaknesses of our government and the weakness of his colleagues in the Senate. Of course he eventually was discredited. By that time, by '56, he had gone.

Q: But what about with China, this is during the Eisenhower administration, Walter Robinson was in charge.

DEAN: Yes, he was very pro-Taiwan you see. He knew and liked the madam, Madam Chiang Kai-shek, and the Generalissimo. He was a strong defender of the GRC (government of the Republic of China), but there were other strong defenders as well, such as Walter Judd, whom I later came to know and to like very much. We weren't on the same political wavelength, but he was a really nice man. He had been a medical missionary in China. He developed his political point of view from the circumstances in which he had lived, and he kept the same points of view until he died. Just the same, he was a very fine person and very good friend. I didn't know him at that time, and I didn't know a lot of the other Foreign Service officers who had served in China, some who had come under McCarthy's fire. Even Doak Barnett: the State Department wouldn't give Doak Barnett a permanent clearance. His brother Bob served in the State Department for many years, and both were suspect during the McCarthy period because of their views and contacts. Very unfair.

Q: Again, trying to capture the period when you were taking Chinese at the FSI, what was your impression of the situation on Taiwan, the Kuomintang and Chiang Kai-shek?

DEAN: It is hard to say. We spent much of our time studying very hard. Some of our speakers would talk about what was happening in Taiwan. Some of the people from the Department would tell us about conditions there. It didn't seem to be very gripping to tell the truth. Not a lot was happening in Taiwan at that time. It is true that later on the offshore island crisis occurred, but that was a couple of years later. Our relationship with Taiwan had already been firmed. We all read the White Paper, read all the background documents. We knew that our government had intended to let the chips fall where they may as far as the Generalissimo and his government were concerned when he left the mainland and came over to Taiwan. It wasn't until the outbreak of the Korean War that brought the government of the Republic of China back into the fold again and caused the Seventh Fleet to patrol the Taiwan Strait to help protect them. It wasn't until then that a very close relationship began to develop. By 1957, the relationship had become very close. But people in the Department were divided. Most were very positively in favor of Taiwan and very negatively disposed toward the mainland because it was communist and allied with the Soviets. That was the prevailing cold war view. I remember going in to the old East Asia Bureau and saying, "Why don't we start something going with the mainland?" They said, Shhhh. Don't let anybody hear you say that."

Q: I know. I came into the Foreign Service in '55 and had nothing to do with that area except having been an enlisted man in Korea during the war, but you know, it just made sense. You have got China sitting over there and that is what diplomacy is all about. Talk to them.

DEAN: We were talking to them you know. At that time talks were continuing in Geneva. We were talking to them, but it wasn't getting anywhere. Both sides were just talking past each other. There was some prospect of getting an agreement on the renunciation of force, but we were afraid to accept it. Now the roles are reversed. We are trying to get them to accept a renunciation of force and they won't. Against Taiwan, I mean. For myself, although I was thinking and hearing and reading about these things, I really wasn't focused on them as I was trying to learn more Chinese and reading more about the background of China and its history in the civil war then on current conditions. I was spending a lot of time focused on that, and not as much, I would say, on policy. Indeed we students weren't involved in policy at all in those days. That was also true later when we went out to the language school in Taichung where I studied for a couple of years.

Q: You went out to Taichung at the end of '56.

DEAN: No I stayed in Washington at FSI for six months and then went out to Taichung in July of '57, for two years.

Q: You were learning basic mandarin weren't you?

DEAN: That's right.

Q: What was the atmosphere like in '57-'59 in Taichung?

DEAN: Our Embassy had been sacked by the Chinese in early 1957 because a MAAG [Military Army Advisory Group] jury found a U.S. serviceman not guilty of a killing, but better relations were quickly restored.

Q: MAAG is military assistance advisory group.

DEAN: Yes, but our languages school didn't have a great deal to do with our embassy or MAAG. The Chinese were expanding the CCK [Chiang China-kuo] airfield near Taichung with American contractors, so they were there in some numbers. The atmosphere was tense because the communists had bombarded the offshore island of Quemoy and Matsu in 1958 and the U.S. Seventh fleet broke the blockade. The head of the language school, Howard Levy, tried to keep us focused on the Chinese community as much as possible in order to learn more Chinese. He introduced us to many Chinese officials. Some were retired mainland officials who had come over in 1949. Some were scholars; some were local officials. Or, we would go off and spend a week at one of the universities living there and talking to the students and the professors. Levy tried to get us to interact as much as possible with the Chinese society. Then, of course, we had our lessons, and we did what reading we could in addition. We really concentrated on the Chinese language and our studies to the exclusion of contacts with the Americans or the Embassy. Occasionally we would get a visitor from the Embassy, but very rarely. Occasionally we would get an inspection team coming by, but that was our only contact with officialdom. We were left to ourselves and our studies. People worked very hard.

Q: Were your Chinese teachers in a way sort of pushing the Taiwanese line?

DEAN: No. The teachers mostly were from the mainland, mostly from Shantung. The reason we used them is that they were mainlanders who had come over to Taiwan in 1948 and they had the same mandarin accent as people in north China. People in Taiwan speak a Minnan dialect which comes from southern Fujian. Their forefathers came over from southern Fujian two or three hundred years ago. They were fisher-folk who settled down and became farmers and gradually prospered. They are the basic population. There is an aboriginal population which lived in the mountains who were the earliest inhabitants. There are perhaps only three or four hundred thousand of them left. But, 85% or more of the population of Taiwan are these Taiwanese whose forefathers came over from Fujian. The teachers at the school spoke the Mandarin dialect from northern China, which is the dialect we learned. We didn't have anyone at that time speaking the Taiwanese dialect. This was a great mistake. Even the Chinese officials, the mainland officials who occupied all the jobs in government, local and central, didn't speak Taiwanese. Only one. I met, a vice minister of foreign trade who told me he spoke Taiwanese. He made a point of learning it. He said he was the only official he knew of who spoke Taiwanese. This of course was in the mid-'60s when he said that. But it was true. It is a difficult language in the first place even for mandarin speakers. There were some mainlanders who had come from Fujian who naturally spoke the dialect, but very few.

Q: Were you getting any impression of the KMT government?

DEAN: Sure. There were lots of impressions. We lived in Japanese houses that the Japanese had built for their officials, with tatami floors and with little gardens. They were quite nice houses on the broad unpaved street, with no telephone. There was one telephone at the director's house which was way down at the end of the street. Naturally no television. On the next street down there was a general under house arrest, named General Sun Li-ren. He had been accused of conspiring against the Generalissimo and plotting a coup. This was not true as it later turned out, but he had been sentenced to house arrest. He did stay there most of the time, but they gave him a chance to get out, and occasionally we would see him playing tennis on public tennis courts with his guards. We never met him but we knew about him and we knew the circumstances. We also heard about General Sun from some of our teachers who weren't too sympathetic to the mainland government. There were one or two of them, even though they were from Shantung, who had come to Taiwan earlier and had been protected by the Taiwanese when there was such a wave of hatred against the mainlanders after the incident of February 28, 1947, when there was an uprising. The mainlanders put it down brutally, killing over 20,000 people. Some say as many as 30,000 people were executed. So, there was no love lost between the Taiwanese and the mainlanders. One of our teachers described the circumstances, having been there then. This was ten years earlier, but it burned deeply in his memory. To this day, the incident is a governing force in politics in Taiwan. Anyway, with those undercurrents, we knew that the security forces would come in and break down people's doors and drag people away in the middle of the night, imprison them, execute them for alleged communist sympathies or other acts. So, we knew what kind of a society it was. On the other hand, we had a lot of friends among the local populace, mostly mainlanders, because they were the officials, and they were the educated people. A certain group of Taiwanese had been educated in Japan by the Japanese, mostly doctors and engineers, during their occupation. but they hadn't established universities in Taiwan. The Japanese built up the infrastructure, the agriculture output was designated for Japan. Taiwan was a breadbasket for Japan during the war years and before. We knew what the score was at any rate. There was a Sino-American friendship society, but all the members were mainlanders, mostly generals and officials. We become very close friends with some of them. To this day, one of our closest friends was then in charge of the armored brigade in the Taichung area. That must have been 45 years ago. He and his wife attended our Taiwan born son Tom's Man Yue Party in 1958. We have been to the Hu children's weddings, and to all sorts of family birthdays, and affairs like that. Even last December, I went to Mrs. Hu's 80th birthday in Taipei, with her whole family present. So we got to know some people very well indeed and became very close.

Q: What about this '57-'59, I'm not sure exactly but I think the great leap forward was underway at that time, were we getting much in the way of information?

DEAN: Later I found out more about developments in China because after two years in Taichung, I went to Hong Kong and was in charge of our economic section analyzing developments on the mainland. In '57 the Hundred Flowers Bloom campaign had been launched by Mao Zedong. But he found the criticism was too intense, so he stopped it and purged all of those who had been rash enough to criticize him. Then he began his commune system, taking agriculture producer cooperatives and forming them into large communes. Then he began the Great Leap Forward program, trying to substitute manpower for capital investment. In other words, he was trying to use labor instead of capital investment, to lift China off its feet and move it into a new economic era. People were melting down all sorts of slag in backyard furnaces, none of it usable, and being drafted for projects elsewhere and leaving the old men and women to work in agriculture. They were told to deep plow. They broke through the fields where you would have your rice growing, usually very thick clay, they would break through the bottom with their deep plowing and all their water would run off. They had a terrible time. But I'm getting a little ahead of myself.

Q: It wasn't overly apparent was it?

DEAN: Not at first, because in Taichung we were really sort of isolated. We weren't in the thick of what was going on. We knew of the offshore crisis, the communist attack on the islands of Quemoy and Matsu had taken place. Tensions rose, and people were concerned that this would be the beginning of an attack on Taiwan itself. But then the Seventh Fleet came in and broke the blockade and Taiwan was able to re-supply its soldiers on Quemoy so that crisis died down. We had earlier signed a mutual security treaty with Taiwan in 1954 after an attack on Little Quemoy. In a sense, under that treaty, we were obligated to help them although there was a big argument, later made famous by Nixon and Kennedy in their 1960 debates for the presidency, about whether our treaty should cover these offshore islands. There was a Formosa Resolution and all sorts of argument about this point. It is really hard to tell you how isolated we were in the language school from matters of policy.

Q: Were alarm bells ringing during the Formosa Strait crisis for you all too? Were you thinking maybe we are going to be in the middle of an invasion?

DEAN: We polished up our evacuation plan to try to decide how to evacuate our families, just as we had in Kuala Lumpur. In Kuala Lumpur we had a great big bag full of gold coins and some machetes we planned to give our people. We were planing to go through some of the jungle paths over to the other side of Malaysia. It was a very foolish plan. You would never be able to get people across. I don't know if you ever read Neville Schute's book A Town Named Alice. Anyway this is about captives of the Japanese going across Malaysia and the travails they went through. We never would have been able to use this plan. Anyway there was a similar plan for Taichung. I think that had us going up the mountains to the silver line trail along the plateau and coming down into Hualin. Of course, that is okay if people are pretty fit. I have gone up that trail two or three times, but it is very steep. If you were thinking about carrying little kids, Mary and I had two by then, and any food supplies, to say nothing of clothing, it would have been an almost hopeless task, but at least we had a plan. So there was some thinking as far as that went about evacuation.

Q: When you were getting out in '59, oh, by the way, besides language studies were you having any of what might be called area studies?

DEAN: No it was almost completely language with good concentration and excellent teachers. People who finished the course had a very good working knowledge, I think, of Chinese, at least a three plus, but of course, you needed more. Anyway we had good teachers, good morale and a good school. I went from there to Hong Kong.

Q: Did you have any choice or where did you want to go?

DEAN: I don't know whether I had any choice or not. I was assigned to Hong Kong and was happy to go there.

Q: Hong Kong was the pre-eminent China watching place wasn't it?

DEAN: That's right and that is the job I got, in the economic section. My friend Paul Popple, it happens, was the head of that section. Later he left and I took his place.

Q: By the way, you were there from '59 to...

DEAN: '62. That was a fascinating time because I did get involved in what was happening on the mainland and saw the results of the Hundred Flowers Bloom campaign.

I also saw the results of the commune policy and of the Great Leap Forward, which was an abject failure. Coupled with very bad weather, it created famine conditions in many parts of China. There was a steady stream of refugees coming into Hong Kong. One of our jobs was to study the refugee interviews that the British special branch conducted and to find out about conditions in China. Most of these people were refugees for economic reasons; it wasn't for political reasons. It was because of their livelihood; they had none and they had to find some way of feeding their families. Literally thousands and thousands of refugees came into Hong Kong until it got so bad that in 1962 the British army and the police put up barbed wire to keep people out as they just couldn't take any more. People were swimming across the bay, trying to avoid the sharks, trying to get smuggled in by so-called snake boats. They were trying everything.

Once they touched base in those days, they were home free. The British would not expel them if they landed. That wasn't true later.

Q: Can you talk a bit about how the economic section worked, I mean what you were looking at in China and how you were getting your information?

DEAN: We got our information from a whole series of sources. We produced a translation of the Chinese press. It was quite an elaborate group that translated articles of interest from various papers. We'd get those papers from all sorts of places, even from the market, a fish wrapped in paper. It might be an old provincial newspaper which we could use. We did a big translation service of the Chinese press and distributed it to universities and academicians and others for their research, too. Later we had to charge them for it, but at that time I believe it was free. Then we used the FBIS translations of Chinese radio, the Foreign Broadcast Information Service. That was based on Okinawa and we got a lot of their published material. Then we used, as I said, the Special Branch reports of the refugees, and we tried to use whatever other sources of information we could get. I would say that our general overall assessment of what was going on in China was reasonably accurate. It may not have been specifically accurate, but it was reasonably accurate for the economy in the various provinces. We had a very good agricultural officer, Bryce Meeker, who worked with us. He was really expert. He had been in Hungary during the Soviet invasion of Hungary. Later, he was to go on to Russia. He was very capable and hard working, and he added a great deal to our assessment. A lot of the problem really wasn't in the industry but was in the agriculture sector and he followed those developments very carefully. We followed also their foreign trade such as it was at that time. Of course, we had this stricture against Americans buying anything from China so we had a Treasury official in Hong Kong, Charlie DeSevalas, who made sure that everyone at the consulate general or even the public, Americans living in Hong Kong, knew the Treasury Department strictures against buying things from China. I would say it was an exciting period for us because, although a lot of what we did was analytical, we did see enough people who had been in China for one reason or another and we had enough sources of information to put together a pretty good picture of what was happening. Of course we liaised with Australian intelligence and British intelligence, and we had a very large contingent of CIA [Central Intelligence Agency] in our consulate general. The consulate general was huge, with a staff of several hundred Americans and Chinese.

Q: Who was the Consul General at that post?

DEAN: Well, there were different Consul Generals from 1959-63. Marshall Green was Consul General for part of the time and then Julius Holmes was Consul General for part of the time. My wife had worked before we were married in London for Julius Holmes, so she knew him quite well. She was his secretary there. So we became very friendly with him and with Marshall Green, too. They were interested in what was happening on the mainland, and our section was putting out a great deal of the information.

Q: In many ways what you were putting out, the economic side was the real story wasn't it?

DEAN: Yes it was, but there was a problem here because a lot of people, analysts back in Washington, were believing the Chinese claims about their economic success during the Great

Leap Forward. We were debunking these claims, you see, so there was a certain amount of tension between those people who thought China was doing just marvelously and those who knew from talking to people who had seen the situation that it was doing very poorly, in fact tragically. It wasn't until later that the numbers of 30-40 million people dying during this period were confirmed. It was very interesting. There were lots of good newspapermen. Joe Alsop was there hovering around thinking China was going to break up because of the crisis resulting from the failure of the Great Leap Forward. Stan Karnow was there with Time Magazine, Jerry Schecter, Bob Elegant, all of whom later became quite well known, all writing about what was happening in China. The focus of our Consulate General was really on China although we were negotiating with Hong Kong on the first textile agreement limiting the shipment of textiles to the U.S. We negotiated that. Our economic section had two parts. One was the China analysis section, the other dealing with Hong Kong issues. Then, later I became head of both of these sections. We dealt a lot with the British government on textile restraints and a lot of other issues. Of course at that time, our navy was using Hong Kong as an R and R base. Navy ships were always in port and as a result, we had very good relationships with the British military. They were very hospitable to our men and we would always go around to the functions they hosted. It was a very lively scene at that time. I think more and more people were concentrating on China. I remember one of my friends was a British police officer, who later became a civil servant. In '62, the police were busy trying to keep Chinese refugees out of Hong Kong. He was involved in that effort, trying to keep people out and also interrogating people. Later on, in '66, he was abducted by a radical group during the Cultural Revolution, which, in spite of orders from Peking, was spilling over into Hong Kong. The Hong Kong government got him back, I think, with an apology, but it was a tense time for him and for his family and friends.

Q: I wonder right now, I am reading this book by Dr. Lee on the personal life of Chairman Mao. In a way you find it incredible, going to something like the backyard furnaces. They were melting down pots and really not turning it into anything. You have the feeling that nobody was able to ask the question, well, this is all fine but what does this mean? Were you wondering about the thought process of these people who were going so crazy?

DEAN: Yes. You see, Mao Zedong was great for theory but terrible for practice, partially because his theories were so bent. That book will indicate, if you have gotten far into it, that he was like the Chinese emperor. No one would dare approach him with a complaint or criticism. Frankly, they were even reluctant to approach him to ask him for instructions. Once he laid down the general line, they would go out and scurry and try to do what they thought he meant, and lots of people just didn't know. It is a most amazing book. I would suspect, based on what little I know, it is fairly accurate.

Q: I am told you knew there were some problems, but I was wondering, here is a China watcher, you are looking at these people who are considered the Han race, great merchants and all this - it is as though they have gone nuts.

DEAN: Well, some of the Chinese knew this. For instance, in '62, Peng Dehui, who was one of their most famous marshals, objected to what they were doing. He said the statistics everybody was putting out from the communes and from the factories were just unbelievable. During that time Mao dismissed the whole state statistical bureau because it had also objected, but Peng Dehui was a very important official. However, he was purged in an anti-rightist campaign. Even though he was purged, others of similar view, like Liu Shaoqi, who very soon took over from Mao as the president, also believed that the Great Leap Forward was a terrible mistake. Later on, Liu was purged for his views. A lot of people in China understood, just as we did in Hong Kong, that things were going crazy. It was just a terrible waste and a terrible tragedy. We knew that and reported it. I think gradually people came to understand, even in China, that it was just dreadful. There was a period around '64 when the rightists had come back in after the anti-rightist campaign that had dismissed Peng Dehui, but then they got purged themselves. That is a later story.

Q: Could you talk about the problem back in Washington. I mean, there were talks about how well the Chinese were able to mobilize, in the United States, mobilize all their people and maybe they are on to something, even barefoot doctors.

DEAN: People thought they might be on to something but, you see, I think that it was wholly inaccurate and based on just wishful thinking and not on the facts. People who had consulted any of our reports knew they wouldn't succeed. Of course we couldn't prove that what maybe 1,000 people said in their debriefings was accurate, that they portrayed developments in the rest of China. It is like picking up a handful of sand and counting the grains and wondering if they can count for the whole country. But it was an indicator. Also the provincial newspapers were indicators, as were the reports of visitors.

Q: Did you find some people in the academic world or the political world wondering maybe "This is pretty marvelous?" There is always this love affair between the United States and China.

DEAN: You always get some people who believe that. Sometimes people draw up their opinions without enough facts to substantiate them. You are always getting differences of opinion in the China field. Look at today. So, that has been sort of normal, since 1949. I think that, looking back on that time, our Consulate General people did a very good job of using what information they had to project an analysis of what was going on. And, we had good relations with the Hong Kong government and the intelligence services., so we were able not only to carry out our analysis of the mainland but also our mostly economic work pertaining to Hong Kong.

Q: What about in this '59-'62 period, you did have the election of 1960. One always thinks of Nixon and Kennedy and the Quemoy debates. When one looks back, I can't remember who was doing what or why it was such an issue, but it was one of those things that cropped up. Did that play at all with you?

DEAN: No, it didn't really seem to have too much resonance. Most people felt that Kennedy had won that debate primarily because of the way Nixon looked. I mean he had very poor make up and a dismal look, so it wasn't really the substance that made Kennedy win, it was the PR part. When Kennedy came in, there was some thought that he might be thinking of changing policy toward China, but if he had been thinking of it, nothing came out of it. There wasn't, as far as I know, much going on. The reason for that rumor is that Walter McConaughy was the Assistant Secretary for East Asia Affairs at that time. I worked for him later. He is a fine gentleman, but he was thought of as being a very strong supporter of Taiwan. He was moved from his job. I think Roger Hilsman was put in his place. It was thought that the move was part of a rethinking the China policy. If my recollection is correct, that is what gave some credibility to those rumors.

Q: Someone in one of these oral histories said, and this is of course third hand, that Eisenhower when he talked to Kennedy after Kennedy was elected said, you know in international affairs I am going to support you. If you make a move toward China, I'm not going to. I don't know if there is any truth to that, but Kennedy really won the election by a hair and wasn't really very adventurous on this.

DEAN: I guess he inherited the Bay of Pigs. Of course, it took place on his watch, but I think it was already in train. But, I don't know if you would call Vietnam adventurous or not.

Q: No, it was sort of a reaction.

DEAN: Maybe he inherited that, too.

Q: Yes, Dien Bien Phu was in '54, but I mean things sort of grew, it wasn't as though he...

DEAN: But that is how all these international crises develop. They just don't usually flare up unformed; they take root, and they gradually appear.

Q: Well, you were somewhat removed, but did the enthusiasm for government and all that that came with Kennedy, infuse the Foreign Service where you were or were you just too far away and too...

DEAN: I think it was an uplifting time. People felt hopeful about the future. I'm not talking about just China policy but the future in general. To a lot of youth, it was a breath of fresh air; people felt that this was a good omen for the future, but I don't think it affected our day by day work or changed anything in Hong Kong.

Q: What about Hong Kong and these textile agreements? Hong Kong by this time had reached the stage where textiles seem to be a moveable thing going to poor areas.

DEAN: Before then, you see, when the communists took over on the mainland in 1949, many of the Shanghai textile magnates moved down to Hong Kong. Very fortunately, a lot of the new equipment they had ordered was on the high seas, and they had it diverted to Hong Kong, so they were able to start business right away. They built up an enormous business to a point where our economists were worrying a great deal about the flood of textiles that were coming into the States and driving our own textile industries out of business. So, we focused on Asia, although a lot of the textiles were coming from Italy and other places. We concentrated on Hong Kong and decided on an agreement that would limit the amount of increase of Hong Kong textile exports per year. After a lot of heartburn in Hong Kong, because the textile magnates there didn't want to be limited, the British decided they would sign an agreement for doing this. They gave quotas to each of the textile manufacturers. Those quotas have been bought and sold in subsequent years. It has worked very well except that a lot of these businesses established factories in Thailand or Taiwan or other places, even Africa, and started manufacturing textiles for export to the United States. In a way, we may have cured the Hong Kong problem but then we had to make textile agreements with Korea and Thailand and everybody else. It is like suddenly 1,000 heads were springing up and you have to deal with all of them.

Q: When you were doing this at this time, you were dealing with the British, and how were the British dealing with the magnates who were mostly Chinese?

DEAN: That is right. We were dealing mostly with the British. They usually would have some Chinese staff too. In their legislative counsel or executive council meetings, they would have several Chinese bankers as well as prominent businessmen. They would discuss these things to the nth degree. Gradually the British were able to persuade everybody that there was no alternative, that they had to do this, and in the long run, it wouldn't be bad because they had a guaranteed increase. That has worked quite well for them. So, the industry prospered. They didn't overproduce; they knew what the limits were and they ran up to them. They would negotiate with us frequently on different categories, taking things from one category and putting them into another or expanding the categories; gloves, hats, different sports apparel. So, they did very well with the textile agreements. It seems restrictive and against free trade on the basis of it, but in many ways it benefitted their industry.

Q: Did the dynamics here, the British were doing the negotiating, did you had the feeling that the Hong Kong Chinese merchants were part of the process.

DEAN: Yes, they had to bring them into some of the negotiations. We dealt with the British Director of Commerce and Industry and with the Financial Secretary and with the Chief Secretary. I think that negotiations were pretty hard, but from our point of view, they were successful. John Lacey, my predecessor, did a lot of these negotiations. He was very even tempered and kept to our position and wore the others down. Eventually they saw the light.

Q: I thought we might stop at this point, and we'll pick it up next time when you are leaving Hong Kong in 1962. Where did you go?

DEAN: I came back to the Department.

Q: You left Hong Kong and you came back to Washington. What job did you have?

DEAN: I was a desk officer in the Office of Asian Communist Affairs in the East Asian Bureau. Asian communist affairs had the responsibility of following developments in China and in North Korea and in North Vietnam, and also Mongolia.

Q: You were doing this at the beginning of each session from 1962 to when?

DEAN: '66.

Q: '66, a good solid time.

DEAN: I started out as one of the desk officers. Later I became the officer in charge of Mainland China affairs. Then I became deputy of the office and then acting head of the office during this four year period.

Q: Did you have a piece of either North Korea or North Vietnam or was it all China?

DEAN: Mostly China, but we had everything. I had China at first, but later took North Vietnam and North Korea. Of course, the focus at that time was both on China and North Vietnam.

Q: Why don't we talk about China first and then move to North Vietnam. We have already talked about it before, but when you came back, how were developments in China seen and what were developments in China?

DEAN: Well, it was a very curious period from '62 to '66. 1962 saw the end of the Great Leap Forward and the beginning of the rightist movement. I should say the anti-rightist movement. People like General Peng Dehui, who had protested about the Great Leap Forward, said it was just a terrible waste. Of course, the country was suffering a great deal because besides taking all the able bodied men from the agriculture sector, leaving old men and women and children to work there, they also suffered from three bad years of weather so there was widespread hunger and serious famine in some places. Later on we learned that between 30 and 40 million people died during this period. So, General Peng Dehui and others felt very strongly that Mao's policies were wrong and they protested. They were able to end the Great Leap Forward, proving that it was a disaster, but they suffered for being correct. Mao was able to purge them, so this was the anti-rightist movement of 1962. But, in spite of the fact that there was an anti-rightist movement and Peng DeHui was purged, people who had similar views, Liu Shaoqi, Deng Xiaoping, and others formed a group in the bureaucracy that also supported Peng Dehui's position, and they gradually gained more influence to the point where Mao Zedong felt more and more threatened. It was then at the end of '65 and beginning of '66 that he launched the Cultural Revolution. We were following these developments, the purging of Peng Dehui and the formation of this coalition around Liu Shaoqi and Deng Xiaoping, an anti-Maoist coalition, so we used all the information that Hong Kong provided and other sources to try to analyze what was happening in the mainland and to decide what our policy should be.

Q: Now 30 years later we are all over China, lots of books are coming out and all that, but looking back, how well do you think we understood the forces within China and the role of Mao at that time?

DEAN: I think we had a very general idea, not a specific one, but we had a lot of sources: their own broadcasts, their own newspapers, the attacks against individuals, the purges. This gave us a pretty fair idea of what was happening in China. As I say, it wasn't until some time later that we knew the extent of the damage of the Great Leap Forward and the effort to remove ownership of the land from the peasants. They had given them ownership of the land shortly after 1949, but then they took it away and formed these smaller agriculture producer cooperatives, then the larger ones, and then the people's communes. This time and the Great Leap Forward coincided. Both proved to be disastrous ventures.

Q: I'm wondering not just to capture the mindset in Washington but in the academic community. I suspect at the time there is a tendency to say maybe the Chinese are right for the Chinese. Maybe they are on to something. It turned out they weren't.

DEAN: That wasn't our tendency but in European and some academic quarters and some government quarters, there was a tendency to say the Chinese were really substituting labor for capital investment and pushing ahead to industrialize China in a very rapid way. We knew from my experience in Hong Kong seeing the refugees and the reports that had revealed conditions in China, of the utter impossibility of their claims about agricultural production, and we knew from attacks on various members of their own elite in Hong Kong that things were in very bad shape. Granted our analysis was very general, but our views in Washington at the desk were similar. I don't believe we had any false expectations about what was happening in China, in fact, quite the opposite. Nevertheless, we still felt that we had to deal with the Chinese, and one of my jobs was to write the instructions for the Warsaw talks with the Chinese. I wrote them for the first couple of years and then I would go to Warsaw every month to advise, first Ambassador Cabot and then Ambassador Gronouski in the actual talks with the Chinese. We gradually tried to change the tenor of these talks.

Q: Could you explain what the Warsaw talks were?

DEAN: These talks were started initially in Geneva with Ambassador U. Alexis Johnson. They came about through an agreement between Zhou En-lai and John Foster Dulles in 1954. We started talks in Geneva with the objective of trying to get the Chinese to renounce the use of force against Taiwan and to try to get some newspapermen, academicians, and other types of exchanges with the Chinese. They always said in those talks that the subject of Taiwan would have to be resolved before they could advance other aspects of the bilateral relationship. This is very interesting, and there is some new research. Jay Taylor, who has just written a new biography of Chiang Ching-kuo has found that initially the Chinese were willing to renounce the use of force. U. Alexis Johnson sent telegrams to the Department that are now public saying he recommended that this be accepted. It was too all embracing for Washington, so they turned it down. Later on we came back to a more narrow definition of the renunciation of the use of force against Taiwan. It is very interesting to speculate what might have happened had we come to an agreement much earlier with the Chinese about the renunciation of the use of force. But we didn't and we spent a lot of time and effort. The talks become quite sterile. We would say our piece and they would say theirs. They would issue the 272nd serious warning about over flights by American planes of the Chinese mainland and we would pay no attention.

Q: They were actually U-2's piloted by Taiwanese weren't they?

DEAN: Not necessarily. Some were flights by our own planes and some were the Chinese Nationalist patrols that were going up and down the Strait. U-2's were more for intelligence gathering. These others were the normal patrols in the Strait to maintain their air superiority and also to see if anything was developing on the coast. Sometimes they would fly too closely inland and we would get another serious warning. The talks were not getting anywhere. The Chinese wanted to resolve Taiwan first; we wanted to exchange newspapermen and academicians.

Q: What about people in prison. We had at least two. Could you talk about Americans in prison there and what we were trying to do about that?

DEAN: There were many American citizens still in prison, religious leaders, and also some people left there from the Korean War, and others who had been on intelligence missions and who had been imprisoned when their plane had crashed. I went to the border when I was in Hong Kong to greet Bishop Walsh. Bishop Walsh was released from prison after being held since 1949.

Q: This was about when?

DEAN: If my memory serves me correctly, this would have been in 1962. Bishop Walsh was a really remarkable man. He was bedridden but later recovered. He had been in prison for many years, since '49. There were many others like him, who claimed American citizenship. Later on they were to suffer a lot more because of the Cultural Revolution. At the time I was in Warsaw the talks had been moved from Geneva. They were held in a small Polish palace in a park. We would come in; the Chinese would come in. When I first got there, neither side would acknowledge the other; they would sit down and start their talks. When I got there, after I had spoken to Bill Bundy who was the Assistant Secretary, we tried very hard to change the atmosphere of the talks, to shake hands and begin to change the language. Instead of referring to their "regime," we referred to their government." We got rid of a lot of pejorative expressions in an effort to make it a little more civil. I also started to go over to the Chinese Embassy at the end of each talk or on the following day to see if there had been any problems with the translation (each side translated their own Ambassador's talk) to see if there were any questions or anything like that, but it was mostly an ice breaking type of situation. We tried quite hard to get some agreement on newsmen and on academic exchange saying if it was difficult to solve these major problems, why don't we put them to one side and go on with more practical ones in the interim. We didn't stage any breakthroughs, but we did change the atmosphere quite a bit. These talks were electronically bugged. One of our security men had his van a few blocks away, and he picked up the talks on his radio. We knew the Polish government was listening but plainly the Russians wanted to make sure the Poles told them the exact truth, so they had installed their own bugs in the chandeliers, so the talks were actually broadcast at least to a small circle around the palace. I think that things began to get a little better, but then the Cultural Revolution broke out, and that prevented any type of movement at all by the Chinese.

Q: When one looks at this whole thing, the Kissinger breakthrough, in a way it wasn't a matter of initiative on our part, it was really the Chinese just weren't ready for this sort of thing. I mean the thought of Americans having relations with China during the Cultural Revolution during the height of it is almost impossible to envisage.

DEAN: No, I think we were doing our best in the period from '62 to '66, but the Cultural Revolution broke out in 1966. There were too many tensions within the Chinese government. Later on, one of the reasons I think they were receptive was the Soviet action against Czechoslovakia in '67. This caused enormous consternation in China because they, of course, thought they might be another victim of the Soviets. It was at this time, or a little before, that they began digging underground shelters underneath Beijing, Shanghai and other cities. I went down into one later; it was a complete underground city. They were building them with the idea that this would protect their people from Soviet nuclear warfare. They had air purifiers and everything. They had flour mills down there, hospitals, dormitories, workshops, all sorts of things. They were really quite large. Of course, it would not have stood up against nuclear warfare of the kind they had in mind, but it shows you how much labor was involved in all these places. Digging so many underground cities was unbelievable. They did it for fear of the Soviet Union.

Q: Now we are talking about constraints on the Chinese because in '62-'66 they are sort of sorting things out, moving from the Great Leap Forward to their rightist movement and Mao is sort of glowering in his cabana by the swimming pool, and then he came back with the Cultural Revolution.

DEAN: Mao was locked in a power struggle with Liu Shaoqi and with Deng Xiaoping and the party bureaucracy, and in fact he did lose the presidency. He kept the chairmanship but he lost the presidency to Liu Shaoqi during this period. Mao was determined to purge Liu and Deng, also who supported him, as well as anyone else who opposed him.

Q: Did we have a fix on Liu Shaoqi and Deng Xiaoping and that sort of thing?

DEAN: Yes, I mean they had been very prominent, it was very clear. The only thing that wasn't clear was Deng Xiaoping's position; whether he was fully in Liu's camp or whether he was staying with Zhou En-lai somewhere in the center or had moved over to the left. We didn't know that; we didn't know the exact manipulations Mao was making. We didn't know for sure, but we knew there was a power struggle going on. Liu had been purged and arrested. We knew that Deng had been purged. We knew that many people at the top felt that the Great Leap Forward was a disaster and it was Mao's fault. It was not clear in 1966 where things were going to go, and we didn't predict the outbreak of the Cultural Revolution. I don't think anybody predicted that.

Q: What about constraints on our side because during the Eisenhower period, in a way one has the feeling that the China policy was tossed to the rightists in our Senate and you had Robertson and all who were going to make sure we weren't going to go anywhere with China. It was a pretty rigid China policy I would characterize. Then you came back here in '62 under Kennedy and Johnson. Within the East Asian Bureau, were you picking up a feeling of, well maybe now we can do something?

DEAN: I think when Kennedy was elected and assumed the presidency, the East Asian Bureau thought he was going to make some overtures toward China and to change our policy. I would like to think it is true, that he had been thinking of this, and he changed the leadership of East Asia and the Pacific Bureau. I'm not positive about this, but it was thought that he was interested in going ahead. But then he stopped. There were too many other problems. There was Cuba and there was the burgeoning Vietnam situation, so we didn't move ahead. Then when he was killed in '63, I was back in Washington. I remember when I hear about it. I went to get a hair cut at the barbershop. Elwood Williams, who was a friend of my brother's on the German desk, told me about it. Kennedy's death ended the prospect of any movement. I don't think that Lyndon Johnson ( whom I got to know a little better later), was on the verge of doing anything, so things were certainly in abeyance at that time. Vietnam began to take a much more prominent role in the work of the State Department and in our work and in the government's work. I would have to go around, for example to many schools and universities and colleges talking about the administration's position on Vietnam. The students told me that the President was lying and the government's position on Vietnam was wrong, all of which was part of the early stages of campus unrest and opposition to our Vietnam policies, so it was very difficult to talk to people.

Q: Sort of our cultural revolution.

DEAN: Yes. It was a very difficult period. It was almost impossible to explain the government's position particularly since I, myself, felt it was questionable whether we would be able to impose a solution on the Vietnamese people. I felt that quite strongly. In fact, I went over to the Joint Chiefs of Staff and participated in several studies at the time to see what we could do against the North Vietnamese. I was opposed all the time to the use of U.S. armies being sent into North Vietnam because I felt that it would bring the Chinese in with even greater force. The Chinese were already involved; they had already been manning missile, batteries, and other anti-aircraft batteries. They already had battalions of troops on road-making duty in North Vietnam. Later on I found, from a graduate student who was getting his Ph.D. at Peking University, that during the course of the Vietnam War, the Chinese had something like 900,000 troops in North Vietnam, mostly doing road-building and anti-aircraft, not all at one time, but at various times during the course of the war. Anyway, my feeling was that if we sent U.S. ground forces into North Vietnam, the Chinese would respond. And so, of course the studies went further than that. I would repeat that the Chinese would respond and naturally the subject of nuclear weapons would come up. I had to take footnotes protesting some of these reports as I felt that the use of tactical nuclear weapons would not deter the Chinese. Mao said that China had about a billion people and if they lost half of them, they would still have 500 million. Even if we devastated them and used other than tactical nuclear weapons, this would be a festering sore, not just the question of the use of nuclear weapons, but on the Chinese themselves. It would be a festering sore and eventually they would recover their economy and their people, and then they would be an enemy forever. It seemed to me it was wiser not to spread the war. Some, like Ambassador Graham Martin, didn't think the Chinese would come in. Of course, I didn't know, but I was almost positive that they would feel that they would have to. Anyway as you know, instead we bombed North Vietnam, Cambodia and Laos.

Q: We are talking about U. S. ground troops in North Vietnam because that was one of the options that we could do.

DEAN: That was one of the options, and that is why these JCS studies were being made, to find what the Chinese reaction was, and that is why I was there.

Q: What were you getting from our military about putting ground troops into North Vietnam

DEAN: What I just described, the JCS study on this. Some people wanted to know what the results would be. Tommy Thompson was the one who pushed the JCS study.

Q: I was just wondering when you talked to the military or with the military individually, were they saying "Hell, no?"

DEAN: Some of them. They were divided too. Some were saying they didn't want a wider war. Some were very upset at the constraints put upon them by the conduct of the war, no troops in the North, initially no bombing of the North, no bombing of the ships bringing goods in, the Russian ships, the Chinese ships. They felt as though their hands were tied behind their back and they couldn't really fight a war like that. Of course, they were right. But, also on the ground in Vietnam things were not settled; things were not proceeding that favorably. People, I think, were giving exaggerated reports of body counts, and all sorts of other misinformation. Then Washington wanted to use Robert Thompson's ideas. Robert Thompson had been in Kuala Lumpur in Malaysia. I had known him at the time. He was trying to suggest that the British experience in Malaysia be transferred to Vietnam which was, however, a completely different situation. I argued at length about that, without too much success. There were lots of arguments going on within the Department about this plan and about policy. I was in charge of the peace initiatives with North Vietnam. There were lots of these peace initiatives, both on the part of other governments and on the part of individuals who would come into see us, and even some feelers on the part of their own government. I was very interested in this and hoped that we would find some way of bringing at least a pause in the war allowing us to reflect and to find a way out. I had earlier served in the White House for Lyndon Johnson. He had been elected in '64 and I was there for about two months working on his inauguration primarily because my friend, Paul Popple was his Chief of Correspondence and had asked me to come over and help him. So I did and I got to meet Johnson frequently. He would come in and pick up his correspondence from the pile on my desk and say this guy is a good friend of mine, you should give him very good treatment. He was a very suspicious type of person. He was suspicious of me until he got used to me. But anyway, he was a very interesting man. I think that if he had better advice, he might not have committed the U.S. so thoroughly to the Vietnam War. At the end of '65, he did declare a bombing halt in Vietnam. This was after the Gulf of Tonkin alleged attack. I say alleged because I talked to Senator Fulbright later about this, and he said that it appeared dubious. Then Johnson started the retaliatory bombing. He declared a pause in December '65. He sent Governor Avril Harriman, myself and Chris Squire to visit several heads of state to see if we couldn't prolong the 1965 bombing pause of North Vietnam into a possible peace negotiation. That is where I got introduced to Air Force One. We traveled with two crews and the three of us to several different countries. They asked me to go because the first stop was to be Warsaw. We were going to try to persuade the Poles to intercede with the Soviet Union. Then we were hoping also at the same time to see the Chinese there. At the time, although I didn't know it, there was an argument within our government between Dean Rusk and McNamara. Rusk was opposed to this initiative.

Q: Yes, I remember. I was Consul in Belgrade then.

DEAN: Harriman, Ambassador Elbrick and I and someone else from the Embassy went up on this special train to see Tito. We spent the night on the train and got there the next morning and had breakfast with Tito. He insisted everybody have several slugs of brandy. He said he would try to help. We went off to Egypt to see Nasser, who was the other co-chairman of the non-aligned movement. Nasser also had the opinion something should be done. We met at his military encampment outside Cairo. He seemed sincere, saying that he wanted to do something.

Then we flew off to Iran to see the Shah, and later to Pakistan to see Ali Khan. We saw Prime Minister Shastri in New Delhi right before he went to Tashkent to meet with Ali Khan, where he died. Anyway it became more like public relations than anything else. Then we went to Australia to see Prime Minister Menzies because the Australians were involved in Vietnam. Next we went to Japan to see Sato, who was Prime Minister, and we went to Saigon and to Laos. But, because we couldn't see the Chinese or the North Vietnamese, we only achieved the result of getting the Soviets interested. At that time the Soviets and the Chinese were pretty much at loggerheads with each other. We thought that the split between them really happened in the late '50s, and by the time things had developed in the early '60s they really were at odds with each other, including over supplying arms and materials to North Vietnam. The Chinese would deliberately hold back the train shipments coming through China carrying Soviet munitions and goods to North Vietnam. They deliberately delayed then for weeks, sometimes even longer. The Soviets had to resort to shipping many of their military supplies through Hanoi. So the Chinese were, in effect, blockading some of the Soviet aid to Vietnam. The Chinese didn't want the Soviets to get a foothold in Vietnam and be on both of their borders. This is why later on they were so annoyed at the Soviets taking over Camh Ran Bay after the U.S. withdrawal. There was really bad blood between the Chinese and the Soviets. We thought that we possibly could play on this antagonism and deep antipathy. So we tried. Harriman and some others wanted to see if we couldn't exploit this rift.

Q: I'm trying to figure out what the game would have been if the Soviets were going to support. In a way we wanted both the Soviets and the Chinese to join together and say let's...

DEAN: We wanted both of them to agree to a bombing pause and influence Hanoi to that effect because they were both supplying Hanoi. Our view was that if they could use their leverage on Hanoi, then it would be valuable. Now, we thought that the Chinese might do it because they didn't want the Soviets to get more influence there. We thought the Soviets might do it because they were angry at the Chinese and concerned about the growing Chinese power there. This was just a wish, but, of course, none of this happened. After the bombing pause in '65 we committed more and more troops to South Vietnam and suffered tragic consequences.

Q: What was your impression of Harriman at this time? He was a very important figure; it was logical that he should have been Secretary of State and yet Harriman was cast in sort of this East Asian role.

DEAN: He had been Assistant Secretary for East Asian Affairs and then Under Secretary. I think that might have been before they had a Deputy Secretary, and he didn't become Secretary of State. I think people listened to him. When I say people, I mean people in our own government and also foreign governments. He was really respected very highly. You could see that very clearly in all of these meetings, and he was very persuasive and knew all the details and facts. I thought he was a good emissary, and if we had been given permission to see the Chinese and the North Vietnamese, who knows? Of course, it is quite possible that Hanoi might have refused to enter into any negotiations at that point, but it really depends on what they would have gotten out of it. They wouldn't refuse to look at it I think. They might have gotten a lot out of it without the destruction which they themselves suffered. I think of it as one of life's great opportunities lost.

Q: What was your impression on how Harriman was treating these constraints that were put upon him? Where was it coming from?

DEAN: It was really coming from the Secretary and indeed the President, so he was feeling let down. It wasn't a matter of others trying to restrain him. He didn't try to go off on his own; he waited for authorization before he did anything.

Q: Did he sort of talk to you all as he went around? I mean what were you getting from him?

DEAN: Yes, we had several discussions about whether we could manage to talk to the Chinese or the North Vietnamese, if the bombing pause could be extended, what the outcome could be if there was a negotiation. There were always discussions of this type, and of course, what the Chinese motives were, what the Russian motives were, whether the South Vietnamese (at that time they weren't even drafting their own people into their armed forces,) whether they were able or willing to stand up for their own government. Whether or not the split in the communist camp, which was so obvious by then, although some people still didn't believe in it, whether that was going to make the domino theory less viable. Of course I thought it would. I thought it was rather unlikely that the domino theory, which represented a monolithic communism advance, was sensible. We saw China and the Soviet Union at each other's throats. The North Vietnamese hated the Chinese and had for 1,000 years or more. They had been occupied and ruled by China for many centuries, and they didn't like the Chinese. Later on the border war between them in 1979 was an acute expression of that dislike. The Chinese didn't like the Vietnamese either. But, also Thais didn't like the Vietnamese or the Cambodians. It is very hard for me to see why we did not pay much more attention to these fractures in international communism.

Q: Were these fractures well known and part of sort of the body of your knowledge? I mean yours and the other people who were dealing particularly your dealing with a variety of countries.

DEAN: Sure, anybody who had read any Vietnamese history would know about the relationship with the Chinese and the Vietnamese, documented over the centuries. Anybody who had been following developments since 1958 with China and the Soviet Union would know that they had really come to a parting of the ways as early as 1960. It seemed to me that this knowledge was discussed in papers, but people in the Department really didn't focus on them. Many in Congress, but also some of our own policy makers, didn't really factor the implications into account. It is not hindsight to say that the Sino-Soviet split was so real and that the Vietnamese hated the Chinese.

Q: What were you getting, I mean you had North Vietnam as part of your responsibility, how did we see the North Vietnamese government? What were they, were there factions within it?

DEAN: We were getting very little from North Vietnam. I think we knew much less about North Vietnam than we knew about China, and our knowledge about China as I have described was very general.

Q: Did you have the feeling that Johnson in a way was calling the shots or was this Rusk calling the shots?

DEAN: In the long, run it was Johnson. Even when Fulbright and other Congressional leaders came to see him after the Tonkin incident, he told them he was not going to run away like a cur with his tail between its legs, that he was going to stand up for America. I think that what he lacked was more farsighted advisors. Bill Moyers was one of them, but not on foreign policy. Dean Rusk was a strong advocate of our policy in Vietnam. I admire Dean Rusk. I think he was a great man, but when it came to the Chinese, he was staunchly anti-communist, anti-Chinese. He had been Assistant Secretary for East Asian Affairs before, and he had served in the Burma campaign and his views were deeply affected by the KMT's loss of China.

Q: He had been a planner for the...

DEAN: That's right, so he had some knowledge of this. He was a very knowledgeable man. He was definite in his principles and his views; he was almost unswervable. He was very persuasive, and straightforward person. In many respects a very admirable man. I just happen to think that he was wrong.

Q: What did we see in it for the Chinese to support the North Vietnamese, because this doesn't raise itself as being a major policy consideration. Maybe I'm wrong but...

DEAN: Oh, I think so. Vietnam is on their border just as Korea is on their border. I believe very strongly that they were very concerned about security, their national security. There is a book that is out recently. I think it is called The Great Wall and the Empty Fortress. It describes Chinese history in terms of their concern about their border areas and their effort to secure those border areas as a means of protecting their own country and civilization. This book depicts these objectives as primarily defensive in nature and describes the Indian border wars and the border war later with Vietnam and the Russian border wars as being essentially defensive in nature. I think that anything that happened in North Vietnam which involved foreign forces possibly going into North Vietnam would have been of extreme importance to their national security and defensive posture. I still believe to this day that they would have reacted with massive amounts of troops and that we would have embarked on a war with China if we sent troops into North Vietnam.

Q: Looking at China, were we looking at any divisive elements there, warlordism or something like that?

DEAN: There were some people who thought that maybe (they always thought that and still think it today), China might break apart. I don't think that is a likelihood, although, who knows what will happen in the future. It didn't seem a likelihood to us then because the country had been unified quite completely by the communist rulers. If Mao had retired, stepped down in 1950, he would still be revered as a great man. Now for many people, particularly among the intellectuals, he is vilified. A lot of the ordinary people, taxi drivers, farmers, still remember his name and remember the mass movements, so he is still a name to be reckoned with as far as they are concerned. It just seems to me that China is such a huge, vast place and our knowledge about it is so comparatively small. It is like picking up a handful of sand from the beach and counting the grains and from that determining how many grains there are in the rest of the world.

Q: How did we see Zhou En-lai during this '62-'66 period?

DEAN: We saw him as a sort of a mediator, as a person who stood between Mao, between the wrath of god, and the rest. He tried to keep things running on an even keel. Actually he catered a lot to Mao. If he hadn't, he would not have stayed in power. But he was responsible later on for bringing Deng Xiaoping back, and he was responsible, I think, for shielding some of the officials from the Red Guards and the terrors of the Cultural Revolution. Essentially he was a positive image in our minds at that time in the early '60s, and later, too. I think most people felt that Mao was a fanatic and Zhou En-lai was a pragmatist. Most people felt that Liu Shaoqi was pragmatic and Deng Xiaoping, too. It later turned out to be true. Of course, it is easy to say if we had known more in the '60s we would have reacted differently both toward China and toward North Vietnam, but one gets drawn into these things, particularly if you are not very clear-sighted about what our objectives are. One gets drawn into them and they become bigger and bigger and then it is hard to extract oneself with any degree of honor. People get committed arguing one side or the other in Congress or in the public, and so this whole Vietnam venture really fragmented our society in many different and disturbing ways.

Q: Did Senator Fulbright play any role during this '62-'66 period particularly regarding our China policy?

DEAN: No, I don't think so. He was focused on Vietnam. Not too many people were talking about changing our China policy at that time. He may have said this in his memoirs or publicly, but I don't recall it in any of his speeches or statements. When I spoke to him later, we were talking mostly about Vietnam.

Q: How about the CIA? I mean this is sort of what you have the CIA for, to find out what is happening in difficult places, in those days North Vietnam and China.

DEAN: They were good analysts, their analytical side on China had very good people. I remember several of them. I thought they did quite a good job of trying to describe what was happening at that time. They were using the same sources which INR [Bureau of Intelligence and Research] and the Consulate General in Hong Kong were using. They may have had some human intelligence sources, but basically they had the overt radio broadcasts, the provincial newspapers, the refugee reports from the Special Branch in Hong Kong, and diplomatic dispatches from other countries that were represented in Beijing. So, using those sources, they came to, I think, fairly sensible conclusions about what was happening in government circles. Vietnam was a much more difficult thing because nobody had focused much on it before, and nobody really had nearly as good sources. We were sort of groping around more blindly without intelligence in Vietnam.

Q: In the office for dealing with these affairs, were there any discernible splits about what we should be doing and all that?

DEAN: Because it was a crisis, policy decisions had risen to the top. Decision making was at the Secretary's level and the Presidential level; McGeorge Bundy at the National Security Council. His brother, William Bundy, was the Assistant Secretary of State for East Asia. It was at William Bundy request that I was following the peace initiatives. We tried to see if there was some way of getting good channels and developing one of these initiatives into something meaningful. I think we didn't get very far with them because there wasn't a really burning desire to follow them up much from on high, even with the Harriman initiative. Which is not to say that we didn't try.

Q: Well, moving over to sort of the other side, more about difficult places, what about Kim Il Sung and North Korea? What were we getting out of that?

DEAN: Nothing but what you have heard about and known about for some time. Just complete adulation of Kim Il Sung, and the fact that their society was such a closed dictatorial society even after the Sino-Soviet split. Before, both the Chinese and the Soviets had supported North Korea, particularly in its war against the south. Now the split was a big question for the North. Would they be able to obtain military support from Moscow or Beijing? North Korea was playing them both off against the other. It was getting more support from one because it claimed that the other was going to send support, so the Russians would hurry up and do it, or the Chinese. So, as far as Chinese and Soviet support was going at that time, they were doing quite well. The North still harbored designs against South Korea. There were still constant incursions of intelligence groups and tunnels under the demilitarized zone, all sorts of actions abroad and at home to further their aims. They were a true danger. The question is, would they take advantage of what was going on in the South? You know several units from South Korea went to Vietnam.

Q: A whole division

DEAN: A whole division was sent to South Vietnam, and they proved to be very effective. Would the North Koreans take advantage of their absence to try something; would the war spread? This was a real worry, and we didn't know the answer at that time. We had a morass that was quickly developing in Vietnam. It had been developing for some time already, but it was getting worse. We had the uncertainties about what was happening in China, and we had the danger from North Korea, so it kept us busy.

: During this time, looking at mainland China, what was the feeling of its intentions toward Taiwan?

DEAN: Well, judging from the Warsaw talks, Chinese insisted as it had from day one of these talks and even from the day they declared the People's Republic on October 1, 1949, that Taiwan was part of the People's Republic of China. It was a province; it was part of their territory. They were never going to give up this claim, and in my view, they will never do so. It is a territorial imperative that is very strong in China and with other countries too. It seems to me their attitude toward Taiwan was expressed in the Taiwan talks when they refused to renounce the use of force. Their rationale for doing so, of course, is that this would be surrendering their sovereignty and their claim that Taiwan is part of their country. They believe they have a right to quell internal disturbances themselves. Therefore, they weren't going to give up the use of force. Their attitude toward Taiwan was very tough on that stance. But, I can't think of a time that it hasn't been tough except for a period in the '80s when we had better relationships with Deng Xiaoping, and at the same time, we had good relations with Taiwan, and Taiwan and the mainland were beginning to trade, to invest, to travel. Tensions in the Taiwan Strait at that time, I would say between '82 and '89 when Tiananmen occurred, were the lowest they have been in history. At other times, of course, there have been high threats. In '62-'66 Taiwan was doing a lot of these lightning jabs at China, sponsored in part by the CIA, but also sponsored by some of our far-out military units. They would send rubber boats onto the mainland with a few infiltrators. Usually they would be captured within days. They would send balloons over with messages and with little gifts from the offshore islands. They would do lightning raids here and there. Of course, the CIA helped the Kampa Guerillas in Tibet. This was the time of the Tibetan uprising and the Chinese crackdown in '59. At any rate, there had been a lot of that type of thing which provoked the Chinese and didn't get us anywhere. In fact, it just created more tensions. The over-flights I speak of, not the spy flights but the others, were not a deliberate goading of the Chinese, but they were more from navigational problems. China was so troubled, roiled internally, that I think they didn't have that much focus on doing something about Taiwan. Things were tense but not critical.

Q: You left there in '66 just about the time of our great buildup in Vietnam. Where did you go then?

DEAN: I went to Taipei.

Q: You had been focused almost completely on the mainland and the communist side. Had there been anyone within the East Asian Bureau, who looked after Taiwan?

DEAN: It was the Office of Chinese affairs. Asian Communist Affairs had broken away from the old Office of Chinese affairs. Taiwan, and I think Korea and Japan, were handled by a separate office, so I didn't have much to do with it at that time.

Q: I was wondering you kind of did your own thing; it wasn't as much involving China.

DEAN: No at that time they were separate. We didn't have much to do with what was happening in Taiwan. I recall quite clearly. It had been a very important desk in those days, but it was beginning to enter a decline, partly because of the Vietnam War and partly because of what was happening in China, and partly because there wasn't much happening in Taiwan at that time. My next posting when I left the Department and went to Taipei was as Political Counselor. I think you have already done a session with Arthur Hummel, a talented professional. He was the Chargé at that time. Then Walter McConaughy became our Ambassador, and we didn't have a Chargé after Art left. When Walter went away on leave and for promotion boards and things like that, I became the Chargé, but for most of the time, I was the Political Counselor.

Q: You were there from '66 to...

DEAN: '69.

Q: When you arrived in '66, what was the political situation and the economic situation in Taipei?

DEAN: Taipei was just starting to move into the boom years of their economic development. They already had their land reform, where the land was turned over to the farmers, private ownership of the land. The landowners were compensated by shares in some of the government corporations, sugar, petroleum, etc. That phase of the economy already had gone very well. Agricultural production was up very high. Light industries were beginning to grow very rapidly. In a few years heavy industry also began to grow, the China steel corporation, China Shipbuilding, electric power, things of that type. So, their economy was in pretty good shape, but still the agricultural sector was leading in importance at that time. The Generalissimo was in complete charge. The mainlanders who had come over with him were ruling Taiwan from the top down. A few Taiwanese had been brought in to lower ranking jobs in the government, but essentially the mainlanders were calling the tune and they were disliked by the Taiwanese because, as I mentioned earlier, of the very cruel and arbitrary way in which they had been ruled from 1945 until the Generalissimo came over in '49. In 1945, the Gimo sent General Chen Yi to take over Taiwan. Chen Yi created a crisis between the mainlanders who came over and were grabbing everything like carpetbaggers and the Taiwanese populace, to a point where there was an enormous uprising against the mainlanders by the Taiwanese which was brutally suppressed with as many as 10,000 people killed arbitrarily by General Chen Yi in 1947. The Taiwanese have never forgotten that. The mainlanders were ruling them in every aspect. They didn't have any say in what was going on. So they committed their energies primarily to the manufacturing and economic and industrial sector. When I got there two-thirds of the large companies were owned by the Taiwanese, and of course, they owned the land. The farmers owned their land. They owned most of the small and medium sized companies, so they were a very important economic power even if they weren't a political power. That was the scene when I arrived in Taiwan. The mainlanders made sure that dissent was punished. There was, I remember, a man named Po Yang who was a dissident. He was a mainlanders himself. He drew some derogatory cartoons about the Generalissimo, and he was imprisoned for several years for those cartoons. Various others, like Li Ou, had spoken out and had been jailed. There were several other intellectuals who were jailed for their dissident views. Some were mainlanders; not Taiwanese. But the Taiwanese were gradually becoming independent oppositionist politicians. One of them, Henry Kao, won the election as an independent Mayor of Taipei City, and the Generalissimo decided not to intervene. Kao served out his term. There was a lot of Congressional interest in Taiwan. Many visitors coming in because of the old days. They came to see the Generalissimo or the Madame. They were entertained by the Chiangs, who were very intent on maintaining U.S. support and the U.S. connection. Indeed they offered up the island facilities for the Vietnam war effort. Tankers for the B-52s were based in southern Taiwan. They would fly up and refuel the B-52s that were coming from Guam or Okinawa on their way to bomb the North or South. At that time there were over 10,000 U.S. service personnel in Taiwan and lots of the dependents of those serving in Vietnam were also there. I forget now what the total number of Americans were. It was a huge U.S. community in terms of the PX and special privileges and everything. We were negotiating a Status of Forces Agreement with the Foreign Ministry. There had been some incidents where our military had insisted on trying the army culprits themselves.

Q: There had even been a sacking of the Embassy.

DEAN: That occurred much earlier as a result of one of these incidents in 1957 before I got to the language school. Anyway, in '66 we were still negotiating, and during the time I was there, we did arrive at a final agreement on status of forces which included an agreement on who would try whom for what type of offense. It was more necessary then because there were so many Americans. I also set up with the general in charge of the Political Warfare Department a bi-weekly meeting on developments in China. They had much better intelligence than we, and for once, it wasn't propagandistic. We met with representatives from their military and from their navy and their intelligence service, and we would meet once every two week with our own team and find out what they thought was happening with Liu Shaoqi or with Deng Xiaoping or Zhou En-lai and what was Mao doing? This was the start of the Cultural Revolution and it was really of considerable interest, so we reported back to the Bureau. I think that time has proved their analysis was pretty accurate on what was happening. They had a much better feel for these things than we did. We kept up these sessions with them, and also at that time with Chiang Ching-kuo who was the Generalissimo's son and who would later become president. At the time he was Defense Minister and Vice Premier. He had not had much to do with the diplomatic community. He had been in the background mostly in the '50s and early '60s as head of the intelligence and security. He was a shadowy and rather negative image to foreigners. We agreed, it would be good if he became better known and met more newspapermen and diplomats and became better known internationally. Once when I was chargé, he came to my office and said, "You know I followed your advice. I had a meeting last night with a newspaperman representing The London Evening Star." It turned out that the newspaperman was a Russian KGB agent, Victor Louis, masquerading as a reporter for this London paper. Louis had come to Taiwan to stir up trouble because the Soviets and the Chinese were at odds with each other. The Russians were trying to fish in troubled waters and Victor Louis came back a few times to see if Taiwan might be willing to have an unofficial relationship with the Soviet Union. Taiwan was so anti-communist at that time that they rejected it, but just the same, it was an interesting type of situation.

Q: What was your impression of Chiang Kai-shek?

DEAN: He was a very charismatic figure. Say what you will about his stubbornness or inability to do what Americans wanted, he was a very charismatic figure. When he entered the room, he really made a difference. I dealt with him a few times, not through informal conversations but to deliver messages or to get messages back for Washington. He had, I think, a very traditional Chinese upbringing and a very conservative, even for a Chinese, traditionalist point of view, and a relatively narrow horizon. His son was much different. Ching-kuo had a very broad horizon, a much different education and much different outlook. Anyway, I think the Generalissimo really believed in the Confucian ethic. He believed it was the duty of the people to respect the government and the duty of the government to serve the people, but he didn't brook any interference and he was totally opposed to any type of liberalization. I think he was a figure, we would say, of "yesteryear," of the previous decades; whereas, his son, Chiang Ching-kuo was a figure of the present and future. The Madame, of course was very evident in relations with Americans and frankly played a major role with policy towards the U.S. At that time, we had stationed on Taiwan some of our planes with nuclear weapons. Later these were withdrawn. We also were supporting as you mentioned earlier, the Chinese Air Force U-2 planes and a lot of their other intelligence units. We had just come to the end of our aid to Taiwan, but we were still giving them access to a lot of military surplus material from Vietnam. Our MAAG Chief would go to Vietnam and send ships just loaded with all sorts of surplus equipment. The Chinese military did very well during that time by offering to help the Air Force with the refueling of B-52's, with the repair of some of the military equipment that had been broken or destroyed and getting large quantities of material for themselves. As a result, during that period, Washington's relations with Taipei were quite positive. Walter McConaughy, our Ambassador, had very good relations both with the Generalissimo and other top leaders. They had a remarkable group of officials in Taiwan, some of whom are still alive. These were people who had come over with the Generalissimo, who had occupied positions of real power in the bureaucracy in China. Some were very able and capable people. Taiwan got an infusion of upper level very talented people who were responsible for the land reform, for agricultural progress, for light industrialization, for the heavy industrialization, and for the economic progress of the island. They deserve a lot of the credit for it; they handled things well.

Q: One of the great deficits of the Chiang Kai-shek regime prior to that had been the corruption which had initiated many of the attacks on his government and the Kuomintang. Had that been pretty well dissipated by the time you got there?

DEAN: I think they made a definite effort to wipe out corruption from the very moment the Generalissimo came. You see, C. H. Kung and the Soong family didn't come to Taiwan, they just retreated to New York. So a crowd of people like that who had been so involved in corruption on the mainland didn't come to Taiwan with the Gimo, but they took their ill-gotten gains and decamped elsewhere. The Generalissimo came over and really cracked down on top-level official or even mid-level corruption. I'm sure there was some corruption on the street, paying off policemen, customs officers, things like that, but it was really very low-level and not important to the economic development or to the well-being of the society. So, the Gimo kept a very sharp eye on that. People were afraid to transgress. His son was even stricter. His son fired his closest friend and advisor because his advisor's mistress had gotten involved in a banking scandal. Ching-kuo was even more adamant against corruption. During that period the transgressors knew that punishment would follow, so I think that kept corruption down to a bare minimum.

Q: You mention all these visitors. The China lobby had been equivalent to what the Israeli lobby is today. With the China lobby, these were not people of Chinese descent but California conservatives mainly, sort of the conservative wing of the Republican party. I would have thought that they would have in a way gotten in the way of our relations because with the charismatic Madame and the Generalissimo would get them to manipulate our political process so we couldn't deal with them on a level playing field. I think in terms of the Israeli lobby today in the United States. Did you have that problem?

DEAN: The China lobby has a long history. It goes back to "who lost China?" It goes back to the McCarthy period. It goes back to the WWII days where China was an ally and Madame Chiang Kai-shek and the Generalissimo were heroes. The China lobby was not as much in evidence in 1969. But it was still there, and they were still close friends. The Generalissimo and his foreign ministry made a strong effort to invite prominent Americans to visit Taiwan, and there was a steady stream. It seemed to me that from '66 to '69, the China Lobby wasn't as powerful as it had been before, partially because everybody was focused on Vietnam. I think that Taiwan was fairly confident of U.S. support.

Q: Johnson was still in the White House at this point.

DEAN: Yes.

Q: But this would change. Nixon was elected in '68 and the administration started in '69.

DEAN: But Nixon had been to Taiwan during this earlier period when he was not in office, and they felt that in him, they had a very close friend. He had been there earlier on various visits. I remember once he had come to Kuala Lumpur while I was there in '54 while he was Vice President and he had been to Taiwan on that trip also so he was well in favor. There were other people like that who had come to visit the Generalissimo and the Madame. Walter Judd was still a Representative. He was a frequent visitor, and the Madame liked him very much as did the Generalissimo and they welcomed him. So, the China lobby was there, but it wasn't as active. They had been able to keep mainland China out of the United Nations, and by one way or the other had prevented it from taking Taiwan's seat. This went on until 1971 when China did get in and Taiwan was expelled. But, in '66-'69, things were still going along pretty well, and I think the relationship was reasonably smooth. There were, as I say, status of forces negotiations going on. We ironed out other problems, and they were cooperating with us on Vietnam. The Generalissimo was advising not to send American troops there because he knew that a lot of casualties would cause heartburn at home, but to use other troops like the Koreans. Easier said than done. We didn't want to use his troops just as we didn't want to use them in the Korean war for fear of bringing the Chinese in, but he helped in other ways. I think that essentially during that period of time, the relationship was quite friendly.

Q: How did you get on with Walter McConaughy because he was sort of not the old China hand but you might say to the right of the old China hand?

DEAN: Well, that was his reputation, and it was true. I also think that he was one of the finest gentlemen for whom I have ever worked. He was really honest in his opinions and very courteous. I think that he did have strong views, and I would feel somewhat differently. We would talk about our differences. I would write something, and he would say let me think about this for the next day or two. He would take it home with him and then he might come back in a couple of days and say, "I understand what your argument is, but I just can't bring myself to agree." He would say it in a very nice way. We had several discussions of this type. We had a very good relationship, and I liked him very much, even though as I say, our views were different. Our Economic Counselor and I had very different views, too.

Q: Who was economic counselor?

DEAN: Bill Morell. At first it was Bob Brown, then Bill Morell. Bill and I are close friends to this very day. Walter McConaughy is still down in Atlanta. Unfortunately he is almost blind and he is not too well. His wife is looking after him. He had one special attribute which I will never forget. He had a remarkable, phenomenal memory. He would go in to see the Generalissimo and they would have a conversation for an hour and a half. He would come back and dictate it, the whole thing, and he would remember it exactly. Some weeks or months or years later, he would still remember the whole conversation in its entirety. His own experience was with China. He was Consul General in Shanghai when the KMT was defeated. He had a lot of experience in the East Asia Bureau concerning China. So, he had a very good background, and he knew what he was talking about. It wasn't as though he was making up his mind without any grounding in facts. It is odd to say this, but he seemed to be the perfect representative to Taiwan at that particular time, because our policies were meshing; our relationships were good. He had a very positive relationship, not only with the Generalissimo and the Madame, but with other top level officials. I think he was respected and liked. I don't think people were manipulating him. He drew up his own views from his own resources, not from outside pressures.

Q: You mentioned Bill Morell, the economic counselor was coming out of a different view. Was there any sort of different outlook on the economic side?

DEAN: Not really. I was just saying philosophically that our views on China policy and the authoritarian rule on Taiwan and Vietnam were different. On the economic side of things we saw developments quite clearly in the same direction.

Q: Were we making an effort to see on Taiwan that the Taiwanese were going to take over eventually. I mean this is an aging generation of mainland Chinese. We were looking at sort of a new breed that were being sort of, in place. Was this something you were seeing and how were we dealing with it?

DEAN: It was not clear then how things were going to develop because there was a second generation of mainland Chinese like Fred Chen, James Soong and many other people of their age and even younger who were taking high positions at that time, so it wasn't clear where things were going. It was still an autocracy, but we dealt extensively in our Embassy in the political section with what you would call the independent oppositionists. They weren't allowed to have an opposition party. That was illegal, but they could run as separate individuals independent of any party organization. We had one very good officer, Jerry Fowler, who would go off and talk to some of these people, go to some of their parties and make close friends. Through him we kept up with a large number of oppositionists who are now in positions of power today. Fowler brought our political section in Taipei in close touch with oppositionists like Wu San- Lien, the head of one of the independent newspapers. Wu had to steer a rather clever line to keep his newspaper from being closed down. But, he is a revered name in the opposition movement in Taiwan because he did oppose the KMT. We felt that the Taiwanese were 85% of the public, that inevitably more of them would come into government. Chiang Ching-kuo who was rising into prominence then, was bringing in more Taiwanese into the party at the mid levels and into the government, too. So, it seemed clear that if you were looking forward at their history, the Taiwanese would have a much more important role. We tried our best to establish relations at that time with as many Taiwanese as we could.

Q: Was there any concern with the mainland Chinese making any inroads with the Taiwanese?

DEAN: Yes, there is the General I mentioned, General Wang Sheng, with whom we had these weekly meetings. He was also the head of security and counterintelligence. One of his jobs was to ferret out spies and subversives. After the Korean War about 15,000 Chinese prisoners of war opted to come to Taiwan instead of going back to the mainland. He found out that several communist cells had been planted among those soldiers. He did the same with other infiltration that occurred even with people who came over with the Generalissimo. Taiwan didn't let many other people in after that. Some of those were communist spies who had been planted, and he uncovered them, too. There were quite a number of people that he had arrested who were either executed or imprisoned.

Q: At this time the Cultural Revolution was really cranking up. It was in full swing. This must have been a big turn off for the Taiwanese on both sides. I mean were they getting a pretty good picture of what was going on?

DEAN: I think they got a reasonably good picture. In some cases better than ours. I think the Cultural Revolution was pretty well publicized; at least the more glaring activities of the Red Guards. This made the Taiwanese feel that they didn't want to have anything to do with the mainland. It made the mainlanders on Taiwan wonder if they should take advantage of this, and there was some advice going to the Generalissimo that maybe he should persuade the Americans to do something. Of course the Americans were so deeply involved in Vietnam that they weren't about to get involved in the mainland, too. Caution prevailed in Taiwan among the Chinese mainlanders themselves. They decided to wait and see how this was going to play out. It was a pretty lively and stimulating time for all concerned.

DEAN: They hadn't left them yet. They didn't break relations until later. At the time, the Japanese DCM's name was Hara. He had served with my brother in Prague. When I got to Taiwan I met him, and he immediately made the connection, and he became a very good friend, to the point that we were discussing the recognition of Outer Mongolia which our government was planning. I discussed this with him and, the Japanese government, not wanting to be left behind, went ahead and recognized Outer Mongolia. Then, because the Generalissimo had written to President Nixon, we decided not to do it. So, the Japanese were left out there hanging. It was very embarrassing for a while. Anyway, they never wanted to be following in our footsteps. They wanted to be a little bit ahead of us but not so far out ahead that they were dangling. During that time, they still had ambassadorial relations, and in a way, Japan was very popular among the Taiwanese, because unlike in Korea where they were at each other's throats, in Taiwan the Japanese had acted with strictness but with fairness. A glaring contradiction to the mainlanders who originally came over and who acted very unfairly. If there was an offense under the Japanese, it was punishable by a definite penalty and nothing else. The Japanese had occupied Taiwan for some 50 years. They had been there since the Sino-Japanese war of 1895. So the Japanese had rewarded those Taiwanese who spoke only Japanese not only in the workplace but in their homes. They had educated Taiwanese leaders in Japan. These were mostly engineers and doctors. They had built up the roads, the factories, the railroads, what have you. So they were not unpopular. Frankly a great deal of Taiwan's trade is still with the Japanese and the older generation still speak Japanese. So Japan has maintained close ties with Taiwan, and they have been fairly beneficial to Taiwan traders and Japanese entrepreneurs as well.

Q: Were we much involved in economic promotion as far as trade with the United States and all that?

DEAN: The U.S. was Taiwan's major export market, but we really didn't get into serious trade problems until a few years later. We did negotiate textile agreements as we did in Hong Kong, and we got into some other agreements. But, the real problems blossomed in terms of intellectual property rights. This first manifested itself in book pirating. Book publishers would get a best seller, pirate it, and sell it for a pittance, usually locally, but then the Chinese began to send them abroad, books like the Encyclopedia Britannica. You could buy the whole set for $50. This was true in the late '50s and through the '60s. Finally we were able to clamp down on pirating and copyright infringement by the end of the 1960s and into the 1970s. Still, it was a really big problem, particularly when you get to cassette tapes and music, and then video tapes and CDs and software. The billowing trade surplus became an enormous problem until in the '80s. In 1987, we had a trade deficit with Taiwan, a deficit just in our bilateral trade, of $19.4 billion in that one year. This was building up. When I was there, it wasn't nearly that way in the '60s, but through the '70s and into the '80s our trade defect really began to blossom, and it was a serious issue. I can get into that later.

Q: Yes, I was thinking this would be a good place to stop. So in 1969, you left Taiwan; where did you go?

DEAN: I went to the senior seminar at the Foreign Service Institute.

Q: Well, in 1970, you were back in the world again.

DEAN: That's right. Even before I had gone to the senior seminar the EA Bureau asked me if I would go to Hong Kong as the Deputy Principal Officer, and I agreed to, so I was back in Hong Kong in 1970 and stayed there until 1974, mostly doing my best to help manage a very large office. We must have had several hundred people if you combine the 250 Americans with several hundred Chinese. It was a big operation. A large part of it was concentrated on analyzing what was happening politically and economically and militarily within China. It was at that time, our largest China watching post. I have spoken earlier about some of our sources. Some of them were the same, but we had additional sources by then. There was more travel by American citizens to China. We had opportunity to interview them and to see many other foreign travelers who came through Hong Kong who had been on visits to China, so we had more information. Many of them had spoken both to central and local officials, so we found out quite a bit more about what was happening. It was pretty obvious there was an easing of tensions between the U.S. and China. This was even before Kissinger's visit.

Q: Kissinger's visit was during this period.

DEAN: That is right. It was in 1971. Kissinger had secretly visited China. John Holdridge was with him. Holdridge's book, Crossing the Divide, details that trip. Kissinger had ostensibly been on a trip to Pakistan and allegedly became ill, but actually he was spirited away to the airport and flew to Beijing where he met with Zhou En-lai. Of course, most people in the Department, including Marshall Green who was the Assistant Secretary and ourselves in Hong Kong who were supposed to know what was going on, knew nothing of Kissinger's trip or the results of it. However, one of my friends in Hong Kong was L.P. Sung, a newspaper publisher of a very small paper. He had previously been in the intelligence service for the Nationalists and then the communists. He could have been working for both of them for all I know. We were having lunch in a small restaurant where we used to meet periodically. He said, "You know, there is going to be a very high level visit from Washington to Beijing." I said, "Oh?" He said, "Yes, the highest level." My friend was well connected with the NCNA people. They were the Chinese communist newspaper and intelligence arm. He said, "Yes, I have got this on very good authority." Of course at this time that was sort of a big shocker. Nobody thought that things would move as quickly as that. We all read President Nixon's article in "Foreign Affairs," but we hadn't realized things were moving that fast. We weren't in the loop on that type of closely held information. So, I went back to the Consulate General. It just so happened we were having our country team meeting, and I told them what I had heard and asked, "Should we report this to Washington?" Then it was decided by David Osborn, who was our Consul General, not to do so." He said, "they probably know about it if it is true." David Osborn was, I think, one of the most brilliant people I have ever met in the Foreign Service or elsewhere. He was a great linguist. He had served in Japan and spoke excellent Japanese and excellent Chinese. He also spoke the Cantonese dialect which he learned in Hong Kong to such a degree that he would go on the radio program and indulge in banter, a humorous dialogue, with the radio station host. Later, when he became Ambassador to Burma, he learned Burmese, too. He always thought that everybody else had the similar type of keen mind as he did. He would send reports or ideas or suggestions back to the Department that would go from one logical point to the other without filling in the valleys or thought processes in between and expect his readers to be equally as intelligent as he was, so that he didn't need to fill in all the argumentation. I kept on telling him that his assumption that everyone would understand wasn't necessarily the case. I got several comments or feedback from the Department saying they didn't understand why he had gone from point A to point B to point C. It was a pleasure to work for him. But, getting back to Kissinger's visit and the aftermath.

Shortly after L. P. Sung had told me that an important top level visitor was coming from Washington to Peking, we received a flash message. It was about three or four days later, telling us to listen to the radio in twenty minutes. That was Nixon's famous radio and television address here in the States, in which he revealed that he was going to go to China to bring about a change in U.S. relations with China. Well, this was exciting news, and pretty soon we were involved in preparations for the visit. Then, after the visit, there was subsequently an agreement that we would set up an official liaison office in Beijing. David Bruce was the first ambassador. He was given the personal rank of Ambassador for his new job. It was a new concept in diplomacy, the Liaison office had all the diplomatic privileges and immunities and what have you, but the U.S. still didn't have diplomatic relations with China. We just had an official liaison office and they had their official liaison office in Washington, both represented by an ambassador. The Consulate General in Hong Kong was involved with getting David Bruce and his wife up to Beijing and provided a lot of administrative backup for them as they were just getting started. We were involved in helping with the establishment of the liaison office. They were rather short staffed, so they called on us for various things. For example, for the first time an American official was to be permitted to go to the annual Canton trade fair, so I went to represent the U.S. from the Consulate General because the liaison office couldn't spare anybody at that time. The Chinese reluctantly agreed that I could go. It was an eye opener for me because at that time Guangdong (Canton) looked like a very old fashioned city that time had passed by, there was very little traffic. It reminded me of Kuala Lumpur in the '50s in many ways. It certainly was not the bustling industrial center that it has become today with massive traffic jams, huge numbers of people crowding the streets, and fantastic pollution in the air and in the water. It has greatly changed in such a short period of time. I'm talking about the great change from 1973 until today. At any rate, a great deal of our effort was designed to try to help our office in Beijing get settled, but also we continued our reporting because the liaison office was not ready yet to take over a large amount of the China reporting.

Q: Also I would suspect that being in Hong Kong in those days, you were in a better place to report rather than being trapped in the capital.

DEAN: True, and that proved to be the case even later on. John Holdridge went to Beijing as the deputy. He was Kissinger's nominee. Kissinger was the National Security Council advisor to the President. But, Alfred Jenkins went as a second deputy. He was Secretary of State Rogers' appointment. The two, Kissinger and Rogers, couldn't agree on who should be the DCM, so they sent two DCMs. It shows you a little bit about the bureaucratic push-pull between the National Security Council and the State Department. I think the State Department really had not been informed at all about Kissinger's private visit and the President's intention to move ahead. The White House kept that very close and under wraps. No one knew about it except Kissinger and Richard Solomon and Holdridge. I think this shows the beginning of the divide between the National Security Council and the State Department. Later on Kissinger became Secretary of State, but he diverted most of the State Department officials who dealt with China by tasking them to write NIE drafts and other papers while he merrily went his own way with his own policy without waiting for any conclusions from Department desk officers. It was a very interesting way to keep the bureaucracy busy, but rather disheartening.

Q: Let's talk a bit about this period '70-'74. What was happening in China at that time?

DEAN: Beginning around the end of 1965 and into '66 China had embarked on the Cultural Revolution. It was, as I said earlier, Mao's efforts to strike down bureaucratic opponents and his opponents in the party, so he used young high school and even elementary school students, the young Red Guards, to storm the headquarters of the party and the bureaucracy and to drag out the responsible officials, vilify them, and pelt them with mud. In some cases, they were killed. Even in 1970, the Cultural Revolution had up and down, and additional surges of terror. Zhou En-lai was apparently trying to calm things down. Deng Xiaoping had already fallen and so had Liu Shaoqi and many other important officials. Things were in a relatively chaotic state. Dr. Lee, in his book about Mao Zedong, goes into that at some length. We were following developments, trying to find out where the Cultural Revolution would lead. Eventually it went on for 10 years. The universities were closed. The libraries were sealed. Nobody got an education. Everybody was busy on trains going from one place to another to storm one center of the party or to destroy temples. The slogan was, "Knock down the old and up with the new," so they destroyed a lot of China's most beautiful artifacts. It was really a terrible crime committed against their own civilization. We were seeing the results of this, and we had many reports from relatives and visitors.

