What happened concerned my daughter. The Department wanted me to stay longer. My daughter had been bitten by something; she started having convulsions.

The administrative officer there was of Filipino background, an ex-chief petty officer out of the Navy. He was typical of those who kiss ass above but would screw the secretaries and everybody that was junior. For example, he'd pay the officers' per diem to go up Islamabad on TDY. The embassy was getting ready to move, we were building a new embassy up north. Because of this, the staff had to go up there at times. The secretaries had to go there, but they weren't given per diem, yet the officers were. The secretaries needed it more than the officers.

The embassy doctor recommended that my daughter be taken to Frankfurt to be checked out in the hospital there because the local hospital was terrible...

But the son of a bitch refused to sign the orders.

When I heard this, I went in on a Saturday afternoon. He was in his office. He didn't know how to use the staff; he was always at his own typewriter, doing things. I said, "If you don't sign those orders, I'll spend the rest of my career getting your career." It was my daughter whose health was at stake in this situation.

He was livid. People usually didn't speak to him that way, because the administrative officer could create problems for you.

Well, he signed the orders, and my wife and daughter went off to Germany. But they still didn't cure her, and these convulsions would come and go. They had her on sedatives, some purple-colored stuff that would dope her out.

I wanted to get the hell out of there. My two years were up. The situation was dangerous, the embassy was blind, deaf and dumb, the family was too important to risk under such conditions . Even though the Department wanted me to stay on, I wasn't about to. There's a war coming, and nobody wanted to believe me.

Now here's the damndest thing about this, in terms of the realities of what was happening in that embassy. Jimmy Fancy said, "Look, you're leaving within days on a ship." I was taking the Lloyd Trestino Lines out of Karachi. He said, "I want to throw a luncheon in your honor, I want you to bring several officers from your embassy to that luncheon, so I can get to know some of them. In order to keep your ambassador informed, somebody's got to take your place as my contact with the embassy. If we have a war with India, this could be terrible for everybody here, and ruin my business." He had a big industrial complex.

I said, "All right. Sure."

There were some CIA people in the building; there were the other political officers. I invited several from each group to go to that luncheon. Not one of those people wanted to go. I ended up at that luncheon alone. Not one of them would leave the embassy. They all used the excuse that they didn't want to be out of there. They wanted to be there because the ambassador might need them. Christ, they weren't learning anything sitting in that embassy. The whole issue was: they knew where their bread was buttered. Being involved with the truth could be dangerous for one's career.

Now, a flashback, this one concerns a rather gusty guy named Nyrop... After I first arrived in Karachi, everyone was complaining about the commissary. The prices in the commissary were horrendous. Everybody in USAID (we had a big USAID mission there), clerks in the embassy, officers and wives complained about the terrible prices in the commissary.

Motor pool cars took us to the office in the morning and home at night. You never knew who was going to be in your car. It would be the head of the USIA one minute and a clerk the next time. I had a personal car, but most of the time, I left it home with my wife and rode in an embassy car, because she needed transportation for the kids to go to school.

I was in the car with the head of USIS, the deputy chief of the political section, and someone else, I think somebody from the CIA, and they were all complaining about prices in the commissary. I was brand new and listened but I decided to find out why the prices were so high.

I started making contacts within the American official community and asking questions. I soon located somebody in USAID who knew something. He said "If I give you a memo that I've gotten my hands on, that I'm not supposed to have, will you not let anybody know where you got it?"

I said, "You're damn right. Nobody'll know. I'll just say I got this memo."

This memo had been written for the ambassador by the administrative counselor concerning the commissary problem, the reason why prices had to be so high, and the fact that this was causing economic hardship for the whole staff. This had to be kept quiet because it was necessary to cover up the mistake made by the previous ambassador.

This memo pointed out that the previous ambassador to McConaughy, [William Manning Rountree]... a career type, who was, I gather, somewhat arrogant, had given away to the Pak

Government the big warehouse and building which housed the commissary. The money to build these buildings on land owned by the United States government was the capital of the embassy community and not U.S. Government money. Without it the community had no real property against which it could borrow at reasonable rates for ordinary operating expenses. This capital represented the three or four or five hundred dollars each family put up on arrival, and you got it back when you left. It turned out that this ambassador had given away that building to the Pak government. So the capital for the embassy club was no longer there to borrow against. Therefore, we had to borrow at high interest rates. At the same time, the manager was buying all his stuff from one outfit in Texas, single source. There was some corruption, obviously, over that. But nobody wanted to talk about that aspect, because that's part of the... It appears the administrative officers were tied in with that some way, but I couldn't prove that. But I did have a copy of this memo, with all the details.

I thermofaxed copies of this memo, enough for every officer attending the weekly staff meeting. All embassy officers were present. Before the meeting, I put one a copy at every place around the table and on every chair in the room.

The administrative counselor arrived saw the document; jumped up and said, " Who put this out?"

I raised my hand. He was livid. By then, a lot of people had read it. I said, "Obviously, something's got to be done about this commissary. It appears to be the fault of the administration."

The only person in that room who stuck with me in that fight (and a fight went on that morning) was this one junior political officer named Dick Nyrop. He stuck with me. Everybody else, including the senior officers and heads of other agencies all backed down.

From then on, they, at least, knew what had happened. I said, "From now on, gentlemen, I will manage to get my stuff my own way."

The commissary was trying to make most of profits on the liquor sales. We were paying a horrible price for liquor, compared to other embassies. I asked a British colleague to put in an order for me. I bought all of my liquor from the British from then on, just to get around that problem. By the case. You had to buy it that way rather than by the bottle.

This problem involving commissaries is endemic to the system. By the end of my career I had seen enough to come to that conclusion, but this occasion was the first lesson to me. As I remember it, the man running the commissary in Karachi had been in Afghanistan where he had been fired from that commissary. It was always these single source operations in which prices were too high. I felt there was some kickback going on in the system. I think it was bigger than one person. That's my feeling. Back in the Department, there was something wrong with that whole structure. But, without a full scale investigation by the I.G., who could say for sure?

Anyway, out of this, I was not popular with the administrative counselor, especially after I raised all this hell about sending my daughter out of country for treatment.

In the end, nobody came to the Fancy party, they knew what the ambassador didn't want to hear.

My last night there was a Friday night. We were boarding the ship on Saturday morning.

Q: This was what year?

THOMAS: In the fall, early September? of 1965. The war is imminent. The embassy is pretending it's not happening. I had pictures, and had shown them to the political chief, of tanks being brought in. The intelligence people are talking about it, but you couldn't get the embassy...

McConaughy felt (according to feedback within the embassy) that if he admitted that Pakistan our ally, a member of both CENTO and SEATO, was in bed with Communist China, he could not compete with Bowles in Delhi. He didn't want this. He was keeping Pakistan in our court. Pakistan was in our court, and that was that. They weren't in with the Chinese Communists. That was the gospel. He was in a state of denial and self delusion.

It was very obvious that it wasn't going off that way.

The night before we were to leave, there were a lot of parties in our honor around the community. I'd gotten to know the Brits and the French and everybody. We had this China Club the members of which were for the most part the ambassadors or DCM's who had become personal friends.

Before we went to the parties, I got a call from Pir Pagaro. He said, "Look, you plan to come here last thing, after all your parties are over. Plan to stay all night, because I've got something I want to give you as a going-away present. I'd like to help your career."

I said, "Okay."

Well, it turned out the Pir had been called in two days earlier by the general staff of the Pak army and asked to sit in on the general staff meetings of the planning for the war. The Pir didn't approve of this war. But they wanted to use his bandit people, the Hurs, who also lived part of the time in India...nomadic.

Q: This was going to be the Sindh War, wasn't it?

THOMAS: The Sindh War, yes. It went off up in Karachi and in Kashmir and in the Sindh and across in to the Punjab.

Q: It was sort of called the Sindh War.

THOMAS: The Sindh War, '65. Anyway, it was close to Lahore, where the... and then in the Sindh. Well, the whole thing was planned, and they wanted the Pir to use his people as guerilla fighters. He was given the whole battle plan, when things were to start, the order of battle i.e. where the troops were, etc. for him to study and have for his use, so that he understood.

He said, "Here, now you copy this down. I can't let you have this, but you copy all this you want to."

I copied. I spent all night copying this damn thing, making drawings, quick drawings, putting troops where they were, and the whole damned battle plan.

I hadn't had any sleep. At six in the morning, I put the plan into my safe in the political section. It's a Saturday morning. I wrote a big sign telling the reader to get the security officer and have him open it and read the document inside. It was very important. Right on the safe, big sign.

After I got back to the Department, I learned that stuff never was sent to Washington. The whole battle plan we had ahead of time never got out of that embassy.

Along with this information that I had learned from the Pir and some of his connections, I also learned that this was not just to be a war in Pakistan, this was to be the start of a move to force America out of the Far East.

In other words, if this effort had been successful, it was only the first part of a total plan whereby there was to be a coup in Indonesia, which was to overthrow the right wing. You had a right wing and a left wing in Indonesia. But the left wing, the Communists, were to overthrow the right wing and move on Malaysia and move also on Vietnam, because we were having problems in Vietnam. This was '65. At the same time, they were going to get the North Koreans to move into South Korea. This was to be the first move in a broad scale effort all over Asia to force the Americans out of Asia. You know, the domino thing. All of this was being planned in Beijing.

This was not something that my ambassador wanted to hear anything about.

We boarded the ship. As it turned out, due to our socializing there, we'd gotten to know, but not realized it, the agent for Lloyd Tristino. He'd been to our home many times, and I never even thought of him. So when we decided to go by ship, I asked the travel section in the embassy to get me my reservations. Suddenly, I received a call from this guy, and he said, "You know, I'm their agent here."

I said, "Oh, I'd forgotten that."

He said, "You know your government's rules. You're going on that ship, but you're not going to have confirmation until the last minute, because you're going to have the best cabin on the ship."

It ended up, we did. It was right at the center of the ship, so the rest of the ship rolls around that position.

The voyage began in Yokohama and went all the way through to Venice; Karachi was the halfway point. The Captain's Ball was the night after we left Karachi. For my wife and me, this was our first social event aboard, all dressed up in tuxedo and fancy gown.

At the Captain's Ball, they gave away the captain's prize of a jeroboam of champagne to the winner of the elimination dance. The elimination dance was done using a bingo machine, if the number pasted to your lapel came up, you sat down. We were out there dancing, with a number on my lapel, suddenly one of the stewards came up and changed my number. I didn't even think anything about it. We're dancing along, and the numbers keep falling, and we keep dancing and we keep dancing and we keep dancing. At the end, we're the only ones left standing. So they deliver the jeroboam of champagne.

Most of the dance music being played all evening long was typical rock and roll music of the '60s. Well, I had been dancing with this Italian crowd in Karachi, including this guy (he was an Italian) who was representing Lloyd Tristino at the local hotels. I would dance with the wives, and they all liked Viennese waltzing. I can waltz and many men don't. I learned this as a young man at military school. Many people there knew I could waltz, and my wife and I waltzed often in the ball rooms of the local hotels. They then announced, "Would the winner of the jeroboam of champagne lead off the next dance?" And guess what they played the minute we got up? A waltz, the first that evening. Of course, that tipped us that this was all set up. It was a setup.

Q: Well, why don't we stop at this point. You left in '65, and you were coming back to the Department.

Today is the 17th of April, 1995. This is also income tax day, because it's a Monday. Fred, we've got you leaving Pakistan in 1965. Then whiter?

[THOMAS: In retrospect, to this point in my career, I had served in two posts as a political officer, Korea and Pakistan. In both, one faced the same problem, a lack of integrity by those in positions of power to attempt to report honestly because it either would not be welcome in Washington or it would, in the eyes of our ambassador, reflect badly on his tenure. It appears that the development of a rational effective foreign policy, based on the realities of a situation, has become the hostage of dogmatically conceived views which have been concocted to serve the narrow economic interests of the "Establishment".]

THOMAS: I returned to the department, and was told that I would be given a posting someplace in the Far East where, after all that work in language school, I could use my Chinese. Every time they went to send me someplace, there was somebody willing to quietly shoot it down. But, as you can imagine, from what I have said so far, I was not the most political guy in the world when it came to bucking the bureaucracy. I realized that, but I had a philosophy that I had to live with, that I was brought up with, and it made it impossible for me to play the smart bureaucratic game. Therefore you do step on some toes when you call a spade a spade. And every time they kept turning... And so I sat in limbo for about a year here, in sort of never-never land, just going into the office. It was like after all of us who left Vietnam, later. But in this case, it wasn't because there weren't enough jobs, it was that the jobs they had in mind kept falling through.

At last, I said, "Look, if this is going to continue, I've got kids and a wife, and I can't stay in limbo any longer. Let's give me a job."

There was an outfit known as the Office of Strategic Research, in the Department, and it had a function. There was a man whom I'd known. I'm trying to think of his name now. You know, names, after this many years... James, Jim.

As a flashback, he had been chief of the political section while I had been a student in Taiwan. And I had been told that I was going to be pulled out of language school there and sent to him to do what they call the political/military job, because they had to rewrite the Status of Forces Agreement there. I put up a hell of a fight, saying I hadn't come to this language school to have it interrupted, and I didn't want to do that, and if they insisted I come there right away, I'd just resign from the whole shebang. And so, when I said that, I remember the ambassador, Drumright, called me in. He had heard what I'd had to say, and he said, "All right, I'll give you three more months down there. In three months, you're to be up here," from the language school into that job. Well, by the time the three months were up, thank God they'd found somebody else to fill it, and I didn't have to go.

Anyway, he was back here and he was chief of the political section there, and we got to know each other, and I liked him; he liked me.

Q: Chief of the political section in this Office of Strategic Research?

THOMAS: No, he was in the Office of Strategic Research, one of the senior people in it by then. He said, "Fred, you've got an engineering degree, and we need somebody with an electrical engineering degree." At this time, they were spending gobs of money on the McNamara Line.

My paper, caused questioning by the economics people. I guess this wasn't the thing to be saying, because suddenly my job was switched from Switzerland; I was to go to the political section in Bonn as what they called the Asian guy, working for Jock Dean.

Q: That's John Gunther Dean.

THOMAS: Yes. He had a brother, David, who was a Chinese linguist.

Q: Jagdschein being a hunting license.

THOMAS: And very hard to come by.

Q: Oh, yes.

THOMAS: I enlisted Colonel DeSanto to become the co-chairman. He got some of his junior officers to become the administrative workhorses for this effort. In the end, we made a lot of money. We gave away a car, and we gave away a lot of other things at this banquet. Ford gave us an automobile to give away in a raffle; it was a big moneymaker.

Out of this, I'd become somewhat popular with the school administration. Chuck Wootton wanted me to re-up and stay on. But I wanted to get back to East Asia and Chinese, because here China had just opened up.

Q: Nixon had made his visit there in, what was it?

THOMAS: In 1971. China had opened up. I'd learned Chinese, and I wanted to get back to East Asia and China. In response to every inquiry, came the answer that all the slots were already filled. You've been away from the China crowd for a while. You'll have to come back and do your stint in Vietnam. Because that's where everybody was going. So I thought, well, that's fine.

I gave up this pleasant job, drinking wine on the Rhine and going around Germany and having a good time. Relatively, it was the most pleasant post I've ever had. It wasn't high excitement, but it was fun.

Q: I have a long interview that I did with Terry McNamara, who was the consul general in Can-tho, and essentially he was left alone. The CIA took care of their own and left, and he more or less had to line up things. So he got out on his own.

THOMAS: I'll tell you why. I was at the embassy at the time; I pulled the ICCS out of Can-tho long before... The only reason they didn't want to pull anybody out was because it would look like the place was falling. This was Martin's own doing, so he insisted everybody stay in place. You couldn't even ship your wife out unless you did it with your own money. The place was seething with anger because people wanted their wives and children out of there. Mine were the first to come in, but then they allowed others in. It was a terrible situation.

Q: You left when, and when did it fall?

THOMAS: I left on April 4th, and it fell on the 28th.

Q: Where did you go?

THOMAS: I flew to Hong Kong and stayed in Hong Kong a while. I was so worried about friends there and people there, you know, Americans and other people, that I just didn't want to leave. But I'd been ordered to go. I even volunteered to stay, but wasn't allowed to. Hong Kong was a little too expensive, so we then went on to Taiwan, and stayed there for a while. Nobody was pushing to get me back to the States.

Q: They had too many people.

THOMAS: Laos had already fallen, and there were all these people out of Laos. I stayed in Taiwan for a while. I think we spent three weeks in Asia, until the fall. I saw some friends, I think, in Tokyo, who had gotten out as it fell. Then we came on back to the States and stayed for a while on the West Coast with my brother-in-law and sister. I talked to people who got out right at the end, but it didn't get any better. The realism.

Thank God for a few people there like Sneypp, Moorefield, Hays and Lacy Wright. I think they received some medals out of it. They deserved them because they were the ones who really organized to get things moving.

Our effort was the first, the attachés and my meeting with General Smith started the airlift that moved non-official Americans. Without that early start many Americans would have been endangered. But, there were still a lot of people left behind, who paid the price for our inept policies.

Q: Then what did you do?

THOMAS: The Department, nobody wanted me back here. Nobody wanted any of us back here. When I got back, I went into the Department, and I was told to stay on leave, administrative leave, which meant you didn't pay for it. We couldn't keep staying with relatives. We decided get back into our own house. There were no jobs at the Department. The oil crisis was still brewing. It was the mid-'70s, late '70s, and they had all these research projects going, on petroleum and the shortage of oil. I was sent out to do that. It was just make-work. I ended up doing research on oil, going out to the Department of Energy. I had these clearances, and these clearances let me go to a lot of places and see a lot of documents. But it was no job, really.

I kicked around with nothing really to do. They talked about giving me some more Chinese to bring my Chinese back, there was no job in Beijing at the time.

I was a year in limbo with no real job. It was more than that. They ended up giving me a research INR type job, which was dullsville, sort of intelligence analysis, which I found not my thing.

Desai had taken over in India, and they thought there was a big break in India, with Desai in.

Q: Desai was the new president who replaced Indira Gandhi.

Q: You were in Delhi from when to when?

THOMAS: I arrived there in, let's say, October of '77, and departed in June of '78. I had the school year with my kids there.

Goheen had left on home leave; I went in to make my final call on Arch Blood; I apologized for not having accomplished anything, in terms of my job there. He said, "Oh, you've accomplished a lot. What you did for this commissary and the morale here has been worth, you know..."

I took off for Washington. There was no real job back here, really. They kept kicking me from pillar to post. Suddenly, at a Christmas party here, I met someone from a large corporation; he heard I was a China linguist and that I was looking around; I was sort of fed up with bureaucracy. He said he thought he could line up a job with his corporation, and a new big contract they had in China. This was the winter of '78, Christmas time, and I listened to him.

In the spring of '79, I just decided I'd had it. I retired in June, with no written commitment, but an oral commitment, that I would be hired by this company to go to China for them.

Just as I retired, the Chinese pulled the rug out from under this company and a lot of others. They got scared they were spending too much money, and they cancelled all these contracts. I'd retired, suddenly, into what I thought was going to be a job. It wasn't a job, because it disappeared.

I tried to start a consulting business on China. I was just getting started, when I was hit from the rear in a terrible automobile accident. It was two to three years before I came out of the shock from that, the trauma.

I said, "Well, what the hell. I'm going to enjoy my retirement." I became involved in local political affairs.

That was pretty much my State Department career.

Q: Well, I want to thank you very much. Fred. This has been very illuminating.

JOHN J. TAYLOR
Chinese Language Training/Political Officer
Taichung (1960-1965)

John J. Taylor was born in Arkansas and attended Vanderbilt University before joining the US Marine Corps and eventually the Foreign Service. Overseas Taylor served in Ghana, Taiwan, Malaysia, China, South Africa and Cuba. He also served in INR, the NSC, as the deputy assistant secretary for intelligence coordination and as the chief of mission in Cuba. Taylor was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2000.

Q: Were you at all concerned that you might end up in a Spanish speaking area?

TAYLOR: I think an assignment to Latin America or Spain never entered my head. When I passed the Spanish language test, I had already been assigned to Chinese language training. I went out one door at FSI and in another.

Q: Had you ever tried to learn Chinese on your own?

TAYLOR: I was a complete neophyte when I entered Chinese language training.

Q: You went to FSI first?

TAYLOR: Right - for nine or ten months.

Q: What was that like?

TAYLOR: We covered the waterfront pretty much – both reading and speaking. In the first month, we concentrated on spoken Chinese. Then we began the infernal memorization of characters. Three of us made up the class. It was a good experience in every way. The teachers were excellent. It's pretty hard to be enthusiastic day after day teaching your language to neophytes, but our Chinese teachers did it with great spirit.

Q: At the time, we had not recognized the PRC. Did you expect that we would do so or did you think you would be tied to Honk Kong or Taipei?

TAYLOR: I went into Chinese affairs because I was convinced that US relations with the PRC would eventually become one of the most critical elements in our foreign policy. I had no doubt that the role of China in the world would grow geometrically. I also knew that some day we would recognize the PRC and all the old Consulates would open up. I knew the day would come when I would be working on the mainland of China.

Q: Do you remember who your fellow students were?

TAYLOR: One was Marty Gale, a Foreign Service officer who had been vice-consul in Monaco. He had become well acquainted with Grace Kelly, lucky dog. Through that fortunate connection he was, while in Chinese training, offered a job managing some investments of the Prince and Grace in Bermuda. He resigned from the Service. I think he ended up as an advisor to the Bermuda government and Monaco as well. I never heard of him again. I suppose he's retired now and playing lawn bowls somewhere on the islands and having kippers for breakfast.

The other student was a young CIA officer. After completing the time at FSI, the two of us went to Taichung, Taiwan to continue the two-year course. The CIA chap also soon resigned and left government service. So, I was the only one of the three who stayed in the Foreign Service.

After the completion of language training, I was assigned to our embassy in Taipei as a political officer. Consequently, I spent the last few months learning Taiwanese, which, of course, is also a Chinese dialect.

Q: You were in Taichung essentially for eighteen months. You were there when Kennedy became president. Did that raise expectations?

TAYLOR: Yes, especially for those planning to work in Chinese affairs. We had high hopes that there would soon be recognition of the PRC - or at least some serious rapprochement between the U.S. and China.

Q: Did you learn something from your teachers about the situation on Taiwan and in the PRC?

TAYLOR: The faculty represented a wide variety of experiences and viewpoints. Of course, no one was pro-communist. But we did hear a lot about the mainland; most of the faculty had come from there with the Peoples Liberation Army hot on their tail. We had only one teacher who was Taiwan born.

Q: During the election campaign, a vigorous debate arose about Quemoy and Matsu. Was that an issue while you were in language training?

TAYLOR: Naturally, it was a major issue. This was soon after the Quemoy crisis of 1958. At that time, tensions ran high across the Strait and it appeared that war could break out. The language school students made a trip to Quemoy. In those days, the two sides were shelling each other every other day. Wisely, they picked the same day. An old Nationalist Air Force plane flew us onto the island on one of the off days. We explored the extensive fortifications that had been cut into the granite mountain that formed the core of the island. It was striking. It was evident, however, that militarily, Quemoy was not important to Taiwan. It might have provided some early warning if an invasion of the big island was in the planned stage, but it was real estate that primarily had political importance. For Chiang Kai-shek, Quemoy and Matsu were part of the mainland and thus their occupation rationalized his claim to be the leader still of all China. Despite the crisis of 1958, the islands were also important to Mao. Although Mao saw the islands occupied by his enemies with US support as an affront, they also provided a valuable link for him to Taiwan. Thus he probably was content with Chiang's occupation.

Q: While in school, did you get much information about what was going on the mainland?

TAYLOR: While attending FSI, we had very good lecturers - academics like Harold Hinton. They would speak to us - Hinton in a machine-gun delivery - on the economic and political situation in the PRC. Even more important, perhaps, was the reading, both assigned and self-selected... I started to read everything I could lay my hands on about China, but especially about contemporary China. I started a pretty good library on Chinese affairs; it now contains hundreds of books.

Q: Did your wife also take language training?

TAYLOR: We had two young children, so it was not possible when we were in Washington. When we arrived in Taichung she began to take classes. We paid for these private lessons. Today, they are provided to spouses free. We had Chinese servants - a maid/nanny, a cook, and his wife. None of them spoke any English at all; so Betsy's Chinese became very good. She is fluent still today, but does not read Chinese.

Q: Who was our ambassador in Taipei at the time?

TAYLOR: At first, it was Everett Drumright. During the 1940s, he was a relatively junior China specialist who survived the McCarthy era unscathed because he was so young and because he had not been critical of Chiang Kai-shek or the Nationalists in his reporting. Most senior China specialists, like John Service, were of course highly critical of Chiang and naïve about the intentions of the communists. Drumright became ambassador in 1958. He held the view that our support of Chiang Kai-shek was critical to U.S. security interests in the Far East. That, he believed, was the overriding consideration. The regime's internal policies, which included suppression of any political opposition, constituted a domestic question in which, he believed, we should not get involved. In our confrontation with the PRC, we needed the support of the Nationalists in such things as intelligence, but more importantly in the event of war with China, Taiwan would be a key strategic asset and a valuable political ally. Whether or not we liked the KMT's domestic policies was beside the point, he thought. Admiral Alan Kirk succeeded Drumright in July 1962. Kirk was a good old salt who had been in command of the allied naval forces on D-day, but he lasted only seven months due to bad health. Another former admiral, Jerauld Wright, replaced him.

Q: You said that in the last six months you concentrated on learning Taiwanese. How different is that from Mandarin or other Chinese dialects?

TAYLOR: It is something like the difference between Portuguese and Spanish. There is a commonality that allows people to have a limited understanding of each other's speech. They are different languages; although once you know one, it is of course much easier to learn the other.

I did have some difficulty switching after 18 months of Mandarin to Taiwanese. But I was looking forward to the assignment in the political section, my main mission being to cover Taiwanese politics and local affairs. The Taiwan provincial assembly met not too far from Taichung, so while still at the school I made a point of meeting a good number of assembly members. I invited a few to our house for dinners and once a good number for a large reception. I don't remember asking the embassy's permission to proceed with these social occasions, the purpose of which was to make contacts for my forthcoming job. I just went ahead.

Q: Did you get the impression during your tour in Taichung that the Taiwanese were "second class" citizens with the mainlanders who had fled to Taiwan calling all the shots?

TAYLOR: The history of the Taiwanese under Kuomintang (KMT) rule had been up to that point quite tragic. In 1947, the Nationalists brutally suppressed a Taiwanese uprising, killing about 28,000 Taiwanese. In the 1949-50 period, as the Nationalists fled to Taiwan, KMT security services executed several thousand other native Taiwanese suspected to be opponents of KMT rule. These were traumatic experiences, which have not been forgotten almost 65 years later. When I arrived on Taiwan in 1960, no open political dissent was allowed. The mainlanders, who had come with Chiang in 1949, dominated the government, the military, the police, and the strong public economic sector, which controlled all infrastructure but also a number of major industries. In the Nationalist military in 1960, no native Taiwanese had obtained the rank above captain.

The Taiwanese were an oppressed majority. It was just a fact of life. No one thought anything could be done about it for the foreseeable future. I reported on the views of the Taiwanese political leaders and other Taiwanese elite in business, church, etc. The KMT allowed independent candidates to run for local elections but not to form opposition parties. A couple of nominal parties from the mainland days still existed in the Legislative Yuan (the central parliament), but under martial law only the KMT could operate on Taiwan. In effect, the independents formed an opposition to the ruling party. I got to know a good number of these independent politicians even before I left Taichung.

Q: Was the junior member of the political staff usually assigned to cover domestic politics in Taiwan?

TAYLOR: It was either the embassy or more likely the China desk back in Washington that suggested that I study Taiwanese as well as Mandarin. This followed a decision to assign a junior officer in the political section to follow native Taiwanese affairs.

The new mayor of Kaohsiung, Henry Kao, was typical of the local opposition politician who operated within the rules and ran for office as an independent. That the KMT allowed him to win was considered at the time quite extraordinary. Chiang Ching-kuo, who was Chiang Kai-shek's son and then responsible for internal security as well as covert operations against the mainland, had been convinced by Kao to allow him to assign monitors to every polling station to insure a fair outcome. Kao thus became the first non-KMT mayor on Taiwan. I got to know him quite well. In private, he would condemn the KMT for its dictatorial and authoritarian ways as well as for its policies that kept native Taiwanese out of government, the public sector, and the military. Still, he was careful not to condemn President Chiang Kai-shek or the grand policy of returning to or "counterattacking" the mainland. Of course, he did not mention the subject of Taiwanese independence. That was far beyond the "pale."

Nevertheless, even in the early 1960s, one could detect the emergence of a group of island-born politicians who saw a path for themselves to position and influence in local and provincial affairs, and down the road possibly something more - provided of course they did not step over the boundaries set by the two Chiangs and the KMT.

Q: During this 1962-65 period, what was the embassy's attitude towards this emerging native political movement? Did we see it essentially as a Taiwan internal issue or were we concerned that the Taiwanese might try to establish some kind of relationships with the PRC?

TAYLOR: In the 1960s the chemistry of US-Taiwan relations began to change. President Kennedy was elected in 1960 and ran into difficulties almost immediately in our relations with the Soviet Union. The debacle of the invasion of Cuba was a bad start to say the least. Looking around to recoup and perhaps interested in the subject, the Administration began to consider the state of democracy around the world and what today we refer to as "human rights." This involved taking a hard look at civil liberties even in dictatorial countries that were our allies, like Taiwan. The new "look" in America's world posture had an impact on the embassy's priorities, even when we still had an ambassador (Drumwright) who was completely sold on Chiang Kai-shek and the KMT. Still, the Kennedy people began to make it known to the KMT that it had a strong interest in civil rights and democracy.

For many years, the embassy kept its distance from the budding Taiwanese opposition, not even showing moral support whenever they ran afoul of the government and were locked up. But with Kennedy's election, the embassy started to pay greater attention to these people and to the attitudes of the Taiwanese people in general. As I said, my assignment was a new one for the embassy, and reflected this new interest, and very likely an instruction from Washington.

Q: Was there any concern that the Taiwanese, if they ever were to take power, might take a different position on foreign policy issues?

TAYLOR: Ambassador Drumwright worried that if the Taiwanese ever took control, the staunch anti-communist line of the KMT would be watered down and Taiwan could even try to adopt a somewhat neutral position. Drumright believed that if a free and fair election was held on the island, the KMT would lose and the Taiwanese opposition would take charge. He was wary of the opposition's stand on the Cold War and China; at best he thought its position was unpredictable, at worst, it would be opportunist. He saw the Republic of China as a very important U.S. partner - and an unsinkable aircraft carrier - in the Far East. This contribution, he thought, was vital in the Cold War and in the containment of the PRC.

In 1961, a Taiwan magazine called The Free China Review became increasingly liberal in its editorial content. It was supported by the Republic of China's most famous intellectual, Hu Shih, who had been ambassador to the U.S. during the early part of the war with Japan. After 1949, Hu remained in New York. His magazine began to call for democratic reform on Taiwan. About this time, an informal collection of intellectuals and non-party politicians that shared these views soon formed an informal study group. It included a mainlander named Lei Chen, editor of Free China Review, and the Taiwanese Mayor of Taipei, Henry Kao. They and others discussed the possibility of forming a political opposition party. Lei and one of his associates were arrested one night and charged with sedition. The associate was also accused of being a communist agent. The whole affair was handled with a heavy hand by the authorities. The charges were clearly trumped up and the court had already made up its mind before the trial began. That was not surprising in light of the KMT's track record on opposition parties. The "plotters" were sentenced to long jail time.

The Department sent a cable to Drumright instructing him to make representations on behalf of Lei Chen. He was told to make it clear to Chiang Kai-shek in no uncertain terms that we did not take kindly to his high-handed methods in suppressing democratic opposition. This was the first such lecture the Department had thought of sending to the Gimo since 1950. The ambassador was told to point out to the Gimo that the draconian police measures then commonly practiced in Taiwan might well lead to events like those in Korea that had recently ended with the ouster of Syngman Rhee. Drumright did not follow his instructions; rather, he sent a reply to Washington that pointed out that Chiang Kai-shek would pay no attention to our jawboning in this fashion because he knew that if free and fair elections were to be upheld, the KMT would be defeated. Therefore, neither he nor his son would neither allow such elections nor a formal opposition. That was certainly true, but Drumright went on to paint a dire future for U.S.-Taiwan relations if the KMT was ousted from power, a regime that he considered to be the lynch pin of our East Asia policy.

The Department did not answer Drumright, but soon thereafter Admiral Alan Kirk replaced him. Kirk had been in charge of naval operations on D-Day under Eisenhower. He was selected for the Taiwan job by the Kennedy administration because, in its view, the main challenge in the Far East at this point was not the internal situation in Taiwan and the future of democracy there, but rather events on the mainland after the debacle of the "Great Leap Forward." We know now of course that that this utopian effort by Mao was a miserable failure resulting in millions of deaths by starvation. At this time, thousands upon thousands of Chinese were fleeing the PRC for Hong Kong. For many KMT old timers on Taiwan there suddenly seemed the real possibility of a successful "counterattack" that would take them back to the mainland. In any case, Chiang Kai-shek at the least had to appear to be girding up for the vaunted attack in order to appease his military and other mainlander supporters. He felt had to make it appear that he was seriously preparing for an invasion of the mainland. The ROC military did begin to make plans and discuss the various possibilities - e.g. a direct attack by sea or one through Burma. Military exercises were held and the CIA station chief at the time, Ray Cline, lobbied back in Washington for US support of a KMT move on the PRC. But it was fairly clear to most of us in the political section that despite all of the KMT military activity, Chiang did not intend actually to lead an attack without all-out US involvement.

Cline had an unusual relationship with Chiang Ching-kuo, Chiang Kai-shek's son. The two men seemed to agree completely on political and strategic matters; in fact, they probably agreed on most things. The two used to go on bashes together at night. Some said that they even looked alike. So, Ray became a stout defender of the regime usually urging Washington to go along with whatever Chiang Kai-shek wanted – at the least to supply him more military equipment and supplies in order to mollify his demands for action.

Kirk was appointed ambassador because he was a distinguished elder and senior military officer and therefore in theory should have been compatible with Chiang. Furthermore, his naval expertise included leadership of the momentous Normandy landing. Soon after his arrival, he called on Chiang and forcefully stated the U.S. position on the prospect of invading the mainland. He said he had been involved in a major invasion by sea and he knew that to be successful, the invader had to have enormous and overwhelming resources, particularly manpower on the order of the numerical advantage the Allies had when they invaded Normandy. He laid out what in his view would be required for a successful attack on the mainland. It was obvious the KMT did not have these kinds of resources. Kirk bluntly added that the United States would in no way become involved in either the invasion of the mainland or in repulsing a follow-up PRC “counter-attack.” After that conversation, Chiang refused to see Kirk ever again. Kirk had to leave six or seven months after his arrival for health reasons.

Q: Did people at your level take the Chiang threats seriously?

TAYLOR: Most of us at the junior level were more skeptical than the senior officers. Ray Cline, as I said, took it very seriously and even supported the idea of an invasion. The Ambassador and the Department had to take the Gimo's threats seriously and had to prepare counter-arguments. In the summer of 1962, President Kennedy made an important statement about the situation in the Taiwan Strait; he said publicly that the U.S. would not support any kind of military action across the Strait.

But Chiang continued to raise the issue and in 1965, the rhetoric again reached a high point. Cline by that time was back in Washington as the DDI (deputy director for intelligence) at the CIA. Ray had a very close relationship with McCone, then the CIA Director. Again, he used his influence to try to get the U.S. government to support Chiang's aspirations at least at some level. Washington did cooperate in very limited military actions in an effort to placate Chiang - and the CIA. For example, we supported the dropping of several 100-man parachute commando units. It was Chiang's purported idea that these groups would provide intelligence on whether the population might rise up against the communist government, especially given the poor economic circumstances on the mainland. Several teams were dropped, but the PLA quickly wiped them out.

But the issue of a ROC invasion of the mainland kept coming up, even in 1965 and 1966 when Johnson was president. In 1965, as the Vietnam war heated up, the Gimo's proposal was to invade southwest China. The argument was that that this would secure our position in Vietnam by blocking further assistance from the PRC to the Viet Cong. This proposal again had the strong support of Cline and the CIA. At one stage, Chiang proposed sending Nationalist troops to Vietnam. The Department and the Joint Chiefs rejected that proposal over the objections of Cline and the CIA.

Q: While you were there, was Ray Cline considered to be extreme?

TAYLOR: You have to remember that in the 1950s, our relations with the Nationalists were conducted primarily by the CIA. Our ambassador knew little of what either the CIA or the military were doing. Sometimes he learned about these matter from the Nationalists. So, Ray's position was not unusual.

The CIA station and Chiang Ching-kuo's organizations dreamed up a number of operations that turned out to be debacles. Most ideas of course were scuttled. The Nationalists usually ended up with some new military equipment to keep them happy. These activities, those actually carried out and those aborted, kept the ROC special operation troops busy and well fed. Sometimes, however, these schemes had serious consequences. For example, a CIA covert operation from Taiwan to stir up insurgency in Tibet took place in 1958-59 - that is it predated the Tibetan uprising of late 1959. The only result was the death of a lot of Tibetans. Another joint ROC/CIA covert operation sought to stir up an uprising on one of Indonesia's main islands. This adventure also was a fiasco. The Indonesians shot down and captured an American pilot named Pope. Washington suddenly reversed course and began wooing the Indonesian military by sending them modern military equipment and weapons.

Q: Was there the usual division in the political section between junior and senior officers, with the younger staff looking at the KMT as a relic of history?

TAYLOR: I reported on native Taiwanese affairs and therefore had to explain their point of view. Thus, I came to understand their complaints against the regime more than others in the Embassy. I reported extensively on the absence of democratic practices on Taiwan and how the KMT manipulated political life on the island, suppressing all important public dissent. Private dissent, however, was quite common. This was the fundamental difference between Nationalist rule and that of the Communists. The mainlander population made up 15% of the island population and yet they completely dominated the police and the military establishment as well as the state economic sectors. I wrote reports on this situation, which the embassy forwarded to Washington. I was in the embassy only a short period before Kirk replaced Drumright. The DCM was Ralph Clough - an very open and supportive Chinese-language officer. The Taipei government lodged protests on several occasions about my activities. It was particularly suspicious of my meetings with the Taiwanese opposition or "non-party" politicians. The ambassador or the DCM would tell me about the protests, but I was never instructed to cease and desist. I always assumed that in these meetings the conversation was being taped. Often that was true.

I believe by 1962 the Department accepted that KMT-mainlander dominance could not last forever. We had to pay more attention to future Taiwanese leaders. I think it was in 1961 that the ambassador was first instructed to remonstrate with the KMT about its suppression of Taiwanese aspirations, but the Gimo told him to forget it. By the time I arrived, we would delicately raise this delicate issue only when some serious act of police suppression took place - which by then was very seldom.

Q: Were you able to give leader grants to Taiwanese?

TAYLOR: We did. Unlike in the 1950s, Washington possessed some collective level of understanding of the Taiwanese position and how this might affect the prospects for long term stability. And, as I said, in terms of cold-war policy, the new Administration believed it was in American interests to begin to pay more attention to human rights. Thus, we selected people like Mayor Henry Kau for U.S. study grants. When Kau came up for re-election in 1965 or 1966, the government refused to provide poll watchers; that discouraged him enough so that he didn't run for re-election. He did run again later at the end of the 1960s. We made informal demarches to the Nationalist government at various levels to encourage the government to allow more open and transparent elections. During my tour, the policy of encouraging greater political say for the Taiwanese began. It was still limited, but at least the initial steps were taken.

A local politician named K'ang Ning-hsiang, who at one time worked in a gas station, was the first independent politician to be elected to the national assembly, called the Legislative Yuan. K'ang was also the type of oppositionist we tried to encourage. Twenty years later, after opposition parties were allowed, K'ang would be one the moderate leaders of the Democratic Progressive Party. Originally, the Nationalists had refused to have new elections to the Legislative Yuan. As mentioned before, a provincial assembly existed that was made up mostly of native Taiwanese. But the Legislative Yuan (LY) left little real power to the assembly, the two bodies in effect legislated for the same territory and population. But the Yuan passed the principal laws of the land and controlled the bulk of government spending. In the mid 1960s, the KMT decided to allow some supplementary elections to the L.Y., and this allowed a handful of Taiwanese to become members. K'ang Ning-hsiang was one of those.

By the mid-1960s, Chiang Ching-kuo was not only his father's right hand and his eyes and ears, but he was also as well the brains of the party. Chiang Kai-shek's health was failing, and this left more and more of the burden of government to the son. It was during this period that Chiang Ching-kuo and some of the more progressive elements that had long been associated with him decided that the KMT had to take a longer-range view of its future. It had to look beyond the slogan of returning to the mainland. It was Ching-kuo's view and that of some of his inner coterie that the KMT was likely to be stuck on Taiwan for the indefinite future, and thus it had to move away gradually from its authoritarian rule. The goal was eventually to become a more open and democratic institution, and eventually even be able to win a free and open election.

Ching-kuo's new approach had Washington's support. As events moved along, we increased the jawboning about the need for the KMT to ease its authoritarian ways. The reformers under Ching-kuo felt that the KMT could for many years keep political control on the island while allowing greater Taiwanese participation in political life and a more open society overall. They wanted this reform process to take a long while, during which time the mainlanders would keep control, but they also recognized that eventually, the Taiwanese would control the KMT and the government. This was, at the time, all theoretical but it was a profoundly important change in thinking - the leaders-to be of the dictatorial KMT regime were informally but decidedly embracing the principle of real reform and the eventual target: popular democracy. As Alex De Tocqueville said, despotism is in its greatest danger when it is reforming itself.

Q: Were we seeing Chiang Ching-kuo as a new broom or just the old broom in a different disguise?

TAYLOR: Our views of Ching-kuo began to change around 1965 when he made another trip to the U.S. He was then defense minister. Until then, he was viewed as principally the enforcer of his father's dictates, including the brutal suppression of dissent. But during this visit to the U.S., he talked about a new position on Taiwan's relationship with the PRC that was a clear departure from the standard catechism. It was a position which was much more acceptable to us. He said that in the long run it was still the KMT's fervent hope to return to the mainland, but he realized that this might not happen in his life time. Of course, the goal could not be abandoned, he said, but for the foreseeable future his government's focus would be on Taiwan and its economic and political growth.

Ching-kuo's idea was to make Taiwan such a model of economic and political success that its example would put enormous pressure on the mainland to follow suit. After 1965, that is in fact what the Taipei government focused on: first, economic development, and then in a much slower manner political liberalization. The reformers envisioned many careful steps forward, some to the side, and some backward, but in the final analysis, popular democracy was the direction the Nationalists followed thereafter. Chiang Ching-kuo and his friends thought they could complete the process in twenty years. Quite amazingly, they had that amount of time and, helped by events on and outside the island, they did it.

Q: How good was our intelligence about events on the mainland?

TAYLOR: The CIA of course had close ties to the Nationalist intelligence apparatus, run by Chiang Ching-kuo. But neither the Department nor the CIA paid much attention to the human intelligence that the Nationalists were collecting. It was not considered reliable. Sometimes it was fabricated. What was most valuable for us was the open monitoring of China's media by the Foreign Broadcast Information Service (FBIS). The National Security Agency also had facilities on Taiwan for other signals intercepts. Information from this source - the NSA - was highly useful to the military but seldom provided political insights.

By this time, we were running U-2 flights over the mainland. This was a program Ray Cline had successfully pushed. The U-2s first spotted China's secret nuclear weapons facilities in the far northwest. Nationalist pilots flew these spy planes, but the CIA controlled the operations. The latter was something of a sore point with the Nationalist Air Force. Two or three planes and their pilots were lost. All of these intelligence operations were as far as the Nationalists were concerned under the command of Chiang Ching-kuo.

We had wide range of exchanges with Nationalist intelligence on what seemed to be going on the mainland. By the mid-1960s, they were much more objective about events within the PRC and on the mainland. That change reflected Chiang Ching-kuo's influence. In the early 1960s, for example, the Nationalists viewed the Sino-Soviet split as a great farce - a deliberate effort to mislead the West. This was CKS' idea. In the mid-1960s, Ching-kuo developed his own think tank staffed by American-trained political scientists, and they produced a much more sophisticated analysis. When I went back to the Department assigned to INR, I covered Taiwanese matters as well as Chinese external affairs. I was involved in these exchanges with the Nationalists and I thought they were useful.

Q: By the time you left Taiwan in 1965, what were your thoughts about the island's future?

TAYLOR: I believed that eventually - sooner rather than later - the political opposition would come to the fore and native Taiwanese would take over the government. I did not know how this change would take place - peacefully or not - but I was sure it was coming, probably within ten or twelve years. I felt that the U.S. should take a longer-range view of events on Taiwan and do more than it was doing to foster a political situation on the island that would allow the transition to take place peacefully and democratically. Well, I was off a decade, but US actions did eventually push the KMT toward political reform. This push, however, came not so much from jawboning and threats of sanctions as from our steps toward détente with the mainland beginning in 1971.

FRANCIS J. TATU
Chinese Language Training
Taichung, Taiwan (1961-1962)

Francis J. Tatu was born in New York in 1929. He served in the US Navy from 1946-1952. Afterwards, he received his bachelor's degree from University of California in 1955. His career includes positions in Hong Kong, Laos, Taiwan, Philippines, Thailand, Washington D.C., Nepal, Vietnam, Indonesia, Malaysia, Brunei, and Australia. Mr. Tatu was interviewed by Susan Klingaman in October 2000.

Q: So to Chinese language training in Taiwan. Tell me about that.

TATU: This was a wonderful situation from my point of view. We lived in this relatively little town, Taij Chung. We lived in Chinese-style houses. Actually there were a little more Japanese style because the Japanese administrators had lived in them: Shoji screens and tatami, you know. Everybody took off their shoes on entering because the floors were covered with tatami and we sat on popillows on the floors. They had little contained gardens. It was very nice, a nice situation. Our school, which was an old rundown mess of a building, had a lot of character. We had as our director - "ShauoChang" was the title - a scholar named Howard Levy, who is famed in Far Eastern ranks.

He was a very dedicated scholar, and he had a number of books out, one on “Yang Gway Fay, court favorites of an illustrious celestial” the most famous courtesan in Chinese history, and he was also somewhat of a libertine. He had a book out on Chinese ribald jokes and a book on Taoist sex practices, which is very pertinent stuff. We had, therefore, the school itself, a tradition of very heavy drinking and partying. As a senior you would frown on that, but at the time it was a good way to get to know the people. For example, we had field trips once a month. Soon after I arrived there was a field trip, and we went first to a Chinese cigarette factory. There was great hilarity as everybody feigned trying to find the Chinese Carmen. To amuse us and they were making yard-long cigarettes. Howard had the ability. He was wonderful at the language, and really good with people. Then we went to a Chinese wine factory for lunch. That was total disaster because in the Chinese tradition, you know, you are required to toast each other and then each dish in the repast. And the drinking is very heavy. My gosh by the time we were out of there everybody seemed to be roaring drunk. Then we went for a briefing by the MAAG, by the U.S. military, and the briefing officer said, “Just your breathing in here, as a result of you guys, is enough to knock me out.”

That’s an example, but I’m thinking of this demonstration and parade in town also. Once Howard instructed us and we all had to line up on a certain street corner in Tai Chung on a Saturday morning. It turned out we were going to march in a Buddhist parade. There were a lot of American missionaries in the area, and here we were marching along with our Buddhist flags, and suddenly there’s a whole group of missionaries and they looked very startled at this.

Q: Did they realize that you were American diplomats?

TATU: Oh, yes, they knew who we were. The school was very well- known.

Q: How many students were there in the school?

TATU: I think at that time we had about 15, from all different agencies. We also had a compulsory sports program, “A sound Mind in a sound body;” we had to play baseball. Howard’s favorite Chinese saint was called Madzu, who is famous in the Chinese litany. On one occasion we were playing an Air Force team and they seemed to be badly beating us. Howard had given each of us Madzu medals. He took his medal out on the pitcher’s mound, got down on his knees, and began praying to Madzu. Whereupon suddenly a heavy rain broke out and the game was called.

Q: That’s what he was praying for.

TATU: One of the Air Force guys said, “We thought we were playing diplomats, not a bunch of witch doctors.” The next time that we played them, in the make-up game, we beat them anyway. There was always something going on. Howard also wrote a book on footbinding (reviewed by Time magazine, thank you). Once we all broke out of class and he had people bringing in little old ladies with the bound feet, putting them up on the table in our recreation room to inspect their feet. On another occasion he had one of our guys all pinned down with acupuncture. That’s the kind of emersion that’s really, really good.

Q: You got right into the culture, steeped in it, literally steeped in the alcohol of it. How did you do in learning Chinese?

TATU: Oh, very well. I graduated with 3-4. That was over 30 years ago, but I can still initiate and maintain a conversation in Chinese.

Q: From just one year? Well, you had started in Hong Kong.

TATU: Two years. Actually, they held me over because they wanted me to learn what is called “grass”- that’s scriptive Chinese. In the meantime I had the opportunity to go to Saigon and I was enthusiastic about that prospect, but Howard wouldn’t let me go. By the time this was resolved we had a new director, actually a missionary by the name of Jerry Cox. He decreed that there would be no more drinking in the school and restricted all these practices. He wanted everybody to calm down. (When Howard left Tai Chung we hired a funeral band to see him off.) In the meantime Howard had gone off to Korea to open a language school there. The message came back; “I think it would be cheaper, rather than teaching the Americans Korean, to teach all the Koreans English.” Anyway, the short of this matter was the grass training didn’t work out, but because of being held over, I missed a number of fairly attractive assignments, and that’s when I went to the Philippines.

LOUIS P. GOELZ
Consular Officer
Hong Kong (1961-1966)

Louis P. Goelz was born in Philadelphia on February 25, 1927. After military service he graduated from La Salle College and Georgetown University. He joined the Foreign Service in 1955. He served in Lima, Hong Kong, Sao Paulo Belen Para, Mexico City, Nuevo Laredo, Tehran, and Seoul. He also served at INR, and the Visa Office and was assigned to the NATO Defense College for a year. He retired in 1992 and was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in July 1992 and February, 1993.

GOELZ: '61. I went out to Hong Kong. I was assigned to Hong Kong to a consular position and I stayed in Hong Kong until 1966, about that time.

Q: Hong Kong is sort of unique in the visa business. Could you explain what the situation was during this particular period?

GOELZ: This particular period in the beginning was very unique because we were running a refugee program, as well, and actually it was the consular section that was issuing the papers, and running the program. We didn't have RP in those days, or anything remotely resembling it.

Q: RP is the Bureau of Refugee Affairs.

GOELZ: So we were tasked to handle it. It was a program that had been inaugurated by President Kennedy, and had a lot of urgency attached to it -- I believe for political reasons but the idea was to issue as many Chinese visas as was possible. The workload was heavy. We used to have to work sometimes 10 hours a day, 6 or 7 days a week to keep up with the workload that was dumped on us.

Q: Where would the pressure be coming from to issue Chinese visas? Because there never had been a humongous voting Chinese lobby the way there was, for example, for Italy.

GOELZ: I agree, but there was some pressure being brought, mostly from California. There was political pressure being brought to bear against the White House, and the White House was responding to it. They wanted that program started, and they wanted it done as soon as possible.

Q: Who were the refugees?

GOELZ: Most people in Hong Kong were refugees at that particular period of time, and anybody who left the Mainland at any time who could qualify at certain dates and circumstances involved. Anybody could qualify; the fortunate or unfortunate part of...the problem was that most of our local employees qualified, and went to the States.

Q: Fraud was not a major problem?

GOELZ: Oh, it was a very big problem in Hong Kong, and in all Chinese cases. A lot of fraud, of course, concerning citizenship and the issuance of passports, and passport applications. During the time that I was in Hong Kong I spent the first six months to a year in the immigrant visa section working on these refugee cases. After that I headed the passport unit because we were falling behind in our evaluation of citizenship cases. A lot of that concerned fraud, of course, and we had investigative services. We also had there an investigative unit, the only one in the world dealing directly with immigration fraud at that time. We had about 10-12 Chinese investigators who worked for us. We also had what we called "outside men" who were sort of informers and undercover investigators for us. I headed that unit myself for about two years supervising the investigations into fraudulent citizenship, and visa entitlements. It was a very interesting sideline.

Q: Well on this, I've heard stories about raids on peoples' places in order to catch their briefing book, or whatever.

GOELZ: Right. This happened earlier on. By the time I got there and got appointed as chief...one of the reasons I was placed as head of the section was because they wanted to put a new aspect to the whole situation. The local Hong Kong government had been unhappy with what was going on because it violated the rights of those under British authority and even the British nationals who were resident there. They were not real happy. It got to the point, when I took over the unit that we were not allowed to go and visit anybody's place of residence. This was done either by our investigators who got permission from the people they were checking on, or by our "outside men" who would investigate sub rosa to see what the situation was. It was a very interesting time, and the work was extremely interesting because it was very different.

There is one aspect of it that might be especially notable. That was that this particular unit over a period of years had a list of all the villages in Toishan especially, but also in several of the other counties around Hong Kong where most of the Chinese going to the United States came from. In these villages one of the peculiarities was that each village, as small as it was, had a particular family name. So if you lived in that village your name should be so-and-so. We had a book that we actually published with the cooperation of the Immigration and Naturalization Service, they provided the money. We provided a list of all of these villages with the family name or names that would name more names that were found in that particular village. It was a most successful tool in breaking fraudulent cases. Because what would happen, somebody would set up a paper trail of one of the persons in a particular village, but try to use their own name. They were caught every time. INS used it, and may still use it as far as I know. It was a very useful tool for them as well.

Q: Were there attempts to pay off, I mean, corruption within the investigating unit?

GOELZ: Was there ever! I had to fire the chief investigator during the two years I was there, and also about five to six investigators who we found out were taking bribes on the side. It's to be expected, though, in something like that unit.

Q: What was the impact of this on you, Lou? Here you're working, you know these people want to get out, and would use any means possible and as you say, we both served in some of the same places. It's very understandable why somebody would do anything in order to get out, and paying officials is a way of life. How did this affect you at that time?

GOELZ: Do you mean did it sour me on visas, and visa applicants? Not really. It was as much a challenge as anything else, me against them to see who is going to win. They won more often than I did, of course. But it was still an interesting challenge. It was something useful. Developing tools to help with the work I thought was especially useful. Just turning down cases because somebody may not be giving you full information, is not really the answer. The answer was to go after the fraud, the deep rooted corruption, and the...well, what do you want to call it, just the various ways they used to get themselves to the United States. The Chinese are very nice people once you get to know them. Although I never learned the language, I knew a little Cantonese but not much. But the Chinese we were exposed to in Hong Kong, and elsewhere, turned out to be very nice people. I enjoyed my five years in Hong Kong.

Q: What was your impression...I think a consular officer, particularly over a period of time, gets one of the best feels for how a group of people settle in the United States. Because you're looking at their affidavits and support. What was your impression of how the Chinese were doing during the '60s?

GOELZ: The Chinese were doing quite well, quite well indeed, and were getting to the United States, and especially as you say from the affidavits and support of those who were in the States for those who were coming to join their immediate families or relatives. They started out with nothing, and wound up with everything. We had one local employee who I knew fairly well, in fact I hired him in Hong Kong, who went under this refugee program to the States. He got married just before he left, and he went to the United States on board a ship with his wife and $100. He landed in the San Francisco area where he had relatives whom he was working with. They raised flowers down south of San Francisco. Today that same local employee is a multimillionaire. He got involved in real estate in San Francisco, and made a fortune. They did well, very well indeed.

Q: It's always encouraging to work with a group like that. You feel that you're putting people in who are going to be marginal. You left about '66?

ROGER ERNST
Deputy Director, USAID
Taipei, Taiwan (1962-1964)

Roger Ernst was born in New York in 1924. He graduated from Williams College in 1948 and the National War College in 1956. He served as an overseas Captain from 1943 to 1947. His career with USAID included assignments in India, Taiwan, Korea, Ethiopia and Thailand. Mr. Ernst was interviewed in 1997 by Arthur Lowrie.

ERNST: I came back to Washington, and was fishing around for a new assignment. I had the summer as home leave. I had said that I really didn't think I ever wanted to go to Taiwan because it was a dictatorship. This is the summer of '62. And I got a call, please to come to New York from Nantucket, where I was vacationing, and meet Howard L. Parsons, who had been in the Foreign Service, who was going to Taiwan as the AID mission director. He'd been the Counselor of Embassy in Bangkok for Political Affairs, he later was Counselor of Embassy for Economic Affairs in Bangkok on another tour. Howard and I met in New York at a hotel near Penn Station, and we liked each other immediately. I said "Alright, I'll come to Taipei with you as your Deputy Director." So that was my next assignment. We finished our home leave, we came to Washington, we went to the FSI, Jeannie and I, for one of those 21-day quick courses on China. Excellent, well done. Arthur Hummel's father was one of the mentors, instructors, who happened to be in Washington, I suppose, because I think he lived in China, most of his life, been a missionary. And he taught us something. He took out a bowl one day, and in the bowl he put marbles. And he swished them around. And they all ran around among each other, yes there was friction, but everything got resolved. He took out the marbles, and he put in sugar lumps. And he swished the bowl, and of course the lumps were all corners and angles, and they banged up against each other. He said, "I want to tell you, don't ever forget..." And I haven't. "The first is Chinese culture and way of dealing with issues. The second is Western confrontationism. We, in our juridical system, in a traffic accident, right and wrong. In our courts, right and wrong. Win and lose in our sports. The other is Chinese. Yes, there's friction, yes, there are problems, but they get worked out, the corners are rounded." And I saw that so many times, both in Taiwan and in other cultures where Confucianism and Chinese culture are important. I learned that from Ambassador Hummel's father. I've told Art about it. One of those little nuggets that you learn, if I didn't get anything else out of the FSI, that was worth the price of 21 days. Gave me a clue.

Went to Taiwan, here were an exciting people, living in a shadow of defeat. It's as if we'd had a civil war here in the North American continent, and the government had been run off the continent and had to evacuate, say, to Puerto Rico. Two million of us, government, businessmen, educators and chefs. If San Juan was Taipei...

Q: What was the emphasis in AID?

ERNST: Our emphasis - this is related - was to build the confidence in the Chinese on Taiwan that they could run their own economy, or, as our Ambassador, Admiral Alan Kirk said, who was a great man, he said "They can paddle their own canoe. They have to." So we said to the Chinese - the dialog with the Chinese - was: "You're so good you don't need an aid program, and we're not going to continue an aid program, so you'd better be that good." We played the coin both ways, with the ambassador's approval and agreement and support. It gave the Political Section problems. They were afraid of the "China Lobby" of Senator Knowland.

Q: Madam Chiang Kai-shek.

ERNST: Madame Chiang and others. And we were lucky in that Senator Knowland came to Taiwan. And Howard Parsons, with me in the background, had an opportunity to spend about an hour and a half with him. He told him how capable the Chinese were, and how debilitating our aid would be over time. (Do we see some parallels in Israel, with American aid creating debilitating overdependency? Or the welfare syndrome at home?) Knowland said "You're right. I agree we should terminate the AID program." And he said so publicly. So the specter of John Service, the China Lobby, China First group, was dissipated.

David Bell, who was the AID Administrator, came to Taiwan, maybe twice. Anyway, one time he came, and I can remember a conversation with Administrator David Bell, and the assistant administrator for AID, who was a man named Seymour Janow, and Howard Parsons, and me. In the men's room, at the Grand Hotel. And we were talking about terminating the AID program. And David Bell had been through this with us, but Janow hadn't, and Janow said "Is that right?" Howard said "Yes, I think so" And David Bell said, "Yes, we're going to talk to the Chinese about a gradual phasedown, transfer from grants to low-cost loans and from low-cost loans to commercial terms. A transition. Several years, not abrupt. They can do it." And that was the official decision, in the men's room at the Grand Hotel, as far as I can tell, it was then documented in papers pushed through the machinery.

The Chinese had a terrible time, because they'd gotten used to aid; there was a whole bureaucracy that was living off administering the AID program. This was 1963. When I went back to Taiwan in '75, as a private, as an unofficial visitor, I had dinner with P. Y. Shu, who was Head of the Central Bank; with C.K. Yen, who later was Prime Minister, who had been Minister of Finance; with Li Kwo Ting, who ran the AID Administration group, and others. Jeannie was there. Official dinner for me, for us. And they went out of their way to toast us, for giving them their wholeness again by terminating the AID flow.

Q: When did we actually get out?

ERNST: In '66 or '67.

Q: That's amazing, that that philosophy was prevalent then.

ERNST: They took the challenge.

Q: But it doesn't seem to have caught on with AID generally speaking, in the world, at all.

ERNST: No, no, bureaucracy wants to project their jobs.

Q: In both the donor and recipient investing.

ERNST: Exactly. And true with the UN too. There was a very exciting time in Taiwan. Averell Harriman came once, and we had big discussions with him. He was then peddling the position that the Chinese in Taiwan should work on assistance to Africa, in order to get African votes in the UN to protect the seat in New York. So we provided some help to the Chinese in Taiwan to beef up their ability to provide assistance to the newly independent African states who had come into being in the '58-'62 period when they got their nationhood. A lot of sidelights; it was very interesting. The Japanese were increasing their role; private business, we brought the first three American banks into Taiwan, held their hand, lubricated the way. National City, Morgan's and Hanover. I don't think Hanover exists anymore, Manufacturer's Hanover. Private businessmen. The first nuclear power plant. It involved a lot of very interesting things.

You asked about policy. Ambassador Kirk was a tremendous person. If he had worked half-time, he'd be better than most Ambassadors. He was so prescient. Economical. He knew what was wanted. And his wife, Lydia, was wonderful, too. They were lucky, we were lucky, they were in Moscow, and he'd had that UNSCOB job, UN in the Balkans. Commander of the fleet that crossed the channel, under Eisenhower to liberate the continent. Little guy, and his son, Roger, Ambassador in Somalia, and in, maybe in Eastern Europe [Romania]. Retired recently. Anyway, Ambassador Alan Kirk said that his instructions from President Kennedy, leaving out the bureaucratic language, were "Not to permit the government in Taiwan to mount an attack against the mainland, nor to liberate the mainland, because that will get us into the soup." So he turned to the head of the Military Assistance group, and he said "Make sure that they never have enough aviation gas and diesel for their ships. I don't want them to be able to get to the mainland. We control their oil supply." We, the U.S. military.

NICHOLAS PLATT
Chinese Language Training, Foreign Service Institute
Washington, DC and Taichung, Taiwan (1962-1964)

Ambassador Nicholas Platt was born in New York, New York in 1936. He attended Harvard University and Johns Hopkins University, and entered the Foreign Service in 1959. His career included positions in Hong Kong, Japan, China, Washington, DC, and ambassadorships to Zambia, the Philippines, and Pakistan. Ambassador Platt was interviewed by Paul McCusker in 1994.

Q: Now what got you onto the language training, were you particularly interested in China at that time?

PLATT: I went into the Foreign Service as a European specialist trained in German and French and well grounded in European history. I had done my thesis on the passage of the Marshall Plan through Congress, so I had a smattering of American government as well. As soon as I got into the Foreign Service I found that Europe was full up, it was full up in a lot of ways. Everybody wanted to go there. All the posts were full. You practically had to wait for someone to die before you could get a job. The jobs which you could get weren't very good. The policies had already been lined out. At that time what passed as policy formulation was really just manipulation of nuances. I was steered in the direction of China by a number of coincidences. One, running into a friend in FSI who was taking Chinese language and who seemed to me to be an incongruous choice for such a specialty. But he convinced me that it was a ground floor from where there was nowhere to go but up. The whole region was important to us but had not really been paid much attention to. There were lots of good jobs out there and lots of responsibility. And then, of course, I looked at Bohlen's record and he had made a very good career out of picking very early on in his career a specialty that no one else had an eye on. He had decided, rightfully so, that the United States was one day going to have to have a very important relationship with Russia. He learned the language, did his homework and labored in the vineyards, and he was right and rode that elevator right up to the top. I thought that if he could do it maybe I could do it too as far as China was concerned. It was with a certain amount of romanticism that I went into it but, actually I found that the learning of the language was interesting and the ability to ultimately communicate in Chinese to the Chinese people was very satisfying to me and exciting, and I felt that the Department was giving me something that they couldn't take away. It cost $50,000 in those days to train a China specialist. I suppose it is six or eight times that now.

Q: Of course, in those days too there were a lot of younger officers who had the same realization that you had that maybe the answer to their career prospects was to learn a hard language such as Russian, Chinese or Indonesian.

PLATT: Well, I felt a hard language represented a kind of rudder in the Service. We were all supposed to be capable of serving anywhere but I felt the Windsor assignment really kind of tore the scales from my eyes. I mean, it wasn't what you knew it was what you could persuade the government to spend money on so that they would have to justify that assignment to Congress that would move you in the direction you wanted to go. So if you were a real cynic you would say, "Find me a hard language specialty that is expensive and interesting and work at that, make it happen and you will have a rudder in the Foreign Service." And I think it did work.

WILLIAM H. GLEYSTEN
Economic Officer
Hong Kong (1962-1965)

Ambassador Gleysteen was born in China of Missionary parents. Educated at Yale and Harvard Universities, he entered the Foreign Service in 1951. After service in the State Department's Executive Secretariat, Mr. Gleysteen studied Chinese and was subsequently posted to Taipei, Hong Kong, and to Seoul, Korea, where he served as Ambassador from 1978 to 1981. He also served in Washington with the National Security Council and in the State Department as Deputy Assistant Secretary for East Asian Affairs. The Ambassador was interviewed by Thomas Stern in 1997.

Q: In 1962, you were assigned to Hong Kong as an economic officer. How did you manage to get such an assignment that made sense in career terms?

GLEYSTEEEN: During my whole career, I think I was rather lucky in being assigned to positions that made sense for me and for the Foreign Service. I knew from my friends that Hong Kong was about to have a major turn-over in staff. There was talk of my replacing David Dean - a schoolmate and a language school fellow graduate. I also knew the consul general, Marshall Green, and some of the right people in the Department. So everything worked well from my point of view.

In Hong Kong I was one of two deputies in the China Section headed by John Holdridge. I supervised reporting on the PRC's economy; the much smaller Hong Kong Section handled reporting on Hong Kong. In our section of "China watchers" I recall only one officer who had special economic training. All I had was basic economics at the undergraduate level plus my Taiwan experience. Although we were amateurs in economic theory, our lack of expertise was not a major drawback. We had a commonsense grasp of our subject which had a heavy political content. The distinction between political and economic was blurred in our work.

We had a local staff of about 15 people, who were highly competent. Some were professional economists -university trained. We paid them well by Foreign Service, not commercial, standards. Their services were an indispensable part of our operations. We included the local staff in our discussions to a degree that would not have been permitted in other posts. They did things that the American staff could not do - e.g. reading far more voraciously and extensively in Chinese than we were able to. What made this unique collaboration possible was that in the main we used unclassified material open to all.

I first met Marshall Green in Washington about ten years earlier while serving in S/S - after his return from London to work in the EA Bureau. Then I had quite a bit of contact with him while he was DCM in Seoul and I was in Tokyo. My early impressions of Marshall were consistent with the image he had in the Department: a lively, amusing, upwardly mobile, very ambitious officer. Looking from the outside, I think Marshall did a good job as DCM in Seoul, except perhaps during the first stage of Park Chung Hee's coup. In Hong Kong, I only had a very brief exposure because he left soon after my arrival. During this brief period, I felt Marshall was sound in his assessment of the China issues.

Our paths crossed again in the late 1960s and early 1970s. He was the assistant secretary for EA; I was the East Asia director in INR. I saw him daily, briefing him on the latest developments in the area. I spent at least half an hour with him and often more. I developed a great deal of respect for him. Throughout every phase of his life, he was cheerful and a master of puns - even at funerals.

My second consul general was Ed Rice, a friendly hands-on officer. Ed was one of the early "China hands." He had a number of out-of-area assignments, but had returned to EA to be a deputy assistant secretary before coming to Hong Kong. He had known Chinese well, although by the time he reached Hong Kong, his language skills had deteriorated.

John Holdridge was in charge of what in Beijing would have been called the political and economic sections. Heyward Isham, a Soviet expert, supervised the political side and I the economic. There were 5 or 6 officers in each unit. After about a year, Holdridge left for home leave and a period of duty on a personnel panel-probably a promotion board-which about half a year. At Rice's request, I filled in for Holdridge. It was somewhat awkward, because Isham and I were the same rank, born in the same month, went to same university and graduated in the same year - although we didn't know each other. I was chosen over him simply because I was a China officer and he was not.

When Holdridge returned, I went back to my economic assignment for a short period before leaving Hong Kong. Substituting for Holdridge was very useful for me; Ed Rice seemed satisfied and I worked with him on a major despatch, analyzing our interests in China and recommending a shift in our recognition policy. Both of us were proud of our hard work, which was the intellectual high point of my assignment. My inquiries later in Washington suggest that Dean Rusk and Co. hadn't seen it or brushed it aside.

In addition to our China reporting, the consulate general had a normal operation dealing with Hong Kong itself, including political, economic, and consular functions. There was a little overlap between the two operations, but we got along very well. Essentially the Hong Kong consulate general consisted of two institutions, both supervised by the consul general. It was a large operation.

We lived in enviable circumstances. Hong Kong was the most comfortable of my posts. The CG building was fairly new and well maintained. It was quite spacious; every officer had a small private office. The building was located downtown in a choice area near good restaurants. We had individual houses for the most part, but also occupied small apartments in various lovely places. I lived in a double apartment complex on Deepwater Bay, which was not too hard to take. Other people lived in Stanley, Repulse Bay, and downtown. The DCM lived on a hill side overlooking Deepwater Bay. The CG lived part way up the Peak. Living may not have been luxurious, but it was far better than adequate. No one should have complained.

Hong Kong, in the 1962-65 period, was beginning to shine - a new development. I remember visiting Hong Kong in 1953 when people were dismissing it as place that "wouldn't make it" much past the end of the Korean War. It was having severe economic problems caused by the enormous refugee influx; it couldn't pull itself together. But we should not forget that in the early 1950s Korea was ridiculed as a "basket case", Taiwan was a dictatorship with severe problems, and even Japan had not yet taken off economically. People tend to forget those rugged days.

Starting with the mid-1950s, Hong Kong began to blossom - becoming the trade gateway into the PRC, providing a savvy base for foreign companies that wished to work in East Asia and China, and serving as one of the first locations for modern labor intensive export industries. Hong Kong lived under the rule of law, with an independent judiciary based on English law. By the time I was later stationed in Hong Kong, it was a thriving, vital city. The business community was very vigorous. There was already considerable affluence in the Chinese community, indicated by the ever increasing number of privately owned boats in various harbors and new cars on the street. It was already clear that the Chinese were becoming the predominant element.

The American business community was heavily focused on banking. There were considerable business opportunities for US banks in Hong Kong, but they were also interested in being ready if and when China would open up for them. Many major American companies located their Asian headquarters in Hong Kong. In the same way as banks, these companies did business in Hong Kong, but they were also readying themselves to invest in the PRC when the time was right.

In many respects the rules for US contact with the mainland were silly. We were all barred from doing any business with the PRC, leaving that growing field to others. For example, we could not buy goods made in the PRC, even if sold in Hong Kong. Food consumed in Hong Kong was more or less exempted. American firms, such as banking, had to be careful that none of their transactions involved the PRC or its citizens. That was not easy, but I think the American firms did their best to keep within US rules. All American transactions were monitored by the consulate general; we had a treasury attache with a staff that was strict on the issue of trade with the PRC. I thought it was a very foolish policy. But it was implemented with great vigor - except, of course, on senators and congressmen.

I might say a word about the problems and challenges of remote reporting on China from Hong Kong. In those days virtually no Americans were allowed to go to the PRC. No officials were permitted to do so, and the rare exceptions were doctors or other professionals who had a good reason and political connections in Washington. The Japanese and the Europeans, even if they did not have diplomatic relations, freely allowed their citizens to visit and do business in the PRC. Our rules were an enormous barrier to travel and a self-inflicted handicap to our understanding of China. Nevertheless, once you overcame feeling foolish, there were plenty of opportunities for useful work. We had to be vacuum cleaners, pulling in any information about the PRC we could. We would talk to every interesting traveler. We would meet endlessly in hotel rooms or invite them to the consulate general or our homes. We would cover every minute of their stay in the PRC. Our big net covered many Japanese, European, Australian, New Zealand and some Americans - like journalists - who got in, one way another.

With practice we became pretty good in the choice of interlocutors, so we were able to focus on those who had something to say. Some were gold mines. They were perceptive; they might had high level contacts up to the highest, including Mao. They knew what to look for. Some of them traveled periodically to the PRC, giving them and us, a sense of perspective. There were only a few of these, but they were the gems.

For the most part, people were willing to share information and views with us. We had a good reputation, unlike the Cold War headquarters mentality and ideology prevalent in Washington. The consulate general had built up an almost academic reputation over the years; its staff was considered sensible and their judgments had proven pretty good. Many consuls general contributed to this aura. In my time, I felt lucky to inherit it and worked hard to sustain it. Our sources were usually cooperative; quite a few liked coming in to the consulate general, although we always offered to meet them elsewhere. As far as I know, none of our contacts were barred from travel to the PRC because of us, although it was always a concern. We tried to protect people whose comments could be easily traced back to them - a remark by Mao Zedong could be easily traced back because only a few would have had the opportunity to hear it. Generally, however, our activities were very transparent.

The second aspect of the job was to be an intelligent reader, mostly in translation but selectively in Chinese as well. We were allowed legally to buy Chinese communist publications - a great privilege! We read for hours on end. We had a very, very large translating operation that was only closed recently. Every day, there would be reams and reams of material coming out of that section and by wireless from a parallel operation in Okinawa. Much of the stuff was quite good and useful. I did my own reading whenever I could, thereby maintaining some fluency in the language in which I was trained. This was the only time in my career that I did that - reading original political and economic materials coming from the PRC. I concentrated on certain key publications; I wasn't good enough to skim huge volumes of material.

We drew from academic sources everywhere in the world for help with our analysis. If it was not in English, we would have it translated. We had intelligence operations paralleling our work; the intelligence community was less fettered by restrictions than we were, and I found their product useful. It was not the answer to a prayer, but it did add to our knowledge. The information collected was freely shared with us; I had good relations with the station chief.

We exchanged information with other countries, primarily Western European ones and Japan. We worked closely with the British whose operations were quite similar to ours, although they had the advantage of having intelligence representation in the PRC. In terms of quality, I generally found the Japanese most insightful - perhaps a subjective hangover from my previous assignment. I maintained contact with the Japanese consul generals and their deputies. If I had to rank various countries in terms of their usefulness for us I would mention Great Britain first, followed by Japan, and then Western European countries. They were all very cooperative and very useful.

We generally did not interview refugees directly, because the British had a skilled refugee screening program that produced large quantities of material. Information collected from refugees included a great deal of junk and often lacked perspective. Refugees were not necessarily representative of the mainland Chinese population or balanced observers of the China scene. Many academics-e.g. Ezra Vogel, Doak Barnett, Jerry Cohen-interviewed refugees at length. I was happy to glean their results rather than go through the drudgery of their interviews. Occasionally, I myself talked to a particularly interesting refugee.

Perhaps colored by my own interests, my sense of priorities in Hong Kong was: first, interpreting events within China; second, trying to influence our China policy by conveying the Asian pieces of the context; third, providing insight on the Chinese approach to the Soviet Union, Indochina, Taiwan, Hong Kong itself, and East Asia generally.

Although I know of no institution that did it better, I must admit we did only a passable job of interpreting what was happening within China. Despite the lurches of Mao Zedong's leadership and the mind-boggling nature of some of his policies, we usually were able - with a time lapse - to use refugees and traveler reports, publications, and occasional snippets of good intelligence to give Washington a fair sense of what was actually happening in the country. But there were always big gaps; and we had few clues to help decipher what was going within the inner councils of the leadership. Our self-imposed absence from China and ban on contacts with Chinese didn't help. Our biggest failures were in the area of prediction. There were titanic shifts and events, such as the "Great Leap Forward" and "Cultural Revolution," that we did not anticipate. Yet no one really did; it would have been a miracle if we had.

When I arrived in Hong Kong, the PRC was suffering from the collapse of the "Great Leap Forward." That zany policy, begun in 1958, was an act of hubris on Mao's part that rapidly backfired into a major disaster for China. The intensity of forced agricultural production, the formation of massive communes, and the resort to crazy shortcuts - such as the melting down of every bit of cast iron to make useless backyard steel, deep plowing that quickly ruined the soil, etc - took a very heavy toll and thoroughly discredited the regime. Analysts say that as many as 20 million people may have starved to death. At least several millions died from man-made and natural disaster. I don't think anyone really knows, but it was really a cruel period for the Chinese people. North Korean policies some times remind me of Mao's.

A surprising number of people in the West were slow to recognize the insanity of the "Great Leap." During the initial fanfare a number of romantics, journalists, and even some in our intelligence community speculated that some elements of the "Great Leap Forward" might actually work; I thought they were nuts. After the collapse, a different crew of Westerners, following Taiwan's lead, postulated the possible demise of the PRC. This was less ridiculous but still dangerously misleading. I believe the consulate general's solid reporting contributed significantly to the commonsense views reflected within the government and much of the media.

Similarly I think we did a pretty good job in picking up bits and pieces of information in the aftermath of the "Great Leap," including various reforms with which the PRC was experimenting. Of course, we had far more difficulty trying to figure out what was going at the top. There appeared to be a serious struggle for leadership of the party and the government. Along with several others, I was quite sensitive to this most important issue; our best source for analysis was Chinese publications. I wish I had done my research more boldly because the "Great Leap Forward" was the precursor to the "Cultural Revolution" -another program devised by Mao over opposition from more pragmatic leaders. The first signs of the new upheaval appeared just as I was leaving Hong Kong. They looked peculiar to us and we reported them, never being able to relate one odd development to another with enough coherence, thereby failing to see the shape of the horrendous "Cultural Revolution." I kick myself for having failed to do that. Analyzing what was going on in Beijing's Forbidden City was very difficult for everybody in the outside world - and for most Chinese. But over the years, I think the consulate general deserves good marks for its analysis of the general situation in China.

Our track record on foreign policy matters was okay - probably a cut better than okay. We had a sound appreciation of Sino-Soviet relations - considerably more accurate than some in Washington. We had a fair understanding of the PRC's approach to Indochina as well as its military capacities.

Most important to me and in contrast to Embassy Taipei, the consulate general was open minded and relaxed in its approach to US policy toward China. Consul General Holmes, a distinguished newcomer to Asia who preceded Marshall Green, broke the taboos in talking about our policy toward the PRC, and from then on the consulate general openly pushed for a more pragmatic policy. Marshall Green did so in a variety of ways, and, as I have already mentioned, Ed Rice and I sent Washington a message similar to Holmes's, less elegant perhaps but written with considerable wisdom about Asia. Those messages would look pedestrian today; at the time they were quite bold.

I came into the Department in 1951, during the Korean war. I was deeply troubled by communist aggression on the peninsula and wrestled with what we might do. I was not happy about the course of events, but it seemed inevitable to me that in due time, we would have to establish relations with the PRC - in some form immediately to be followed by "normal" in due time. We were out of step with the vast majority of other countries. From the beginning of my foreign service career, I was uncomfortable with our PRC policy. It was a cloud over me at my early posts. Dutifully, I carried out US policy as best I could, but I was quite out of sympathy until 1971. This didn't mean I "liked" the PRC regime or that I condoned its crude pressure on the Nationalist off-shore islands or Taiwan. But since the PRC seemed well ensconced, I felt it was short-sighted not have some kind of relationship with it.

When I was interrogated in early 1955 by Scott McLeod's investigators about my alleged sympathy toward the Chinese Communists (see remarks regarding my experience in S/S), I made the following comment:

...Concerning my own views on Communist China, I stated that communism and communism in China were an anathema and disappointment to me. Since the Chinese Nationalist Government was the one I grew up with and because of my family views, it was naturally the one I "supported." From 1945 to 1949 I was mad and sad about its ineffectiveness. After 1949-50 I began to think we probably would have to recognize Communist China diplomatically, as unpleasant and hostile as it was and would be. The Korean War removed this consideration. I went to on to explain that at present it would be disastrous to recognize Communist China because of the tension surrounding Quemoy, Matsu, and Formosa, but I said I thought we should think through the problem for a future date...

These remarks are quoted from an angry memorandum I wrote to myself on February 3, 1955 to record of a most unpleasant experience. During the next 8 years in Taiwan and Japan I became thoroughly convinced the time had arrived to change an outmoded policy. I saw normalization with the PRC as a process that would develop over years, reflecting the new reality in East Asia, devoid of any adverse moral connotation, and following the practice of most of the world. The choice was simply this: should we have a perpetual wall between two important countries or did we have to deal with the reality of a communist regime in China. If the latter, then wouldn't it better to have official relations with it? Our existing policy closed its eyes to the facts on the ground. In addition, I thought that we were paying a penalty in having much of our dialogue with the PRC often conducted through third parties - the process of using an intermediary lost us opportunities and made for miscommunications because some of the third parties had their own agendas. I thought about and talked a lot about the consequences for the balance of power. In those days I did not foresee China shifting quickly from its hostility toward us, and I doubted a policy change would have a major beneficial effect on our dealings with the USSR. Yet I thought it would be a move in the in the right direction, and I was sure it would ease our relations with allies such as Japan.

It took Richard Nixon and Henry Kissinger to put all the pieces in play - for their own reasons and in a strategic framework that exaggerated the benefits. When the breakthrough came with Kissinger's trip to Beijing in 1971, our obsession with "the menace of China" was replaced by an overly simple view of the PRC as part of a united anti-Soviet front. Like others, I understood the new policy in terms of our Cold War interests; I was happy that the US was finally going to normalize relations with the PRC. At the same time, I sensed that the anti-Soviet rationale for the opening to the PRC might be interpreted excessively and lead us to mishandle our relations with Beijing. It is a complicated subject, but I believe that I was right in these concerns, which came to the fore in both the Ford and Carter administrations; I participated in some of the discussions that I will get to later.

The change in US policy toward China should have made long before 1971-72, and we would have been better off if it had been done openly rather than in secret. Despite being pushed to the sidelines while Kissinger and Nixon did it, I am really grateful to them for their bold action. As for Consulate General Hong Kong during the 1960s, I would say we contributed significantly to preparations for the change - both through our analysis of the China context and our policy recommendations. A lot of energy went into the effort.

Friction in Sino-Soviet relations, which burst into public debate while I was in Hong Kong, fascinated everybody, even those in Washington who could hardly believe what was happening. It is hard to remember now the role of the Americans who fought so hard to interpret the Sino-Soviet "bloc" as two communist regimes both marching in the same direction mostly under Soviet leadership. From every scrap of information that we collected, it looked like these people were way off-base. CG Hong Kong deserves kudos for its quite objective picture of reality - portraying the tremendous strains between the PRC and the Soviet Union, which were heading toward a climax of some sort, with actual fighting to take place along their borders in 1969. In addition to the public diatribe conducted in the names of Khrushchev and Mao, there was all sorts of intelligence about troubles dating back to 1954 and earlier. For all its conviction about a Sino-Soviet monolith, I must say in fairness, that we were never instructed by Washington to hew any party line - unlike the editorial work by MacArthur in Embassy Tokyo or the censorship exercised in Embassy Taipei.

My own views on Sino-Soviet relations were importantly influenced during graduate school at Yale. When I was an undergraduate, I had an orthodox Cold War view of the problem. I assumed that Stalin and his cohorts played a major role in setting Asia's fires - which in fact they did. And

I assumed China was cooperatively involved, as a kind of junior partner. But in graduate school I had a chance to do considerable reading on the earlier communist period that highlighted the independence of the Chinese communist movement. I became convinced, as some scholars had, that independence, rivalry, and friction were the reality between the two nations. Essentially, I thought that each would go in its own way, following its national interest more than ideology. That meant that on some issues, there would be a partnership, but often the two would find themselves on the opposite sides. By the time I reached Hong Kong, my views were pretty close to what historically seems to have been the pattern.

After a checkered record of support in the early years, the Soviets finally assisted Mao come to power in the late 1940s. But rarely did the Soviets do all they could have done. In the post-war period, the Soviets pillaged Manchuria for its industrial equipment and later demanded certain territorial concessions from the Chinese - including some of the same things the Russian Empire demanded of Imperial China in 19th Century. I was impressed by the replay of this clash of nationalisms. When the more obvious signs of strain began to appear - in the mid-1950s, and even more pronouncedly in the late-1950s with Khrushchev's public refusal to back Mao in the Taiwan Straits - I thought we faced two major powers that would go their own ways, guided, as I said, mostly by their national interests. Despite my analysis, I was still amazed in the late 1960s when they carried this behavior close to the point of a major war and sought to enlist our weight into the contest.

While I was in Hong Kong the consulate general also spent much time speculating how the Chinese would deal with various events in Vietnam and the Taiwan Straits. The Taiwan off-shore islands had again become a subject of US-PRC tension. The PRC was in bad shape economically. The People's Liberation Army (PLA) was suffering as a consequence of the "Great Leap Forward" and its aftermath; so it was hitting bottom as a consequential military force. At the same time, Vietnam was becoming an increasing problem for the PRC because of our military build up. The PRC sent substantial assistance to the North Vietnamese, a very complicated process. Given these conditions, there was discussion in Taiwan of taking advantage of the PRC's preoccupations and weaknesses through a variety of provocative actions. The U.S., as I remember it, made a statement, probably in the Warsaw or Prague Talks in 1963 or 1964, that we would not support any Taiwan action raising the level of tensions. That was well received by the PRC. These and other events gave us in Hong Kong an opportunity to assess the PRC's mind set and possible moves, which we did very conscientiously.

One of our most consuming and tricky challenges was to assess likely Chinese behavior in Vietnam. Washington was obviously concerned about what the PRC might do militarily if we intervened more directly in Vietnam. Stimulated by my Geneva Conference days, I tried to keep up with Indochina even though it was not part of my normal portfolio. While in Tokyo I had managed a rather long visit to Vietnam. I went twice while in Hong Kong and several times more after returning to Washington. I traveled to many regions of the country as well as Saigon, talked to all levels of the military, met at length with our embassy staff, etc.

In general, the consulate general, specifically including Rice and me, felt that the PRC was being very cautious and demonstrating little evidence of intention to intervene militarily. This was a crucial judgment on our part, because Washington was trying to assess how much risk we were running as we escalated our military presence in Vietnam from an advisory role to combat with US forces. Of course, we put in caveats - one being the obvious need to be prepared if our judgment proved wrong. Although I was fairly confident of our prediction, it bothered me personally. Effectively, we were assisting those in our government who favored deeper involvement in Vietnam. With a brief lapse in 1965, I was opposed to such entanglement.

Incidentally, our assessment of the PRC-Vietnam relationship got me into a running argument with those in INR and the intelligence community who worried about Chinese intervention as in the Korean War. Alan Whiting, who was INR's director for East Asia, disagreed strongly with us. He had written a famous book on the PRC's intervention in the Korean war; he tried to apply the same lessons to the Vietnam situation and came to an entirely different conclusion than I and most of my colleagues. Our debate conducted by cable got into the press from sources "who did not wish to be identified." I deduced and later confirmed that Whiting was briefing reliable journalists "on background." I did the same, giving the New York Times some good stories. In retrospect, I think we were both a bit foolish.

As for your question about our access to information and the degree of our influence in Washington, I would say that the consulate general was well served with information, while the effect of our recommendations was less than desired. Our analyses of the general situation in the PRC got broad circulation and were widely respected but they didn't reach the highest levels of the Department; they were fodder for the analysts in EA, INR and other parts of the intelligence community. We had some disputes with Washington over the national intelligence estimates which did not always match ours. CIA would tell us that we were wrong and they were right, if only because they had many more resources to devote to the PRC - and anyway, headquarters is always right! These disagreements were not a big problem for us; they were arguments among peers and we really didn't give that much of a damn about what the bureaucracy in Washington believed.

On issues affecting bilateral relations - on which we wrote some wonderful reports - the consul general often helped in their drafting and signed them out in his name. That plus restrictive circulation helped get attention - at least at the assistant secretary level. I don't know how they were viewed at higher levels; at least there was no attempt to stop us from our analysis or to tell us to hew the line.

On issues such as possible military engagement between the PRC and Taiwan or China and Vietnam, our reports were thoroughly read in Washington. We would get specific questions, some of which indicated certain biases, which was alright because we were not hemmed in our responses. In the case of US-Vietnam relations, I believe our important messages reached high levels in the government.

I also remember being impressed by how much traffic we received on Vietnam, including intelligence material. We were near Vietnam, but we had a detachment that our people in Saigon did not. So we some times submitted interesting comments, even though our immediate responsibility was the PRC. For example, after the Tonkin Gulf incident, Ed Rice inspired and supervised some careful analysis by our section plus the military attaches and CIA Station. As I recall them, our comments would look good today in light of what we have since learned about the incident. We were never convinced that there were in fact military clashes in the Gulf; we suspected that the US was seizing on isolated indicators to escalate our military intervention. We relied heavily on intercepts of Vietnamese communications, technical intelligence gathering, and Beijing's attitude. This intelligence was rapidly available to us in Hong Kong because we were part of the collection system.

I admired Rice for team efforts such as this one. In other instances he also signed off on messages, even the more strident ones and those he knew would draw opposition. I don't want to leave the impression that we were heroes in Hong Kong. Most often we were only one voice in the cacophony of noises emanating from groups of China watchers.

Let me address the question of how much influence the United States had on China during this time. In the 1962-65 period, our influence was significant. On the fundamental aspects of our policy - the embargo and containment of the PRC - although we could not control other countries, we severely complicated the PRC's efforts to broaden its relationship with the outside world. All of our military and economic goods, all of our technology as well as most of the developed world's military and technical exports, were deflected away from the PRC, thus impeding its economic and military development. As the leader of the "Free World," we did exercise a negative influence on the PRC, even if it meant an increasing tension with some of our allies who did not see the PRC as the enemy, as we did. Some aspects of this policy of denial - for example, the complete trade embargo - were inconsistent with my views on recognition of the PRC.

In the international sphere, our policy of not recognizing the PRC-keeping it out of the UN, handicapping it in all fora - was a joke - on us. We were kidding ourselves if we thought we could keep the PRC isolated for any length of time. Our policy was the dominant one in the developed world, but most countries found easy ways around it - as did many Americans. It was a doomed policy - just encouraging people to cheat. When the policy change finally came in 1971, everyone was ready for it.

As for the PRC's domestic policies, we had no visible impact. We probably provided the hard liners in the PRC with a justification for their policy. We may have had a negative impact on PRC domestic policies, helping hard liners take their crude approach to domestic issues as part of an anti-US campaign.