Q: This was not a closed society in this regard.

DEAN: No. It was widely publicized. It was in their papers, on their television, and broadcasts on the radio. It was everywhere. Everyone knew. Visitors, relatives would be just distraught at what was happening to the intellectuals who were being purged. The economy was really suffering because the government's attention was focused elsewhere, on the Red Guards and their task to destroy Mao's enemies. It was a very crucial period and we were reporting on all these events. Eventually, when John Holdridge and the others were established in Beijing, we kept reporting Zhou En-lai was under attack because he had advocated once again resuming the examination process to get into the university. The papers were attacking him, not by name, but were saying Confucius was trying to restore the entrance examinations for the universities. Some of the provincial papers up in Liaoning were leading this attack, and we were reporting on all of this. It was very clear from our analysis of what was going on in Beijing that the left wing of the party led by Jiang Qing (Madame Mao), and her cohorts were really trying to oust Zhou En-lai and the recently returned Deng Xiaoping, so that the leftist policies of supporting constant revolution, and constant struggle to prevent backsliding into bourgeoisie thinking and practices would prevail. They were really vicious in their attacks on Zhou. Zhou En-lai was ill; he was suffering from cancer. A couple of years later, he died. It was so obvious to us in Hong Kong that this infighting was going on. John Holdridge kept sending emissaries down from Beijing to our Consulate General in Hong Kong. He sent Fitzgerald, the Australian Ambassador, and he sent Howland, the New Zealand Ambassador, with messages for us to calm down, not to make such an issue of in-fighting. He said everything was peaceful on the streets of Beijing, that their people didn't think anything was going on and that we were unnecessarily alarming Washington. Of course it was clear, that at the liaison office everybody wanted the new relationship to work, and it would work much better if everything was stable.

Q: And they had their contacts, and they didn't want to see these contacts knocked down.

DEAN: Well, they thought that we were exaggerating. They didn't have many contacts, which I discovered when I went there later myself, the only contacts our office in Beijing had were the other diplomats. They might get some information from a fellow citizen who happened to be a businessman or someone passing through. Basically they had few, if any, Chinese contacts on whom to base their views. They didn't get the provincial papers that we were getting either. Later on in John Holdridge's book, Crossing the Divide, John said that he knew from the very moment he got there that there was this attack on Zhou En-lai and constant internal strife. This is, I think, memory failing him because he protested so much that when the new Consul General, Chuck Cross, came out to replace David Osborn, Cross said the Department thought that Hong Kong was wrong in its assessment of what was happening. I think the CIA analysts were the only ones who thought we were right. But in this case the Department, the people on the desk and in the INR thought we were wrong. When I was in Beijing some years later, and the Gang of Four had just been arrested, big wall posters went up all over the city and they explained with excruciating detail all the ins and outs of the attack on Zhou En-lai for restoring the examinations, or doing everything that Chiang Qing and company had criticized him for, so we had a complete, detailed account of that period which I think proved without a slightest doubt that Hong Kong's analysis of the leadership in Beijing was completely accurate. We had a very good staff. We had Bob Drexler, an excellent draftsman, very concise and succinct; Jay Taylor, who was very good on projecting things into the future, and Sherrod McCall, who was excellent on short term projections. It was a terrific group of officers. Jay Taylor is in this area now. He is writing a biography of Chiang Ching-kuo and has sent the final draft to the Harvard University Press. Sherrod McCall is on the west coast, in San Francisco. He is guest lecturer on Chinese ships along the China coast and southeast Asia. Getting back to the point I was making, pretty soon Chuck Cross understood where we were coming from and he didn't try to interfere or change our analysis.

Q: I think it is an important thing to look at because dealing with China and visions of what happened to the old China hands, here you were reporting essentially chaos.

DEAN: Yes, a real serious leadership struggle. It was probably the beginning of the struggle for succession.

Q: By this point halfway through at least, Kissinger became Secretary of State. When you got these pleas from Peking and Washington, did this interfere with your reporting?

DEAN: No, we felt we were right, and we had newspaper evidence and some hearsay, but then radio broadcasts and other things that seemed to indicate our analysis was correct. We didn't change it nor did, Chuck Cross try to get us to change it. We just carried on. This was in '74, and just two years later, history proved that we were right.

Q: I'm trying to capture the attitude of the China hands. Here you have this immense nation which was not our friend which was going through a very chaotic time which meant it was very badly weakened. Was there any shout of almost pleasure at China's chaos because what is bad for this country means that it is essentially less of a threat for us.

DEAN: No, that was not our motive in reporting on the leadership struggle. I think most people who were working in the Consulate General at that time were very much in favor of better relationships between Washington and Beijing. Most people also believed that if China just dissolved into chaos, it could create many more problems for us than if it had a reasonably stable government, even though it was a communist one at that point. So, I think people were positively inclined toward China, at least those with whom I was working. There was no desire to create problems for the Washington-Beijing relationship. On the other hand, we felt Washington should know what was happening, so that they could base their assessments on facts instead of on hopes.

Q: Well now, as you were doing this reporting, were you seeing any of this encourage a Chinese xenophobia and criticism of the opening to the United States which had been sponsored by Mao? Still, I think this would be a turn that could have happened.

DEAN: Well, it was happening to a certain degree because all Chinese who had had an education in the United States or had some contact with the U.S. were dragged out and criticized. There was one professor named Robert Winter at Peking University. He had been teaching English there since 1926 or '27. He was a very elderly man at that time. They dragged him out and criticized him, imprisoned him in his room. Several other Chinese professors at Peida either committed suicide or were thrown into the pool at the university and drowned. It was a serious attack on the intellectuals and a really tense time for all the people. People were worried about what was going to happen as a result of these clashes in the top leadership. Were they going to spread as the Cultural Revolution had already spread over the country, was Madame Mao's influence going to prevail and would their future be even worse than the past had been?

Q: Was Madam Mao (Chiang Qing) pretty well identified as the leader there?

DEAN: She was well identified as the leader of the extreme left. There is no question there. She and her Shanghai clique really held a lot of power, and she had much influence because of her close connection with Mao Zedong. Mao was rather mercurial, too. At one point he would swing over one way and then swing over the other way. She tried to keep him influenced to the most extreme policy. I think at that time he was beginning to fail mentally, too. So she was a dangerous woman and perceived as such, not just by the leadership but by large numbers of the populace, who knew what was going on. Of course, hundreds of millions did not know, and had no idea, living in the countryside or in far-off places. Others who were in Beijing and the larger cities, such as Shanghai, had a pretty clear idea of the big power struggle.

Q: How were your contacts in Hong Kong? I mean how was Hong Kong responding to this, both the government at the British level and down below?

DEAN: I think they were responding with alarm. They could see a repeat of the 1962 situation where they had to set up barbed wire and have the police and the army push back masses of people who were trying to cross the border into Hong Kong as a result of the failure of the Great Leap Forward. They foresaw that similar things would happen again if the Cultural Revolution did leak over into Hong Kong. It was mostly during the period when I was in Taipei. During that period my friend Trevor Bedford was snatched. He was a high ranking policeman who was kidnapped by the Red Guards and later released. In Hong Kong there were bombs left in certain places and some prominent individuals had live snakes put into their mailboxes in packages. Open them up and there is a poisonous snake. So, there were all sorts of threats and things like that. The regime in Beijing was trying to prevent the Cultural Revolution from affecting Hong Kong. Hong Kong was still the source of a great deal of China's foreign exchange and their trade, so they wanted to preserve it, but it proved impossible to control everybody. Things just became chaotic. People were worried about the future. Was their future going to be one of disintegration and chaos, or were they going to be able to ride out this period? It was a tense time, I think, and for the intellectuals it was a period of extreme worry.

Many of them were sent down to the countryside to work in pig sties. I remember one woman I met some years later. She had been sent to far-off Inner Mongolia. The local peasants hated the people who came down from the cities. Mostly they were intellectuals; they had no idea how to farm. Their hands weren't ready for hard work nor their health, and they were just extra mouths to feed, so they were really not received very well. They were set to the most menial work. She was cleaning out pig sties and all sorts of the rotten jobs you can find on a farm, but she did it willingly and built herself a reputation. Some years later, they voted to send her back to school teaching. She had been a school teacher in Shanghai. But it was true of everything. Children were betraying their parents, denouncing them as bourgeoisie capitalists or denouncing them for having said this or that, and the parents would be sent down to the countryside to slave away on farms. The whole place was so disrupted.

I don't know if I mentioned earlier, but I went to Jinan, which is the capital of Shandong province. There is a hill, called the 1000 Buddha Mountain outside the city. Over the centuries Buddhist statues, huge ones and small ones, had been carved in the stone. The Red Guards had smashed off the heads of every single one of these statues using dynamite if it was a really big one or axes if it was smaller, so the whole place was destroyed. Many other cultural sites were destroyed as well. In some cases the army came out and protected temples and other buildings on orders from their local commanders. Sometimes army units were fighting against each other. Many temples, many priceless scrolls, and all sorts of artifacts were destroyed during this period. I think that the human destruction, destruction of their history, and the fact that the schools were closed for ten years, made this period one of the darkest times one can think of in Chinese history. It had such a major effect on the future in terms of losing a great pool of educated people, and also the attack on the intellectuals left China without much guidance in that area. It has taken a long time to build back. So, I think China really suffered enormously during the Cultural Revolution. In my view, you have to blame it completely on Mao Zedong and his policies. It is just as you see in Dr. Lee's book, Mao acted like an emperor, aloof and isolated. People were even afraid to approach him. When they did, it took months to get him to focus on any policy that would improve the lot of China's people. In Hong Kong at that time we were just doing the best we could to give an honest assessment of what was happening in the mainland. As for Hong Kong itself, we had very good relations with the British government and with the Chinese members of that government, as well as with Chinese merchants, bankers, lawyers, either professionals and with the media as well. We worked hard on all of these contacts, and one of our major targets was the American Chamber of Commerce. They had good information and we would exchange ours with them, and we tried to build up really close ties with the Chamber and to help them as much as we could. I feel Hong Kong and Taiwan were two places I have been where the relationship with the American Chamber was very close indeed, and invaluable.

Q: Was the Consulate General feeling the pressure of the people of Hong Kong, particularly those with money, to make sure they had American passports and green cards?

DEAN: Yes. A lot of them tried to do that. They could get E-visas if they were investing in the United States, because Hong Kong was a British crown colony at that time, so they could get treaty trader visas. Many of the wealthy Chinese had children in the United States, and it was easy for them to get permanent residence. For tax reasons, most of them did not, but they all had visitor's visas to go if something happened.

Q: They were all keeping their...

DEAN: That's right. Some of them had their seagoing yachts ready to get on and go. They could reach the Philippines or elsewhere. Most people felt they would have enough warning. Except for the incidents I mentioned when the Cultural Revolution spilled over but was contained by the police and the army, there wasn't that feeling of panic in Hong Kong or the fear that Hong Kong was going to be overwhelmed. The incidents I spoke of happened in '67 and '68. By the time we are talking about in the early '70s, Hong Kong was more worried about its trade and its economy. The stock market had fallen through the floor, having gone up very high, it had come down very low. Many people lost their money. But, things on the mainland seemed to be settling down.

Zhou En-lai was back. His influence seemed to be apparent, and the flow of the Red Guards was beginning to recede. The frenetic sending of people off to the countryside was beginning to stop, but people hadn't come back. Things seemed to be calmer, and this is the period when we established our Liaison Office. But, under the surface, as I mentioned, things were seething and bubbling and ready to break open again. It was a fascinating period of time. We were very busy, as you can imagine, in the Consulate General, not only with the visa applicants and the business interests, but with the analysis of what was happening economically as well as politically on the mainland, and with our support of the new Liaison Office in Beijing and our efforts to help as much as we could.

Q: Did the war in Vietnam play any part in what you were doing?

DEAN: Yes, of course. It was a major factor. We had an enormous number of ship visits. Hong Kong was an R&R place for the navy. Ships that had gone down to the Vietnam area had come back, so their crews had R&R. It was an R&R post for lots of people from Vietnam, too. Soldiers and others came from Vietnam for rest and recuperation. That was an important area. I think Hong Kong merchants benefited a lot. They were making equipment for the military in Vietnam. Everything from web belts to buckles and boots, everything you could think of, so in a way they prospered with the Vietnam War. Of course, behind all of this was the reason for the Nixon-Kissinger opening to China. They not only wanted to use China as a barrier to the Soviet Union's expansionism, but as a way of trying to resolve the Vietnam War. That was one of their primary reasons for the new policy. I think everybody understood that, at least in our office, so Vietnam was tied in to everything that was happening at that time, and Hong Kong did have a role in the ways that I mentioned.

Q: With China hands, of which you were one, Hong Kong was always the greatest concentration, was there a new rise in morale and chomping at the bit because all of a sudden China was opening up?

DEAN: I think most people in Hong Kong were pleased that China was opening up, as was the American public. I think there was a great wave of approval when President Nixon made his announcement about his forthcoming visit, but I think we were sort of realistic because the Chinese are not that easy to deal with. We found that even during Nixon's visit there were hard negotiations going on about the Shanghai Communiqué. Marshal Green by that time had been brought into the net with John Holdridge and others, and the Chinese were really very tough on the question of Taiwan and other specific issues. I think that no one thought it was going to be easy. I had a great deal of experience dealing with the Chinese in Warsaw already. I didn't think it was going to be easy. The Chinese government wasn't settled then. It was impossible to see smooth sailing. The best we could hope for was gradual incremental progress in the relationship, and that is what we did hope for. I think most people in our Embassy in Taipei, as well as Hong Kong and most of the Department, felt these moves were good for the United States, that it was in the U.S. national interest to move in this direction, so I feel there was almost a unanimity. There were a few people, of course, who kept thinking about the past instead of the future, but they were in a very distinct minority at that time. Still, some people were suspicious about China and whether the relationship would work, what China would do in the future, and whether it would be able to recover from the Cultural Revolution. Who knew? There really was a lot of guesswork going on then.

DEAN: That's right, I went back to the Department.

Q: Doing what?

DEAN: I went to personnel. I got a job as the chief of the junior officer division in personnel.

Q: You were doing that from '74 to...

Q: Was there much emphasis in the '74-'76 period one to recruit women and two, to get them into jobs that would be challenging?

DEAN: There was some emphasis then, but it wasn't as much as it later became. We were delighted to get any woman applicant who would come in through the examination process or who was a mustang, but there weren't very many, very few to tell the truth. I think later there was a bigger push to try to recruit more women, but at that time, there weren't many at all. I remember trying to help in some cases like Tip O'Neill's daughter who was a reserve Foreign Service officer; she wanted to transfer in. I thought she had a lot of potential and tried to get her assignments that would help her. There were some officers who had been brought in from cultural affairs. The question was whether we could convert them to Foreign Service officers or whether they would have to go back to USIA. One was a really good linguist who had been the director of our Chinese language school out in Taipei, George Beasley. I tried to get him regularized as a Foreign Service officer. In several individual cases like that we tried to find really good people, and he was excellent. He had a good background and excellent capabilities. He could have competed with anybody. We were doing our best, but it was on a really small scale. I think the big push came later. There was a lady Foreign Service officer, Allison Palmer, who would come frequently to our office on behalf of some applicant or other saying the reason we hadn't brought them on board was because of discrimination or she would claim someone hadn't been promoted. She was a very tough person, but I don't think she was right, because we would have been happy to help women officers.

Q: She was talking about somebody who had not come into the Foreign Service?

DEAN: Right.

DEAN: Yes, I almost left early. Bill Sullivan asked me to go and be his deputy in the Philippines, but I felt that I had made a commitment to the Department to serve the two years I had agreed on in personnel. Also I was interested in what I was doing, and I didn't want to just drop it and go off and leave everything in the lurch, so I courteously declined and stayed there. Later, Bill Gleysteen in EAP came down and asked me when my two years were up if I would go to Beijing to our Liaison Office. I said I would and that is where I went after my stint in personnel

Q: You went, is it called Beijing?

DEAN: Yes, the Chinese call it Beijing.

Q: You were in Beijing from when to when?

DEAN: I was there from '76 to '78 for a two year tour. I was working first with Bill Gates, who had been chairman of the Morgan Guarantee. He also had been Secretary of the Navy and briefly Secretary of Defense. He was a fine man. He had been appointed by Gerald Ford who, as you know, had taken over after Nixon when Nixon resigned. Ford was an old friend of Gates and had appointed him to this job with the idea that we would move forward with formal diplomatic relations with Beijing, and that is what Bill Gates really wanted to do. When I got to Beijing in June 1976, it was still a very difficult post because our people were isolated. There was the diplomatic community with whom we could interact, but not with the Chinese. The Chinese wouldn't have anything to do with the foreigners, not just the U.S. but with other foreigners also. So, one's whole life was with the other foreigners and not with the Chinese. It seemed so odd, so strange to be in such a huge country with so many hundreds of millions of people and to have your circle of both work and social contacts be limited to the other foreigners only. We were also treated in a somewhat different way because we were not part of the diplomatic corps. The Chinese every year, for example, would have a big tour through China for the diplomatic corps. We got our own private tour. It was much better, frankly, with a smaller group. We traveled all over. It was a really interesting opportunity to see the country. Shortly after I got to Beijing, Zhu De, the famous marshal, one of the survivors of the Long March, died, so we all went to his funeral. Earlier in that year, Zhou En-lai had died in the spring. Then there had been a serious riot in Tiananmen in April of that year when lots of people came to pay their respects. The government forbade a funeral for Zhou En-lai. This was very unusual and everyone knew it was Madame Mao (Chiang Ching), his enemy, who was responsible. Deng Xiaoping had been purged just shortly after that for the third time. So, Chiang Qing and her cohorts seemed to be coming to the fore. Anyway, there was trouble in Beijing. Zhou En-lai was now gone; Zhu De was gone. Then the Tangshan earthquake erupted, the most devastating earthquake in recent history.

Q: A quarter of a million people.

DEAN: Yes, hundreds of thousands of people were killed and many more were casualties. The estimates of the dead were even higher than a quarter of a million, they were closer to half a million, 500,000 at one time. The real number is somewhere in between those two figures, but there were literally hundreds of thousands killed. I saw the city of Tangshan later. It had been leveled to the ground, huge cement structures were smashed to the ground, trains had been set on fire. The coal mines nearby had all been flooded; the miners lost their lives. It was a terrible tragedy. The whole effect of the earthquake which was about 8.2 to 8.4 on the Richter scale, spread to Tianjin. The Australian prime minister, Whitlam, was visiting there, and in the hotel in which he was staying, the building separated, there was a big gap; you could see all the way down to the bottom floor.

Lots of buildings in outlying Tianjin were destroyed. Even in Beijing where we were, many the old mud brick houses, high walls with heavy tile roofs, just collapsed because the shock waves were so great. In the apartment I was living in there were great big cracks in the wall right above all the doorways, and in some of the other apartments where our staff were, some of the balconies had fallen off. The authorities made everybody evacuate the hotels and the apartment buildings. The whole population of Beijing moved out to the streets, and people were living in shelters along the streets. Fortunately it was summer, but it was hot. There they were, all these millions of people living out in the streets. The streets were wide and the sidewalks were also wide, so they built their shelters on the sidewalks. We had to evacuate all of our dependents because we didn't have any place to keep them, so we sent all of the women and children off to Japan or Taipei or Hong Kong.

We kept the nucleus of our staff; we lived in the office building and in the Ambassador's residence because they are both low two story buildings. We brought a lot of mattresses down from storage and put them in the dining room and had sort of a dormitory, 10 people there, 12 in the living room, some in the offices and elsewhere. At the time we had a Congressional delegation visiting. It was a problem for them; we had to put them up, too, because they had been kicked out of the hotels which were closed, so we had about 15 or 20 of them take care of and to house and feed. There were severe aftershocks going on all the time. It was an extremely tense period of time. Like all things, gradually order was restored. After people had lived on the streets for something like six weeks, they gradually were able to move back into their buildings, some of which had been repaired or partially rebuilt. Gradually things came back to normal. The significant of this earthquake was identified by some Chinese as Mao Zedong losing the mandate of heaven, a sign that he was going to lose power. Sure enough, very shortly thereafter, he died. This was a very tense period because who was going to replace him? No one knew! Earlier, after Zhou En-lai died, Hua Guofeng had been appointed premier. He was not to last long in that job. I remember James Schlesinger had been invited for a visit. He arrived just as Mao died. The Chinese didn't want to cancel his visit, so they sent him out to the provinces, mostly in the northwest, for a tour, and then he came back a couple of weeks later for talks.

Q: He was what at that point?

DEAN: He had been Secretary of Defense. He was in China in a private capacity, but he had been invited by Mao, so they wanted to honor his visit. This period of time was so crucial because after the earthquake, and Mao's death, Madam Mao and her cohorts tried to seize power. This was the Gang of Four; who had their base in Shanghai. Madam Mao had sent orders to the Nanjing regional military commandeer, whose area also included Shanghai, ordering him to open up the Shanghai arsenals and arm the militia. The militia was loyal to her. She wanted the militia to be armed and to take over the city while she went to Beijing and negotiated with the other leaders. She wanted to use Shanghai as a major lever. What happened, and we all found this out from the big character wall posters after she fell, was that the Center heard about her plan and they ordered the Nanjing military commander, General Ding, not to arm the militia. He was wavering so they sent the former military commander, Xu Shiyu, who had been posted to Canton a few months earlier, to come back and assume charge. Most of the top military commanders in the Nanjing region owed their promotions to General Xu. He was really very popular. He came back and ordered General Ding to guard the arsenals and not to arm the militia. The commander refused. Xu Shiyou, according to the big posters, drew his revolver and shot him and then sent regular military troops to guard the arsenals. Chiang Qing (Mrs. Mao) in the meantime was in Beijing thinking her militia was in control or would be shortly, but she was seized and imprisoned by the top leadership. That was the end of Chiang Qing. You should have seen the public reaction when the news broke. I was at a dinner with the British Chargé and the German Ambassador and a few others in the Sichuan Restaurant (one which Deng Xiaoping really liked). Arthur Burns was visiting at that time and it was a dinner for him. I had heard earlier from a young Chinese student, an American who had come to visit his grandfather, who was a member of the National People's Congress. The grandfather had heard, strictly through the grapevine, of the arrest of Chiang Qing and the other members of the Gang of Four, and he told his grandson. The grandson told one of the wives of our officers (That was when our people still stayed at a Beijing hotel) and she told us. So, we had that information, and at the dinner, the British Chargé told me that his driver had told him that Madame Mao (Chiang Qing), had been arrested. So we put these two things together and it seemed just too good to be true. It was a development that I think everybody had hoped for. Two or three days later, this information spread over the whole city. I have never seen such a huge roar of popular approval. Huge numbers of people came to Tiananmen Square and started snake dances all through the whole square, beating drums, setting off firecrackers. It was the biggest spontaneous celebration I have ever seen in my life. Chinese military officers and others who had always shunned foreigners were grabbing people from our staff who were down there observing and were having their pictures taken with them. It was a really complete, absolute turnabout in the attitude of the people. They obviously felt so happy and so pleased that they weren't going to fall under the constantly left-leaning struggle and the revolutionary zeal of Chiang Qing. It was a big boost for the city. Then, gradually Deng Xiaoping came back to power. He had been purged after Zhou En-lai died, but he came back for the third time and gradually began to take over power as vice premier. He had ties all over the country with the military, with the top bureaucracy, with everyone, so it didn't take him long to consolidate his power. We had several meetings with him because various groups of congressmen and senators would come, and he would always give them a big banquet in one of the restaurants near the Forbidden City, which no foreigners had been able to visit before. He was a short feisty man; very interesting, and very practical. He said, "It doesn't matter whether a cat is black or white, as long as it catches mice." "Learn truth from facts." He knew of all of the distortions that happened during the Great Leap Forward and the Cultural Revolution. He was a practical person but still very authoritarian. He was a communist, but he was very sensible.

Q: Were you finding a change, outside of the Tiananmen Square demonstration, for foreigners particularly you and others?

DEAN: Yes, absolutely. After Deng Xiaoping's return there was a great change in the foreign ministry people we dealt with and the academics, intellectuals and government officials. Much different. Before, for example, the only Chinese we could ever invite for a dinner were the head of the Diplomatic Service Bureau and his colleagues. We would invite them to a dinner at my place, ply them with drink and they would have a really good time. Then the next few days, as they were in charge of dispersing apartments or drivers or cooks, and it was like a jackpot. We would get a whole series of these things. But, those were literally the only people we could invite.

Q: That was your connection for survival as opposed to finding out what was going on in the country.

DEAN: That's right and that was done for administrative reasons. We couldn't talk to anybody else. Later we really had much franker conversations with the foreign ministry people and other officials, or the Chinese at the universities began to tell us all the things that had happened to them during the Cultural Revolution. I mentioned the wall posters. They went into great detail about how Zhou En-lai had been attacked by Madame Mao. They revealed all sorts of other things; it was fascinating. Of course we went to Mao Zedong's funeral. They built, in an exceptionally short period of time, a huge mausoleum for him in Tiananmen Square. There he was lying in state. I think history will prove that if he had stepped down in 1950 when he ended the civil war, he would have been thought of as a great man instead of more of a monster. He caused so much damage to China, economic and intellectual and physical damage, it was unbelievable. At that time I was working for Leonard Woodcock.

Q: You were what, the DCM?

DEAN: Yes. Tom Gates had wanted to stay, but the new administration wanted its own man, so Leonard Woodcock came, and I also worked for him. He was very interested in his job, in the Chinese, and in trying to move ahead with diplomatic relations. Tom Gates had been very disappointed that there weren't any moves on his watch about regularizing relationships. He even sent me back to the Department with a letter to the President asking why we weren't moving ahead and making use of his recommendations to do so. I went back and took the letter to Habib and asked him to proceed as he thought best. It was pretty clear that we weren't ready right then to move further ahead. Both Tom Gates and I would have liked to, but I didn't think that Washington was ready. Later on that summer, Secretary of State Vance came to Beijing in late August '77. He proposed to Deng Xiaoping that the U.S. switch its Liaison Office from Beijing to Taipei and its Embassy from Taipei to Beijing. He said either a U.S. Liaison Office in Taipei or a U.S. Consulate General in Taipei would enable us to establish our Embassy in Beijing. Deng Xiaoping characterized this proposal as a step backward in the negotiations with the U.S. because he claimed that both Ford and Nixon-Kissinger had claimed that the U.S. would not have any official relationship with Taiwan, and what Vance was suggesting was an official government office of one type or another in Taipei. Therefore there was no progress during that visit. Leonard Woodcock and I were both disappointed at the time.

Q: Disappointed in the Washington proposal or the Chinese reaction?

DEAN: Disappointed that the Chinese had turned him down, because it would have saved a lot of heartbreak and problems later on in the relationship with Taiwan. We still had an official relationship. Taiwan would have been happier to have an official liaison office there with an Ambassador rather than the American Institute in Taiwan (AIT), which they eventually got. But anyway, Vance was not able to reach any agreement with the Chinese. Later on Brzezinski became very interested in doing something which was anti-Russian in scope, anti-Soviet.

Q: Brzezinski was National Security Advisor and was looking at everything with a certain amount of Polish view.

DEAN: Yes, that's true. He was a bright and engaging person and who knows, perhaps the idea of using the Chinese against the Russian was an attractive one at that time. We are talking about May 1978. By that time the Vietnam War was long lost, but we were still locked with the Soviets in the Cold War, and Brzezinski felt that China would be a really good ally against the Soviets. So, he wanted to move the U.S. forward into formal diplomatic relations with China, and make them a formal ally against Moscow, but at least use them in the game against the Soviet Union. Brzezinski went out to the Great Wall and brandished an AK-47 and said, "This is for the polar bear." He had his discussions with the Chinese and they agreed to start negotiations later on in the summer between Washington and Beijing. These negotiations were kept very secret. They were run by the National Security Council and by the USLO, the U.S. Liaison Office in Beijing. They weren't disseminated among other people. At that time, my tour was up, and I left for a job in the Department in INR as head of the East Asia section. My replacement, Stapleton Roy, was the one who did most of the work with Woodcock on the negotiations with the Chinese. I came back leading a group of Congressmen and Senators in the fall, just before Thanksgiving, and Stapleton Roy and Leonard Woodcock gave us a good briefing. But, at that point there had been no breakthrough on the crucial question of continued U.S. arms sales to Taiwan to bolster their defense against any mainland attack. The Chinese were adamantly opposed to the U.S. continuing arms sales, even of a defensive nature, and the U.S. side would not move ahead unless there was some agreement that we would continue arms sales. After our visit to Beijing, I traveled all over China with this Congressional group. They were interested and interesting people. Senator Muskie was there, as was Senator Stone, Packwood, and several others. Muskie has died, and the others are no longer in Congress. It was a very good trip. The Chinese made a major effort to accommodate their interests. Stapleton Roy gave us an excellent briefing in Beijing. But as I said, there had been no breakthrough.

The breakthrough came shortly afterwards in early December. The Chinese decided they wanted to go ahead with formal relations. They reserved the right to raise the arms sales issue at a later date. They were putting it to one side and letting diplomatic relations proceed, and we did establish diplomatic relations. President Carter, on the fifteenth of December, 1978, said that as of the first of January, 1979, two weeks later, the U.S. was to establish formal diplomatic relations with Beijing, that we were to break all relations with Taipei, that we were to withdraw the remainder of our military forces in Taiwan, which at that time were just a few hundred, and that we were to give one year's notice to terminate the Mutual Defense Treaty that we had with Taiwan. In 1954 the treaty's revision said that it could be terminated with one year's notice. We were to do all of these things, and of course, not too many people in the State Department or in the whole bureaucracy knew anything about this. Very little preparation had been made. The breakthrough came suddenly; the announcement came shortly after that. The negotiations had been kept secret because the administration did not want Taiwan's friends in the Congress to disrupt them or to hinder them, so here was a fait accompli, but what were we going to do with Taiwan? Well, "L's" (Bureau of Legal Affairs) Jim Michel drew up a quick version of the Taiwan Enabling Act, or what later became the Taiwan Relations Act. It didn't deal with arms sales. It didn't deal with protection of economic interests on both sides. It didn't deal with a lot of issues which Congress, when they got the draft, felt were important. So, on a bipartisan basis Senator Frank Church and Senator Jacob Javits got together in the Senate and Zablocki and Lester Wolfe and others in the House, and they worked on a bipartisan plan to bring about a Taiwan Relations Act which did include a large section on arms sales, which included language very similar to the Mutual Defense Treaty, that any attack on Taiwan would be viewed with serious concern by the United States. They stopped short of saying what our response would be. They protected economic assets on both sides; they gave Taiwan, in effect, the status of a foreign country to argue its cases in U.S. Courts. They gave all sorts of protections of immunities, not diplomatic immunity but functional immunity, which later was similar to immunity given to foreign consulates or organizations in the United States. They added many provisions like that. For example, they gave Taiwan 20,000 immigrant visas annually, similar to the quotas of other countries. This was something Taiwan hadn't had before. They treated them in many respects like a foreign country, but they said the relationship would be unofficial and would be conducted by the American Institute in Taiwan, a non-governmental private organization. That is where I came in. I had been in INR just for a few months, and I volunteered to Dick Holbrooke to help build up this new American Institute.

Q: Dick Holbrooke was...

DEAN: Assistant Secretary of State for East Asian Affairs. We were concerned that AIT not be politicized, that it become a professional organization subject to the Department's guidance in terms of policy. The American Institute in Taiwan was not established to originate policy; it was to carry it out, and that is what we did. So, the Institute was started in a little basement room where the old FSI used to be. We had a room smaller than this. It was about 12'x12'. We jammed three desks in there and we had one secretary and three officers.

Q: Well, when you started, was there a concern that somehow this might turn out to be one of these things where they would haul some political figure out as a very strong proponent of Taiwan, and this would sort of muddy the waters and set a precedent. Was this a concern?

DEAN: Yes, it was a concern, and that person might go directly to the White House, for example, or might be at odds with the State Department over what policy we would pursue. We emphasized in our negotiations with Beijing that we would have only unofficial relations with Taiwan. The Taiwan Relations Act added on a lot of things that were apparently official, but they gave the President certain leeway. President Carter, when he signed the Act, said the Congress had given him certain leeway, and he would interpret that in light of the negotiations with Beijing on diplomatic recognition. Of course, AIT was just an idea. We had to borrow the $15.00 to go down to the District of Columbia and register AIT as a nonprofit organization. We didn't have any money. I got into an argument with the Department administrative people because our people out in Taiwan had been put on administrative leave. Later we were going to turn them into AIT employees. The Taiwan Relations Act said that AIT employees may not be U.S. government employees, so we had to separate them from the Department. In the meantime, they were on administrative leave. Some of the administrators in the Department wouldn't let me send air pouches out there with their letters and credit card bills and everything because the Department didn't have any money for the American Institute in Taiwan. I had to go to a higher authority and say, "Can't you just please pay for them anyway and send them out," and they did. It was that type of little problem that was multiplied a hundred fold in every little thing you could think of. Because the Taiwan Relations Act said we were private, nongovernmental, and our employees were not to be U.S. government employees, we had to deal endlessly with personnel and administration, and not just with the Department, but with other departments and agencies to resolve problems. We wanted everybody in Taiwan to be converted to AIT employees regardless of which agency they had come from; USIA, Agriculture, Commerce or elsewhere. We gave them the same allowances, the same types of leave as Foreign Service Officers.

Every single department had different rules for allowances, shipment of household goods, school allowances and home leave and whether they could ship an automobile and the type of housing they could have. We wanted to treat everybody the same way, and we wanted them all to report through the Director of AIT, and not individually, to their departments. Initially, for the first few years, we were able to hold the line, and everything worked out very well in terms of employee morale. Everybody was being treated the same way and got the same benefits in terms of working together and in terms of our relations with their parent agencies and departments back in Washington and everyone enjoyed a harmonious relationship. Things from that point of view went very smoothly. It was working out the details back here that was really frustrating. Eventually Washington's bureaucracy's insisted on regaining their separate controls. We didn't have any problem with EAP, the Bureau of East Asian and Pacific Affairs. Their policy guidelines were very clear, and we understood them. We followed them, and that pleased Department policy makers. They wanted us to be as unofficial as possible. But the administrative side complained they had no experience dealing with an unofficial organization that was carrying out U.S. foreign policy abroad. Our director was just a private citizen; he was not an Ambassador. So we continued to have difficulties of different sorts up until the present day with the administrative side of things, although we tried hard to resolve them.

Q: How did you, I mean here you are in this organization; did you have a State Department badge and all of that?

DEAN: Because the State Department lawyers said it would be a conflict of interest if I signed the AIT contract with the State Department, while still being a State Department officer, I retired from the State Department, early in January of '79 in order to take over AIT, to help found AIT, and to manage it and sign the contract with the Department. The contracting officer had never had a contract of this type before. The legal provisions kept defeating him and us. We kept trying to modify and simplify it, but it wasn't easy because nobody had dealt with a situation of this type before, so there was a lot of confusion. Anyway we eventually got things working. Fortunately, we had a terrific administrative officer, Jack Connally. He is still on contract with the Department. He has retired, but the Department calls him back and sends him to different spots to try to solve administrative problems. He was really an experienced, positive thinking officer. We were so lucky to have him because the problems were so enormous and so frustrating. He did a marvelous job. We also had Joe Kyle who had been economic counselor in Taipei and had served in the EA Bureau. He came on board in January as our economic officer. Joe was experienced and a good negotiator with both the U.S. bureaucracy and the Chinese. He negotiated many agreements with Taiwan and kept track of economic developments there.

Q: You say you couldn't pay anybody. Most people who work for the government, and I speak from experience, don't have a back log. I mean we need our monthly check.

DEAN: That's right, but we couldn't do anything about that until President Carter signed the Taiwan Relations Act in April 1979. Once he signed the Act, we signed a contract with the Department, and the Department started to fund us. Fortunately, because our staff in Taipei had been put on administrative leave and had not converted yet to AIT, the Department was able to pay them.

Q: I am a bit confused. Let's take fisheries. There are fishery people who know fish, and you don't know fish. There are fishery people in Taiwan who know fish.

DEAN: And we would bring them together.

Q: You would act in what would be known in Hollywood parlance as the beard. The man who takes somebody else's mistress to a party so somebody else can get together with her. That was known as the beard.

DEAN: We were the beard plus! What we would do is bring the fishery delegation from Taipei to Washington, not the other way around usually. Then the fisheries experts would meet with each other. If we could spare a person, we would have them there, if not they would meet by themselves in a place that we would arrange at AIT, or a hotel room, or it could be anywhere at that time, but not in the office of our fisheries experts. So they would meet; they would negotiate. When they got to an agreement we would have to sign it. We would sign it, and there was a provision in the Taiwan Relations Act that we had to report all of these agreements to Congress. We were also the repository of all of these agreements. If anyone in the public wanted a copy, they would have to come to us. They were also printed in the federal register. Yes, in a sense we were the beard, but in another sense, we served as the unit that coordinated people and cut through a-lot of red tape. You know if there is to be a meeting of people from the State Department, the Defense Department, Treasury, Commerce, they dance around with all sorts of briefing papers and clearances. We would just pick up the telephone and say we are having a meeting here tomorrow, please send a representative. They always did. We didn't have a lot of paperwork, so we cut through a lot of red tape. We facilitated a lot of agreements; we got things done much faster than the normal process worked. The Taiwan representatives were amazed that things like that were happening. Of course Taiwan didn't like the setup; they wanted an official office, not an unofficial one. They wanted to go to the State Department and the National Security Council and talk to everybody in the various departments and they couldn't do that. They wanted to have high level visitors coming from Taipei, and from Washington to Taipei, and they couldn't have that either. There were lots of things they couldn't have that made them unhappy, but in terms of the substantive work, getting agreements done, cutting through red tape, facilitating real work, then AIT did a pretty good job.

Q: How about the representation of Taiwan in Washington. What was your role in that?

DEAN: We had to make all their official appointments for them. We were the interface for them in Washington. They would come to us if they needed to see someone, and we would meet either in our office or arrange a luncheon or a dinner or a breakfast. We had lots of breakfast meetings, and we would get someone from the Department, maybe the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State and a few others to discuss a particular problem. We would discuss it over breakfast and get a solution usually, I mean if a solution could be reached, or at least they would pass their messages back and forth and hope they would reach the proper recipient. So, they had that type of contact, and when visitors came from Taiwan, legislative groups or others, we would brief them in our office, make their schedule, including calls with the Congress. At that time, the State Department was shy of having these people in the building, but later on legislators could go in, but no Chinese officials, in the State Department or the National Security Council or White House. So things worked out. If I had to do it again, I would have made a memorandum of conversation for every single discussion I had with the Department's administrative people, because we didn't have a good record of what had been agreed upon as the years went by and that was unfortunate. Other than that, under the circumstances, we did the best we could, and we tried to help Taiwan's Coordination Council. Taiwan's office in the U.S. was called the Coordination Council for North American Affairs. Subsequently, in '94, they changed their name to TECRO, which was Taipei Economic and Cultural Representative's Office in the United States because they had to have Taipei or Taiwan in there so people would know where to go to get a visa. In those early days, we did our best. There were lots of embarrassments. In the beginning the State Department was very tentative about dealing with Taiwan at all. They felt that Taipei and their friends in Congress wanted to throw a spanner in the new gears of the relationship with Beijing. Taipei wasn't helping itself at that time because it was always saying that the relationship with the U.S. had some elements of officiality in it, or when we signed the privileges and immunities agreement, Taipei claimed it was diplomatic privileges and immunities. Before you could say Jack Robinson, the PRC Embassy would be in there protesting about a diplomatic agreement, and about the names Taipei used, the Republic of China, and all this type of thing. Washington was really tentative in dealing with Taiwan and worried about Taiwan's attitudes and what they would try to do. They were worried about the new relationship with Beijing. We tried to soothe these feelings both on Taiwan's side and on the Department's side and to build a bridge between the two so they could communicate in a less frenzied, uptight way. I think that helped a little bit. For one thing, I had a very good relationship with President Chiang Ching-kuo. I had served in Taiwan before, so I had met him much earlier. We had become, I would say, good friends. I admired him and respected him, and I think we had a level of confidence in our conversations with each other. I went to Taiwan soon after AIT got started early in '79 and saw him. He had determined he would do everything he could to make the relationship with Washington work. He saw relations with the U.S. as vital to Taiwan's security, although a lot his countrymen and high officials were livid about the break in the relationship and the U.S. diplomatic relations with China. He himself calmed them down and tried to rebuild the relationship. He really did a great service to his country by doing that. Unfortunately, right after the break in relations, on December 27, 1978, Deputy Secretary Christopher and Roger Sullivan, a Deputy Assistant Secretary in EAP and others in EAP had gone to Taipei on a special mission to work out the new relationship. When they got there, the whole cavalcade was met by a mob of students and workers who smashed the windows of the cars, jumped up and down on the roofs, forcing the roofs down on the seat backs with passengers crouching on the floors. Some of the passengers were cut by the flying glass. I think that this riot had a profound impression on the victims. Christopher and the others who came with him became sour about Taiwan and the relationship. It was foolish of us to have sent a mission to Taipei at that particular time because we should have anticipated some public outrage. We should have met in Guam or Hawaii and worked out things in a calmer atmosphere. Partly it was our own fault and partly it was a demonstration that got out of hand, and partly the fault of the foreign minister and others in Taiwan. Things were pretty tense. Eventually President Chiang sent his ablest negotiator, his vice minister of Foreign Affairs, Yang Hsi-kun, to Washington. He was highly respected here. He was an independent thinker, but really brilliant. He worked very hard with the State Department. He got the agreement we now have with the American Institute in Taiwan, its functions in Taipei, its functions in Washington, and the Coordination Council's functions in Washington. The Chinese set up an office in Taipei too. So the agreement was worked out and both sides began to move ahead with the relationship. I think that it has worked reasonably well. At the very beginning, some people thought this would be a short term solution, that things would change in five or 10 years at the most. The unofficial relationship has been going on for 20 years. The 20 year anniversary will be next April. It looks to me that it will go on for a long time after that, perhaps, another 10 or 20 years. So we have this organization, the American Institute in Taiwan. It has had its ups and downs, but I think it has tried very hard to carry out its responsibility, and it had some very good people. Chuck Cross was our first director in Taipei. We had Jim Lilley and then Harry Thayer, Stan Brooks, and then myself later. I'll get to that.

Q: How did it work? I mean we had our office in Taipei. Somebody would sit down and write the equivalent to a political telegram reporting this. What would they do, send it?

DEAN: Send it to me. The telegram would be addressed to AIT Washington, and our telegrams to Taipei, all telegrams that went out to Taipei were from me. I would sign them; I mean my name would be on them. They would be sent by various organizations. The EAP Bureau would send them to other bureaus, after clearance.

Q: In other words these were basically State Department communications.

DEAN: Yes. We had a circuit to the State Department. I am only telling you what the form was. The form was put that way in case unclassified cables got into the public realm and it would be seen very clearly that they were being sent between AIT Washington and AIT Taipei. But, in the Department, in the communications sector, when AIT/Taipei telegrams came in, they would be distributed to all the departments and agencies according to subject or there even could be a byline on them, pass to so and so. We had the usual protection of our confidential materials. The Sea Bees came from Manila and built up our communications room and everything else with the normal type of equipment that an Embassy would have. We had full scale cooperation from the State Department in those respects. I mean you couldn't ask for better cooperation, in communications and technical support, things of that type. It worked out very well.

I think there was a lot of concern in Congress about Taiwan. The Taiwan Relations Act said that AIT had to report to Congress annually for the first three years, which we did. We would give Congress a report which would use the Department's resources as well as our own, a mutually agreed upon statement. Then I would speak at an open hearing about the relationship. I went up to testify several other times for several other reasons, particularly before Congressman Solarz, who was the chairman of the House Subcommittee on East Asia and the Pacific. He was concerned about several human rights and other cases, some of them just terrible. There was a big riot in Kaohsiung in 1979 at the end of the year. Elections had been postponed the previous year because of the break in relations. It was Human Rights Day so the oppositionists were demonstrating on both of these counts. The demonstration got out of hand. Something like 183 policemen were beaten up. Several rioters suffered some injury too. No one was killed, fortunately but several organizers were arrested. Congress and the Administration were concerned that the Taiwan government was going to give the death penalty to some of these people. Taiwan was still under military rule and martial law, and most of those arrested were going to be tried in a military court. In early January 1980 I was sent to Taipei to speak to President Chiang. This was three weeks after the riot. After we discussed it at length President Chiang assured me that none of the prisoners would get the death penalty, and that most would be tried in civilian court not military courts. In the final analysis, that is what happened. The Taiwan authoritarian government controlled the courts. President Chiang realized the impact on American public opinion if the prisoners were executed. He was a very unusual and farsighted man. He made it clear to me that he wasn't going to do this, and subsequently that proved to be the case. All of the prisoners who were given jail sentences are now out. Their jail sentences were shortened. President Chiang followed through on his promises to us. Some of those who were released from prison are now among the most prominent leaders of the opposition party in Taiwan, and they have played a major role in Taiwan's march toward democracy.

We worked hard, both in trying to restore confidence in our relationship with Taiwan through our military sales which were very important to them, but also through our conversations, negotiations, and other aspects of the relationship to reassure them that the U.S. was not just washing its hands of Taiwan and walking away as we had in 1949-1950 before the Korean War broke out. They had some experience with that. They were afraid we were going to take Taiwan and hand it to the mainland on a silver platter in pursuit of our own national interests. That suspicion was with them then, and I am afraid it is still with them today.

Q: In a way, this early period was helped by the fact that Taiwan was not a democracy and the mainland China was not a democracy so we didn't have an emotional stake of withdrawing our support from a "Democratic" country and pushing them into the jaws of a communist one.

DEAN: You could say that, but on the other hand we had had a long, close, and friendly relationship with the Republic of China, both on the mainland and Taiwan. They had lots of friends in the U.S. and in the Congress, and their economic ties with us were becoming more and more important as well. They had really good links with our military because many had gone to our various military training schools at the highest level. As well as low ones. We had trained their aviators, and had given their navy old destroyers and other ships. It was a very close relationship. We had a joint command, the Taiwan Defense Command, and joint war planning. There was a lot to the relationship which was suddenly brought to an end. This is the first time I can recall that we just broke diplomatic relations with a friend and ally, though we did have a mutual security treaty, in pursuit of our interests elsewhere. I think there was a feeling of guilt on our part for the way we had managed this relationship.

Q: I have done an interview with Nat Bellocchi who held your position somewhat later. I mentioned that the ROC, the people representing there, had an incredible network of friends. They really knew how to network, I mean they already had it through their mercantile interests and their military interests and all this. We are talking now about the early 1990s, the mid-1990s, the mainland Chinese just didn't have this type of relationship. I was wondering whether you found yourself running into that network.

DEAN: Oh, yes. Even in a lot of my testimony before Congress. There were those in Congress who resented the fact that the U.S. had broken relations with Taiwan and asked really pointed questions about the new relationship which they resented, I remember Derwinski, who was a Congressman from Illinois, while we were in some grain sales conference (Taiwan had sent us a grain purchasing mission that was in Chicago.) seated on the same platform saying to me in an aside, "If I had my way we would send our battleships to Taiwan, restore diplomatic relations, and put the U.S. flag back up on the embassy there." He was speaking from the heart; that is what he really felt, and lots of others felt that way. It was a delicate time in the State Department's relationship with Congress, its relationship with Taiwan, and frankly in Taiwan not everybody was going the same way the president wanted to go. There were those who wanted to embellish the relationship and restore officially, but carefully, so as not to offend the U.S. Administration.

Q: Well now, you must have felt you were the greatest nuancer in the world as far as having to deal with this. I was thinking that the Taiwan representation in the United States, particularly in those early times, were trying every way to almost exacerbate the problem.

DEAN: What they had done was to compensate for the lack of official relations by sending over all sorts of missions, purchasing missions, sports groups, cultural groups, and inviting to Taiwan, congressmen, senators, staffers, governors, educators, mayors, everyone you could think of. There was a constant stream of visitors, and still is.

Q: They paid their way.

DEAN: Yes, of course. This is still going on. They use the alumni association of Tung Hai University to invite people, or Suchow University or other private universities. They did this to compensate for the lack of other types of official contact, and quite successfully. They had very good congressional relations through people in their offices in Washington. They got to know all the staffers, all the congressmen. They were dropping in all the time giving them information about what Taiwan was doing. That has continued, but at the time, it was quite delicate and the new relationship made it even more so. It was very touchy with Beijing, and Congress was intent on following up to make sure things were run as they saw fit. Everybody had a different agenda and a different perspective. We tried to bring them all together.

Q: What about the mainland Chinese? Were they rattling rockets and doing much during this period?

DEAN: Well, of course, right after the announcement of diplomatic relations they were still very sensitive. I mentioned they flew off the handle when we signed the privileges and immunities agreement, and Taipei characterized them as diplomatic privileges. They were on the lookout for anything like that. On any showing of the Republic of China flag in the U.S., any sign of officiality, anything, they would protest right away. There were lots of protests to the State Department those first couple of years. Things got even more tense when President Reagan campaigned, when he was the candidate, because he said on several occasions that he would restore diplomatic relations with Taiwan.

Q: This was in 1980.

DEAN: Yes, that's right, the 1980 election. President Reagan gave several speeches. He said, "We will have an official government office in Taiwan. The relationship with Taiwan has many elements of officiality in it." He was known as a good friend of Taiwan. He had been there several times as Governor of California, and Richard Allen was writing a lot of his speeches for him. Richard Allen later became the National Security Advisor and worked in the word "officiality". I counted it eleven times in one speech. This drove the Chinese on the mainland up the wall because they were afraid Reagan would restore U.S. official relations with Taiwan. A lot of Republican visitors to Taiwan at that time, before the election, were promising Taiwan that relations would be upgraded. So here again we had a really tense and difficult situation.

I recall that various invitations for the inauguration had gone to Taiwan. Anna Chennault was the National Republican's Women's Committee leader. She had gotten the senate organizers of the presidential inauguration swearing-in ceremony to invite a delegation from Taiwan led by Y. S. Tsiang, Secretary General of the KMT, and several officials from Taiwan. The Chinese Ambassador heard about this and said that he would boycott the ceremony if Y.S. Tsiang came to it. So, I had to go along with John Holdridge to tell Y.S. he was disinvited. Fortunately he had checked himself into an Alexandria hospital with a "diplomatic illness." Earlier we urged Taipei to tell him not to come. Then Anna Chennault said, "Don't pay any attention to them. Come anyway." We again urged them not to come, but finally they did arrive. Y.S. was here. He knew that he wasn't going to be able to attend the ceremony. He checked himself into the Jefferson Hospital with the flu, and we went to the hospital to give him our commiserations. Anyway, he didn't go; the Chinese Ambassador did come, and the Reagan administration decided they would not upgrade relations with Taiwan.

Even so, the Chinese were really upset and they pressed the Reagan administration. They pressed us hard on arms sales, on the FX fighter plane, on all sorts of issues. Finally the Reagan administration decided that besides not upgrading the office in Taiwan and leaving things as they were, that they wouldn't sell the FX aircraft to Taiwan. We negotiated an arms sales agreement, signed on August 17, 1982, which said that U.S. arms sales to Taiwan would gradually decrease and that they would not exceed the quality or quantity of earlier arms sales. This agreement was made under the assumption that there would be a peaceful resolution to the Taiwan situation. The domestic repercussions were so severe that they affected Alexander Haig, who was Secretary of State in the early parts of the negotiation, and his pressing for this agreement was partially responsible for his resignation.

The entire conservative establishment in Washington reacted with cries of outrage and horror. Senator Barry Goldwater and Walter Judd, a former head of the Committee for One Million, went in to see President Reagan. Of course, this was orchestrated over several weeks and months, through the months of May, June, and July, really up to the August signing in '82. When Haig had gone to China in June, he had to use these words, "We will not exceed the quantity or quality of arms sales." This was not in his brief but they represented what he thought. They were written into the August '82 agreement. President Reagan was upset by his friends' reaction. He sent a letter to President Chiang Ching-kuo in July with six points in it concerning arms sales.

Two of the points are still important in other areas. One is that we would not be a mediator between Taipei and Beijing, and the other is that we would not press Taipei into talks or negotiations with the mainland. He sent the letter as a way of reassuring them. He said we had not discussed Taiwan arms sales in advance with Beijing and would not discuss them, would not agree to a certain time for ending arms sales, would not change the TRA, and would not change our position on Taiwan's sovereignty. So Reagan sent the letter in July and went ahead and authorized the signing of the Communiqué. I think by that time we had been backed into a corner and had no other option other than to sign it. But it has caused a lot of dissension. I think that whenever you have a document like that which one side is being forced into, you really can't expect it to last forever, and I think we have to say not only the spirit of the Communiqué has been violated, but several of its terms have been violated by us.

Q: When you talk about quality, what is quality.

DEAN: We had a rule of thumb. If something is no longer being produced, like a M-48 tank, then we were willing to sell the next higher production model. But that wasn't an agreement with China. Every time we did something like that, they would object strenuously. So we had a lot of trouble with China in the early Reagan period, during the campaign, during his first year in office, up to August of '82.

Q: Did you as an Institute have, I mean I would have thought you would have wanted to brief and really sit down and talk to the Reagan people around him. These were people coming in, there always is a learning curve for a new administration but particularly for one coming in as the Reagan one did. These were not old government hands who knew their way around. This was a brand new crew.

DEAN: That's right. On the other hand, they had some experienced people, John Holdridge, for example became Assistant Secretary for East Asian Pacific. Jim Lilley, whom I had known for a long time, went to the National Security Council. They knew what the score was, but you see they had two motives. They wanted gradually to improve relations with Beijing for our own national interest, and at the same time, they wanted to improve unofficial relations with Taiwan. And, this is exactly what they did. After the '82 Communiqué, the Reagan administration began to do both of these things. Relations with the mainland improved markedly. Relations with Taiwan improved markedly. From the summer of '82 until Tiananmen, we had good relationships with both sides. I won't say terrific; there were lots of problems with both countries. But they were solvable, and the trend was a positive trend. We did a lot with Taipei. Washington had a very good policy team. For once the National Security Council, the State Department and the Pentagon worked together. It was a pleasure to see because at other times they were so often at odds with each other, and I have seen that. In this case, there was Jim Lilley and Gaston Sigur, and Rich Armitage over in Defense. They were all friends. They were representing different organizations but could resolve whatever problems they had and present a unified position very well, and they achieved a great deal, both with Beijing and with Taiwan. That is where I had a hope things would continue to improve, but who could foresee Tiananmen.

Q: Tiananmen was in 1989, which we will come to. Before we end this, you left Washington in '87.

JOSEPH YAGER
Deputy Chief of Mission
Taipei, Taiwan (1957-1961)

Mr. Yager was born in Indiana and raised in Ohio. After earning a degree at the University of Michigan, he joined the US Army, where he served in China until joining the State Department in 1946. Mr. Yager became one of the Department's China specialists, serving in Canton, Hong Kong (Peiping) and Taipei, as well in Washington, where he continued to be involved in Chinese economic and political matters. Mr. Yager was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1999.

Q: So you were in Taipei from 1957 to when?

YAGER: 1961. Most of that time was as deputy chief of mission rather than economic counselor.

Q: You got out there about when in 1957?

YAGER: It was the middle of the year.

Q: How would you describe the situation on Taiwan at that particular point?

YAGER: We had had something of a disaster. The embassy had been attacked by a mob and looted and partly destroyed. So, when I arrived, the embassy was located in some excess space provided by an agency attached to the Navy called NAMRU2 (Naval Medical Research Unit). I had read all the information about that rather sad episode. The riot had been set off by a case where an American sergeant had shot and killed a Chinese who he said had been peeping at his wife taking a shower. He was tried in an American military court. We had an agreement with the Chinese there that made that the appropriate thing to do. He was acquitted. When he was acquitted, the Americans in the audience all stood up and applauded. All this was reported in the Chinese press. There was widespread indignation over this case. That led to this looting of the embassy. I would say that our relations were in a slump. There was great suspicion that Chang's son, Chiang Ching-kuo, was behind the looting of the embassy, but that was never proved. Certainly, some Chinese intelligence agency was involved or took advantage of it. Someone broke into the code room and got at the code machines. This had forced the changing codes all over the world. I think that that kind of action indicates some knowledge of where the code room was and a strong desire to get into it.

Q: Yes. Well, who was the ambassador when you arrived?

YAGER: Karl Rankin.

Q: I understand he was pretty shaken by this whole episode?

YAGER: Well, he had a minor problem with it. He had previously been stationed in Hong Kong. He and Mrs. Rankin had friends in Hong Kong. They liked to go there occasionally, which was done very easily. But when an ambassador leaves his post, he is supposed to notify the State Department. In this particular case, for some reason, Rankin just popped off to Hong Kong and did not tell the State Department. His deputy had to try to handle the riot and its repercussions. It wasn't excusable that Rankin was away, so he was criticized, but he stood quite well in Washington. Rankin was a good ambassador. He was a very intelligent man, very organized in his work. Everything that came along, he got on top of very quickly and efficiently. Under the circumstances, there was really no way for us to push Chiang Kai-shek to become more democratic. Perhaps, there was better opportunity a little later, and we did do a little bit of that later. Some people, including some members of his staff (not me), thought that Rankin was too accepting of the Chiang regime.

Q: I think this often is a division in embassies, where the more junior people think we should be doing more, which is easy, because they don't have the responsibility or see the repercussions. It's just "We should have more influence" or something like that. Actually, an embassy is there to deal as best it can with what is in place.

YAGER: The younger people had this feeling. They were quite good officers. I think they probably wanted to have the reporting be a little broader. The political counselor was very far right wing. Interestingly enough, at the time of the riot, his servants came back and expressed their sympathy with the riot. He had had some difficulty. Somebody had hit him over the head and he was bleeding. They expressed their pleasure that he had been hit. He shifted his attitude a little bit because of that experience.

Q: We're still talking about when you arrived. The China lobby, which was right wing, which had Congressman Judd, Walter Robinson, all were coming out of the right wing of the Republican Party. Did you feel under constraints about what you could report about the Chiang Kai-shek regime on Taiwan?

YAGER: As economic counselor, I felt no constraints. There was more to report than I and my small staff were able to report. So, that was not a problem. After about a year, I became first acting and then was confirmed, in the job of deputy chief of mission. From that perspective, I didn't feel any pressure from the China lobby. When I had been back in Washington as chief of the Division for Far Eastern Research, I didn't feel any constraints. I was never approached by the China lobby. I did come to know Mr. Walter Judd. He visited Taiwan frequently. I came to respect him. He was a very intelligent man. His views were not as right wing as is sometimes portrayed. He was a great one for rural development. That would be done in quite a democratic way. I would not put Judd in any negative light. I liked him.

Q: What about economic development during this period? Later, Taiwan had become an economic miracle, an economic powerhouse for a small country. Were the seeds there at the time?

YAGER: Oh, yes. Physically, even bureaucratically, some of the elements were already in place.

The Japanese had a system of farmer's associations that the Chinese had maintained and greatly improved. This was a system that could be used and was used to transmit technology down to the farmers and help them adopt better methods of growing things. The government included some very able people in the economic field. The vice president, Chen Cheng, was given a fairly free hand by Chiang Kai-shek in the economic field. He was one of the better Chinese nationalist generals. He was a very capable man. I got to know him quite well. He allowed the technocrats, the modernizers, to control economic policy within the limits set by Chiang. Chiang gave budgetary priority to the army. But with what was left, these modernizers were pretty free to do what they wanted to do. The AID agency and the embassy worked very closely with them. Even after I became DCM, I was heavily involved in this, because I was an economist.

Q: You talked about during the war. One of the earmarks of the Chiang Kai-shek regime in China proper during the 1930s and during the war was its corruption. Was that under control? How did we see that by this time?

YAGER: I don't think that corruption was a major phenomenon at the time we're talking about. Chiang himself was never accused of corruption. He was in fact anti-corruption, although unfortunately, the first criterion that he had in dealing with subordinates was loyalty. Competence and even honesty were less important. I don't remember any serious corruption cases. I did hear of petty bribes down the line. I think that the nature of the migration screened out some of the bad elements, though not entirely. In general, the professional class was made up of people who believed in a fresh start for their government on Taiwan. Of course, that was Chiang's own position. He unfortunately had the illusion that somehow he could get back to the mainland.

Q: Did you see a change or a problem with the difference between the mainland Chinese who came over and were the KMT cadre and the native Taiwanese? How was this working out during this 1957-1961 period?

YAGER: Oh, yes. The mainlanders were dominant. We quietly tried to encourage smoothing out these tensions. We felt that some progress being made, but the Taiwanese, as we called them then, were definitely in a very subordinate position. All the important jobs in the government and in state-owned enterprises were filled by mainlanders. Now, there were a few Taiwanese businessmen and industrialists who became important and who were allowed to prosper. I think that on a policy level, the mainlanders said, "Yes, they're all Chinese. We must treat them equally." But I think there was some feeling of superiority, that "These people had been under the Japanese for 50 years and they don't really know how to do things. We have to bring them along. We know how to do things. They really don't." They were a little contemptuous of them. They were also suspicious of them. They knew that some of them actually liked Japan, so the government prevented any Japanese newspapers from being carried into Taiwan and severely limited the showing of Japanese motion pictures, practically eliminated them. Actually, the Taiwanese had been allowed so little influence by the Japanese that they really didn't have many people that could occupy very high level positions. Take the military. The military before long became mostly Taiwanese draftees. Taiwanese were allowed into the military academies. But they would enter the army as a second lieutenants. How long would it be before you'd have a Taiwanese general? Quite a long time.

Q: Rankin left. He went to Yugoslavia, didn't he?

YAGER: Yes, he did.

Q: Who took his place and what was your role during this transition?

YAGER: Everett Drumright did. At the time that Drumright came in, I was acting DCM and I continued in that role for about three months. Drumright and I got on quite well. He wanted to have me permanently in that job. Robertson was pushing for Stirling Cottrell, who had been on detail to Indonesia. Why he wanted Cottrell so strongly, I don't know. He didn't know me. He just overruled Drumright and Cottrell came along. But of course, he was working for a man who hadn't wanted him. Cottrell, though a nice fellow, was a bit odd. He had some notions of tightening the administration in the embassy. He wanted the responsible section chief to tell him what he was going to do about every telegram that came in that required action before he did it. Well, that didn't go down very well. The political counselor, a different man than the one I mentioned earlier, and a smarter one, quickly undercut that policy. He created a mimeographed form listing a series of general things which might be done with a telegram and he would just check an item on this form and send it to Cottrell. So, Cottrell just didn't fit in very well. When he went off on leave after about three months, Drumright got me in the DCM job permanently.

Q: Could you talk a bit about Drumright? He is an old China hand. I think you served with him in Hong Kong, hadn't you?

YAGER: No.

Q: Oh, you had missed him. He was an old China hand.

YAGER: Yes. In Hong Kong, I was under McConaughy.

Q: How did you see Drumright relating to Chiang Kai-shek, to the situation there?

YAGER: Drumright was an old China hand, but an outsider. He was always more conservative than many people his general age and rank. He was a much better officer than his detractors claimed. He ran a very good embassy. When I became his deputy, I knew that he was known to be difficult and I said to myself, "Well, I am going to absorb the heat rather than pass it on." I followed that policy and it worked pretty well. It was a little hard on me, but still it worked. I found him quite capable and I respected his way of doing things, which were perfectly alright with me. He was known to Chiang as a friend of nationalist China and he got along with Chiang very well. On the other hand, I was an unknown, but I also got along with Chiang and Madam Chiang very well. They viewed themselves as historic characters, as I guess they were. Nevertheless, they treated my wife and me in a very friendly, helpful manner.

Q: How did you see Chiang Kai-shek's son, Chiang Ching-kuo?

YAGER: He was under a cloud because of the riot. He gradually became rather pro-American and more accessible. I got to know him quite well. I was a little surprised that when he came to power he was as democratic as he turned out to be. But I found him intelligent, pretty capable. I remember, he took a group of Americans on a bus tour across the East-West Highway. We stopped at one of the highest points of the highway overnight. I am not an early morning sleeper and neither is he, so I was up walking around and so was he. We went down a rather steep trail into an aboriginal village. He knew the people there, and they knew him. They talked to him in Chinese. I was quite impressed by his touch with people. I came increasingly to think that he was not a problem, but to some extent an asset.

Q: Yes. So often, the son just does not carry the weight that the father did and is just a weak reed, but in this case, he turned out to be a real plus in the whole political equation.

YAGER: He did eventually. He was really groomed for high office. His father moved him gradually up. He started out working with retired army personnel. They had an organization for that, whose name I now forget. Early on, he was given a leading role in the intelligence field. Then he was gradually moved up to better and better jobs. He learned that way. On the mainland, he had not been a great success. He was, in fact, quite a failure on the mainland.

Q: Let's talk a bit about the Quemoy Matsu Crisis, which sort of focused Americans' attention during the Kennedy-Nixon debates. How was that going? Could you explain what the Quemoy Matsu Crisis was conceived to be?

YAGER: I think except at the very beginning when the civil war was still going on, a communist threat to these islands was not seen as a prelude to an attack on Taiwan, which the Chinese communists really did not and probably still do not have the capability of mounting. It would be such a large amphibious operation over 100 miles of sea, even wider at some points. So, we thought the shelling was an effort to take these islands and thereby to weaken their nationalist adversary and possibly to drive a wedge between the Chinese nationalists and the United States. That was the kind of thinking that we had. The shelling came as quite a surprise. I was at a dinner in the official guesthouse with some senior Chinese officials and a number of other Americans when the news came of the beginning of the bombardment. It was totally unexpected. The nationalist minister of national defense was, by a bad coincidence, on Chinmen and he was caught in an open field by the bombardment. It was lucky he wasn't killed. Later analysis by the U.S. Army attaché of the bombardment concluded the bombardment was not a prelude to the landing of troops. It was not directed appropriately for that purpose. It was more kind of hit everything and raise a big storm, but it wasn't directed carefully against the main nationalist artillery positions and the beach defenses. You might say it was a big political bombardment rather than the prelude to an invasion of the islands.

Q: When this thing became a matter of domestic politics in the United States, did that surprise you all and did that cause any particular problems the way the debates were going and all?

YAGER: Surprise? I am a pretty phlegmatic type. I don't react to surprises very much. So, I can't honestly say that I was surprised. I guess I did not anticipate it. I welcomed the congressional resolution because I felt that that was a way of quieting things down. The U.S. had played an important role in ending that crisis successfully. It was basically a Quemoy crisis.

Matsu got a lot of shells at it, but Matsu is farther from the mainland or from any other island that can be used by the communists. So, what happened in Quemoy was really what mattered. We had escorted supply ships to Quemoy up to the old three mile limit. This really constricted the Chinese communists from doing anything. They might conceivably have had some idea of landings and maybe gradually bringing more and more troops ashore and taking the islands. But our close involvement constrained what the communists could do.

Q: Within the embassy, were we debating whether we should tell the Chiang government to abandon Quemoy and Matsu? Were we strongly supporting holding on?

YAGER: We didn't want the communists to take those islands. We thought it would be a political blow to the nationalists and something of a blow to us. There wasn't any debating in the embassy, because most people were not that informed as to what was going on. We did later get Chiang to reduce the amount of troops he had on Quemoy. He had more there than he needed to defend the island and we felt that made the island a greater prize for the communists. Getting him to withdraw part of his garrison on Quemoy was consistent with our efforts to get him to reduce the size of his army overall, which was larger than he needed and was costing money that might otherwise have gone into economic development. We made a deal with him. We gave him some very heavy artillery that the U.S. Army no longer could see a use for, but it fit the Quemoy situation. Quemoy is just full of caves and a lot of artillery was placed in caves that had small apertures through which they could fire. These heavy guns were just the thing that the Chinese could use.

Q: In our estimate, was the idea of a return to the mainland basically out of the question?

YAGER: Yes. One year there was a policy statement by the State Department which implied support for a return to the mainland and I wrote a critique saying that "This is the objective but I don't see any policy measures that would be designed to achieve this objective." Marshall Green told me privately he didn't like that comment, but the Department never criticized it in writing.

Q: Tell me, within the embassy, you obviously had people who were following China. Were you, the China experts, following developments on the mainland? Were you pretty well informed as to what was going on on the mainland?

YAGER: Oh, we relied on Hong Kong. In Hong Kong, you had access to a variety of people coming and going.

Q: But were you getting that information?

YAGER: Yes.

Q: Were there any internal debates about whether to recognize at any particular point mainland China in some configuration, maybe Taiwan being separate from China? Was this a subject that was discussed?

YAGER: No. I'd say that we saw the U.S. role as trying to keep things calm, avoid any renewal of the civil war, and make Taiwan more and more prosperous and defensible.

Q: But there wasn't the underlying bubbling up, saying, "Gee, we've got to recognize this communist regime at some point?" Or was that understood?

YAGER: I thought that we would recognize the communists eventually, but I couldn't see any basis for doing it at any early time. It certainly was not a subject of discussion. It wasn't that somebody said, "Don't you talk about that." It just was that nobody talked about it.

Q: Also, events in China were not very conducive to thinking about dealing with that. At this time, they were undergoing the Great Leap Forward.

YAGER: We rather liked the fact that Chinese communist economic policy was failing. In their first few years, they had done pretty well, and the policies on Taiwan which we were promoting also seemed to be succeeding. The embassy in Taipei was inevitably in a rather parochial position. I don't know whether the consulate general in Hong Kong in this period was talking more about the issue that you're talking about. When I was stationed in Hong Kong, which wasn't for a very long period, we certainly talked about the possibility of recognition, but that was cut off by the Korean War and even more so when the Chinese came into the Korean War. It took a long time for that experience to sink back into history and for people to take a new look at the China problem. The Chinese behavior in Korea was a defining action. They were really our enemy and what we had to do was to keep them from breaking out.

Q: I thought we might stop at this point. We've come to 1961. Where did you go?

YAGER: In 1961, I came back to be chief of Chinese Affairs and then they reorganized and I had China, Japan, and Korea. This was in what used to be called the Bureau of Far Eastern Affairs.

Q: We'll pick it up at that time.

Today is December 13, 1999. You said there were some things that you should cover that we didn't before when you were in Taipei. Let's go back. What would you like to talk about?

YAGER: One thing was the problem of preventing a new outbreak of the civil war. This was not too easy, because CIA was continuing to send teams into China. The Chinese communists, of course, didn't like that. The military situation when I first went there was that the Chinese nationalists had air control over the Taiwan Straits, and the Chinese communists had not yet moved any substantial amount of air force to the China coast opposite Taiwan. When the Chinese communists did move more planes there, we were afraid the Chinese nationalists would attack the communist air bases. I'm not sure whether Ambassador Drumright was away or whether he just asked me to do it. Anyway, I went to the foreign ministry and told them that we were aware of this new situation and we also were aware of the fact that the chief of their air force had threatened to attack the communists if they moved planes forward. I said that we thought this would be a very poor idea, that there was no point in restarting the civil war and so on. The government on Taiwan did not attack these bases, so maybe our demarche had some effect. One minor amusing part from my point of view was that a couple of days after I had made this demarche, my boss, Ambassador Drumright, said, "Chiang Kai-shek is angry with you." I said, "He is?" He said, "Yes. He doesn't like what you said in the foreign ministry about not attacking those air bases." Drumright didn't really feel that I had done something wrong, so I didn't take his remark seriously.

A somewhat more serious situation arose later. I can't really put a date on it. I don't think this has ever been published. The Chinese nationalists infiltrated 4,000-5,000 elite troops into the Thailand, Laos, and Burma border area without our knowledge. They called these troops "special forces," although they were not special forces as the U.S. uses the term. They were really just especially good infantry. The Burmese army, unfortunately for them, discovered this force back in the jungles and the Chinese gave the Burmese a bloody nose, because they were quite superior to the Burmese in their capabilities. This let us know that these troops were there. Drumright was away at the time. The Department sent us an instruction to tell the government on Taiwan that they must get those troops out of there immediately and that the U.S. government would take any necessary action to insure compliance with this request.

This gave me the opportunity of delivering an ultimatum, which very few Foreign Service officers have had the pleasure of doing. I was instructed to see the foreign minister, but he was away, and I realized there was some urgency to my instructions, so I went to Hsu Shao-chang, the political deputy foreign minister who was the senior deputy. I delivered my instructions and Hsu said, "Joe, that is very hard language." I said, "I am giving it to you verbatim." After I delivered the ultimatum, things moved rather rapidly. We called in the chief of MAAG and got his full cooperation. MAAG set up a training exercise for the transport component of the Chinese national air force to bring the troops back. It went off very smoothly. The only mishap was one plane blew a tire on landing at the airfield in Thailand, but it did not damage the plane otherwise.

Q: How did they get into Burma?

YAGER: The connivance of the Thai military. I don't know exactly what was done because of that, but I imagine that there was probably some unpleasantness between our embassy in Thailand and the Thai military.

Q: With the CIA, did you run into any problems with U2s? It has come out now that we were training nationalist Chinese pilots with U2s and they were flying over China.

YAGER: I didn't have any knowledge of that at the time, despite the fact that I was the DCM. I had some knowledge of the operations by sabotage and espionage teams. I had lunch every week with Ray Cline, the CIA station chief on Taiwan. We would discuss the political situation and exchange information. He never told me very much about his operations. I think he told Ambassador Drumright somewhat more. I had quite serious reservations about those operations, but I felt that it was not up to me to complain. I knew that they were totally unsuccessful, that the communists were snapping up these poor people shortly after they landed and that they had no effect except as an irritant to the communists. Ray was a very capable man, extremely intelligent.

He got on very, very well with Drumright. I felt that he quietly moved too far into Drumright's sphere of authority, but since Drumright seemed to like it, there was nothing I could do about it.

There was a problem with the way the Chinese handled senior U.S. visitors. The Chinese liked to divert these visitors - let's say, a senator - and handle his schedule while on Taiwan. Drumright and I decided that we were going to stop that. Soon thereafter, I struck a blow for that policy, when I met Senator Monroney of Oklahoma at the airport. General J.L. Huang, a very large man, tried to take Senator Monroney's bag away from me. Somehow, I kept the bag, and I was then able to take the Senator to the embassy for a discussion of his schedule.

Q: I served in Korea from 1976 to 1979. By that time, the Koreans had a (This is speaking of these official visits, particularly of congressmen and all.) very sophisticated technique of dealing with these... There were some essentially tame congressmen, but important ones, both senators and representatives. For some of them, they would come over and practically bypass the embassy. There would be a tailor waiting for them to whip them up some clothes. It was assumed, but we didn't get into it, that there was probably female companionship involved, presents. It was damn close to bribery. It was almost blatant. Of course, this is very Oriental, but it's also not unknown in American business practices. But it was very disturbing to us. This is 20-odd years later. Was there that type of thing going on?

YAGER: Yes, there was. There was some of it. We certainly didn't encourage it, but some members of Congress were notorious for this kind of thing and we felt that they traveled in large part because of this kind of treatment during their trip.

I think that I should cover a few more things on my assignment in Taiwan. Two of the most important events were the visits of President Eisenhower and Vice President Johnson. President Eisenhower had not planned to stop in Taipei, but his stop in Tokyo was canceled because the embassy in Tokyo reluctantly concluded that it would be dangerous for him to come there. The Japanese government had warned them that they could not ensure the security of the visit. The President shifted to added stops in Taipei and Seoul. We had just a few weeks notice. That sounds like a lot, but it isn't. Luckily, Embassy Tokyo sent up its plans for the visit, which gave us an idea of what we should do. We also got very detailed instructions from the Department, which we endeavored to follow. It was a totally new experience. I was in charge of coordinating the President's visit from the American side.

I think that the breakthrough in my managing the visit was when I said to myself, "What you are doing is planning for a pageant." That is precisely what it amounts to. You have to plan every detail, where every car is in the sequence of moving people around, who sits in every seat in every car, who stands where at various points during ceremonial parts of the visit, who walks this way, who walks that way. Everything is planned to the last detail. We worked out a pretty good plan, and it went off well. I remember one part of the planning that was rather interesting. A Chinese general, a friend of mine, and I had to put on a performance of what would happen when President Eisenhower arrived. I had to play the role of President Eisenhower and this Chinese general had to play the role of Chiang Kai-shek. So, we ran this thing off at the airport and it went smoothly, as did the actual event later. In this case, I didn't go to the previous stop, which was Manila, but I went by helicopter to the cruiser that was bringing Eisenhower to various stops on his tour. I was met on the deck of the cruiser by a classmate from the National War College, which was rather pleasant. I was also met by Assistant Secretary of State Jeff Parsons, who was a friend of mine. Jeff said, "I am going to take you down to the ward room. A discussion is going on. I must tell you that this is the first substantive discussion we've had with the President on this trip." So, I went down. I forget what they were discussing, but after that was over, I was asked to present the schedule of the President's visit to Taipei to him and I did so without any trouble. The whole visit went over very well, because Eisenhower was a soldier, and he could accept detailed instructions, contrasting later with Johnson, who, of course, was not a soldier, far from it.

Q: I'd like to ask a question on the visit. Was there any concern in the embassy that Chiang Kai-shek might try to get something out of Eisenhower, commitment, support, or something of that nature?

YAGER: I don't remember that concern. I think we felt that Eisenhower could take care of himself. I believe that was probably our basic point of view toward Eisenhower. We were not so sure of Johnson. In any event, there wasn't anything of that nature. The Eisenhower administration was quite firmly committed to the Chinese nationalists.

A few days after Eisenhower had left, a Chinese colonel in their equivalent of our Signal Corps came to an American colonel in MAAG who was the Signal Corps representative and said, "A very embarrassing thing has happened. I want to clarify it. We know that the Secret Service thought that we were trying to listen in on Eisenhower's conversations in his hotel room. The fact is that all of our telephones work best when they are set so that they are live when they are on the hook. The Secret Service discovered this and they adjusted the telephone so it was not live on the hook. I can show you in the warehouse that all of our telephones are like that and that we use the adjustment of making them live on the hook just to make them perform better. I want you to know that we were not trying to listen in on President Eisenhower." Of course, this story was a futile effort to cover up. It was quite clear that the Chinese government on Taiwan had listened in on Eisenhower's conversations in his hotel room.

Q: What about the Johnson visit?

YAGER: Well, this should have been easier. We knew what to do, because a visit by a Vice President is treated in the same way as a visit by a President. It was not as easy because of Johnson's personality. In this case, as DCM, I had to go to Manila and ride back on the plane from Manila to Taipei so that I could be available to brief the Vice President on his schedule. So, I went down to Manila. The main episode there was that my wristwatch was stolen, but so be it.

I was riding in the back of the plane on the way to Taipei. This was not a very long flight - maybe an hour and a half - and I was getting nervous, because I hadn't been called forward to brief the Vice President. Finally, I was called forward. He was chewing out his speechwriter, who was sitting there quivering. I remember, Johnson's final attack on this speechwriter was, "If you don't stop giving me this crap, I'll get up there and say what I really think." A rather serious threat, I might say. So, I gave the Vice President his schedule. He read the first item: review honor guard. "That is the way we are losing the world." So, Assistant Secretary of State for Administration Bill Crockett, who was standing there, very obsequiously said, "Well, Mr.

President (He was the President of the Senate.), we will call it off." I had to be the poor fellow to say, "Mr. Vice President, we can't call it off because they are already there." So, he suffered through the honor guard, but on departure, there was no honor guard.

Johnson was carrying a letter from President Kennedy to President Chiang Kai-shek. After we had landed, he gave me that letter and said, "You put this letter on 3x5 cards and give them to me before I talk to Chiang Kai-shek." So, I dutifully did that. When we went out for his interview with Chiang Kai-shek, he arrived early, to my surprise, and he said, "Where are those cards?" I had them in my side coat pocket. I gave them to him and he read them over and gave them back. Then he followed them meticulously, which is really quite important. When you're delivering a letter and you're going over the same ground orally, you don't want to deviate or the recipient will say "Why did he deviate? What is going on here? Maybe there is a little more to this than the letter says" and that kind of thing. But to Johnson's great credit, he handled it beautifully.

Johnson was a bit hard to handle. He couldn't sleep well. He was up and down all night in the hotel, waking people up. We had a duty officer there, and at one point Johnson asked the duty officer for a can of chocolate Metrical, which was in that period a diet drink. The duty officer, to his great credit, knew an embassy secretary that was on Metrical. He woke her up and got a can of chocolate Metrical for the Vice President of the United States.

Q: Did you have to get him a masseur and black out his windows? I am told it was quite a production.

YAGER: No, we didn't have to do that. There was a story in the press about whiskey in which they got things backwards. The story said that we had to ask the consulate general in Hong Kong for a bottle of Cutty Sark, a brand of scotch. It was the other way around. We had an embassy shop in Taipei that had better supplies than Hong Kong had. So, when Johnson went to Hong Kong, we had to get a bottle of Cutty Sark for him. I am sure Johnson didn't like that publicity. In that period at least, southern politicians were not supposed to drink scotch. They were supposed to drink bourbon with branch water, but Johnson liked scotch.

Q: Did Johnson pay much attention to the political aspects? Later, people said that this trip that Johnson was sent on was really almost to get him out of Kennedy's hair.

YAGER: Yes, he was very political in an amusing way. He was met by Vice President Chen Cheng and they rode in the limo together from the airport. Johnson kept stopping the car and getting out to shake hands with the crowd just as if he was trying to get votes in Taiwan. His schedule called for going to a nearby county seat to see a display about land reform. On the way there, when he would see a farmer in the field, he would stop the car, get out, and shake the farmer's hand. I can't imagine what a Taiwanese farmer would think of this. Johnson was a very big man, much larger than most people realize. To see him striding across the rice paddy, which was dry at that season, hand outstretched, wearing a red sportshirt, it must have been terrifying to the farmers, but that's just the way he was.

Q: You came back to be in charge of Chinese and other affairs.

YAGER: Chinese Affairs.

Q: That was from when to when?

YAGER: That would have been from August to December of 1961. Very shortly after I arrived, I was given a top secret document on relations between the Chinese communists and the Soviet communists. I knew that there was some evidence of a split between the two, but I had no idea how serious it was until I read that document. I was utterly convinced after reading that that the split was real. Some right-wing people, particularly in Congress, were then contending that the split was just a big act to deceive us. Of course, it was not.

I think the next memorable thing that happened to me was, I was confronted with a very long paper written by Ed Rice, who later became both a boss and a friend of mine, who was then in the Policy Planning Staff. He had written this paper under George McGhee, the director of that staff. McGhee sent it to Walter McConaughy, the assistant secretary for Far Eastern Affairs, and he wanted a reply within two days. So, McConaughy gave it to me to look over. Well, it was a paper that deviated quite a bit from current policy in ways that I thought were not very wise. Somehow, we stopped it. It is always easier to stop things in the U.S. government than it is to get things done.

Q: How was it deviating?

YAGER: Rice wanted to try to move closer to the Chinese communists. I think that he had the idea of trying to move toward recognition, which was then not in the cards. Rice later became the senior deputy to Harriman in Far Eastern Affairs and therefore my boss. Although we often disagreed, we had a very good relationship.

Q: When you came to Chinese Affairs in the latter half of 1961, was there any thought within the bureau about recognizing China or was it just not politically doable from our side and also maybe that in China itself, there was too much turmoil?

YAGER: I don't think there was too much turmoil, but I think that we felt that they were pretty well committed to an anti-American policy. The Korean War had changed the American outlook on China. Before the Korean War, I think that the prospects for recognition of China were very high. This has just been borne out by people who studied papers of Secretary Acheson. In 1961, that just wasn't politically feasible.

My approach to China policy after I got into Far Eastern Affairs was that I didn't think that our present totally rigid policy could survive. A new, maybe democratic administration would not support it. It might get us into more trouble than we wanted. Our allies would not support it. So, I tried to promote a policy of somewhat softening the relationship. I got a little bit done in that regard. I was thinking in terms of allowing some trade and some visits. But it was hard going.

Afer I became director of Chinese Affairs, I reorganized the office. There had been an economic section and a political section, and I divided the office into a mainland section and a Taiwan section. I put John Holdridge in charge of the Taiwan section, to his chagrin, and Lindsey Grant in charge of the mainland section. Quite recently, John spoke to me with some resentment about what I had done then. I explained to him that I felt that he was a very good administrator and that all of the programmatic work was on the Taiwan side and I felt he could handle that very well. I said I felt that Lindsey was less of an administrator, but that he was rather innovative and wanted to think through new things and he would have that opportunity on the mainland side. Maybe that placated John. I don't know. In any case, Lindsey and I worked together and did our best to moderate China policy. But anything that involved China policy would be bounced by the Department to the White House and killed. The Kennedy administration was utterly terrified of being caught in a position where it appeared to be doing something pro-Chinese communist.

Q: I heard somebody say that when Eisenhower was talking to Kennedy before the takeover, he said, "Look, I'm going to support you in everything, but if you move on China, I won't." I don't know if that's true or not.

YAGER: I didn't know that at that time, but certainly, as far as the Kennedy White House was concerned, it was very cautious. There really was a political problem. Later, Nixon, the right-wing Republican, was able to make a move that no democratic president could have made.

Q: Was there a "Mr. China" over at the White House?

YAGER: No, there was a Mr. East Asia, Mike Forrestal. He was very close to Harriman.

I suppose that a few words about Harriman are in order. Harriman was a good man. He was well motivated. He was not mean. He wanted to do the right thing on every level. He wanted to be fair to people. He wanted to do good things for his country. He was quite effective. He was unusual in that he couldn't really predict what he was going to do. He said to me more than once, "I don't know how I arrive at decisions, but somehow they come out and I must say that they are usually right." I think that he was correct in that self-judgement. To a subordinate, he was sometimes a bit difficult. If he disagreed with you, you couldn't really have a discussion with him. He would say something like "No, that is wrong. You are absolutely wrong. I know about that and you are wrong." You can't get any hooks onto that kind of an argument. I developed a policy of coming back at him once. I felt twice would not be wise, so I didn't do that. I remember one very rare occasion when he actually flipped and agreed with me. He said, "Well, I was just trying to see if you were serious."

Q: What about this Chinese-Soviet split? Was this a problem to the goals dealing with China policy or not?

YAGER: I don't remember that. There probably is a public conception that the China lobby was just everywhere and was pressuring the State Department. I know there was something called the China lobby. That is, there were members of Congress who were very pro-nationalist and were quite publicly saying so, but no one ever came around to me when I was the officer in charge of Chinese Affairs, subordinated to Harriman and the Secretary. I never had any contact, any pressure, from the so-called China lobby. It was part of the political background in which I operated, but it wasn't something that was actively there that I had to cope with in a serious way.

Q: How did you find the nationalist Chinese embassy operated in Washington at this point?

YAGER: I really have no complaints about them. They have a good Foreign Service. I don't think that I had any serious problems with them. I was really quite fortunate in the countries I was dealing with. The Japanese have an absolutely first-rate foreign service. If you deal with a Japanese foreign service officer, he will be very professional, have done all of his homework, know exactly how to do business. The Chinese were almost at that level. The Koreans were not.

***

Q: Let's go back now to this period of 1961-1963 of dealing with China, Japan, and Korea. Were there any particular developments during this time with Chinese affairs on Taiwan?

How about military activity on the Straits of Formosa? At one time, the nationalists were shooting the communists out of the air.

YAGER: I don't think there was that kind of trouble. There had been a crisis when I was in Taiwan. I think I mentioned that in our previous session. That was when the communists bombarded Quemoy and Matsu.

Q: What about internally within mainland China? What was the situation at that time?

YAGER: I think that the Great Leap Forward had failed and there was a famine. We, of course, watched this with great interest. I don't know whether Mao's Cultural Revolution affected us much.

Herbert Levin was born in New York in 1930. He entered the Foreign Service in 1956. His career included posts in Hong Kong, Japan, Tanzania, Sri Lanka, and India. Mr. Levin was interviewed by Mike Springmann in 1994.

LEVIN: Yes. My MA in Fletcher was in Economic Affairs.

Q: And then you went from there, you said, to Taiwan?

LEVIN: My freshman roommate at Harvard was a Chinese Communist, Ji Chaozhu. He went back during the Korean War when Premier Zhou En-lai asked loyal Communists to return. Though a devoted patriotic Chinese and a Communist, when Americans who had doubts about Communism discussed this with him, he would give answers such as -- "if we had in China what you have in the United States we wouldn't need Communism; we've tried other things and they don't work." We stayed in contact over the years, with the State Department security people quite content to have me exchanging letters with him through Pakistani friends and that kind of thing.

Q: Was this State Department security or the folks behind it, our friends at the CIA?

LEVIN: This was strictly State Department security. I don't recall being asked for copies of the letters or anything like that. It was simply that we had to report contacts with Chinese Communists, this was a contact and they said go right ahead.

Q: But they would have been hysterical at your dealing with a real dyed-in-the-wool Communist.

LEVIN: I don't think they were. Obviously I was writing to him. The letters were either carried or they went by mail through censorship. I wouldn't write him anything that would get him in trouble. The letters that he wrote to me often had a beginning and an end which would sound politically nice to anybody else reading them, and then the center would be something personal about family and that kind of thing.

Q: Did you get a good picture on what was happening? We're talking about your Chinese Communist contact over the years, to whom you'd be writing letters.

LEVIN: This friendship was part of the reason that I became interested in Chinese language and area study. I was interested in going into the Foreign Service for the reasons we already discussed, but the particular Chinese interest came out of this fortuitous assignment to the same dormitory room my freshman year in Harvard. Then we stayed in touch and State Department security didn't have any problems with this. We exchanged fairly innocuous letters back and forth.

Q: What happened to him eventually, do you know?

LEVIN: Ji was Zhou En-lai's interpreter in Zhou En-lai's capacity as Foreign Minister not as Prime Minister. The Chinese combined those jobs as many countries did at that time. Ji was a Chinese Foreign Service Officer and served in Washington twice. He retired from the Chinese Foreign Service in '91 to become Under Secretary General of the United Nations. He asked me to come up and work with him.

Q: That's amazing.

LEVIN: So that's why I was in the UN Secretariat.

Q: That's incredible. You were in Taiwan, you said, initially in Chinese language school.

LEVIN: That's right, in Taichung, Taiwan.

Q: This is about the time that the Quemoy-Matsu business was going on.

LEVIN: Right. The Quemoy-Matsu shelling would have been in '58; I went in '59.

Q: What was that like; both Taiwan and the People's Republic insisting there is only one China? What was it like working at that point, saying "there is only one China" from the small rump state of Taiwan.

LEVIN: Getting to Taichung in 1959, ten years after Chiang Kai-shek's government had evacuated to Taiwan, it was quite clear that Chiang was not going "to reconquer the mainland," the phrase in use then. At the same time, many of the people who came from the mainland didn't have any other rationale for their preferred position. They felt they had moved a national government to Taiwan. In their eyes, to dissolve a national government and to turn it over to the local provincial Taiwanese Chinese was both legally and personally anathema. Some of them were motivated by selfish reasons. They wished to retain their politically justified positions which provided them with authority and money. Others were motivated by a kind of patriotism. They thought that communism was bad and that they should hold out an alternate for China. After all, who knew what opportunities the future would bring the Chinese people.

The Chinese have a long history and they sense history when viewing a contemporary problem. On Taiwan, some felt that Communism would dissolve or fall apart in the future and they would have preserved another Chinese system. Others felt that the Nationalist -- Kuomintang -- government of Chiang on the mainland had done a bad job. It had been corrupt, it had been inefficient, it had been warlord ridden, and so forth, and they would show in a different place, in a different time, when they weren't fighting the Japanese, that non-Communist China could do a good job with the local people. So among the mainland Chinese in Taiwan, there was a whole range of rationales for their situation.

The Taiwanese majority viewed things differently. Along with the rest of China, Taiwan had been under the Manchu Dynasty. The Manchus were foreigners to the Chinese, though highly Sinicized towards the end. In the 19th century the Chinese in Taiwan had not liked being ruled from Beijing. Then they were under the Japanese, who had been an efficient but not a cruel colonial regime the way they were in Korea. It was a relatively benign civilian colonial regime. And since 1945 they were again under the mainland, so the Taiwanese had a long history of adjusting to people from outside their province ruling them. Many of them resented this but historically there were relatively few Taiwanese martyrs in these situations. Perhaps more a demonstration of adaptability than cowardice.

Taiwan was a relatively prosperous place. After the economy got going in Taiwan, due both to a great deal of American aid and a lot of educated, highly motivated people who were anti-Communist from the mainland, both Taiwanese and mainlanders saw their daily lives improving. Also, the people from the mainland were not a monolith. In addition to the Kuomintang -- Chiang Kai-shek's Nationalists -- there were a lot of other minor political parties and individuals who came from the mainland to Taiwan who were anti-Communist but were also highly critical of the Nationalists.

For politically minded Taiwanese, this meant that they were dealing with a non-monolithic ruling group. The situation has evolved the way optimists thought it would, relatively peacefully into a kind of Chinese democracy. Of course, Foreign Service Officers whose reports suggested the possibility of this benign outcome received much less attention than those predicting Taiwanese-mainlanders violence like that which occurred in 1947, or a Communist invasion, or other dramatic events.

Q: You were in language school for a couple of years?

LEVIN: In those days, FSI had sufficient money so that the first year in Washington was half language and half area training, which was a sound investment. FSI discontinued this shortly thereafter because they didn't have enough money. We had full-time at FSI, Professor Harold Hinton, a distinguished scholar of China who died very recently. This was important because an FSO who doesn't know a great deal about China and speaks good Chinese, is more dangerous than someone who doesn't speak Chinese and doesn't know about China. It was excellent that we had a full year in Washington, serious area studies and language instruction. In addition to his own rigorous efforts, Hinton brought in leading China scholars from all over the U.S. to lecture and meet with us -- historians, economists, etc.

And then to Taichung. The Taichung assignments were approximately a year, some were longer, depending on when you were needed at a post.

Q: Is this at the university there?

LEVIN: No. This was a separate institution, the Huayu Xuexiao. This was the descendent of the language training that the State Department had started in Beijing in the 19th century to train in those days what were called "the student interpreters," before there was even a career Foreign Service, starting in 1926.

Q: How would you describe your language training? I've had people tell me that they took German in FSI, and could discuss the gross national product in German but they couldn't get their hair done.

LEVIN: Chinese language training took a long time, and most of it took place in Taiwan where you had to get a haircut. You had training to discuss the GNP or agricultural reform, etc., in Chinese. We developed technical vocabularies in the classroom and went downtown in a pedicab to try and buy aspirin. We didn't have the kind of a problem you describe. Quite clearly, language training should take place in the country where the language is spoken so you do both of these things simultaneously. The German problem you cited was not a problem for us.

Q: Then you went from there to the then Embassy in Taipei as an Economics Officer?

LEVIN: No, I went from Taichung to the Consulate General in Hong Kong. In Hong Kong I first worked on the Chinese mainland economy. We realized that even though our Hong Kong commercial officers were doing important work in trying to stimulate American exports to Hong Kong, separate analysis of the Hong Kong and Macau economies would provide insights into the Chinese economy.

For example, the Chinese prefer to eat fresh rather than frozen pork and therefore you had railroad carloads of live pigs coming into Hong Kong. When there were suggestions that there were food shortages and crop failures and so forth in China, you could see what provinces the carloads of pigs were coming from, whether they were coming like previous years, whether they were thinner or fatter, and all that kind of thing. This gave you some idea of what was going on in different parts of China which supplied food to Hong Kong.

There were literally hundreds of thousands of Chinese in Hong Kong who were exchanging letters with their families all over China. There were also visits of Hong Kong Chinese who were Cantonese to nearby parts of China which was always relatively easy. Visits to the North in those days were a bit more difficult, but nevertheless there was an enormous flow of people, mail and information between China and Hong Kong.

If one was immersed in the local Chinese community, not just studying paper about the mainland, we could do a better job and that's the way we worked.

Q: How much pressure was there at the height of the Cold War to shade reporting, to show that China was worse off than it really was? We were allied with Chiang Kai-shek and the Republic of China, was there any of this kind of pressure in there? Because for example in Germany, people didn't want to report what the Kubla Khan were doing because it made the German government, Helmut Kohl, look bad.

LEVIN: In Hong Kong, at the time I was there, there was absolutely none of that. Because the purging of the people who had been on the mainland was so recent, some of these people were personally known to us, like Jack Service. There was not only a lack of pressure, there was a strong effort to make sure that everybody should know that there was no pressure of that kind.

Most of the time I was in Hong Kong, the Consul General was Marshall Green. Marshall Green had come into the Foreign Service in Japan before the Second World War and he was personally and intellectually a very stimulating and honorable person. Under him, there were no improper pressures of any kind -- personal or professional.

However, in Hong Kong we were conscious of one situation of that kind not in Hong Kong. We were the R&R point for that part of the world. People liked to come to Hong Kong, because it was pleasant and in those days it was relatively cheap. We had a constant flow of people to and from Saigon. There were always a couple of Chinese language officers assigned to the Embassy in Saigon because of the importance of the Chinese community in Cholon and its ties all over the country. These people did mostly political reporting but they often were slotted in the economic section because it made it easier to justify their having access to the business oriented Chinese community.

The reporting by the Chinese language officers in Saigon, based on what the Chinese community was saying, was that the government in Saigon was extremely corrupt, that it was not becoming more effective, that there was a tremendous gap between the urban elite origin South Vietnamese army officers corps and the bulk of the ordinary soldiers of the Vietnamese army composed of peasant youths from the countryside. Based on their contacts with the Cholon Chinese business community who traded all over South Vietnam, the Chinese language officers generally did not take an optimistic view of the abilities of the Saigon government to mobilize the country against the Communists.

The dominant group in the Embassy, the Ambassador and others in Saigon often were people assigned from France who were French speakers, because we didn't have enough Vietnamese speakers. They considered that the Chinese Language Officers, though they had not personally been on the mainland, were so conscious of the reasons that Chiang Kai-shek had failed against the Communists, that they insisted on looking at the Vietnamese situation through Chinese eyes, so to speak. They felt that the Chinese Language Officers were so intellectually overwhelmed by the recent Chinese historical experience with Communists that they couldn't judge Vietnam on its own merits. They gradually pushed these officers into the Consular and Administrative Sections and then decided that they really didn't need them at all. There were a number of Chinese Language Officers who had very bitter professional experiences in Saigon. Others, who served in operational roles in the provinces were not involved in this brawl.

I can not say for how many years this was the case in Saigon, but during the period that I was in Hong Kong there was a phasing down, and perhaps out, of the "need" for Chinese Language Officers in Saigon.

Q: So they sent them primarily to talk to members of the local Chinese community of which there were a substantial number?

LEVIN: Cholon, part of Saigon, was a vast Chinatown. It was the dominant economic force in the country, particularly after the diminution of French interests. These people were involved in rice milling, the movement of crops and commodities around the country, trucking companies and so forth. The Vietnamese government in Saigon and sometimes the U.S. military would tell the American Embassy that a province was loyal and pacified and completely under their control. The Cholon Chinese would tell the Chinese Language Officers that they had to pay enormous taxes to the Communists who actually ran the province, or that it was no longer possible to operate in a province where the Communists had taken over complete controls and they were pulling out. So Embassy Saigon would have this kind of reporting quite different from what it was being told by the Vietnamese government and the U.S. military.

The Chinese in Vietnam were anti-communist bourgeois minded, merchant-class Chinese. The Chinese community as a conduit for Communism was not a problem in Vietnam as, for example, it had been in Malaysia in a previous period where the Communist effort was largely through a minority of ethnic Chinese.

Q: And then from Hong Kong you went to?

LEVIN: From Hong Kong I went to the Embassy in Taipei in Northern Taiwan. (The language school was in Taichung in the middle of Taiwan.) There we watched a government which was interestingly embittered over the fact that it was not going to attack the mainland of China. Obviously, it could not succeed, and the U.S. Government was firmly opposed to their trying. Trying to maintain a rationale for keeping the levers of political and military power in their hands was therefore the principal preoccupation of the mainlanders.

They could see that their children, for the most part, were not interested in succeeding them in this role. They either emigrated to the States or married a Taiwanese and merged into the more numerous and increasingly more affluent Taiwanese community. You could see the clear beginnings of this process which was unsatisfactory to some mainlanders and acceptable to others.

Taiwan was an interesting place. There were people from all over China who were quite concerned with what was going on in Sichuan and Shandong. There was little tourism in Taiwan in those days, but you moved around easily and people were generally friendly. Americans came to Taiwan from Vietnam on R&R. They had their families there so the men in Vietnam could easily visit their wives and their children. Living in Taiwan was safe and relatively quiet.

At the time, the Taiwan economy was becoming increasingly intertwined with the Japanese economy.

Q: The Japanese were setting up car assembly plants there at that time?

LEVIN: The Japanese were just starting to make investments. The Taiwanese were quite happy to resume their pre-WW II ties with the Japanese. The mainlanders preferred the Americans for both political and historical reasons. There was a kind of a competition, whether the Japanese or the Americans would be more acceptable. This probably was good for the Taiwan economy.

Q: What position were you in the Embassy in Taipei?

LEVIN: When I arrived I went into the Economic Section, and then in about a year I was transferred to the Political Section.

Q: Did this reflect your interests or did somebody just say, Herbert Levin you go and be a political officer next week?

LEVIN: Going first into the Economic Section was useful because I got a good grounding in the economic forces that were at work in Taiwan and providing a basis for its growing prosperity. American AID ended while I was there and the U.S. AID mission was closed.

This was good background for moving over to the political side. The Political Section was becoming much more active. The American government was criticizing the Chiang Kai-shek government for lack of democracy, for violations of human rights, arrests and imprisonment without trial, etc. We made representations against this kind of thing. I enjoyed the political work. Arthur Hummel set the tone during my time in Taipei as a long time Chargé d'affaires and DCM. He was outstanding.

Q: How much of a difference did you see in the situation on the Island from the time you were studying language in Taichung to the time you were a political/economic officer in Taipei. Was there much of a difference?

LEVIN: You could see the increase in prosperity. The government in Taipei, because of its experience of loss of the mainland, was anxious to have the rural area prosperous. Chairman Mao used to say that the relationship between the Communists and the peasants was like the fish and the water.

Chiang Kai-shek's government decided that if they were to maintain themselves in Taiwan they had to have a satisfied "peasantry," so they had a whole system of devices to favor the rural areas. There weren't too many privately owned cars in those days, but bicycle and motorcycle licenses were cheaper in the countryside than they were in the city. There wasn't television but there was radio. As in many countries there were radio licenses and those were cheaper in the countryside than they were in the city. Bus fares were subsidized in the countryside but the buses in the cities had to pay for themselves.

They also had a system of population control. You needed a permit to move your residence from the country to the city but they didn't want to do it by police control. They had inducements for people to be happy and remain in the countryside. Loans for houses from government sponsored housing banks were cheaper in the countryside than they were for apartments or houses in the city.

People going through the teachers colleges were obligated for a certain number of years of teaching in exchange for their tuition free education. In many places in the world where you have systems like that, the rural areas are not the choice of the best teachers. They want to stay in the cities and you tend to get the teachers who did not do as well in school going to rural areas. The National Government turned this around by offering higher salaries and other subsidies so that good teachers would be attracted to go to the countryside at least for the first few years after they got their degrees.

The Nationalists wanted to maintain the Taiwanese population on the land but they wanted to do it by economic and societal inducements rather than police coercion. However, they certainly used police power if anybody really seemed to threaten their control. It was just interesting to watch them operate this kind of a system where the mainlanders considered themselves to have failed if inducements -- and threats -- did not work and they had to use force. Similarities to Beijing's rule are obvious.

Q: Was Marshall Green the Consul-General in Hong Kong?

LEVIN: Correct.

Q: Who was the Ambassador in Taipei at this time?

LEVIN: When I was in Taichung in language training the Ambassador in Taipei was Everett Drumright who previously had been the Consul-General in Hong Kong. Then there was Walter McConaughy who came to Taipei after being Ambassador to Pakistan. McConaughy was a pre-war officer of Marshall Green's generation who had actually served in the then-American Consulate in Taipei -- Taihoku in Japanese -- before the war. I imagine Taihoku must have been his first assignment in the Foreign Service. Admiral Jerauld Wright also served as Ambassador while I was in Taipei.

Q: How did the Embassy work? I keep thinking the Cold War, the good Chinese and the bad Chinese. Was there any of this filtering through the Embassy? Did you have people you were allowed to see and not allowed to see because it might upset the local government?

LEVIN: In Taipei, we didn't have any acknowledged Communists to deal with, but the government would get upset over other things. They were upset when our China Language Officers also learned to speak the local dialect, Taiwanese or Minnan; they grumbled and asked why we were training people in that language. All the schools were in Mandarin, the government spoke Mandarin, so why were we bothering with this local dialect? Since most of the people spoke better Taiwanese than Mandarin it was obvious why we were doing it. Interestingly, few of the Mainlanders ever became fluent in Taiwanese at that time.

The government tended to focus its attention on our officers who spoke the local dialect. Our officers would of course meet with Taiwanese who were critical of government practices. The government would grumble about that -- why are you Americans meeting with that fellow, he is just a loudmouth, he is not important, you are giving him status in the community by having your people meet with him, etc. Our Ambassadors were pretty sturdy in saying that there were no restrictions placed on members of the Chinese Embassy staff in Washington meeting with Americans of all political attitudes, and they assumed that this would be reciprocated in Taipei, and we would not pay official attention to their grumbling "advice" to reduce contacts.

At the same time, our guys had to be careful because if they met with a Taiwanese, and he then disappeared and was found to have "volunteered" for farm work on a remote island off Eastern Taiwan, this wasn't very good either. We had to weigh carefully how valuable these meetings would be to us, and how dangerous they might be for the other fellow. The other fellow might think that since he'd been meeting with the Americans, the Americans had the ability to protect him from his government, which of course we couldn't. That element of danger to our contacts was always on our minds.

Since I was not a Taiwanese speaker, I rarely got into that kind of situation. Sometimes I would be at a meeting with them along with other Embassy officers but I rarely got into the most delicate contacts with Taiwanese. I did take the lead in some direct not entirely pleasant encounters with the security authorities both in Taipei and at some remote locations.

Q: Did the Ambassador get his fingers into every section or did he pretty much leave you all to do your job?

LEVIN: I would say that both Drumright and McConaughy were both very professional and had good balance in the extent with which they worked through the chain of command, through our superiors, as distinct from calling somebody in directly. Hummel was superb in balancing discipline and informality. It was a small Embassy and you had daily direct contact. The chancery was a ramshackle building between the main freight railway line and the wholesale fish market. Everybody met on the stairs daily. It wasn't a stuffy place. Admiral Wright also adapted easily to this -- as if he were serving again on a small ship.

I don't recall resentment of any of our Ambassadors for the way they operated. Just about everybody in that Embassy in Taipei, from the DCM on down spoke Chinese. I think our senior economic persons sometimes did not speak Chinese because it was most important that they had strong technical backgrounds. But almost everybody including consular officers spoke Chinese, had been through Chinese language training, had an interest in the Chinese people and so it was a motivated staff.

Not everybody loved everybody but it was a pretty congenial group; we were concentrating on trying to understand a society that was evolving with some very unusual problems. So I would say that most of the Ambassadors seemed to be quite pleased with the qualities of the staff and we got along. Hummel had been born in China -- he was a missionary son and fought with the Nationalist guerrillas behind the lines against the Japanese. His Chinese was fluent and we all learned from him both how to get along with the Chinese and how to argue with them.

Q: Were most of these positions language designated or were people assigned to Taiwan out of an interest in things Chinese?

LEVIN: I would think that every position in the political section must have been language designated as they were always filled by language officers. Probably in the economic section, some were and some weren't. Probably in the consular section the same. But certainly the Embassy was dominated by Chinese language officers. This was necessary because in those days Taiwan, not yet a substantial international trading entity, was looked upon in much of the world as sort of the last life boat for Chiang Kai-shek, who lost the mainland and probably would eventually lose Taiwan. There weren't a lot of foreigners around. I don't know if the educational system in Taiwan at that point even encouraged learning English. You could not have operated in Taipei in those days without speaking Chinese except in a very narrow area of senior bankers and the small numbers of international traders.

Q: Then you went from there to the National Security Council.

LEVIN: No, I went from there to Tokyo to the Political Section. The Embassy in Tokyo in the Political Section always had a Chinese language officer. Not exclusively to utilize the language skill but because Japan's relations with China, both the mainland and Taiwan, were of importance to the United States. You had to have someone with a strong background in Chinese affairs to have any kind of serious dialogue with the Japanese government and Japanese business people and scholars on China. There was always someone in Tokyo doing this job.

Q: What was your title at this point?

LEVIN: What was I? I guess I was a First Secretary.

In the Japanese Foreign Ministry, the China Section was headed by a very able, active person who later was the Japanese Ambassador to China, among other places. His name was Hiroshi Hashimoto. There was a great deal of interest in China in both the U.S. and Japan. We both were trying to understand what was going on there.

The Japanese were more forward with China than we were in terms of trade, travel and everything else. At the same time, they had no desire to play a prominent political role with the Chinese. The last thing they wanted was a brawl with the United States over China policy. So I worked on China and Taiwan, North and South Korea. It was really Japan's relations with Asia, including Siberia and Vietnam.

Q: What kind of insight did you get into the workings of the Japanese government on their China policy? Did you get that out of them by conversing with these guys or did they kind of play it close to their chest?

LEVIN: I would say that they were quite open. After they accepted that we would be discreet, that they weren't going to hear themselves quoted back either by other Americans in my Embassy or, worse yet, by people in the State Department in Washington, they were quite helpful in trying to get you to understand what was their system of decision making and what the various forces were which affected the outcome.

Since the Liberal Democratic Party was in office and was likely to remain in office for the foreseeable future, they weren't going to have changes in policy due to elections. Factions within the LDP and also bureaucratic and business groups had distinct interests. The Japanese were quite helpful in describing these and what goals they were striving for. I found them quite frank in that respect.

Let me describe one incident which might help explain the atmosphere in Tokyo at the time. The United States had decided to recognize Mongolia. This had been an off-again on-again thing for many years, with the Russians repeatedly vetoing the Mongolians desire to have an international relationship with the U.S. The Japanese wished to normalize relations with Mongolia whenever the U.S. did.

The long-standing U.S. arrangement with the Japanese was that when the U.S. had reached the actual point of decision with the Mongolians, we would tell them in advance and permit them to announce their recognition of Mongolia first before the U.S., as a courtesy. This was done. We informed them in advance when we were going to announce, perhaps it was to be a week later, that it was all decided. The Japanese promptly made their recognition announcement, as agreed with us.

The Americans had also notified Chiang Kai-shek in Taipei that they were going to do this. The Nationalist government in Taiwan claimed that Mongolia was part of China and they energized their friends in the U.S. Congress, in the Republican right wing, to cancel our agreement with Mongolia to enter into diplomatic relations, and actually got the President to turn around.

The U.S. then had to go to the Japanese and say, forget what we told you, we've changed our minds. The Japanese, not looking for public fights with the Americans and being a country where forms of courtesy are observed, avoided any public reaction. At the same time the Japanese were shocked and in a fury that the Americans, after literally years of working on this, could be reversed by Chiang Kai-shek and accept this kind of humiliation from him. The question was also privately raised, "Could Japan really count on anything the Americans could say when something like Mongolian recognition could be changed?" What was more important to Washington, the assurances that the American government had given the Japanese or Chiang Kai-shek's ire? Since I agreed with the Japanese that Washington was guilty of poor judgment, I had little difficulty in meticulously reporting Japanese anger to Washington.

I felt this was significant because it showed that the Japanese wanted to trust the United States. They wanted to be able to rely on us and we had been unreliable without any really compelling reason.

Another interesting responsibility was in regard to a series of incidents along the northern border of China with Russia, around Damansky Island in Russian, Chenpao in Chinese, and the question of who was provoking who in minor skirmishes and shootings reported. It was obviously part of the world where there were not too many travelers. It was also a situation where satellite photographs couldn't really tell you much because these were small groups of people involved with small arms fire.

I asked the Japanese if they had any views on this. They made available the Japanese Imperial Army archives and retired Imperial Army officers who talked about their skirmishes with the Russians when they had been "defending Manchukuo" in exactly the same place. They explained that this island was really a mudbank and it moved around depending on the spring floods. Sometimes it was attached to one side of the river, sometimes it was attached to the other side. Recent military academy graduates on first patrols could rush out there in the spring when the water was low and plant a flag and say, "It's ours." If the counterpart new lieutenant on the other side wanted to show that he too was a hero, defending the soil of the Motherland he would shoot at them. It was really a kind of a crummy little game over an insignificant wandering mudbank.

This didn't mean that Beijing or Moscow might not be choosing to push the other, and a small number of casualties was reportedly involved. But it really wasn't a situation wherein there was an agreed border and one side was engaging in calculated belligerency, acts of war, by crossing it.

I think this information from the Japanese may have been helpful to Washington to understand that though one side or the other was letting their patrols be resolute, it was a muddy area in both senses of the term, where there could be people blundering into each other on patrols and other local confusion. The Japanese were cooperative and helpful in trying to figure out what was the real intent of Beijing and Moscow.

This was also the time when the Non-proliferation Treaty was being negotiated.

Q: This is early '60, '61, '62, '63?

LEVIN: No this was late '60s. The Soviet Union and the United States were the co-chairmen of the international committee that was negotiating the Non-proliferation Treaty. The Japanese were obviously not about to build nuclear weapons. Indeed, they probably have the greatest anathema toward nuclear weapons of any country in the world, because they're the only country that was bombed with nuclear weapons. At the same time, the Japanese were having difficulty in accepting the Non-proliferation Treaty draft because the Washington and London naval disarmament conferences before World War II had put Japan in an inferior position in terms of numbers of battleships and cruisers to the Americans and the British.

It appeared as if an international treaty was coming into existence which would permanently label Japan as a second class country. While on one hand they weren't going to develop nuclear weapons, and they were prepared to commit themselves to this, on the other hand to sign a multilateral treaty which permanently put them in an inferior category was something they were having trouble with. It was necessary to have a long and difficult negotiation with them to put wording in the Non-proliferation Treaty about the commitment of the nuclear countries to denuclearize and to eventually become equal to Japan, and a lot of other things to make it more palatable. (I think that Germany may have taken a similar stance.)

In the Soviet Embassy in Tokyo, there was an individual who had been assigned to Tokyo because due to the deterioration of Sino-Soviet relations, the Soviet embassy in Beijing had reduced its staff. The Soviet system had these people coming out of Chinese language training. They didn't have a Consulate in Hong Kong, they didn't have anything in Taipei, and they couldn't go to Beijing, so somebody said, go to Japan and be a China watcher.

This was a period of detente between the United States and the Soviet Union. When this fellow arrived in Tokyo, he found out that there was somebody who spoke Chinese in the American embassy. He did not speak any Japanese or much English and he was kind of isolated even in his own embassy. He gave me a call and asked if he could come over and see me. I agreed. When we met, he told me the background for his unexpected assignment to Tokyo and said he wanted to be a China watcher. I told him that was not too easy from Tokyo but he could be a Taiwan watcher. He said, "Great." I got to know this Soviet officer and he was a responsible and serious person in terms of trying to understand China. His name was Valentine Kovalenko.

At any rate, at one point in the NPT negotiations, an instruction came out that the Soviet and American Embassies in Tokyo should make a joint demarche on the Japanese in regard to one point in the negotiation. Both the American and Soviet Ambassadors, Alex Johnson and Troyanovsky had the same reaction which Kovalenko and I did. This was that if you wanted to increase Japanese resistance, the best way was to have a joint Soviet-American demarche. To have Japan's only ally and its long-standing enemy (there was still no Soviet-Japanese peace treaty to end WW II), going in together would drive the Japanese crazy.

We concluded we were not going to have the two Ambassadors go in and make the joint demarche. However, we could say to the Foreign Ministry that in order to save the Japanese time, the American and the Soviet representatives could drop in together because they had the same instructions. So Kovalenko and I did all the NPT negotiations. We later had American technical negotiating teams coming out. This took a great deal of my time, and was very worthwhile.

All of my work on the NPT in Japan with Kovalenko was done in Chinese. In the Foreign Ministry, when we discussed things, it was in Chinese. The Japanese would have one of their Chinese language officers participate. But it was an unusual interlude. It was a period of detente with the Soviet Union when people in the Soviet Embassy in Tokyo, who clearly wanted to have normal relations with the United States, were allowed by their system to have them. They came forward and some of them were personally interesting and professionally useful to work with. They stood out clearly from the more usual Soviet types around them.

Q: And you went from Tokyo to where?

LEVIN: I went from Tokyo to the National Security Council staff where I was responsible for Japan and the Koreas, and worked on devising the opening with China. We had a person full time on Vietnam, and I assisted him by doing Cambodia and Laos, since Vietnam was a very demanding job and he was traveling with Kissinger on the secret peace negotiations.

Q: Could you maybe talk a little bit about how the National Security Council staff operated and the origins of this opening to China because it hit the world like a thunderbolt.

LEVIN: In terms of the opening to China, Henry Kissinger has written about this. I read his book when it came out, and recall it as quite accurate. This preparation was very closely held and my role was modest. I recall Kissinger laid it out in his book the way it happened.

The part that I worked on the hardest was a review of all of the controls we had on our relations with China. There was legislation in Congress, there were State laws, there were formal federal regulations which had been published and registered, there were various U.S. Government statements on the record, and then there were simply practices -- how we refer to "Communist China" on the VOA or in the State Department spokesman's statements -- that sort of thing.

I ran an exercise with people from throughout the government to put together a compendium of all of this. It was amazing to us that we got all of this done and it didn't leak. We didn't want it to leak because it would alert Chiang Kai-shek that the United States was about to recognize China, which we were not about to do. Or it would tell Beijing that we were about to recognize them even though they were doing things that we didn't like, which was not the case. There were many sound reasons for trying to keep this quiet. It remained quiet, though a lot of people were involved in it.

When we completed this compendium, we recommended that some of the easier steps be taken, such small things as having the VOA and the State Department spokesman no longer refer to Red China or Communist China, but the "People's Republic of China." We periodically reemphasized that you could send food and medicine to the PRC under certain circumstances. All of this came under the heading of "signals" to the PRC.

Also, I participated on behalf of the White House, in a scholarly group which was seeking to get permission from the U.S. government to have scholarly interchange with China. Scholarly materials could be sent and individuals could travel because we thought this was a good non-government way to start contacts going. A great deal of preparation was done through these scholarly discussions. These were scholars, not government officials. They were discreet but obviously they would talk about this on their campuses to the biologist who wanted to exchange specimens, that sort of thing. This was fine because public opinion could then see that there was U.S. Government interest in opening to China.

I think it had the desired effect in that it fostered non-hysterical, non-polemical public discussion. Clearly, people who either accepted Taipei's view of the world or felt this could endanger Taiwan were unsympathetic to this process. People who felt that you "Could not continue to ignore 50 percent of the world's population etc.," argued for going in the other direction. This was really healthy.

When the Chinese ping-pong team in Osaka invited the American ping-pong team to go, my successor in the Chinese job in Tokyo, Bill Cunningham, not only reported this but phoned me. We were able to get quick approval because we had made this thorough preparation. We had been pleased at the generally positive public discussion of the possibilities of non-government contact and travel, so those people were able to go. We certainly had not anticipated that this would begin with a ping-pong team in Osaka.

It also happened to turn out fortuitously that the people on the ping-pong team, the coach and the manager and the players, were the kinds of Americans that you pray to be involved in something like this. As you know, you can have American sports figures who can be disappointing as personalities or representatives of the United States. This was not true, this was just a wonderful bunch of people who had good common sense, and conducted themselves with dignity. It was fortunate, and we were very pleased. We couldn't have picked a better group.

Things moved from there. As I believe was laid out in Henry's book, the formal contacts, the trip and so forth, this was done through the Pakistanis. A number of countries had offered to be helpful but the Pakistanis had good relations with both countries, they were discreet, and they were the actual channel.

Q: Did they know what we were doing in a general way or were they just trying to open doors between the United States and the Peoples Republic?

LEVIN: Pakistan? They carried the mail. They did not read it, they did not comment on it. They were reliable and modest.

Q: They came to us first?

LEVIN: A lot of countries who had decent relationships in both Beijing and Washington made offers. I think that Henry felt that some of them would seek to aggrandize their positions, either with us or the Chinese. Some countries wanted to be brokers, to get involved in the exchanges, and he didn't feel this was necessary. The Pakistanis wanted to be just a discreet channel of communication. They weren't about to tell the Chinese how to handle the Americans or tell the Americans how to handle the Chinese. They simply wanted to help, which they did. They did it with great discretion and care, nothing ever leaked. They wanted to be the channel to help us get together, and they handled that well and we were grateful to them.

Q: How do you characterize the relationship between the NSC and the State Department, because Kissinger went from being National Security Advisor to being Secretary of State. Sort of, if you have a State Department why do you need another shadow organization pulling the strings on the President's staff.

LEVIN: I would say that the story has been documented in their books -- Kissinger's book, Nixon's book, Secretary of State Roger's book -- about the kind of personal and political rivalries which they had. At that time this did not filter down to the staff level in the specific area that I'm talking about. I am not suggesting that just because nearly everybody involved had been through Chinese language training, this made them a band of brothers. At the same time, these were all experienced professionals, different from the National Security Council staff today or the previous administration which includes inexperienced people with strong political views brought in from outside the government, frequently with personal factional backing from groups of the left or right. Henry looked to his staff to be professionally competent individuals, not spokesmen for political or ideological points of view.

The National Security Council staff in the area I was working, the "Asian cluster," were all professionals from different institutions, and the people in the State Department, CIA, Defense, USIA, were all professionals. The Nixon administration rarely put political appointees at that level, as is the case today. Yes, we were aware by rumor or innuendo that our masters had disagreements and rivalries but this simply did not affect the kinds of judgments we made, or operationally the way we did things.

We knew there was a competition going on but it really didn't have a direct effect on what we were doing. In the area that I'm discussing, whether it was trying to support the secret and the non-secret negotiations to end the Vietnam War or the opening to China, there was a pretty clear problem to be solved or goal to achieve, and there were many different views as to how to do this. But we had a responsibility to try and move proposals forward which were pretty specific. The fact that our bosses may not have loved each other or they were competing didn't really affect what we were trying to do. We sent our best efforts to the ultimate decision-makers.

Q: What was the oral exam like?

HOROWITZ: The impression that I had was that they were more interested in how I handled myself under pressure -- being asked a lot of questions about things that they hoped I didn't know much about to see how I responded. The written exam was pretty comprehensive and I did fairly well. So I think they were looking at personality and character. As soon as they hit a subject that I didn't know anything about, they hit me again with the another question -- like a lot of stuff about American geography, name three ports on the Mississippi River. We talked a little bit about the economy of the American south, they wanted me to expand on that which wasn't exactly my area. However, the interesting thing about the oral exam to me was that at the end they told me to come back in a couple of hours -- they had a few other people to give orals to -- and I took a walk, went to Macy's, and when I came back they congratulated me and said I had passed. They asked me when I was prepared to begin. At that time they were recruiting for people, the Foreign Service was taking in junior people and expanding. I said, "I don't know, I hadn't really thought about it seriously yet." They said, "Well, we will give you a little time; let us know in a few weeks." I said that I would like to think about it. Then one of the oral examiners called me aside and we went into another room -- his name was Raymond Paul Ludden and he was one of the old China hands who had been one of those heavily criticized in the McCarthy years. He explained who he was and said, "You know I am very interested in China, I spent a lot of time there; it has been a terrible period we have gone through. Now they will send me to Latin America -- they are not going to send me to China again. But if that is the reason you are hesitating, because of the McCarthy, period, I want to reassure you. The Foreign Service needs young people and we need people who are interested in China and East Asia and I hope that it is not the persecution of the McCarthy period that makes you reluctant to come into the Foreign Service." I was tremendously impressed by that. As a matter of fact that was not a reason why I was hesitating; I knew people who were affected by McCarthy, and of course at that point a lot of academics were. But I was very impressed by that, I have always remembered it. After a few weeks of pondering, I decided that I would do the foreign service.

Q: So you came in when?

HOROWITZ: The fall of 1956.

***

Q: Then you went off to the preeminent spot for looking at the other side of the moon. I have you going to Hong Kong from 1965 to 1969. What were you doing?

HOROWITZ: China watching. By that time our China watching apparatus or organization had become more sophisticated and in Hong Kong at the Consulate, which was very large, there was a separate China mainland section which did no business with Hong Kong at all, it focused only on the China mainland. This section was broken down into two halves and I was in charge of the economic side.

Q: Which was particularly important at that time. The tremendous concern was whether China was going to do something.

HOROWITZ: It turned out that that was a tremendously interesting period. Hong Kong was an ideal place for China watching. People who at that point came out of China as refugees or escapees would come to Hong Kong. People going in to China for business or trade, for whatever purpose, would enter via Hong Kong and come out via Hong Kong. It was a gateway in and out of China. In part by Chinese design because the Chinese like the idea of restricted gateways. So we could pick up a lot of information about China. Some of the radio monitoring of China was done there, but monitoring that was done elsewhere was easily cabled to Hong Kong. There were lots of other China watchers there.

Q: How did you interface with these people?

HOROWITZ: Oh, there was a whole China watching community all to itself, and very little contact with other people in Hong Kong. A lot of informal exchanging of views back and forth, discussion, small groups getting together and exchanging ideas. You established relationships. I established a good friendship with a businessman in Hong Kong, a westerner, Caucasian, who was doing business with China. I got to know him well enough so that I could call him when he came back from the visit to Peking and say, "How's business doing? Come over, Herb, and have a drink." So everyone was picking up bits and pieces of information. The British were sensitive about it, but they were picking up a lot of information too and we were exchanging our take with them, and to some extent with others. Even with the non-governmental people; there was a missionary who put out a publication on analyzing developments in China, Father ..(?).. Some of the media people, newspaper people, who were in Hong Kong were good China watchers on their own. We would get together and trade stories, impressions. So it was a very vital place for China watchers.

Q: What was your impression at the time of the Chinese economy? What were we saying and how were we looking at it?

HOROWITZ: Our impression as of about 1965 was that the economy had substantially recovered from the Great Leap collapse, the Great Leap tragedy; that agricultural production had come back to the pre-Great Leap Forward level, where it was in 1958 or 1959.

Q: Perhaps you could explain the Great Leap Forward.

HOROWITZ: The Great Leap Forward, roughly 1958 to 1960, was a Maoist led effort to stimulate the economy by getting away from the Soviet model which the Chinese had followed in the first five year plan and which focused on heavy industry. Mao said, "We are going to walk on two legs, we are going to give attention to agriculture as well as to industry." In the rural areas communes were formed, the cooperatives were transformed into communes which were much larger units. The idea was that there would be this massive application of labor; everyone would get out in the fields and work; private plots were abolished. In some communes there were dormitories, cafeterias, nurseries for the kids. By the sheer exertion of human labor and the proper revolutionary spirit they were going to build small industry -- backyard steel furnaces, for example. It was a great failure! The gross national product dropped by more than a third. Unfortunately there was some bad weather over a couple of the years and because of the disorder generated by the Great Leap Forward, the regime was unable to cope with it in terms of famine relief. It was just a disaster; a starvation situation existed.

In the early sixties the pragmatists were in command. We didn't call them pragmatists at the time but they have now become known as the pragmatists. Mao had lost some of his influence over the party and the country; he was still the main person but had lost some of his influence. The people who were in charge of the government in a day to day way were trying to get the economy going again. We felt by 1965 that this had been achieved. Agricultural production was up again, industrial production was moving ahead and they had begun to buy some small amount of machinery and equipment from abroad which was a reflection of some of the growth. By about 1965 they were in better shape than they had been for a number of years.

Q: What was our feeling...

HOROWITZ: Let me explain about China watching, it was a very esoteric art. With the failure of the Great Leap Forward, the Chinese stopped putting out statistics. Since there were no data to deal with, a lot of estimating was by the seat of one's pants. For example, in the agriculture area we had an FAS, Foreign Agriculture Service, person who worked with my unit a lot. I used to write the reports; often he would explain the agricultural issue to me and I would write it up and then he would critique what I wrote. The experts knew what China's historical agricultural pattern had been -- how much area was cultivated, how much rice was planted -- and with that background of information and with fairly good communist statistics in the fifties and knowledge about weather in different parts of the country, the experts were able to make some sort of judgments as to whether the crops were going up a little bit or down a little bit. Then you could match this with what the communist propagandists were saying. If they said, "Oh, we had an excellent crop last year," that meant it was terrible; if they said it was a "super, bumper crop" it might have been better. So after awhile you were able to key what they were saying, the phraseology they were using, with the information that you were gathering elsewhere. The trouble is, the further you get away from the base year of reliable information the more right or wrong you might be.

Q: Were we getting anything out by way of intelligence from people coming out, escaping?

HOROWITZ: Yes. Along with other evidence that agricultural production had gone up, people coming out of China complaining about famine had decreased. It was clear from the refugees that the true situation had improved somewhat. So you had all these bits and pieces of information. Of course, one of the problems with the refugee information was that it was mostly about south China, you didn't get too much about north China. In other areas of the economy it would be a similar kind of guesswork. Part of it was feel, part of it was impressions of visitors, part of it was what China was buying or trying to buy from abroad.

On China's foreign trade, we would compile the data from China's trade partners. We knew which of the trade partners were most important, extrapolate the partners' figures for a whole year -- e.g., if we only had eight or nine months -- convert f.o.b. to c.i.f. and c.i.f. to f.o.b...

Q: What do those mean?

HOROWITZ: Cost including freight, or free on board. If you want to get a picture of what China's trade was, from their perspective, you have to do this. There was a lot of guesswork involved. Then we would come up with some estimate as to trends in China's trade and what this told us about China's economic situation. It was part data and part guesswork. On the political side there was also a lot of reading between the lines. A lot of the Chinese radio broadcasts or the China press reports would be standard, they would repeat the same thing. Then all of a sudden the slogan would change and it would be a hint that something was happening. A slogan doesn't change by the whim of a broadcaster. We also learned in due course, rather later, that this was what the Chinese on the mainland over the years were doing; they were listening to their own radio broadcasts and reading their own newspapers, and reading between the lines trying to figure out what was happening. It was a very specialized field this China watching.

Q: Did you find that there might be somewhat different mind sets between say the British, who did have an embassy in Beijing, and the French, who by that time had established some trade? Did they have a different mind set than we did?

HOROWITZ: To some extent and we benefited by exchanging views with them. If China was interested in some equipment and some foreign technicians went in we might learn something indirectly about one industry or another and the French would pass it along to us, or the British would, and vice versa. We were very interested in what the Russians were saying about China because after all in the 1950's there were a lot of Russian advisors there. The Russians withdrew all of their engineers and technicians in 1960, the time of the Sino-Soviet split. Many Chinese before the split studied in Moscow and many Russians had been in China. We were interested in what the Soviets were saying in their Encyclopedia about China. One of the interesting things we found is that after a while they were using our figures in a lot of sectors. But in some areas, like iron and steel and oil production, they had different figures. We gave credence to that in industries where they might have had some first hand knowledge. We were always interested when Embassy Moscow could get us a copy of the China section of the Soviet Encyclopedia.

Q: Here you all were, China watchers, and I assume that you were all talking to each other, the political and the economic side. One of the great questions in looking back today -- we wonder, were we right -- was the extent of the Chinese communist threat to the area. How did you see this at that time?

HOROWITZ: At that time, after the failure of the Great Leap Forward and during this period of recovery, we felt that China was very inwardly focused. They were having a lot of economic problems and we did not have at all the feeling that China was looking to expand her borders or get involved in problems outside. The Sino-Soviet split having occurred, this was the period when China was emphasizing an independent foreign policy that was anti-Soviet and anti-U.S. Sort of a pox on both your houses, we will do it ourselves. China was weak and even though the economy had improved we didn't see China as a threat in the sense of it trying to do something about Taiwan, at least in the immediate future. China seemed much more inwardly focused.

Q: Well Vietnam was hot and heavy during this time.

HOROWITZ: Yes, beginning to become important. A lot of people who were going to and from Vietnam -- American government officials, American and other western reporters -- would come through Hong Kong and stop there. And some of the foreign correspondents in Hong Kong also had responsibility for Vietnam and Southeast Asia; they would go over on visits and come back. So we were conscious of this and one of the things we focused on was: How important was Chinese assistance to the hostile Vietnamese? I do remember that many of us felt that a lot of Americans had exaggerated the cost to China of the help it was giving to Vietnam. For example, our estimates of the amount of grain that China was sending into Vietnam was only a fraction of China's total; even though China was not rich it was just a fraction of China's total resources. Obviously a certain amount of small armaments and other help from China was going to Vietnam but I think we felt then that the amount of Chinese aid was limited and the threat from China exaggerated. You remember that there was a period when the Vietnamese situation was being portrayed as "the real enemy is not the Vietnamese, it is those Chicoms." We felt that that was exaggerated. It is important to remember that while their economy may have recovered by 1965, the next year the Cultural Revolution began. There was another inward looking serious period.

Q: And this lasted for how long, about five years or so?

HOROWITZ: No, the worst years were 1966 to 1969.

Q: Which were the years you were in Hong Kong.

HOROWITZ: But technically the Cultural Revolution didn't end for a decade. It was declared at an end in 1976 after Mao had died and the Gang of Four had been purged.

Q: Were you getting reflections of this Cultural Revolution, or was there a lag there?

HOROWITZ: I think there was a lag in our understanding of it. The analysis that we and others were doing was pretty good, but there were a lot of things that came to light later on which we did not quite see in the same light at the time. For example, before the Cultural Revolution there was a big propaganda campaign called the Socialist Education Campaign, one of the big political emulation campaigns. We didn't fully understand at the time that it was Mao and some close associates who were trying to reinvigorate the revolutionary ardor of the country and to win back some of the influence and control from the pragmatists who were running the country on a day to day basis. Only later on, by what developed in the Cultural Revolution, did we realized that those people were indeed pragmatists -- people like Deng Xiaoping who still lives and is active in Peking. At the moment we didn't perceive it, it was only later on reflection. Many elements of the Socialist Education Campaign became important elements of the Maoists during the Cultural Revolution.

Q: Looking back on this what would you say was the problem with trying to conduct something like this when you can't get on the ground but have to rely on emanations from the country?

HOROWITZ: It is hard because you have to rely on data and information from a lot of different sources and make seat of the pants guesses. I think it is important to have an open mind and be prepared the next year to revise your estimates or your judgments from the year before. It is difficult. Later on, and I think this is interesting, when we were in Peking at the time of the Liaison Office from '73 to '75 -- and I think we did some good reporting from Peking but it was very Peking centered -- in many ways the people in Hong Kong were getting a better view of some of the things that were happening in China. There were still travelers coming out through Hong Kong that they could talk to, they were getting information from provincial newspapers. In some ways some of the reporting and analysis in that period from Hong Kong was better than some of the reporting we were doing in Peking.

Q: You have what we call in Washington an inside the beltway viewpoint.

HOROWITZ: That is possible, yes.

Q: Were you getting any feeling of concern then about the reversion of Hong Kong to China?

HOROWITZ: Yes, there was. Hong Kong has always gone through these phases of great worry and concern followed by huge optimism. In 1967 there was a period when the Cultural Revolution was spilling over into Hong Kong and there were pro-Mao activists and there were some demonstrations. The British had to reinforce the border; they brought in some Gurkhas. Some bombs were going off in the streets, mostly propaganda bombs; also bodies were floating in to Hong Kong waters, the result of Cultural Revolution fighting. The people in Hong Kong got worried and began looking elsewhere. All of a sudden there was an overabundance of office space and apartments. (Even we moved during that period; we got a better apartment and lower rent.) Chinese families were laying out the future. One son would be sent off to Singapore to open a branch of the shop, another would go to the U.S., another to Taiwan. So there was a period of agitation and concern in Hong Kong during the Cultural Revolution. But that passed when the worst part of the Cultural Revolution was over.

Q: Looking over the people, were there any that stood out in your mind as being really good as China watchers or was it mostly a collegial effort?

HOROWITZ: I can think of a lot of people who were outstanding reporting officers and good analysts but it was really very much a collegial effort. I think we all benefitted from this going back and forth and discussing and reexamining. During the Cultural Revolution, for example, so much was happening -- there was the Chinese media to look at, there were wall posters and pamphlets that people were smuggling into Hong Kong because there was a market for this stuff, there were some Cultural Revolution type publications that were coming out, there were refugees that might be interviewed. So in our China mainland section we would have a meeting every morning, first thing in the morning, and sometimes another meeting at the end of the day, and we would decide for that day who was going to do what. Who was going to follow up this lead, who was going to contact the British about that, who was going to look at that new editorial that just came out, and then we would fan out and come together and decide what we...

Q: It must have been a very exciting and stimulating time.

HOROWITZ: It was. It was also a little unreal sitting in an office and doing all this analysis of a country when you are not there.

Q: It reminds me a little of being an astronomer during a meteor shower.

HOROWITZ: After Hong Kong I went back to the Department in Washington and was in the Office of Aviation.

Ambassador Harry E. T. Thayer was born in Massachusetts in 1927. He received his bachelor's degree from Yale University in 1951. He served in the US Navy from 1945-1946. His overseas posts include Hong Kong, Taipei, and Beijing. He was ambassador to Singapore from 1980 to 1984. Ambassador Thayer was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1990.

THAYER: I had planned to work as a newspaper man and was hoping to go to work for the Hartford Courant in Connecticut, but at the last minute was offered a job with Alaska Airlines as assistant to the chairman of the board in New York. So I went to New York for Alaska Airlines, stayed there for six months and decided to go on with my original plan. I got a job at Newsweek as a copy boy, stayed there for a couple of years. And that was during the [Senator Joseph] McCarthy period. During this time my interest in Chinese, which had started at my senior year at Yale intensified. Even though I hadn't majored in it or taken any Chinese courses at Yale, I began at Yale to read into China. At Newsweek I continued my interest in things Chinese, although I worked there on other subjects, especially medicine and science writing.

This interest increased during the two years at Newsweek, which was '52 to '54. Then I went to Europe with my wife for three months, used up our savings, just wandered around Europe. After we came back, I went to work for the Philadelphia Bulletin at the same time as taking the Foreign Service exams, worked for the Philadelphia Bulletin as a police reporter for a year and then as a rewrite man in general assignment for a year, which ended in 1956. Then I went into the Foreign Service September of 1956.

Q: What attracted you towards the Foreign Service?

THAYER: I first got attracted to the Foreign Service by interest in things Chinese, in what was happening between the U.S. and China. And this was during the time of the issuance of the White Paper in 1949. When I was at college, my interest was boosted also by a major article in the Reporter magazine about the China lobby, by the rise of Senator Jenner and others...

Q: Knowland.

THAYER: Knowland, the senator from Formosa, McCarthy, the whole shebang. And I just became more and more aware of things relating to U.S.-China relations. And, at the same time, I was stimulated further by our trip to Europe, where, among other things, I stopped in at embassies and talked to Foreign Service officers as I could. And I agonized about trying to go to the Foreign Service as soon as that trip was over but decided to put a little more newspaper work under my belt, take the exam to keep my options open; so I took the exam but went to newspapering.

When I came into the Foreign Service, I came in with also a lot of the romance of the Foreign Service. I liked the idea of traveling abroad. As a kid, I traveled a lot around the United States, taking all kinds of different jobs in a variety of states. And I had a lot of the romantic attraction of the Foreign Service, in addition to this rather unfocused but nevertheless strong interest in getting involved somehow in China.

There was another factor in this interest. In 1951, while I was working for the Philadelphia Bulletin -- let me back up a minute. During all this period, the Korean War was very much a part of our lives. And I expected to be called back in the Navy for the Korean War. I had been an enlisted man 1945-'46. So when I went to join a reserve unit, I took the examination for a commissioned officer. The Korean War and things Asian had also come very much in our consciousness. I thought I was going to be called back in with my unit. In the end, for some reason, the unit wasn't called, and I went on with my civilian life.

While I was at the Bulletin, which was during the '54 to '56 period -- I guess that must have been '55 -- the Chinese announced that they had a number of prisoners of war, including a friend and guy with whom I graduated, Jack Downey -- John Downey -- one of the CIA men who was captured after he was shot down on a mission into Manchuria. Not shot down, but he had landed in a small plane, and he was captured along with a fellow named Fecteau. In any event, the announcement by the Chinese of John Downey's capture had a terrifically strong impact on me, and it intensified my desire to get involved somehow.

I remember picking up the phone in Philadelphia the morning I read this in the New York Times and calling Pete Braestrup. Peter more recently was editor of the Wilson Quarterly and now is with the Library of Congress in another capacity. But Peter was then with Time magazine and a journalistic friend. And I remember saying to Peter, "Peter, isn't there something we can do about Jack? Can't we do something about Jack?" And internally I thought to myself, one of the things that I can do is to get involved, not as an act of charity, but just as an act of -- I just felt I wanted to do something. I felt I wanted to be a part of that rather than observing. It increased those desires of wanting a piece of the action rather than observing the action. So Jack's capture intensified my desire, or the announcement of his capture intensified my desire to enter the Foreign Service.

Actually, Jack's capture came back into my life after I entered the Foreign Service. I still had more to do with Jack in a very direct way after going in. We can come to that at a later stage.

Q: In the first place, when you entered the Foreign Service, was there any attempt to channel you off towards the USIA side with your newspaper experience or not?

THAYER: No, there wasn't any attempt, as far as I remember. I remember being asked by one of my Washington- resident Yale classmates why didn't I go into USIA. And I remember answering him -- this was at a party -- "If I'm going to go into the State Department or the government, I want to be a part of the real action. I don't want to be helping to comment on the action. I want a part of the real action." But no, no attempt was made to recruit.

Q: Did you have regular training and all that?

THAYER: I was a member of the Class of September 1956. It's a class that Loy Henderson, former under secretary of state, is alleged to have commented on during a 1960 or '61 visit to Vientiane. He supposedly asked one of my classmates when he had come into the Foreign Service. He said "1956."

And Loy Henderson said, "Oh, that was the year they took everybody in."

Anyhow, that was when I came in, September '56. And we were given a choice of assignments, asked to list preferences, one, two, three. I listed Hong Kong as my first preference for reasons that had more to do with the romance of the Foreign Service and China than everything else. I remember listing Beirut as second. Beirut was then one of the great posts to serve in.

Q: The pearl of the Middle East. The Paris of the Middle East.

THAYER: And what is now known as Kinshasa, Leopoldville in those days, as my third choice. Luckily, I got Hong Kong.

Q: What were you doing in Hong Kong?

THAYER: I started out as a visa officer, and I was on the visa line handling particularly spouses and minor children of American citizens. I did that for most of the two years I was in Hong Kong, two and a half years. I also served, for about six months, as the American Services officer. Although I'm basically a political officer, I really enjoyed the visa work. Although I never felt it was as prestigious as the political work in the big consulate in Hong Kong, I learned a tremendous amount because we were dealing face to face with people coming out of China. I just learned one hell of a lot about China.

Q: Could you give a little idea of the atmosphere of what a visa officer was doing? Because Chinese visas in those days were always a very difficult job.

THAYER: In Hong Kong, virtually all the immigrant visas I handled were the M-1 and M-2 visas. Virtually all of my cases were from the south. The majority of them were from Taishan County.

Q: Taishan being near Canton?

THAYER: Being near Canton. Hong Kong being near Canton, most of the people coming into our consulate were from Taishan on their way to the States. Taishan was the traditional origin of Chinese immigrants to the States. There was a study done a year before or two years before I arrived, which included a calculation that about 85 percent of the cases we were working with were fraudulently based. That is to say, the petitioners in the States had come in on phony slots opened by their fathers presence in the States, and their parents' declaration to the Immigration Service that they had a certain number of sons back in China. But they had sold off those slots to a lot of the people, the next generation. This group had gone to the U.S. before I got to Hong Kong. They were, at that time, filing petitions in turn, for their wives and children. The petitioners had gone to the States with false names, most of them. So their wives and children, with false names also, had to make up all kinds of paper stories in order to be legitimized as the subject of the petition. And so they were coming to us with all kinds of lies. Even though the basic relationships, by the time I got there, were mostly correct, the names, the identities, claimed home villages -- many of them were false.

When I was there, the consulate was in the second year of a million dollar anti-fraud program where a bunch of security officers were hired to work with local authorities to get to the bottom of the fraud in the Chinese applications. So there was an atmosphere of suspicion and distrust that exceeds the situation in most places.

Illustrating this, the kind of mentality that was around in our consulate, I went off on a raid in Macao with one of our investigative officers and his Chinese local investigator. We went off to Macao, and we raided. We literally charged up the back stairs of a rickety old house to raid, in the first case, an apartment on the third or fourth floor where we tore the place apart looking for documents demonstrating the real identity of applicants that were before us applying for visas. We had no warrant. We had nothing at all. I went along as an observer. But my moral outrage at what we were doing only came in retrospect. At the time, I wasn't sensitive to this, quite to my shame today. But this is the kind of thing that we were doing in those days.

But I got to Hong Kong in May of '57, and Hong Kong was still quite a primitive place, nowhere near as crowded as it is now, and very much a place for refugees. We were processing refugees, basically, is what we were doing.

Q: What did this do to you and your fellow consuls? Did this have an effect? I mean, when you've got 85 percent fraud or something like that, did it turn you all into cynics and pretty nasty people to deal with as bureaucrats?

THAYER: My guess is that most consular officers, if they haven't served in China, have served in comparable places where the fraud is very, very high. And I certainly went through stages, and I think most of my colleagues went through stages -- initially of sympathy, then of an outrage at being lied to day after day after day, and ultimately passing through that sense of outrage to a feeling of resignation and compassion. I certainly went through all three of those periods in Hong Kong.

But the fraud was permeating before I got there. An American consular officer had been jailed for selling visas, quite a sensational case at the time. Fraud was a way of life. Yet we became quite good friends with some of the immigration attorneys who came in. In fact, while I served in Taiwan, this 1980's decade, I again saw one of the old immigration attorneys for Hong Kong cases, Jack Chow, who had some pretty bad cases but always managed to keep up good relations with the visa officers.

But, yes, it created attitudes that, in retrospect, were regrettable, are regrettable. And it created a certain degree of arrogance, a colonialist mentality. And in those days, Hong Kong was very much a colony. People called Chinese "boys." The Foreign Correspondents Club and the American Club were two main scenes of activities, and they had a "colonialist" flavor. While there were friendships, certainly close friendships between many of the consulate employees and the Chinese, the Chinese intellectuals and their senior local employees and so forth, there was, on the visa front, a different set of relationships, and they were, in many respects, mutually hostile -- the visa officer angry at being exploited himself and his country being exploited from his perspective; the visa applicant, as is still the case, simply anxious one way or the other, ethics be damned, to get to the States. It's still the situation.

Q: Did you get any chance there to get into the political reporting side or anything like that?

THAYER: As visa officers, we were encouraged mildly to send along political information to the political officers. And I made good friends in the political section, several of whom are among my good friends today, and would quite often confer with them about things that I had found. Occasionally I would send up a report. But we were pretty overwhelmed with visa work, as is the case most places, and there wasn't as much production out of the visa section for political or economic purposes as there probably could have been. However, there wasn't an intersectional disdain as there is in some embassies, and there was a good deal of cooperative work.

Q: What was your attitude at that time towards the People's Republic of China, in other words Red China, at that time?

THAYER: Well, my attitude was based, you have to understand, mostly on ignorance, because I'd never had any formal study of China. But I read the FBIS and I...

Q: FBIS being?

THAYER: The Foreign Broadcast Information Service translation of Chinese broadcasts. I read that every day, along with the consulate's own translations and other material. I otherwise tried to keep up with what was going on or learn about what was going on in China. I took a course at Hong Kong University in the economy of China. A lot of my attitude, I remember, could be illustrated by a conversation I had with Ambassador Bohlen, now dead, whose wife's name was Thayer and is a second cousin of my father. He was ambassador to Manila at that time, having been shipped out by Dulles for a variety of domestic political reasons. He and his wife, Avis, came over to Hong Kong. And I remember they asked me to lunch, a very kind thing. I didn't know them well at all, but we were distantly related. I remember talking to Bohlen about my attitude toward China. I said, "Reading the FBIS every day, it makes me really despair at the U.S. and the Chinese ever working out some livable arrangement. The generation that is being schooled today" -- that was in the '50s -- "is hearing nothing but very vituperative anti-American propaganda. And so these kids are going to grow up with great antagonism, perhaps irreversible, toward the United States."

Ambassador Bohlen, in a kindly way, pooh-poohed this, saying that he didn't think that the effect would be permanent. And he said, "Anyway, Harry, you ought to remember something." He said, "Governments deal with governments, and the function of the diplomacy is to deal with the government, not with the people. And governments will not always see things in the same way as the people do." That was an interesting comment.

But my attitude was one more of curiosity rather than of hostility. I remember asking Consul General Drumright when I was on duty one Saturday morning -- Drumright being an old-line, rather right-wing Foreign Service officer who escaped the purges. And I asked him did he ever think we would go back to China during my professional lifetime. And he said, "Oh, yes." He said, "I have no doubt that we'll go back. The Chinese will become democratic again, or at least the communists will fall, and we'll reopen the same number of posts that we used to have." But my attitude was more of curiosity and learning. I really was learning, didn't pretend to be an expert. It wasn't hostility. It was interest.

Q: You were around the China hands. This was the time when it was absolutely an untouchable subject to talk about recognizing, as we all called it in those days, Red China. But what about within your cohorts and all? Did you see this as being a worthy -- I mean, not a worthy goal, but that we were probably going to recognize Communist China, or we're going to have to wait for the great revolution that was in store or whatever you want to call a non-communist government?

THAYER: I don't remember clearly any single conversation I had on this subject with my colleagues there. I think there was a general acceptance of the impossibility of doing anything with the Chinese under then current conditions, that there were a lot of tangled knots that had to be untangled. And the beginnings of that were taking place in Europe: in Geneva, then Warsaw (our bilateral ambassador-level talks). But I don't think anybody that I was aware of saw a near-term solution to it. So we were just living with it.

But, at the same time, I think most of us young fellows were in the business because we wanted to deal with the China problem and were interested in the China problem as a diplomatic problem and implicitly a problem to be solved, implicitly someday we would solve it. So I think that was the context in which we were working.

I remember some conversations about the possibilities of Chiang Kai-shek retaking the mainland, somehow going back to the mainland. Still that wasn't an important part of our thinking. The important part of the thinking was there's a problem there that had to be solved. We didn't quite know how it was going to be solved.

Q: Did you feel sort of a heavy hand at all? I mean, obviously you were at a much lower level, so you wouldn't, but that one had to really watch what one said about China? I'm thinking because of the McCarthy era and all this, that you couldn't really express how you felt.

THAYER: I didn't feel that terribly myself, because I wasn't that important. But I remember some discussion by others, older Foreign Service officers there, who did feel that they needed to pull some punches specifically because of concern about the psychology of Washington. And whether this amounted to not reporting things that they felt rather than reporting -- I don't think it meant not reporting facts, it's just that one was cautious. And I remember at about the same time, although it was in Washington, either just before I was in Hong Kong or just after, there was some concern about being seen reading a communist publication on the bus, for example. But I wasn't terribly conscious of this as a factor in Hong Kong.

Q: Then your first tour was over and you went back to the Department in 1959. What were you doing there?

THAYER: Well, I went back to the Department to be a post management officer in the executive office of the East Asia Bureau with responsibility for personnel and funds for Japan, Korea, Hong Kong, and Taiwan, for the embassies and the consulate general there. I might say that about halfway through the Hong Kong experience my then wife and I talked over what we would do next and whether our experience in Hong Kong had confirmed sufficiently our interest and willingness to devote a career to Asia and China. We explicitly came to the decision that, yes, our interest was genuine. We wanted to stay in it. My wife had gotten quite a lot of interest in Chinese art and other things. I applied for the Chinese language program in Taichung (Taiwan), and was accepted in that program, the Foreign Service Institute's Chinese language and area training.

I was accepted for that program, but at the last minute, when I was to leave Hong Kong for the U.S. on home leave, they changed my assignment to go back to East Asia Bureau and serve as a post management officer. I was then over thirty and felt my language-learning capability was going to fade pretty fast. I had been studying an hour a day in Hong Kong religiously and doing quite a bit of homework. But I was outraged at this sudden deprivation and consignment to administrative work in Washington instead of proceeding on the China track and, before leaving Hong Kong, fought it by telegram and letter and every way I could. But I was deemed indispensable for post management and went back as a post management officer.

Q: How did that play out then?

THAYER: Well, it played out like so many things. I got interested in it, and I learned a lot about how the Foreign Service is run. They put me in the East Asia Bureau while Walter Robertson was still there, which gave me kind of a taste of things. And it was quite instructive. I learned a lot about the Foreign Service and working in the bureaucracy. And I learned a lot about management and all these things, learned a lot about Congress, writing justifications for funds to the Hill. That was all quite instructive. I also met a lot of the personalities involved in China and Asia affairs. I also, in May of 1961, suddenly got yanked off to go on a trip as a coat-holder for LBJ when he was vice president, went around the world as an aide to this LBJ first around-the-world trip.

***

THAYER: That summer of '61, I went direct to Taiwan to start training in Taiwan. And I ended up staying there two years, partly because of an accident I had. It put me out of training for a while. At the end of those two years in Taichung, which I loved, I had initially expected to go to Phnom Penh in one of the China-watching posts, combining French and Chinese. I had French and I had learned Chinese. But something happened about the Phnom Penh assignment. I ended up opting for Taipei, and I went down to Taipei as my first assignment in 1963 after language school.

Q: Were you getting any indoctrination as you went through your training? I went through Serbian training, and we had Serbian teachers who were trying their best to turn us into real strong anti-Titoists. Really it didn't have much effect. But I was wondering whether because of the training, were you getting the KMT side of things from your language teachers?

THAYER: To some extent. And we were conscious that everything we were doing was being reported to the regime in Taipei. Some of the teachers were hard-line. Some of the teachers were very, very anti-KMT, and that came through in the teaching. The language school even then, however, was allowed to teach from original communist materials. We learned from Mao's writings, and the People's Daily. These Materials weren't allowed to go out of the building, but we were allowed to consult them. So it was a reasonably balanced thing. But I will say, from the experiences of my last job as dean of the language school, the problem of getting native speakers to train without giving a little free political indoctrination one way or another is still with us.

Q: Oh, yes. [Laughter] Well, it sounds like you had it a little better. There is nothing more stubborn than a Serb, and these two were cousins, and they were very strong.

What were you doing in Taipei? You were there from '63 to '66.

THAYER: I was there from '63 to '66. I went down there as an economic commercial officer covering industry -- textiles and book piracy were the two main things I covered. But I also did odds and ends of other things. And we did our first bilateral textile negotiation a few months after I arrived. It was a tremendously instructive experience for me being the embassy person on this beat.

I will say that my newspaper background reared its historic head just before I went down to Taipei. The PAO in Taipei at that time tried to persuade the DCM and myself that I should go to USIS and help him put together a weekly newspaper and work full time in USIS. I fought this very hard in a long memorandum written from the language school to the DCM in which I gave my background and aspirations and said that I'd been derailed once from Taichung, I was over thirty, I'd never done any substantive work, and I wanted to get on with my substantive career, and I figured USIS would be a diversion.

That view was finally accepted, and I went as an economic commercial officer, served in that job for a year, as the only Chinese language officer in the section. After home leave I came back and worked in the political section.

Q: Harry, could you tell me a little more about these textile negotiations? Then we'll come to the book piracy issue. Because both of these seem to be, in many ways, the very core of our relationship with Taipei. I mean, these are not minor subjects, are they, in those days, anyway?

THAYER: Well, they weren't minor subjects in those days. We had completed a textile agreement with Japan. I think we had not done so with anybody else at that point. The importance of the negotiation, the commercial importance is well understood, the domestic pressures here, perhaps, are well understood. To me, the really enlightening part of that effort was the problem of coordinating and getting a consensus among U.S. domestic interests as manifested in the various departmental representatives who were there -- the Labor Department, the Commerce Department, the State Department. These were all participants in the negotiations.

The relationships with the Chinese seemed to be a lot less acrimonious than the relationships among the American negotiators. As a State Department officer, I was very much a creature of the chief negotiator who was a State Department officer himself. And I was quite flabbergasted as a relatively naive Foreign Service officer to find the American side conniving with the Chinese side to bypass one of the American negotiators. Well, this isn't a new idea to older hands, but to me it was an eye-opener. It was also, to me, very satisfying that, as a Chinese language officer, I could use my Chinese, and that was useful. I mean, that was rewarding for me. Parenthetically, I'll say that in that same job I worked on a PL 480 agreement.

Q: Would you explain what the PL 480 agreement was?

THAYER: Public Law 480, which allowed for the sale of American agricultural commodities repaid in foreign currencies which were normally spent, of course, in the host country. The thing I most remember about the PL 480 agreement was that I was charged with verifying that the Chinese version conformed with the American version. I was able to find that in a number of respects the Chinese version was imperfectly translated and was able to get it translated correctly. As a language officer, that was very gratifying that I could do that.

Anyhow, the textile negotiations have been followed by many bilaterals with Taiwan. Subsequently I, twenty years later, when I headed the PRC desk, was involved in our first textile negotiations with the Communist Chinese.

Q: Well, how did the book piracy issue come up? Could you explain what the problem was?

THAYER: Yes. The problem of the book piracy in those days was that the Chinese were not only copying without authorization American books, including the encyclopedias, but were exporting these publications back to the United States. And it did not sit well with the American publishers to find their prices undercut by, say, 90 percent in their own territory.

Q: I think many of us benefitted by these overseas. I mean, they were tut-tut. But I have several books which...

THAYER: Well, that's what we all did. An encyclopedia from Taiwan was a very well-known commodity available to Foreign Service officers. In any event, in 1963 and 1964, when I worked on this problem, I took it quite seriously. We were getting a lot of flak, Congress and so forth. I worked with a department director at the Taiwan Ministry of Interior, who, himself, was convinced that Taiwan for its own image had to do something about the problem. And he and I worked very closely together.

At the same time, when I came back to the United States on consultation I went to New York and met with the American Publishers Association to try to encourage them to work with us and take the Chinese bureaucracy in good faith, treat them in good faith, and together, as the saying goes, we could make progress. In fact, we did make some progress when I was there, and within a year or two, exports to the United States had stopped. The Chinese had instituted procedures to stop the export to the United States of Taiwan-pirated books. And I don't mean it all halted completely, but the Chinese regulations were in place and firmly enough so that the embassy issued strict instructions against any of our personnel taking stuff back as being against both U.S. and Chinese laws. I don't know that it was ever implemented properly, but the Chinese customs and the American customs both inspected for pirated books, and pirated books that were attempted to be taken out of Taiwan were confiscated, and I think there were some penalties imposed.

So that was a rewarding thing. It taught me something about negotiations. It also seemed like a worthwhile thing to put some imagination and energy into, which I did. And it was also, if I may say so, a palpable kind of problem that had some sex appeal to it. Our ambassador gave me a lot of support.

Q: Our ambassador at that time was?

THAYER: Was Jerauld Wright.

Q: Admiral Jerauld Wright.

THAYER: Retired admiral, who is still in Washington and quite active, a very nice gent, and he gave me terrific support -- demarches to the foreign minister and so forth -- in effect, giving support to the Chinese department director whose name I still remember was Hsiung -- a Chinese character for bear -- who actually, more or less, single-handedly reversed Taiwan's position. Mr. Hsiung was a very fine gent. But the ambassador was supportive, and it was one of those things that Foreign Service officers put a lot of energy into, get a lot of satisfaction from, but it passes and nobody remembers what you did. But it's part of the fun of being in the Foreign Service.

Q: Then you worked on the economic side, and then you moved over, you say, to what, the political side?

THAYER: To the political side. We had a five- or six-man political section.

Q: Of course, in those days, that was our representation to China.

THAYER: Right. And Embassy Taipei was a lot more important in the '50s and the '60s, particularly in the early '60s than subsequent to the [Secretary of State Henry] Kissinger. As a political officer, I was covering two things. One was some of the central government organizations, including the KMT central committee, and the other was the Taiwanese and local governments.

In this connection, I began to study Taiwanese. So I studied one hour a day Mandarin, Monday, Wednesday, and Friday, and one hour a day Taiwanese, Tuesday and Thursday. Taiwanese was important because part of my job, I'm delighted to say, was to get out of the embassy and go around the island and meet the local politicians, the magistrates, the KMT county chairmen, the newspaper publishers and so forth. That was terrific fun. I would just go off on my own for a week and wouldn't have a necktie on, and go around the island and meet people and use my Chinese full time. It was terrific fun.

Q: I wonder if you could give, at this point, how you saw the situation on Taiwan, I mean, both with a central government but also relations with the Taiwanese and the effectiveness, and lack thereof.

THAYER: Well, I didn't see it as clearly then as I do now. But I saw the Taiwanese probably as a lot more meaningfully discontented than they were. That is to say, Taiwanese did feel exploited. Chiang Ching-kuo was just beginning to have some effect in bringing Taiwanese into the...

Q: Who was he?