Three times - the Korean war, the off-shore islands crises, and Vietnam - we engaged in or threatened combat against the PRC. That certainly influenced Chinese views of the world around it. Although our ignorance helped to bring the Chinese into the Korean war, I have always felt - and still do today in light of historical documents now available - that we were right to assist South Korea defend itself in 1950. Over the longer term, our actions in Korea had a definite impact on PRC policies, influencing Chinese behavior on the off-shore island crises and in Vietnam. Our firm stance in Korea gave us some credibility in Beijing. In short our influence on the PRC was certainly heightened by our forceful military posture in East Asia; it compelled PRC policy makers to take our military presence into account.

I should make a summary statement on my tour in Hong Kong. Of all of the posts in which I served, except perhaps Korea which had some unique problems, I found that the intellectual quality of the consulate general work was outstanding. The consuls general insisted that the staff maintain an objective view and that contributed to enlightened reporting. My colleagues knew their stuff. Reporting from Hong Kong was very special; I don't think I saw that same level of insight again. The staff had a sense of participation on substantive issues that was great for everybody. The staff in Hong Kong was carefully chosen. It was a good team and worked well together. The intelligence community in Hong Kong was well integrated with the rest of the American staff. It was a good show. Even the military attaches, of which there were many, were part of the team, although they sometimes could be difficult with their own agenda. They had too much money and quite often ran clumsy covert operations without experience, thereby getting the U.S. government in trouble.

When I arrived in Hong Kong, Oscar Armstrong was the deputy consul general. He was followed by John Lacey. Both of them played a very useful role. They were excellent officers. As I mentioned earlier, Hong Kong had two separate entities: the "China watchers" - an embassy in exile - and those responsible for normal CG duties with the territory of Hong Kong. In that second category, we had a very active commercial operation. Then we had a large, sprawling intelligence community, which presented technical and legal challenges. The deputy CG was the keystone of keeping all in sync. I had a high regard for the officers under whom I served and for those whom I supervised.

WILLIAM WATTS
Chinese Language Training
Washington, DC (1963)

William Watts was born in 1930 and raised in New York, New York. He received a bachelor's degree from Syracuse University and a master's degree from Harvard University's Russian Regional Studies Program. He served in the U.S. Air Force from 1951-1954. Mr. Watts' Foreign Service career included positions in Korea, the Soviet Union, and Washington, DC. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on August 7, 1995.

Q: In the summer of 1963 you came back and what did you do?

WATTS: I was assigned to Chinese language training, which was what I wanted. It is interesting that if I had not been taken out of Chinese language training, my guess is that I would still be in the Foreign Service. I really wanted to be as bilingual as possible in both Chinese and Russian. I went into the Chinese language program in August/September 1963. Marshall Green was then the deputy assistant secretary for state for East Asian affairs and I had worked for him in Korea. Marshall, who was a very foresighted guy, had wanted to develop within the Department a desk as opposed to something in INR that could deal with mainland China. But you could not have a PRC desk because Congress wouldn't have permitted it at that point.

What Marshall did was to create, obviously with the approval of Roger Hilsman and then

William Bundy, the assistant secretaries, something called the Office of Asian Communist Affairs. The Office had technical responsibility as an operational desk for North Korea, North Vietnam, Mongolia, Hong Kong, because of the trade, and PRC. The China desk remained Taiwan. This Office of Asian Communist Affairs was to be looking at these other places. The rest of it was essentially a phony, it was a cover for having a China desk. We had a desk that had five people. There were: Burt Levin who was a language officer and later was consul general to Hong Kong and then ambassador to Burma; David Dean, who became the head of the US Interests Section in Taipei; Lindsey Grant, who went on to other things; Arthur Dornheim, resident expert on Mongolia and Hong Kong, especially the textiles issue; and myself. I was brought in by Marshall to be the Soviet eyes and ears in this unit. What happened was that because of a lot of bureaucratic nonsense, I was essentially shut out of all the traffic, the really sensitive stuff that I needed to see and have in order to do my job to be reporting on the Soviet issues of the Sino-Soviet relationship. I vented my frustration, but was still kept in the dark.

At this time, the guy I worked for in Moscow, Rocky Staples, who had been public affairs counselor in Moscow, had left the USIA and had gone to work for the Ford Foundation. He came to me and said, "Why don't you come work for the Ford Foundation?" So eventually, after a lot of soul searching, because I went into the Foreign Service forever, I did wind up resigning and going to work for the Ford Foundation. So that was the end of my Foreign Service career.

MORTON I. ABRAMOWITZ
Consular/Political Officer
Hong Kong (1963-1966)

Ambassador Abramowitz was born in New Jersey and educated at Stanford and Harvard Universities. He entered the Foreign Service in 1960 after service in the US Army. A specialist in East Asian and Political/Military Affairs, the Ambassador held a number of senior positions in the Department of State and Department of Defense. He served as Assistant Secretary of State for Intelligence and Research and as US Ambassador to Thailand (1978-1981) and Turkey (1989-1991). He also served in Taiwan, Hong Kong and Vienna. Ambassador Abramowitz was interviewed by Thomas Stern in 2007.

Q: Your next assignment, after language training, was to the American Consulate General (CG) in Hong Kong. I think you were first assigned to the passport section.

ABRAMOWITZ: That is right. I was not very happy to be assigned to consular work again, but it was the only position open in the Consulate at the time I was available. I was told that as soon as vacancies occurred in the economic or political sections, I would be considered. That assuaged my unhappiness to some degree.

My consular job was primarily devoted to Chinese fraud cases. I did spend a little time on issuing passports to American children born overseas or other straightforward requests, but my principal focus was on fraud cases. These were generated by Chinese who would make an application swearing that they had been born in the U.S., who had been brought back to China by his or her parents; however all records to verify these stories had been usually lost or destroyed, mostly in the great San Francisco fire. Applicants would show some documentary evidence which usually had little relationship to their application.

Q: Did you have the opportunity, as you did in Taiwan, to discuss substantive issues with your “clients”?

ABRAMOWITZ: I would try to engage some applicants, particularly those that had recently come from mainland China and explore their views on conditions in the PRC. This was not a systematic process; it was a matter of opportunity primarily and I did not file regular reports, unless there was something unusual. Most of the applicants came from four small districts in Kwangtung Province. Most of the Cantonese-born Chinese now in the U.S. came from these districts. I would guess that at least half – if not much more – of the applications were fraudulent.

Since these applicants spoke Cantonese, I did not have much opportunity to use my Mandarin; I had an interpreter for interviews. I did however pursue my Mandarin studies with a tutor provided by the Consulate General. I read mainland China newspapers. In the evenings, we often tried to mingle with Chinese and then the Mandarin was somewhat helpful since Cantonese was mostly spoken. You have to remember that we were in Hong Kong only 18 years after the end of the Japanese occupation and only 14 years after Chiang Kai-shek’s retreat from the mainland.

I can’t say that the time in the Consular Section was very useful; it did little for career development or learning. After six months, I moved to the Political Section.

This Political Section of the CG was devoted entirely to mainland China matters. It covered both economic and political affairs in the PRC. I worked on economic issues. I liked the job. I found the economic situation in the mainland fascinating and often the subject of great debate. I was given wide discretion and allowed to pick and choose issues to focus on. I spent much time on the PRC’s foreign trade especially as it impacted on Hong Kong’s foreign trade and was the biggest source of Beijing’s foreign exchange earnings at that time. I spent a lot of time tracking down visitors from the PRC to talk to them about economic conditions in their country. That was the most interesting part of the job.

The Political Section included both economic and political officers and was headed by John Holdridge. The chief of the economic section was Bill Gleysteen. I worked primarily for Bill which was a delight and an excellent experience. I developed a high regard for Bill’s intellectual ability, his honesty and his dispassionate approach to the issues that we were analyzing. Bill was a serious, dedicated man.

John had worked on China for a long time. He was an easy man to get along with and left me pretty much to my own devices, even though he was always interested in my reports and activities. I respected his competence. The first Consul General I worked for was Marshall Green who was in Hong Kong for only a brief period after my arrival. He was replaced by Ed Rice, who was an old “China hand.” I got acquainted with both of these senior officers and liked and respected both. I came to know Marshall much better during later assignments. I did not see Rich much after I left Hong Kong. He was quiet, very knowledgeable, very accessible, and very serious. I learned a lot about China from him.

We had an agricultural attaché and we spent a lot of time together studying the effects of the “Great Leap Forward” on China. Famine was a hot topic of the PRC – we made estimates of the numbers who probably died. The famine raised the question of the durability of the Chinese Communist regime.

Hong Kong was a great post, and an interesting place to live, in part because we were in effect the U.S. embassy to the PRC. I was in HK during the escalation of the Vietnam war. That raised the fundamental issue of PRC support for North Vietnam which became a major issue for our analysis. In addition, in 1964, the Chinese set off their first nuclear test which was of a course a major issue. The PRC kept us all very busy.

Q: Did you have the opportunity, as you did in Taiwan, to discuss substantive issues with your “clients”?

ABRAMOWITZ: I would try to engage some applicants, particularly those that had recently come from mainland China and explore their views on conditions in the PRC. This was not a systematic process; it was a matter of opportunity primarily and I did not file regular reports, unless there was something unusual. Most of the applicants came from four small districts in Kwangtung Province. Most of the Cantonese-born Chinese now in the U.S. came from these districts. I would guess that at least half – if not much more – of the applications were fraudulent.

Since these applicants spoke Cantonese, I did not have much opportunity to use my Mandarin; I had an interpreter for interviews. I did however pursue my Mandarin studies with a tutor provided by the Consulate General. I read mainland China newspapers. In the evenings, we often tried to mingle with Chinese and then the Mandarin was somewhat helpful since Cantonese was mostly spoken. You have to remember that we were in Hong Kong only 18 years after the end of the Japanese occupation and only 14 years after Chiang Kai-shek’s retreat from the mainland.

I can’t say that the time in the Consular Section was very useful; it did little for career development or learning. After six months, I moved to the Political Section.

This Political Section of the CG was devoted entirely to mainland China matters. It covered both economic and political affairs in the PRC. I worked on economic issues. I liked the job. I found the economic situation in the mainland fascinating and often the subject of great debate. I was given wide discretion and allowed to pick and choose issues to focus on. I spent much time on the PRC’s foreign trade especially as it impacted on Hong Kong’s foreign trade and was the biggest source of Beijing’s foreign exchange earnings at that time. I spent a lot of time tracking down visitors from the PRC to talk to them about economic conditions in their country. That was the most interesting part of the job.

The Political Section included both economic and political officers and was headed by John Holdridge. The chief of the economic section was Bill Gleysteen. I worked primarily for Bill which was a delight and an excellent experience. I developed a high regard for Bill’s intellectual ability, his honesty and his dispassionate approach to the issues that we were analyzing. Bill was a serious, dedicated man.

John had worked on China for a long time. He was an easy man to get along with and left me pretty much to my own devices, even though he was always interested in my reports and activities. I respected his competence. The first Consul General I worked for was Marshall Green who was in Hong Kong for only a brief period after my arrival. He was replaced by Ed Rice, who was an old “China hand.” I got acquainted with both of these senior officers and liked and respected both. I came to know Marshall much better during later assignments. I did not see Rich much after I left Hong Kong. He was quiet, very knowledgeable, very accessible, and very serious. I learned a lot about China from him.

We had an agricultural attaché and we spent a lot of time together studying the effects of the “Great Leap Forward” on China. Famine was a hot topic of the PRC – we made estimates of the numbers who probably died. The famine raised the question of the durability of the Chinese Communist regime.

Hong Kong was a great post, and an interesting place to live, in part because we were in effect the U.S. embassy to the PRC. I was in HK during the escalation of the Vietnam war. That raised the fundamental issue of PRC support for North Vietnam which became a major issue for our analysis. In addition, in 1964, the Chinese set off their first nuclear test which was of a course a major issue. The PRC kept us all very busy.

Q: What were your basic sources for analysis?

ABRAMOWITZ: Our key source was the Chinese mainland press. That was enhanced by the efforts of one of our officers to purchase all written mainland material that might be available in HK. Much of that material was smuggled out from the mainland – i.e., secret newspapers not publicly available to the Consulate. I would have to say that in the overall analysis scheme these materials were not a major contributor to our analysis. Some of my colleagues might disagree.

We also kept in close contact with representatives of other countries that had establishments in Hong Kong. That provided us periodically some interesting information. CIA also contributed to our knowledge, although it too was a limited source. There was also a considerable number of Chinese visitors – businessmen, diplomats, etc. from Beijing or Shanghai. We were voracious in our efforts to contact these people and to talk to them about what was going on in the PRC.

I was in my early thirties during my time in HK. It was a very satisfying tour because the issues I was involved in were of great interest to me and to our government. The work was intellectually challenging because we were working on a closed society which required a lot of “tea leaves” reading. China was potentially very important, an enemy of the U.S., and ranked high on the U.S. interest list.

We were putting together a mosaic – taking little bits of information gleaned from many sources and trying to fit into the larger picture, such as portrayed by the Chinese press. You also had to read between the lines and be able to understand the code words that the Chinese used. The press was particularly important as the Chinese moved from the “Great Leap Forward” to Mao’s increasing efforts to start a new “socialist education” program. You could follow the supposed changes in the government’s programs step by step by reading the Chinese press from 1963 onward.

In general, we believe that we did figure out the broad mosaic, although there were a lot of surprises. For example, all of a sudden, a famous leader is set aside. The day I left in August, 1966 the mayor of Beijing, a very prominent party leader, was fired. We knew that something major was going on, but I think we were all continually surprised by the extraordinary actions taken by the government. It was the early days of the Cultural Revolution. We understood that whatever machinations were being undertaken were at Mao’s behest – or approval, at least. This was a long process which lasted ten calamitous years.

The focus of our intelligence collection and analysis was usually some big issue, for example, the stability of the regime. We were deeply interested in Sino-Soviet relations and focused on the developments of the split. We were eager to fathom’s the PRC’s attitude towards Vietnam and the war and what a role it might play. Finally, we spent a lot of time working on the Taiwan issue – e.g., the PRC’s views of the situation in the Straits.

Minutia was interesting but we had our eyes on the bigger issues. The CG in Hong Kong was one of the principal contributors to this government-wide effort of determining the PRC’s views on major issues. We were the principal source of public information and “tea leaves” reading. We also had loads of visitors from the States who came for up-to-date briefings on the PRC. We spent perhaps an hour each day – it obviously varied from day to day – briefing the American official and unofficial visitors, including an endless procession of the media. This role I think heightened even higher the intellectual excitement that our work brought to us. People were clearly interested in what we were up to. We were the main contact for the large American press in Hong Kong. We had numerous CODELs (Congressional Delegations) interested in the PRC. That role was a major contributor to Consulate morale because people had many interlocutors deeply interested in our work.

Q: Did you feel that the CG made an impact on your visitors – the press, the CODELs, etc?

ABRAMOWITZ: Absolutely. The press came to us all the time. This included some of America’s best journalists on East Asia. I have no doubt that we had an impact, on many others to whom they talked. They have often told me so because so many have been life-long friends. The journalists were professional; they did not just accept our analysis and assertions, but often – not always – came to the similar conclusions after doing their own further work. It was a fruitful endeavor for us as well. They spent lots of time with us and I am convinced that the Consulate General helped shape the American public’s perception of the PRC. It was time consuming – on everyone’s part – but it was well spent.

Of course, the process was assisted by the lively social life in Hong Kong. We would meet loads of people on that circuit and were able to make our views known to those we met there, some of whom were VIPs (very important people).

Adding to the intellectual ferment was the fact that many reporters would go from Hong Kong to Vietnam to report on the situation there. On returning to Hong Kong they would pass along their more unvarnished observations. That added considerably to our knowledge and kept our intellectual juices fermenting.

As I said in my Harvard “Neuhauser” lecture: “We were an intimate part of the media, particularly in Hong Kong, where all of us searched for every scrap of information about China and waylaid anyone who came down from China or who had escaped. In fact, the Hong Kong consulate, the de facto American Embassy in China, to a great extent shaped public reporting on China in the fifties and sixties. I don’t mean top reporters like Stan Karnow, Joe Lelyveld, Seymour Topping, Bernie Kalb, Jerry Schecter and others just wrote what we told them. They certainly did not. But the Consulate because of its resources and the quality of its people was an indispensable stop for reporters. It was nice to get our views of China into the newspapers. Such efforts occupy much of my time today, but they are no longer as much fun.”

Q: How was the Consulate General’s relationship with the Department?

ABRAMOWITZ: We had vigorous exchanges. We often disagreed particularly about Chinese intentions in Vietnam. There were occasionally public spats between the staff in Hong Kong and Washington. Alan Whiting, for example, who was the head of the INR (Bureau of Intelligence and Research) section dealing with East Asia. The exchanges were vigorous but mostly unpolitical.

I describe some of these exchanges again in the spiel I delivered at Harvard. In it, I said: “Interesting battles raged in Washington over a China we perceived dimly. One, similar to our problem today with Iran and with many of the same considerations, focused on what to do about China becoming a nuclear weapon power as we watched it proceed to its first test in 1964. Significant internal pressures to attack China’s nuclear facilities were rebuffed by President Johnson. A second was a real debate in 1964-65 over how China would respond to the vast buildup of American forces in Vietnam and the bombing of the North. Washington feared that the Chinese might come in a la Korea in 1950 and 1951 if we seriously escalated. The opposing views on the Hong Kong Consulate and Allan Whiting in INR became very public. Whiting, who helped George Ball argue against increased deployments and of course wrote the Book China Crosses the Yalu would spell out to Max Frankel in Washington why China was likely to come in in a big way. In Hong Kong we would talk with the New York Times bureau chief, Seymour Topping, and give our perspective on why the Chinese would not do so. The CG won that argument.

It was, of course, hard to evaluate in our policy deliberations the extent of China’s domestic turmoil and its impact on Chinese policy of those extraordinary two decades in China. The Cultural Revolution mostly produced shakings of the head in Washington and elsewhere. Despite what government specialists were long telling their masters about the depth of Sino-Soviet differences, there was also a skepticism on more pertinent domestic political concerns that hindered trying to take advantage of the dispute. The Democrats had become gun shy on anything Chinese from the damaging “who lost China” debate. The depth of Sino-Soviet animosity became clear even to Washington in 1969 with the incidents along the Sino-Soviet border. In the end the change in administrations from the Democrats to Richard Nixon and Henry Kissinger, the American difficulties in Vietnam, and China's troubles with the Soviets all continued to lead to what most China watchers had long and devoutly hoped for, even if we were surprised and captivated by Kissinger's secret diplomacy."

Q: In your area of responsibility – the economic scene – what were you observing?

ABRAMOWITZ: The big question was whether and to what extent the PRC was recovering from the "Great Leap Forward." What were the indicators of farm production and what did they suggest? Was China expanding its foreign trade? Were Chinese goods finding a market outside its borders? What was happening to their military forces?

The CG funded a trip that I took to look at the question of Chinese exports in Southeast Asia. I visited six countries meeting with host government officials, local leaders, and visiting Chinese department stores to analyze the size and vigor of a Chinese export drive. The assumption was that if the export sector was recovering, then it was likely that the Chinese domestic economy was also getting back on its feet. That was an issue of great interest to Washington. Hong Kong itself was of course an excellent market for cheap Chinese goods.

The agricultural economy in China was, of course, most important because it was the key to political and economic stability. China had gone through exceedingly difficult times (1959-62) with the "Great Leap Forward." It had wreaked havoc on Chinese agriculture with the resulting death of something close to 30 million Chinese – that was the experts' best guess, but no one has ever known for sure. Regardless of the number, it was a devastating blow to China which made it important to make some educated guesses about the state of Chinese agriculture because that would have a major impact on political stability. I think that by 1963, we had reached the conclusion that China had essentially recovered from its "experiment" and that the economy had hit bottom and was slowly beginning to recover. There were still problems of agricultural production – e.g., lack of sufficient fertilizer (we watched fertilizer imports very closely). But I think by 1963, the sense of crisis was beginning to fade; by 1966, the "Great Leap Forward" was history, replaced by another extraordinary Communist event, the Cultural Revolution.

The Chinese government had embarked on a "socialist education" campaign from 1963 which led us to focus on the stability of the Communist party and its potential impact on agricultural production. Starting in 1965, we began to notice certain trends in the press which suggested to us that a shake-up in the party was in the making. By the time I left in 1966, we were certain that something real big was going on in the party, but we didn't know exactly what. Even though these intra-party upheavals and power-plays were not part of my portfolio, we all had to be up-to-date on this process because of its very likely spill over effect into political and economic areas of the PRC.

Finally, we were interested in the state of the Communist party. Was it still peddling old ideology? For that analysis, we depended primarily on printed material – newspapers, books, etc.

Q: Did you have any idea what organizational level of the Department was reading the CG's reports?

ABRAMOWITZ: Our reports went to the country director and the deputy assistant secretary for the region. A few went directly – or were sent by the East Asia bureau – to the Seventh Floor. Most of my own reports would not have gone to the Seventh Floor; my views might have been included in some summary reports on such general matters as Chinese agricultural output and conditions. But I don't think that as a routine matter, the CG's reports were read on the Seventh Floor, except for some staffers. But, as I noted before, our exchanges with Washington were mostly high level in substantive content with the office director being our main interlocutor and the Assistant Secretary that of the Consul General.

Q: Did you note any changes in PRC attitudes or policies as our involvement in Vietnam grew?

ABRAMOWITZ: By 1965, we had a considerable presence in Vietnam. The Chinese were supplying arms and other materiel to North Vietnam and thus to the Viet-Cong. In the CG we wrestled with the issue of Chinese intentions toward the war. On this issue we and Washington did not see eye-to-eye generating some major debates. As I previously indicated the CG thought that China would provide significant assistance including perhaps even some man-power, but we never expected the Chinese to enter the fray full bore – as they did in Korea. This is a very broad brush description of our general view; it had some more nuanced aspects. But Washington, particularly George Ball and Whiting, took a much more grave view about Chinese intentions. Although I can not prove it, I think Ball and Whiting in part took this dire view of likely Chinese intervention because they were basically opposed to the Vietnam War, they wanted to limit our exposure, and expressed deep concern as the U.S. increased its involvement. My speculation may be unfair; I wasn't in Washington and privy to their deliberations, but it was what I was hearing. There was certainly no question the CG and parts of the Washington bureaucracy did not see eye-to-eye on the question of Chinese support for North Vietnam. That was a vigorous debate which became public, as I previously mentioned.

We did not have a "Vietnam Hand" on the staff. I did a small amount of reporting on Vietnam as did some of my colleagues. The CIA station spent a lot of time on that issue. We also got plenty of visitors who had great interest in Vietnam – e.g., Dan Ellsberg, Henry Kissinger. All were trying to find new approaches to a difficult situation. Most of these "thinkers" visits were officially sponsored.

We had, of course, a large number of visits from Vietnam-stationed personnel in Hong Kong for R&R. I talked to some of them, particularly the ones with whom I had a personal connection – classmates, colleagues from previous assignments, etc. We got a fairly wide range of information both from these personal contacts and from reading the correspondence between Saigon and Washington, copies of which were sent to the CG.

Q: Talk a little about Sino-Soviet relations during this period you were in Hong Kong?

ABRAMOWITZ: That of course was very high on our priority list of topics to follow. We already had indications – secret speeches, newspaper articles, talks with diplomats, etc. – that bilateral relations were deteriorating. These policy differences were strictly downplayed but the public exchange of letters between the two sides was increasingly tough. Moreover Soviet technicians had already been withdrawn from China. We had to consider whether the Sino-Soviet Axis was irreparably broken and we were witnessing a change in the geo-strategic picture.

Our analysis focused on the severity of the tensions – an issue that was not easily answered from our vantage point. We were also faced with the question of what the U.S. might do to help move the “splitting” process along. Much of Washington was still quite skeptical about the nature and depth of this “split.” I also don’t remember much thought being given in Washington to how the U.S. might take advantage of this potential divide. Adequate attention was not paid to this huge foreign policy development until military incidents along the Sino-Soviet border in Siberia took place in 1969. At that point the U.S. government finally acknowledged that the Sino-Soviet split was real and would impact on many important issues. A consensus began to build in the U.S.G. that this development cried for U.S. activism and eventually resulted in President Nixon’s efforts to normalize relations with the PRC. This continuing development was one of those defining moment in history.

When I left Hong Kong in 1966 Washington was still in a cautious and skeptical mood, not certain that the Sino-Soviet Axis was dead and required new U.S. foreign policy initiatives.

Q: What do you remember about your living conditions in Hong Kong?

ABRAMOWITZ: We were fortunate. We had the house on the very top of Hong Kong. It looked over a great swath of the island. The house had been occupied by Mark Pratt, another Foreign Service officer, who was unexpectedly reassigned from Hong Kong to Laos because he had violated local regulations concerning use of water on private lawns. Hong Kong was in the middle of one of its periodic droughts. So the house became available. In addition to the vista, it had beautiful large rooms with 40 feet ceilings. We had numerous parties – primarily official ones – impossible without our excellent Chinese cook. This was the life of one of the junior members of the staff and it was bracing.

Our guests for the most part, were associated with our work. Hong Kong was a great assignment for a young FSO; it combined very interesting substantive work with a high standard of living that few junior officers had the opportunity to live. Our contacts, whether American, Chinese, British or other Europeans, were on the whole interesting, stimulating, and forthcoming. We worked hard, but there were off-setting benefits. Hong Kong was no hardship post, but an intellectually stimulating hard-working one. Now, However, I have little desire to go back to the island.

NATALE H. BELLOCCHI
Chinese Language Training
Taichung, Taiwan (1963-1964)

Assistant Commercial Officer
Taipei, Taiwan (1964-1968)

Ambassador Natale H. Bellocchi was born in Little Falls, New York in 1926. He received a degree in industrial management from Georgia Tech in 1944 and was soon drafted into the U.S. Army to serve in a rifle platoon during the Korean War. His Foreign Service career included positions in Hong Kong, Laos, Vietnam, Taiwan, Japan, India, and an ambassadorship to Botswana. Ambassador Bellocchi was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on March 21, 1995

BELLOCCHI: We got inspected while I was in Laos and only two of them dared to come up from Bangkok. They inspected us at a time when it very fortuitously rained very heavily so flood waters were all over the place. Our secretaries were sitting at their desks typing away with water and lizards floating around the water, and right within the building. I'm not talking about outside, and they were very impressed with the way we kept everything going even in such a bad time. So I at that time had just become an officer--I'd passed my Foreign Service exam, I actually got sworn in in Laos by the DCM at that time, and they said, "Well, you don't have any language on your paper. What are you going to do about that?" So I said I would like to go to Chinese language; I'd been studying it privately on my own even there in Laos. He asked me, "With a name like yours, why not Italian? That would be the easiest way for you to get off the language problem." I said, "Yes, but if I studied Italian, I would only be able to be assigned to one place and I'm interested in Asia." So he said, "That's reasonable." And he recommended that I go to Taichung, and I did eventually get the orders to go to Taichung.

Q: Taichung being the...

BELLOCCHI: ...the language school on Taiwan.

Q: I've got you there from about '63 to '65?

BELLOCCHI: That's right.

Q: I think it's important to understand the type of people who went to language school at that time. Could you talk about your class, and how the training was, and its outlook?

BELLOCCHI: It was still at that time a carry-over of the old type of language school where it was very important that you mix. You'd get located in a place where there aren't many tourists and foreigners, so that you had to use your language as much as possible. They had a small school, at one point there were only six students and six teachers. It was always one-on-one, changing every hour, no English spoken in the school. Every weekend was off with one of the teachers to some village, or someplace else on the island where the teacher would never never speak English. You had to order food, and get to the hotel, and all this kind of business. So it was very intensive. We had six hours of class a day, plus we were expected to put in at least two to three hours of listening to tapes after that. They threw you into it no matter what. I had not had a bit of the romanization they were using at that time, the Yale romanization system. I'd studied my Chinese from characters because of the job I had, and it was kind of tough adjusting to the new system. I never have really learned much on romanization. I found it very difficult, but that didn't matter. They just threw you in there and you had to do it. I think being that intensive, and being isolated from foreigners, really was very very good. That's where I think government was getting their money's worth because after all of that, and going up to Taipei to the embassy, it was really only then that I began to think in Chinese, and really felt comfortable speaking Chinese, even after that intensive thing. So if it's less intensive I don't see how people can really get as much out of it.

Q: What about the officers who were getting trained with you? What was their outlook towards China, and your outlook too? You had Communist China, and you had Taiwan.

BELLOCCHI: First of all there was a mix of people there. There were some military, some USIA people, there could have been any number of other agencies that had some people learning languages, and USIA people were focused more on culture and that area because the vocabulary is quite different. But as far as the attitude, that was still a time when Communist China was Red China, and the concern mainly was, well, there weren't really very many places to go if you were going to use the language except Southeast Asia, and that was only with the overseas Chinese group. In fact most of those people didn't speak Mandarin, so it was kind of limited. I think that everyone thought, well one day this is going to be useful because one day maybe there would be something opening up out there. But as far as attitude, China was Taiwan. That was the China that everyone knew, and not always with great admiration. There was a lot of criticism of the government of that day.

Q: From your observation at that time, can you characterize the Kuomintang government on Taiwan.

BELLOCCHI: Very good in terms of efficiency, the use of our AID money, very impressive. Of course, very disarming always because they're always quick to acknowledge, "Oh, we really appreciate all the help you're giving..." this type of thing. They're very very good at this, and I think it's not a put-on, I think maybe they are sincere. But there was also very much an awareness at that time that it was a small group that was governing, a majority of people that weren't really participating at all in the whole process. In fact, that was my major emphasis when I went up to Taipei because I was assigned up there as the assistant commercial attaché, and it was at a time when AID was just phasing out. In fact they closed their doors in '65, and we had to look for export opportunities. Before that we were dealing with government. So AID always dealt with government only, and government always dealt with their state enterprises, and companies that were more or less Mainlander run companies. And when I got up there, they were saying we really had to start developing a market. Most of the private sector is really Taiwanese, not Mainlander, and we didn't know anybody. So I started a major effort, in fact I wrote a very large report ...I visited almost every factory on that island, went all through that island visiting factories, getting to know a lot of people, and then developing a huge list of Taiwanese business men. Some of them very substantial, and we really started to work on getting to know them better and developing export opportunities for them. Again, you can make every job a fascinating job, and it was fascinating for me.

Q: You were commercial officer in Taipei from '63 to '68.

BELLOCCHI: '65 to '68.

Q: In the first place, was the attitude of the ruling people who'd come over from the Mainland, sort of looking down on the Taiwanese?

BELLOCCHI: Oh, yes, very much.

Q: Sometimes these attitudes get picked up by the embassy officers?

BELLOCCHI: Well, to a certain extent because in those days, just say as an example a political section...I can't remember how many officers were there, say four or five anyway, they would always have one that had had three months extra study in Taiwanese which, of course, meant he could say hello and goodbye maybe at the most. But at least he focused on the Taiwanese community from the political reporting standpoint. It wasn't given that much attention because all the power was in the hands of mainlanders. So I think there was certainly sufficient element of our people who were China oriented, to think that Chiang Kai-shek and the Kuomintang and the rest of them were here temporarily and one day they would return in some fashion back there to the mainland. But there was also a lot of criticism of our dealings with the authorities. To be fair, that's something that doesn't come easily for us, and we were well aware of the inequities there. As time went on that grew, that is, the awareness that the Taiwanese were really second class citizens in their own place.

Q: Who was our ambassador at that time?

BELLOCCHI: Admiral Wright, Jerauld Wright. I'll never forget Jerauld Wright. He was only there for a short time. On my first assignment after arriving in the embassy, a lawyer from Los Angeles had a trade complaint on some scrap iron. Somehow or other $100,000 had changed hands, and the Los Angeles client was claiming they hadn't received the scrap iron, while the local scrap iron dealer claimed they had. The American lawyer came to the embassy for help and they sort of hooked me, and said, "You go and help him." So I was the translator, an interpreter for a full week of this guy bargaining, and by the end of the week, as usual, the fellow's foot was practically on the airplane going back to Los Angeles before the final deal was struck for $40,000. And they agreed, and he got a check for $40,000 there at the airport, and to this day I don't have any idea who came out on that one. It seemed to me that maybe both of them came out, I'm not sure. But unbeknownst to me, that lawyer, when he got back to Los Angeles wrote a letter to Ambassador Wright to say how much he appreciated the help this fellow Bellocchi gave, he was a superb interpreter. I didn't know anything about this, but my boss from the Department of Commerce, a very fine...he's still alive and lives out in Minnesota, wrote my OER, efficiency report, and he showed it to me as they were supposed to do. Then he said, "While you're reading this, I want to show you something that I didn't have the heart to show you before." This was months after...he pulled out of the center drawer, this letter from this fellow in Los Angeles and all these fine things he said. Scratched across the top of that letter, "I don't believe in complimenting an officer for just doing his job." Signed Jerauld Wright.

So Wright was there at first, but then there was a hiatus...

Q: Today is April 10th, 1995. Nat, before we move on, I think we're just about finished with your first time in Taipei after you became commercial officer.

BELLOCCHI: Assistant Commercial Attaché, that's right.

Q: I'm not sure if I brought it up but I'd like to bring it up in case we didn't mention it last time. As you got into Chinese, and you were on Taiwan, did the shadow of John Stuart Service and the old China hands who were badly burned by McCarthy and the people on the right, did you new China hands kind of look over your shoulder and think about that much or not?

BELLOCCHI: I don't think we thought about it at my level at that time. But you certainly sensed that up in the higher levels where policy decisions were actually being made, it was an element in the kind of decisions one was going to be making to be sure one stayed out of trouble.

Q: Were you saying, this isn't going to happen to me. Or at a certain point you better watch...I mean looking towards the future because by taking the language you had made a commitment. Did your cohorts sit around and talk about this, or not?

BELLOCCHI: I think in Taipei there was always...I guess among the liberal element of our China types who thought we ought to make more contacts with the native Taiwanese, that this was where all the people were and one day there would be a democracy, and we ought to..., etc. And there were the other cautious ones saying, our policy is with Chiang Kai-shek, and retake the Mainland, and all that kind of business. And even though we knew it was patently ridiculous, that Taiwan was not going to retake the Mainland in that sense, nobody really would stand up and say, let's drop this fiction.

It got to the point where...I remember a little incident when I was leaving Taiwan, Fred Chien and Paul Chou, and one other from the North American section of the Foreign Office in Taipei, had a little lunch together with a couple of us from the embassy. At the time I think Fred was about the number three in the North American section, he's now the Foreign Minister. We were kidding and the inevitable question always came up, what's going to happen when the Gimo goes? The Gimo was pretty old at that time. And Fred who wears glasses, sort of put his glasses down toward the end of his nose, and said, "You mean if he goes." We all got a big kick out of that, but it was the sort of thing that demonstrated that he was considered supreme by everyone, and everyone thought they had to pay public obeisance to it, including us Americans. When I was down in Taichung Ambassador Kirk was just leaving, he was Kennedy's ambassador to the ROC. He was followed then by Jerauld Wright who just died recently.

Q: Yes, about a week ago.

BELLOCCHI: Jerauld Wright was conservative, nothing could be better than Chiang Kai-shek and his people, so one had to be a little careful on how one were criticized the Taiwanese Chinese, to protect your own career I guess.

THOMAS L. HUGHES
Director, Bureau of Intelligence and Research

Washington, DC (1963-1969)

Mr. Hughes was born and raised in Minnesota and was educated at Carleton College, Oxford University and Yale University. After service with the US Air Force he worked on Capitol Hill and became active in Democratic Party politics. He later joined the Department of State, first as Assistant to Under Secretary Chester Bowles and subsequently as Deputy Director, then as Director of the Bureau of Intelligence and Research, where he served during the event filled period 1961 to 1969. His assignments brought him in close contact with the major political figures of that era. His final government assignment was to Embassy London as Deputy Chief of Mission. Mr. Hughes was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1999.

Q: While you were going through this, what was the attitude of Kennedy's headhunters towards the foreign service?

HUGHES: Oh, the headhunters, and Bowles was one of them, were very skeptical about the foreign service, especially its oldest ranking officers. Chet thought that State needed big injections of younger, fresher blood. Shriver and Kennedy himself agreed with Bowles on this. They thought that in many cases the foreign service was part of the problem. Rusk, by contrast, admired the foreign service. If you looked at his favorite bureau, East Asia (FE), he surely regarded the U. Alexis Johnsons and Walter McConaughys of this world as eminent public servants. Elsewhere in the department, there was a certain sympathy for that part of the service which had suffered cleansings and expulsions as a result of McCarthy and Dulles, or had been left to wither on the vine, or sent to Latin America instead of to Asia because they were politically unacceptable. The fallout from the who-lost-China struggle left the East Asia Bureau in the hands of the Taiwan crowd, people who basically were going nowhere on China policy. On the other hand Chet wanted to appoint outsiders with positive reputations, which would make it easier for American policy to adjust to new opportunities.

Q: I heard from somebody that Eisenhower had told Kennedy that he was going to support him in foreign policy but he shouldn't try to change our confrontation with communist China.

HUGHES: My impression of Eisenhower throughout the Kennedy administration was that he was unremittingly unhelpful on Asia policy. Kennedy in part appointed John McCone as CIA director because he was a Republican with good ties to Ike. He was often sent up to Gettysburg, and invariably came back from the general with hawkish responses on Vietnam and China. Eisenhower always proposed reinvesting in our military effort up to, and including, the use of nuclear weapons. Later Johnson dispatched General Goodpaster to Gettysburg, and the response was the same. I thought Eisenhower's advice to Kennedy and Johnson in the 1960's was deplorable. It contrasted sharply with his own non-intervention in Indochina in the 50's after the French debacle there.

Q: During the Kennedy administration, including your former boss Roger Hilsman, there was this infatuation with special forces and green berets-- somehow you have bi-lingual people parachuted into the jungle, and this would turn things around. I probably am overstating. But did you find a diminution of that view as the Johnson people became more involved in the war?

HUGHES: Well, yes, in fact there was a diminution after Roger left the government in early 1964. But it is also fair to say that he wasn't alone in that enthusiasm. Bob Komer picked it up pretty quickly. Bobby Kennedy continued to treasure the concept as one of Jack's legacies. In addition Roger is probably still a better defender of strategic hamlets than I am. He should be interviewed on that subject to see what he thinks in retrospect. . Of course he left INR in March '63 and that was relatively early in the Vietnam saga. As assistant secretary for far eastern affairs, he was able to continue that interest for another year as the operational head of the geographical bureau into the first months of the Johnson administration.

So I don't think there was an abrupt change. Certainly the whole goal of strategic hamlets and pacifying the countryside remained a central objective for those who thought the war had to be won in the south. All that persisted. And then, perversely, the more troops that were dispatched, the more wedded we became to winning the war in the south. As Rolling Thunder and other air force operations failed to produce any dramatically positive results in the North, the policymakers again turned their attention to saving the South. There was a kind of trade-off--attacking the North for a while and when that proved to be unproductive, concentrating again on the South. That was the kind of mental process affecting the policymakers by 1966. There was no question that these contrasting arguments were on the table. The analysis that showed why you were unlikely to succeed here and also why you were unlikely to succeed there confronted the policymakers with a continuing dilemma. Almost all of them, of course, were also proud veterans of World War II. Kennedy supporters were still wearing his PT boat tie clasps left over from the 1960 Kennedy campaign. They weren't about to give up when it came to professional patriotism.

Johnson inherited all of that. He was proud of his own war record, such as it was. There was even a residual secessionist mentality from our own Civil War that identified with South Vietnam. Rusk and Johnson, for example, shared this historical memory in many ways. Both were poor boys with deep Southern backgrounds in rural Georgia and Texas. Both had grandfathers who fought for the Confederacy. In a way the South's revenge for Gettysburg ever since their defeat in 1865, was their subsequent takeover of the US army. Already in the Spanish-American War and the First World War, many US generals were coming out of Dixie. This was in a way the last bugle call for the Confederacy.

I remember Harriman coming out of a meeting on Vietnam saying that he felt like the only Northerner in the room.

After World War II the Pentagon had also had a personal impact on the State Department. General Marshall moved in as Secretary of State. Colonel Dean Rusk who served in the Pentagon after the war, came over to State under Marshall. So there was not only a military-industrial complex but a diplomatic-military-industrial complex. Rusk's protégé U. Alexis Johnson at State had a direct pipeline to the Pentagon. A bureau of political-military affairs was established at State to assure constant contact. Folk memories from World War II were still present in many Washington corridors of power in the 1960's.

Dean Rusk idolized General Marshall. The latter's bitter experience with China also had a lasting influence on Rusk. He himself had been traumatized by the Chinese intervention in Korea. You couldn't have found a more sensitized audience than the Secretary of State over the possibility of Chinese intervention. Speaking of China, there was another curious development in our public diplomacy as the Vietnam war continued into 1967 and 1968. The student protests at home were accelerating and the country was obviously getting more and more deeply divided. The public rationale for the war needed upgrading because saving South Vietnam from communism was no longer quite adequate. There had to be a bigger rationale than that, not only from the public relations point of view, but also to buttress the internal confidence of the policy makers themselves. They had to convince themselves that the stakes were larger than they previously seemed. Suddenly the Chinese threat was magnified. Rusk spoke of a future haunted by a billion Chinese armed with nuclear weapons. McNamara announced that the reason we needed a missile defense was protection against China. Paradoxically, however, the more China became their rationale for the war, the more fixated Rusk, Johnson and others became on the possibility of Chinese intervention.

Rusk had come into office still believing in the Sino-Soviet bloc, and he was one of the last in the administration to accept the fact that there had been a real falling out between the two communist rivals. When INR changed the spelling of Peiping to Peking, from "Peip" to "Pek", we were pioneers in the State Department, well in advance of the Far East bureau and of the Secretary.

Q: Was it an acceptance of the communists?

HUGHES: Yes, it was a denial of the mythology of Taiwan and an acceptance of the undeniable fact of Communist rule in Peking. But the most significant point was a tactical one. In the mid-'60's, Rusk finally accepted the Sino-Soviet split when he realized that it would help let the Russians off the hook on Vietnam. This would enable him to conduct arms control negotiations with the Russians. The more the Johnson administration became embroiled in Vietnam, the more the policymakers became willing to recognize the Soviet-Chinese split. Gradually it became obvious that we were going to conduct a war policy with a China rationale in the morning and a peace policy with a Soviet rationale in the afternoon. By 1966 we have Kosygin and Johnson at their summit meeting at Glassboro. Our debacle in Vietnam had gradually let the Russians off the hook, leaving the Chinese as the main rationale for the war. The US policymakers' chagrin over the unexpected Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia in 1968 was therefore all the greater.

Q: I want to return to the role of INR and your role. Were you in the State Department responding to this in subtle ways? Were you suggesting how we should look at this split?

HUGHES: As I said, we were convinced of the split long before the secretary of state was willing to admit it. He was briefed about it when he came into office, and details of the deteriorating Sino-Soviet relationship were a staple in his normal daily briefings. INR and the intelligence community in general also produced more substantial estimates on the split from time to time. Rusk resisted accepting the seriousness of the split, let alone its implications, for quite some time. I came to think that he had a special problem if China was going to become the major rationale for the Vietnam war. It was the Chinese intervention in Korea that had burned him once before, and it was the possibility of a repeat performance in Vietnam that underlay his incrementalism when it came to escalation.

Setting up China as the major culprit also enhanced Whiting's role in INR as the watcher and warner about every move that the Chinese might be making. So Rusk became ever more attentive to the Chinese threat. His first question at my morning briefings always used to be "Any sign of Chinese movement? Any sign of Chinese reaction?" If Rusk had not been so sensitive about possible Chinese intervention, the rapidity and breadth of our air attack on the north would probably have increased. .

Q: Whiting was your man, but was there any disquiet on your part or on the part of other China watchers? Did they feel he belonged to the old school and there was a new school looking at the cultural revolution?

HUGHES: We were quite happy with Whiting in the 1964-6 time frame when he was still with us. After he departed for Hong Kong, and John Holdridge joined INR, there was some shift in attitude. Arguably the cultural revolution did put a brake on Chinese interventionist impulses, in turn enabling US policy to be more venturesome. How assertive Rusk actually was with Johnson on the China issue remains unclear. Johnson himself was deeply worried about China. Rusk continued with his mysterious posture: "I don't speak out at the cabinet meetings. I reserve my advice for the president." We never knew exactly what that was. He clearly saw nuclear non - proliferation as a place where the U.S. and the Soviet Union had a common interest. He was very enthusiastic about pursuing this and undoubtedly thought it could take some of the curse off the Johnson administration's Vietnam predicament. The worse that predicament became, the more Rusk redoubled his efforts with Moscow. That certainly was true right up to the Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia in 1968 which of course necessitated another policy U-turn. Thereafter we were back stopping both Chinese and Russian communism again.

Q: Again, going back a bit but moving off Vietnam onto China. Were you able to get a pretty good fix on China and what was happening? You mentioned there were more China experts than Vietnam experts.

HUGHES: Yes, but they all labored under the cloud of McCarthyism and were scarred by the "who lost China" controversy. There were academic experts within easy reach in Washington, like the distinguished Doak Barnett at Brookings. There were people in the State Department who were more or less exiled from Chinese affairs like Doak's brother Bob Barnett, who worked in State in another capacity on the economics side. Many ranking foreign service officers with China careers had been burned by the McCarthy experience and had left the government or transferred to other geographic areas. But there was a cadre of younger foreign service officers like Charles Cross, incidentally a classmate of mine from Carleton College, who has just written some stimulating new memoirs. They were serving in Taiwan, Hong Kong, or elsewhere on the periphery of China.

Some of the veterans from the 1950s were still around like U. Alexis Johnson. But they had learned to be gun-shy on China. They knew which way the wind was blowing. There wasn't anything very exciting about the China analysis coming from the senior foreign service officers who had escaped controversy for one reason or another. So we are really talking about younger foreign service officers or academics. The brilliant young James C. Thompson, another political appointee, was a conspicuous exception. He too had emerged from the Chester Bowles stable. He eventually worked either in the State Department or White House for everyone across the spectrum from Bowles to the Bundy brothers to Walt Rostow. Jim never ceased to speak truth to power. He even accompanied Humphrey on his famous trip to Southeast Asia, and along the way he memorably tangled with the Vice President on China (see the Humphrey memoirs).

Thinking back on it, I'm not sure that at the time we appreciated the real depth of the Chinese cultural revolution. The careful incrementalism of the US air strikes on North Vietnam were designed to avoid provoking China. But the Chinese Cultural Revolution may have dampened any Chinese interventionist temptations then as well. This combination of factors may explain the external caution displayed by the Chinese. You could argue that the regime was so concerned about its internal convulsion that it wasn't going to be venturesome outside. But our official and public view was more ominous.

The earlier Sino-Indian war also illustrated the manipulative way Washington utilized its anti-Chinese point of departure both for policy thinking and policy explanation. The war gave the Indian lobby, such as it was, a positive way to exploit the prevailing anti-Chinese atmosphere in Washington. Here was one more proof of Chinese aggression, never mind the facts. (Allen Whiting, for example, argued that China hadn't really triggered the war with India.) Once more you had an overriding political reaction. This time it separated the supporters of India from the specialists on China. Those few who had worked for better relations with India were not going to miss this sudden and welcome opportunity. India could now get serious attention from the U.S. government since it was engaged in a struggle with China. This was enough to produce yet another Harriman mission. And since we were always good at pressing weapons on people, there were rush proposals for US military assistance to India. Naturally pressure for US intelligence collaboration with Delhi quickly followed, especially since Washington was eager for information about Chinese preparations for their nuclear tests at Lop Nor. The Chinese "attack" was of course a calamity for Nehru and non-alignment, and Nehru's carefully cultivated relationship with Chou en Lai lay in tatters. Washington was eager to exploit that development.

Conversely the Sino-Indian war also confronted the American champions of Pakistan with an awkward readjustment. Our U-2 base for the famous over-flights of the USSR was not the only stake we had in Pakistan. For a long time our covert intelligence operators had also used Peshawar as a listening post aimed at Russia. We liked to kid ourselves that the Pakistanis shared our interest in collecting electronic intelligence from the USSR. But as soon as American inspectors would leave for the day, the Paks would switch the antennae from north to east, in order to train them on their favorite Indian targets. We were interested in the USSR, while they were interested in India, and not surprisingly both interests were accommodated.

I spent some time in early 1964 in India and Pakistan, and again debriefed at some length on my return. A contemporary transcript of that debriefing about South Asia is available in the Bowles collection at Yale.

Q: How about looking at the Soviet Union? I would have thought we would have had a very sophisticated INR cadre dealing with that by the '60s.

HUGHES: We did. Throughout the decade, INR had several Kremlinologists with strong credentials, both foreign service officers and civil servants. Our Soviet analysts probably had mixed views about how much could be accomplished with the Russians at that point in the Cold War. Hal Sonnenfeldt, then one of our INR office directors, was a hard liner, if that is the right word. He was a realist, as befits a man who later became known as “Kissinger’s Kissinger”. There were plenty of warnings about the dangers and limits in US-Soviet collaboration. In 1966-7, however, despite the view of the Soviet Union as a continuing danger, there seemed to be new possible policy opportunities with Moscow. They recurred a few years later with the Nixon-Kissinger decision to turn our anti-China policy upside down and to drive a bigger wedge between the two Communist powers.

DAVID G. BROWN
Rotation Officer
Taipei, Taiwan (1964-1966)

David G. Brown was born in Boston, Massachusetts in 1940. He graduated from Princeton University in 1964 entered the Foreign Service. His assignments include Taipei, Saigon, Yokohama, Tokyo, Vienna, Beijing, Oslo, and Hong Kong. Before retirement in 1996, he served as Director of the Office of Korean Affairs. Mr. Brown was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on January 28, 2003.

Q: What do you recall about the Philippines?

BROWN: Not a great deal. I do remember reading about the Korean War. The mental picture I have of myself is of a kid lying on the floor with newspapers and circling words that I didn't know in the newspaper stories about the Korean War and going to the dictionary and looking them up. We lived in a compound with walls around it, and I went to the Manila American School. Honestly speaking, my life revolved around the school and the country club. There is not much other than this memory of reading about the Korean War. Did I remember later that the Chinese got into the fight at that time? No, I have no recollection of that. I was not seriously interested in international affairs. I was not reading, as I do now, avidly about Americans who were involved in foreign policy. That came later.

Q: At Princeton, what areas did you sort of concentrate on?

BROWN: There's an interesting story there, which I do remember. In the spring of 1959 when I was accepted to Princeton, I was sent forms asking me to sign up for fall semester classes. At that time, I had just finished reading the book, The Ugly American. That book sparked my interest in international affairs and a diplomatic career. Going through the catalog, I noticed that Princeton taught Chinese. So I wrote down Chinese, sent the class registration form to Princeton, and then went off for the summer. That summer I was working at a camp for handicapped children north of Toronto in the lake area, and I didn't give a thought to Princeton for almost the whole summer. In September, I arrived at Princeton and was handed the registration card on which there was, in handwriting that looked remarkably like my own, the word "Chinese." Did I really want to do this, I asked myself?

I then went and talked to Fritz Mote who was a professor of what Princeton called Oriental Studies. He said, well, you took Spanish when you were in high school. You got pretty far along with it. Here's what I recommend. Take the one class in Spanish you need to meet the language requirement. But also try Chinese out for the first semester. If you like it, you can continue. That's exactly what I did. It wasn't so much that I loved Chinese. It was that the professors in the program were really attentive to their students and cared. So, I stuck with Chinese, and Fritz Mote arranged for me to get a scholarship at the end of my junior year to go to Taiwan for a year abroad. I went. Not only was I married at that point, but also I had a young son who was three months old. The $3,000 scholarship allowed us to fly to San Francisco and get on a boat and sail to Taiwan, spend a year there learning Chinese on my own and doing research on the thesis I had to write.

Q: Now, on the Taiwan side, what did they do? Was there a structured course or did they dump you in Taiwan and it was up to you or what?

BROWN: That was the first year that Princeton had sent students to Taiwan. Two of us went. For my colleague and I, the only requirements was that we be in Taiwan, that we devote ourselves in some fashion to studying Chinese and Chinese society and, when we came back, that we would make recommendations on what future students should do. The latter was really very easy because the year that I was there, which was 1962-3, was the year that Stanford University organized the Stanford Center which was an inter-university program operated on National Taiwan University campus. My colleague and I did not have a structured program. We got introductions to some people who would help us. I tried to audit courses at National Taiwan University but found out that my language was not adequate. Therefore, I fell back on a pattern of doing tutoring with a professor and pursuing my thesis research.

Q: What was that?

BROWN: The thesis was about a man, Hu Shih, who you've probably heard of. He was a liberal intellectual in China who participated in the May 4th movement. Hu also served under Chiang Kai-shek as a government official including as ambassador to the United States. When the nationalists retreated to Taiwan, Hu was involved in setting up an intellectual journal of contemporary affairs. One of Hu's colleagues in this was a man named Lei Chen. Lei decided to go a step further and organize a political party in opposition to the nationalists. When he did that the government cracked down and threw him in jail on trumped up charges. This had happened two years before I went to Taiwan. What I tried to do was to write a thesis to understand why Hu Shih had chosen not to come to his colleague's defense. So, I spent a lot of time reading Hu's writings.

Q: Had he died by this time?

BROWN: Yes, Hu had passed away. I did interview some people who knew him. I was really green, and I did not have anyone in Taiwan who was helping me. Censorship was heavy, and the subject was one that was very difficult to discuss with Chinese. I could have gotten myself thrown out of the country.

Q: A naive kid wandering around asking about somebody who was associated with dissidents.

BROWN: So, it's probably fortunate that I spent more of my time in the library at Academia Sinica. This was only possible because of connections that the university had set up for me. I was able to go out to Academia Sinica, use their files and read everything that was in the press at the time and research the laws that were in place. It is fascinating now because Chen Shui-bian, the current President of Taiwan, has just released a study about Lei Chen's arrest. It sheds light on things that were hidden at that time.

Q: But looking at this figure, did this give you, I mean, granted you're really green on this whole thing, but did it sort of open up a slight window on to Chinese political life and all that?

BROWN: Oh, yes.

Q: How things worked and all that?

BROWN: Yes.

Q: Did you have any old mentor or something you could go to and say, "What's this all about?"

BROWN: I didn't have anyone like that when I was in Taiwan. On my return, Prof. Mote was my mentor. He worked with me on that thesis. I have a recollection that also maybe the other person who was helping was Marius Jansen, who was a Japan specialist. He has a very keen analytical mind and he helped quite a bit.

Q: How did you find living there? I mean, was this a society, what sort of society did you find this living in Taiwan at that time?

BROWN: One strong impression was the extent to which the society was still wrapped up in Chiang's goal of returning to the mainland. The visuals were something that you associate now with a communist country. Billboards and placards and statues extolling Chiang. Yet, I never had any sense that I was being followed or harassed.

Another one of the visuals was that there still were pillboxes at main intersections, creating an image that if there was ever any unrest; soldiers were going to be ready to gun down the populace. In one sense it was rather comical because the pillboxes were often painted with slogans. Everyday life was pretty good; life seemed to be improving. This was the beginning of Taiwan's economic miracle. We lived in a Japanese style house with almost no heating. Bought almost everything off the local market. I survived economically because my dad had worked out with the local representative of the American President Line for me to exchange my dollars and get local currency, the New Taiwan Dollar, at about two and a half times the official exchange rate. That's what allowed me to stretch my modest fellowship and support my family for ten months.

Q: Was there a feeling because this was not that long after the Taiwan Strait crisis and all. Was there a concern of Mainland China jumping on Taiwan or Taiwan jumping on Mainland China? Was this sort of an issue that was around?

BROWN: I will have to say that I don't recall thinking or worrying about that.

Q: Well, I mean it probably shows something. What about were you getting, was what was happening in Mainland China at all a topic?

BROWN: We would talk about it occasionally amongst American friends, but it wasn't something I spent time talking to people in Taiwan about.

Q: But this was, now do you recall any questions that came during the oral exam?

BROWN: Well I remember one. Should we recognize "Red China?" I made what I thought was a terribly persuasive case for recognizing the PRC. The examiners had two comments about the exam. Sonny, you don't know very much about the United States. You've got to study it more. It wasn't quite that brusque, but almost. The other was that I had guts trying to get into the Foreign Service by making an argument for recognizing Beijing. Yet, apparently, I'd made the case persuasively and respectfully.

Q: Well, that's interesting. You know, I think there is a whole very solid body of opinion who calls it practically we should recognized the PRC. I remember I came in the Foreign Service in '55, but I always had that, it just seemed like a lot of people over there were talking to the Soviets, why not these, they had some other problems, but just how to deal with this government.

BROWN: Under Kennedy, there were people, Roger Hilsman and others, who were advocating improving relations with Beijing. We would have gone farther at that time if the Cultural Revolution hadn't intervened, but that's a different story.

Q: I heard somebody tell the story that when Eisenhower talked to Kennedy just before the inauguration he said, "I'll give you support on a lot of things, but don't try to recognize China" I don't know if this makes sense. Kennedy was very cautious. He had won by a very small margin. So, you came in really right out of college.

BROWN: Though I was a bit older because in the Toronto education system, they have 13 years of high school and I'd done that and then I'd done the extra year in Taiwan. So, I was almost 24 when I joined the Foreign Service.

Q: Did you have any feeling that the oral exam may have pointed out that you missed something about being an American? You know, I mean American history or?

BROWN: Well, this was pointed out to me, but no, I didn't have any sense I was missing something. I was really focused on trying to understand foreign countries, particularly China and Taiwan.

Q: How did you find your language was by the time you graduated?

BROWN: When I came in I was tested I think at the 2/2+ and my first assignment was to Taipei. The Department said I didn't need language training. I was told to study on my own.

Q: Then your first assignment was to Taiwan?

BROWN: Right.

Q: As what?

BROWN: If you remember the Service in those days, there were rotational junior officer positions

Q: Yes.

BROWN: My first six months was in the economic section. I was the assistant commercial officer working for a wonderful avuncular man named Ollie Bongard, the Commercial Counselor. I guess my greatest accomplishment at that time was to launch a Chinese language commercial newsletter working with the Chinese on the stuff at the embassy. So, I was really digging into that subject matter. It was a great deal of fun finding out how one prints with a Chinese typewriter, interviewing people about how they liked the newsletter. It was mimeographed, a very simple production. Then I did a stint, which was supposed to be six months, but ended up being nine or ten, in the consular section wrestling with the question of student visas. Dick Hart, the section chief, was another mentor who took me under his wing.

Q: What was sort of the attitude of dealing with at that particular point, anybody who got a degree and came to the United States as a student would probably dig in. Now, it's quite a different matter. There's much more backwards and forwards.

BROWN: We were having maybe 5% or 10% of students come back when their education was finished. It was not a very satisfactory situation.

Q: What about, first of all, who was the ambassador?

BROWN: At the beginning, it was Adm. Wright. I recall he left soon after my arrival.

Q: I'm just looking in the, Wright, Gerald Wright, yes. He was an admiral.

BROWN: What were his years?

Q: Gerald Wright was there from '63 to '65.

BROWN: Okay. I arrived in '65 and then there was a gap and I think the next man was Kirk.

Q: No, Walter McConaughy.

BROWN: Walter McConaughy. Anyway, there was a long gap. My current colleague, Ralph Clough, was the DCM and charge then.

Q: What was sort of the attitude, I mean, you're the junior officer there and it always ends up I gather because of my experience, a clique of junior officers, you know, who sit around and talk over tea or beer or whatever it is. What was the attitude towards Chiang in Taiwan in those days?

BROWN: Disrespectful I would say. He wasn't in senility at this point, but he was in declining health and the whole idea that he was going to lead them back to the mainland was obviously a charade. The focus of people's attention then was Chiang Ching-kuo. Given his mixed background, what was he likely to be? It was clear that he was going to take over from his father. I'm trying to remember, in 1965 or '66, Ching-kuo was, I think, Vice Minister of Defense.

Q: He had also come out of the sort of the enforcement side.

BROWN: Absolutely. He had a very dark image at that point.

Q: Did you get any feel for being a China hand at this point? Were there China hands around and were you sort of?

BROWN: Well, I certainly thought I was part of a group of people who had made a commitment to studying and knowing about China, yes.

Q: How about studying on the side?

BROWN: I worked at it pretty hard. I guess one of the highlights of my time there was joining the Junior Chamber of Commerce. I spent a lot of time with them and used them as a network to get to know people around the island. The Jaycees was a very well developed organization, and it was entirely in the hands of Chinese. There were a few foreigners in an organization of several hundred members on the island. There were three or four foreigners and one of my colleagues and I from the embassy were amongst those.

Q: Who was the colleague?

BROWN: Bob Littell. The Jaycees was a tremendous eye into Taiwan society. It allowed me to use my Chinese, as everything was done in Chinese. It was a tremendous help to my language, but it also was a window into what was taking place amongst younger upcoming people on the island. I had an opportunity to see an organization that had a lot of both mainlanders and Taiwanese in it. They were running for elections within this organization to get chosen for the leadership positions and how did they go about doing it. How did the networks that they developed work? To what extent were people reaching across the ethnic lines? This was still a period when Taiwan was very much split, not in terms of political organization because there weren't any opposition parties, but in terms of ethnic background. There was still a great deal of hostility towards the mainlanders.

Q: As you, well, even back to the time when you were a student there, this split, did you find that one tended to sort of get absorbed into the mainland thing at first or was there, could you bridge this gap?

BROWN: While a student, I did not get to know many young Chinese. My friends were other Americans and my contacts were older people at Academia Sinica and Taiwan University. I met some students, but not many. It shows the things I missed. I should have been actively involved with students, but I wasn't. I was young and much more bookish. Back in Taiwan a second time, I was older more mature and operating in an environment where people were engrossed in local politics. As I said, the Jaycees were a tremendous window for a young person like myself to take advantage of. I was 25, 26 and these people tended to be in their late '30s and '40s, but nevertheless I made a lot of friendships, some of which are still alive today.

Q: Well, did you find a curiosity on the part of the people in Taiwan from the professional class about who you were, where you were coming from and all that?

BROWN: Yes.

Q: What about at the embassy was the embassy absorbed by the mainlanders or was sort of the handwriting on the wall for everyone that you know, eventually the Taiwanese are going to take over and we better get ourselves positioned correctly?

BROWN: The mainlanders dominated government and many of ones contacts were with the bureaucracy. There was at that time an officer in the political section whose job it was to follow the opposition and that was Jay Taylor. He was one of four or five people in the political section. Everybody else was focused on working with either the Nationalist party or the government apparatus or the military, all of which at that time were dominated by mainlanders. There was just one person really in the whole embassy whose job it was to get to know the opposition, and he had to operate carefully. There were prominent opposition figures at that time. One that was talked about a great deal was Henry Kao, who had been elected mayor of Taipei City.

Q: Was the KMT or the nationalist government coming down heavily or were there any opposition?

BROWN: I won't say there was nothing, but there was not a great deal of opposition activity in this period. It was too dangerous. I don't know this so much from my recollections from that time, as from the study I have kept up since. I teach a course now on Taiwan. You had the Lei Chen case in 1960 as I said and then there was the arrest of Peng Ming-min and two students who were with him in late 1964. He was a professor at the National Taiwan University who was arrested just before my time at the Embassy. His case played out during my time. I can't remember any other serious arrests taking place during my tenure. It wasn't until the '70s that you began to have a resurgence of active opposition activity. What you had in my time there as I've said were some Taiwanese who would run in local elections against the KMT and occasionally win.

Q: Were the Taiwanese moving into the coming from the chamber of commerce, were they moving into the commercial side?

BROWN: Oh, absolutely. You could see this. Particularly outside Taipei, it was almost, the Jaycee organization was almost entirely Taiwanese outside of Taipei.

Q: Looking sort of back on this, but at the time is there such a thing as a Taiwanese, people from the island of Taiwan a way of operating that may be different from the mainlanders?

BROWN: Culturally there was little difference. I was quite impressed how strongly Chinese Taiwanese society was. If you go there today, there is a resurgence of interest in Taiwan culture, which hadn't really started at that time. It really began in the '70s. Now Taiwanese nationalists have a very clear concept of how their society is different from other Chinese societies. This is what social science calls an "imagined community." They draw on their past to suit political needs, but in terms of why are Taiwan businessmen so successful on the mainland in their investments, it is in part because they know how to operate in a Chinese environment. They know the language, they know the culture, they know how people act.

Q: When did the Cultural Revolution start?

BROWN: 1966. It was just starting as I left to go on to Vietnam.

Q: Was there any view that the Peoples' Republic was going to be something with whom we could do business or did you find with you and your colleagues did you feel that oh, when is that shoe going to drop?

BROWN: Yes, my recollection is that we talked about this a lot and that many of us thought something ought to be done to open contacts with Beijing. But we were just junior officers in the embassy, and in those days junior officers weren't let in on issues such as these that were handled by the Ambassador.

Q: What about, with the chamber of commerce or even as a consular officer and all, did you have much dealing with the bureaucracy at all?

BROWN: Yes, some. After my consular time was up I was transferred to the administrative section. There I got an unusual task to catalogue all the Chinese employees, foreign nationals contractors, residence staffs etc. This wasn't a counter intelligence issue, just a simple question of who was working for us, doing what in what capacity. The study turned up a surprising number of people employed officially to handle private work for senior officers. I endeared myself to my colleagues asking why taxpayer money was being used to hire gardeners to cut the lawns of all the officers in the political and administrative sections and why is it that the administrative counselor had more of these services? I was getting in trouble. So, I was moved out of that section pretty quickly.

Q: When did you finish up?

BROWN: I had hoped that my last rotation would be to the USIS office in southern Taiwan. I had traveled around the island and visited the south several times. There was a staffing gap in the USIS office in Tainan, the cultural center in the southern part of Taiwan. So, I made a pitch for not going to the political section, but spending my last six months as the branch public affairs officer in Tainan. I was told no; you should go to the political section. I think the Embassy was afraid that I was too green and too prone to do things on my own. So, it was safer to have me in the political section. I did that for about two months and then there was an appeal for people to go to Vietnam. I volunteered.

Q: Had Vietnam been a subject of conversation or discussion the island?

BROWN: Yes, but how? Here my memory fails me.

Q: What sort of was the motivation?

BROWN: Vietnam was becoming controversial. I thought it would be good to go where the action was. Was I for the war, was I against the war, was I going down there to find out what the truth was, you know.

Q: Well, as I look upon it my motivation for volunteering there in '68 or '69 was kind of this is where the action was and I wanted to see it. A sense of a little adventure and this was sort of the focus of all; I wanted to take a look at it.

BROWN: Was there an element that it would look better to volunteer rather than just being ordered to go there? There may have been something in that because just everybody was going one way or another.

Q: When you arrived there in '66, what was the situation in South Vietnam?

BROWN: The war was not going well, and the Americans were getting more and more heavily involved in it, not just in a military sense, but in every aspect of Vietnamese life. I got assigned to the provincial reporting unit. I came with Chinese and there was a Chinese affairs officer position in the embassy, but that slot was filled. As I did not know Vietnamese, I was assigned to cover the II Corps highlands area where you could do more with French than elsewhere. As I had studied French in Canada years earlier, the Embassy arranged brush-up classes to bring my language up to the 2+ level. The II Corps highlands was where the Montagnards lived.

Q: Let's talk about. Who were the Montagnards and what was the situation there?

BROWN: The Montagnards are aboriginal people. The name Montagnards was given to them by the French because they lived in the highlands along the western border with Laos and Cambodia. No one knew exactly how many there were, perhaps one million, divided into any number of tribes. The Vietnamese traditionally despised them. The French had had a policy of keeping the ethnic Vietnamese out of the highlands. This was not a magnanimous policy but one designed to reserve the area for coffee and tea plantations run by French planters. Since the French government was gone by then, there was a Vietnamese administrative structure in the towns and some Vietnamese and ethnic Chinese merchants. But the bulk of the population in this highland area was Montagnards. In the war, they were caught between the Republic of Vietnam with the U.S. on one side and the Viet Cong on the other side. Both sides were trying to recruit Montagnards because they were tough fighters who knew the terrain. The Montagnard economy and way of life were of course being disrupted by the war. Their economy was slash and burn agriculture.

While we're on Montagnards, let me mention one highlight of my work with them. In 1967 National Geographic did an article on the Montagnards. I helped the reporter and was surprised to find myself quoted in the lead paragraph of the piece. Nothing profound, just a quote about the Montagnards being caught between the government and the Viet Cong with their way of life in jeopardy.

The U.S. government goal was to persuade the Vietnamese government to abandon their cultural prejudices and adopt an enlightened policy that would attract the Montagnards to support the South Vietnamese government. That was a large part of what the embassy was trying to do in the highlands. There was a political movement among the Montagnards called by the French acronym, FULRO, for the United Front for the Liberation of the Oppressed Races. These were Montagnards who were trying to preserve their own culture and achieve autonomy from both the Viet Cong and the government. So, much of what we tried to do in that period was to convince the Vietnamese to be sensible enough that you could then encourage this FULRO movement to cooperate with the government against the North Vietnamese. It was a lot of fun for a young guy.

Q: How about the regular army units? Did you find this a different breed of cat or something?

BROWN: Well, I didn't have much to do with the GIs. My contacts tended to be with the Intel people and occasionally with the senior officers. We had different jobs. The intel people were focused on the Viet Cong units. My attention was on what's going on amongst the populations in these areas and what were their attitudes. What were their attitudes about the prospects for the war? What were their attitudes about the South Vietnamese government? Despite the general I mentioned before, generally, I found what I thought were very intelligent men leading our military. There was a General Lee, I can't remember what position he was in, but I remember him wanting to talk to me about the Cultural Revolution in China and what this would mean for the prosecution of the war. In fact at one point, he sent word he wanted me to come and brief him. I was flattered.

Q: Today is the 11th of February 2003. 1968, what caused you to go after Japanese training?

BROWN: I was a China hand.

Q: Yes?

BROWN: In those days we didn't have relations with China. Having been in Taiwan in a junior officer slot and in Vietnam, which was a very unique experience, I wanted to do something in normal diplomacy. You couldn't do that in Hong Kong. That was where you would go if you wanted to report on Mainland China from the outside. I'd been in Taipei so I decided do something different by going to Japan where the U.S. had diplomatic relations and where I could be in an embassy and gain experience in normal diplomatic work.

Q: Well, this raises a question. I've thought about this. We've had our China hands, but it became a very sort of a distant type of diplomacy. I mean essentially they were observing another country not having real diplomatic relations. I mean you had it with Taiwan, but other than that it was sort of like calling themselves political officers, but essentially everybody was an INR officer.

BROWN: That's exactly it. If you went to Hong Kong you were reading the press, reading interview reports of refugees, trying to pick up local newspapers from around China and read them and read between the lines so to speak to figure out what was going on in China. It was more of an intelligence analyst's job and I wanted to practice diplomacy.

Q: Did you have any problem you know with your China background and all getting yourself into the Japanese orbit?

BROWN: No, at that time when you'd done your service in Vietnam, the personnel system was trying their best to satisfy your interests. So, when I said I wanted to take Japanese language training, the request seemed to have been granted quite easily.

Q: Well, from '70 to when did you?

BROWN: I spent three more years in Japan from the summer of '70 to the summer of '73 in Tokyo. All the time in what was called the external unit of the Political Section and my principal beat was to follow Japanese policy in Asia. The biggest part of that was Japan's relationship with China.

Q: Yes, of course an interesting time, too. Before we get to that, how would you describe Japanese American relations in 1970?

BROWN: They were reasonably good. We had been through the period of demonstrations against the U.S. Japan security treaty. That was in the past. We were in the process of, I wasn't involved in this, but we were in the process of negotiating what we called the reversion of Okinawa to Japanese sovereignty and of course when that was accomplished in 1972 that was a hugely symbolic event representing America's respect for Japan and the fact that we were, you know, returning the territory to them. Relations were reasonably good. One bad aspect, that again I was not personally involved in, was the controversy over textile exports from Japan to the United States. Later, there were more serious problems caused by the so-called Nixon shocks. The first of those being over Kissinger's secret trip to China and the second one being the U.S. decision to go off the gold standard. Both of these steps were taken without prior consultation with a country that was deeply affected by the decision and a close ally to the United States.

Q: Was it you know, somebody trying to deal with the Japanese government. Was there kind of a I don't want to sound fictitious, a Japanese person you could talk to or if you wanted to deal with the Japanese government you found yourself sharing with a whole bunch of people. In other words you couldn't go up to the prime minister and say, look we're going to be recognizing China, but don't tell anyone?

BROWN: Well, first dealing with the Japanese government was quite favorable. Although I was a junior officer, my counterparts were officials with considerable influence on policy. The Foreign Ministry did control Japanese foreign policy. Within the Foreign Ministry, responsibility was delegated downward on most issues rather remarkably. An office director was tasked to come up with policy ideas and to lead a process of consultation within the Japanese government. His boss, the assistant secretary level person was then responsible for selling these policy ideas to the upper levels of the bureaucracy. The ministry's leadership worked hand in glove with the governing Liberal Democratic Party and would get the LDP's blessing, which was normally pro forma. The LDP controlled the Diet, so there wasn't any problem at that level. If we were able to work things out with the ministry at the level at which I was dealing, things went very smoothly. Now, needless to say when you run into a crisis in the relationship as we did when Kissinger's secret trip was revealed things got escalated way up the line and it was the ambassador who was dealing directly with the minister and political leadership.

Q: What about with China? You know, prior to the Kissinger thing because Kissinger visit was when?

BROWN: It was in August of 1971.

Q: Yes. So, what was the state that we were observing of Japanese Chinese relations?

BROWN: Our policies were quite consistent with each other in the sense that neither of us had relations with Beijing and both governments were in the process of thinking about how to change that and modifying their policies in modest ways. Both governments were in sync in terms of supporting the Republic of China in the UN. The big difference was that the Japanese had a substantial economic relationship with China and the U.S. did not. We still had an embargo on trade with China, though U.S. had already been going through a process of small steps with China to signal that we were open to improving relations. Then the big break came when China invited the U.S. ping pong team.

Q: That was the famous ping pong diplomacy.

BROWN: Right. I didn't get involved in it personally because my boss here was also a China hand, Bill Cunningham and he jumped on that as soon as he heard that the news of the invitation. The ping pong team actually transited through Tokyo on the way to China. Bill helped facilitate that and went out to the airport and saw them.

Q: What was the Japanese economic relationship with China?

BROWN: It was not an aid relationship, but a purely commercial one, and it was done under the rubric of a trade agreement between a Japanese trading association rather than the government and the China Council for the Promotion of International Trade, a government front group handling Beijing's trade with the West. It was a pretty substantial relationship. For Japan, which was promoting itself as a trading nation, being able to sell everywhere was important. The U.S. didn't really have a problem with this Japanese trade because we too were moving away from a strict embargo on trade with China.

Q: Were you in a way being a China hand?

BROWN: Yes, we followed Japanese ties with China closely. I was not an intelligence officer but I read all open source information about China in Japan and reported it. I was supposed to maintain contact with the Japanese China watchers who met Chinese coming through Japan. There were academics whose knowledge and opinions about China we reported. But the main work was maintaining very close coordination with the Japanese Foreign Ministry. We exchanged information on what they were doing on what our policy was, the steps we were taking. There were annual consultations between the Office of Asian Communist Affairs, the China desk at the State Department and the Ministry and between their policy planning staff and our policy planning staff. We were in bed with each other. That's what made the absence of prior consultation about Kissinger's visit to China in 1971 such a shock.

The Japanese government was under a certain amount of pressure to build upon the economic relationship and to begin to improve relations with China. Some European countries were moving ahead to recognize China in the early 1970s. Out of deference to the U.S., the Japanese government was resisting the domestic pressures on it in order to stay in sync with the U.S. The State Department too was trying to keep our two countries on the same wave length. Then suddenly without a word of forewarning the U.S. takes a huge step to open up its relationship with Beijing. The government and the foreign ministry in particular felt that their confidence and support for the U.S. had been betrayed. There was a lot of bitterness in certain parts of the Japanese Foreign Ministry.

BROWN: Well, you read about it in the news. I can't remember whether we saw Nixon's announcement on TV or not. We saw it replayed. Now, as it turned out this had been very closely held and even Secretary of State Rogers hadn't been told that Kissinger was making this trip to China. We in the embassy were taken by surprise, but when we learned the extent to which other people were equally in the dark, we didn't feel quite so bad ourselves. However, we still had to deal with the Japanese. I can remember going over there and having an extremely prickly conversation with Hiroshi Hashimoto who was then the head of the Office of Chinese Affairs. He was an older man and had spent a good part of his post war life involved in China. As a young man had been a soldier in the Japanese army at the very end of the Second World War if my recollection is right, he was in the air force. His reaction was very nationalistic. Over drinks he said this was the end of Japan's trusting the U.S. The relationship with the United States was going to change and Japan would have to start making its own policy thinking about its national interest. That was not the typical reaction. The typical reaction was not nearly so nationalistic and pained as he was. Yet it had been his job to make sure that his government knew exactly what the United States was doing on the China policy and he felt he had been betrayed.

Q: How did you respond?

BROWN: There is no response. There isn't a good response, but we said that we've got to move on from this. The next order of business between us was the annual fight over Chinese representation in the United Nations. This was something on which the Japanese and American governments had collaborated to an extraordinary degree on a daily basis exchanging intelligence about what was going on every capital in the world, about the demarches that were being made, divvying up responsibility on who could do a better job in persuading various capitals to support our common cause.

Q: I know the Americans had sort of assumed the Japanese had expended tremendous what you might call political capital in these fights over who was going to represent China in the United Nations because this was, every little capital, like you say, Togo or something like that and all of a sudden I can't remember what we did, what did we do, fudge it or something for the next time around?

BROWN: Well, there was a general presumption that this traumatic change in U.S. dealings with China was going to radically undermine the efforts to sustain Taiwan's place in the U.N. Nevertheless, the instructions that came out were to fight the good fight. The U.S. went to Taiwan and said the only way that there's going to be a hope of winning would be to go for dual representation, that is an approach which would create the possibility for both Taipei and Beijing to have a seat, even if Beijing. Washington tried to persuade Taipei that if we could sell this it was certain that the Chinese would reject it and that Taipei in the end would remain in the U.N. However, Chiang Kai-shek but was very deeply committed to the idea that the Republic of China was the sole legal government of all China and he was not going to give on that. So, what resulted was that Taipei said it opposed dual recognition but would not object to the U.S. pursuing the idea at the U.N. So on that understanding, the Japanese and American governments again together tried to sell this. However, after Nixon's announcement, many governments were rethinking their China policies because of what the United States had done. In the end we lost the vote in the United Nations and the Republic of China walked out. Our representative to the UN at the time was George Bush and he got up and he said that it is a reasonable thing for China to be in the United Nations, but it's unfair the way this came about because the principal of universality is important. A founding member has now been thrown out which sets a horrible precedent. I'm sure Kissinger probably didn't care at all that that had happened.

Q: Prior to this in talking around with both your colleagues in the embassy, but also, and then it carried over to talking to the Japanese in informal conversations. You know, when I came into the Foreign Service it seemed to me to be perfectly reasonable that eventually we're going to have to recognize China. I mean this was not, to say the least.

BROWN: You've got to live with the reality.

Q: Yes and I think most of my colleagues did and in talking around this was not one of these things that it wasn't staying gee, communism is a good idea or anything like that, it was just you know, we've got other big countries and they're just going to have to come around. Were the Japanese talking this way, too or did you avoid the conversation?

BROWN: No, before Nixon's announcement, I often talked with Japanese colleagues informally about how both our countries should be moving together to open relations with China. After Kissinger trip had been announced and knowing that Nixon himself was going to China in the following year, a process of political change was unleashed in Japan and within a year and a half Tokyo had worked out its deals and recognized China and devised a formula for maintaining an unofficial relationship with Taiwan which has worked for the Japanese pretty well and which in fact the United States more or less copied when we took the step in 1978.

Q: Well, what was the Japanese view of what was happening in China? In the first place, what was happening in China internally '71 or so?

BROWN: China was coming out of the Cultural Revolution period, the worst of it was over, central control had been reestablished throughout the country and things were beginning to look up. That was part of the backdrop in which the Chinese representation fight was taking place. It wasn't a China that was obviously in chaos and psychologically at war with the world that we were dealing with at the UN. It was a China that was beginning to come out of those policies and get back into more normal relations with the rest of the world.

Q: Did the Japanese in the press and all, did the Japanese press play much of a role in determining policy?

BROWN: First of all you had a variety of opinion in the Japanese press, from the liberal leaning socialists to the conservative Liberal Democrats (LDP) on the right. You had some who were strongly committed to maintaining the substance of the relationship with Taiwan and others including Tanaka who favored moving ahead and normalizing relations with China. You had a group within in the LDP that had traditionally had close contacts with people in China and were promoting normalization and you had people in the LDP who were very close to Taipei. So, there was a debate going on. When the U.S. made its move it significantly shifted its debate so that it was quite clear that Tanaka was going to normalize relations with China.

Q: Was there any understanding on the part of your contacts particularly at the foreign ministry and all about understanding why in a way that you were going to have this shock because this was a shock in the United States, too and it was mainly because had you announced this or done something you would have allowed the right wing in the United States to get cranked. You know, it's a political reality in every country that you've got when you have to do things, sometimes you have to do things suddenly and make them a sort of fait accompli otherwise you allow the forces that are opposed to it to build up enough pressure so that you can't do the thing. It sounds like Japan had the same forces I guess every country's got these forces?

BROWN: I think that was part of Nixon's calculation that, if he was going to make this kind of radical change, he needed to do it dramatically in order to outmaneuver the conservatives who would try and block such a policy change. You didn't have the same process in Japan. Japan's decision making is different. They engage seemingly endless debates to build a consensus. So, it was very clear a year before they recognized that this was where it was going to end. You could see these debates going on in the press, Japanese politicians positioning themselves in the media and partly through contacts with the foreign ministry. It was just a question of what the terms would be and the nature of the deal that would be made concerning their relations with Taiwan. Tanaka had to come up with a deal that was satisfactory to the wing of the Liberal Democratic Party, which had close ties with Taiwan.

Q: Yes, there's a time to just keep your mouth shut and let that take care of it. Did you see any effect as far of the very strong nationalist Chinese supporters in the United States? You know, it used to be the China lobby or whatever you want to call it, you know, the, like it used to be so strong in the right wing of the United States trying to affect Japanese dealing with Taiwan for example?

BROWN: No, I didn't see any of that.

Q: I guess by that time that element in American political life wasn't very strong.

BROWN: Well, I think Nixon had judged correctly that he could sell the opening to China to conservatives as an effective anti-Soviet maneuver. In fact, he was correct. The country did come around without much anguish to support the steps he took at the time. When you get to 1978 with Carter normalizing, that's a different period than in 1971-72. I should go back to how we eventually got over the shock with the Japanese. I would say we got over it because many Japanese, despite their initial reactions, came to appreciate that Kissinger and Nixon were right that the only way to make such a change was through a dramatic move and understood that their initiative was moving in what the Japanese considered the right direction. Therefore they came to live with it and see it as something that wasn't contrary to Japanese interests even though it had been done in a way that was very abrasive and regrettable.

Q: This of course is not unknown in other places, including Capitol Hill. I've interviewed Marshall Green who was the Assistant Secretary for the Far East and he described how he'd made some sort of thing saying where Kissinger supposedly had an upset stomach or something like that. He said, oh, hell, he's probably out talking to the Chinese or something like that. As soon as he started thinking about he made everybody sit and swear not to even mention that remark because that's exactly what could happen.

BROWN: Yes.

Q: In a way you think it has to probably have to be done that way. Always there was a predilection on the part of Kissinger and of Nixon to do it their own way and to get credit.

BROWN: Yes.

Q: How did you find sort of let's say before because that would have been when things were normal, before the opening to China, dealing with the foreign ministry?

BROWN: It was a very good relationship; personally we got a lot of information. We shared a lot of information. It was a close relationship and it still is.

Q: Did the Japanese have good information on China? I would imagine they would.

BROWN: They had all sorts of sources because of the economic relationship and people traveling back and forth and conversations that would take place with Chinese leaders when one or another delegation went to Beijing. Did anyone have real access to the countryside and what was going on in China? No, but we were all trying to share the information that we had. They did their intelligence reports and gave copies to us. We got material from INR, not so much from the CIA because the station had its own relationship with the Cabinet Research Office. So, many analytical reports were being sent back and forth.

Q: Did you all have a feel for the tragedy of the Cultural Revolution at that time?

BROWN: I don't know. You certainly were aware of how it had disrupted China, but you didn't really understand then its full impact, as I recall.

Q: Did you know, one of the things I'm struck about people who got involved in that first opening to China. I was just talking yesterday with Winston Lord. I did a very long interview with him and the sort of the thrill of seeing Mao Zedong and all that, but I mean in a way it's almost although, nobody was really making note that this guy at least in my estimation was a real monster. The things he did to his country are just beyond belief. Was this at all coming out at this particular time you were dealing with it?

BROWN: We had the impression of him as a megalomaniac who was very far long in his years and was just losing it a little bit.

Q: Was the feeling that by the Japanese that China was a danger as far as an expansive country or not?

BROWN: No. That was their view at that time. There wasn't a feeling of hostility. In general, Japanese saw China as a neighboring country with which they ought to have a normal relationship. It was out of deference to the United States that Japan did not normalize sooner. In that period, China was not in the era of reform and growth. There was not a sense that China was what we'd call today a rising power that might be a threat.

Q: What about looking at China I mean you had the French and British embassies and the Yugoslav embassy all of which had relations with China. Were you getting anything from them?

BROWN: We didn't get it in Tokyo, but I'm sure the U.S. government was getting it elsewhere.

Q: This wasn't part of your beat?

BROWN: No. We met with other embassies and talked about things from time to time and I particularly would spend a lot of time talking to people in the British Embassy and the Australian Embassy who were following developments in the evolution of Japan's China policy the same way I was to try to trade notes and exchange analysis. I didn't have much to do with the Taiwan Embassy, though my recollection on this is not clear.

Q: After the Nixon visit, well, I mean the Kissinger visit first, as far as dealing I mean your job was it mainly assuaging hurt feelings. I mean were there developments or were the Japanese in a way turned loose as far as China was concerned?

BROWN: Yes. They felt they freed to do what was in their best interests. They would keep us informed. My recollection is that I had to work harder to find things out and double check sources. It wasn't quite as open as it had been in the past. It was more a job of piecing information together to understand what was going on in the political process in Tokyo.

Q: Well, I imagine the Japanese press must have gone wild, not just against us, but the whole idea of okay, now we can really report on China and you know, I mean, in that particular relationship. Things must have been sort of fast and loose.

BROWN: My memory is failing me. I can't remember whether there was a big rush of Japanese reporters to go into China at the time. I can't remember which papers had those kinds of relationships whether that was changing or not. My recollection is that the Chinese were quite skillful at cultivating favorites amongst the Japanese press and freezing out those whose opinions they didn't like.

Q: Dick Snyder was my ambassador in Korea when I was there. Did you, for you did you feel that you had finally entered the world of real diplomacy and all?

BROWN: I certainly did. Except for the China issue, not a great deal was happening, but Japan was slowly moving towards what was a very important decision which was to ratify the Nuclear Non-proliferation Treaty. Another major issue that I had to follow was attitudes within Japan on nuclear weapons issues. What was the Japanese government doing in terms of eventually ratifying the NPT? What were political and public views on ratification?

Q: But it's interesting, you know, observing close hand Japanese diplomacy. One doesn't see the Japanese hand in a lot of those things. I mean when you think about you know, as we have today, you think about France for example, its fingerprints were all over everything, but what about Japan? Was there a style of diplomacy that you saw?

BROWN: At that point in time, Japan had not begun to think about having an independent diplomacy. They were still very much in the mode of being with the U.S. I think the shock on China was one of the things that began to prod them in the direction of saying well, you know, the war has been over for almost 30 years now. It's time for Japan to start having its own policies. The amazing thing is that we're now into the 21st Century and this sort of debate about whether Japan is going to have an independent policy from the United States still goes on. It's advanced and things have affected it over time, but it's been a very slow process in coming.

Q: Did you find the LDP had any particular cast as far as foreign affairs as opposed to I guess it would be the left wing?

BROWN: Yes. There was the Japanese Socialist Party, which was still opposed to the U.S.-Japan Security Treaty. They were in favor of moving rapidly ahead to recognize China, dumping Taiwan. They wanted to normalize relations with North Korea rapidly. That was part of the political scene, but the JSP was always a minority, and the real action was what was going on in the bureaucracy and within the LDP. Where's opinion within the LDP shifted at any given time? That's what you had to take into account.

Q: Well, say in the foreign ministry was the foreign ministry responsive to the mood of the LDP or did the foreign ministry kind of do its thing?

BROWN: The Foreign Ministry had a very strong sense, the ethic of the Japanese bureaucracy, that they were the guardians of the national interest. The ministry knew what was happening internationally. It understood the sophistication and the complexities of international relations. Therefore, it was their job to make sure that Japan stays on the right course. That meant that the Foreign Ministry had to guide the LDP to do what's right for Japan. As I said, they didn't have to worry about the other parties because the LDP commanded a majority in the Diet. It was just a matter of infiltrating sensible ideas into the LDP. That was done a lot at these evening entertainment parties that went on endlessly and at various levels. The office directors, who were the people I was dealing with, would go off in the evening for dinners and drinking with junior LDP politicians and people in the business community who had interests in China policy. Policy was worked out behind the scene. If a Japanese bureaucrat was doing his job well he was able to come up with the ideas, to percolate them up through his own system. Then the system at the senior levels would do this quiet liaison with people in the LDP and the LDP itself was a very hierarchical and structured organization. It was a bottom up type of decision-making. It wasn't the LDP driving policy; it was the mid levels of the bureaucracy driving it.

Q: MITI. Yes. I've always heard that was a very powerful thing, but at this particular time of '70 to '73, how did MITI fit into the foreign relations side?

BROWN: I wasn't the principal officer dealing with MITI then. It was the people on the economic side that had those relationships. The way I saw it was in the sense that MITI was very much involved in promoting Japanese exports and that meant in addition to selling to the U.S. and Europe, selling to China and Southeast Asia. They were very much involved in the economic aspects of relations with China. They were pushing to open things up so that Japan could export more. But that was not what was driving Japanese policy. The Foreign ministry was more important.

Q: But that was administrative, but of course that's sort of the guts.

BROWN: Well, yes, if you're running an aid program, which Japan was not doing at that time in China but was doing everywhere in Southeast Asia, then what the Ministry of Finance thought the aid levels ought to be and how they fit into the budget and all that was high policy.

Q: Did you with the opening to China; were you conflicted about being a China hand, Japanese hand and all? I mean all of a sudden this is a new ball game.

BROWN: I thought it was a great advantage to know something about Japan. I was able to go back and work in Chinese affairs, but I wasn't a person who was only a China hand as some others were. I would say the quintessential archetype of the China hand was Dick Williams who was my last CG in Hong Kong. He had had five overseas assignments during his 30 plus years in the Foreign Service. Four of them to Hong Kong and one to Guangzhou. Those are the only places that he had served overseas. I mean he worked on other things back in Washington, but that wasn't the career track I was on. I was very happy being able to go from China to something else and then back to China and then do something else and so forth.

ROBERT LYLE BROWN
Economic Counselor
Taipei, Taiwan (1965-1968)

Robert Lyle Brown entered the Foreign Service in 1944. His career included positions in Morocco, Japan, Taiwan, and Washington, DC. Mr. Brown was interviewed by Charles S. Kennedy in 1990.

Q: What was the situation in Taipei when you got there in 1965?

BROWN: The Section was in a viable but marginal situation. It was obvious that the AID program should come to an end. Nearly everyone was fighting it, hook line, and sinker. When I arrived, I went back to what I learned about science and technology and its development. Based on the papers I had written, I developed a concept of whole series of bridges which involved, inter alia, science, technology, commerce, sister city-to-city and industry-to-industry programs. I wanted Americans to come out to see Taipei. I wanted the Taiwanese to pass laws which would encourage investments, which would entice Americans to the island. Little by little--it didn't take that long--they changed. I became the acting AID director because we finished the program for all intense and purposes. Some of my colleagues approached me in subsequent years to apologize because many were convinced that I was off my rocker when I made some of my projections. They said that I saw matters much more clearly then they had. I am not saying that to complement myself, but it was an insight that I had based on my education and experiences in Belgium, Japan and other places.

Q: Let me ask about the fight with AID. Did you have a lot of opposition and how did you manage the program's demise?

BROWN: There was a set of fortuitous circumstances. First of all, it was self-evident that Taiwan's economy was improving, that it was becoming viable. It was also self-evident that the excessive dependency was no longer necessary. It was also becoming obvious that Chiang Kai-shek was no longer a viable threat to the mainland. Congress was no longer as self-possessive about Chiang, although Walter Judd and company were still around. New Congressmen were on the scene who were not as obsessive about China as some of their elders and predecessors. The American AID officials there knew the circumstances; it was pretty self-evident. Since they had been successful, good assignments could be anticipated for them. But it took a political decision by the Ambassador. We convinced the Chinese that the cessation of assistance would be to their advantage. They didn't protest as vehemently as they might have five or ten years earlier. I think therefore it was easier to terminate the Taiwan aid program than it had been in Belgium years earlier. The Taiwan program went out nicely.

Q: Who was the Ambassador?

BROWN: Walter McConaughy. He eventually supported me because I had to deal with AID which unto itself was difficult. I also had to watch how the Military Assistance Advisory Group (MAAG) was operating. They were providing training and material to the Chinese military. As this was a resource coming into the country, the Ambassador decided that I was the Embassy's officer for MAAG issues. The Political section didn't like the job because it was sticky wicket, argumentative, full of details, dealing with pushy generals, etc. I had of course dealt with similar issues before and I didn't find it all that challenging. In short I did not come with any significant biases. So I took on the MAAG responsibility. One day, the Ambassador was called to see Chiang Kai-shek who wanted to thank him for the assistance that a member of the Embassy staff by the name of Robert Brown had rendered. Chiang said that he had heard the name from all of his colleagues and friends; he had been told that Brown was working very hard for the Ambassador and the US and Taiwan. Chiang said that he would like it very much if the Ambassador would tell Brown that the President greatly appreciated Brown's efforts. The Ambassador subsequently called a country team meeting that same day and related the story. He was smiling like a cat that had just eaten three mice. He was pleased. Because we had terminated the assistance program it was all the more important. We were under fair weather both politically and economically.

I should also mention that we got the President's Science Advisor to come to Taiwan. The AID representative was still there. He and the Ambassador and the DCM went to the meeting with Chiang Kai-shek. I was the note taker as the lowest ranking man in the room. Chiang went around the room asking people what they thought. He turned to me before many others had spoken and he asked for my opinion. I told him that was very difficult. Taiwan had the sun, the water and the earth--that was a given. The sun and the water had been very gracious; the earth was limited and there are many people. Taiwan had made a great and meaningful step when it distributed land to the farmers; that intensive farming on Taiwan was an example for the world. It appeared that with the development of industry, there would be new options for his economy which could compete with the Japanese. But I thought more could be done for the people. That was interpreted as a political commentary. I mentioned that the majority of his people were under twenty-one and I suggested that they needed more education--they were only going through the sixth grade. I said that these young people were a resource that must be taken advantage of because they were good, hard working people; now was the time to give them more compulsory education. Within one year, compulsory education was established through eighth grade. It was one of the rare occasions when I had tears in my eyes for a positive contribution. Hundreds of thousands of students went to school; schools were built; teachers found and it worked.

ARTHUR W. HUMMEL, JR.
Deputy Chief of Mission
Taipei, Taiwan (1965-1968)

Ambassador Arthur W. Hummel, Jr. was born to American parents in China in 1920. He received his master's degree from the University of Chicago. His career with USIS included assignments in Hong Kong, Japan, Burma, and Taiwan. He served as the ambassador to Burma, Ethiopia, and Pakistan. Ambassador Hummel was interviewed by Dorothy Robins-Mowry on July 13, 1989.

Q: You were then in the States until 1965. Did you go back overseas?

HUMMEL: In '65, I went overseas. It was another State Department job. I was Deputy Chief of Mission, DCM, in Taiwan. That was a great time because one Ambassador, Admiral Wright, had already left. I took over from the previous DCM, Ralph Clough. Walter McConaughy was supposed to come immediately. We had already had an agrément from the Chinese government for him.

Then the Indo-Pak War broke out and Walter McConaughy was Ambassador to Pakistan and he was stuck in Pakistan for a solid year. This is the DCM's dream, to have the Ambassador go away so the DCM can take over and do what he wants for a year; that was great fun. I enjoyed it immensely.

Q: That's a long time.

HUMMEL: It's an area that I knew a lot about. I met with Chiang Kai-shek and Chiang Ching-Kuo dozens of times on my own as the principal interlocutor. I enjoyed it extremely and learned a lot from it.

Q: What was going on then in Taiwan? The Economic Assistance Program?

HUMMEL: Just finished in '65.

Q: Just finished?

HUMMEL: It terminated in '65, but we still had extremely good relations and Taiwan was already becoming a success story. I had the nice experience of being temporarily a member of the Joint Commission on Rural Reconstruction, JCRR, which managed land reform in Taiwan. The basis for all of their economic progress was that land reform.

Politically, there were some strains. We had to continually restrain the Chinese from doing silly things in relation to the mainland. It would be counter-productive and wouldn't get anywhere.

Q: Was this with vindictiveness, a sense of "we'll be back there on the mainland"?

HUMMEL: It was an article of faith at that time: "We are going back." So, we had to be sure that Americans, sometimes American organizations would not get involved, particularly military. CIA was very good about all of this, but some of our military outfits would insist on training the Chinese in small river boat activities that could only be engaged then against the mainland.

ROBERT KNOPEs
Chinese Language Training
Washington, DC (1965-1966)

Chinese Language Training
Taiwan (1966-1967)

Assistant Cultural Affairs Officer
Taipei, Taiwan (1967-1971)

Publications Officer, USIS
Hong Kong (1971-1974)

Robert Knopes was born in Janesville, Wisconsin, raised on the family farm, and served in the U.S. Navy during the Korean War. He received his BA and MA from the University of Wisconsin before entering the Foreign Service in 1961. He served with USIA in Thailand, Taiwan, Hong Kong, and Italy. He was Chief of the East Asia/Pacific Division of Voice of America. Mr. Knopes was interviewed by David Reuther in 2014.

KNOPEs: And then Chinese. I finally got orders to go to Washington for Chinese language. The program at FSI was a year or less. It was not easy to get a lease for an apartment for less than a year. But we did get settled. And, to back up just a little bit. In September of '64 our second son was born in Bangkok. We thought about having the delivery at the Seventh Day Adventist Hospital in Hat Yai. But there was a blood-related issue that raised some concerns. We decided to go instead to the Seventh Day Hospital in Bangkok. USIS Bangkok arranged for the air force to send a special plane down for us -- with a nurse! It was very reassuring. USIS took good care of us. They took good care of the branch PAOs. We all went to Bangkok. Karen and Chris stayed with USIS friends. I stayed until the baby was born on September 20, then returned to Songkhla with Chris. Karen flew down on Thai Airways a week later with newborn Peter. When we headed back to Chinese language training, we managed two small kids in tourist class.

Q: So when did you leave the assignment in Songkhla then?

KNOPEs: June or July.

Q: Of '65?

KNOPEs: Of '65, uh-huh.

Q: And so you came back to Washington?

KNOPEs: Yeah, to FSI.

Q: For FSI Washington and Chinese.

KNOPES: Yeah. The class started in September.

Q: Do you recall who were your fellow students?

KNOPES: There were only two students, Ivan Klecka and me. Did you ever meet Ivan?

Q: Yes.

KNOPES: Ivan came out of Laos and I came out of Thailand. We were both keen to begin Chinese language. There were two teachers and two students. Ouyang. Did you have Ouyang Chao?

Q: Mm-hmm.

KNOPES: She was still there. And Li Tsung-mi?

Q: Yeah.

KNOPES: That was it, we were the class.

Q: Because they must have been running a special class for you because --

KNOPES: I don't know. I think they were shunting everybody else off to Vietnamese. I was surprised there weren't any State officers studying Chinese.

Q: But Ivan was also USIA officer?

KNOPES: Yeah, uh-huh.

Q: Oh, OK, so -- because I've got a list of FSOs (Foreign Service Officer) that took Chinese at that time. And that doesn't include your name.

KNOPES: Is that right?

Q: So obviously USIA was using FSI but running its own course.

KNOPES: Well, I don't know. That's strange.

Q: Yeah, because you just named the two main --

KNOPES: We had the two teachers. When we got to Taichung there were several State officers who had been there for a while. They were finishing the course.

Q: OK, so you started --

KNOPES: About September of --

Q: In '65 in Washington.

KNOPES: Yeah, mm-hmm.

Q: And then you in '66 a year later you --

KNOPES: Went to Taichung.

Q: Do you recall -- and you would have graduated --

KNOPES: 1967.

Q: '67, yeah.

Q: We're returning to our conversation with Bob Knopes. So your dream comes true. You're in Washington studying Chinese. What's that FSI introduction like, say compared to your academic --

KNOPES: Oh, it was so concentrated. When I was studying Chinese at Wisconsin Miss Chou was an easy teacher. She let me get away with too much. So Chinese always came at the bottom of my study list. She was very nice and gave me a good foundation to the language. But at FSI we went past what I learned at Wisconsin in less than a month.

Q: And how did FSI approach the training?

KNOPES: We began by concentrating on the spoken word. We started out with tones, added some vocabulary, then began to make sentences. We were halfway through the course before we got to learning characters. In Washington we gained some control of Chinese as a spoken language. In Taichung we would concentrate on characters and reading

Q: Now, is this so many hours in class and so many on tape, or?

KNOPES: We must have had about six hours in the classroom each day. I think one of those might have been listening to tapes. We took tapes home to listen to at night. We'd found an apartment not far from FSI, two-bedrooms, and we had two small kids. Then it turned out there was another one on the way. Listening to Chinese tapes with two little guys running around was not easy. At the same time my wife was trying to cope with temporary living while hugely pregnant. Ivan was a bachelor living in the apartment complex above FSI, with plenty of time and no interruptions. I was worried that he would just leave me behind. But the study of Chinese presents its own limits on time and dedication. I held on and Ivan and I went out to Taichung on equal footing.

Q: Now, where was your apartment?

KNOPES: Oh, we were on Beauregard Street --

Q: In Northern Virginia.

KNOPES: Yeah, Northern Virginia,.

Q: The year ends in the summer of '66.

KNOPES: Yeah, mm-hmm. You're assigned then to the second year of Chinese.

Q: Mm-hmm. How does one travel to Taiwan in those days with two young kids?

KNOPES: Three by then. Now we had another six-month-old. Andrew was born in March. I don't recall much about that trip. We spent time with our parents, then left from Chicago O'Hare. On this trip we flew in a jet plane, but still had to refuel in Anchorage, Alaska. I think we stayed there overnight, then to Tokyo and on down to Taipei.

Q: What was it like arriving in Taipei in '66?

KNOPES: Well, I didn't get much of a feel for the town as we were stuck in our hotel for the entire day. There was a typhoon off the coast that almost delayed our arrival. We were supposed to catch a plane to Taichung the next morning. In the hotel room we watched the weather report on the TV, but didn't know anything about typhoons at that point. The wind outside was whipping the trees and the rain was horizontal. We thought, "This is serious."

But our USIS contact said, "We think it'll be all right. We'll send a car in the morning to take you to the airport."

It was still overcast and windy the next morning when left for Chiang Kai-shek airport. Was it Chiang Kai-shek? This airport was in town.

Q: Right, this is the one in town.

KNOPES: Yeah, I think it was called Chiang Kai-shek. Anyway, we went to the airport, only 10, 15 minutes away. We boarded and took off. In minutes we were above the clouds, in full sunshine. When we landed in Taichung it was a beautiful day. That was our first typhoon experience. We learned that if it's not hitting where you are or heading toward you, it's not going to be too serious. This one was just skirting the northern fringe of Taiwan. We were met at the airport by the "xiaojiang," the school principal, Jerry Koch. He had been a missionary, spent time in China, and spoke Chinese. In Taichung instruction was tutorial, just a teacher and a student. Except for an occasional lecture on some aspect of China, there were no group classes that I recall. We began the course by reading lessons prepared at the school, "20 Lectures on Chinese Culture" and "Newspaper Chinese," then launched into reading articles and editorials from the daily newspapers.

Q: Where were the lessons given and what were your housing arrangements?

KNOPES: When we arrived there was no house available for us. We spent a couple of weeks in the Railway Hotel not far from the school. It was a basic hotel, not a good situation for Karen and three young boys. We learned that the CIA had a couple of leased houses that were empty. No students were coming to use them, but the Agency didn't want to release them to us. USIS Taipei worked a deal enabling us to camp out in one of those houses until something else came open. We didn't have to wait long. Don Anderson, who I later worked both in Shanghai and in Hong Kong, was leaving to be interpreter for United States-PRC talks in Warsaw. We moved into his western style house, which had plenty of room for us. The only drawback was the hard tile floors and marble railings. We were concerned that a wandering two-year-old might fall and break his head, but that didn't happen. The school was a western-style building with many, many rooms. The administrative offices and a small conference room were on the ground floor. Upstairs were the classrooms. Each teacher had his or her own room. It was a good group of instructors, all from Beijing, all with a heavy Beijing accent. One was a retired general, another a noted calligrapher who gave each of us a scroll of calligraphy when we graduated.

Q: Mm.

KNOPES: It was an interesting group. One of my first classes was with a gentleman named Chang Da Mu. I was in the classroom when the bell rang but there was no teacher. Then there was a rattling of the paper covering the bookcase, and Teacher Chang appeared. There were no books in that bookcase. That was where he took his afternoon nap. The atmosphere in the school was relaxed, but personally, the pace was intense -- reading, breaking down newspaper editorials, learning new characters, forgetting those I had learned the day before.

Q: Mm-hmm, mm-hmm.

KNOPES: To give the students a break from the routine we had a week or two off every few months. On our first break, Da Chen, the senior teacher, suggested that Karen and I and our son join her and her husband, who was a colonel in the Chinese Air Force, on a drive around Taiwan. We decided to drive from Taichung, east over the mountains, through Taroko Gorge to the port of Hualien. From Hualien we went down the east coast to the tip of the island, then through the towns of Kaohsiung and Tainan, back to Taichung. Spending more than a week with the chief teacher was great experience. The scenery was wonderful but the roads were terrible. Da Chen's husband and I spent much time pushing the car out of mud holes.

Q: In addition to this trip, were there any other field trips?

KNOPES: Yeah, we went to Hong Kong on one. I think all the students went along on that one, the whole group. We had briefings at the consulate but had a lot of time to ourselves. We were given an allowance for books and I spent a lot of time in bookstores which were well-stocked with books on China.

Q: I mean Taichung is quite a distance from the embassy in Taipei. So did you have an opportunity from time to time to interact with the embassy?

KNOPES: Yes, I was in frequent contact with the USIS office up there. I knew if I went to Hong Kong, Singapore, or Saigon I wouldn't be speaking much Mandarin. I wanted to be assigned to Taipei so I lobbied the PAO for an assignment every time I went up.

Q: It was Ken Boyle at the time?

KNOPES: Ken Boyle was PAO and Ned Conlon was his deputy. Every time I went to Taipei I let them know I was available. It worked out. When the field program officer retired, I was first in line. It turned out that my job would be assistant cultural affairs officer, not field programming. I was not disappointed. Taiwan didn't need a field program officer anymore. Our audience was not in the rural areas but in the cities. There were USIS branch posts in Taichung, Tainan, and Kaohsiung. Kaohsiung and Tainan are only about 20 miles apart, so were overseen by a single BPAO (branch public affairs officer). With US assistance Taiwan had become a very successful agricultural economy. Now it was on the verge of change to an urban-industrial economy. As ACAO, I would handle the American Visitors Program, bringing speakers on a wide range of subjects to Taiwan.

Q: Actually, I think looking at this list, Ivan Klecka ended up in Taichung.

KNOPES: No, he went to Hong Kong.

Q: Hong Kong.

KNOPES: Yeah. He was the USIS Information Officer in the consulate. I went over to visit him a couple of times. He didn't use much Mandarin there.

Q: So let's see. We're at the summer of '67 and you get assigned into USIS Taipei.

KNOPES: Taipei, mm-hmm.

Q: So what does the assistant cultural officer do in this environment?

KNOPES: We had an active speaker program. USIA in Washington recruited speakers for posts around the world. Posts could request topics, specific speakers, or both. We could also ask for speakers requested by nearby posts, and who fit our needs, to stop in Taipei. A speaker usually came for 3 or 4 days. I think I programmed at least three every month. I remember speakers on the environment, the space program, the United Nations, education, and economics. American politics and government were touchy subjects because the Republic of China was a one-party system and the island was under martial law. I helped programme the astronauts who made the second landing on the moon and later arranged a display of one of the moon rocks. I prepared and gave lectures on American culture and customs at USIS branch posts and in schools. Most visiting speakers were programmed in Kaohsiung, Tainan, and Taichung, as well as in Taipei. It was a labor intensive job. But I had a good staff. I believe that every successful USIS program overseas came about because of the work of dedicated FSNs.

I also worked on a donated book program. American publishers got tax credits for sending remaindered books overseas. When I got to Taipei there was a room, about as big as this room, piled floor to ceiling with donated books. My predecessor had been too busy with the educational exchange program to do anything about books. Ken Boyle said, "Well, you're here, you're new, how about taking over the book program?"

And I thought, "Great, I love to look through books."

The book room was in the back of the building. Few people knew where it was and there was no telephone. I spent many happy hours there, sorting books and making lists of where to donate them. I soon knew the librarians and many professors in every major university, as well as some senior government officials and their staffs. I could make individual presentations and I could pick out special books for the PAO to present to his contacts. It was a good opening for me. I finally cleared out that roomful of books, though more kept coming all the time.

Q: Let's get a handle on how USIS is organized at a major embassy such as Taipei. The senior officer would be the PAO --

KNOPES: That was Ken Boyle when I got there.

Q: And then he would have a deputy.

KNOPES: Ned Conlon, right. Then there was a Cultural and an Information Officer. Larger posts, not Taipei, had an administrative officer, too. The Cultural Officer in Taipei was Merv Haworth, a graduate of the FSI Chinese program in Taichung. He had served in Taipei as ACAO after Taichung. He had just come back from Washington where he had worked on the Fulbright and other Exchange Programs. Exchanges were an important part of the USIS Taipei operation. Merv and another ACAO handled all of the exchanges, leaving me free to do American Visitors and anything else that came along. There were three Americans in the Information Section. Tom Graves was the information officer. Wally Gibson was the assistant IO and Wally Bishop was motion picture and radio officer. The information office sent out the daily wireless file to newspapers, radio stations, and government offices. And then there was a book translation program, World Today books, done mostly in Hong Kong. The information office put out Student Review, a monthly bilingual magazine with English and the Chinese translation side by side. It was a learning tool for English, very popular with students.

Q: Let's talk about the wireless file for a minute.

KNOPES: Mm-hmm.

Q: You were saying that comes out of Washington.

KNOPES: Yeah, every day.

Q: It's a compilation of what?

KNOPES: Of current news. Much of it culled from the daily American newspapers. The press office in Washington also had a staff of writers who covered the White House, Congress, anything in Washington that would be interest to posts around the world. One or two USIA journalists would cover events especially for Asia posts.

Q: Would it be primarily U.S. news and --

KNOPES: Yeah, primarily U.S. news.

Q: -- or cover Europe and --

KNOPES: Yes, they covered Europe, but there was a separate news desk for each area. There was an East Asia desk that gathered and sent out news of interest in Asia. You asked before about Vietnam. There was a lot of coverage on President Johnson and our Vietnam policy. USIS Taipei carried all of that. Of course, the government in Taiwan was strongly anti-communist and fully supported our efforts in Vietnam.

Q: Now, the local environment is one of censorship or sensitivity to the news.

KNOPES: Yeah, right.

Q: Did the wireless file run into --

KNOPES: No. I don't think there was ever a problem with the wireless file. That was current news. And not distributed to the public. USIS sent it to media and government offices and selected officials and academics. We tried to push a bit in introducing discussion of American political processes. I got the head of the political science department at Taida (National Taiwan University) to translate a book on American politics for World Today books. It was distributed without a problem.

You asked about censorship. We programmed American speakers on American politics in our USIS centers but rarely in universities. To test the limits, Leo Moser, who was in the Political Section of the embassy, agreed to give a lecture on the America democratic system at Taida. Leo had a PhD in political science and had taught before coming into the Foreign Service. We had been classmates at the language school. I reserved a lecture room and put up posters on the campus. At the appointed time we waited and waited, but no one showed up. I am sure students were interested but it was too risky. When talking one-on-one away from campus, students were always full of questions. On campus they knew they were being observed. Being curious about democracy might indicate a sympathy for Taiwan independence. The goal of students was to finish university and go to the United States for an advanced degree. Learning about democracy would come later.

Censors read everything printed in Taiwan, with special attention to things political, and anything concerning the PRC. Small local magazines often pushed the limits on political commentary and were closed down. But they usually reopened a month later under a new name, and maybe a new editor. Any mention of the PRC was forbidden. Textbooks and encyclopedia printed elsewhere but sold in Taiwan were missing pages where items on the China mainland had been.

Q: In fact, the Taiwanese political movement was starting up at that time.

KNOPES: Oh, it was, yes.

Q: And you have the Diaoyu of 1970/'71.

KNOPES: Yeah.

Q: Over the Senkakus.

KNOPES: Sure.

Q: Those were one of the first major student demonstrations in Taipei.

KNOPES: That's right. But that was a protest against Japan. It was nationalistic and sanctioned by the government. Those were good demonstrations and under control (laughs). Demonstrations about domestic questions were another matter.

Q: Well, at this time, for example, Peng Ming-min —.

KNOPES: He went off to the United States.

Q: Yeah, he went off. How did that happen?

KNOPES: Well, there was a lot of talk about it after he was gone. It was upsetting to the government. They feared he would promote Taiwan independence from abroad. I just read something the other day about who helped him get out of Taiwan. I don't think anybody in the embassy actively helped him. Though one of the political officers I was in language school with had contacts with many Taiwanese, not promoting anything but keeping tabs on the attitudes of the Taiwanese community. He spoke Taiwanese and had many student contacts. Not long after he was transferred from Taipei most of his contacts were picked up, except for one guy (laughs).

Q: Picked up by the authorities.

KNOPES: Yeah, right. Not sent away or anything, but questioned. Warned, actually. But the Peng Ming-min departure was an event that created a bit of a stir when I was there. We talked about it, but didn't know much about it at the time.

Q: But it must have made quite a stir in the embassy, I mean everybody's talking about it.

KNOPES: Sure. And certainly the story was big in official circles in Taipei. They were very upset by the whole thing because they figured something bad was going to come from it. But Peng went into academia in the US, did not involve himself in politics, and the story died away. Then there's one event that I've never understood. And I don't know if you've heard of this before, but a bomb exploded in the USIS library in Tainan.

Q: Mm.

KNOPES: I mention it, but I don't have anything more on it. Neal Donnelly, who was the branch PAO there at the time, has probably talked about it in his oral history. I don't think it was ever ascertained who did it or why they did it.

Q: Well, Nancy Tucker covers it in her book.

KNOPES: Did she?

Q: And she suggests it's the local authorities sending the message.

KNOPES: That was the only thing we could think of. It was not a dissident. It had to be somebody else. We never got the message as far as I could figure out. A couple of students were injured, so it seemed a senseless act.

Q: Let's see. Ken Boyle leaves in the middle of your tour, and Bob Clark comes --

KNOPES: Bob Clark comes.

Q: And change in bosses, change in atmosphere?

KNOPES: Oh, much, much. Ken was preparing to retire when I got there. He had a long career, a distinguished career. He had worked in France during and after WWII. He had been a PAO in Hong Kong. Now he was planning to go back to university to study linguistics. His mind was on his future, not USIS Taipei. He was very good at languages, fluent in French and Chinese. He had a new wife and a new baby. Ken continued to manage USIS Taipei but it was not a dynamic operation. Then Bob Clark arrived, with Bob Nichols as his deputy, and things opened up.

Q: What did they do different, programming?

KNOPES: Bob Clark developed a good relationship with everybody. He and Bob Nichols were outgoing personalities, experienced, they knew China. They welcomed new ideas. I advocated trying new things in programming, doing more with Student Review magazine, reaching out to students. Bob Clark listened, removed me from the cultural section, made me editor of the magazine, and set me up as the program officer. In one of the first issues after I took over Student Review carried an article on anti-Vietnam war protests in American universities. We were not advocating student protests, but we wanted to present a more realistic picture about what was happening in America. The same articles were being used by USIS posts around the world. The ambassador was quite conservative, cautious about anything that might upset the US-ROC relationship. When we were trying a new approach, the PAO always explained to him what we planned and got his approval. Musical groups were part of our cultural programming, guitarists, choral groups and small orchestras. When we were offered Junior Wells and his Rhythm and Blues Band, I said to Bob Clark, "This sounds interesting. This is something we ought do."

Bob agreed, and convinced the ambassador that Junior would introduce another side of American music. So Junior Wells brought rhythm and blues to Taipei under the auspices of USIS and the American embassy. Everyone loved it. People got up and danced in the aisles. Several officials attended, even one of Chiang Kai-shek's old generals, who came with his grandchildren. We put them in the front row and offered them ear plugs, but the general said, "Don't worry, I'm an old artillery man."

Q: (laughs)

KNOPES: Whether that meant he was already deaf or that he wanted to hear every thump of the high-decibel goings-on wasn't clear. It would have helped if we all had been a bit deaf. Junior's band featured two guitars, a pounding drum, and Junior's exuberant singing, all amplified by a giant sound system in an aged auditorium with minimal acoustics. Everybody had a great time. We got no negative comments at all. The band went on to play in Taichung and Kaohsiung, with the same reaction. We opened things up a bit with out-of-the-ordinary programs like that.

Q: The Kuomintang Party that's running Taiwan at this time in fact has a propaganda unit that's supposed to watch these things.

KNOPES: Sure, yeah.

Q: And the embassy was aware of who that officer was and --

KNOPES: Well, sure, right.

Q: And how to interact and --

KNOPES: We laid the groundwork for it. We promoted Junior and his band as a popular form of American music. They stirred up dancing feet, but they had no interest in politics. I don't think they even cared where they were. On the bus they sat and listened to music on their earphones, oblivious to the passing scenery.

Q: What else did Clark open up for you?

KNOPES: I lobbied to do more with students, so I was made editor of Student Review magazine. It was popular because it promoted English learning with its bilingual format - English and Chinese in adjoining columns. I added more local articles, lightened up the format, and put in more about what was happening on American university campuses. We never had a problem or even a comment from the authorities.

Q: Now, when we talk about the work of the embassy we're talking about the econ officers getting out, and the political officers getting out. What would have been your local contacts like?

KNOPES: Mine were mostly in the universities and libraries.

Q: Universities.

KNOPES: Yeah. We kept close contact with university presidents and department heads, keeping them informed of what was available, asking what we could do for them. I worked with the heads of the departments, mainly social sciences, history, languages, and literature. Programs on the environment, ecology and space were popular. Space flight, moon landings, and space technology especially had broad interest. I made all the arrangements to bring a moon rock for display in Taiwan. That was a major success. The local history museum, which was right across the street from USIS, set up two rooms for the exhibit. On opening day the line to get in extended for blocks. I personally carried the rock on the plane to Kaohsiung for a showing. Crowds in the south were just as numerous and enthusiastic. About the same time we programmed the astronauts from the second moon mission. The entire embassy was involved in organizing events for the astronauts. USIS set up four big screens in the sports stadium to show a film of the actual flight, with commentary by the astronauts, to several thousand secondary school students. The astronauts did similar, though smaller, programs in other major cities, always to capacity crowds.

Q: Now, David Dean was the political counselor at the time you were there.

KNOPES: Right.

Q: And probably was running a pretty good section. Did USIA or yourself chat them up as to, you know, what some good ideas might be, or?

KNOPES: Oh yeah.

Q: The interaction between Political and USIA --

KNOPES: I had been classmates in Taichung with most of the political section -- Leo Moser, Jerry Fowler, Charlie Sylvester, and Ted Price. We came up to Taipei together, partied together, worked together, and exchanged ideas on what was happening in Taiwan. I had a great relationship with the Political Section. David Dan was supportive and helpful. I didn't get to know him very well until we both went to Hong Kong where he was the deputy principle officer in the consulate.

Q: Now, you're first getting to Taipei in '66. You're leaving in '71.

KNOPES: Mm-hmm.

Q: What would you say are some of the changes you saw in the, in the mission and in Taipei in the local political --

KNOPES: Society was changing, the economy was expanding, and the political climate was opening a bit. Taipei was changing, growing outward, becoming urban. But it was not a modern city. The skyline was flat, only two new buildings were over four stories. When we arrived in Taiwan in 1966, we had to watch for oxcarts on the streets of Taipei. A couple of years later they were gone, new thoroughfares and overpasses were constructed and there were more cars and motorcycles on the streets. Kaohsiung was a flourishing industrial city. American aid had helped create a thriving agricultural economy. Now it was moving to industry and technology. The educational system was quite good but there was concern about a brain drain -- students going to the US and staying. This began to change as jobs in education and industry began to open up. Taiwan was still under martial law but it was not rigidly enforced. The ROC was concerned about international pressure for the PRC to replace it in the UN.

Q: And some have offered that this is because Chiang Ching-kuo was coming up.

KNOPES: That was clear, even at that time. The embassy, the political section, had regular contact with him. I think everyone saw that Ching-kuo was more open-minded and forward-thinking than his father.

Q: There was an assassination attempt in New York.

KNOPES: Yeah, that's right. It was big news in Taiwan when it happened, but it passed quickly. I can't remember much about it. It was a major story in the papers but I got the impression that Ching-kuo didn't want it to be an issue. There was some concern because it happened in the US. But the story didn't last.

Q: Now, so this whole time you're on the Cultural Affairs Section.

KNOPES: Mm-hmm.

Q: Oh, and you got rid of that room full of books.

KNOPES: I did, yes. There were always more coming in, but I could handle them after I got the backlog out of there.

Q: But that's, that's a good presentation.

KNOPES: Oh, fantastic. After I presented hundreds of books to a library, USIS was their friend forever. As I said, it was a great entrée for --

Q: And a personal gift too, you said to the Supreme Court Justices and -- KNOPES: Sure, right. A book presentation was a good entree to senior officials. It was a way to get to know a lot of people. .

Q: I remember when I was there later, presentation gifts were big and I have this whole collection of ties from the various municipalities in the --

KNOPES: Right. Oh, I wanted to mention my experience when I went from language school up to Taipei. As I said, all the teachers had this great Beijing accent, the standard accepted by all Chinese. When I make contacts with older officials in Taipei. My Chinese was very clear, understandable to everyone. The problem came when they replied and I couldn't understand what they said (laughs). They were from Zhejiang, Guangzhou, or Shanghai, each with a heavy local accent. Boy, that was a distressing situation (laughs). It took a couple of months to get my confidence back. I was really disappointed for a while.

Q: Some of the Taichung students said studying a language was fabulous. Then you walked out the door to the street and everybody spoke Taiwanese.

KNOPES: Taiwanese, right.

Q: Just to sort of illustrate how things are moving, this whole ping-pong thing comes up.

KNOPES: Mm-hmm.

Q: In April of '71. That must have come to people's attentions.

KNOPES: Maybe. But as I said, reporting on anything to do with the PRC was strictly controlled. And that story concerned both the PRC and the USA. I don't think there was much in the Taiwan press about it, even though it was a portent of major changes to come. On the other hand, there was heavy coverage when a mainland tennis player defected to Taiwan.

Q: Now, in '71 you're working on your next assignment or trying to figure out what you're going to do next.

KNOPES: Yeah. That's right, '71. We were getting ready to go back to an assignment in Washington. Except for the short stay in Virginia for Chinese at FSI, we had been overseas since 1962, so we're coming on more than 10 years. My wife's father had died. Her mother was alone in Mount Kisco, NY. We were making moving plans when I got a call from the area office in USIA asking if I would like to go to Hong Kong to be editor of the Chinese-language regional magazine World Today. The plan was to revamp World Today, sell advertising, and make it self-sufficient. "We think you are the one for the job. Will you do it?" I thought it was a great opportunity but I had to convince my wife. That was a tough job. I never did convince her. But she finally agreed and we went to Hong Kong. It was a job that just popped up. I was a Chinese language officer, had some experience editing Student Review Magazine, and I was available.

Q: But in those days USIA had a rule, you could only be out of the country so many years?

KNOPES: That was an informal policy, I think. They didn't want you to lose touch with the US, which we were probably beginning to do. Our boys had grown up in Asia. They knew little about their homeland.

Q: Want to take a break?

KNOPES: Yeah, I think so.

Q: We're returning to our conversation with Bob Knopes. We're talking about the end of your assignment to Taipei and this new assignment to Hong Kong. And I would suspect in one sense this illustrates American soft power, because you're, you're going from organization speakers and influencing audiences that way to now influencing audiences through a written publication. Did USIA have a number of these written publications --

KNOPES: Oh yeah.

Q: -- languages around the world?

KNOPES: Yeah. I recall, Al Majal, which was in Arabic. It was the same size and format as World Today and we used that as our model. Of course there was the magazine done for the USSR. I think it was called Amerika. There was Problems of Communism, in English, with articles indicated in its title. I know there were others but I don't recall the names. Al Majal and most of the others were done in Washington. World Today was done in Hong Kong and distributed in Asia, sold on newsstands. World Today was started in the 1950s to support the Republic of China on Taiwan and to counter material about the People's Republic, which had just taken over the Chinese mainland. At that time the US was still thinking, hoping, the Nationalists might return some day. World Today carried articles about the United States, its policies, and its commitment to freedom in Asia. Its biggest market was Taiwan and Hong Kong, but it had a readership in the Chinese communities in Saigon, Bangkok, Kuala Lumpur, and Singapore. Since World Today was sold on newsstands, one of the first editors put a Hong Kong movie actress on the cover of every issue, hoping that would catch the eye of a reader and lead to more sales. It might have worked, but it didn't fit the editorial policy that I had in mind when I took over in 1971. The magazine was then being edited by the local staff with nominal supervision by the information officer. It had become a little bit slapdash, a jumble of translated articles. The area office wanted a more substantial, a more focused publication. Since we were heavily involved in Vietnam at the time, we always had an article or two on United States policy and goals there. There was also the goal of making the magazine self-sufficient through advertising.

Up to that time, World Today had been funded from the USIA budget. Though money came in from sales, US law required that those funds go directly to the US Treasury. They couldn't be used to cover the cost of printing or shipping. Now, USIA lawyers had come up with a new interpretation of the law, allowing us to use advertising income to pay some of the costs of publication.

Q: As opposed to subscriptions?

KNOPES: No, we couldn't handle subscriptions. That would require additional staff and a huge amount of paperwork. Mailing individual copies was not possible. We mailed in bulk to distributors in the countries I mentioned before. Circulation was all news stand sales. I had edited Student Review but didn't know much about the magazine business. I started by talking with magazine publishers in Hong Kong, like Readers Digest and Far Eastern Economic Review. "How do you sell advertising?" "How do you market in various countries?" They were all helpful but not encouraging. It will be tough for a magazine put out by the US government to attract advertisers, they said. And they were right. It wasn't practical. But it was my job and I forged ahead. They said we would first need information on readership for potential advertisers, so I found a small company that would do some surveys for us and an ad agency that started looking for advertisers.

After I got the assignment, I took a trip from Taipei to Hong Kong to talk to the PAO and look over the situation. While I was there President Nixon announced that he planned to visit the PRC in 1972. Nobody saw that coming. I was standing in the corridor of the USIS office listening to a radio broadcast when David Dean came dashing in, asking "What'd he say?" There was no radio outlet in the Consul General's office. That announcement pretty much determined how I was going to do World Today, for the first year, at least. I took over the magazine in July of 1971. Nixon was going to Beijing in the spring of '72. I forget when it was, May or something?

Q: February.

KNOPES: Oh, February? OK. I hadn't planned any big changes in the magazine for a few months, anyway. Now we would concentrate on preparing a special edition on Nixon's trip to China. While we were doing that I gathered information on advertising, polling, and distribution.

In the run-up to the visit we made arrangements to get news reports and color photos from AP (Associated Press) and UPI (United Press International). We got materials put out by the State Department and the USIA press office that covered the trip extensively. We had a lot more material than we could use. We had camera-ready copy set for the printer before Nixon was back in the States. Copies of the special edition were on their way to distributors in Southeast Asia within a week. We must have printed almost 100,000 copies. The issue was sold out in a short time. No copies went to Taiwan, of course. The authorities there did not see this event as newsworthy for the island. Around Southeast Asia it was a best seller. This gave us a good start in launching the revised magazine, a monthly, more than double the size of the bi-weekly, with more articles on business, economics, international relations, and US society.

Our ad agency was able to sell some advertising for our first revised issue. I think we had Cross pens and the Hong Kong regional airline Cathay Pacific. Ads for cigarettes would have been a sure thing but we did not accept those. Later, we added some hotels and another airline or two. It was a slow start and never picked up much speed. I was successful in introducing advertising, bringing in some additional revenue. But we were meeting serious headwinds. On a trip to Southeast Asia I found publications carrying more about the PRC. One was even using the simplified Chinese characters developed in the PRC. Once the American president visited China most restrictions on publishing on what was happening there were lifted. In Saigon I got a mixed message. The distributor was enthusiastic, telling me, "We're looking forward to this new publication. We'll definitely increase our distribution." I looked at the barbed wire in the streets, the inflation, and other negatives and thought, "That probably isn't going to happen."

Circulation wasn't going to increase in the Chinese communities of Bangkok or Manila, either. The younger generation was totally assimilated as Thai or Filipino. They were not learning Chinese and would not be buying Chinese language publications. No matter how good we made World Today it would be hard to compete with local publications. We enlivened World Today and gave it more focus, but it was a general magazine put out by a US government agency. A couple of years after I left, USIA cut funding for all its magazines. World Today was ended, but before long a similar magazine was created for circulation in the PRC. It was called Jiao Liu.

Q: Just on the bureaucratic side of things, what's the tree that you're in? Who do you report to?

KNOPES: Nobody really. That was the good thing. My first PAO in Hong Kong was a former newspaper man. He was very helpful, suggesting things to try but letting me decide how to proceed. The next PAO was a poor manager. I was well into the job by then and could fend off his wildest suggestions. He was more troublesome to the rest of the staff. The people who were concerned with what I was doing were in Washington, and they were only concerned with the finished product. I was pretty much on my own. I ran each issue by the PAO, but I don't recall any editorial problems arising.

Q: Being published in Hong Kong, is -- do you own the publishing facilities?

KNOPES: No.

Q: Or do you rent --

KNOPES: World Today was always printed by a local printing company, South China Printing, I think it was called. Their facility was in Aberdeen, on the other side of the island. We were in constant touch with them. When an issue was ready they came by the consulate to pick up the camera ready copy. Once we approved the final layout, the issue was printed and shipped to distributors. After I left Hong Kong, USIS switched the printing of the magazine to USIA's Regional Service Center in Manila, a major publishing operation that printed books, magazines, posters, everything that USIS posts needed. The magazine was then shipped to USIS posts by diplomatic pouch, a significant savings.

Q: And what was the circulation when you started off?

KNOPES: I think it was 70,000 to 75,000 copies an issue. Taiwan and Hong Kong took most of that, 70% to 75%.

Q: After that first issue, you got back into Taiwan, did you?

KNOPES: After the Nixon issue, yeah. There was just the one special issue. Then we made the switch to a monthly magazine, doubling the pages and changing the format. After Nixon went to China I thought it was time to get away from the pro-ROC bias, or at least make it neutral. In one issue I used a report on agriculture in the PRC that was written by the consulate economic section. It was just one page, a straightforward report, but it indicated that agricultural output was improving. After the Great Leap Forward and the Cultural Revolution, there was nowhere to go but up. Our area director at that time was a protégé of Vice President Spiro Agnew, extremely conservative and pro-ROC. He was outraged that I would do such a thing. He threatened to remove me as editor, but settled on forbidding me from using anything positive about the PRC in the future. He left shortly afterward and I got back to carrying more coverage of the PRC. After Spiro Agnew resigned the vice presidency, he was frequently in Taiwan on some form of business. He and his colleague were very close to Taiwan. I could see why they didn't want the magazine saying anything good about the PRC. It might have hampered their future relationships with Taiwan.

Q: Now, Washington was watching you, or reading from time to time?

KNOPES: Oh, yeah.

KNOPES: The China desk officer in USIA at that time was native Chinese, so he read each issue. We also appended an English summary of each article in issues we sent back to Washington.

Q: The magazine wasn't a -- was tied to a larger USIA program of doing these language magazines.

KNOPES: Well, not exactly, no. It was a local operation. I only used the other magazines as comparison. World Today started in Hong Kong and ended in Hong Kong. It's operating costs were part of the USIS Hong Kong budget. We got a lot of support from USIA press and magazine offices, but we in Hong Kong decided the editorial policy, except for that one instance.

Q: As the editor then of this publication, you're going around to the parties in Hong Kong saying I'm the editor? I mean you're joining the journalist crowd?

KNOPES: Yeah, to some extent. I would say, "I'm doing this magazine and we want to sell advertising. Can you give us any hints or suggestions or advice?" They were very helpful. I was a member of the Foreign Correspondents Clubs, a good place to make contacts. That's an interesting point, how did World Today fit into USIA? I believe it was one of the first regional magazines established. From what I heard, the genesis was USIS Hong Kong, not USIA, though I'm sure USIA approved. Its purpose was to present a positive picture of the ROC on Taiwan, but it also carried plenty of material on US presence in Asia and Southeast Asia. My job was to sell advertising, not easy for a general magazine relying totally on news stand sales. We had no idea who was buying the magazine. I put in more features that would appeal to a younger audience, while continuing to carry statements of the secretary of state and other government entities about US Asia policy. We added a section on business and economics. We tried to cover a lot of ground, maybe too much.

Q: During the time that you're in Hong Kong working this project, other things in the area are happening. The Americans pull out of Vietnam, '72.

KNOPES: Yeah, uh-huh.

Q: Or '73 rather.

KNOPES: Yeah. We always carried articles on Vietnam. When I traveled to Vietnam, I found a stringer correspondent there to write local stories for us. I added stringers for most countries in Southeast Asia. The US was withdrawing, but we were still talking about the future of South Vietnam.

Q: Middle East pops up. Does any of that get covered?

KNOPES: Not much. We might have carried a statement of U.S. policy on the Middle East but it was not our area of interest.

Q: Right. Because the Vietnam Peace Accords were signed in January.

KNOPES: Yeah, uh-huh.

Q: '73.

KNOPES: I think we were fairly optimistic, or at least hopeful, that things would work out. The collapse didn't come for another two years. But the Middle East, no, I don't think we covered much of that. It was a publication about Asia and the U.S./Asia relationship.

Q: Now, you were there as the editor. Were there any other USIA officers assigned to this project?

KNOPES: No, I was it. An American officer put together Current Scene. You remember the magazine Current Scene?

Q: Yeah.

KNOPES: But that was another office -- again a part of USIS Hong Kong but almost independent. Current Scene was really about what was happening in the PRC, analytical articles in English. The editor acquired articles from academics and unclassified items produced by the consulate. I think it was about 16 pages, published as a quarto, whereas World Today was a regular magazine. The USIS information officer handled press relations for the consulate. But Current Scene and World Today were separate entities within USIS. I had a staff of five or six. The senior editor had been running World Today for many years, although the information officer was nominally in charge.

Q: Now, was he a USIA officer?

KNOPES: No, no, Chinese. We had two other editors and two layout artists. I selected the articles and worked with the senior editor on a plan for each issue. The others did the translations and the layout.

Q: Well, as you were saying earlier, being in the publishing business can be tricky from time to time. Do you ever run into any other complaints on your coverage?

KNOPES: No, no. We didn't. Everyone seemed to be quite happy with it. I took a couple of trips to visit our distributors. They were always upbeat and offered suggestions on content. When we changed to a monthly, with a completely new format, they were enthusiastic about it. They said they thought we were going in the right direction. I was not optimistic about the long term. The political climate was changing. China was opening and the ROC on Taiwan was losing international clout. The best thing about those trips to Saigon and Bangkok and talking to all those distributors was that I got a fantastic Chinese meal at every stop.

Q: (laughs) What office in Washington would you have been in contact with on these issues?

KNOPES: The Area Office for policy guidance and help and the Publications Office for support on materials for the magazine. There was one guy who looked over all trade magazines and company annual reports. Some of these had good articles about future developments in medicine, management, or science that could be useful to us. He sent copies out to us. If we thought we could use them he would get the rights. We always had a pool of good material to choose from. There was a writer and a photographer at RSC Manila who did regional stories that were useful. On my trips around Southeast Asia I hired stringers in each of the countries. They supplied us stories from Malaysia, Singapore, Vietnam, Taiwan. We were trying to turn World Today into a regional magazine rather than just clipping and editing from U.S. articles. Of course, we used State Department policy statements. We always carried an article on US policy. The goal was to make the magazine regional. We hoped this would attract more readers and bring in advertising, too.

Q: Now, this also coincided with the time that Nixon goes to China and we have an unofficial establishment in China. Does this open the door to sending World Today --

KNOPES: No, no.

Q: -- into China?

KNOPES: That didn't happen until about 1979, after our embassy opened in Beijing. World Today was included when USIA killed off the magazines sometime in the mid-1970s. After we opened our embassy in Beijing a magazine called Jiao Liu, similar to World Today, was created. Jiao Liu was distributed free in China. John Thomson was the first PAO in Beijing. He must have had something to do with starting the magazine. The problem was who to send it to. John and his staff grabbed listings from every available telephone book, college faculty directory, government office, any list of names and addresses they could find, and created a mailing list. One of my first jobs when I got to Beijing in 1982 was to refine that distribution list. It was an impressive list but we didn't know if copies were actually reaching the people, or who might read it when it arrived. But no, World Today died somewhere along the line in the late '70s. Jiao Liu wasn't a direct replacement but it was put together in Hong Kong by a similar staff. I believe that staff was all new hire, though.

Q: Now, when you start in Hong Kong David Osborne was the CG (consul general).

KNOPES: Yeah.

Q: And later Chuck Cross.

KNOPES: Only for about a month, during my last month there.

Q: Oh, that Chuck came.

KNOPES: Yeah, it was David Osborne and David Dean all the time I was there.

Q: What was Osborne like to --

KNOPES: Oh, he was a very nice guy and an effective CG. As World Today editor, I didn't have much contact with the CG. I played squash with David Dean because we knew each other from Taipei.

Q: Actually, Hong Kong is one of the larger diplomat establishments.

KNOPES: Absolutely, right. Right, it was then, too.

Q: So it'd be easy to get lost.

KNOPES: Well, you could.

Q: Or stay in obscurity.

KNOPES: After Hong Kong David Osborne became ambassador to Burma. When I traveled to Burma as USIA desk officer in 1977, I called on him. He remembered me and was very cordial.

Q: This is also the Nixon administration, Kissinger becomes secretary of state. Did you notice any particular atmospheric change because of that? At your level anyway?

KNOPES: No, I don't think so. When was that? '72?

Q: Kissinger becomes secretary of state in '73.

KNOPES: In '73, yeah. I don't remember anything at that time or any changes back in Washington. I was pretty much in that little office. We were really struggling with the advertising and I was making trips around the area. I was completely focused on the magazine.

Q: Well, '74 you make a change by coming back to Washington.

KNOPES: Mm-hmm, yeah.

THOMAS P. SHOESMITH
Deputy, Taiwan Desk
Washington, DC (1966-1971)

Thomas P. Shoesmith was born in 1939 and raised in Pennsylvania. His career in the State Department included posts in Japan, Hong Kong, South Korean, and an ambassadorship to Malaysia. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1991.

SHOESMITH: I was assigned as the deputy on the Taiwan desk, then the Republic of China desk. I was asked to take that job, again by somebody that knew me. That's the way it used to work. It does today to some extent, I suppose. Bob Fearey asked me to come back and handle that job. I had no previous experience with respect to China/Taiwan and very limited with respect to China, except for my time in Hong Kong, which was not the kind of experience which would have been terribly helpful. But I was glad to have the job. After I was there about a year, the Country Director went off to Vietnam, and I succeeded him as Country Director for Republic of China Affairs, I think, in 1967, some time in there. I held that position until I went off to the Senior Seminar in 1971.

Q: Well, you were there in 1969, when the Nixon Administration came in. Taiwan certainly was a major focus, particularly of the Right wing of the Republican Party, which Nixon somewhat represented. What was the difference between the Johnson Administration and the Nixon Administration regarding Taiwan?

SHOESMITH: I have no clear recollection of any differences. What I do recall is that there was considerable sentiment within the Bureau of East Asian Affairs, which I shared, for relaxing the grip which the Republic of China had on our policy with respect to Mainland China. There was a feeling that we should try to move in the direction of some opening toward Mainland China. I think that it was in that time frame that the Secretary -- who was it then? Rogers, I guess -- made a speech somewhere to which we contributed. Secretary Rogers said something to the effect that when we are concerned with matters under the control of the people in Beijing, we will have to deal with them. Regarding matters which are under the control of Taiwan, we will have to deal with the Republic of China. And that was the first sort of crack in the door. I suspect that the Secretary had little input into what was going on in the White House in the same direction. Our concern at this time was focused on efforts to try to resolve the question of Communist China's exclusion from the U. N. There were other countries that were beginning to recognize Beijing and to cut their ties with Taiwan. There was increasing pressure in the United Nations to bring China into the United Nations. Initially, we had opposed that. However, that opposition was beginning to waver. Of course, we spent a lot of time talking with the Republic of China Embassy here, in an effort to prepare them for some change in our position on the United Nations and to get them in a more sympathetic frame of mind toward changing their own position. For example, Communist China would be in the Security Council, but we would somehow try to find a way to retain the Republic of China in the General Assembly. All of that effort, of course, just went up in smoke with the Kissinger visit to China, which came as a complete surprise to me. I don't know whether the Assistant Secretary knew anything about it. For that matter, I don't know whether Secretary of State Rogers knew anything about it. I was on leave in Pennsylvania, and there was a notice that the President was going to make some important announcement on television. I remember my son asking, "What do you suppose that's about?" I didn't have any idea. And when the President said that Henry Kissinger had visited Beijing, I couldn't believe it.

Q: This was when you were still on the desk?

SHOESMITH: I was still on the desk. This was in 1971, before I went over to the Senior Seminar.

Q: The Assistant Secretary was Marshall Green, wasn't he, at the time? He didn't know about it because he mentioned being at a staff meeting and making some remark about Kissinger saying that he had tummy trouble. He said, "It sounds as if you've gone off to China," and then all of a sudden he realized what he had said at the staff meeting and thought, "My God, you know, there might be something to this."

SHOESMITH: I recall something of this story. So, as of that point, well, everything we'd been doing for a year or more, principally with the Republic of China Embassy here in Washington had gone up in smoke. Our Embassy in Taipei was not much involved in this effort to try and get the Republic of China to save some of its position.

Q: Well, you really were looking at a two China policy...

SHOESMITH: We were, in effect, yes, looking at a two China policy.

Q: Well, how, let's say, before the Nixon shock came about, how receptive was the Republic of China's Embassy to this idea?

SHOESMITH: Oh, totally unreceptive. I mean, I used to talk mostly with the DCM [Deputy Chief of Mission]. I knew him as a friend, and we had a very good relationship. He could understand what we were trying to do and he may even, himself, have been sympathetic, but he knew that his government would never countenance such a move. It would not be involved in it in any way. We tried, but to absolutely no avail. I remember particularly talking with people from the Canadian Embassy to get them to retain some sort of tie with Taiwan, as they had recognized Beijing. They were unsympathetic. So, it was a futile effort that I was engaged in.

Q: Did you feel this at the time or did you think that...

SHOESMITH: I certainly saw that it had very little chance of success, but I myself was not just going through the motions. I must have felt that it was important that Taiwan not be simply cast adrift, that there had to be some place in the international structure for Taiwan. If you could work out something in the United Nations, such as I mentioned, a place for them in the General Assembly, this would have been a good thing to do. However, looking back at the situation at the time, I have to say that I probably realized at the time that there was very little hope that this could be achieved.

Q: How did the Republic of China's Embassy work in Washington? Did they still have the "China Lobby," or a vestige of that to try to bypass the Department of State to some extent? Did they have a direct ear or a direct line to Congress?

SHOESMITH: I don't think they had much support. I mean the "China Lobby" at that time was no longer a significant factor. I think that their ambassador was a very experienced and a very effective person. He probably tried to do what he could. He could see the direction in which things were moving, particularly after Kissinger's visit. I just don't know how much of a sympathetic ear he got up on the Hill. We were sympathetic and were trying to do what we could. It was clear that we were going to be moving toward an opening to China, as we saw it and as I saw it. The task was to try to preserve some position, not only within the UN but internationally for Taiwan, for the Republic of China. For the Republic of China on Taiwan. But the position of both sides at that time -- Beijing and Taipei -- was that you could not have relations with both. And so after 1970-71 more and more countries decided to make that break. Taiwan, it was clear, was going to be increasingly isolated, diplomatically and internationally. There was nothing, I think, that we were in a position to do to halt that.

Q: Well, as you looked at it, could you see the situation which has more or less developed today? There is really a very vigorous, economic power on Formosa or Taiwan, just sitting out there, without diplomatic clout. However, it really doesn't make a lot of difference.

SHOESMITH: No, I don't think I foresaw that. I think views about the Republic of China at that time were very much affected by the rather negative impression we had of Chiang Kai-shek and of the KMT [Kuo Min Tang] regime in Taiwan. They had martial law. It was very ineffective, I mean, politically. Of course, we did have important bases there. It was one of the safe havens for the families of people serving in our Mission in Vietnam. And the Republic of China was very cooperative in allowing us to use their bases in support of our activities in Vietnam. We had that, but as to the future, I mean, what would happen to Taiwan, it was not a very bright picture. I don't think anyone anticipated either the economic or the political evolution of Taiwan, which has occurred over the last decade. Particularly politically, within the past five or six years. I certainly wouldn't have anticipated that. The successor to Chiang Kai-shek, Chiang Ching-kuo, gave no signs that he was a man with the breadth of vision that he subsequently demonstrated.

Q: He was basically not only the son of Chiang Kai-shek but the head of the police and all, wasn't he?

SHOESMITH: That's right. He had been, yes.

NEAL DONNELLY
Taichung Language School
Taiwan (1967-1968)

Branch Public Affairs Officer
Kaohsiung, Taiwan (1968-1971)

Cultural Affairs Officer
Taipei, Taiwan (1971-1972)

China Branch Chief, Voice of America
Washington, DC (1972-1975)

Cultural Affairs Officer/Deputy Public Affairs Officer
Taipei, Taiwan (1975-1981)

Mr. Donnelly was born and raised in Buffalo, New York. After graduating from Canisius College he served with the US Army in Korea. He joined the United States Information Service in 1960. His assignments, primarily in the Cultural and Public Affairs field in the Far East, included Saigon, Hong Kong and Taiwan, where he served in a number of different capacities. After entering the State Department Foreign Service Mr. Donnelly had a number of assignments with the Voice of America in Washington. Mr. Donnelly was interviewed by David Reuther in 2001.

Q: After Harvard you're actually just beginning on being in a school environment; you went from there to Taichung Language School.

DONNELLY: Taichung Language School. I was there for not quite a year; I was pulled out early because they needed someone to staff the branch in Kaohsiung. It's a big port city. There was military north of the city and the naval base at Tsoying. There were some U.S. Naval people and a few other military in Kaohsiung, but I was the only Foreign Service officer southern Taiwan. It's a big city with a lot of important people. It was quite interesting.

Q: Let's go back to Taichung for a minute. How was the language school set up and what was it doing in the middle of the island?

DONNELLY: It's now in Taipei, as you know. Why was it in the middle of the island? I think it was somebody's idea that it's best to teach language in a local setting where you can go out and hear Chinese spoken all the time. There are too many distractions in Taipei and there's too much English spoken there. I guess that was the idea. I think it worked; I think there were an awful lot of people in Taichung, a few that spoke English, but a lot of people spoke Mandarin. Of course the language of the local people in Taichung is what they call Taiwanese or Fujianese, or whatever they want to call it, but it was very similar.

Q: Your Mandarin didn't get you far down.

DONNELLY: Most people could understand it and certainly the young people were all educated in Mandarin.

Q: Now who was in language school with you? Do you remember? Was it a big class?

DONNELLY: Yes, Al Romberg, who later became a State Department spokesman, he lived next door to me. Dick Williams, who was later consul general in Hong Kong.

Q: Was Bill Rolp there at that time?

DONNELLY: No, Bill Rolp was not there. I guess other people's names will come to me in a minute, but those two names stand out.

Q: But it was a fair number of people, ten to fifteen people?

DONNELLY: It was about thirty, I think.

Q: What were they going to do with them?

DONNELLY: Some of them were military and there were some, I guess, CIA. I didn't know; I've always been rather dense about the CIA. One of my friends there, I found out later, was in the CIA. I'd had no idea. But there were a fair number of them. Only a few were State Department that I know of; Naran Ivanchukov, and of course Romberg. Naran and Romberg and Dick Williams. In USIA there were Wally Gibson and myself, Dave Huey and there was a guy named Bill Buehler who was in the Army with me in Korea; he was CIA and later left the CIA and now is teaching Chinese at the language school in Monterey. He was at the army language school in Monterey when I was there and then he went to Korea with me. He studied Mandarin right from the get-go; his Mandarin is very good, obviously.

Q: Now FSI (Foreign Service Institute) Taichung is so many hours of speaking and so many hours of recitation off tapes?

DONNELLY: Six hours of class work and then you work at home; it's intensive.

Q: Did you get an opportunity to tour the island as part of the class?

DONNELLY: Yes, for one week, I think between Christmas and New Year's, they assign a teacher to two or three students to tour the island. We went around it in a car that belonged to one of the students. What we found is that the teacher who was of course a mainlander, not a Taiwanese, was absolutely useless. He didn't know anything about the island and he couldn't speak the local language, so we could've just as well went without him. (laughs)

Later on I toured the island myself with one or two friends on bicycles; I've been all over that island on bicycle. Staying in little inns at 75 cents a night or something like that.

Q: Now this is before the economy in Taiwan really begins to pick up, isn't it?

DONNELLY: Yes.

Q: The U.S. terminated aid in '65, I think, and you were there in '67. Were there any inklings of what would become this great economic expansion?

DONNELLY: When I was in Kaohsiung, they opened up something called the Kaohsiung Export Processing Zone. It was several factories built on what was a sandbar in the Kaohsiung Harbor and they invited foreigners, mainly Americans, British and whatnot, to bring in material or components and hire local people, usually young girls, to process them and then send them out, but not sell them in Taiwan. They started out, the young girls, making transistors and shirts, tennis rackets, golf clubs, all these things, and they would earn probably about $30 a month. I think that was about the beginning. That was extremely successful; foreign companies made a lot of money and the government made some money on taxes. It didn't hurt the local economy bringing in imported goods because they couldn't be sold there and people were getting money and would buy motorcycles and things.

It worked so well that they set up one north of Kaohsiung and then another north of Taichung. In any event, there were three of them by the time I left. The idea was so good that they just kept expanding in it and forgetting about the export processing; just bringing in. I don't know if they did it in any other country, but it was certainly the beginning of American factories taking advantage of local labor.

Q: You're in language school and you left early, you said, to go to Kaohsiung. You said there were a couple of other USIA people there; did they have other assignments and you were there unassigned, or you were always going to go to Kaohsiung and you went early?

DONNELLY: Happenstance.

Q: (laughs) You did that already!

DONNELLY: I had no inkling. I didn't ask for it. I don't know why it happened.

Q: Well now, in those days could you take language without an ongoing assignment?

DONNELLY: In those days, yes. Right now if you're in the Foreign Service, you bid for assignments. Never; I never bid for an assignment. That procedure was not in effect when I was in Taiwan.

Q: That would come in, in the 1970s. You're right.

DONNELLY: They would decide where they want to send you. I think in the case of sending me to Kaohsiung, the PAO in Taipei was Ken Boyle and he had been my PAO in Hong Kong, so he knew me. He didn't ask me if I wanted to go, he just said, "Go." He said, "Go," and he goeth; come and he cometh. (laughs)

Q: So you left the language school a little bit early. If you took language at Harvard and you've got FSI, you must've hit 3/3. Did you test out?

DONNELLY: Oh, I think so. I took some Taiwanese as well in Taichung, so I had some Taiwanese.

***

DONNELLY: When I was in Kaohsiung, they opened up something called the Kaohsiung Export Processing Zone. It was several factories built on what was a sandbar in the Kaohsiung Harbor and they invited foreigners, mainly Americans, British and whatnot, to bring in material or components and hire local people, usually young girls, to process them and then send them out, but not sell them in Taiwan. They started out, the young girls, making transistors and shirts, tennis rackets, golf clubs, all these things, and they would earn probably about $30 a month. I think that was about the beginning. That was extremely successful; foreign companies made a lot of money and the government made some money on taxes. It didn't hurt the local economy bringing in imported goods because they couldn't be sold there and people were getting money and would buy motorcycles and things.

It worked so well that they set up one north of Kaohsiung and then another north of Taichung. In any event, there were three of them by the time I left. The idea was so good that they just kept expanding in it and forgetting about the export processing; just bringing in. I don't know if they did it in any other country, but it was certainly the beginning of American factories taking advantage of local labor.

Q: You're in language school and you left early, you said, to go to Kaohsiung. You said there were a couple of other USIA people there; did they have other assignments and you were there unassigned, or you were always going to go to Kaohsiung and you went early?

DONNELLY: Happenstance.

Q: (laughs) You did that already!

DONNELLY: I had no inkling. I didn't ask for it. I don't know why it happened.

Q: Well now, in those days could you take language without an ongoing assignment?

DONNELLY: In those days, yes. Right now if you're in the Foreign Service, you bid for assignments. Never; I never bid for an assignment. That procedure was not in effect when I was in Taiwan.

Q: That would come in, in the 1970s. You're right.

DONNELLY: They would decide where they want to send you. I think in the case of sending me to Kaohsiung, the PAO in Taipei was Ken Boyle and he had been my PAO in Hong Kong, so he knew me. He didn't ask me if I wanted to go, he just said, "Go." He said, "Go," and he goeth; come and he cometh. (laughs)

Q: So you left the language school a little bit early. If you took language at Harvard and you've got FSI, you must've hit 3/3. Did you test out?

DONNELLY: Oh, I think so. I took some Taiwanese as well in Taichung, so I had some Taiwanese.

Q: Now you go to Kaohsiung in July of '68. Would you describe what that mission was; it was a consulate?

DONNELLY: No, it was just a branch post.

Q: But was there also a Foreign Service consulate there?

DONNELLY: No.

Q: So USIA was it?

DONNELLY: I was it. If they wanted a speaker at a college assembly, if they wanted an American official, I was it. If anybody had to call in the mayor, I was with them to call the mayor. I'd have the mayor over to my house and...

Q: I'm interested in this because of course when I was there in the '80s, Kaohsiung was a three or four person post reporting on political events that were going on in Kaohsiung. So here the American presence in Kaohsiung is the telling of America's story; USIA-type presence. Kaohsiung is not politically and economically important enough...

DONNELLY: Taiwan probably wasn't in the American scope. The TOEFL Exam would be run in my center, some of it. All that sort of stuff.

Q: How many locals did you have then?

DONNELLY: I had about eight, I guess. I had a driver, three librarians, an assistant, a janitor, and a motion picture guy.

Q: So you had an auditorium where you could show films or hold cultural events?

DONNELLY: If we had speakers come down, just ordinary...

Q: What kind of academic institutions were there at the time?

DONNELLY: There was a medical college; the medical college was the biggest college. There was another college; I forget the name of it. It was a normal college. Later on they put a couple more universities down there. A medical college and a normal college, I think were it. I remember, they asked me to give a lecture on American foreign policy at the medical college. Most of the students at the medical college were Taiwanese and after I gave the talk, they had something called "pan chang;" that was the student who was to run roughshod over other students if they got politically away from the Kuomintang; learned too much.

Q: This was the political officer.

DONNELLY: They had a political officer, yes. So he got up - of course, most of the students are Taiwanese - and he said, "Why don't you," meaning America, "want us to return to the mainland?" And I said, "I want you to go to the mainland," at which point the students erupted and they whistled and cheered. (laughs)

Q: (laughs) That's an interesting way in which the society was organized at that time. The KMT, the Kuomintang, is a Leninist party.

DONNELLY: They controlled all the police chiefs, all the university presidents and major staff, all the ministries; they had everything. The Kuomintang really had things screwed down pretty tightly. So much so that almost all the Taiwanese disliked the regime, but they would be afraid to even talk about it because they're not sure... If there are three people together, then someone is an informer. Besides the garrison command and the police and their equivalent of the FBI (Federal Bureau of Investigation), they had several units whose job was to ferret out dangerous types, so Taiwanese wouldn't want to talk openly. If they even mentioned the number 2-2-8, they would be thrown in jail. I know a man who was thrown in jail for having a copy of Edgar Snow's Red Star Over China; he took it from an American school library. They found it and then they threw him in jail.

The husband of one of my employees was ratted on because when he was in China he belonged to a hiking group and they had Communist connections, although he was no Communist. Years later, somebody had an argument and ratted on him that he was a Communist and they threw him in jail and then one day they just called up and said, "Come and collect the body." They executed him.

It was very tight. You had to be very careful what you said. Some people were fearless though; there was a politician named Kuo Kuo-ch'I. They called him Ta P'ao, meaning "big cannon" because he had a big mouth. I went to one of his election rallies and he was talking. The way they ran election rallies, all candidates could get up and talk for twenty minutes or a number of minutes and that's all they had.

This rally was for a legislative Yuan (equivalent of our Congress). There could be KMT candidates and independent candidates, but the independents could not form a political party; they had to run separately. Big Kuo got up and said, "I don't want to talk about Taiwan. I want to talk about a small country in Africa called Rhodesia. In Rhodesia all the important positions, all the police and magistrates and the important government people, they're all from another country. They're all from Britain; none of them are Rhodesian. Of course, the Taiwanese immediately get the point and they all started screaming and laughing and the Kuomintang (KMT) which was running, but they had to shut the machine off, the microphone. But he very cleverly got the point across that they were being controlled by foreigners: the mainland Chinese.

Q: Why is it, do you think, the KMT even allowed those elections?

DONNELLY: Oh, I think they had to. You have to have some semblance; even in Communism they have the local meaningless elections for group leaders and things. You have to have something.

Q: Kaohsiung was in fact a very Taiwanese part of town. The mainlanders were all up in Taipei. If you had some Taiwanese you must have been very popular.

DONNELLY: Well, I got along well with the Taiwanese; I liked them, also I liked a lot of mainlanders I knew there. But because I spoke some Taiwanese and had a lot of Taiwanese contacts I was rather looked on with suspicion by the government.

I'll never forget in 1975 when I came back to work in Washington at the Voice of America, one of my broadcasters there asked me to go to dinner at a Chinese affair where the Minister of Information, Fred Chen, was going to be the speaker. This was in Washington. I said okay and afterwards she said, "I'd like to introduce you to him." Now, I'd never met him. He was head of the information office in Taipei. I'd been in Taiwan all those years but down island. I'd never met this man, and she introduced me to him. She said, "This is my new boss, Neal Donnelly," and he must not have heard my first name and he said to me, "Are you any relation to Neal Donnelly?" I said, "Yes." Obviously he had my dossier that he had been reading because I'd never met him. I think probably they're very suspicious of me, without any reason at all because I never was instrumental in anything.

Maybe he knew my name because of the bombing in Tainan. About three or four days after China was admitted to the UN (United Nations), I think October twelfth it was - I think it was Columbus Day, I was in the office in Tainan. I had a cultural center in Tainan and the one in Kaohsiung. I went back and forth between the two.

Q: Oh, you covered both?

DONNELLY: I covered both, yes.

Q: So there wasn't a separate third office of USIA? It was Tainan?

DONNELLY: No, I had both and also a reading room in Pingdong. So it was a big area. I left the office and Bob Nichols, who was the Taipei deputy, was down visiting at that time and that night I had invited the temple committee from the San Feng Kung Temple in Kaohsiung to dinner. I spent a lot of time in and around temples because I became interested and I thought it was very important to understand the religion of the country. If you want to understand a country, you should understand the religion. I think we're learning that now in Afghanistan.

I had the temple committee, only one of whom could speak a little English, and two who could speak Mandarin. The rest were Taiwanese and they were almost country bumpkinish types. Bob and I just got back from Tainan to Kaohsiung and just sitting down to dinner when the phone rang. It was my chief assistant, K.C. Chuang, in Tainan telling me that our building had been blown up. Now this was incredible. Since February 28, 1947 there had been no terrorist explosions and it was just incredible. So I said, "I'll come right away". The temple committee really didn't understand why I invited them to dinner and left them without eating, but Bob and I rushed back to Tainan and there was very serious damage to the building. A powerful bomb was set outside my office and some students were hurt badly. My janitor was hurt.

Q: Now the explosion was in the evening?

DONNELLY: Yes, right after I left the office, so it was about six o'clock, I suppose.

Q: So that's not too evening; so knowledgeable that there would be people in the building.

DONNELLY: Oh, yes, they knew that. So we went back and there were two boys that were hurt badly; one lost a leg and the other got a hundred or so pieces of wood and things imbedded in his body. He was in the hospital a long time. They were both poor boys, sixteen years old. You know, trying to learn something at USIS and they were from a little fishing village nearby. Very poor. So I got the ambassador, who was McConaughy, I think at the time, to put some money aside from our liquor fund. They sold liquor, as you know, and then made profit; the profit went for one thing or the other. Anyway, he set aside $5000 each for the boys which was enough for them to get a college education. I'm still in contact with them.

Q: Really? What are they doing now?

DONNELLY: One now has got a Ph.D. and his wife has a Ph.D. He is a chemical engineer and is dean of a university in Taiwan now. So something good came of it.

Q: You were saying the bomb was brought into the building?

DONNELLY: Yes, put in between my office and the library.

Q: So the building is open?

DONNELLY: Sure, the building is open. The students were there; it was about six o'clock and the library had students in it.

Q: Now the issue is who claims credit or who gets blamed for this? I mean, as you say, this was just weeks after China gets into the UN. Kissinger has already gone to China and in July of '71 Nixon announces that he is going to go to China in February of '72 and then the vote is taken in the UN on the representation issue and Beijing enters the UN. Shortly after that, there's this explosion.

DONNELLY: I believe, now we can check this, but I believe China entered the UN before Kissinger went to China.

Q: No, before Nixon went.

DONNELLY: Before Kissinger. Because I learned of Kissinger going to China when I was transferred to Taipei, and this happened before.

Q: Hum.

DONNELLY: No, China entered the UN before Kissinger went to China. The UN vote, as you recall, the balance of those in favor and against kept slipping and at one point they got in without the help of the United States. I'm pretty sure of that.

Q: Well, I just checked it so...

DONNELLY: Oh, you checked it?

Q: Yes, Kissinger went secretly in early '71 and in July of '71 Nixon announced that he'd been invited as a result of the previous tour. So, by July of '71, Nixon makes public his invitation to go to China in February of '72. So this event of yours is then July/August of '71.

DONNELLY: No, It's October of probably '70. China was in the UN before Kissinger went to China. I don't know how I can check this, but I will.

Q: Yes, it'd be interesting.

DONNELLY: China was in the UN before Kissinger went.

Q: Coming back to the point though, whose bomb?

DONNELLY: When we got there, my chief assistant was livid because there were about four or five different KMT security groups, the garrison command, the police, their FBI – they called them ministry or bureau or something, and they're all in there, and my assistant, a Taiwanese said, "They're in here destroying evidence." In any event, they said they were going to question every person on the island to find out. Finally they blamed a young Taiwanese student and they put him in jail. Treated him nicely in jail and then let him out. He came to the United States later and I met him; he did not do it. The question is, who at that time had access to explosives? I was told by a friendly magistrate that it was the son of a general who was mad because China got into the UN, but I can't confirm that. But who would have access to explosives in an island that's so tightly controlled?

Q: That's a singularly good point.

DONNELLY: Who would be mad at the United States? Simply not the Taiwanese; we were a beacon for the Taiwanese.

Q: Why do you say that? A beacon in what sense? Were we very public in our criticism of the Kuomintang's efforts.

DONNELLY: The United States, as you well know and everybody knows, is a democratic society and we were pushing democracy in all sorts of ways. We were sending a lot of students from Taiwan, both mainlanders and Taiwanese, to the United States and they liked what they saw. They saw us as a counter balance. If the United States wasn't there, God knows how repressive the regime of Chiang Kai-shek would've been.

Q: So they were aware that by programs and by profile we were making it a little bit easier for them, even on the island?

DONNELLY: I think that's really true in every country; in the world probably.

Q: Without sanctions; don't you have to put sanctions on people first?

DONNELLY: Well, I wouldn't, but then I'm not running things.

Q: While you're in Kaohsiung, Vietnam is still around, in fact, there's Tet in '68. Are any of those issues affecting your presentation in your public speeches when you're addressing these issues?

DONNELLY: In Taiwan you didn't have to apologize for being an anti-communist.

Q: (laughs) It made your job very easy.

DONNELLY: It didn't affect it at all, no.

Q: On the other hand, you had the Tet Spring of August '68 in this timeframe.

DONNELLY: Yes, again, they were interested in it, but we didn't have to address that specifically.

Q: Actually, at this time in Taiwan, maybe not down in the south, but certainly up in the north, there was a series of student demonstrations on the Diao Yu T'ai issue, which are these small islands equally claimed by the Japanese and China. The Japanese seemed to be getting the upper hand. This was 1970. Did you see any student demonstrations down in your area?

DONNELLY: It was the Senkaku island dispute. As a matter of fact, there had been no student demonstrations in Taiwan since 1947. There was Marshal Law; they were not allowed to have student demonstrations. The first student demonstration was at USIS, Tainan. I got a call from the same guy, K.C. Chuang. He said, "Get up here right away. There's a student demonstration." I said, "Impossible; you can't have one." What had happened is fifty students walked from Chung Kung University, an engineering university in Tainan, passed a police station to USIS and demonstrated. How were they allowed to do that? You can't have a demonstration. The way they were able to do it is that the fifty of them were overseas Chinese students; they were from Singapore and places like that, so the police weren't going to touch them. They came and demanded that we force the Senkaku question; we force the Japanese to accept that it is Chinese. I called Taipei for instructions before I went up to Tainan; I called from Kaohsiung to Taipei to the political officer and he said, "Invite a couple of the students in and listen to them and don't promise them anything."

Q: Who was in Taipei at the time?

DONNELLY: It might have been Leo Moser. The ambassador was McConaughy, I'm sure. The political officer might have been Leo Moser.

In any event, I went out there and there were the fifty students outside raising their arms and stuff like that and the police looking sheepish because they know these guys shouldn't be doing that, but they don't know what to do about it. I went in and talked to the leaders and they kept talking about the sovereignty and whatnot and I kept saying, "Yes, yes, yes," until they were sick of hearing me say, "Yes, yes, yes," and then they left. That was the first demonstration. Then the next two or three days, because the ice had been broken, the students in Taida, Taiwan National University, thought if these people could get away with it in Tainan then there had to be demonstrations in Taipei. But it was the fifty overseas Chinese students who came to my office who started the whole thing.

Q: It's a very nationalistic issue for China; this claim to these islands that sit between Taiwan and Japan. I understand from some academic readings that this nationalism just really took over on Taida campus and some people got a little excited and went a little too far.

DONNELLY: Well, it was pent up emotions for a lot of things, obviously for the nationalistic idea, but also just to demonstrate. Students like to demonstrate; they had a chance now and they had a cause. In Taipei they took it. They bused people in. But they wouldn't have done it if it weren't for those fifty overseas students who took the bull by the horns and marched to my center in Tainan.

Q: Did you know a Taiwanese nationalist by the name of Peng Ming-min at this time?

DONNELLY: Not at the time; I've met him later. When he was ferreted out of Taiwan, I think that was probably 1967, he went to a Nordic country first and then finally to the United States; the University of Michigan, I believe. I've met him since. He became the head of FAPA, the Foremost Association for Public Affairs in Washington.

Q: The United States was implicated in his surreptitious departure. Did you feel anything about that or did anybody talk to you about that because you're down in the very Taiwanese area of the island?

DONNELLY: Yes, there's a lot of speculation.

Q: Again, not bad for U.S. image?

DONNELLY: Not among the Taiwanese. There were two, probably men of course, and then there was a guy by the name of Thornberry who got out of the island surreptitiously. The way Peng Ming-min got out, there's a lot of speculation; the Kuomintang thought that he either flew out from the American airbase south of Taichung, CCK Airbase, or he went out on a U.S. navy ship from Kaohsiung Harbor. As a matter of fact, he went on a Japanese visa; he had a beard and an artificial arm. He lost an arm, you know. He was in Japan studying in Hiroshima or Nagasaki and he lost an arm in the atomic bomb blast and has an artificial arm now. He was on more or less under loose house arrest because he had been a favorite of the former vice president. But he slipped out with a beard, an artificial arm and a Japanese passport; he left that way. We had nothing to do with it.

Q: Another event that occurs at this time is CCK (Chiang Ching-kuo) is traveling in America and there is an assassination attempt on the trip in 1970. Was there any repercussions that you noticed in the press or the conversations you were having with people?

DONNELLY: I was at a party with some Taiwanese right after it and one of the Taiwanese (this isn't very nice to report I guess – it doesn't reflect favorably on him) was talking to me and he said, "Just like a Taiwanese; he can't shoot straight." That's about the only effect. The Chinese government didn't blame America for that and CCK actually was pretty big about it himself. He didn't make a big vendetta over it.

Q: Is there anything else about Kaohsiung or Tainan that we haven't covered? Basically it's your own little empire in Southern Taiwan; you're the only American official.

DONNELLY: It was wonderful. I enjoyed it a lot. I spent a lot of time riding around the island on bicycles and stopping in little villages and spending the night. I got to know the people very well and had a very nice time.

Q: Are you beginning to see the economic expansion? This is now 1970, 1971.

DONNELLY: Especially with the Kaohsiung Processing Zone, yes. Every year people had a little bit more; this year they'd buy a refrigerator, next year they'd buy a motorcycle. Every year they got a little better. That was why there wasn't a great deal of uprising against the Kuomintang because people's lives were getting better.

***

DONNELLY: I think I was called the publication officer at that time. Student Review was the biggest thing we did. We had other books and things. One thing I might mention about Kaohsiung...

After the bombing of the cultural center in Tainan, it took three months or more to put the building together again; there was extensive damage. Actually the Taiwan government paid for most or all of it. We rearranged the building, expanded rooms, and partitioned others. We ended up with an empty room about twelve feet by eighteen feet, something like that, and we decided to use that room and make it available to local young artists to hang pictures.

We got a hold of a well-known local artist and asked him if he would make a committee up and select young artists to hang their pictures there for a couple weeks at a time, but the stipulation was that there could be no sales made. This was only to get them started. We did that and it was a very successful program, so we duplicated it in Kaohsiung and then the USIS branch in Taichung also made a little gallery. Finally Taipei did the same thing. So we had four art galleries going in the early '70s showing art of young artists of some quality; the quality was judged by local established artists. I think that almost any of the young artists over there in those days got their start in the USIS gallery which we began in Tainan.

Q: But you mention that there was some resistance on your boss' part.

DONNELLY: Well, the resistance came later when people in Washington found out that we were doing this and told us it's not the USIS' mission to promote local artists. But I had a different take on it; it seems to me that it established a great deal of goodwill and it was a rather democratic thing to do. Anyway, we did it as long as I was in Taiwan and right up until the '80s when I went back.

***

Q: You were talking earlier about traveling around between Kaohsiung and Tainan on bicycle. What was the road net like in those days? We're talking the late '60s.

DONNELLY: In those days there was a decent paved road between Taiwan and Kaohsiung, but I would travel secondary roads on bicycle. I didn't want to be on what we called "suicide alley"; everyday you'd see an awful accident when you're driving there. Not only that, but I travel on my bike all over the place. I put my bicycle on a train and then get off at a place and bicycle back. There was a guy by the name of Dave Hughes, who was a Foreign Service Officer for a time; we bicycled from Souao on the east coast, 300 kilometers down to Taitung. Along that mountain road it took us five and a half days. It was quite an adventure.

Q: Had you been staying at the inns?

DONNELLY: We stayed at the inns except one night. We were between little towns; we were about twenty kilometers from one town to the other and we came to a little hamlet. The hamlet was called Ho Ping which means peace. There were fourteen thatched roof houses there and it was getting dark and we didn't have any lights on our bikes so we couldn't drive in the dark. We stopped in the middle of this little hamlet and a lady came out and we asked her, "Is there a restaurant here?" She said, "No." "Is there a little inn?" "No." Well, we stood looking at each other and her husband came along and he said, "Well you can spend the night with us." So he brought us in and they gave us a meal; it was rice, regular rice, with a vegetable dish with something like bok choy or cabbage and just maybe a sliver or two of pork and boiled water. That tasted really good then.

They were going to put us up in their one room place. They were going to give us their bed and then the children and they would find someplace to sleep. A policeman came. Now along the border they have border police and this was out on the eastern shore. He talked to them, but didn't talk to us. He wanted to know what we were doing there and I could sense that there was trouble for this family. They were kind to us and we were causing trouble. So he left and pretty soon his superior came; his superior was a sergeant or something. He came and he talked to us. He said, "Who are you?" and we told him. I said, "I'm with the embassy," and he said, "Why did you pick this particular family to come to?" I could see, oh God, these people are in for it. At about that time the neighbor came. They were Taiwanese but the neighbor was an old soldier from the mainland. He offered for us to spend the night at his house. So we went over and before we got to bed he said, "Well, we've got to have a drink," and of course if a Chinese invites you to drink, you better drink. He had this little thatched house with a mud floor. So we said okay and he went over and got a five gallon can, you know the type you see on the back of jeeps, a gasoline can, and he brought it over. He had made his own moonshine; white lightning. So he started pouring it into little cups, and I thought, oh, my God Almighty. So, we toasted and I drank it. We did this about three or four times. It was awful. Then we went to bed. My friend and I shared the bed. I woke up in the morning and I thought, 'Boy I can see!' I thought I would probably be blind. Dave said, "What do you mean?" "That was awful stuff. What did it do to me?" He said, "You didn't drink it, did you?" and I said, "Of course. I saw you drink it." He said, "No, I poured it on the floor." Anyway, this goes to show the kindness of these people towards us and the trouble they could've gotten into.

Q: Yes. The Mainlander guy can invite you to his house, but the Taiwanese were compromised by extending the same hospitality. When you were down in Kaohsiung, how much supervision were you getting from your bosses in Taipei?

DONNELLY: Well, I didn't get much. I was grateful for that. When I applied for USIA, there was a plaque on a building at 1776 Pennsylvania Avenue. The plaque read: "Telling America's Story to the World." I guess I did that best by not having a lot of direction. I felt that if the people better understood our policy, which I could explain, then there wouldn't be so many misunderstandings and wars and all sorts of trouble. I modestly think that I might have been successful with less direction than with more direction.

Q: Did you go up to Taipei from time to time?

DONNELLY: The first couple of years Ken Boyle was the PAO, I went up about four times a year. Travel wasn't very easy, nor was telephone communication. The Taiwan telephone system was pretty bad. To call there, we would use military field phones and hook up to a U.S. Army net. I would get through that way. But it wasn't easy. You'd be shouting into the phone. To go up by train, it took eight hours in those days.

Q: So your telephone communication in those days was to hook you into the U.S. military, so the U.S. military was in another place in Taiwan and it had its own net?

DONNELLY: North of Kaohsiung was a naval base. There was an American contingent there.

Q: After having all this independence and all this time in Taiwan to yourself, Taipei discovers you and decides that you better come up there with them in August of '71. Can you describe your duties in Taipei?

DONNELLY: The first year I was there, the main thing I did was the magazine Student Review. It was a bilingual... That was my main duty, and then other cultural duties from time to time.

Q: Did you get involved with the local television and movie people?

DONNELLY: No.

Q: So you were all print.

DONNELLY: For the most part, yes.

Q: Did USIA have any contact?

DONNELLY: Yes, they did. As a matter of fact, one of our local boys was a former movie actor and he had a lot of contact with them, but we really didn't do much with movies. The movie industry was fairly well developed by that time.

Q: Were the local movies popular?

DONNELLY: Oh, yes, sure.

Q: I'm under the impression that the movie The Sand Pebbles, which was one of Steve McQueen's first movies, was actually filmed in Tanshui, on that part of the river.

DONNELLY: It may have been, some of it, but my understanding was that it was filmed in the Philippines.

Q: Could be most of the scenes. I was once told though that it was banned in Taiwan, that they weren't allowed to see it.

DONNELLY: It was not complimentary to the nationalist soldiers. There were American movies, I guess; I didn't go to movies that much. I did go sometimes to the local movies for language comprehension. One of the movie houses I went to, which had Taiwanese movies, was just a very small shed with wooden benches and a dirt floor. It's nothing like that now. This movie house in Kaohsiung was situated between two brothels. I'll never forget taking my eight year old daughter to see a funny Taiwanese movie and thinking, if she only knew where the hell she was. There were two brothel areas. One was behind city hall; another one of those buildings by the railroad station.

Q: You were saying though there's Taiwanese language movies. How did that fit with the KMT's language requirement. For radio and television, they only allowed a couple of hours in Taiwanese.

DONNELLY: They would allow the weather report in Taiwanese. That's very important for the fisherman and the firemen and whatnot. The Taiwanese movies were not political in any way. They were slapstick, guys' pants falling down. I think it didn't bother them much.

Q: But they had that kind of a policy. Did that become a problem for us? I suppose we were putting out reading materials using the characters.

DONNELLY: It was never a problem for USIA in any way. The government's language policies didn't hinder us in any way.

***

Q: So, you've taken the written, you take the oral, they told you right away that you passed the oral?

DONNELLY: No, it was about three months. But I didn't know that I had an assignment until much later. Then I went May 1st, I think is when I went, and was sworn in. I was sworn in by L.K. Little, who has a China connection. He was, for reasons which I don't know, the last customs commissioner in China before the war. The Chinese accepted a foreigner as the customs commissioner; Robert Hart, I think was the first and there were a series of foreigners who were customs commissioners and L.K. Little was the last. I found out later in Taiwan how the Chinese were also proud to be in the customs office because it was squeaky clean and not corrupt like most of the government. The amazing thing was when I got to Taiwan, the Taiwan local administrative officer, the Chinese who did most of our administration, was a man by the name – I think his name was Duan, but in any event he was the first Chinese commissioner after L.K. Little and then of course fled from China when the communists took over he joined our office and became the USIS Taiwan administrative chief.

***

Q: Well, certainly personnel is sending you messages, "Shouldn't you move on?" or where your boss says, "Hey, I want Neal here."

DONNELLY: I was actually ordered out of Kaohsiung to Taipei during my second Kaohsiung tour. I was ordered by Bob Nichols. Of course we can get into this when we get to Taiwan, but after I had my first tour in Kaohsiung, I wanted to go back. USIS didn't want to send me, but the ambassador wanted me to go back, so I did; you do what the ambassador wants. Then I had a tour in Washington and the PAO asked me to come back to Taipei as cultural officer and so I did. While I was there in the second tour we had the normalization; they kept me on. It's all happenstance.

***

Q: I'm afraid to ask, but in August '71 you went up to Taipei; was this personnel or serendipity again?

DONNELLY: I was ordered up by Bob Nichols, who was the deputy. He said, "You've been down there too long."

Q: (laughs) Oh, they noticed you were down there?

DONNELLY: Yes. He said, "It's not good for your career." I said, "Well, I don't care. I like it here." This may sound strange to a lot of Foreign Service Officers who come in as young officers hoping to be ambassador, but I just enjoyed it and I didn't want to go to Taipei, but I was ordered up so I had no choice.

Q: You were the cultural officer, so USIA had a fairly large program in Taipei? How many officers?

DONNELLY: Yes. It had about ten officers and it had a book program, a magazine, a lot of lectures, a big library; all sorts of things.

Q: What's the magazine and how does that work into this?

DONNELLY: Student Review; Student Review was a magazine put together in Taiwan based on articles written in Washington and send out to countries. It was mostly about America, although we'd have some articles written locally about how modern Taiwan was becoming.

Q: This was in English language?

DONNELLY: No, it was bilingual, which made it useful to students. They printed about 70,000 in Manila; there was a USIS printing plant in Manila. Before I became Culture Affairs Officer to Taipei they would send them in bulk to schools for distribution. But I knew from going and visiting schools that the magazines would just sit in the corner. It was a waste of money. I wanted to put a price on the magazine and sell it. I had a hell of a time convincing anybody to do this. Finally they let me do it and they said the circulation would drop. I said, "Half the circulation of people reading it and passing them on is better." It did drop; it dropped about 30,000, but people were buying it and I knew they would buy it because it's bilingual; they could read English and if they don't know what the word means they can glance over at the Chinese on the opposite page. It sold and it was a success.

Q: Was the translation being done in Manila or just the printing?

DONNELLY: Oh no, the translation was being done at the office in Taipei.