THAYER: Chiang Ching-kuo was the son of Chiang Kai-shek. He became deputy defense minister when I was there, became defense minister, too, when I was there. But he was responsible for opening the KMT more and more to Taiwanese. Taiwanese were very much in the KMT when I was there, but there was a lot of anti-KMT sentiment, particularly among the Taiwanese intellectuals. There was a good deal of apparent sentiment, nostalgia, for the Japanese. Some of this was phoney. Some of this was real. In any event, in the 60's I think I exaggerated the importance of the anti-KMT sentiment in terms of the ability of the Taiwanese, anti-KMT Taiwanese, to turn their antagonism into dramatic pressure against the regime.

I remember postulating in a paper (that I never did send forward because I didn't really believe it in the end; I talked myself out of it in the process of writing) that, if Chiang Kai-shek then were suddenly to die and there was some kind of economic downturn, the Taiwanese would actually riot to the point of using physical power against the regime. And I had come to the point, I thought, of believing that. But when I wrote it out, I realized I didn't believe it.

Q: This raises a point I think that's interesting. I'd like you to comment on it. Going back to the time you were there and how you saw things, when one reads newspaper columnists now fifty years ago or something, they tend to see things in apocalyptic terms. I mean, if this doesn't happen, very horrible things or major things will happen, rather than things sort of working their way out. It's easier to get a handle on these things if you're just writing. Do you think that this, sort of in political reporting, too -- I mean, the same process of not seeing things maybe in as gradualistic terms as they might be in more sort of black and white?

THAYER: I saw things more in black and white than, in retrospect, was accurate, certainly. But I found the process of writing, particularly a long think-piece, helped mature my own thinking. I would say, incidentally, that when I got to Taiwan, well, I had had four or five years of newspaper experience and supposedly a good education and so forth, but I was really quite naive about foreign policy and diplomacy. And when I was in the economic section, I participated in drafting the first part of an annual posture statement for the embassy in which I went along with a rather wild and simplistic set of recommendations for U.S.-China policy, a paper which I hope never surfaces, because I think, in retrospect, it was so bad -- so bad and so simplistic. Well, I just make that point. I imagine many officers have gone through the same thing. But this was not a good paper even while I was an economic officer.

As a political officer, I saw a lot of the Taiwanese, sympathized with them, and let myself be influenced, I think more than a more mature officer would have, by their description of the facts and by their perspectives, although I discounted a great deal of what they said about their economic well being, because I could see how well they lived compared to how I know they had lived ten years earlier, and the statistics were there also. So I wasn't taken in entirely. But my sympathies certainly were with them, and, therefore, I probably exaggerated, in my own thinking, their importance. I don't think it affected my reporting at all except that by my interest in the Taiwanese, in the local politicians' attitudes, I was able to get better access to them, and, therefore, I was able to report more fully what they were thinking and what they were saying.

It's when the judgment came as to how important this was that -- others were making these judgments in any case. I was a junior officer, and there were level heads around, and I wasn't pushing a particular line. I was just reporting. I loved reporting. I loved getting out and talking to people, figuring out what they were thinking, trying to write it in an understandable and interesting way and drawing some small conclusions from it. I enjoyed that part of it, throwing light on dark corners.

Q: How did the political section, particularly, and yourself look upon the KMT -- the Kuomintang -- as a government, its effectiveness, its value?

THAYER: Well, I think we thought it was effective. We believed and said in our briefings to newcomers and newspapermen and so forth how important it was for the free world to have a strong Taiwan, a viable economy, a military force, Taiwan as a major part of the Pacific chain of democratic or at least non-communist states. We believed in the unpleasant nature of the communist regime, indeed. I think all of us saw the imperfections of the Taiwan regime at that time, as did many in the regime itself. I think we had a rather healthy attitude. We weren't in the bag of the regime. That is to say, our embassy was not a spokesman for the regime, although there were times, particularly in the evolutionary period of the early '60s, when, for example, on the issue of Mongolia, which occurred just before I came down to Taipei...

Q: The issue being?

THAYER: Being Mongolia's seat in the U.N. Ambassador Drumright, I think, got into a big rhubarb with the Kennedy administration over that. And there were other times when our embassy as a whole, I think, saw things a little more sympathetic to the KMT regime than perhaps Washington did. But I don't think egregiously so. We had some very smart and able people at the leadership of the embassy when I was there.

Q: Who were they?

THAYER: When I arrived, Ralph Clough was the DCM, and Ralph was one of our best China language and area professionals. His spoken Chinese is terrific. But he's a tremendously wise person and was not going to be anybody's fool. I'm sure that his advice to our series of ambassadors was always good. He was in charge a lot of the time. He was a very good man, is a very good man still.

Q: Yes, we had a good interview with him. Marshall Green did it, by the way.

THAYER: Well, Ralph was there, and then he was succeeded by Art Hummel, who has had a wonderful career. Art was a very good DCM, very able with the Chinese, also a very level-headed guy. So we weren't a bunch of patsies for the regime. We very much had our eye on U.S. interests. I think I say this collectively. I'm speaking more of the others senior to me who were in the embassy.

Q: How about a view of Red China in those days? It was going through tremendous turmoil at this point in the mid-'60s. How did you view this? Did you think of this as an awesome power or a disintegrating power? What did you think?

THAYER: Well, you have to remember, in those days, China had its first nuclear test in 1964, first nuclear device. It had beaten up the Indians in '61, I guess. We had the Quemoy issue in '58. Communist China was a threat, and we saw it as a threat. We saw -- at least I did -- the KMT as, at that point, the only sensible part of China to support. Maybe eventually something else would happen, but in those days there wasn't much doubt as to what we needed to do in our relationship with the KMT. I think there was a fair amount of discussion of the need for our relationship with the PRC to evolve more, and that was manifested in things that were done during the Kennedy administration, including the Hilsman speech in '63 -- Assistant Secretary Hilsman -- in which he said, in effect, that Communist China was there to be dealt with. So there was a degree of realism, but we didn't see any rapid evolution about to take place.

Q: Do you recall how you felt about China and the Soviet Union? Was it still as close as a lips-to-teeth type situation, or how did you see it then?

THAYER: I think I understood that the split had taken place. The Soviets had withdrawn personnel and all that. I never saw China as a creature of the Soviet Union, anyhow, and we certainly didn't, in those days, think that it was. There were, you know, obvious rifts. I can't remember all the details now. But there were problems within the PRC, within the Chinese Communist Party, and there were the tremendous economic problems in the early '60s, the aftermath of the Great Leap Forward.

We saw the PRC as a threat but also knew it was in trouble. But there wasn't much doubt -- I don't think there was much doubt in those days -- that our alliance with the KMT was important to U.S. interests. I saw it in too simplistic terms, but I think that, generally speaking, people were sophisticated about it.

Q: Were there any major incidents that you were involved in or anything during this time you were on Taipei?

THAYER: No, the riots of '57 were...

Q: That's when they sacked the embassy.

THAYER: When the Chinese sacked the embassy -- were a very important memory to us all, and part of the memory of our embassy institution. We were all sensitive about that. When I was in language school, there were a lot of rumors that Chiang was going to attack some piece of Fujian and there was a big excitement, seen the distance from the language school. But, actually, the three years I was in the embassy, there weren't any really dramatic incidents that I can remember. We didn't go through a major change of regime. There were no other major events that took place. I wouldn't call it a placid time, but relatively so.

Q: You came back and you were in INR [Intelligence and Research] then, weren't you?

THAYER: No, actually I came back to be on the Taiwan desk.

Q: You left in '66?

THAYER: Left Taiwan in '66 and came on the Taiwan desk, which was a four-man desk, and I was the low man. Then I became deputy director for my second year there. Much of the time I was handling economic questions as well as being the desk-level authority on the local politics side because of my own experience in Taiwan.

Q: Was there any residue of the old China lobby from Congress? Did you feel this breathing down your neck or not, or had this pretty well been dissipated?

THAYER: By that time, the China lobby had pretty well dissipated, but it was still there, and some of the well-known figures of the China lobby were around. And because of our dealing with the Taiwan Embassy, the Republic of China Embassy, we saw a lot of these folks -- Walter Judd, for example. When I got to the U.N. in 1971 during the Chinese representation effort, the China lobby was exemplified by the Committee of One Million, which was the new manifestation of the China lobby. It was still very active. But as a desk officer, no, there wasn't much involvement.

Q: You then spent a while with the Intelligence and Research Division?

THAYER: No, I went back to serve on the Taiwan desk for two years, and then I went over as deputy director of PRC affairs. So '66 to '68 I was on Taiwan and Taiwan affairs, and '68 to '70 I was on PRC affairs.

Q: How did we view the PRC? This was the time of our major commitment in Vietnam. How did we view the role of the PRC at that time?

THAYER: Well, we viewed the PRC as supporting Vietnam, of course. But we also -- I say "we," the people on the desk before I got there as well as when I was there -- we were concerned that our hostilities with Vietnam did not spill over unduly into the U.S.-PRC relationship. The Warsaw talks were continuing at that time. We also had other things in mind to do with the PRC that would reduce the tension between us. We sought to avoid gratuitously exacerbating a relationship with the PRC, exacerbation as a corollary to our hostilities with Vietnam.

Q: You must have then gone a bit head-to-head with the military from time to time, didn't you? Because we were flying bombing raids very close to the Chinese border.

THAYER: Well, there were.

Q: The military, from what I understand, felt the State Department was trying to get a little too precious.

THAYER: Perhaps so. My recollection of what actually we did with the military is not so clear. But I remember a pilot being shot down over Hainan, for example, and he evidently had gotten off course. We didn't think this contributed to U.S.-PRC relations. And, as I remember, we let our views be known about that. It was also during this period that the Seventh Fleet patrols between Taiwan and the mainland which were merely symbolic, were reduced. I can't remember at which point they were eliminated, but they were reduced, in any case.

In those days, we were looking for ways to improve the relationship with the PRC and were trying various things, including in the Warsaw channel but also in other ways to reduce the tension with the PRC. I was deputy to Paul Kreisberg, who was the director, and Don Anderson was the number three man and was our interpreter at the Warsaw talks. And he and Paul would go off to Warsaw talks while I ran the office. But Vietnam was still very much in the way of improvement of U.S.-PRC relations.

Q: Did the idea crop up from time to time of somehow using the Republic of China's troops at all as a factor in the Vietnam thing, or was this something that we --

THAYER: I don't remember any specifics on this, but I think it was well understood by everybody that we didn't want to complicate the Vietnam exercise or U.S.-PRC relations by the introduction of KMT troops. I will just mention parenthetically that while I was still in Taiwan, I did accompany the ambassador in to see the foreign minister to ask for Taiwan secondary support of some kind, contribution of medical supplies, I think. And, of course, there were some well-known refueling activities that took place out of Taiwan in those days, I think involving KC-135s. So that was there.

But back to the period of '68 to '70, there were various things that were happening, of course, especially the Sino-soviet clashes on the Ussuri River which occurred in the later period. We were looking for opportunities to improve our relationship with the PRC and did everything we could to keep the Vietnam thing from interfering with that.

Q: Did [Secretary of State] Dean Rusk reach in and tap any of you? Did you get any feel for his attitude towards the PRC?

THAYER: Yes, but I would say my feel was secondhand, very much so. I was in his presence from time to time, I guess, but didn't have much direct dealings with him. He was pretty hard-line, articulating the line including the PRC threat to Southeast Asia and so forth. We were also trying to open relations with Mongolia in those days, and he, I remember, did not support certain memos that were sent up proposing we do this or that to open negotiations or relations with Mongolia. But, generally, I think we understood that the secretary's posture was hard-line against the PRC.

Q: Then you moved to the United Nations from the War College?

THAYER: Yes. I went to the War College for a year and then moved to the U.N. in '71. I actually expected to go to Africa on my post-War College tour and so I took the War College African trip. But I ended up not going to West Africa as I thought I was going to. I ended up going to the U.N.

Q: What were you doing with the UN?

THAYER: I went to the U.N. as the deputy counselor for political/security affairs under Mike Newlin, with global responsibilities. But I went there initially to be the staff coordinator for all the Chinese representation issue activities. I went the summer of '71, just about the time that we put forward our proposal for dual representation; that is, presence in the U.N. General Assembly of both the PRC reps and the Republic of China reps. The Security Council seat -- this evolved a little later -- the Security Council seat was to be given to the PRC.

Q: The political context at this time, [Richard M.] Nixon was the president, but we had not yet made our overt opening to the PRC, had we?

THAYER: That's right. Nixon was the president when I went to New York in early July of '71. It was in the context of the U.N.'s support for the PRC increasing, so it was questionable that we would be able to hold the line on the PRC. With our dual representation proposal we were adjusting to this political reality. Very shortly after I arrived on duty in New York, Kissinger's trip to the PRC was revealed, and that put the dual representation issue in a new context where the U.S., on the one hand, was trying to preserve a seat for the Taiwan regime at the same time as actively playing footsie with the authorities in Beijing. So that was a complicating factor in the so-called "Chirep" issue as it played out in 1971.

Q: How did you operate? The Chirep problem was something that absorbed our United Nations activities and also many of our relations abroad of getting people to make sure that the PRC was not represented in the United Nations. This went on for years, and you were there at sort of the end of this whole thing. How did you find this work at sort of the seat of the whole thing in the United Nations? How did you operate in this?

THAYER: Well, you're right. The Chinese representation issue had been with us forever, and I can remember, in 1961, Paul Kreisberg, when he was in INR, telling me that INR and others were then exploring some new possibility for a formula for Chinese representation. In 1971, my philosophical context was that Taiwan was a viable entity; I didn't expect Taiwan ever to regain the mainland, but it was a viable entity and a good member of the U.N. and so forth, and it was appropriate that it continue to be represented in the U.N.

On the other hand, the PRC -- whatever kind of shambles it was in -- it was also, in the end, an entity, a quarter of the world's population and so forth, and it should be represented in the U.N., too. So the dual representation issue seemed to me to conform with reality at a certain level, at a logical level. It was not reality at the political level, because the PRC didn't want to put up with dual representation, and the PRC increasingly held the cards. But it was a worthy goal if we could have pulled it off, and we came close -- within two votes -- on the important question resolution. We came within two votes of pulling it off that year. Now, if we'd pulled it off that year, certainly there's a good chance the next year we would have lost it. But, nonetheless, it was worth it and also a matter of good faith. It was worth our trying to do it.

Q: Was there ever any feeling on the part of the Republic of China representation to say, "Okay, the hell with this. We're a separate country, and we're Taiwan," or something like this?

THAYER: It was never manifested, any inclination toward going for a status of an independent Taiwan.

Q: Because that would have probably been much more sellable, wouldn't it?

THAYER: Well, it might have been. But, in the end, no, because the PRC was against it, and the majority of U.N. members recognized the importance of the PRC and were not prepared to cross the PRC. But the leadership of Taiwan and certainly the mainlanders, who were their diplomatic servants, diplomatic officers, from the ambassador on down, adhered to a one-China view with their government as being the legitimate government of that one China.

They swallowed hard with the idea of the Security Council seat being taken over by the PRC. They saw everything as in a one-China context. This was a very deeply felt conviction on the part of the representatives of Taiwan. We worked very intimately with the Taiwan group and with Japan, as well as a whole group of co-sponsors. But the group in Taiwan worked hard to preserve their seat. And then-Ambassador [George] Bush and others worked extremely hard. Eighteen hours a day was nothing in those lobbying exercises. I might say a word about the lobbying.

Q: I'd like to hear that, yes.

THAYER: It was the largest lobbying exercise we'd ever undertaken. I was coordinator of this in the New York side. Harvey Feldman, also a Chinese language officer, was in IO/UNP (U.N. Political Affairs). He was one of the people who had put together this dual representation proposal. We were lobbying like hell in New York, and we were lobbying like hell in capitals abroad. And our job, among others, was to coordinate this lobbying. So one of the problems that I had was simply to keep track, to make sure that we knew what the hell we were doing and had done. We developed a system of three-ring binders for telegrams, keeping track country by country, of all our instructions, discussions in New York, Washington and capitals. One of our USUN political officers (who normally was responsible for our UN relations with Eastern Europe) for the duration of the Chirep battle did virtually nothing but keep the telegrams in order.

Q: Because obviously you weren't going to get anywhere in Eastern Europe.

THAYER: Well, in any case, we co-opted him to do nothing but keep track of those damn books. And then we would lobby, maybe, at the ambassadorial level several countries a day and report to Washington, to the capital, what had been said by the permanent representative of that country in New York. This would be coordinated with what we were saying in Washington to the foreign ambassador and also coordinated with what instructions went out to the field for our ambassador to say to the host country foreign minister or prime minister on Chinese representation. So this was a tremendously complicated thing. And by the time we finished it, we had about a half a dozen or a dozen of these three-ring binder books just packed with telegrams.

I met every day for the last month of this lobbying effort, every evening, with the Japanese political counselor. We would sit together and compare notes on what we were doing. Because the Japanese were in this, they had committed themselves to the project, and they were lobbying very hard themselves on the part of this issue. For them it was domestically politically...

Q: I was going to ask, what was the drive on the Japanese side?

THAYER: Well, we sought their support. And, of course, their relationship with Taiwan was long standing and very close. The political leadership, the LDP, committed itself to going with us on this Chinese representation question. Therefore, in addition to their interest in the dual representation issue and doing their best to keep the faith in their relationship with Taiwan, the Japanese leadership couldn't afford as a domestic political matter to be on the losing side on this issue. And particularly when you throw in the shock, to the Japanese, of the Kissinger visit to China.

Q: This happened when?

THAYER: In July. I forget the exact date. July 15th was the president's announcement from California that Kissinger had just returned from Peking. That had shaken the Japanese government pretty badly, and so they had a lot at stake in winning this dual representation battle, and, therefore, not only sought to coordinate with us but to make damn sure that they -- including the diplomats in New York -- made damn sure that they knew what the United States was doing. But also Tokyo was extremely hungry for information on what was happening and for reassurance that the U.S. wasn't dropping the ball or playing any more games or whatnot.

So nightly I met with the Japanese counselor, with whom I became very good friends, to exchange notes. He would tell me all the lobbying they did, and we would decide on what recommendations to give our respective capitals on who should be lobbied in third countries the next day and so forth.

Q: These interviews and the transcripts are really designed for people who are not overly familiar with how one works. When you say lobby, I mean, it's all very nice to talk to the ambassador or somebody at the United Nations, but one has said that countries don't have friends, they have interests. And on this China thing, I wouldn't imagine that words would have an awful lot of persuasion. I mean, but how did you operate?

THAYER: Well, we operated on the assumption that words do have some persuasive value, that the logical argument carries some weight. We also operated on the assumption that in the real world an argument made by the greatest power in the world has especially significant weight. Therefore, when we would tell a European country or a Third World country who valued the United States' friendship, they would listen with great care. When the United States says a vote in a certain way is of tremendous interest to the Americans, it's not a small matter for another country to say no. So one of the factors in lobbying is logic. But there are other factors involved, too.

In fact, neither the Canadians nor the British, for example, joined us in this. They made clear early on they wouldn't join. But the Canadians, as I recall, didn't make it quite as clear as the U.K. I can remember shortly after my arrival, shortly after the dual representation proposal was floated, having a long talk with a Canadian officer trying to sell him on the logic of supporting us in this. But the lobbying in New York was done often by then Ambassador Bush; by Chris Phillips, who was his deputy; by Tap Bennett, who was number three; by Bill Schauffele, who was number four -- they were all ambassadors -- by Mike Newlin, who was political counselor; by myself; by others in various ways in New York. And I often would go out with one of the other ambassadors, and having given them a briefing paper which they soon mastered, because with slight changes for each country it was pretty well something they could draw on. And I would take notes and duly report it back, copies to our embassy in the capital and our other relevant embassies. This was the main activity of our mission to the U.N. for part of July and all of August, September, right through to the vote on October 24th.

Q: You say by two votes you missed this. Were there any votes you thought maybe could have been gotten? I mean, were there any crucial votes that didn't go our way?

THAYER: There were, I think, five votes that went differently than we had expected -- I mean, differently against us than we had expected. There were other surprises the other way. (One of the things you do at the U.N. at vote time is to make sure the delegates are not hiding out in dark corners or not in the bathroom, that they're in their seats where they can commit themselves to the vote.)

There was some sentiment that we were "betrayed," by those who changed to vote against us despite promises to the contrary. I was never comfortable with this posture of crying "betrayal". I think we did pretty well, and if it hadn't been those five, it would have been something else. History had caught up with us, and we lost the important question resolution by two votes. And having lost the important question resolution, which required that any vote on Chinese representation was a substantive issue and therefore require a two-thirds majority, having lost the important question procedural vote and everybody knowing that we didn't have a plurality for the substantive issue, the final vote was overwhelmingly for the admission of the PRC and the expulsion of the Republic of China (Taiwan).

The permanent representative of the Republic of China -- in fact, the foreign minister was there. I guess the Republic of China foreign minister had the seat. He walked out before the final vote was taken once the important question resolution was defeated.

Q: Did you feel any sort of pressure from the China lobby, from Congress or anything that maybe this was the end of us and the U.N., or had history caught up with that, too?

THAYER: There were some threats at that time. I don't remember the precise threats, but there were some in the Congress. There may have been a sense of Congress, a resolution of some kind, that if Taiwan got thrown out of the U.N. that the U.S. should stop paying its dues or something.

But the fact is that the Administration made a tremendous effort to win that vote, and nobody could have asked Ambassador Bush to have done more, with the exception that there were many who said that the timing of the Kissinger visit in the early summer of '71 undercut our position on the dual representation issue. There are many who said that the second Kissinger visit to Peking -- Beijing, as we now call it -- the announcement of which came just before the final vote in October, also undercut the impression of sincerity on the part of the Administration in pushing the dual representation issue. One might say that there's some validity to that argument.

Q: I was going to say, one of the accusations that has cropped up not only, obviously, in the press and all, but also in the interviews is that if Henry Kissinger is not the bride, there's going to be no other wedding anywhere else. Did you have any feeling that once Kissinger -- and obviously with Nixon, but Kissinger was very much a central figure in this -- had moved to doing things with the PRC that the Republic of China, the Taiwan thing, had sort of dropped off the interest?

THAYER: Well, a lot of people were saying this. A lot of people whose votes we were soliciting were saying this. And, of course, the Japanese were upset, and the Taiwan group was upset because, on the face of it, it did give the impression of the United States being less than 100 percent behind supporting Taiwan. The fact is that the dual representation did embody letting the PRC in, did incorporate that. So it wasn't totally antithetical for Kissinger to make the trip at the time he did. Although, the second trip coming just before the final vote in the U.N., that timing was bad, but I'm not sure it was intentional. It may have been just sloppy.

Q: Were we making noises from the United Nations, or was this an operation that was happening sort of without much connection between our units?

THAYER: I think it's fair to say that we were not consulted closely! Certainly the U.N. wasn't consulted, and it was a surprise to Ambassador Bush. Kissinger's first visit to China was a surprise to the China desk. It was a surprise to everybody. I remember the night that Kissinger's first visit became news, I telephoned from my New York apartment to Bill Brown, now ambassador to Israel, who was then deputy director of the China desk, my old job, called Bill and asked him what the hell was going on. Bill's answer on the phone that night, "Harry, I don't know what's going on. It's news to us." In fact, the Kissinger visit was presaged by many recommendations made by us on the China desk, even in my day, a year or two earlier. So its concept wasn't original. It was the timing.

I'm straying a little bit from your question, so bring me back.

Q: Well, it was really whether you felt that we did have basically a dual -- I mean, not only a dual policy but an undercutting policy.

THAYER: I don't think that we were cynically trying to undercut the policy of dual representation. That has yet to be proved, that we were doing it cynically. It's quite conceivable to me, in our government, that we were so badly coordinated that when the Chinese and the U.S. side were negotiating the timing of Kissinger's second visit, it's quite possible that we failed to think through what the implications of the second visit, coming just before the China vote, would be.

Q: During particularly this period of the United Nations, George Bush was the ambassador. Is that right?

THAYER: Right.

Q: I wonder if you could give your impression of how he operated and impressions of the man, since he now, as we talk, is president of the United States.

THAYER: Well, being, naturally, a conservative Foreign Service officer, I won't say very much new about it. Incidentally, I also served as his deputy in Peking, so I maintained an admiration for him in both places. I think that in the U.N., particularly on the Chinese representation issue, there was no question that Bush was convinced that this was the right thing to do. And I was there when Bush learned about the dual representation policy as had been proposed by Washington or there shortly after. I was in discussions with him about what the policy was. He became convinced that this was a good policy and one that he could put his heart into and his vigor into, which he did. He was indefatigable in lobbying for this policy. He believed in it. He made a lot of public speeches. He saw a lot of people, shook a lot of hands, entertained a lot of people, gave a lot of his time both at home and in the office to this. And his sincerity was never in doubt.

As an operator at the U.N., he was very effective. In the first place, his credibility was very high. He made genuine friends with everybody, and he had a marvelous touch in dealing with the human beings behind the title, invited them out to his hometown, Greenwich, to seats at the baseball game, made personal connections with everybody. He's a good politician. But he also had a sincerity that went with this. People believed him. So when he said we, the United States, will do this or believe that and so forth, people believed him. When he asked to see somebody, people would see him. There weren't any groans that, "Here comes Big Foot Super Power banging on our door." They received Bush as a human being they could relate to and who treated them with dignity and respect. And this counts a lot, particularly in multilateral diplomacy. It counts in all diplomacy, but it was very evident there.

Just to continue to answer your general question about the way he performed, my impressions, he was terrific on staff morale. He knew everybody. He wrote those little notes of appreciation for everything that was done. I remember when Mike Newlin and I negotiated in the Security Council context a hijacking agreement with the Chinese. This was the first agreement that we had negotiated in the U.N. with the PRC. Bush sent us down a little note, you know, "Congratulations for your great work on this." That kind of little touch makes a lot of difference. But he was that way with the people he was relating to in the U.N. secretariat, the secretary general, the other missions. He was very friendly with the hostiles as well as our friends. I think people had a lot of respect for him.

Q: So what was the fallout? We lost this vote. You stayed in the U.N. until '74, is that right?

THAYER: I stayed in the U.N. until '75, actually. But the immediate fallout was that the PRC came in. And turning from working to exhaustion on the lobbying effort on behalf of Taiwan, immediately I became the Chinese specialist in New York who was on the spot to coordinate how we handled the new group coming in. And the first thing of importance that I handled was getting the new group in safely without being shot, otherwise crucified by bureaucrats or assassins, into the airport in Laguardia Airport and into New York. And that was an enormous effort. You can imagine the desk was fully involved in it, getting clearances for a China Airlines plane to fly into Laguardia, pilots who had never made the trip, and all kinds of special deals that were worked out. And we had lots of meetings, I and the U.N. security guy, Joe Glennon, whose name I still remember, with the Port Authority, the Airport Authority, the local police, the state police, every conceivable bureaucratic entity gathered in huge rooms out at Laguardia Airport trying to coordinate every aspect of the flight clearance, the security, the motorcade, everything.

My responsibility was to represent the State Department and to report all this, acting on behalf of Ambassador Bush, whose instructions were, "Do it. Do it right. We're going to welcome these people. They're members of the U.N. We're going to deal with them." He was immediately on board with that. But also reporting to Washington -- we used the phone a lot to Washington -- making sure that Washington's various diplomatic interests were being preserved. I mean, I was not making policy; I was simply trying to make sure that everything went smoothly. And the desk, two or three days before Deng arrived, sent up one of their officers to be sure that Washington's interests were fully represented there. He was Phil Lincoln, who is now consul general in Sydney, a Chinese language officer, an able officer.

In any event, we worked hard to get the Chinese in smoothly. They bought a hotel -- I forget what the name of the hotel was -- for their permanent representation in New York. We did our best to deal with them effectively from the start.

Q: Were you making contact with them all the time?

THAYER: Yes. After they arrived, I was the contact guy. And I went over to their mission quite a bit. The Chinese sent a very strong delegation. Their "PermRep", head of mission, was Huang Hua, who eventually was foreign minister, but very early on -- in the revolutionary period -- was an America specialist. We bent over backwards to be hospitable. We were the host country, and Bush took this very seriously, made sure that all entities of both the local government and the federal government were doing their best to make our new guests comfortable.

Q: Were there any problems from the fact that we didn't recognize them? I mean, that just really wasn't a factor then?

THAYER: No, it was not a factor. In the multilateral context we dealt with them. We didn't deal with them on bilateral issues except those having to do with their U.N. presence. But it was not an inhibition at all. The main thing that distinguished our dealings with the Chinese was that they were a sexy new commodity, and there was tremendous interest in Washington, including by the secretary and the president, that the thing be done right. And so there was a lot of pressure on all of us to make sure it was done right. But we all agreed that it ought to be done right, so it was.

Just to add this one tiny illustration, there were hostile acts against the permanent mission. One day a mixture of Caucasians and Chinese -- I guess Chinese-Americans and ROC citizens -- threw rotten eggs against the wall of the Chinese mission. Well, the Chinese mission got appropriately outraged about that, and as soon as Ambassador Bush learned about it, he gave me a message for the Chinese. (I had called him from home to tell him this had happened; it was a Sunday, I think, and I had been informed by our security office.) Bush gave me a message for the Chinese. I immediately went down to the PRC mission and asked to see the deputy PermRep or whoever and extended the ambassador's personal and the U.S.'s national apologies that such an insulting thing had happened to our guests. It was just part of the game.

Q: You saw the PRC delegates right from the beginning. Did they feel they were in a hostile country? What was their reaction when they came? A generation had been brought up as we were the great Satan, to use present Arabic terminology.

THAYER: Well, referring back to my conversation with Ambassador Bohlen in Hong Kong in '57 or '58, they came in not hostile, not taking a hostile position. I can't say what was in their minds, but I can tell you what their posture was. Their posture was learning, and they were very cautious and prudent when they came in. They were, I think, unprepared to win the U.N. vote that year, and so they weren't completely up to snuff, and they were in a learning posture the first year or two that I was there. If I can recall correctly, in early 1972 at the end of the 1971 General Assembly session -- a couple of months after the Chinese came in -- we did a wrap-up on their performance. I remember using the metaphor that the Chinese did not, as many people expected, come in breaking up the furniture in the U.N. Far from it. They came in very quietly, very politely, very much asking questions and hearing the answers, taking notes and acting upon them. So they were not a hostile presence from our point of view. They were not a pain for us. They were learning.

Q: Where were they learning? In other words, obviously, they were not in a position to turn to their old mentors, the Soviets, to say, "Well, how should we act on this?" I'm not talking about on substantive things, but I mean organizational things like that.

THAYER: Well, they leaned very heavily on the secretariat, and they moved, in due course, to see that some of the more pro-Taiwan elements in the secretariat were replaced by some of their own people, part of the game. They drew heavily on the non-aligned who had supported them and they could ask advice from. But they also drew heavily on our expertise, and if they wanted a briefing -- I can't remember specifics -- but if they wanted a briefing on the history of this or that issue or the legal ramifications of this or that issue, they would go to the legal advisor of the U.N., but they might also pick the brains of our very excellent legal advisors in New York.

There were other issues on which we were in different camps. One of them was the Korea question. And another big issue we had during my time was the Cambodia question. On those questions, the Chinese were on the other side, to begin with, anyhow, and they wouldn't come to us for any advice about these, but they were going to their like-minded friends and asking, "How does this work? What is the history of it?" This kind of thing.

Q: Did you get any feel for Huang Hua while he was there and how he operated and how he viewed things?

THAYER: Well, certainly how he operated. He operated in a low-key, polite way. He's a very complicated guy, and I don't claim to have ever understood Huang Hua. He has a long, well-documented involvement in U.S.-PRC relations. He's a student of Leighton Stewart, who used to be head of the university in China and was our ambassador. Huang was quite capable, though, of being outraged at the United States.

Q: We have some interviews. He gave a very difficult time down in Shanghai in 1948, very hard-nosed.

THAYER: Well, he's quite capable of being hard-nosed. On such issues as Cambodia where our position was very strongly opposite to the Chinese position, the Chinese were quite capable -- and Huang Hua, personally -- of attacking us vociferously, even nastily. But his posture toward us generally was quite friendly. And I remember, for example, when the Chinese foreign minister, Chiao Kuanhua, who lost his job at the time the Gang of Four fell, when the foreign minister came to New York for the opening of General Assembly one year, Ambassador Bush invited Chiao and Huang Hua and a couple of their officers out to Bush's mother's place in Greenwich, and they all went out there. And Huang just couldn't have been more affable on that occasion. His relations with Bush were very good. There was a younger female officer at the U.N. at our mission who spoke some Chinese, and he took an interest from day one encouraging her to speak Chinese with him, and he had that kindly touch. But in the end, I think we felt that he was more of a creature of his mission than a heavyweight politician in his own right.

Q: You were there until '75. Who replaced Bush? When did Bush leave?

THAYER: Bush left in 1972 for the Republican National Committee, John Scali replaced him. John was a former ABC correspondent. He was on the Nixon White House staff, and he came up, his first entry into diplomacy, following Bush.

Q: How did he operate?

THAYER: Well, he is not the instinctive politician that Bush was, and he also felt, I think, a great deal more hostile pressure from the non-aligned than Bush had. For both him and his successor, Moynihan, I think, our issues with the non-aligned, both economic and political, intruded more into their consciousness and psyches than they had in the case of Bush. Scali was very much involved, though, in all the political issues, and there were some rough ones when he was there.

Q: You were there when Moynihan was there, too, is that right?

THAYER: No. No, I'd left before Moynihan came.

Q: In your particular field as sort of the China man, were there any major issues that you dealt with, say, while you were at the U.N.?

THAYER: Well, more in the capacity as the Asia person. It's an important distinction because there weren't many China problems in the U.N. There were, however, the Korean issue -- the perennial Korean issue was with us -- the Cambodia issue for two years was there then Sihanouk was in Peking and the Lon Nol regime in power in Cambodia. We were supporting the Lon Nol government. There was very heavy lobbying on the Cambodian issue, where we were at loggerheads with the Chinese. On Vietnam, I remember accompanying Bush to see Waldheim on instructions to explain why we were mining the harbors of Hanoi.

We were involved with the Chinese on a variety of Security Council issues. Shortly after the PRC came in, the India- Pakistan war of '71 consumed the Security Council, and that was a major issue there. There were similar things that went on during the Scali years. But there were not Chinese issues in the U.N. so much. For example, one of the big issues, I guess, was during the Scali period -- or maybe it was still in the Bush period -- was the reduction of our contribution to the U.N. from 33 percent to 25 percent. Well, it doesn't sound like much of an issue now, but that was a major issue. And former Senator Gale McGee, who was part of our delegation that year, handled that issue in the financial committee. But I think the Chinese were supportive of us in reducing our contribution, having expenses more shared by others. The Chinese, like the Soviets, were also, as I recall, quite conservative financially with the U.N. and didn't want to see some of the non-aligned ideas resulting in the U.N. undertaking expenditures that weren't appropriate.

Q: In a way, I would have thought that there would have been almost a sigh of relief after twenty-odd years of fighting the China issue, which was the representation of China, to have that over with. Was there almost a feeling, "Okay, now we can get on with other business"? Because that must have permeated everything.

THAYER: Yes, I think there was that psychology. I mean, you get caught up in lobbying for the Chinese representation issue and policy is right and so forth. But all of us knew that inevitability the U.S. had to find some relationship to the PRC, some way to deal with the PRC. And the PRC entry into the U.N., for all the anomaly it helped contribute to in Taiwan's status, it had the effect of a catharsis. It opened up the possibilities -- as the Kissinger visit did, too -- of a more normal relationship. So, in that way, it was quite as you describe it.

Q: How about with the United Nations? What was your relationship to both the NSC and later? I don't know if Kissinger was secretary of state or not, but was there much interest on the part of Henry Kissinger with the U.N., or did you feel this in direction or pressure or competition?

THAYER: Yes. I kept up direct ties with the NSC staff, and this was partly at the initiative of the NSC staff. But it was partly my own initiative, as a way, for my part, to ensure that what we were doing was not eventually going to run into problems with the NSC. So I was in direct touch with various NSC staffers during that period, and their interest, of course, reflected Henry Kissinger's interest during his NSC tenure.

When we did have one problem with the PRC -- we had more than one problem -- and it's one I can't go into here, but just to say that at Ambassador's Bush's request, as a result partly of my own proposal, I went down to the NSC to see Winston Lord to brief him directly on behalf of Bush about an issue that had come up. It involved host country relations and the running of their mission. This was because anything that happened with China was of direct interest to Henry Kissinger and in this case was quite a sensitive thing. Bush wanted to be sure that the national security advisor had the full facts.

But we -- at least, I -- didn't then get caught up in any battle between the NSC and the State Department. My contacts were mostly a matter of coordination among the bureaucratic entities that needed to be informed. Later, when I was Chinese affairs director, 1975-79, NSC-State battles were a daily problem for me.

Q: You didn't have the feeling that the NSC was undercutting the U.N. mission to pursue whatever their policy might be or anything like that?

THAYER: No, I did not. There were issues where there was a lot of contention between a number of elements including the NSC. I was not so conscious of those as I'm sure that Ambassadors Bush or Scali were. And I can remember feelings of outrage about what NSC was doing on some issue or other, but I can't remember what the issues were. I mean, I just can tell you it was there.

Q: You wanted to make an addendum to your interest in the Foreign Service, because of your connection with Jack Downey.

THAYER: I had mentioned in our earlier discussions, too, that the Chinese announcement that Jack Downey had been captured had a big impact on me. That happened while I was working for the Philadelphia Bulletin, and it was an added incentive for me to go into the Foreign Service and to focus on China. Jack was a CIA operator who had reportedly been captured when the small plane he was on landed in Manchuria. In any event, that Chinese announcement, which I read in the New York Times, did have a big impact on me, as I mentioned in the earlier conversation.

Subsequently, when I went to Hong Kong, where I served from '57 to '59, my friendship at Yale with Jack -- not an intimate one, but still a friendship -- was known in the consulate. When his mother and brother, Bill, came out for a historic first visit to Jack in 1957 or '58, I was assigned as their control officer and was able, in the small ways that one does, to help Jack's mother and Jack's younger brother through the problems of Hong Kong and the transit to China, as well as seeing them on their way out and so forth. That meant a lot to me in a small way, contributing to my sense of not only supporting Jack but also being a part of what was going on.

That sense of being a part is also in the context of another facet of my background, having worked for Newsweek for a couple of years -- '52 to '54 -- I did most of the cover story which appeared in the Newsweek medical section, actually, on the twenty- one prisoners of war who "stayed behind." They were those prisoners of war from the Korean War who chose to stay in Korea or China instead of being repatriated at the end of the war. I went to the homes of many of these prisoners of war -- and received correspondents' reports on others -- and tried to investigate their backgrounds, what kind of people they were, and so forth. As reflected in the POW story, most of these people who chose to stay behind had, not surprisingly, come from troubled homes and had other reasons to be not enthusiastic about returning to their former lives in the States.

But, again; that story was another link for me with China. And then Jack's imprisonment and helping his family coming through Hong Kong was another aspect of that. A further aspect was when I was deputy head of the China desk, '68 to '70, we then, as always, wrote the instructions for the bilateral ambassadorial talks between the American and Chinese ambassadors in Warsaw, our only official channel of communication for many years with the Chinese. In those talks we never failed to raise the question of the release of the remaining American prisoners, including Jack.

Q: Did you find that you were pushing it? Were you giving a little more impetus to making sure that it was included every time?

THAYER: I can honestly say that I did not. But the reason I did not was because the release of American prisoners had always been high on our agenda in Geneva and Warsaw and remained high on our agenda in Warsaw, and it took no extra push for me to have it stay high on the agenda. But it gave me extra satisfaction every time I participated in instructions that were drafted for those meetings where we pushed for the release of prisoners. So those are the aspects of the Downey case I wanted to follow up on.

Q: You left the U.N., or getting ready to leave it, towards the end of '74. Your next assignment was to Beijing as deputy chief of mission. But I wonder if you could tell us how that job came about, because I'm sure it's a very competitive one.

THAYER: I guess the topic sentence really was because I had worked with [George] Bush on Chinese affairs when I was in the U.N. -- as we've covered in earlier conversations. But also being a good professional, I sought that job through normal State Department channels. In fact, what happened was when Bush was named by [Gerald] Ford as the envoy to Beijing to replace David Bruce -- and Bush was then head of the Republican National Committee -- I called Bush's special assistant, Tom Lias, since dead, whom I knew quite well. I didn't want to bother Ambassador Bush directly about this, but I called Tom and simply told Tom that I wanted him to know that I was applying through State Department channels to go to Beijing in any capacity, and since Ambassador Bush was going to Beijing, I wanted him to be aware of that. I told Tom that I didn't expect Ambassador Bush necessarily to do anything about it, but I wanted to be sure that he was aware of it.

I applied through the State Department, let it be known in the ways you do, that you're interested in a job. I also telephoned PRC affairs director Oscar Armstrong from New York to inform Oscar, with whom I worked a lot, that I had informed Ambassador Bush that I would like to go to Beijing, that I was doing nothing more about it through Ambassador Bush, but that I wanted Oscar to be aware of what I had done. I had told the State Department I was ready to go out to Beijing in any capacity. I had said that pretty much right along, and in any case doing anything. I actually expected, if I did get chosen to go, it would be as political chief, chief of the political section.

I learned of my assignment some weeks later, sometime in 1974 before George Bush went out to Beijing. He came up from Washington to New York to a farewell party given by then PermRep John Scali, to which I was invited, a send-off party. Bush took me aside just at the beginning of this dinner in the U.N. PermRep's Waldorf apartment to tell me, "Well, Harry, it's all set. You're going to replace John Holdridge as soon as John finishes his tour." John was DCM, and I had really not expected to be DCM. I was kind of dumbfounded by this, but obviously thrilled. And the prospect of going out to Beijing, in the first place, was, for me, terrific. Second place, going out, working with Bush, whom I liked very much, and third place, going out as the top professional in China. I never had really expected to get to China. Going out in that capacity was a prospect that I was really eager about. So that's the background of that.

Q: You got out there when?

THAYER: I arrived in May of 1975.

Q: This was, of course, a rather difficult time as far as American foreign policy is concerned because this is just when we had pulled out of Vietnam in a pretty inglorious manner. Did this impact at all on how we were dealing with the Chinese, or was this considered, in a way, an opportunity? How did you view it from your particular working viewpoint?

THAYER: Well, really, in all honesty, it was a very quiet time in U.S.-PRC relations, and I did not make any dramatic contribution to those relations that I'm aware of. I think that Ambassador Bush would, in all honesty, say the same thing, because the relationship was really quite cool; what we were trying to do was to keep the ship -- the ship of bilateral relations -- from rocking too much.

It was the Gang of Four period. Relations, trade, everything else had cooled from the high points of the rising curve of '72 and '73 and the first part of '74. By the time I got there in '75, the relationship was on a downward curve or had flattened at a low level, however you want to look at it. Our contacts were limited. We did a fair amount of travel, but travel was limited, nevertheless. And the relationship was correct. We had some cancellations of cultural exchanges because of supposed impolitic statements on one side or another, trivial things that the Chinese chose to use to eliminate certain contacts. It was really a cool period. But we, nevertheless, had quite a few dealings with the Chinese, if for no other reason because there were a fair number of visitors, both official and unofficial. There were such things as unofficial visitors, but except for those promoted by the Sino-U.S. Friendship Association, we came in contact with most of them. Most of them sought us out. The Friendship Association visitors did not.

Bush's relations were very good with the Chinese. I think there were good vibes left over from his New York service, where he, as we talked about earlier, was the leading host for the Chinese coming to New York. His personal relationships were quite good, and they always treated Bush politely and respectfully. Bush's man-in-the-street reputation in Peking was quite good, mostly derived in my encounters with taxi drivers or shop clerks who would volunteer nice things to me about Bush. So we had our contacts with the foreign ministry, and we attended banquets with visitors. Two high points of my service as DCM out there were the visits of Henry Kissinger in October of 1975 and of President Ford in December.

Q: He was then secretary of state.

THAYER: Then secretary of state. And then that was followed by the visit of President Ford in December of 1975, two months later. Those were really quite important events during the first half of my tour in Beijing.

Q: You say they were important times. Was it protocol-wise, or was this a lot of work, or were things changed at all?

THAYER: Kissinger had regularly visited China since '71, and he had not visited at all in '75 because relations were fairly cool. In a situation where symbols are in some ways the substance of the relationship, a visit by the secretary of state to Beijing was an important event in itself and said something about the relationship. It said that the relationship was continuing, and that, in itself, in the strategic world of the time, was an important fact. Even though trade was down, cultural exchanges were down and so forth, the fact that the secretary of state was visiting Peking was very important. But there were various issues to be settled that weren't settled by the Kissinger visit or, for that matter, by the president's visit, because the Chinese were so tangled up in their own domestic problems, among other reasons, that it was very hard for them to make any decision that was favorable to the relationship.

Q: This is still when they were trying to sort out the post- Mao period, wasn't it?

THAYER: Well, this was before Mao's death, but the Gang of Four was riding high. Zhang Chunqiao, Yao Wen Yuan, Jiang Qing were all in prominence. So President Ford's visit was also an important symbolic event at the time. That helped balance off his earlier meeting in Vladivostok with the Soviets. So Ford's visit to China was important in itself. The symbolism of the presidential visit was significant. But there were no great advances substantively that came out of that visit. Then Bush himself left China almost immediately after the Ford visit. He left on December 7, 1975, I think, to go back and run the CIA.

Q: Let's talk a little about Bush. After all, we're talking about the man who is now president of the United States. But it does seem like there was a criticism during the campaign when he was first running for president which was essentially that he was "Mr. Résumé." He'd been the ambassador at the U.N., and then he'd been with the Republican National Committee, and he was ambassador, really, for a very short time. Did you have the feeling that he was somebody sort of passing through and looking at it, but not taking control? How did you feel?

THAYER: Well, to be explicit, no, Stu. I had the impression of somebody who took the job very seriously. I can illustrate that in various ways. But just to pick two ways: when I was still at the U.N., Bush came back for consultation, back to Washington, and he got some kind of a bug. He had come back through Pakistan, he got a bug there, so he was hospitalized in Georgetown Hospital. And he asked me to come down from New York to see him, or it was arranged that I would come down from New York to see him. I remember very clearly Bush, in his hospital bed recovering at Georgetown, his telling me that he was eager to have me come out. He said all the nice things. But then he said, "I really feel that we've got to work harder to get to know these Chinese leaders, and we don't know enough about this group who now seem to be making decisions. Specifically, I'm determined to have a meeting with Zhang Chunqiao. Nobody's met him. We don't know enough about him, and I want to do something about it." He said nice things about John Holdridge's work. He didn't mean there was any change when I was coming, but he just was indicating his anxiousness to understand more about what was going on in China. That was one illustration.

Another illustration was that he really worked hard on his spoken Chinese language when he was there. He took lessons virtually every day from our resident Chinese teacher, Mrs. Tang, who was, of course, assigned by the Diplomatic Services Bureau to teach us all Chinese. But Ambassador Bush worked hard at the language, and he used it. He's one of these people, unlike most introverted Foreign Service political officers, he didn't mind making a mistake in the spoken language. So he practiced his Chinese every chance he'd get, but he studied it also.

Well, these are not the marks of somebody who was just passing through. He traveled in China. When he traveled, he learned. He took notes. He took notes in his own hands. When he attended meetings he took notes, and he would come back and faithfully, much to our gratitude, report to the staff. Normally, of course, at official meetings he would have somebody accompany him, very often myself. But when he had conversations that somebody else attended, he would make notes of these conversations, and he would pass them around among the staff.

Q: What was the position of Zhang Chunqiao?

THAYER: I think he was a vice premier.

Q: But he was part of the Gang of Four?

THAYER: Yes.

Q: Were you able to get him there?

THAYER: Never did. Although he appeared for athletic and other events, and we could see him lined up like you see the Russian leaders lined up. But, no, we had no contact. But Bush was very persistent in inviting people to the residence, and he did get everybody he could get to the residence, perhaps for just a small supper. He'd always take care to include myself and one or two others, for example. Bill Thomas, who was then chief of the econ section, or Stan Brooks, political chief.

I remember a fascinating evening at the residence one night when Bush invited the then-head of the Chinese Association for Friendship with Foreign Peoples -- whose name will come back to me -- but he also had been the Chinese ambassador at Warsaw, our chief interlocutor for many years. He had been Zhou En-lai's man at the time that Chiang Kai-shek was captured at Xian in the '30s. And it was marvelous fun for a bunch of China specialists to sit around hearing one of the prime players in the Xian incident describe at first hand everything that happened.

Well, that wasn't getting at the key power structure. This guy was on the edge. But it was the kind of thing that Bush did a lot of. Deng Xiaoping liked Bush, and he gave a farewell lunch for Bush. In the charming way the Chinese have, they gave the lunch in the "Taiwan Room" of the Great Hall of the People. But this was, nevertheless, a very warm send-off that Deng gave to the ambassador. The Chinese did have a certain respect for Bush, I think partly because he wasn't hesitant to speak out firmly to the Chinese, too. He wasn't a patsy for the Chinese.

I was going to illustrate this in a very modest way by recalling an episode involving one of our officers from Hong Kong, whose wife, I think, was of Vietnam-Chinese origin. They had both come to Beijing, visiting there for a few days. The wife came to the front gate of the liaison office compound to visit the office, as any Foreign Service wife would do, and showed her American passport to the Chinese Army (PLA) gate guard. But because she had an Oriental face -- the Chinese have a very hard time thinking of Americans as anything but white-faced Anglo-Saxons -- the guard refused to let her in. She insisted, and the guard continued to refuse. One of our officers went out and checked into the problem. Then the consular officer went out and argued with the guard that this woman had a right to come into the embassy. And, again, the Chinese refused.

Ambassador Bush heard about this, and Bush was clearly outraged by the idea that the Chinese would have the gall to prevent an American citizen from coming into the American liaison officer compound to say nothing of an American diplomat. Bush hit the roof. He was really furious. We discussed what to do about it and decided that we would, in the next stage of this battling, have an officer go out and talk to the PLA guard, insist he make a call to his superiors. That didn't work. Then he decided to unleash the political counselor, who was Stan Brooks, to call the equivalent of the assistant secretary for American affairs, a guy by the name of Ling. Stan is tough and hard-nosed, among the more stubborn of our colleagues. Stan called and, in Bush's name, just raised holy hell about the guard's performance, the principles involved and so forth. The result was that the woman was let into our compound within about thirty seconds.

But the point to be made here was about Bush, who was often accused of not being able to stand up for himself, being a wimp or so forth, this kind of thing. His genuine outrage really came through, and he was prepared to pull out all the stops and be as hard as necessary. He would have gone much further if necessary to support this principle that the Chinese were not going to interfere with American diplomats or, for that matter, with Americans.

We learned later of a humorous denouement of that episode. As I recall, a senior Chinese representative in Washington visited the White House a day or two later. He was to meet his wife separately at the White House. For some reason, the guard initially refused to let the wife of the representative into the White House. We understood at the time the Chinese were convinced that this was a swift American retaliation for the episode at our gate in Beijing.

Q: And you just kept your mouth shut.

THAYER: We kept our mouth shut, because, as we all know, the American government has never been able to be this responsive. [Laughter] But this episode was also considered important enough and Bush's remonstrations were effective enough so that I think Deng Xiaoping also apologized to President Ford when he came out to visit, apologized for having kept this person out.

Q: While we're talking about relations between the two countries, as a China specialist, did you find it was a problem, not just in the official but the non-official relations between the two countries? There seems to be an infatuation by Americans with China, and I'm wondering whether you found that this infatuation led to what infatuations do, sometimes not asking for as much or expecting as much as we might from other countries. Did you find this sort of a problem in our relations?

THAYER: I think it became later in the overall U.S.- China relationship. This takes us ahead to the period after I left Beijing, after the death of Mao. (Mao died in '76.)

Incidentally, between Bush's departure and the arrival of [Thomas] Gates six months later, I was chargé in Beijing, and as a China specialist, one of the rewarding things was to be the man in charge carrying the American flag in China, where I was never sure, for the first 20 years of my career, I would get to. As our relationship began to pick up during the Carter presidency, which was coincidental with the post-Mao period, there began, as you will recall -- it didn't begin, perhaps, but there was an acceleration of "China euphoria." Bloomingdale's had its China-style furniture and its China days, and China was really a sexy item in the United States. As we moved toward normalization -- this is a time now I was country director for China between about September 1, 1976 through the normalization period to the summer of '79 -- there began to be, partly by accident, partly nurtured by the Carter administration, a feeding of the American tendency to display a special emotion toward China. This was most illustrated, in my judgment, during the visit of Deng to the United States. In a gala at the Kennedy Center, Deng came onto the stage and greeted a bunch of small children who had just done a dance of some kind. Shirley MacLaine got up and made an absolutely inane speech about what a great people the Chinese were, and she also had the ignorance to say what a terrific thing the cultural revolution was, as I recall.

In any event, there was this euphoria about Chinese. American business was crawling all over each other to get a piece of the China action, and I felt at the time that the administration was overselling China to the American public. It was important that we help contribute to an atmosphere of increased warmth in the relationship in order to bring both sides of the normalization equation up to the point of willingness to regularize the relationship. But China was oversold in 1978-79, just as we had oversold Chiang Kai-shek in World War II. Americans were especially upset by Chiang Kai-shek's corruption and so forth, because they expected something different. Americans were offended by the fact that in the post-'79 period, as the '80s moved along and then climaxed by the Tiananmen massacre, the Chinese turned out not to be saints and perfect partners after all. This is a longstanding problem in the relationship.

Not to digress too much, but to pick up on your question, I've always felt that part of our problem with dealing with the post-war period and the Chinese civil war was that we had so oversold Chiang Kai-shek in World War II. President Roosevelt insisted, perhaps for good reasons at the time, that Chiang and his country hold one of the permanent seats in the Security Council. We treated the Chinese as a major power. It wasn't just Henry Luce; it was a lot of other people, in the government and out, who sold Chiang Kai-shek and the KMT as the greatest thing that ever happened to democracy in China, etc., and we oversold them. So when Chiang Kai-shek turned out to be something less than we had sold ourselves on his being, we overreacted in bitterness and anger at and derision of Chiang Kai-shek. In the same way, we oversold ourselves about the promise of the U.S.-China relationship in the period of the '70s and the '80s. We're seeing the fruit of that now in the reaction to Tiananmen.

Q: What would you do as chargé to a country where you say our relations were not really moving in any direction? What does a chargé do with a major country such as China?

THAYER: Well, that's a very good question. Compared to being a chargé in a normal relationship, the chargé's work is not heavy in Beijing. But, there were a lot of things to do. There were, of course, visiting delegations to be supported.

Q: Visitors, I assume, were a terrible burden, weren't they?

THAYER: I wouldn't call them a terrible burden, but they were very much a part of our work. We also had Americans who were working at fertilizer factories and others that needed protection, welfare. There were various consular problems. We had the cultural exchange going on. We had occasional complaints of a political nature that had to be dealt with. We had the endless negotiations you had for high-level visits. There was kind of a routine external, but not every active external activities. But you did travel and you reported on factories you'd visit, call on the party stalwarts, call on other prominent people in various cities, report that. The demonstrations at Zhou En-lai's death took place when I was charge, an exciting time.

There was a lot of content analysis. The People's Daily and other press was read every day by all of us who had the language. We also had agriculture and commercial reporting to do, the kind of routine things that are done in any embassy. We had a very small staff. So considering the size of our staff, we had enough to do. But there was in Beijing, like you read about in the stories of China in the time of the boxer period or all through the '20s and '30s, an awful lot of back-scratching among the foreign diplomatic corps, the endless dinners by the various chiefs of mission for the various other chiefs of mission. And when a foreign ambassador left, there were endless farewell parties. There were endless arrival parties. And they were a real pain, too. It meant that almost every night was tied up socially because you really had to show the flag, have friendly relations with third-country counterparts. But that was a really down side of the job, as far as I was concerned.

Also, national days. Everybody had a formal national day celebration. (The Americans, because we did not have a normal relationship, had two celebrations, one to which Chinese officials only came; another for everybody else.) But the national days were, in practice, one hour long. They normally lasted from 5:00 to 6:00 or 6:00 to 7:00, and they normally were in the International Club. They normally served the same liquor -- I won't say out of the same bottles, but they served the same liquor, had the same glasses, the same hors d'oeuvres, the same often unpleasant waiters and waitresses passing things around, and the same people to talk to. When Bush was there, incidentally, we often went to these national days on our bicycle. At least that was one activity. We spent a lot of time bicycling around Beijing on weekends.

But the best about being chargé for me in Beijing was running my own post for six months, carrying the flag, and working with a bunch of very high-quality FSO professional China specialists. Having that team work together was a great joy for me.

One other thing I did while I was chargé was to greet former President [Richard M.] Nixon on his first foreign foray after his resignation. You may recall that the Chinese invited Nixon to come to Beijing in the middle of the 1976 New Hampshire primary, and there was a good deal of speculation in the American press at the time that somehow the Chinese were trying to interfere with that primary, where Ford, among others, was on the ballot. The fine tuning of the U.S.-China relationship required even finer tuning then when the decision about meeting Nixon came. Should the chargé of the liaison office go to the airport to greet a disgraced president, as normally was done to greet a high-level person? This was kind of a hot potato at the time.

Q: I assume you went.

THAYER: I went. When I went out to the airport to meet Nixon, standing around with the Chinese at the time waiting for his special plane to come in, the chief of protocol asked me to come over and meet under the wing of some aircraft on the tarmac. Hua Guofeng, who was then an obscure guy with a security background, who became the next powerhouse in the Chinese government. But that was the first sign. When Nixon came, Hua came out to meet him, and that was the first sign that Hua's star was on the rise. It didn't stay up past 1980.

Q: What was your analysis of this? Was this too much of a hot potato even to consider about the invitation by the Chinese to Nixon?

THAYER: It was a hot potato at the time because of its domestic political sensitivities. I felt the Chinese were not just trying to embarrass the Americans. I think Chinese motivations in inviting Nixon were twofold, basically. First, they really do make a big point of being true to their old friends, and they consider Nixon an old friend. But there was a political point to be made, too. And that is that the relationship after Nixon left the presidency (starting before Nixon left, in fact) was not moving forward as well as the Chinese perhaps had hoped. So it was a way of sending a message to the Americans: "We're inviting Nixon to symbolize what a good guy he was in beginning the process of normalization, and you guys who are now in charge in Washington aren't doing as well as our friend Richard Nixon." The Nixon visit, incidentally, was preceded by a visit of his daughter, I think Tricia Nixon, and her visit was given front-page play in the People's Daily.

I might mention one quick little thing to give the flavor of life in Beijing at the time. I got a call at about one o'clock in the morning from the foreign ministry protocol office saying that they wanted me to know that Tricia Nixon and her husband were arriving the next morning at the Beijing Airport at seven or eight o'clock, whatever it was. They assumed, they said, that I'd want to know so I could be there. Well, the fact is that the way we had to operate in Beijing was that our drivers were completely under the control of the Public Service Bureau. I had absolutely no way of contacting my driver in the middle of the night, and there was no way that I was going to get out to the airport unless I took a taxi. And the Chinese knew this. So I had to tell my Chinese telephone caller that I was regrettably going to be unable to make it to the airport to greet Tricia Nixon.

When former President Nixon came, I was included in the arrival and the farewell banquets for Nixon. I told his principal assistant -- and I mentioned to the former president also -- that he was welcome to come to the liaison office to see the brick and mortar fruits of his original opening to China. But I said that I hoped that he would understand that, while I would like to welcome him to the liaison office, it would have to be without any publicity when he came. Nixon did not come to the liaison office, but at the farewell at the airport he went out of his way to thank me for the invitation. It was an awkward situation at that time.

Q: Nixon, at that point, was not what you'd call rehabilitated or anything like that.

THAYER: That's right. Nixon was really a bad name in the States. It was in the middle of political happenings in the States having to do with the next election, and it was a very sensitive time.

Q: How were we reading what was happening in China? I'm talking about the political leadership. How did you go about it, and where did you see things going? This was a time of change. Mao died while you were there, didn't he?

THAYER: Mao died, I think, in November '76.

Q: He was pretty much out of it, wasn't it?

THAYER: Well, he was out of it, but he was still there. The Gang of Four was riding high during most of the time I was there. There were the riots or demonstrations at Tiananmen and at the Martyr's Shrine subsequent to Zhou En-lai's death in April of 1976. People were going up and people were going down, but most of this was obscure to us. I mean, there was some very esoteric tea leaf reading done by our analysts who were very good, particularly Stan Brooks and Lynn Pasco. Lynn is now DCM in Beijing to Jim Lilley. (Stan subsequently went to Taipei as AIT director.) We saw China leadership in flux, and there was not much we could do about it. This was manifested to us in various ways in trying to get progress on the claims assets issue and trying to get certain cultural visits accomplished, certain other things.

The Chinese were just themselves tied in knots. How we discerned this was the way people would speak to us, the jargon they would use in briefings, toasts, what was printed in People's Daily and in other publications. But we didn't really understand a lot that was going on very deeply behind the scenes.

Q: Henry Kissinger was secretary of state while you were there. Did you have the feeling that, having broken through to China, his focus of interest was really more on the Soviet Union now?

THAYER: No, I did not have that feeling. But the fact was that Kissinger, as secretary of state, was trying to keep the relationship with China moving, but it was hard to move forward at that time. It was just a period in history when progress was not going to be made.

Q: Were there any other developments at that time, or should we move on to your next assignment?

THAYER: Well, there were a lot of developments, but I guess we ought to move along.

Q: How about Thomas Gates? What was his background, and did he make any changes?

THAYER: Gates made no change in the basic policy. There was no change to be made. Gates was selected after a long delay. He was a secretary of the Navy, and then secretary of defense under Eisenhower. He was chairman and CEO of Morgan Bank in New York. Also from Philadelphia, in fact. Our families had known each other before. He was selected, I think, because, among other things, Ford had confidence in him, he was a non-controversial "political figure;" that is, a non- professional. We wanted to have a political figure for symbolic purposes in China. Gates, of course, had government experience and prestige, but he didn't have any background in China.

He did not make changes when he got there, but he worked very hard at learning and getting around as best he could. He just carried on the relationship on a more or less even keel for the rest of the Ford administration. Very dramatically, the Tangshan earthquake happened when he was there, when there was something like 200,000 people killed, and virtually the whole liaison office staff moved into the Residence out of the hotels and apartment houses and so forth. Gates did a great job in keeping the U.S. operation on an even keel at that period.

But, no, things didn't change much. They didn't really start to change until the Carter administration, and that was partly because the situation in China changed then. A leadership came into place with the demise of the Gang of Four, the death of Mao, the rise of Deng Xiaoping and others who saw the value of an improving Sino-U.S. relationship. With a new U.S. administration in place the relationship then began to move forward.

Q: It's been mentioned in some of these interviews that really it wasn't a matter of the United States doing something early on that really would have opened up things; it was a matter of events in China, the cultural revolution, the Great Leap Forward, etc., etc., all of which would have precluded any real opening. Is this your feeling that political paces in China really govern a lot of things?

THAYER: That is very substantially true. There may have been things that we could have done in 1949 that would have made a difference, '48 and '49. There may have been things that we could have done in the mid-'50s that would have made a difference. But basically the Chinese were not fully prepared, even at the time before the Korean War, to enter into a relationship with us. In the '50s certainly there was some lack of enthusiasm for relations with the Chinese under the Dulles administration, but the Chinese were not behaving very well either toward the United States.

In the '60s under [John F.] Kennedy, we made very direct, explicit efforts to improve relations, and the Chinese were simply not prepared to go forward for some of the reasons that you cited. So it was really not until the late '60s, when the Chinese were prepared, that we also had moved along to that point. Nixon became president. So the time was right for the relationship to begin its movement, and that was also because things had changed in China. The context of Sino-U.S. relations had changed, and we had the good sense to seize upon this. President Nixon, in his 1967 Foreign Affairs article, made pretty clear what his strategic view was and presaged in that article the opening of a U.S.-China relationship. But it had to wait until the Chinese were ready.

Q: You left Beijing in 1976 and you went back to Washington. What were you doing?

THAYER: I went back to Washington as country director for Chinese Affairs as Oscar Armstrong moved up to deputy assistant secretary, replacing Bill Gleysteen who went over to the National Security Council staff.

Q: What did Chinese Affairs encompass in those days?

THAYER: The office used to be called the Office of Asian Communist Affairs, encompassing Vietnam as well as, I guess, North Korea and Mongolia. By the time I came into that job, it was only Mongolia.

Q: And China.

THAYER: And China, of course,

Q: And the PRC, but not Taiwan.

THAYER: Not Taiwan. Taiwan was a separate office, right.

So I came into that job in the summer of 1976. Two of my brothers had died while I was in Beijing, and after the second brother died, I felt I had to come back. So I asked for an early transfer, remaining long enough to help Ambassador Gates get settled. David Dean came out to replace me, and I came back to take over the job that Oscar Armstrong had held. That was in the late summer of '76.

In the fall of '76, these events in China took place. We also had the U.S. election. It seemed to me, and to others, of course, that we could begin preparing for the new administration to move the relationship along, which we did.

Q: Had Carter, during the campaign, made any campaign promises about relations with China?

THAYER: I think there had been generally positive things said by the candidate.

Q: But nothing that gave you real marching orders?

THAYER: Well, frankly, I don't recall exactly what he said, but he had people advising him who were very sympathetic with moving the relationship along. Dick Holbrooke was one, and Dick became assistant secretary of state for East Asian Affairs. Mike Oxenberg, I think, also contributed to some briefings for Carter. He came on the NSC as Brzezinski's China guy. So there was a general feeling that all wanted to move the relationship along. It wasn't a new idea. But we all felt that perhaps now was the time that we could do a little bit more.

Q: The reason I ask, I was in Korea at the time, and Carter had made the specific thing about withdrawing American troops from Korea, which was, to all of us, a lousy idea. And I think it became apparent to him, too, because they weren't withdrawn. But you didn't have that sort of albatross hung around your neck?

THAYER: No, but I might mention that the withdrawal of U.S. troops from Korea was an albatross for U.S.-Korean relations, but it was the kind of signal that could be helpful to U.S.-China relations.

Q: Let's talk about this time you were there. Let's talk about what you were doing prior to the actual change of administration.

THAYER: We were just continuing the routine cool relationship with the Chinese, nothing very fancy. That didn't last once the new administration came in. I took over in September, I think -- late August or September '76 -- and the election was November '76. We were in a marking-time period until the new administration came in. I don't want to exaggerate my role in preparing for a policy change. It was just part of the discussions about what we would do next.

But I will say that I had in mind at that time and mentioned to Art Hummel, who was then assistant secretary, the possibility of forming a team made up of Al Romberg, who was then a National Security Council staffer under Gleysteen, a China specialist, and a very bright guy, now with the Council on Foreign Relations, and the other half of the team would be Stape Roy, who was my deputy, had been Armstrong's deputy and is now executive secretary of the department (later Ambassador to the PRC). I had in mind those two guys. In fact, as we moved into the normalization negotiations, Roy and Romberg became key players in reviewing the record of the Kissinger-Zhou En-lai talks, formulating the policy memos that the State Department produced first for Secretary [Cyrus] Vance and later for the President. The team of China specialists working on U.S.-China relations was led by Bill Gleysteen who came in as senior deputy assistant secretary under Dick Holbrooke, who was Vance's assistant secretary. Dick took a very strong interest in developing U.S.-China relations, as he did U.S.-Vietnam relations, which is, of course, another subject.

(Dick Holbrooke was an exceedingly able, controversial but able -- I consider him a good friend -- advocate of moving on U.S.-China relations, and he arranged, before inauguration, for a group of us to brief Secretary Vance on U.S.-China relations and made certain proposals to him before Carter took over, about where we should go on U.S.-China relations.)

Mike Oxenberg in the NSC was very high on and instrumental in moving the relationship along. We had some very good people. Burt Levin and Harvey Feldman on the Taiwan desk. Paul Kreisberg, the deputy head of policy planning staff at that time, had a role also. Mort Abramowitz, originally a China specialist, was deputy assistant secretary for International Security Affairs over in Defense; he had a role, too. Later, on the China desk, Don Anderson and Lynn Pascoe were valued players, as was Charles Freeman, who was a key player on the task force set up after December 15, 1978, to coordinate the follow-on actions, including the Deng visit. There were some extremely able, highly motivated people involved in putting together a China policy, elements of a China policy, as the Carter administration began to get in gear. Incidentally, there was a national security decision memorandum which ended up on the front pages of the New York Times because of some dispute allegedly going on about arms sales to the Chinese, where they named myself and Bill Gleysteen and Mort Abramowitz and, I guess, Mike Oxenberg as having particular viewpoints on this issue. That was early in the administration.

We got into a diversion with the Chinese over the settlement of the claims-assets issue. This was U.S. property seized by the Chinese, held by the Chinese, and Chinese assets blocked by us. That was an issue that came prematurely on the front burner, and we wasted a lot of time actually trying -- but failing -- to get that settled before we moved into the serious normalization negotiations.

Secretary Vance along with Holbrooke, Gleysteen and others, I accompanied on his first visit to China in August of '77, which basically opened the negotiations.

Q: Can you give a little feel for the atmosphere of the change-over from administrations from your particular point of view in the China field? Was this a hostile takeover? Was this, "Let's try something else"? How did you feel about this new group coming in and they feel about you?

THAYER: Dick Holbrooke personified the administration in the East Asia Bureau. Dick was the new assistant secretary for East Asia and Pacific, vigorous, aggressive, intellectually very alive, clearly anxious to make his mark. So there was no doubt who was running the East Asia Bureau in the policy sense. Bill Gleysteen was chosen by Dick as his senior deputy, and that was a blessing for the bureau, Bill being one of the ablest Foreign Service officers of his day.

Q: He was later ambassador to Korea when I was there and a China hand.

THAYER: And also a China hand and a great public servant. So when Holbrooke took over, Dick made clear to us he was interested in moving on China policy, and he was interested in drawing on the professionals to do so. It was two very happy combinations. He came down to the China desk early on, along with Bill Gleysteen, and met with myself and Stape Roy, who was deputy, and one or two others in my office, and we discussed China policy. Right from the beginning Dick Holbrooke was a strong advocate on the policy question.

In fact, Dick, in the end -- this may be irrelevant to this project -- but in the end I was the only country director who remained from the former regime who was still in place three years later.

This was not anything particular about me so much, I think, but symbolized that Dick was determined to work constructively with the China professionals; he needed them, and we shared pretty much the same goals. Our communications were first rate. With Bill Gleysteen, our China man in the front office, later to be replaced by Roger Sullivan when Bill went off to Korea, direct with Dick Holbrooke or with the seventh floor -- all these channels were always first rate.

One thing I'll say for this historical record is that one of Dick Holbrooke's great virtues -- and he's taken a lot of beating from a lot of people who don't like him -- was that he was eager to hear dissent. I never hesitated to disagree with Dick Holbrooke, and did so in handwritten notes, in more formal memoranda, on the telephone, in person. I remember once catching him on the elevator to berate him for something that he was trying to do in China policy. Dick had the self-confidence and the open-mindedness never to take offense. He didn't feel his rank being challenged at all. He liked the intellectual give-and-take. And the result of this facet of Holbrooke's personality was that he picked brains and made creative people more creative. I don't count myself as a particularly creative person, but if I had any contribution to make there, it was helping to manage a creative process, keep the paper moving and keep people moving constructively, asking questions, making the best use out of talent. And with Stape Roy and Al Romberg and others, there was ample talent to go around there. But Dick was, for me, almost always a pleasure to work for.

U.S.-China, U.S.-Vietnam, and U.S.-Soviet policy all were entangled there, and this made the policy aspects of Dick Holbrooke's job a lot more complicated than one would ordinarily think, because to some extent these three strands of policy were crossed, occasionally short-circuited or blocked each other, and that was an important element.

But to come back to your question, how did I, as a professional, feel when this new group took over, I felt very comfortable with it. There were, however, in the course of the three years, a lot of problems. We had a lot of problems with the National Council staff. You're familiar with the Brzezinski-Vance problems. Whatever the facts about that, there were some problems -- Brzezinski and Vance, as we all know -- and there were lots of tactical bureaucratic operational problems between, on the one hand, the National Security staff, and, on the other, the State Department staff, the Foreign Service China specialists and others.

Q: Can you give some illustration of the types of things that were working to effect your operations vis-à-vis China?

THAYER: Well, I'll be a little cautious here, but just to say that often the Brzezinski agenda was not the same as the Vance agenda. And, therefore, the Oxenberg agenda was frequently not the same as the Thayer agenda or the Holbrooke agenda.

Q: Oxenberg was the China man in the National Security Council staff.

THAYER: So oftentimes not all the cards were on the table between NSC staff and the East Asia Bureau, and it took quite a lot of extra effort to keep track of what Mike Oxenberg, on his own or on Zbig's behalf, was up to at any given time. I just want to add that since those days, Mike Oxenberg and I are still talking, and we both recognize this was a problem between us. To some extent the problems were almost endemic in that kind of a situation. In any event, we had the common goal of a China policy that best served U.S. interests.

Q: What would be a problem? With a policy towards a foreign country, why would the two people responsible in the NSC and in the State Department be moving in different directions?

THAYER: I think it's fair to say that there were differences between Vance, Holbrooke and Brzezinski, for example, on how fast we should move on U.S.-Vietnam relations, and that had some impact on how we perceived the pace of U.S.- PRC relations. Nayan Chanda covers this to some extent in his book Brother Enemy.

Because of differences in perception of the desired pace of these respective relationships, there were various tactical things that went along with that, differences between what the NSC would like to do and what the East Asia Bureau would like to do. I am being elliptical because some of these issues are still alive to some extent.

Q: Well, particularly with China, can you say there were those that are dealing with China, either in the NSC or in the office of Chinese affairs, ones that were saying, "Let's go slow with firming up relations"? Because obviously at this particular time we had this emotional and strong political tie -- I'm speaking of American internal politics related to Taiwan -- and to recognize the People's Republic of China fully would mean the diminishing of our official relationships with Taiwan. How was this playing out? Were there sides on this, or were you saying, "That's a Democrat-Republican problem and that's not ours. We'll tell you the way it should be," or something like that?

THAYER: There were surprisingly little differences within the government, within the executive branch, relating to Taiwan. There wasn't a manifestation of the China lobby in my office or in the East Asia Bureau or in the legal advisor's office. At least it wasn't an important factor. Every one of us were convinced that we had to retain some kind of relationship with Taiwan, that the continuation of arm sales was important and that American businesses must have access and so forth -- even though these things were not all covered fully in our initial presentation of the Taiwan Relations Act. But there was a unanimity about the overall project. The project was to normalize relations with the PRC, to retain some kind of relationship between the people of the United States and the people of Taiwan, because it was pretty well understood we would have to break diplomatic relations with Taiwan.

Some people on the Hill didn't agree with that, as we know from the public record. But within the planning group, there was no disagreement on the essence. There was a lot of discussion, quite a high intellectual level, it seemed to me, about what we should be doing, what we should be using as a basis for negotiation with the PRC, how we should go about retaining those things that were essential in our relationship with Taiwan. This was a group of people who cared tremendously about doing the right thing by Taiwan as well as pursuing the U.S. interest with the PRC.

So the level of intellectual discourse in moving on this policy over a two-year period, was very high. And it was, in many ways for me, a thrilling experience to be involved in this process of trying to move history along but doing it in an honorable and a productive way, that is to say, productive for the long run. So it was a matter of working from a common bias, a shared vision of what we wanted to achieve. The real differences were in how we best go about it, and that was a natural and healthy process.

The first part of this process, incidentally, was to analyze the many, many hours of conversations between Henry Kissinger and Zhou En-lai and Mao dating back to the first 1971 visit. The State Department had not had access to the records of those conversations until the Carter administration. So when Carter came in, one of the first things we were able to do was to get access to these records which were held by the White House, and analyzed them to give us the platform from which we could then figure out how to move ahead.

Q: Was this because of secrecy? Was this a normal thing, these documents being held so tightly? Or was this Henry Kissinger in operation or what?

THAYER: A lot of the above, I would say. But the nature of the situation when Kissinger first went to the PRC to some extent required an absolute confidentiality. And Kissinger didn't trust the State Department. He didn't trust many people. So these records were kept very carefully. And even today, you will have seen very little reference to the particulars of the Kissinger-Zhou En-lai dialogue. I will say here only that the dialogue was elegant, and it showed two marvelous minds at work toward a common purpose with great historical and philosophical sweep.

In any event, the first documentary analyses that we did were based on these records of the Kissinger meetings, which we kept extremely carefully, double locked, and double sign-in and sign-out, and so forth, read only in one room with a light off, etc. We were determined also that it was important to keep the confidence of the Chinese that we were serious in our purpose and not going to use these historic records loosely.

Q: Harry, on something as sensitive as changing our relationship basically with Taiwan, did you keep Congress informed? Did you have a dialogue with staff members? Because this would strike me that if there's any issue -- well, also the other one was the Panama Canal issue, that the Carter administration really was making two major difficult political foreign policy --

THAYER: SALT, also.

Q: SALT, yes, and really the Camp David thing. I mean, this was really the administration coming in, wasn't going to sit around and react. It was going to try to do things. But what was the approach towards Congress as you went about this?

THAYER: Dick Holbrooke is very much a political animal and worked hard to maintain and develop personal ties on the Hill. For example, he invited the head of the East Asia and Pacific Affairs Subcommittee of the House Foreign Affairs Committee -- Lester Wolf, in those days, Congressman Wolf of New York -- to sit with us at a weekly East Asia staff meeting. So he was very sensitive about the need for congressional support and consulted carefully with a whole range of people on both sides of the Hill. Our consultations on China were informal, and we talked often, at all levels, with individual members of both houses and their staffs.

Q: On both sides?

THAYER: On both sides, Republican and Democrat. We also testified in informal committee sessions. Harvey Feldman and I, I remember once, went up and testified together. Harvey was then director for Taiwan, having replaced Burt Levin. We went up and testified informally on the relationships there and touched on possible outlines of a normalization agreement. But State did not have what the Congress felt was appropriate consultations with China. And the Hill raised holy hell with us and with the president when he announced the normalization of relations with China, explicitly accusing that we had not consulted Congress adequately.

In fact, we had told them virtually everything in substance, but we hadn't said, "And we plan to do this so-and-so at such-and-such a time, and we are negotiating these things right at this very time." But to any reader of the newspapers, it was obvious that there was a lot going on in the relationship, a lot of signs of progress in the relationship. Brzezinski visited China in May 1978. Others in the Executive Branch went. And also there were congressional visitors, a lot of them, going to Beijing at the time. We encouraged a lot of this. So there was no question that the Congress could get the message, but formal consultations, consultations that the Congress felt were adequate, no. I think the record shows that plenty of congressmen felt that they were not consulted adequately about normalization.

Q: Was this a political game that was played of outrage when they knew what was going on, or were they really being kept from significant facts, and was there a reason for this?

THAYER: Congress has all kinds of people in it, and there were plenty of people in Congress who were very strong supporters of Chiang Kai-shek and Taiwan, quite a substantial constituency, although not as much as before, who held the same view. There was obviously a lot of resistance to any break in relations with Taiwan, which was one of the results of the negotiations and one that we anticipated. We did not want to derail the normalization negotiations by tipping our hand too much on the Hill in terms of timing or details of an agreement. That was an important factor.

Q: What was your impression of President Carter at the time regarding this? Was he a player? Was he a pusher or what?

THAYER: President Carter was very much a player. I think he was so on many issues. But in the China thing, memoranda that we drafted went to the president, he read them, marked them -- very much a player. It was his personal decision -- at least he was one of those who made the decision -- that the access to the facts of the normalization negotiations, knowledge of that, be extremely restricted. And we restricted it within the State Department in 1978, kept it entirely in the East Asia Bureau, knowledge of negotiations, handled the paper extremely carefully. So the way we handled the Congress and the public side of normalization, the president was very much aware of and in favor of -- encouraged it. The president absolutely knew of the degree to which we were limiting our formal consultations, to come back to that point.

Q: Were you involved or aware of how we were keeping the Taiwan side informed of what we were doing?

THAYER: Yes, but we were not keeping them informed in any detail as to what we were doing. We had, in earlier years, informed the Chinese, the Republic of China Chinese Embassy, about the outlines of progress in the Warsaw talks or lack of progress in the Warsaw talks. But we were then in a different mode with the PRC. By 1977, we were not keeping Taipei fully informed about our discussions with the PRC. By 1978 we were not even keeping State's policy planning staff informed.

Q: Did you have the feeling -- you and also those dealing with China, and I'm speaking about both sides of the equation -- that the Republic of China government was really preparing itself and had braced itself for a new type of relationship, but, having little choice, they were ready, after a lot of unhappiness, to accept something as long as there was a solid relationship with the United States?