Q: So you had full editorial control?

DONNELLY: Yes.

Q: And that was under you as the cultural officer?

DONNELLY: Yes. I think I was called the publication officer at that time. Student Review was the biggest thing we did. We had other books and things. One thing I might mention about Kaohsiung...

After the bombing of the cultural center in Tainan, it took three months or more to put the building together again; there was extensive damage. Actually the Taiwan government paid for most or all of it. We rearranged the building, expanded rooms, and partitioned others. We ended up with an empty room about twelve feet by eighteen feet, something like that, and we decided to use that room and make it available to local young artists to hang pictures.

We got a hold of a well-known local artist and asked him if he would make a committee up and select young artists to hang their pictures there for a couple weeks at a time, but the stipulation was that there could be no sales made. This was only to get them started. We did that and it was a very successful program, so we duplicated it in Kaohsiung and then the USIS branch in Taichung also made a little gallery. Finally Taipei did the same thing. So we had four art galleries going in the early '70s showing art of young artists of some quality; the quality was judged by local established artists. I think that almost any of the young artists over there in those days got their start in the USIS gallery which we began in Tainan.

Q: But you mention that there was some resistance on your boss' part.

DONNELLY: Well, the resistance came later when people in Washington found out that we were doing this and told us it's not the USIS' mission to promote local artists. But I had a different take on it; it seems to me that it established a great deal of goodwill and it was a rather democratic thing to do. Anyway, we did it as long as I was in Taiwan and right up until the '80s when I went back.

As a matter of fact, in the late 1970s when I went back for my second time in Taiwan and was head of the USIS in Taipei, we had probably the most famous and the most successful art exhibit in the whole country in our center. Backing up some years to when we opened in Tainan, there was a fisherman who started painting late in life, sort of a Grandma Moses type, and he came to our center and asked my assistant if he would put up his paintings. My assistant looked at him, and they looked like childish stuff, and said, "No, no, get out of here," so the guy went back crushed. He was a man by the name of Hung Tung; he was a fisherman and his wife sold incense in the local temple in a little coastal town called Pei Men. One day he saw his son drawing Chinese characters and he took up a pen and drew one of the characters and it looked like a man, so he put a head on it and arms and said, "Oh, I can draw," and so he went and got cheap paper and cheap paints and started painting. He told his wife, "Now I'm an artist; I don't work, I draw," and he drew a couple hundred of these really amazing paintings that I'm told are very good.

Some years after he was rejected by our USIS Tainan guy, he went to the artist who we had running the committee, a man by the name of Tseng Pei-yao, and he knocked on his door and said in Taiwanese, "I know you're an artist. I've been to an art exhibit today and I want you to look at some paintings that a friend of mine did," and Tseng looked him and said, "They're marvelous, they're wonderful." He said, "I did them," so Tseng contacted us in Taipei - at this time I had gone to Taipei, and said that he'd like to exhibit this man's work. In the meantime, a very small magazine had printed some of his pictures and they were well received, so we said okay, and we scheduled an exhibit. Before the exhibit we had a press conference; he was a very funny guy who gave sort of off-the-wall answers to whatever question he was asked and he generated a lot of interest, plus the fact that he was Taiwanese and his paintings had no classical Chineseness in them at all. He generated interest and when we opened the exhibit at ten o'clock on, I think it was a Saturday morning, there were 200 people outside waiting to get in. The story got around that this guy's exhibit was fantastic and for two weeks we had people come who had never been to an exhibit in their life; ladies with babies on their backs. All of them were crowding in so we had to open up a back door of our gallery because we couldn't let people in and out the same door. We had to limit it to 200 in there at a time and at all times there were people lined up. It was a real shocker; it was so much of a shock that the established artists were upset and they had what the communists would call a "struggle session" against him, saying, "Who is this guy? He hasn't done what we've done. I've spent all my life drawing bamboo and this guy is..." They really sort of denounced him.

He became very famous and he wouldn't sell any of his paintings. He was poor; he didn't have any money, and he wouldn't sell any of his paintings. He said all he wanted was the government to repair the roof in his house and he'd give them the paintings. He was a very simple man. The magistrate in Tainan Hsien said he would build him a house and after he said that, the government in Taipei came down like a ton of bricks on the magistrate and he withdrew the offer. I visited the man many times later; he lived in a hovel, really. He died and after he died of course his relatives started to sell his paintings and some of them, I'm told, are selling for U.S. $20,000.

Q: It's a great story, but the conflict between Taipei and the Tainan magistrate, is that an expression of artistic conflict or the mainlander Taiwanese?

DONNELLY: It's political.

Q: It's political. It's the ethnic division on the island again.

DONNELLY: The artists who objected to him, not all artists of course, were the established artists. I mentioned before Chung Kung University in Tainan, I can illustrate some of the problems between the Taiwanese and the mainlanders, for a couple years I got permission from the president of the university to audit a history course. I wanted to audit a history course for language comprehension training. It was a lady teacher; a mainland teacher. She taught modern Chinese history. Well, modern Chinese history is just fraught with all sorts of contradictions. But in those two years that I was there, she would get up and speak and no student asked any question of her at all about what she said. That's just the way history classes were conducted in that school and probably in other schools.

At one cocktail party, I met her and we were talking about a friend of mine who is a Dutchman, but a Taoist priest. He was an anthropologist and a sociologist, but he'd become a Taoist priest so he could do his research. This lady was livid at this man who lived in Tainan, a man by the name of Kristofer (Rick) Schipper, because, she said, "We are here in this country trying to teach these people about what they're doing is superstitious and you foreigners come over here and promote it." She was a Christian, of course.

Q: Actually, I wanted to ask you, Tainan also was the center of the Taiwan Presbyterian Church. Did you come across them?

DONNELLY: The Presbyterian Church is interesting. In the middle of the nineteenth century, the foreigners carved up China into spheres of influence; the Germans got the Shantung Peninsula and the Russians got this and the Japanese got that. It looked like such a good idea that the missionary groups informally did the same thing. The Baptists were concentrated in one area. But I say the missionaries; this is all but the Catholics. The Catholics didn't join in on this, they were all over. But the Presbyterians got Fujian and Taiwan. Taiwan was further divided. The northern part of Taiwan was pretty much the preserve of the Canadian Presbyterians and the southern part the British/English Presbyterians. That's why there are two theological seminaries in Taiwan; one in Taipei and one in Tainan. The one in Taipei for a long time had a Canadian cast. You have Mackey Hospital in Taipei; Dr. Mackey was a Canadian missionary. In southern Taiwan you have the British.

When I was there, the number two man in the theological seminary (the number one man was a Taiwanese) was a British minister by the name of Bebe and I knew him quite well. Because of that, almost all of your intellectual, western oriented Taiwanese in the early part of the Chiang Kai-shek regime and in the Japanese time, would be Presbyterian because the Presbyterians were on the ground as missionaries, and what do missionaries do? Missionaries educate. So the educated Taiwanese, for the most part, would be Presbyterians and they would for the most part be the most dangerous to the regime; the rebels. So, the Taiwan Independence Movement had a heavy, heavy Presbyterian cast to it.

Q: Did USIA have any association with their seminary or did you go lecture on the campus from time to time?

DONNELLY: No, I did not. I attended a stage performance there and I had lunch over there a couple times, but only as an individual, not as a government function.

***

Q: Now at the time that you were the cultural affairs officer, August '71 to June '72, you had to handle the Nixon trip to China which was February of '72. Did that make much of a blip on your screen?

DONNELLY: Not on my screen. The political officer had to handle that with the counterparts. It didn't bother us. It was strange how the people... Obviously, the mainland Chinese were very upset. The Taiwanese seemed to think it was not a bad idea, that it might in some ways help them. Our staff was about half mainlander and half Taiwanese. The Taiwanese were not bothered one bit about it. It may break the cycle and weaken the Kuomintang. Kuomintang, the mainlanders, were very upset. Of course they were very quiet. They were always quite assertive in the office because they were on top, but they weren't sure where they were with Nixon. It took a while to get back.

Q: Were you involved with the Fulbright Program?

DONNELLY: Yes, I was as the cultural affairs officer, I was on the Fulbright Committee. Then I was chairman of the Fulbright Committee when I became PAO.

Q: Can you explain how this program works and what its intent was?

DONNELLY: It's a two way cultural exchange. The Fulbright professors are brought from America to teach in local universities. The other direction for the most part was sending graduate students to the United States for advanced degrees. We had a Fulbright foundation equipped with an executive director, a Chinese man. They would be placed in universities. Then when they would give out grants to Chinese students who wanted to go to the United States for their studies, they would be screened initially by the Fulbright organization that was housed in the USIS building, a large old building dating from the Japanese occupation of Taiwan. It was a Japanese government building and when the mainlanders came after the Second World War, they made it the provincial legislative building. So up until the late 1950's, the provincial legislature met in that building and then when they left and had a permanent home south of Taichung, that building was rented to USIS.

Q: Were there any other local institutions that you worked closely with? I understand there was a joint council for cooperation in humanities and social sciences.

DONNELLY: No, but I did work closely with the language center which was attached to the University of Tai Ta (Taiwan National University) and that taught English to college students, mainly those wishing to go to America. I was a member of that board and once a month I'd go over and listen to the meetings and look at their budget. That's about it. Make sure they were doing the right thing.

Q: Because early on there was a number of joint councils for this and that and now I get the impression that as Taiwan begins to expand they're doing a lot more of their own...

DONNELLY: In any event, I was not aware of that council that you mentioned.

Q: Who was the ambassador at that point, '71 to '72?

DONNELLY: Certainly in '72 it probably was still Walter McConaughy and then later it was Leonard Unger. Walter McConaughy was a very interesting guy. When he was a young Foreign Service Officer, his first post was attached to what was the embassy in Tokyo and he was assigned to the consulate in Taipei because Taiwan was part of Japan. Later he came back to Taiwan as the ambassador and lived in the same house where he had lived as a young consular officer. Very interesting. One of the local administrative officer's father was Ambassador McConaughy's rickshaw driver when he was a young FSO (Foreign Service Officer). Then Unger; Unger was the last ambassador to Taiwan.

Q: Right. Actually he was in Bangkok before Taipei and I think he left Bangkok in late '73, early '74.

DONNELLY: Something like that, yes.

Q: Is there anything else you want to use the Taipei cultural job for to illustrate USIA job definitions, policy, directions?

DONNELLY: Do you mean the first or second time I was there?

Q: The second time; around '72.

DONNELLY: Just that time? Not '75?

Q: No. Again this is the aftermath of the Tiao Yu T'ai (Senkakus) student demonstrations and whatnot, but that was over by the time you got to Taipei?

DONNELLY: It was over very quickly because it was a threat not to the United States, but to the government.

Q: Well this is interesting; in one sense remains contemporary because we're looking at Beijing now and how they're handling their student nationalism, so here you have two Leninist parties struggling with the same problem. That is...

DONNELLY: The same people, Chinese.

Q: And the same people.

DONNELLY: Yes, there's a lot that China can learn from the way Taiwan handled or mishandled.

***

Q: So your next assignment, '72-'75, is VOA. That means somebody found you and brought you back to Washington. (laughs)

DONNELLY: Yes, they did. I was overseas twelve years without a Washington assignment and people were saying, "How did you do it?" I said, "I didn't. It just happened."

Q: I remember I came into the Foreign Service in '71 and when we were in Rosslyn for the A-100 class one day, somebody pointed at some gentleman down the hall and whispered, "This is his first time back and he left during the Eisenhower Administration."

DONNELLY: (laughs) Well, actually I went overseas during the Eisenhower Administration.

Q: There you go; maybe you were...

DONNELLY: Maybe it was me.

Q: Now you come back to Washington; Voice of America. What does the Voice of America do?

DONNELLY: They broadcast, now I think it's about forty languages, but when I was there I think it was about thirty languages, and we broadcast then in Mandarin only, I think it was about 11 ½ hours a day. We broadcast mainly news, some feature stories and some music, but every hour on the hour that we were on the air we would have a good fifteen minute news broadcast which was all news; you know, no advertising breaking up the news, just straight news. It was in depth. Then there wasn't any CNN (Cable News Network); it was just short-wave VOA, BBC (British Broadcasting Company), and other national broadcasts.

It was very important to Chinese and other people in those days; now not so much with television, etc. But I read recently in the Afghani business that the Afghanis were all at their radios at all times – short wave radios when they had them, listening to the Voice of America to see what was happening. That's true and it was true then. The VOA was very important.

One problem with China was that we never knew if anybody was listening. Not only that, we never knew if anybody could hear it. Of course, and if you are on the air you wanted to know those two things; can it be heard and is anybody listening. So if you're broadcasting even to someplace like Russia, there are a lot of Americans in Russia that can turn on the radio and say, "Yes, it can be heard here," or "It can be heard there." We could send tourists over to a country to listen all over the place, but we had nobody in China. So, I thought of an idea to find out if somebody was listening. I got a lot of flak over this idea and it didn't really do me good in the long run, but having been in Taiwan all those years, I knew a couple of things. I knew that the Chinese were hungry for English and I also knew that they could learn by rote because I'd been in class with them and I'd seen the way they repeat and repeat and repeat, and they could learn. We had a fifteen minute a day program on English which was nothing in depth, so I thought if we put on a half an hour English program and repeat it three times a day and repeat the same half hour seven days a week, that's twenty-one shots that any Chinese worth his salt could memorize that and could learn English.

Now they need a book. How do you get a book in China? I thought, well, I knew that in Taiwan the English 900 Series, which was a Macmillan Series, was very popular. What it is, is 900 basic sentences and if you memorize these sentences you have memorized every grammar rule there is plus a lot of vocabulary. So I went to Macmillan and said, "Could you sell us these books very cheaply?" The 900 sentences were in sixty lessons; fifteen sentences per lesson. They said, "We'll sell you the six volume book, a dollar a book, $6. So we'll give you some sort of discount." So I went to the program manager at VOA and said, "I want to do this," and they said, "How are you going to get the books to the people?" I said, "What I will do is I will put an advertisement on the air saying we're doing this and any Chinese that wants to have a book could go to their corner bookstore and buy the book. However, if you are in an area where they don't have a corner bookstore, you could write to a P.O. box in Hong Kong and we'll send you the book free.

Well, I got a lot of flak; for one thing they said, "This is a news organization; we're not an educational organization." I kept pushing and pushing and kept getting flak and finally the division director said he'd let me do it. He told me later he'd let me do it only to see me fail. Within the first month, we had two hundred letters from all over China and they were ecstatic and going up to the Hill and saying, "Look, we've got all these listeners!" and the letters kept coming in and coming in and coming in. Then we started learning, when Americans were finally allowed to go to China, they found out that the book was pirated in China.

Q: (laughs) Of course.

DONNELLY: Macmillan knew that would happen, but I told Macmillan that the Chinese are product loyal and it would be to their benefit in the long run.

I'll never forget, one time maybe fifteen or twenty years after this, a Chinese was in the States and I was talking to him, I was guiding him around someplace, and I said, "Your English is very good. Where did you learn it?" and he said, "English 900." So, it was successful.

Q: And that program went on the air when?

DONNELLY: Let me see if I can get the date. It was January 1st, 1973.

Q: So it takes you one quarter to convince the powers that be to take this experiment. But here you have a news organization; a broadcast organization that has never sought any feedback from an audience? Never checked because they have no way? So how did they justify themselves to the...

DONNELLY: There was no mail between China and the United States. In those days there was absolutely no contact. They hadn't had a letter in twenty-five years because the Chinese wouldn't forward it and the Chinese wouldn't dare write to the United States. You write to the United States and you've got the thought police down on you.

It may be hard for young people today to understand what a complete wall of silence was between the United States and China. There was just no cultural contact, no academic contact, no mail, no anything. But then they got 200 letters sent to Hong Kong in the first month.

Q: But see, now, you'd been in Hong Kong so you knew that that's where China leaked, if you will.

DONNELLY: Yes, that's right.

Q: And that it would be acceptable to send a letter to Hong Kong where it wouldn't be acceptable to send a letter to the United States.

DONNELLY: The Chinese knew that letters to Hong Kong would often transfer to Taiwan or to the States or someplace, but they allowed that.

Q: Right, as long as it's not out front.

DONNELLY: Yes, face.

Q: Face; you can get a lot done.

DONNELLY: As long as your face is preserved.

Q: When I was there in the '80s, mainlanders would travel to the mainland all the time through Hong Kong and as long as they didn't tout it, both sides allowed it to happen.

DONNELLY: Sure.

Q: But you were the first guy to go through Hong Kong and know that that mailbox was there to be used.

DONNELLY: Well, but there was just so much resistance on the part of the management there. Fortunately the head of VOA at that time, a guy by the name of Ken Giddens, he was a political appointee during the Nixon years and he was a conservative guy, but a very decent guy who I think probably in the end was the reason I was able to get it done; he'd backed it up.

Q: The VOA had Chinese language broadcast for the mainland only? Can you pick it up in Taiwan?

DONNELLY: You can pick it up any place. Until English 900 requests for the book, we got no letters from the mainland, but we would get letters from ships at sea because the Chinese sailors could listen, wherever they were. We broadcast towards China, but the atmosphere is such that sometimes it bounces all over the place. Obviously they could hear it in Taiwan clear as a bell. We had listeners in Taiwan, I guess, but they could get most of what they wanted from other ways. But the people in China had no other way of getting independent news.

Q: As the Chinese branch chief, how many people did you have working for you? How was it organized; was it organized by languages like that?

DONNELLY: We only had one language then; now I think they've brought Cantonese back. We had sixty-two people, I think, and we had a news service, a features service and a production service. The producers are the technical guys and then the features people would write color pieces and whatnot. The news was the heart of it.

Q: We're twenty-five years and one CNN later, and now in the press there are issues about independents in VOA. The State Department being critical of stuff they put on. Did those kinds of issues arise at the time that you were...

DONNELLY: Yes, they did. VOA was jealous of its independents, but we know we all get our paycheck from the U.S. government. The newsmen overseas were particularly jealous. They wanted to be trench coat journalists. They went too far, I think. A VOA journalist overseas would not, for example, go to an embassy and talk to a political officer because he didn't want people to think that he was being fed information where Joe Alsop went to the embassy and the consulate regularly and also Joe Kraff. All of them, any journalist worth his salt, Bob Elegant, checked in with the political officer, but VOA correspondents wouldn't.

Q: Who was VOA hiring as its correspondents?

DONNELLY: Well they weren't Foreign Service Officers; most of the VOA staff were what we'd call domestic staff. The Foreign Service Officers at VOA were there on two or three year assignments.

Q: I'm looking at the correspondents who were so jealous of their independents? Were they just average Americans or...

DONNELLY: Yes. They were just guys. A lot of them were former newsmen for other papers. So they were jealous of their independence.

We had a big problem with the boat people during the wind down of the Vietnam War. The State Department did not want us to broadcast anything about the boat people because if we broadcast that the boat people made it to Manila, for example, the State Department was afraid that that would encourage other Vietnamese to leave on boats and maybe to leave to be pirated or raped or drowned. So they wanted us to lay off the stories of boat people and I would get calls from congress to give them transcripts of everything we had said about boat people in the last month or so. One time I had to go to congress and sit there on the witness chair, but luckily I wasn't called upon.

Q: Saigon falls in April of 1975 toward the end of your tour. There were some big American news stories; the Nixon resignation. How did the VOA cover that? Was there anything unique there?

DONNELLY: No, just straight.

Q: At this time, some things are happening in Taiwan. Chiang Kai-shek dies in '75. Did that impact on anything?

DONNELLY: We reported it straight. That's all. It was easy at VOA; you just reported straight and every now and then there'd be a little flak. We had a rule that you had to double source everything which meant that sometimes the VOA was a little slower than other news agencies because they wouldn't immediately go with the report; they'd double source it. So as long as your sources were correct and as far as news was concerned, the news came to us from the news room. I didn't make up the news; it would come to us and we'd select what we want and what we don't want. But as long as we didn't monkey with the news, we double sourced it, kept it straight, we didn't have to worry about anything.

Q: In these three years did congress pay you any particular attention?

DONNELLY: No, I can't think of anything in particular. Every now and then you'd get a call from congress saying, "We want to see what you've said about something," but you just take a copy of the file and send it over and that's the end of it.

Q: What would be the source of that sort of request?

DONNELLY: It would come through our front office and it obviously came from a congressional staffer. I wouldn't know who it was.

Q: But that was a fairly standard kind of request to be made?

DONNELLY: Yes.

Q: VOA is sort of part of the international, not only news, but was part of the, I want to say competition, but the Cold War with the Soviet bloc. But you're there now at a time in which Nixon has gone to China, there's the liaison office set up in Beijing. Did you get any sense that things were now different; that things were now operating in a slightly different environment in China?

DONNELLY: Very little. One thing we did, we followed the American news organizations in the State Department in changing the name of some Chinese. You know, Peking became Beijing, for example. With everybody except for those in the China branch mispronouncing it, calling it "Bayjeeng", when it's Beijing, not Peking anymore. Just a few things like that; we started using the proper name for the People's Republic of China and we were very careful about what we reported on Taiwan, but just straight.

Q: Some of the people working in VOA are immigrants, the Chinese, the change to finally recognizing and using the People's Republic of China, was of significance to them?

DONNELLY: I would say it varied, but most of them, all of what we in Taiwan would call mainlanders, about half of them were people that had come from the mainland to the United States and about the other half were people who had come to the United States through Taiwan or actually some of them even were born in Taiwan, but of mainland parents. Their Chinese was excellent.

I think you could say they were all more or less anti-communist and some of them even had relatives in the Taiwan, Republic of China Embassy, the Taiwan Embassy it would've been when they had an embassy here. But I think that all of them are proud of China and the fact that China is now China and not Taiwan. They're quite proud of the fact that China now is taking a place on the national scene and flexing its muscles. I think probably every one of them now probably has been back to China and is quite proud of it. I think that they were glad that China was shucking some of the dictatorial trappings of communism and they could see that it was going in the right direction. They didn't cause a problem; nobody quit because we were handling Taiwan with kid gloves.

Q: Just by way of background, in VOA for the Asian section, was there also a Japanese section and Burmese and Thai etc. or just was the Soviet Bloc, if you will. The Vietnamese, the Chinese...

DONNELLY: In the East Asia and Pacific Division there was no Japanese. We'd record a feed for the Philippines once a week; not the China branch, but the division had one. The division had a Thai, Indonesian, and the Indonesian language would be for Malay as well; same language. Vietnamese, Korean, Chinese, Burmese. In that division which I later headed, we had 160 people.

I'll back up to the feeling about China. The Chinese, among the people there, they were all anti-communist certainly, but almost none had any sympathy for Taiwanese. That's pretty true with most mainland Chinese. A lot of them, I just had this conversation with a Chinese the other day, they object to Taiwanese because the Taiwanese are interested in independence and they're interested in independence because as Annette Lu, who is now the vice president, told me, in 1897 China divorced Taiwan. She was referring to the Treaty of Shimonoseki (1895) when China ceded Taiwan to Japan after a defeat. "China divorced Taiwan," she said "We want a remarriage." And a lot of Chinese interpret that as denying their Chineseness and the Chinese are very – I'm looking for a nice word, not patriotic, but they're quite proud of their Chineseness, and for somebody to deny that seems a bit much. A lot of them don't like Taiwanese very much.

Q: Sounds like the distinction you're drawing though isn't only just a political distinction; independence or a part of China. It's a culturally defined identity.

DONNELLY: The Taiwanese have been tainted in many people's minds by fifty years of Japanese culture and that's the fault of Minister Li Hung-chang at Shimonoseki; it's not the fault of the Taiwanese. The Taiwanese, you'll find out, like Japanese food. What I'm reading and hearing from Taiwanese friends is that the young Taiwanese, especially the young Taiwanese girls, go nuts over anything Japanese. Well that's an insult to a Chinese because the Japanese are responsible for terrible, terrible massacres; the rape of Nanking and, you know, just terrible things in China. Very few Chinese are going to be pro-Japanese. The Taiwanese are, and that's another thing that bothers Mainland Chinese.

Q: I remember when our Chinese colleagues would take us out to dinner, they'd take us to a Chinese restaurant and when our Taiwanese political friends would take us out, we'd go to a Japanese restaurant.

DONNELLY: You bet. That's the way they feel.

***

Q: Neal, we had just finished your tour as the VOA Chinese branch chief, in June of '75. So, September '75 you show up back in Taiwan. Is that right?

DONNELLY: Yes, that's right.

Q: As the deputy public affairs officer?

DONNELLY: No, as the cultural affairs officer.

Q: The cultural affairs officer?

DONNELLY: I was later made deputy, but first as the cultural affairs officer.

Q: Can you give us a description of the USIA office at that time, and what your duties were?

DONNELLY: I think there were about ten officers there. There was a public affairs officer, a deputy, a cultural affairs officer, assistant cultural affairs officer, a press officer, a publication officer, and then there was a branch post in Kaohsiung which had the Tainan branch under it, and a branch in Taichung.

The cultural affairs officer was a very normal USIS type of cultural affairs; one who arranged lectures of visiting Americans. We had a magazine that we put out, The Student Review, and we distributed some things to universities and had the Fulbright program. The exchange both ways were under the cultural affairs officer. The cultural affairs officer was a member of the Fulbright Board, actually chairman of the board, for a large Fulbright operation in Taiwan at that time.

Q: Now you'd served as a cultural affairs officer in Taiwan at an earlier tour. This is basically coming back to the same job?

DONNELLY: It was the same office, but this time I was in charge of other offices there. In the previous time, I was a cultural affairs officer, but not in charge of the office.

Q: So how many people were working for you then?

DONNELLY: One other officer.

Q: USIA is also interested in the culture that's going on in that country. You were talking earlier about helping out with art exhibits and whatnot, so are you getting around to the press and the movies?

DONNELLY: Not the press; the press officer would do that, or the deputy, which I later became and then I was involved with the press. We were in touch with all of the cultural-type people, of course many college professors and many of the artists and musicians.

Did I mention before about the artist program? I did not?

Q: No.

DONNELLY: We had one. I think I mentioned before that when I was in Kaohsiung and Tainan I started a program of making a room available for local artists to...

Q: Right.

DONNELLY: And they became art galleries. First we did it in Tainan, then we did it in Kaohsiung. Taichung then followed and then in Taipei we did the same thing. We would offer the walls of a room and in Taipei it would be an auditorium, for art exhibits. When I was in Kaohsiung - Tainan, a fisherman came to the office and offered some of his art to put up on the walls and it was Grandma Moses type art. Did I mention this?

Q: Yes.

DONNELLY: My chief assistant said, "No, get out of here, it's no good." Later, when I was in Taipei, he took his art to a Tainan art critic and showed it to him. The man said it's super stuff and contacted us in Taipei and then we had an exhibit of his stuff in Taipei. I didn't mention that before, did I?

Q: Not that it was in Taipei, but you talked about it.

DONNELLY: It was in Taipei and the guy was a fisherman from a very poor area in Tainan County called Pei Men. Anyway, his art was very primitive, but the art critics loved it and when we held the exhibit in Taipei, it was the most successful art exhibit that Taipei had ever seen. People were interested because there was a lot of press comment about this very unusual guy. Before we opened the doors on the day of the exhibit, there were a couple hundred people out the front of our building. The exhibit lasted for two weeks and we extended it then for another week. It was extremely successful. I don't remember what I said before about the paintings.

Q: It was basically Grandma Moses.

One of the things that I wanted to touch on though was here you are, the cultural affairs person in USIA, and you're working in an environment where the Kuomintang as a Leninist party has pretty good control over movies and the art scene and whatnot. Did you see that control lessening or did you see it at all?

DONNELLY: Oh, sure. The government would allow almost anything that was not either political or disruptive of public order, public security, so you wouldn't have any movies or art that was critical of the government. An awful lot of cultural things had a very strong anti-communist message to them. This Grandma Moses-type of artist that I mentioned before was criticized severely by the established artists because his subjects were very much Taiwanese-type subjects: fishermen and puppets. There are puppet shows in Taiwan and opera. He mixed a lot of Japanese-type symbols in his paintings, including a Japanese flag. He was an old man, he'd lived under the Japanese. That infuriated the established artists and they had newspaper articles about what an awful man he was, and how he mistreated his wife and all sorts of things.

The government was pretty much hands off as long as it did not touch on political opposition or affect good public order.

Q: By 1975, you had the Nixon trip to China and the Americans have established a liaison office in China. Did you see any impact from that in your job as you went through your daily routine?

DONNELLY: No, there was nervousness on the part of the mainlanders in Taiwan. Initially, a lot of nervousness, but things calmed down. There was always the worry that we were going to go too far with China, but it didn't affect what we were doing very much. I would say that as far as the cultural scene, it didn't affect it very much.

Q: This is also the time where the economy in Taiwan is picking up. In fact, the government begins the ten special projects; the subway, the down-island highway and whatnot. So I would assume there's quite a bit of economic wealth being generated here.

DONNELLY: I did a great deal of traveling in the countryside and could see every year that the farmers got just a little bit better off and I often thought about a quote from Shakespeare's Julius Caesar; when Caesar was on his way to the senate, he passes by Cassius, one of the conspirators.

Do you know the quote?

Q: I'm not sure what you're leading up to, but I know the quote, yes.

DONNELLY: Caesar looks over at Cassius and he says, "Yon Cassius has a mean and hungry look about him. Let me have fat men about me; men that sleep at night." And I thought, the people in Taiwan were fat at that time and they slept at night. So they were no trouble. But the government kept most everything screwed down very, very tightly. But the people were fat.

Q: What do you mean by "things were screwed down tightly" though?

DONNELLY: Politically. You obviously couldn't have a movie about the 2-2-8 incident or any movie or article in the press that criticized the government. What you could do is criticize individual government officers. You couldn't criticize Chiang Kai-shek or Chiang Ching-kuo themselves, but you could criticize local mayors and things like that. That was acceptable, but you could not criticize the party as such.

Q: One of the things that the Kuomintang had been doing for some time was to reintroduce Chinese culture to the island, which you said had been a Japanese colony. Did you see any of that in your work?

DONNELLY: Well, yes, of course. I may have mentioned that I audited history courses at Cheng Kung University in Tainan. The history was all from the Chinese perspective and in grammar schools, and in middle schools, and in college, all the history was Chinese history. The Taiwanese would complain to me that they would learn about all of the ancient dynasties, but were taught nothing or allowed to learn anything about their own history, which is very interesting history. The fifty years that the Japanese were there, of course was just erased, and the Taiwanese history before that was erased. There was nothing there; it was tacitly banned, I guess. But the Taiwanese were very upset. Now Taiwanese are studying their history. History and culture under the Kuomintang were all mainland Chinese history.

Q: One of the political changes in Taiwan at this time is Chiang Kai-shek dies in the spring of '75 before you arrive, so his son now takes over the reins. Did you see any of that sort of play out?

DONNELLY: Yes, sure. Surprisingly, the son made a great, great effort to appeal to the local people. He would put on a jacket and a baseball cap and go out in the countryside and talk to the farmers. He got general acceptance from the people, I believe. He loosened up martial Law a great deal and eventually, of course, dropped martial law. He realized that the country was too tight. He loosened it up in many, many ways.

I think the majority of Taiwanese appreciated the change from his father's rule, but still, of course, you had people like Wang Sheng and others who were hard-line anti-communists and who didn't like Taiwanese very much. You'll find even today, talking to American-Chinese as I did just last week, about their mistrust and dislike, actually, of Taiwanese because they feel the Taiwanese are denying their Chineseness and when you believe your culture is the most superior in the world and you have somebody who denies it, it's a bit like the Americans who become anti-American like the Taliban fighter (John Walker Lindh); everybody wants his head and nobody has a good word for him. So I think as a group, the Taiwanese have a very bad image among most mainland Chinese; not all, but most.

There is a bit of a change in Taiwan itself; an awful lot of mainlanders are beginning to make accommodation for the majority of people who live there which are Taiwanese. Ch'en Fu (Fred Chen), I'm told, is now learning or has learned to speak Taiwanese. That's an amazing thing.

Q: Now, the administration in Taiwan has changed to Chiang Ching-kuo and it's the Carter Administration in Washington. Is the atmosphere under which USIA is working a little changed budget-wise or in those kinds of ways? Particularly because the Carter Administration is for human rights, too.

DONNELLY: We did lose some personnel, but I don't remember it being under Carter; it was a little later. Carter established something called "zero based budgeting," which you remember. It seemed every president in every administration had some idea about saving money and there was a lot of hoopla, but it all came to nothing. And zero based budgeting came to nothing. As a Foreign Service Officer, you've been through this so many times, they all run together, zero based budgeting and all this. The Chinese government wasn't very happy with the Carter Administration, but there wasn't anything they could do about it.

Q: One of the major events that happened at the time that you were there was the Chung Li incident; the riots during the elections of late 1977. Did you see anything out of that or how the press played it?

DONNELLY: Well, the press played it from the government's standpoint because the press is controlled by the government. There was one independent newspaper called Tzu Li Wan Pao, "Independence Daily," I guess you'd call it. They were a little more reasonable in their treatment, but most of the treatment of the Chung Li incident would be from a government standpoint; that is, a few people were causing trouble and the government took care of it.

Q: A couple of years after that was the Kaohsiung incident. The U.S. recognized China. Normalization was January 1, 1979 and now by December 1979 there's the Kaohsiung incident. How did that affect the atmospherics in which you were operating?

DONNELLY: Almost all the people in the Kaohsiung incident had some connection with America. There was a magazine called Formosa Magazine, Mei Li Tao, "Mei Li Tao" meaning beautiful island. Beautiful Island Magazine. But beautiful island is a translation of the Portuguese word Formosa. The people on this magazine were supporting political candidates in the coming election. The coming election was touted to be a fair and open election. What this magazine did was take a note of candidates and put them all together and when you put all the candidates together, it's a party. Now, the Kuomintang has always allowed independent candidates to run, but they couldn't form a party. Well, this magazine formed sort of a party and it upset the government.

The magazine decided to hold birthday parties where people get up and give speeches and they decided to hold a rally in Kaohsiung before the election in December. I think they held it in early December, I believe, on the UN Human Rights Day; they held it on that day and eight people spoke. The day before the rally, a Mei Li Tao supporter was beaten by the police and so at the rally that night a lot of people showed up with torches and two-by-four pieces of lumber, and the police took this as an excuse to charge the rally and arrest the speakers, and in the process knocked a few heads. There were eight speakers and not all of them were arrested. Some independent politicians who were not even there were arrested. But one of the people who spoke who was not arrested was K'ang Ning-hsiang. Now K'ang was one of the first people to take on the Kuomintang publicly. He was sort of a fearless guy. He grew up in a section of the Wan Hau, where the Lung Shan Temple is. He spoke at the rally, but for some reason he wasn't arrested. But Annette Lu Hsiu-lien and others were arrested and then they, of course, had a trial. Now that was early December; the election was still going on.

Q: Actually twelve months earlier. Normalization was twelve months earlier.

We were about to get into the trials. That would be the spring of 1980. Of course the first thing that happens before the trials is Lin Yi-hsiung's family is murdered.

DONNELLY: The family lived very close to where the U.S. military annex was, which is now the AIT headquarters. Lin's mother and twin daughters, if I recall correctly, were there at the time and his wife was someplace – I don't know, she was working, I guess. Lin himself was in jail being interrogated for his involvement in the Kaohsiung incident and in the magazine Mei Li Tao and in the opposition movement. I say "interrogated" because that's a pleasant word for what was happening to him. While the wife was away, someone came in and murdered the mother and the twin daughters. There was another daughter that, if memory serves me correctly, was there but was not murdered.

There was, of course, a terrible stink in the press about this, especially when Lin was in jail for a political crime (Kaohsiung Incident), not a criminal action. The government said that they were going to investigate and find the culprit. The reports that we got were that the Lin's house was watched at all times by government police, and the idea that someone could have snuck in there unbeknownst to these policemen just seemed a little strange to most people. But the government came out with a likely criminal, somebody called Big Beard, (Ta Hu Tzu). Big Beard, it turns out, was an American, who on his own sort of befriended the Lin family, although one feels he was more of a pest than anything else. He was an American whose name I can't recall at this time, who was teaching, I believe, maybe a research or graduate student in an Australian university. So they arrested Big Beard, but didn't hold him because he had nothing to do with the murder obviously. It was good smoke to blow in the face of the public. Everybody was talking about Big Beard's nefarious deeds for a few days anyway. Apparently he did go to the house that day, but was gone long before the murders.

In any event, they had the trial and Chiang Ching-kuo promised that the trial would be fair and open. Before the trial they had an indictment of these eight people. The indictment was for sedition. They had an indictment and they had a trial, and the trial was open and I think probably more or less fair. It was reported in the press, in two papers anyway: Tzu Li Wan Pao and Chung Kuo Shih Pao. The way it was reported was that these two papers and some foreign correspondents, AP being one of them, would send two people to sit in at the trial and they would take turns recording what was said. And their transcriptions would be printed in the newspaper the next day.

Q: Sort of as a question and answer format?

DONNELLY: Well, I guess one did the questions, one did the answer, one did five minutes and the other did five minutes. One person couldn't get it all and the two of them would alternate in whatever way was comfortable for them.

Q: So this amounted to the only public transcript?

DONNELLY: The only public transcript, and it was in the paper and it was fairly full and fairly accurate. Such things as the intimidation of Annette Lu who is today's vice president and spent six plus years in jail for the Kaohsiung incident. She said that she was intimidated by them. She was interrogated only by men and they would say things to her like, "When you come here, you are as if you are naked," and she thought that was sexual intimidation. That was all printed in the paper. So the trial, I think, was pretty fair.

Lin Yi-hsiung would tell about being tortured with having salt water poured down him until he was bloated and all sorts of things like that. It was out in the paper, so the trial, I think, was fair and open. They had the indictment and then the trial and then the sentencing. The sentencing was based upon the indictment and not upon the trial. So, Chiang Ching-kuo was right, the trial was fair and open, but the indictment and the sentencing weren't fair; they were open, but not fair. So these people all spent time in jail and now, of course, they are all out and in leadership positions in Taiwan.

Q: Now if the press is publishing this account of the trial, I'm presuming that, it's now AIT, is translating these and sending this back to Washington?

DONNELLY: What was USIS became the Cultural and Information Section (CIS). We translated them, all of what was in the paper, and sent it back. We did that independent of the political section, which became the General Affairs Section. We sent it in on our own. Really it should've been a General Affairs Section responsibility, but seeing we had liaison with the press and the press has pretty much always been a USIS function, we sent it in on that basis. Everything that was in the paper was translated by us and sent in.

Yu Chi-chung, publisher of Chung Kuo Shih Pao (China Times) had the most complete coverage of it, and he announced that when the trial was all over, he was going to put all of the testimony that was recorded in his paper into a book and sell it. After he announced that, the government got to him and said, in so many words, “Don’t you dare,” and so he didn’t.

Q: Well, it’s interesting because Yu, of course, sits on the central committee of the Kuomintang. He is at the center of power; he’s a trusted...

DONNELLY: Yes.

Q: Even with that, that’s enough political protection to allow him to publish the trial, but not enough to protect a subsequent book?

DONNELLY: Apparently. He made the announcement and then he changed his mind. Why he changed his mind, only he knows. (laughs)

Q: Well, actually, we got ahead of our story a little bit because President Carter on December 13, 1979 announced that the United States was going to change diplomatic recognition and recognize the People’s Republic of China and unrecognize the Republic of China on Taiwan. For those sitting in Taiwan at that time, working for the embassy and USIA, what was that announcement like to you?

DONNELLY: It was a shock, I think for everybody. There had been indications that we were going to do something like this. In September of that year, we were still in the embassy of course, and the country team, that is the heads of the sections, was called together to discuss how we would operate if this happened. Then we put all in of our ideas, I think it’s fair to say that Mark Pratt was the guy who did the writing of the report, but I’m not sure now, anyway all the ideas were put together and sent to Washington as if Washington was at all interested in our opinion, which they weren’t. (laughs)

Q: So this was very much a local initiative or appeared to be a local initiative?

DONNELLY: It seems to me that it might have been, yes. In any event, nothing happened after September; we were going along quite well. They were in the midst of an election. The election period was about two weeks, and a week before the election was over, Carter made this announcement. A lot of people were very upset about the timing because had he waited a week the election would’ve been over and the democratic forces were making great strides in that election. But when he made the announcement, Chiang Ching-kuo canceled the election.

It was quite a shock to the Chinese and to us. My recollection of that day that the announcement was made, that was, I guess, the 15th in Washington; the 16th in Taiwan. That morning a cable came in to the ambassador and probably only the ambassador and the political officers were aware of the contents of that message. But that message was something like, “Stand by for an important cable.” It didn’t say what.

That night, Ambassador Leonard Unger went to the American Chamber of Commerce Christmas party at the officer’s club on Chung Shan North Road. He had on his tuxedo and a red bow tie, as I recall. Mark Pratt must’ve been in the office and a cable came in late at night, I’m not sure if it was 9:30 or 10:00 at night - something like that, saying that Carter was going to announce the Normalization of China and the derecognition of Taiwan. Mark immediately got a hold of Unger at the Christmas party at I think about 11:00 pm and then Unger started the wheels in motion to contact Chiang Ching-kuo who was the president of the country. Now you don't just go to the president of the country's house and ring the bell and talk to him, so it took a while to go through the several people that they had to and then they got Chiang Ching-kuo at, I think, slightly after two o'clock in the morning. Unger told him that we were derecognizing Taiwan. I'm told that he was in shock, shocked into inaction, and really didn't do anything until the following morning.

At six o'clock in the morning I was called by the duty officer and told to get down to the office. I got there, I guess about 8:00, and the country team was in the bubble.

Q: Now your position at this time was?

DONNELLY: I was the PAO (Public Affairs Officer). I was in charge of the cultural and information sections of USIS.

Q: So you were the senior USIA person?

DONNELLY: I was the senior USIA person and Mark and I had been in Taiwan the longest so we were the most, familiar with Taiwan.

Q: (laughs) The longest living organizers.

DONNELLY: We got there and Unger, still in his tuxedo and red bow tie, told us what Carter was going to do and we should call our families and tell them to listen to the radio, the armed forces radio station in Taiwan which would broadcast the message. And to tell our families to keep the kids home from school and things like that. So we did. Then the announcement came and of course people were very upset.

One of the first things that President Chiang Ching-kuo did was to cancel the election. He'd just been shocked into inaction because he wasn't expecting it.

Q: Talking about peoples reactions, you have employees in your office. Did they begin to react?

DONNELLY: Yes, sure. Our office had about half mainland Chinese and half Taiwanese Chinese. The majority, of course, felt betrayed and they felt very bad, but there was a minority of Taiwanese, maybe four or five, who thought it was a good idea. They thought it was a good idea because of the dislike of the Kuomintang government and they thought this may, somehow, give Taiwan a chance to become independent. So there were a few who thought it was a pretty good idea.

The election was cancelled and we got a few weeks of just sort of fumbling around. Of course there was a reaction in the United States, as well. The reaction was that not enough people were told; I don't think Barry Goldwater knew. Had Barry Goldwater known, he would've somehow thrown a monkey wrench into it if he could. He and most other conservative republicans were kept out of it. There was also a feeling that Carter was a little petty about it by announcing it at 9:00 at night Washington time during prime time which meant that as soon as he announced it, people like Goldwater wouldn't have any time to mobilize anything and it wouldn't give the people in Taiwan any time either. In any event, we were sort of fumbling around. It was decided in Washington that it would probably be a decent thing to do to send a delegation to Taiwan to smooth ruffled feathers.

Q: Give out some face?

DONNELLY: Yes, face. So, Warren Christopher led a delegation with Roger Sullivan and a lot of other people that, I'm not sure if I've got my dates remembered,

Q: I think it's the last week or so...

DONNELLY: It's after Christmas.

Q: It's after Christmas, but not January 1st.

DONNELLY: They arrived...

Q: Actually it's 29th, 30th...

DONNELLY: Something like that.

They arrived at the airport. I was the head of USIS, but I was also handling all of the press relations. Before they came, someone in the government information office talked to me. I went over and they wanted to know if Christopher would give a press conference. I said, "Yes, I was told he'd give a press conference at the airport," and he asked me who was going to introduce him. I said, "Well, I usually introduce them; that's my job. I'll introduce him." He said, "As a courtesy, would you let Chen Fu," (that's Frederick Chen) "introduce him?" I said, "That's a little unusual. I'll ask Ambassador Unger." At this point, when we were trying to bend over backwards to smooth their feathers, Ambassador Unger agreed.

Q: Chen Fu is the minister of foreign affairs at this time, isn't he? Or is he head of GIO?

DONNELLY: At this time, he had already left GIO (Government Information Office). In any event, Ambassador Unger said okay, so I wrote out the statement for Christopher. As I said, they agreed for Fred Chen, who was not the GIO at this time - he was the vice foreign minister, to introduce him. So, Fred Chen introduced him. We got into the airport and as we were going into the airport, we noticed that a lot of students were milling around. Now that airport at that time had a military side and a civilian side, but the same runway of course. The military terminal was, of course, secure. So we went to the gates and outside the gates were all these students milling around. We went in, let me back up just a bit. We were told before, that we probably should use Chinese government cars instead of our own cars in the motorcade. We thought this strange, but who's ever in charge of automobiles said okay. So in the motorcade were, I suppose, thirty cars or so; half the Chinese delegation, half the American, and they lined up outside. Christopher came with a delegation, Roger Sullivan and other people, and he was led into where the press were. A very small room, but there were about forty or fifty press.

Q: Now this is on the military side?

DONNELLY: It was on the military side. There's nobody in there except the press and the delegation.

Q: But he's arrived in his own aircraft?

DONNELLY: Oh, yes, the American aircraft. Sure. It was a U.S. Air Force plane, I believe. In any event, he arrives and I would've introduced him if everybody agreed and I would've said, "Ladies and gentlemen, this is Warren Christopher, the deputy secretary of state. He would be happy to take your questions." That's all...

Fred Chen's introduction was not "Ladies and gentlemen of the press, this is the deputy secretary of state. He has a short statement and then he'll take your questions." It was nothing like that at all. It was a condemnation of the act of Normalization, and the Taiwan government negotiating position on Normalization, from which they would not retreat. We were talking about people to people relations and they wanted government to government relations, and they would not budge from that. The introduction was very hard-line, very long. It went on for about five minutes, after which, Warren Christopher read this very bland statement that I read. Should I read it?

Q: Yes.

DONNELLY: This is the statement of Warren Christopher after he'd just been blasted by vice foreign minister Fred Chen, and told what they're going to say to us, and that they're not going to retreat from it. He said, "President Carter had asked me to come here to initiate discussions with President Chiang and other senior officials of your government. In these discussions, my purpose will be to seek to develop a general framework for our future relationship. We will be discussing arrangements which can enable our two peoples to maintain our cultural, commercial, and other relationships on an unofficial basis. We are here to begin an important process and I hope we can make a good start. I am grateful to President Chiang and his colleagues for setting aside time for these discussions. I look forward to meetings which will reflect the goodwill and understanding that has existed between us."

(laughs) Obviously there wasn't any goodwill or understanding.

Q: Now let me get this straight. They have created a transportation system in which their drivers control the cars; we're not using our cars and we're not using our drivers?

DONNELLY: A few of our cars and a few of our drivers.

Q: But the delegation itself?

DONNELLY: I was in a Chinese government car.

Q: But the importance of the press conference is that they've made their negotiating position public so that's it's going to be difficult...I mean, in the world of negotiation, if the other guy makes his a good public hard-line comment, his defense then in the private meetings are, you know, "My public is going to expect this and I can't back down any further." So this is all part of their negotiating tactic.

DONNELLY: It's part of their negotiating tactics, but it wasn't a good idea, as will be seen.

In any event, we went out then and got in the motorcade and started out. By the time that we got outside the gates, the students, I don't know how many there were, several thousand, surrounded the cars and began to pelt them with eggs and rocks and to jump up on top of the cars and stamp on the roofs. I had with me in the car Mort Smith who was one of our USIA people from Washington. I was sitting in the front seat and Mort and another, Jack Cannon, were in the back. A student came with a flag pole and shoved it through the window and broke the window. I was covered with glass and cut a little bit. Ambassador Unger was driving with one of the admirals, I think. He was mildly cut and his glasses were knocked off. He had the Seventh Fleet commander with him, I think.

Q: Let's see, Admiral Weisner, was CINC...

DONNELLY: Yes, that's what he was: CINCPAC, Admiral Maurice Weisner.

Q: Were they in the ambassador's car with the ambassador's driver, or were they in...

DONNELLY: I forget; I just don't remember now.

Our car was badly damaged. They kept us for a long, long time in that motorcade; wouldn't let us go through. Just pounded the cars and breaking the windows. No one was hurt badly and I'm told by a young friend of mine who was a military officer - a young Chinese friend - that the soldiers were told to don civilian clothes and make sure that none of the students got too wild. He said, he himself, wrestled down a student who was going after the ambassador's car with a hammer. So they were prepared. The demonstration was supposed to be spontaneous, but when we came to the gate that night I noticed that there was a large truck and on the side of the truck was written in Chinese, "Lu Tung Tzu Shuo" which means "mobile toilet," and you very seldom have mobile toilets at spontaneous demonstrations.

Also, I know from a friend of mine who was a student at National Taiwan University, that there were loud speaker announcements that morning at that university and others, urging students to go and rally at the airport. So it was a put up job.

We finally broke out of the cordon that the students had created, but had to abandon our car because it was so badly damaged. When the cars broke out, they sort of went in all different directions. Some went to the Grand Hotel and our car went up to Yang Ming Shan, up to Kuomintang resort up there. I forget the name of it. There were three or four cars that went off in one direction and Roger Sullivan was in one of them. Then other cars just went to places like

U.S. Military Headquarters.

Q: What do you mean you abandoned the car?

DONNELLY: We abandoned our car and found another car that we could take. Our car wouldn't work because it was so badly damaged.

Q: Now was your car a U.S. government car or one that they provided?

DONNELLY: It was a Chinese government car. It seems that they thought they didn't want to damage our cars and have to pay for them. (laughs) I don't know. In any event, we abandoned it and we got one of our own cars. I forget how we got it, but we got in one of our own cars and I think first we went to the U.S. Army Headquarters and then got on the phone there with Washington; I didn't, but Roger Sullivan did. Some of the people were asking what we should do. I think on the other end was Holbrooke, but I don't remember. I do remember that there were a couple in the U.S. delegation that wanted to turn right around, get back on those planes and fly out of there. The reason they didn't is because there's a U.S. Air Force regulation, I'm told, that a pilot has to have so many hours sleep after so many hours in the air.

Q: So they didn't have another crew?

DONNELLY: I don't know. So it was decided that they would stay there and tough this thing out and give face, anyway, and they did. During the three days they were there, there were some mild demonstrations. I'm forgetting, but before they came we did have demonstrations at the embassy. I was there at the embassy. The embassy was sort of surrounded by these yelling and screaming students, and rocks were being thrown at windows. Some windows broke. The embassy was really a good thirty yards from the street and there was a fence there, so somebody with a very good arm got one or two rocks through the window.

Q: My impression is that the embassy is on a fairly narrow street, too. It's not on a main boulevard; it's sort of off a main boulevard and the streets around it are just two lane roads.

DONNELLY: No, that's the present AIT.

Q: Oh.

DONNELLY: The embassy was, near the old North Gate and the railroad station. It's on the corner of a fairly large street. As a matter of fact, there's an overpass right there. That was one thing that worried our security people, because the overpass is close enough that you could do damage to the embassy from the overpass. In any event, that passed and then...

Q: Now did you participate in any of these discussions?

DONNELLY: Not in the discussions, no.

Q: But you would've had to handle the press, the American press that came with the delegation certainly realized that this was going to be a news event so they got themselves there.

DONNELLY: There were a couple of dates; the dates of December 15th where Carter announced the derecognition, January 1st when derecognition took place, and February 28th when American official activity in Taiwan would end. In other words, there was a two month period under the Vienna Convention where somebody who is winding down an embassy has a grace period of selling property and acting sort of official for two months.

We derecognized formally on January 1st, but December 31st, the flag came down for the last time and that was obviously a news event. Ambassador Unger wanted the flag to come down with dignity and had a private, sort of family affair. I argued that that was a mistake. I argued that the U.S. press and the U.S. people would want to see this and it should not be kept from the press. He overruled me, of course. So that day, I went down to the embassy and told the ambassador, "Make sure, if you don't want anybody in here, that that gate is shut."

They were going to take the flag down, I think at sundown, if I recall. What Unger wanted is he was going to stand there at the foot of the flag, have the Marines take down the flag, fold it in military manner and give it to him in a very dignified way. That was going to be alright, but a very enterprising American reporter, I think his name was Collins - his father was a former ambassador or consular general to Vietnam back in the '50s, I believe, he got a hold of a Chinese government car somehow and came to the gate and tooted the horn and the embassy gate guard, a Chinese, opened the gate and let him in. Now we've got, I think he was one of the news networks, CBS (Central Broadcast System) maybe, an American newsman inside the gate. Well, Unger was livid and the security officer was running around screaming, especially at me. I said, "I didn't open the gate." They said, "You've got to get him out of here," and I said, "What do you want me to do, throw him out? He's bigger than I am." They said, "Tell him to leave," and Unger at this point, he's going to call the head of NBC or CBS, whatever it was, and I said, "You're going to get no place. It's the middle of the night, and if you tell him, 'one of your reporters was enterprising enough to get in here', he'll probably get a raise." So Unger finally cooled down, but he was mad as hell. They said, "Get him out of here," and I said, "I'll tell you what, I will go down and ask him to leave." That's ridiculous, but I said I'd do it.

Q: Where has he parked himself all this time?

DONNELLY: The car is now inside the gate. There's a wall around the compound...

Q: And he's just stayed with his car?

DONNELLY: Yes, he said he's going to cover this event.

So, I said, "I'll go down," and I went down and I knew him. I forget his first name, John or something like that. I said, "What if I asked you to leave?" (laughs) He said he'd tell me to go to hell. I said, "Okay, I asked you and that's your answer." So Unger then decided that he would have the flag taken down, folded, and brought into him and presented to him inside the embassy. I said, "Well you know, they're going to get pictures anyway. There's this overpass right by and there are apartment buildings all around and the newsmen and all around. Just let them in," but of course he wouldn't do it.

I have some pictures...

Q: The whole incident with the flag taking down, of course is symbolic of the events that have unfolded, so this is a great journalistic coup for this young man. We've just looked at your photos here and I see the overpass you're talking about; it looks like it's only about fifteen feet away.

DONNELLY: It wasn't that close, but it's close. There were reporters up there and all over the place. Well, the flag is down and now we formally recognize China, but we're still in Taiwan for two months at which point someone from the State Department comes out and a man who later became ambassador to South Africa, his name will come to me in a minute, to tell us what our future is going to be. Now we had all these ideas that if we became non-State and civilians, we'd all get civilian pay and all of this sort of stuff. (laughs)

Q: Sounds like an excuse for a pay raise there.

DONNELLY: His message was, you're going to be separated from, but then can come back into the U.S. government when you finish your tour here, and your time here will count towards retirement and everything else. There'll be no change in pay. The possibility of you maybe losing a year or so towards any promotion would be great because this will not be a very important post. In addition to that, you lose your diplomatic immunity, so in a traffic accident or anything like that, you won't have the power of the embassy behind you. This is a very discouraging message.

Q: You'd be quite exposed to local legislation. Now was this someone from the administrative side of State Department personnel or one from the desk; political, policy?

DONNELLY: No, this was an important person who later, as I told you, was ambassador.

Q: He's grabbing you out of the personnel system.

DONNELLY: And his name is personnel administer, because I've seen him since.

Q: Because now, the Taiwan Relations Act (TRA), which is the law that puts all this in place, has not been passed yet. This is State's version of that law, and so he's explaining to you what State has written into the TRA that they're sending up to congress.

DONNELLY: I don't know whether exactly he's talking about what State is sending to congress, but he's talking about how State is going to view us and he said, "Anyone that wants to leave, we will reassign them right now. Anybody that wants to stay, this is the deal."

Well, about half the people, I think, decided that they wanted out. I stayed.

Q: Actually, in addition to those, State had already planned to reduce the size of the mission to some extent.

DONNELLY: I think they had a cap on it, and I think the cap was something like sixty or sixty-one.

Q: Yes.

DONNELLY: And I think the cap has since been lifted, maybe, and now there's a few more. But of course the military is out.

Q: Right.

DONNELLY: And a few military who remained, remained in civilian status; no uniforms or anything like that. But the Taiwanese, of course, wanted some military because they wanted to buy weapons from the United States.

Q: One of the things I wanted to get clear was you were saying about fifty percent of the people didn't take up the offer to stay, but in fact, wasn't that cap smaller than the number of people that were there? So somebody had to leave anyway.

DONNELLY: Yes, and I don't know what the numbers are.

Q: Okay.

DONNELLY: So that was that, and then February 28th was the last day when we...

Q: Could act as an official?

DONNELLY: Yes, had any official capacity whatsoever. Then what happened was State sent their version of the Taiwan Relations Act to Congress and Congress didn't like it. Congress decided that they were going to write their own. Well, Congress doesn't move very quickly and it took until May. In the meantime, Senator Ernest Hollings decided to punish the State Department for being so naughty and doing things without informing congress: he held up our pay. There could be no money spent on anything in Taiwan while we were there; no visas could be issued, nothing could be done. No official Americans could come and we could not go to our offices. We were all put on administrative leave. Administrative leave means you don't have anything to do, but you get your pay. But the fact is, they couldn't pay us because he held everything up. So there's a whole group of us that are now on administrative leave and the country team met every morning, and Bill Brown's house who was the deputy, we didn't have any ambassador...

Q: Right, because Ambassador Unger has left.

DONNELLY: Ambassador Unger has left and Bill Brown is holding in his house every morning, a session where we get together and talk and communicate with Washington by phone (we don't have any cables) about one thing and the other. We did that every morning; the country team did.

The rest of the staff just didn't do anything. They were there, but we're not getting paid. People's checks are bouncing and people's house payments on their houses back in the States aren't being paid. It was a mess. People who wanted to go to the States for good reasons, businessmen and whatnot, couldn't get a visa. The only way they could get a visa, and they worked this out, was for them to give all the information to Hong Kong and the visa would be issued in Hong Kong and sent back. So it was.

Q: Adding time and delay to the Taiwan businessman's... That would be the individual needing a visa.

DONNELLY: Yes, so there was a lot of important business that didn't get done for three months, thanks to Hollings' pique at the State Department.

Q: What's a senator for, but to punish...

DONNELLY: (laughs) Finally, we opened sometime in early May and it was decided that we would call USIS the Cultural and Information Section at that time. It was decided to start our activities on a rather low key. Now one thing we'd always had was lectures for visiting Americans and the first person who wanted to come was Susan Sontag. She had been to China and she wanted to see the other side of China. She wanted to compare them. The State Department was sending her on a lecture tour to Asia, but not Taiwan; she was going to Korea and some other places. But she said, "I want to go to Taiwan," so they said, "Do you want her?" and we said, "Yes."

We decided to start the lecture program not at night when we'd get a lot of people, but in the afternoon, hoping that we'd get started and then we could work into the evening hours. So Susan Sontag came and she was there a couple days. I had her over to dinner, I know, and then the day of the lecture I took her to lunch in Wan Hwa, which is an old section of Taipei. I took her to the Lung Shan Temple, one of Taiwan's biggest temples, and then to a little food stall. Right across from the temple there's a little market area with food stalls in it. I remember we had fried squid and she thoroughly enjoyed herself. And then walked from Wan Hwa back a bit before we got in the car and in Wan Hwa, there is an alley where they sell snake.

Q: Snake Alley?

DONNELLY: She was interested in that, and at the next street to Snake Alley, as we passed by, she noticed there were very young girls standing in front of little houses and they seemed to have a lot of makeup on and short skirts and stuff. She asked me about it. I said, "Well, a lot of them are young girls and their father - a lot of them are adopted - and this is a fact, it's not a nice fact, but it's a fact; they'll be sold and rented out to the bordellos for a period of a couple years and then her father would get $500 or something." So it's not much different than a lot of other societies. It probably doesn't happen anymore, but it did happen.

That was that, and then we got back to the lecture. In the lecture there were about half Chinese, half American. We didn't get many Americans at our lectures, but if you had Susan Sontag, all the American language students would want to come and listen to her. USIA in Washington sent out a biography of her and we printed it up and I put copies of it on the table in the auditorium. I went in to introduce her and people were sitting in the auditorium, I went up to the stage, I thought she was following me, but she wasn't; she picked up the flier with her biography on it, and as I'm waiting for her, she walks up, she's reading it as she's walking, and then she sits on the stage, reading, and I give the standard bland introduction about her, "Ladies and gentlemen, please join me in welcoming Susan Sontag to Taiwan." Clap, clap, clap. Nothing. She's still reading; she's ignoring the audience completely, reading this thing that we had sent out from Washington. I didn't notice that I'd walked to the back of the auditorium by that time, then I look up and she's reading and people are waiting, and she finishes reading and she says, "Neal, who wrote this?" I said, "We got it from Washington." She said, "It's all lies." (laughs) And that was the start. Then what she did, she read from one of her books and took questions. The first question was from a dignified older Chinese man who asked the sort of question that they always ask. He said, "Is this your first visit to Taiwan?" (in an elderly voice) She said, "Yes, it is." "What is the thing that impressed you most about Taiwan?" She said, "That you still practice slavery!" (laughs) Oh, God, the whole place erupted. She was talking about the little girls in the bordellos, and she went on to explain how I had taken her down there. It was a disaster.

Q: But actually, by way of background, this is a standard USIA program where they get famous Americans in the arts and they offer these people to the regional bureaus. "We're going to send Susan to Korea and Japan and whatnot. Do you guys want her?" and the post will come in and say, "Ooh, this individual is very attractive to our audience and we would love to put them up."

DONNELLY: A lot of Americans like to do this, too; people like Daniel Boorstein. He came in – you know, a very prestigious man. And others like Thoreau who wrote The Great Railway Bazaar, and some other things. I know he's got a brother. Is his name Paul Thoreau?

Q: Yes, that's the travel guide.

DONNELLY: Paul Thoreau wrote that book after a USIS sponsored tour. He said he wanted to go to all these places and lecture as an author. And he did; he went from one place to the other and then he wrote about them and you had no idea from reading the book, that what he was on a USIS sponsored tour until he got to Vietnam. In Vietnam he stayed with the PAO who was Marshall Bremant. You may know him.

Q: Yes.

DONNELLY: Marshall Bremant was the PAO. He was a State officer, but he took a tour as PAO in Vietnam. I don't know if you knew that.

Q: I had forgotten that he did a tour there.

DONNELLY: He stayed with Marshall Bremant, then he went to Hue, and in Hue he stayed with the local USIS guy who later was in VOA with me; a very, very nice guy. I forget his name. He's the only one in the whole book that he mentions by name, I think. And identifies as a USIS officer. But anyway, that's a speaker's program, which can be very good.

Q: My impression is that it's good in a number of ways. I was intrigued that Maya Angelou went on one of these USIA things as a cast member of Porgy and Bess during the 1950s when she was a young woman.

DONNELLY: We've had a lot of famous musicians. Duke Ellington came and Louis Armstrong.

Q: To Taiwan?

DONNELLY: I'm sorry, Louis Armstrong came to Hong Kong while I was there, we had Duke Ellington in Taiwan. Oh just lots and lots of very famous people. Charlie Byrd came to Taiwan too.

Q: So this is a major program that USIA has to expose American arts to a foreign audience?

DONNELLY: And expose American artists to the world. So it's a very good program.

Q: Well, here you are, it's the first days of AIT, you're not getting paid, there's no law that covers you, you literally can't talk to your colleagues officially. I wonder who pays for the telephone calls back to Washington. (laughs)

DONNELLY: I don't know much about the administrative aspect of it, but it was a crazy time.

Q: But now things get straightened out by May?

DONNELLY: May, yes.

Q: And who comes out to be the head of AIT?

DONNELLY: Chuck Cross. Chuck Cross was ambassador to Singapore and he's a guy that was born in China of missionary parents and was a China hand-type, and he's the new director. We called him director.

Q: Of AIT. Actually, Chuck has just published a book of his memoirs, Born a Foreigner. He talks about being of missionary parents in China and a Japanese language officer with Marines during the war.

To get this job, has he resigned the Foreign Service or is he actually retired? I've forgotten.

DONNELLY: Well, all of it. It was all a fiction and I don't know what his fiction was; whether he retired or not. He may have retired, but I'm sure they would've taken him back had he wanted to. But I think that was his last post.

I guess I went on home leave in July or something and I think he came when I was on home leave, but for some reason he left. I came back in September, I think, and he left shortly after I came back and Bill Brown had already left. Bill Brown became ambassador to Israel later, whether he left to do that or not, I don't know. I think he did. So there was no deputy when I got back from home leave, and I think it must've been September, and Chuck Cross then went on home leave, I believe. I believe he came directly from Singapore to Taiwan and had not been on home leave, so when I got back, he went directly on home leave and I was made acting director of AIT. A friend of mine quipped that the highest rank I got was acting director of an unofficial entity. (laughs) In any event, I was acting director and Chuck Cross left me specific instructions, "Make sure that no think piece goes out of this AIT while you're in charge. I don't want any waves while I'm gone." So, sort of make sure nothing happens. And I did that. I had a fight with Mark Pratt once because he wanted to send out something that looked to me like a think piece. We're the best of friends, but we did have a little to-do over that. So anyway, here we get to October 10th, which is the Chinese National Day.

Q: The Republic of China National Day, right.

DONNELLY: And I'm the acting director, so I cable Washington and say, "What should I do? Should I go to the event?" and word came back that "Yes, you should go to the event." Now at the National Day they have a tea party for diplomatic invitees in the presidential building just before the event, and then from the tea party you go out to the stands in front of the presidential building and watch the parade. So, I'm invited now to the tea party and I go in and they were just having tea and somebody gives me a number, something like eighty-two or eighty-three, and I don't know what it's for, but I've got this number. And then after about a half an hour of tea, we're told that we're going to go and shake Chiang Ching-kuo's hand, and to line up by numbers. Well, I keep looking for what number it is and I find that my wife and I are the very last people in the line. (laughs)

The first group in the line are official diplomats. The doyenne of the diplomatic corps was the South African ambassador and then all the Central Americans and the second group in the line were invited guests like businessmen from America and Britain and France and Japan, and then the third group were unofficial diplomats and they'd be the Japanese and the Singaporean. We were the last ones. So I got to shake Chiang Ching-kuo's hand last. It was a real cold fish handshake.

Q: Well, actually that's interesting because when I was there in the '83, '85 period, they were trying all kinds of gimmicks to create the impression that it was a more official than unofficial relationship. They could have put you in the front of the line and then you would have been sorely tested.

DONNELLY: Well, dare I tell a joke on this tape?

Q: Oh, please.

DONNELLY: This joke was told to me by a Chinese reporter, a lady reporter actually, during the Christopher mission time, because Fred Chen insisted that we have a government to government relationship. Have you heard this?

Q: Yes.

DONNELLY: Should I tell that or not?

Q: Oh, yes, yes. Tell it.

DONNELLY: A government to government relationship and we wanted a people to people relationship. The joke is, it has to be told in Chinese, that Fred Chen's or somebody's driver was driving an American and a Chinese official around and they kept arguing in English about people to people or government to government, and the Chinese driver didn't speak any English, so at the end of the day he asked his boss (of course this is in Chinese), he said, "I don't understand. You two talked all day long about 'P'i Ku Tu P'i Ku' (people to people) and 'Kan Men Tui Kan Men' (government to government) what's the difference?" Of course, P'i Ku means ass and Kan Men means rectum. It was a joke that made the rounds during derecognition. So it shows that the Chinese have a good sense of humor. We AITers had our own sense of humor. Three of us couples got together and composed the AIT fight songs. I'll give you a copy if you want.

Q: So you were acting director for how long? A couple of months there?

DONNELLY: A couple of months, yes. You might say "nonaction acting director".

Q: On a short leash, by the way. (laughs)

DONNELLY: Yes, on a short leash.

Q: How would you characterize the impact of the Normalization procedure on USIA's program in Taiwan?

DONNELLY: Well, the first test concerned one thing USIS does as a matter of course: it puts out backgrounders to influential people, newsmen, and government officials of U.S. government announcements; for example, a presidential press conference. We'll record it and put it on in mimeographed or other form (mimeographed in the old days) and...

Q: It's the wireless file.

DONNELLY: The wireless file. And maybe a presidential speech or even an act of congress or something very official, and send it around. After we opened up shop again and started sending backgrounders, I was called over to the Government Information Office. Carter gave a speech in which he said something about the People's Republic of China. Now, in Taiwan you cannot say People's Republic of China; you either call them Chinese communists or bandit communists. You can call them bandit communists or Chinese communists, but you can't call them the People's Republic of China and I was told that I couldn't send this out; I'd have to correct it. Of course now I'm not official. I said, "I'm not going to correct my president's language. You know, I'm not going to do it. You can do what you want, but I'm not going to do it. You can throw me off the island; whatever you want." They backed down, but they thought they could intimidate the U.S. government. So we felt that. Other than that, the Taiwan government realized pretty soon that their best course was to get along with us rather than to frustrate us.

Q: So all your programs are intact, you're getting speakers from USIA. How about the magazines and whatnot that you're distributing; is there any problem?

DONNELLY: There really wasn't any great problem.

Q: So, change the name on the door and the programs move forward?

DONNELLY: Right, and I think most of the people in the government wanted to get out of that and there were only a few hard-liners. We were still invited to receptions and it just went on.

Q: How about your personal contacts? I mean you're the senior USIA person; are some people sort of dropping you off their 'A' list or are the Taiwanese coming forward and making comments?

DONNELLY: I can't think of any incident where they went one way or the other.

Q: Is there anything else we need to cover for this period? Actually, we started out that you were the head of the cultural section and we haven't paid much attention to your own jobs during this timeframe. You were head of the cultural section, deputy PAO, then the PAO, the Public Affairs Officers, then you got to run the shop for two months. So at what time did you move from being the cultural officer to the deputy PAO?

DONNELLY: I was asked back to Taiwan by the PAO; Bob Clarke who had been my PAO when I left in '72. He wanted me to come back and I said okay. I went back in the same shop; the cultural shop. When Bob left, Bill Ayers came. Bob's deputy was a man by the name of Harry Britton and then Bill Ayers who was another China type who had been born in China of missionary parents, he came as the PAO and Britton left shortly after that. Bill made me deputy, so I was Bill's deputy for a couple years and then when Bill left, I was made PAO.

Q: How formal was your definition of responsibility?

DONNELLY: In USIA, the standard USIA operation would have a PAO, a Public Affairs Officer, a DPAO (Deputy Public Affairs Officer) or a cultural officer, an information officer. Under the cultural officer you might have a publications officer or assistant cultural officer. Under the information officer you might have a press officer, in some places a radio officer and in some places a motion picture officer. That's the way a normal USIS operation was run. Unfortunately there were very few normal USIS operations. The duties sometimes don't always fit the title.

What a deputy should do is take the direction of the PAO and make things work. He probably might have to write the country plan, he would have to do sort of all administering of the program. In Taiwan it ended up that I did all of that plus I pretty much handled the press because all my life I've been dealing with press. We had a couple of press flaps and the PAO at that time, Bill Ayers, asked me to take over all of the press duties as well as being Deputy PAO.

Q: Was there a fairly established press presence in Taiwan?

DONNELLY: There were of course local papers; a lot of local papers. Some more important than others, obviously. In terms of foreign correspondents, you had AP (Associated Press), UPI (United Press International), Reuters, Agence France Press, and a few other foreign news agencies, but not all of these people were represented by Americans. They usually were local Chinese who would do the reporting for you. So we were in touch with all of these people. Then there were several freelance reporters. TIME magazine had a man who was on a retainer, and Newsweek as well. And then there were just other people that wrote for whoever would take their stuff.

Q: You were saying there were some press flaps?

DONNELLY: Well, yes, there always are of course. One of the big ones was when Richard Holbrooke came; I forget just when this was. It must've been before normalization. In any event, he came out and when he came into the airport of course the reporters wanted to talk to him. So they crowded around him and pushed tape recorders in his face and knocked his glasses off. Richard Holbrooke is not the kind of guy you want to knock the glasses off of. He said at that time, I quote, "You'll pay for this!" He was really upset with the USIS officer who was doing the press at that time who didn't organize the thing in such a way that that wouldn't happen. He raised hell over that. So that's when I was the deputy and that's when Bill Ayers asked me to take over the press responsibility as well.

The next time Richard Holbrooke came, several months or a year later, I forget when, he landed at the airport and there was a government car to pick him up that speeded to, I think the ambassador's house, through empty streets. It was like the Pope coming; they cleared the way. So there was no problem, but he got deference more than he deserved.

Q: One of the things; Taiwan is a bit of a focus because of the Kaohsiung incident and the emphasis on human rights, but the Chen Wan-cheng affair happened just before you left. That was the young Mellon University...

DONNELLY: Yes. Chen Wan-cheng was a professor at Carnegie Mellon. He came to Taiwan to see his parents at Christmas, I think, and he was found dead on the grounds of Taipei University. In college he had been a vocal advocate of Taiwan independence, as most Taiwanese are. The government picked him up for questioning at his apartment in Taipei and he never came back. That's when they found him on the grounds of Taiwan National University. The police said that they brought him home and don't know what happened to him.

Most people think that they interrogated him (this cannot be verified) and beat him pretty badly and he died and they dumped him there. They allowed the body to be viewed by some people from Carnegie Mellon who flew out to look at it. I have seen pictures of his nude body and it was pretty badly beaten. One of the reporters of, I think, the small paper Ta Hwa Wan Pao, a lady reporter, reported that the doctors or whomever they were from Carnegie Mellon came out and did an autopsy. The government got very upset with her use of the word "autopsy." Autopsy is very specific. They said they looked at the body, but they didn't do an autopsy. She was railroaded out of that country; I think she was sent by one of the news agencies to India to get her out of the country. That may not have been necessary, but that was what happened.

In any event, the government claimed that he must've gone up to the roof of, I think it was the library at Taiwan National University, and jumped; committed suicide. Someone said, if he jumped and committed suicide, why were there no head injuries? Because if you fall, the heaviest part of your body is your head. You're bound to have head injuries. He had no head injuries; his injuries were all on his body. The briefing officer for the garrison command or the police or whoever gave it - and this was recorded in the paper and caused a lot of laughs - said, "The reason he had no head injuries is because he fell on his "peigu," now his "peigu" is his bottom. The idea of committing suicide and somehow arranging to fall on your rear-end is ludicrous. So most people think he was done in by the government. No proof, of course.

Q: Besides the Mellon people that came, did that draw any extra press attention?

DONNELLY: Oh, sure, sure, a lot of press attention.

Q: So here again, suddenly you're handling the press.

DONNELLY: Well, I'm handling the press, but the story is theirs and I can't get up and give a press conference and say what I believe. I just facilitate whatever; if the reporters come and say they want to talk to a political officer or something, that's one of the things a press officer does. A press officer will set up interviews with embassy people.

Another duty of the press officer, depending upon the embassy and depending upon the ambassador, is to be the press spokesman. In Taiwan they wanted me to be the press spokesman because they didn't want newsmen going to each individual officer and picking their brains and tricking them into saying things. So anybody that wanted to see a political officer or an economic officer, any American newsman or any newsman would come to me and make an appointment and I'd make that appointment and the people would be prepared. If there was any embassy statement to be made, the ambassador would have me make the statement. Now the statement might be written by somebody else, but I would make it. That's the way they control the output to the press and eliminate flaps.

Q: Now you're the PAO before the break in relations and so after. How would you compare Ambassador Unger with Chuck Cross as managers... or were their jobs so different?

DONNELLY: I don't think their jobs are so different; Chuck Cross' job may have actually been a little more difficult, but Unger had a difficult job because he sort of knew that things were winding down and he had to almost prevent a flap. I don't believe he did, but if you know that your country is going to derecognize the country where you're accredited to, it must put a great deal of psychological pressure on you and everything you say and everything you do. So Unger had a tough job. Unger was a little stuffy, I think. He'd been an ambassador several times and I think...

Q: I think he was my ambassador in Bangkok, but he wasn't a China officer if I recall.

DONNELLY: Oh, no, he didn't speak Chinese. Is that harsh to call him a little stuffy?

Q: No.

DONNELLY: I would call Ambassador Unger "Mr. Ambassador" or something like that. Chuck Cross, I called Chuck. I was closer to him. Actually we played golf every Saturday morning and he and I were partners. We played two others, Bob Clark who was the former PAO and had retired in Taiwan, and a guy by the name of Larry something or other who was former CIA – if there's such a thing as "former" CIA, I don't know. Anyway, he was there as a civilian. My relations with Cross were different. Cross is sort of a feisty kind of a guy, but you know, a nice guy.

Q: Did you have any formal relationships with the other missions in town; the Japanese?

DONNELLY: No, I didn't with any of them. When I was in Kaohsiung, of course, the only other diplomatic mission in Kaohsiung was the Japanese consul there and we saw each other a lot, but that's because I was the only American in Kaohsiung. In Taipei, no, I didn't.

I had a lot of contact with foreign scholars, mainly because of my interest in Chinese temples and Chinese religion. So I got to know a lot of Germans who did research in that area.

Q: Why would the Germans be researching?

DONNELLY: I think I mentioned before about this Dutch scholar in Tainan, Rick Schipper. Did I mention him?

Q: No, I don't think so.

DONNELLY: Well, he was a Dutch scholar who came to Taiwan to do research in Chinese religion and then actually became a Taoist priest.

Q: Oh, yes. Yes, you did mention that.

DONNELLY: So he's one and then a lot of other Europeans are very interested in some of the culture of any country and some of them are interested in Chinese culture. The best place to do research in those days on Chinese culture was Taiwan, for two reasons; one, you couldn't do it in China, and two, the Chinese had repressed the popular religion, which is what these scholars were interested in. Of course popular religion in China now has come back in a big way, but in those days, no. So sort of a repository of popular religious culture would be Taiwan. There were 8,000 temples. There were Buddhists, Taoists, Confucius – Confucianism is not exactly a religion, but like a religion. And there was what you might call folk religion and a lot of other things. And there was a lot of material there. I was very interested in that and collected a great deal of Chinese religious artifacts. I collected two very old scrolls of hell which were hung by a Taoist priest. Have you seen them?

Q: Yes, I have; they're very explicit as to what hell looks like.

DONNELLY: I have a collection of over two hundred wooden temple statues. I collected two of these sets of scrolls. One is according to an academic who studies these, over two hundred years old, which makes it probably one of the oldest in the world because these were not art; they were not considered art. There was no reason to save them; they were visual aids at funerals. On them you have the tortures for hell and then you have the caption alongside the torture telling you what it's for.

Q: Oh, if you do this, this is your punishment?

DONNELLY: So it seemed to me that this was a very interesting thing and it told what was naughty and nice at least in one area. The scrolls are fairly similar, one to the other, but as they're copied mistakes are made and then the mistakes are... In any event, I gave mine to the Smithsonian and they had an exhibit here in Washington for six months and then they sent it to several cities in America including Honolulu, San Francisco, and Los Angeles. In addition to that, I took all of the captions, there were five hundred captions in all, and translated them and then wrote a book about them. That accompanied the exhibit.

Q: It sounds like an assignment in Taiwan then offers a number of intellectually satisfying...

DONNELLY: I'm not sure what it did for my career, but I certainly enjoyed every minute of it.

Q: Being the PAO, you would have had an opportunity to interact fairly frequently with two major newspaper guys, Wang T'i-wu...

DONNELLY: Wang T'i-wu and Yu Chi-chung.

Q: Yu Chi-chung. What are their careers? How did they become heads of these two newspapers?

DONNELLY: Well, I'm pretty sure Wang T'i-wu was a military man and Yu Chi-chung was something of a scholar, certainly a political type. The papers started very modestly when the Taiwanese came to Taiwan in the late '40s. I guess probably by dint of their political connections with the government they grew until now or at least when I left, each one claimed a million in circulation and maybe more. I don't know.

Wang T'i-wu was sort of a hardnosed anti-communist and sort of built like a Jesse Ventura with hair. Yu Chi-chung has a gentler look to him; he is more scholarly-looking, and I think a more balanced type. I think he's a decent man.

Q: And the third paper on the island was Tzu Li Wan Pao?

DONNELLY: Tzu Li Wan Pao was not the third largest by any means. Tzu Li Wan Pao was more independent in its outlook, but again it had to be very careful; it could only go so far. The rest of the papers were more or less political or non-political. There was a paper for the China youth and there was even a paper for students which would print in Chinese and alongside the Chinese would have the National Phonetic alphabet for the students. If they didn't know the word, they could pronounce it.

Q: One of the things that was unique about the Taipei printing situation was these magazines that particularly the political opposition would use to get their message out because they couldn't control a newspaper. If I understand, there were newsprint rules and the Kuomintang control mechanism was such that you couldn't get control of the newspapers, so the political opposition had these magazines.

DONNELLY: That's true, but in the early days when I was there, there were no opposition magazines. The first one of any stature was Mei Li Tao. That was squashed. Then there were people like Antonio Chang who had started magazines with K'ang Ning-hsiang that tested the waters, pushing the envelope until today it's wide open.

Q: You know Antonio fairly well. What did his career look like? What did you understand of his experiences?

DONNELLY: Well he started working with K'ang Ning-hsiang. He's sort of a very balanced guy, I think, but very Taiwanese. His wife is a mainlander, I believe, so he's not wild. His background is totally newspaper and press, and then of course he had his own newspaper and now he has a government job. He now has the equivalent in the Taiwan government of Condoleezza Rice (National Security Adviser). I don't know the Chinese term, but he's the deputy national security adviser.

Q: Antonio Chang?

DONNELLY: Antonio Chang, yes.

Q: Because I knew him...

DONNELLY: He laughs over all the trouble he had. I asked him if he'd been in China and he said, "Yes," and I guess during Tiananmen he was there and I think he was arrested. He laughed and he said, "Oh, their jails are not nearly as efficient as our jails."

He was here recently.

Q: Oh, was he?

DONNELLY: But he is now in government.

Q: Well, now there's an interesting symbol of the changes that Taiwan has undergone politically, because in the '80s when I knew Chang and K'ang Ning-hsiang, they were on the outside; they were sweating every issue they put out, they were very aware of where the rules were and how close they could get to the envelope.

DONNELLY: Taiwan is blessed with a lot of very, very intelligent opposition people; they're not wild radicals.

One of the things USIS does really well is libraries. We had within USIA in Washington a bunch of officers who wanted to do away with libraries; make them media centers and just let certain people at it. You know, get rid of a lot of books. But libraries are magnets and they draw the intellectuals. K'ang Ning-hsiang would come to the USIS library often and what he'd do, he would go and read the Congressional Record because we had copies of the congressional record. Anything that was ever said about Taiwan in Congress, he knew. He did his homework well. A lot of people would come to the library and get all this sort of information and so they were really one step ahead of the government on a lot of the issues.

Q: Just through the simple availability of a USIA library?

DONNELLY: Now maybe, I guess all of this is on the Internet so maybe it doesn't make any difference anymore. I don't know, but in those days it did.

I attended a cultural conference in Penang one time. John Reinhardt was the head of USIA and cultural officers from the USIS cultural offices from all over Asia came. We had a session on libraries and some people got up and argued that really libraries were expensive and took up room, and we ought to do away with them because we could do things better without them. I got up and challenged that because I think the libraries are the best thing we do and I made the point which I think is valid, that if we had a USIS library in Changsha, China in 1920, Mao Zedong would've been in that library every day. I'm sure of that. I think just the availability, it's a magnet, it's passive, but like a magnet it draws.

Q: I think you've put your finger on an important point. The Americans are can-do; get out there and whatnot, and the library is passive. It doesn't solve the American psychological need for action.

DONNELLY: Freedom now.

Q: Freedom now, right.

DONNELLY: We had one guy named Carter, Allen Carter, who had some position that he was able to get his feelings known, and his idea was that each USIS officer should know twenty-five people and these twenty-five people we should cultivate and we should decide what books they should read and, whether they ask for it or not, send them the book anyway. This is nonsense stuff, but it's so nonsensical that it was current for a lot of USIS. Maybe that's why there is no longer a USIS, I don't know. (laughs) In any embassy, as you well know, the people who knew the situation best, the people who knew the most local people, were political officers and USIS officers.

Q: Yes, definitely.

DONNELLY: That was because, I think, the U.S. officers had the freedom to move around and had the mandate to know something about the culture.

Q: And they also had the language. I mean, we had the language and that simply frees you up and you can move around in whatever environment you're in.

Is there anything else we need to touch bases on about Taiwan?

DONNELLY: I haven't talked this much in ten years. (laughs)

MICHAEL H. NEWLIN
Senior Political Advisor, USUN
New York City (1968-1972)

Ambassador Newlin was born in North Carolina and was raised there and in the Panama canal zone. After graduating from Harvard he joined the Foreign Service in 1952 and was posted to Frankfurt, Oslo, Paris, Kinshasa and Jerusalem, where served as Consul General. During his distinguished career, Ambassador Newlin served in several high level positions dealing with the United Nations and its agencies and NATO. He served as Ambassador to Algeria from 1981 to 1985 and as US representative to the United Nations Agencies in Vienna., 1988-1991. Ambassador Newlin was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2006.

Q: How did you view your, what was the UN particularly concerned with at that time, during those years, or were there various issues that you found yourself...

NEWLIN: We had quite a wide range of political issues that I worked directly with George Bush on.

Q: Mike, you are going to read an excerpt from your efficiency report explaining what your job was.

NEWLIN: The counselor for political and security affairs is the principal officer in the UN mission below ambassadorial rank, responsible for the achievement of U.S. political objectives in the United Nations. As this position is presently constituted, the incumbent performs dual functions. Either of which could be a full time assignment. The incumbent's primary role is principal political advisor on both substance and tactics to the chief of mission and his two ambassadorial level deputies. Less visible but of near equal importance are his executive responsibilities as head of the political section consisting of 12 officers and 6 secretaries. In the first role the incumbent must keep abreast of a world wide range of political issues either before or apt to come before the UN. He must prepare or supervise the preparation of briefing papers for meetings between the chief of mission and permanent representatives of 131 other countries, the Secretary General of the UN and other important officials often at the foreign minister level. Normally he participates in such meetings and prepares reporting telegrams, or supervises a member of the political section doing so. The incumbent has overall responsibility for staff work in UN political bodies, the Security Council, the General Assembly, and the two political committees, the Trusteeship Council and the Committee on De Colonization and non self governing territories.

I wound up being George Bush's chief political officer from the State Department. We worked closely on a daily basis. The issues that we faced were many and numerous. Among them of course, was the second India-Pakistan war. But before that there was the great issue of Chinese representation. When I got there, that was beginning to heat up. We for years and years ever since Chiang Kai-shek was defeated and left for Taiwan, we supported the Nationalist Chinese, even though they were not on the mainland of China. Then just before the issue came to a head in the UN, we adopted what amounted to in effect a sort of a modified two China policy. We wanted to keep our options open to eventually establish relations with the People's Republic of China. We said that we had a one China policy. We said that we recognize that China was one entity, but that there was a special situation with regard to Taiwan, and we thought that even though China should represent the Chinese people in the UN, there ought to be representation for Taiwan as well. The ultimate status of Taiwan should be decided through negotiations. We engaged in a massive worldwide diplomatic campaign for our new policy. The problem was that Chiang Kai-shek and the Nationalists didn't support the new policy. They weren't in favor of it. The Soviets at that time did not want to have the PRC in the UN; their relations with Beijing were terrible. Even though that they didn't want to have the PRC in they couldn't very well campaign against them. So George Bush was very active in meeting with supporters and getting reassurances that yes when the votes came they were with us. The lineup was complicated. The UK and Canada recognized the PRC. Japan supported us strongly and also mounted a worldwide diplomatic campaign. The nonaligned were aligned against us. We had a wonderful officer in the political section who was a marvelous vote analyzer. On paper, we had a majority of commitments but some of the were soft. Her bottom estimate was that we would lose.

It was about maybe a week before all of this was coming up in the General Assembly and George Bush summoned me to come up, just the two of us. He said, "Mike, I am going to tell you something in the strictest confidence that you are not to tell anyone." He said, "Kissinger is going to Beijing to meet with the Chinese." This was just before the vote. I said, "Well, we are going to lose, but nobody can blame you that we are going to lose." He said, "No I don't believe that at all. We have got firm commitments for a majority, many at the chief of state level. I then went over the opinion of our vote counter whom Bush knew was usually accurate. So then I put together a telegram, a top secret NODIS telegram to the Department that said this is coming up to a vote in a few days. Here are the numbers of states that have said yes they will vote yes. Here are those that are going to abstain. Here are those voting no. We think that when push comes to shove, that we are going to lose and here is our guess as to the final vote. So I took it over to the Waldorf Towers to show George. He said, "I don't like this at all." I said, "Well I think you ought to at least tell the brass in Washington this is our best guess so that it won't come as a shock to them if it turns out to be accurate. Hopefully people will do what they say they are going to do, but we don't know." So he reluctantly agreed to sent it. So then Rogers, the Secretary of State wanted to send his aide, Dick Pedersen who used to have the job that I had, up to reinforce us. George was wonderful about it. He called me in and said, "Washington wants to send Dick Pedersen up here, Mike, for the Chinese vote." I said, "He is welcome. By all means let then send Pedersen and anybody else they want to come up here." So Dick came up. In the midst of this really historic meeting in the General Assembly which dragged on into the night. George was summoned to the telephone to get a call from Kissinger in Beijing. He never told me what went on but I think it wasn't a very pleasant thing. Kissinger was obviously very nervous about how things were going to turn out. Sure enough we did lose. We went through a period...

Q: Had the Kissinger visit been announced at that time?

NEWLIN: Oh yes. It had been announced.

Q: So everybody was drawing the conclusions that the game is over.

NEWLIN: Yes. Why should we ruin our future relations with China when Kissinger is meeting Mao? That is how it came out. We had to go down to Washington, went down to Washington with George. We met with Scali and the media and briefed them as to what had actually happened. Long standing allies, the Netherlands, Belgium, Tunisia joined the stampede.

So then the Chinese did arrive. The Chinese ambassador in Ottawa was told to pack up and come to New York and assume his duties there. I don't think the Chinese were really expecting it. I will tell you another very interesting thing that happened. All of this was going on and we were lobbying the quarters. I went over and tried to persuade the Dutch to stand with us and the Tunisians that had promised. They were hell bent to vote for Beijing. The Albanians were the sponsors of the resolution that replaced the Nationalist Chinese with the PRC. So during the meeting it looked like and we were lobbying so much that it looked like that we were going to prevail again in defeating the Albanian resolution. So the Albanian representative got up and started towards the podium. The Pakistani permanent representative Aga Shahi said, "Where are you going?" The Albanian said, "Well I am going up to the podium. I am withdrawing my resolution." Shahi said, "Why are you doing that?" "I am afraid we are going to lose." "You are crazy; the Americans are losing. Don't do that."

Q: Tell me, Mike, Before you heard about Kissinger going to China which obviously pulled the rug out from everything.

NEWLIN: It changed everything.

Q: But before you heard about that, was there sort of the feeling OK we are fighting this battle, and we fought this battle year after year after year to keep the PRC out of the UN. Was there the feeling that OK we are doing this one more year, but this is really a losing battle to go on with?

NEWLIN: Well, Nixon's overture took everyone by surprise. His entire career had been built on strong anti-communism. We assumed that we would again prevail with the support of anti-communist members. Things got off on the wrong foot that night from the beginning. The roll call is decided by lot. You pick out a country name to begin and then proceed alphabetically and the first member to vote that night was Canada. So the Canadians voted against our position. Of course the UK were against our position as well. So this was a losing proposition.

I think they were probably surprised they won. They came in and we couldn't have any official contact with them, but there was a political officer, Harry Thayer in the political section who spoke Chinese, so he was the one that went with the customs and immigration people to assist the Chinese delegation when they arrived. Then George Bush wanted very much to meet the Chinese permanent representative. So I said, "OK, we will arrange that." So I found out when Kwong Hua was going to call on the president of the General Assembly. His office was right behind the podium of the General Assembly so I arranged for George Bush to appear to be making a telephone call on the telephone right outside the door. So when Kwong Hua came out, I said, "Mr. Ambassador, I would like you to meet Ambassador Bush of the United States." They shook hands. That was George Bush's first official contact. Of course they were in the Security Council. It was a pretty dicey thing. At one stage there was a debate, I guess this must have been in the context of the second India-Pakistan war. Of course the Soviet...

Q: It was sort of the Bangladesh war.

NEWLIN: The Bangladesh war, that's right.. And of course the Soviets were supporting India. The Chinese were strongly supporting Pakistan. George Bush got a call from the Department instructing him to call U Thant, the Secretary General and urge U Thant to call for an immediate cease fire between the two. So he did get U Thant on the line, and U Thant was very dubious that this was something he ought to do. I broke in and said, "People are dying. This is something that the UN should do." He said no, that he really didn't think the situation was one that he could take this initiative. So we reported that back to Washington. Then we got word of a telegram from Islamabad saying that the U.S. could call for a cease fire. The State Department shot back and said, "Do you formally request the United States to call for a cease fire?" Then the answer came back,. "Yes. We formally ask the United States." So then we issued the call for a cease fire. It came into being. Then we had a Security Council meeting the next day to bless the outcome of the war and say that Bangladesh was independent. Bhutto, by that time was president. It was very interesting. I went with George over to the hotel to meet with Bhutto. He was an interesting character because he had been very anti American.

Q: Oh he was?

NEWLIN: Yes. But he was very smooth and everything. Then in the Security Council meeting the next day, he denounced the resolution that provided for Bangladeshi independence and for the cease fire and the negotiations. He ripped up the resolution and threw it into the Security Council well. He had had many harsh things to say about India and about a lot of people. Then Bhutto got up and walked out of the Security Council. Then later in the afternoon I saw him walking in the hall outside arm and arm with the foreign minister of India.

WILLIAM H. GLEYSTEN
Director, East Asia and Pacific, INR
Washington, DC (1969-1971)

Ambassador Gleysteen was born in China of Missionary parents. Educated at Yale and Harvard Universities, he entered the Foreign Service in 1951. After service in the State Department's Executive Secretariat, Mr. Gleysteen studied Chinese and was subsequently posted to Taipei, Hong Kong, and to Seoul, Korea, where he served as Ambassador from 1978 to 1981. He also served in Washington with the National Security Council and in the State Department as Deputy Assistant Secretary for East Asian Affairs. The Ambassador was interviewed by Thomas Stern in 1997.

GLEYSTEN: As far as the seventh floor was concerned, we didn't get tasked very much by the secretary or his principals, leaving us room to choose subjects that we thought would be of interest. I focused mostly on China and Vietnam. In the case of China, I hoped our analysis of China's international behavior and domestic developments, particularly shifts in the Chinese leadership, might have some impact on our policy vis-a-vis the PRC. Nick Platt, who had worked with me in Hong Kong, was very good at extracting essential information for our clients. In the case of Vietnam, we tried hard to convey objectivity, often struggling against the tendency of Defense, CIA, Embassy Saigon, and our own Ray Cline to justify our policy in the face of doubtful data.

By the time I got to IO and then INR, I had an opinion on many of the hot issues. It is very hard for an analyst to be completely objective when his or her mind is bent in a certain direction. Although, as I have said, we did our very best to be objective in our written assessments, I felt far freer to be opinionated in oral comments. For example, I was a longstanding proponent of formal relations between the US and the PRC, and in my IO days I sometimes pushed this view to the annoyance of my superiors - who to their credit never censored me.

When Nixon came in, I was concerned that we were about to go backwards; having overlooked his famous 1967 article in Foreign Affairs, I viewed him too simply as a strong anti-communist who would never deal with the PRC. Of course, we had no inkling of Nixon's and Kissinger's machinations. NSMs kept coming from the White House; studies were tasked and recommendations options prepared - in part to throw the bureaucracy off the track. Because we feared a conservative backlash from Nixon, we were pretty timid in the recommendations of these papers. But we did manage to get some good ideas into the analysis and we hoped we could at least work on the assistant secretaries - and by influencing them perhaps influencing the policy makers on the seventh floor.

I lobbied quite vigorously with Marshall on the question of PRC recognition. I made clear that normalization with the PRC should take place without undermining Taiwan, because we had a responsibility for its security as part of our long-range strategy in Asia. Marshall heard me out with great sympathy. Both of us thought we were doing our duty, and we were both completely unaware of goings on in the White House. Marshall and the whole Department were cut out of Nixon's and Kissinger's secret maneuvers on China. Nixon and Kissinger took the boldest steps of all options; our timidity must have amused them. I didn't learn about any of this until I after I had left INR and arrived at my next assignment in Taipei in 1971.

Although this central policy issue was always on my mind, most of our China efforts were devoted to such matters as Chinese policy toward Indochina, Sino-Soviet relations that had ratcheted dangerously towards war, and obscure but important leadership developments during the latter phases of the Cultural Revolution. Even if it was hard to document, change was in the air. The Soviets began a massive buildup of forces on the Chinese border, and the Chinese responded with a considerable buildup of their own forces, including construction of huge fortress-like structures that were fascinating to our intelligence community. In this tense atmosphere the Soviets tried to inveigle us into colluding with a nuclear threat to China. Out of the same fear, the Chinese were being more responsive in their talks with us in Warsaw, through "ping pong diplomacy" - and, completely unbeknownst to us, in their dealings with Nixon and Kissinger.

***

I also mentioned Korea as a special interest. I wanted us to examine the changing relationships between the PRC, the Soviet Union, the US, and Japan. We could see the shifts in PRC views towards us - even before the Kissinger visit to Beijing. I wondered whether these shifts in the regional equilibrium might have an influence on the Korean Peninsula, particularly the North. I kept prodding our analysts to be on the lookout. I assumed that the changing relationships in the communist world might have a beneficial impact on the Korean Peninsula, and I hoped that any shifts might allow the North to seek better relations with the South. Some contacts eventually took place with North-South Korean talks in 1972 after Nixon's visit to China. But in the late 1960s and beginning of the 70s I must say that we kept looking in vain. All we heard on both sides of the DMZ was a hard line.

MORTON I. ABRAMOWITZ
Special Assistant to Undersecretary of State
Washington, DC (1969-1971)

Bureau of Intelligence & Research, East Asia Division
Washington, DC (1972)

Deputy Assistant Secretary for East Asian and Inter-American Affairs
Department of Defense (1974-1978)

Ambassador Abramowitz was born in New Jersey and educated at Stanford and Harvard Universities. He entered the Foreign Service in 1960 after service in the US Army. A specialist in East Asian and Political/Military Affairs, the Ambassador held a number of senior positions in the Department of State and Department of Defense. He served as Assistant Secretary of State for Intelligence and Research and as US Ambassador to Thailand (1978-1981) and Turkey (1989-1991). He also served in Taiwan, Hong Kong and Vienna. Ambassador Abramowitz was interviewed by Thomas Stern in 2007.

Q: In your role of special assistant, were you involved in deciding what issues were to be referred to the undersecretary?

ABRAMOWITZ: Richardson became sort of the super-manager of the Department. Secretary Rogers was quite laid back – some even said “lazy”. That left a vast amount of territory for Richardson to cover. Most issues ended up on his desk both because of Rogers' management style and his "Henry" problem. Richardson and Henry Kissinger had developed a close relationship, although it turned out that the relationship was not quite as close as Richardson had viewed it. Richardson was very active in generating consideration of issues and got to know a good bit of the working level of the Department.

He became involved in almost every issue. Alexis Johnson, the deputy undersecretary for political affairs, handled most of the day-to-day issues that needed Seventh Floor attention, although Richardson was at least briefed on those as well and was in constant touch with Johnson's assistants. As chairman of the under secretaries committee – part of the NSC system – Richardson was involved in inter-agency matters related to implementation of policy decisions reached by the NSC. In this regard, the one committee action that received most attention were the first steps which eventually led to the establishment of U.S.-Sino relations. I am referring here to the removal of restrictions on American foreign subsidiaries including with China and other actions of that nature. I remember this effort particularly because I drafted the memorandum which eventually went to the president for his approval of these confidence building measures on China. It was just by accident that we were moving in the same direction as the White House in changing China Policy, although, as far as I know, no one in the Department had any idea what Nixon and Kissinger were up to.

Richardson was also responsible for the Department's nominations to the White House for presidential appointments. He interviewed every one of the Department's final recommendations particularly the non-career, many of who were not known to him. A number of candidates who had deep pockets were seeking a presidential appointment after having made sizeable contributions to the Nixon campaign. Richardson examined them very carefully to make sure that they would not at least embarrass the administration in their new positions. He also played an important role in moving some career officers up the ladder.

Richardson got heavily involved in major issues such as Vietnam (of course, everyone was involved in Vietnam). He even hired a special assistant whose sole role was to follow Vietnam developments. That was Charlie Cook, whom Jonathan Moore had found in the Pentagon. That was a full-time job which assured Richardson of being current on fast moving developments.

One of the more effective channels in the government to get things done as well as to smooth ruffled feathers was Richardson's relationship with Kissinger. If there were any problems between the Department and the NSC or if some action needed to be taken quickly by one of those organizations, Richardson would invariably take it up with Kissinger and vice versa. From my vantage point, I never saw Rogers as a very effective Secretary of State – either as a policy developer or a manager. He was, however, a good judge of the American public and its receptivity to American foreign policy initiatives. He was an excellent advisor on how to get public approval, but in the policy development field – either as a creator, implementer, or defender – he was just not in same league as Kissinger. That became a real impediment to a good Kissinger-Rogers relationship, because it put Rogers in a second echelon which created resentment and anger on his part. Rogers was very much concerned about his personal status and his stature in the public's eye. I think you have probably discerned by now that I did not hold him in high regard, although I want to repeat and stress that Rogers had a better feel for the public's mood and views and how to handle issues publicly than probably anyone else in the government's national security apparatus.

***

Q: So at some stage, Paul Popple called you. Had you known him before?

ABRAMOWITZ: Only slightly. But he knew my background and had read my writings on China and Korea, and was acquainted with my views and style. I was certainly ready to get out of the IG. Paul was a very fine man; and I liked him a lot. He was a man of great probity, not reluctant to give his opinion even if it didn't fit the "prevailing winds." I also liked that he mostly let me run the division, that is to direct the research efforts of INR's East Asia division. I should note this was my first "managerial" job.

The director of INR was George Denny, who at the time was actually "acting" director. INR at the time had six or seven divisions in it – mostly mirroring the regional bureaus' organization. We had a China office, a Japan office, a south-east Asia office, etc. This was my first opportunity to become better acquainted with south-east Asia; I had focused previously on north-east Asia (China, Korea, Taiwan) although some of my analytical work in Hong Kong on PRC's foreign policy brought me into contact with issues in other Asian countries.

This new job was a learning experience. I briefed Marshall Green, the East Asia assistant secretary, on a daily basis. I got to know him even better and we had a very good substantive relationship. He always asked for my thoughts on major issues – not policy recommendations, but my thoughts on the significance of the intelligence. I also got to know the bureau staff well; and worked closely with them.

The assignment worked out well. I got managerial experience. My understanding of East Asia grew exponentially and lastly, I became well acquainted with both the leadership and the staff of the East Asia bureau as well as those in other agencies working on East Asia. Broadly speaking, our – INR's – responsibility was to provide good analysis of major events and trends in East Asia and to estimate the potential eventual impact of these events and trends on U.S. policy in the region. We were not an intelligence gathering agency; we were the recipient of intelligence gathered by other parts of the U.S. government; our people tried to "connect the dots", as it is described today, based on the information received as well as their own knowledge of the area and its history. The mix of Foreign Service and senior Civil Service officers provided a unique set of skills which was not available to other agencies. My view of that was further reinforced when I became assistant secretary of INR several years later. The mixture of the field experience of a Foreign Service officer combined with the long term attention that a Civil Servant had devoted to a particular subject made for a formidable analytical team. This mixture of skills and knowledge provided a useful support to the policy maker.

We were able to respond in crisis situations with instant analyses – briefings, short papers, longer term analysis, etc. – since we were almost always up-to-date on events and currents in the part of the world for which we were responsible. We provided daily both information analysis which we felt would be useful to policy makers; many of the Foreign Service officers had been in policy making positions and the Civil Service officers had been close enough to that process for long periods so that they had an understanding of the needs of senior officials. My period in INR-EA was another useful learning experience which came in quite handy when I became the Assistant Secretary.

I am not a dispassionate observer of the policy making process for the East Asia area. I believed then and do so today that INR-EA could usefully contribute to policy making. There is the mantra of the purists who insist that a sharp line should be drawn between intelligence estimates and policy making. This has always been a problem which became much more acute for me when I was INR assistant secretary. In contrast to my INR-EA period, by the time I became assistant secretary, I had long been involved in policy making and that made the maintenance of this “Holy Grail” of separation much more difficult to maintain. While working in EA/INR, I was still in the early stages of my career and although my work in the undersecretary’s office obviously brought me into contact with policy making at the highest level, I had not yet begun that part of my career and therefore trying to maintain some separation between intelligence analysis and policy making – artificial as it might seem – was not a major challenge. I wasn’t shaping our EA policy; I was trying to support those responsible for policy making. I must say that despite some outside skepticism, I always found INR tried to maintain the distinction scrupulously.

That assignment also brought me into Vietnam, an area which had never been at the top of my agenda. No one had ever asked me to get involved either in Washington or in Vietnam itself. I was seen primarily as a “China expert”.

I should mention at this stage the INR relationship with other agencies. I had had some experience with the CIA in Hong Kong and Taiwan. But the INR job required broader exposure to the total intelligence community – CIA, NSA and DIA especially. We had to work together to produce “community products.” (NIEs, for example which at the time were viewed with a reverence that they probably did not deserve.) We spent a lot of time working on those documents. I found this experience “eye opening.” I began to understand the collection capabilities of other agencies. I also began to understand some of the institutional biases which all bureaucracies have. My main focus was on intelligence analysis; I did not for example have a need to know much about covert actions. I can’t remember if I ever had any contacts with the Deputy Director for Operations in the CIA. But in my first real exposure to the totality of the intelligence collection apparatus of the USG, I was fairly impressed by the magnitude of our efforts.

Q: Let’s talk about some specific issues. What work did INR do on Vietnam?

ABRAMOWITZ: I began in INR/EA just as the negotiations on a peace agreement in Vietnam were beginning. Our work was mostly concentrated on events on the ground – i.e., the fighting, its political significance, the impact on the government in Saigon, etc. We also focused on what North Vietnamese intentions seemed to be and what they would likely do. We were quite comprehensive in our scope of work. These analyses were also forwarded to our negotiating team. I remember that after one major military engagement, we wrote a paper entitled “Have we turned the corner?” I would describe our efforts as a continual watch of and interpretation of events unfolding in Vietnam – both north and south. The Paris talks were on-going and we tried to provide our negotiators with information and analysis we thought would be useful in their work.

We knew nothing of Kissinger's dealings with China before the general election. We were surprised by the visit, as was most of the country. But even before and certainly after the trip, we were writing papers for Secretary Rogers and Marshall Green, who were part of Nixon's delegation. We, of course, spent a lot of time on Sino-American relations, the subject of a small book that I mentioned earlier. The subject was of great interest to me which may have also contributed to the amount of time we spent on it.

I was deeply impressed by Kissinger's initiative. It was a real achievement. I would call it "A Great Leap Forward" – to use a familiar Chinese phrase. I had always been on the side of those who wanted to change our China policy. The first step in making a change occurred while working for Elliot Richardson. We allowed American subsidiaries abroad to do business with the PRC. I was surprised by the giant step that the Nixon administration took. I as well as many others saw the potential benefit of our change in China policy as a step toward resolving the Vietnam conflict changing the Soviet orientation. So the initiative was deeply relevant to our country's most vexing foreign policy problems at the time.

At this point it might be useful to quote again from the paper I delivered at Harvard in 2006. It summarizes my views on Sino-American relations over the years including in the Foreign Service and repeats some of the previous discussion. "China was very much part of my various jobs. During my graduate days in Cambridge professors and students including me sneered at Professor Dixie Walker's perverse views of China communism during its early rule. Walker supposedly had gone way overboard in his criticism of communist rule in his book China Under Communism: The First Five Years. Well he was right on what was going on in China, and we at Harvard and most other universities were wrong. That came home in spades, except to the Committee of Concerned Asian Scholars, in the incredible human catastrophes of the Great Leap Forward and the Cultural Revolution."

"Cataclysmic events in China coupled with our extreme limited access and knowledge often prompted fierce interagency debates, almost always between the State Department and the CIA. The Great Leap Forward produced a huge argument over whether China would fall apart because of the severity of the food situation, "the downward spiral" as Joe Alsop called it in the China Quarterly. The outside community provided little insight on China's actual situation with the exception of the famous Father Ladany in Hong Kong. In the end the State Department was proved right in its more optimistic view of China's ability to get by the terrible shortages, although it lowballed the number of deaths. Parenthetically, such fights over ignorance have continued to this day about countries we are isolated from, including North Korea and most vividly, Iraq."

"China's potential for breakdown and our internal debate converged at other times. One interesting episode that I followed closely in Taiwan in 1962 was when the Nationalist government publicly started planning to "counterattack" the mainland and levying all sorts of taxes to support an invasion. A brief effort to rally U.S. support for the KMT was led by Defense and the CIA, particularly the station chief in Taiwan, a Harvard PhD and former junior fellow – Ray Cline. The Kennedy administration told Chiang Kai-shek to forget about it. It was the last gasp of Chiang's return to the mainland ideology. The excising of the myth contributed to greater openness on Taiwan."

"Other interesting battles raged in Washington over a China we perceived dimly. One, similar to our problem today with Iran and with many of the same considerations, focused on what to do about China's becoming a nuclear power as we watched it proceed to its first test in 1964. Significant pressure to attack China's nuclear facilities were rebuffed by President Johnson. A second was the debate in 1964-65 over how China would respond to the vast build up of American forces in Vietnam and the bombing of the North" which I discussed previously.

"It was, of course, hard to evaluate in our deliberations the extent of China's domestic turmoil and its impact on Chinese policy of those extraordinary two decades in China. The Cultural Revolution mostly produced shakings of heads in Washington."

Back to my employment history. Richardson was appointed Secretary of Defense in mid-1973. I went to work for Defense in the fall. So I was in INR for about one year.

***

ABRAMOWITZ: Our concern for the potential of communist encroachment in East Asia, gave me the opportunity in 1975 after Vietnam fell to convene a group to come up with a U.S. strategy for Asia in the post Vietnam era. Our major recommendation actually was to slowly improve our relationships with China including development of a military-to-military relationship. When the study was completed we briefed other agencies in Washington. I think it was well received. It was not a roadmap, but more of a strategy piece intended to begin creation of a framework for inter-agency discussions about what specific steps might be taken to improve our position in Asia. We needed to explore what more could be done to strengthen our relations with China, as part of our effort to contain the Soviet Union in Asia. In any case, our views were heard around town; I don't know how much influence we had, but I think it gave some help to those pressing for an easing of tensions with the PRC.

It also widely felt that Sino-Soviet tensions might ease if the Chinese came to believe that we were not a reliable player in the region. This view carried over into the Carter administration where it was challenged by some members of that administration. In any case, much of my time in 1975 was devoted to trying to restore East Asian views of the United States as a reliable and dependable ally.

Q: Let me now turn to the Philippines. What were the major issues you had to deal with as deputy assistant secretary (ISA) in DoD?

ABRAMOWITZ: Early in the Carter administration, Secretary Vance called me over and said he wanted me to come back to the Department to become Dick Holbrooke's deputy in EA. I said no. During that meeting he suggested that perhaps the time had come for us to withdraw from the Philippines – or at least to get out of Clark Air Base. At about this time, the national security process had produced – or was about to produce – a couple of National Security Memoranda (NSIM), which were instructions to the bureaucracy to come with some answers to specific policy questions. One dealt with Korea; the second related to the possible elimination of our military bases at Clark and Subic in the Philippines.

The first one State had the lead, the second DoD. I was appointed as chairman of the inter-agency working group to draft the response to the Philippine NSIM. The principal issue was a strategic one, whether we should withdraw from our bases, long a basic part of our defense structure in the area. Unlike Korea, our posture in the Philippines was a decision the president had not made. We produced a paper which discussed the pros and cons; it was not, to the best of my recollection, a source for serious inter-agency dispute, unlike the Korean paper. It was a unanimous view that we should not withdraw from Subic naval base. Clark was a more debatable proposition with people holding differing views about the importance of that air base. My recollection is that the final draft suggested that the decision on Clark be postponed and then be reviewed again in a year or so. There was general agreement among the agencies that there were already enough action already underway that would reduce our presence in Asia, after our defeat in Vietnam, that this was not the right time to consider major reductions in our presence in the Philippines. I think that all agencies shared the concerns over Asian perceptions if we continued to reduce and reduce our presence in the area.

All of the administration's efforts also have to be viewed within the context of its desire to normalize relations with China. This was a difficult issue in light of all its wide impact. I personally favored the direction the administration was taking toward finally carrying out normalization. But I was also quite cognizant of the number of difficulties that such a policy would create. The administration's considerations culminated in Brzezinski's trip to Beijing in the summer of 1978 during which he told the Chinese that the U.S. had made the decision to normalize by the end of the year.

While China policy was moving ahead the USG was also focused on specific issues such as troop withdrawal and base closings. China policy of course raised the question of our relations with Taiwan which in fact had been under review since the Ford administration. We received a presidential directive to develop a withdrawal plan for our military presence on Taiwan, which ISA did. To further complicate our Asian situation, the State Department was negotiating with Vietnam to re-establish relations and they had gone very far. Given growing China-Vietnam animosity the White House did not want to rock the China boat. Holbrooke's negotiations with Vietnam ran into White House "buzz saw". The two efforts – normalization of our relations with China and the establishment of relations with Vietnam – became conflicting objectives as there was a bureaucratic battle. Vietnam lost out. The normalization of relations had to wait a long time with Vietnam.

This dilemma was not a problem for us in the Pentagon, but I closely followed developments. I supported the draw-down of our troops in Taiwan. I also supported the normalization of relations with Vietnam. DoD as an institution took no position on these policy issues.

I mention these various policy development strands to illustrate the dilemmas Carter – and Ford before him – faced in Asia before and after our withdrawal from Vietnam. I was in the Pentagon for the first couple of years of the Ford administration and watched the strains close up. There was no question that Asia and our future there was very much on Carter's agenda. In the final analysis, it was our efforts to improve relations with China that was certain and will be most remembered by history.

As I suggested before, there was an informal network in Washington among people dealing with Asia. It consisted of a variety of offices in State, the NSC, and ISA. Holbrooke, Armacost, and I were in frequent contact. We had a high degree of intellectual camaraderie; we didn't necessarily always agree on every issue (e.g. troop withdrawal from Korea), but we had intense and valuable discussions on each issue. We worked together closely and were close personal friends. These colleagues understood my position and even if not agreeing with me, at least respected my views – unlike people like Stillwell who never took the time to try to understand or even be factually correct.

WINSTON LORD
National Security Council Staff
Washington, DC (1969-1973)

Director, Policy Planning Staff
Washington, DC (1973-1977)

Ambassador Lord was born and raised in New York City and earned degrees at Yale University and the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy. He entered the Foreign Service in 1961. After serving in Washington and Geneva, Mr. Lord was assigned to the Department of Defense before joining the National Security Council, where he was involved in China and Indonesia matters. He subsequently served on State's Policy Planning Staff. In 1985 Mr. Lord was named US Ambassador to China, where he served until 1989. From 1993 to 1997 the Ambassador held the position of Assistant Secretary of State dealing with Far Eastern Affairs. Ambassador Lord was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kenned in 1998.

Q: But Yale did have that Yale in China thing. I was wondering if there was any spill over there?

LORD: Well, China was to become a very important part of my life, including my married life. I had no particular interest in Asia at that time. So consistent with the curriculum of most of the schools and colleges at the time, most of the history we took was either American history or European history.

I might add a quick note on my languages. I continued French at Yale, I dropped Latin and Greek. But the problem was that teaching at Hotchkiss, for that matter Buckley before, and at Yale the emphasis in those days was on reading and writing, not on speaking. I got to the point where I could read in French almost as well as English, but to this day I can't speak it very well and I have an incredibly bad accent. Of course, Latin and Greek was all reading and writing in any event, not speaking. So as a practical help in my career, it was a real lacking here given the kind of approach they took. I could stumble through French, and get along, and I can still read it quite well but I never developed a good speaking habit, and I'm not particularly talented on spoken languages. I'm probably sort of in between. I did extremely well, I was usually first in my class in all these languages, but it was reading and writing, and not speaking.

Q: What about history?

LORD: History was, as I've said, essentially American history and European history. I don't recall taking Asian history, for example. And there's no question that there was a bias in our colleges and schools then.

You mentioned Yale in China. Before I forget, we'll get into this but in my senior year I suddenly thought I'd like to participate in Yale in China which was then in Hong Kong. By the time I focused on it I was too late for the application. I might well have gone and if I'd done that I would not have gone to graduate school and maybe would have missed my wife.

Q: You better explain Yale in China.

LORD: Yale in China was a program which still exists today in which, in those days, was essentially people going to Hong Kong studying Chinese. I guess it must have been Cantonese at the time, and studying things Chinese. Of course in those days we didn't have relations with China so they couldn't go into the mainland, so it was a little misnomer. Since the opening we've had Yale in China with teachers going into China and working in Chinese schools in various parts of China.

Q: I think it was initially a missionary impulse, wasn't it?

LORD: That's correct.

Q: Then it moved into more academic...

LORD: A couple more points on my parents. My mother had a very distinguished career but in those days, '30s, '40s, '50s, '60s, this is well before women's lib, she was under constant criticism because of her heavy public involvement and traveling, of being a poor mother, of neglecting her kids. I never felt this way. I'm sure my brother never felt this way. We thought she was a terrific mother, and we were proud of what she was doing. And my father was totally supportive, was not only content but proud to be known as the husband of Mary Lord. I've always joked by the way. I was always known as the son of Mary Lord, and just when I was coming into my own. I had a famous wife who was a best selling author, I became the husband of Bette Bao Lord. So one of these days I might make it on my own.

Q: I'm afraid it's too late. I mentioned that I was interviewing you today and my daughter and her friend...I went to a party last night with them, and they said, it was all about your wife. Ambassador to China...

LORD: You might tell them, if they're fans, her latest book, The Middle Heart, a novel which came out a year ago, is going to be a Hallmark Hall of Fame, a television production.

So from early on I had an appreciation of the equality of women, including in careers and how they should have a fairer chance. I also had a good feel for the way my father took this without any ego problems and was very supportive. My father wrote a very amusing book called Exit Backward Bowing which chronicles all the travels he took with my mother. It's by him with the advice and dissent of Mary Lord, and it came out sometime in the '70s I guess. One amusing thing in that is that my mother was always very diplomatic, didn't like confrontations, whereas my father was more straightforward. He didn't like Nehru of India whom he thought was hypocritical and more or less he didn't like the fact he always sort of leaned toward the Russians. But my mother knew his daughter, Mrs. Gandhi very well and didn't want to alienate her in the book. So my father said some nasty things about Nehru in one of the chapters. My mother said, "you've got to take that out." So my father resolved this by saying in the introduction, "I was going to write the following nasty things about Mr. Nehru but Mary said I couldn't do it so therefore I decided to take out the following paragraph", and he left the paragraph in.

Q: Was there any questioning from whatever passed for the left at Yale at that time?

LORD: A pretty conservative era. The lines were pretty clearly drawn in the Cold War so one was suspicious, not only of the Russians but of course of the Chinese. I held a rather traditional bipartisan Cold War view, that we were in a global struggle with the Soviet Union. I was a liberal Republican even then, and not an extremist in foreign policy even then. My whole career I've been rather centralist in terms of domestic politics and foreign policy. So I would not classify myself among the raging hawks at the time. But I'm sure looking back I believed in a strong defense and suspicion of the Soviets, and the need to maintain our alliances. The need to contain Communist China, etc.

Q: You were at Fletcher when?

LORD: The fall of 1959 to June 1960. If I had to pick out the happiest years of my life, this would be towards the top. First, I met my future wife there and I always joke that I first started becoming her friend because she took very good notes in economic classes, which she did by the way. So we began to get very close starting around December, then we graduated. Since we'd seen each other every day, we thought this is a little artificial so she went off to Hawaii to work - that's the furthest she could get away from me and still be in the United States. She was a Chinese citizen, born in Shanghai, didn't want to leave the country because she wasn't sure she could get back in on her passport so she went off to Hawaii. She actually left for Hawaii with $50.00, a one-way ticket, no job, and no contacts but she was determined to show that she could work on her own, survive and also to test our relationship and within a week she became executive assistant to the head of the East-West Center which was just starting up. So that was one reason I had a happy year.

Q: As you were dealing with the world at Fletcher, were there any particular areas where you began to focus? I mean, having a young lady you were very interested in China. Did that move you towards looking at the Far East?

LORD: It certainly did, although again it's hard to quantify from a distance. Clearly I got more interested in Asia but I think like most of us Europe and the Soviet Union was the major focus, and I of course had been to Russia, and I had been to Asia so I had an interest in Asia as well. So those are the two continents that intrigued me more than Latin America or Africa. Indeed, in my career I became a generalist, and more recently more Asian-focused.

Q: With your international group at Fletcher, did you find there was sort of a different view of our rather strong anti-view towards the Soviet Union and China?

LORD: I don't recall specifically. I know we had a lot of debates, both with Americans about domestic politics, and with foreigners about international affairs. But I believe most of the students came from countries that were pretty much on our side during the Cold War. There were several Pakistanis, several Thai students, some Japanese, Latin Americans, only a couple Middle East students as I recall. So I think most of them were from countries that were allies - it doesn't mean they personally would necessarily subscribe to their government's position. I don't recall a great challenge over my anti-Soviet position. There might have been some individuals.

Q: This is probably a good time, could you give me some background about your wife, because she became an important element later on when you...

LORD: First on, one further point on the racial marriage. It never seemed to us like it was a big deal, it seemed natural to get married but again in 1963 interracial marriages, even though it was Asian not African-American, was considered unusual. I remember my old nurse who had helped raise me when I was very young, a conservative Scottish woman, was deeply upset that I would have an interracial marriage and tried to talk me out of it, and of course had absolutely no effect. But we never felt at the time or since it was ever a problem. It was always smooth. Of course, my parents were totally relaxed about it, as were the Baos, and the wedding was a happy event. It really was a terrific match. We never really felt any problems, and we never felt since then that we've ever suffered. Indeed we've felt it a source of strength, it enriched us both and, of course, exposed me to Chinese culture and language and food, and dealing with her parents and learning more about China through my wife.

Q: She was about your age?

LORD: She is one year younger, she was born November 3, 1938 in Shanghai. Her father was born on November 3rd, her grandfather was born on November 3rd. Her grandmother, her mother, and she were all born in the year of the Tiger, so there was a lot of symbolism. And in fact when she was born her grandfather told her mother that she had all the signs of a rich and happy life. Just the features and the timing, and everything was pointing towards a terrific life. And in fact she certainly would agree with that prognostication.

The Baos were moving around during the war. Bette was the first child of her parents who were married in 1937, and they left Shanghai. They were in various places, including Guilin, Hong Kong, and Chungking. Mr. Sandys Bao was an engineer and he himself was a remarkable person who was the debating champion of all of China. A great athlete, very intelligent and a great engineer, and he was building or rebuilding factories and power plants in China. And they kept moving around to stay out of the hands of the Japanese, and there were times when they had to go into air-raid shelters, etc. My mother-in-law, Dora Bao, was a gorgeous woman and very strong and intelligent in her own right. So they moved around went into the interior of China. The next daughter named Cathy was born in Guilin, and third third sister, named SanSan, means number three, was born in Chungking.

When Bette was eight in 1946 her father was assigned to the United States as an export representative for the Nationalist government. He assumed the assignment was for six months or a year so he was only going to take his wife and Bette, who by then eight, could learn the language at that time and that would be useful for her, and leave the four year old sister Cathy and one year old sister SanSan behind. Cathy cried so much that they took her as well. He went ahead of his wife and daughters and then she and Bette and Cathy came over in 1946, in the fall. I don't remember the exact month. But they left SanSan behind, only one year old and she would get nothing out of it and they figured they were going back in six months or a year. So they left her with an aunt and uncle to take care of her until they went back.

He kept getting extended in his assignment, Mr. Bao did, and then the Communists gradually took over and they couldn't get SanSan out of China. To make a long story short, she spent the first 17 years of her life in China. Until she was about 16 she thought her aunt and uncle were her real parents. Her grandmother who thought she was dying at the time, she actually died a little bit later, decided to tell SanSan that her real parents were in America. When she heard that she wanted to be reunited, or at least to see her real parents. Her mother wrote a letter pretending that she was sick, and was going to be in Hong Kong for convalescence and could her daughter come out for two weeks to visit her and take care of her. Luckily in terms of timing the Communists for some reason, mostly because there was a terrible famine at that point as the result of this Great Leap Forward, were letting some refugees get out. To this day we don't know whether they believed that the daughter was only going to go out for two weeks and go back in, or whether they realized she was leaving. But she took a train to Hong Kong. My father-in-law was very nervous because many Chinese families had tried this, the kids would come out and they were so disoriented they'd turn around and go back in again and not join their real parents. Mrs. Bao was determined to take a chance, the girl came out, and they were reunited and they went to Taiwan temporarily and came to the United States and she has been ever since.

And that story of her being left behind, growing up in China and how she got out, and her experiences, was my wife's first book to become a best selling author. SanSan arrived just shortly before our wedding and was a bridesmaid at our wedding before she could speak any English. So she was there just in time for the wedding in May '63. I think she got out at the end of '62.

That book was called Eighth Moon. My wife had no intention of being an author. She was a chemistry major at Tufts University where she went. She had gone to a New Jersey high school before that. At Tufts she was a campus leader, and a good student, head cheer leader for four years, a modern dancer, and just one of the most popular people on campus. She started as a chemistry major but as she said she wasn't very good at it, she did this because she felt that all Chinese kids should grow up to be scientists like Madame Curie. So she thought she was going to be an "ist" as a scientist or biologist or chemist. But she kept blowing up the lab. The head of the chemistry department told her that she could either stay in the chemistry department and flunk, or move on to another curriculum and pass. So she changed to international affairs and felt this was a matter of shame that as a Chinese Asian youngster she wasn't going to be an "ist". Luckily it turned out later in life she was an "ist", a novelist.

Anyway she took international affairs and then went to Fletcher and that's how we met up. So we met and got our master's degree together at Fletcher. We decided for reasons I've mentioned to separate and see how enduring our relationship was, having been in close quarters all this time. She went to Hawaii, as I've said, with $50.00 and a one way ticket, no job and no contacts and within a few days was the top assistant to the acting director of the East-West Center, just as it was getting launched and helped him launch the whole East-West Center operations for about a year. Then she came back and worked for the Fulbright exchange program in Washington, joined a modern dance group, the Ethel Butler Group which was the outstanding modern dance group in the city.

Early in my career, in addition to writing Eighth Moon, she was basically dancing and teaching dance, being supportive of me but didn't have her own career per se. She did run a major, successful arts conference in the early 1970s while Nixon was President. She had no plans to write anymore, and didn't realize that writing wasn't always that easy. She took on the job of writing her sister's life because her sister didn't speak any English. My wife spoke Chinese. She had forgotten Chinese until she became a teenager and then she relearned it, and felt she was the only one both with a personal connection and the language who could tell her story. So she had her sister dictate her life, and then she turned it into a book. It did extremely well, almost was a best seller, sold probably - which was a lot of books in those times - something like 30 or 40,000 hardbacks, was a Reader's Digest condensed book and was translated in 15-20 languages.

Looking back on her first experience in the United States, however, this is relevant to another book she wrote, when she first came to the States, when her family came over it was to Brooklyn, and she arrived the same year that Jackie Robinson broke into the major baseball leagues. The Dodgers were her passion and Jackie Robinson was her hero.

Q You might explain who Jackie Robinson was.

LORD: Jackie Robinson was the first black American athlete to play in the major leagues, and he broke into the major leagues in 1947. My wife was living in Brooklyn, he was playing for the Dodgers. So she was for the Dodgers in general, and for Jackie Robinson in particular. She had a very enriching time adjusting culturally, and always felt that you could be enriched by two different cultures, and that becoming an American doesn't mean leaving your native culture behind. She has always felt that she has had the best of both Chinese and American culture and history, and she had some adjustments like any immigrant would. They arrived on a Sunday, her mother had her in school the next day, a Monday. They went in to see the head mistress and she asked what age she was to figure out what grade she should go into. In China you're one year old when you're born, and you're also another year old when you get to January 1. My wife was eight, but when asked this question she put up ten fingers, and was put in the fifth grade, and she didn't speak a word of English and was put in the fifth grade. But she had to adjust, so she went on and always graduated early, she got out of college by the time she was 20, and went on to graduate school.

Anyway, her experiences were amusing and enriching, and she wrote a book for children called In the Year of the Boar and Jackie Robinson. It's symbolism in the title, its how you continue to be Chinese, but also become an American, and also how Jackie Robinson stands for the best of America, and how baseball symbolizes America where you're both an individual and a member of the team. This book has won all kinds of awards, it's a staple in classrooms around the country and has been extraordinarily popular.

The other books she has written, just quickly to go through this, It was of course dramatic and we'll get to this later, that I was with Kissinger on the first trip to China by any American official in 22 years. Kissinger kept going back in the succeeding years to advance relationships and on one of these trips, in 1973, my wife went back for the first time to China since she had left and saw many of her relatives, and visited her grandfather's grave, and was very moved by the whole experience, and came back deciding to write another book. The only book she had written at this point was Eighth Moon, which was published back in 1964. This was about nine years later.

She started writing about her relatives, and about China, but realized that if she published it that her relatives might get in trouble with the Communist regime. So she decided to make it a fictional account but realized that she had to go back into Chinese history somewhat, and went back into the end of the 19th century. Then began a novel which then really had no relationship to her actual relatives' experiences, just an inspiration, although many people who read the novel assumed it was a true story of her family history. So she wrote Spring Moon, and this was her first novel. It was an absolute phenomenon when it came out, spread by word-of-mouth. It got fantastic reviews. It was on the New York Times, Publishers Weekly and every other major best selling list for 31 weeks. It got as high as number two in the country in hardback, sold a couple hundred thousand copies, a lot in those days. It was number one in paperback, sold over two million copies. And Alan Pakula, the famous director took an option on it for a movie although he never made it. Again translated into 20 languages, it was a main selection of the Literary Guild, and was just an absolute phenomenon which is still her most famous and beloved book, along with the children book which another generation has equally loved. I mentioned In the Year of the Boar and Jackie Robinson, which was actually published in 1984. Spring Moon was written...well, she took six years writing fiction. She did Eighth Moon in a year, which was non-fiction. Fictions always takes longer, it took about six years.

We went to China from '85 to '89 and based on her experiences and interviews with various Chinese, she came back and wrote a book which was published in 1990 called Legacies: A Chinese Mosaic, which is non-fiction, a combination of stories of Chinese, particularly during the Cultural Revolution up to Tiananmen Square, and her own family histories woven in, so it's both personal and historical, political and cultural. It was chosen by Time Magazine as one of the top ten books of the year. It was a best seller in its own right, I think for nine weeks. It was a Book of the Month Club selection and translated in many languages overseas.

And then her final book was about a year and a half ago (1996), called The Middle Heart, another novel on China, not a sequel but a more recent period in Chinese history, essentially World War II up to Tiananmen Square. Again, terrific reviews. It sold very well but was not a best seller like her other books. But the compensation is that in addition to many foreign languages, it is going to be on television Hallmark Hall of Fame (with her doing the screenplay - chosen after interview).

Q: At least you...

(Lord Speaking about what his next move was in his career)

Lord: And then the other one was when I was offered by the National Security Advisor, Bud McFarlane, and Secretary of State George Shultz to become ambassador to China in 1985. And I said I preferred a job in Washington. My wife said, you're crazy not to be ambassador to China. So in leaving the Service, then becoming Special Assistant to Kissinger, which was the turning point in my career, and then going to China as ambassador, in each case my wife was very influential in helping me.

Q: As you looked at Asia when you came on board, did you have any ideas thinking back in your mind about different approaches we might take? Leaving Vietnam aside.

LORD: Well, I thought even then that Asia was of great importance to us. I don't think that even I could foresee how important it would emerge by the 1990s. But I was never guilty of being Eurocentric, I felt that Asia deserved a greater slice of our attention and our engagement. I've already said that I supported our general posture in the war, not only for our global position but for our position in Asia, and to give the countries in the region time to develop. I'd have to say that I was not vigorously in favor of an opening to China at that point, which is important to state given the fact that I was so involved later in my career. I was not Joe McCarthy-like in my dislike or my distrust of China. I must have been aware of Nixon's article which included China in Foreign Affairs magazine in 1967. I don't think anybody realized he was going to carry it to such a dramatic extent but he did indicate that we had to do business with China in that article which coming from him was quite interesting. But it would be dishonest for me to say that in the late '60s I was saying we should open up to China, that will free up our diplomacy in general. I was open to new approaches but I didn't envision the dramatic opportunities of the China opening at that point.

Q: Taking a little tour of the horizon. Asia, did that include India at that time?

LORD: No. Again, I didn't work just on Asia. I want to make that clear. But I recall that was mostly what I worked on, and I did some think pieces on Asian strategy in general. But we traditionally in the State Department, as you know, and that is also true in the Pentagon, we don't include the sub-continent in our definition of Asia, or specifically, East Asia and the Pacific. So I don't recall doing much work on India, it was basically east of India.

Q: Indonesia by this time was sort of considered a safe area. Suharto had been in for about two years.

LORD: Well, again as I've told you, I want to be very careful not to try to pretend more than I do remember about specifics and where we were on different issues and policies. I recall thinking that Indonesia was underappreciated given its size and potential importance. I don't recall how much we thought it had stabilized. Obviously, Indonesia together with the rest of Southeast Asia was a major concern for us as we engaged in Vietnam. I would have thought I'm sure that if we lose in Vietnam, if not an automatic domino impact there would nevertheless be an unsettling impact on Indonesia and the other countries in Southeast Asia. It is one of the reasons I generally supported our Vietnam policy. We'll get into this in much more detail as we go along, but in retrospect as one calculates the benefits and the losses of the Vietnam experience, clearly the losses outweigh the benefits. But on the plus side you have to say that we did buy time for Indonesia, for Southeast Asia in general to develop their economies with our having established a buffer against communist influence. And I do believe that the buying of time for Southeast Asia and Asian development generally is one of the pluses of our engagement. If we had never become engaged, and Hanoi had overrun all of Indochina without any opposition in the course of the '60s, I do think without having to subscribe to automatic domino theory, there might well have been other countries falling under communist influence. Our Asian friends agree that we bought them time to develop independently.

Q: I think it's easy to underestimate the very possible effect, and later of course seeing these other countries strengthening themselves; they no longer had the same momentum later. What about the Philippines, was this a problem? Do you remember anything about Marcos?

LORD: I remember at that time, probably having a fairly high opinion of Marcos, I forget when he came into office. And indeed, Marcos did some good things early in his tenure. But like so many Asian leaders, or so many leaders in the world, he didn't know when to quit when he was ahead. So whether it's the Shah, or whether it's Marcos, or whether it's other world leaders, sometimes they do good work for a while, and then greed or corruption, or ego, sets in and they begin to pay for it. So I imagine at that time the Philippines were one of our allies in Vietnam, along with Thailand, Australia, Korea, I forget who else was helping, and we had a pretty positive view of them. But again, it's hard for me to reconstruct 30 years later precisely how we felt about each country.

Q: How about the other two major powers, Japan and Korea? Were there problems at that time?

LORD: No, I think we felt Korea was a pretty good ally in Vietnam. At that point we were nervous about North Korean strength versus South Korea. Today, in the late '90s it's very clear who has won that race, South Korea has just dramatically outstripped and outperformed the North, it's gone ahead and the North has gone backwards. But, we tend to forget, that in the '60s in many respects the North not only posed a major military threat to the South, in some respects it looked like it was proceeding economically, at least on pace with South Korea. Maybe we were misled because it was an opaque society even then. So there was that concern, and this is before the miracle in terms of the South Korean economy taking off. But against that backdrop, they had been a good ally in Vietnam. As for Japan it was supporting our effort in Vietnam in terms of bases, etc. It was somewhat nervous. It wasn't an economic power, yet.

Q: Moving back, you say you had Asia and you had other things, but were you looking at the Soviet Union and how it was dealing with both China and Japan?

LORD: I just don't recall. I'm sure in the context of Asia I looked at all those countries. I believe I did some work on NATO and Europe but I don't have a precise recollection. Basically, being a Policy Planning Staff, it was more think pieces, or comment on ongoing policies, than it was operational. So our job was to provide information and possibly policy recommendations. Having said that like myself when I was head of Policy Planning in the State Department later, the heads of our office knew that we had to have policy relevance, that if it was just a white tower academic operation the leaders in the Pentagon weren't going to pay any attention. There was no question, and it wasn't just on Vietnam, but including Vietnam.

Q: When the election of Nixon came about, I assume that the Pentagon saw this...I mean most of the people who were involved, the military side of it, viewed this with a certain amount of relief.

LORD: I don't recall there was any opinion across the board. I guess in principle the military thought Nixon being a staunch anti-communist would be firm. But you have to remember that Nixon was promising a secret plan to end the Vietnam war. So on the one hand he had hard and tough anti-communist credentials, but on the other hand he was taking advantage of weariness with the war and suggesting he had ways he was going to end it. He never had a secret plan. To the extent he had a plan, it was basically figuring he could use the Russians and maybe the Chinese to pressure Hanoi, to bring the war to an end by trying to improve relations with them, and cornering Vietnam in that way. But he didn't have any secret plan. Moreover the military wasn't all hard-line because some of them were dovish or at least disillusioned.

Q: What about the staff that you were meeting there and the people?

LORD: As for the staff, I can't reconstruct every name, but they included people like the following. Al Haig, the military assistant who would eventually become NSC deputy, who went on to become head of NATO and Vice Chairman of the Army and also chief of staff to Nixon and the one who helped ease him out and make the transition during Watergate, and later Secretary of State, and Presidential candidate. You had Mort Halperin directing the NSC interagency system and policy planner who I have already mentioned, one of the brightest people in government, probably the youngest Deputy Assistant Secretary in the history of the Pentagon. Hal Sonnenfeldt on Soviet, European and arms control issues, who already had a reputation, knew Kissinger at Harvard, had a complicated relationship because they were both Jewish immigrants from Germany and although Sonnenfeldt never had the visibility or stature of Kissinger, he was very bright, very tough in talking back to Kissinger. They had a very complicated, mutually respectful, but also mutually prickly relationship. Bill Hyland, who was also a Soviet and European expert like Sonnenfeldt, who went on to be director of Intelligence and Research in the State Department, and editor of Foreign Affairs among other areas. Dick Sneider on Asian policy who was eventually ambassador to Korea, and a very able Foreign Service officer. Also, John Holdridge, on China and Asia, who became our ambassador and Assistant Secretary. Tony Lake who was special assistant to Kissinger in 1969 when I was sitting across the way in the Executive Building with Halperin, a bright Foreign Service officer who had been in Vietnam, went on to be head of the State Department Policy Planning staff and National Security Advisor. Roger Morris, another special assistant, an extremely bright, young person who went on to be a major historian and writer. William Watts, who also was a bright young officer. Jonathan Howe, only a naval commander then, went on to be a four-star admiral and actually headed our ill-fated operation in Somalia, and also was head of Political-Military Affairs in the State Department. John Negroponte, who worked with me on Indochina one of our outstanding Foreign Service officers, went on to become ambassador in several places. He wasn't there at the very beginning. Fred Bergsten, who has gone on to be one of the top economists in this country, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury and now head of the International Institute of Economics, Robert Hormats, who went on to become an Under Secretary as well as Vice Chairman of Goldman Sachs. Pete Vaky, another outstanding Foreign Service officers in charge of Latin American affairs. Peter Rodman, a close, personal assistant to Kissinger who went on to be head of State Policy Planning as well as a senior person in NSC staff. Hal Saunders who went on to be a top person on the Middle East, both the NSC and at the State Department. Others who came from Systems Analysis at the Pentagon were outstanding, such as Larry Lynn, Jan Lodal, and Phil O'Deen who worked on arms control and Vietnam.

This was particularly the case for the three priority issues as Nixon came into office from his standpoint, and Kissinger's standpoint - ending the Vietnam War on an honorable basis; opening up to China; and improving relations with Russia. In effect, taking care in his first term of the communist world, as well as the inherited war, clearing the decks so that in his second term he could build a structure of peace, if you will, on the momentum of the first term, and shore up other alliance relationships, although he worked on that in his first term as well, work on the Middle East, and attack some of the new issues including the developing world. That was the master plan. He was poised to do it, of course, after his landslide victory in 1972 and then along came Watergate. So that's the general staff. I could get into the system if you'd like.

Q: Why don't we talk about the system.

LORD: I've already given the priorities, obviously Vietnam was a priority, plus China and Russia, and in all three of those there was a heavy dose of secrecy and clearly running it out of the White House. So from the very beginning you had control out of the White House, and that was accomplished in several ways. First, Nixon himself had tremendous strategic conceptual strength, a lot of experience as Vice President and since he was defeated in 1960 he had traveled around the world and met a lot of foreign leaders, gained a lot of capital and brownie points and respect around the world by his travels. He did a lot of reading and thinking and writing including his Foreign Affairs article on Asia which gave the suggestion that he might open up to China. So you had that strength coming from the President himself and his grasp of policy.

Q: Before we go the next time into the issues that came up, were the meetings for decision-making getting people together, with either Kissinger or his deputy, or somebody sitting there? I've been to so many meetings when people get together and things don't really happen.

LORD: There were plenty of times, particularly early on, where you were just reviewing things and not necessarily trying to come up with a conclusion. Maybe saying, okay, we've brought the issue this far now let's go back and do some more work on it. There were other times where you'd have disagreement and we need more work, bounce it back and come back again. Other times where you would have enough to go forward to the President. Other times where decisions were made. Sometimes there were crisis meetings to react, e.g. to the downing of an American plane by North Korea, or a quick meeting when there was a border clash between the Chinese and the Russians in the summer of 1969, a very important event which really brought home to Kissinger and Nixon why the opening to China would make sense. So there were different kinds of meetings; we didn't always have decisions.

The other thing I should point out is the advantage Kissinger had in his control of the system, in addition to brilliance, hard work, staff and the process set up, was proximity. This is always an advantage a National Security Advisor has over a Secretary of State, not that Nixon's door was always open but Kissinger could get in there although Haldeman tried to control him a little bit. He could pick up the phone and go in and see Nixon on a daily basis; he briefed him every morning. This is crucial before NSC meetings. In addition to the papers with the options and maybe tabs with the actual details, with State, Defense, and other agency positions. Kissinger always had the opportunity, and generally took advantage of it - and Halperin or I, or the expert on the staff did it - to put his own views on top. In fairness he would make sure the President knew other peoples' views. He had to, otherwise even he would be in trouble. He owed it to the President and he owed it for his own protection so it didn't look like he was cutting people off. But he would get the last word in, either verbally before a meeting, or in his covering memo saying, well look, Secretary Rogers thinks you ought to do this. Secretary Laird thinks you ought to do that. Here's why I think you ought to go this direction for the following reasons. He would even say on paper or verbally, here's how you ought to play it at the meeting.

Now I want to make clear Nixon in the NSC meetings generally did not make decisions in the meetings. I don't think he ever did. He basically would listen, give people a chance to present their points of views. It was usually led off by a CIA briefing and an overview of issues and options by Kissinger. Nixon would let everyone weigh in, and then go back and weigh his decision. And, again, Kissinger would have a crack at him after the meeting. Whether it's right after or the next couple of days, he could go in there. So he had tremendous access and influence.

Furthermore, another strength Nixon and Kissinger had for foreign policy, and for the system being dominated by the White House, was the fact that they thought in generally similar terms. They both believed in strategic approaches, not just tactical day-to-day approaches. They both had a conceptual framework they were working in, they were both hard headed geopoliticalists who clearly put an emphasis on what countries did in their foreign policies, not their domestic policies, who were clearly attracted to balance of power. And they usually shared views on specific issues. Each independently, for example, saw the imperative of opening up with China. They both deserve credit.

Finally, there was a shared strength because Nixon and Kissinger had a good division of labor. Nixon as President had to make the tough decisions. He had a strategic framework. He was knowledgeable, but he didn't get mired down in details. So he was a general strategist, and he kept informed and on top of things.

He generally left to Kissinger the actual negotiations, the tactics, a lot of the backgrounding of the press, the promotion of public perceptions, the bureaucratic chairing of committees, the infighting, and the traveling.

So I think that President Nixon of all of the presidents that I worked for struck the best balance between not getting into too much detail and not being sufficiently involved. Nixon was in between, say, the practices of Ford and Carter. President Ford was quite removed from foreign policy, although Ford had great confidence in Kissinger as Secretary of State. In fairness to President Ford he had to heal the nation after the Watergate Affair. The other extreme was President Jimmy Carter, who arguably got into too much detail. I think that President Nixon struck a good balance and had enough confidence in Kissinger, who held views parallel to his, and was sufficiently brilliant as a diplomat and tactician that President Nixon could leave the daily work to him.

Q: Today is May 14, 1998. Let's talk first about your impressions of President Nixon, particularly early on in his administration.

LORD: Sure. I had worked for Nixon as a volunteer in the 1960 presidential campaign, as we discussed earlier. I knew his dark side, of course, but also felt that he was very well equipped to be President, particularly as far as foreign policy matters were concerned. Therefore, I went to work for him with considerable enthusiasm, and I was also enthusiastic about Kissinger, his brilliance, and his potential.

I think that the best portrayal of Nixon that I've seen remains Kissinger's portrait in the first volume of his memoirs, in which he captures the complexity of Nixon. First, regarding Nixon's strengths, I should say that in terms of my exposure to him it was considerable but not intimate and certainly not on a daily basis. Kissinger generally liked to meet with Nixon alone, as opposed to having NSC staff people with him. This was both a reflection of Kissinger's ego, on the one hand, and his not wishing to have others there, which reflected Kissinger's insecurity. Kissinger sought to control access to President Nixon in many ways. This was true in the case of briefings, meetings, or, for example, at decision-making sessions after meetings.

However, I sat in on a great many meetings with President Nixon and some strategy sessions with him, as well. As we discussed previously, I was with Nixon on the plane to China. I sat in on all of the meetings Nixon had with Mao Zedong and Zhou Enlai. I was with him at the Moscow Summit Meeting. I traveled with him as we went beyond Moscow on that trip to Romania, Iran, etc. I once went up to Camp David, Maryland, at a crucial moment, before the May 1972 Summit Meeting in Moscow, when Hanoi launched a new offensive in South Vietnam. So I had intermittent access to President Nixon. At San Clemente, CA, I was out there at New Year's, working on Nixon's annual foreign policy reports. There would be some interaction with the President on these occasions. Then, of course, I also had considerable exposure to Nixon, through Kissinger, in terms of his comments and his relationship with President Nixon. Occasionally, I would be listening on the phone with Kissinger when he'd be talking with Nixon, often in the evening. Sometimes, Nixon would be swearing in his special language, either because he was tired or he had had a few drinks. So that's just to give you a feel for my exposure to him.

Now, regarding the man himself, not only based on the previous evidence but on the observations of others, which reinforced my impressions. The good side of Nixon, in terms of sheer strategy and conceptual strength in foreign policy, was very good, indeed. He had had considerable experience in terms of travel and meetings as Vice President. He had done a lot of thinking and reading, and indeed writing, including his famous article in 1967 in "Foreign Affairs."

So he had a very clear strategy when he came into office as President. In particular, he had some basic goals. I want to add quickly that his strategy was very close to Kissinger's, but they came at it independently. They hadn't really known each other very well. I think that they had only met once or so before Nixon became President. They hadn't really discussed much, so Nixon had some courage in choosing Kissinger, despite this lack of personal contact and the fact that Kissinger was in direct contrast with Nixon. Kissinger was a Harvard educated intellectual, of Jewish immigrant origin, and an establishment, Rockefeller type person, whereas Nixon was from an anti-communist, California, modest income, American family background.

Clearly, what Nixon and Kissinger had in mind was first, and as the highest priority, to deal with problems involving the communist world. They wanted to have good relations with our allies and to get to issues like the Middle East. However, the three overriding challenges were to: end the war in Vietnam, open up a new relationship with China, and try to improve the relationship with the Soviet Union. These issues were, of course, interrelated. By improving relations with China and Russia they could put pressure on Hanoi to negotiate, since they were Hanoi's two major patrons. So Nixon had a clear feel for geopolitics. He had a sense, and we will get into greater detail on this, that by opening up to China he would loosen up our diplomacy generally and that he wouldn't have to deal with only Moscow in talking with the communist world.

Nixon obviously had a sense by then, and many Americans were slow to come to this appreciation, that the Sino-Soviet split was real. This became very clear after the clashes on the Sino-Soviet border in the summer of 1969. Nixon saw other advantages in establishing contact with China as the world's most populous nation. Above all he wanted to put pressure on the Soviet Union to get them to be more forthcoming toward us, by showing that we had an option by going to China. This was the so-called "China card," a term which was exaggerated. Nixon wanted to have good relations with Russia as well. He wanted to have better relations with each of these large, communist nations than they had with each other.

Nixon also hoped, and here he put more emphasis than Kissinger ever did on this point, that Russia would help him end the war in Vietnam. During the presidential campaign of 1968 Nixon talked about having a secret plan to end the war in Vietnam. He didn't really have a secret plan. I think that his main emphasis was that improving relations with the two communist giants, and particularly the Soviet Union, would help to bring pressure on Hanoi to end the war.

So Nixon's greatest strength was his conceptual approach to foreign policy, his geopolitical feel, and his sense of strategy as he entered office.

Q: There you were, often the note taker. Were these points articulated by Nixon and Kissinger, or is this something that you are putting together later?

LORD: It's a combination of both. Certainly, these views were articulated by Kissinger in my presence. They were also articulated in annual, Presidential reports, which hold up very well in retrospect, by the way. Nixon put them out every year, usually by early February. We would draft them at President Nixon's home in San Clemente, CA, in late December to mid-January. They were highly conceptual statements of U.S. foreign policy. They often gave some sense of the direction in which we were heading, including the opening to China if people read these statements carefully.

So this version of Nixon's views is partly derived from secondary sources but partly from conversations in my presence. Certainly, they reflected the way President Nixon conducted himself in meetings.

I would like to add somewhat to the strengths of President Nixon, and then we'll get to the weaknesses, particularly during the White House years. During the early years of his Presidency, and while I was in the White House, President Nixon did his homework before meetings and conducted himself extremely well at them. Later, it became noticeable, as the Watergate affair began to overtake him, that he was less meticulous about his preparations for meetings and so on.

The strategy papers that we helped to write for him reflected Kissinger's views. However, we knew that they were also consistent with the President's views. I've come to these conclusions, given my exposure to him in meetings and what I had read at the time and since. I think that most observers, including even harsh critics of Nixon, would say that this strategic approach was one of his great strengths.

Also, I think that one of his strengths, compared to other Presidents, before and since, was that he delegated just enough in the foreign policy field. He was a strategist, along with Kissinger, and they reinforced each other. But Nixon made the crucial decisions, whether they involved the opening to China, whether it was bombing Hanoi and mining the harbor at Haiphong, thereby jeopardizing the Moscow summit meeting, or whether it was the Middle East alert a little bit later on, at the beginning of his second term. He made a lot of courageous decisions. He was the conceptual thinker behind these decisions. However, he would not get bogged down in details. He had confidence in Kissinger to do the basic negotiating and moving forward. He clearly was in general charge of the strategy. Therefore, he was on top of it in a way that, say, President Ford never was in terms of detailed, strategic grasp. He didn't get bogged down in minute details, as President Carter tended to do. Nixon's involvement, on the one hand, but his willingness to delegate, on the other hand, were about in balance. He steered between micromanagement, on the one hand, which no President really has time for, and detachment and lack of strategic impact on the other, which a President shouldn't have either.

In this sense Nixon and Kissinger worked well together. Of course, as time went on, this balance changed, particularly as Kissinger began to develop a higher, public profile, achieved more spectacular successes, and made more frequent trips and undertook dramatic initiatives. There was a real, mixed feeling or rivalry between the two men, and I'll get back to that. Nixon became somewhat jealous of Kissinger for getting some of the credit which Nixon thought he, himself, deserved.

So these were his basic strengths. Now, his weaknesses obviously include paranoia. Nixon always felt that the liberal press and the establishment were out to get him and didn't respect him. This is also reflected in the complex relationship similar to that which President L. B. Johnson had with the Kennedy legacy, and so on. Kennedy was the polar opposite of Nixon's style. This also fed into his suspicions, including all of the manifestations of the Watergate affair, which came to cripple Nixon's presidency.

Nixon had some unattractive elements, for example, of anti-Semitism, which Kissinger has recorded. I heard these a couple of times when I was listening in on the telephone. However, Nixon would often do this in front of Kissinger, so you wonder just how profound it was. I can't judge the degree of Nixon's drinking problem. I don't think that it should be exaggerated. It was clearly exaggerated in the Oliver Stone movie on Nixon. However, there is no question that he had a problem. I was on the phone a couple of times, taking notes for Kissinger, when President Nixon clearly had had a few drinks. But I believe he only indulged at night, not during the day. I do not think that this problem affected his presidency in any significant way. That is my clear understanding of the matter.

Nixon also could be devious. These are some aspects of Nixon's dark side, which have been well documented by others, and I really can't add much to it. He was a shy person, not particularly gifted with small talk. If you were standing around with him, it could be somewhat awkward. This is not necessarily a negative aspect of his personality, in point of fact.

As I said before, Nixon didn't like direct confrontations and so he would have Haldeman in particular to handle them as his hatchet man. If he had bad news for Secretary of State Rogers - cutting him out of something or a decision going against his recommendation - or against Secretary of Defense Laird or another member of the cabinet, the chances are that he wouldn't convey it directly to the cabinet officer concerned. He would have Haldeman do it or, somewhat later, Al Haig, as he became the First Deputy NSC Advisor and eventually Chief of Staff. There are more issues that I could get into, but I'm sort of giving you an overview now.

Q: Could you mention, particularly early on in his administration, how Nixon treated his Secretary of State, William Rogers? He was an old friend of Nixon's. We'll get to Kissinger later on. Did you have any feel for how Nixon treated Rogers?

LORD: Again, Nixon would never be directly rude with Rogers or anybody else. I have to stress that I obviously would not have been in very many meetings where there were just Nixon and Rogers. A good many of the meetings I attended with Nixon were just with Kissinger. For example, during the Nixon summit meeting in China, Secretary of State Rogers was off with the Chinese Foreign Minister. As has been discussed earlier, Nixon hired Rogers because he knew that he would be loyal, someone whom he looked to take care of the secondary issues while he and Kissinger focused on the big three issues which I mentioned before of Russia, China, and Vietnam and, to a certain extent, the Middle East. This doesn't mean that Nixon and Kissinger weren't heavily involved in Berlin, Europe, and many other issues. However, whether it involved Latin America, Africa, or perhaps economic issues, Nixon felt that Rogers could handle those while he and Kissinger dealt with the more urgent and cosmic tasks.

Nixon clearly wanted Rogers excluded from the discussions at times. I don't think that he was personally against Rogers, but it was a combination of his wanting to direct major policy areas without a lot of interference and because of his suspicion of the State Department, a flashback to his resentment of bureaucrats and what he thought of as their liberal bias. So Nixon would often exclude Rogers from a lot of the secret negotiations and trips.

Every now and then Nixon would feel a little concerned about this exclusion of Rogers. For example, and we'll get into this later, when Kissinger went on his secret trip to China, Rogers did not know about the trip when Kissinger took off. Nixon made it clear to Kissinger, even though Kissinger was worried about leaks, that Rogers had to know about this trip as it was taking place. I don't remember the exact sequence, but he conveyed the information about the trip to Rogers, through Haldeman, Haig, or someone else. Rogers was told that this invitation had come from the Chinese, sort of at the last minute, while Kissinger was traveling, and Kissinger was going to go on into China. There was the usual duplicity in the treatment of Rogers.

I would have to assume, from everything that I saw, that Nixon was perfectly polite to Rogers at meetings. He wouldn't humiliate him. That wouldn't be his style. But clearly, the outcome was to cut Rogers out of things.

Q: In these conversations that you were aware of, did Nixon ask "How will this play in Congress or how will this play with the media?" In other words, Kissinger was supposed to be the foreign affairs expert. Nixon was obviously the politician. You can't get anywhere in the U.S. Government unless you figure out how you're going to make something work with Congress, the press, and all of that.

LORD: It's fascinating to talk about that, but I don't want to exaggerate the number of times that I heard Nixon and Kissinger on the phone or even in person. These phone conversations I listened in on wouldn't have occurred more than a handful of occasions.

I want to make it clear that I was not privy to the overwhelming majority of Nixon-Kissinger conversations, either bilaterally or with other persons present. But one can assume that they would talk often about how to handle Congress, particularly on issues like Vietnam and what levels we could authorize for troops, foreign aid, support for bombing, and, as the war continued, heading off damaging resolutions restricting our military activity in Vietnam.

I think that, probably in terms of domestic politics more generally, and the press and media, Nixon would talk more to Haldeman, Ziegler, and others. However, he would certainly discuss these kinds of things with Kissinger. No question about that.

I believe that Kissinger himself never gave any press conferences on the record until his famous, peace is at hand press conference in October, 1972, when Hanoi released the details of the agreement we were negotiating with them. This was the first press conference he gave on the record, instead of on a background basis. For an academic like Kissinger who had never previously served in government he showed an amazing understanding, not only of bureaucratic infighting but of handling the press. That was one of his strengths.

In some ways this helped Nixon because it helped explain to the press the conceptual framework for Nixon-Kissinger policies and also helped build support for what we were trying to do on various fronts. However, to the extent that the press began to praise Kissinger and he got more attention and profile, at times this began to feed Nixon's paranoia and sense of envy.

In terms of substance one of the main disagreements that I can remember between Nixon and Kissinger was that Nixon wanted to extract more from the Russians on Vietnam, as opposed to other issues in the Russian-American relationship. There were times when Kissinger would be moving on SALT [Strategic Arms Limitation Talks] or some other, bilateral matters with the Russians. Nixon would want to slow things down unless the Russians did more to pressure Hanoi. Kissinger was clearly in favor of the Russians leaning on Hanoi, and the Chinese also, for that matter, but I think that Kissinger felt that we had very important business to handle with the Russians, whether this involved negotiations on Berlin, arms control, or other matters. Nixon wanted to hold the Soviet-American relationship somewhat more hostage to the Soviets providing help on Vietnam. So that was one area of difference between Nixon and Kissinger.

At times, in the home stretch, the hectic home stretch of the Vietnam talks, there were some differences between Nixon and Kissinger. However, I think that some of this was fed by Al Haig, who was somewhat more hard line on Vietnam than Kissinger was.

There were certainly other, tactical disagreements. However, I think that it's fair to say that Nixon and Kissinger were generally on the same wave length on the broad outlines of policy. This was certainly the case on China. There were never any significant disagreements there. On Vietnam I think that it's fair to say that Nixon was generally more suspicious than Kissinger as to whether the North Vietnamese were negotiating seriously to end the war. Kissinger, without being naive about North Vietnamese intentions, tended to see more hope in that secret negotiating process than, I think, Nixon did. I think that Nixon felt that the North Vietnamese would dig in. In retrospect, I think that Nixon was right, up until the break-through in October, 1972. Every time that Kissinger and I thought that we were making some progress, Nixon tended to be more skeptical. In retrospect, I think that Nixon was entirely right. The North Vietnamese did not come around until they saw that Nixon was going to be re-elected over Senator George McGovern.

The basic point that I am making is that on substance, conceptually, and even in terms of tactical execution, Nixon and Kissinger were pretty close in outlook.

One other thing that I should say is that Kissinger genuinely, and he said this in his memoirs, believed that Nixon deserved lots of credit for the successes that were achieved and his courage in making lonely decisions on major issues. After all, Nixon sent Kissinger into China alone, and really without anybody else knowing about it, risking a tremendous backlash from our allies and, above all, from his conservative base in the Republican Party and elsewhere at home. In retrospect, historical revisionists like to say that the rapprochement and opening with China was inevitable, that it made Nixon popular, and so forth. However, in all fairness when he authorized this opening to China, he couldn't be sure of that in advance.

Nixon took courageous decisions in bombing Hanoi and mining Haiphong, risking the 1972 summit meeting with Moscow, where there were a lot of agreements lined up and ready for signature. I think that Kissinger always felt, despite his mixed feelings toward Nixon, that the President deserved credit for making these tough decisions, which only a President could make.

Kissinger admired Nixon's strategic grasp and the fact that he generally backed up Kissinger. Of course, Kissinger liked the fact that Nixon wanted to run things out of the White House and cut out the bureaucracy. Kissinger had no objection to that.

At the same time Kissinger tended to reciprocate Nixon's views toward him. Kissinger was suspicious as to whether Nixon was bad mouthing him to Haldeman and Ehrlichman, behind his back. In fact, Nixon was doing this. He was constantly doing this, as we know now from the White House tapes. He told Haldeman and Ehrlichman to keep their eye on Kissinger. I don't think that Kissinger thought that Nixon was reflecting any profound anti-Semitism which some of his comments suggest. I think that Kissinger always admired Nixon for having the courage to choose him, Kissinger, even though Nixon hardly knew him and even though he knew that Kissinger was very different from the rest of the White House staff.

Nixon also gave Kissinger wide discretion in choosing his own staff at the NSC, although over time I think that Nixon began to suspect that this staff was a little too liberal for his taste. He suspected that some of the White House leaks were coming from that NSC staff. Kissinger had genuine admiration for Nixon's strengths but, of course, he saw Nixon's dark side as well. There is no sense in my going into great length on this subject because I think that Kissinger has described this very well in his own memoirs.

Q: In these conversations that you were aware of, did Nixon ask "How will this play in Congress or how will this play with the media?" In other words, Kissinger was supposed to be the foreign affairs expert. Nixon was obviously the politician. You can't get anywhere in the U.S. Government unless you figure out how you're going to make something work with Congress, the press, and all of that.

LORD: It's fascinating to talk about that, but I don't want to exaggerate the number of times that I heard Nixon and Kissinger on the phone or even in person. These phone conversations I listened in on wouldn't have occurred more than a handful of occasions.

I want to make it clear that I was not privy to the overwhelming majority of Nixon-Kissinger conversations, either bilaterally or with other persons present. But one can assume that they would talk often about how to handle Congress, particularly on issues like Vietnam and what levels we could authorize for troops, foreign aid, support for bombing, and, as the war continued, heading off damaging resolutions restricting our military activity in Vietnam.

I think that, probably in terms of domestic politics more generally, and the press and media, Nixon would talk more to Haldeman, Ziegler, and others. However, he would certainly discuss these kinds of things with Kissinger. No question about that.

I believe that Kissinger himself never gave any press conferences on the record until his famous, peace is at hand press conference in October, 1972, when Hanoi released the details of the agreement we were negotiating with them. This was the first press conference he gave on the record, instead of on a background basis. For an academic like Kissinger who had never previously served in government he showed an amazing understanding, not only of bureaucratic infighting but of handling the press. That was one of his strengths.

In some ways this helped Nixon because it helped explain to the press the conceptual framework for Nixon-Kissinger policies and also helped build support for what we were trying to do on various fronts. However, to the extent that the press began to praise Kissinger and he got more attention and profile, at times this began to feed Nixon's paranoia and sense of envy.

In terms of substance one of the main disagreements that I can remember between Nixon and Kissinger was that Nixon wanted to extract more from the Russians on Vietnam, as opposed to other issues in the Russian-American relationship. There were times when Kissinger would be moving on SALT [Strategic Arms Limitation Talks] or some other, bilateral matters with the Russians. Nixon would want to slow things down unless the Russians did more to pressure Hanoi. Kissinger was clearly in favor of the Russians leaning on Hanoi, and the Chinese also, for that matter, but I think that Kissinger felt that we had very important business to handle with the Russians, whether this involved negotiations on Berlin, arms control, or other matters. Nixon wanted to hold the Soviet-American relationship somewhat more hostage to the Soviets providing help on Vietnam. So that was one area of difference between Nixon and Kissinger.

At times, in the home stretch, the hectic home stretch of the Vietnam talks, there were some differences between Nixon and Kissinger. However, I think that some of this was fed by Al Haig, who was somewhat more hard line on Vietnam than Kissinger was.

There were certainly other, tactical disagreements. However, I think that it's fair to say that Nixon and Kissinger were generally on the same wave length on the broad outlines of policy. This was certainly the case on China. There were never any significant disagreements there. On Vietnam I think that it's fair to say that Nixon was generally more suspicious than Kissinger as to whether the North Vietnamese were negotiating seriously to end the war. Kissinger, without being naive about North Vietnamese intentions, tended to see more hope in that secret negotiating process than, I think, Nixon did. I think that Nixon felt that the North Vietnamese would dig in. In retrospect, I think that Nixon was right, up until the break-through in October, 1972. Every time that Kissinger and I thought that we were making some progress, Nixon tended to be more skeptical. In retrospect, I think that Nixon was entirely right. The North Vietnamese did not come around until they saw that Nixon was going to be re-elected over Senator George McGovern.

The basic point that I am making is that on substance, conceptually, and even in terms of tactical execution, Nixon and Kissinger were pretty close in outlook.

One other thing that I should say is that Kissinger genuinely, and he said this in his memoirs, believed that Nixon deserved lots of credit for the successes that were achieved and his courage in making lonely decisions on major issues. After all, Nixon sent Kissinger into China alone, and really without anybody else knowing about it, risking a tremendous backlash from our allies and, above all, from his conservative base in the Republican Party and elsewhere at home. In retrospect, historical revisionists like to say that the rapprochement and opening with China was inevitable, that it made Nixon popular, and so forth. However, in all fairness when he authorized this opening to China, he couldn't be sure of that in advance.

Nixon took courageous decisions in bombing Hanoi and mining Haiphong, risking the 1972 summit meeting with Moscow, where there were a lot of agreements lined up and ready for signature. I think that Kissinger always felt, despite his mixed feelings toward Nixon, that the President deserved credit for making these tough decisions, which only a President could make. Kissinger admired Nixon's strategic grasp and the fact that he generally backed up Kissinger. Of course, Kissinger liked the fact that Nixon wanted to run things out of the White House and cut out the bureaucracy. Kissinger had no objection to that.

At the same time Kissinger tended to reciprocate Nixon's views toward him. Kissinger was suspicious as to whether Nixon was bad mouthing him to Haldeman and Ehrlichman, behind his back. In fact, Nixon was doing this. He was constantly doing this, as we know now from the White House tapes. He told Haldeman and Ehrlichman to keep their eye on Kissinger. I don't think that Kissinger thought that Nixon was reflecting any profound anti-Semitism which some of his comments suggest. I think that Kissinger always admired Nixon for having the courage to choose him, Kissinger, even though Nixon hardly knew him and even though he knew that Kissinger was very different from the rest of the White House staff.

Nixon also gave Kissinger wide discretion in choosing his own staff at the NSC, although over time I think that Nixon began to suspect that this staff was a little too liberal for his taste. He suspected that some of the White House leaks were coming from that NSC staff. Kissinger had genuine admiration for Nixon's strengths but, of course, he saw Nixon's dark side as well. There is no sense in my going into great length on this subject because I think that Kissinger has described this very well in his own memoirs.

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: You talked about some of it. You didn't discuss the transition...

LORD: Well, I will do this at the risk of some repetition. I know that we talked about my initial interview with Kissinger and his emphasis on loyalty, and so on. I believe that I mentioned that the one thing he never wanted was yes men. He could intimidate people, and we'll get into that in a minute, with his intellectual brilliance and even his temper. However, he genuinely wanted good, counter arguments.

During the first year I was working for Mort Halperin, sitting in the Executive Office Building. We had two, basic roles: one was to help to run the NSC system, that is, the various meetings and how they were run, with the National Security Adviser chairing almost everything and then putting decision memoranda together. I was responsible for helping to prepare the agendas, talking points, and strategy for those meetings, as well as following up on their results. I helped to package the memoranda from the various agencies, plus our memoranda for the President, looking toward NSC meetings and Presidential decisions.

The other role we played was that of a mini Policy Planning Staff, in which Halperin or I would write memos to Kissinger, pointing out issues that would be coming up and which he ought to be thinking about. We would also play devil's advocate on some current policies which we thought might need adjustment.

It was particularly in the latter role of devil's advocate that I caught Kissinger's attention. Of course, I had been sitting in on many of the meetings in the NSC system. He had seen the work I had done with Mort Halperin in preparing material for Presidential speeches on Vietnam and sending ideas to Kissinger. I think that what particularly caught Kissinger's attention was the fact that I had written some memos which Halperin passed through directly, making clear that they came from me, including some which were critical but well-reasoned enough to earn Kissinger's attention. I remember in particular a memorandum on Laos. I remember another one on Africa, regarding which, I felt, we should be more responsive to the racial dimension there, both because it would help us geopolitically, vis-a-vis the Soviets, in terms of influence in the African continent, and because it would respond to domestic concerns and constituencies toward which, I felt, we weren't sufficiently sensitive.

The point I'm making is that Kissinger welcomed challenges, even if he didn't agree with the thrust of these challenges. I think that these memoranda which I had written caught his attention.

The role of Special Assistant to Kissinger was generally played by Tony Lake and, to a certain extent, by Roger Morris as well, who were sitting over in the West Wing basement of the White House. These people were privy to the most sensitive material, which I was not, such as the beginnings of the opening to China, the secret Vietnam negotiations, the Cambodian bombing, and so on. These were some issues that I wasn't quite cut in on. I can't remember which issues I knew nothing about and which issues I only knew something about. I was exposed to a very great deal, through running the NSC system with Mort Halperin, but I didn't know everything.

However, Tony Lake made clear to Kissinger that, mostly because of exhaustion, and not so much out of substantive disagreement, he was planning to leave the NSC staff in early 1970. It is true that the incursion into Cambodia, which took place in the spring of 1970, was the proximate cause of Lake's resignation, along with those of several others. The fact is, he was going to leave the NSC staff anyway. This event speeded up the process and also gave it a certain cachet. I'm not challenging Lake's sincerity in leaving out of disagreement with this policy. I also disagreed with this policy, but Kissinger liked to point out that Lake was going to leave the NSC staff anyway.

So when Lake was leaving, he needed a replacement. Al Haig came to me on behalf of Kissinger. I don't remember the exact date, but it must have been in January or February, 1970. Haig said: "Would you like to take Lake's place as Special Assistant to Kissinger?"

I still can't believe that I did what I did. For some reason I at least strongly indicated to Haig that I would decline, before checking with my wife. I have a terrific marriage and I consulted her on all major issues, because I genuinely value her opinion. I feel that this should be a matter of principle in a marriage. I just dreaded the office hours I would have to keep if I replaced Tony Lake. I knew what he had gone through. Not that my office hours were all of that relaxed, but I was working from about 8:00 AM to 7:00 PM. I knew that Lake was working from 7:00 AM to 10:00 or 11:00 PM and spent most of his weekends on the job. I am enough of a family man that I knew that I just didn't want to keep those hours.

I went out to have dinner at a restaurant with my wife, which was somewhat of an unusual occurrence, given my work schedule. I told her what I had done. "Exploded" is too strong a word, but she said that this was absurd. It wasn't so much that she was mad that I hadn't consulted her, although she must have considered that puzzling. She thought that this was a stupid decision. She told me, in her usual, straightforward way, that I had an opportunity to be a close associate of Kissinger, whom she considered the most brilliant man at the time on the Washington scene and someone who was on the verge of accomplishing great things. So just from the point of view of my own, personal exposure, career, and learning curve, she thought that I had made a crazy decision. Beyond that, in terms of public service and trying to help my country, she felt that I had an obligation to take this job, work with Kissinger, and do great things, including ending the Vietnam War. She handed me a quarter - or was it a dime?- to get right back on the phone to Haig and say that I had changed my mind and would accept the job.

By the way, this also reflected the fact that, despite the incredible hours and everything else, she was totally supportive of me. There was a pattern throughout her comments that she thought that this was an historic opportunity for a young person, barely 30 years of age, to be exposed to great issues and great men, as well as her feeling that this was an opportunity to serve my country.

In retrospect, I'm sure that I must have said to Haig that my answer was probably "no" but that I wanted to talk over the offer with my wife. After talking it over with her, I realized that I had made a rather impetuous decision. I called Haig back later that night. I can't remember whether I said that I wanted to think about it further or whether I immediately accepted the offer. In any event, I accepted very quickly. Of course, this was the wisest thing I ever did. I would have missed an historic opportunity to be in the middle of dramatic events and help to advance what I think were positive causes. Even though things didn't always turn out the way I liked, I at least had a chance to make my case. Also, of course, I was stretched incredibly, both intellectually, emotionally, and in every other way. It was a breakthrough for my career, and we did accomplish some major goals, so it was clearly the right decision.

Without jumping forward at any length, I should say that this happened on several, other occasions, where my wife steered me in the right direction. I had been a Foreign Service Officer but left the Foreign Service in 1967, despite my affection for the service. I had been well treated by it, on the whole, but basically my wife considered that I was on a very slow road to real challenges and responsibilities. After five and one-half years in the Foreign Service, she urged me to leave and take a job in the Department of Defense [in 1967]. There was a later time, in 1985, when I was offered the ambassadorship to China. We'll get to that. My initial reaction was: "No, thank you, I'd rather have a job in the State Department, say on the seventh floor," [where the Secretary of State and his principal assistants have their offices]. There really wasn't a good opening then, and she said that she thought that I was wrong. I had turned down the ambassadorship partly for family reasons and so on. She again corrected my course.

So at each of these crucial junctures in my career she was very influential in steering me in the right direction.

Anyhow, I accepted the job of Special Assistant to Kissinger, knowing what I was in for. Of course, it was the best thing that I ever did. So I moved into the West Wing of the White House, in the basement, right near Kissinger's office, in what used to be the men's room.

I don't think that the hours have ever been matched, certainly in my career, and probably in very few careers. I didn't start the day off all that early. I got into the office at 7:30 to 8:00 AM, because I insisted on having breakfast with my young children and at least see them then. I knew that, by the time I got home again, they would be in bed, and I wouldn't see them. I sort of made it a point that I wouldn't arrive at the office at an ungodly hour. It might well have been 8:00 AM or even 8:30 AM when I got in. On the average, I left the office somewhere between 10:00 and 11:00 PM, and sometimes at 1:00 or 2:00 AM. On Saturdays I would say that I arrived in the office roughly at 8:30 or 9:00 AM, getting home in time for dinner, and then usually spending half a day in the office on Sunday. This was in addition to about 13 secret trips to Paris and elsewhere for Vietnam negotiations as well as all the public trips with Nixon and Kissinger. It involved weekends and holidays when I would pretend that I had time off, when I actually had been out of the country. This is not to complain. It is simply to give you a sense of the pace and demands of the job. It was an exhilarating and a fantastic experience.

My job was essentially to be Kissinger's global sidekick in the following sense. He had experts on the NSC staff for every major issue and region. He wanted one person who had the overview to put this all together for him. Therefore, I would pair up on China with John Holdridge. I would pair up on Vietnam with Dick Smyser and later with John Negroponte. I would pair up on Russia with Hal Sonnenfeldt and Bill Hyland. I would pair up on the Middle East with Hal Saunders. So there would be a regional expert and then a person who had a more general view. I was more of a generalist. I would help Kissinger integrate these issues, so that in devising overall strategies he had someone who could relate these various issues.

For example, one question was how could we use Russia and China to put pressure on Hanoi to negotiate an end to the Vietnam War? This meant, of course, that it was a fantastic opportunity for me because I sat in on the strategy meetings and helped to write the memoranda, together with the experts, on all of these issues. I went on every one of the trips related to these issues involving Russia, China, and Vietnam. So my job was to work with the experts to make sure that Kissinger was ready for these meetings and/or trips. I would help to write the memos to the President, setting out the strategy for these meetings and/or trips, policy meetings, or NSC decisions related to them. Then I helped to implement the decisions, I would sit in on meetings as a note-taker. I would help write reports to the President after the meetings, whether in Washington or, more usually, when we were traveling. I would also help to prepare the transcripts of the meetings. All of this was completely the case for China and Vietnam, much less so on other issues. On some occasions I was instructed to prepare two versions of reports or transcripts of meetings, leaving out some material for the other agencies.

By the way, Kissinger liked verbatim transcripts, including his jokes. It was easier to do this when a translation was involved, as there was in the case of meetings with the Chinese, Vietnamese, and Russians. There were pauses for translations, and you could keep up a verbatim transcript. I would also sit in when Kissinger was meeting with European leaders, who spoke English. Then keeping up a verbatim transcript was really a frantic job. I was of course more than a note-taker, and others shared this task. I helped to devise strategy and to prepare policy papers and analytical reports to the President afterwards, as well as to suggest where we go from here, especially on China and Vietnam. Of course, I would work closely with the various experts on the NSC staff who knew more about many of these subjects than I did.

The bulk of my time was spent on China and Vietnam, although there was quite a bit of time spent on Russia and on some of these other issues. Then the other main area that I worked on was drafting in general, including memos, reports, transcripts, and recommendations. If the President were giving a speech, whether at the UN, on Vietnam, and so on, Kissinger would turn to me and some others, including the experts, and ask us to give him either the raw material for the speech or some rough drafts.

He would then turn this material over to the speech writers. Our job was to get the substance in there, and their job was to package it, as speech writers do, and give it a lift. Nixon had three, very effective speech writers. Each of them fit a certain, ideological mode. The more liberal of the three was a man named Ray Price. If the President wanted an inspirational speech at the UN, for example, chances are that Ray Price would take it on. The most conservative by far was Pat Buchanan. If the President wanted a hell raising or tough speech for the silent majority or attacking the press, he had Pat Buchanan. Then in the middle was Bill Safire, who is certainly conservative in outlook but in this spectrum of speech writers was sort of in between Price and Buchanan. All three of them were really accomplished wordsmiths, and all of them would greatly improve the rather leaden prose that I would pass up to them.

I helped to get Kissinger ready for press backgrounders. I would help to prepare sample questions and answers, suggest lines of attack or defense, often working with the other NSC staff experts.

We turned out annual Presidential Reports. There were four of these for 1970, 1971, 1972, and 1973. They were generally composed in San Clemente, California, at Nixon's vacation White House, but sometimes also in Washington. These were drafted in the December-January time period, with the final product coming out in February. These were really quite remarkable documents. However, almost invariably, when they came out, the only questions at the press conferences when they were released were about Vietnam. The press would ignore rather important stuff on what we were doing with China or with our allies, in the Middle East, or even with Russia. So it was exasperating that the focus would always be on the immediate problem of Vietnam, as opposed to all of the other elegant, conceptual stuff that was in them.

At some point we'll get into these because, as I went on, I became a speechwriter and then I orchestrated speeches for Kissinger when he was Secretary of State. That, in itself, was an exercise in the agony and ecstasy, but mostly agony.

So these were my basic roles. Most of my time was spent on Vietnam and China. A lot of time was spent on drafting, but some time was spent on Russia and other issues.

Q: On these memos and notes that you helped draft for Kissinger to go to Nixon on various issues, was there much paper going back and forth on this? Would Nixon come back to Kissinger? Did he have anybody writing for him?

LORD: We're talking mostly about either strategy memos before meetings or trips, or reporting memos and analysis afterwards. Certainly, on Vietnam or China, I think that it's fair to say that throughout this period in the White House, I certainly did major reporting on the results of these trips. I want to make clear that I did this, in conjunction with the NSC staff experts. It's fair to say that I had a certain flair for drafting, even though I didn't always have the expertise. I had enough of a sense of the substance, when I got into it, that I could do that. I don't want to exaggerate this, but whether it was on Kissinger's secret trip to China, on which we prepared a 40-page, single space report, or the strategy for upcoming, secret talks on Vietnam, I would certainly do these more or less, in conjunction with others on the staff. In reporting on the results of trips, I would prepare the reports in conjunction with them. It's fair to say that I was a dominant drafter, together and equally with them and increasingly with Peter Rodman, as time went on, on the actual transcripts of these meetings.

Almost single-handedly I did the drafting, in consultation with others, on the 1970 Laos statement, on the 1970 report of the President on Cambodia, and so on.

In most cases the feed back was probably verbal from President Nixon, that is, from Nixon to Kissinger. The one example that was different was on the trip to China. We'll get into this in more detail, but Nixon did an extraordinary amount of homework. I was in charge of putting the briefing books together. I think that we had at least six huge briefing books covering every, conceivable issue. The President underlined and wrote comments on almost every page of the six books. He kept asking for more information, even as we flew out to China, stopping on the way in Hawaii and Guam. Even as he was flying into China, he was asking for more information. He really did his homework and performed very well there.

Q: Why don't we approach this thematically?

LORD: I was just wondering if I should give you a portrait of Kissinger. I don't think we've done that yet...

Q: No, no.

LORD: And my relationship to him. And then, if you like, we can get into subjects like China...

Q: Isaacson's book is called...