THAYER: Well, the Chinese from Taiwan -- the "Republic of China" Chinese -- were not in favor of normalization of U.S. relations with the PRC. They saw our peaceful relations with the PRC probably as constructive, but they certainly were never in favor of U.S. breaking relations with the Republic of China. However, they were aware that plenty was going on. Any reader of the newspaper would know that there was plenty going on, and that goes for people on the Hill as well as people in Taiwan. So they were aware. The signals were there, but we were not spelling it out for them.

Q: As this went on, did things fall out the way all of you thought they would who had been dealing with this when you first opened this? The Institute for China, or whatever you call it with Taiwan, keeping that relation -- was that more or less how you saw the thing coming out or did that grow?

THAYER: Well, in the end, we sought, as part of the normalization plan, to establish a relationship with Taiwan something along the so-called "Japanese model," which was an unofficial relationship but carrying out pretty much the same functions as in an official relationship. And so the Japanese model, which we examined very closely, was the basis for our approach.

As it turned out, we needed -- much more than the Japanese had needed -- to do a lot more U.S. internal legal adjustments to be in a position to carry on a relationship with Taipei parallel to the Japanese model relationship. We needed a legal structure, and we needed laws to make it possible for Foreign Service officers to be separated from the Foreign Service and work unofficially in Taipei, because we were determined, among other things, to be as good as our word. That is to say: our relationship with Taiwan was going to be conducted on a non-official basis. Well, we needed a lot of laws for that, and we put together the Taiwan Relations Act which would establish the American Institute in Taiwan and its legal structure. We sent a draft Taiwan Relations Act to the Hill after the president's announcement on December 15, 1978. We sent to the Hill a Taiwan Relations Act which would enable us to carry on this unofficial relationship, this people-to-people relationship implementing commercial, cultural, and other elements.

The reception to the Taiwan Relations Act on the Hill was outrage. What we did was to send up a package which covered the legal requirements of establishing this unofficial relationship but did not have the political elements such as security concerns and so forth in it that the friends of the Republic of China, in particular, but also many others of a more neutral stance, thought was appropriate for the circumstances.

So to put it succinctly, the administration -- I think it's pretty clear -- badly underestimated what the Hill reaction was going to be to this skeleton of a Taiwan Relations Act. It wasn't broad enough for the Congress. We didn't present it in the best possible way. Our testimony was not good. And we got torn apart by the Congress for this. It simply was a case of just not estimating correctly how this package that we put together would sell.

Q: What happened? To follow through, from your perspective, did Congress strengthen it, harm it, skew it, or what?

THAYER: Well, Congress took our skeletal Taiwan Relations Act designed for specific operational purposes and made it into a political document which went far beyond what the administration had intended. But the administration was able to avoid the most troublesome aspects being proposed that would, you might say, tend to re-officialize the U.S. relationship with Taiwan. For example, we did not want in the Taiwan Relations Act any reference to the "Republic of China," for perfectly obvious reasons. We didn't recognize the "Republic of China;" therefore, it would be inappropriate to refer to it by that name.

One of the things that we did in normalization was to give a one-year notice of abrogation of our Mutual Security Treaty. We would not have a formal defense commitment to Taiwan at that time, and we sought to not have any formal security commitment introduced into the Taiwan Relations Act. So there was a lot of dispute over this, a lot of very hot, heartfelt outraged dispute with many of those opposed to the administration policy absolutely convinced that the administration was engaging in an immoral act by breaking relations with Taiwan. The administration was equally convinced, as I was -- quite low on the totem pole -- that what we were doing was very much in the national interest, entirely appropriate, and moral. As long as we maintained these people-to-people relations with Taiwan and fulfilled the other commitments embodied in the skeletal Taiwan Relations Act in the announcement of normalization in the president's statement, so long as we did everything we said we'd do, we were acting morally.

But this was a matter of hot debate, and there was a lot of blood on the floor in the process. I wasn't on the front lines of this aftereffect. My role was to continue to work on developing U.S.-PRC relations, and others were taking most of the heat on the Taiwan Relations Act.

Q: How did the PRC react? We said we'd do this, and then it got into Congress and really the things were changed, weren't they? How were they reacting?

THAYER: Well, we had made clear to the PRC Chinese all along that there would be certain legal steps we'd have to go through. They didn't like that, but we hadn't explained to them the kind of Taiwan Relations Act that there would end up being because we didn't know the kind of Taiwan Relations Act there would end up being. The Chinese were not happy about what was produced by the Congress.

Q: What was your impression of how the People's Republic of China were dealing with Congress? Do you think they were getting good reports so that they were pretty well informed about how the system worked and the pressures and all this?

THAYER: I think they were pretty well informed, but not very. The Chinese liaison office, as it was at that time, was staffed by people who were pretty competent. Some of them had been educated in the States. Others had served for a long time in the liaison office. The liaison office had quite good relations with and access to the Hill. I'm sure they were surprised by the amount of activity for continued support of the Republic of China on the Hill, and they didn't expect the kind of Taiwan Relations Act they would get. But the reporting was fairly good.

I think it's pretty damn hard for any country to understand how our political system works, and it's particularly difficult for a China that had been so out of touch with the U.S. for so long. But they had people following U.S. affairs in Beijing over the years, and they had their American experts and so forth. But it's quite a different thing in understanding the dynamics of Congress. After all, the Carter administration misread the strength of the Congress's reaction.

Q: You're saying the State Department, even the Carter administration, really misjudged the vehemence which Congress would react to this.

THAYER: Well, it seems to me we did, anyhow, and so did the PRC. But the PRC consistently made it clear that it was our responsibility to keep our own house in order, and the PRC quite understandably did not want to take responsibility for the way the U.S. Congress behaved.

Q: Did you have the feeling that at any time our new establishment of relations was being jeopardized by the Congress and the backwards and forwards as we worked on the Taiwan Relations Act?

THAYER: There were risks there if some of the language proposed by the -- for want of a better term -- right wing in Congress, if some of the language proposed had stayed in the Taiwan Relations Act, it would have violated certain specific and implicit undertakings to the Chinese. I mean, for example, the use of the term "Republic of China." Now, whether that would have led to the derailing of the whole process or not, I can't say. But surely we were worried that some of the efforts might succeed, and that would be a problem.

THAYER: I stayed on until the summer of '79, and the last thing I did was to write a scope paper for Vice President [Walter] Mondale's pending trip to China which took place in June or July of '79.

Q: How were things at that time? When you left, did you see a new relationship?

THAYER: The relationship had begun to settle down pretty well. The episode of the Taiwan Relations Act left a lot of bad feelings on the Hill, and I won't say that those bad feelings had wholly dissipated. But things had calmed down a lot, and the relationship was beginning to move along.

JACOB WALKIN
Consular/Security Officer
Hong Kong (1958-1960)

Born and raised in Brooklyn, Mr. Walkin was educated at Cornell, Yale and the University of California. Entering the Foreign Service in 1952, he studied Serbo-Croatian at the Foreign Service Institute and was assigned to Belgrade, Yugoslavia. Subsequent assignments took him to Hong Kong, Jakarta and Surabaya. Following an assignment at the State Department in Washington, Mr. Walkin retired and began a new career as professor at Auburn University.

Q: Well, let's move on. In 1958 you went to Hong Kong.

WALKIN: I was assigned as general investigator of Chinese fraud, there were quite a few of us, and this is what I did for one year. I made periodic trips into Calone and talked to various Chinese. I learned Cantonese, by the way, while I was there and that is what I did for one year. But they had a security officer who proved to be drunkard and they just sent him home, they had to, and the Consul General at the time, Jerry Lewis Holmes had to pick somebody to replace him. I thought nothing of it at the time, but it so happens that he picked me. Among the general investigators of Chinese fraud there to replace him and that is what I did during my last year in Hong Kong there and I was the security officer doing all the same jobs that security officers do, including by the way, lecturing to newcomers on particular security problems that we had in the consul general.

Q: What were the major security problems that we were concerned about?

WALKIN: There was a general question of general security and Chinese spies for the area but also the usual security officer duties of investigating particular employees, employees to be, to ensure that they were not spies or working in any way for the Chinese communists and I also gave periodic lectures on the particular problems affecting us in the Consulate General in Hong Kong. I had quite a crowd and it is worth mentioning and when we were through, they just didn't want to leave, they wanted to hear more of what I had told them. I well...

Q: You are back to France now.

WALKIN: Pardon?

Q: You are talking about France now?

WALKIN: France yes. No, in Hong Kong...

Q: You mean the people who were being told the security problems?

WALKIN: The particular security problems to watch out for because they had come to work for the Consulate General in Hong Kong. This has nothing to do with France.

Q: What particular, as an investigating officer, were you working on American or/and Chinese employees in the Consulate General or were you working on the visa/fraud side?

WALKIN: No, I was not in the visa/fraud side as a security officer. Well I did the general work of a security officer, investigating, and as I started to tell you, this lecture I gave periodically to newcomers on the particular security problems that they should look out for while they were employed in Hong Kong. I certainly remember the fact that this group, I don't know, there were quite a few people in my office listening to me talk about the particular security problems of Hong Kong, they just didn't want to leave. They wanted to hear more. I am sure this fellow reached Consul General Holmes and all the other people with whom I worked while there. I mention it as something likely to remember quite vividly, this particular incident. I did general security work and I continued to make trips into Hong Kong. I caught the attention once of Holmes when I reported back to my reporting officer, who was Sam Gilstrap, the Deputy Consul General, about an incident of which I had run into an American Chinese in Calhoun who had been sent there by, it may have been ATS who sent him there, to check on, as a secret agent so to speak, of there's, checking on potential spies. He spoke Cantonese fluently. I probably started talking to him in Cantonese and when he learned that we were Americans, we started talking in English but he had been sent there without the knowledge of the Consulate. When I reported this to Sam Gilstrap, when I got back and he reported it to Holmes, Holmes immediately sent for me and I told him in detail, just what I had learned that he was an American and they had been sent by some agency other than State and was working secretly there and Holmes exploded because he had not been told about this. He just listened to me and I know that I never saw that young man again. He was probably immediately withdrawn.

Q: Were we concerned at that time with attempts of the Communist Chinese to place employees in the Consulate General?

WALKIN: Oh, no question about that, before anybody could be employed, I as the security officer, engaged in long investigations of individuals and wrote reports on individuals who had applied to work in the Consulate General

Q: Did we get much support from the British?

WALKIN: Oh, yes, I personally didn't have much contact with the British but I am sure we did. We were generally sympathetic to them and their own administration of Hong Kong as a colony of theirs.

MORTON I. ABRAMOWITZ
International Cooperation Administration
Taiwan (1958-1960)

Economic & Consular Officer
Taiwan (1960-1962)

Chinese Language Study
Taichung, Taiwan (1962-1963)

Ambassador Abramowitz was born in New Jersey and educated at Stanford and Harvard Universities. He entered the Foreign Service in 1960 after service in the US Army. A specialist in East Asian and Political/Military Affairs, the Ambassador held a number of senior positions in the Department of State and Department of Defense. He served as Assistant Secretary of State for Intelligence and Research and as US Ambassador to Thailand (1978-1981) and Turkey (1989-1991). He also served in Taiwan, Hong Kong and Vienna. Ambassador Abramowitz was interviewed by Thomas Stern in 2007.

Q: When did you take the Foreign Service exam?

ABRAMOWITZ: In 1957, in Washington, DC. I passed it. Marshall Bremont, who also entered the Foreign Service, was sitting next to me. I took it in Washington because that is where I was at the time. I passed the oral in 1958. After leaving Harvard, and having no job, I took a management intern appointment at the Labor Department. I knew when I accepted that position that I would not stay at Labor very long, but I needed the income. This appointment also required passing an exam – the junior management intern exam – which allowed various departments to offer special jobs to those who had passed. It was the sought-after way into the government for recent college graduates. I took Labor's offer for a position in its international affairs division. An additional complication was the fact that I knew that I would be called soon for military duty.

Just as I was about to be drafted, the government opened a new program which allowed people to serve in the active forces for six months and then in a reserve status for seven years. I had been accepted for naval officer training at Newport, although I must say that I had a hard time imagining myself in that role. Then this new program opened, I opted for it, a week before I was to report to Newport. I left Labor after six months and joined the Army.

I was first assigned to Fort Dix for two months of basic training and then to Fort Chaffe in Arkansas for six months as a clerk-typist, during which time I managed to catch pneumonia. I still don't understand how I managed to last that long, much less being nominated as "soldier of the month" at Fort Chaffee. My friends and I chuckled at this. I was still a clerk-typist when I joined the Reserves. (Ironically, when I took a Presidential appointment – as a FSO – I was automatically discharged from the Reserves. So I was on active duty for six months and in the Reserves for eighteen months.

When I was discharged from active duty, a position in ICA (AID's predecessor) opened up and I took it. I also took the oral exams for the Foreign Service in 1958, but State stopped hiring new FSOs in that year. I did not get appointed as a Foreign Service officer for two years, I spent one year at ICA's headquarters in Washington in 1958 and then one year with the ICA mission in Taiwan in 1958 as an assistant program officer. In 1960, I was finally appointed an FSO and moved across the street, so to speak, from the ICA mission to the embassy.

In ICA I started in the Office of Chinese Affairs – i.e., working on Taiwan. I stayed in Washington for one year, participating also in a training program. Most of my time was spent working on the “desk.” I learned a good bit about the operations of the Washington foreign affairs bureaucracy.

My boss at ICA was a wonderful woman, Laura Hughes, who taught me a lot about operating in the USG. She devoted considerable amount of time to my training and development – she even asked for my views on occasions. It was a small office – only three of us. I was really an add-on to the regular staff; that is there was no formal position for me.

In ICA Taiwan, I became responsible for the management of the commodity import program, which was a large part of our assistance effort to that country. I analyzed Taiwan's needs, proposed which commodities to finance, and worked with the Taiwan government to make sure all came to pass. I also prepared that portion of the mission's annual AID request.

The Taiwan program was a large one. We must have had about 1,000 employees in ICA headed by Wes Haraldson an FSO and a very good and determined AID director.

I liked the Taiwan assignment, one I had prepared for. It was sort of the “Promised Land.” I was finally in a Chinese environment, learning the language and culture and traveling around the island. I had the opportunity to put my academic training to use, which was not always relevant. I met with many Chinese officials, learned a lot about doing business with bureaucracies in Taiwan and the U.S. It was my first overseas experience. Many of Taiwan's officials of course were refugees from the mainland; in fact, they made Taiwan the economic success it became. They were outstanding technocrats and their consistent contributions provided the essential spark to Taiwan's economic success story.

The principal aim of the assistance program was to reduce the rate of inflation. It was a real economic challenge. The economy had been running out of control because of huge defense expenditures. This was the main justification for the commodity import program; i.e., importing goods at low prices would drive down the price of all commodities, thereby dampening inflation. The commodities covered the whole range of economic activity, but especially agricultural products. In addition ICA helped develop and finance Taiwan's new infrastructure and expanded farm production. On the whole, our assistance program was well thought out, executed with skill, and instrumental in starting Taiwan on its way to become one of East Asia's “tigers” – like South Korea and Singapore. The Taiwanese economy far outpaced economic development efforts in most countries.

Q: You seem to credit the Taiwanese officials for much of the economic success.

ABRAMOWITZ: Absolutely. The top ones were honest, smart, and dedicated to making things happen. Most, but not all, came from the mainland. One of the principal institutions involved in this economic development process was the JCRR (The Joint Commission on Rural Reconstruction). That was run by a very prominent Chinese intellectual, but was a joint U.S.-Taiwan organization which managed a nation wide agricultural development program which turned out to be very successful and often held up as a model for other countries. It was actually started on the mainland but fell a foul of the Chinese civil war.

I am not suggesting that economic development by itself produced political growth. When I was there Taiwan was a very authoritative country run by the KMT (Kuomintang). There was a huge divide between the native Taiwanese and the “mainlanders” who followed Chiang Kai-shek from the mainland after the Communist take-over in 1949. That divide still remains but has been significantly reduced by Taiwan’s overall development and the very significant rise in incomes of the whole population.

I arrived in Taiwan after a terrible incident in 1957 when a number of Taiwanese were killed by the Nationalist forces. Chiang Kai-shek ran the country from the day he landed until 1975 when he died. The military which had followed him from the mainland were his enforcement mechanism. On the other hand, the economy grew and grew. The U.S. tried to encourage more democratic approaches to political development on the island but not very aggressively. We treaded carefully in the political landscape. As Embassy officials we were instructed to be careful with whom we talked publicly. Some of our contacts had to be “out of sight.” We could not be viewed as encouraging a Taiwanese political identity. Such activity was frowned upon by the Nationalists and by our own ambassador, Everett Drumright. In my perhaps unfair view he had a strong case of “clientitis.” It was not simply a matter of caution. I think he felt the nationalists would one day return to the mainland.

The ICA-Embassy relationship was very good, conducted mostly at higher levels than mine. We far outnumbered the Embassy and our building was much larger. The embassy Political Section had four or five officers. Same for the Economic Section. Perhaps more importantly, ICA had the resources to dole out which made us key players for the government. The Embassy, of course, had an important role in the AID program; it had to approve the level and composition of the assistance program and at times requested changes. I don’t remember much friction between the two organizations; they seemed to work cooperatively and present a united front to the KMT government.

Q: When did you decide to move to the State Department?

ABRAMOWITZ: As I mentioned, I waited for two years to get my security clearance and more importantly, for State to find the funds to hire me. I kept getting letters from the Department telling me that I was still very much on their minds, but that they wouldn’t be able to hire me in 1959. Finally, in 1960, I got a letter that the Department was ready to embrace me and that I could join the A-100 course (the introductory course offered to incoming officers) when I returned to Washington. I was appointed as an FSO-7 rather than FSO-8. I was given credit for my previous employment as well as my graduate school work.

I was sworn in as a new Foreign Service Officer in Taipei and assigned to the consular section of the Embassy. It was supposedly part of a rotational training program, starting with consular work and then being assigned to other sections of the embassy.

Many new officers, including myself, viewed an assignment to the consular section with some skepticism. In fact, I found that time in the consular section to be of enormous help. For one, I wrote a number of messages to Washington on our concerns regarding visa problems we were encountering in Taiwan. At the time, these messages received considerable attention; I don't know if they would today.

My second fortuitous circumstance came because my boss knew how to write and taught me what he knew. He was a very smart Foreign Service officer, but not an ambitious one. He really didn't care much about his career; he just wanted to reach retirement age having enjoyed what he had done regardless whether he had accomplished much or won any recognition. He had been a political officer but somewhere along the line had drifted into the consular business. His name was Tom Dehart and he had been the head of the embassy's consular section for a few years. We became friends and he really helped me immensely to sharpen my writing – systematic organization, clarity of thought, etc. I think his talent was wasted, but he preferred a sort of easier life. I have always owed him a real debt for his tutoring.

The consular section was a very busy one due primarily to some very serious visa fraud problems. Chinese students would get a short-term student visa and never return to the island. I must say that I had great sympathy for them – jobs in Taiwan were hard to come by then. Nevertheless they were clearly in violation of U.S. law. I was a very lenient visa officer! I must say that no one complained about my actions or attitude. Whether others were in sympathy with my views or whether there was little oversight, I don't know, probably both. In any case, my generosity seemed to be acceptable. I never violated U.S. laws, but where I had some leeway, I was lenient.

It was not my visa issuance work that attracted the embassy's attention, but rather my writings in that section. I focused on broader policy issues which individual or groups of visa applications raised. For example, one dispatch was on the pervasive problem of visa fraud in Taiwan. A lot of people on that island made money from the visa issuance process. It was these think pieces, plus my background in economics, which eventually led to my early reassignment to the economic section. That had been part of the original rotation plan which allowed me to use my economic background.

Of course, at the time, even though the economy was obviously beginning to grow, the "grass seemed greener" on the other side of the fence. Now of course, the trend seems to have been reversed. Many, probably most, U.S. trained Chinese return to Taiwan to seek their fortune.

Q: What did you do in the economic section?

ABRAMOWITZ: I had a good time. I talked to all sorts of people, high and low. I didn't talk to the president or his son, but I talked to many senior government officials. I had a pretty free hand in selecting subjects I wanted to focus on. I covered financial issues – one of the major disputes between Washington and the embassy concerned inflation. Louis Marks was the Department's expert on the subject – a very smart guy. He was convinced that Taiwan had licked inflation and he was right. Many in Taiwan and the U.S. did not agree with that analysis. I wrote a number of pieces on the subject, one, I remember, when the Taiwanese introduced a 100 Taiwan dollar bill the previous highest note was 10 Taiwan dollars. That was an indicator used by many to show that inflation was really creeping in; it was not the case.

My boss was Paul Storm an very interesting and unusual fellow. He pretty much left me to my own devices and I picked what I thought was important. There were some mandatory reports, such as the weekly economic report, to which we all had to contribute. We also in those days had something called CERP (Comprehensive Economic Reporting Program) was required periodically with listed reports. But in general, I was pretty much able to pursue economic issues which were timely and of real interest to me. There were four officers in the section. Two of us were junior officers, Herb Horowitz and me. We divided up the reporting.

Taiwan was a very interesting economic post and had enormous activity and dynamism. The place was changing into a modern economy. You could see the change right in front of your eyes. You didn't have to watch the grass grow; it boomed.

The political progress, to the extent that it existed, was not noticeable from the outside. The KMT and the President ran the place. But improvement in education and a growing economy was creating intellectual and psychological change in Taiwan.

For me good governance, dedicated people, and free-market oriented policies were the driving sources of the expanding economy. I would particularly give credit for this phenomenon to the effective and determined governance. It turned out to be a key to changing society. The ability of people to run their own affairs and to make things happen impressed me tremendously; that impression of a superb economic team has stayed with me for these many years.

Taiwan had an excellent intellectual and physical infrastructure. Most other countries at a similar stage of development did not have such an infrastructure. The Japanese provided Taiwan an effective agricultural system, and good transportation. Many of the mainlanders who fled to Taiwan were highly educated and the school system was quite modern for its time and place. So Taiwan had the good fortune to be a "new" country with a reasonably effective economic structure. Too many other "new countries" started with a low-base and were forced to deal simultaneously with major political problem (or problems) and economies that were barely functioning. Taiwan could develop its economic base and it had an established if authoritarian political system. In retrospect, I think the Taiwanese managed their entrance into the family of successful countries pretty well.

Political development was gradual. It was a dictatorship. The expansion of democracy came slowly but it came. The economic dynamism, the benefits of rising incomes helped expand the middle class, which stimulated a growing interest in political issues. The improving educational system – education was widely respected as it is in much of East Asia – contributed enormously.

All this provided a basis for a remarkable change in the KMT, which continued and accelerated after I left. Eventually, the KMT turned itself into a democratic party. Many hope that will be repeated on the mainland.

Q: Did the rise of a middle class have any impact on the development of a democratic political system?

ABRAMOWITZ: Yes, as I said it was beginning to expand. There were many middle-class people who had come from the mainland. The Taiwanese themselves had something of a middle-class primarily in rural parts of the country, where agriculture had been developed by the Japanese. By the time I arrived, whatever devastation had been created by the war had pretty much become history, so that the native population was able to partake in the economic boom. I think the economic expansion started in the early fifties. By the time I arrived, one could see clear evidence of an “economic success story.” And that visible improvement continued while I was there and vastly enhanced the middle class with ensuing political benefits. That was one benefit of serving in Taiwan. Many of my Foreign Service colleagues would go to a country for two or three years and see no change in the economic situation.

On the political side what we mostly watched was the growth of a communist state on the mainland, (then) in bad economic shape. That further increased the division between Taiwan and the mainland. The mainland was a one-party country, but one which fought and won a civil war.

While I was there we witnessed the last gasp of Taiwan’s “return to the mainland” policy. That of course was Chiang Kai-shek’s dream. In 1962, in light of the serious problems Beijing was encountering in the country especially in the agricultural sector and the policy squabbles in Washington about our China policy, Chiang Kai-shek decided or wanted to convey the notion that he was preparing to attack the mainland. Our Station Chief, Ray Cline, was very supportive. Finally, Washington told Cline to shut up and conveyed to Taiwan the need for caution. I don’t think anyone thought that Chiang Kai-shek would actually do what he threatened, but we were concerned enough to throttle it. We didn’t want any trouble in the Straits or in the area for that matter. We supported Taiwan’s economic development program, but not its stated ambitions to return to the mainland. We would not publicly state such policy, but I don’t think the Taiwan government had any doubts about what the U.S. would support and what it wouldn’t. In retrospect, it might have been Chiang’s effort to muster a stronger U.S. commitment to Taiwan.

I should mention here that my relationship with the CIA station was essentially social. I had very few, if any, business contacts with agency personnel. I made friends with a few of them; I knew Cline slightly – I got to know him better later in my career when I introduced him to Elliot Richardson to be considered for the INR directorship.

After Drumright left the ambassadorship, we had two chargés for a long time – first Joe Yager and then Ralph Clough. It was good to work for both of them. They carried out policy, but were open-minded enough to listen to the staff and discuss the issues. The most contentious probably being the Embassy’s relations with the Taiwanese community.

I mentioned the bitter disputes in Washington about our China policy. I was not much aware of the battles in Washington between various agencies except with the CIA in 1962. In Taiwan, although various agencies and people had different positions and perspectives, no one, as far as I can tell, “free-lanced” or took any intra-mission debates public. At least, that is what I observed from my vantage point which was that of a junior officer in a large U.S. establishment.

Q: Did developments in Vietnam have any impact on our China policy?

ABRAMOWITZ: Our involvement in that war had not begun while I was in Taiwan. We were concerned by developments there – but Vietnam did not rank high on our working agenda; that changed by the time I got to Hong Kong. Then it became a big deal indeed.

Q: Did the issue of the UN seat come up during your tour?

ABRAMOWITZ: Indeed it did. The embassy strongly supported Taiwan’s desire to keep the “China” seat at the UN. The issue arose annually and the embassy took the same position year after year. There wasn’t any opposition within the embassy to our position. Had we taken a different view, and had it been approved by Washington, that would have had a corrosive impact on our relations with Taiwan.

In 1958 Bob Scalapino wrote what became known as the “Scanlon Report.” Scanlon was a private consulting firm. He essentially concluded that a future foreign policy course should be to support a “one Taiwan” policy with its claim to the mainland. Not surprisingly that report was created considerable furor on the island. Today, Taiwan would warmly support that conclusion in a minute. I mention this because the future status of Taiwan was, and will continue to be a major foreign policy issue for the U.S.

Given that context, the question of Taiwan giving up its UN seat was just not an issue ripe for serious discussion in Taipei. The politics of the situation also barred any serious discussion in either Taiwan or in the United States of any changes in the current practice or any alternatives to the status quo. As far as I was concerned, the UN seat issue at that time was not an issue meriting much consideration. That would change with President Nixon.

Q: Did you have many contacts with Washington during your Taiwan tour?

ABRAMOWITZ: A few. I did return to Washington to take the A-100 course during my home leave in 1961. That was a rather unique experience, because by this time, I had been in the government overseas for a couple of years, unlike most my colleagues who were brand new to the Foreign Service.

It was during this time that I became more closely acquainted with some of the Washington heavy weights on China – people like Lew Marks and Joe Yager, who had been the Deputy Chief of Mission (DCM) and the chargé in Taiwan and then assigned to Washington to run the Taiwan desk. In Taiwan, most of my contacts with Washington were via correspondence on specific issues.

Q: How would you summarize your tour in Taiwan?

ABRAMOWITZ: I refer you to a lecture I recently gave at Harvard which covers this point. I said: “For me it was an exciting period, not only because Taiwan was my first time living in Asia, but also because there was still a deep exhilaration in public service – the sense, at least in East Asia, you were contributing to building something and you could see results. I was also the first generation of FSOs after the bloodletting of the State Department’s China experts – John Paton Davies, John Stewart Service, Oliver Edmund Clubb among others – and the focus on security during the Dulles years. There were enhanced security tests in general and a cautious atmosphere on anything to do with China. The atmosphere had eased somewhat when I joined the Department in 1960. In Taiwan you could pretty much speak your mind in private, but one had to be careful: we called Taiwan “China” and China “the Mainland”; public criticism of the Nationalist government was to be avoided, and consorting too much with the nascent and harassed Taiwan nationalist movement was “verboden.” It is remarkable to remember now Bob Scalapino then writing the famous “Scanlon report” – which advocated for “one China” and “One Taiwan.” Because it denied KMT sovereignty over China, it was pillories in Taiwan. Taiwan would love that situation today.”

ABRAMOWITZ: I stayed in Taipei until the middle of 1962, when I went to Taichung to our language school there. I got out the following year, having passed the course, although, as I said, I am not a great student. I don’t have a “good ear” which is particularly challenging when you are trying to learn a tonal language. I could read well; I never mastered writing. In any case, for the work that we were being trained for in Hong Kong, reading was the essential skill. In Hong Kong, I read Chinese newspapers all the time for my work.

Of course, there were people like Stapleton Roy. He and his brother David had been brought up in China and were almost bi-lingual. David taught at Harvard and later at Chicago. Stape, of course, became one the Department’s top experts on China and a superb FSO. The Gleysteen brothers were of the same background; sons of missionaries who were mostly bilingual. In fact, before the McCarthy era, it was the sons of American missionaries in China who were the backbone of the Department’s China expertise. After McCarthy, the Department still had some of this talent, but less and with a much lower profile.

The school tried to immerse you in Chinese. We were supposed to speak only Mandarin, but lapses were inevitable given the composition of the student body. I must say that the course was infinitely better than anything that I had taken at Harvard or Stanford, but it was not total immersion.

We studied Mandarin Chinese, the language used for official purposes. Mandarin has been so widely taught over the last 40 years, that one can get along in China using Mandarin exclusively. People still speak Cantonese or other Chinese languages, but most everyone except perhaps senior citizens, now communicate in Mandarin. At the time I took language training, that was not the case.

Mandarin then was not spoken widely on Taiwan. There Taiwanese, was mostly spoken; we could not use Mandarin and be understood by many.

James F. Leonard was born in Pennsylvania in 1920. He received a bachelor's degree from Princeton University and served in the U.S. Army from 1942-1946. Mr. Leonard entered the Foreign Service in 1948. His career included positions in China (Taiwan), France, Russia, and Syria. This interview was conducted by Warren Unna on March 10, 1993.

Q: You went on to Chinese language school and then Taipei after this, is that right?

LEONARD: Yes.

Q: Now, I'm curious on the Taipei part. I went out with Eisenhower on his last trip abroad, when he couldn't get to Japan because of the riots against the ...?

LEONARD: I was there then.

Q: You were in Taipei then? There everything was sweetness and light between Chiang Kai-shek and Eisenhower, and there was no Quemoy and Matsu ...?

LEONARD: Well, yes. Let's check. This would have been 1960?

Q: Yes, his last trip before he stepped out of office.

LEONARD: Yes. Things were fine at that point. They deteriorated very sharply a year or so later between us and Chiang Kai-shek. That is a more interesting story, but at the time that Eisenhower came, there were no problems, we were very friendly and supportive toward Chiang and the government there on Taiwan. We were fiercely determined to defend the offshore islands, Quemoy and Matsu. There had been a crisis that had got under way the summer of '58 and I was sent out there in the fall of '58 to the language school. It was going on. We, as students, were completely insulated from it. We didn't understand the gravity or lack of gravity of the whole situation. We knew we had made a massive deployment of the Seventh Fleet to the area. In fact the airbase near us in Taichung had had a lot of big airplanes deployed to it. I don't know if they were stationed there, but they were coming in and out a great deal, really as a measure of intimidation to make it clear to the Chinese on the mainland that we were not going to allow them to take the offshore islands. The way it was described to me by a friend who was in the Embassy was that we put these carriers on the east side of Taiwan and we put the aircraft from them flying up and down the straight very intensively and in a way which made it pretty clear to the government in Peking that they were going to be in real trouble with the United States if they pressed any attempt to take the islands. This was enough to cool them off and avert the crisis.

Q: I have some recollection of people here suspecting that Chiang Kai-shek was fomenting Quemoy/Matsu, provoking, trying to get the US more involved. This is not ...?

LEONARD: Well, that may relate more to the '61, '62 period, because what happened after 1960. The Great Leap Forward took place in 1958, and the Quemoy/Matsu was at the same time as that. But the Great Leap Forward had disastrous economic consequences on the mainland. The first year or so, it wasn't so apparent, and then by 1960, it had produced a massive famine. We knew that things were terrible on the mainland, there were a lot of ways that information came out through Hong Kong, etc. At that time I was in the Embassy and was following mainland affairs.

Q: You were in the ....

LEONARD: In the Political Section. Although we knew things were bad, we had no idea how bad it was. Millions of people literally starved to death in that artificially created famine which followed the Great Leap Forward. That inspired Chiang to think that maybe, maybe he had a chance to overthrow the regime and return to the mainland. He began talking to us about that, and he also began doing things on his own, sort of behind our back that made us very nervous. So what happened was that ... Averell Harriman had become the Assistant Secretary for the Far East ...

Q: In the Kennedy administration?

LEONARD: Kennedy by now, yes. This was early 1961. They replaced Eisenhower's Ambassador on Taiwan with Admiral Kirk, a personal friend of Averell Harriman. I don't know if you ever knew him, but Kirk had commanded the naval landings in Italy and in Normandy, and then was Ambassador to Brussels and Ambassador to Moscow, and then had retired. He was in his early 70s I think at that time. His son is my contemporary, Ambassador Roger Kirk. Harriman asked him if he wouldn't go there in order to ensure that the thing didn't get out of hand, because there was a lack of confidence. There was a feeling that Chiang Kai-shek had been pampered by the China lobby and might misunderstand what would be the American attitude toward an attempt on his part to recover the mainland, to launch any sort of armed action against the mainland. Therefore, Ambassador Kirk was sent out to talk very frankly to the "Gimo" (Chiang) and make sure that this was understood. I didn't go along on the conversations ...

Q: You were the Political Councilor ...?

LEONARD: No, I was not the Counselor, I was the number two or three in the section. I became the Counselor a little later. At this time I was not, so I didn't go along on those talks, in fact I don't know that anybody else was in the room when Ambassador Kirk would talk with the Gimo.

Q: Was Mrs. Chiang in the room?

LEONARD: I don't know that at all. Very clear messages were conveyed. In fact, Harriman himself at one point came out. The first time I ever had the pleasure of meeting him, I was sent out to the airport to capture him as he got off the plane, bring him into town. The State Department, and Kennedy personally I think, were all concerned that there might be some sort of dangerous action on the part of the Nationalists, but it didn't happen.

Q: Well, how did you people in the political section, who were not the Ambassador, not the Assistant Secretary back in Washington, react to this policy, when the end of the Eisenhower period and the beginning of Kennedy, did you feel the US had been naive, or was doing right with a difficult customer? How did you personally react to all this?

LEONARD: I think most of us were probably critical of the China lobby. We didn't like our Ambassador. He was a very difficult personality and that may have played a part in our attitude.

Q: This was before Kirk?

LEONARD: Yes. His name was Drumright. He was a very difficult and very conservative personality and most of us felt that there were a lot of things wrong with the way Taiwan was being run, economic as well as political. It changed very substantially over the subsequent years. Eventually, emerged into the sort of success story that it is today. And that all began more or less in that period. But at the beginning of the Kennedy period, we were all almost without exception in the Embassy exhilarated by the victory of Kennedy, and very pleased that there was somebody there who was not in any way a captive of this right wing Republican ideology on the China question.

Q: Now, and your language training was a good training in Taipei?

LEONARD: It was good. Chinese is a very difficult language, but I was very fortunate in going from the school where you got a smattering, a barely able to make out kind of level, to three years in the Embassy, with a good deal of chance to talk Chinese with the political people there, many of whom, outside of the Foreign Ministry of course, did not speak English, it was a good chance to get your language to a useful level.

Q: So by now, you'd had Russian and Chinese, Mandarin I guess?

LEONARD: Yes. The Russian was of course deteriorating rapidly.

Q: So now, you came back then and got into the INR was it?

LEONARD: That's right. I went right in to the INR in the Far Eastern Bureau.

Q: So you'd be watching China from Washington?

LEONARD: Yes. My first assignment was on the China desk, or whatever it was of INR. Then I moved more during the time I was in INR, I guess three years, '64 to '66, almost three years, two and a half anyway. I moved from that, the focus was pretty much on Vietnam because during that period we were engaging in the escalation in Vietnam and we had a whole series of intelligence estimates on what would be the consequences of various US actions, and I was often, not always but often, the US representative in those meetings over in CIA where these intelligence estimates would be turned out saying: "Suppose we bomb, suppose we do this, suppose we do that? What will be the consequences?"

Robert Drexler was born and raised in Milwaukee, Wisconsin. He received his Bachelor's degree from Harvard University before entering the Foreign Service in 1957. In 1975 he served as Deputy Chief of Mission in Bogota, Colombia. In addition to Colombia, he was posted to Malaysia, Hong Kong, and Geneva. Mr. Drexler was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1996.

Q: Great foreign policy issues: can you give us a view of that time, how we looked at the Soviet Union?

DREXLER: My view of the Soviet Union was colored by my Army service, because I was assigned to a regiment just across from the Czech border, at one of the gaps through which the Red Army was supposed to pass when it unleashed the Third World War. The US Army had a rather crude political training program for us. I forget what it was called. It involved young officers coming before the troops and impressing upon us the near and present danger of a Soviet attack, lest we spend too much time in the beer gardens and the museums, and not remember that the Soviets were just down the road, literally. And after a while this had a rather counterproductive effect, particularly on those of us who were college graduates and felt that the presentation was not really very effective. So, I think that colored my attitude toward the Soviet threat. My own parents were strongly opposed to Senator McCarthy, and all he stood for, the red scare and whatnot in Wisconsin, as were many. Because Milwaukee, where I came from, has always been a Democratic stronghold. It had a Socialist mayor for 25 years, though of course he didn't nationalize anything. I think I was probably on guard against the most extreme portrayals of the Soviet threat, for the reasons I've just described. But my interest really was more in Asia, and things Chinese. It had started at college, almost by accident. When Professor John Fairbanks was denied permission to go to Japan to teach a course or something by the Army, which felt that he was of dubious political allegiance, he stayed behind at Harvard, and with Professor Reischauer gave one of the pioneering courses in Asian history, which was very popular and celebrated, and which I took. And then I started Chinese language studies there. And of course at that time it was felt that the Korean War was Chinese in inspiration, and of course, it became Chinese in participation very quickly. And Asia and the Chinese were really my chief interest. And so while I was a little disappointed to go off in the other direction, I soon got back on the right track.

Q: I'm just curious, because I can't help but compare my own feeling. How did you feel, what were you getting from these courses you were taking, about Communist China. China fell in 1948, and we had non-relations until 1974. But when you came in, how did you feel about relations with China?

DREXLER: I had a very dark and dim view of China as a Communist state, and I was favorably inclined to the Nationalists at that time. I don't recall this ever really coming up in my college studies of China, because of course Fairbanks and Reischauer had to steer away from that sort of topic, but more important, their course was a backward-looking one, it was historical and cultural. I soon became caught up in this problem, though. I went to Barranquilla, stayed there about 18 months, and then came right back to Chinese language school. So I was back in FSI rather soon. And there we found people like John Stewart Service, people who had been purged from the China corps. Service, I remember, was studying German at that time. And there were others around like Service, such as John Paton Davies, Jr, and it was made clear to us that these were people with whom we should not associate. Perhaps I'm going too far ahead now, but I recall when we were in our Chinese language training, we had asked if we could meet with John Stewart Service, and hear about some of his experiences in China. And we were told this would require a special decision by the Dean of the school, who at that time was Harold Hoskins. The permission was denied. We were told we could not meet with John Stewart Service. He was still an officer, you know. So we were appalled by that, and were beginning to have fresh thoughts about the China problem.

We met with him secretly, in his flat, his apartment in Arlington, where we sat around and listened to him, enthralled by his account of his experiences. And I remember when we left, he said, "Good luck boys, but be careful." And we were careful, subsequently. For example, there was a meeting of the Association of Asian Studies, at a downtown hotel, around that time and Davies was there, with some of the other purged old-timers. And press photographers came around while we were talking to Davies. He said, "Boys, you don't want to have your photograph taken with me." And I'm ashamed to say we stepped aside. So, the atmosphere was really very bad. At that time Joe Bennett was the head of the Office of Chinese Affairs. He was a strong Nationalist Chinese sympathizer. His wife was the granddaughter of Liang Qi Qiao, an outstanding Chinese intellectual from the end of the dynastic period. And I remember that when we had meetings with Bennett as part of our training, and when we began to show some interest in Communist China, and some doubts about keeping them out of the UN, he lost his temper, and we were astonished by his reaction. I think then we, at least I, began to feel that excluding Peking from the United Nations was a bad idea, founded on emotional and other reasons that really didn't stand the scrutiny that I was able to bring to them, and such knowledge that I was able to acquire about China. Most of the people in my class felt the same way, but we learned that it was imperative that we keep our mouths shut about this. And indeed, I found myself later in my career having to give speeches arguing against Peking being seated in the UN, as year after year we fought the battle to keep them out until we gave up.

Q: So you came back for your Chinese language training. Could you explain how the Chinese study course was set up? We're talking about 1957?

DREXLER: This was 1958-59. Actually, I was at it for almost two years. Most of it was in Taichung where FSI language school was operated in a small town where no one spoke English, including the teachers, and that was the best part of it. It was preceded by about six months in Washington, where we began basic language training and an area studies course, which at that time was supervised by Harold Hinton, who later became a professor at G.W. -- a well respected authority in Asian studies and the China field. Nicholas Bodman, a very gifted linguist, was in charge of the language part. We had excellent teachers, who were all refugees from Nationalist China, and distinguished men, highly cultured Chinese from the old school. The course was very good, and we learned Chinese quite well by the time we got to the language school. And once there, of course, we really took off. The teachers were expert, the atmosphere, the climate was just perfect for that. The school had a very good reputation as far as the language abilities of its graduates was concerned. I make that point because, not to praise my own cohort, but to point out that in later years, particularly in the '70s, the graduates of the language school, which was then in Taipei, and then later in China itself, were not being turned out with a high enough language skill, according to the superiors for whom they worked, in their first assignments. But we had a very good operations. Howard Levy was the head of the school in Taichung at that time, and we had to fight off becoming too Chinese. We wore Chinese padded gowns in the winter, as it was quite cold in Taichung in the winter, and because that was the only clothing that you could get, and it was very warm. The student's wives got caught up in Chinese cooking, and we got caught up in Chinese art and calligraphy, and the poetry and so on. And we were in this very Chinese community. There was a very small American airbase near Taichung, and we were resented by the Americans there, as we were thought to be putting on airs. These were Americans who imported frozen Chinese Chungking Chicken from the States, and who used to talk about going into "Chinatown" to shop. And of course we were exposed to the Nationalist Chinese mindset. There we lived in special compounds, that were formally occupied by the Japanese overlords, beautiful old Japanese style houses. And we were taken to Taipei. We heard the Generalissimo speak. We couldn't understand him because of his thick dialect, but we saw old China there. And I like it. It's a beautiful island, and we associated with some very fine Chinese people, refugees, intellectuals, painters, and hundreds of generals and admirals who had come over and had nothing to do. Some of them were forced to take on menial tasks. I know a noodle seller who came by at night who was a colonel at one time, and we would frequently be invited to the homes of these people and see packing crates in the next room, which we learned not to ask about, because we realized they couldn't unpack politically, because they were just there temporarily and they were going to go back, even though by then seven or eight years passed. The island was still in a state of siege. We had to keep emergency rations for evacuation.

There was curfew, a differential for serving in a war zone; the shelling of Quemoy Island and that sort of thing. But I'm getting ahead of it, perhaps.

Q: When you got there, could you describe the group of your cohorts who were taking Chinese at the time, and also, how did you all view a career -- here you were with the huge country of China sitting there, in which we had no representation. How did you all view China, and taking Chinese as a career?

DREXLER: We were captivated by things Chinese. The culture is a powerful one, once you are exposed to it.

Q: By the way, were you married at this point?

DREXLER: No I wasn't. It is a powerful culture, universal in its scope, and it exerted a very strong attraction. As far as I know, none of the people who were with me then have ever stopped feeling this effect. When I started here in FSI, which at that time was in the basement, the converted garage, of what was then called Arlington Towers, there were just three of us in the class. And we became fast friends. You either did that, or you became fast enemies, because we were in this windowless room, hour after hour, month after month. When I got to Taichung, there were various levels of students there. There were about 30 students, some from State, some from CIA, some military, some CIA under military cover. There were about four classes, I guess, there, and we progressed through. The group that I was in, there were about eight or nine of us, and the senior officer was James Leonard, who went on to become an Ambassador and was head of the UN Association, and is still very active in Foreign Service affairs, and I worked with him later in the Arms Control Agency. He was our senior officer, and the only one who had a telephone. But we were not able to find out much information about Communist China, because all this was censored by the Nationalists. Our teachers, of course, were refugees, and some of them had left their family behind. But we had a Kuomintang, the National Chinese Party intelligence agent among our teachers, who was known to keep watch, not only on the other teachers, to be sure that they were politically correct, but I suppose to file reports on us, and any transgressions we might have. But for example, when Time Magazine put Mao's picture on the cover, they couldn't tear off the cover, but they have a Chinese character, meaning bandit, that was stamped right over his face. The Encyclopedia Britannica was pirated then, I bought a copy, and all sections on China referring to Communist China were whited out, otherwise it was a perfect, 24-volume edition. And the maps were changed to show the capital as Beiping, instead of Peking, or Beijing, as it became. So you couldn't learn anything about Communist China. We went to Hong Kong from time to time and were briefed at the Consulate General. And there, of course, is where the China watching took place. We could bring back books and things, but we had to keep them to ourselves, because our servants would be embarrassed, if they were Chinese texts, to be exposed to this. It would be like having a pornographic novel out when a Catholic priest comes to visit. You put these things away. So there was a strong pull, and we began to feel all the more strongly, as I think I was saying before, that the policy of isolating China was wrong. We became much more sympathetic to what was going on in China. On the one hand, the Taiwan scene was very good, but the Chinese there were building on the Japanese infrastructure. The railroad system, all the farmhouses were brick, electricity, sewage -- everything they built on that. But there had been a time, when the Nationalists first came, of great oppression. But by the time I arrived the island was prospering, so there was no suffering or wretchedness, and then there was also this dose of the old China, and the graciousness of the Chinese to us. But still we knew that what we thought was the real China was across the way, and our aspiration was to become involved in that. None of us especially wanted to be assigned to the embassy in Taipei. And the Ambassador was rather cold toward us. He was Everett Drumright. He paid very little attention to the school or to our studies. He never visited, and the only time we really heard from him was when we made a rather daring visit by plane to Quemoy Island, off the coast, on one of the days when the Communists were not shelling it. They did it on alternate days, it was a strange system.

Q: Also, if I recall, Drumright was what one could call an old China hand, but did not speak Chinese, is that right?

DREXLER: Yes, I don't believe he spoke Chinese.

Q: You had that dual core, of China hands that never spoke Chinese, who were not sympathetic at all to those who did.

DREXLER: That's right. We all aspired to Hong Kong as an assignment, but there were only so many places at the time when we graduated, so we were instead sent to what were called peripheral posts, around China, where there were overseas Chinese communities, and once you got such an assignment, you were able to study at FSI the dialect spoken there, and I was assigned to Singapore, so I had three or four months learning the Hokkien dialect, which was terribly difficult, but then at the last minute, the assignment was changed to Kuala Lumpur, where they speak Cantonese mostly, and I didn't have time to learn that. I became the first Chinese Affairs officer at the embassy there. And I was very frostily received, because Kuala Lumpur in those days was the Indonesian language officers' bailiwick. They had a tough language to learn, and few places to speak it. There was Jakarta, Surabaya, Medan, and then there was Kuala Lumpur. I was received at the airport by an Indonesian language political officer with whom I had to work. He said, "Welcome Bob, but frankly, we don't know why they sent you here." But actually Kuala Lumpur is mostly a Chinese city, and I developed contacts in the Chinese community to such an extent that the Police Special Branch complained to the Ambassador about it because they didn't want the US to start sympathizing with the Malaysian Chinese.

Q: You were there from when to when?

DREXLER: I got there in 1960 and left at the end of 1963.

Q: That was the Emergency?

DREXLER: The Emergency was officially over. The guerrillas, largely Chinese, were still up in the northern jungles. They were no longer killing people in the city, but you were not allowed to go up into the northern territories adjoining Thailand. This Communist insurgency had been mostly put down, and that was a remarkable success in those days. You know, when Americans were still trying to fathom how to deal with such guerrillas, the British showed how it could be done. They were successful. But there were circumstances in Malaysia that couldn't quite be duplicated elsewhere. At first I found myself at loose ends in our Embassy there, because as I said, people didn't welcome me, and they put me to work as visa officer again, which I objected to, because I hadn't learned Chinese to give visas there, and I asked to be reassigned to another post. And then they gave in, and made me the junior political officer in the Political Section, and that's when I began to work with the Chinese community.

Q: Who was the Ambassador?

DREXLER: When I first arrived, it was Homer Byington, who had largely a European professional background.

Q: Let's talk a bit about what you did. You had to sort of make a place for yourself as the Chinese language officer. How did you do that?

DREXLER: First of all, I established contacts with the local Chinese, which hadn't been done before. The country was governed by a coalition party, which was responsible for its independence, and still is in charge up to today, called the United Malay's National Organization. And it formed an alliance with parties representing the other two major communal groups, the Chinese and the Tamil Indians. The Tamil Indians were a small community descended from persons brought in to work in the tin mines, as were some of the Chinese. There was a Malayan Chinese association and a Malayan Indian association, part of the alliance. No one much bothered with the Indian association, which was a tiny party, but no one in the embassy had established a relationship either with the more important Malayan Chinese Association. So I did that for the first time. Actually, I called on the Indians too, but mainly got to know the Chinese leaders of that political party, which was part of the government coalition. There were also Chinese who were in opposition to the alliance. And particularly in the city of Penang, a coastal city on the Straits of Malacca, which is largely Chinese, an island. One of the local Chinese politicians there, Lin Chong Eu, had formed an opposition party, and I was the first embassy person to go up and talk to him. The government frowned on this sort of thing, but both of the Ambassadors encouraged me to do it, and they never tried to curb my activities. Of course, we just had chats with these people. It was the sort of contacts that are normal in posts around the world.

There were one or two occasions when I was asked to help the Central Intelligence Agency in Kuala Lumpur, because they didn't have any Chinese language officers either. They occasionally ran operations which required some knowledge of Chinese, and asked me to work with them on this, pledging not to tell my State Department superiors about it. So I did this, and helped them with a couple of operations, which they found useful. And I also had a Chinese lady as my assistant, who formerly worked with the Special Branch during the Emergency, doing press translations. There was a very large number of Chinese newspapers, locally as well as in Kuala Lumpur. And she had been working for some time before I got there, but nobody was paying attention to what she did, and her work production fell off, and she nearly left as well. My arrival, of course, delighted her, because she had at least one more reader, but also someone who was willing to work with her and see that her work focused on things of interest. So we revved up what I think was a very good Chinese press translation service, of documents that we circulated to the other political officers, and to the Ambassador, who were not getting it from anybody else. So this was important. I became pretty well established in the embassy, when they could see I could be of use to the CIA and to the other political officers. I could help out in the Consulate. USIA would sometimes ask for my help too; I would occasionally serve as an interpreter for the PAO. And of course friends always wanted you to take them to local Chinese restaurants and order the meal in Chinese, which was something I never learned to do, but tried to finesse. So I came to enjoy the post quite a lot.

Q: I assume you were looking for influence from Mainland China at that time. Did you find any?

DREXLER: No, not really. I found Nationalist influence. The government, of course, was very anticommunist, just having put down a communist rebellion. And the penalty for being found with a weapon was hanging. The Emergency was a terribly bloody affair, and the Communist Party was banned, and so on. There were no relations with Peking, of course, and there must have been a Nationalist Chinese Embassy, but I don't really remember it, or I certainly didn't have anything to do with it. My interest in the Chinese was as Malaysian Chinese, and how they were faring in their own country. The big question was Chinese education, the future of the language, the Malay's national language policy, these were the hot political issues; that the Malays were imposing their own language officially on the Chinese, forcing them to learn, Malay, English, which they did, and their own Chinese dialects at home, and sometimes Mandarin at school. Many of these young people were learning four languages. And the future of their schools, which were largely privately funded by the local communities, was jeopardized. And I was in touch with the Chinese School Teachers Federation, and I was following that. What we wanted to know was, was the country going to blow up. There have been cases where there were severe racial riots.

Q: One thinks of Indonesia. Amok is a Malay term.

DREXLER: In fact, it did not happen while I was there. Shortly thereafter, they had a terrible riot, with great loss of life. So my job was to keep my finger on that pulse. The Mainland - Nationalist thing did really not figure.

Q: How about the counter thing that was happening in Singapore and Lee Kuan Yew. Here was a real Chinese city and leader, who is around today?

DREXLER: He was regarded as a dangerous leftist, and 110% Chinese. Not in a Communist or Nationalist sense, but just too Chinese. He represented a great threat to the Malays in Kuala Lumpur. They had great qualms about bringing Singapore into the Federation, and they did so only in connection with North Borneo and Sarawak, which had a non-Chinese indigenous population, which they thought would help balance the Chinese. When they saw these Dayaks and former headhunters come into the Parliament for the first time on the day I was there, the Malays, I think, had their doubts whether this was really going to be the counterbalance that they had anticipated. But it didn't work with Singapore and Lee wanted it to. He was in tears when they broke up. But Singapore and Lee were just too Chinese, and at that time, Lee was regarded as a leftist. And of course some even thought he was a Communist. The DCM in Kuala Lumpur at that time thought that he was almost in the pay of the Chinese Communists. This was James O'Sullivan. But it was very easy to tar Chinese who resisted Malay dominance, to tar them with a Communist brush. I thought that was unfounded, that the connections did not exist.

Q: You were there when Kennedy, particularly Robert Kennedy came. And this tremendous emphasis on youth, a real arrogance. Can you talk about Robert Kennedy coming there?

DREXLER: He made a bad impression on me personally, though we awaited his arrival with a great deal of enthusiasm. I was there when his brother was assassinated, and scurrying around to find a condolence book and hanging the black streamer on our flag, and having our stationery edged in black, and attending an unforgettable requiem mass in the cathedral. We were all devastated. So Robert still had heroic proportions to us. But when he got there, his behavior -- well, you used a word I would find very apt -- his arrogance and his self absorption were so strong, that as he waltzed through the office and greeted us, not perfunctorily but, well, arrogantly, I can't improve on that -- the charm wore off very soon. He also was involved in mediating a quarrel between Indonesia and Malaysia, the "Confrontasi," the confrontation by Sukarno of the federation. Robert Kennedy thought that he could bring this mediation off quickly and prove his skills, his diplomatic abilities. And he made, I remember, demands on the communication system which we simply were not up to, and he was totally unrealistic and short tempered, and unforgiving when neither our embassy, nor Jakarta, nor Manila, where he went off to, was able to provide him with the backup which he felt he needed, and which I suppose he got in Washington with his entourage. So I think he left thinking badly of us, as we did of him. The one virtue of that experience was that shortly after his trip, a much more modern, sophisticated communications system was installed, which we all benefitted from, and which was probably overdue. He, of course, did not succeed in mediating this dispute, but made a lot of waves.

Q: Just to sort of wrap this up, as this Confrontasi was going on with Indonesia, were people in the embassy taking sides on this?

DREXLER: We were hostile to the Indonesians. We didn't like Sukarno at that time, and we, among the younger officers there was dislike of the American Ambassador in Jakarta, Howard Jones, who was sometimes called Sukarno's court jester; that's how we viewed him. And of course it was Jones and his country against Baldwin and our country. And in true foreign service fashion, we identified with our host country on this. And of course Sukarno and the Indonesians were easy to identify against. There was poor little Malaysia, a democratic country. And we admired the Tunku, the leader, the prime minister, very much. So we were all for them. I remember when the crowds charged right past my apartment to go to burn the Indonesian embassy, which was just three blocks away, I didn't mind at all. No one was hurt, but we thought they were getting what they deserved. The Indonesian Ambassador and his entourage were all military men and made it clear that they looked down on the Malays. They also felt that the Malays were handed their independence by the British, unlike the Indonesians, who had to fight a bloody war against the Dutch.

Q: What was your impression of Tunku Abdul Rahman?

DREXLER: He was a prince, literally, and also in character. He played an indispensable role at that time. He was the royal line of the House of Kedah. At that time, as now, the Federation of Malay States, which had been formed by the British, of course, had I think nine, or at least seven sultanates. The Sultan of Johore, for example, was well known and even had his own army. These were people who had the almost slavish allegiance of their Malay citizens, who were loyal to their Sultans before anything else. And Malaya, when it became independent, had a king, who served for four years, who was elected by these Sultans, and the role of king passed from one to the other. So the Sultans were very important. They were the cultural, and religious leaders of their sultanates, their states, as we called them then. Kedah was one of these. So the Tunku came from an aristocracy that played an important role. He was English educated, he was trained as a lawyer, he spoke English fluently. And he was a democrat, basically, despite his aristocratic background. By the time I got there he was already on top of the political situation, so I can't really account for his rise. But I certainly witnessed the hold he had. And most important, the Chinese trusted him, and that was vital. They did not trust his deputy, Razak, who succeeded him, who was regarded like most Malays, as basically anti-Chinese. But the Tunku, by his previous political career, by his friendships and his demeanor and conduct, won the confidence of the Chinese, and of course the Indians too. So this was vital. There was no one else like him, no one else near him. So the great fear was that he might die, he might have a heart attack or something, and then what would happen? Of course, he was lucky that he was working with a very enlightened colonial government, the British, at a time when they realized they had to let go. So the transition and the relationship during the transition with the former colonial masters was ideal, very smooth, to the extent that many Brits were kept on after Independence -- the Chief of the Supreme Court, the top military commander -- to ease the transition until the Malays could work their way up. That showed how relaxed both sides were. It's impossible to think of the Dutch staying on as head of the Indonesian Supreme Court under Sukarno. But this is what happened in Malaysia. And then of course they both had put down the Communist insurgents during the Emergency. This of course was a terrible experience for the Chinese community. But by the time of independence, it had been put down. The Chinese Communist guerrillas had clearly lost, order had been restored, and the Chinese community in the cities wanted to get on with their lives, educate their children, make money, be secure, and so on. They realized that the pro-Peking communists had no future. They were beaten and they didn't really have to worry about them. So they got over the Emergency experience fairly quickly. I think the one mistake, perhaps, and Ambassador Baldwin cautioned the Tunku against this, was adopting Malay as the national language, rather than English. We said, why not English? After all, it's not the language of either of the three major communities, yet the leaders of all three know it. It's an international language, and so on. But the Malays couldn't have it.

Q: Why don't we stop at this point. I want to put down here -- where did you go after this? You left in 1963...

DREXLER: I came back to the State Department, to the Bureau of Intelligence and Research, and I was the analyst following China's activities in Africa.

***

Q: Today is March 11, 1996. Please continue.

DREXLER: From 1963 to the end of 1966, I was in INR, working for Alan Whiting. By that time, I would say that the China corps had been reconstituted. The purged victims from the McCarthy era were gone. There were a few old China hands left, but not many. And by that time, by the mid-'60s there were a number of officers, China specialists, approaching senior rank, and the mid-career group, that I was in. The Chinese language school in Taichung had been quite successful in turning out a new corps. And these people were becoming more confident, I guess, and attention was being paid to them. And of course our loyalty was not in question, because most of us had been school boys at the time China was lost.

It was also at this time that the techniques of China watching were perfected. This is largely the accomplishment of Alan Whiting, for whom I went to work. He had a university background, and was celebrated as the author of a book, "China Crosses the Yalu," which was a study of how the Chinese had signaled us that they were likely to intervene if we moved closer to their borders, how we misread, or ignored, or misunderstood these signals. And this technique of careful scrutiny of Chinese public statements, editorials, and handling of the news, and so on, was really the essence of China watching. And it was the only means we had to find out what was going on in a closed society. And the China watchers that Alan Whiting trained got so good that after a few years, those who worked in Hong Kong would be visited by diplomats -- the British, the Dutch, the Norwegians -- who were in Peking, who would come down to talk to the American China watchers in Hong Kong to find out what we thought was going on. We often knew better than they, I think. So Whiting trained us all, and he had a great influence through his writings and techniques, even on those who didn't work for him directly. At that time the INR office was called the Office of Sino-Soviet Affairs, which even by that time was an anomaly, because the split between China and the Soviet Union was so profound, there was no reason anymore for lumping the analysts together. But it went on that way for some time. And even as much as five or six years later I would still run into people -- political figures, congressmen -- who would question if there really was a split between Peking and Moscow. If there wasn't instead really a devious plot to make us lower our guard. And so there in INR I sat in a cubicle right next to a Soviet specialist, who was also working on Africa. As time went on, it was clear that our focuses were quite different, and far apart.

Q: Before we move on, can you explain a bit about what the techniques were; how Whiting was training you?

DREXLER: What we focused on, actually, the only source material we had from China, were the public statements that the Chinese made to their own people, and for foreign consumption. Foreign Ministry statements in the latter case, and daily editorials in the former, although People's Daily editorials could touch on foreign affairs. So you kept careful record of these pronouncements, and you assumed, and I think Whiting is correct in having concluded some years before, that these statements were drafted painstakingly, with great care, down to the choice of adjective and adverb, that there was no carelessness. And very often, the more important the statement was, the more likely it was that it represented the outcome of a high party meeting, and that what you saw in the papers might have been the result of extensive debate, the consideration and rejection of many drafts, and you were able, by keeping careful record, to compare statements in People's Daily on a certain topic, or on a certain occasion -- anniversaries, of course, were vigorously observed year after year -- with its predecessors on the previous years, or on a previous subject, and note differences if certain formulas were missing. Formulas, for example, which might have identified political campaigns. You could conclude that this omission was not by accident. The writer didn't forget it; that this reflected a decision to put less emphasis on that particular campaign. You also paid careful attention to the order in which officials were named, because the hierarchy, which was quite complex in the party, the standing of individuals and any trends in the leadership, could often be detected from the turnout on occasions, and from who was standing next to Mao this year, and we would check to see where an official was placed on this occasion last year, and a great deal of information could be obtained this way. We were also occasionally successful in getting documents from China that were not meant for foreign consumption, or public consumption. And later, when I was in Hong Kong, I had charge of a unit that was responsible for getting these materials, and paying for them, actually. There was a brisk trade in them. Some of them were real, some of them were not real, as you might expect. The Japanese were among our chief competitors, and had at least as much money as we did.

To take a crude example of our China-watching technique, if People's Daily editorial warned the United States that if Washington took a certain step, it would be viewed with "concern" by the people of China and then a subsequent statement on this subject injected the word "grave" concern, this was not a slip, or just the result of a writer's use of a thesaurus. This meant a shift in emphasis, a growing concern. Using Whiting's book, and the warning statements that the Chinese put out before intervening in Korea, and we also had the statements they put out before attacking India in the '60s, we compiled almost a glossary of such warning statements. And I remember that one of the most extreme warnings, almost signaling military action on China's part, was the phrase, "Rein in your horses on the brink of the precipice." When you saw that phrase, it was a sign that something serious was probably going to happen; that military action was imminent, and on occasion in the '60s, we did see such a phrase, aimed again at the Indians, and we were, if not alarmed, quite concerned about it. So that was the basic technique of analysis.

Q: Was this Chinese Chinese, or Chinese Communist? It sounds a bit like criminology. What was the genesis in China of this? Was it Communist or a Chinese manifestation?

DREXLER: No, it was Communist. It did not exist under the Nationalists, or before that time. It was a symptom of the regime's determination to indoctrinate the public thoroughly. The Chinese, on the whole, even today, even in the villages, are much more interested in politics and political questions, than say, farmers in Wisconsin or Idaho would be nowadays, because this was required by their local units, which went down to the neighborhood or farmhouse level. The regime had an intent and a felt need to inculcate the whole population with its line, and it had to use the press and to some extent, the radio, for this. There was nothing else. The regime, of course, was also bent on the most radical social, political, and economic reform programs, and they were controversial. They involved the regimentation of the life of the people to a great degree. So there was a need for information to go out in great detail. And sometimes we were able to see provincial newspapers, or how a provincial government handled a pronouncement from Peking. That could also be revealing, of course. So this system of indoctrination was, I think, more highly developed in Communist China than in the Soviet Union.

Q: A little bit sounds like it might have reflected the Mandarin establishment in a way. A much stronger hierarchy in China, as opposed to the Russian one.

DREXLER: Yes, that's true. When the system worked it did work that way. But of course the Mandarin system had broken down by the start of this century. There was a great deal of chaos and disorder, and of course the warlord period as well. But it's true that the Chinese, and in the Confucian system, were amenable to this sort of highly structured hierarchical approach to their lives.

Q: Was it clear in 1963, when you arrived there, that China and the Soviet Union were really apart?

DREXLER: There was no doubt in our minds about that in INR. And then of course it became more pronounced in 1964, 65, and later. This was part of a basic change in the attitude of the China specialist toward their problem. It was a sort of revisionism. First of all, we saw that there was not a Sino-Soviet bloc. China was different and separate. Then we also began to conclude that China was basically weak, vulnerable, defensive, and reactive in its foreign relations. When I was first given the chance of the assignment of following China in Africa, there was great alarm that the Chinese were going to move in take it over. This was the time of the African decolonization, there were new, vulnerable, naive countries there, and Zhou En-lai had made a visit during which he famously said Africa is ripe for revolution. And there was one other occasion, almost as famous: I think he was in Mali, and was quoted as looking at the wide open spaces there, and said something about how you have so much room here, and we're so crowded. Which of course led to the feeling that maybe there were 10 million Chinese on their way to Africa, which was ridiculous because at that time the regime couldn't get people to move from the eastern part of China to the west, to say nothing of going to Mali. So I found that this was exaggerated. But then the Vietnam War escalated, and I was put on the Vietnam problem, and my job in INR was to monitor the Chinese aid and assistance to Vietnam, and of course to try to give the signal if it appeared that China was going to intervene in the conflict, as it had done in Korea.

There again, we came to the conclusion that China was not behind the Vietnam War. North Vietnam was not China's proxy, as Dean Rusk was convinced. And we said this in our reports. The office I was in was also responsible for monitoring North Vietnam, with Dorothy Avery, our first-class Vietnam analyst. And we sent in reports showing that the bombing of North Vietnam was not breaking morale, contrary to what the Administration thought or expected. We also had an officer with us, Frank Corey, who analyzed the Tonkin Gulf incident, based on communications and signals intelligence, and wrote the memo a few weeks after the incident, which concluded that it had not taken place as the Administration claimed, or reported. It is now widely accepted that it did not in fact, but it was Frank Corey, arriving at this conclusion from communications intelligence just weeks after it took place. He put this in a memo and it went forward, but of course God knows what the effect was. Well, we know what the effect was, namely nothing. It was ignored. For me then to read McNamara's latest book In Retrospect, particularly the passage in which he says that part of the reason that they made so many errors was that the government, and I suppose he meant the State Department, did not have the expertise in China or in North Vietnam that it should have -- this is rubbish. Those experts were there. I was working among them to a certain extent. I was among them. And we published memos regularly, but they were disregarded.

I remember particularly occasions when Alan Whiting would run into the office and tell us that George Ball, who was our hero in those days, had a meeting at the White House in the afternoon at 3 o'clock. We should immediately crank out a memo with the latest intelligence. We fed to George Ball throughout this period intelligence which supported, and confirmed in his own mind his ideas about the Vietnam War, its current course, and how it should go. But there again, all to no avail. So, as I said, McNamara is quite wrong in that judgment.

But also at this time, ideas arose which I think have damaged the China specialist corps, especially the idea that the threat from China has been exaggerated, that the Chinese are basically defensive, reactive, and that they are weak. From that you go on to the thought that the Communist revolution in China was probably not so bad for China after all. That it was probably basically a good thing. And here we see the influence of John Fairbank, under whom I first studied, and who influenced most of the China specialists at that time. He was a professor at Harvard, and the pioneer, the dean of American China specialists in the academic world. And he had the most profound influence on us. He shaped our view that while Mao was a despot and an extremist, and his half-baked schemes had caused suffering, there was another side: the good that had done for China. The great famines, the floods, the horrors of the pre-Communist period were no longer being visited upon China. There were the barefoot doctors bringing at least some medical care to places that had never had it for a century or more. Roads and railroads were being built. The country was being held together again. Education again was being advanced. And there I see the genesis of a rather soft, almost apologetic line toward China, which has continued, and which I think characterizes the majority of China specialists even today. This was very pronounced during the Bush Administration, and still is now under the Clinton Administration. I am one of the few, I suppose, who finally broke with that view, and as I can describe later, it cost me an assignment in Peking, because of this policy difference. But there was the beginning of this idea.

Now, it was also during this period when I was in INR that the Chinese became a nuclear weapons state. They exploded their first nuclear device in Lop Nor. And that caused a good deal of alarm and consternation. We were wondering if they were going to proliferate weapons to Pakistan and Africa, and who knows where. I became interested in arms control, and I went over to the Arms Control Agency, which was still brand new. It had its original director, William Foster, and original cast of characters. I offered my services, so to speak. They had no Asia specialist, to say nothing of China specialists, on the staff. At that time, and for many years after, the arms control field in the US government, and certainly in State and ACDA, was dominated by European specialists and experts, and properly and understandably so. But this continued for much too long. In fact, it's only been in the past 8-10 years, where even on the academic side, you have attention to Asian arms control problems. This is quite recent, and long overdue, and I think we've paid a price for it. But anyway, they took me on.

Q: So when did you leave INR?

DREXLER: I left at the end of 1966. I was in ACDA for 1967-68.

Q: I want to stick to INR for a little while. Did you find a divergence of view about the relationship, with the Soviet people as to how they looked at things, the relationship, and where things were going?

DREXLER: Although we were quartered in the same room, and I had a Soviet specialist as a neighbor in the next cubicle, there was no operational or substantive sharing. Hal Sonnenfeldt was the head of the Soviet part of the INR Sino-Soviet unit. There was another officer there, whose name I can't remember. But Sonnenfeldt was the star, the hard-driving Soviet specialist. We had very little to do with them. Indeed, it was not until the incidents in the late 1960s, early 1970s, the Sino-Soviet border clashes, that we really got together closely and were matching notes. So we were looking in opposite directions.

Q: But here you had a Vietnam War, which was considered all during the war, that the Soviets and the Chinese were as close together as lips and teeth in so far as they were supporting the war. And yet, the Chinese specialists, of which you were one, were reporting out that the Chinese really aren't too supportive of this war.

DREXLER: The Chinese were not behind it. They supported the Vietnamese, but if I understand correctly, Dean Rusk's idea was that the North Vietnamese were a Chinese proxy for Peking's own imperialist designs over Southeast Asia; this was a proxy war on behalf of Peking, which we in INR were convinced was not true.

Q: With this attitude, did you find you were in divergence -- obviously you found you were in divergence with the Secretary of State, but how about with the CIA, or the ISA of the Pentagon?

DREXLER: We had a close working relationship with the CIA then, as I did later in Hong Kong, and later in the East Asian bureau. The problem was that the CIA faced the same limitations we did. It had no good sources of information. There were no defectors, there were no moles that were planted there in China. There was, during the first time I was in INR, the first Chinese defector to the US, and the only one that I know of in this period, who came out of Africa. And I remember interviewing him in a CIA safehouse in Arlington somewhere. We, INR and CIA, were playing the same game, working with the same material. This was not a situation in which the CIA people would come up with some hot information, or hot scoops. So the differences were perhaps over interpretation of the same People's Daily editorial. You had their China specialists and our's and we would put out these reports, and National Intelligence Estimates, chewing over the same stuff. This has been the case for a very long time. This was in the age before satellites. Later, the satellite program was quite helpful, although not greatly. As for the military, we had a rather low opinion of the analytical abilities of the Defense Intelligence Agency. They seemed to emphasize quantity over quality. They, like us, were poring over the same sort of stuff. So for a People's Daily editorial, you had the INR interpretation, the CIA, and the DIA. The DIA one was one that we, I'm afraid, looked down on. And the level of writing, the level of analysis, was so obviously inferior, that the DIA product was usually discounted. We occasionally ran into problems with DIA representatives in making estimates about whether the Chinese were likely to take some military action. We had, at that time, a Watch Committee which put out a weekly statement for the President and the top Cabinet members in the foreign policy area, of the likelihood of hostilities anywhere in the world, and this was a joint product. You had to have an agreement, or if you didn't, you had to have a footnote showing dissents. The DIA consistently put in footnotes to cover themselves. They always highlighted the worst possible scenario and then signed off. So they lost credibility.

Q: It was a CIA, cover your ass: Everything is fine, except, however, there's always a possibility that the Soviets may strike immediately, or something to that nature.

DREXLER: That's right. That's a very good point you make -- the stringing together of qualifying words, "may...probably" was a favorite technique for DIA. So that you got so many conditional phrases that by the time you got to the verb, it could mean anything. The CIA and of course INR language was much more tightly controlled and defined. And we had a superb wordsmith, Allen Evans, a remarkable man, for whom I had great respect, who was in the Front Office in INR in those days and subjected all of our written product to the most careful scrutiny. I think he was English in background and education, and he read our reports as if they were legal documents, so that every word was counted, and we had to choose our words that way because he would just kick the stuff back if it wasn't of that caliber. But there was no one in DIA who seemed even interested in doing this. And later I can describe some instances during the crisis when President Park in Korea was assassinated when we got into real trouble because of DIA.

Q: Were you and the CIA in divergence on where things were going?

DREXLER: No, not at that time. Indeed, I can think of only one period, and that was in the late 1970s, where we had a basic difference over the status of Deng Xiaoping. Otherwise, the agreement was pretty close. We knew the fellows there; they knew us. They had an advantage in that they stayed in their jobs. You could have a man following Africa, China in Africa, 5-8 years at a time, whereas none of the Foreign Services officers were in an INR slot for more than 2-3 years. So they had an advantage of continuity. We did have still in INR, at that time, a few old timers, Civil Service employees like Rhea Blue, who had not been RIFed. INR had been drastically cut back in the early 1960s, and had lost a lot of people like the ones I described in the CIA, who had long exposure, long continuity, and institutional memories. But there were a few left. Rhea Blue was one of these. She was a specialist on the Himalayan border area. But we thought what we lacked in continuity we could match with brain power. CIA wouldn't agree, of course, but we thought we didn't do such a bad job.

Q: What was your impression -- if you were coming up with rather a different analysis than the Secretary of State one, what was your relationship with the Vietnam working groups, who were dealing with this, and also the role in INR in State policy at that time?

DREXLER: Well, we had in INR at that time a terrific esprit de corps. And part of it was a reflection of the head of INR, who was Tom Hughes, who went on of course, to head the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, a well-known think tank in this area. He had a half hour every morning with the Secretary, which was very important. Typically, a analyst would have a week-long duty, you would get up about 3:45 a.m., get to the Department at 4:30 a.m., and be confronted with the evening's take -- enormous stacks of material. And if you, like in my case for example, were the briefer that day for East Asia, you had to cover everything from Tasmania to North Korea. It was all there, dumped on your desk. You had to go through it, select things that were worthy of being brought to Hughes's attention, you typed them up on old manual machines that often needed a ribbon or which broke down, with your comment on the event. And then, it was a very stressful thing, because as you were doing this, more and more stuff came in up to the deadline, which I think was about 7:30 a.m., and we all went in then, and sat around with Tom Hughes, who would come in, cool and collected, and look over what we had written. He'd ask us questions about this, and you would have to have the answers, which was, as I say, quite demanding, because you might be a China specialist, but you were trying to analyze something that happened in Indonesia, let's say, or North Korea. So we did fairly well. There was no opportunity, by the way, to call anybody at that hour. You were there on your own, this was understood. So Tom would gather all this stuff together, underline this for the Secretary, that not, and then would dash off -- literally run down the hall. So we knew we were getting through to the Secretary. I was, as a junior officer. Of course, naturally we were disappointed that some of our views were not accepted, but I have to say at that time -- now we're talking about the mid-'60s -- the prospect of collapse in Vietnam was not there. We did not see this. The concerns about the military situation, which later became so grave, were not so then. We did not have a sense at that time of a tremendous struggle within the Administration. We knew that Ball had his own ideas, and as I said, we fed him things. But we were not privy to what was actually going on in the NSC or in the White House. And so we were doing our job, we were feeding in material, we knew it was getting to the Secretary, we knew it was getting to Ball. But we didn't have a high degree of frustration that it wasn't changing policy, because I don't think we felt at that time that there was a need to get out of Vietnam, for example. We were not at that point yet.

Q: Although you were focused on Vietnam at that time, what was happening in China? Was this the time of the Great Leap Forward?

DREXLER: It was the beginning of the Cultural Revolution, just the beginning. The Great Leap Forward and its damage were past. The Cultural Revolution was taking shape, and we were trying to understand it and to come to terms with it. We had a basic shortage of information on the state of the economy, which was very hard to come by. These were state secrets. We followed, in a fascinated way, the beginning of Mao's purge of Liu Shao-chi, and the people around him, the so-called Capitalist Roaders. And we gave day-by-day reports of the state of play as we could see it. But that was about it. It was almost an academic exercise. There was no sense, I think then, that what was happening within China had any important implications for US policy because we could not detect any debate within China over Vietnam. We knew the Chinese were supporting it; I was monitoring the surface-to-air missiles that China sent in, and where they were being placed in North Vietnam, and so on. But that was about it.

Q: The Great Leap Forward was over, but the damage to that -- was that apparent?

DREXLER: No, we didn't really know at that time how severe the economic consequences were because we didn't have the data, the information. We didn't have travelers' reports either. We tried everything. We had a program of -- I can't say even now where this took place exactly -- but in which we examined correspondence coming from China, between private people. That was opened, looked at, translated, and circulated for the benefit of our China watchers. The radio stations were monitored by FBIS. All of the Chinese language stuff was translated and published in Hong Kong. We were buying documents, we were using the stuff we got from Tibet, leaving no stone unturned. Of course, we were also talking to diplomats from friendly countries who were in Peking. But they were really very much in the dark. It was a very tough business. Of course, we were constantly in touch with academic specialists who faced the same problem. In those years, all of the good books available on modern China would only fill one shelf. Now of course, they would fill a room. We knew what was being put out. The China Quarterly was the leading publication for China specialists at that time. We were in touch with the leading academicians, and they with us. But still there was a great unknown there.

Q: You mentioned that later you felt that John Fairbank's view was somewhat pernicious. Did you feel that at the time, or was this a growing unease?

DREXLER: No, I had great respect for him. He was my professor, after all, and his prestige was unchallenged in the field. Indeed, it was only in one of his last books, shortly before he died, that he recognized and acknowledged this himself. But you see, it was a case of the pendulum swinging too far. We were revising a view of China held by ignorant, right-wing extremists in this country, totally at variance with the facts, and which was linked up with the old Yellow Peril ideas, and God knows what all. People were still smarting from our defeat in Korea, at the hands of Chinese forces, and all of that. So, Fairbanks was certainly correct in trying to argue and disabuse people of those ideas which were really pernicious at that time. And I think now no one contests that, and that he was right at that time. I should say that the view I just expressed to you now about Fairbanks and what I think is the excessively soft line, is a minority view, and you will get most China specialists taking issue with me on that.

Q: One thing before we move to ACDA: Watching China in Africa during this time. There was a lot of attention in Africa at this time. These were new countries coming up, and we knew the names of Sekou Toure and Kwame Nkrumah, etc., etc. Today Africa doesn't raise much of a blip on our radar. And China was certainly a very new player in there, as was the Soviet Union. Did you find that you were up against people who were concerned that China was going to do a lot more in Africa at that time?

DREXLER: As you say, Africa loomed very important at that time, it was a cockpit of the Cold War. Also, there was a feeling that there were places in Africa that had mineral wealth, uranium, oil, that was important to us strategically or could be very important if it fell into Communist hands. So there was a great deal of concern about that, especially after Zhou En-lai's trip. But the Chinese also became, or tried to be, champions of the non-aligned and the Bandung movement, to which the Africans were very receptive. And it involved, of course, the exclusion of the Soviets, as well as the Americans. So it was kind of a third force, and it had great resonance in Africa at that time. And the Chinese were very good at cultivating these people. So while American officials had an exaggerated view of the potential there for China to sow trouble for us, there was certainly grounds for some concern at that time. It was not wholly exaggerated. The Chinese had a small aid program, but it was sharply focused. They had excellent language training programs. It was taken for granted that when the Chinese Ambassador stepped off the plane no matter where in Africa, he spoke the local African language. I'm not talking about French, say, but the local language very well. And also the Chinese example of Maoism appealed to the Africans in a way that Soviet Communism did not. Like the new African nations, China was a poor country, victim of colonialism, in a way, pulling itself up by its own bootstraps, fighting off imperialism, so there was real resonance.