LORD: "Kissinger." It shows a very sophisticated grasp of substance in terms of what Kissinger was trying to achieve conceptually, strategically, and tactically. In terms of personality and operating style as well I would have to say that it is the best book on Kissinger that I have seen, even though I fully understand why Kissinger was upset about this book. If someone wrote a book about me that was 90 percent favorable and 10 percent critical, I would be upset about the 10 percent. In Isaacson's case, the critical percentage was higher. There is no question about that. There are some aspects where his comments about Kissinger are unfavorable and/or unfair.

Kissinger had the following strengths. In terms of pure intellect Kissinger was absolutely brilliant. He was a tremendous strategist and conceptual thinker as a geopolitician. He was also a terrific tactician in terms of implementing this strategy. He was a superb negotiator, one who was able to adjust his negotiating style to his interlocutors and their cultural history. He didn't know much about China before he started his negotiations with the Chinese leaders. He didn't know much about Vietnam. He was more of a European expert.

With the Chinese, and I am oversimplifying this, and their style has changed since then, I might add, their basic approach was first to lay out general principles which they felt strongly about. They would set forth what they really needed from their standpoint and stick quite closely to this to the end. This was in opposition to the Russian negotiating style, which involved inflating their objectives for bargaining purposes. Then they haggled like rug merchants. Or the Israeli style, which reflects their sense of insecurity, understandably because of their history, geography, and so on. The Israelis behave like meticulous lawyers, concentrating on every last detail in negotiating documents. They are almost like Talmudic scholars. Kissinger would go to the Israelis and get 10 requests for agreements that the Israelis wanted him to get out of Anwar Sadat [of Egypt]. Then he would go to Sadat and get agreement on nine of these requests. He would return to the Israelis, and they would complain about the one request that he wasn't able to obtain from Sadat.

Q: The Japanese called the announcement of the Kissinger agreement with China, the Nixon Shock.

LORD: And Japan is a key ally of the United States. However, if Kissinger's going secretly to China had been known in advance, a number of things would have happened, and these were some of the arguments used for secrecy.

The Chinese indicated that they wanted some degree of confidentiality as well, but I think that the emphasis on secrecy was certainly as much from our side as theirs. If it had been known in advance that Kissinger was going to China, first, you would have had the Washington bureaucracy weighing in with specific, and, in Kissinger's and Nixon's view, second level concerns, that we had to get this aspect of trade, cultural exchanges, or whatever. Or that we had to be careful about Russian sensitivities. This would have hamstrung the early discussions.

Secondly, we would have had our allies weighing in, in advance, trying to bind us, whether this involved our South Vietnamese allies, the Japanese, or the Europeans making demands and limiting us in our discussions with the Chinese.

Thirdly, there would have been a firestorm among the conservatives and many of the Republicans domestically in the U.S. about the President's even considering making this dramatic move toward China, causing an uproar and hamstringing him in advance. All of this would also have put off the Chinese.

Fourthly, all of this would have been exacerbated by the understandable anguish of our friends on Taiwan.

This can be endlessly debated, and we'll come back to it, but there were at least some plausible arguments for the initial secrecy in connection with the China trip. I might just point that out generally, before I get off track.

There was no question that Kissinger would lose his temper. Isaacson has put out the theory, which may or may not be true, and I think that there may have been some element of truth in it, that Kissinger treated me better than others. I think that this is true, although I got my share of yelling from Kissinger and on many occasions. No question about that.

However, I always felt that Kissinger was less outrageous with me than with some others. I don't particularly buy Isaacson's view for the reasons he cites. I think that this is rather a case of psychobabble. There is the fact that I came from an establishment background, my mother was a member of the Pillsbury family, and I came from Park Avenue. Kissinger was an immigrant, looking for greater social status. I think that is a little bit too complicated for me. Moreover, Nelson Rockefeller surely gave him all these elements. Without wishing to sound pompous or self-righteous, I think that Kissinger felt that I had a certain degree of integrity and principle. He respected that and thought that I was less devious, even though he himself was devious on bureaucratic matters. He felt that I was a little more open. He may have seen some contrast in my approaches versus others and was somewhat more hesitant to scream and yell at me. Frankly, I did good, hard work for him which, I am sure, he appreciated. So, although I had my share of mistreatment, it was not as bad as some others suffered. And he generally would come back more gently after some outburst.

I was put off by the way he would yell and scream at others in front of me or just generally. I was put off by his deviousness, although not so much with me because I knew pretty much everything that was going on. I didn't particularly like the extent of deviousness he displayed with others, which I felt was unnecessary.

Kissinger and I used to joke that when we studied philosophy, as we did in our younger days, he would study logic, and I would study ethics. As was pointed out in one of his books, which he gave me for Christmas, an Andrew Wyeth set of paintings, he inscribed it to my "conscience," or being his conscience.

So Kissinger and I had a complicated relationship. There is no question that, on a personal level, he had high regard for me and my wife, whom he greatly admired, as he liked strong women. My wife is charming and is strong and smart. She talked back to him as well and gave him good advice on China. We were his closest social friends on his staff. He generally didn't socialize too much with people on his staff and never got close to people like Al Haig, for example. Whether at dinner parties, just alone, or at a Chinese restaurant, or whatever the occasion, he saw quite a bit of us. We were one of a small handful invited to his wedding to Nancy. Later on, after Kissinger married Nancy, we saw a good bit of her as well. So it was a good, close relationship.

Of course, there were times when I got mad at him. There were weeks when I would come home, screaming only half in jest that I was ready to quit. My wife would always say: "Knock it off and go back to work." At the time of the Cambodian invasion [in 1970] I was very close to quitting, and we'll get back to that. So I did have some mixed feelings about Kissinger. I would get impatient at the hard work and the constant demands and the deviousness in his treatment of other people. However, at the same time, nobody is perfect, everyone has faults, he was under tremendous pressure, he was working harder than anyone else, he was brilliant, and he was doing, on the whole, things that I thought were very important and constructive. Therefore, you tend to get into the whole question of means and ends.

So I clearly saw Kissinger's warts. Without being condescending, because I have my own faults, I felt that he was someone who was doing very important things. I felt that you had to forgive people, particularly those under pressure, for certain faults. He was an incredible mix of ego and insecurity. On the one hand, he was extremely self-confident, willing to take on all of these negotiations, juggle a lot of balls at once, go off on trips, and do all of these things with a small staff. He had to have an incredible ego to do all of that. Intellectually, he knew how dominant he was.

However, at the same time he was insecure. He was insecure in terms of President Nixon and the Haldeman crowd, whether they really distrusted him or not. He was insecure in that he did not want people to have direct access to Nixon. We will discuss the phone tapping episode. That clearly was evidence of Kissinger's being in the twilight zone on some of these issues.

He had a tremendous sense of humor, which also was a saving grace. There were constant examples of that. He was self-deprecating. Often Bill Hyland, Peter Rodman, and I would send false memos to him. For example, we once prepared a memo from Kissinger to Nixon suggesting, somewhat irreverently, a meeting with God. We talked about 12 people being present. Supper would be served. A ten-point plan, and so forth. We prepared phony communiques for Guatemala and for Ethiopia in which we would do parodies of meetings just concluded.

I once gave him a picture of a big gorilla, inscribed to me from him, saying: "When I want your opinion, I'll beat it out of you," and that kind of thing. I'm not giving very good examples here, but the point is that this leavened things up and made working for him worthwhile. During meetings, sometimes tense ones, or after them, we would often swap humorous asides.

As he came from Europe, he had a sense of history and tragedy. In looking at the course of events he never had the American sense of optimism. He always had a feeling that things might go wrong. He was greatly concerned with stability and geopolitics. On the one hand, this was an advantage, because he had a sense, as the Europeans did, and as an historian, of the balance of power. This served him well in dealing with China, Russia, Vietnam, and the Middle East. So he had a strong, conceptual and historical background which served him well and worked well with Nixon.

On the other hand, it was a weakness because it meant less concern about human rights and values. This got him into trouble with the right and the left, for example, in connection with the search for detente with the Soviet Union. On human rights generally, he never had a full appreciation of the need for public and Congressional support, which might come more naturally to people born in the United States. In many ways he was more comfortable dealing with authoritarian leaders who could make decisions than in dealing with messy democracies and parliaments. And he did not fully appreciate, in my view that democracies elsewhere helps on national security goals

On the plus side again, I have to say that he got the best out of his staff. I think I have mentioned that he really stretched me. I learned from him an incredible amount of history, conceptual approaches, and geopolitics, as well as negotiating skills and skill in dealing with the press and the bureaucracy. I will always be grateful to him for that.

I might add, in passing, that any stories about his being a secret swinger and a ladies' man are totally made up, or exaggerated.

I should also point out, on the plus side, that he was a very steady friend. There would be times when he would yell at me and so forth. However, there were times, in the crunch, when he stood by me. A good example, and we'll get to this later, is that my first assignment as a Special Assistant in 1970 was to prepare a long, White Paper on our historical involvement in Laos. Through misleading reports by one agency or another and for other reasons, a mistake, or an alleged mistake, was contained in that White Paper. There was a phrase in that paper that no American had ever been killed in combat in Laos over the previous 20 years or so. There was a lot of controversy about how much we had been involved in Laos secretly. This paper was designed to clear the record. In fact, we didn't have combat soldiers getting killed in Laos. We had people who went into and out of Laos. One group was ambushed and, in self defense, a few had been killed. This was not really combat. So literally the statement we made was true but, of course, it was somewhat misleading. Given the suspicions about our Laos involvement, the statement that in this 20 year period only six or so Americans had been killed, and it wasn't really combat, people could have said: "that's a lot less than we suspected." However, on the day this paper was published, this secret was revealed, so to speak, and made it look as if we were being devious. It was hugely inflated - why would we cover up such a small number? But the agencies misled me in providing information.

Anyway, it was a horrible introduction to being a Special Assistant to Kissinger. The press went crazy, and the White House faced a barrage of questions, day after day. President Nixon was furious at Kissinger and his staff for screwing this up. Throughout that period Kissinger was rock solid personally with me and for me. He said: "It was not your fault. You were just misled by the bureaucracy," which was basically true, by the way. Secondly, while he said this to President Nixon in my defense, it would have been very easy for Kissinger to have laid the responsibility for this statement on me. He basically said: "Look, we should have double checked this around. That's my fault." That is, it was Kissinger's fault, not the fault of his staff. It was a very tough moment for me. I hadn't worked for him for that long. I was new to the West Wing and a brand new Special Assistant, so it wasn't as if he owed me for years of hard work. He stuck by me solidly.

Another good example of his being a good friend, although it was also in his own self-interest, was when Zhou En-lai invited President Nixon to meet with Mao Zedong and said that Kissinger should come along. Kissinger then asked me to come along as well. This was partly so that he wouldn't have to take notes, leaving this task to me. However, in all fairness I had basically done the hardest work on the China visit from the beginning. I had been responsible for overseeing the briefing books. It was obviously an historic moment, and Kissinger included me in on that meeting with Mao, for which I'll always be grateful.

Also, he has been generous to me in his books in referring to my contributions and my character, as well as in paying tribute to me in public forums.

The down side is that I know that in more recent years there have been times when he has bad mouthed me for some of the policies that I have been involved in. As always, this was not stated publicly, but you always hear about it.

There was the wire tapping episode. We can get into that later on, if you like. However, briefly, his argument was that there were serious leaks in our international security structure, and he was right. As I said earlier, my belief is that if you have a disagreement on policy, you should debate it and generally try to force a policy change. If you lose out on that debate, either you carry the policy out loyally and don't leak, or you quit your job, if it's that fundamental an issue. I was always against leaks. I never leaked, in fact. During that period I was very shy with the press because I knew that I could get into trouble, but also because that was my style. Kissinger, in effect, was saying that these were damaging leaks, and Nixon, Haldeman, and others were suspicious of this liberal staff, anyway. They knew that some of these leaks had to come from a very small circle because the information was so sensitive, and only a few people knew about it.

Therefore, Kissinger said he couldn't say that they could wire tap others but that they couldn't wire tap his staff. He was assured by Attorney General Mitchell and others that the wire tapping was perfectly legal. Kissinger genuinely was concerned about the leaking. A good example of one of these leaks is that just before the secret trip to China, the Pentagon Papers were published, based on selected, secret documents. Daniel Ellsberg, who had been a Pentagon official, put them out without authorization. If anything, these papers were damaging to the Johnson administration, not to the Nixon administration. On purely political grounds you could say that the publication of these papers was all to Nixon's advantage, since they dealt with the Johnson era. However, Nixon and Kissinger went through the roof on the principle that you don't leak these highly classified documents. They were also concerned that the Chinese, who wanted confidentiality in dealings with the U.S. at that point, would feel that the U.S. Government couldn't keep any secrets. So this was Kissinger's reasoning on the wiretapping episode.

Having said that, I would have to add that you cannot square a personal friendship and total trust and intimacy with his authorizing of tapping your phone, as you go along. I am sure that many people felt, and I can understand that, that my sense of outrage was too much under control. I was unhappy with the wiretapping and I said so. I also thought that it was an ineffective way to run down leakers. However, I understood some of the rationale for it. I myself thought that the leaks were unfortunate, even when they involved leaking material to pursue some policy option that I agreed with. I just think that that isn't the way to operate. You can't run a government that way. I understood that I had access to all of the most sensitive information, so that only a few people could be suspected. I would naturally be one of them, because I knew virtually everything. Very few people in that secretive White House knew everything in terms of secret negotiations and policies.

It turned out that I didn't know that my phone was being tapped until just before I was about to leave the White House staff in May, 1973. I wanted to take a break because of total exhaustion and wanting to see more of my family and my kids grow up. The Vietnam War was over, we had opened up to China, we had a degree of détente with the Russians, and it seemed a good time to leave. I learned about the phone tapping when I had already decided to leave, and I had an exchange about it with Kissinger.

So that is some of the down side of my experience with him.

Kissinger, of course, was very disorganized in many ways. He didn't have a clean management style but, nevertheless, got things done. I don't think that I have anything else to raise at this time, but we may pick up other things as we go along. That is pretty much my recollection of this period.

I want to leave it on a positive note, both in terms of my personal gratitude and my admiration for Kissinger's achievements, his hard work, his brilliance, and his essential patriotism in trying to serve the United States. I'll always be grateful to him and I have affection as well as respect for him. This doesn't mean that there weren't times when I was exasperated or that there were not elements of Kissinger's character that I didn't and don't fully approve of. However, nobody is perfect.

Q: Before we move to cover the China trip, what about Alexander Haig? I was wondering if you could talk about his role at this time, because he became a major figure later on.

LORD: Well, Haig rose amazingly fast in the federal bureaucracy. He was recommended by Secretary of Defense McNamara and maybe some other people to Kissinger, who wanted a Military Assistant. He came to the NSC staff as a Colonel with the task of maintaining liaison with the Pentagon and as a Military Assistant to Kissinger. At the time he was no more important than about 15 others on the NSC staff, in terms of either rank or access.

There was fierce competition to see who would be Kissinger's deputy in the early months of the Nixon administration. The major contenders were Mort Halperin, who left partly because of Kissinger's duplicity on various matters and partly because he didn't get to be Deputy National Security Adviser. Another contender was Hal Sonnenfeldt, who had complicated relations with Kissinger. Both were immigrants from Germany. Sonnenfeldt was very smart but was always poking around and making Kissinger nervous. So there was a love-hate relations between the two of them. To a certain extent Larry Lynn was also a contender. He was an assistant to Kissinger from the Defense Department. He did a lot of analytical work, systems analysis work on defense, Vietnam, etc.

Of course, none of these people became Kissinger's deputy. Al Haig became Deputy National Security Adviser, which was quite an extraordinary achievement for someone who didn't even know Kissinger and who had rather obscure beginnings. He worked his way up, finally becoming Kissinger's deputy. He managed this partly because he was a very hard worker, loyal, and tough. He was willing to take on tough issues for Kissinger. It has also been surmised, by Isaacson and others, that Kissinger felt that Haig would not be much of a challenge intellectually, compared to Halperin, Sonnenfeldt, and so on. I think that Kissinger felt that Haig would be a deputy who could do some tough work on his behalf and make the trains run on time. I think that Kissinger felt that he wouldn't always have to be looking over his shoulder at Haig, although that was rather ironic, given their complicated relationship with President Nixon later on.

No matter how you look at it, though, Haig emerged as Kissinger's deputy. He managed to do it, certainly in the early days of the Nixon administration, without alienating the rest of the NSC staff. I mean that he not only reached that position but he did so without leaving a lot of bloody bodies behind him. He sort of did this smoothly. I can't speak for others about their views of Haig at the time. However, I have the impression that, at least in the early going, he was respected and managed to become Deputy National Security Adviser without alienating a lot of people. That was quite an extraordinary achievement.

Now, Al Haig had many strong qualities. No question that he was courageous. He would talk back to Kissinger, which was always important. He was willing to undertake tough assignments, whether this involved giving the bureaucracy bad news or going out to Saigon and trying to persuade President Nguyen van Thieu and the South Vietnamese Government to go along with the Vietnam Agreement of January, 1973. Or going to China in January, 1972, after our secret trip in October, 1971, to help to prepare the final logistics and some of the other details for the subsequent trip by President Nixon. So Haig was someone whom Kissinger could count on to do tough work. He handled some of these assignments very well. He was always outspoken and a very hard worker. He was a genuine patriot, whatever one thinks of all his subsequent views and actions.

As some suspected, Haig would often play good guy with the NSC staff, in distinction from Mad Man Kissinger. He would sometimes be friendly to the NSC staff and say: "I'm on your side. We've got to keep Kissinger under control." I wouldn't put too much emphasis on that, but that was the view of some members of the NSC staff.

On the whole, Haig was more hawkish, if you can put it that way, more suspicious of the North Vietnamese, and more grudging about the Vietnam Peace Accord of January, 1973, although he went along with it. Generally, Haig was on the side of more military pressure in Vietnam, if necessary. He was somewhat more suspicious on how to deal with the Russians. I don't want to suggest any major divergences from established policy. Certainly, he was in full agreement on China. There were no significant differences there. Haig deserves a lot of credit for taking on tough assignments and working very hard. He would cover effectively for Kissinger when he went on secret trips in connection with Vietnam or China. He was very effective in helping to cover up when we were gone from Washington. So he brought many strengths to the job.

He, of course, didn't lack for his own deviousness at times, which played in with Kissinger's style as well. As time went on he more and more gained the confidence of President Nixon for, as we were traveling, he would be the Acting National Security Adviser to the President. He appealed to some of Nixon's more hawkish qualities, his suspicion of the bureaucracy, and so on. He gave Nixon some sense that, perhaps, Kissinger wasn't being tough enough on the Russians or with respect to pressuring Hanoi; or he was being too anxious for a deal with the North Vietnamese. As time went on, Kissinger felt that Haig was playing on some of these issues and trying to gain President Nixon's confidence at Kissinger's expense. I think that there was some evidence for that. The relationship between Kissinger and Haig became very complicated. This is well documented in Isaacson's book and in Kissinger's memoirs.

The most classic example is the effort to try to sell the Vietnam agreement, which we had worked out in October, 1972, to President Thieu of South Vietnam. We went to Saigon after the breakthrough in Paris. Thieu was giving us trouble on that. Kissinger and I kept writing cables back to President Nixon and getting tough cables back in return. Kissinger always felt that Haig was influencing these cables, not always showing all of Kissinger's messages to the President. In the home stretch of the Vietnam negotiations after that, there were some unpleasant articles in conservative columns which took cracks at Kissinger. He always felt that that might have been Haig's influence back in Washington. I'm not saying whether these feelings were correct or not, but they did reflect the rather complicated relationship that Kissinger and Haig had.

There was mutual respect between them. Haig saw all of the strengths of Kissinger that I have enumerated and particularly admired him for those. However, Haig didn't lack for ambition himself. Kissinger saw the value of Haig and leaned on him very heavily, typically in connection with some of the tough work that was needed.

Q: There are three, major themes now: China, Vietnam, and the Soviet Union. Why don't we take the China theme now?

LORD: Right.

Q: Here you have a wife who was born in China, although China was not your particular field. Although you were working...

LORD: Certainly, the single most dramatic event that I've been involved in had to do with the opening to China in the early 1970s. In my entire career the question of relations with China has been the most important, including not only the work I did in the 1970s but also as Ambassador to China and Assistant Secretary of State for East Asian Affairs. So China has been the single, most important aspect of my career as it has evolved.

It's been given a special dimension by being married to a woman born in Shanghai who, I think, understands China better than anybody that I know. She has always been very prescient on that, although we haven't always agreed on every last policy prescription.

There is some irony about the centrality of China in my career, because I was a Foreign Service Officer in 1962, when my wife and I decided to get married. In those days you had to get permission to marry a foreign citizen. Not just because she was Chinese. She could have been Irish or, say, Congolese. I would still have had to get permission to marry her. The State Department gave this permission, but they said that I would never work on Chinese affairs. This was because many of her relatives were still in China, with the exception of her mother and father and second sister. (Her third sister was still in China at the time.) Her father worked for the Taiwan Sugar Company, which is government-owned, so he was close to being a diplomatic representative of Taiwan in the United States. In fact, he represented Taiwan in the international sugar negotiations. So the State Department said that this combination, and my having a Chinese wife, meant that I would never work on Chinese affairs. I, of course, said that I could find other issues to work on but couldn't find another woman like this, so I would go ahead, with this restriction.

Partly for that reason I never studied Chinese in the State Department. I might never have studied Chinese anyway, given the pressure of time. My wife didn't have the patience to try to teach me Chinese. So I never learned to speak Chinese and never thought that I was going to work on China. Of course, I ended up going with Kissinger on his secret trip to China and was the central support mechanism for Nixon and Kissinger on China throughout that period.

Then, I wound up being American Ambassador to China. So, to my dismay, I didn't speak Chinese when I went to China as Ambassador. I took lessons, but you can't learn Chinese on the basis of an hour a day. There is some irony in all of this, but China has been a special part of my career and my personal life, for the reasons I have mentioned.

One amusing footnote which I might mention, in retrospect, is that my wife was interviewed in the course of my obtaining permission to marry her. In one sense, this interview was outrageous. She was interviewed by someone who was about a mid-level GS civil servant, named Mr. Szluc, I believe. I had accompanied her to the State Department, but Mr. Szluc sent me away and said that the interview was going to take some time. In fact, it lasted for about two hours. He asked her a series of incredible questions which you wouldn't expect native-born Americans to be able to answer, let alone someone born in China. She was not a recent immigrant but had come to the United States at the age of eight. In this interview she was asked to name the starting lineup of the Green Bay Packers football team, who is Vardis Fisher, what's a "Death in the Afternoon" cocktail, what's the difference between a minuet and a pavane, and name the original 13 colonies in the order in which they became part of the United States.

Q: I couldn't have answered any of those questions!

LORD: No, and neither could I. I don't know how many she could answer, but I always told her that Mr. Szluc was just having fun. She had a master's degree from the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy, not to mention an undergraduate degree from Tufts University. In addition to her academic training she is very smart, so obviously the interviewer was just having some fun. He asked the questions very seriously. If she didn't have self-confidence and ego, this process could really have upset her. At the beginning and at the end of the interview he said: "I have the power to deny your application for marriage." He said that with a straight face. On the last question he said: "This is the most important one of all, more important than any other that I have asked so far. What will you do if I tell you that this application for marriage is to be turned down and that your husband cannot remain in the Foreign Service?" She said: "Well, that's very clear. He can get another job but he can't find another person like me to marry." That's what I would have said. So the marriage was approved. It's amusing in retrospect but, in many ways, it was quite outrageous.

Q: I wanted to say that, as a Foreign Service Officer, I never dealt with China. I entered the Foreign Service in 1955 and always had the feeling: "Damn it. It doesn't make any sense not to have diplomatic relations with China." No doubt there were reasons, but I just wondered if you were carrying any particular intellectual baggage with you in this respect?

LORD: Well, as I've already discussed, in the early part of my career in the State Department I worked on Congressional Relations, political-military affairs, and trade matters. When I went over to the Pentagon, I began to work more on Asia and, of course, thought somewhat about China. I have to say that, as I came onto the NSC staff, I certainly was not like Senator Joe McCarthy or Congressman Walter Judd on China. I was not hysterical about this matter. But I also have to say that I wasn't champing at the bit to have a brand new, revolutionary policy toward China.

I was rather open minded. I felt that Mao's Communist China was a pretty unpleasant place and had been pretty unfriendly to the U.S. I was certainly receptive to trying to improve relations, but I was sort of in the middle. I certainly wasn't dug in as a hard right, anti-communist. However, I wasn't one who said that we were absolutely crazy about our policy toward China. I didn't ask why we weren't dealing with the population of 800 million people at the time. So I wasn't a real revolutionary then. It's hard to remember what I felt. I'm sure that I read Nixon's own foreign policy piece in "Foreign Affairs" magazine in 1967, which included the need to deal with China. I think that I was receptive to moving toward China and I saw geopolitical advantages to doing that.

I think that it's fair to say that American analysts, and there might have been some exceptions, on the whole were quite slow to see the Sino-Soviet split. As we look back on it, the Chinese and the Soviets were going through real tensions, certainly by the early 1960s. By the time I joined the NSC staff in the late 1960s to work on Asia, I understood that there were tensions between Moscow and China. I don't think that, even then, we saw how profound they were. We were not under the illusion that the Sino-Soviet bloc was a monolith. Indeed, I am sure that I understood instinctively that what President Nixon and Kissinger intended to do was to attempt some exploitation of the tensions between the two communist states. I would have to say that I didn't appreciate fully the extent of the divisions between Russia and China, even in the late 1960s. The border clashes along the Sino-Soviet border were a dramatic event, of course.

Q: Along the Ussuri River...

LORD: Along the Ussuri River, in the summer of 1969. That, obviously, brought home the reality of this split. Once we began dealing with the Chinese and with the Russians, you could see that there was tremendous tension, so it was very clear, of course, by the early 1970s. I would say that I was very slow in coming to realize this, as most people were. I was not naive about a monolithic approach to the two countries, of course, but I didn't realize the full depth of their hostility toward each other.

Nixon and Kissinger each came into office placing a high priority on making an opening to China. They had independently come to this conclusion. Nixon had indicated this in his article in "Foreign Affairs." We know, in retrospect, that he felt that this was a high priority. Kissinger felt the same way, primarily because of the Soviet dimension, but for a variety of other reasons.

Kissinger's rationale, and Nixon's, included the following. First, an opening to China would give us more flexibility on the world scene generally. We wouldn't just be dealing with Moscow. We could deal with Eastern Europe, of course, and we could deal with China, because the former Communist Bloc was no longer a bloc. Kissinger wanted more flexibility, generally. Secondly, by opening relations with China we would catch Russia's attention and get more leverage on them through playing this obvious, China card. The idea would be to improve relations with Moscow, hoping to stir a little bit of its paranoia by dealing with China. Never getting so engaged with China that we would turn Russia into a hostile enemy but enough to get the attention of the Russians. We'll come back to that. This effort, in fact, worked dramatically after Kissinger's secret trip to China.

Thirdly, Kissinger and Nixon wanted to get help in resolving the Vietnam War. By dealing with Russia and with China we hoped to put pressure on Hanoi to negotiate seriously. At a maximum, we tried to get Russia and China to slow down the provision of aid to North Vietnam somewhat. More realistically and at a minimum, we sought to persuade Russia and China to encourage Hanoi to make a deal with the United States and give Hanoi a sense of isolation because their two, big patrons were dealing with us. Indeed, by their willingness to engage in summit meetings with us, with Nixon going to China in February, 1972, and to Moscow in May, 1972, the Russians and Chinese were beginning to place a higher priority on their bilateral relations with us than on their dealings with their friends in Hanoi. This might begin to make Hanoi nervous.

Much less important for Nixon and Kissinger but a longer range consideration was the potential of economic relations with China. This was less important over the near term, but they saw this in long term dimensions, unlike most American policy makers. They could see a day when China could be an important economic partner of the United States, as well as in terms of cultural exchanges and some other aspects.

Q: All of this was laid on the table.

LORD: Yes. This is not just retrospective recollection. This was clearly laid on the table. We also wanted to promote general stability in Asia as well. We had fought a war with China in Korea. There was the problem of North Korea. We thought that generally if we wanted to see a more stable region in East Asia, we would have to deal with China.

These were some of the main reasons for opening up relations with China. Nixon and Kissinger each, and independently, had these reasons on their agenda and, of course, they reinforced each other.

Nixon sent Kissinger a memo on February 1, 1969, approximately one week after his inauguration as President. I can't reconstruct this memo verbatim, but basically he instructed Kissinger to find a way to get in touch with the Chinese. This was one of the earliest instructions that Kissinger got from Nixon. Of course, Kissinger was all in favor of doing this.

We had the following challenge, among a lot of other challenges. You have to remember that we had had 20 years of mutual hostility and just about total isolation from China. We had no way of communicating directly with the Chinese. A lot of Americans were still very suspicious of China, even of an anti-Russian China, including a hard core of Nixon's conservative base. The American public really wasn't attuned to an opening to China as yet, although there were different attitudes on this possibility. We had allies who would be nervous about such an opening to China.

So there were many challenges facing us: how would we get in touch with the Chinese and how would we move, when we knew that they would always put the status of Taiwan up front as the dominant issue? There had been some sporadic talks with the Chinese Communists in Geneva and Warsaw, going back to 1955, but Taiwan, as well as other things, had always been the hang up to an improvement in relations. So the question was: how would we get in touch with the Chinese and how would we move past the Taiwan issue? How would we prepare our allies and the American public for this, particularly the conservatives?

So with all of the obvious advantages that Nixon and Kissinger saw, there were these challenges in the way. Here's the way Nixon and Kissinger went about it. First, in terms of communications, the only way to get in touch with the Chinese was through third parties. I don't have all of the details at hand, although they are available elsewhere. There were various channels that Nixon and Kissinger tried to use to get word to the Chinese. In a general sense, they were looking for a new beginning. One involved using De Gaulle and the French, another was Romania, and we finally, of course, settled on Pakistan.

So we began with indirect negotiations and communications. These warmed up, and we'll come back to that later on. We finally settled, as I say, on the Pakistani channel. Pakistan had the advantage of being a friend to both sides. There was no danger of Russian involvement, as we might have had if we had used Romania. France was a NATO [North Atlantic Treaty Organization] ally of the U.S. and not necessarily the best channel to use to contact China. So, for a variety of reasons we settled on Pakistan. That was one challenge, namely, getting in touch with the Chinese, which we worked out over a couple of years.

Q: May I interrupt? Why Pakistan? The British had had uninterrupted relations with China.

LORD: First of all, we would have been willing to use any of these channels. However, it was clear that the Chinese weren't picking up on any of them until we got to Pakistan. The British, of course, because of the Opium War [1839-1842] and their history with China would have been a bad channel for the Chinese. The Chinese didn't pick up on the British. If they had picked up with France, I think that we might have continued with the French. The Chinese also didn't pick up on the feeler through Romania. There might have been a couple of other intermediaries which Nixon and Kissinger tried out, but those were the main ones.

Also, under the general heading of communicating with China, another way that we communicated with China was through taking some unilateral steps at home, by relaxing some economic restrictions. This course did not require reciprocity on their part but was designed to show that we were interested in moving ahead. It was also designed to begin to condition our public and our allies that we were moving ahead in this direction. So several things were done. There was a toast which Nixon gave to President Ceausescu of Romania, in which Nixon used the phrase, the People's Republic of China. This sounds unexceptionable now, but at the time no American official and certainly no President ever used that official designation, which the Chinese Communists wanted. We had always said Red China, Communist China, Mainland China, or something like that.

Even then we knew that the Chinese were very subtle. The Chinese would take aboard our just using that phrase, the People's Republic of China. I remember that at one point Secretary of State Rogers gave a speech in Australia which contained some positive signals to China. We selectively relaxed some Treasury restrictions and some travel restrictions, I believe, for travelers, academics, and perhaps humanitarian representatives. I don't have the details of this but I'm sure that they are in Kissinger's book. We also ended our regular naval patrols in the Taiwan Strait itself, cut them back at least.

The Chinese, in turn, quietly let go free the American yachtsman who had drifted into Chinese waters. Previously they would have made loud noises.

In effect, we signaled the Chinese, in concrete terms, that we were taking certain steps, however modest, and that we wanted to move toward a new beginning with them. These steps were modest enough, and enough in our interest, that we didn't require reciprocity. We didn't want to start to do something which they would have to respond to, tit for tat. We wanted to signal to them, even as we tried to get in touch with them through these indirect channels and messages of a private nature, through these unilateral steps where we wanted to go.

Finally, in the President's annual reports on our foreign relations of 1970 and 1971 we put language on China in them which would suggest to any careful reader that we were moving toward a new kind of relationship with China. By the time the report for 1972 was prepared, this point was quite obvious. So that was designed, not only to send a signal to China and other countries but also to condition our public opinion, which was the other problem, that we were moving toward China. Obviously, all of this, in retrospect, may be clearer than it was at the time. Despite all of these signals nobody was prepared for Kissinger's secret trip to China. A close observer, looking at President Nixon's toasts and statements, statements made by Secretary of State Rogers, as well as the unilateral steps, would surely have seen our tendency, and our goals, but I don't think that anybody could have predicted the dramatic step of Kissinger's secret trip to China and the Nixon trip. However, the fact that we were trying to move toward a better relationship with China was pretty clear.

The clashes along the Sino-Soviet border in 1969 underlined the urgency of doing this. We saw the clear evidence of tensions between the two countries. Obviously, China's security concerns on that border, vis-a-vis the Russians, ensured that they would be particularly receptive. I don't have the exact chronology of these various moves but I'm sure that we stepped up our efforts after the border clashes.

Q: Was there also a feeling that things had reached such a point in China that we might be able to open up relations with that country? This is your field, but there had been this tremendous Cultural Revolution, its offshoot in terms of the Gang of Four, and all of that. China really didn't seem to be ripe for an improvement in our relations.

LORD: I want to be careful here that I don't retrospectively put perceptions and views in place which are now clear to me and say that we held these views at the time. What was clear, of course, was that China, because of the Soviet threat, might well be interested in improving relations with us. The Soviet Union was clearly their biggest security threat, and the border clashes had made that clear. We sensed that already before then, and then those border clashes brought it home. So, in that sense, we figured that China would be receptive to these overtures, and for the same reasons that we were. The Soviet factor applied to both countries, in addition to more esoteric things, like dealing with the strongest power in the world, security considerations, and so on.

In addition, the proclamation of the Brezhnev Doctrine in 1968, after the Soviets put down the Prague Spring, Czech dissent, had a major impact on the Chinese. Naturally they were very concerned about Moscow's asserting the right to intervene in other country's domestic affairs for the sake of socialist solidarity.

You have to remember that, although the most extreme manifestations of the Cultural Revolution were in the late 1960s, it really went on, officially, until the end of 1976. So the Chinese were still sorting this out at the time. In addition to the Soviet factor we also thought that the Chinese might think that, if they could improve relations with us, that might open the door to relations with other countries. Japan was certainly holding back on its opening to China. The French had made some movement toward China, but the British and others, such as the Federal Republic of Germany, were generally holding back in developing relations with China because of the U.S. posture, whether this involved admission of Communist China into the UN or just generally dealing with it. We figured that the Chinese would calculate that if they could open the door with us, that would mean that they could break out of their isolation more generally with all of these other countries. Not to mention getting into the United Nations and beginning to establish at least unofficial, if not official, relationships and breaking out of various kinds of embargoes and isolation with Europe, Japan, and elsewhere. So we figured that that would be another incentive for them which would have a multiplier effect if they opened up with us.

I think that we had some sense that China must have felt somewhat beleaguered at this time. You may remember that the Chinese Government recalled all of its ambassadors during the Cultural Revolution, except for Huang Hua, who was Ambassador to Egypt. So they were isolated. However, frankly, we didn't know much about what was going on in China, as far as the full depth of the Cultural Revolution. We couldn't be sure at the beginning of our effort to establish better relations with China that Mao Zedong and Zhou En-lai would have the vision and courage to open up with us. However, the Russian factor and the perceived Chinese need to break out of their isolation more generally by opening up with us were two of the reasons why, we felt, they would be receptive to our efforts.

Q: These are all oral histories, and we are focusing on the perceptions of the individuals interviewed. You had been doing more general work for Kissinger. How were you clued in on the policy at that point?

LORD: During my first year on the NSC staff, from February, 1969, until February, 1970, I was not aware of the fact that we were doing private things to establish contact with China. We took some unilateral steps, as I have already mentioned. When I say that I was not aware that we were trying to establish contact with China, let me make it clear that I was not aware that we were trying to pass secret messages to the Chinese. I was aware of some of these unilateral steps because they started in 1969. These involved action taken by the Department of the Treasury and the Department of Commerce, maybe USTR.

Q: You mean the travel restrictions. Had the ping pong diplomacy business started?

LORD: No, that was later, in April, 1971, and we'll get back to that. It happened just before Kissinger's secret trip to China. When I became Special Assistant in February 1970, I was aware of the fact that we were searching for a new relationship with China. We were easing these unilateral restrictions, and I learned that we were starting to send some signals to China. I sat in on some of the discussions about what to do during the Sino-Soviet clashes along the Ussuri River, how much to intervene, what steps to take, and so on. So I was aware of that and the geopolitical desire to improve relations with China. I wasn't aware of that memo from President Nixon to Kissinger of February 1, 1969. I was not aware of the efforts to get in touch secretly with China. I was already aware, of course, that we had talks going on with the Chinese Communists in Warsaw. At the time those talks were being reported through official State Department channels. They were generally just sort of propaganda exchanges. Once I became Special Assistant I was privy to all these moves, of course.

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: These were not actually resumed until 1970. There was an effort to try to get them going again.

LORD: Then they were broken off again after the incursion into Cambodia by U.S. and South Vietnamese forces in the spring of 1970. When I became a Special Assistant to Kissinger, I was immediately told about the secret Vietnam negotiations and the secret China negotiations. I was more generally aware, then, of our dealing with Soviet Ambassador Dobrynin on the Russian front. I was involved in some of these issues but I didn't become fully involved, particularly with the message passing to China, until I became a Special Assistant to Kissinger in 1970.

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: You mentioned that you took part in meetings on the clashes along the Ussuri River.

LORD: That's right.

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: Was there ever a discussion of the United States taking a clearer position on these?

LORD: As I've said from the beginning of this, I don't want to mislead anyone with a memory precision which I don't have. Again, I think that Kissinger's book would be the most detailed on this. There was certainly a feeling by Kissinger and, I assume, by Nixon, that in the geopolitical picture it would be dangerous for America if the Russians were to humiliate China. Also, these clashes gave us an opening with China; they really brought home their concerns and maybe made them more receptive to our overtures. Therefore, the issues were what signals could we send, either by restraining the Russians or what we might say publicly or on background, and how could we get word to the Chinese that we didn't want them to be humiliated? I don't recall the details of any actual debate about whether we would move military assets around, how much we would threaten the Russians, or how much we would say on background.

Kissinger's main interest was the fact that there was tension on the Sino-Soviet border and that this gave us an opening to China.

So in 1969 and in 1970-1971 there were these public signals and attempts to get through to the Chinese through various channels. Again, the great detail would be in books by Kissinger and others, including Isaacson and so on.

This effort began to be more pronounced in the spring of 1971, of course. There was the ping pong diplomacy business and there was also an interview which Chairman Mao had with Edgar Snow. This interview indicated some receptivity to better relations with the United States. Nixon, of course...

Q: Edgar Snow was a...

LORD: Biographer of Mao and a journalist who had spent many years in China.

Q: He wrote Red Star Over China.

LORD: Yes. This book spoke admiringly of the Chinese Communists and of the Chinese revolution. We saw this interview as part of a signal back to us. I can't recall the precise chronology. We didn't get much back from some of the channels we opened up through the Romanians and the French. These wouldn't necessarily consist of verbatim messages passed back and forth. There would just be Nixon telling Ceausescu or De Gaulle that the next time they were in touch with the Chinese they might say that the U.S. was interested in better relations with China. It would be at that level.

I don't remember the precise chronology, but it became clear, certainly by 1971, that the Pakistani channel was the one to follow. We began to do it through Hilaly, the Pakistani Ambassador to Washington, who would come to us with hand-written messages from the Chinese, passed through Islamabad to him. He would bring these messages into Kissinger's office, and we would prepare hand-written messages back. Often, I would draft them, or Kissinger would. Then he and I would go over the draft and send it back through Ambassador Hilaly. The issue became how do we move this relationship forward and how do we get beyond the issue of Taiwan dominating the agenda?

There was one exchange in Warsaw, in which the Chinese indicated, more or less on the record and through that channel, that they would be willing to see an American emissary come to China. This was phrased in general terms. Meanwhile, we picked up on that in the private messages through the Pakistanis. Again, I can't give you an exact chronology here. There were gaps in the contacts, sometimes lasting for months. Then through the Pakistani channel the Chinese began to talk about a possible American visitor to China.

There were two issues facing us. One was who would go? Also, what would the ground rules be? These were matters which were dangerous for both sides. So a lot of these messages were designed by us to get Chinese agreement. For us the issue couldn't just be Taiwan. Their initial position was, more or less: "Send someone over here. We can talk to you, but you must resolve the Taiwan issue before we can do anything else." We wanted to maneuver it so that while we were willing to talk about Taiwan - of course, we would have to do that or we wouldn't get anywhere with them - there would be a broader agenda as well. We finally got to the point in these messages where the Chinese agreed that an American emissary would come and talk about a possible trip to China by President Nixon. The emissary would not only talk about Taiwan but about other matters as well. This was the breakthrough, in the spring of 1971.

Once we had established that this was not just a single issue agenda, that they were willing to consider a Nixon trip, and that they were prepared to receive an American emissary first, then we could begin to get concrete. Right about this time, in the spring of 1971, we had the incident of ping pong diplomacy. This essentially involved an American ping pong team in Japan, which the Chinese invited to visit China. The ping pong team agreed. They went to China and had a warm reception. This was a major development. In fact, we hadn't had a group like that going to China throughout this period. We, of course, understood this event, particularly against the backdrop of our secret channel, that this was a clear signal by them to us that they wanted to move ahead and that they were beginning to prepare their own public for some movement on relations with the U.S. The invitation to the ping pong team was a very carefully calculated move by the Chinese.

So we had the secret channel getting more receptive regarding an American emissary and the fact that the agenda would be broader than Taiwan. We had the public comments by Mao to Edgar Snow, although I forget the date of this interview. Then we had the ping pong diplomacy incident. Meanwhile, we had taken some unilateral steps, so things were beginning to move.

Q: You were talking about China. You had John Holdridge, who was a China expert in the State Department. Here Nixon and Kissinger were trying to puzzle out China, which they obviously had no intimate knowledge of. Where were you getting the input for the messages you were drafting? Did it come from the CIA [Central Intelligence Agency], Holdridge, or someone else about what the Chinese were probably thinking?

LORD: That's a very fair question. First, Holdridge knew quite a bit about China and spoke Chinese. I want to make clear that I am talking about my own role, but Holdridge was clearly crucial here and throughout this period. He brought a lot of knowledge on the China issue to Kissinger and, through him, to President Nixon. In addition, we would ask the bureaucracy for various studies on China, not saying what the real purpose was, in terms of setting up a secret or dramatic breakthrough. However, these were legitimate study memoranda about China and they were very useful. Also we were moving ahead with these unilateral, economic steps. We would ask for analysis of the economic situation and other background material, as required.

Quite a bit of material was submitted by the State Department, CIA, and other government departments, in a legitimate exercise of looking at policy options, generally informing the President and so on. Then, in addition, Kissinger began consulting, on an individual basis, with outside scholars and experts on China. This included Allan Whiting, a Far Eastern specialist, and Andre Malraux, from France, who had written the book, "Man's Fate," and knew something about China. Malraux saw President Nixon as well. I'm sure that these consultations included others but I just can't recall them all.

I assume that President Nixon began to read up on China, as well. I certainly did the same. So there was a combination of Holdridge on the NSC staff; official memoranda from the bureaucracy, requested from the White House; intelligence reports in the normal course of events; and consultations with outside experts. I'll get into the preparations for Nixon's trip later. Does that answer your question?

Q: Yes.

LORD: One of the criticisms of the secrecy of this whole operation was that we couldn't fully take advantage of the people in the State Department, on the China desk. We included them finally, as we went along after the 1971 Kissinger trip. However, for a long while people would say that we didn't have the full advantage of their knowledge. Having said that, I would say that we would often get this knowledge by asking for memos. As we went forward on trips, we began to take this material with us. Kissinger went on nine trips from 1971-76. I was on every one. He brought along with him State Department people like Al Jenkins and Marshall Green, of course [Assistant Secretary of State for East Asian Affairs], in addition to others who could provide supplementary information and views. You're right. We didn't have the intimate, day to day exchanges that some of these people might have provided, had they been included.

Q: Did you have any idea who was sending the hand-written notes from the Chinese side?

LORD: We assumed that they were prepared by Zhou En-lai personally, after checking with Mao. There was no question that something of this magnitude was probably from Zhou En-lai. We didn't know whether Zhou En-lai personally drafted these notes or somebody who was the equivalent of Win Lord on his side. Clearly, these notes had Zhou En-lai's personal touch.

Q: One other question on the beginning of this opening to China. In a way, Pakistan seemed like an unlikely choice. Was there concern about a possible leakage? Were there any quid pro quos for the Pakistanis?

LORD: Well, as I said, we sort of tried various channels to see which ones the Chinese were most comfortable with. They chose the Pakistanis. I think that they did it because Pakistan had been friendly to them. China was having its problems with India. They had a war with India in 1962, so China had always leaned toward Pakistan, supporting it on the Kashmir issue, for example. The Chinese generally had a solid relationship with Pakistan. In fact, that has continued all the way through to the present day.

Meanwhile, on our side, we also would lean, on the whole, toward Pakistan. First of all, because we felt that India was lined up with the Soviet Union. Although India was head of the Non-Aligned Movement, it kept doing things that annoyed us. Even under previous American administrations, and more especially under Nixon and Kissinger, we tilted, to use the famous word, toward Pakistan. So Pakistan was a country which was friendly toward both sides, the United States and China. I think that's probably the main reason that the Chinese settled on Pakistan. There was little danger of leaks to India or Russia, which were two of the main concerns in terms of the opening to China at that point.

The other issue, of course, was who was going to go to China? There was some debate, as recounted in Kissinger's book. President Nixon was ambivalent about anybody going because it might take away from the drama of his going to China. Of course, by then he had this complicated relationship with Kissinger in terms of ego and sensitivity. However, he also wanted someone who could handle this trip effectively, and Kissinger was the best person to do that. He also recognized that he just couldn't go to China cold turkey and without preliminary preparations. He realized that it was necessary to prepare the way. We weren't even sure before the Kissinger trip whether the Nixon trip would even be possible. The purpose of the Kissinger trip was to set up the Nixon trip. We had to see whether there was enough to go on, to protect our flanks, and to see whether we could get around the Taiwan issue. So it was a tricky thing.

There was some debate whether we should send Ambassador David Bruce, Ambassador Ellsworth Bunker, and I forget the other names that were discussed. I think that at one point Nixon just suggested to Kissinger that maybe Secretary of State Rogers should go. I don't think Nixon ever seriously considered that. Of course, from the beginning, Kissinger wanted to go. He thought that he was the best person to handle it, and I think that he was. Not to mention Kissinger's ego, sense of history, and so on.

Finally, they settled on Kissinger but, even then, there was some debate about where they, Kissinger and the Chinese, would meet. I think that there was some discussion that perhaps they didn't actually have to meet in China and that they could meet somewhere else. I think that there was a feeling that Nixon preferred that rather than have Kissinger go to Beijing, which had a certain drama. Maybe they could just meet over the border in southern China, across the border from Pakistan, or something like that. Again, it wouldn't be the same thing as going to the capital city of the Middle Kingdom [traditional Chinese name for China]. It would reserve more drama for Nixon.

Kissinger, of course, was all in favor of making this trip as dramatic and as central as possible. He also felt that with the Chinese, in terms of psychology and face, a willingness for the American emissary to go to the capital of the Middle Kingdom would be useful. Another consideration was that Kissinger could meet whomever he needed to meet much more directly. This would be no more complicated, in terms of secrecy, than some other place in China. So eventually, and I don't recall the exact chronology or the number of messages that went back and forth, they settled on Kissinger going. They settled on the agenda including issues in addition to Taiwan, and on holding the meeting in Beijing. Then they agreed that, with the cooperation of Pakistan, they would make the trip to China through Pakistan.

Before getting to the secret trip itself, are there any questions that you want to ask, as background at this point?

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: I have a question if it qualifies as background. Otherwise, postpone it. You mentioned the Taiwan issue several times. I was wondering if you could say anything about the attitude of Kissinger and Nixon, perhaps, toward Taiwan? What did they think of Taiwan at this time and how significant did they feel that it was as an obstacle?

LORD: I think that you have to be careful in retrospect. I think that it's fair to summarize their position as being friendly to Taiwan. Their feeling was that, in terms of American national interests however, you have to take some risks in that relationship, in order to move ahead with China. However, this must be done carefully, both out of loyalty to Taiwan and always conscious that, if you mistreat your friends, other allies and friends are going to get nervous about your steadiness. For example, that was a clear motive for our trying to get out of Vietnam honorably, and not undermining our credibility in terms of how we treat our allies. This point applied to Taiwan. Clearly, Nixon and Kissinger wanted to square the circle. They wanted to open up with China without having to go too far in destroying our relationship with Taiwan and, in the course of doing this, not only hurting our international reputation for steadiness and friendship with our allies, but also stirring up domestic opposition to mistreating an old friend.

So it was a cool-headed, hard-headed, and calculated sense of geopolitics which drove our desire to open up with China for all of the reasons that I've mentioned. We desired to do this with minimum disruption on the Taiwan front, but knowing that we were going to have to do some fancy footwork with the Chinese. From the very beginning, and this is reflected in the Shanghai Communique, the strategy was, in effect, and I think that it was effectively carried out, to postpone resolution of the Taiwan issue, try to appeal to Beijing's sense of geopolitics and fear of the Soviet Union and its desire to break out of its isolation, and to try to override its preoccupation with Taiwan. So we needed to devise an approach, and eventual language, that would preserve Beijing's position and preserve our interests. The idea was to keep working on the Taiwan issue, but we would kick it down the road for later resolution. So that was the basic approach.

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: One other factor. You also mentioned relationships with allies and the importance of secrecy prior to this. There have been some suggestions, in some of the books written about this episode, that Kissinger didn't like the Japanese very much and that some of the secrecy involved in this trip was intended to send a message to the Japanese.

LORD: I wouldn't go nearly that far, because Japan is an important ally, and he wouldn't want to disrupt the alliance. I think that it is fair to say, and this continues to the present day, that Kissinger always had a certain suspicion of Japan, even as he had of Russia, versus a predilection to go easier on the Chinese. I've discussed this with him, and this view still persists. But surely he did not wish to hurt our ties with Tokyo or send any message.

Kissinger was genuinely concerned about leaks out of Japan, feeling that the Japanese were particularly prone to leaks in their media. He was aware of the Japanese-Chinese love-hate relationship, because of World War II and other matters. So it wasn't as if Kissinger wanted to hurt our relations with Japan. He was certainly too calculating in terms of American national interests to go out of his way to annoy Japan. That wasn't the point. However, he was prepared to run some risks to pull off the China trip correctly and not be pressured, whether by Japan or others, to lock ourselves into a position with the Chinese before we even set out.

Now Kissinger would be the first to admit that, as we moved to improve relations with China, we didn't handle the Japan side very well. The dilemma we faced about pre-briefing other nations is that we might be pressured by Japan and others to take positions before we even sat down with the Chinese. Kissinger and Nixon had the feeling that this was totally uncharted territory. It may look relatively easy and inevitable in retrospect, but it was very uncertain at the time. Making this trip to China was not without its risks, despite our feeling that the Chinese would be receptive because of their fear of the Soviets and of their isolation. Therefore, we wanted as free a hand as we could get when we sat down with the Chinese.

I don't know whether Kissinger would agree with me on this, but, in retrospect, I believe what we should have done to square this circle was to have someone, not very prominent or noteworthy, like myself or Holdridge, go to Japan, perhaps a week before the secret trip to China, or something like that. Such a person could have gone personally to Sato, who, I think, was the Japanese Prime Minister then and informed him in advance. In this way, as a minimum, when this news broke, he could have said that he had been informed in advance by the United States. We could have informed him and sworn him to secrecy. I think that it would have been worth taking that risk of a leak to have done this shortly before the secret Kissinger trip to Beijing.

I don't think any of us proposed this then, and I doubt whether Kissinger would have agreed to this. I think that he would have felt that this wouldn't work because Prime Minister Sato would have to tell his cabinet colleagues or be considered complicitous himself in holding back this information. Then it would leak out, and all the down side of advance publicity I have talked about before would have occurred. We surely gave a shock to Japan, not to mention to some of our NATO allies and others. You could make a case for tipping off Japan more than Europe, since this was an Asian event. We might have informed the Japanese leader so that he could at least say, as a matter of saving face, that he knew in advance, as opposed to admitting that he knew nothing. The fact is that Japan had been holding back in its relations with China, primarily at our insistence. The Japanese were very anxious to move ahead, at least a little bit, in their relations with China. They held back because we kept urging them not to do that. So they felt betrayed when we leap-frogged them.

Q: Was this a matter of any debate beforehand in Washington, when you were making the preparations for the Kissinger visit to Beijing?

LORD: It must have been, but I can't recall any vivid debates, believe it or not. We must have talked about whom else to tell about this trip. These arguments about secrecy or not must have been explored. However, I don't recall this as being an ongoing, vivid, and raging debate. I certainly don't recall myself or anyone else, pressuring Kissinger to tell our friends of this trip in advance. I want to be fair about that.

Q: Particularly because of the impact on Japan, was there anyone in the NSC or in the immediate circle of people dealing with this trip who was really a Japan expert and who would understand the impact on Japan?

LORD: I think that almost anybody would understand that. You wouldn't have to be a genius or a Japan expert to realize that this visit to China by Kissinger would have a major impact. In retrospect, I don't think that we fully appreciated the depth of the shock and perhaps, a Japan expert would have brought this home. Certainly, John Holdridge knew enough about Japan to understand this. It's not as if we hadn't been dealing with Japan. We had a recently completed agreement on Okinawa, which was quite significant. We had some sporadic textile negotiations.

I want to make clear that Kissinger, whatever his belief that Japan some day may go nuclear or become nationalistic again, certainly, as a friend and ally wouldn't want to go out of his way to cause trouble for Japan. Of course, Kissinger had certain priorities and was worried about leaks.

So I think that Kissinger and Nixon probably didn't fully appreciate the totally devastating blow which the announcement of the Kissinger visit to China would be in Japan. They certainly were aware that this announcement was going to break some crockery. They weighed carefully these considerations. However, I don't recall any raging debates about this, although I could be wrong. I certainly don't recall my pressing any other course than what we did, even though, in retrospect, I would have done it differently.

As we got into May and June, 1971 and with messages transmitted through the Pakistanis we settled on the dates, places, and everything else. I know that we had to bring our Ambassador to Pakistan, Farland, into the preparations, and the CIA, about how we would do this. Farland came to the US, I believe California, for consultations. We got some special briefcases from the CIA with locks on them, and we began to get ready for the Kissinger trip to China. Together with Holdridge, I began feeding Kissinger with lots of briefing material, some of which we would get from the bureaucracy in innocent ways and other materials which we produced ourselves.

Kissinger chose three people to go to China with him. Myself, as a sort of global sidekick, Holdridge as the Asia and China expert, and Dick Smyser, as the Vietnam expert. The Vietnam issue would be a significant factor in the discussions in China. Those were the four, including Kissinger himself, whom he chose to go into China, as well as two Secret Service agents. Kissinger began reading extensively on Chinese history, culture, and so on. I, of course, did the same. I fed him other materials. We began to prepare strategy papers and talking points on various issues or formulations, some of which we would get from past State Department papers. Our famous formulation on Taiwan, that the U.S. acknowledge the view of Chinese on both sides of the Taiwan Straits, etc. I believe it drew upon earlier State Department think pieces and so on. Whether it was history, culture, or personal portraits, I'm sure that we requisitioned some of this material from the CIA and the State Department, although carefully, to disguise our real purposes. I can't recall just how much I drew upon my wife at that point, in terms of what she suggested reading.

So Kissinger began to bone up on this material. I think that we met with the CIA and Farland in California at some point to go over some of the secret logistics of how to get in and out of China secretly. At one point we went down to Key Biscayne, Florida and spent a few days game playing the trip, thinking about it, and preparing memos. So we began to get ready for it.

Now, as you recall, there was a publicly announced trip that Kissinger took. It included Vietnam, Thailand, India, and Pakistan. Then Kissinger was supposed to return to Washington through Paris. That was the public itinerary. However, the game plan was to go off secretly to Beijing from Pakistan and by pleading illness and the need to go to a Pakistani hill station to spend a couple of days allegedly recuperating while, in fact, Kissinger was secretly going into China.

Ironically, Kissinger came down with a real stomach-ache in India, and so he actually was sick in advance of this secret trip. He covered this up as much as possible, because he wanted to save his real illness until he arrived in Pakistan. I should point out that for the public trip the key U.S. Air Force Special Missions aircraft were taken up for one reason or another. We had a rather poor aircraft. It had no windows and was quite noisy, as I recall. [FYI: This was a KC-135 tanker aircraft with fuel tanks removed and passenger accommodations installed. These aircraft have one fairly small window over each wing. END FYI]

I had the rather incredible job of juggling three types of briefing memos and schedules. There were three groups of people on this flight. In one group were Kissinger, Holdridge, Smyser, and myself, who not only knew that we were going into China but also were privy to the talking points, the strategy, and all of the stuff that we needed to get ready. Not to mention the logistic details on when we would sneak out of Pakistan and how we would do it. This was all on a tightly constricted aircraft, I might add, on which we were going around to these other places. So I would have to keep those briefing memos up to date, including the logistics, the schedule, and the substance. There was the constant harassment by Kissinger of keeping them up to date and in not too gentle a fashion. I had to make sure that only Kissinger, Smyser, and Holdridge would see certain briefing books. I'm talking about people sitting right next to each other on the plane, some of whom knew of the secret trip to China and some of whom did not.

Then there was another group. I know that it included Hal Saunders, NSC Specialist for Near Eastern Affairs, who was along because we were visiting India and Pakistan. People in this group knew that we were going into China, because they had to help cover for us. However, they had no need to know what our strategy and talking points were with the Chinese. So Hal and a couple of others had another series of briefing books. These were sanitized or excerpted copies of the other memos.

There was the third group of people who didn't even know that we were going to China. They had to get a completely different set of logistics and non-substantive memos, as well as substantive papers on matters with which they were concerned.

So there was the usual harassment of Kissinger always looking for excellence and always revising things and asking me repeatedly to update things, complicated by the fact that I had to do three different versions of these revisions. This was one of the more hectic times of my life. Of course, it was so exciting and dramatic that I never begrudged any of this. However, it was a challenge. Kissinger himself has said in his memoirs that it was a rather extraordinary performance on my part. So all of that was quite exciting.

Q: I was wondering, what was the take that was coming through the system that you were seeing on the leadership in China at that time?

LORD: Before answering that, there are a couple of things that I want to recall before I forget them. There are a couple of amusing vignettes. Of course, of all the secret things that Kissinger did, along with the Vietnam negotiations, this was the most secret of all. Kissinger swore me to secrecy, as he always did. However, he also understood that I had a very open relationship with my wife and that I was telling her everything. At least Kissinger suspected that. I never quite admitted or denied it. I just trusted her. That's the kind of marriage I have, and I also wanted to get her advice, particularly on China. She was born in Shanghai and is of Chinese ancestry.

Kissinger has said in his memoirs something about the agony of preparing for this trip. He recalls that he told me that I couldn't even tell my wife about it because she was Chinese and would be suspected if there were any leaks. She knew a certain amount about our China policies. However, I was careful. I let her know that we were trying to open up relations with China. I wasn't precise with her about the details of the secret trip but I wanted her to know that we were going to go to China. I also wanted to keep my pledge to Kissinger. So the night before we left Washington on the publicly-announced trip, I called her over to the window of our house and said: "Look out there. I think that I see a 'Peking Tom'" and smiled. Of course, she understood what was going on.

Another thing is that I called her parents, as I always did, to say good-bye before setting off on this trip. I'm very close to my parents-in-law. I'll never know why, but my mother-in-law said: "Hope you enjoy your 'Peking Duck.'" I almost fell off the chair! I don't recall whether there was any public speculation about Kissinger going to China. I don't believe so. In fact, I'm sure that there wasn't. So I don't know how she had this instinct. Certainly my wife had not told her! I was very careful about leakage, of course, and I totally trusted her. Even in this connection I was a little vague, but I know that I wanted her to know where I was going.

The other point I want to make before we get into your question is that, during this period we were trying to improve relations with Russia. We had a mixed bag of results in this connection in 1969 and up to the summer of 1971. We're talking about July, 1971. We had been suggesting for some time that there should be a summit meeting between President Nixon and Chairman Brezhnev. The Russians were dragging their feet on this proposal, as well as on the issues of Berlin and arms control. We clearly got the Russians' attention after this secret trip, and things began moving immediately. The point is that we were still prepared to have a summit meeting with Russia and, indeed, before we had a summit meeting with China, if we could arrange one when we went to Beijing.

We wanted to get our sequence straight before we landed in China. So there were instructions for Deputy National Security Adviser Haig to call in Soviet Ambassador Dobrynin while we were traveling and to make one last suggestion of a Summit Meeting with Moscow. Haig was supposed to let us know the outcome of this proposal as we traveled. Anyhow, Haig made the pitch, Ambassador Dobrynin turned it down on instructions, or at least put it off. Haig called me at 3:00 AM local time in Bangkok. He got me out of bed. We used double talk on the phone, but Kissinger said that this wouldn't have fooled a kindergarten kid. Basically, he was saying that the Russians had turned us down.

We then made a clear decision that we would have a summit meeting with China first, assuming that we could arrange it, as opposed to a summit meeting with Russia. Of course, the Russians couldn't know how they were screwing up, because they certainly would have accepted a summit meeting first in Moscow, had they known that we were considering a summit meeting in Beijing. So that is of some significance.

Now, to get to your question. I don't recall all of the information we got on the Chinese leadership at that time. I'm sure that we drew on the resources of all of the U.S. Government agencies, including the CIA as well as the State Department. I just don't recall what these various sources said about the Chinese leadership. Clearly, I don't think that we could have appreciated the courage and vision that we saw in Mao and Zhou En-lai before we began to interact with them. I would quickly add that we saw these qualities, along with all of the other terrible attributes of both of these people, particularly Mao Zedong. I don't want my views to be taken out of context.

We weren't aware of the full extent of the Cultural Revolution, and certainly the horrors of it. I don't think that anybody was. It was clear that Zhou En-lai was a very skillful leader, but the impact that he made on all of us was much greater than we'd been prepared for. We obviously knew that he was a significant figure and that Mao was a major figure. We had no illusions; we knew that these were ruthless people. There was no question about that. You don't get to the top in that system without being ruthless. We knew about the famine, the Great Leap Forward, and what we knew about the Cultural Revolution, not to mention their intervening careers and so on. They talked about nuclear weapons; at that point they not only were in favor of having them themselves but were also relaxed about nuclear proliferation. They were opposed to us on all fronts and they used hostile rhetoric. I mean, this was not an easy crowd to deal with. However, we also knew their incentives in wishing to improve relations with us, and I have talked about them.

We obviously had detailed CIA and other reports on Mao and Zhou.

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: Was there any sense of factionalism? Did you have any sense that Mao and Zhou were doing anything that was dangerous to them?

LORD: I want to be careful about this. I am sure that we assumed that approval for broadened contact with us had to come from Mao. Obviously, it came through Zhou, because he was the man who was signing off on the communications. It was obvious that they were working together. I don't know whether we knew who might be hostile to us or the opening. But we knew that broadened contact with us would be very controversial in China, even as improved relations between the two countries were in the U.S. We didn't know how much they were keeping the fact of our contacts on a close hold basis in their bureaucracy, as we were in ours. One of the reasons for secrecy, in addition to the ones I mentioned, was that there was still opposition in China to what they were doing.

I have to say that, as I recall, we didn't have a particularly sophisticated sense of Chinese factionalism. Whether Lin Piao would be opposed to this course, for example, or how Mao and Zhou related to each other, although we probably knew that Zhou had survived by being loyal and always being Number Three in the Chinese Communist hierarchy, if possible, and not Number Two. We had the general sense that Zhou was more pragmatic and moderate than Mao, and things like that. However, I just can't recall how perceptive and how sophisticated our analysis of these Chinese leaders really were.

Q: We had this program for years of interviewing people coming out of China through Hong Kong, reading papers, and so forth. But still, you say, you did not know that the Cultural Revolution was such a disaster.

LORD: Well, we knew that this was a terrible system and we knew that the Chinese people had suffered. I knew this personally because my sister-in-law, my wife Bette's sister, had escaped from China in late 1962 through Hong Kong, just in time for our wedding. At the time the Chinese authorities were letting some people out because of the terrible famine. She joined her family and was at our wedding in 1963. My wife wrote a book, before we went to Geneva [in 1965], called "Eighth Moon," based on my sister-in-law's living in China and getting out. So we knew first hand from her of the horrors of the system and the economic problems, as well as the repression. We, of course, knew of the burning of the British Embassy in Beijing and other acts of fanaticism and the isolation of China. So we were aware of these things. I don't think that we had a full sense of just how pervasive and devastating all of these developments were.

Even though we knew that the Great Leap Forward had been a disaster, I don't think that anyone knew of its extent. Even by Chinese Communist admissions, it was 30 million dead, or something like that. Yes, we knew that this was an unpleasant and terrible system. The Chinese leadership was composed of tough people, and the Chinese people had suffered under them. However, I think that the situation was worse than we realized. Of course, this was somewhat balanced by the emphasis of President Nixon and Kissinger, that the opening up to China was in America's national interest, even though the Chinese leadership was composed of an unpleasant group of people.

Q: Then how did this trip to China proceed?

LORD: A lot of material has already been published about how this secret trip to China worked out. However, this is how the secret trip worked.

We went publicly to Pakistan. There was a public banquet the first night. We went back to the government guest house. We packed and, at about 3:00 AM we were driven to the Islamabad airport by the Pakistani Foreign Minister I believe - Sultan Khan. It seems that they're all named Khan. I've seen him since. We went to President Yahya Khan's plane. Apparently, there was one reporter from some news service who thought he saw us and reported this to his editor. The editor said that the reporter was crazy and spiked [rejected] the story. I wonder what happened to that guy's career.

The plan was to be gone on this secret trip to China for 48 hours. We got on Yahya Khan's airplane. Let me talk about the cover story. We took off for China and we left about 4:00 AM. On that morning the story was put out that Kissinger was not feeling well and, at the invitation of the Pakistanis, he was going up to a hill station [mountain resort] to recuperate for a day. There was a Secret Service agent in a car, slumped over. It wasn't supposed to be an impersonation but he played Kissinger up to the hill station and, I believe, Hal Saunders was with him. So there was a motorcade going up to the hill station. All of this was done fairly early in the morning so that there were no journalists around.

Arrangements were to be made for a Pakistani doctor to attend to Kissinger at the hill station. This doesn't make much sense to me but the way I heard this story, the Pakistanis asked one doctor: "Do you know what Henry Kissinger looks like?" He said: "Yes." They said: "We're sorry, but you're the wrong man." So they get another one. In addition, a couple of Pakistani cabinet ministers who were in on this charade went up to the hill station as if they were paying a call on Kissinger.

Meanwhile, of course, we were in China. At the end of that day the Pakistanis put out a communique saying that Kissinger still didn't feel very well and was going to stay another day at the hill station. This meant that our whole, public schedule in Islamabad had to be slipped because we were supposed to leave Pakistan for Paris on the following day. So the rest of the schedule had to be slipped a day. So that was the cover on that front. I don't know how many people besides Hal Saunders knew about this, but he and Ambassador Farland were the key men in this respect.

Returning to our travel, Smyser, Holdridge, Kissinger, and I, plus two Secret Service agents, named Reedy and McLeod arrived at the airport in Islamabad. Reedy was the senior Secret Service agent, and he knew where we were going as we went to the airport. The other Secret Service agent had no idea. We boarded the plane and found four Chinese already seated there. I may be exaggerating this in retrospect but I believe that McLeod went to draw his pistol, because he was so surprised to see these Chinese on the airplane.

One of the four Chinese in the plane was Zhang Wen-jin, an Assistant Minister of Foreign Affairs in charge of American affairs and a key negotiator with us, just below the Foreign Minister level. He helped to draft the Shanghai Communique. He was a very cultured man. He was later Ambassador to the United States. He was the senior Chinese official in this group which was already on the plane. There were also a Chinese Protocol Officer, a grand-niece of Mao named Wang Hai-rung, and Nancy Tang, an interpreter. There were six of us in our party.

During some of the plane trip Kissinger was studying his briefing books. During some of the time he was talking to Zhang, and he switched back and forth between these two occupations. I've always made a lot of jokes about this, but Kissinger was genuinely upset by the fact that he had no extra shirts with him. He had a special, personal assistant named David Halperin, who had packed his suitcase but didn't put any shirts in. So I've always said that, instead of worrying about this historic trip and what he was going to say to Zhou En-lai about geopolitics he was fuming about his missing shirts. He really was upset about his shirts. He borrowed a couple of shirts from John Holdridge, who stands about 6' 3" in height. Kissinger is about 5' 9", so he looked like a penguin walking around in one of John's shirts. He really was upset. Here it was, an historic moment, and he felt that he would look ridiculous. He was really mad at a time when you would think that this would not be a big deal. However, in human terms you could see that at this most important and dramatic time, when he was meeting Zhou En-lai, he would be upset to look ridiculous in this shirt. And, of course, the shirts he borrowed from John Holdridge had a label that said, "Made in Taiwan."

Anyway, we were sitting on the plane. I forget how long the flight was. Perhaps seven or eight hours or maybe less than that. Here is a well-known story from this trip. I've always tried to make it sound better than it was. I should tell it as it actually happened. Dick Smyser and I were sitting ahead of Kissinger in the back of the plane. The air crew, of course, was composed of Pakistani cabin attendants and Pakistani pilots, navigators, and flight engineers. No American official had been in China since 1949, so we would be the first American officials to visit China in 22 years. By my good fortune Smyser was called to the back of the plane by Kissinger for consultations just before we got to the border between China and Pakistan. All of the others, in addition to Smyser but not including me, were in the back of the plane with Kissinger. So, as we crossed the border, I was in the front of the plane. So I've said ever since then, in case the question should ever come up, that I was the first American official to visit China since 1949! I've said, on some occasions, that I deliberately raced to the front of the plane to do that, but that's slightly gilding the lilly.

Obviously, there was a great sense of drama. As the sun came up, we were passing K-2, the second highest mountain in the world. It was right outside our window, with the sun on it. Remember, we were in a Pakistani plane with the usual windows. We had left the nearly windowless KC-135 jet back at Islamabad. There was a sense of drama that we were going to the most populous country in the world, after 22 years and there were all of the geopolitical implications of that. There was the anticipation of meeting with Zhou En-lai, this great figure, and there was the excitement and anticipation of those talks. There were James Bond aspects of this trip, since it was totally secret. For me, personally, there was the realization that I was the first American official to visit China in 22 years and that I was married to a woman from Shanghai. I'll never top this experience in terms of drama.

Of course, we spent a good deal of time on the plane, discussing what the strategy would be in talking with Zhou En-lai and the Chinese. I had read very carefully the materials we had prepared over the previous several months. I don't have the precise time with me, but we landed at the military side of the airport outside of Beijing. We were met by Marshall Yeh Jien-ying, a well-known Chinese general from the Long March. I don't know whether he was on the Politburo of the Chinese Communist Party, but he was a very important figure. So that was a fairly high level reception. Also there to greet us was Huang Hua, who was later Chinese Foreign Minister. We entered limousines with curtains drawn, so people couldn't see into them. Then we drove into Beijing through Tiananmen Square and past the Great Hall of the People to a place called Dayoutai, which is the guest house compound for very important visitors. We were then secretly ensconced there.

I don't recall how soon it was before Zhou En-lai came over to greet us, but I'm sure that it was right away. We had a banquet that night, sitting around with Zhou En-lai. We had discussions with him which, according to Kissinger's book, lasted for 17 hours. We were in China for a total of 49 hours.

The major challenge, of course, was to work out an agreement that President Nixon would visit China and to develop some rough sense of what the agenda would be. We agreed in principle that there would be just a brief announcement, which both sides would issue simultaneously, after we got back to Washington.

However, the real negotiating, and this went on for hours, was about the following. We wanted to make it look essentially that the Chinese wanted President Nixon to come to China. The Chinese essentially wanted to make it look as if Nixon wanted to come to China and that the Chinese were gracious enough to invite him. So we went through our first, agonizing process of negotiation on that issue. At one point we broke off the negotiation, not in a huff, but just recognizing that we were at an impasse. We thought that the Chinese were coming back to the negotiations within a couple of hours. Kissinger and I and the others walked around outside, because we knew that we were being bugged, and we couldn't discuss strategy and tactics unless we walked outside. Probably the trees were bugged, too. Who knows? I remember that we waited for hours and hours. The Chinese were probably trying to keep us off balance and were probably working out their own position. Most likely, Zhou En-lai had to check with Mao Zedong.

Finally, the Chinese came back, and we resumed the discussion and worked this issue out. I forget the exact language used in the brief communique which was made public. The formulation used went something like this: "Knowing of President Nixon's interest in visiting China..." And in fact he had expressed an interest in visiting China in general. The formulation went on that the Chinese had invited him. So it wasn't as if the Chinese wanted Nixon to come to China and were going out of their way. They used the formulation that they invited him because they had heard about his interest in visiting China. On the other hand, Nixon wasn't begging to go to China. So it was a fair compromise. This matter was covered in a few sentences, essentially, but it was tough to work out.

In the midst of this negotiation we also did some sightseeing. The Chinese closed off the Forbidden City of Beijing to tourists so that we could visit it privately and on our own. We had the head of the Chinese Archeological Museum and an expert on the area take us around personally as our guide. I'll never forget it. It was a very hot, mid-July day. I was carrying either one or two of these very heavy briefcases. We had to take them everywhere with us. We didn't dare leave them anywhere for security reasons. Of course, it was dramatic to see the Forbidden City all by ourselves. It was also very hot, carrying those damned briefcases around.

After that we had a Peking Duck luncheon-banquet hosted by Zhou in the Great Hall, I think.. The main topic of conversation was, in fact, the Cultural Revolution. Here we saw just how clever Zhou En-lai was. We know that he, himself, was aghast at the excesses of the Cultural Revolution, which had been unleashed by Mao. At one point he himself had been imprisoned in his office by Red Guards. However, he hadn't survived this long by suddenly being disloyal to Mao and on an issue of that importance.

The way Zhou recounted this experience was basically as follows. He went through how he had been locked up in his own office. He talked about some of the exchanges he had had with the Red Guards, in a very clinical way. He then used some phrasing like the following. He said: "Chairman Mao is, of course, much more far-seeing and prescient than I am. He saw the need for the 'Cultural Revolution' and all this upheaval and destruction to 'cleanse' the revolution." I don't recall exactly how he phrased it. Zhou continued: "I wasn't so prescient. I saw the excesses, the problems, and the down side." He said something like that.

If Mao read the transcript of what Zhou said, he couldn't have complained, because Zhou En-lai was saying that Mao had a better vision than Zhou did and saw the need for the Cultural Revolution. At the same time Zhou was signaling to us that the Cultural Revolution had gotten out of hand, had become rather brutal, and there were excesses. So it was a typical example of cleverness by Zhou En-lai. He was keeping his flank protected with Mao but was also making sure that the people he was talking to knew that he was a much more reasonable and pragmatic person. It was a fascinating performance. I'm sorry that Smyser missed it because he was sick.

When we finished drafting the communique, we got back on the plane and returned to Pakistan. We successfully re-inserted ourselves in the charade which had been worked out in Islamabad. We then went on to Paris the next day. It so happens, and we'll get back to this, that while we were publicly in Paris, we secretly snuck off and met with the Vietnamese Communists. Indeed, this was one of the more forthcoming meetings with them. Afterwards Kissinger and I thought, somewhat naively, that we had pulled off two, historic encounters in one trip: the opening toward China and moving toward settling the Vietnam War. That latter idea was a wildly premature judgment. I remember that we debated which was the more historic and important, getting the war over with or arranging for the opening to China. We said, wasn't it a great achievement to do both in one trip?

Q: Back to the meeting with Zhou En-lai, how were these negotiations carried out? Was it basically Kissinger and Zhou?

LORD: It was basically Kissinger and sometimes Zhou En-lai. Sometimes it was Zhang Wen-jin or Huang Hua serving as the negotiators on the Chinese side. Correct me here if your own research comes up with a different view, but Zhang Wen-jin and/or Huang Hua seemed to be serving as surrogates for Zhou En-lai. As I said before, in his book Kissinger says that there were about 17 hours of meetings with Zhou En-lai. I think that there were 17 hours of meetings but I can't believe that Zhou En-lai was there that long. Maybe if Kissinger adds in the luncheon and the other contacts with Zhou, the total time of his discussions with Zhou would add up to that. It was a long negotiation, but a lot of the time was taken up with waiting around for the Chinese leaders. We were not really meeting with them for all of this time.

Now, we didn't just talk about the communique. And each side set forth its positions on many of these key issues. There was considerable geopolitical exchange between Zhou and Kissinger, the beginning of one of the most remarkable multi-year dialogues ever conducted in diplomacy. I was privileged to be present throughout the hundreds of hours of talks between these two giants.

We also clearly, of course, talked about the agenda for the Nixon visit. We made it clear that, although we would talk about the issue which was the most sensitive and important to them, namely, Taiwan, we also wanted to talk about Russia, the Middle East, South Asia, Korea, and the beginning of bilateral contacts. So we began to set forth the agenda that we wanted to talk about. I'm sure that the Chinese kept emphasizing Taiwan but also agreed that there would be a broader, geopolitical discussion. In retrospect, I don't know how much time was spent on this. When Zhou En-lai was there, a lot of time was spent on these kinds of issues. Negotiating the communique would have been carried on with his subordinates.

Q: What would you do? Go through a certain amount of proposals, and then everybody went back and huddled?

LORD: Well, regarding the agenda, we weren't negotiating about a specific agenda. We just wanted to make sure that there were enough common interests and enough to talk about beyond Taiwan that a Nixon trip would be worthwhile. The Chinese, in turn, wanted to make sure that we were sufficiently flexible on Taiwan that they could get around their domestic problems with this issue. It wasn't a matter of negotiating or reducing to specific language these other issues. There was just a philosophic exchange. Indeed, we carefully crafted Kissinger's opening remarks and his talking points both to be sensitive on the Taiwan issue and to put the bigger picture forward and why it was in the interest of both countries to overcome decades of mistrust and hostility. So there were a lot of exchanges. This is where Kissinger was immediately impressed with Zhou En-lai in terms of his sophistication, historical sweep, and eloquence.

Regarding the negotiations on the communique, I don't recall exactly how they went, but I'm sure that we had prepared in advance a draft communique which we presented to the Chinese. The Chinese came back with their draft communique. We were far apart and began to haggle about the details, particularly this issue of who invited whom. I can't recall whether we decided, from the very beginning, to keep the communique very brief or whether both sides reached the point where we agreed that this was the only way to do it, that is, to announce the fact that Kissinger had been in China and that Nixon would be going to China in the spring of 1972. I believe this was the first time that the Chinese used their formulation that they knew of Nixon's interest in China and that they had invited him to come.

I don't recall whether we initially talked about other issues for the communique. I seriously doubt it. We felt that this communique would essentially be an announcement. It was dramatic enough in itself. It would be premature to negotiate on other issues. It would make other people nervous if we said that we had been talking about other matters. I am sure that, from the very beginning, the idea was just to have an announcement that Kissinger had visited China and that there would be a forthcoming Nixon trip. It was agreed that we had to maintain secrecy until we returned to the US. Certainly, President Nixon wanted to make the announcement himself, given the drama surrounding the matter. That was understood, and the Chinese went along with that.

Q: I take it then that there was considerable discipline on both sides in avoiding political diatribes or simply setting out well known positions and all that sort of thing.

LORD: I would have to go back and look at the transcripts. Since Zhou En-lai was as sophisticated as he was, he would be firm in their positions on all of these issues, including Taiwan and other, geopolitical matters, but he also indicated his desire to move ahead with the relationship of China and the United States. His rhetoric would have been carefully modulated, so that it wouldn't turn us off. We, in turn, would be firm but clear that, despite our differences, we wanted to move ahead. Kissinger, on behalf of Nixon, was forthcoming on Taiwan even as he sketched the broad agenda. Indeed he began to set forth some important assurances on our Taiwan policy that impressed the Chinese side.

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: Dick Solomon has suggested, in some of the work he has done on negotiating with the Chinese Communists, that Kissinger so much enjoyed talking to Zhou En-lai that he would tend to go beyond his talking points and range more broadly.

LORD: Absolutely.

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: In this particular instance of the secret trip to China Kissinger may have said some things that, perhaps, would not have been said had they been pre-rehearsed, in the sense that it was good to use the Chinese-American relationship as a joint U.S. and Chinese way to keep Japan under control. Or that Kissinger gave more ground than he might have on...

LORD: I would have to go back and review the transcripts. There is no question that in the discussions between Kissinger and Zhou En-lai they would range more widely, on this trip and on subsequent occasions when they got to know each other better. There would be a tendency to sit back and get away from the immediate questions at hand. This was in contrast with the practice when we were negotiating with Zhou En-lai's subordinates on specific language. Kissinger would have prepared talking points and positions on all of these issues.

At times Kissinger might push the envelope or use ambiguous formulations which might tempt the Chinese. He was forthcoming on Taiwan. As for other issues, he might have said things on certain issues that he would probably be embarrassed about if they were shown to the country that he was talking about.

On Japan, for example, Kissinger's basic thrust would have been to tell the Chinese that the U.S.-Japan alliance is in our interest and is in China's interest. So he would have said that Japan has an impulse toward nationalism and rearming. However, if the Japanese feel secure under the U.S. nuclear umbrella, or our security alliance, then they won't go in that direction. Therefore, Kissinger would say, it is in China's interest for the U.S. to have good relations with Japan. We worked on them in that connection.

In the initial meetings the Chinese attitude was: "We don't like your alliance with Japan. We don't like alliances in general and we also don't like foreign troops on another country's soil. You are just building up Japan and making it more dangerous." We would counter by saying: "If we didn't have this tie with Japan, they might go nuclear and rearm and be a greater threat to your security. So you ought to be in favor of this alliance."

Frankly, that argument made an impact on the Chinese over the following years. They reached the point where they clearly agreed with us. They have held this position ever since, until the last few years, when they have become more ambivalent about Japan.

Let's just continue with this particular episode, and then we can go back again. Obviously, we were very excited when we got back to Washington. I recall the awkwardness, and I did feel bad about that, when we were flying out from Washington to meet with President Nixon at San Clemente, California, a day or two before the announcement about the Nixon trip, and I was sitting on the plane with U. Alexis Johnson, the Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs. He didn't know anything about the trip which we had made to China. He was an old China hand and had participated, I believe, in the Geneva and Warsaw talks with the Chinese Communists.

Q: Yes. He was one of the first to negotiate with the Chinese Communists, apart from the talks on the Korean armistice.

LORD: He was a very decent man. I sat outside his State Department office during the Cuban Missile Crisis in 1962. I had dealt with him in Political-Military Affairs and I always respected him. To be flying out with him, knowing that in the next two days there was going to be an announcement on China, and he didn't even know about it, left me feeling very awkward indeed. I still remember that.

We got out to San Clemente and worked on Nixon's announcement. Nixon's inclination, and I think that he was entirely right, was to keep his remarks very short. It was so dramatic that he didn't need to elaborate. He could get away with a few sentences or a few paragraphs. The eventual announcement was only a few hundred words long.

Nixon announced in advance that he would be making a statement. Most of the press speculated that it was going to be on Vietnam, as they figured that almost anything would be on Vietnam. None of them knew that it was going to be on China. So we had some tense moments during the 24 hours or 48 hours out in San Clemente, putting together this announcement and, also, the game plan for informing, rather belatedly, countries around the world, not to mention our own government. We did this at the last minute. So that was a dramatic time.

Then, of course, Nixon went on TV and made the announcement. Everyone knows what a dramatic impact it had.

Meanwhile, I had brought back with me for my Chinese wife a small sampling of Chinese soil.

Q: So there wasn't any particular battle about it that I recall. Let's continue on the China theme.

LORD: Okay.

Q: So what were you doing at this point? Getting ready for the Nixon trip?

LORD: Yes. Then we had to work out the exact timing of President Nixon's trip to China and how we got ready for it logistically and substantively.

Let me pause and say that the most immediate and the most important impact was with Russia. We'll get back to Russia later, but let me say very quickly that we obviously got the attention of the Russians. As I said earlier, we had not been making much progress with the Russians. They hadn't agreed to holding a summit meeting, the SALT negotiations [Strategic Arms Limitation Talks] were going slowly, the Berlin negotiations were not moving ahead, and we had up's and down's in the two previous years. Basically, we were trying to move, and Soviet-American relations were better than they had been in 1970, when we had several crises at once, but on the whole, we were just treading water.

Then, within weeks, the whole Soviet-American relationship started moving forward. This was very concrete evidence that the opening to China would help us with the Russians, which was one of the purposes of the Kissinger visit to Beijing. Within weeks, or months, the Russians agreed to holding a summit meeting as well, in this case in May, 1972, just a few months after Nixon would go to China. Of course, the Soviets realized that they had miscalculated and that they should have agreed to a summit meeting before the meeting in China was announced. The Soviets were totally caught by surprise. We then made a break through on the Berlin negotiations. I don't remember the dates, but that began moving very quickly, as we moved toward a very significant agreement. We made progress on arms control, so that we set up the SALT-1 agreement by the time we got to Moscow in May, 1972. We began to talk with the Soviets about economic and other arrangements. Of all the reactions to the announcement of the Kissinger trip to China, I would say that the most important one by far, of a positive or, indeed, any nature, was the reaction in Moscow. The most negative impact, of course, was in Japan, where the announcement caused severe embarrassment to the Japanese Government. However, the progress made in relations with the Soviets was very helpful.

It's hard to judge now how nervous this trip made Hanoi. It certainly didn't make the Vietnamese communist leaders immediately flexible. However, we figured that the combination of the announcement of both of these summit meetings was certainly going to put pressure on Hanoi to be more reasonable. We hoped, of course, that this would give an incentive to both Beijing and Moscow to put such pressure on Hanoi.

For example, in Beijing there was an ideological embarrassment in moving ahead with the U.S., which was fighting with their Vietnamese compatriots. We didn't realize fully at the time the extent of the Sino-Vietnamese hostility, either. We assumed at the time that, if they were not like lips and teeth, as they had once likened their relationship, at least the Chinese and Vietnamese communists were friendly. It was awkward for the Chinese to have American troops fighting against their ideological compatriots in Vietnam. Therefore, it was in the Chinese interest to try to get this war behind us.

Similarly in the case of the Russians, it was awkward, while they were trying to improve relations with the United States, to have their friends and allies engaged in a fight with us. In a little while I can get back to the Chinese view of Vietnam and how we dealt with that.

So the most immediate impact, I'd say, was on Japan, Moscow, and, to a certain extent, Hanoi.

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: The Russians had tried, at times, to play the relationship off. In other words, argue to the Americans that they would be better friends of the United States than the Chinese communists would be.

LORD: That's right.

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: Were you aware of that?

LORD: Oh, yes. This was a constant pattern with the Russians. They certainly didn't say: "We white men have to stick together." However, you also got the feeling that there might have been a cultural and racial undertone to this. I can't document when the Russians made their moves and at what time. They often floated proposals, including an arms control deal which, they thought, would unnerve the Chinese, as well as NATO. The Russians made references to their view that the Chinese couldn't be trusted, and so on. Of course, this was always deflected by Nixon and Kissinger.

So we began to think about how to get ready for the Nixon trip to China. I don't remember exactly when we fixed the dates of February 22 to 28, 1972. The announcement only talked about the following spring, I believe. We knew that there would have to be follow-on, advance trips before Nixon went for this visit to this unknown terrain. We had to decide on the specific cities that President Nixon would visit. So we scheduled another trip to China for Kissinger in October, 1971. Al Haig would go to China in January, 1972, and President Nixon would go in February, 1972. When we went to China in October, 1971, I don't believe that we knew that Haig was going to go to China in January, 1972.

The purpose of the Kissinger trip in October, 1971, was two-fold - substantive and logistic. We needed to prepare substantively for the summit meeting. Regarding the agenda, we needed to get a sense of each side's positions and see what might be said in any outcome, whether a statement or a communique. There would also be further, substantive exchanges between Kissinger and Zhou En-lai, in particular, to prepare the ground for Nixon's conversations when he came to China. Secondly, there were the logistical arrangements to be made. That is, what the schedule would be like, where Nixon would go and where he would stay, what his itinerary would be like, and the security and public relations preparations that would be needed. We wanted even to arrange at that point for satellite ground stations to support international coverage of the visit, although this was rather early in the game for satellite coverage.

We took along with us a lot of people from the White House staff to deal with the security and press side of the visit. I know that this was when Dwight Chapin and Ron Ziegler went to China. So we had a dual purpose in visiting China in October, 1971.

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: Why October?

LORD: Well, we had been to China on the secret visit in July, 1971. It took us some time to get our act together and get ready to go back in order to prepare for a Nixon trip that was coming in the spring of 1972. There was no magic aspect of a second Kissinger trip to China in October, 1971. It was just the natural rhythm of the calendar.

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: Some people have suggested, and there is some logic to this, that the secret trip was badly timed in terms of the United Nations and the votes there.

LORD: In retrospect, and to be honest about it, I don't think that we paid much attention to that. You're absolutely right that the timing of the secret trip was awkward in terms of the UN vote on Chinese representation. Our objective was to prepare for a Nixon visit to China. However, as we got on the airplane and were flying out of Shanghai - we flew from Beijing to Shanghai and then flew out of Shanghai en route back to the United States - we learned that we had lost the vote in the UN on the admission of the People's Republic of China. We had still been holding out, trying to ensure that, at least, Taiwan could stay in the UN as well. Of course, China would only accept one representative for China's seat. That was an embarrassing finale, to say the least, because it drove home the realization that we were causing pain to our friends with this opening to China.

You're absolutely right, and that's a good question. Why a second visit to China in October, 1971? In retrospect, we should have had a better sense of timing, and I just don't recall whether anybody said: "Do we really want to go to China in the middle of this UN debate?" I just can't recall whether we took this matter into our calculations. This was a tactical mistake. On the other hand, once we had made this dramatic breakthrough in July 1971, the UN sentiment was going to shift. We had to go sometime in the fall, during the UN General Assembly session so there was always going to be some awkwardness

Q: You went on all of the trips in connection with preparations for the Nixon visit?