Q: There's a racial thing there too, because the Soviets were white and the Chinese were not white.

DREXLER: When I finally got a defector -- the only one I told you I can remember, from the Chinese embassy in Africa -- and I went to talk to him, I asked him, "What did you feel about the Africans?" He said "We looked down on them, we despised them racially." But he said, "Naturally, of course, this was never made apparent to the Africans, but we had the strong Chinese racial prejudice against blacks." But what you said before is true. They were colored, and the Chinese tried to capitalize on this.

Q: Did you find that as INR was so downplaying the long-range influence of the Chinese, where there were others in the government saying you don't understand?

DREXLER: I think not. There was very little expertise on this subject, and it was not so difficult for us to get our more moderate views accepted by officials in Washington. And the interest in the Chinese in Africa flagged rather quickly, and of course in part it was because we had other things to worry about, especially Vietnam.

Q: Also, in interviewing people who served in Africa at various times, one of the remarks would be, "Well, the Chinese had a large mission there. God knows what they were doing." Very seldom was there any real concern about what the Chinese were up to. They seemed to be kind of there, but really an alien...

DREXLER: There is one thing I should mention, and that's the question of Chinese representation in the United Nations. We were, the Administration was determined, of course, to block Peking's admission, and to retain the Nationalist seat in the Security Council and elsewhere. Of course, the African countries were numerous, and they all had votes in the United Nations when they entered. For the Chinese, just to get an embassy there, to get recognition, was important, if not so much as to what happened in Niger or Mali, but at the U.N., because that was one more vote. And of course we know how the momentum built up and what the trend was. We could see that time was not on our side. And the Nationalists at that time did not have the money that they since used in some small countries to buy back recognition, and they had to rely on us. So we fought the Chinese U.N. representation battle in the African theater also. The Chinese communists made some gains there.

Q: Again, I want to keep tapping this one thing. In the China INR side; the Sino side of this, in your hearts of hearts, what was the feeling toward recognition of Communist China by the United States at that time?

DREXLER: As I recall, I personally had no trouble with the idea that Communist China should be kept out of the United Nations. And as I recall, none of my colleagues, senior or my peers, did either. We accepted that policy. Not frequently, but I often had to talk and brief groups and make speeches on this subject, and to defend the Administration's policy. And at that time I didn't have any trouble with it. I won't say that it came later, because throughout my career and to this very day I've taken a rather hard-line attitude toward Communist China. I'm not saying that I believe they should now be out of the U.N., certainly not, but I didn't have any difficulty with that in the 1960s. Maybe the fact that I feel that others didn't either is more a reflection of my own views than anything else.

Q: Why would the Italians or the Germans -- was it just that they wanted to sell equipment off around? What would be their interest in resisting the Treaty?

DREXLER: The Germans, and to some extent the Italians, saw the Nonproliferation Treaty as a means by which the Soviet Union was denying them the right to acquire nuclear weapons. And whether or not they actually had an interest in acquiring such weaponry, they felt that for giving this up, and thus meeting the Soviet foreign policy objective, they required compensation, either in the form of more liberal restrictions on their use of nuclear energy for peaceful purposes, or in the form of limits on the Soviets. Our ambassadors sympathized with these views, to the extent that we in ACDA felt that the Administration's policy and positions were not being faithfully portrayed and put forth to the host country governments. I recall one occasion where we had to use the Norwegians, either in Bonn or in Rome, I forget, to make sure that the substance of what we were after was conveyed. This came as a great shock to me. We ran into the same opposition in the EUR Bureau, under George Springsteen. And I witnessed fierce battles between ACDA and the EUR Bureau over the treaty. Most of the ACDA personnel at the negotiations were ACDA career employees. I was one of the few State Department Foreign Service people detailed there. So I felt more than embarrassed; I was dismayed and disturbed by the way my colleagues in the State Department handled this very important foreign policy project. But we prevailed with great difficulty, with our allies, and with even greater difficulty with the Soviets, and finally tabled a joint treaty. It was signed and ratified. We were all invited to the signing ceremony at the White House, which is one of the high points in my diplomatic career.

There was an Asian China twist to it, which I want to tell you about, because it's not very well known, and recorded nowhere, but is of some interest. The basic treaty languages were Russian and English, and once the treaty was approved by the UN, endorsed by resolution and in final form, there was a mechanical task making its text conform in the other languages of the UN, namely Spanish, French, and Chinese. I worked on the Spanish translation, first of all, to be sure that it conformed. Then something happened to the head of the Department's Chinese language unit in Language Services, so he was not available to work on the Chinese text, and they sent me to the UN in New York instead to do this. We did not work from scratch, of course, but rather, as in the cases of the other languages, like the Spanish, from a basic text done by the UN interpreters. But the treaty text was highly technical, and the translators at the UN in Chinese, as well as Spanish, did not have this background or expertise. And so, we had to do a lot of work on the basic draft that they gave us. My opposite number from the Soviet Embassy, was Igor Rogochov, whom I encountered later in Moscow, and who is now Russia's Ambassador to China. We worked together on this Chinese text. Now, of course, for me the sensible thing would have been to have someone from the Chinese UN mission with me, but this was the Nationalists; the Soviets would not allow them into the room, or even into the same general area where we were working. So when we came to a point in the treaty text where there had to be a change, I would have to leave the room, call the Chinese Mission on the phone, and tell them what the new phrase was. And the first question to me always was, "Did you suggest this, or did the Russians suggest this?" Because they were convinced that if the Russians suggested it, there was something devious there, and that the Russians were bent on putting something in the Chinese version, which would be more binding or tougher on China than, say, for the other parties. And so we labored at this for several days. We were helped by the fact that the technical terminology was already available to us in the Charter and Annexes that set up the International Atomic Energy Agency. The Chinese definition of fissionable materiel and safeguards was already there in the IAEA context, accepted in usage, and so we used that. We were also able to draw on language from the Chinese version of the United Nations Charter, and there we discovered a problem in the text where the Nonproliferation Treaty has a preamble which refers to some of the objectives in the UN Charter. One of them pertains to the use of force, or the non-use of force, rather. We discovered that the Chinese translation of the UN Charter, which had been on the books for 15-20 years, was wrong, and had been incorrectly translated. Nonetheless, we were supposed to quote this passage in the preamble to the treaty. So we were faced with the question of do you quote the Charter language verbatim, even though it's wrong, or do you correct the Charter language when you quote it in the treaty? Well, we made the correction, and we put it in right, and never said anything about it one way or the other. And to my knowledge, the Chinese translation of the UN Charter still has this defect. The Chinese Mission, the Nationalists, later told me that -- well, they signed it, they ratified the treaty, so our translation wasn't all that bad. There were some passages that they felt didn't flow quite right, but by and large it was not such a bad job under the circumstances. The State Department gave me as my reward, a copy of the Chinese treaty text, one of very few, of the version that was used for signing, beautifully printed, on heavy paper, which I still have, as my memento of all that work.

Q: You were still not a senior officer at this time, a mid-career officer. Did you make any attempts to do something about the non-support within the State Department, particularly the EUR Bureau, of getting our Ambassadors to support this, or not?

DREXLER: No, I didn't. We aimed at the objective, which was to get the go ahead from Dean Rusk, the Secretary of State, and for him to get it from the White House. And we had our eyes on this, and we used all means for it. And so we all concentrated on this. I remember the day when Foster was on the phone to the Secretary and he said, "We go then Dean, we go?" And Dean said go, and that was the final go ahead by the Department and the Administration to accept the treaty as we had negotiated it with the Soviets. So for us then the battle against the parochial-minded European specialists in the Foreign Service was won, and I didn't carry it any further.

Q: When this treaty went, were there any reservations about parts of it that concerned our delegation, although every treaty is usually a compromise of some part.

DREXLER: One of the most difficult problems in the treaty concerned peaceful nuclear explosive devices. Because in that era, there was a vision of nuclear explosions being used to reverse rivers, dig oil fields, open up copper mines, build harbors, and so on. These were going to be popping up all over. Of course none of this ever happened, except perhaps in the Soviet Union, but this was a sticking point. It was an unknown technology, and other countries who were behind us in it, and we were not very far advanced ourselves, didn't want to be denied it. It was very hard working with the Atomic Energy Commission people on the delegation to satisfy those countries who wanted to be sure they would get the benefits. Then of course there were a few countries like India and Brazil, who never intended to sign the treaty in the first place, and who probably aspired to become nuclear weapons states, but who used the peaceful nuclear explosive issue as a means of staying out without high political costs internationally. So they used that against us. So that was one thing. But we finessed it, and got a treaty provision providing peaceful nuclear explosion services, but in the end, of course as I said, there was no need for this. The technology was not called upon nor developed, and no one wants peaceful nuclear explosions being set off in their neighborhood anywhere. So that was a problem with the Atomic Energy Commission but it was resolved. The other problem was with the Pentagon on a nuclear weapon test ban. We were required and under great pressure from the countries giving up nuclear weapons to commit ourselves to stop testing ourselves. The Pentagon then, as probably now too, was completely opposed to this, and had allies in the Atomic Energy Commission. There were strong differences in the delegation between the Joint Chiefs of Staff, who always had a Colonel on the delegation, and the rest of us. There again, we made a treaty commitment that was artfully worded to resolve the problem. Many of these treaty clauses were very artfully worded. I learned quite a lot about treaty writing from that experience, from our very able lawyers there. And one of the phrases that sticks in my mind which served us so well was "effective measures." You would commit your government to take "effective measures" and then you would fill in the space: general and complete disarmament, world peace, to end testing, to end the arms race, whatever you wanted. The operative words were "effective measures," and that was subject to interpretation. You could label almost anything you didn't like, any specific proposal as not being really "effective," and not serving that purpose, as being misleading or misguided, and so on. So the treaty has many such clauses, and I ran into them, not only in the original, but then in the Spanish and the Chinese as well. So there were those problems. But the basic idea of the treaty, that it was in the United States' interest to stop the proliferation of nuclear weapons, had strong, widespread support, and among public opinion as well, in industry, and bipartisan support. Of course President Johnson was committed to it, and so there was momentum there behind this.

Q: You left ACDA in 1968, and whither?

DREXLER: I went to Hong Kong. By then, Alan Whiting, the head of the Sino part of the Sino-Soviet Affairs in INR, had gotten assigned as the number two in our Consulate General in Hong Kong, which was the center of China watching. He worked there for Ed Rice, who was an old China hand, whose earlier career I'm not familiar with. Undoubtedly he had served on the Mainland as a young man, but he was not tarred with the brush that was used against purge victims. But there was an immediate clash of personalities. Mr. Rice, I understand, whom I'd met, felt threatened by Mr. Whiting, this high-powered, celebrated China watcher and specialist, with academic credentials and proven record in INR. The job of number two at the Consulate General was not traditionally one from which you did China watching or supervised it, and so I don't think Mr. Rice expected he was going to get such a person anyway. Alan lasted only a few months, but long enough to get me transferred there to work for him. By the time I got there, he was gone. So I was there for four years, 1968-1972. This was, I like to think, the heyday of China watching. Ed Martin replaced Rice as Consul General, and then David Osborn replaced Martin. None of them involved themselves regularly in our China watching work. We had a China Mainland section. I started at the head of its political unit, and did that for two years, and then I became the chief of the section for two years, and I had 12 officers working for me, and a large staff of 40-50 translators. It was wonderful to be there at that time. We had all the top Asian correspondents of the western American press there, some covering Vietnam, people like Robert Shaplen, who were based out of Hong Kong, Bruce Neelare, Stan Kumpa, all of these people. Plus, all of the leading academic specialists on China came through. We talked to them, got to meet them, exchanged views. The diplomats from Peking came down and talked to us and we to them, and it was a fascinating experience, and for me of course, it was the pinnacle of the China watching overseas operation. I couldn't get beyond that, because we did not have representation in Peking. We briefed an unending stream of Congressmen, military officials, and government officials going through Hong Kong, on China. That was standard, to say nothing of the women's groups and the others who came through and were entitled to this. I gave three or four long briefings a week besides doing writing and reporting. And we were also engaged in the acquisition of documents, which was largely funded by the CIA, and we were able to get some pretty important stuff on the Chinese atomic energy program, among other things.

Q: Why would the Italians or the Germans -- was it just that they wanted to sell equipment off around? What would be their interest in resisting the Treaty?

DREXLER: The Germans, and to some extent the Italians, saw the Nonproliferation Treaty as a means by which the Soviet Union was denying them the right to acquire nuclear weapons. We had all the top Asian correspondents of the western American press there, some covering Vietnam, people like Robert Shaplen, who were based out of Hong Kong, Bruce Neelare, Stan Kumpa, all of these people. Plus, all of the leading academic specialists on China came through. We talked to them, got to meet them, exchanged views. The diplomats from Peking came down and talked to us and we to them, and it was a fascinating experience, and for me of course, it was the pinnacle of the China watching overseas operation. I couldn't get beyond that, because we did not have representation in Peking. We briefed an unending stream of Congressmen, military officials, and government officials going through Hong Kong, on China. That was standard, to say nothing of the women's groups and the others who came through and were entitled to this. I gave three or four long briefings a week besides doing writing and reporting. And we were also engaged in the acquisition of documents, which was largely funded by the CIA, and we were able to get some pretty important stuff on the Chinese atomic energy program, among other things.

Q: How did one get documents?

DREXLER: Well, we didn't have to advertise, because by the time I got there it was known that the US Consulate General would pay for good documents. The Japanese Consulate General would also pay, as would some others. We obviously attracted fraudulent documents, so anything that was offered for sale had to be carefully scrutinized. We thought we were pretty good at doing this, and we watched our money. Sometimes you had to take a chance. For the atomic energy documents, I remember the meeting in which I had to decide whether to recommend this or not. We did recommend, and as I remember we paid something in the order of $50,000.00. I believe that subsequently the documents were found useful. There was no question that they were authentic, but that was rare. To spend so much money.

Q: You say that the Japanese were paying money. Did you see each other's documents?

DREXLER: No, the Japanese had their own China watchers there in Hong Kong at this time, and they did not have relations with Peking then either. They were driving up the price. So, I met with my opposite number at the Japanese Consulate, and I said, look here, we're interested in the same material. People are playing one of us off against the other to get a lot of money. Why don't we work cooperatively, and share the documents, at least match notes, consult so that we're not being ripped off and so reduce our expenses. In other words, exercise a monopoly or duopoly. He turned me down. The Japanese refused. We met frequently though, to exchange views as all the China watchers did. I had a weekly lunch with the chief German Embassy China watcher, and the Chief British intelligence officer. Once a week we met at a restaurant and talked things over. And sometimes we exchanged documents. I also had a weekly lunch with foreign correspondents. There were endless dinners. You never had to buy your own meal in Hong Kong if you were a China watcher at the American Consulate General. We had a superb relationship with the press. These were very distinguished men, Stan Karnow was there, and others, and we trusted them and they depended upon us. There was, in my experience, only one not too important breach of confidentiality by the press, otherwise the working relationship was superb. So while I couldn't bring off the cooperative documents purchasing plan, there was never any obstacle to exchanging views and comments.

Q: I'm not really sure why the Japanese would be so aggressively separate at this point.

DREXLER: I can't account for it. I suppose that my opposite number saw the virtue in cooperation, but was turned down by his superiors. We had at the Tokyo level very slight exchanges with them. I went up to Tokyo once or twice, mostly to brief our embassy there on what was going on in China, and I had a couple of meetings with the China specialists in the Japanese Foreign Ministry. But I found their people very stiff and inhibited, and not really very forthcoming or interested in sharing information with us. I think that they felt that there were real limits on the commonality of interest between American officials and the Japanese officials when it came to China. Probably they had their own agents and operatives on the Mainland, their own access, I don't know. They certainly had their own experiences in China. So I had the sense that they looked at China rather differently from us. They calculated their interest as not being entirely congruent with our's. This was not the case, say, with the Germans, the French, the English, the Canadians, the Norwegians, and so on. We were all in the same game together. But the Japanese had their own game going.

Q: What did we see in China during this 1968-72 period?

DREXLER: The Cultural Revolution had led to chaos. It was at that time that Mao called in the Army to restore order, and formed local units of government, revolutionary committees, in which the armed forces component was dominant. He also turned to his close comrade in arms and designated successor, Lin Biao, also. The downfall of Liu Shao-chi, and the other targets of the purge which Mao had in mind when he unleashed the revolution, the crushing of the spirit of bureaucratism and so on, all those goals had by then been achieved. But at a cost which Mao felt, and people around him felt should not be sustained. So they were beginning then to draw in the reins and bring the revolution to an end, and reestablish the purified successor generation to Mao, as embodied in Lin Biao. So we watched this take place. The one thing I modestly credit myself with was being the first to detect that Lin Biao himself had been purged. We saw that something strange was going on. There were, as we used to call them, anomalies in the press, in appearances, and there was great disorder involving Mao's wife, Jiang Qing, and the Shanghai radicals around her. We were all puzzled about this, until finally, it seemed to me that there was only one explanation, which was unthinkable almost, that Lin Biao, Mao's designated successor, his closest comrade in arms, was finally going to be purged, and that the whole succession scheme was off. I took my telegram about this up to David Dean, who was my superior at that time as Deputy Principal Officer. He questioned me about it, and we sent it off. We were the first. We were ahead of CIA, all of the other agencies in reaching this conclusion that Lin had fallen. And it wasn't until weeks after that the Chinese themselves confirmed it. So that was a big satisfaction for me personally. But then of course there came the great breakthrough, the Nixon and Kissinger visit, when I became very alienated from Washington's policy toward China. From the Nixon-Kissinger approach, that's when I started to back off.

Q: While you were there, were these various groups that you would brief, they would essentially be public groups. What were we saying about China at that time?

DREXLER: We gave them an accurate picture, of course, of the internal turmoil. China at this time was very much introspective. The action was all on the domestic scene, the Cultural Revolution. While they were feuding with the Soviets, and also with us and helping Vietnam, it was remarkable that they were able to maintain this revolutionary campaign at the same time. It was a China dominated by domestic political turmoil. And that's what people focused on and what we briefed visitors about, to help them puzzle out what was going on inside China. Because as far as the Sino-Soviet split was concerned, and Vietnam, our visiting groups more or less knew what that was all about already. But what was going on inside China and what the Cultural Revolution was all about that was a mystery that we could try to unravel for them. Then of course, after the Nixon and Kissinger visit...

Q: When did that visit take place?

DREXLER: This would be 1971, I guess, 1971-72, around then. Then we had a stream of people. Erhlichman came through, and I briefed him. George Shultz too. At that time I think he was OMB Chief, or maybe Secretary of Labor. Frank Shakespeare, the head of USIS, Admiral McCain was frequently in from CINCPAC, Secretary of Treasury Kennedy, the Chicago banker, came through. It was endless. Especially after the breakthrough and ping-pong diplomacy led to more contacts. Some of the people who went up were woefully uninformed. Secretary of the Treasury Kennedy's questions and background knowledge were so poor that his own staff was visibly embarrassed as we sat around the table and he threw these dumb questions at me, but off he went. Erhlichman and Shultz didn't say very much. They were good listeners.

Q: John Erhlichman was on the White House staff.

DREXLER: That's right, with Haldeman, he was one of the two chief aides of the President. It was also at this time that the Chinese released some long-held American prisoners from the 1950s. The first one I received, unfortunately, after he died. His ashes, I can still see them. I was told that he had committed suicide. This was Hugh Redman. He had committed suicide and the Chinese were going to send us his ashes, and I expected a small urn. Instead I got an enormous package, about two feet long and one foot square, with a muslim covering and the large letters of his name on the side. And this was set on my desk, perfectly horrible. The Chinese told us he committed suicide, after being held for 20 years, with a razor blade in a Red Cross package. The Red Cross told us they never put razor blades in their packages. Then we got word that they would release a live prisoner, Fecteau. These were men who had parachuted while conducting CIA clandestine operations at the time that the Mainland fell to the Communists and who were captured and held for over 20 years.

There was Downey, Redman, and Fecteau. Redman was dead and they told us they were going to put Fecteau across the Hong Kong border at Lo Wu. So I was designated to receive him. The RAF provided the helicopter and took us to the closed border area, which was strictly off limits. We were escorted by a detail of Gurkhas to the bridge, where Fecteau was going to be put across. We knew that there was one train down from Canton, and we waited for it and he didn't show. At the border, in addition to the Gurkhas at the bridge, there was an enormous machine, looking something like those around here that are used to vacuum up leaves in the fall. But this was to spray a banana paste across the bridge in case the Chinese tried to rush across, this gooey stuff would be sprayed from this enormous machine with the great pipe, to coat the whole bridge with banana paste, so that the Chinese would then slip and fall while the Gurkhas went out to attack them. Of course that never happened. But we sat and waited, but there was no Fecteau. I had with me a US Army Colonel, who was one of our attachés and a British military doctor. The doctor was there in case Fecteau was in bad health, but I think also that we had in mind that if Fecteau was going to become difficult, we might have to require the doctor to tranquilize him, because the CIA wanted him taken quietly and quickly by helicopter directly to the RAF part of the Hong Kong airport where there was a C-130 waiting to take him to Manila, Clarke Air Force Base. But there was no Fecteau. So we went to have lunch, and when we came back from our lunch there he was. The Chinese had insisted on giving him lunch at their little canteen at the border before putting him across, after holding him for over 20 years. And there he was, a big strapping fellow in very good health, but totally docile. And far from providing us with any trouble or needing any tranquilizers, he needed stimulus. That is, I took him over to the helicopter, and I said, "Mr. Fecteau, this is the helicopter we've laid on to take you to the air base, and then on to Manila." And he wouldn't move, until I told him to get onto the helicopter and then sit down. The poor man, after all this imprisonment, had been conditioned to such an extent, that he would not make an obvious physical move until told, even by an American friendly officer. With him was a young girl, a mystery girl, who had been put across with him. She told me that she had set off with a boyfriend from Hong Kong a year before and had sailed to Manila. They had been washed ashore, held in a Chinese village. Her boyfriend starved to death, because digestive problems made it impossible for him to eat what the Chinese provided, and she had his passport and a few things with her.

So I asked who she was, and she told me her name and the story I just related to you. She and her boyfriend had of course dropped off the face of the earth, and had been presumed dead for over a year. And I offered to call her father...

Q: She was Occidental, I take it.

DREXLER: She was an American citizen, and so was the boyfriend. She had his passport. The Chinese had never told us about holding her, nor alerted us that she was going to come across with Fecteau. I offered to phone her father in the US, but she said no, he had heart trouble, and he'd probably have a heart attack if he learned suddenly that she was alive after all. So I got her on the plane that was there for Fecteau, and sent her off to Clarke Air Force Base, and that was the last I ever saw or heard of them again. Fecteau, of course, said nothing to us, nor did we put anything to him, since obviously he was physically fit. I often thought that he might write a book about his experiences, but as far as I know, he didn't.

One further point, the previous Kissinger visit came as a total surprise to us at the Consulate General.

Q: Were you all seeing things in the tea leaves on the Chinese side that they were doing something to make the situation ....

DREXLER: We did not see this, but back in Washington, in INR, an officer and old friend of mine, Lynn Pascoe, strictly on content analysis and looking at editorials and so on, judged that some important positive shift in relations with the United States was in the offing. He deserves great credit for this and is the only one who spotted anything like that. Of course, it was not clear from that what this would exactly entail, namely a Nixon and Kissinger visit. It came not only as a surprise to me, but also as a shock. I thought it was very badly handled, that the terms in the Shanghai communique would come to haunt us, as the Shanghai communique has come to haunt us now these days. But this egocentric Nixon visit to China was done under terms which I think the Chinese regarded as the same way the emperors used to regard tribute bearers. It was self effacing, almost self-humiliating, almost groveling on our part. That's how it looked to me then, and I was very disturbed by what had happened. I count this as a further progression in my disenchantment with the prevailing line among China specialists and among government specialists on what we should do about China. My colleagues were by and large elated by this development (the Nixon visit and the diplomatic breakthrough), and of course in terms of our careers we saw the prospect then of serving in China, and of having our China watching made immeasurably easier and more fascinating by service there. But in terms of American interests and how to deal with the Chinese, and how they perceived us, I thought we were the losers.

Q: Was this at the time that this developed?

DREXLER: That was my immediate reaction. I was appalled at what they did.

Q: Looking at Mao, at that time--here you had this Cultural Revolution and you were beginning to see the consequences of many of these actions. What was your analysis of Mao? Was this like Stalin trying to stay in power, making sure he was in power, or was it for the greater good of the Chinese? What did you see motivating him?

DREXLER: We thought of him as the greatest Chinese of the 20th century. An outstanding historical figure of unmatched importance in modern Chinese history. Sun Yat-sen, Chang Kai-shek, of course also made their mark, but they were failures. What Mao achieved, bringing a country of over 1 billion people under control, not only of his party, but almost under his personal control, was an astonishing achievement. To watch the man at work, to hear the crowds and see their adulation of him, to be bombarded as we were constantly in Hong Kong by Mao's thought and the little red book, and so on, we noted that we were in the presence of an historic phenomenon. We were also, of course, aware of his shortcomings, that he was authoritarian, and an oriental despot. We were aware of those faults. But we felt that by and large the Chinese people were behind him, that he had that sort of legitimacy; he had not lost, as the Chinese say, "the mandate of heaven." And so I think this was the same idea that Kissinger had when he was ushered into the Mao presence. This was not your ordinary Chinese restaurateur or laundry man. You were in the presence of a great man, flaws and all. And so that's what we thought about him. I must say that the inside story of his personal life has become known only last year, when his physician wrote his memoirs. It's an astonishing account of Mao's sexual depravity and loathsome personal habits and so on. This was a side to him that you have to add to his other despotic behavior and he now of course looks quite different. But that's what we thought then. He was an historic phenomenon, a great man.

Q: One has the picture of the China watchers jumping up and down, gee, things are going to happen, and you sitting there scowling. How did your unhappiness or unease with the development take?

DREXLER: It cost me an assignment that would have been the pinnacle of my Foreign Service career as a China specialist. But that was a little later. The Nixon visit came toward the end of my tour, and I was then going back to the Arms Control Agency to a good job in Geneva. But, if I can go ahead just a little bit, I was out of the China field for three years in Geneva, and then out of it for three years in Bogota, when I was DCM. And at the end of my service in Bogota, Carter had become President, and had named Leonard Woodcock as ambassador and head of the liaison office in Peking. I don't know who was the DCM when Woodcock got there, but the man's assignment was up, and they were searching for a replacement. At that time, I was a front runner, because I was the only China specialist who had experience as a DCM running a large embassy with constituent posts. In Colombia we had three Consulates, and in China we were going to get more. I was a China specialist, I had the right rank, and so on, and finally they whittled down the list and I was asked to fly from Bogota to Washington for just a two-hour final interview with Ambassador Woodcock. He was an American labor union leader, and a very fine man. I liked him. I think he did well. However, before I went up, he had made a speech, a public speech, being back in Washington on consultations, and to pick his DCM, and in this speech he advocated a very soft, accommodating line toward China that went so far that the State Department felt obliged to disavow it, and say that it was his personal view. We did not know at the time that Carter was actually preparing to break relations with the Nationalists, to break the security treaty with Taiwan and have full diplomatic relations with Peking at the ambassadorial level. Undoubtedly Woodcock knew this but he got out ahead on his own. In my interview, everything went very well for the most part. And then we got to matters of policy, and I said to Ambassador Woodcock that I had to in all frankness tell him that I disagreed with the position that he had taken about a more liberal line toward China, and that I felt that he and I should really discuss this openly before I was assigned and got there, because this was going to be a continuing issue and as his DCM I would feel obliged after all these years to raise my own views and challenge his. He thanked me for my frankness and we ended the interview in a friendly way. I went back to Bogota. And when I got back in Bogota a few days later, I was called by Harry Thayer, the China Office Director, who told me that I had lost the assignment. So that was it for me, I lost it. And I was told that this was because of the policy difference. But curiously, years later when the Reagan administration came into office, this affair got me a job back in the EAP bureau, with Paul Wolfowitz, who at that time was the Assistant Secretary. I won't go into that in any detail. But when Paul, who was a very conservative person, as was the President, of course, interviewed me for an office directorship in his Bureau, I could tell the effect that I had on him when I told him the story I just related now, about how my harder line on China had affected my career. And so he gave me the job right off. And he and I were of one mind during that part of the Reagan administration, of the need to take a tougher line toward China. But there again he, to say nothing of me, failed to halt the pressures toward accommodation.

Q: We'll probably touch on both of those later, but you went back to ACDA, and when were you there?

DREXLER: I was given ACDA's only permanent overseas post, the one that they funded. I was Counselor for Arms Control, a kind of political counselor to the US Mission to the United Nations in Geneva, for three years, from 1972-1975. Idar Rimestad was the Perm Rep, and then Francis Dale, a political appointee. So I was ACDA's man there, I had the rank of Counselor, and I was also named the Deputy US Representative to the UN sponsored Conference of the Committee on Disarmament (CCD), which was in session about 8 months of the year, two sessions a year. I was also detailed to the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, the CSCE, as the US Representative in the military basket, the military subcommittee. The Pentagon initially opposed my being named representative there, because they didn't want an ACDA man, but when they found out that I was not really an ACDA man, but a Foreign Service officer, that made me slightly more acceptable, so finally they agreed. So I worked on the CSCE, as well as the Disarmament Conference for three years. Unfortunately, while we made great progress at the CSCE, which was an important negotiation, which results that are still working very well for us, we made no progress on the disarmament side, the arms control side. We were in a defensive, in a holding posture, because the Nixon administration was not inclined to enter into any more arms control agreements there, apart from SALT talks. These bilateral, US-Soviet SALT negotiations were separate from us at the Disarmament Conference and were closely controlled by private back channel by Kissinger. The Nixon Administration was not interested in the work of the CCD, so we had to constantly explain to the other CCD delegations why we couldn't have a test ban, why we couldn't have a chemical weapons treaty, why we couldn't do this or that. It was not a very good time to be there, but we did make some progress on the chemical weapons treaty, and that has finally come into effect, though modified considerably from what we had in mind originally. But the work on the CSCE I found very satisfying, and the one point that I would want to make about it is that we were constantly knocked off balance by Mr. Kissinger's behind-the-scenes negotiations with the Soviets, negotiations that he conducted without keeping our CSCE delegation in Geneva informed. So that frequently the delegation would follow instructions and take positions -- sometime forceful positions -- only to be told by an infuriated Soviet delegate that Mr. Kissinger had already privately disavowed to them the positions we had just expressed. So the Soviets, I think, took delight, as well as tactical advantage, in this, and I felt this particularly in the military committee when we were negotiating confidence building measures. Because of this behind-the-scenes maneuvering with the Soviets by Kissinger we were suspected by our NATO allies, with whom we were supposed to be working together. I often had to go to NATO in Brussels when we would have consultations on the joint alliance posture to be taken in Geneva, and I would be given impossible instructions from Washington, which we knew were the result of deals Kissinger had made behind the scenes with the Russians, and which we somehow had to force down on our allies, who suspected us--rightly--of colluding with the Soviets behind their backs. So that negotiation left a bitter taste in my mouth, as far as Mr. Kissinger is concerned. But nonetheless, it was brought off, and I think the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe was successful from the long-range Western point of view.

Q: You know, I had an interview with George Vest some time ago. And he was in Helsinki working on this, and said that he would sometimes hear from the Norwegian who had heard from the East German, who had heard from the Soviet, that Kissinger was undercutting him. His impression was that Kissinger really was not the prime mover in the CSCE, but Kissinger really was somewhat dismissive of the CSCE, whereas he was more concerned about SALT and all. Did you get that feeling?

DREXLER: The Helsinki meeting was one of the early phases of the CSCE, and then they moved to Geneva, and, I forget, the CSCE may have been concluded later in New York. But George Vest came to Geneva, and I worked for him, and I have great respect for him. He was close to Kissinger, of course, he had been his press spokesman for a while. I agree that no doubt the SALT negotiations were more important to Kissinger than the CSCE, and more important in every respect, to us too. Also going on were the MBFR talks, the Mutual Balance of Force Reductions, in Vienna, with Ambassador Jonathan Dean there heading our delegation. We tried to liaise with them occasionally, but not with much success. The CSCE was not looked upon as very important. As an arms control measure, it wasn't. But what was important about the CSCE was the human rights basket, and it can be argued that our success, the delegation's success in getting the Russians to subscribe to this, led to the human rights exchanges and openings which helped bring down the Soviet regime. That was very important. But that was not one of Kissinger's interests. My criticism, my quarrel with Mr. Kissinger is not on his priorities, but his style, and his allowing a situation to come about where his delegation seemed to be betraying the Western allies there, and where we were kept in the dark. This was not in our national interest. As for his purposes of downplaying the CSCE to make sure that it didn't interfere with the more important SALT game going -- this could have been achieved in a more statesman-like and creditable way. I thought myself that this was further proof that Mr. Kissinger for his brilliance, his knowledge of history, and his other qualities, had many weaknesses of character. That is still my view.

Q: By the time you left in 1975, where did things stand?

DREXLER: The CSCE agreement was nearing completion. The CCD arms control talks were bogged down, and Nixon had resigned, of course. The disarmament conference there in Geneva was largely preoccupied with protecting the nonproliferation treaty, because the treaty had a clause which required a periodic review conference. All the parties get together and look at it every five years to see if its purposes are being met. So, we had a conclave in Geneva in which the non-aligned could hold our feet to the fire. They could charge that we didn't give peaceful nuclear explosive devices, we didn't stop nuclear testing, we kept building up our arsenals. We're still engaged in the mad arms race, and we were doing this sort of thing. So we had, as we did every review conference afterward, until the one a couple of years ago, to preserve the treaty from attack and we succeeded. I was the Secretary General of the US delegation for the first review conference, and we brought it off. But those were three bleak years in which we were on the defensive in Geneva, as far as the U.N. and multilateral arms control negotiations were concerned.

Q: So you left in 1984, and whither?

DREXLER: Then I went back to the Bureau of East Asian and Pacific Affairs. As I mentioned earlier, I was hired by Paul Wolfowitz, who was the Assistant Secretary, in an interview, when I seemed to say a magic word when I was describing how I had lost my assignment to Peking as DCM, because I favored a hard line toward China. He favored a hard line toward China too, and I guess I was such a rare bird among China specialists, that this convinced him to take me on. And I was made Director of the Office of Regional Affairs. In that office we handled at that time the Asian refugee problem, which was a very serious one, all of the million or more refugees from Vietnam, the boat people suffering horribly in the camps throughout Southeast Asia, the refugees from Laos and Cambodia, and so on. I also was responsible for military assistance programs to all of East Asia, and for economic assistance programs. And I handled arms control, which was just beginning to -- I mentioned that the arms control field, when I entered it in the '60s was European in its focus, and its experts and staffs were all European in their background studies -- arms control was now beginning to shift in focus to Asia, and there were proposals for nuclear free zones and other measures. And also I watched China and other affairs, which had a regional interest.

I was the only office director that participated in Paul Wolfowitz's senior staff meetings, which was with Deputy Assistant Secretaries, and his press advisor. I had and have great respect for Wolfowitz, a brilliant, hardworking man, whom I'm sure has a long, great future ahead. We were not always in agreement on domestic politics, certainly, but I had great respect for him. He was a sort of one-man band. I was used to having papers pile up on Middendorf's desk, because he never paid attention and wasn't interested. The papers piled up on Paul Wolfowitz's desk because he was interested, and wanted to read all this, and he would lug home a briefcase that I would have found hard to carry. He was extremely conscientious and hardworking. I should say about politics that when I went to work for Middendorf I was an Independent. After two years with him I became a registered Democrat, and having seen his friends Pat Robertson, Ollie North, and James Watt, and that whole crew. But Paul and I took a conservative view about China, and I think he liked that. The EAP bureau was compartmentalized very much. The office of Indonesian Affairs focused on that country, and they did their own thing. The Philippine affairs officers did their thing, and the Japan people were doing their thing, and the China people had their shop. The problem was that while what happened in Indonesia and the Philippines, and the Australia/New Zealand desk, didn't much affect the rest of the region, but certainly what happened in China did. And I found that the other office directors, covering Indonesia, Thailand, the Philippines, Japan even, always had their eye on what the China specialists were doing, but they never butted in, and were rather inhibited and reticent, because they hadn't studied Chinese, so they didn't know the secret handshake and the secret password, and the China crew let them know this, and kept them out. This crew insisted that their work was only for specialists and those of us who understood China. But of course with my background I could not be kept out in that way, and I constantly sent in memos to Paul, criticizing this or that that I saw developing in our China policy. Primary among this was the growing military relationship between the United States and China, which horrified me. We began moves to update the electronics on their fighter planes, to improve the technology on their ships, to exchange visits with the Chinese military, and so on, all of which I thought was not in our interest, and was selling rope to the hangman. I sent memos to Paul criticizing this, and I remember on one occasion when we were at the FBI Academy together, and I drove him back, and I told him my views, why I thought we were ill-advised to develop military ties with China. He said, "Well, Bob, I think you're right and I agree with you, but unfortunately this thing has gone too far, and the White House and the Pentagon, and so on, and Shultz, and it just can't be stopped, and we just have to go along with it."

At this time, the Soviet Union was turning into a Pacific power. It didn't last long. They were building up their fleet, they were using Cam Ranh Bay, our former Vietnam facilities, and they were making agreements with a lot of these newly independent island states, buying their fish, or crabs, octopuses, or whatnot, in return for refueling rights and potential base facilities. So they were presenting a new threat in the Pacific to us. And this was the thing that drove the Pentagon to a closer military relationship with China. The Pentagon thought that we could complicate things for the Soviets in the Pacific by cooperating more with China, and some of the Pentagon people even envisioned China and the United States fighting together against the Russians. I actually saw a Pentagon paper that Paul sent me with such a scenario, and he asked me to comment on it, do what I could to fix it up, and so on. And I took it to him and said, "This can't be fixed up. The analysis, the concepts are so erroneous that nothing can be done with this." One of the specifics was that the Chinese would help take out Cam Ranh Bay, that in this war with the Soviet Union we could depend upon the Chinese navy and air force to attack Cam Ranh Bay and neutralize the Soviets there while we were fighting in other areas. I said that this was fantasy, not even science fiction. If the Chinese see a war shaping up between the Soviets and the United States, they'll order a cup of coffee and sit back and watch the tigers fight. There is even a nice Chinese saying to go with this. It's completely unrealistic to expect what the Navy was expecting, but nonetheless it went forward.

And one of the things that troubled me was that EUR and the Soviet specialists didn't seem interested in this. Typically a paper on the subject of Sino-American military cooperation would make clear that this particular move was going to present strategic problems for the Soviets in Asia, and complicate the decision making for Soviet military planners, and contain other advantages for us and disadvantages for Moscow. But, as I would say to Paul, there's always a missing paragraph, and that was, how were the Soviets going to react? What are they going to do when we do this with China against them? What are their countermoves; what might they do? This was always missing. I would take these papers often to the Soviet desk, and find that they were not much interested in it. There was no input for them, no real desire to comment. They themselves just couldn't focus, apparently, on the Pacific. I don't know what other reason there might be. So I found this very troubling, so I formed a committee, an inter-bureau committee, called the Soviets in Asia Committee, which I chaired and which brought together once a month Soviet specialists, and our Asian specialists from the State Department. And we sat down and matched notes on what the Soviets were doing in Asia, what we were doing in Asia and the Pacific with the Chinese, and I tried to close that gap between the Bureaus. And then we would take minutes of our meetings, and reach some conclusions, and record observations, note this or that with alarm, and so on, and then these minutes would be circulated to Paul and to others, which I thought was a good idea, and might help put some brakes on what we were doing with the Chinese in an anti-Soviet thrust. I think that this committee was not continued after I left that job in 1987, and of course, although we couldn't see it at the time, the Soviet Union collapsed, the Soviet Pacific navy is now rusting in Vladivostok.

Q: I'm an old navy buff, and seeing these really beautiful ships all lined up and sort of listing off to one side on the mud flats...

DREXLER: We couldn't have foreseen that, but it came out all right, although the military aid and cooperation to China is still there and will haunt us.

Q: It already is.

DREXLER: Yes. Now, at that time there was a change in the Administration's policy toward the Soviet Union, at least nominally. Before the change, if I understood it correctly, it was the thought that we would have to regularize our bilateral relationship with the Soviets, sort of at the summit levels, and then once that was done, if it could be done, our problems in various parts of the world -- Central America, Latin America, the Middle East, Africa, the Pacific -- would sort of fall into place. They would be corollaries of this basic agreement. But then this idea was changed. I don't know whether it originated in the White House, or with Shultz, or both. It was decided instead to attack the regional problems. To overcome misunderstanding and conflicts in the various regions with the hope that this would build a basis for a better bilateral relationship and maybe for a far-reaching summit agreement. That was a good theory and in practice we had meetings with the Soviets. Their Latin American specialists and our Latin American specialists first got together and what was important for us was that it was then proposed that the State Department's Asian specialists get together with Moscow's Asian specialists. I thought this was a great idea. Paul Wolfowitz was not so anxious to do it. He is strongly anti-Soviet, anti-communist, highly suspicious of Moscow.

Q: You were mentioning Paul Wolfowitz?

DREXLER: Yes, he had a very well reasoned idea of the Soviets as our antagonists and rivals, based on academic study, work in the arms control field, in other words, well founded, well reasoned, not visceral...

Q: What was his background?

DREXLER: He had a Ph.D., and I think he taught at university. I believe he did a Ph.D. thesis in arms control on the International Atomic Energy Agency's safeguards of nuclear installations. I think he had served perhaps in the Nixon-Ford Administration in the arms control field, but I can't say for sure. But his background is what we would call a political-military background, with specialization in Soviet Affairs. So he was a careful student and a real expert on the subject. He had never been to Moscow, and that's where we were supposed to go for our first experts meeting. Before we left for there, he arranged a sort of a bull session with a lot of other hard line American Soviet specialists, whom I briefed as to what we were going to do when we got to Moscow. Paul wanted his colleagues to know that we weren't going to sell out our country or be patsies or pushovers, or agree to give up our weapons, or let the Soviets seduce or entrap us. They could depend upon us, and they didn't seem to be worried, but I think that Paul felt he had to secure his right flank if he was going to go to Moscow. And so I drafted for him a memo to Shultz as to what we were going to achieve. We were going to sock it to them in Moscow, we were going to take a hard line, hit them on human rights, and go in there and fight. And I think the Secretary looked this over and sent it back with a marginal comment saying, "This is fine Paul. But also be alert to any signs of flexibility on the Soviets' part."

So we went off to Moscow in 1985. We had two days of talks with the Soviets. They didn't go very well. Ambassador Hartman was away, and the embassy officer in charge of our arrangements got everything balled up. We went to the wrong place for the meetings, we missed our plane, everything was fouled up. And the Soviets said that they didn't have such a thing as an Assistant Secretary, and so their top Asia man, who was called a Deputy Minister, named Kapitsa, a terrible man, would not deign to meet with Paul, because Paul was of lower rank. So Paul said "Well, if he's not going to meet with me, I'm not going to go. You go and meet with him Bob. You go to meet with his underling." I said, "We've come here to Moscow, we can't do this. We have to go through with the talks." And I'm sure if Hartman had been there he would have advised us to. But the Charge, a DCM, was in sort of awe of Assistant Secretary Wolfowitz, and he wasn't much help. But it got very tense there as we prepared for this session, so I said to Paul, "Well, why don't you have a private meeting with Mr. Kapitsa, before the conference, and tell him that things like this sort of protocol problem of rank shouldn't stand in the way of a good frank discussion." So he agreed to this, and when we finally got to the right place, he had a private session with Kapitsa, and sort of worked things out, so that we had our meetings, and the protocol problems were resolved. It turned out that the number two at the talks was Igor Rogochov, the man with whom I'd met 20 years before in New York, when he and I both had the task of making sure that the Chinese language version of the Nonproliferation Treaty conformed, in my case to the English, and in his, the Russian language version. So he remembered me from that time, and I remembered him. The meeting was useful, but Paul took a very tough line on human rights, and Kapitsa got angry, or he feigned anger, and said he wasn't going to be lectured on human rights. And Paul, who is Jewish, had a very strong empathy with the so-called Refuseniks, the Jewish community that was being held almost in bondage in Moscow, and not allowed to immigrate. He felt this very strongly and understandably. So there were emotional issues in the meetings, too. We did have a fairly frank exchange on a number of issues. One of the things that I was supposed to ask the Soviets, and did, was what was going to happen in North Korea after Kim Il Sung died. We hear that he's got this crazy son. Is he going to inherit the way the Bourbons and the Hapsburgs did? You know him better than we do; what is he like? It turns out that they didn't know him much better than we did, and they didn't have anything to offer, and it was clear that they were rather worried too as to what Kim Jong Pil was going to be. Well, we're still in that boat. So after the meeting, we flew all the way across I don't know how many time zones to Tokyo to begin briefing our Asian friends about the talks.

Q: Talking about the meeting, what was the impression you got of the Soviet feeling toward China at the time?

DREXLER: We had common views as far as analyzing what was going on, what the state of play was there with Deng Xiaoping. As I recall, we both had the feeling that these Chinese could really be a pain in the ass. That they really were quite a handful to deal with. I think we shared information and matched notes, almost the way I used to do when I would go to the NATO meeting of Asian experts in Brussels, which I did twice a year. It was rather the same atmosphere. Once we got off the human rights thing, there was more or less what was intended, an exchange of views among specialists. There was no posturing on that, and the questions and the answers were very serious, and so this was the case at the luncheon too. The Soviets were hospitable to us in that sense, and I think wanted to deal with us in a professional way. So it was useful. And then we all flew to Tokyo, and Paul went on to Tokyo to brief the Japanese on this meeting, and I must say the Japanese were very interested in what we had to say, and what this was all about. The Americans getting together with the Soviets and talking about Japan, among other things. The Japanese Charge in Moscow was an old friend of Paul's and invited us out to an elaborate Japanese dinner and did all he could to pump us. Because our Embassy's administrative arrangements were so poor, it was this Japanese Charge who drove us all to the airport when we left. And he drove so slowly, so as to have the maximum time to pump us, that we nearly missed our plane. In fact, we had lost our reservations, and only with great trouble did we finally get on the flight to Tokyo.

Q: Before we leave this, so the mutual feeling about China -- did the Soviets show much attention to other parts of Asia? Japan, the Philippines, and Vietnam, in particular.

DREXLER: Well, I can't remember anything notable about our discussions of those other countries, except that they were rather sarcastic about the Philippines and Marcos.

Q: You retired when?

DREXLER: In September of 1987.

Q: Well, this has been fascinating.

DREXLER: I'd like to add one point. When I was in the East Asian Bureau, I attended two Chiefs of Mission conferences. These are annual affairs, where they bring together our ambassadors to all of the Asian posts, and the first one took place in Honolulu, at CINCPAC, the military command center of the Commander in Chief of the Pacific. And it was a very interesting session in the command center. All the ambassadors were there, but there was no one there from our mission in Taiwan, which at that time was headed by Harry Thayer, an old friend of mine. Instead, there was Harry's deputy. And I talked to him, and asked, "Is Harry ill or something, he couldn't make it?" He said, "No, he was not permitted to come." The EAP Bureau at the State Department would not let Harry Thayer come to the Chiefs of Mission conference because the Chinese Communists would object. We had this fiction, of course, that we don't have an embassy in Taipei, but instead an Interests Section, as the Nationalists do here in Washington. And Foreign Service officers staff it, but they nominally retire from the service, are hired by this group, and then when they finish their duty, they come back into the Service. It's a fiction understood by both sides, and it works neatly. Peking accommodates itself to it. But I never thought that we should have to go so far as to not let the head of our office there come to a top secret classified meeting at CINCPAC in Honolulu, a private meeting of our own. This particularly is, I think, wrongheaded because the head of our office in Taiwan wasn't just another chief of mission, like, if our ambassador to Burma was not there, it wouldn't be a terrible loss, because we didn't have that much interest in Burma then anyway, but Taiwan is a major trading partner, important politically in the region, and it was more important that our man in Taipei be there, than our man from Burma or New Zealand. But he wasn't. Not only did he have to be represented by a deputy, but the deputy was not even allowed to sit at the table in CINCPAC, which was reserved for ambassadors only. So he sat in the audience with the rest of us, which I thought was postposterous. So the next year, when they discussed arrangements for another chiefs of mission meeting, one that was going to be held in Washington, at the senior staff meeting, I said, "I have to be the only one, since Paul has left, who is in the Bureau now who was at last year's chiefs of mission meeting. And I want to tell you what happened regarding our man in Taiwan." I said that, "I think that this is really wrong, and to kowtow this way to Peking is quite unnecessary. If they protest, we just reject it, and they probably won't protest anyway, they may not even know. We are really only harming ourselves, and our discussions by keeping such a man away." Jim Lilley at that time was the Deputy Assistant Secretary for China, and an old friend from Hong Kong days, and he said, "I agree. We will let the representative from Taiwan sit at the table this time." But I believe they didn't let the number one man come even then. So this is an example of the eccentricities and the anomalies that one encounters where China is concerned. I think that is worthy of note.

Donald M. Anderson was born in Iowa in 1932. He entered the Foreign Service in 1958. His career included positions in China (Hong Kong and Taiwan), India, and France. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on July 8 and September 2, 1992.

Q: How did the Chinese connection which, of course, ran through your entire career but how did this start? Coming from Sioux City...

ANDERSON: I've been asked that many, many times. About the only answer I can think of is that when I was in the third grade, I believe, my third grade school teacher was a former Chinese missionary. She used to read us stories about China, and take us over to her house and show us all of the things that she had brought back from China. Then when I was at LSU obviously there wasn't much of a China program, but they did have a course in Chinese political history, and I took that. And in my graduate year at LSU I started working on a master's thesis on the 1945-47 period of U.S.-China relations, the Marshall Mission, etc. So I had an interest in China, and the April Fool's sheet that you fill out...

Q: This was the post preference report that came around and due on the first of April, hence the name April Fools Sheet.

ANDERSON: From the very beginning I requested Chinese language training. I remember quite clearly that I got a phone call from Personnel...actually I had been assigned to Munich and was quite pleased with the assignment. I was going to the Consular Section in the Consulate General in Munich. And I got a phone call from Personnel saying that they had noted my application for Chinese language training and that the Chinese program was very overcrowded but they could get me into Cambodian right away. I told them, thank you, but no thank you, and sort of made up my mind that I was going to go on to Munich. It wasn't more than two or three days later that they called back and said that I had indeed been accepted for Chinese language training, which meant another year in Washington which just about broke my wife's heart because at that time we had one daughter two years old, and one daughter six months old, and she was very much looking forward to sailing to Munich. But we did the year in Washington and then went off to Taiwan for the second year of Chinese language training.

Q: The school was not in Taipei was it?

ANDERSON: No, it was down in Taichung.

Q: How was the course conducted there?

ANDERSON: Well, it was a very informal place. Taichung at that time was, I guess, a city of 500,000 people, but by Chinese standards it was a very small town. It reminded me in terms of size of something akin to Sioux City, Iowa. The school was in a large what had been I imagine a single home. There were about 20- 25 students from USIA, CIA, State. That was pretty much it at that time. The classes were basically tutorials. One would have some classes with two or three students in it, but as you progressed into more advanced Chinese it was usually a one on one situation. The latter part of the course was really basically devoted to newspaper reading because reading Chinese is the time consuming part. We gave speeches, and we had lectures, and area studies lectures in Chinese. It was quite a well run program, I think.

Q: Did you feel that you were absorbing the Nationalist Chinese point of view? Or was it relatively apolitical?

ANDERSON: Well, inevitably...being in Taiwan, you were exposed much more to the Nationalist point of view. And most of the teachers had come from Beijing, or from the northeast.

Q: You were being taught Mandarin?

ANDERSON: We were taught Mandarin. The dialects vary so much in China that they sought teachers from the Beijing area which was the most standard Chinese. Our teachers were entirely Mainlanders who had fled the Mainland when the communists took over so you did have a rather staunchly anti-communist viewpoint. We did get the People's Daily, and Chinese communist publications because it was necessary to not only learn the standard Chinese characters, that is, the old-fashioned more complex characters which we used in Taiwan, but also you had to learn the simplified characters which the Chinese communists had introduced if you were going to read the Chinese communist press.

Q: Did you find that a lot of ideographs had been made up? Sort of communist type words, or not?

ANDERSON: Not the characters themselves, no. That was a pretty straightforward process of simplification based on the logic of the characters. In fact, I think had the Nationalists not lost the war and evacuated to Taiwan, they would have probably introduced a similar expanded simplification system. The language itself, the jargon obviously was influenced by the communists ideology. Like any language it evolves and I did find that when I once became involved with Mainland Chinese, that the language that was spoken on Taiwan -- the Mandarin that was spoken on Taiwan -- was progressively getting more out of date with what they were using on the Mainland. It was, generally speaking, more formal, not classical. A much more old-fashioned kind of Chinese.

Q: What were you picking up from your fellow students, and any connections you might have with the embassy about the political situation? We're talking about 1961-'62. The Kennedy administration had come in. Was there a feeling that the Nationalists might actually make a try for the Mainland? Or did we think this was a pipe dream? How did we feel?

ANDERSON: Well, the period I was in Taichung the first time was really sort of the depths of the results of the Great Leap Forward, there was widespread famine on the Mainland, and the Mainland was really in terrible shape economically. It was probably the one time following Chaing Kai-shek's withdrawal to Taiwan that there was some serious consideration given to the possibility of launching some kind of an attack against the Mainland. I don't think it ever came to anything. I went back for further training in 1965 and one of my teachers at that time was a sort of semi-retired Nationalist general, and he and I used to talk about it. He said that he had been designated in 1962 as the Commander of the Nationalist forces on the Mainland should the invasion take place. Obviously it never did.

Q: Again, among your group, the recognition of Communist China was a bone of contention that went on from 1948 until really 1977, or something like that.

ANDERSON: '79.

Q: What was the feeling there? I was a Foreign Service officer but never dealt with it but the feeling, it's just a political thing, why don't we just get on with it, and recognize them.

ANDERSON: I think among the group that I was with and certainly my own feeling was that we ought to be moving in that direction. It was not a simple matter of simply switching recognition at that point. It probably would have produced chaos on Taiwan, but a lot of the fiction that we maintained for many, many years really gradually became rather silly. I remember when I went back to the Department -- it would have been the mid-'60s -- you still really couldn't talk about it. If you used the word "China" without "communist" in front of it, there were people who would question what you were talking about. There was a long time, for example, that you couldn't use the word "Peking", you had to use the word "Peiping" which was the Nationalist name for the former capital of China. It was a very emotional issue, and the China lobby was still at that time fairly strong. People still remembered what had happened during the McCarthy period, and the whole issue that we lost China, etc.

Q: The China hands, John Stewart Service, and others really suffered from that.

ANDERSON: I had friends who said, "Why do you want to study Chinese?"

Q: Again, I'm trying to get back to the time...what was the feeling about a career in Chinese? After all, you had this one not overly significant island where we had posts, and then you had this huge Mainland with many millions of people on it where we had no recognition, and you're starting on a career of this. What was the feeling?

ANDERSON: I guess I took the long view. I figured that I had probably another 20 or 25 years in the Foreign Service and that things would inevitably change. And then in addition to the view that at sometime we would get to the Mainland, it really wasn't quite as restricted as it might sound, because the embassy in Taipei was quite large. And then we had the Consulate General in Hong Kong which was the premier China watching post for the U.S. Government and was larger than most embassies. At that time there was also a practice of assigning Chinese language officers to a number of our southeast Asian posts because places like Bangkok, for example, had very large overseas Chinese communities, and it was felt that it was desirable to have a Chinese speaking officer to follow that sector of the community. So in terms of career possibilities it was not a bad deal.

Q: Indonesia, Burma...well then you did go to Hong Kong where you served from '62 to '65. What were you doing there?

ANDERSON: Well, the conventional wisdom when we were finishing up language school was that the career-wise thing to do was to go to Taipei because that would help you solidify and consolidate your language. I decided not to do that, and I tried to get assigned to Hong Kong because I did want to work on the Mainland. I did not want to get locked into being a Taiwan specialist. So I went to Hong Kong first as a consular officer, which is the way everybody went from language school to Hong Kong...in the consular section. I did a year in the American citizen services...actually the passport section, which was a very educational experience because passport fraud in Hong Kong was a major enterprise.

Q: How did you deal with it?

ANDERSON: It was a fascinating thing.

Q: Could you describe how the fraud developed, and how you dealt with it?

ANDERSON: Basically, the origins of the passport fraud was in the late 19th century, early 20th century. There was a tremendous amount of, not immigration, but travel by people from Guangdong Province just across the border from Hong Kong, to the United States, largely working on the railroads as laborers. This group of people actually came almost entirely from two or three counties, just across the border. And when the San Francisco earthquake occurred, for example, all the birth records were lost, and all one had to do to be certified as a citizen living in San Francisco was to have two people come in and swear that you were born in San Francisco. A lot of Chinese became American citizens that way. Someone did a study once of the population of San Francisco at that time and determined that if every Chinese male in San Francisco had actually been born in San Francisco, knowing the number of Chinese females in San Francisco, that each woman would have had to given birth to 600 children. Their practice was generally to leave the wife back in the village, and go earn enough money that they were prosperous by Chinese standards; then they would come home and maybe spend a year, and then go back and work some more. During that time would sire children. And, of course, the desirable thing to have was boys, because they would then grow up and as soon as they were eligible they would go to the United States and work to continue this process of sending money back to the village. Daughters were an inconvenience, and so what would happen would be that if your brother who had stayed back in China had a son, and you came back and your wife produced a daughter, your brother's son would become your son for immigration purposes.

They developed an intricate network of fraud and in response the Consulate General in Hong Kong set up a fraud unit which was really quite an elaborate organization. The Chinese traditionally have what is called three generation papers. These are papers on usually red tissue paper, and they have the names of all of the relatives for three generations written on them. These are exchanged at wedding ceremonies. The fraud unit started studying these things, and developed an extensive file and collection of familial relations for these three counties, particularly Toishan county which was the biggest. It reached the point where people would come in...nobody had a birth certificate or any document so you relied on secondary evidence such as photographs taken with a person, work permits, or whatever it was. They would come in and claim to be so-and-so, and the son of so-and-so. We could send the application to the fraud unit, and they would research the names and come back and say, "He is not so-and-so's son. He is his nephew, and this is his father." We would present this to the applicant and they were usually so stunned that we knew that much, that they would immediately throw up their hands. And then there was blood testing also. Blood testing became quite sophisticated, it wasn't a positive identification, but it was a negative identification. So it was a real job of sleuthing. There was very little legal work or traditional consular passport work. It was trying to figure out the family heritage of somebody.

Q: I'm sure it gave you a much greater appreciation of the social intricacies of Chinese life too.

ANDERSON: Indeed. Not perhaps for Chinese life in the big picture, but certainly for southern Guangdong. Cantonese life is frequently quite different than say north or other parts of China. It's very traditional, sort of old-fashioned.

Q: How about with the language? I've always understood that there's Mandarin and Cantonese, and then a multitude of other dialects. How about Cantonese? Could you get along with it, or were you learning?

ANDERSON: No. I must confess that for spoken work in the consular section, my Mandarin was virtually useless. They all spoke Cantonese, and in fact, many of them spoke Toishan which is a dialect of Cantonese. I could read the documents because Chinese is standard all over China.

About the language. No, I did not interview people in the language, I used an interpreter. In fact my principal interpreter and assistant knew more about U.S. citizenship law than I ever would.

Q: This is so often the case. Then you moved to the political section?

ANDERSON: In those days the political and economic functions were divided differently in the Consulate General because of the peculiar nature of the Consulate. We had a Hong Kong-Macau section, and a Mainland China section, and within each of those two sections we had an economic and political unit. So I was assigned for a time in the commercial section of the Hong Kong-Macau section where one of my major functions was what they called Economic Defense Officer, which was enforcing our embargo on the Mainland. It sort of meant chasing Hong Kong companies around that did business with China, and trying to prevent them from buying American products.

Q: This was a major effort on our part.

ANDERSON: Oh, it was one of the silliest I've ever seen. The Consul General himself got in trouble because he had a love for Chinese export porcelain, and thought that was perfectly acceptable to buy. And we had a Treasury agent in the Consulate who warned him that he was breaking the law. That job only lasted for about six or eight months, and then the State Department contacted me and asked me if I wanted to be the next interpreter for our meetings at the ambassadorial level with the Chinese in Warsaw, Poland. It's something that I had given some thought to because I did fairly well in the basic Chinese language course. I came out of it with an S-4, R-4.

Q: I might for the record say S-4, R-4, is speaking-4, reading- 4, is extremely high in our business. You really have to be born to get the 5-5, which is the highest.

ANDERSON: The job rather appealed to me because at the time the officer who was doing it was posted in London in the political section, and used to fly over from London to Warsaw to do the talks. So I readily agreed that I would like to do it...it involved going back to Taiwan for an additional year of interpreter training, and then on to, I thought, London. And as a result I should add they pulled me out of the commercial section, and put me into the Mainland China political section, reporting on Mainland China's foreign relations. So I did move over to the political section for about the last year and a half that I was in Hong Kong. My stint in the political section in Hong Kong ended up really being devoted in very large part to reporting on the probability of China's entering the Vietnam war. While we were in Hong Kong the Tonkin Gulf incident happened, which produced mass rallies in Beijing and a number of very threatening editorials and speeches about the U.S. aggression against Vietnam. There were a lot of people, particularly back in Washington, who still had very fresh memories of the Chinese entry into the Korean war, and there was serious concern as to what the Chinese were going to do, and, I think basically, how far we could pursue the war in Vietnam without provoking Chinese intervention. I was sitting out in Hong Kong reading everything we could get, and trying to provide an analysis of the probability of a Chinese intervention.

Q: I've heard people say this obvious centuries-long antipathy between the Vietnamese and the Chinese and saying you never could really expect these two to get together.

ANDERSON: It was pretty well obscured during the war, though. They were talking about being as close as lips and teeth and all of that stuff.

Q: Just to get a feel for this. Here you are sitting in Hong Kong reading newspapers, and listening to broadcasts, and this type of thing. How could you get any feel for what's going on? It's a controlled press...

ANDERSON: It very definitely was an inexact science. It was almost entirely from content analysis. Looking at the terminology they were using, talking to Chinese about, "What are the implications of this type of language coming from a Chinese source?" Really just gauging whether they were drawing a line and saying, "At this point we will react," or leaving things fuzzy. It appeared to me quite clear that they were trying to leave things fairly fuzzy. And I pretty well concluded that the United States could bomb, could conduct an aerial warfare against North Vietnam, but if the United States were to cross the 17th parallel, and start driving...

ANDERSON: Yes, and start driving toward the Chinese border, then I think we probably would have gone too far.

Q: As you went into these analyses, were you using as sort of a test the words that the Chinese were using during 1950 essentially in Korea, and saying, "Ok, they were saying this, and we did this..." and using this as the model to look at?

ANDERSON: To the degree we could, but we didn't have that much. Alan Whiting wrote the book on China's entry into the Korean war, but that was later. We really didn't have the ability to do that careful an analysis. We probably should have.

Q: You say you talked to Chinese to find out the nuances. Who were the Chinese you'd get the nuances from?

ANDERSON: Well, I talked to the Chinese language teachers that we had. We had a Chinese local staff who assisted us with the content analysis, a very bright bunch of people that had an institutional memory of events and pronouncements by the Chinese going back sometimes 15-20 years. In fact, some of the locals that we had at the Consulate back in those days had actually come out of China with us when we left China. So they were a tremendous help. I remember one phrase, xiu xiu pang guan; quite literally it means "stand aside and watch," and I was trying to figure out whether this was a serious threat or what, and one of the Chinese said, "Well, literally, I think it probably amounts to your saying, 'If you get in a fight, I'll hold your coat.'"

Q: Who was the Consul General at that time?

ANDERSON: Marshall Green was Consul General when I arrived. By the time I was in the political section, it was Ed Rice.

Q: You were coming out with a sort of a conclusion. This is a very important thing, and there was a lot resting on what the Chinese were going to do, and obviously you were down the line so it wasn't all on you. But still did you feel any pressure as far as how you should call things, or not? What was the atmosphere?

ANDERSON: No, not really. Obviously I was pretty far down the line, and my analyses weren't going out under my signature. It was being vetted by at least two more layers, and sometimes three, and this was only one input into the decision-making in Washington. INR had an input, and CIA had an input to the decision-makers in Washington. But we were looking at it from the Hong Kong perspective, and as I say, largely based on content analysis. I don't know how much impact that had, but obviously the decisions were made to go ahead.

Q: Did you get any feel about, from where you were, about the CIA operations? Were you getting information, and how did that meld in with your activities?

ANDERSON: The CIA operation was very important. At that point less so for Vietnam, and for the Vietnam conflict, at least as far as inputs to me. It was important in terms of conditions inside Mainland China. There was a very extensive interview program, and the agency worked very closely with the British who obviously had a much bigger presence and were screening people coming across the border, etc. So it was a very important operation. I remember there were one or two guys that showed up who had just come out of North Vietnam, and we chased them around Hong Kong like they were gold miners, and usually they wouldn't talk to us anyway.

Q: What was your impression of events in China at the time? The Great Leap Forward had...

ANDERSON: It really collapsed, and economic conditions were in terrible shape. This was a period when Hong Kong was just being swamped by refugees coming across the border. I can remember our apartment looked out over the harbor, and then on to the hills of Kowloon. There was a terrible drought during this period, and we got down to water for four hours every fourth day. The brush fires on the hills you could see at night, burning up the hills. The refugees were streaming across the river that separates China from Hong Kong, and the Hong Kong government was having to cope with these thousands of refugees and began a massive housing program. We were very much involved in that as well because some of them did have claims to go to the United States. So it was a very difficult time, and we were focusing largely on the issues of the day. We were also trying to do China watching in the sense of what was happening in Beijing.

By the time I left to go back to language training in late '65, we were beginning to see some signs that something wasn't right in China, and that there were some new figures beginning to appear. But up until that time the Chinese had been able to maintain a facade of unity. I think people realized rather late that there was a tremendous power struggle going on.

Q: You went back to Taichung from '65 to '66? What was that all about?

ANDERSON: That was interpreter training. They had no formal interpreter training program, since they only trained one every four years so I had to sort of make it up myself. I worked with two or three of the senior teachers to design an interpreters' course. We built up a glossary of terms. I would read newspapers and interpret orally what I was reading, and if I saw words that sounded like they might be words that would be useful in the context of the ambassadorial talks in Warsaw I'd pull them out and we worked on a glossary of interpreting terms. Then my wife and I worked on going the other direction from English to Chinese -- sort of standard government jargon that one might be confronted with. Then I had my instructors put that into what they would consider proper Chinese.

Q: Was your wife learning Chinese?

ANDERSON: Yes. At one point about that time she was 2+.

Q: What happened? I notice you didn't go to London for the Warsaw talks after all this.

ANDERSON: What happened was, the European Bureau in a burst of economy said, "We're sick and tired of funding this position in London for a guy who doesn't do anything for us, and is working for the East Asia Bureau. So unless we can make him more productive, we're canceling the position." And the first reaction was to transfer the interpreter to Warsaw itself, where he became chief of the consular section. When they told me that that was what they were going to do, I decided I didn't want to be chief of the consular section in Warsaw. I basically said, "You can take my name out of the running," and got back a very quick reply saying, "We have been re-thinking the whole thing, and beginning with you we're going to move the position to Washington to the China desk, and that way you can be part of the drafting of the instructions, and the preparations for the talks..."

Q: I don't know what instigated it, but I remember there was a Congressional hearing where all of a sudden someone said...somebody on the Congressional side just to poke at the State Department, made a big fuss about, "What are you keeping a Chinese specialist doing in London?" "Ho-ho-ho," you know. I don't think the Department of State at that point, whoever was doing it, had a good answer for it.

ANDERSON: That's absolutely right. It was one of the poorer showings. I think what he said was, "Well, he uses his Chinese occasionally when he goes to Chinese restaurants." He was our interpreter. So anyway, I ended up going to Washington, and working on the China desk.

Q: You were there for four years from '66 to '70. What were you doing? Was this pretty much with the Warsaw talks?

ANDERSON: Oh, no. Maybe I should begin at the beginning. I ended up actually doing three jobs in the four years. I started off as the junior officer, the number two officer, in the China Mainland section. The office at that time was called the Office of Asian Communist Affairs, and theoretically covered Communist China, North Vietnam, and North Korea, all the communist countries in Asia. We spent about 98% of our time on China, and 2% on North Vietnam and North Korea. But I was the number two guy for China, in addition to doing the Warsaw talks, which were becoming at that point less and less frequent because China was going into the Cultural Revolution, and they were in total chaos.

Q: I think you might explain what the Warsaw talks were.

ANDERSON: The Warsaw talks were the ambassadorial level talks between United States and China. It was our point of contact with Communist China that went back to 1955. In the Geneva Conference in 1955 John Foster Dulles and Zhou En-lai agreed to begin these talks in Geneva. They started in Geneva. There were only two agenda items. One was the return of citizens detained by the other side. And the second item was other matters of mutual concern. They resolved the first item, reached an agreement in principal, I would say in about six weeks to two months of discussions in Geneva. And then they began a sort of general dialogue that went on literally from 1955 up through early 1970. The talks went through various periods. There were long periods when they were really pretty sterile, pro forma kind of things, and other periods when there were some real contributions made.

In 1958 they moved the talks from Geneva to Warsaw. While they were in Geneva the Chinese ambassador representative was Wang Ping-nan, who used to have to come down from Warsaw. Our representative was U. Alexis Johnson, who used to come over from Prague. So they moved the talks to Warsaw, and Wang continued for the Chinese, and Jake Beam did the talks for the U.S. side.

In addition to that I did Chinese Mainland analysis, and then after a year or so our Hong Kong-Macau officer left, so I became officer in charge of Hong Kong and Macau Affairs for about a year. Then the officer in charge of Mainland China Affairs, the senior position, got promoted to Deputy Director of the Office of Asian Communist Affairs, so he moved me up to his job. I ended up as the officer in charge of Mainland China Affairs.

Q: On the Warsaw thing, did you go to any of these talks?

ANDERSON: Oh, yes.

Q: What was your impression in the context of the period you were doing it? From '66 to '70.

ANDERSON: As I said, in many ways they were quite sterile. At that point China was in no mood, nor in any position, to entertain very many initiatives, or to take any initiatives. The talks were held in an old Polish palace, a hunting lodge actually of a Polish prince, called Myslevitzky Palace, which was set in a park in a very picturesque setting. The building was thoroughly bugged so we all were conscious of the fact that we were not just talking to each other, but we were also talking to the Poles, and through the Poles to the Soviets. The arrangements for the talks were that each side had four members. There was the ambassador on each side, a political adviser, an interpreter, and a scribe, as he was called -- the note taker. We would meet in this meeting room in the palace and we alternated on who spoke first, and each side would deliver a prepared statement running about 15 or 20 minutes. In fact, I used to participate in drafting it, and once it was drafted and approved back in Washington I could sit down with my dictionary and translate it into Chinese. I interpreted from English to Chinese, and their guy interpreted from Chinese to English which is the reverse of normal interpreting situations. And then after the two prepared statements there was sort of a give and take back and forth, oftentimes working from prepared position papers because we pretty well knew what the Chinese were going to say.

At the conclusion of the meeting -- the press almost always came to Warsaw for the meetings, American press, the wire services, etc. -- we'd meet briefly with the press, and usually say nothing more than, "We had a useful and productive exchange of views. No further comment."

Then the following day, we had an informal arrangement where the political adviser and the interpreter would meet with their counterparts, usually at the Chinese embassy, and we would give them an English text of our opening statement, they would give us a Chinese text of theirs, and if there was any confusion about terminology, or what we meant by something, we would try and straighten it out during this informal meeting.

I don't know how the Chinese felt about it, but the American side felt it was a useful sort of informal contact where we could talk without the constraints of a formal negotiating session.

It also turned out to be useful in other ways. At the first meeting I attended in '66, we went over to the Chinese embassy -- my predecessor actually did the interpreting, I was there...

Q: Who was the predecessor?

ANDERSON: Al Harding. The Chinese gave him a little farewell -- they had soft drinks and beer, which Al said normally they didn't do. They normally had tea. But it was rather interesting because we noted that in the meeting room where they received us on the wall over the sofa there had obviously been two portraits, there were two light spots on the wall. When we got there there was one portrait of Mao Zedong in the middle, and it was one of the really first conclusive bits of evidence that Liu Shao-chi, the former head of state, had indeed been purged, and was no longer a person. Then as we left the building, on the walls in the halls of the embassy, there were pieces of paper with hand-written slogans which was the beginning of the big character posters of the Cultural Revolution.

Q: You say a prepared statement, was this just two people talking past each other?

ANDERSON: In large part. In the early days we had a number of concerns that we had to address. One thing we talked about was pilots who were flying against North Vietnam but who strayed and went over into Chinese territory and were lost. We were trying to get an accounting for them. Vietnam was a major factor for meeting all the way up toward the end. But at that first meeting in '66, we did use a phrase which was intended, and I think interpreted by the Chinese, as an assurance that we did not intend to invade North Vietnam and told the Chinese in that meeting that, "we seek no wider war in Vietnam."

Q: This often was a bone of contention saying we should just go in. Was it your feeling, and those with you, that this could really tip things if we landed at Haiphong or something like this. This could bring the Chinese in?

ANDERSON: Yes. And that's what we were trying to prevent. On the U.S. side we were trying to promote some sort of informal non-official contact. We were trying to get journalists into China for business, and a variety of what we saw as concrete practical steps that one could take to improve the atmosphere in relations and perhaps lower the tension levels between the two countries. The Chinese were not having any of that. It was a very sterile period. They were primarily berating us on Vietnam. For example, we picked up a Chinese boat that had gotten in trouble in the Tonkin Gulf. It had been in distress and one of our ships picked it up, towed it into port. We gave them food and fixed their ship up, and sent them back. And we mentioned this as something we had done as a humanitarian gesture, and they, of course, denounced us for it.

During the Cultural Revolution period, most of their people got pulled back to Beijing. This was a period when all of their diplomats were being called back to China to take part in the Cultural Revolution, so that the senior official on the Chinese side was usually a chargé d'affaires, not the ambassador, and their interpreter would come back and forth. As I say, the talks were really pretty dull at that point. The Chinese obviously had instructions that they had to have the last word, so our ambassador would respond to a charge by the Chinese, and the Chinese then felt obliged to answer again. Therefore, the talks sometimes would drag on for three hours or more. I can remember one time the political adviser on the Chinese side, who was really not a political adviser, their interpreter was far and away the more influential and the brightest of any of the group. The chargé turned to the interpreter after the talk had gone on for about two and a half hours, and said, "Can I stop now?" The interpreter said, "No." So he made another charge about something. So we would usually decide this had gone on long enough, we'd let them have the last word, and then decide on the next meeting.

But the rather humorous thing about it was, the reporters didn't get anything substantive because we would come out and give them a bland statement. In 1970, toward the end of the talks, we really did make some significant progress. In fact, the two opening statements were sufficiently substantive and significant, and meshed in such a way that neither side felt that they could go beyond that particular point without getting further instructions. So the meeting lasted for about a half an hour, maybe 40 minutes, and the press, of course, interpreted it as indicating that our relations had reached the lowest point ever. But it was finally, a significant and substantive meeting.

Q: ...looked at each other and said, "What do we do now?"

ANDERSON: That's exactly right. So anyway, the talks proceeded through the Cultural Revolution through a very, very difficult period, and then there was a gap of a full year between talks. Basically after Nixon came into office -- he had already written an article indicating that he thought the United States should move toward improving relations with China, and there began to be some movement to see what could be done. The Chinese at the same time, I think, were becoming interested in improving relations with us. This was the period of the Brezhnev doctrine and a real concern on the part of the Chinese about what the Soviet intentions were.

Q: Did you have any feeling that the Chinese...I mean obviously the Polish intelligence service was passing everything on to the Soviets at that time, that the Chinese were using these meetings to stick it to the Russians, or anything like that from time to time, or not?

ANDERSON: Not so much to stick it to the Russians, I don't think, but it was obviously an inhibiting factor. One thing I didn't mention was, well, we haven't gotten to it yet, but when we decided to try and resume the talks in 1970, we decided we would have to discuss the issue of Taiwan, and some of the fundamentals of the relationship, and that we couldn't do that in the Myslevitzky Palace with the Poles and the Russians listening, so we proposed to the Chinese that we change the venue of the talks. We considered several possibilities, one being a third country less under the thumb of the Russians. And the other one that the Chinese finally agreed on was to move the talks to our two embassies. So the meeting that resumed the talks after about a year's hiatus in January of 1970 was held in the Chinese embassy.

Q: Was it sort of the feeling that we were ready and willing to do a lot of things, but was really waiting until the Chinese were ready to make some moves? Was this more or less how things were going? Or were we as disinterested observers say, we were also stalling and not wanting to get anything going?

ANDERSON: We were stalling to a degree, and particularly we were not prepared to do much in terms of recognizing the legitimacy of the Chinese government of the People's Republic of China. What we wanted to do was more, as I said, the concrete practical level of exchanges, and solving problems. They wanted to talk about fundamentals, and that's why we decided toward the end of '69 that if we were to resume the talks we ought to try and address some of these questions. At that point I think Nixon and Kissinger were in favor of that, and we were able to do things for the first time in terms of formulations on political relationships that we couldn't have done under Johnson, and particularly under Dean Rusk.

Q: Was the feeling this was Dean Rusk who was calling the shots on China policy? Or was this basically the Democrats having been burned on China once weren't going to get themselves caught again?

ANDERSON: Dean Rusk played a major role. He had been Assistant Secretary for Asia, he had been in China, he considered himself a China expert. He was very conservative on China issues. It was very difficult to get any flexibility as far as the seventh floor...

Q: The seventh floor being where the Secretary of State dwells.

ANDERSON: And then when the Nixon administration came in and Walter Stoessel, who was then the ambassador in Poland, was instructed to contact the Chinese, and indicate that we would like to resume the talks. Paul Kreisberg was the Office Director. By that time it had become the Office of Chinese Affairs, it was no longer Asian Communist Affairs. We shed North Vietnam and North Korea. Paul Kreisberg was also the political adviser to the talks so he and I worked very closely together on this. We were told to start drafting a new set of instructions for Stoessel for a meeting with the Chinese. As I said, that's where we basically agreed, the two of us who had been working on it, that we should talk about Taiwan and some of the more fundamental issues between the two countries.

I remember some of the earlier drafts of the instructions that we did. I was quite surprised to find that the feeling was that we hadn't gone far enough.

Q: Was it a surprise, or not, when the Nixon administration came in...obviously Nixon had earned his name as being one of the most vehement anti-communist early on. Was there a feeling there, "Oh my God, here we're moving farther to the right on this." How did you feel about this?

ANDERSON: No, there wasn't because while Nixon had made his political reputation, as you say, as a vehement anti-communist, he was also recognized as a very savvy and pragmatic international thinker. He had already announced the so-called Nixon Doctrine of limited U.S. involvement. And he had written in one of the journals saying we had to find a way to improve our relationship with China. So we knew he was inclined in that direction. So there wasn't any worry about the ideological aspect of that particular Nixon anti- communist position.

Q: Again, the '66 to '70 period, what was our view of the Cultural Revolution? Because I suppose in many ways this was your main preoccupation, wasn't it?

ANDERSON: It was. Well, it was very clearly an unmitigated disaster for China. By that time we were getting a lot of intelligence, mostly through Hong Kong, of what was happening in the provinces. There were a number of places in China where it was nothing short of civil war. They were using artillery, and the two factions were engaged in pitched battles. Bodies would come floating into Hong Kong harbor that had been executed. Sometimes multiple bodies all tied together would float into Hong Kong from these factional fights that took place just up in Guangdong province. And, of course, it was a tremendous guessing game as to who was doing what to whom in the upper reaches of the government in Beijing. It was sort of an analyst dream...play the game because so much of the indications of where things were going was done in the press, largely through historical allegories and this kind of stuff. It was great fun to play the game, but it was very, very hard to read.

We did have very good intelligence on the degree of chaos that was going on in China. I remember Bill Bundy during the '60s -- during the height of the Cultural Revolution -- set up sort of a Wise Men's Group of some academic scholars. They were the best in the United States...

Q: Fairbanks and...