LORD: I went on all of the trips during the Nixon and Ford Administrations. There were nine trips to China. There were separate visits to China by President Nixon and by President Ford. Kissinger made seven other trips to China, not including the Nixon and Ford visits. I went on all nine trips. I did not go on the Haig January 1972 trip.

Q: How about the trip to China by Al Haig?

LORD: Haig went on his own to China in January, 1972. I don't know whether he ever went to China again, to be honest. However, as he was Kissinger's deputy, he wouldn't travel with Kissinger. He would mind the store at home when Kissinger went abroad.

Q: During the period between the time you came back from the first trip to China to October, 1971, you obviously had other things that you had to do, in connection with the Vietnam negotiations...

LORD: And moving ahead with the Russians.

Q: Yes, so things were really moving. However, you were also fleshing out an agenda that President Nixon would be taking with him.

LORD: That's right. As we did for Kissinger trips but obviously also for a trip as important as the Nixon visit, we did a lot of homework to get ready for that. First, we arranged by subject matter excerpts from Kissinger's conversations with Zhou En-lai and other Chinese during his first trip. So in terms of Vietnam, to take one example, we had everything that was said on Vietnam during the 17 hours of our meetings. That material would be excerpted from those conversations and put under that heading. These excerpts would be set out in terms of The Chinese Position and The U.S. Position. We set out goals and talking points and also defenses against Chinese attacks in certain areas. In other words, what's their offense and what's our defense? And vice versa. We did that on all of the issues.

We carefully drafted Kissinger's opening statement. We had the transcripts fully recorded both by excerpts and in terms of specific issues. We provided further background material both from CIA as well as from the State Department on Chinese personalities and their positions on various issues, plus the domestic situation in China. We prepared memoranda on Chinese relationships with other countries and what our goals were. Then we drafted a possible communique to be issued at the end of the Nixon visit. So we prepared the talking points and provided background on the various issues that might come up in Kissinger's conversations. We also set out goals for the summit meeting.

Then there was the whole logistic side, which was managed by Dwight Chapin and others. There would need to be agreements with the Chinese on how many press representatives they wanted to allow. Of course, the Chinese were shocked by the numbers we had in mind. Other matters involved security arrangements and logistics, personnel needs, and issues of this kind. So there was a massive amount of work to be handled.

Q: I would have assumed that the NSC staff would have been almost overwhelmed by virtually every Embassy in Washington and every Congressional political leader in our own country. They would be asking: "What did you people see in China and what are you doing" to make sure that you make this or that point?

LORD: I'm sure that this was the case. I don't recall specifically. In my own case I had my hands full with my own in box. My job was basically working with Kissinger and, with him, for President Nixon. Together with John Holdridge and others, I prepared analyses, talking points, and getting ready for the summit meeting. External activity with other countries would have been handled, either by the State Department or by the experts on the NSC staff for the region concerned. So if someone on the NSC staff had to see the Japanese Ambassador, short of Kissinger it would have been John Holdridge, or Sonnenfeldt with a European Ambassador, for example. There was a lot of that contact work going on, but it doesn't stand out vividly in my own mind.

Most of these contacts were handled by the State Department, which was getting up to speed itself, as well as by the White House. Kissinger was very careful about his staff talking to many people, and certainly not to the press or Members of Congress. So we wouldn't have spent much time dealing with external contacts. Certainly, I didn't. Others may have. However, you're right. There were a lot of queries, questions, and suggestions as to what we ought to do.

Q: The major issue before you, as you prepared for the Nixon trip, was Taiwan, wasn't it? As you prepared to set up the agenda, in a way you had to be coming up with what answer you wanted. Was there a debate raging within the White House over what was to happen with Taiwan?

LORD: Here, again, my memory is not clear, and I don't want to try to be overly precise. We began, of course, since the situation was now public, to draw in the State Department, including experts like Marshall Green, Al Jenkins, and so on. There were also people working with them who, I assume, had been working on China. I realize that they had been working on China at that point for some years. So we began to get previous formulations about what we had said about Taiwan and other issues in Warsaw and Geneva, also drawing from internal position papers. At least now, since this matter was public, we drew very heavily on these resources. We had drawn on these resources before, but always somewhat under false pretenses, at least about the immediate objective.

Now, of course, the subject was open. President Nixon was going to go to China. Kissinger was going back to China in October, 1971. He took some State Department people with him this time. So we could draw on these sources. These would include formulations on Taiwan. I can't remember exactly how all of this was thrashed out. I was the one who worked primarily with John Holdridge, getting Kissinger ready for the meeting. We had formulations on Taiwan, on the communique to be drafted, and so on.

Basically, our approach on Taiwan was going to be trying to square the circle. We had no intention at that point, of course, of switching relations or anything that dramatic. The issue was essentially: "How can we kick this issue down the road?" And leave the Chinese enough face so that they could live with it, not solving this issue, certainly not trying to bite any bullets ourselves. We were very sensitive to the impact on our friends on Taiwan, other allies, and our domestic audience. So we came up with words which would be reassuring to the Chinese but which would not get us into too much trouble.

Kissinger had given some important assurances to the Chinese on Taiwan in July 1971, but then and thereafter our formulations were designed not to undercut Taiwan or our ties with it in any fundamental issue.

I don't remember any raging debates on Taiwan in our government. I remember that we put together some massive briefing books on this and the other topics.

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: Even early on, did you have a scenario on how long our process of normalization with China would take and that it wasn't leading to diplomatic relations...

LORD: Not really. We did not have any precise time tables. My guess is that the general assumption was that we wouldn't bite that bullet of normalization until after the reelection of President Nixon in 1972. That was sufficiently controversial, not to mention the shock to Taiwan and so on, and also the political fallout. So we didn't want to bite that bullet at that time.

Now, I don't recall whether we ever sat down to the Chinese and said: "We'll do this in President Nixon's second term." I recall that when President Ford was in office, we made it clear that we would move ahead on normalization of relations with China during Ford's second term, if he was reelected. However, I don't believe that we were ever that precise, even among ourselves, beyond a working assumption that we weren't going to try, nor would the Chinese expect, to be able to pull off full normalization during President Nixon's first four years.

However, in February, 1973, after one of Kissinger's visits to China, we set up Liaison Offices in the two capitals. This step amounted to de facto embassies and normalization and was a major step forward. It also showed Chinese flexibility, since they had said firmly they would never have an embassy in Washington while the Republic of China was still there.

That's a good point that you raised. Without being precise about normalization of relations, we did have to figure out how we were going to communicate between China and the United States, since we didn't have Embassies or, at that point, even Liaison Offices. We ended up doing this two ways. One was through General Vernon Walters [the Defense Attache] in our Embassy in Paris. He talked to the ambassador named Huang Chen in the PRC Embassy in Paris, who eventually became Ambassador to the United States. Once the People's Republic of China was admitted to the UN, we communicated through the first PRC Ambassador to the UN, Huang Hua, who subsequently became their Foreign Minister.

We set up a communications channel through Ambassador Huang Hua in New York. Kissinger and I, or sometimes myself alone or Al Haig, depending on whether we were traveling, would go up to New York and meet Ambassador Huang Hua in a secret apartment, a CIA safe house about two blocks from where my parents lived, and where I had grown up.

We would have exchanges with the PRC in that apartment, and through Paris, whether it involved looking forward to the next trip or talking about the crisis in Bangladesh which concerned India and Pakistan, for example. We had exchanges with the PRC on such subjects. Or we just generally kept in touch. We had to work out communications, and these were the channels that we used until we agreed to set up Liaison Offices in Beijing and Washington in February, 1973.

We didn't have a precise timetable for normalization of relations. I don't recall the formulas we used about saying to the Chinese that some day we looked forward to having diplomatic relations and full normalization. I'm sure that these references were somewhat guarded and certainly were not specific in terms of a timetable. Even as other issues came up, we had to try to be as careful as we could, whether this involved our troop presence on Taiwan, and so on.

So, from the beginning, you are absolutely right, Taiwan was the most sensitive issue, obviously, even as we tried to keep in play all of the more positive issues.

Q: Regarding the agenda, you arrived in Beijing in October, 1971.

LORD: That's correct.

Q: The Chinese knew that you were coming to Beijing. Did you find that there was a different atmosphere? Did you find that you were dealing with apparatchiks? Or was the atmosphere one of, "Let's get down to business." Was there any euphoria?

LORD: No. Three things happened in connection with this trip. First, there was a continuation and a great enrichment in the conversation over a whole range of substantive issues, between Zhou En-lai and Kissinger. There were really remarkable conversations between them. By the way, Kissinger has said that, of all the people he ever met in the diplomatic field in his life, the two most impressive were Zhou En-lai and De Gaulle. Since Kissinger spent infinitely more time with Zhou En-lai than with De Gaulle, he probably would put Zhou En-lai in first place. Maybe De Gaulle would have rivaled that if Kissinger could have spent as much time with him. However, Kissinger has always said that Zhou En-lai was one of the two most impressive people he has met. Kissinger's conversations with Zhou En-lai were always interesting.

There was a continuing process of feeling out by each side as to where our strategic goals could converge and how we could handle difficult issues. That was one aspect of the Kissinger trip and an end in itself, with Kissinger going back and talking to the Chinese.

Then there were the two goals of setting up President Nixon's trip to China. On the substantive side, and related to the one I just mentioned, we were beginning to see what the leaders would say on these issues when they met, together with mine fields to be avoided and areas of possible convergence to be explored. Specifically, and I'll get back to this, there was the communique, which turned out to be The Shanghai Communique. This would be the concrete result of the Nixon visit and obviously very important. Further, there were the logistic preparations on where the President would go and what he would do. If you like, I could discuss both the communique process and the public process.

Q: Yes.

LORD: Let me discuss the public process first. I don't recall how much of this was fixed before we went to China and how much was fixed when we were there. It was agreed that we would arrive in China on February 22, 1972, and remain through February 28, 1972, Chinese time. President Nixon would go first to Beijing, then to Hangzhou for its natural beauty and just to go to another place. Then we would go to Shanghai and leave China from there. There would be roughly a day each in Hangzhou and Shanghai and four or five days in Beijing.

The way the Chinese handled this, and they were very clever in helping to get ready for the Nixon visit, involved getting their own public used to the fact that the American President was coming after 22 or 23 years of total hostility and isolation. During this time the Chinese Communists had demonized America in their own propaganda. So, although we found out that there was underlying respect and affection for the United States by the Chinese people, despite this propaganda, and which was quite remarkable, nevertheless, both in terms of high ranking cadre and even some of the Chinese leaders, and in terms of the general public, the Chinese had their own need to begin to condition the Chinese audience as to what was coming. This renewal of contact was a shock for us, but it certainly was quite a turnaround for the Chinese, as well. So, in effect, we did a dress rehearsal, wherein Kissinger and the rest of us would go to places that President Nixon would be going to, both to check them out, but also gradually to reach wider Chinese audiences.

The most restrictive were the private meetings with Zhou En-lai with a handful on each side. Then there were broader meetings with more people on each side, substantive and logistic. We went to see a cultural performance of some sort, even on that trip, to which high Chinese cadre were invited. So the next circle of people we saw and were seen by consisted of fairly high level party officials who had been specially invited and were exposed to Kissinger and us. Then we went to the Summer Palace and the lake, which is a famous tourist attraction, including for ordinary Chinese citizens. So we were there, not only checking out this site for President Nixon but also exposing the Chinese people to the Americans and the fact that Nixon was coming. We went to these places, both to check out the logistics, the security, the attractiveness, the symbolism, and the photo opportunities, but also to begin to condition widening circles of the Chinese people that Americans were coming and that this was to be accepted, and so on.

Q: I assume that there was rather intensive, TV coverage of all of this.

LORD: For the trip in October, 1971, I don't believe so. This is partly because the Chinese weren't physically set up with satellite TV, as we were later on for President Nixon's trip, and partly because Nixon, with his ego, didn't want his thunder stolen. So I don't believe that there was TV coverage on the October Kissinger trip, or Haig's trip.

Q: I meant internally, in China.

LORD: No, I don't believe so even then, either. The Chinese didn't have much television. For example, and I just saw this figure the other day, as late as 1978 or 1979, which is, after all, five or six years after our first trip, something like 10 million Chinese had access to television. I'm not talking about 10 million TV sets, but access to television. Today, the figure for access to TV is over a billion Chinese. So you can see how far they've gone.

I don't know how much press coverage there was of the October Kissinger trip to China. We may not have had any press with us. President Nixon would have been very annoyed, had we had much press with us. Kissinger would have been sensitive to this point. He got enough drama out of his secret trip to China that he wasn't about to upstage Nixon by getting all kinds of photo opportunities. You should remember that it wasn't just us there at this time. There were also Dwight Chapin, the security people, and Ron Ziegler, the press spokesman. They'd make sure that President Nixon wasn't going to be upstaged.

We checked all of those sites out. We did not go to Hangzhou and Shanghai. We stayed in Beijing. We managed pretty much to put together the arrangements for the trip. There was a lot of haggling, I'm sure, as there always is, particularly with the Chinese. But it's also true with the Russians and others. There is the question of security and whose security officers are going to ride in whose car. Nixon had to use Chinese cars, and the Secret Service people resisted that. As far as the press arrangements were concerned, the Chinese probably expected a few score press people, at the most. The Nixon press people asked for credentials for 200 press, or whatever the figure was. The Chinese just gasped.

However, the Chinese were quite forthcoming, certainly on the media coverage. They probably saw that this was to their advantage, despite their nervousness and being totally aghast at the number of journalists who would be coming for the Nixon visit. Regarding the entourage of the American President, the Chinese were relatively forthcoming. Kissinger used to joke that the cultural shock was extraordinary when the Chinese talked to the advance party about publicity.

Among other things which probably was done on this trip, or maybe on Haig's trip, was that Kissinger laid the groundwork for the President and him to meet with Zhou En-lai and others to discuss the political issues, including the particularly sensitive issue of Taiwan, and the communique. Meanwhile, the Foreign Ministers, William Rogers [Secretary of State] and his Chinese counterpart, Ji Peng-fei would deal with things like trade, cultural exchanges, blocked assets, and economic and other bilateral issues. This was arranged so that they would have parallel conversations and keep the State Department out of really important negotiations. This was nothing that anybody was proud of.

Q: Was Mao Zedong a factor in any of this?

LORD: No. We didn't expect to see him in October. Again, that would be upstaging President Nixon. Mao really only saw national leaders. He was a factor, and I'll get to the communique in just a minute. He was a factor on that. Zhou En-lai was always deferential to Mao and would always invoke him. So, in the course of conversations Mao's name would come up. We were sure that, for something of this magnitude, anything major would be approved by Mao. However, we didn't see him, and he wasn't directly involved. I am sure that Zhou En-lai was keeping him posted as we went along. So I think that that covers the logistics of the visit, as far as I can recall.

Q: Was Deng Xiaoping involved?

LORD: No. At that point, no. He made a couple of comebacks, but at that point we had never heard of him. I know that. At that time he probably would have been in one of his down periods and still hadn't recovered from the Cultural Revolution as yet. You have to remember that the Cultural Revolution went on until 1976. People really started to be rehabilitated in 1977-1978. Deng went up, went back down, and went up again. We didn't meet Deng for the first time until he led a delegation to the UN in New York in 1974.

Are there any other questions on logistics? I can get to the communique and the substance, but I think that's about all I can remember about logistics.

There were quite interesting aspects with regard to the communique. We had in mind a rather typical communique, in which we would try to get in there as many points of convergence, agreement, and parallel policy as possible. Even if we had to stretch it, given the fact that the two countries had been isolated from each other and mutually hostile, and we agreed on almost no issues on the international scene. In the course of our conversations with Zhou En-lai we handed him a draft communique.

Q: We're still talking about the trip in October, 1971.

LORD: Yes. The whole idea was to get as much as possible in the communique negotiated on that trip, so we wouldn't leave it until the last minute and under the pressure of the summit meeting in February, 1972, and last minute deadlines. So we wanted to try to get the communique squared away. Ideally, we would have liked to have everything negotiated. As I will describe, we ended up getting the great bulk of it done, except for the Taiwan issue, where we made some progress but still had some outstanding problem areas, which had to be negotiated at the summit meeting.

So, of course, we had this rather well-done, standard, diplomatic communique covering a lot of issues and suggesting that the meeting was very friendly, marked by convergent perspectives, but without being stupid about it, or going overboard.

At the next meeting it was obvious that Zhou En-lai had checked with Mao. He came back and just tore into us with revolutionary fervor, in effect stating that we had given him an amateurish and ill-advised draft communique which was basically useless. I'm not trying to reflect what Zhou En-lai said in a verbatim way, but what he said, in effect, was that we had fought against each other in Korea, the U.S. had intervened on the Taiwan question, and we disagreed on many world issues. He said that the U.S. had some allies, and China had some allies. We had totally different social systems and views of the world. We had gone through 22 years of mutual hostility and isolation. He said that your people, our people, and our mutual friends around the world are not going to understand this kind of communique, which suggests that we are like two, normal countries getting together for a regular, summit meeting. He said that this is absurd.

Furthermore, and I don't know that he put it this way, but the sub-current of his remarks would be that some of our respective allies are going to be nervous. If we are this friendly, this might mean that we are selling them out. In addition, he said that the description of the world situation in the draft communique wasn't sufficiently revolutionary from his standpoint. He indicated that it was in a bourgeois pattern, and so on. So he said that the whole draft lacked credibility, candor, and, furthermore, couldn't be defended by the Chinese ideologically, in their own party circles, with their own people, and with their friends. By implication he suggested that we might have some of the same problems that certainly the Chinese had. As far as China was concerned, there was turmoil under the heavens, and we shouldn't pretend that there weren't significant differences. He went on for some time, just ripping us apart.

Instead, he suggested, and this was at his initiative, that we have a different kind of communique, which was unprecedented in diplomatic practice, in which each side would state its own position. He said that in those areas where we do have some agreement or some parallel interest we can state those as well. However, he seemed to be saying that, having set out our differences, we would each have protected our domestic flanks, relationships with our friends and allies, and made more credible those areas of agreement when we stated them, because we had been honest enough in the rest of the communique to make the points. We had been separated, we had been hostile to each other, and we had these continuing differences. So when we get to agreements, people will believe us because they have seen our candor beforehand.

Frankly, this was a brilliant idea.

Q: Oh, yes!

LORD: It was unprecedented. I don't know of any other communique quite like the Shanghai Communique. The fact is, not only is it invoked routinely and so on, it still is a governing document in some ways. I don't believe that I can think of another such statement, lasting so long in significance. I'm not speaking of something like the Treaty of Versailles ending wars. However, in terms of a summit meeting, I can't recall any summit communique in history which has lasted this long, still having some significance and being invoked by both sides continually and being recognized by the public. This is because of the unprecedented nature of it.

So we had our work cut out for us because, by this time, we only had about two or three more days left in China. Indeed, we may have extended our trip by a day or two in order to negotiate the draft communique. This may have led to this terrible timing at the UN in connection with the Chinese representation issue.

Kissinger and I went back to the guesthouse. I don't recall whether we immediately saw the wisdom in this approach or not, but we had no choice in any event. Certainly, Kissinger soon saw it, as did I, but at first we were disappointed that we weren't going to have some nice document that would record the major achievements at this forthcoming summit meeting. We were a little bit worried about justifying this visit to our domestic, U.S. audience. But I think that we fairly quickly saw the wisdom of the approach which Zhou En-lai had advocated.

After we went back to the guesthouse, we spent a frantic night, although we spent some more frantic nights during the negotiations on Vietnam. We proceeded to take the draft communique which we had received from the Chinese. I can't remember whether they gave us a full draft of the communique. Certainly, they didn't set forth our positions. However, they set forth their position, on the world in general, ideology, revolution, and whether justice is more important than stability in dealing with the strivings of the poor around the world. Then the Chinese described their friendship with Vietnam, with Pakistan, their backing of the Arabs, and their backing of North Korea, etc, and their related positions on key issues. They mentioned all of these things where we more or less disagreed, certainly in philosophy and ideology. They probably included one or two sentences that the two sides hoped to improve bilateral relations, or something like that.

So we had a challenge of how to accept the Chinese approach. I think that we recognized, to a certain extent, that it was probably a good idea. However, at that point, given the time pressures and the fiery nature of the Chinese rhetoric in their draft, we were pretty concerned. We would never admit to panic, but we were under pressure. We worked in shifts in dealing with this task.

Kissinger went to bed first. I can't give you the exact time. I would say that it was at about 10:00 or 11:00 PM. I spent the next few hours doing a redraft of the Chinese draft communique. In doing this I tried to accomplish three things. Tone down the Chinese rhetoric. This was somewhat presumptuous - trying to tell them what they could say. We said to them that they could very well stand firmly for their positions, but it was not in their interest to excite our own, domestic audience. This would tend to undercut the President's initiative. There needed to be some restraint in the fire eating rhetoric contained in the Chinese draft communique. We needed to tone down their draft because what sounds like natural rhetoric to them sounds pretty polemical and hair-raising in American ears. So one of the parts of our redraft was to take the Chinese positions and try to tone them down, without overdoing it in terms of our chutzpah, because, after all, it's their view of the world, not ours.

Then I set out to state our positions. We decided to do this firmly and honestly, both to balance the Chinese position to a certain extent, to reassure our friends and allies where that was appropriate, to be firm as a matter of general principle, and also to deal with our domestic audience so that it would look as if we were firm as well. We would not, however, employ the kind of rhetoric that the Chinese communists did. So, setting forth our positions would consist of both of us surveying the international scene, ideology, and so on. We also put in principles of international relations on which we felt we could agree, even if we could not agree on the analysis of whether revolution was afoot or whether justice was to prevail over stability. We, the Chinese and the United States, put in several principles, such as non-interference, which they liked, and the view that both sides oppose hegemony, which was a code word for the Russian threat. We liked this, and they liked it as well. It was the single most important agreement in the communique. Neither Moscow nor the world missed it. There were some other principles added to this. Then there were contrasting statements on specific international issues, such as the ones I mentioned.

Then we had to have language on Taiwan. The Chinese had set forth their position, so we had to set forth our position, maybe finding some areas where we could agree on Taiwan.

Finally, toward the end, we needed to beef up bilateral areas where we already converged and where we could make progress. So we beefed up things like looking forward to an exchange of persons and more economic exchanges. And so we prepared this redraft of the communique. I'm not sure we put all this in during the first draft but we at least headed in these directions.

This is the kind of material I was working on. Then, about 3:00 AM, I woke Kissinger up and gave him my redraft of the communique. I went to bed until 6:00 or 7:00 AM. During this time he redrafted what I had prepared. Then we went back to the Chinese that morning. We gave them our counter-draft, and then both sides kept preparing counter-drafts. We made considerable progress in terms of most of what became known as the Shanghai Communique, except on Taiwan, where we still had significant differences on which we couldn't close the gap, although we would like to have done this.

By the time we left China, in terms of the communique, we had about 80 to 85 percent of the communique done, including pretty much what they were going to say on these issues up front, internationally and on specific issues, and what we were going to say. I think that we had agreement on most of these international principles. There were four or five of them, including the one on hegemony. Although we still wanted to beef up bilateral cooperation in future, positive directions, we had at least some of that in the draft. However, there was still a considerable gap on Taiwan. So that's where we were as we left.

Q: On the technical side, who was looking at the language on both sides? Were the Chinese looking at the English language and you looking at the Chinese text?

LORD: That's a very good point. Frankly, we relied on their interpreters in the conversations. As I mentioned, Nancy Tang had been on the plane from Pakistan. She had also done some interpreting for Mao. Ji Zhao-chu was actually Mao's interpreter in the interview with Edgar Snow and had been an interpreter as a young man. He had attended Harvard University. He was also a key interpreter in this context. Tang and Ji did the checking on the Chinese side, obviously translating it for the Chinese leadership, as well as sending it up to the Politburo and Mao, or whoever was reviewing it.

We just worked in the English language. John Holdridge spoke Chinese but not, I believe, well enough to be precise. I'm sure that when we got back to Washington, we checked out the texts with our expert translators and interpreters, in terms of precision in Chinese. You are right. We had to make sure that the Chinese language version matched our English language version.

It was our general experience that, unlike the case with the Russians, the Chinese were fair on translation matters. In their translations they wouldn't try to sneak in a Chinese word that was more to their advantage than what we meant in English. Sometimes, you have two or three choices. You can take this word or that word. The Russians could always be counted on to take anything that they could find in the dictionary that would serve their cause, even if it was a real stretch of what both sides genuinely meant. In this way they were picking up loose change all the time. This is one reason why Kissinger began to prefer dealing with the Chinese, rather than with the Russians. This was partly because the Chinese were always fair on translation issues.

For example, in the Shanghai Communiqué, after we issued it, and we more closely examined what they had done after we got back to Washington, we found a few instances where the translation of a given phrase could have gone either way. They actually gave us a word that was more favorable to us than it might have been.

The other reason that Kissinger preferred dealing with the Chinese was that they were more up front about their basic position. When you got a position from them, it was pretty close to their bottom line, even from the beginning, rather than inflated, as was the case with the Russians. As I said earlier, you never knew where the Russians' bottom line was. You always had to slice down to reach it, which means that you, yourself, have to pad your own position. We preferred the Chinese, principled approach.

So, on the issue of language, we were pretty much at their mercy, but this didn't turn out to be a problem. There was no problem in the conversations, because several people on the Chinese side understood English, and John Holdridge knew enough Chinese to double check anything that we needed. The Chinese really had no incentive to distort the translations. Zhou En-lai himself understood some English. He would often laugh at Kissinger's jokes before they were translated.

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: What was the reason for not taking your own translators and interpreters with you?

LORD: By then the trip was public knowledge. In the first place we didn't have too much talent, certainly in the U.S. Government. I guess that Chas Freeman was about as good as you could get at that point, but he certainly wasn't up to the Chinese standard. However, it was mostly a matter of Kissinger not wanting to have extraneous people around for sensitive discussions.

Q: So when you got back to Washington with the Shanghai Communiqué...

LORD: It was an advanced draft of the communiqué. (End of tape)

Q: You were saying that you had accomplished a great deal.

LORD: We had accomplished a great deal in terms of the communiqué. I think that we began to see more clearly why this was a good, though unconventional approach. I remember that we were also still concerned about the Taiwan issue. Obviously, it was so sensitive to both sides and very sensitive in terms of the President's domestic support for this opening to China. So we knew that we had a lot of work already done on that, but we also did a lot of homework over the next few weeks, trying to figure out how to bridge the gap.

Al Haig went back to China in January, 1972, primarily to pin down the logistics of the Nixon trip. He worked with the advance security and public relations people. I think he also tried to make further progress on some aspects of the communique, but I don't recall that he made much progress on it. However, he did a good job with the logistics.

Q: Then you returned to Washington in the fall of 1971.

LORD: That's right. We had the embarrassment of the UN defeat on the Chinese representation issue as we were flying home. We had gotten on the plane, quite excited on the progress we had made for the Nixon trip. Then we had this immediate downer and shock of the UN vote.

Q: The UN vote being...

LORD: The People's Republic of China was admitted to the UN and Taiwan was kicked out. Obviously, we knew in our heart of hearts that was probably coming soon. We fought hard to keep Taiwan in, together with China, without success. To have it come just as we were leaving China was really quite embarrassing to Kissinger and Nixon.

Q: Why were we making a stand on this, because we had been fighting on this issue for a long time? This had been a sort of major occupation of the Foreign Service for 20 years or more. We tried to get all of these countries to vote for Taiwan and against Communist China. We had expended tremendous, diplomatic capital on it, but as soon as we began to open up to China, we must have known that, in effect, we were trying to hold back the sea.

LORD: Of course, we knew. What we tried to do was to promote a two China approach, even though we did not recognize the PRC officially, in an effort to allow Taiwan to keep its seat in the UN. I can't remember whether we opposed Beijing getting into the UN at all or whether we were saying that if the PRC gets in, Taiwan should also remain a member.

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: This was called "dual representation."

LORD: Yes, dual representation. However, getting back to the incentives to the Chinese to move with us, one of them was to get into the UN. They knew that this would be part of the fallout of their breaking out of their isolation and establishing relations with other countries. So we honestly lost all of our leverage with the July Kissinger visit, and it was inevitable that the PRC would be admitted to the UN. The Chinese hung tough on the point that Taiwan had to leave the UN. So I think that we knew that the PRC would be admitted, but the real issue was whether some honor and credibility could be preserved for our domestic position for this initiative by keeping Taiwan in the UN as well. This would certainly mitigate the blow. The UN vote was not only on admitting the People's Republic of China but making clear that there couldn't be dual representation of China and that Taiwan had to get out of the UN.

There were some ironic overtones in that outcome for my family. My father-in-law, Sandys Bao, as I said earlier, represented the Taiwan Sugar Company in the United States. Sugar was Taiwan's major export in those days, though it has since diversified its exports. He was also Taiwan's representative on the International Sugar Council which would meet periodically in London. The council included representatives of all of the major sugar exporting and importing countries and was connected to the UN. So you could argue that I did my father-in-law out of a job. But he hung on in that job, and Taiwan remained a member of the International Sugar Council for what I think was a couple of years after the UN admission of Beijing as a member. This was because of his own capabilities and skills and the fact that he was held in such respect by his fellow delegates. They went out of their way to try to preserve his position. Basically, I cost him one of his jobs.

The other ironic thing was that when my wife and I were married in 1963, our wedding reception was at Twin Oaks, in Washington, DC, which was the residence of the Chinese Nationalist Ambassador at the time and until 1979. The Chinese Nationalist Ambassador gave us a wedding reception. Then, eight years later, I snuck into China with Kissinger and greatly shocked Taiwan.

Let me say that my father-in-law fully understood what we had done. In fact, he told me that the opening to China was in the national interest of the United States.

Q: When you came back to Washington after the first Kissinger trip in 1971, were you pretty well concentrated on the preparations for the Nixon visit during the period from October, 1971, to February, 1972?

LORD: A lot of other things were moving, too. Of course, we were concentrating on preparations for President Nixon's trip to China. However, you have to remember that the pace of contacts with Russia also picked up. I spent nowhere near as much time on Russia as I did on either Vietnam or China. However, I was certainly involved in contacts with Russia. That meant negotiations on the status of Berlin, SALT-1 [Strategic Arms Limitation Talks - 1], and beginning to move toward the holding of a summit meeting in Moscow, as well. Again, these preparations did not take much of my time. I was fully deployed on China and Vietnam.

The situation in Vietnam was also moving. I don't have the dates in front of me, but we were still making secret trips to Paris during this period as well. And in a major speech in January 1972, the President revealed our secret negotiations and our forthcoming negotiating position. So it was an extremely busy time. Indeed, the following year and a half was one of the most dramatic times in U.S. diplomatic history and certainly in my personal life, because we had the Beijing Summit Meeting, the Moscow Summit Meeting, the ending of the Vietnam War, and assorted other events in the course of that period.

However, to return to the China front, first we had to get ready for Al Haig's trip to China in January, 1972, making sure that he was prepared, and working with the White House domestic staff on the logistics, as well as trying to make further efforts on the draft communique for the Nixon trip. I think that Haig also raised Vietnam a great deal, to try to get the Chinese to continue to pressure Hanoi, and so on. So we were preoccupied with that. I recall being in Florida when we were launching Haig right at the time of the Super Bowl. I am a fanatic Redskins fan, and they were in the game. Kissinger gave me about a six-hour drafting assignment about three hours before the kickoff. I did the job in 2 hours, 55 minutes.

Then, of course, when Haig returned to Washington, we only had a few weeks before President Nixon's trip to China. I was put in charge of the preparations for the President's trip, which meant that I had to orchestrate the whole thing. I had lots of help, of course, particularly from John Holdridge, who was crucial and much more of a China-expert than I.

This was the most meticulous process of preparation, as Kissinger has said in his memoirs, which has probably ever been undertaken for a summit meeting, both because it was so important and because of its historical significance. So, as I've already mentioned, we put together six black briefing books about so high.

Q: Looks like about eight inches thick.

LORD: Yes, six or eight inches thick. These briefing books were filled with everything from Chinese history to Chinese culture and poetry; personal portraits of Mao Zedong, Zhou En-lai, and the other, principal Chinese leaders; all of the transcripts of conversations during our trips in July and October, 1971, and Haig's trip in January, 1972, arranged by subject matter as well as the full transcripts on their own; the Chinese positions and objectives on every issue; our positions and objectives on every issue; our offense and defense; further elaborations of the draft Shanghai Communique, particularly with reference to the Taiwan issue; Chinese popular sayings. We had chronicles and excerpts from articles by outsiders.

We just had an incredible and rich array of material. To this day, and I have worked for several Presidents, I have never seen any President work as hard for a single event or trip as Nixon worked for this trip. As I mentioned earlier, quite literally, there was proof of his having read every page of these briefing books, because there would be his marks and annotations on almost everyone. Often there would be questions and requests for further information. When we finally went to China with Nixon, he kept asking on the airplane, as we flew toward China, for more information. This resulted in a good performance by President Nixon with Zhou En-lai, Mao, and the other Chinese leaders.

Q: You were talking about the preparations for this Summit Meeting in China. I don't know how it was then, but now one has the feeling that when a Summit Meeting comes up, the major preparation on the White House side is for photo opportunities. The public relations people almost take over. They are concerned about the time of day the television coverage will be available, headlines, backgrounds, and all of that. Were they melded into your preparations?

LORD: Certainly. There was the major focus on substance - this was after all a truly historic event and exhaustive talks were held during the trip. But the public impact in the US, China, and the world was key and integral to the substance, so the public dimension was clearly a key part of the trip, which was heavily televised. It had a tremendous impact back here in the United States. In fact, this coverage led to the almost instant romance and euphoria that was overstated. After all, horrible things were still going on in China. We swung from one extreme to another, from picturing China as an implacable enemy to a new friend, so to speak. This reflected somewhat a sort of built-in respect and affection for the Chinese people, and also an appreciation for its geopolitical and historical significance.

Q: This goes back to the beginning of the United States as a republic. I have a history of the United States Consular Service. We couldn't get consuls in places like Germany and such countries. However, back in 1790 or so Congress immediately approved the appointment of a Consul to go to Canton. China and the China trade have always...

LORD: That's right. There has always been a genuine liking for the Chinese people, a sense of this huge market, as well as the Christian missionary connection. This feeling has been reciprocated on the Chinese people's side, as we found during our first public trip in October, 1971. The Chinese were amazed and stunned at the sight of these Americans walking around. However, they were certainly friendly and not hostile. It was clear, as we went along, that the Chinese people, despite all of the years of propaganda and enmity, genuinely liked Americans. Partly by comparison with all of their other neighbors.

In the case of Japan, even the young Chinese who hadn't experienced World War II had heard stories about the Rape of Nanking, and so on. There was a clear dislike and distrust of Japan. Also a real concern about and dislike of the Russians, as we learned more and more since then. The Chinese have expressed to us their distrust of the Vietnamese. This was also true of their attitude toward the Indians and, to a certain extent, the Koreans. So, as the Chinese looked around their periphery, these feelings were evident. And they didn't like the Europeans, and particularly the British, because of the history of the Opium War [1839-1842], in addition to other depredations by Germany and so on. So, even though the U.S. may not have had a perfect record in our relations with China, we certainly looked more benign and friendly than others.

So, on both Chinese and U.S. sides, there was a generally positive feeling. Of course, Chinese public opinion was under tight control and supervision there. I think that it's fair to say that the Chinese public welcomed this opening of relations. There was undoubtedly debate about the opening to the U.S., maybe among the Gang of Four, and perhaps Madame Mao and Lin Biao didn't like all of this. There may have been some debate at the highest levels of the Chinese leadership.

In the U.S., in turn, there was a tremendous outpouring of affection for China. Part of our problem is that we haven't had a steady gaze toward China. American emotions have run the gamut from the evil Fu Manchu to the noble peasant depicted by Pearl Buck. If we just take American attitudes from the last 50 or 60 years, our perceptions have ranged from regarding the Chinese as staunch allies in World War II to enemies, starting in 1949, when Mao Zedong took over the country, or the Korean War, when we wound up fighting each other. We were appropriately horrified at the Great Leap Forward, the ensuing famine, and the Cultural Revolution. Then, suddenly, now there was this opening to China, the tremendous romance and euphoria, and the feeling that we are going to be friends again. Subsequently, Deng Xiaoping came along with capitalism and the view that the Chinese were going to become market economists just like us.

Then, in the 1970s, we began to hear stories about the Cultural Revolution as we had more journalists more or less permanently stationed in China and began to see the warts as we began to have a more normal relationship with that country. In the later 1980s, the relationship was at its most positive though the bad dimensions of the Chinese system were clear. Then there was the Tiananmen Square massacre [in 1989] and the image of the man in front of the Chinese tank, and we went back to a negative perception of China again. Also, the Soviet threat, key to our ties, disappeared. Now we are slowly moving back again, with somewhat more mixed feelings. At one point the Chinese were referred to as yellow hordes, Red Guards, and blue ants. Now they are capitalist men and women. So there have been these great swings in American perceptions of China.

Certainly, at the time of the beginning of the opening to China, including the Kissinger and Nixon trips, the reportage out of China was pretty positive and euphoric. People were sort of swept up in this. There were few people who were negative. Certainly, Bill Buckley [conservative columnist and publisher] was one of those who went to China and returned with clear reservations. Marilyn Berger of the "Washington Post" was skeptical. They began looking beneath the surface in China. But almost everyone else was swept up in this euphoria.

That was a very windy response to your question about the preparations for the Nixon visit. Of course, a lot of preparations were made, including arrangements for the press and photo opportunities. However, those preparations were essentially made on the other side of the White House. We were concerned with the substance of the Nixon visit.

At times Nixon, Kissinger, Haldeman, Chapin, and Ron Ziegler might have debates. Kissinger would always be worried about being crude with the Chinese. After all, we were visiting their country, and should we be rearranging their furniture? (This was literally done once in Canada in Prime Minister Trudeau's office.) We needed to have some sensitivity toward China's own culture, as China was the host for the Nixon visit. Of course, the President's advisers on the public relations and political side were much more concerned about the images and popularity at home of the President. So there was always that kind of tension. However, it worked out very well.

We, of course, were focused on the communique and the substantive issues and how we would handle relations with other countries which were watching this trip as it developed.

Q: Did you have a feeling that Nixon was trapping himself, not so much in a contest, but in a display of his intellectual virtuosity in dealing with Zhou En-lai? He had heard about how great this man was and he may have wanted to show, by God, that dealing with him was part of Nixon's makeup. Do you think that was a factor?

LORD: I think that that was an element. I mean, any of us, as human beings, when we go up against a heavyweight, want to do our best. So I'm sure that there was that element. However, in all fairness, I think that during those early years of his administration, particularly before the Watergate Affair began to preoccupy Nixon, he prepared very carefully for the major meetings that I also attended, including the Russian summit meeting. In effect, Nixon would commit to memory his basic positions. He liked to talk without notes, whenever possible, to impress people. So this tendency was really carried to a super level on this historic trip. Nixon was very careful in getting ready for these meetings. He really did his homework. Foreign policy issues were his primary passion, even though he became concerned more with the domestic front. People now realize this more clearly than they gave him credit for at the time. He was actually quite progressive on many domestic issues.

So there was that element of ego in Nixon's makeup. He knew, from Kissinger's recounting of his conversations with Zhou En-lai, that this was a formidable interlocutor and that he had to be up to that. However, this was also an historic trip, and it was very important to Nixon in terms of substance, in gaining Chinese confidence, in projecting firmness, inducing them to cooperate, and pointing out the advantages of cooperation.

In addition to substance, Nixon also wanted to have a good sense of Chinese culture and history, what he could say in his toasts, how he could work in little Chinese sayings and poetry in his toasts and in some of his remarks at the various meetings. And Nixon was genuinely interested in China, as most Americans are. He wanted to learn more about China himself.

So Nixon had all of these incentives, in addition to the historical and geopolitical significance of it. Furthermore, he knew that, although the meetings would be off the record, he nevertheless would be watched with tremendous attention on the world stage, including American television.

However, all of this preparation didn't do the President much good when he got to the Great Wall. I can't say that I blame him. There he was at the Great Wall, and the press came up to him and said: "What's your reaction to this?" He answered: "It surely is a Great Wall," and that's about all he could come up with after all of his preparation for this visit. That was the only - and very minor - incident where Nixon did not perform splendidly.

Q: On the domestic side, what were you getting from your wife and your wife's family? We were going through a sort of euphoric time in terms of relations between the United States and China. Were you getting advice from the pillow, "Don't trust these people?" What were you getting?

LORD: No, not at all. First, as far as my wife was concerned, it was very exciting that the Nixon visit to China had taken place. She recognized that it was in the U.S. national interest. She felt some pride and excitement that I was personally and directly involved in this. She had a sense of irony that a person like me, who was directly involved, had a Chinese wife. She had, of course, a real feeling of love and respect for the Chinese people and a willingness and desire to overcome a feeling of isolation from the Chinese people, including her relatives in China. So all of these feelings were basically very positive.

The same thing was true of my parents-in-law, even though the Nixon visit had a direct impact on my father-in-law. He was working indirectly for the Taiwan Government. It's hard to exaggerate how responsible he was in his comments to me. There never was any sense of "Why did you do this" or, "How dare you?" In effect, it was just the opposite. He said to me, although he wouldn't want to be quoted in Taipei at the time, "I fully recognize that this trip is in the American national interest." So the opening had no impact in our family except excitement. Even my in-laws were excited that I was involved in this event. There was absolutely no problem in that connection. Of course my wife was very helpful to me - and Kissinger at times - in interpreting Chinese culture, history, and style. And she was aghast about the political system. She also was the only person I remember predicting Deng Xiao-ping's come-back in 1974-75.

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: What about the China Lobby?

LORD: You have to remember that the NSC staff, and particularly myself, in my position as a Special Assistant to Kissinger and being responsible for this particular portfolio, had very little contact with the outside world.

I rarely got out of the damned office. Sometimes I attended dinner parties, for example, in the Georgetown area of Washington, including with Kissinger and, I would see, some of the movers and shakers in social settings. But I would always be late. I had no contact with the Congress, no contact with the press, no contact with foreign diplomats unless I was sitting in on a meeting, for example, with Soviet Ambassador Dobrynin or going up to New York with Kissinger for a UN contact. So I wasn't personally exposed to this. I don't recall any tremendous pressures from the right wing, or China lobby. I'm sure that there was some concern expressed to Nixon and Kissinger. Certainly, the overwhelming reaction from the media was positive, as was the overwhelming reaction from everywhere. American public opinion and Congress were an easier sell politically than, we thought would be the case.

I'm sure that Nixon, in particular, was somewhat nervous about public reactions as we went along including his conservative base. This initiative did take some courage. I'm sure that Nixon was pleasantly surprised at how limited the negative reaction was. At least, that's my clear recollection.

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: In your position on the NSC staff you were talking about being protected or isolated from the outside world. Do you think that that was a good or a bad thing?

LORD: Given the office hours I kept, this lack of outside contact probably was inevitable in any event. It also fit in with Kissinger's style. However, it also was a reflection of the fact that I was a Special Assistant to Kissinger. The quick answer is that this situation was probably bad. It would have been better to be exposed to the outside world, including Members of Congress, foreign diplomats, the general public, and even the press, to ensure that I wasn't so insulated. Having said that, I must say that I had so much to do that I wouldn't have had much time for such contacts.

Secondly, I had more sensitive information than anyone else in the NSC staff, except for Al Haig and Kissinger, since I was involved in all of these initiatives. I'm not saying that other NSC staff members didn't have as much information on particular issues, but nobody else had this kind of information on all of the issues. So there was that factor.

However, to deal with outsiders, we had NSC staff people for specific countries or regions. They would have their own clients. So the European expert on the NSC staff would meet with a European diplomat or businessman, etc. I wasn't involved in that because I was a Special Assistant to Henry Kissinger. So for all of these reasons I was insulated from such contacts. I think that it would have been better if I had been more exposed to such contacts.

Q: Shall we move on to how the visit went and all of that?

LORD: As I look back on my career, I think that the secret trip was in first place in terms of drama. The Kissinger trip to China in July, 1971, was secret and it was the first such trip, I had a Chinese wife, and so forth.

The Nixon trip has to be up there, probably tied for second place, if not in second place. Certainly, the trip which brought peace to Vietnam is also up there, and would be in second or third place. Then, next would be the Moscow summit meeting, in fourth place.

The Nixon trip to China was obviously a tremendous event. I run out of adjectives in describing its drama. There was a big buildup to it, and we started it going. It was massively busy getting ready for it, of course, for all of the reasons that I've mentioned.

We got on the President's plane. I can't remember how we moved from my office to the airport. At one point we were on the South Lawn of the White House. President Nixon took off on a helicopter. I remember being with my kids and my wife. I thought that it was on that trip that we were waving goodbye to the helicopter. But how I got to the plane in time is a mystery. Something is screwed up in my recollection of it.

I remember getting on the plane at Andrews Air Force Base. There was a TV on the plane, which we were watching from right outside the President's cabin, in the senior staff quarters. On the TV people were saying goodbye to the President and us taking off from Andrews Air Force Base. As we took off, we still were watching it on television. I was saying: "If this plane explodes, we can see ourselves explode on television!" This was a case of sick humor.

In any event, we made two stops: one in Hawaii and one in Guam. On the trip to China with Kissinger in October, 1971, we had stopped off in Hawaii (the Big Island) as well. We stayed at the most beautiful hotel there on Mauna Kea. That's the good news. The bad news is that, by being closer to Kissinger on this trip I got to stay instead in a guest house up in the mountains. I would much rather have been in the hotel, as we were working very hard on the visit.

As I said, on the way to China we were very busy, revising talking points and getting more information for Nixon. That is all I can remember.

Q: A technical point. You say that he was going through these huge, briefing books on the plane. You say that Nixon wanted more information.

LORD: The work continued on the plane. I want to make that point clear.

Q: I was thinking of your statement that, during the flight, Nixon wanted more information about this or that, in a plane over the Pacific Ocean. How did you get more information from Washington?

LORD: We would prepare more elaborate talking points, as opposed to our having to do the research on them ourselves. The people in Washington could give us more positions, I think. If it was more information wanted, there were people on the plane, in addition to myself, who probably knew it right away. But if it was information on the Paris negotiations on Vietnam, we had the briefing book. If it was a matter of Chinese history, culture, or something like that, hopefully someone on the plane knew the answer. I can't recall how well our communications worked with Washington, whether we wired back for more information or not. We certainly did this during our later trips with the President and others.

I don't want to exaggerate this. I'm not saying, for example, that we turned out 500 pages of text on the plane. However, continually and throughout the trip, even on the last leg of it, there were requests coming back from the President for more information. I don't recall - as I did in all of my trips with Secretaries of State and other Presidents - that I ever sat around with Nixon and others, kicking around strategy and tactics. I don't recall precisely. There were probably a couple of conversations that I had with the President in the cabin. It was mostly working on papers.

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: Was this when you sat around with Nixon and talked freely about China?

LORD: We did that on a few occasions, but not very often. This was partly Nixon's style, perhaps due to his shyness. He probably didn't want a lot of people around him. Certainly, it was part of Kissinger's style. He didn't want to have a lot of the members of his staff with direct access to Nixon.

Once or twice I went up to Camp David [in the Catoclin Mountains of Maryland], when I sat around with Kissinger and Nixon. There were other times when he handled matters differently. Unlike subsequent Presidents and Secretaries of State with whom I have worked, I don't have any recollection of a lot of strategy sessions or directly briefing Nixon, and so on. I want to make clear that Nixon was always friendly and cordial to me. I'm sure that I've already mentioned this, but basically we were isolated from the domestic side of the White House. However, during the October, 1971, trip, and the Presidential trip, we tended to converge a lot more. So too on the Moscow trip.

However, we always sort of felt that we were being treated as second class citizens by the White House staff. As I said previously, we were never admitted to the White House mess and didn't have parking privileges. I don't think that Kissinger made any heroic efforts to get us into the White House mess or have us mingle with the domestic side of the White House. Looking back on it, given Watergate and everything else, it's just as well that we were pretty well isolated. But I would have liked White House mess access on all those late nights in the West Wing basement.

So, anyway, there was a great sense of drama when we went to China with Nixon. I remember that when we landed at Beijing Airport, maybe naively I was somewhat disappointed at what I considered the strained nature of the Chinese reception. We had expected thousands of people in cheering crowds, after 22 years of hostilities. There was a very small crowd, including a Chinese Army honor guard. Looking out the window at the welcoming ceremony, I thought that it was a fairly grey day, too. This didn't look like a monumental event, as it ought to have been.

Of course, everyone was wondering how the first encounter would go between the President and Zhou En-lai, who was at the airport to meet him. They all remembered that Secretary of State John Foster Dulles had snubbed Zhou En-lai in Geneva in the 1950s when he refused to shake his hand. That initial handshake this time was clearly going to be important. Nixon left the plane, walked down the steps, and went over and shook Zhou En-lai's hand. This was a famous photograph. I have a copy in my house of just the hands shaking. This picture is dedicated to the New China Hands. Then there was a restrained reception at the airport, with the band playing, the national anthems, review of the honor guard, and so on. There were not many people there. The reception was very cool. Then there was the motorcade to Tiananmen Square and on to the guest house. There were no crowds in the streets, except the usual ones. No one had been lined up specially. Again, I was somewhat disappointed. The press noted that the reception was rather restrained.

Q: I think that this point came out in my interviews with others. John Holdridge, for example, mentioned the coolness of the reception. Chas Freeman mentioned the same thing. It was almost humdrum as far as they were concerned.

LORD: It was, considering the buildup and the drama of the moment. It was sort of anticlimactic. There was the inherent drama, but there wasn't the color and excitement that one expected. I can't say that I was depressed by this, just that we felt that there was not quite the elation we expected to feel at the time.

We got to the guesthouse. I think that Zhou En-lai briefly said goodbye to the President to allow him to freshen up and relax. About one hour later Zhou En-lai came back to the guesthouse and asked to see Kissinger. He said that Chairman Mao wanted to see President Nixon right away. Before the trip we had never pinned down when the President would see Mao Zedong. Obviously, we assumed that he would, of course. This would be a meeting with the highest Chinese leader. The Chinese indicated that Mao would meet with the President, but they never said precisely when this would be. This was a typical example of the Chinese style, where the Emperor used to keep visitors on edge, and the schedule was never fixed until the last minute. This was true of other trips that we had. This was partly intended to keep us off balance, and partly to make us feel grateful when the actual meeting took place and that it did take place.

The immediate reaction was, not being mad, that they just sort of said, "Come on over and see the Emperor." Obviously, there was instead excitement. Also, there was an immediate recognition that, whatever the restraint of the initial reception, the fact that Mao was going to see President Nixon within the first couple of hours of his arrival was very significant. It was going to send a clear signal to the world and to the Chinese people that Mao personally was behind this visit and the historic importance of the event. So this was obviously very good news, even if it was a somewhat unorthodox way to proceed with the leader of the Free World.

Nixon asked Kissinger to go with him. That was his intention, to have just the two of them at the meeting. Nixon didn't want Secretary of State Rogers along. We also thought that there might be more than one meeting with Mao, since this was so early, and Rogers could go to a later meeting. Indeed at one point Zhou had suggested that there might be two meetings with Mao. Kissinger, to my everlasting gratitude, asked me to go as well to this historic meeting. Basically, on the one hand, it was a reward for all of the hard work that I had done, generally for Kissinger and specifically on the China initiative and that, together with Holdridge, I had been in overall charge of the major preparations for the Nixon visit and the drafting of the Shanghai Communiqué. However, it was also in Kissinger's self interest to have a note taker there, so that Kissinger could concentrate on the conversation.

So I got to take notes at the Nixon meeting with Mao. Also, Kissinger knew that I was one of the world's great note takers. I always got meetings down verbatim, even the jibes. There was that element to it.

And so, with great excitement, we went off to see Chairman Mao in the leaders' compound. We walked past a hallway with a ping pong table and into Mao's modest study, which was lined with books. Mao already was somewhat frail, physically, but nowhere near as much as he was during later meetings he had with Kissinger and with President Ford. I tied for first place among Americans with Kissinger in meeting with Mao five times. That is, once with Nixon, once with Ford, and three times with Kissinger alone.

Mao had a couple of nurses around him and clearly needed some help. He was an old man but not a dying man by any means. He was just somewhat frail, physically, but not shockingly so. Indeed, he struck us with his presence. It is hard to sort out how much you expect when you see a great man, given his reputation. I say great, not in a positive sense but, in the sense of impact. Mao was obviously a very bad man in most respects. As for the physical force of the man, how much was I making this up and how much Mao really made this impression? Both Kissinger and I felt that if we walked into a cocktail party and had no idea who this guy Mao was, his very presence would still have had an impact on us.

So it was Nixon, Kissinger, and myself on our side, and Mao, Zhou En-lai, Nancy Tang as interpreter, Wang Hai-rung, and perhaps one or two others on the Chinese side. I'd have to look at the picture to be sure.

The meeting lasted for about an hour. I remember distinctly, coming out of the meeting somewhat disappointed. I was impressed with the physical impact of Mao. It was also clear that this man was tough, ruthless, and came from a peasant background, in contrast to the elegant, Mandarin quality of Zhou En-lai. However, I thought that the conversation was somewhat episodic and not very full. Kissinger had sort of the same reaction as I did. Mao was speaking, as he usually did, in brush strokes, whereas we were used to the elegant and somewhat lengthy presentations of Zhou En-lai. Mao would just throw in a few sentences, a few brush strokes. He went from topic to topic in rather a casual way.

As we left, however, we were obviously happy. We had had this immediate, friendly meeting with Mao. I can't remember which meeting discussed which topic. However, I am sure that we both talked about the danger of the polar bear, the Soviet Union. Mao certainly said, in one of these meetings, and I believe this was the one, that we could wait to settle the Taiwan problem for 100 years. In one of the meetings, and it may have been this one, when told that he had made a major change in China, he said: "No, I've only changed a few things near Beijing." So we had these sometimes rather epigrammatic comments. It seemed at times that he sometimes did not quite know what he was talking about. He was rather casual about what we would be getting at, in what order, and what was his agenda. So his comments seemed somewhat disjointed, not particularly elegant, and a little disappointing.

However, we changed our mind on Mao's deftness as we thought about it, and I don't think that this is a rationalization, and as the trip went on we realized just how important this meeting was. It was important because, immediately on arrival, and for the reasons I mentioned, he had indicated to the world and to his own public, his backing for this strategic move. It was also important because Mao was setting out the main lines, however thinly and in brush strokes, for Zhou En-lai to elaborate on in the coming days in the various conversations. So maybe there were only two or three sentences on the polar bear, but there was the whole line of anti hegemony and the fact that we had to get together against the Soviets, not as allies, but as a matter of common concern. It was there, authorized, and for Zhou En-lai to fill out. On Taiwan, as I said, Mao said that China could wait. It was there in the communique, in which they could take a tough position, but we could take our own position. We didn't have to resolve this question now. We could move on and kick it down the road.

I'm not saying that these remarks made everything easy. They just authorized the lines of instruction which Mao was setting forth in a strategic way. He had covered these two, key issues, Taiwan and Russia, and he raised some other issues which I cannot now recall. The transcripts of all these meetings, most of which I produced, are publicly available now.

Q: Vietnam?

LORD: I don't recall whether Mao mentioned Vietnam. The Vietnam issue probably came up, but I just don't recall. We only spent an hour in this meeting, and there were translations to be made, so there wasn't that much time available. There was some personal banter and also the fact that both Nixon and Mao recognized the other's vision and courage in taking this important step.

However, as we thought about it, and certainly by the end of the trip, we realized in fact that Mao had put in a very skillful performance. In his understated and unorthodox way he had set forth the main lines of Chinese policy, he had made clear the features that he considered very important, and that other things could fall into place. Mao was self-deprecating, even though he had a tremendous ego. He had some humor. He had gotten through his agenda purposefully, even though it seemed casual and episodic. He had managed to cover the main points. I still don't think that it was one of the great conversations of all time. However, I think that Mao was much more purposeful and skillful than we gave him credit for at first. We realized that within a few days.

Q: I was just thinking about what you said about not having pinned down in advance when President Nixon was going to see Mao. They could have put a really unpleasant twist on it if Nixon had only been allowed to see Mao at the very end of the trip.

LORD: Well, it would have been much worse if we hadn't seen Mao at all.

Q: But if you had only seen him at the end of the trip, it would have indicated that Mao was saying: "All right, I'll see Nixon, but..."

LORD: Not necessarily, and I'll tell you why. During most trips, and our subsequent and more recent trips to China, usually we worked our way up the scale. We started by seeing the Foreign Minister or even the Vice Foreign Minister. Then we saw the Premier. And we ended up seeing the President or the Chairman of the Chinese Communist Party. So it would have been somewhat natural, to see Mao late; certainly the meeting would have to take place in Beijing. However, on the last day in Beijing, we could have had a sort of climax meeting with Chairman Mao, blessing what had happened. It would not have been a put down. On balance, having the meeting right at the outset was the best outcome. By putting the Chairman's immediate stamp of approval on the trip for the world to see, as well as sketching the key Chinese position for Zhou to flesh out. But having the meeting with Mao as a finale would have been fine.

Q: I see.

LORD: However, it was rather unorthodox and even more significant to have the meeting with Chairman Mao first.

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: Did you really get on the plane at Andrews Air Force Base, not knowing whether President Nixon would meet Chairman Mao?

LORD: Well, we knew in our gut that Mao would meet Nixon. Conceivably, he could do the unthinkable and not meet Nixon, but he didn't. However, when we left Andrews Air Force Base, we did not have an agreed time for the meeting with Mao, and they never explicitly promised a meeting. I don't remember what the Chinese formulation was on this point. They certainly gave favorable indications but I don't know whether they actually said: "We can give you 100 percent assurance that President Nixon will see Mao." I'll bet that they didn't. I know that we made unilateral statements that Nixon would, of course, be seeing Mao. We said that we would like to know when this would be, but we knew that this was going to happen. It would have been unthinkable if it didn't.

So we were sure that Nixon would see Chairman Mao. There was just that one percent uncertainty, perhaps to keep us off balance, in not confirming the schedule for the President, which was mildly annoying. However, it was typical of the Chinese Emperor indicating that he was the head of the Middle Kingdom and that we were showing obeisance. So we honestly did not know the timing of the meeting with Mao and were surprised that it took place that quickly. We expected the more traditional meetings with Zhou En-lai and then a meeting with Chairman Mao toward the end of the visit.

Q: On several occasions you made reference to the practices of the Chinese Emperors. I've heard this kind of comment from other China experts or people who have dealt with China. You mentioned that China regards itself as the Middle Kingdom. Was it very much in everybody's mind that the People's Republic of China may be a communist regime, but we're still dealing with something like a Chinese court?

LORD: Well, hopefully not in a subservient or obsequious way, but out of respect, yes. We were dealing with tough, ruthless, Communist Chinese leaders. However, we were also dealing with people who were heading the world's most populous nation which, we were sure, even then, would be a major world power in the next century. And a nation which had the world's richest civilization and culture. And a nation which had been Number One more than any other country in history.

One of the complications in dealing with China is that the Chinese have had so little experience dealing with the outside world as equals. For 4000 to 5000 years they were Number One in the world, at least in their view. Everyone else was either invisible, irrelevant, distant barbarians, or tributaries. Then China had a bad century or two. They were dominated by outside powers from roughly the mid 1800s on. They probably began to lose their technological dominance to the West and Europe by the 1600s or 1700s. Then China was actually humiliated by the British and other Europeans, the Japanese invasion [1937-1945], fighting against us in Korea [1950-1953], and other experiences in the 19th and 20th centuries. So after 4000 to 5000 years as Number One and 100-150 years of being humiliated, this is where we found them when we went there. We are still dealing with the consequences of that, although for the last 15 or 20 years, since the reforms started, the Chinese have sort of stood up as equals. They are getting used to dealing with other countries as equals. This combination of arrogance or self-confidence, derived from being the Middle Kingdom and Number One for so long, plus the more recent humiliations and slights by foreigners and xenophobia, and very little experience in dealing with other countries as equals has made it particularly complicated to deal with China.

So, when we went to China, Nixon and Kissinger in their toasts and their statements were careful to say, and with genuine sincerity, that China was a great civilization and a great country. They said that as China had been in business for 5,000 years, we've only been in business for 200 years. We paid careful attention to Chinese face and were polite. Also, we believe that this is true. Frankly, as a world superpower, much stronger than China, we can afford to be magnanimous. We could be generous and sincere, as I said, because militarily, economically, and in every other way we were totally dominant of China. So for all of these reasons we were aware of this historical, cultural background and we paid due deference to it.

The Chinese are also geniuses at protocol, in making you feel at home, and are very careful with you. Their whole idea is to inculcate in outsiders coming to the Middle Kingdom a sense of obligation for their hospitality and friendship. In effect, they seek to create ties of alleged friendship. They want us to feel that friends do favors for other friends. For example, if the Chinese were taking Nixon or Kissinger to the Great Wall, the Forbidden City, the Temple of Heaven, or the Summer Palace, and they have two hours to cover the Summer Palace, what they would do is to break up two hours in their planning into 20-minute segments. They never want to give a visitor the feeling that he or she is rushed. In going to the Summer Palace, to take that example, if you stop for longer than they expected to look at the Empress's Jade Boat, or something like that, instead of pushing you and saying that we're not going to get through everything, they just agree among themselves, without telling the guests, "All right, we'll cut out the next 20 minute segment and go to the next one." So you end up getting through on time in terms of what the schedule says but you never feel rushed.

The Chinese food was terrific, at least in the early visits. However, it got worse as we visited China in subsequent years. The food during the Nixon visit, particularly the banquet in Hangzhou, was very good, indeed. So the Chinese have tried to create this sense of subtle superiority, Middle Kingdom great host protocol, and so on. All of this is designed to make you somewhat more amenable on substantive matters and deferential in spirit.

Q: I must say that the one scene that sticks in my mind is of Nixon making a toast. And the band played "America the Beautiful." I never heard this song played so much, which I have always thought should be our national anthem, anyway. It was magnificently done.

LORD: Before getting into the substance, I would like to mention some of the public events. I don't have these in order, but among the things Nixon did was to attend these banquets, where the Chinese PLA [People's Liberation Army] band played "America the Beautiful," "Turkey in the Straw," and other melodies, all of this on television. I can still recall the vision of the two leaders toasting each other in a huge dining room in the Great Hall of the People. There were about 10,000 at this banquet, or something along those lines. That was one public event. Another event involved going to a dreadful, Cultural Revolution type ballet with Madame Mao. Another one that we went to was a major, gymnastics exhibition in a gymnasium. Nixon also went to see the Great Wall and the Forbidden City. Kissinger and I were busy working on the communique at that point, so we missed that. Of course, we had already been there. That was the point where poor Nixon went to the Great Wall and said: "It surely is a Great Wall." Those were the major, public appearances during the Nixon visit to Beijing. He went on the lake in Hangzhou, and, I believe, visited an industrial exhibition in Shanghai.

To get back to the Nixon meeting with Mao, if I can. One amusing, personal highlight, which you've probably heard, was that, as we concluded the meeting, the Chinese came in with the communique announcing the meeting and photographs of it. The photographs had all of us in them. The communique said that Mr. Nixon, Mr. Kissinger, and Mr. Lord were present. Nixon and Kissinger looked at each other and said to the Chinese: "Please cut out Mr. Lord from all of the photographs and out of the communique and keep secret that he was at this meeting."

The reason that they did this is that even they were embarrassed that Secretary of State Rogers had not been at the meeting. They figured that it was humiliating enough that the National Security Adviser was with the President at this historic meeting, but the Secretary of State was not. To add on top of that the fact that the Special Assistant to the National Security Adviser was there as a third person but the Secretary of State was not was too much, even for them. The Chinese clearly must have been puzzled by this, but they readily went along with this request.

So the official communique just said that Nixon and Kissinger were present on our side. The pictures cropped me out of it. I was on the right side of the picture as you looked at it. I, of course, was disappointed, because I wanted worldwide fame, but I was sworn to secrecy. Very few people knew about this. I don't even believe, in fact I'm quite sure, that the State Department didn't know that I had been present at the meeting, either. I just can't remember now that anybody knew.

I will now confess that when I got back to Washington, I told my wife. I wasn't about to keep this secret from her. However, for a couple of years this secret was kept from the entire world. Then, just to show you the Chinese style, when I went back to Beijing with Kissinger when he visited on his own, in 1973, when he met Mao on his own, we were sitting with Zhou En-lai. Wang Hai Rung, the same grandniece of Mao's, who was close to Mao but also sat in on our meetings, as part of Zhou En-lai's staff, came in with a piece of paper for Zhou En-lai. Zhou En-lai read it out and then said to Kissinger: "Chairman Mao wants to see Dr. Kissinger and Winston Lord." Now, Chairman Mao wouldn't have known me from Mel Gibson or Woody Allen. I was sitting there with several other US officials, all higher ranking. In protocol terms I would have been the last person going with Kissinger to see Mao, because you can only take one person. The Chinese knew, first, that I was the closest person to Kissinger and, perhaps, the most important in terms of the China initiative. Secondly, I had attended a Kissinger meeting with Mao, but this occasion was secret, and nobody knew about it. Thirdly, the Chinese knew that Kissinger would want to take me for general reasons and because of my note taking and advice. So they thought up the gimmick of Mao wanting me to be there, along with Kissinger. This gave Kissinger the pretext, despite protocol, of taking me with him. I went to this meeting. It was a very nice gesture on their part. On a subsequent trip they gave me a picture of the Nixon meeting with Mao, with me in it, to prove that I had been there. Since then, of course, it has been well publicized, but that was an interesting sidelight.

Now we ought to get to the substance of the trip. We had a series of meetings with Zhou En-lai and also some meetings, particularly to negotiate the language of the communique and other, loose ends, with the Vice Minister of Foreign Affairs, whose name was Chao Kuan-hua. He was a very able vice minister. He subsequently got into trouble because he bet on the Gang of Four against Deng Xiaoping. He made the wrong bet. His wife, who was a translator, was close to Madame Mao.

So we had two kinds of discussions. There were meetings between President Nixon and Zhou En-lai on substantive issues. On our side were Nixon, Kissinger, Holdridge, and myself. Meanwhile, Secretary of State Rogers, Assistant Secretary of State Marshall Green, and other State Department people were meeting with the Chinese Foreign Minister, Ji Peng-fei. They were dealing with bilateral issues only, such as economic and cultural exchanges, and so forth. They may have touched on some international issues, but their discussion of them would have been superficial. In any case the Chinese Foreign Minister, Ji, was less important than their Vice Foreign Minister, Chao. Of course, Nixon was relying on Kissinger as his adviser.

So the real discussions were between Nixon and Zhou En-lai, and they ranged over all of the issues that one would expect, whether it was on the general, historic nature of the opening to China or Russia, South Asia, the Middle East, Vietnam, Korea, Taiwan, and bilateral relations. There was discussion with Zhou En-lai of general principles and major issues and particularly Taiwan. The specific negotiating session on the language of the communique took place with Vice Foreign Minister Chao, with great assistance from Assistant Minister Zhang Wen-chin. There were some loose ends unresolved on the communique generally, apart from Taiwan, but mostly this was directed at trying to beef up the positive sections toward the end. These sections weren't particularly contentious.

We had really tough negotiations on Taiwan, day after day, right down to the wire. They finally ended up on our last night in Beijing, when we were to take off the next day for Hangzhou. We reached agreement. I still remember this. I don't think that I went with Kissinger to tell Nixon, late at night, that we had reached final agreement on the communique. Of course, you know the formulations agreed on, and I won't go through all of that. Basically, it was a rather historic formulation which has held up to this day. The Politburo of the Chinese Communist Party approved the communique that evening. Of course, we had approved it.

We took off for Hangzhou on the following morning. When we got there, Secretary of State Rogers and Marshall Green saw the communique for the first time. That is no way to do business. Either on the plane to Hangzhou or in Hangzhou, they said basically that this communique was a disaster. They probably did not use that phrasing, but they were disturbed.

Q: Did they say something close to that?

LORD: They were very critical, particularly on Taiwan. They said that President Nixon was going to get killed at home and around the world and that we had given in too much to the Chinese. We thought that this view was nonsense, in substantive terms. Each side had declared its positions. In fact, we had negotiated the communique pretty skillfully and we thought that most of their comments on the communique were - frankly understandably - piqued at having been left out of the negotiations. The process was lousy and State should have been included. But the communique turned out to be excellent.

So Nixon had a terrible decision. On the one hand, the Politburo of the Chinese Communist Party had already approved the communique. On the other hand, he risked having Secretary of State Rogers and Marshall Green, if not on the record, then leaking out on background that they had not only been excluded from the negotiations but that we had also sold out on Taiwan. So Nixon had the humiliating experience of sending Kissinger back to Hangzhou to reopen the negotiations on the communique.

I still remember an amusing sidelight on this. I happened to be in my underwear when Kissinger somehow came into my room to ask me about something. Just after that President Nixon came into my room and made some stupid joke because he saw Kissinger with me in my underwear. That isn't the point. This was a poor attempt at humor. Then Nixon asked seriously what we were going to do about the views of Secretary of State Rogers on the communique. He said: "I can't afford to have the State Department undercutting what we've accomplished." So he then said: "Henry, you've got to go back to the Chinese and get some of these concessions which Rogers and Green have given us on specific language." Some of these were impossible to get. Obviously, State never could have gotten them either, but you can't blame the State Department for being irate. So clearly they were going to ask for many changes, both because they'd like to get them, but also because they figured that it would be more embarrassing to Kissinger if we didn't get them. Some of their suggestions, however, were minor nuances, or nitpicks.

Kissinger, of course, was very resistant to this. I don't remember exactly what the conversation was. But he dreaded going back to Zhou En-lai and saying in effect: "I've got a small detail here. We know that your Politburo has approved this, as well as Chairman Mao. Here we are in Hangzhou, and the Politburo isn't even around, and Chairman Mao is back there in Beijing. However, by the way, we'd like to reopen some of the sensitive issues on Taiwan that we've both agreed on after months of negotiations." This was going to be embarrassing, to say the least. It was our own fault for having cut out the State Department in the negotiations on the communique.

So we reopened the negotiations on the communique that night. It was very humiliating.

Kissinger explained our bureaucratic and public relations situation. We suggested some changes but didn't try out all of the changes that the State Department wanted, particularly the ones that were really dramatic in their import. Zhou En-lai handled the matter very skillfully. He tried to avoid making this situation any more awkward and embarrassing than it really was.

There was one key point, I believe, that Green made and was adjusted. We had language that reaffirmed all our alliances except Taiwan. It was meant to reassure allies, but the omission of Taiwan would have been glaring. Thus State suggested and we got Chinese approval not to mention the alliances. And Kissinger in his press conference on Chinese soil verbally reaffirmed our commitment to Taiwan. That change was important.

Zhou also gave in on a few secondary points. I don't remember the details, which improved the draft in a couple of places but didn't touch anything fundamental, nor could they, since the Politburo and Chairman Mao had already approved it, and Zhou En-lai was operating on his own. He threw a few crumbs to us, which we then included in the communique.

We went on to Shanghai the next day, and Kissinger presented a press briefing on the communique, including reasserting on Chinese soil that we would continue to have our defense relationship with Taiwan. This was a very sensitive point. It is one thing to say this in the United States, but to say it in Shanghai was quite extraordinary. Kissinger, as it were, was doing a high wire act, and he wanted to protect the President's domestic flank and his international reputation, as well as fears on Taiwan, without overly alienating the Chinese. This was a very skillful performance.

We were not 100 percent sure, particularly after the State Department had spooked us a little bit, what kind of reception the trip and the Shanghai Communique would get, both immediately and when we returned to Washington. Even as we flew back to Washington, with the euphoria of the trip, we were still a little bit concerned about what the reaction would be. Well, once again we underestimated the popular dimension of this initiative. There may have been some carping at the time, but, on the whole, everyone not only welcomed the trip as a tremendous success, with this romance and euphoria. They also said that the Shanghai Communique was very well done.

Q: As I recall it, and, Nancy, you might remember, Marshall Green's main point, in the Oral History interview I did with him, was that there was some sort of reference or drawing a parallel to Secretary of State Dean Acheson's leaving South Korea out of the U.S. defense perimeter in the Pacific, when he made a speech to the National Press Club in January, 1950, not long before North Korea invaded South Korea in June, 1950. He had outlined U.S. interests in the Far East but didn't include Taiwan as one of them. Does that ring a bell with you?

LORD: Well, in the first place I want to make clear on the record how much respect I have for Marshall Green. He handled himself, as did Secretary of State Rogers, with tremendous dignity when they were really cut out of things that they really should not have been cut out of. I'm sure that whatever concerns Marshall Green had were genuine, though he felt understandable annoyance at the process. I don't recall that particular comment by Marshall Green, if that's what it is. But his concerns were almost entirely focused on the Taiwan portion of the communique. As I said I believe there was a reference to various allies which suggested an omission of Taiwan and therefore all references were taken out, so that is probably what Green was referring to.

Q: His comments were on Taiwan...

LORD: But we couldn't have possibly stated in the Shanghai Communique that we were going to defend Taiwan. We certainly had the expectation of a peaceful resolution of this matter. Regarding the arms sales question we talked about continuing them, which was dicey. We didn't break our defense treaty with Taiwan at that point. At some point in the communique we used the formulation to the effect that we were willing to reduce our forces on Taiwan as tensions in the area subsided. This was really a reference to Vietnam. We said, in effect, that if the Chinese helped us to end the Vietnam War, they would see us reducing our forces in Taiwan. Since a part of the rationale for our forces in Taiwan was regional stability, including Vietnam, we could justify it on those grounds because it was a subtle way of meeting their concerns on that point. It also could suggest that a peaceful approach by China in the area, and to the Taiwan question, could also help the withdrawal process

Marshall Green may well have made a comment of this kind, but I just don't recall the details of what his concern was. I'm sure that it referred to Taiwan.

Q: During all of this what was the impression of Nixon, Kissinger, and yourself of Madame Mao? Where did you feel that she stood in the Chinese structure at that time?

LORD: We didn't see much of her. I think that she was probably at one of the banquets. She was the escort to the President and Mrs. Nixon at the ballet. That was the only exposure that we had to her. I never talked to her in any way. I was standing around when she made some small talk with President Nixon. It was my impression at the time that she didn't seem particularly friendly. I think that, even then, we suspected that she was less enthusiastic about this opening than Chairman Mao. We weren't aware as yet, that I can recall, of the Gang of Four mentality and where she stood on this spectrum. However, either at the time or since then we thought that she was less enthusiastic about this opening. Maybe not resistant, but certainly less enthusiastic.

I should have mentioned the Lin Biao incident during the trip to Beijing in October, 1971. There was tightened security for reasons that we didn't know about at the time. It turned out that two weeks earlier, in September, 1971, Lin Biao, partly, we believe, revolting against the opening to the United States, made a grab for power. He became involved in a struggle with Chairman Mao, tried to escape China in an airplane, and crashed in Mongolia. The world knew nothing of this at that point. This incident was covered up for some time. However, this resulted in a rather tense security situation, and we saw a lot of security precautions in Beijing.

I'm not saying that Madame Mao was linked up with Lin Biao, but she was probably in the more skeptical part of the spectrum with him on the American connection. I can't remember how much we knew of this at the time, but she did strike us as less friendly in the brief encounters we had with her.

Q: During these discussions in China, what was the view of the Chinese of the Soviets at that time? Were they trying to get any information from us or were they saying that we both know that the Soviets are bad people?

LORD: Let's get into some of these other issues. Regarding the Soviets, that clearly was a major theme throughout the Nixon visit to China. Kissinger and Nixon would play on this threat to China and us. They were always a little careful so that, if these remarks were transmitted to Brezhnev, they wouldn't be too embarrassed. They were fairly heavy on the dimensions of the Soviet threat. When we would talk to the Soviets, we would never say negative things about China, but we also would try to improve relations with Russia.

The Chinese were the same way on the Soviets. Certainly, Mao was the bluntest about Russia. The higher up you went in the Chinese hierarchy, the blunter they were about Russia. This was true of Deng Xiaoping later, with the talk about the polar bear and the threat. This attitude held true for 20 years. Even during my last meeting with Deng Xiaoping in 1988, or whenever it was, he was talking about the Russian as well as the Japanese threat to China. So that theme was there a lot.

Early on we began briefing the Chinese on our relations with the Soviets. We worked on improving relations with the Russians, but we were also using the Chinese to induce the Russians to improve relations with us. With the Chinese, on the one hand we wanted to reassure them that we weren't being feckless and naive in seeking detente with the Russians. However, on the other hand, we had to spend a certain amount of time letting the Chinese know that we were moving somewhere with the Russians, too, to get them a little excited. So it was a carefully nuanced game here.

Kissinger was always meticulous, and Nixon was on his trip, to brief the Chinese about what our strategy was toward the Soviet Union. Basically, we would say: "Look, we want to improve our relations with Moscow. We don't deny that. They have nuclear weapons, and we don't want to get into a war with them. However, we have no illusions. The Soviets are tough and expansionist. And by the way, they are more of a threat to you than to us, given their geography, history, and capabilities. We don't really trust the Russians, but it's in our national interest to try to improve our relationship with them on a hard-headed, pragmatic basis. We'll use pressures, but we'll also use some incentives. We know what we're doing." The sub-text to this was: "We are making some progress with the Soviets, and you Chinese should be sure that you keep up with us and improve relations with us, so that we don't get ahead of you in relations with the Russians." Indeed, we had a much more concrete agenda with Moscow than we did with China, where we were just launching a relationship. With Russia we had topics like arms control, Berlin, trade, exchanges, etc. With China it was essentially geopolitical dialogue in the early years.

The Chinese would be flat out in talking about Soviet pressures and threats. I don't know that they even went through the motions of saying that they wanted better relations with the Soviets. They might have, but they would talk about past Soviet perfidy and future concerns. I don't know that they complained that the Soviets did not help them with nuclear weapons, but they certainly referred to the border clashes and continuing Soviet pressures on China. At times, and this was truer in subsequent years, particularly in the mid 1970s, the Chinese would say: "You Americans are getting a little naïve with the Soviets. Detente is really an illusion. You're getting too soft and you're trying to stand on our shoulders to reach the Soviets. You're trying to use us and you're being naïve with the Russians." We got some of that flavor, particularly from Deng Xiaoping later on, but not so much from Mao and Zhou En-lai earlier on, as I recall.

So this was a heavy theme in our talks with China. Then there was the anti-hegemony reference in the Shanghai Communiqué. We were careful to brief the Chinese on what we were doing with Moscow. For example, after President Nixon's trip to China in February, 1972, we went to Moscow in May, 1972. Then, in June, 1972, Kissinger, myself, Holdridge, and so on went back to China for two main reasons. One was to debrief the Chinese on the Moscow Summit Meeting and fill them in, which we continually did. Secondly, we tried to get them to help more on Vietnam. Those were the two main reasons. So that was an example.

Through these trips, and more and more as we went along, we briefed the Chinese generally on policy and the status of negotiations with the Russians, always giving them a hard edge twist that we were not naïve and that we would make sure that the Russians did not take advantage of us. We began to share intelligence reports with the Chinese. Often Jon Howe, who was a military aide on the NSC staff, and I would go off and brief the Chinese on Russian troop deployments. We would also give them information on Soviet capabilities, both to show that we were friendly and that we were trying to share information that might be useful to them. And also, frankly, to make the Chinese a little nervous about Soviet intentions.

So the Russian dimension was very important. It was not the only reason that we opened up with China. That's been proven since the end of the Soviet threat to the US in 1989-90. Over a 20, 30, or 40 year period we will have a large agenda with China, which is going to be a major power. Certainly, our joint concern about the Soviet threat was the glue in the early going, but we've shown, and we will show that we have other reasons for dealing with China, even without the Russian threat. That was the primary reason then, but there are all the other factors which I have mentioned, including the Vietnam issue, the attempt to try to stabilize regional stability in Asia, North Korea, and the Taiwan Straits, to a certain extent. If the Chinese have good relations with us, they'll have less incentive to attack Taiwan and wreck their relations with us.

Eventually trade and cultural exchange and other exchanges have become our other reasons for good relations with China. However, the Soviet theme was the dominant theme in the early 70s and 80s.

Q: What about North Korea? Did you sense anything approaching distaste among the Chinese for the Kim Il Sung regime in North Korea?

LORD: No, not at that time. This aspect has become clearer in the last few years and as we speak, here in 1998. However, the Chinese didn't show much daylight on North Korea, and I'll get back to some of the other issues. On North Korea I didn't detect any opening. They had no interest in South Korea at that point. Even then, however, they probably made it clear to us, and in fact, I know that they did, that they had no interest in seeing the North Koreans attacking the South Koreans and perhaps dragging them into another war against us. I'm sure that the Chinese said that they hoped there would be stability on the Korean peninsula. However, they showed no daylight between them and North Korea. Certainly, their references in the Shanghai Communique and other talking points would be pretty solid in their connection with North Korea.

I would like to make clear that Zhou En-lai was so sophisticated that he wouldn't use terms like lips and teeth and the usual garbage which you get out of the Chinese. It would be much more elegant than that, but substantively he would still be very solid with the North Koreans, I am quite sure. I should say that the conversations between Zhou En-lai, on the one hand, and Kissinger and Nixon, on the other hand, were the most interesting and impressive, diplomatic conversations that I have ever witnessed.

On Vietnam, which is an important subject, we didn't fully realize then how much the Chinese disliked the Vietnamese, and vice versa. In fact, the Chinese invaded Vietnam a few years later (in 1979). We still saw the Chinese essentially as a patron of Hanoi, along with Moscow, somewhat competing with Moscow and somewhat constrained in terms of the degree to which they could help us. This was because they might lose influence in Hanoi to Moscow if they were more forthcoming with us than Moscow was.

The same consideration applied to North Korea. Chinese concern about Russia reflected not only the bilateral pressures between the two countries but their impact around the world in places like North Korea and Vietnam where China was in competition with Russia for influence. So this infused all of their views. Some of this is retrospective and some of this we saw at the time. The Chinese recognized that the Vietnamese could be pretty stubborn. They basically wanted to get on with their relationship with us, and the Vietnam War was a real annoyance, as I said earlier. The Chinese felt that it was a distraction to have fighting going on near their border. The Chinese did have some support troops in Laos, I believe. They never went in force into Vietnam, which adjoined their border, and they still had their ideology and history to deal with. They had to look as if they were close with Vietnam and they did want to compete with the Soviets. So they had all of that working.

However, they clearly wanted to get the Vietnam War settled. They would appeal to us in these conversations and would say: "Look, you're bogged down in Vietnam. Your domestic situation is terrible and there is a lot of uproar. More importantly, you're getting distracted from your other, geopolitical responsibilities. You can't face the polar bear around the world effectively, and even your position in NATO is hurt because you're so preoccupied with Vietnam and you're alienating a lot of countries."

They would use their ideology in this context. Again, Zhou En-lai would be somewhat elegant in referring to a civil war in Vietnam and say that the Vietnamese people demand justice, and all of that stuff. Basically, whatever they put in public communiques, in our private talks they would appeal to our national self-interest, more than ideology and references to lips and teeth. It would be more like: "You guys are bogged down. It's in your interest to get this war in Vietnam over with." Of course it was in Beijing's interest too to end the fighting near its border and also end the irritant in our bilateral relations, which were more important to the Chinese than their ties to Vietnam.

I don't think that the Chinese ever heavily pressured Hanoi. I think that they were helpful to us in their own self interest. We think that their attitude was: "There should be a military settlement. Hanoi shouldn't be requiring America to humiliate itself by also deciding the political future of Vietnam." We'll get into Vietnam later, but basically the North Vietnamese position for years was that the U.S. not only had to withdraw unilaterally but, as we left, we had to overthrow the government of Nguyen van Thieu and replace it with a coalition government. We made our position clear as early as the fall of 1969, when we suggested a cease-fire in place. And we followed this up concretely in May, 1971, with a specific, seven-point proposal in the secret talks. I'll go into this in greater detail when we talk about Vietnam. We made clear that we could live with a unilateral withdrawal as well as a cease-fire, a return of POWs [Prisoners of War], and international supervision, as long as the political settlement was left for the Vietnamese people to decide.

We made clear to the Chinese that it is one thing to have a military settlement along those lines, but it's another thing to ask us to overthrow an ally and to decide for the Vietnamese people themselves their political future. We said that we're not going to do that. We kept stressing to the Chinese and asked them to relay to Hanoi that we were prepared to reach a reasonable settlement but that the military and political issues should be separated and that Hanoi couldn't ask us to overthrow an ally. We also appealed to the Chinese. We said that if you want us as a balancing force in Asia, the world, and particularly against the Soviet Union, as well as a restraint on Japan, you should support us. If the Japanese felt insecure, they might feel a need to remilitarize and develop nuclear weapons. We said that if the Chinese want us to play this geopolitical role, which was in their interest, they can't have us humiliated in Vietnam, making all of our allies and friends around the world think that we are totally untrustworthy. It is one thing to withdraw. It's another thing actually to overthrow the Thieu Government and put in a coalition government.

We kept pounding that theme with the Chinese, hoping that they would reinforce it with Hanoi. We hoped that we could get a military settlement only, which was what our objective was. We believe that the Chinese, probably somewhat carefully, because of the Russian factor, conveyed this view to Hanoi, although I can't prove it. I think that Zhou En-lai actually went to Vietnam after one of our trips to China. I'm quite sure that he did. There were high level Chinese emissaries who went to Hanoi. We can't prove what they said - I don't think that we had any documentary evidence through intelligence channels. However, we are quite sure basically about what Zhou En-lai said carefully in our discussions and superficially from his trips and so on. There were some signs of Hanoi's annoyance with its Russian and Chinese patrons. The Chinese, in their own self interest, kept this issue out of the way between us. However, we believe that they were leaning on Hanoi and probably saying something like: "Get the U.S. out of South Vietnam and settle for the military side only. You can't expect the Americans to overthrow the South Vietnamese Government. Time is on your side. Once the U.S. gets out of South Vietnam, the country will fall into your lap within a few years. You can afford to wait. In the meantime, get rid of the American presence and let the chips fall where they may in your favor in the coming years."

We think that the Chinese were talking to the North Vietnamese along these lines. In any event, in their conversations with us, the Chinese never pressed us to accept the North Vietnamese political proposals. They put the stress on America's getting out of South Vietnam and getting the war behind us. So by avoiding getting behind the overall North Vietnamese seven-point or nine-point plan or whatever it was, over the course of the years, it was clear to us that the Chinese were probably sympathetic to a military solution only.

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: Can I ask you, in connection with North Vietnam, but going back a little bit further back in time, in terms of the Chinese-Vietnamese relationship, how much did you think about it as a limiting factor in pursuing our policies in Vietnam? For example, in a conversation with Allen Whiting which Stu Kennedy had Whiting warned about a possible Chinese intervention in Vietnam. John Holdridge rejected that possibility as being distracting and silly and that the Chinese would never have intervened. Do you have a sense of how seriously that was taken?

LORD: I would like to make clear also that, as we talk about these issues now, we're not just talking about the Nixon Summit Meeting in China but the tenor of the conversations with the Chinese over a two or three-year period. This is the only way to handle it. I can't be precise.

I think, and this was more relevant during the Johnson Administration, although it may also have been relevant to Nixon, that we had to keep in mind the possibility of Chinese intervention. Short of that, there was also the danger of making it really awkward for the Chinese by escalating near the Chinese border, even if they didn't intervene and therefore affecting our bilateral relationship. In my opinion, the possibility of Chinese intervention in the Vietnam War was not a major factor. Certainly, by the time we got through the early 1970s and the opening to China, I don't believe that we were really concerned about the Chinese directly intervening in the war. There was nothing in our conversations with the Chinese which ever threatened that. The Chinese would often say that hostilities in Vietnam were awkward near their border. They never threatened that they were going to intervene. Again, we'd have to look at the history books. I think that there's some evidence that the Chinese had some forces in Laos and Vietnam in a supporting role, e.g. anti-aircraft or construction.

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: There were actually Chinese troops in North Vietnam in the mid-1960s, in a supporting role. I was thinking more in those terms as to what degree, in that earlier period, was this something that all of you had in mind?

LORD: In terms of Vietnam policy I think that there was some concern but that it was more relevant to the Johnson administration in the 1960s, than it was when we got to China in the 1970s. One of the arguments against going into North Vietnam on the ground, as well as even escalation like heavy bombing, was the Chinese reaction. That clearly was a factor. Reasonable people can disagree on how important it was. Maybe it was fairly important in the 1960s, when I was less directly involved in Vietnam policy. In the early 1970s I never recalled, in dealing with the Vietnamese or the Chinese, that this was a major factor then. I think that the significant considerations were domestic public opinion and the cost-benefit ratio of military pressures. However, others may disagree, and maybe correctly, that this was more of a constraint than I recall it as having been. I think that it was more of a constraint in the 1960s, particularly with respect to sending American troops into North Vietnam and getting closer to the Chinese border.

Q: After the Korean War you can't help but re-fight your last war.

LORD: Exactly right. I almost mentioned that the feeling was: "Well, if we go too far in Vietnam, we may make the mistake we made in Korea." I'm sure that that was a factor. People can disagree on the relative weight to attach to it. It was probably significant in the 1960s, but my recollection is that it was not significant in the early 1970s.

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: No.

LORD: Let me raise one other issue. I can't give you a lot of detail on it, but this was the India-Pakistan issue. The Russians were essentially lined up with India during the Cold War, and the Chinese were lined up with Pakistan. On top of that, Pakistan had done a favor to China and the United States by serving as an intermediary and as a launching pad for our opening to China. So when the crisis in Bangladesh broke out, and so on, I recall that this was regarded as a significant issue for some time, although my memory is very bad on this. This included talking to Huang Hua, the Chinese Ambassador to the UN in New York, and coordinating our moves to warn India about not attacking Pakistan. I think that we may have had some U.S. Navy ship movements in this connection.

Q: USS ENTERPRISE, a nuclear-powered aircraft carrier, was sent into the Bay of Bengal, I think it was, at that time. This was regarded as a tilt toward Pakistan. The Indians still remember this.

LORD: Of course they do. Kissinger finally went to India a few years later (about 1975) and tried to restore our relations with India, to a certain extent. There is no question that, for a variety of reasons, Kissinger and Nixon wanted to tilt toward Pakistan. It's a huge exaggeration to say that we did this solely as a favor to the Chinese. It was a factor that Pakistan had been an intermediary, that the Chinese and we were on the same side, and this would reinforce our new opening to each other. However, in my view, it would have happened anyway, given the general, geopolitical attitude of Nixon and Kissinger that if a stronger power is opposed to a weaker power, you help out the weaker power in terms of balance.