ANDERSON: Fairbanks, Bob Scalapino, Doak Barnett. They would come to Washington periodically to discuss "whither China." One of them finally told me, he said, "You know, we're getting more out of this than you are." Because we were assiduously collecting everything we could get by way of intelligence from the provinces, and probably knew about as much as anybody, which wasn't certainly enough, but we did have a very good...

Q: How did we feel? I mean was this Mao Zedong going off in a rampage? Or was this a breakdown in authority? What was causing this as far as we saw it?

ANDERSON: The Cultural Revolution?

Q: Yes.

ANDERSON: I think it was the combination of things. It was a power struggle first and foremost. Mao felt that after the Great Leap Forward had failed certain elements of the leadership -- Liu Xiaochi was then head of state, Deng Xiaoping, and a number of others were leading China in a direction of revisionism, or capitalism if you want to put it that way, which they were. They were trying to put the country back together economically from a very dangerous point. And Mao felt he was being shunted aside. He had his own vision of what revolutionary China should be and he decided to mobilize the masses, essentially destroy the system, and then put it back together again. And then obviously there were many people who, for their own purely selfish personal reasons, joined into this struggle for their own personal aggrandizements, or power position, etc., notably his wife, and the people around her.

Q: Later the Gang of Four. What was our estimate of Mao Zedong? Was he a canny political thing? Or was he sort of a bull elephant in a china shop?

ANDERSON: Oh, no. I think Mao was a major political thinker, an ideologue, and a truly great leader. Even despite everything he'd done he's still revered by the people of China. He's probably a leader that should have died about 1951.

Q: Which happens so often. Again, and again you run on these people who outlast, outlive their time.

ANDERSON: But he brought the revolution to a successful conclusion for the communists, introduced a system which brought a certain amount of hope. There were a lot of excesses, but there was also some hope and a feeling that China was making progress in the early '50s.

Q: It was beginning to feed itself, and clothe itself, which it had not been able to do under previous regimes.

ANDERSON: But really from '57-'58 on, it was just one series of disasters. There was the Hundred Flowers campaign, and then the anti-rightist campaign, and then the Great Leap Forward, then the Cultural Revolution. Basically the Cultural Revolution wasn't really over until Mao died in 1976.

Q: How did we view Zhou En-lai? He always seemed to be a very practical person, but yet he survived under Mao. How were we viewing him at this time?

ANDERSON: I think he's a remarkable individual in that...I really can almost literally say, I've yet to find anyone who doesn't admire the guy. He obviously had to be a magnificent opportunist in the sense of knowing where to land, and when to give and when to attack. But he was universally revered. I was in Hong Kong when he died, and in Hong Kong the lines stretched down the street to pay their respects at the memorial service. It was just tremendous, and genuine. I know Chinese today that have fled China, have been persecuted by the Chinese, and who hate the communist system, but one person they can't say anything bad about is Zhou En-lai. It's amazing.

Q: Did we see him...I'm talking about, of course, at that time, as somebody we should keep an eye on because he represented hope? Or did we see him as another one of the boys?

ANDERSON: I think he was always recognized as a pragmatist, and someone who, if there was anybody we could do business with, it was probably assumed it would be Zhou En-lai.

Q: Did you get any feel for Kissinger? Was he involved? Did you have any contact? Or were you feeling the hand of the National Security Council at this time up until 1970? Nixon came in '69, so it really wasn't much time, but did you have any feel for Kissinger?

ANDERSON: Oh, yes. Well, as I say, we had two meetings in Warsaw that were very significant. One was in January of 1970, and the second was in February of 1970. In fact, it was during those two meetings that some of the formulations we put together in terms of describing our views of the relationship between the People's Republic of China, our relationship with Taiwan, and our acceptance of the idea of the unity of China were drafted. Eventually very similar formulations found their way into the Shanghai Communiqué. So in many ways I feel that Paul Kreisberg, who was the principal drafter in most cases, and myself, made a real contribution to the Shanghai Communiqué that emerged in February of 1972. In fact, at that point after the February meeting, we were planning to send a delegation to China which would have been headed by a Presidential emissary. I was working on costing it, how we would do it, and what kind of communications we would require. We were planning for a meeting with the Chinese in Warsaw in April, but the President in the interim had decided to go into Cambodia with American forces and...

Q: This is the spring of 1970. I was in Saigon when they went in so I remember it vividly.

ANDERSON: And the Chinese canceled the talks.

Q: Was our planning kept very hush-hush? Or was this just sort of a normal diplomatic progression that you were working on? I mean the idea of costing-out a Presidential delegation.

ANDERSON: This was usually done in secret, NODIS. Its all been declassified now.

Q: I was just trying to get the feel of how we were...

ANDERSON: No, it was very, very limited. The Chinese canceled the talks. Paul Kreisberg and I returned to the United States, both of us terribly disillusioned because we thought we were really on the edge of a breakthrough. I decided there wasn't any future in messing around with China for the time being and asked for, and got, an assignment to New Delhi. Paul Kreisberg went off as DCM to Tanzania. Henry Kissinger immediately recommenced the talks with the Chinese in an even more clandestine operation in Paris.

Q: Then you went to New Delhi where you were for two years, '70 to '72. What were you doing?

ANDERSON: I was in the external section of the political section. Back in those days...in the bad old days...I think it was Galbraith back in the early '60s decided he needed a China specialist and a Soviet specialist in his political section. So there was a Chinese language officer position in the embassy in Delhi, and I went out as the China specialist, which would have kept me busy about 5% of my time. Actually, my bailiwick, as it turned out, was India's relations with Asia, and the communist world -- Soviet-India relations, Indian-Chinese, Vietnam, and Eastern Europe.

Q: Did you get any feel for the Indian view of China? Were they still wary? How did they feel, because the Cultural Revolution was in full swing.

ANDERSON: The worst part of the violence had pretty well stopped. The Gang of Four was still very much in the saddle.

Q: Yes, little red books waving.

ANDERSON: The Indians, I think, view China with a mixture of awe, envy, and contempt. There are some very good China scholars in India, and obviously it's a country that's very poor. So they feel a sense of competition. These are the two huge land masses in Asia, the two great population bases. And I think I mentioned, there's a feeling that China gets treated better than India. That the West, and in particular the United States, doesn't recognize the importance of India and accept India's logical hegemonic position in South Asia, which doesn't make India very popular with its neighbors. The '62 war at that time in '72, still was a very sore point. For example, Taiwan used to launch propaganda balloons from Quemoy and Matsu off the China coast, and the propaganda balloons would sometimes get picked up in the upper air currents and would sail clear across China, and across the Himalayas, and drop in India. Some guy would find one of these propaganda balloons and every time some Indian parliamentarian would get up and give a speech about, "these terrible Chinese are delivering these propaganda balloons to us, and what is the government going to do to stop this?" So it's just a very minor thing.

In the '62 war all the Chinese restaurants in New Delhi changed their names to Japanese. The first page of the menu would have about five Japanese dishes and the rest of the menu was all Chinese.

Q: Just one last thing, and then we can call it for today. You mentioned this fascination, or the Indians felt we gave more attention to China, I talk as a Foreign Service officer serving around, and no particular speciality, but I've always been intrigued by this fascination we have with China, which goes back to really one of our first consuls where we weren't sending consuls to anywhere else, we sent them to China. There has been this fascination about, and great things are going to happen, which have never happened as far as great trade, etc., etc. Did you feel this? That there's a special China interest in the United States which isn't justified by practicality?

ANDERSON: I obviously think China is an important place. More important, I think, is an almost unique problem we have with China, and it sort of goes both ways with a similar problem in China. There is this love-hate relationship. When things are going well with China, and China is being good, Americans think China is wonderful. It's all panda bears, and rosy-cheeked kindergarten children, and people going to banquets, and delivering stupid speeches. And then when China does something bad, like Tiananmen, then China can do no right. There is this overwhelming desire on the part of the United States people to somehow punish and correct China, which we're going through right now.

Q: This must have been an overlying theme all the time, this reversal back and forth all the time in the United States where we don't really have that much of a problem in relations with other countries.

ANDERSON: That's true.

Q: As a China hand were you aware of this, and thinking, "Oh God, here we go again," or something like this?

ANDERSON: Harold Isaacs wrote a book quite a long time ago called "Scratches on the Mind", where he makes this very clear. We have this problem, partially on the part of Americans because there is this affinity to sort of change China, to make it over into what we think should be the image of China.

***

ANDERSON: I don't know where we finished, but I was in Delhi and got a cable from Washington saying that they wanted me in Paris in two weeks. This was right after the Nixon trip. Actually, the lead-up to the Nixon trip, and the continuing contacts had been conducted in Paris through General Walters...

ANDERSON: ...who was the Military Attaché', and the Chinese ambassador, and after the Nixon trip the contact in Paris sort of went public and the President announced that this would be the point of contact between the Chinese and ourselves, and that Ambassador Arthur K. Watson would represent the U.S. side. It became rather urgent at the time because Ambassador Watson was flying back to the United States on one of his fairly frequent trips and according to the story that appeared in the press, he got rather intoxicated and by way of apologizing to the stewardesses attempted to stuff $10.00 bills in their blouses which one of the stewardesses duly reported to the press. Of course, the press was all over...the State Department and the White House asking, "Is this the guy that's going to be handling our contacts?" "Yes, he's going to do it, but we'll have somebody there with him who is a China specialist." That is why I was suddenly transferred to Paris.

Q: I assume under strict instructions to keep your hands off the stewardesses.

ANDERSON: We got there in May of '72, and as usual in the State Department after turning my family upside down and disrupting their lives, making everybody miserable, we got to Paris and they basically said, "What are you doing here? And we don't really know what to do with you." Pat Byrne was the Asia officer in the political section and she sort of took me under her wing and took me down to meet the ambassador. I remember that quite vividly because we were walking down the hall and Jack Kubisch, who was the DCM, appeared in the hall on our way down to the ambassador's office, and said in an absolute remarkable way, "Whatever he says, agree." It was sort of a panicky advice that I should be terribly cautious. I went down and met with the ambassador and he was an absolutely charming man. We had a session, just the two of us, and he said he considered the China contacts one of the most important jobs that he had in Paris, that I was his man for those contacts, and I had access to him anytime I wanted to. If anybody in the front office gave me a bad time just to come right into his office, etc. So I left thinking this was going to be great.

And then Allen Holmes, who was the Political Counselor, and was very close to the Ambassador -- the Ambassador trusted him implicitly, and the Ambassador did not trust most Foreign Service people -- spoke to me and said there was a question as to whether I would be Special Assistant to the Ambassador and work directly for him, or whether I would be in the Political Section. And Allen advised me, and I think in many ways saved my hide, that it would be much safer if I were in the Political Section because I would have this buffer between myself and the Ambassador.

Q: Because at certain points efficiency reports are written, and if you're Special Assistant it depends on the Ambassador. Whereas Holmes being in the Foreign Service among other things...

ANDERSON: It was even more serious than that in this case. Anyway, that's the way we worked it out. The job really didn't amount to a great deal. The Ambassador didn't take part in many of the routine things that we did, but I saw the Chinese maybe a couple of times a week, and basically didn't have that much to do otherwise.

Q: What sort of things were you dealing with?

ANDERSON: Largely very routine stuff. At this point there were delegations going back and forth between China and the United States. The Chinese delegations almost all came through Paris. They would usually neglect to get their visas arranged and would come into Paris and would have to have a visa by 8:00 the following morning in order to get to whatever appointment they had in the United States. The first Boeing sale was made, and the Boeing people came through to meet the Chinese who were en route to Seattle and didn't know how to do it, so I took care of that. A lot of that kind of routine stuff.

The big thing that we were waiting for was two packages, one educational exchanges and the overall umbrella arrangement that we were trying to set up to begin educational and cultural exchanges; and a business package to set up a similar kind of relationship and a structure for beginning business relationships, remembering that at that point we had no representatives in Beijing. We had no diplomatic relations so this was the only way we could do these things in a non-official type relationship. This was the point at which the organization I'm now with, as matter of fact, the U.S.-China Business Council which was then called the National Council for U.S.-China Trade, was designated as the umbrella organization for trade. The National Committee on U.S.-China Relations and the Committee on Scholarly Communications with the People's Republic of China were designated as the educational and cultural umbrella organizations. We were expecting to get these two packages to present to the Chinese, that was probably into around early August and the Ambassador was going home on vacation so I was pushing Washington to get these things. They finally got them out to us, two lengthy cables, and when I came into the embassy that morning the two cables were waiting, and it just happened that the Ambassador was calling on the Chinese Ambassador because he was going on vacation the following day. It was a rather extraordinary meeting because the Ambassador had been out the night before, and was nowhere to be found in the embassy. I spoke to his staff assistant, who was very wise in the ways of the Ambassador, and said, "We've got to wake this guy up, and get him ready. We've got these two things." He said, "Leave it to me, Don. Don't call the residence."

Q: I take it this was a very ticklish situation.

ANDERSON: He was a very volatile individual, he could be absolutely charming at times, but he could fire you on the spot as well. So he went over to the residence, and I got the car and met him over there. He brought the Ambassador down and I handed him the two papers. Each were about, I would say, maybe ten pages long -- one on educational exchanges, and one on the commercial relationship. He glanced at them, and tossed them back in my lap and I believe his words were, "This is crap. I'm not going to talk about this penny-ante stuff." He said, "I'll leave that to you to take care of with your counterparts." And while we were riding over to the Chinese embassy he said, "What I really want to do today is just talk about global issues, sort of a tour d'horizon," for which we had no instructions whatsoever. In fact I had been specifically told by the NSC that I was not to do that kind of thing, that this was basically a mail delivery program and I was not to engage in other types of conversation.

But we did sit down with Ambassador Huang Chen, who was an interesting individual, and Ambassador Watson did indeed proceed to indulge in a tour d'horizon. The most memorable moment of which I remember -- this was 1972 -- he said, "Mr. Ambassador, the one thing that I think both of our countries have to worry about the most is Germany and Japan." Ambassador Huang, I thought, looked rather surprised at this statement, but we carried it all off, and went back. I wrote a reporting cable which reported mainly what Ambassador Huang said. Ambassador Watson later told me it was the best cable he had seen written in the embassy since he had been there.

He left very shortly after that and went home, and I am told...I don't know this from my personal experience, that he was met in the United States, and informed that it was time for him to resign. So that was really the last I saw of Ambassador Watson.

Q: Could you explain a bit about who was Ambassador Watson? What was his background?

ANDERSON: He was one of the sons of Arthur Watson, the founder of IBM. He had been president of IBM International, and as you know, his brother became Ambassador to the Soviet Union and the story was at the time that there was a question of who was going to become chairman of the board, and the senior leadership at IBM did not want Arthur K., so they arranged for him to become ambassador. I was told later that he had told someone in the embassy that he had always considered me to be the State Department spy in this China business, and he considered that I was responsible for his demise as ambassador, which was not true at all because I was very careful about that.

Q: Just to get a little feel for somebody looking at this in future times. Maybe you were sort of a mailbox operation there while these other things were happening, but at the same time there still was an official source of communication. Kissinger was head of the NSC at that time. Were you getting instructions, or whatever you want to call them from people in the NSC, "Watch this guy. We don't want him to screw things up," or anything like that? Were people telling you this?

ANDERSON: Not really. I was hearing in the embassy, and I think it was generally understood, that this guy was rather volatile, and sort of an unguided missile. But, as I say, the instructions were really that we were a mailbox, and I can remember one instance when Marshall Green came through, he was the Assistant Secretary at the time, and I told him that I was going to try and use these contacts to broaden the discussion. And he said, "That's fine Don." And the first time I wrote a cable back based on a discussion with my counterpart on his views on Sino-soviet relations, I got a very fast phone call from Washington saying, "Dr. Kissinger does not want you doing that. Deliver the mail, and that's all." So I did very little of that.

My only other job in Paris during that whole period was to fill in for the Vietnam Liaison; actually I did get involved in the Vietnam peace talks which took place at that time, and which involved the Chinese, of course. In fact, we had a meeting with Secretary Rogers who was with the U.S. delegation, and the Chinese representatives at the Paris Peace Conference during that time. There was a period when Jack Kubisch was involved with the talks, then Jack Irwin who was the next ambassador to come out. By that time Henry Kissinger had gone...this would be November of '72, Henry Kissinger had gone to Beijing again, and they had announced that they were going to open a Liaison Office in Beijing, which I think was a very neat diplomatic stroke. They basically had an embassy, without calling it an embassy, and managed to finesse many of the issues.

Q: Particularly the two Chinas problem which was Formosa and...

ANDERSON: I'm convinced that the Chinese, and I think probably Henry Kissinger, reached agreement on the establishment of the Liaison Office with the understanding that this was the first step toward diplomatic relations and the establishment of a full- fledged embassy. I think probably the Chinese expected it to happen, and they expected it to happen much more quickly. In fact, it took from '73 all the way to December '79 when Carter finally announced establishment of diplomatic relations. I think that was a much longer period, but it was due in large part to, on the one hand the Chinese side which was going through a succession struggle with Mao and the Gang of Four; and on our side we had Watergate.

Q: This was forcing Nixon out of office.

ANDERSON: So what happened was, basically I knew from November of '72 that my job in Paris was going to come to an end because we would be setting up the Liaison Office. Then I was informed by Washington that I would be going from Paris to Beijing. I went on a direct transfer from Paris to Beijing in May of '73, so I was in Paris literally one year.

Q: Back to the peace talks. What were your perspective of those peace talks at that particular place and time?

ANDERSON: I was not involved at the high policy level. My job was basically liaison with the Chinese. We kept the Chinese very well informed on positions that we were taking. Again, I was something of a mail man. I was the guy that Bill Sullivan would send out to the Chinese embassy at night to deliver papers and messages, and talk to the Chinese about what our positions were going to be. I think basically the Paris peace talks were a means for the United States to exit Vietnam. I mean it's a very controversial agreement, but at the time I think, viewed with a great deal of relief by most of the people that were involved.

Q: Did you get any feel for the Chinese role? Were they sort of passive by-standers?

ANDERSON: They were cooperative in the sense that they did not make obstacles. In fact, the atmosphere between our two sides was very good. The Chinese ambassador gave a dinner for...it was a Vice Foreign Minister on the Chinese side. We all went out and I can remember that the atmosphere at the dinner, and at a separate meeting that we had at the American ambassador's residence, basically talking about bilateral U.S.- China issues, was very good. I think at that point they felt the U.S.-China relationship was moving rather rapidly in the right direction.

Q: How about the lips and teeth relationship between China and Vietnam? Did you have any feel that this was almost now a secondary problem for them?

ANDERSON: Yes. I think there was very little of that kind of...well, practically none of that kind of rhetoric in our discussion. And, as we found out later of course, the lips and teeth relationship was a rather tenuous one at best. My view of the whole Sino-Vietnamese relationship was one of sort of mutual necessity bringing together two natural adversaries and as soon as the necessity ended in 1975 when the Vietnam war ended, the natural antagonisms came right back.

Q: You were right in there on the opening up of our Liaison Office?

ANDERSON: Yes. I got there, I believe it was in June of '73. The initial people, Ambassador David Bruce, who was the head of the Liaison Office, and much of the Liaison Office staff had already arrived when I got there. I had to shut down things in Paris, and I went back home for a few weeks. Then went on to Beijing. It was a real honeymoon period. The Chinese were doing their absolute dead-level best to be as cooperative as they could under the circumstances. Believe me, the circumstances were not that good at that time. I mean, the Gang of Four, Jiang Qing and her group were still very much a force to be reckoned with.

Q: I suppose in political terms you'd call it the radical left. Mao was still alive, but failing.

ANDERSON: Mao was still alive, but failing, and Zhou En-lai was very much managing the U.S.-China relationship. But he was failing too. Basically we didn't know that when we got there, at least I didn't. When we set up the Liaison Office, Kissinger came out again in November, and Zhou En-lai appeared in pretty good shape and was at the banquet for Kissinger in the Great Hall of the People. That 1973 visit went very well. My job on that one was as press liaison. I managed the press corps, and the liaison with the information office of the Chinese Foreign Ministry. I thought the visit went smoothly, and Kissinger went away quite pleased with that visit.

For example, on the Liaison Office itself, the Chinese really went out of their way to do everything that we could possibly ask for. The building that they had picked out for us...the system in those days was that they basically built chancelleries and took you out and said, "Which one would you like?" The one they had for us was too small, and we asked them to put an "l" extension onto the end of it. They literally assigned a work crew that went 24 hours a day, and in something like three weeks, had built the extension onto the Liaison Office. It was that kind of atmosphere of "anything we can do to make you happy." At the same time, of course, that they were bugging us, and restricting our travel, and other things.

Q: Was the Gang of Four the radical left were they able to intrude on the process, or were they kept away?

ANDERSON: At that time, they seemed to be cooperating with the whole process. It was a very strange time. I mean, Jiang Qing, for example...

Q: That was Mao's wife.

ANDERSON: ...Mao's wife hosted the Boston Symphony which was one of the big cultural events of the initial period of exchanges. She was very charming, of course, when Nixon was there. She was pushing her revolutionary operas and ballets. That group was a very strange group of people. Jiang Qing, for all of her anti-western attitudes, had a fascination with Western movies. We very quietly worked out an arrangement with Jack Valenti, for example, he would send us movies...

Q: He was president of the American Picture Association.

ANDERSON: He would send us out films that she wanted to see, and we would deliver them to Jiang Qing and her friends, and they would return them. We would return them back because the American Picture Association was very, very sensitive about copyrights, and piracy, and this kind of thing. Some of the choices of her movies I found rather interesting. The first movie she asked for was Day of the Jackal, which deals with assassination.

Q: ...of Charles de Gaulle.

ANDERSON: She also asked for Z, another movie dealing with assassination.

Q: A leftist movie about Greece.

ANDERSON: We didn't really sense any attempts to obstruct the relationship, although there was a power struggle going on at that time between basically the followers of Zhou En-lai, a more pragmatic group, and the leftists. As long as Zhou was alive, it seemed, the U.S.-China relationship was contained. Kissinger came back to Beijing in, I think it was again November of 1974, and by that time I was head of the political section so I was the sort of overall control officer for that visit. Kissinger saw Zhou En-lai in the hospital. He'd already been diagnosed as having cancer. I don't think anybody knew exactly what the diagnosis was, but he was ill. By that time a discussion with Mao had to go through two interpreters; one who spoke his native Hunan dialect, and then someone who could speak Mandarin. It was therefore screened through two female interpreters, one of whom was his niece, and the other was a lady by the name of Nancy Tang who was one of finest interpreters I have ever met, but who got involved with the Gang of Four and eventually got into trouble with them. So the visit in '74 did not go nearly as well as the earlier visits, and I think it was partially a reflection of the power struggle that was going on in Beijing. Of course, we had our own problems back in Washington with the Nixon resignation.

We did accomplish a number of things, largely in terms of cultural exchanges -- some very significant cultural exchanges; getting the business relationship started, some high level visits, and basically getting the mission up and running and finding a way to function. We started out in the late spring of '73, operating out of a couple of hotel rooms, using one-time pads...

Q: This is a coding device, very primitive, very...

ANDERSON: ...slow. The Liaison Office moved to another apartment, and we set up a very primitive communication system in the bathroom of one of the apartments. Then finally we got a whole communication system, and the building, and we were able to move into it. One rather humorous aside, the Chinese in their efforts to please us when they built the new wing...that was part of the reason we needed the new wing was to put the communication section in. They did a lovely paneling job of the room where we were going to put the communication system, which involved strips and then wood paneling over it. Of course, the security people said that absolutely positively there could be no wood paneling on the walls of the communication section, so the Seabees had to go in and tear out all the work that the Chinese did. And one of our senior officers, who was very sensitive to Chinese sensibilities, was trying to figure out how we could tear all this paneling out and dispose of it without offending the Chinese. The Seabees built an absolutely beautiful parquet bar which they put in the Seabee apartment as the result of this.

Q: How did the restrictions and the bugging affect your work? More broadly, here you are, the first time in China, we're starting up after 30 years or so, how did you go about doing political work?

ANDERSON: It was difficult. We had the normal relationship with the Foreign Ministry. When I say normal, it was a pretty sterile relationship. They were always willing to see us, and they were always pleasant when we went to see them, but in terms of a dialogue, we had very little. One major fact that I neglected to mention was that of course, after about the first year, David Bruce left as head of the Liaison Office to become ambassador to NATO, and George Bush arrived as the second head of the Liaison Office. So I was in Beijing for the second year with...

Q: I'd like to talk about both of those gentlemen afterwards.

ANDERSON: As I say, there was very little dialogue. I think, in fact, that was one of the reasons why David Bruce lost interest very early on. I think he, given his background in London, Paris, and Bonn, that he visualized an on-going dialogue with Zhou En-lai. If my memory is correct, he may have seen Zhou En-lai twice after his arrival, but after that he was relegated not even down to the Foreign Minister, but often times being called in by the head of the American and Oceanian Department, who is about the equivalent of an assistant secretary, and at that time not a very pleasant fellow. I think basically, Mr. Bruce decided this was beneath him.

We did a lot of China watching which consisted of reading the newspapers, periodicals, and trying to figure out what the historical references were, the implications of rather arcane philosophical discussions that appeared in the newspaper from time to time, getting out on the streets and walking around. It was very difficult to talk to people but occasionally someone would talk. There was a period during that time when big character posters were put up, a form of expression that the Chinese permitted from time to time. We would go out and literally spend hours just standing in front of a wall reading the big character posters. Then exchanging notes with western journalists who were out doing the same thing, and collecting as much information as we could that way.

Q: I have visions of these big character posters and all these westerners, "Hey, have you seen this one?" "Come over here and look at this one."

ANDERSON: The journalists were much more open about photographing and this sort of thing. So we worked out a deal to acquire those. And then visiting with people who came through, western businessmen, and Chinese-American scholars who would come through oftentimes had better access than we. One of the things we did is attach ourselves to any major delegation, or any delegation at all that we could, that was traveling around China and go with them as escorts. I escorted the first delegation of White House Fellows, for example, on a very interesting trip through China. My wife and I escorted six U.S. governors on a long trip through China. That sort of thing, Congressional delegations, we would go with. It was strange. It was during probably the most restricted period in our bilateral relations in terms of contacts. I traveled more in China in the period '73 to '75 than I've ever traveled in China since. A lot of it was show and tell. We were shown what they wanted us to see and given the standard propaganda line. Then there was a great deal of gullibility in that.

Q: There has always been this strain in American view of China since the earliest days. For some reason Americans have a rosy view, or keep thinking that things will work out in China.

ANDERSON: Actually, the problem is not exactly that way. It's a two-sided problem. We tend to swing to both extremes. China is either, as you say, this wonderful place with its 4,000 years of culture, and panda bears, and rosy cheeked little kindergarten children that we all love. Or it's the other extreme, the Chinese and the Korean War, and brain-washing, and torture. Right now we're much more on the negative end. We do have a difficult time getting ourselves positioned in the middle where we recognize this is a marvelous country with incredible history, but they're also a bunch of bad guys and they can do very nasty things.

Q: How did you find the Chinese bureaucrats? I'm told that they're one of the most difficult to deal with.

ANDERSON: In the Liaison Office period, they were difficult to deal with, particularly if you got into substantive issues where they would have to go out on a limb and make a statement about a political issue. They were very, very cautious. On the other hand, I find their diplomatic service very, very able, and they were a very bright bunch of people. If they're not telling you something, they're not telling you because they're stupid. They're not telling you because they're protecting themselves. And at times they could be very skillful in finding ways to accomplish what you wanted to do.

I don't want to use up too much time but I remember one case when Henry Kissinger was coming and I was handling the press, it would have been '73. Henry had a friend with the New York Times, I can't remember his name now. But anyway, he was traveling in China, and we got this cable from Kissinger saying, "Please arrange to have this guy included as part of the press corps people" the U.S. press corps, the traveling group that came with Kissinger. So I went over to see Mr. Ma, who was head of the International Liaison, and asked if they could do that. And he said, "Mr. Anderson, you must understand that our rules are that only the people traveling with the Secretary on his plane are considered part of the press corps, and that those are the only ones that can be included." He said, "That is our position in principle." He said, "You understand now our principled position." I said, "Yes." And he said, "Now as a practical matter, since this fellow is a friend of Henry Kissinger's he won't be part of the press corps, but we will include him in all of the banquets, all of the briefings." And I discovered that the Chinese often times follow this approach. They have a position in principle which if you understand that, and agree with it, then in terms of practical implementation of that principle, they can do the exact

Q: Back to a couple of the people that you dealt with. David Bruce is one of our preeminent diplomats. How did you find his approach? You've talked a little about him, but how did he operate?

ANDERSON: David Bruce obviously was one of our premier diplomats. He was a very, very decent fellow, and his wife Evangeline was a very nice person. Even though Evangeline still remains very interested in China, I don't really think that they were probably well suited to the job. He was well suited in that he was who he was.

Q: It was a gesture that we're putting a top level person there.

ANDERSON: Yes, exactly. The Chinese did the same thing. They sent Huang Chen, the ambassador to France. It was a gesture to show how important this relationship was and how important the Liaison Office was. But as I say, I think David Bruce really expected that he would be communing with Zhou En-lai, and when it didn't work out, Mr. Bruce really, I think, lost a good bit of interest. He spent a lot of time working on his memoirs and other things. But he came through when it was important. Nick Platt was the first chief of the Political Section, who had a fatal accident in China -- hit a girl on a bicycle through no fault of his and when he was asked to leave David Bruce was absolutely marvelous in making sure that Nick was taken care of, and it not reflect on him. He looked after his people, had very little patience with children however, which was sometimes a sore point. We had our kids out there...

Q: ...and compound living.

ANDERSON: ...and it was very tough living. The compound for much of the time was hotel living, but I don't think David had much sympathy for little kids. In contrast, George Bush was much more conscious of this type of thing.

Q: Well, tell about George Bush. Now George Bush came to this really...we're speaking at a time when George Bush is President of the United States, but at this time he wasn't a major figure particularly. He had bounced around in a bunch of jobs.

ANDERSON: Some fairly big ones.

Q: Had he been head of the CIA by that time?

ANDERSON: No. He went from the Liaison Office to become head of CIA. He had been a Congressman from Texas, and then ran unsuccessfully for the Senate. I get a little mixed up myself...he was chairman of the Republican Party, and he was Ambassador to the UN. I think he was Ambassador to the UN and then became chairman of the Republican Party, and then came out as head of the Liaison Office.

Q: But still, from Bruce to Bush at that time, he wasn't carrying quite the weight, was he? Or maybe I'm misreading this.

ANDERSON: He didn't really have the same cachet as having been ambassador to London, Paris and Bonn. On the other hand, in many ways politically, he was better plugged in, and probably had more clout in Washington with the Nixon administration and ultimately later the Ford administration, than Bruce. He was not without clout.

Q: Could you describe how he operated during the time you were there?

ANDERSON: He's a very energetic guy, and sort of a go-go-go type of approach. I think the first message we got was a message to be conveyed to, I think, the Ghanaian ambassador -- it was one of the African ambassadors who he had known at the United Nations. The message was to inform the Ghanaian ambassador he had just become the second best tennis player in the diplomatic corps. They had been tennis rivals in New York. He arrived running; I think he gave a reception for the entire Liaison Office staff the day he got off the plane. One of the first things he did was go out and buy a ping-pong table and move it into the formal dining room of the residence so that the kids could go over and play ping-pong, and he would go over at lunch time and play with them.

But again, I think he was frustrated by the lack of communication and dialogue with the Chinese. I remember at that time we were dealing very frequently with a lady by the name of Wang Hainong, who was Mao's niece and at that point was an Assistant Minister of Foreign Affairs. She was really noteworthy for her clamlike approach to dialogue, and I think it used to drive George Bush up the wall because he would go over and we would have a message to deliver from Washington on whatever issue. Quite literally most of the time the message would take five minutes, and then Wang would sort of sit there, and George Bush would be damned if he was going to arrive at the Foreign Ministry and leave ten minutes later. So he would sometimes tend to launch into discussions of issues, political issues that I wondered about occasionally at the time, because we got no response. Wang, or whoever was her interlocutor would sit and listen but we got very little in response.

Q: Do you have any feel for how the policy apparatus worked at that time? In other words, we'd go in and deliver a message which we felt there should be some response, or something like that, you'd get the clam treatment more or less, but did you have any feel what happened to policy things, and how they came back and answered them.

ANDERSON: Oh, we would get a response eventually but basically the way it worked Washington would send us a message, we would go over to the Foreign Ministry, deliver the message, and they would say, "Thank you, we will inform the appropriate offices." And then maybe a week later we would get a phone call saying, "Would you come in?" We would go in, and they would read from their prepared position paper. So we got answers, but it was a process that had to go through particularly the party machinery to get the right answer, or to get an approved answer. What I meant was, in a normal diplomatic situation you could go in and do that, and there is conversation and some back and forth in dialogue on the issue. But there was very little of that. Basically, I think everyone was scared to death. It was a time when the power struggle in Beijing was very intense, so no one was going to stick their neck out.

Q: Was that the situation the whole time you were there?

ANDERSON: Yes. I left Beijing in the summer of '75, and went to Hong Kong. The Consul General in Hong Kong asked me to come down and we amalgamated the political and economic section into a China reporting section. We were dealing with both economic and political reporting, and he asked me to come down and run that, which I did. We had relatively little operational kinds of functions, but it was a terribly interesting time from a reporting standpoint. Zhou En-lai died...I got there in early fall of '75, and Zhou En-lai died I believe it was February of '76. I can no longer remember the exact sequence, but Chu De, who was number two to Mao for many years, died. Then Mao himself died. And before that they had the Tangshan earthquake which was the enormous earthquake in the Northeast. Three weeks after Mao died we had the arrest of the Gang of Four. So 1976 was a tremendously eventful year in China, and we were observing from Hong Kong through the Chinese press, through intelligence.

Q: The question always comes, Hong Kong was the preeminent China watching place for years, all of a sudden we open an office in Beijing, so what's Hong Kong doing? And why is it still doing its thing?

ANDERSON: It's because the two bring two different kinds of attributes. In Beijing you have on-the-scenes, you have the ability to talk to people, you can get out on the streets, you're interacting with the Foreign Ministry and other ministries in the government. There is a large political relationship to be managed, which requires an on-the-spot presence of an embassy. Hong Kong, on the other hand, is outside looking in. It has a number of advantages as well. One is resources. There is a Foreign Service national staff there, a local Chinese staff many of whom have worked for the Consulate for 20 or more years, who have followed these developments and have a historical memory that is invaluable. And being Chinese they can get through Chinese materials twice as fast as any American regardless of how good his language is. And then there is the international press, and a whole China watching community there. And a very substantial intelligence operation. There are intelligence resources there that you don't have anywhere else. And it's been very interesting that over a long period of time you get a different perspective from Beijing and Hong Kong. Usually Hong Kong, when developments are happening, when events are breaking, Hong Kong tends to be more on the pessimistic side that things are going wrong, or that there is a power struggle going on. And in Beijing, living right in the community, the inclination I think is to see things as being more normal than they look from the outside.

Q: Before we leave the Nixon-Ford administration, what was Kissinger's role once he established this relationship? Did he sort of move on to other things? Did you feel that Kissinger was really on top of the China relations all the time?

ANDERSON: Pretty much, yes. He retained a very direct interest in China, and at a minimum Kissinger, I think, sort of set a tone that really shaped the way we dealt with China for a very long time. Essentially Kissinger saw the opening to China as part of a global strategic move, and was very much interested in the triangular relationship. At the same time I think he was very affected by China in his book, and speeches I've heard him give. He was obviously very impressed with Mao and Zhou En-lai, and with their intellectual capabilities, their strategic thinking, and this kind of thing. I think they were people he felt he could commune with. Then there was very definitely an atmosphere in the U.S. government as long as Kissinger was running the show that basically in dealing with China you looked at the big picture and the strategic relationship, don't bother with details which led to, I think, a lot of people...not necessarily myself, but a lot of people feeling that we were giving away things that we didn't need to give to China. In other words, if the Chinese said, "We want this," in terms of a negotiation, the inclination was to say, "Okay," rather than have a show-down, and quibble over details, which may or may not have been wise.

Q: What about in Hong Kong the view there of events and Vietnam and Chinese- Vietnamese relations?

ANDERSON: At that period really Vietnam did not figure terribly large.

Q: It was our major preoccupation, and then it just dropped over the horizon?

ANDERSON: The Hong Kong Consulate General did not contribute to the Vietnam picture at that particular time. There were the beginnings of Vietnamese refugees, and as a matter of fact, I had one guy working for me who did nothing but Indochina matters. It was not a major focus.

Q: You left there and came back to Washington?

ANDERSON: Yes.

Q: First you were in Micronesian negotiations for a while from '77 to '78. What were you doing on that?

ANDERSON: I was the Deputy U.S. representative. The Micronesian operation is a very strange thing. It was called the Office of Micronesian Status Negotiations, and the head of the office had the rank of ambassador. At the time I was there it was Peter Rosenblatt. I was a very small part of a process that had been going on, at that point, for about ten years, and went on again for another five or six after I left. The objective was to negotiate a relationship with the Micronesian states which was called Free Association. The United States objective, in crude terms, was to grant limited sovereignty to these states so they could basically manage most of their internal affairs while we retained control of their foreign affairs, their foreign economic relations, and their foreign military relations because a major player in this whole thing was the Department of Defense, which was looking at Micronesia...I always felt in terms of World War II Pacific.

Q: We'd gone to a great deal of effort and blood to seize these islands from the Japanese. And I guess the Soviets were sniffing around in the Pacific.

ANDERSON: Then you have to realize Truk, the Marshall Islands, and Eniwetok, these were places where we shed a lot of blood. And there was also in the Marshall Islands another factor which made it very important to us, the Kwajalein Missile Range which was an almost perfect site for testing intercontinental ballistic missiles. We would fire them from Vandenberg Air Force Base in California and drop the warheads into the lagoon at Kwajalein. It was exactly the right depth. So we had some interest, but it was an almost tragic negotiation in many ways. It was a clash of a huge wealthy western culture coming into an essentially native island culture. Right after World War II the Navy ran the Micronesian Trust, and basically took the approach of sort of anthropologically not disturbing the native life. The UN, under which we had the mandate, went in and looked around and said, "These people are living in poverty. You've got to do something to improve their livelihood." The responsibility got moved to Interior, who then took the approach, "We're going to modernize and bring you into the 20th century, and get all these good things for you."

I don't know what the right answer is quite frankly. The result was you had one of the highest rates of government employment I think anywhere in the world. People forgot how to fish, people forgot how to do the things that they had done for generations. Alcoholism became a problem, and economic development was practically zero.

Q: I have an interview I've done with Peter Rosenblatt which would bring this up. Then you went to the China desk where you were from '78 to '80. This was the Carter administration. Was this different? This was a new world, wasn't it?

ANDERSON: It was a new world, but in terms of the U.S. approach to China policy, it was very little changed. The China policy remained very consistent, and as a matter of fact of course, Carter was the one who was finally able to start moving toward normalization of relations, and did so in '79. I'll be absolutely honest with you, I ended up as deputy on the China desk largely because I really wanted to get out of the Micronesian negotiations. They were fascinating in many respects, but I felt like I was kind of out in left field. Our offices were over in the Department of Interior, and I didn't feel that I was in the main stream of what was going on at State. So when I was offered the job of deputy, I came over. And I was glad I did because I ended up being there at the time of establishment of diplomatic relations and the visit to the United States of Deng Xiaoping and some very historic moments in U.S.-China relations.

Q: When you arrived there, how did you see this relationship? We had a strong relationship with Taiwan, and we were working this other one, the two China policy. How did this work out? What was the bureau suggesting that we do?

ANDERSON: One big problem at this particular time was that the normalization negotiations, and some of the moves that were being made, were so highly restricted, so highly classified, that a lot of the other kinds of lower level measures that needed to be taken to prepare for it were not being taken because you couldn't tell the people that had to do it. For example, the Legal Adviser was called upon to perform heroic service when we were starting to move toward normalization and had to have some form of legislation to take care of Taiwan. Because of the relationship we had with Taiwan, we couldn't just simply say, "Good bye," and walk away. The Japanese had led the way with their arrangement that they had developed with Taipei after they normalized with Beijing, and we more or less followed some aspects of the Japanese model where we created in effect an embassy, but declared it a private, non-profit, entity. That was all done through the Taiwan Relations Act, and of course, this all had to be done in the context of the normalization negotiations. And as I say, much of it was very difficult to accomplish because the people you needed to do it couldn't be told why they were doing it. Or if they were asked to do it, they would know what was up. I was kept briefed and involved on the normalization negotiations up to the very end. I guess that would have been into November, but then in early December, I believe it was...

Q: This would be '79.

ANDERSON: ...'79, Ambassador Woodcock, who had been meeting with the Chinese Foreign Minister, had two meetings, or maybe three, with Deng Xiaoping. That was where the last pieces fell into place. I'm sure it took Deng Xiaoping himself to say, "All right, we will do these things." Then it was decided that they were going to do it. I was not included in that, and as a matter of fact I remember vividly that on December 15th when Jimmy Carter went on television to announce that we were establishing diplomatic relations with China, it was the day of the East Asian Christmas party. I got a phone call from Bernard Kalb...

ANDERSON: I had known Bernie for a long time, and he said, "Don, what's going on?" I said, "I don't know," and I added, "I really mean it, I don't know." "Well," he said, "the White House had just announced the President is going to make a major foreign policy statement at 9:00 tonight. He said, "There is nothing going on that he would be making an announcement about, nothing in the Soviet Union, and there's nothing in the Middle East." He said, "Its got to be China." He said, "Is he going to normalize relations?" And I said, "Bernie, I have no idea, and don't you say that anybody on the China desk had any kind of a clue, because it's true." He said, "We're going to go with it anyway." And they did, and they were right. At 9:00 that night Jimmy Carter...

Q: Did someone then brief you on what was happening?

ANDERSON: By the Christmas party things did sort of begin to fall apart, and it was generally understood that that was what was going to happen.

Q: Was the reason for these negotiations of this type, or concern, within the American political environment that this might intrude?

ANDERSON: Yes, I think it was. There were several problems. One, there was concern about Taiwan. Taiwan actually got treated rather shabbily in terms of notification. I think that they did not want Taiwan to know that we were about to make this move because Taiwan at that time had quite a strong lobby on the Hill. I don't think they wanted the Hill to know too far in advance. They did brief, but a very, very short time before it actually became known. And there was a good deal of resentment about that in the Congress as well. But I think that they did not want a big political "brouhaha" blowing up with Congress passing emergency resolutions, and the top people on Taiwan going to their constituencies and so forth, so it was very closely held.

Q: Taiwan was part of the China desk, wasn't it until that point?

ANDERSON: No. It had been separated. At the time of normalization, there was a Republic of China desk. And quite some time earlier, actually in the '60s, we had split the Mainland off from Taiwan, there was the Republic of China desk, and originally there was the Office of Asian Communist Affairs which included China. And then we dropped North Vietnam and North Korea and it became just the China desk. So the two desks were separate.

Q: And as a practical measure they both had been going in such different directions that they could be treated as a practical measure as different countries, couldn't they?

ANDERSON: In practical terms there was a lot of that, yes. The ROC desk and the China desk worked obviously very closely, and now there is a Taiwan Liaison Staff in the Office of Regional Affairs, again, which works quite closely with the China desk, because almost every major policy impinges on both sides. I don't know if you read the Washington Post today, but there's a sale of F-16 fighters to Taiwan which looks like it might be going through which would have some major implications for both sides.

Q: It seems to be more a political move to get the Texas vote for your former ambassador, George Bush.

ANDERSON: There may be an element of that, I'm sure.

Q: During this China desk period '78 to '80. Any other major events that you were dealing with? One would be the visit of Deng Xiaoping, and how he was viewed by us at that time.

ANDERSON: I think his visit was a tremendous success, and he was very popular everywhere he went. I accompanied the Deng party on that trip around the United States. Everywhere he went there was a degree of tension because there were the Chinese Nationalists and some people were out with the Chinese Nationalist flag, etc. But by and large his reception was very warm, and I think personally he handled himself very well.

Q: Did he understand the Chinese Nationalists element in the United States? Was he surprised at it, or did you get any feel for that? Was he briefed?

ANDERSON: I don't think he was surprised. I mean, they're pretty sophisticated on that subject, and they follow it extremely closely themselves. It was obviously one of their concerns, and one of the things they talked to us at the working level about. "We understand there's been a few demonstrations here, and what are you going to do about? Will you make sure that they are kept at a certain distance, etc." So they were expecting it, and it was managed I think in a way that satisfied them.

Q: How did you feel about, you might say, the High Command dealing with Far Eastern affairs under the Carter administration? I mean, you had Richard Holbrooke who had been sort of a young Turk in the Foreign Service coming in and he was more interested I suppose in Vietnamese affairs at that time. How was he and his immediate subordinates?

ANDERSON: Basically, I think, pretty good. I always found Dick a difficult person to deal with. But I think he had the right instincts, and we got where we wanted to go. And he had some very good people in the Bureau, and up the line, dealing with people that I dealt with who dealt with China. I found generally they were quite good.

Q: As an East Asian China hand, what was your personal feeling about how our China policy came out, which more or less existed to this day. This was considered quite a bold move on the part of Carter to cut this knot that had been around. How did you feel about how it developed?

ANDERSON: Given the emotional involvement in this whole relationship, I think it came out about as well as could be expected. The immediate Congressional reaction was very strong, and in many cases very negative. And the Taiwan Relations Act reflected Congressional feeling that we were abandoning a friend. But we argued at the time, and I think it has been proven historically accurate, that we were not abandoning Taiwan. In fact, Taiwan has prospered mightily since. From a strictly diplomatic standpoint they have become isolated. But from an economic standpoint, cultural standpoint, they have been successful. And I think the relationship we have with them now is a very sound one.

Q: Was there anything else we should cover in that period?

ANDERSON: I can't think of anything. I'm sure that others have covered some other aspects of it in more detail, some of whom like Harry Thayer, for example, were more directly involved in the beginning of normalization negotiations.

Q: ...Shanghai as Consul General from '80 to '83. You must have felt this was the culmination of your career, didn't you? To have a major post in China, having been out in the place where one would never would return to China? How did you feel about that?

ANDERSON: I wouldn't call it a culmination but it was certainly something that I sought and wanted to do. I considered it a real challenge. Even when I was living in Beijing with the Liaison Office we traveled down to Shanghai quite often. I had found Shanghai a fascinating city, its history.

Q: Its really a very recent history. It goes back to about the 1830s, or something like that.

ANDERSON: Even later than that.

Q: It was a made treaty port, like Hong Kong.

ANDERSON: Yes, but an absolutely fascinating place. I was delighted when I got the job as Consul General, and particularly because we were setting up the post. We were creating something new, and in a way setting precedents, and establishing a new consular mission, which I found particularly interesting.

Q: Were you able to pick up any of the residue of the old consulate which we abandoned and were forced out of in '48? I've interviewed some people who left on ships there. I mean, we went out rather reluctantly, dragging our heels. Was anything of that left at all?

ANDERSON: It is all there, but one of the fall-outs from -- I guess you could call it a fall-out -- from the Taiwan Relations Act, Congress in its desire to protect Taiwan's interests introduced into the Taiwan Relations Act a provision that all properties in the United States held by the former Republic of China would remain the property of Taiwan. So the former Republic of China embassy, and the residence in particular, a place called Twin Oaks which sits on about 12 acres of beautiful land between Connecticut and Wisconsin Avenues, and a number of other buildings continue to belong to Taiwan. So we have never settled our official claims between the PRC and the United States. We haven't gotten back any of our official buildings, really haven't made much of an attempt. So we were not expecting to go back to any of our former official buildings. And, in fact, the then Deputy Chief of Mission, Stapleton Roy, who is now currently our ambassador, was asked down to Shanghai and shown the building that they were going to lease to us, and came back and...I don't know whether you know Stape, but he is not a terribly effusive kind of person, and he was waxing absolutely ecstatic about this building. It was the home of one of the Yung family, who were probably the wealthiest Chinese in Shanghai. It was three acres of gardens, and an absolutely magnificent old mansion that they offered us, which we grabbed, and we're still there. Part of the fun of opening the post was taking this place and converting it into a Consulate General without destroying the beauty.

Q: Did you find a contrast in dealing with the Shanghai authorities? One gets the feeling from reading from the periphery about this that they really are a different breed than the people up in Beijing, much more aware of the world, and looser, and easier to deal with? I don't know.

ANDERSON: There is a certain amount of that. As a matter of fact up in Beijing in the Foreign Ministry you'll find an awful lot of Shanghainese. I used to kid them about the Shanghai mafia that used to run the American and Oceanian Department because there are a lot of people who are originally from Shanghai. For example, the current Chinese ambassador. They are a bit different but you have to realize, of course, I went to Shanghai in 1980, and I was in Beijing in '73. In the interim the Gang of Four had fallen, Deng Xiaoping had come back, so it was a whole new atmosphere. So it was a much easier place to live and deal with. But there were still plenty of problems, and Shanghai in many respects at that time, I think, was kept on a tighter leash by Beijing than many other parts of China. Because really the Gang of Four and this whole Maoist clique that attempted to usurp power, their power base was Shanghai.

Q: The mayor of Shanghai, was he part of that?

ANDERSON: Yes, Zhang Chunqiao was one of the Four, and Wang Hongwen, and all three were from Shanghai, and Jiang Qing herself had...

Q: ...had been an actress in Shanghai.

ANDERSON: So I think Shanghai for a long, long time was viewed with a certain distrust, and there were a lot of hangovers and holdovers from the earlier period that were still in jobs; frequently not doing much but they had not been dislodged. So that it was a different atmosphere, but Shanghai people are generally much more friendly, and effusive, and sophisticated, than in Beijing.

Q: Okay, one, you're setting up this thing, but what else did you do? How did you go about it?

ANDERSON: We basically set up the whole gambit of things. One important thing was getting the consular operation going. We held off the formal opening of the Consulate until we felt we had all of the necessary infrastructure. The consular section was built, and we had the visa machines and everything that we needed. At the opening ceremony I said, "We will be open for business tomorrow morning and ready to provide a full range of services." At 5:00 the next morning we had a line of about 60 people waiting to apply for visas. We did a very big consular business. We did a fair amount of trade promotion. Shanghai was one of the more popular places for American businesses to come, and there were a number of things really just getting started that we could...

Q: Had they established those economic zones?

ANDERSON: No, they hadn't come yet. That was later. They were on their way, they were planning them but they hadn't come yet. But Foxboro, for example, which produces electric monitoring equipment for industrial processes, was setting up a joint venture. Nike Shoes came in and tried to set up a joint venture. McDonald Douglas was just beginning what became a major co-production operation building commercial jets. So we had the beginning of a business community, and we had regular meetings of this community to brief them and get their reactions. Finally that grew into the Shanghai- American Chamber of Commerce which now has well over 65 or 70 members.

There were a lot of things not directly related to the consular operations, things like setting up the school. We had to create the Shanghai-American school. We had a cultural section and a very active cultural and educational program. We got the exchange visitor program going, and I think were very successful there. Often times Beijing couldn't use all their international visitor grants and we were always ready to grab them. And Shanghai has an Institute for International Studies, which is one of their most sophisticated sort of Rand type operation. We sent a lot of those people to the United States on short-term grants, and those people have been friends of the Consulate and friends of the United States for a long time.

Q: The great onrush of Chinese students to the United States was probably, I suspect, will be the most significant thing that was done.

ANDERSON: I agree with you.

Q: I mean this back and forth, China will never be the same.

ANDERSON: I totally agree with that. I take a certain amount of pride that either on the China desk, or in my jobs overseas, I have always pushed that aspect because I totally agree that the 140,000 Chinese that have come to the United States now, and it's growing every year, will be a tremendously important factor in our bilateral relations and in China's modernization. I was struck by that when I was Consul General in Shanghai because at that time, after the Gang of Four period was wound up, many of the older people who had been in prison or had been under house arrest, or whatever, were coming back and getting responsible positions. And many of these people had been trained either in the United States, or at places like St. John's University in Shanghai which was an American run missionary university.

Q: And Yale had some...

ANDERSON: Yale was not so big in Shanghai but there were a lot of people who had had extensive contacts with them, and who were American educated. And dealing with them was just marvelous because they understood even after an absence of 35 years what we were talking about.

Q: Did you have any problems on the consular side with protection of welfare, Americans getting into trouble? Or wasn't that a factor particularly?

ANDERSON: We had probably less than many places. People tended to be a little more on their good behavior in China than they are in Tijuana or Naples, or some place like that. We had a few people go around the bend, a few people died. We had several cases of absolutely fascinating individuals who had stayed on in China, American ladies, who had lived in China for the past 30-40 years -- in one case for 50 years. She was a Quaker lady from Pennsylvania, had married a Chinese who was studying in the United States and when he got his Ph.D. she married him, and went back to China. This was in the '20s when an American woman, if she married a foreign national, lost her nationality. She had lived as a Chinese all her adult life. We got to know Muriel, and she was a great gal, tougher than nails, and finally decided she wanted to get her American passport and be an American citizen. So we had quite a range, some rather bizarre consular matters.

Tragically, one of our officers married a young girl from Taiwan where he had met her studying Chinese, and she came over after they were married, of course, a little bit nervous about moving to Communist China from Taiwan. And they were out on a trip, one of the consular corps sponsored trips, died suddenly of a heart attack, age 27. Suddenly we had a dead wife, the family wanted a Buddhist ceremony funeral which we managed to do, and got the body shipped back to Taiwan via Japan. It was a terribly sad thing, but in many ways it was kind of touching because one of the Foreign Affairs Office people, who was helping us with this, and he had on other occasions not been very helpful, came over on a weekend and brought me...they had to do a death certificate, and he said, "I have recopied the entire death certificate because it was printed in our simplified Chinese characters (the modern Chinese characters they use on the Mainland)." He said, "I know they don't use those on Taiwan and I was afraid that they would not accept our simplified characters, so I have redone it in the old characters."

A large part of it was getting set up, getting the building fixed, getting the school started, getting the consular program going, getting the commercial program going, and getting the cultural program going. We did a fair amount of political and economic reporting, and it was a good time to be doing that because nobody had ever done it.

Q: It's a Foreign Service officer's dream.

ANDERSON: And then we traveled. The consular district encompassed Jiangsu Province, Anhui Province, and Zhejiang which is really the whole Yangtze basin and includes some of the nicest cities in China, Hangzhou, and Suzhou, and some of the more scenic spots. I used to tell visitors that if my consular district was a country, it would be the fifth largest country in the world.

Q: On the cultural side, here is the ancient Chinese culture, and the very aggressive American cultures, were there problems?

ANDERSON: The problems weren't between an ancient Chinese culture and a modern American culture. The problems, where we had them, were in the degree to which the Communist government wanted to maintain control. And the degree of openness that they were prepared to permit. We were always pushing for more and more open exchanges, more frank discussions. "Let us bring in more films, and show them to more people," and the Chinese were always just a little bit nervous. Shanghai is a very western city in many respects, and as you said, Shanghai's history, while they have the 4000 years of Chinese culture certainly, they look back on a 100 years. They really do look on themselves as sort of the New Yorkers of China.

Q: I take it you did not follow in the footsteps of one of your predecessors, George Seward, who hung an American in the courtyard of the American Consulate back in around 1863 or so.

ANDERSON: No, I did take part...he didn't get hung, but we had the first American government ship, it was the NOAA oceanographic ship, I think it was called the Oceanographer, a beautiful white ship that came in along with the director of NOAA. It was an exchange between our two oceanographic societies. The ship, as I say, was a beautiful ship, and it had a co-educational crew...

Q: It's a fancy term for men and women working on it, which was unusual at that time.

ANDERSON: The captain took out one of the crew, and they both arrived at the banquet with the Chinese...she having not been invited, a bit tipsy, and the Chinese had a bunch of Chinese admirals who did their Chinese number on them, toasting with MaoTai, the Chinese high potency stuff, and they both got absolutely swacked. The director of NOAA fired them both, so we didn't hang them, but we did send them home.

Q: How about the relations with the embassy? Any problems.

ANDERSON: No, we had quite good relations actually. We had a good Admin officer, and we set up a courier system -- it was illegal, but we used to send a diplomatic pouch up with our classified stuff. We'd send up an officer, so we got back and forth as frequently as possible. I didn't have any real problems that way.

Q: Then you came back for the last two years on the China desk again?

ANDERSON: I came back in '83 for two years on the China desk, '83 to '85.

Q: Did you find any difference with the Reagan administration, and China? Reagan came sort of an old line Republican, a very pro-Taiwanese.

ANDERSON: Reagan, I think, scared us all to death before the election, and really immediately after the election. The transition team that he sent over to State was pretty shocking. I will give Al Haig really high marks.

Q: He was Secretary of State.

ANDERSON: He was appointed Secretary of State. He went in and said, "Okay, I'm in charge now. All of you transition people get out of here." I think he kept the China thing on the trolley and prevented it from taking a real lurch. And once he had stabilized it, and the bureaucracy that was built up around the President, after that there were relatively few problems. We had a tougher bunch than we did in the early days. Paul Wolfowitz was the Assistant Secretary, and there was less empathy with the Chinese. I think he was more interested in other issues, and he didn't see why we were pandering to the Chinese. This F-16 deal that we've talked about today...

Q: ...this is a fighter plane.

ANDERSON: ...brings up the issue of the 1982 August 17 joint communiqué that was negotiated, which Paul Wolfowitz has always thought was a terrible mistake. This is the one limiting our ability to sell arms to Taiwan. On things like that, the Reagan administration was tougher. I think that they took, if you will, a more pragmatic attitude, and were willing to risk offending the Chinese more so than, say, during the Carter period.

Q: I suppose looking at these things from a certain perspective and saying, "Well, maybe rightly so."

ANDERSON: Yes, and history changes too. The relationship isn't the same at different points. I guess the big event of my time as Country Director for China was the Reagan trip to China. I quite literally spent much of my time in the two years I was Country Director, either managing trips or managing visits of Chinese dignitaries to the United States. We had the Reagan trip to China, the visit to the United States by Zhao Ziyang, who was then the Premier, an earlier visit by the Foreign Minister which was the first official formal visit to Washington by a Chinese Foreign Minister. Then a number of other high level visits.

Q: On the Reagan trip from the press, I mean it's hard to say that one had the feeling that Reagan was not very knowledgeable or engaged on foreign affairs. He tended to see things in rather simplistic terms. From your perspective, how did you prepare him, and what was your impression of how he worked on this. Really, it was a major trip on his part.

ANDERSON: It was a major trip, but there was not major substance. In fact, I don't think there were too many people that wanted any new breakthroughs or any major substantive changes. So it was, it was a big photo operation. It was a chance for the great communicator to go to China, and communicate to the Chinese, but there was a very strong element, I can remember, of a desire to communicate really over the heads of the Chinese to the American people as well. And there was incredible television and press coverage of that trip, and he did it extremely well. It was one of the few times when I have watched him turn it on in person, and he is remarkable. I went to the White House briefings and we did our number, we spoke our piece, the President listened, but I didn't have the feeling that there was any great substance. As a matter of fact, after we finished one of the briefings -- I think it was the Cabinet Room, he listened very intently, but at the end his only comment was, he told a story about losing his contact lenses in Hong Kong when he was doing a movie, and so he walked around Hong Kong holding his eyes like this...because that's the way you can see better if you've lost your contacts. He said he didn't understand why everybody was so angry with him. That was his sole comment on the substantive issue.

Q: In talking about drawing your eyes back to make you look oriental. Then just briefly, you were in the Senior Seminar from '85 to '86, and then you went back to Hong Kong as Consul General for our years from '86 to '90. Was there any change in being in Hong Kong at that time? Had the operation matured?

ANDERSON: There were lots of changes, but not as many as many people might have expected. The assumption was at the time of normalization of relations that Hong Kong would gradually shrink, would diminish, and in some respects it did. I mean the political section and economic section was considerably smaller. But strangely enough the Consulate was at least as big, and maybe a little bigger, than I had ever known it to be. One of my roles in Hong Kong was to fend off other agencies that wanted to either set up offices, or add staff to their existing offices. It is a great regional center, I think we had 12 or 13 different government agencies represented there, and there was constant pressure to increase. The big thing, of course, that had changed substantively was the 1984 Sino-British Joint Statement a time certain had been set for Hong Kong's reversion to Beijing, which affected a whole range of things in Hong Kong, and the attitude of the Hong Kong people.

Then, of course, the other major development and major tragedy was Tiananmen which occurred in June of 1989.

Q: This is the quelling of a major student demonstration in front of world television in the main square of Beijing. Let's talk first about the reversion. Did we have a fixed policy when the Hong Kong people would come to you and say, "What's the American assurances?" How did we play this? Because this was only two years after the statement, and people hadn't learned to live with it yet.

ANDERSON: What happened with the statement was that there was great fear, and uncertainty, prior to the statement -- in the period '82, '83 and into early '84. Property values were affected, people were beginning to make arrangements to get out, and there was a high degree of uncertainty. My predecessor, I will say, played a significant role in presenting an image of confidence.

Q: Who was that?

ANDERSON: Burt Levin. Then came the Joint Declaration in 1984, and the document, I still think, was a very good document. It was well negotiated, and if the Chinese abide by the provisions of that Joint Declaration, I think Hong Kong's future is going to be okay. There was a great collective sigh of relief when that Joint Declaration came out. So I came in '86, following a period of not euphoria, but relief, and a renewed sense of confidence that things were going to be all right. But the next phase in the process, as agreed, was to begin the preparation of the basic law for Hong Kong, in effect a mini-constitution. That process was just beginning. My feeling was that over the period that I was there, there was again something of a deterioration of confidence, in part because of the negotiations over the basic law and a growing sense that the Chinese really aren't going to leave Hong Kong alone to the degree that we hoped. And, of course, Tiananmen occurred which was a terrible shock. The democracy movement in China had a tremendous impact in Hong Kong. I can remember one Sunday there were at least 800,000 people marching peacefully down the main street of Hong Kong. There were enormous demonstrations. There was an interesting change that took place during that period because they were demonstrating for our compatriots in China, our brothers in China. This was a whole new attitude because generally Hong Kong Chinese have looked upon people across the border, in the Mainland, as sort of country bumpkins. "We're the smart guys, we're the wealthy, we're the ones who know how to do it, and all those people up in the Mainland are kind of dummies." And when the democracy movement started, there was all of a sudden in Hong Kong a feeling of being Chinese, of being part of the thing that they were seeing in Beijing. In fact, there was a lot of support, monetary and material support that went from Hong Kong into China during that period. Practically all of those tents that you saw on television in Tiananmen came from Hong Kong.

Q: Were people looking to the United States to do something? How did they feel about how we reacted?

ANDERSON: To what? To the 1997 issue?

Q: To the Tiananmen Square.

ANDERSON: Everybody watched in horror. I personally felt like I was watching a tragedy. They recognized there wasn't anything we could do in the short term in the sense of changing things. In the short term we did take actions which probably still can't really be discussed, to provide shelter, and help for people who were escaping who had been involved in it. We cooperated with a group of about five other countries to help some of these young people, and some not so young, to get through Hong Kong and get on safely to the United States or to Europe, or wherever they were going. And, of course, the President immediately announced economic sanctions, and certain steps in terms of cutting off high level visits, etc. Actually, the United States probably took as strong measures as anybody, and kept them in place, or is still keeping some of them in place longer than anybody else.

One of the very interesting things about the post-Tiananmen reaction was that probably the people who were back in doing business more or less as usual, were the Chinese from Taiwan and from Hong Kong.

ANDERSON: A full year later.

Q: Were the Chinese, who were able to leave, beginning to hedge their bets more by getting out of Hong Kong?

ANDERSON: No, the brain drain had already become a serious problem. There is a constant outward migration from Hong Kong, and a steady inward migration from the Mainland into Hong Kong so that the population has remained relatively stable. There are about 22,000 people leave every year, in the '60s, '70s, '80s. It went up to 35,000, then up to 45,000 and the last figures I saw it was running between 55,000 and 60,000, and many of these people are the best and brightest, they are people with needed skills. It's a bit of a dilemma because they want to get out, and Hong Kong is certainly not going to try and prevent them from leaving. We do not want to be seen to be contributing to the brain drain. On the other hand, Canada and Australia, and a number of other countries, were actively welcoming those people because a country like Canada, has an under population problem, and needed certain types of skills -- secretarial skills, skills in the financial field, a variety of things which are more or less mobile. It was an issue that I wrestled with much of the time.

Q: How would you deal with it? Obviously you don't want to shout fire, but at the same time American business people, other people would come and say, whither Hong Kong? Do we have a policy, and how did you handle this?

ANDERSON: I basically took an upbeat, optimistic approach. I think I must have answered that question several hundred times. Every business executive and business leader that came through from the States, the first question was, "What's going to happen in 1997?" My response was that basically Hong Kong is going to change. There will probably be less personal freedom, more controls, because the Chinese I don't think are capable of accepting the degree of free wheeling operations that Hong Kong has permitted. On the other hand, I don't think the Chinese are so stupid that they're going to upset the business atmosphere to the point where Hong Kong will no longer be a good place to do business, and it has so many natural advantages in terms of communications, the port, the skilled labor force, that it is almost irreplaceable, at least in the short term for China. China depends on it to a tremendous amount. So I told them, "I think we'll still be doing business after 1997."

Q: Maybe we might cut it off here, do you think?

ANDERSON: I certainly do.

Q: Just one last question. Looking at it today, and maybe they have, if a young Foreign Service officer comes to you and says, "What about a career as a China specialist?" What would you tell them today?

ANDERSON: I would tell them that if that's their interest, and they enjoy it, I would certainly do it. I have probably specialized in China more than anybody in the Service. Out of 32 years I spent about 25 in China, or China related jobs, and never regretted it.

Q: I thank you very much.

MARK S. PRATT
Chinese Language Training, Foreign Service Institute
Taichung, Taiwan (1959-1960)

Mr. Pratt was born and raised in Massachusetts and educated at Harvard, Brown, Sorbonne and Georgetown Universities. Entering the Foreign Service in 1956, he studied Chinese and was posted to Hong Kong. Throughout his career Mr. Pratt dealt with Far East and Southeast Asian affairs, serving in Taichung, Hong Kong, Vientiane, Paris, Taipei and Guangzhou (Canto), where he was Consul General. His Washington assignments also concerned Southeast Asian matters. Mr. Pratt was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1999.

Q: Were there signs at the time that the Kuomintang group was going to be sort of aged out or moved out, or how were we seeing this? Were the Embassy and all pretty well read into the KMT at that time?

PRATT: The Embassy was not. The Foreign Service people were not. It of course was the political leadership which, of course, found it convenient for the United States to let the so-called China lobby and it's views of the situation be spread around. I think it was also another good indicator of just how difficult it is when you have a democracy and the persons who are your leaders come in knowing very little if anything about foreign affairs and knowing, however, that they do have another election coming up and therefore it's far more important to pay attention to what domestic concerns are than what the foreign realities are. It didn't bother me particularly because we took that for granted. We realized that we were expected by the Foreign Service to keep track of what was going on in elections, even though, of course, the persons who did so would be called in by the ambassador and the ministers would have fingers wagged at them telling them how we should not be permitted to talk to any of these Taiwanese, we shouldn't go anywhere near polling booths, we shouldn't try to compile biographic information about the Taiwanese and so on. So we knew that we were in an adversarial situation to a certain extent.

Q: Was Walter Robertson's hand apparent?

PRATT: Oh, yes.

Q: He was the head of the Asian Bureau at the time and very much the creature - a strong term to use - but very much part of what you called the China lobby in Congress.

PRATT: Well, I had had for a short time Pat Paul Weinbarger, who, of course, had been earlier tied in with Sun Yat-sen and very early tied in with also Chiang Kai-shek. So I was not unaware of these people. I heard, for example, when I was a student here, a debate between Fulbright and Walter Robertson. So of course the China question was one which was a big problem in the United States and something we were well aware of. But we did see that one of the realities was that the Taiwanese were not that happy to be under the Kuomintang, and I had to remark also that most of my KMT friends in Taipei had nothing but the greatest of contempt for Chiang Kai-shek, and what the military leadership was going. They blamed them for the loss of the Mainland. They said, "I wouldn't be here if they hadn't been such a miserable bunch of corrupt officials back in Nanjing." So I found that the Mainlanders at that time - and that was 1959-60 - were far more willing to criticize the leadership of the Kuomintang than they were when I went back in 1979.

Q: Well, now, later in the years, around October of 1960, the Islands of Quemoy and Matsu all of a sudden became the center of the American political discourse, when Nixon and Kennedy debated on these two islands, which I don't think either of them ever paid the slightest bit of attention to afterwards. But were Quemoy and Matsu the subject of discussion while you were on Taiwan?

PRATT: Somewhat, although I think they're really, to a certain extent, a matter now of discussion than they were then because, although the 1958 crisis had come, it had also gone, and therefore the only reaction of the Taiwanese, I found, was that they were very annoyed with the Kuomintang because they, of course, considered neither Quemoy nor Matsu to be Taiwanese at all. And they said what the KMT is doing is taking all of our young men over there and putting them on those islands as hostages because they are trying to involve us in a war with Peking over their own interests, which have nothing whatsoever to do with Taiwan. Now, of course, because KMT has had Quemoy and Matsu sufficiently tied in for all this time, they are really saying that Quemoy and Matsu have to be considered part of Taiwan. Now this is not what was the case when I was there early in 1959-60, when these were extraneous islands which should be turned over to the Mainland, and all the Taiwanese troops should not be sent over there to die for the pretensions of Chiang Kai-shek, when they could be kept back for the defense of Taiwan if it were ever needed. This is a very different attitude. Now they have been tied in long enough so that between 1960 and 1990, those 30 years mean that these people consider that that's just a place to go for viewing the Mainland and tourism and so forth, but now it's part of the Taiwanese concept of Taiwan.

Q: Who was the ambassador when you were on Taiwan?

PRATT: Let me see. Our DCM was Ralph Clough and then Art Hummel.

Q: I think both have been interviewed by our program.

PRATT: Everett F. Drumright. He was an interesting character. Of course, as you know, one of the incidents which had occurred a little bit earlier - and I'm sure you've talked to other people about that - was when they had the sacking of the embassy and -

Q: Talk a little about what you were hearing about it.

PRATT: Well, what I was hearing about when I got there is that how badly this was really handled by the American side. Now, as I say, I've never gone back to reread the history on the subject, but I was told that Drumright had gone down to Hong Kong for a little R & R and Joey Yaeger was then the - have you interviewed him?

Q: No. Where is he now?

PRATT: I think he's here in Washington. He was DCM, and therefore chargé d'affaires. And Chou Chi was foreign minister. I run into Chou Chi the rest of my career, too. And when this occurred, Joe Yaeger went to see Chou Chi, and they could not locate either the chairman, who was down-island, or Chiang Ching-kuo.

Q: The son.

PRATT: The son, who of course was a key figure in most security matters and certainly in any security matters which touched the United States connection. So my friends whom I talked to there said one of the real problems was that the Americans didn't seem to understand this: this was all set up by Chiang Ching-kuo [CCK] with the permission of his father to take the place really of elections. In other words, they believed in the good-old Communist type of . . . both of them strongly influenced by Moscow and the Moscow representatives, and therefore you had to have "participatory democracy" without any power coming from democracy.

Q: The 99.9 percent vote.

PRATT: But allowed them to let-off steam; let them think that they are participating. And therefore, these demonstrations and the sacking of the embassy were set up primarily to show that, unlike the May 4th movement, they were not going to be soft on the foreigners, even though they depended on the foreigners. And therefore, they were going to let out a burst of righteous outrage, and of course, at the same time, however, going along with the looters of the embassy, were a few of Chiang Ching-kuo's agents. And along with the top-secret communications from CINCPAC [Commander in Chief, Pacific] all over the front lawn and so forth, the files which were most thoroughly viewed and then taken were all the biographic files that we had on the Taiwanese population. And so this is what I was told was how the Americans just didn't understand that this was done on purpose at a relatively high level and it was only when the people who attacked the embassy then got close to and appeared to be headed for a police station that, of course, the waiting troops came rushing in and cleaned up the area - that they just did not realize that this was being done by the top leadership for their own purposes. So this is part of the environment, this attitude towards the Kuomintang, which was prevalent not only in the Taiwanese, where you would expect it, but also in the more educated and more enlightened Mainlanders. Of course, the Mainlanders also say, you know, "Taiwan, this is the place for my father's generation. We are merely here because we had to go somewhere, but we're all headed out." And at that time, of course, almost all of the scholarships and even permission to leave Taiwan to study went to Mainlander children, not to the Taiwanese. The Taiwanese exodus took place in the 1970s, not at that time, in the late '50s and early '60s.

Q: Well, given the sacking of the Embassy and all, would you say that the attitude of the Embassy - and we're talking about the officers, particularly who we're dealing with - our "gallant allies" - was there certain amount of almost either dislike or contempt towards the KMT?

PRATT: Yes. Well, although it was a bit bifurcated in that the top political leadership, which was also highly military. If you look at the central standing committee of the KMT during the period of the '50s and '60s, it was heavily laced with military and security people. And of course they considered themselves to be occupying an unfriendly territory. When they first arrived in 1945, they treated it more harshly than we treated Japan because from their point of view, these people had been on the other side in that war and therefore they were traitors to China. So of course they were not really very nice colonists for Taiwan. But we also found that there was a whole new breed of intelligent civilians who had either been in the United States when the collapse of the Mainland occurred and then when they left the United States they didn't go back to the Mainland but they went to Taiwan instead. And they were emerging in most economic areas, and they included people who worked in the JCRR [Joint Commission of Rural Reconstruction], which was one of the most interesting organizations which the U.S. set up, the organization which served to really be a way of getting to the top levels of the Chinese Government the intelligent opinions on what ought to be done about agriculture and land reform. All of the Chinese technocrats who had come back from study at Cornell, like current president Lee Teng-hui, and these persons found great difficulties in getting their ideas up to the upper level of their own society because that's not the way Chinese bureaucracy works. And so JCRR was a way of getting around the usual blockage which exists within a Chinese bureaucratic system, which of course we're seeing on the Mainland now, less so in Taiwan.

We found also, paralleling this, the U.S. MAAG organization, the Military Assistance Advisory Group. They served a similar role within the military because down there in Taichung, one of the groups that we knew, of course, the military was headed by Chiang Wei-kuo, the ostensible brother of the vice-president at that time, son of Chiang Kai-shek - ostensibly. And we would hear from them that the MAAG was their only way of getting what really was sensible military advice from the lower level to the top level because, again, you had this blockage in the Chinese bureaucratic system, where you'd never dare tell your boss anything except that which he's already told you before. So this was part of the very creative role which, I think unbeknownst to many of the people doing it, was set up by the very intelligent Chinese who were trying to find ways of handling the difficulties within their own political structure. And so this is one of the things which one could observe there. But I think even more important, though, was the fact that this, in the eyes of most of the Mainlanders, was a hopeless stopgap situation for them, where they would fill out their time till retirement or till their death doing as best they could there, but the thing to do was to try to get it so that their children could leave and get out to the rest of the world and not be in this terrible backwater of Taiwan, because from their point of view they had come from Shanghai, they had seen the glories of Shanghai in the 1930s, they really even considered Peking a little as a backwater. Intellectually speaking it was still a very important part of China in the 1930s and '40s, and Taiwan just didn't rank.

Q: It's like going to Alabama or something like that.

PRATT: More like the hills of Arkansas. This was something - because of course, you know, the Chinese I think are very, very sensitive about quality, a kind of snobbish, perhaps, aspect, because it's not always real quality - because that they don't know - but they really do have a sense of hierarchy in quality. And of course now it has become almost something which has to have a numerical price tag on it. But nonetheless they are looking for what is of value, and having known Shanghai, which is, after all, the greatest city in the Orient in the '30s - it was called, you know, the New York and Paris and the London of -

Q: Much more than Tokyo.

PRATT: Much more than Tokyo. So in any case they had to look at this as exile, and I think you may have heard of the great laments written by the poets (who were also officials) who were sent out to Xinjiang under the Ch'ing Dynasty and their laments for the beauties of either Peking or Yangzhou or other places in civilized coastal areas. So this is something which has a whole tradition in China of exile. But the thing is, they considered New York to be far more pertinent to them than Taipei.

Q: Well, then, were you able to tap much into this sort of intellectual program that was going on?

PRATT: A bit, because as I said I knew the son of this minister of the interior, and he was a student at the Normal University in Taipei, and he had students. So I would hear a great deal about the views of the younger Mainlander kids who were students of the elite. I met some of the elite. I was taken off to see a General Chiang, who was a cousin of Chiang Ching-kuo, and I would see, say, the brother of Madame P'eng, who was in the Ministry of Finance, and would occasionally have dinner with people of that sort. They were very outspoken because what happened between then and the time when I went back, in 1978, was the great expansion in the capacity of listening devices and enough money used to purchase them, so that the whole society became far more aware of the special secret services and how they could be listened in on and how what they said could be used against them. That's something which did not exist there in 1959, and the Mainlanders could feel free to grouse, the way Chinese love to do anyway. I mean, it's a marvelously complaining society, unlike the Japanese.

Q: What impressions were you getting of the role of Madame Chiang Kai-shek?

PRATT: Well, we would see her, say, out at the airport and so on. Sometimes we were sort of air marshals there to see when people were arriving and departing and so on. She, of course, was not greatly liked by either mainlanders or Taiwanese, and they told nasty stories about her silk sheets and how she plundered any place she happened to be in. I mean she was sort of a Hermann Göring of the KMT.

Q: You hear stories about her during the war in the White House, demanding her silk sheets.

PRATT: Yes. Well, afterwards she learned to travel with them always. The point was that she expected that there be silk sheets. But she did - she does - because she's still alive, one should keep in mind - so she was not at all a Grand Old Lady. She was obviously considered a very handsome woman by the Mainlanders, and they somewhat admired her ability to become so popular in the United States, to speak English well enough, and to head such a role in the American political system; but she was not their kind, any more than Jiang Qing was the kind of person whom the old Communists liked. I mean Jiang Qing was a cheap actress; well, Madame Chiang was, after all, one of the worst of the Shanghai types.

WILLIAM ANDREAS BROWN
Chinese Language Training
Taichung, Taiwan (1959-961)

Ambassador William Andreas Brown was born in Winchester, Massachusetts in 1930. He joined the "Holloway Program" which was part of the Naval Reserve Officers Training Program and went to Harvard University, graduating with a Magna cum Laude degree. In 1950 he went to Marine Corps basic training in Virginia and later served in Korea. His Foreign Service career took him to a multitude of places including Honk Kong, Taiwan, Singapore, Malaysia, USSR, India, the UK, and Israel. His career includes an ambassadorship to Israel as well as several positions in the State Department, Environmental Protection Agency. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in November of 1998.

Q: While you were in Hong Kong, did you or any of your colleagues think about what you were going to do next?

BROWN: Yes, I was dedicated to the study of China. Remember that I had come into the Foreign Service and decided, in consultation with my wife Helen, that we would put in a year or two and then decide whether it would work out for us. Well, it was working out for us fairly well. There was also the down side of working in a bureaucracy with its restrictions, its hierarchy, and all of that. However, as a first post it was great. As a place to work on my thesis, Hong Kong was also exciting. So our attitude was: "Let's give this career another year or so, especially if I can get an assignment to another Chinese post." I particularly wanted to get advanced training in the Chinese language on Taiwan.

So I applied for advanced training in Chinese, was accepted, and was transferred to Taiwan in August, 1959. We took a good, long home leave, traveling to the U.S. via Europe. We stretched our dollars as much as possible by traveling "economy class." This made it possible for us to introduce our children to the great cultures of Lebanon, Greece, Italy, Germany, France, and so forth. I arrived in Taiwan for advanced language training in late November, 1959.

Q: So you were away from Hong Kong...

BROWN: From then until Chinese New Year's of 1961, or about 14 months in all.

Q: Where did you study advanced Chinese?

BROWN: The State Department's Chinese language school had been deliberately located at Taichung, then about four hours' drive south of Taipei. We were in an area of Taichung which had been the Japanese administrative center before World War II. In fact, most of us were able to negotiate moving into Japanese-built houses of the old style. They had sliding panels for partitions and beautiful little gardens, with tatami covers on the floors. They were drafty and cold, but living there was a great experience.

It was also a great experience for me, because I'd already had academic Chinese. However, it had become somewhat fractured. I'd gone into the U.S. Marine Corps. My spoken Chinese, in terms of the Mandarin dialect, was somewhat weak. I had acquired a lot of mixed pronunciations and problems with tones and so forth. However, my reading ability in Chinese was better than the average student coming from Washington. The standard Chinese language class started in Washington at the FSI and went on for about 18 months. Then the Foreign Service Officer student trainee went to Taiwan for 12 months.

I was coming into this program in Taiwan laterally, as it were. They couldn't quite fit me in, which was wonderful, because I got, not entirely, but very largely individual instruction. Because of my Marine Corps experience and my exposure to intensive, accelerated artillery training at Fort Sill, Oklahoma, I had a view that you could make a lot more progress in a given language than, perhaps, the standard, routine approach would indicate. Remember, I had also had three months of intensive French language training at the FSI. I was tremendously driven in those days by ambition, both academically in terms of my thesis, as well as in Foreign Service terms.

The net result of this was that I took six hours of Mandarin Chinese a day. We had a sympathetic Director of the Language School, Howard Levy, who was a T'ang Dynasty specialist. I approached Howard because I had found a member of the teaching staff who had a classical education and whose father was a professor of literature at a university. I asked Howard if he would let me take an extra hour a day of classical Chinese, which was very unusual. The average student at Taichung didn't go into this. Essentially, this related to the 13th century, A.D., so that I could work on my thesis more effectively on my own time. He agreed. A lady teacher worked with me on classical Chinese texts. If she had a problem, she could go to her father.

I discovered, out in the countryside, in bombproof shelters, the Imperial Library, which had been whisked from Beijing by various means to Taiwan. Then it was moved, out of fear of a Chinese communist invasion, into special shelters. I found ancient texts there, protected by a librarian sitting outside. There were no xerox machines, no copying devices. When I buttered him up through introductions and so forth, I found that the way to order a text, if I could figure out what it was, was to throw myself at his mercy. This would happen on a Saturday or a Sunday. He would order coolies to go into the vaults and get great, wooden chests containing documents which he reckoned would be useful to me and bring them out. I would then hand copy these documents, bring the copied texts back to my teacher, and try to interpret them.

Then word came through that I was being reassigned to Hong Kong. It came as a terrible shock to me to be assigned back there, probably back into the Consular Section. However, I said to myself that if that is what is going to be, then I have to study the Cantonese dialect. There would be only one way of going back to Hong Kong and trying to work in Mandarin, and that would be to be assigned to the Political Section. There was no hope of that, as yet.

So I added an extra hour of study of Cantonese. I was then taking eight hours of Chinese a day, mostly of intensive individual study. I was working nights on my doctoral thesis. I led a very regimented life. I would get up early, go to class at noon, dash back home for a quick, light Chinese meal, (We had Chinese cooks in those days.), have a half hour nap, and then go back to the classroom. In the evenings, I would have a light dinner and then work on until 11:00 or 12:00 at night on my thesis. This was a very demanding routine.

As time went along, I learned that I was not going to be assigned back to Hong Kong after all, but rather to the embassy in Kuala Lumpur. There was a personnel opening there, and it was thought that my Cantonese, as well as my Mandarin, would be useful. That led me to intensify my work in Cantonese. Then, at the very end, came the switch. The American embassy in Kuala Lumpur decided that to take on a Foreign Service Officer, his wife, and four kids would be a heavy burden on available housing. So the word came that I wasn't going to Kuala Lumpur. Instead, I was going to the Consulate General in Singapore! Bob Drexler, who was a bachelor then assigned to Singapore, was studying Hokkien as a second dialect of Chinese. He and I were both infuriated to learn that we had been switched. He would go to Kuala Lumpur, and I would go to Singapore.

This was the greatest thing that ever happened to either of us. I went to Singapore, which was boiling politically. Drexler went to Kuala Lumpur and got married! [Laughter]

Q: I've interviewed Bob.

BROWN: You have?

Q: What was the situation in Singapore? Singapore has been in and out of Malaysia. Where was it at this time?

BROWN: First, let me give you a few more sidelights on Taiwan. Remember, I was working intensively, and I decided that I wanted to learn the modern, communistic type Chinese, with the hope that some day I would be posted back to Hong Kong as a Political or Economic Officer. So I took special work in Chinese simplified characters with instructors who were cleared. A few instructors had been cleared to deal with these prohibited materials. I also got into Chinese cursive writing and so forth.

I took a flight with a few others to Quemoy and Matsui Islands. We flew by special plane and visited these besieged, Chinese Nationalist bastions. There were also some individuals among this group, although I won't go into details, who had, shall we say, a rather nitty gritty view or experience with American involvement with the efforts of Chiang Kai-shek on the offshore islands and so forth. So it was quite an education in many, many ways. I traveled a lot in Taiwan. The new cross-island highway had been built. It was then a very perilous, dirt road through some magnificent scenery. During my tour in Taiwan, I was also activated very briefly in the U.S. Marines when Operation Blue Star landed. The Marines needed interpreters, so I put in a couple of weeks as a Marine Corps interpreter, down in Hung Nam in the south. This was an earthquake desolate area where 60,000 U.S. and Chinese Nationalist Marines and Navy landed. Some 5,000 Chinese prostitutes migrated to service them. I got into all sorts of things in Taiwan. It was a very exciting time.

Q: Let's talk just a bit more about this.

BROWN: I got to see Chiang Kai-shek, who flew down there for this exercise. On Operation

Blue Star, the good guys were always the Marines who were landing. They had to have opposition, so a battalion of Marines who had been at sea for six weeks were emplaced inland as the defenders. That's why so many of these ladies of the night migrated from all parts of Taiwan down there.

Q: I'd just like to say this for the record here. On one occasion a U.S. Navy carrier group was apparently coming into Pusan. The Red Cross was getting a bunch of buses to go down from Seoul to Pusan and take the servicemen on a tour. A group of the "Madams" came up to the Red Cross and said, "Look, we're going to go down there anyway. Can we ride the buses down to Pusan and back? We'll pay you." The Red Cross would have liked to have saved money but decided that this arrangement probably would not look too good. It's a different world now.

What was the impact of the Chiang Kai-shek regime as far as the State Department students at the school in Taichung were concerned?

BROWN: Remember that this was a wartime atmosphere. Those magnificent beaches of Taiwan had been mined, and barbed wire had been strung across them. So there was no prospect of getting out and frolicking in the waves. I had to wait 20 years later to do that. There was heavy censorship and total propaganda. The use of Japanese, of course, was banned. The vast majority of the Taiwanese spoke Japanese, having been under Japanese occupation for a very long time [1895-1945]. Also banned were Japanese films, magazines, journals, and so forth.

The line in official Chinese Nationalist publications was very, very tough. The Chinese communists were referred to as "Gung Fei," which means "Communist bandits," with the symbol for a dog as the classifier added in front of this name.

Chiang Kai-shek's position had improved significantly, but the Chinese Nationalist regime was still a very authoritarian and very military oriented society. However, the material side of daily life was improving. A railroad and highway infrastructure was in place in Taiwan. It had basically been constructed by the Japanese and was now being improved. The American presence was very significant in terms of military personnel and bases. In Taichung we studied next to a Chinese Nationalist Air Force Base, which had an American component, and which was later to be very significant during the Vietnam War, as far as ferrying goods and people to and from Vietnam was concerned. At the same time, the Chinese Nationalist line was that they were dedicated to recapturing and reuniting with the mainland of China on Chiang Kai-shek's terms.

While I was there, it turned out that this figure that I was studying, Wen T'ien-hsiang, of the 13th century, was a great, political symbol. Political courses in the Chinese Nationalist system had his portrait on the wall of the classrooms. Newspapers carried articles on him and his undying loyalty to the Sung Dynasty. A town on the East-West Highway in the Toroko Gorge was named after him. A statue of him had been erected, and the base for it was dedicated by none other than Chiang Ching-kuo, the son of Chiang Kai-shek. All of this was totally unexpected for me and a great advantage as well.

However, to come back to the situation in Taiwan. We had a very strong, security relationship with the Chinese Nationalists. We took this very seriously and we had a large, military presence in Taiwan.

Q: What about language studies? I suppose that your teachers were native speakers of Chinese. Were they kept under a certain amount of control by the Taiwan authorities? They were getting ready to fight against an invasion of Taiwan by mainland Chinese forces.

BROWN: Yes, but our teachers were selected for their accents and cultural backgrounds, so they were largely from Beijing. You couldn't say Beijing in those days. You had to say Beiping, the Chiang Kai-shek term for "Northern Pacification." It was forbidden in Nationalist China to say Beijing, and this was also frowned on in the Foreign Service. One had to say and write, Beiping. One was discouraged from referring to the "People's Republic of China." It was "Communist China," "Red China," or "Mainland China." In Taiwan one could say the "Gung Fei," the "Communist Bandits."

Our teachers were thoroughly screened by Chiang's security police. The teachers had to be very careful about what they said. One or two of the teachers were bold enough to make little jokes, on the side, but they had to be very careful.

I mentioned that in terms of studying about communist China there were several teachers who had been cleared to handle Chinese communist materials. These materials had to be kept in a secure place, watched, and so forth, out of fear of contaminating other people. We didn't know definitely but we suspected that our teachers had to be very careful in handling us and each other. They learned to watch themselves.

Q: Who were some of the students in your class?

BROWN: Among those with whom I overlapped one way or another were Mark Pratt, Harry Thayer, Roger Sullivan, Herb Levin, Burt Levin, Bill Payeef, Norman Barnes, and Marshall Bremont. My family and I lived in the house left by Jim Leonard, who was later an Ambassador in Arms Control in the State Department. After completing language study in Taichung, he went up to be a Political Officer in Taipei. Some fine people who were going on to greater things were associated with that school. I might also mention David Dean, Richard Nethercut, Bill Thomas and Paul Kreisberg. These people were top-notch in our China service. They had gone through the school at Taichung.

Q: I'm not sure, given your schedule, that you had much spare time. However, were there ever discussions among the Foreign Service Officers studying Chinese at Taichung about where China was going? I'd like to capture what you were talking about when you were on your own.

BROWN: Naturally, career-wise, most of us were looking forward to the day when U.S. relations with communist China would improve and, at long last, we would be able to go to mainland China as professional diplomats. At the time I was at Taichung, the atmosphere was pretty grim. We had fought communist China during the Korean War. We lost about 58,000 men killed or wounded. We killed about 300,000 to 500,000 communist troops, both North Korean and communist Chinese. There was terrible hostility displayed in the propaganda from Beijing.

There was the Quemoy-Matsui crisis [of 1958]. We all wondered: “When is this going to end? Isn't it time, or is it time to open up or loosen up a little bit?”

The election of John F. Kennedy as President [in 1960] gave us some hope of change, but this hope was falsely based. I'll come back to that later on. Regarding the future of U.S.-Chinese communist relations, we tended to split. There were those among us who were more critical of Chiang Kai-shek's regime than others were. Some of us said that Chiang's regime was militaristic and authoritarian. There was a certain amount of corruption in it. Nationalist China was still receiving a significant amount of U.S. aid, although the corner was turned while we were in Taiwan. Through our help and their own efforts, the Nationalist Chinese had so improved the situation economically and agriculturally that they were establishing the basis for light industrial development. They were visibly beginning to take off.

My old professor, John K. Fairbank, visited Taiwan when we were there. For him this was a dramatic visit, for he had been very critical of Chiang Kai-shek. By the time he came to Taiwan, he had to admit that significant things were happening on Taiwan. This tattered, battered bunch of Chinese Nationalists who had evacuated mainland China [in 1949] somehow, with our aid and their own efforts, had put things together.

Q: The Nixon-Kennedy debate [during the 1960 presidential election campaign] seemed to center on the future of Quemoy and Matsui, of all things. Did that debate have any reverberations in Taiwan?

BROWN: I can't speak for all of us in the Taichung language school, but I think that we were pretty solidly for Kennedy, in the hope that a more liberal administration would somehow move things forward in terms of U.S.-Chinese communist relations. We weren't naive, but I would say that that was our predisposition. Remember, we were a mix of State Department and USIA [United States Information Agency] officers. There were also people from some other U.S. Government agencies. However, our group was essentially composed of State and USIS people.

Robert L. Nichols was born in Wisconsin on August 4, 1924. He served in the U.S.

Navy during World War II in China and Asia. He received a bachelor's degree from Tufts University and a master's degree from The Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy. His Foreign Service career included positions in The Philippines, The Netherlands, Hong Kong, Taiwan, Singapore. This interview was conducted by Robert Amerson on August 30, 1988.

Q: When did the Chinese language assignment come through?

NICHOLS: One year after I got back to Washington. My office finally released me. I went into Chinese language training in the fall of 1959.

Q: This was right after mainland China had been taken over by Mao Zedong and company, right?

NICHOLS: Ten years after.

Q: But we were still without relationships with mainland China.

NICHOLS: Yes. There was no relationship. The only posts where Chinese language officers were being used were in Taiwan, then called the Republic of China, Hong Kong, and Singapore, where Chinese is spoken. They would also assign Chinese language officers to places like Kuala Lumpur, Bangkok, and Saigon, where there was a Chinese population and some possibility to utilize your training.

Q: So there were not very many of you in Chinese language training?

NICHOLS: I was in the second class, I think, of Agency officers. We started out in FSI in Washington, and did six, seven, eight months there. Then provided you were doing well enough, you were sent on to Taichung out in Taiwan to complete your training. At the time, I had three classmates from USIA, Howard Stingle, Norman Barnes, and Mervin Hayworth. The others were from the State Department and CIA.

Q: What were your expectations at the time, if you can recall, about how you were going to use this language ability? Did you ever envision getting into "Red China?"

NICHOLS: Oh, I had hoped so, of course. There wasn't a one of us that was in Chinese language training that didn't have that goal in mind. I think it motivated most everyone, this desire to go and serve in China. We felt sure that eventually we would be there. That was very true.

Q: In fact, how did this develop in your case? You went to a Chinese-speaking post next?

NICHOLS: I followed my two-plus years of Chinese language training with an assignment in Hong Kong as cultural affairs officer, which, unfortunately, is not the best place to use Mandarin Chinese, because most of the Chinese in Hong Kong speak Cantonese. However, I did get to use it, and of course, it was definitely a Chinese environment and Chinese post in many respects. I was dealing with a Chinese audience there, by and large.

It was a very interesting assignment for other reasons. It was interesting because it taught me a lot about exchange programs, being a cultural affairs officer, and I was working with the type of programs I believed in -- exchanges, libraries, book translation, speakers, etc.

Q: Hong Kong is the kind of place where a lot of Americans come to visit. You must have had a lot of American officialdom.

NICHOLS: Every American wants to stop in Hong Kong. The entertainers were there in droves. "Satchmo" was there, Sinatra was there. He was moving or trying hard to move in Kennedy circles, so he came there to do good things for them, charity balls and the like. We made good use of people like Sinatra and Gary Moore, but more especially of Rod Serling and Kirk Douglas who came out under our auspices. Serling -- that was an interesting experience.

I was in charge of the book translation program while we were in Hong Kong. One of the plays that had been translated into Chinese was Thornton Wilder's "Our Town." I was reminded of this recently, when I read recently about Arthur Miller's "Death of a Salesman" being done in China. Also I think that Charlton Heston was over there directing some American play in Chinese.

Well, we were offered Rod Serling as an American specialist to come to Hong Kong. What are we going to do with a Rod Serling, a "Twilight Zone" man? A very interesting person, but what are we going to do with him? Well, we had this play that had just been translated, "Our Town," and we had a college in Hong Kong, Hong Kong Baptist College, that wanted to put on this play. There was a young Chinese who had been on a Fulbright to the United States and had gone to the Yale School of Drama. He was back teaching at Baptist College. So I talked with him about it. I said, "Rod Serling's coming out. Is there any way you could use him in the development of the production of this play?"

He said, "Oh, my God, that would be marvelous." He could help explain the meaning of the play and the significance of it. He could help direct.

So when Serling came, the city got very excited about this, and Serling spent his time in Hong Kong helping direct "Our Town" in Chinese. Of course, he had to work through the Chinese Yale graduate, but what he did was get across Wilder's meanings and intentions. The thing that came across so beautifully and to which the Chinese related was the use of mime in the play. There's so much of that in "Our Town." Of course, the Chinese use mime a great deal, too. This worked out very well, and it played to huge audiences in Hong Kong, and it was a very great success.

Q: This was in the early Sixties?

NICHOLS: That would be 1964, somewhere around then.

Q: After your Hong Kong assignment, what?

NICHOLS: It was time for a tour in Washington, because I had never done a full tour in Washington. I was assigned to the East Asia area as a desk officer for Australia, New Zealand, and the Pacific Islands. My duties also included liaison with CU in State.

If I can for a minute, I'd like to go back to Hong Kong to a couple of things that happened in Hong Kong. One was that a Chinese university was established during my stay there, and as I said, I enjoyed the stay in Hong Kong because I learned a lot about exchange programs. We were able to establish a program with the University of California and the Chinese University, an exchange program of professors and students, undergraduate, graduate students, and professors going both ways each year. The Chinese University was a brand-new university in Hong Kong. It came from the consolidation of three private colleges, all of which were actually the successor colleges to those types that had existed pre-1949 in China. A Christian college, a private college and the national university (government funded).

These colleges had been established in Hong Kong after 1949, but were recognized by the British only as "post-secondary schools." However, in 1963 they were amalgamated as one Chinese University, with Chinese the language of instruction. The first vice chancellor came from Berkeley, a man named Li Choh-ming, a very well-known Chinese-American educator.

Q: Which Chinese language?

NICHOLS: They used both Cantonese and Mandarin at the university. Mandarin, of course, is the national language of China, and it was also the national language of the then-Republic of China (Taiwan), and remains still the language that is taught in the schools in both places. Cantonese is not really taught, but it is the first language of the majority of Hong Kong people.

Another thing that happened when I was in Hong Kong which had some significance was my first experience with "handling" somebody of historic importance. Mr. Nixon came to Hong Kong in the fall of 1965. He was attached to a law firm, but everybody believed he was probably working to run again for President.

Q: He had lost the governorship of California and was a few years ahead of his election as President.

NICHOLS: He was the lawyer for Pepsi-Cola, I believe. Cables announcing his visit came into the consulate general in Hong Kong. When he was vice president, he had been in Hong Kong, and somebody had persuaded him to endow a library with some books and perhaps some money. It had become known as the Nixon Library. On this trip to Hong Kong, the consulate general wasn't too anxious to handle Mr. Nixon. He was not in public office. They didn't know what to do with him, but they knew they couldn't ignore him.

So the consul general said, "We've got an out. The Nixon Library and the cultural officer, they make a pair." Well, Bob Nichols was made the control officer for Richard Nixon when he was in Hong Kong. Of course, Nixon got a lot of attention, press attention and so forth. I was sent down to brief him on the local situation.

I remember the consul general called me in early in the morning and said, "For God's sake, Bob, make sure he understands what's going on, the problems in Hong Kong we have on Vietnam and with Peking." He was referring to the fact that Peking was accusing the United States of using Hong Kong as a base for its Vietnam operations. Of course, it was an R & R place for the U.S. Navy, and also the Army. The fleet was visiting all the time, and soldiers were flying in from Saigon daily.

Just prior to Nixon's arrival, one of the R & R planes had crashed at the end of the runway at Kaitak Airport in Hong Kong. Everybody on board was killed. It was a headline story and also drew attention to the fact that Hong Kong was being used by the U.S. military to send its troops from Vietnam. I was to make sure that Mr. Nixon understood the sensitivities on this score, and that when he met the press, to be aware of the problem. Of course, I had heard all these things about how Nixon didn't like the press, and I knew I was going to have to run a press conference for him.

I spent a day and a half with him, and the second day we went out to the Nixon Library. He asked a lot of questions. It was just Nixon and myself in the car, along with a congressman from California named Pat Hillings.

Q: What were your impressions of Nixon the man at that time?

NICHOLS: My impressions of Nixon prior to his arrival were very negative. My impressions of Nixon the man, based on this experience, were quite positive. He had a tremendous intellectual curiosity. He wasn't telling me anything but rather was picking my brain for everything and anything I could tell him about China and about the attitude of the people in Hong Kong towards China, and the attitude of the Chinese towards Hong Kong. He never stopped asking questions, one after another, which was quite impressive, I thought, as an insignificant cultural affairs officer in Hong Kong, what an experience to have a man who had been vice president of the United States and had run for President and was to run again, asking me these questions and paying attention to what I had to say.

Then I warned him about the press. I told him that the American correspondents would try to take over and dominate the press conference, that the Chinese were very passive, and that it would be a good idea if he paid attention to the Chinese questions. And by gosh, he did. He took extra time. In fact, he delayed his departure from Hong Kong on an Air France plane. They had to hold the plane -- he was going to Saigon -- because he held a press conference longer, mainly because he was letting the Chinese get their questions in. That was a real teaching experience to me.

Q: You mentioned Vietnam in this context. At that point it was quiescent. The French had left several years earlier, and we were not really involved.

NICHOLS: We were getting quite involved by '65, yes. It was after the Tonkin Gulf.

Q: This is after the death of President Kennedy and during the Johnson Administration.

NICHOLS: This is during the Johnson Administration. The Tonkin Gulf resolution had already been passed.

Q: So it was on the front burner.

NICHOLS: It was on the front burner, yes.

Q: Did you have any other intimations during that posting of what was to come in Vietnam?

NICHOLS: You had a pretty strong feeling about what was going on, because it was the R & R people, not only the military servicemen, but also our people posted there. The USIS people and State Department people would come into Hong Kong, and many of the wives were living in Hong Kong while husbands were in Vietnam. So we were getting a good dose of information about what was going on in the country, and it was obviously a much bigger thing than we ever expected. It was a very worrisome thing. It was really front burner in our minds out there, day in and day out. You could not forget that Vietnam was right around the corner from Hong Kong.

Q: You went, the next year or so, to the Voice of America, and then concentrated on Chinese relationships at that time. That's all part of the same fabric, I suppose.

NICHOLS: I was only the area officer for Australia and New Zealand, etc., for about six months when I was asked to succeed Jerry Strieker at the Voice of America as chief of the Chinese branch. That was quite an experience. A very interesting experience, and an intimidating experience, too, for me, in the beginning, because succeeding Jerry Strieker, who was probably the best Chinese language officer the U.S. Information Agency has ever had, was intimidating. Jerry recommended me, and I don't think it was based on my Chinese; it was just because Jerry had worked with me and felt that I could do the job. But to go in there and be in charge, and know that you're in charge of Chinese language broadcasts, boy, it worried me.

Q: VOA had a pretty heavy schedule of Chinese language broadcasts at the time?

NICHOLS: Oh, yes, very heavy. It was eight hours a day. Some of those were repeats. I think we had three and a half, four hours of original broadcasts, but that's a lot of air time.

Q: What was on those programs?

NICHOLS: News and features. We did a lot with news and features, and we had a big staff. I've forgotten how large the staff was. It's still large. But it was 25, 30, 40 people, up to 40 people at a time, including contract people. Some of them were strictly announcer types, news readers, and then there was the writing staff who wrote features, some of which were original features, some of which were based on translated material that was used for the back half of the programs. The front half of the program was always news and commentary. Then there was music, also, but most was news and commentary.

Q: Since the United States had no formal relations with mainland China, to what extent was the VOA used as a channel for messages one way or another?

NICHOLS: A very interesting thing happened while I was there in 1968. I had absolutely no idea that anything was going on at that time regarding a change in our relationship with China, but I was very disturbed because we, as a communications agency, and the Voice of America was a tool of communications, a major medium for our message, and that our main -- to use the word -- target audience was the people in China, not the people in Taiwan. I was disturbed that we were using language in Chinese that was offensive to the people in China.

Q: Why?

NICHOLS: Because it was our policy to do that. Our policy at the time required that we call them Communist China, not the People's Republic of China. We had to call them Zhonggong, and that means Chinese Communists. We didn't call it Beijing; we called it Peking, which was the nationalist name for Peking, which means "northern peace." Beijing means "northern capital." You see, the Nationalists never had their capital in Peking; they had it in Nanking and Chungking. So we couldn't call it that. And there was other terminology that we could not use. We had to use the language that Taiwan used in describing the government in China.

Well, I wrote a memo to the State Department about this, and I made my feelings known. I said, "Look, we're trying to communicate with people. If we're not going to have them turn off right at the beginning of our broadcast, then we better start using language that they accept." This went over to the PRC desk in State. It wasn't called the PRC desk, the People's Republic desk, in those days; it was called the Communist China desk, the deputy director of which was an old colleague of mine, Dick Donald, who has now passed away. Dick had worked with me in Hong Kong. He said, "I like your memo. This is good. I'm going to pass it on up."

Well, it went up to Bill Bundy, who was then the assistant secretary. By gosh, in a week, I got approval to use the proper terms on our broadcast, except when I was directly quoting Secretary Rusk, who always said "Communist China" and always said "Peking." But otherwise, unless I was directly quoting an American official, I could use the proper terminology.

Q: A kind of turning point, then. To what extent did the State Department pay attention to the Chinese broadcasts, use them, control them, be concerned about them?

NICHOLS: They were concerned about them. They didn't control them. They would look over some of the commentaries we were putting out. I worked with them quite closely, because I had a lot of colleagues in State with whom I had gone through Chinese language training.

There was a panel at that time, an advisory panel on China for the State Department, which drew on academics from all over the country, people like John Fairbanks, Bob Scalapino, and Doak Barnett, people who would come for a session once every two or three months. I'd sit in on these as the director of Voice broadcasts to China. The talk was about all aspects of U.S. policy towards China and what should be changed.

There was little doubt that the feeling in the Department of State then at the levels below the very top was that we should be moving in the direction of rapprochement with Peking.

To finish up this story about the Voice of America -- I've always wondered, as I read later, and later when I served in Taiwan and when I read about the signals that were given to China that we were moving away from our hard stance, whether or not we didn't use that change in language as one of our signals. I've never talked with anyone at State about this, really, because Dick Donald died, and I never had a chance to talk to Bill Bundy about it, and I've never seen it mentioned in the memoirs that I've read. But I have talked about it to Chinese in China who listened to the Voice of America.

Q: You make your annual trips even these days to China, so you are well in touch there.

NICHOLS: Yes. I ran into two people that told me they were listening to VOA then. They heard this difference in language and to the Chinese it was very significant, and people talked about it. In other words, the Chinese caught this change in language. To me it made everything seem worthwhile. Whether or not they were telling me the truth, it sounded sincere, anyhow, so I think it probably was used as one of the early signals.

The signals to China began to flow in the next two years, when I was in Taiwan.

Q: This is an interesting focus on the total apparatus of the U.S. Government utilizing all the tools it has at its command for foreign affairs purposes. One wonders whether the top echelon policy makers -- Bundy, Rusk, and higher -- were aware of this signal and what it might have meant to the Chinese at the time.

NICHOLS: I have to think that certainly Bundy knew. I mean, Bundy had to approve it. He had approved the change in language. I wasn't allowed to do it without his approval, so I'm sure he did. Now, whether this went up to Secretary Rusk, whether it went that far . . . See, this was prior to Kissinger. Most of the signals came in the next administration. The other signals have all been written up in memoirs. This development came prior to that.

Q: You might have been, you're saying, softening up your Chinese audience with this idea by this change in language.

NICHOLS: I think the whole idea in communications -- you just can't communicate with people unless you use language that they will accept. I mean, it's such a basic principle, that maybe it was accepted on that basis. Somebody saw the logic of this and accepted it for that reason.

Q: We're now at 1965 or thereabouts, '66, then '68. After Voice of America, what came next?

NICHOLS: I went to the Army War College in Carlisle, Pennsylvania, for a year.

Q: A year off?

NICHOLS: Yes, it was a year off. In effect, it was a year off. It was a very interesting year. I guess what it taught me more about than anything was that we have some very fine minds amongst our military. It was a good sort of cross-fertilization. It helped me work with the military later on. I did some interesting research on China while I was there, for my paper, and it was a good year.

Q: Then back to active duty as what?

NICHOLS: Then I went out to Taiwan as deputy PAO in '69.

Q: Had you been in Taiwan before?

NICHOLS: In language school. I'd spent two years there in language school, so I was going back to a place I knew. I went out as deputy PAO. When I arrived, the PAO was Ken Boyle, but soon thereafter he was replaced by Bob Clarke, who passed away a few years ago.

Q: So the changing nature of the Chinese-American relationship must have been one of your top focuses.

NICHOLS: When I went out there, it wasn't apparent that it was going to be. You see, I went out there just after the change in administration. The Nixon Administration had just come in. I was aware of the Nixon Foreign Affairs article on China, written prior to his being elected, in which he said the U.S. can't afford not to have relation with the most populous country in the world, a quarter of the world's population. So it was obvious Mr. Nixon felt that something should change, and Mr. Kissinger made it known, too. But very soon we began to see subtle changes taking place. Kissinger would have off-the-record briefings for the press that used to come to us as "limited official use." They'd be given out by the press quoting a highly placed official of the administration. Well, from the things that were being said by Kissinger, you could see where we were going.

Bob Clarke and I decided that what we needed to do was prepare our audience in Taiwan for what apparently was coming. Of course, we didn't know exactly what was coming. We had as much difficulty persuading the embassy, I think, to go along with our ideas, as we had in persuading the Taiwanese, the people on Taiwan, of what we were saying was happening. We gave monthly press briefings to the Chinese press, and when we had the right visitor, we'd draw on that person. I gave one on the Nixon doctrine. All these were beginnings, an attempt to show that U.S. foreign policy was moving away from its hard position, and that a detente was in the works.

Q: That must have generated tremendous pressures by the Nationalist Chinese in Taiwan against the American official establishment.

NICHOLS: There was certainly a great deal, and some of it was manifested in rather unpleasant ways. In Taiwan, we had branch offices down-island in Taichung, in Tainan, and in Kaohsiung. In 1970 I was visiting our office in Kaohsiung when we got a telephone call from Tainan, 30 miles from Kaohsiung. We were sitting down to dinner at the branch PAO's house, when a call came in that a bomb had just blown up the USIS Tainan office. So we went to Tainan. The office had been almost completely destroyed, and several people had been seriously hurt. This happened the day after Double Tenth, the Republic of China's National Day (Double Ten, October 10.) It also happened at a time when the United States had just given asylum or had helped, supposedly, in the escape from Taiwan of a Taiwan Nationalist, a man named Peng Ming-min.

The Chinese government was not happy with us, and those strong supporters of this Nationalist regime were not happy with us. Who placed the bomb was never officially acknowledged, but there were very strong suspicions about the source.

This was a time on Taiwan when, again, things like language in our press releases became important. The same thing I'd had with the Voice. I remember going to the embassy once to get approval for some language for the press from the deputy chief of mission. I said, "This is what we want to use."

He said, "You can't say that."

I said, "That's a direct quote from Kissinger's press briefing."

And he said, "Kissinger doesn't make U.S. foreign policy." [Well, at that time, of course, Kissinger headed the National Security Council; he wasn't Secretary then.]

I looked at him. I didn't say anything, but I looked at him and thought, "Boy, there's a lack of realism here in the embassy, as well." There really was. There was a tremendous amount of resistance. They couldn't believe what was happening.

Another thing that happened, just before I left Taiwan to go to Singapore -- well, a lot of things happened while we were in Taiwan, actually. I should mention this was a time when we withdrew the Seventh Fleet from the Taiwan Straits. It was announced by Vice President Agnew when he was out there on one of the two trips he made while I was there. Agnew brought the news to Chiang Kai-shek that we were taking the Seventh Fleet out of the Taiwan Straits.

Q: Chiang, the old Chinese Nationalist leader, was still in power then?

NICHOLS: Oh, yes, he didn't die until 1975. He was there and his presence was known. A lot of the work of the administration had been taken over by his son, Chiang Ching-kuo, but Chiang Kai-shek was still in power. He dealt with Vice President Agnew.

Q: Maybe we can jump ahead a little bit. We're talking about relations between U.S.A. and China. Where were you when the renewal of relationship was announced and became public knowledge?

NICHOLS: The renewal, first of all, the Kissinger trip. He arrived in Beijing the day I left Taiwan on transfer to Singapore. I didn't know it. This is a little story that's interesting, because just a week prior to this, my successor had arrived in Taiwan, and I took him down-island over the Fourth of July. This was '69. We visited the branch posts and missed the Fourth of July party in Taipei. When we returned, there was sort of a flap because the ambassador was concerned about the lack of any news in the papers about the Fourth of July party. Well, there had been some in the Chinese papers, but he only read the English language press, the China News.

The day that I was making my farewell call and introducing my successor in the ambassador's office, he said, "Bob, can't we do something about getting something favorable in the press?" He'd just returned from a trip to Washington. He said, "Do the Chinese know I saw the President?"

I said, "Mr. Ambassador, we didn't know that you'd seen the President."

He said, "Just a minute.~" He went over to his briefcase and pulled out a photo, a large photo, and he handed it to me. He said, "Can we do something with this?" It was a photo of President Nixon and himself (Ambassador Walter McConaughy) sitting in the Oval Office, opposite each other, staring with a blank look on each face.

I looked at that picture and said, "But sir, what would be the caption?" He said, "Okay, okay," and put it away. He felt I didn't like the idea. It wasn't the kind of picture that would have given the people on Taiwan any particular feeling of reassurance. I don't think that he was even told what was going on at that time. The President didn't know what to say to him, and he didn't know what to say to the President.

Q: And it showed on their faces.

NICHOLS: A week later, Kissinger was in Beijing. So no question, the President knew that Kissinger was going to make this trip to China when he saw the Ambassador. I saw the news when I stopped in Penang with my wife en route to Singapore.

Q: So you did not have to face the Nationalist Chinese in Taiwan.

NICHOLS: No, I left and several newspapermen saw us off at the airport. I wasn't there when it happened. I was on vacation.

Q: They must have been horrified and angered.

NICHOLS: Oh, I'm sure they were. I know they were, yes, definitely. But we had prepared them for something like this coming.

Q: We were talking about the moment when you were in Taiwan, when the Kissinger trip became known, and some of your other recollections of that post.

NICHOLS: I have one strong recollection of the post. I was talking a minute ago about Kissinger's influence and the direction we were taking in China, and how poorly people in the administration understood exactly what his position was. Near the end of my tour, just before I left Taiwan in June 1971, Frank Shakespeare, director of the Agency at the time, and the area director, John Reinhardt, arrived in Taipei.

I've mentioned that we'd had these monthly briefings for the press on U.S. policy. Well, Bob Clarke, the PAO, said, "We got Frank Shakespeare here, let's use Frank Shakespeare and let him talk to the Chinese press, and maybe he can give them something special, and maybe he can reassure them a little bit." The Ambassador thought this was a good idea. No American officials had been visiting Taiwan and you could sense Taiwan was becoming a pariah of some sort. Frank Shakespeare was the first American official of any significance to come to Taiwan for some time, so we thought we'd use him.

On the day he arrived with John Reinhardt, Bob Clarke and I presented him with this idea, and he liked the idea, but he said, "I've got to get approval." Bob Clarke held a reception at his house that night for Shakespeare to meet the Chinese staff. While we were there, Shakespeare drafted a cable to Washington to present what we wanted to do, and to see if there were any objections to his doing this. We were at Bob's house. He said, "How can I get this cable off?"

I said, "We can get it down to the embassy and the duty officer will get it out." We were at Bob's house. The USIS secretary was Dotty Fry. Dotty and I went into Bob's bedroom, where there was a typewriter. I read it over, and Dotty typed it up. I looked at the addressees and neither State nor USIA were included. So I added them. I thought it was just an oversight. I took the typed version to John Reinhardt. John looked at it, and took it over to Frank Shakespeare.

The next thing I knew, Frank Shakespeare came over to me and led me down a corridor. He put his arm around my shoulder and said, "Bob, I know you're a good bureaucrat." (Laughs) "You've made those changes in the cable addressees, but I have to tell you, I don't want this to go to the State and Agency. I only want it to go to the White House, to Kissinger." I got the message, and learned a valuable lesson. I mean, here was the Director of the U.S. Information Agency, but he was operating only with Kissinger and the White House, ignoring the Department of State and his own Agency.

Of course, the reply came back and he was told not to meet with the press. So we never had the Shakespeare briefing. He was not granted permission. I have always felt that to be a revealing anecdote.

Q: That was the nature of Frank. He was more interested in...

NICHOLS: It was also the nature of Kissinger on China policy. That's where all the decisions were made, strictly in the White House with Kissinger.

Q: Yes. From Taiwan, then, you mentioned you had gone to Singapore and had your own post at PAO.

FRED CHARLES THOMAS, JR
Chinese Language Training
Taichung (1960-1962)

Fred Charles Thomas Jr. was born in Arizona in 1927. He served overseas with the Army for two years before graduating from Bucknell University in 1951. He has served at overseas posts in Korea, Pakistan, Germany, Vietnam, and India, as well as the Office of Strategic Research in Washington DC. This interview was conducted by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1995.

Q: Obviously, you were seeing this from an enlisted man's viewpoint, but I want to catch your viewpoint at various times. What was Korea like in 1947?

THOMAS: It was so backward; it reminded me of China in the 1930s, when my father and I visited China. Beggars everywhere, filth. You'd come to work and go through that gate, and here'd be people dead in the gateway, in the wintertime, corpses. The smell of feces everywhere. The dust. It was just backward Orient at that time. It was the worst of the worst.

Q: Was there any contact with the Korean Army?

THOMAS: Oh, yes, later. Then I was moved to another job because Weckerling went on to something else. I became the Boy Friday to a man named Dr. Ernst Frankel(Ph.D.). Ernst Frankel was later among those who founded the Free Berlin University. He was a noted scholar on constitutional law, and he helped write the Korean Constitution. He was a GS-18 or equivalent in those days. But he was a typical nice Jewish man who didn't know how to handle the military. He didn't know how to use his rank. He and his wife had no children. They treated me as a son, in a way. I was invited for Sunday dinners. I worked for him for a couple of months, and then he was off to something.

There was a group there that was doing the legwork for the POLAD. It was called Political Advisory Group. It was made up of ex-State and -Foreign Service types who had been in the military when they joined the group. Some of them had been with OSS, left State during the Second World War. The head of group had been a State officer, had his doctorate in Chinese studies and was the son of missionaries to China, named Clyde Sergeant. He got to know me there on the Joint Commission because we were all working in one area. He asked me to join his group as the biographic officer. I was to set up the biographic files for Korea (they didn't have anything like that), with the idea that these would end up being the embassy's biographic files.

Q: What were you doing?

THOMAS: I was the biographic officer, because that's why they'd hired me. I set up the biographic files, plus I did domestic political work. We had a chief of political section named Rolland Bushner. Did you know Rolland at all?

Q: No.

THOMAS: Well, Rolland was a first-class officer, but he resigned later and went with FOREIGN AFFAIRS magazine. We didn't have any American women in Pusan when I first got there; it was terrible. There were no women clerks; you couldn't find anything in the file room. It was a mess. The embassy was in an old bank building. Lightner, who was the DCM, was a breath of fresh air compared to Muccio. Muccio was dour, in a way. I tried to make a joke the first day I arrived, and he said, "Well, if you don't like it here, get on an airplane." It was just a joke. But he wasn't there that long until he was called back for a consultation.

I got there about May 20th. We were in the middle, or soon thereafter, of one of the biggest political crises that had ever occurred, in terms of President Rhee wanting to make sure he got reelected president of Korea. Soon thereafter, we put Chang Myon on a hospital ship, to hide him from Rhee's goons. We were manipulating a great many things. I was involved in this, with the rest of the political section.

First of all, let me tell you, the political section was made up of, I think, four or five officers. I'd been hired because I knew something about politics there and people in the Department talking about my moving around with Bertsch and the Coalition Committee. So I knew some people there, and I knew my way around. This place didn't floor me. They had a fellow named Walter Drew, who would read newspapers all the day long, translations of newspapers, and then write up political stuff. It was pretty dull stuff, but he wrote well. Although, Drew had spent many years in Korea from MG days, he was very introverted and didn't get to know people. Another officer was Phil Manhard, who was a first-class collector and people person. He and I hit it off.

Q: He had just, not too long before, been in Shandong.

THOMAS: That's right, and he was a Chinese-language officer. He'd been down on Koji-do, or one of those islands, with a general, looking after the Chinese prisoners of war. But he and I became sort of buddies in the political section.

Q: What was your impression of the Rhee government sitting down in Pusan? By this time, in the summer of '52, essentially South Korea was as South Korea is today, although the country was devastated, the embassy was in Pusan, and all.

THOMAS: The embassy was very anti-Rhee, the whole group of us were; Muccio hadn't been. Muccio had gone with Rhee out of Seoul, he and MacDonald and a few other officers.

THOMAS: Yes, we were friends. (He was one of the best Korean specialists in the service, and a very fine man. He should have been made ambassador there.) They'd gotten out of Seoul and stuck together. So they'd been through the hard times together, with this fellow Shin Song-mo, the then defense minister, whom I was talking about, and many in the cabinet, they all went south. They suffered together, so there was a certain amount of camaraderie there. But Muccio was pulled out of Korea and sent back to the States. He'd been trying to protect Rhee and had done everything he could, but Rhee misread what was going on. Rhee felt that Muccio had done him in, and went after him, using money, because Rhee understood the system of using money with politicians in the U.S. Congress. He had his connections with the extreme right wing of the American government, including Stiles Bridges and others. Many of these names I don't remember anymore, because we're talking a long time ago. But at the time, I knew pretty much. There were people I knew of at that time within the government whose names I don't remember now.

Let me preface this, in terms of my approach to a country like Korea. If you paid for much information, you really didn't get what you really wanted. You had a lot of intelligence agencies there, of all numbers and stripes, collecting information, most of them buying it. I could go into war stories about various ones and stupid things. I'll give you one as an example a little later.

Anyway, because of this, I came to the conclusion that most of what they were furnishing was either concocted or was manipulated, because these people were much more used to manipulating others, in terms of the type things they'd been involved in, especially Rhee. Rhee was manipulating our government back here. I was trying to find out all I could about that, for my own protection and our embassy's protection, because I knew that we weren't going to be popular due to the fact that we were not siding with him in this fight with the National Assembly. That was very obvious.

Rhee suddenly turned to a person named Lee Bum Suk. Lee Bum Suk was a Korean general in Sian China who had been commander of Kwangbok Army under the OSS, Eagle Project, I think it was called, in China, which had a youth corps connected to it. (Later known as the Northwest Youth Corps. He had been the first minister of defense in the Rhee government.) The Kwangbok Army had worked with our OSS against the Japanese. Clyde Sergeant, my boss in the Political Advisory Group, had been the American OSS officer in charge in Sian. I had gotten to know Lee Bum Suk through Clyde Sergeant back when I'd been there in '48, and I knew his background. He was another Chiang Kai-shek, sort of what I call a Christian fascist. You know that type? He was very straight and reminded you of Chiang Kai-shek, very military in his bearing and very black and white. Well, he was brought in to be the hatchet man for Rhee.

The National Assembly, in the past, had elected the president. The president, by this time, had come to the conclusion that there was not going to be any presidency for him if he had to depend upon that damn National Assembly. So he'd better get the constitution changed to make it a popular election for president. The whole issue was to change the constitution. This took a good many votes, a lot of arm twisting and bully-boy tactics. We were trying to protect the majority of the members of the National Assembly, including Chang Myon and others that we considered democrats, against this pressure.

Q: Well, last time, we had you sort of leaving Korea, and then where did you go?

THOMAS: No, no, I wasn't leaving Korea. We'd just gotten the ambassador there. We'd gotten up to about 1953. By 1954, we had the whole thing going on with the Geneva Conference, if you remember.

Q: Ah, yes, this was really over Vietnam.

THOMAS: But for some reason, and it slips my memory now, they wanted people from Korea who had some experience in that situation to participate in Geneva.

Q: That's where we were talking to the Chinese, for the first time.

THOMAS: Oh, yes, and another funny thing in terms of Manhard at the time. Suddenly, because Manhard was a Marine Reserve officer and they wanted to use him for these talks with the Chinese at P'anmunjom, they called him back to active duty and put his uniform back on. I lived next door to the British MI6 for a while there, and the MI6 guy looked at me and said, "Well, this Manhard, he's more than meets the eye."

I said, "Well, may be, I don't know. But I like him; he's a lot of fun."

Q: Take me to your 166th millimeter regiment, that type thing.

THOMAS: You couldn't say toilet yet, and here you were... The craziest damn method... A year of this was very frustrating.

I rented a small cottage in Carmel, which was very nice. I became the darling of what I call the divorcee set. As a single man, I was invited to a lot of parties. It was an interesting year. I got to know some of the arty types around Carmel, and went to the club. Every year the club had a function where each language department was to put up a booth to make money for charity. A major in the Asian Department there was a part-time student, part-time administrator, an official interpreter, and an excellent linguist. He also ran the club. The next morning after this function was over, I said to him, "I didn't see a Korean booth here last night".

He said, "Oh, that's a funny story. It tells the difference between the Koreans, the Chinese, and the Japanese. Yesterday morning, the Chinese arrived early in the morning and started hammering and sawing and putting everything together to build their booth to sell Chinese food. And by six in the evening, when the benefit opened, they were finished. About three in the afternoon, the Japanese arrived; everything pre-cut, bang, bang, bang, it's up, and they're done. About six in the evening, the Korean Department head came in and said, 'Where's our booth?' He expected somebody to build it for them."

Anyway, it was an interesting year to be there, with so much going on in Asia at the time, with our first getting involved with Southeast Asia. I felt that there were better ways to learn a language. The teachers were good, but they should have been left alone to teach language rather than the time spent teaching military vocabulary. Korean is such a complex language, but the vocabulary will come if you've got command of the structure and command of the fundamental verbs of the language. That became obvious later, especially when I was learning Chinese. I realized that if you can really handle Chinese fluently, the needed vocabulary is easy to add. The problem is getting the structure down and handling it fluently with ease. Korean is a much harder language to learn to speak than Chinese.

Q: After a year at the language school, where did you go?

THOMAS: I went back to the Department, and there were some arguments over whether I was going to go back to the political or economic section, because some people said, It might be better if he did some economic work for broadening, or some consular work." I didn't want to do consular work. Because I was young, there also was some worry among some of the senior guys that my experience in Korea, combined with my language training might upstage them; I had already made some enemies for these reasons.

Q: I'm sure you had.

THOMAS: Thank God I had an ambassador who appreciated me, but some of the people in between didn't. By the time it was straightened out and the arguments settled, nearly a year had passed. I was glad to have that time to see my family because my parents were getting older. I left in the late summer of '56.

Q: By that time, peace was...

THOMAS: They were then in the middle of an aid program, big aid programs, and a lot of money being wasted. There were a lot of questions in people's minds about the corruption, tremendous corruption, in Korea. Sort of like you have in China today. An awful lot of stealing. Because Rhee was always balancing forces underneath him, it didn't matter whether you were corrupt. The issue was, if your group got too powerful, he'd put another group in. When you're playing that balancing act, you've got to put up with a lot of bad apples. And he had lots of them.

There's one other story that I think should be told because it has to do with that corruption problem. Just after Briggs arrived, this was the late summer of '52, Strong was the economic chief, the fellow who used to get drunk and tell everything to his mistress; shortly thereafter a man named Sydney Mellen, who was a very nice man, arrived to head the economic section. His wife was Italian, and he was a European diplomat, very sophisticated, very charming, but he really wasn't used to dealing with Asian subterfuge (although I felt, after Italy, he should have had some knack).

Anyway, he was at a staff meeting, where he told the brand new ambassador that the Koreans had managed a recent currency exchange, that is currency reform, beautifully, and it was a massive success.

What it amounted to was that on one day they suddenly announced that you had 24 hours to turn in all your currency and get new currency. You'd get one-for-one up to a certain level, then you'd get...

Q: That came later, but at that time, it was still considered the White House.

THOMAS: The Kyungmudae was just the name of the area in the Seoul where the President's residence is located.

Anyway, the ambassador started to realize that maybe what I was saying was true, but you couldn't tell Bill Jones anything. I just went my own way, reporting what I'd learned. At this point, it was a frustrating situation. I had been told when I was in the Department that Rhee was an old man and that I should busy myself trying to find out what the plans were if he kicked off in office because there would be a scramble for power, and how would that be handled. The intelligence people had been given this function, but the embassy had to have somebody looking at it, too. The intelligence people were rotated frequently and usually didn't speak Korean. They had agents who spoke the language, but agents are different from having American officials handling a problem.

I remember asking one influential Korean the question, "If Rhee dies, have you guys got any plans?"

He said, "I don't know, but I'll go find out." He came back and he told me, "They don't have any plans."

I pointed out, "The American Embassy feels you should, because if anything happened, what would..."

As this all went around and came around, he kept reporting back what he was learning, and I would put it into cables back to the Department. So that kept me pretty busy, doing all this and trying to keep track of Rhee.

In the meantime, I got involved in giving lectures at some of the universities on anything they asked me. I didn't know what I was talking about, but I'd go look it up and ... lecture on something to someone's kids. I got to know some of these college kids; I could feel, from talking to them, because I was speaking Korean at the time, that they wanted to learn some English; I had a group of people coming to my house to learn English...

And my girlfriend at the time was helping me.

Q: Was she Korean?

THOMAS: No, she was American, Catherine M. Frank, a vice consul. We ended up being married in San Francisco in October 1958 as she was en-route from Seoul to the Department. She was a woman Foreign Service officer and had entered in the class of '56. She'd been one of two women officers in a class of 60 appointed to the Foreign Service. She was to be my assistant in the political section, when an older woman, named Maggie Barrett, who'd done this type work, arrived on the scene and became my assistant. I got to read Kay's personnel file; she had a doctorate in political science. Maggie was a lawyer and a CPA and had been a biographic officer in Mexico City for years; she ended up being my assistant in Korea. By that time, I'd come to the conclusion, the only way to go at politics in an Asian country was the biographic approach. Looking at a political party was crazy. You look at people and the interconnections between people. Maggie turned out to be a gemstone.

Anyway, Kay Frank started teaching these students and talking to them. I felt that Rhee was unpopular. I concluded that sooner or later there was going to be a problem with the students. I kept bringing this up, but nobody would listen to me. You didn't dare put anything on paper, for fear you'd get yourself... Robertson, at that point, had already gotten rid of some young officers in Taiwan who were talking about what was wrong with Chiang Kai-shek. It was not the thing to do.

Q: The U.N. Cemetery...

THOMAS: Across the river from Seoul.

Q: Across the Han.

THOMAS: I remember going and standing around there, waiting for this man to approach me because it was to be a blind thing. He never showed. He'd given me his name, and so it was all in the files that I'd gone to meet him. It turned out, that this guy was the guy that later ran the coup that put Park Chung Hee in power. It came up at that time, because they looked up his name and here was this memo I'd written.

Anyway, just before I left Korea in '58... and by then I was convinced we were going to have a shake-up in the Korean government and that Rhee was going to go, one way or the other. Whether it would be the military or the students, I couldn't say, but it was just a matter of time.

I went to see Mr. Huh and told him this. I told him that if anything went wrong, I felt that he was probably the best person to handle the interim situation. Furthermore I was going back to the United States and was going to try to get him invited to do a tour of the United States, on which I would try to accompany him. This would be a way of getting him known and also sending a signal to President Rhee. He said, "All right, if you can do that."

I came back to the States and I talked to my Dad about the fact that it was very sad about the killing of this Korean boy; that it had created terrible feelings in Korea. He knew Mayor Dilworth, and it would be sort of appropriate, on the anniversary, whatever it was, maybe the first anniversary, or the second, I forget, of this kid's being killed, that he invite the mayor of Seoul to be the guest of the mayor of Philadelphia, to commemorate the boy's death and to make an apology on the part of Philadelphia for this. It would be helpful to American-Korean relations. This idea was presented to Dilworth who thought it was a good idea. All it cost Philadelphia was the price of three airplane tickets because he could get free hotel space from the hotel owners. I then suggested that maybe if he could broker this to the cities of New York, Washington, Chicago and San Francisco because the costs to these cities would be small because Mr. Huh and his party could stop on their way back. He'd get a chance to visit these cities and each mayor would welcome him, it would be worthwhile. Fortunately, everybody agreed.

In the meantime, I came back to the Department; I'm preaching at the working level, and I'm waiting to go into Chinese-language school. It was all set up for me to study Chinese because I couldn't stay in Korea all the rest of my life. I wanted to take leave; language school was going to start two months or a month later.

Anyway, I'm preaching this stuff about Korea. I remember David Bane. Do you know David Bane?

Q: It doesn't ring a bell.

THOMAS: I remember David Bane was director of NEA. He had been in and out of the Department, I think with some of the oil companies, and he was a rather sophisticated guy. He ended up later in Pakistan as consul general in Lahore. But at that time David was head of NEA. I remember telling David that Rhee was in trouble; his response was you better keep your mouth shut or you'll get yourself fired if it gets to Mr. Robertson that the Rhee government's not long for this world. I said, "You watch, you watch."

In the meantime, Mr. Huh was invited to Philadelphia; I took leave, and traveled around with him. We went to Philadelphia, New York, Washington, Chicago and San Francisco; it took about ten days or a bit more for this tour. In New York we called on General MacArthur at his apartment. The newspaper reported the story about this call on MacArthur and how this visit by Mayor Huh of Seoul was in commemoration of the student's being killed in Philadelphia. It was also reported that Mr. Thomas from the State Department was accompanying the mayor, etc.

When the word reached President Rhee, you can guess what happened to Mr. Huh when he returned to Seoul. He was fired, right there on the spot. He was out of a job. In the interim, Rhee started to make trouble for Ambassador Dowling back here. He was called back for consultation.

Q: You took Chinese for how long?

THOMAS: Nearly three years. The first year, off and on, because of being involved with Korean affairs. Then two full years at Taichung, where I ended up being acting director of the language school.

I found much that was wrong with how the system allowed linguistic scientists to select which candidates would study Oriental languages. In earlier times, officers who had proven themselves as competent in relating to the peoples of East Asia, and who would be more effective with the language as a tool, were seen as eligible for this major investment in time and money. To select inexperienced officers on the basis of language aptitude alone can create competent interpreters, but excellent interpreters can be hired at much lower salaries. Many of these people learned easily, but found East Asia not to their liking, and spent their free time at the local American military officers clubs. The investment was a waste of money. (This changed approach to the selection of language officers fitted in well with the demise of "men of substance" and the substitution of "the organization man".)

Q: Oh, absolutely.

THOMAS: But if you want effective political and economic officers, they'd better know the language.

To keep that from happening, you must not let them decide who is given language training only based on language aptitude tests. We've got to say to them, "Here we've got an officer we know is damn good at developing productive relationships with the Chinese people (Gwanshi); he's done such a good job, we want you to teach him Chinese. Now it might take him six months longer than it takes somebody else to learn the same amount of language. We don't care. You train him." But that's what's needed in terms of developing effective diplomats.

I saw this phenomenon during my period at Taichung. In the end, however, I ended up getting a 4 in reading, and a 3+ in spoken, which is pretty good.

Q: Oh, it's very good. Just for the record, 5 is a native speaker. It's a two thing: 1 through 5 (5 being the highest) for reading; and 1 through 5 for speaking.

THOMAS: You've got to be a college graduate in that country, native speaker, to get a 5.

Q: And the normal person going to this is lucky to get a 3.3.

THOMAS: That's right. I remember, because I was running this school for six months at the same time as I was a student. The teachers all liked me. Because I was the acting headmaster or whatever you want to call it, principal or director, FSI here worried that there might be favoritism. They brought in Don Sergle to replace me, who'd by then graduated from there and was head of USIS in Taichung. He took over the school from me just at the time I was to graduate. He was then acting director the week of my graduation. He had to sit in, actually sit in, while I took my oral, and sit in while I took my written which had been sent to him from FSI in Washington. He sealed both the written and the tape of my oral and sent them to Washington to be graded. This was done because I'd been acting director of the school, and there was a possible conflict of interest.

But a scandal occurred due to me, after I left there, that I felt very badly about. I want to get it on record now because I want this issue to be addressed.

I had always taken the attitude that when you're dealing with people who have less than you do, you try to be helpful to them. When I left there, I sold things that I didn't want or need any longer (like I'd had some carpets made for my house locally, inexpensive stuff), to some of the teachers at a discount price. They were low-paid people. I sold them my bicycle at a discount price. I tried to be decent to these people who'd busted their ass teaching me. I'd come to know, and encouraged the other students to get to know them in a very social and personal way.

They got a new guy in, a few weeks after I left there, who was to be the new director, who spoke Chinese, but he was from a missionary background.

In the meantime, the head teacher of the school had saved up a fair amount of money in dollars and given it to me. He liked hi-fi's; he asked me to buy him a hi-fi when I got back and send it through APO. Well, this was against the rules. There's no doubt about that. But every one of us broke rules that way. You couldn't be in the Foreign Service and not. We're constantly giving whiskey away to people.

There was a fellow, with the initials L.N. who was with the USIS, there in language school LN and his wife had befriended us and thrown a big party for us as we were leaving.

Q: Were you married by this time?

THOMAS: Oh, yes, my wife was there. We had to pay money to get her trained in Chinese, because the government wouldn't do it at that time. We spent a fair amount of money giving her language lessons; she learned Chinese along with me. She's a better linguist, but, of course, she didn't cover the amount that I had.

Anyway, as I remember it now, I asked LN, "Would you mind being the recipient of this hi-fi gear for Mr. Lin? He's given me the money, and I'm going to pick it up at the PX up in Tokyo and put it in the APO for you, and when it gets here, just give it to him." Which is what happened.

However, it turned out LN was not a good linguist, and he didn't bust his ass like I did. He was a social animal. He and his wife liked to party. That's why we had good times with them; they were always having parties. He was flunking out of the school. He thought he'd pull a blackmail on Lin, the head instructor -- "I've got this stuff, etc. etc."

Then this whole thing came out, that I'd sent this stuff; therefore, Thomas got these high grades. There was no way I got a high grade... it all originated and was graded back here. So nobody in Washington or at the school, who knew the facts, believed that.

This new missionary type said, "Well, from now on, there'll be no fraternization between the students and the teachers." Couldn't even go to a party.

Q: The kiss of death.

THOMAS: Kiss of death. The whole place was terrible. I heard all about it via the letters people were writing me. They fired the senior instructor. He got booted because of all this. LN, in the end, because he'd played this hardnose thing, graduated, but I don't think he was ever very good at Chinese. But they never dared show their faces to me again, those two. Yet we'd been close friends there. They're here in Washington. A very sad ending!

Q: You graduated what year?

THOMAS: I graduated in '62. First of all, I was due to go to Hong Kong, in the economic section. There was somebody in Hong Kong that had been in Korea that didn't like me. I don't know who, but I made my enemies.

First of all, there was the commissary issue in Korea. The married couples all wanted a limit so that no servants were to be allowed in the commissary to buy for the single people. The fresh vegetables and other items in short supply came in at ten o'clock in the morning and were put on the shelves, and they were gone in a matter of a couple of hours. Our servants were over there to get them for us, along with the wives. The wives didn't like standing in line with our servants. They should get VIP treatment. If that happened, single people wouldn't get any of the fresh vegetables. Since single people were the majority in the embassy, they could outvote everybody.

That's why I was president of the Embassy Club. The ambassador put out an order that the servants couldn't shop at the commissary any longer. I said, "All right, I can't buck the ambassador." But I quietly went to this Korean manager, since I was his boss as president of the club, and I said, "Look, I want the stuff split. I want two-thirds of it not put on the shelves until six in the evening, the fresh stuff. One-third at ten in the morning because about one-third of the embassy is married. Two-thirds are single. That's the way it's to be split everything that comes in. If it runs out in the morning, you haven't got any more." That's what he did. Of course, that made me unpopular as hell over there with some of the married couples. But that's the way it worked.

Then the married people got together and tried to run somebody against me to become president. It didn't work. They got something through that I couldn't succeed myself; we got another single person in there as president. This type thing went on.

I was back in the Department, and informal word comes back to me that somebody didn't want me in Hong Kong. You know how that works in the damn system. It can cause all types of problems. Then there was talk of sending me to Taipei. A similar thing happened in Taipei; somebody didn't want me there. (I didn't fit as an "Organization Man" and substance types can be a problem for the system.)

Then they decided to open up a new China affairs post for a Chinese-affairs officer in Karachi, Pakistan. Pakistan Internal Airlines had gone into China. They had a Chinese-affairs officer in Delhi. The guy who had been chief of the political section in Hong Kong, Jake, had that job. He'd been transferred to Delhi. That was a pretty senior job in the Chinese-affairs reporting business, because of India. I was given the Chinese-affairs post for two countries: Pakistan and Afghanistan. I was assigned to the political section in Pakistan.

Q: You were in Pakistan from when to when?

THOMAS: Sixty-three to '65. That was a very interesting period; I had real problems there. That was a period when China and Pakistan became very close. My biggest fights were with the chief of the political section and with the ambassador.

Q: Who was the ambassador and chief of the political section?

THOMAS: McConaughy.

Q: McConaughy again.

THOMAS: Yes.

Q: Again somebody who was...

THOMAS: Anti-Communist.

Q: Really a very, very strong anti-Communist, to the point where it probably had some effect on his...

THOMAS: His judgement. A fellow that did his writing for him, Dick Sneider, who was later ambassador to Korea... Did you know Dick Sneider?

Q: Yes, he was my ambassador in Korea.

THOMAS: Is that right? Well, Sneider was my political chief. I didn't get along very well with Sneider because Sneider was doing just exactly what he was told by McConaughy. I was an effective political officer; I got to know a lot of people in Pakistan, fast. Sneider was not very good socially at handling himself. He was sort of abrupt, and people didn't take to this.

Q: Yes, he was a tough cookie.

THOMAS: He was chief of the political section; yet he hadn't made many friends in the diplomatic corps there. He was sort of negative; he tended to lord it over people. You know how you make calls when you first get to a post? He put out a memo that none of us were to call on anybody, in any of the other embassies, senior in rank to us. I was a senior second secretary, but most foreign embassies in Pakistan didn't even have second secretaries.

Q: No, they had just one person, and that was...

THOMAS: A first secretary, or maybe a chargé, or maybe a minister.

Q: Maybe quite a junior officer.

THOMAS: That's right. The word was out in the diplomatic community that there was a China linguist assigned to do the Chinese-affairs reporting job in the American Embassy. Yet I was told I couldn't call on anybody. Well, I soon said, "I'll cure that." I just started telling any junior officer I could, from any other embassy, that this was a problem for me because I was hamstrung by my own political chief, who wouldn't let me meet anybody; that I'd like to get to know anybody else who knew anything about China or Chinese. It turned out the Canadian minister there, who was the deputy chief of the Canadian mission, was a China linguist; I think married to a Chinese. The French Embassy had the same situation as did the Australian Embassy. All these guys, who were number two in their embassies, came around and called on me. You can imagine Sneider's reaction.

We formed a China club, with me as the president. They asked if they could bring their dispatches and talk to me when they were writing about China, and we'd trade information. Out of this, I got to know as many... Karachi became a small Hong Kong. I talked to anybody coming though on PIA going to China. At the same time, I got to know the Pakistani people.

Q: No, I don't.

THOMAS: He was a bright young man, had a hell of a good sense of humor, and a nice wife, who was from a Turkish Jewish community in Turkey. I never could understand the Department's assigning Jews to political sections in Muslim countries, especially ones like Pakistan. Here you had the chief of the political section was a Jew, and you had Gelber. I'm being given hell most of the time by my boss, but Gelber spent all his time working on a Master's Degree thesis. He hardly turned in anything because, first of all, he had no contacts in the community, his being Jewish. He was bright; he could write musicals. He was a very talented guy and funny, and he'd write very funny stuff. But he didn't know how to get along with the local people. He wasn't around them; he just went home to his wife.

After this first trip with Pir Pagaro, I wrote up everything I learned, in a memcon about politics there, and the fact that the Pir wanted me to go with him. I got an agreement out of the political chief that I'd go hunting with the Pir whenever I wanted to, with no leave taken. I didn't have to take leave, because local politics wasn't my job.

I told the Pir I was interested in Chinese matters, and if he could obtain some information concerning China for me, I'd appreciate it. I'd be willing to give him advice on current politics in Pakistan, if I could be of help.

Every Sunday morning, if we weren't out hunting, he'd either be at my house or I'd be at his house, having coffee and talking local politics.

Then another thing happened. It turned out that he's like a lot of South Asians; they believe in soothsayers or fortune tellers. There was an Indian who was his fortune teller. Early in the game, the Pir asked me my date of birth, the exact day and the year. It turned out I was born on the same day of the year he was, only a year earlier. This soothsayer told him that a diplomat was going to come to Pakistan, who was born on the same day of the year, who was going to make all the difference in his career, politically, and that he should use this man for advice. This put me in a rather special situation with Pir Pagaro.

I'm expected to understand local politics. First of all, I don't know anything about local politics. Before I can advise the Pir, he and some of his people have to tutor me on the local situation. They've got to tell me all the background. I'm learning all this background and dictating it in memcons, but it's not my job to get it to Washington.

This resulted in a funny story because many months later, a cable from Washington about Gelber's reporting, stating, "This reporting is excellent, but there are no backup memcons. Where are the memcons for all these cables?" All this stuff is going in by cable. We want to see... Well, they'd gotten word, through the grapevine, and I don't know who, because I didn't care, but somebody'd let them know. I think it was another guy who had gone home early and told them that all this stuff was coming from me. Then Sneider (Sneider was part of the problem) was forced, along with Gelber, to package up all my memcons and send them back to the Department, because it became very obvious that I was the guy furnishing all this information. The Pir had his spies everywhere.

In the meantime, I got to know a man named Jimmy Fancy who was an Ismaili. He was one of the leaders of the Fancy Clan all of whom were Ismailis. The Ismailis were headed by that fellow they weigh in gold, the Aga Khan. He was one of the Aga Khan's followers.

I can still remember telling Fancy, one night during dinner, about one of my hunting trips with Pir Pagaro, when, out in the middle of the desert, my boiled drinking water had been lost. The reason it had been lost was the people who were transporting it thought it was my liquor, and they didn't want me to have liquor. But the Pir had told me, "You bring your liquor. I can't drink it, because it's against the Muslim code. But most of these people will, on the hunt, and you have it..." The person who had left my water behind thought that it was liquor; it was really water. The liquor got there, but the water didn't. I complained to the Pir. He sent around a case of Evian water, how civilized! out there in the middle of the damned desert. I thought this was pretty plush.

I told this story to Jimmy Fancy. Later, when the Aga Khan arrived for one of his visits, I got a call from Jimmy Fancy, "Hey, would you get in touch with the Pir and obtain some Evian water for the Aga Khan?" The Pir responded by sending me several cases which I sent on to Jimmy Fancy.

It turned out that Jimmy Fancy, who ran this big industrial complex, one of the biggest in Pakistan, said to me, "Look, I can't afford, in a country like this, to go without having spies everywhere. I have my own intelligence system. I'm sure that I know more about what goes on here than most of your embassy. Fred, I'm willing to keep you informed, if you'd like." He came to like me. I received all this domestic political information from either Jimmy Fancy, or Pir Pagaro, while, at the same time, giving Pir Pagaro advice.

In the meantime, there was somebody who was working in the foreign ministry, who was close to the Pir, and who was telling the Pir stuff out of school. The Pir was willing to tell me who the man was, but I really didn't want to know because I knew that this information would go over like a lead balloon in our embassy. They might try to hurt this guy. If I didn't know, I could protect the source and still get away with what I was trying to accomplish. It became very obvious to me that Bhutto was in bed with the Chinese Communists. Kennedy was the president when we first arrived in Pakistan; I felt he was a breath of fresh air - after years of knee jerk anti-communism under the Republicans. Maybe, I could sell the idea to the Kennedy administration of using Pakistan as a bridge to China. It was my analysis that Pakistan based on the realities of geography and the size of India, had to have a close relationship with China. There is no way around it. Since India was Pakistan's biggest enemy, there was no way Pakistan was not going to make friends with China. We ought to use this situation rather than trying to fight it, in spite of the fact that Pakistan was in CENTO and SEATO. At that time there was a big argument going on among China specialists over whether the Sino Soviet split was for real. I believed it was for real and that we should look to using Pakistan as a bridge to establishing relations with China. But here you've got McConaughy, whose views reflected those of the extreme right in Congress... And Bowles is down in...Delhi pushing the India card.

Q: Chester Bowles.

THOMAS: Chester Bowles is down in...

Q: New Delhi, as our ambassador.

THOMAS: I had to go to Delhi fairly regularly, because I was ordered there by the Department, to confer with Jake, who was the Chinese-affairs officer for India. I have to give you this flashback because it tied in with my relationship with the embassy in Delhi. Prior to leaving Washington for Pakistan, I went to the Department's travel office to make arrangements. I told the woman there that we had just had a new baby girl (Veronica), our second child. The baby was about six months old, and we wanted to go by ship. Because of this situation, I was not interested in going first class in a third-class stateroom in the hole. I'd rather fly.

Q: They would call something first class, but it would be down in the bowels of the ship.

THOMAS: That's right. So I said, "If you can't give me true first-class accommodations, I want to fly. If you can give me first-class accommodations going to Naples," (then I'd fly out of Rome on to Pakistan.)

She said, "You're going to have to wait, because it's lowest first-class available."

A week or so before we were to go, she called me in and said, "I've got you a cabin on the sun deck, with a big picture window." And she showed me pictures.

I said, "That's fine."

We boarded The Constitution with some of my friends in New York. We went to our first dinner, in the first-class dining room. It was just for couples; they had baby sitters for the young babies. We were seated at a table with another couple. It turned out he was going out to be counselor for administration in Delhi. His name was Bob Francis. He was a big, heavy fellow, but had a good sense of humor. It turned out he was a hunter, and we got along fine. But, of course, he was down in the hole. He introduced me to some ambassador who was going to eastern Europe, who was down in the hole also. We got to be friends on that trip, for the two weeks we were on it. He said, "You get down to Delhi, you've got to come and see us and stay with us."

Every time I went to Delhi, I'd stay with him and his wife at their place. Counselors for Administration live pretty well. He and his wife had become the Bowles's closest personal friends in the embassy. Mrs. Bowles was always dropping over for coffee. Jake, the Chinese Affairs Officer there, was due to leave; Jake's tour was up.

Do you know Paul Kreisberg?

Q: Yes.

THOMAS: Paul Kreisberg, I heard later, had wanted that job, and Bowles didn't want him. I don't know what the reason was, but Bowles said no. Here we had another China specialist, because Kreisberg was a Chinese linguist, being sent to Pakistan as deputy chief of the political section, to replace the guy who was caught in Iran, who was chargé.

Q: Bruce Laingen?

THOMAS: Bruce had been deputy chief, and the buffer between me and Sneider. Bruce understood I was trying to get the truth out. He was a sensitive and honest person and was so different from Sneider. Sneider was always raising hell with me about something. In my opinion, it was an aggressive posture taken in order to discourage my trying to get something out concerning China that they didn't want to approve.

Q: McConaughy was a China hand, too, wasn't he?

THOMAS: Yes, he was a China hand, but he didn't speak Chinese. But he was a China hand. He'd been in China a good deal of the time. He spoke a little Chinese, but not enough to count.

Anyway, while in Delhi, Bowles's wife, whom I came to know through the Francis's, suggested to me that maybe I'd like to come to Delhi as China-affairs officer, to take Jake's place. I quietly told Bob Francis, "I don't want to create problems for you or for myself, but put the scotch on the idea. Bowles likes people who do just what they're told, and I'm having enough trouble with McConaughy. Bowles is bigger than McConaughy, in a way. I don't want to come here. I'll just stay where I am."

Anyway, while in Delhi, I'd talk about what was wrong in Pakistan, and the fact that Bhutto and the Chinese were getting closer. Delhi was getting intelligence about the situation in Pakistan. Aside from the intelligence, I was picking this up on my own. The intelligence reports coming in from the intelligence agencies were full of it. But it was all being pooh-poohed by Sneider and the ambassador. This stuff, that was in raw intelligence form, would come in but you couldn't write about it because they didn't want to give it any significance. At times, it appeared that the Department was playing the same game. This was crap.

In the meantime, I started taking pictures or having pictures taken for me of Chinese tanks coming in the back door in Karachi. Tanks and arms. I tried to get this out, but the ambassador wouldn't let me do anything with it. My cables, were changed and I'd just say, "Take my name off. I don't want my name on this stuff. A war is coming here, and it's being whipped up by the Chinese. Bhutto is involved with it." When you're in that situation and nobody wants to send anything to Washington, you've got to be very careful about how you handle anything you learn, because they're liable to just try to screw it up.

It was at this point, after Bhutto had been to Africa and made a lot of statements that had created real problems for the United States, that the stuff hit the fan. Bhutto claimed that we were creating problems in Africa; he was helping the Chinese in their efforts at subversion there.

The Sindh Club was across the street from the embassy in Karachi. It was the club for the local gentry. Kreisberg, myself and a fellow named Dick Nyrop... (Nyrop was a gusty guy; I'll tell you a story about Nyrop and his courage.) The three of us were at the club when, in front of a bunch of Pakistani foreign ministry types, we called Bhutto some names. I forget what they were, but they weren't very pleasant names, and he's the foreign minister. Because of his lies and crap about the United States, none of us were very happy, and we were saying so.

Suddenly, a memo arrives at the embassy from the foreign ministry, declaring all three of us persona non grata and wanting us out of there in two weeks.

I remember McConaughy calling us all in; all three of us in a row like a bunch of lieutenants, as if saluting him, standing at attention in front of his desk. He read this letter to us and said, "Gentlemen, is there any truth to this?"

And we all piped up, "No, sir!", in unison. But we knew damn well it was true.

Within less than a week... By then, it was well known that I was Pir Pagaro's American hunting buddy. It was going on Christmas time. There was to be a new National Assembly election. It was a parliamentary system there. Bhutto had been going around bad-mouthing the United States, and yet Pakistan was very dependent on the United States for a lot of aid, its military aid, etc.

Suddenly, despite the fact we'd received a memo from the foreign ministry declaring me persona non grata, I received a telephone call from a friend of mine who was at Bhutto's estate inviting me, in the name of Mr. Bhutto, to come as soon as I can get there, for a prolonged hunt with the foreign minister on his estate at Larkana.

I went to see Sneider to tell him that I've received this invitation from Bhutto. I said, "You know, it's very interesting, Dick; I'm being invited to go hunting with the foreign minister at his estate, while at the same time, they've declared me persona non grata."

He looked at me and he said, "You telling me the truth? You're always coming up with these goddamn lies."

He'd cussed me out, called me a son of a bitch one time. I told him, "You do that again, and I'll break your jaw." I could get physical with enough provocation. Sneider just turned me off. Here all this stuff was going in, all this work I was doing, and I wasn't getting any credit with the Department. (In retrospect, I question whether the Department was interested in the truth. I remember, when I reported in after returning from Karachi, how curt Carol Laise was to me when I called on her. It's my opinion now, that the powers that be there had their own agenda and the truth created problems for them.)

Sneider sent me in to the ambassador, and the ambassador said, "He's never invited me to go hunting. You're damn right, you go. Get there anyway you can, but you get there. I want to know what's going on."

Bhutto is the enemy of my good friend Pir Pagaro, so I wanted to check in with the Pir before I did anything. I call the Pir and ask to see him.

We got together and the Pir said, "I know about that invitation. I've got spies there. Don't worry, you'll not be seeing Bhutto right away. Bhutto's not there; he's off doing something. When you first get there, your host is going to be a man named Hukro. And Hukro is a dangerous person. He looks like a benign old man -- white hair, white beard -- but he has killed half a dozen men with his own hands. He's a dangerous guy. But his job is to entertain you until the foreign minister gets back. There'll be people in the room that belong to me, that are my people. So don't worry. Just go and have a good time. You'll learn something about what that place is like."

I called the airport (it's the Christmas season maybe mid-December) to charter a private plane. Everybody there at the airport was drunk. You could tell they were having a party. I couldn't get a private plane; the train was always booked, but, with enough bribe money, I bought my way onto the sleeper. I arrived at Larkana. The man who'd called me was there, a lieutenant in the Pak Air Force. The first day we went out hunting, I was worried. Frankly, I was scared. I was scared because here was this guy Bhutto (all the stories I'd heard about him) and then this guy Hukro. Bhutto wasn't there, but his wife was there. I was staying in the residence, in Bhutto's own home, in a guest bedroom. Pictures of Zhou En-lai and Mao Zedong were on the grand piano and thick Chinese carpets on the floor. Mrs. was very nice, as was their daughter who's now the prime minister.

Q: Benazir.

THOMAS: Benazir was then a little girl.

I'd hunted all over the Sindh, south of there. But this was up closer to Lahore, northern Sindh. We were hunting partridge that day, along with pigeons. I never shot pigeons, because I would never shoot anything I wouldn't eat. I didn't like squab, so I didn't shoot pigeons. But, I was shooting more cobras than I was shooting anything else. Blowing their heads off. They'd come up here, and they'd come up there, and boom, boom. Well, this was worrisome; how did so many cobras end up out here? It had never happened before. We shot some partridge that day, and I think I shot a few ring-necked pheasants. It was to be the first day of the hunt. We went back and rested that evening; the next day was a better day.

The evening of the second day there was to be a party in our honor, which Hukro was to throw at one of the local restaurants. We were back from the hunt about four in the afternoon; my young host, who was about my age, was there, this lieutenant in the Pakistani air corps, a pilot. He said, "Look, these bastards are out to get you drunk tonight. You've got to watch. I've got a pound of butter here, and you and I are going to split the pound, and we're going to eat it with this loaf of bread. You grease everything." So that's what we did.

We went to the party; it was a girlie party with Sindhi dancing girls. There was a game they played while the girls danced. Your host or another guest standing behind you would hold money on your cheeks, and the girls would come by and dance in front of you, in low-cut dresses, and lean over you, and take the money away. It was belly-dancing, pretty sensuous. I called them the barefoot, dirty finger-nailed, pretty healthy looking "Sindhi Sexpots". They were prostitutes. ... and we'd all been drinking pretty heavily, with toasts and all this stuff. Going on the end of the evening, I looked down on my cheeks, and here's a lot of money on both cheeks. Somebody standing behind me with a nice chunk of money, Pak money. The most beautiful, gorgeous, voluptuous of these dancing girls was there in front of me, dancing. Instead of just taking the money, she had these two long ruby painted fingernails on each forefinger; as she took the money, she stabbed me in both cheeks with those fingernails. I had a big gash in both of my cheeks, like saber cuts; I bled like a stuck pig. My host made the comment, "I don't know about your country, Mr. Thomas, but when a woman does that in our country, there is only one cure." In other words, take her home to bed. I wasn't about to take that girl home to bed. I could see myself coming down with God knows what... So that didn't work, but...

Christmas was coming on, and I wanted to be with my family. I could see Bhutto wanted me there for two weeks, which would have been right through Christmas. Hunting wasn't that important to me, and I'd done what the ambassador told me, which was to go up there and find out what they were up to.

Talking to enough people up there, and listening to the drunken talk that was going on around me that night (although I wasn't sober, I was not as drunk as some of the other people I was listening to), I came to the conclusion that the foreign minister wanted to take me around personally, hunting, throughout the whole election district he was campaigning in, to show me off as his American connection, so that he had no worry about people thinking that the Americans were so anti-him because he'd made all these anti-American statements to get himself in with the Chinese. That was what he was using me for; that was the reason.

I suddenly announced that I had to leave because I had to get back to my family for the Christmas holidays. I thanked them for their... They got me a reservation back to Karachi.

On arrival at Karachi, it must have been six in the morning, the ambassador's car was waiting for me at the train station, with orders to take me directly to the residence. The ambassador was shaving when I arrived. The ambassador turned around and looked at me with these scars on my face; he said, "What the hell happened to you?" I told him the story of the dancing girl.

Then he asked, "What did your wife say?"

I said, "I haven't seen her yet."

He said, "I want to know what she says."

Anyway, I told him what I thought this was all about with Bhutto. That evening on arriving at a reception with my wife the ambassador spotted me coming in the door and signaled for me to join him. His first question was "What did your wife say?" "She said 'Are your Tetanus shots up to date?'" He roared, and noted that my wife was a pretty cool lady.

In the meantime, Pir Pagaro had someone in the foreign ministry who knew what was going on, and the Pir was passing that information to me. The Pir even offered to let me talk to this source, but I said I didn't want to. This person had seen a memo that discussed a letter of agreement between Pakistan and China, a secret letter of agreement that had to do with preparations for this war against India, in which China agreed to do certain things, and the Paks were working with the Chinese in terms of this.

I put this in a memo to the ambassador, that I'd heard this through one of my sources, but I couldn't tell him exactly where it came from except out of the foreign ministry.

I sent this, of course, through Sneider; Sneider was livid. That was the morning I threatened to knock his block off when he called me a son of a bitch because of this information. "You haven't got any proof. All you've got there are words in a memo , You sob!" Etc., etc.

"I've shown you pictures of tanks coming in here. I've shown you this; I've shown you that."

In the meantime, Jimmy Fancy came to me with the same facts, that there was a war coming; that China and Pakistan were planning to provoke it with India.

My tour was about over, coming close to an end. Fancy said to me, "Your leaving just at this time, it's terrible. You're the Chinese-affairs officer."