Also, and for some time, frankly, we had been tilting toward Pakistan. There was nothing new about this, in the sense that the Indians were generally closer to the Russians, with the Pakistanis on the other side. So during the Cold War it was natural for us to line up with Pakistan, at least in Kissinger's and Nixon's view, representing geopolitics at the expense of human rights. There were clearly a lot of atrocities in Bangladesh and so on. We didn't pay a great deal of attention to them, which is an understatement.

There was a genuine concern, and some suggestions from intelligence sources, that India might go after Pakistan (West) aggressively, beyond its support of Bangladesh. This, of course, would also affect peace and stability in the world. It is unconscionable that one country should invade another country. So we wanted to deter that. We had a variety of reasons, including the opening to China and the Pakistani channel in support of that. However, that was not the exclusive or predominant reason. During this period we had close discussions with the Chinese, in our mutual interest, but also to underline again our parallel, geopolitical convergence, having the Soviet dimension wrapped up in it as well. We knew about China's concern about India and Chinese friendship for Pakistan. This was an issue that we could cooperate on early in the course of this opening of our relations, when we were trying to establish mutual trust and confidence, in the sense of shared interests. So that was another issue.

The Middle East was not a significant area. We would keep the Chinese posted on what we were doing. What we got from the Chinese was essentially a pro-Arab position, an anti-Israeli position. This is ironic because, later on, Israel started giving the Chinese military aid, and so on. However, there wasn't fire breathing rhetoric in China against Israel. It wasn't as if you were sitting in Iran or Saudi Arabia. The Chinese view was that justice was on the side of the Palestinians, so they took the side of the Arabs.

Q: Japan.

LORD: Let me mention Japan. I think that we touched on that briefly before. I know that we did, but we may benefit from a little repetition here. China and Japan had a love-hate relationship, of course, given their history, culture, and other things. There was the Rape of Nanking, and the Chinese are still resentful of the Japanese invasion and thereby suspicious of the Japanese. They are worried about Japan remilitarizing and/or going nuclear in the future. During the first few visits to Beijing the China chided us about building up Japan, our security alliance, and the presence of U.S. troops there. In their various meetings Nixon and Kissinger made the counter-argument about our security alliance with Japan and our nuclear umbrella. They made clear that the Japanese were secure and that they didn't have to build up their own military forces or nuclear potential, because the Japanese were safe, being allied with the U.S. They said that it was not in China's interest that Japan worry about the loosening of its alliance with the U.S., because they then might remilitarize, go for nuclear weapons, and fulfill China's greatest fear.

This is one, concrete example of the impact of extensive, geopolitical discussions. People may say: "Hey, that's interesting, but what good is it going to do?" In fact, these discussions had an impact. The Chinese began to understand our arguments and dropped their attacks on our alliance with Japan, and therefore created somewhat less mischief between us and Japan. So that was important.

Of course, once we moved to reopen our relations with China, Japan followed us again and even went further with China, as they had every right to do for we had held Tokyo back and then leap-frogged it. They normalized diplomatic relations with China more quickly than we did.

Meanwhile, we were increasing our communications through two major channels - our embassies in Paris and at the United Nations in New York. These were our channels until we established liaison offices in early 1973.

I've mentioned that we went back to China in June, 1972, primarily to brief the Chinese on the Soviet Summit Meeting and to press ahead with Vietnam, which was still a major concern for us. On that trip we also went to Japan, one of many Kissinger trips to Japan over the years. I sat in on a private meeting with Prime Minister Sato, the only other American present. The trip in February, 1973, was the next one after June, 1972. Again we also went to Tokyo. I've talked about the flavor and substance of all of these trips. The subsequent trips were just to Beijing, except for ones where we went to Suzhou and Xian. Also, we occasionally went to see the sights outside of Beijing.

I want to mention the trip in February, 1973, since it is the last one I made when I worked in the White House. It was a very successful trip, the best during the whole Kissinger period. Until then we had awkward channeled communications with China. We were building more trust with every trip. In fact, the Shanghai Communique said that, from time to time, there should be a Senior Visitor from the United States to China, which shows the mentality of the Middle Kingdom. We were going there. They weren't coming our way. According to them, they couldn't come to the United States, because there was still a Taiwan Embassy in Washington. We were communicating through Huang Hua, the Chinese Ambassador to the UN in New York, and through General Walters, our Defense Attaché in our Embassy in Paris.

By the way, we would always drop in and see the Chinese Ambassador in Paris after we had finished our secret negotiations on Vietnam with the North Vietnamese. We would go over to the Chinese Embassy and give them a read-out on what had happened. This was a courtesy to maintain contact. We would also talk about other issues, but the primary object was to keep them up to speed on our Vietnam negotiations and, hopefully, get their help in leaning on Hanoi.

The trip to China in February, 1973, was the single most successful trip we ever made to China, to develop convergence, at least. First of all, we had begun to build up mutual trust and credibility through extensive discussions over several trips. Kissinger had made three trips by then, in addition to the trip with President Nixon. So there was mutual respect on the personal level and some mutual confidence that we reinforced each other regarding South Asia, and so forth. We had this perennial Russian factor, and all of that stuff. Secondly, Nixon had just been reelected in a landslide, and China knew it would be dealing with him for four more years, and that he planned to move towards normalization.

Thirdly, we had just ended the Vietnam War. So this irritant on the Chinese border, this ideological awkwardness, and the fact that their so-called friends were fighting us in a war were now behind us. They also knew that this would free up our attitudes and resources, whether it involved countering the Soviets or maintaining general, geopolitical balance and assertiveness. So this removed a problem and a complication in our bilateral relationship. Also, public opinion in both China and the U.S. was getting more comfortable with the relationship.

For all of these reasons, this was a very positive context in which to go to China in February, 1973. As a result, it was the first time that Chairman Mao saw Kissinger on his own, and that put the stamp on how important this was.

We agreed in the February 1973 visit on getting over hurdles in terms of communications. We also made an agreement on further economic progress and cultural exchanges. On Taiwan the rhetoric was relatively restrained, I think. However, the most important thing was that we agreed to set up Liaison Offices in the two capitals. This was a clear indication of Chinese pragmatism as well as their feeling more comfortable in terms of this relationship. They had said that there would never be a Chinese Embassy in Washington as long as there was a Taiwan Embassy. This was not acceptable to them, as this amounted to a Two Chinas solution to the problem.

We had tried on previous trips to suggest maybe setting up Trade Offices. We were trying to come up with some formulation under which we would have direct communications with the Chinese, even as we maintained our diplomatic relations with Taiwan. The most forthcoming formulation which we had, and which I think that the Chinese actually suggested, was a Liaison Office. I forget where that phrase, Liaison Office, came from. So the Chinese agreed to the establishment of Liaison Offices, which were Embassies in everything but name. They were big and were going to get bigger. They could do any business that an Embassy could do. So the Chinese could still say that they didn't have an Embassy in Washington while Taiwan had an Embassy. However, in fact, the Chinese did have an office in Washington simultaneously, and that was a major breakthrough.

In addition on this trip we secured the release of two American prisoners, CIA pilots, that the Chinese had been holding since the Korean War.

This trip therefore was extremely successful. The discussions were very rich. It was on this trip that there was another example of Zhou En-lai's style, which was very impressive. There were other reasons for being impressed with his style, including his manner of speaking, elegance, his strategic and tactical skill, his sense of history, his sense of humor, and his charisma. He was an attractive person. The way he expressed himself was always elegant, as opposed to being polemical. He once sent over his personal doctor to look after one of our secretaries, who was sick. He had heard about this in casual conversation. So he had these nice little touches, although obviously he was ruthless in being able to get and stay where he was.

Let me relate one interesting anecdote in this regard. By this time, Zhou En-lai and Kissinger had built up a very warm relationship. Each of them defended his own national interests, but they had great respect for each other. They had tremendous conversations in which they would digress to talk about history, philosophy, or whatever they wanted to discuss. So it was a very warm relationship.

Every time we went to Beijing we stayed at the Diao Yu-tai guesthouse. Kissinger and I, Holdridge, and sometimes others would walk around and talk strategy, just to get a breath of fresh air and some exercise and get away from bugging devices in our guesthouse. On this trip every time we would try to go over a certain bridge, we were stopped by guards. We didn't know why. It turned out later that Norodom Sihanouk or some other sensitive guest was staying there. At the time we were sort of annoyed, because the whole compound, in which the guesthouse stood, was sort of screened out and private. We could cross other bridges, but we just kept getting blocked away from this particular bridge.

Kissinger was puzzled. He either mentioned this matter to one of the Chinese - it wasn't Zhou En-lai himself, but somebody else - or he was overheard in the guesthouse. In any event, to make a long story short, on the final night, when we finished our discussions, Kissinger and Zhou En-lai genuinely didn't want to break up the meeting because they enjoyed each other's company so much. So we went on for another couple of hours, talking about all kinds of things outside the formal agenda.

Then we finished. We were going to leave the next morning. It was a cold night. Zhou En-lai said: "Well, why don't I walk you back to your guesthouse?" So he took Kissinger and the rest of us back to the guesthouse, which was very friendly in protocol terms. And lo and behold, we walked over that bridge! He didn't say anything about it. But that was, of course, his gesture to Kissinger on the personal level.

Now, do you have any questions?

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: Chas Freeman, in his oral history, suggests that Henry Kissinger was resistant to the idea of a Liaison Office in Beijing.

LORD: For what reason?

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: Particularly because Kissinger reportedly felt that, once you had State Department people based in Beijing, that he would lose control of the relationship.

LORD: Again, memory plays tricks. That sounds like nonsense. We, including Kissinger, wanted direct communications with the Chinese. I only remember that Kissinger wanted to have the most ambitious arrangement that we could get away with, without calling these offices Embassies. I clearly remember that he and I felt that a Liaison Office was a trade off which was better than other possibilities. Any office that you would set up was going to have State Department people in it. Kissinger certainly might be suspicious of other bureaucrats. However, to think that you could have any kind of de facto Embassy without State Department people in it is absurd. Kissinger wanted to have negotiations and direct contact with the Chinese, not to mention the signal this sent around the world, including the Russians and the Vietnamese, that we were advancing in our relationship with China. By that time the Vietnamese probably felt that this issue was irrelevant. It's absurd to say that we didn't want a Liaison Office. I am puzzled by that reference. I don't know how Freeman could come up with it. To be sure, since we set up Liaison Office, Kissinger exercised tight control and was always the key link in our ties with Beijing.

Who else suggested this resistance?

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: Roger Sullivan.

LORD: He may have come up with a formulation; I don't remember where it came from. By then we were involving the State Department and asking for ideas. Someone may have suggested using the name of a Liaison Office. I don't deny that. I just don't recall where this term came from. And I really have trouble believing that Kissinger would have resisted setting up a Liaison Office. It just doesn't make any sense. We were delighted to have a Liaison Office, and we knew that any such office would have State Department people in it.

Now, of course, there was also the matter of heads of the U.S. Liaison Office in Beijing. One of the first two people heading it up was John Holdridge, one of Kissinger's NSC staff members. The other one was Al Jenkins from State. So clearly, Kissinger wasn't going to let these people operate on their own. I don't deny that. It's absurd to say that he wouldn't want a Liaison Office. It just doesn't make any sense.

Q: We'll stop at this point. The next time we'll cover Vietnam from the NSC perspective. I would like to note that we have covered the Chinese connection and also the Chinese role in Vietnam, India, the Soviet Union, and Japan in this interview.

LORD: We've gone through the Kissinger secret trip to China and the preparations for it, the rationale for the opening to China, the Nixon and subsequent trips, and some of the discussions and considerations we had on various issues, as well as some personal anecdotes and some on styles.

Q: So we'll pick this up, starting with the beginning on the Vietnam side. Then, after that, comes the Russian side.

***

I am Charles Stuart Kennedy. This is June 23, 1998. We will continue to follow the China thread. Nancy Bernkopf Tucker is also participating in this interview. Win, you said that there are a couple of things that you wanted to add to the material on your experience on the NSC [National Security Council] staff.

LORD: Yes, we're still covering China during my days on the NSC staff. I want to go back over a couple of the trips to China, after the trip by President Nixon [in February, 1972]. It may be repetitious, but I want to make sure that it is covered.

In June, 1972, and I don't know whether we covered this in depth. Kissinger went back to China on the first trip after President Nixon's trip in February, 1972. We made further progress on the relationship between the People's Republic of China and the United States, generally. Two main items on the June, 1972, trip were to debrief the Chinese on President Nixon's trip to Moscow and the Summit Meeting with the Soviets, and we also wanted to keep working on the Vietnam issue. We particularly wanted to get Chinese help in the negotiations with Hanoi.

As always, there were broad ranging discussions between Kissinger and Zhou Enlai. There was a whole variety of issues on the agenda, most of which we discussed in our previous session. There were some nice, warm touches here because, obviously, the relationships between Kissinger and Zhou Enlai and the relationship between the two countries, although they were in their infancy, were obviously beginning to become more friendly. There was a very pleasant meeting with Zhou Enlai. I think that Zhou Enlai was there personally on the boat trip, the visit to the Summer Palace, and the trip to the hills surrounding Beijing.

There was also one difficult issue, which was handled with some restraint by the Chinese. Zhou Enlai showed us pictures of some bombs which had accidentally landed on Chinese soil. These must have been connected to the fighting in Vietnam. I don't recall that this ever became public knowledge or that the Chinese made a big deal out of it. It was quite interesting that they didn't make a major issue out of it.

Q: Were flights over Hainan Island prohibited? This is something that has come up from time to time. People who were with the Office of the Political Adviser to CINCPAC [CINCPAC POLAD] have told us that there were problems with overflights of China during the Vietnam War.

LORD: I don't recall. I remember that the Chinese on this occasion were concerned about bombs actually falling on Chinese territory. I don't imagine that our aircraft went out of their way to overfly China. I don't know whether we accidentally did so or not. Anyway, the Chinese did not raise this issue as such. It was the reference to bombs falling on Chinese territory that seemed to concern them.

This was also the trip where I was greatly embarrassed because of a table tennis exhibition. Kissinger had rashly told Zhou that I was a good player. A few days later the Chinese sprung a match between me and the Chinese champion on one side and Dick Solomon and the world champion on the other. I played badly. The results remain classified.

Without being specific on the chronology, how did we keep in touch with the Chinese after the Nixon trip [in February, 1972]? We had no direct contact at all with the Chinese before the Kissinger secret trip [in 1971]. We had to go through Pakistan. After the first Kissinger trip, we had two basic channels. One was through the Chinese UN Ambassador in New York, a man named Huang Hua, who subsequently became Foreign Minister of the PRC [People's Republic of China]. Kissinger and myself, sometimes I alone, sometimes Al Haig and I, in various combinations, would go up to New York and meet, usually in a safe house, right near where I had grown up as a child, on Park Avenue and the 70s, to discuss various issues. I remember that we kept in touch in this way during the 1971 South Asian crisis, although my chronology is not precise.

In these meetings in New York we continued to talk about bilateral relations, our respective relations with Russia, and, of course, Vietnam. I remember specifically that I went up to New York on my own in April, 1972, when Hanoi launched its offensive just before President Nixon went to Moscow for the Summit Meeting with the Soviets.

The other channel was through Paris. The Chinese Ambassador there was a man named Huang Zhen, who subsequently became chief of the PRC Liaison Office and Ambassador to the U.S. That was a secret contact. Every time that we met with the Vietnamese in secret negotiations, which we'll get to later, we would go over and debrief Huang Zhen, at least during this period, to keep the Chinese posted on how we were doing with the Vietnamese. Obviously, this was done in the hope that they would try to be helpful in encouraging Hanoi to take reasonable positions.

At these meetings with the Chinese in Paris we would also discuss bilateral matters as well. There was a portrait of Mao Zedong in the PRC Embassy. There was incense burning. We had good, Chinese food when we went there, and so on. So those are some incidental points.

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: Could I ask something? You were briefing the Chinese on what you were discussing with the Russians. Was there a sense of confidence on the part of the Chinese that you were telling them everything, or how did they...

LORD: Well, it was not in the style of the Chinese to tell us that they didn't think that we were telling them everything. Nor would they show gratitude at our being forthcoming in briefing them. They listened to us with interest. I don't recall that they probed us with a lot of questions; they would not want to show their eagerness. Mostly, they just listened to what we said.

Indeed, I don't recall whether this began with the trip in June, [1972], but certainly by February, 1973, we began to brief them on Russian deployments [on the Chinese border]. Often I would go off with Jon Howe or some military expert to talk with the Chinese. We would discuss Russian troop levels near the Chinese border and related things. By this means we sought to gain the confidence of the Chinese and to show that we were willing to enter into a new relationship with them.

In their dealings with us they did not reciprocate greatly in terms of their relations with Russia. On the other hand, they did not have much to offer. Relations between Russia and China were pretty frosty at this point.

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: I was going to ask at what point they began to provide us with information as well.

LORD: Well, whether it was Russia, the Middle East, or Vietnam, for a long period of time we generally gave them a lot more than they gave us in terms of these intelligence exchanges, although these began to be more mutual as time went on. We didn't consider the intelligence exchanges as a zero sum game. First of all, we thought that we knew more than the Chinese did on most of these issues. Secondly, we hoped to get more out of them, and we encouraged them to do so, but we didn't get a great deal. However, we felt that even the unilateral, intelligence briefings would give them a greater stake in the emerging relationship with the United States which, after all, was still somewhat fragile after some 22 years of hostility between our two countries. We hoped that our efforts would show them that we regarded them as a more friendly, strategic partner.

Specifically, if there were any arguments in the Chinese Politburo about the opening to the U.S., we hoped to help those in favor of such an opening, like Mao and Zhou En-lai. We also hoped generally to indicate to the Chinese that we were not naïve about the Russians but were willing to share information about the Russians with the Chinese. Furthermore, we also made it clear that we wanted to improve relations with Russia as well. We made it clear that we would not do this at Chinese expense but that it was in our national interest as well. We said that we were not about to form a tight, anti-Soviet alliance with China, any more than we would gang up with Russia against China.

We wanted to strike a balance, making it clear that we were as suspicious of the Russians as they were. After all, this was one of the main reasons for the opening to China. We also wanted to keep the Chinese sufficiently on edge so that we might improve relations with Russia, right after improving relations with China. This was to give the Chinese an incentive to improve relations with us. This was the usual triangular game.

Q: Could you talk about the use of a weapon which we seem to have used quite a bit during that period and subsequently? And maybe before, as well. That is, the use of satellite pictures and photo interpretation. This seems to have become a major tool in our diplomacy, in the sense of telling another country, see what we have to show you from our bag of tricks. Nobody else was in a position to do this.

LORD: Some of this material is still in a twilight zone of classification. I would not be shocking anyone any more than it would have shocked Rick, to use the line from the movie "Casablanca," when he was told by the French Chief of Police that there was gambling going on in his night club. We began to present verbal and written briefings. As time went on, there were pictures added, and so on. We will also go into this later. However, of course, this began in earnest during the Carter administration, when more strategic cooperation was undertaken with the Chinese with respect to tracking Soviet missile activity, not to mention sharing intelligence and cooperation on Afghanistan and other areas.

Yes, satellite pictures were used as we went on. I don't think that we had reached that point during the period I am talking about.

The only other thing that I have to cover before we go on, unless you have other questions, would be to review what we covered during the trip to China in February, 1973. I really would not want to repeat all of that. I think that we covered most of it, but I ought to mention the meeting with Mao.

As I said briefly, the meeting with Mao in February, 1973, was Kissinger's first meeting with him. I remember that we were sitting late at night with Zhou Enlai at about 11:00 PM. Wang Hairong, I might repeat, was Mao's grandniece. She kept coming in and going out, bearing notes to and from Zhou Enlai. Finally, Zhou said something to the effect that Chairman Mao would like to see Dr. Kissinger and that Mr. Lord was invited as well. Or Zhou said that Dr. Kissinger could be accompanied by Mr. Lord, or words to that effect.

This is typical of Chinese, partially Zhou's, style. The Chinese knew, of course, as we discussed earlier, that I had attended the first Mao meeting with Nixon but that I was cut out of all of the pictures and the communique because of the sensitivities of the State Department. The Chinese also knew that Kissinger relied on me the most on Chinese matters. There were other very, very important people in our delegation, but I had been involved the most on such matters and was Kissinger's closest assistant at that point, both generally and on China. Therefore, the Chinese knew that Kissinger would probably want me in any meeting he would have with Mao.

On the other hand, there was a protocol problem. There were other American officials sitting there, whose names I cannot immediately recall all of whom were higher ranking than I. Therefore, it would be very awkward to include me as one of the more junior people if Kissinger could only take one person with him. So what the Chinese did to avoid any possible controversy was to say that Mao wanted to see Kissinger and that I might accompany him to this meeting. This was absurd in substance because Mao would not have known me from Michael Jordan [star basketball player for the Chicago Bulls professional basketball team]. This meant that Kissinger was relieved from having to choose who would go with him to the meeting with Mao. He got the person that he wanted to go with him. I was rewarded with being included in a public meeting with Mao to make up for the fact that nobody knew that I was in the private meeting with Mao. I had been in the other meeting between Kissinger and Mao, but my picture had been cut out of the official photograph. That was a nice, grace point by the Chinese.

We went over to meet with Mao. I think that the meeting lasted about an hour and a half. It ended at 1:30 AM, in any event. The conversation was wide-ranging, and I'll get back to that. For the first time Mao used the expression: "I'll soon be receiving an invitation from God." I hadn't realized that Mao used this expression that far back but I double checked it in Kissinger's book. This was Mao's way of saying that he was quite sick and did not expect to live much longer. He said: "God," and not Marx. This phrase was used in the visit between President Ford and Mao a year and a half later.

Also, Mao kept mentioning that women were causing problems in China or at least saying that China could send the U.S. 10 million women. This was not just playing around with the phony story that Kissinger was allegedly popular with females. At the time we couldn't figure out what Mao meant by this statement that he could send us 10 million women. When we got home, I asked my wife, a Chinese woman born in Shanghai. She immediately said that Mao was having problems on policy issues, including perhaps the opening with the U.S., with some of the Chinese radicals, including his wife, Mme. Mao. In effect, he was saying that he was having trouble with the radicals, including his wife. Mao spoke, using allusions, metaphors, and similes. His Socratic dialogue manner of expressing himself was never very explicit on some of these things. My wife's view seemed to make sense to Kissinger and me.

Mao's basic thesis at this meeting was that China and the U.S. had been enemies and that we would probably continue to fire propaganda shots at each other. However, these slogans really didn't mean anything. What really counted were longer range, national interests and far sightedness. Neither side should maneuver for petty advantage. We should put national interests above ideological differences.

Even this early the Chinese began, through Mao, although I don't know whether Zhou En-lai did this as much, to warn us about fake detente. The remarks didn't have sharp edges of the kind we heard later in the mid-1970s, particularly during the 1974-1975 period up to and during the time of the visit to China by President Ford. Mao's point was that we should not be hoodwinked by the Russians. This theme was introduced. There was also emphasis by Mao that there was a need for U.S. leadership in the world and that we should pay attention to our allies, including Europe, Japan, Pakistan, Iran, and Turkey. So that was that.

Q: We're still talking about the China thread and the period of your service on the NSC staff. There was a lot of euphoria, and this was all very exciting. Was there an undercurrent, discernible to you, about a build-up of the old China Lobby in the United States, including people from the Right Wing who really didn't like China? Was this a factor in Mao's thinking?

LORD: Actually, no. In fact, just the opposite. In our relations with China and our perceptions of that country, we have a history of swinging from one extreme to another. This goes back to American missionaries and the Boxer Rebellion [in the early 20th century] in reaction to the American missionaries. Even during the last 50 to 60 years the Chinese have tended to be portrayed either as evil, Fu Man Chus [a fictional character] or as noble peasants depicted by Pearl Buck in her novels. During this same period we were staunch allies of the Chinese during World War II. Then the Communists took over China, and we actually fought against them in Korea. We had images of the Chinese as yellow hordes, red guards, and blue ants working for Mao. The Cultural Revolution greatly enhanced these negative images. Then we had the dramatic opening of our relations with Kissinger and Nixon. The press coverage of China, on the whole, and the general reaction back in the US during the opening in the early 1970s attracted euphoria and tremendous support for the opening to China, much to our relief, despite 22 years of hostility and bad images of China. There still were people concerned about China, but there was great popular, Congressional and media support for the opening.

If anything, in visiting China President Nixon not only did something which was geopolitically correct but exceeded any of our expectations to domestic support. I think that the opening to China was very popular. I think that we all recollect it that way. So we all did not feel very much constrained in terms of the Right Wing or people being overly nervous about this process. There was tremendous support for what Nixon did. And this policy has always been cited as Nixon's most significant achievement as President.

Of course, this swinging back and forth in American opinion has continued ever since then. A few journalists at the time, such as Bill Buckley, Marilyn Berger, and some others, had doubts about the opening or whether China was as relatively benign as some visitors portrayed it. We didn't realize at the time how bad the Cultural Revolution was. As Americans began to work and live in China as journalists and academics and businesspeople, we began to learn about the horrors of the Cultural Revolution. Actually, this didn't officially end until 1976 but the late '60s saw the worst excesses. These accounts began to come out. Then we had the Deng Xiaoping take-over in 1978, the reforms, and the normalization of Chinese-American relations. Once again, we had accounts that China was going capitalist, and many became overly sanguine. Then, just as things were developing in a positive direction, we reached the Tiananmen Square Massacre in 1989, which greatly set back Chinese-American relations and still is a major problem in our relationship, not to mention the disappearance of the Soviet threat. Even as we speak, President Clinton is about to go to China again.

But to repeat, we didn't feel any constraints about the domestic impact of our policies toward China. Of course, we were still very careful about the Taiwan issue and the matter of friendship with Taiwan. That was and is still a very important issue in terms of our domestic politics, as well as our reputation as a friend and ally. On that issue we were careful, especially during the Ford years. However, on the whole, we didn't feel much political constraint on our relations with China.

Another out of sequence footnote: during the October, 1971, trip, there was the embarrassing issue of postponing our departure for China from a day. President Nixon was concerned about the timing of the UN debate on the Chinese representation issue. [That is, whether the China seat at the UN would be occupied by representatives of the People's Republic of China or the anti-communist Republic of China on Taiwan.] I forget why President Nixon wanted us to postpone our departure from China. In any event, we learned about Taiwan being kicked out of the UN and the PRC being admitted to the UN even as we were flying out of Shanghai in October, 1971. That UN vote was awkward on the domestic front.

Q: Was this one of these studies intended to tie the government up while the administration did what it wanted to do?

LORD: I'm going to give you a mixed response to that question. This was a genuine attempt to get information. Contributions to the response were made by CIA, DIA, the Joint Chiefs of Staff, our people on the ground, the State Department, and others. In other words, all of the relevant actors in Washington and overseas. Those contributions were assembled to make up the response.

Secondly, this was one of a series of National Security Study Memoranda. They were designed to do what was done on other issues, like the Middle East, Europe, and elsewhere. It is also true that contributing to these memoranda would keep the bureaucracy busy. But there was a real search for data and ideas. Some of the operational responsibilities on key issues would be taken by the secret negotiations through the NSC and Kissinger. However, in all fairness, in the very first months of the Nixon administration when these NSSMS were issued, there were no secret talks with the Chinese Communists and with the Vietnamese Communists.

I am sure that in the case of Vietnam secret negotiation was an issue for very early consideration, although I was not in the front office and was not involved in trying to arrange secret contacts with the Vietnamese Communists. So-called negotiations - in reality propaganda exchanges - were already taking place publicly in Paris, under arrangements made by the previous administration. There was a general feeling that we had to get more information. Also, there was a feeling that we needed more ideas. I do not want to be cynical here. Nixon and Kissinger probably had a rough outline in their minds as to what they wanted to do, but they wanted to get other people's views and additional information. They also wanted to get other people's support for whatever strategy they pursued.

Participating in making this study were not only all of the other agencies I mentioned previously, but also outside consultants, including a man named Daniel Ellsberg, who later leaked the Pentagon Papers. Of course, he was very dovish, even at that point. He had been one of the most extreme hawks. Other people were consulted on this matter. I was involved as a part of the planning staff in the Executive Office Building. And then I collated and summarized the agency responses for Kissinger.

I don't recall the precise sequencing of memoranda, decisions made, and deadlines. I think that it's fair to say that this was a very good, solid, intellectual process. It was genuine and not just a cynical cover exercise. It helped to shape the views and decisions of President Nixon and Kissinger. It helped to construct and gain support for the two-track strategy that I mentioned. Namely, Vietnamization, or turning over additional responsibility to South Vietnam, and serious negotiations with Hanoi at the same time.

Everything was looked at, whether it was pacification efforts, military efforts, or the diplomatic situation. Negotiations were then taking place publicly in Paris. Hanoi's strengths and the positions of allies were looked at very exhaustively. I think that this effort was well done.

In any event, out of this emerged pretty much of a consensus on pursuing Vietnamization and negotiating an end to the conflict. To be sure, the State Department was kept out of the secret negotiations. In retrospect, it is quite astounding that the State Department was also kept out of a lot of the secret exchanges with the Chinese, in addition to a lot of the negotiations conducted by Kissinger with the Russians. But we've been through that already. In addition to secret meetings we used extensively backchannel telegrams through the White House Situation Room.

As I've said, during this period there were two roles that the Planning Staff of Mort Halperin and myself, sitting over in the Executive Office Building, had to perform. One was to help to run the NSC system and to prepare agenda papers for NSC sub-groups and the NSC itself on various subjects. In that respect I helped Halperin put together the various papers, including those on Vietnam, which set out our options and so on.

The other role was to write think pieces for Kissinger on various subjects, in which I sometimes acted as devil's advocate in challenging some aspects of foreign policy. On other occasions it involved just looking ahead, noting that there was a problem coming up which we had to get on top of. During this period I sometimes helped Mort Halperin write these memoranda, although he would often write them on his own as well. Sometimes, I would write memos of my own. I wrote a series of memoranda, sometimes on my own and sometimes helping Halperin, to Kissinger on various subjects. At least a couple of them were on the Indochina situation.

I recall specifically a memorandum from me (through Halperin) on Laos in which I questioned aspects of our involvement in that country. I led off by quoting Kissinger himself, in which he said that sometimes it is more important to ask the right questions than to have all of the right answers. So my memo on Laos did not necessarily say that we ought to change our policy. In effect, it raised a series of questions as to whether this policy was working or whether there were some real problems with it. It was a definitely dovish memorandum, although I don't remember the details.

On Vietnam I believe that any memorandum went forward under Halperin's name, although I often helped him with memos of this kind. Again, without fundamentally challenging the policy on Vietnamization and negotiations, I might well have weighed in on the dovish side or the more skeptical side on what we were doing or how serious we should be about negotiations. What I am pointing out is that, without being uncomfortable with our overall approach, I would question the tactical side, at least in the case of a couple of memoranda to Kissinger. He would either see what I had done or knew what I had done with Halperin.

So I made my views known to Kissinger. This shows that he did not want a yes man and did not react violently to my views, saying, in effect: "How dare you challenge our policies?" He took just the opposite view. Indeed, this was important also, because this is what brought me to his attention. He saw me working with Halperin in NSC meetings, in the NSC system in general, and on specific papers. I think that he was impressed by the arguments that I made in some of these papers. They were not just on Indochina. There were other papers, on African policy and so on. Kissinger welcomed, indeed sought, disagreement so long as it was well argued.

Without my being immodest, I guess that these papers showed that there was a pretty good mind at work, not to mention some courage. Even if Kissinger was not always persuaded by the arguments, he at least thought that they were well presented. I think that it's fair to say that by participating in drafting these memoranda I derived a more general exposure to Kissinger and the NSC system. These memoranda brought me to his attention, so that when Tony Lake decided to leave the NSC staff, where he had been Special Assistant to Kissinger, I was asked to take Tony's place.

Q: This is the kind of thing that rankles you and troubles you even today, when you recount this story. However, did this incident have any effect on you and your operations later on? One would think that the bureaucracy would make you much more aggressive to make sure that all aspects of a report are right. Also, what was the attitude of the press about this error?

LORD: It certainly did not affect my relationship with Kissinger. In many ways, as I said, I appreciated his loyalty. He felt that I had been unfairly treated. He may have felt that I had not checked out this report carefully enough, but Kissinger never said that. In terms of my responsibilities as his Special Assistant, they continued to grow. I became very close to him, certainly personally, as well as in terms of substance. I got more and more involved in matters concerning Vietnam, not to mention Laos, Cambodia, and China.

In terms of my views I thought that the press had been unfair and that they had blown this error out of proportion. Give me a break. If this was all that had happened, it was unfair to blow it up to this extent. In fact, this was a very credible and full report, so I was resentful of the media.

In my job at the NSC, in succeeding years, I didn't do many reports like this. Dick Smyser and John Negroponte, as Vietnam experts, were the essential point of contact with the other agencies. My job was on negotiations on the Indochina countries. It was focused not so much on Vietnamization and the military aspects of the struggle, but on the negotiations to end the fighting. By definition, since the negotiations were secret, other people didn't know much about them anyway. So I didn't have much need to rely on the bureaucracy.

The only major case which I was involved in connection with the fighting concerned a report on the Cambodian incursion which I prepared. I can hardly believe that I did this report fairly soon after the Laos incident. It came out in June 1970. So, once again, I had to rely on the bureaucracy in preparing that report. I can't recall the details now, but I had to be super careful then, having been burned once. There were major reactions to the Cambodian incursion, but there was no major flap about alleged inaccuracies in the long report I prepared. There were of course sharp disagreements on whether the incursion itself was a good idea or not.

So that was a painful beginning to being a Special Assistant to Kissinger. Some time around then there was a leak about the secret bombing of Cambodia. I can't recall the date, but a story on this matter appeared in the New York Times. It was an article by Bill Beecher, who later went on to work for the Boston Globe. I only mention this now, because when I worked over in the Executive Office Building, I didn't know about the secret bombing of Cambodia. I can say with total honesty that I never leaked anything about this or any other subject throughout my tenure at the NSC. I mention this because it was that particular leak, in fact, that got President Nixon, Kissinger, and Haldeman up in flames about leaks in the sense that they were undermining our national security policies. Therefore, this led to their instituting the phone tapping. I can talk later about why this happened.

Q: Then let's not do it now.

LORD: I don't think that we should do it now. Wait until another time. I mention this now because I think that this was when telephone tapping was really going on. I just can't recall the timing of it. My phone was tapped, and I'll get into that later on in our discussions. I was suspicious of it because there seemed to be a humming sound on my phone.

Before I arrived in the West Wing as special assistant, there had been secret meetings with the Vietnamese, which Tony Lake had attended, in the summer of 1969. The next, secret contacts took place in the spring of 1970. My first secret meeting was in September 1970.

Let me now give you an overview of how the logistics of these trips worked. Along with the first, secret trip to China, which still ranks No. 1 in terms of drama, the secret trips to Paris to negotiate with the Vietnamese communists and try to negotiate an end to the anguish of this war were clearly dramatic highlights in my experience. There were the national interest and the James Bond aspects of these contacts, the secrecy and the high level of the negotiations, as well as the emotional aspects involved of trying to end a long and bloody war with all the domestic trauma as well.

(Since the interview in January 2003, Kissinger has published the definitive account of the Vietnam negotiations, "Ending the Vietnam War." I edited the manuscript, and Kissinger cites me as "my closest associate during the events recounted here." I commend the book to historians and everyone else interested in those issues.

Q: You remarked how your party went to Paris. Could you talk about the attitude and approach of the North Vietnamese?

LORD: Could I mention first another couple of aspects regarding logistics? I've given you the example of what happened on many of the 19 trips from Washington to Paris to meet with the North Vietnamese. These trips almost always messed up weekends and holidays, although a couple of times we had secret talks as part of public trips elsewhere. Once we went to London for other reasons, and we flew across the English Channel, secretly, to Paris to negotiate with the Vietnamese. Then we flew back to London. On another occasion, in July, 1971, we were in Paris on our way back from a secret trip to China. Not only did the world not know about our secret trip to China, but, while we were publicly in Paris, we had secret negotiations again with the North Vietnamese.

In some ways it was even more complicated to keep these discussions with the North Vietnamese secret than these weekend excursions from Washington. Everyone knew that Kissinger was in Paris and was probably following him, in a sense. So we had an elaborate operation working with the American Ambassador, who was Richard Watson. We had to find a way for Kissinger to negotiate with the North Vietnamese without people in Paris knowing about it. So the cover story was that Kissinger was holed up in the Embassy, talking to Ambassador Watson. Dick Smyser and I went off on our own to a big, open plaza looking at the Eiffel Tower.

Q: What role did Al Haig play at this particular time?

LORD: Haig was certainly on the hawkish side and supported the Cambodian incursion on all the grounds mentioned above. He can speak for himself and has written that American involvement in Indochina was required on military grounds. He has displayed total contempt for those who would leave the President, both in terms of loyalty or the lack of it, and in terms of their intellectual approach. I'm sure that he was disdainful of those who left the NSC staff on this issue. He may have been polite or semi-polite in terms of his feelings, but I'm sure that this was his basic reaction as a soldier. He was also hawkish in terms of not deserting your commander-in-chief at a time of crisis. So that was another interesting episode.

I think that covers Cambodia, and it's time to go back to Vietnam. On Vietnam I've mentioned the logistics and I've sort of touched on how we prepared for the negotiations with the North Vietnamese before we met with them. Dick Smyser, then John Negroponte, and I would work on a memo from Kissinger to the President, saying that we would be meeting again with the North Vietnamese. Here's what is my strategy. So we got President Nixon to sign off on this basic approach to the meeting. We would also prepare opening statements which we might attach as a Tab to the main memorandum, if Nixon wanted to review in detail what Kissinger would say in his opening statement to the North Vietnamese. Basically, the guts of the strategy and our lines would be covered in the memorandum anyway.

So we prepared a memo for Nixon, which included the general approach, and we also prepared Kissinger's opening statement, as I've said. In addition, we assembled some background materials on the facts, and transcripts of previous meetings. We would set out the likely North Vietnamese positions, what we hoped to accomplish and the formula that we might try out, and how we might try to conduct the meetings. These were very careful preparations which, as I've said, we continued to work on the plane trip over. Then, when we would get back, there would be a memorandum from Kissinger to President Nixon, reporting on the meeting and giving his assessment of it. On this, I would get help from Dick Smyser and then John Negroponte.

Now, as a general proposition partly out of hope and partly out of some evidence, we were probably somewhat more optimistic than Nixon about the possibility that the negotiations might produce real progress. Nixon was more skeptical. He, of course, approved of our doing this, but I think that his basic view was that the North Vietnamese were revolutionaries and that there was little prospect that we would achieve much. Over the course of two or three years Kissinger and I were somewhat more hopeful. Probably Dick Smyser agreed with our view, while Negroponte was probably more skeptical. Nixon, and most likely Haig, probably felt that we weren't getting very far. They didn't go so far as to say that the North Vietnamese were simply fooling us, but Nixon suspected that there was no real give in their position. Nevertheless, he approved of our continuing with the negotiations, on the off chance that we could make a breakthrough. In any event, Nixon knew that, for the historical record and when the secret negotiations were made public at some point, he could say: "Look, I was trying to be reasonable." He was trying to protect his domestic flank.

Not to mention, to be uncynical about it, that Nixon genuinely wanted to end the war. He didn't want to have Americans and South Vietnamese killed. He wanted to turn to other issues. He wanted to end our domestic strife. He wanted to end the war with credibility and honor. So if there was some chance that the negotiations might work, fine. However, basically, I think that Nixon was somewhat more skeptical than we were.

There were times when we thought that there was possible progress, if we looked carefully. I remember specifically the July 1971, meeting, after we came back from the secret trip to China and then met secretly with the North Vietnamese in Paris. We thought that Le Duc Tho [chief North Vietnamese negotiator] and his deputy, Xuan Thuy, were somewhat more forthcoming. On this occasion I recall Kissinger and I thought: "Boy, we may have pulled off a double header on this trip." Not only was there a dramatic opening to China, but maybe we had made a significant advance in the Vietnam negotiations.

A couple of general points. When we met with the North Vietnamese, they would have either one or another head of delegation. Either Le Duc Tho or Xuan Thuy. I once made a pun when we were complaining to each other about Xuan Thuy's performance, which didn't add up to very much. I said: "Xuan Thuy (Wan Twee) doesn't make a forest." So if the North Vietnamese delegation was headed only by Xuan Thuy, we knew that he didn't have the authority to do much and the meeting would be a holding action effort. He was something like a deputy foreign minister. He couldn't negotiate seriously. He would simply repeat their positions.

On the other hand, if the North Vietnamese leader was Le Duc Tho, there was a chance of his being serious. He was Number Five in rank in the Politburo. He was a major political figure and could speak authoritatively for Hanoi. Xuan Thuy was more of a bureaucrat than a representative with his own authority. We never expected very much from Xuan Thuy, although we would still make statements in his presence. We knew that they would go back to Hanoi and be read carefully there. We kept the process going but we hoped that there would be more progress.

Q: Did you feel that the opening to China might have undercut the North Vietnamese position somewhat?

LORD: We felt that the openings to both China and Russia would help us. As I said earlier, President Nixon put great weight on the Russian dimension in particular in adding to the psychological isolation of Hanoi. When Hanoi saw that their two patrons were dealing with us, particularly at the time of the summit meetings of 1972, Nixon thought that Hanoi might get concerned and progress might be made. While we were fighting in Vietnam and simultaneously were meeting with the Russians and Chinese at the highest level, this would cause some unease in Hanoi. Secondly, the Russian and Chinese leaders had a stake in the development of our bilateral relationship. The Vietnamese conflict was an ideological and a political brake and irritant in our relationship. Nixon thought that the Russians and Chinese would lean on Hanoi to make a reasonable deal with us as they could move ahead with their bilateral ties with us.

In our contacts with the Russians and Chinese we essentially said: "Look, please tell Hanoi that we are not unreasonable, that we're willing to have an honorable settlement. However, it's got to be a military settlement. You cannot expect us to sell out our allies, overthrow the Saigon government, as we pull out." Our basic pitch was that we were prepared to leave Vietnam, and let the Vietnamese decide on their political future. As we went on, we got more and more precise about leaving unilaterally, if not on a mutual basis. We wanted a cease-fire and the return of our prisoners of war. However, what we were not prepared to do was to overthrow the Thieu Government in South Vietnam and have a coalition government to replace it. I think that we began to introduce the themes of reconciliation and maybe even economic assistance to Vietnam as additional incentives. We said that this was a reasonable outcome for Hanoi. Moreover, consider that we're trying to develop a bilateral relationship with you. From your standpoint, the Vietnam War is getting in the way and is a distraction in the way of improving relations with you. So it's in your interest to get this Vietnam War out of the way, not to mention showing that we can work together on some of these issues.

We hoped that this line with the Chinese and Russians would help the negotiations. We knew that, by itself, it wouldn't be decisive, but we thought that, combined with military pressure and a reasonable negotiating position, it would help to end the war. Now, we can't be sure how much Russia and China weighed in with Hanoi. We're quite sure, without having actual proof, that Zhou En-lai and others did not think that our position was unreasonable.

There is some circumstantial evidence that the Chinese, in their own interests, conveyed our rationale to Hanoi. In our discussions, Zhou would urge us to get out to Vietnam, but I don't recall his urging us to overthrow the Saigon government. The pitch that we made in terms of their national interest was that Hanoi ought to accept our proposals. They could spin this further by pointing out to Hanoi that the Saigon Government was weak and that it might be taken over eventually, once the Americans were out of Vietnam. Their considerations perhaps appealed to Hanoi, but I think that Hanoi was independent enough that it wouldn't fold under pressure from either Russia or China.

Of course, in retrospect, we now know how much China and North Vietnam opposed each other. They fought their own war along the Sino-Vietnamese border a few years later. I don't think that the China equation had a major impact on Hanoi. However, this was certainly one of the reasons that we opened up to China and tried to improve relations with Russia, although this was not the main reason. I think that, around the edges, it probably helped us with Hanoi, and we finally got a settlement in 1973, which I'll discuss later.

Q: What about the nomination and campaign of George McGovern [Democratic Party presidential nominee who was notably opposed to our policies on Vietnam]? Or should we postpone discussion of that?

LORD: I'd rather reserve that, because it was directly relevant to the breakthrough in the negotiations and why there was a breakthrough.

I'd like to make one other point on the North Vietnamese style of negotiations. I've already mentioned that their style was to hang in there, maybe being friendly on some occasions and tough on other occasions. However, essentially, and month after month, and year after year, their basic position was to call for a unilateral, U.S. withdrawal, the establishment of a coalition government in Saigon, and to stick with all these positions, in a revolutionary spirit. They tended to look to their long investment in what they were doing, feeling that domestic support for the U.S. position was crumbling, for all of the reasons that I've mentioned. So they basically sought to wear us down. They would come, essentially as a part of their negotiating style, to listen to our positions and see whether the United States was going to make more concessions and move closer to what they wanted.

This is in contrast to other, negotiating styles, if I may digress briefly. Kissinger was very good at understanding and negotiating with different interlocutors, depending on their cultural and historical styles. For example, in the case of the Chinese, he preferred their negotiating style the most. Basically, they would take a position on principle. Then each side would establish its basic principles and state what it had to have, at a minimum. Then, within this framework, we would negotiate about reaching an agreement. At the beginning the Chinese would avoid exaggerating or inflating their positions and then bargain them down, like rug merchants, (and like the Russians). I'm talking about the Chinese style in the 1970s, not in the 1990s. They have a much more conventional, haggling approach today.

In negotiations the Russians are more like rug merchants. They inflate their positions, exaggerate what they need, and expect you to do the same. Then you can haggle, haggle, and haggle, and finally reach an agreement. Even then you have to be careful about how they would implement the agreement, whereas we felt the Chinese carried out their obligations.

The Israelis were like Talmudic scholars and lawyers. They have an understandable sense of insecurity, given their history and the fact that they are surrounded by the Arabs. They were very cautious about every semi-colon and every last detail of every negotiation. They would haggle and set out to exhaust you with their suspicions of the Arabs. Kissinger, for example, would go to Golda Meir or Rabin, or whomever we were negotiating with. The Israelis would present 10 demands or requests from the Egyptians. Kissinger would go to President Anwar Sadat of Egypt, get agreement on nine out of 10, go back to Tel Aviv, and present this to the Israelis. Then the Israelis, instead of being grateful for getting nine out of 10 of their demands, would complain that he hadn't gotten the 10th demand for them. Anwar Sadat was more romantic and emotional. He was willing to take a big step as a visionary, as long as Kissinger appealed to Egyptian dignity, self interest, and so on.

So it was very interesting to see the various, negotiating styles, including the North Vietnamese practice of just wearing you down and waiting to hear your concessions. In retrospect, they had no real intention of compromising until they had real incentives to do so, as they did in the fall of 1972.

Q: How did our records reflect what went on at the meetings? Did they indicate that the discussion was all very nice, but let's get to the substance of the negotiation?

LORD: Kissinger had a good sense of humor, but sometimes it did not lend itself to those meetings. With all of his interlocutors, including the Russians, the Chinese, the Israelis, the Egyptians, and the Vietnamese he made jokes. He and Lu Duc Tho would often go off and walk around privately and it would seem they were having serious discussions.

Kissinger was very hard-headed, of course. He was not naïve. He was with hard-headed revolutionaries, representing national interests. He knew that they would not suddenly become more flexible because they liked Henry Kissinger. However, Kissinger felt that there was still something to be said, even with this group of North Vietnamese, even more than with other interlocutors, for trying to have some personal relationship. He would break the tension, at times, with humor. He would try to establish his credibility for carrying out commitments and respectability for genuinely seeking agreement. Maybe personal touches would help around the edges. Then, when Le Duc Tho or Xuan Thuy would report back to the Politburo, they would draft their reports somewhat more favorably than might otherwise be the case. Kissinger had no illusions that this effort would make a significant difference in this respect. I think that he was correct in trying to do that. It never hurts to try and be more personable, so long as one has no illusions about the real impact.

By the same token, Kissinger would be very tough and sharp if he thought that Hanoi was getting arrogant. He would come back hard at them, either in the plenary session, or he might well do it, one on one, so that there wouldn't be quite so much face lost. Or he might convey privately, in some discussion, some particularly ominous message from the President. He might say that the President was running out of patience, or whatever it was. So he would try to use different techniques of his own with the North Vietnamese. It was fascinating.

Q: Do you think that the North Vietnamese were aware of the progress being made in the negotiations with China?

LORD: I don't think so. Certainly, we didn't tell them. Now, whether the Chinese informed their North Vietnamese allies, I don't know. This was between the time when we had been secretly to China, just a few days earlier, and the time when President Nixon publicly announced the agreement reached with the Chinese in San Clemente, California, a few days later. We were on our way back to San Clemente to report to the President on the trip and the negotiations on the opening to China. I suspect that the North Vietnamese didn't know. It hadn't come out publicly. We certainly wouldn't have told them. We kept this secret until Nixon released this bombshell in San Clemente. I suspect that the North Vietnamese had not been told of this development by the Chinese.

Q: Was there any interplay between the public meetings and the secret meetings?

LORD: I think that the best appraisal is that we would hang tougher in the public sessions than in the private sessions. In the interest of public opinion and international propaganda we always tried to make our position look at least reasonable, but in terms of substance we would reserve any real flexibility for the private, secret talks. I don't recall any interplay beyond that. Considerations of timing were not important.

I forget how the public meetings went, whether they were held once a week or once a month. I don't recall this. They were pretty well developed. Both sides, essentially, presented their public positions, appealing to international opinion. We knew that there would never be any real progress in the public talks. We have already talked about secrecy in discussing the opening to China. I agreed with it but there was a certain price that we paid, i.e. with Japan. The rationale for secrecy in the Vietnam negotiations was entirely justified. That is, if there was ever going to be any progress, each side had to be able to speak freely, without having to worry about their domestic opinion, their allies, or anything else.

In our case we also had the South Vietnamese Government to consider. (Hanoi, of course, totally controlled the Viet Cong.) We kept them generally posted. We would send off a cable on the secret meetings for the information of Ambassador Bunker in Saigon, but being careful to not scare the South Vietnamese. We did not wish to betray them, but, in fact, we went beyond what we were telling them through Bunker. We didn't want to get President Thieu prematurely excited about the sessions and try to lock us in on tough positions. I think that it's fair to say that we were less than totally forthcoming with the South Vietnamese and that we rounded off some of the edges in the reporting on the secret sessions which we sent to Ambassador Bunker to draw on in his discussions with President Thieu. On the other hand, most of the ideas floated in Paris were somewhat tentative and exploratory.

Q: Had we informed the North Vietnamese in advance that we were going to do this?

LORD: We did, just in advance. We didn't want to give them too much warning because they might leak the story and pre-empt us. I think that at the last minute before the speech was given, we told the North Vietnamese that they hadn't responded privately to our proposals. In fact, I suspect that we told them at the very last minute. I know that we didn't tell them well in advance, because we thought that they would rush out and leak the story, spinning it their way.

So on the whole I was pleased with the results of the speech. It showed a good faith effort to end the war. On a personal level my friends could see what we had been doing. The down side was that the North Vietnamese, who were so tough and cynical, anyway, would be upset that we had revealed the negotiations and that this might undercut them with their own friends, the Viet Cong, and embarrass the hard liners in the Politburo. They might also conclude that it was showing bad faith to reveal these secret negotiations and would put them in a spot. As a result, they might dig in their heels and, as a result, become even more intransigent. That was the down side. In fact, secret negotiations are kept secret so that each side can speak more frankly, so that you can hope to make progress. We risked that advantage by going public regarding the fact of the secret negotiations. But we weren't making progress in the secret talks after more than two years. Hanoi had not responded to our flexible proposals, and we hadn't met since September.

I know that I felt, and this was a pretty unanimous view, including President Nixon, that it was important to set the record straight and to say that we were not making progress because of Hanoi's intransigence. Maybe this would embarrass Hanoi enough or rally international opinion and certainly shore up American support, so that we'd be in a stronger position to carry on. The speech also made clear how far we'd come on Vietnamization and the progress we were making in this regard. A final reason, I'm sure, in terms of the timing of the speech, now that I think of it, was that the speech was going to be delivered a month before the President's trip to China, followed by a summit meeting in Moscow with the Soviet leaders. So I think that the President also wanted to get his views on the Vietnam negotiations on record, as he headed toward China. The dates of the China trip had already been made public, and Deputy National Security Adviser Al Haig had already been to China. This speech not only had an effect on domestic public opinion but also, presumably, it helped us in dealing with the Chinese. So there were a lot of reasons for giving this speech, and it was a good thing to do.

So the Nixon speech of January 25, 1972, was an important one. The next important events were the President's trip to China in February 1972, and his trip to Moscow in May 1972. In terms of Hanoi's bilateral relationships with its friends we hoped that this would increase their sense of isolation and make them more reasonable.

The next important period in Vietnam at that time was April 1972. The North Vietnamese launched a major offensive against South Vietnam. (End of tape)

Q: You were saying that the President had a major decision to make.

LORD: The President had a major decision to make. He was scheduled to go to Moscow in a couple of weeks. The issue was how to respond to this major attack by North Vietnam on South Vietnam.

First of all, this offensive was having some impact south of the DMZ [Demilitarized Zone along the 17th parallel of latitude] and in the northern part of South Vietnam, in terms of the military balance. The North Vietnamese were making some real inroads. So there was a military question as to whether this was really a danger to our overall goals in South Vietnam.

Secondly, the offensive showed that they not only were not responding to our offers, which we had revealed publicly, but the North Vietnamese were instead stepping up their military attacks. This was just the opposite of being reasonable.

Thirdly, and this was very much in President Nixon's mind, they were stepping up the attacks on American and South Vietnamese troops with conventional North Vietnamese forces, which were blatantly crossing the border [on the 17th parallel] and so on. They were doing this at a time when the President was about to go to Moscow, which was providing aid to the North Vietnamese. So, in terms of psychology, domestic public opinion, and credibility, the President was very concerned about being in Moscow in May 1972, at a time when American troops were being killed with Russian weapons provided to the North Vietnamese.

So the military balance with Hanoi and Hanoi's psychology in taking advantage of us by attacking and not responding in the negotiations were serious considerations. But, above all, Nixon envisioned talking to the Russians and clinking champagne glasses while the Russians were providing military materiel to the North Vietnamese who were killing American troops. Thus President Nixon felt that we had to respond vigorously to the North Vietnamese offensive, specifically by bombing targets around Hanoi and mining Haiphong harbor. It would be weak and humiliating not to respond to their attacks. He couldn't go to Moscow in that way.

Counter arguments were advanced by various people, including me, and, to some degree, Kissinger and others. First, all agreed we had to respond to the military threat on the ground. The question was the degree of this response. If we went so far as to bomb around Hanoi and mine Haiphong harbor, Moscow might call off the summit meeting. I remember that there was a meeting in the White House Situation Room, chaired by Kissinger, probably with representatives from CIA, DIA, and from the State and Defense Departments, the NSC, and others. The purpose of the meeting was to judge what the Russian reaction would be to a major escalation, or counter-escalation by us. I believe that, perhaps with one or two exceptions, everybody at that meeting felt that if we bombed around Hanoi and mined Haiphong harbor, we would lose the forthcoming Summit Meeting with the Russians. The general feeling was that the Russians would cancel the meeting.

We had made major progress with the Soviets, and we can talk about this later. The fact of the opening to China made the Russians more reasonable on the issues of arms control, Berlin, economic relations, and so forth. So we were heading for a Summit Meeting which was set up with a lot of major agreements close to conclusion, including those affecting SALT [Strategic Arms Limitation Treaty, then in the process of negotiation], arms control, and many other aspects of Soviet-American relations, not to mention the double header of the Summit Meetings in China and in Russia. So we had a lot invested emotionally, intellectually, substantively, and politically looking toward this major advance in relations with the Russians. This had been one of our objectives for several years. Our positions were well established and well prepared. All of this now threatened to go down the tubes at the last minute, because of the proposed bombing of Hanoi and the mining of Haiphong harbor.

To his credit, in my view, President Nixon's position was firm and correct. First of all, as I said, he couldn't afford to look so weak, and he would do less well with the Russians if he went to Moscow and didn't respond vigorously to their North Vietnamese ally attacking us with Russian arms. He might be regarded as a wimp by the Russians as well as Americans and the world, if he was in Moscow while American soldiers were getting killed with Soviet-made weapons and we were not responding. Secondly, and this is what distinguished Nixon from everybody else, and certainly Kissinger, he boldly predicted that the Russians would not cancel the Summit Meeting. He believed the Russians would go ahead anyway and let the President go to Moscow, looking strong and reacting strongly against the North Vietnamese attacks. He would gain the grudging respect of the Russians and wouldn't lose all of the benefits of the Summit Meeting in the fields of arms control and everything else. So he could have his cake and eat it, too, as the popular saying goes. Even if the Russians canceled the meeting, Nixon felt that it was better not to go to Moscow in view of our goals in Vietnam and international credibility. The worst outcome would be to go to Moscow and not do anything vis-a-vis North Vietnam.

Nixon proved to be prescient, just as he proved that those who were concerned about losing the Summit Meeting were wrong. On this issue Kissinger has to speak for himself. I suspect that Kissinger understood the need for the President to appear to be vigorous in his response on this issue. I also know that Kissinger felt that we might lose the Summit Meeting in Moscow, and he and I agonized over this. Therefore, I think, Kissinger was truly ambivalent on how to deal with this matter. I think that, on balance, he didn't want us to go as far as we did militarily but I don't want to speak for him. Surely he credits Nixon in retrospect for his courageous prescience.

I myself was opposed to the escalation of the air war against North Vietnam, partly because of my moderately dovish stance on carrying the war to North Vietnam. I felt that, above all, we shouldn't lose all of the advantages which we had gained in terms of relations with the Russians - arms control, Berlin, etc. So I was unhappy with this escalation in the air war against North Vietnam. In this respect, I was probably wrong. I was certainly wrong in terms of my estimate of what the Russians would do.

Q: Was the argument made that, since we had made this breakthrough to China, the Russians, that is to say, the Soviets were concerned with our gaining an advantage with the Chinese if the Soviets got huffy in their relations with the U.S.? Almost inadvertently, we were playing the China card.

LORD: A very good point. I'm sure that that's one of the arguments that Nixon made, that the Russians had a stake in this Summit Meeting as well and that they couldn't afford to be one-upped by the Chinese. Fortunately, we had already had our Summit Meeting with the Chinese. I don't know what China would have done in the same situation. They might have canceled the Summit Meeting. However, this happened after the Summit Meeting between the U.S. and China. Nixon felt that we wouldn't have any respect from the Russians if he went to Moscow looking like a wimp in the face of this North Vietnamese offensive, using Russian arms.

These were Nixon's arguments, including the China dimension, and they showed his really firm, geopolitical grasp of the situation. I still recall flying up to Camp David on a beautiful spring day [Presidential retreat in northern Maryland, near the Pennsylvania border] with Kissinger in a helicopter to work with one of President Nixon's speechwriters on the speech announcing the bombing of Hanoi and the mining of Haiphong harbor. I was very depressed. Both of us were saying: "All of this effort with the Russians is going to go down the drain." It was a dramatic moment.

So we were able to roll back the North Vietnamese offensive, and the Russians went ahead with the Summit Meeting in Moscow. However, we didn't make any progress in negotiations with the North Vietnamese over the next few months. We had several more meetings with them in 1972 in July, August, and mid-September. We then had one in late September where, for the first time, although we knew that we had been overly optimistic before, we felt that the North Vietnamese had indicated that maybe they might become more flexible. I distinctly remember that it wasn't a breakthrough, but clearly their tone was changing. Then we had the breakthrough in October. Let me explain why this happened.

The North Vietnamese had just been hanging in there with their intransigent, revolutionary position, as I've said. They weren't about to be flexible, anyway, but they had an added incentive to be intransigent in the summer of 1972. By then our presidential election was coming up. At some point during that summer Senator McGovern got the Democratic Party nomination and was offering a deal way beyond what the Nixon administration was prepared to offer. That is, he was offering support for a coalition government to be established in Saigon, as well as a unilateral U.S. withdrawal from South Vietnam.

During the summer of 1972, even though Hanoi didn't know how the election would come out, the polls showed Nixon quite far ahead. The North Vietnamese probably did their own wishful thinking and felt that McGovern could still win. This meant first, that Hanoi should avoid giving Nixon any sign of progress in the negotiations with the U.S., which might help get him reelected.

Secondly, in the hope that McGovern would win the North Vietnamese would get free concessions from McGovern in terms of what Hanoi wanted politically, as well as militarily. In short, they could just wait for McGovern to pull the U.S. out of Vietnam and hand over the Saigon government to Hanoi. McGovern was essentially saying, I want the prisoners back and the North Vietnamese can have everything else. So there was no movement in the negotiations with the North Vietnamese during the summer of 1972.

By September 1972, the polls were very clear. Partly due to a spectacular record in foreign policy, Nixon was way ahead. Due to the combination of the fact that President Nixon had gone to China and Russia, plus his January 1972 speech on negotiations with North Vietnam, which had helped us shore up support for the Vietnam War, and other reasons, Nixon was in a strong position. McGovern was a very extreme liberal. This wasn't a centrist Democratic challenge to the President. It was a very liberal challenge to him. Even with all other factors balanced in, there was still a silent majority of people who supported the Vietnam War, plus many others who felt that we should try to end it but felt that McGovern was just totally capitulating to the North Vietnamese. Furthermore, McGovern was attacking American motives, plus everything else. He was preaching isolationism and American guilt, so for a variety of reasons, President Nixon was way ahead in the polls.

By September 1972, even the North Vietnamese, for all of their wishful thinking, began to realize that they were probably going to face Nixon for another four years. Then, by October 1972, this perspective became more concrete in our talks. In September the change in the North Vietnamese attitude had been a kind of mood music. In October 1972, the North Vietnamese presented a specific proposal to us. It was raised on October 8.

So we went over to Paris for this October meeting. By now the North Vietnamese calculation was as follows. First of all, Nixon was likely to be more flexible during the remaining weeks before the election in November. Even though Nixon had an apparent victory in hand, he would want to increase his mandate and make sure he won by looking as if he was negotiating a settlement in Vietnam. So the North Vietnamese figured that Nixon would be at his most conciliatory and would be prepared to make some further concessions on the home stretch in the elections campaign.

Q: By now these meetings were being announced publicly.

LORD: They were being announced afterwards, immediately after conclusion, but not in advance. Secondly, the North Vietnamese figured that if Nixon was going to win, he would no longer have to worry about being reelected. He had a new mandate for four years. The North Vietnamese had already concluded that he was a madman at times, e.g. by bombing Hanoi and mining the harbor at Haiphong [in May 1972]. God knows what he would do when he was free of worrying about public opinion and reelection. Of course, we tried to encourage the North Vietnamese to worry about Nixon being a madman. So the North Vietnamese probably felt that they had better lock this up now, since they weren't going to get McGovern. They were going to get a potential madman for another four years.

So this was the reason, and the only reason, why the North Vietnamese suddenly became more reasonable. They were not being defeated on the battlefield. The overall situation was still very much a stalemate. The Vietnamization program was proceeding. However, the North Vietnamese evidently felt that they could get a good deal, Nixon would be eager for a settlement, and they would avoid having to face Nixon as a mad man in his second term.

We went over to Paris for this meeting in October 1972, and were given a present by Le Duc Tho. We still had a lot of work to do on it, but basically, it was the break that we were looking for. It incorporated the unilateral withdrawal of U.S. forces and the release of our prisoners, on the military side. The language of the proposal was fairly specific in this respect. The North Vietnamese proposal also included a cease-fire in place and international supervision of the agreement. The North Vietnamese had moved away from their insistence on a coalition government. There still was some tough negotiating, but they used some new language. They proposed a national reconciliation arrangement, but, in effect, they would leave President Thieu in power in Saigon. So the North Vietnamese dropped the political demands that they had stuck with for years. From my point of view, not to mention Nixon and Kissinger, these demands were something that we shouldn't compromise on.

We received this North Vietnamese proposal at the opening session. Kissinger called for a break in the meeting. I still remember walking with him on a Sunday afternoon in a garden, somewhere in the Paris suburbs. We said to each other: "This is it. We've done it." We knew that we had a lot of tough slogging ahead with the North Vietnamese. Then, of course, we had to get South Vietnamese agreement. However, essentially, the North Vietnamese had dropped their political demands and were willing to have a military settlement only, even though there was a lot of fudgy language about it.

This was a very exciting moment. We continued the negotiations for several more days. We reported home to President Nixon, of course. We didn't want to get Washington's hopes up unnecessarily. So we said that we had made some major progress, though we didn't claim that we were home free. We began to alert the South Vietnamese but again avoided overly exciting them. We said that we had made some progress and were going to continue the negotiations. We had to reply to the North Vietnamese with a counter-proposal the next day. Kissinger had me and John Negroponte take the North Vietnamese draft and then change it, within reason, to meet them part way and keep the negotiations going but also address our remaining concerns.

That night, and I believe that it was the night of October 8, 1972, Negroponte and I took the draft. We worked all night until 3:00 AM. Kissinger had gone out for dinner. He came back, looked at the draft, woke us up at 8:00 AM [on October 9] and said that our draft was too tough. He felt that we had put too many more demands back in and that we hadn't been flexible enough for Hanoi to accept. He gave us some instructions on how to loosen up the draft somewhat. Some of them affected the tone, and some affected the substance of the re-draft but of course Kissinger remained firm on the key points. This was a concrete settlement. It was not just a proposal. It contained the actual points of a settlement. So we were instructed to make it a little more forthcoming, both in substance as well as tone. I don't recall all of the details. By noon on October 9 we had a re-draft, which Kissinger accepted.

We went back to the North Vietnamese. We had several days of further negotiations, until October 11, trying to improve the draft, generally keeping Washington and Saigon informed. The last day ran for 14 hours straight. As usual we were preparing verbatim transcripts. I couldn't even go to the bathroom when I wanted to, and I had plenty of coffee to keep me going. After Kissinger had made a presentation, I would have taken the notes and, perhaps, be a sentence or two behind him. Then I would catch up when the interpreters started reading the Vietnamese translation. I would have some time while the interpreters were putting Kissinger's statement into Vietnamese and then more time as the North Vietnamese would respond to the Kissinger statement in Vietnamese which I couldn't do anything about, anyway. I had some more time while the North Vietnamese were speaking before it was translated into English for us. So I had a double header of a break in that context. I would wait for a particularly long Kissinger statement, complete the verbatim notes on what he said, and then race out of the room, go to the bathroom, and get back in time, between the translation into Vietnamese and the translation into English of what the North Vietnamese said in reply.

We were really very tired, throughout this period. There were problems, for example, with getting the specific details of when we would get our POWs [Prisoners of War] back and details of proposals on Laos and Cambodia as well as Vietnam. The North Vietnamese would claim that they didn't have control over their friends [North Vietnamese allies in Laos and Cambodia]. It is possible that this posture, in fact, was true, particularly with regard to Cambodia, although less so in the case of Laos. We had to make sure that we got our prisoners back from Laos and Cambodia, and we were trying to get the communist side to withdraw its troops from there and to have a cease-fire extended there. So that was a problem. Another problem was allowing military aid to both sides to continue after a cease-fire. Then there were the details of the international supervisory system and what the status of the DMZ [Demilitarized Zone] was. This was the actual dividing line between North and South Vietnam. There were still a lot of details to handle, and a lot of tough questions to be resolved, but the basic breakthrough had been achieved. The North Vietnamese no longer insisted on a coalition government. The language of the draft made it clear that President Thieu would remain in power, while suggesting that there could be a negotiation perhaps leading toward a government of national reconciliation. We tried to make that as vague and as meaningless as possible. In fact, the object was to keep the Saigon Government in power.

We basically put together a draft agreement. Meanwhile, during this period Hanoi was pressing Kissinger to come and visit North Vietnam, as a final, symbolic gesture to make peace and to show, I guess, that we were sort of paying tribute to Hanoi. Not to mention that this made Saigon somewhat nervous. So there was a further question as to whether, after going to Saigon and trying to get President Thieu's agreement to the draft, we would go to North Vietnam as well. Kissinger was willing to dangle this possibility to get the North Vietnamese to be more flexible about the agreement, on the assumption that it was worth doing. There was some disagreement with Washington on whether we ought to go to Hanoi. In addition, we didn't want to be nitpicked by President Nixon and Al Haig [Deputy National Security Adviser] on the details of the agreement. However, we kept Washington generally posted on what we were doing. The same with the Saigon Government, which we also kept posted, to avoid, as I say, getting their paranoia into overdrive.

The final day of these negotiations was October 11, 1972. So there were four days of negotiations, but one of these days went for 14 hours straight. Kissinger prepared to go back and report to President Nixon. We had a draft agreement initially agreed, but with some outstanding issues of a secondary nature remaining to be resolved. There were also some technical questions of what specific phrases meant, and so on. So this was an exhausting period of several days, including all night sessions of redrafting, checking, sending cables, reporting, and filling in Saigon and Washington, as well as preparing talking points for the next day. We also had to prepare new proposals, in addition to verbatim note taking and so on.

I was left behind in Paris with FSO [Foreign Service Officer] Dave Engle, who by then had been involved in the negotiations as our top Vietnamese speaker in the Foreign Service. He and I were left behind to have technical talks with the North Vietnamese to clear up some of these sub-issues. So we sat down with the North Vietnamese at the next meeting. I don't remember the details except I was both exhilarated and exhausted. Kissinger took off for Washington, and a few hours later we met with the North Vietnamese. It was quite dramatic at my young age to be directly negotiating the document (albeit minor issues) which could end our longest war.

Dave Engle and I then had to negotiate with the North Vietnamese at our level on the agreement and settle some of the details on the language. We tried to push them in some respects on some of these issues and clarify the meaning on other issues. Engle would have to check out the Vietnamese language on some of the questions. That was a rather challenging experience for me, actually to be negotiating with the North Vietnamese myself. Again, this was pretty heady stuff for someone like me in his early 30s, negotiating the text to end the war in Vietnam. Even though the basic negotiation had been handled by Kissinger, and this was more technical, still I felt a sense that, though I was exhausted, I was doing something extremely historic and very important.

We worked for about 10 hours straight, with no sleep. I think that we did a pretty damned good job of getting movement on some of these questions and clarifying other things. So I went to sleep, ready to take off the next morning and come back with this annotated draft and with the changes made in agreement with the North Vietnamese. I got a phone call from Al Haig or somebody back in Washington, speaking on behalf of Kissinger. I don't remember the details, but I had to go back again to the North Vietnamese, having thought that I had finished, and make some more points with them. I think that we tried to get a couple of more changes. This was one last episode. I was truly exhausted by this time. Then I got on the plane, a commercial flight, of course, going back to Washington with Dave Engle.

I remember being very emotionally moved by this moment. I felt that we had reached a final settlement at the end of these long, anguished years that had consumed our society. I felt that I had played a crucial role in it and had acted on behalf of Kissinger and the President. I remember going into the plane's bathroom and crying out of a sense of joy and exhaustion. It was a very emotional moment.

We arrived back in Washington. I went over to see Kissinger and reviewed the changes that we had negotiated with the North Vietnamese. He was quite satisfied with them. We made a report to President Nixon.

Then, of course, our next step was to go to Saigon and present this wonderful agreement we had negotiated. Dave Engel had been certified as qualified by the Foreign Service in the Vietnamese language. We had confidence in his ability to check out the translation into Vietnamese. I don't recall whether we had anybody else check it, because the text was so closely held, until we got to a more public stage. What we had was a text which had been negotiated by Kissinger, with some technical and secondary issues of judgment handled by myself with the North Vietnamese. However, there were still some loose ends. These were significant details. I am sure that these included Laos, Cambodia, the DMZ, and some other issues. We were still not entirely satisfied, but the basic issues had been solved and we thought that we now had a rough agreement, in draft, and ad referendum [subject to subsequent confirmation] by Hanoi's Politburo and our President. Of course, we made it clear to the North Vietnamese that we would have to sell this draft to our ally in South Vietnam.

Before we went to Saigon to review the agreement with President Thieu we sent a cable ahead to foreshadow to some extent that we had something. I forget the term we used, but we said that it represented a breakthrough, a possible agreement, or something like that. We clearly let Thieu know, through Ambassador Bunker, that we were coming to discuss this draft with him. So off we went to Saigon in mid-October 1972. I know that it was mid-October because we were there during my son's birthday celebration, which is October 19. I was always away from home for his birthday. It seemed that there was always something going on in Vietnam, China, or somewhere. I would write him a letter on his birthday (he was five in 1972).

On the way over to Saigon, of course, we continued to refine the draft talking points that we had prepared for the discussions with the South Vietnamese, the texts of the agreements, the rationale for each of the points, the defense against what we knew would be Thieu's likely objections, and so forth. Kissinger and I were relatively optimistic about this meeting with President Thieu, although we knew that he would huff and puff. We thought that he would accept the agreement, because we had eliminated the political elements, the call for his resignation, for a coalition government, etc. John Negroponte was very skeptical on Thieu's reaction, more pessimistic. Among other factors was the fact that North Vietnamese troops would remain in South Vietnam.

Q: The North Vietnamese troops would be out in the jungle, in the hinterland, while the South Vietnamese troops would be around the cities and would be under much better conditions.

LORD: That's correct. Absolutely. But it turned out that Negroponte was more prescient than we were in terms of Thieu's reaction to the draft agreement.

We arrived in Saigon. We went to President Thieu's office, and Kissinger made the presentation about why it was in the South Vietnamese interest to accept the agreement and that we would back them up. In case there were any violations, President Nixon would react strongly. Thieu could count on us to enforce the agreement. Kissinger said that this was the best deal that we could get, based on the level of American domestic support. We had done our duty by South Vietnam. We had hung tough in the negotiations and kept Thieu in power. He had gotten a lot of economic and military aid from us. We would rush extra aid into South Vietnam before the agreement was signed, so that he would be in the strongest position possible, before the provisions of the agreement entered into effect. This effort was called Project ENHANCE, or something like that. We said that we would resume bombing if the North Vietnamese attacked in violation of the agreement. We said that we would give South Vietnam full diplomatic support as well as military and economic aid. We said that we were working on the Chinese and the Russians to isolate Hanoi and try to get them to cut off aid to the North Vietnamese, if possible, and that this was clearly our intention.

There was also the whole aid dimension, where we had agreed with the North Vietnamese that we would help them with the reconstruction of their country. We wouldn't call this assistance reparations, as they wanted to call it. We would also give a lot of aid to our friends in Cambodia, Laos, and South Vietnam. I think that it involved $2.5 billion for the South Vietnamese. So for all of these reasons, while we didn't think that it would be easy to persuade President Thieu to accept the agreement with the North Vietnamese, we thought that he would buy, despite grumbling. As I said, John Negroponte was suspicious about this.

When President Thieu first heard our presentation, he didn't react. He just listened. We had no reason to be pessimistic after the initial meeting. I don't recall the sequence, but there was some delay in setting up the next meeting, at which we would have Thieu's response. Whenever the next meeting did take place, we were blasted. Thieu was very upset with the agreement, almost across the board. Above all, because of the continued presence of North Vietnamese troops. He picked out all kinds of other language which he thought was weak, in terms of international supervision, supplies, the amount of aid, or whatever. He complained about virtually everything, but above all the continued presence of North Vietnamese troops in South Vietnam.

Secondly, Thieu said, in effect, that we had misled him. He said that this agreement went way beyond what we had been reporting to him and what he thought was in store for him. Thirdly, in negotiating this agreement, we had been negotiating the fate of South Vietnam. Now, he said, you come to me, a couple of weeks before your elections, and expect me to accept this agreement, which will seal the fate of my country and my countrymen in a couple of days. He said that the agreement was wrong in terms of principle and also wrong in terms of perception, with the Americans ramming this agreement down my throat and not taking into account the fate of the South Vietnamese people.

So, overall, this was a very tough and discouraging session, to say the least. It wasn't a matter of saying that we should go back and fix this up or deal with this or that problem. He essentially rejected the overall agreement. It was not a total formal rejection of the agreement. He said: "We've got to have the following changes." But he required so many changes, and they were so important, that it was just impossible, to see a solution.

To say that we were depressed, would be a colossal understatement. I would compare the flap on Laos (the 'White Paper' I wrote in 1970) as an occasion when I was equally depressed. This was certainly another such occasion, though in this case I didn't feel personally responsible. We ended three or four days of very difficult discussions in Saigon. We were reporting back to President Nixon, through Deputy Security Adviser Al Haig, using back channels, which involved double encrypting of the messages. We reported that Thieu was reacting negatively and what he wanted. President Nixon and Haig were already more skeptical of the agreement than we were. They appreciated the breakthrough that we had achieved but they were not quite as enthusiastic about it as Kissinger and his team were, not including Negroponte. Above all, Nixon did not want to have a big split with our ally. After all, it was their country.

Contrary to Hanoi's view, Nixon was determined not to look as if he were overly eager for a settlement just before the presidential election. He did not want to be accused before history or public opinion of selling out South Vietnam for the sake of being reelected, or making a deal which did not redeem the sacrifices which had been made over many years. He said that this would look political. Moreover, Nixon didn't need this to be reelected. The polls showed him so far ahead of McGovern that he didn't need a successful negotiation of the Vietnam war. So Nixon was determined not to have an agreement on South Vietnam at any price. He thought that that kind of agreement would look opportunistic and would make him look weak to his hard-headed supporters, and others around the world. As I said, he didn't need the agreement for his reelection.

Nixon was considering that, once he was elected, having beaten McGovern, he would have a mandate, and Hanoi would really be nervous about what this madman Nixon might do. They might be more flexible after the 1972 presidential election. Sure, Nixon would have liked to have an agreement and, if South Vietnam had accepted it, he would have been delighted. However, he certainly didn't want an agreement involving a split with our South Vietnamese allies. He couldn't possibly accept a major split, both in principle, in terms of the agreement standing up, and in terms of public opinion at home concerning selling out our friends, or looking opportunistic before the election.

So we stayed in Saigon a couple of more days after the initial blowup to try to get President Thieu to be more flexible and to collect his requests. By then we realized that we would have to go back to Hanoi and try to accommodate what Thieu's priority concerns were. They appeared to be so extensive that it was pretty discouraging.

Meanwhile, we were sending cables back to Washington, reporting the results of our conversations with Thieu. It was maddening, because there was a time delay in sending the cables, especially using double encryption. What happened was that I would sit down with Kissinger. He would tell me what he wanted in a cable, reporting to Nixon through Al Haig. He would outline the action which he thought should be taken and the key issues involved. For example, should we go to Hanoi? All of these issues had to be resolved. So we sent this message back.

We would get responses back from Al Haig, on behalf of the President. By this time Haig was playing games with the President. He was acting for Kissinger at home and was more skeptical about the agreement, anyway. He knew the President was skeptical. This was an opportunity to gain influence with the President at Kissinger's expense. We didn't know how much in the responses reflected the President's views and how much was Haig. Haig's cables were usually quite tough, criticizing us and being very unhappy about the way things were unfolding. There was always a time lag, so we would be responding to a previous cable. And in response to our cable, they would send another response. So we were one cable behind in each direction. There must have been four or five cables like this. What would happen is that we would draft a cable (Kissinger dictating the substance and tone) and send it to Haig in Washington for the President.

We would then get to sleep, and one hour later the communications people would wake me up and say that a reply from Haig was coming in. It wouldn't be a response to the one that we had just sent to Haig. It would be a response to a message sent earlier.

It was maddening. We were very depressed anyway, because of Thieu's reaction. We were nervous as hell about this agreement blowing up. We had President Nixon and Al Haig beating up on us, and we had this communications glitch because of the time difference and the delays occasioned by communications and the double encryption process. We were always one message behind on these things.

Q: Something you mentioned struck me. What about this relationship with Al Haig? Did you have a feeling that Haig, in a way, was reflecting Nixon or was reflecting something else?

LORD: Well, we couldn't be sure. Certainly, Kissinger was particularly suspicious of Haig, and I tended to hold the view that Haig might even have been egging on President Nixon a little bit. I won't try to explain the President's perception. In a way, his was a principled view. He wasn't going to make a lousy deal before the election, both in terms of justice and in terms of self interest and perception. I think that he didn't want to sell out our friends in South Vietnam. Moreover, he always felt that Kissinger was more eager for a deal in South Vietnam than he, Nixon, was. Haig was certainly more hawkish than Kissinger was. Part of this emerging difference would have reflected the President's reaction, anyway. We were quite sure that Haig was saying, in effect: "Well, Henry Kissinger's done it again. Look at Thieu's reaction. He has a point. Why the hell should we do this? Why don't we get the North Vietnamese to do that? Do we really want this argument with our ally three weeks before the election?"

So we had the feeling that some of this rhetoric was either a case of Haig having egged on the President and eliciting instructions from him to this effect. Or Haig was interpreting the President's mood and embellishing it in a fairly tough way. These messages were pretty tough, considering that they came out of Washington. We never could sort that out. Haig, of course, was meticulous about saying that he was only relaying the President's views and that he was trying to represent Henry Kissinger to the President and defend him as best he could. Henry didn't think so, and it was a very tense situation.

We left Saigon with very extensive South Vietnamese demands for changes in the agreement. We had to do a holding action with Hanoi. By this time, of course, it was impossible to go to Hanoi. We could only go there if we could absolutely close the deal. So we had to postpone the trip to Hanoi, and Kissinger said, in effect, to the North Vietnamese: "Well, we told you in Paris that this deal is a good one and we still think that it is. However, we cannot implement this agreement without South Vietnamese acceptance. We will continue to work with our allies and will try to bring them around. However, we're going to have to make some changes. We just can't sell the agreement to the South Vietnamese in this way. We stand by the basic agreement. We think that it's a good agreement. Don't give up. We'll be in touch with you. I can't come to Hanoi now."

So we went back to Washington. I don't know how soon this happened, but within a day or two there was a press release out of Hanoi, lambasting the United States, President Nixon, and Kissinger. The statement said that the United States had agreed to a deal with Hanoi and now, under the pretense that it couldn't tell their lackeys in Saigon what to do, the U.S. was now reneging on the arrangements we had made. Hanoi said that we had broken a solemn agreement with Hanoi and also an agreement for Kissinger to visit Hanoi. They then proceeded to publish the entire agreement that we had reached with them. This would have been on about October 25, 1972, give or take a few days. We are talking about perhaps 10 days before the election.

This led immediately to Kissinger's first press conference. He had given plenty of backgrounders and so forth. He dealt with the press skillfully and well. However, I don't recall that he had ever given an on the record press conference, standing there with TV cameras on him. I forget what day of the week it was but I recall going into the office and working with him on what he would say and how he would handle questions and what answers he would give. In short, how to handle the press conference.

This was Kissinger's famous peace is at hand press conference, as you may recall. Basically, he outlined the course of the negotiations. He tried to strike a calm tone with Hanoi. In effect, he was angry with Hanoi because they had leaked the agreement. He tried to keep Hanoi aboard without lowering the whole tone, even though they had blasted us and released the text of the agreement. Essentially, Kissinger confirmed that what Hanoi had released was, in fact, the agreement. However, he pointed out that we had told Hanoi that we could never agree to this deal unless the Saigon Government agreed to it. This was true, but we had been pretty confident that when we got to Saigon, we would obtain the agreement of the South Vietnamese Government. Of course, Hanoi was playing this in the opposite direction, saying that the South Vietnamese Government was just a bunch of U.S. lackeys anyhow and that the U.S. was using this as an excuse.

In this connection, we tried to be firm with Hanoi, on the one hand, by saying that they were absolutely wrong. We had told them that we didn't have a deal until the Saigon Government agreed with it. We also said that we stood by the essential deal, so we advised Hanoi not to jump off the reservation. With the Saigon Government, even though we were mad at them for rejecting what we thought was in our joint interest, we said that we had been very patient and invested a lot in their defense over the years. We tried not to be too tough on the Saigon Government. We said that we were still going to have a deal with the North Vietnamese, whether the Saigon authorities liked it or not. The basic deal remained. This was the best we could do, and it was in our mutual interest. However, we said that we would try to make some changes and make it more acceptable to the Saigon Government and we would not rush the process.

Certainly, shortly before an election in the U.S. we were not going to reach an agreement with the North Vietnamese behind the back of the Saigon Government. We couldn't do this anyway, and we would try to make the agreement more acceptable to it. However, the Saigon Government should not think that we're going to have a revolutionary change in the agreement. The basic structure is there now, including, implicitly, the presence of North Vietnamese troops in their country.

So Kissinger summed up his press statement by saying that it was a good deal. He showed some sympathy for South Vietnam, which was our ally, after all. We could never implement this arrangement without their agreement. He also said that Hanoi was acting in bad faith. We had made progress and we were standing by the basic agreement.

That was the tone he set, speaking to the two audiences in Vietnam, North and South, as well as to the American audience. In the course of it he wanted to show, first, that we were in fact close to an agreement. This was not some cynical ploy by President Nixon to get votes and that there never had been much of an agreement, and it was all PR [public relations]. Secondly, Kissinger wanted to show Hanoi that we were still within range of a settlement. Thirdly, Kissinger also wanted to show Saigon that, whatever their objections - and we were temporarily, by reason of justice and politics, delaying the conclusion of these negotiations - we continued to stick by the essential agreement.

For all of these reasons Kissinger used the phrase: "Peace is at hand." What he meant by that is that we didn't have it yet, but this is real progress. To Hanoi, we stick by the essential agreement. We weren't going to bow out of the agreement, but we had to renegotiate some of it. To Saigon he said, in effect, that we appreciate your objections up to a point, but you're going to have to live with this deal. Peace is at hand, Saigon and Hanoi.

Generally, that is what Kissinger was trying to do. Now, of course, he was immediately criticized, at least in the following week, for exaggerating how close we were to a settlement, in order to ensure the President's reelection. This is exactly what President Nixon wouldn't want done and exactly what Kissinger was not trying to say. I can say that with all sincerity. President Nixon was going to win reelection anyway. Kissinger was trying not only to hold American domestic opinion but to hold Hanoi and Saigon on the reservation. That was Kissinger's purpose, but he was roundly criticized for exaggerating how close peace was, on the eve of the election.

In fact, the agreement was very close. The deal that we finally did sign a few months later was almost exactly the deal that we had then. So Kissinger was absolutely accurate and was not cynical in his portrayal of the agreement. He was trying to hold the situation together, reassuring Hanoi and warning Saigon.

So that obviously put us in a holding pattern until after the elections. We got in touch with the North Vietnamese and said that we wanted to resume the negotiations after the November, 1972, elections, in Paris. By now, of course, it was public knowledge when we were going, although the discussions themselves were secret. I don't recall whether Al Haig went out to Saigon, but we spent this time collecting South Vietnamese views again, trying to indicate what we would attempt to get and what we wouldn't attempt to get. Of course, we would try to get most of what the South Vietnamese wanted, but in terms of a lot of that, we would simply go through the motions. We had tried once to get some of these changes and would try harder once again. We wanted some of the changes the South Vietnamese wanted - they were, after all, desirable. And if Thieu wasn't fully satisfied, at least he would have enough of a fig leaf to show his people and say to himself that he had gotten some improvement in the agreement.

There were some aspects that we would like to have improved. However, we had gotten about as far as we could, and further than most thought possible.

We went over to Paris in November, 1972, after the elections. The Hanoi representatives were very intransigent. After a couple of days of discussions, when we essentially treaded water but didn't make any progress, the North Vietnamese representatives came in and basically tried to unravel the agreement. They began to make some new demands and to take back some of the concessions that they had already made. We said that we were going to blow the whistle and stop. We weren't getting anywhere. So we stopped.

We had another go-around with the North Vietnamese in Paris in December 1972, with the same lack of results. We were not getting anywhere. In fact, we raised the South Vietnamese points with the North Vietnamese, and there were a few technical points they ceded, but we were not getting anything significant, and Hanoi was making counter-demands.

During the November and December sessions we stayed at the U.S. embassy. I recall vividly having sensational, three star meals, but being very gloomy.

As we headed toward the Christmas holidays in 1972, we were at an impasse. We had tried to make clear that we wanted to go essentially with the October agreement but that we needed a few changes, both on the merits and to bring the Saigon Government aboard. But Hanoi was not having any of this.

To try to prod Hanoi into a more reasonable attitude, as well as for military purposes, President Nixon ordered the so-called "Christmas Bombing," the heavy bombing of North Vietnam in December, 1972. I think that the bombing actually continued during the Christmas holidays. I wasn't particularly in favor of this, although this is an example of my dovish instincts again. It seemed to me that in the past this kind of attack had not particularly worked, but I have to say that I didn't have any particular alternative to suggest. After all, North Vietnam was digging in. We had essentially a good agreement that South Vietnam wasn't buying.

So President Nixon ordered the bombing of North Vietnam for two reasons: first, to show Hanoi that we were not desperate and that if they didn't make some changes in the agreement, we would punish them. President Nixon had been reelected overwhelmingly in November 1972, and Hanoi had to worry about his sanity, now that he had a relatively free hand. Secondly, even as we undertook the bombing, we sent Hanoi a message that we still wanted to negotiate, but they hadn't given us any choice except return to military action.

President Nixon was also sending a message to the Saigon Government. He was determined, as Kissinger was, to stick to the original agreement, essentially, as well as to try to get some changes in it. So Nixon was saying in effect to Saigon: "If you buy this agreement, we'll stand behind you. I'm bombing the hell out of Hanoi right now. We can anticipate some disagreements once we conclude the agreement. I'm showing you that I'm willing to bomb Hanoi and North Vietnam. So if you sign this agreement, you can count on my enforcing it." So the bombing of North Vietnam was not only a signal to North Vietnam to be reasonable but also to South Vietnam to be similarly reasonable and to sign off on the agreement.

As always, I drafted, with Kissinger's supervision and editing, the messages.

Whatever the extent of the bombing of North Vietnam, the objective, of course, was never to cause civilian casualties. In choosing targets, great care was taken to avoid civilian casualties and this was generally done. However, Hanoi, for propaganda reasons, greatly inflated what had been done, and the doves and other people in the United States talked about American atrocities. The fact is that, when we went to Hanoi in February, 1973, the bulk of the bomb craters we saw were in areas which were wholly or relatively unpopulated. I'm sure that there were some civilian casualties, but most of the casualties were military. On the whole, the bombing campaign was carried out as carefully as it could be done.

The fact is that within days of the beginning of the bombing, we received a conciliatory note from Hanoi, suggesting that we resume negotiations. So this worked out well, and it probably encouraged President Thieu of South Vietnam to think that we would be tough in the negotiations with the North Vietnamese, or at least in enforcing a settlement.

Whenever I encounter questions about this bombing of North Vietnam, I always point out that it worked. And that there were minimal civilian casualties. I was reluctant to bomb at the time, although I didn't have an alternative. Nor did anyone else. This was a question of means and ends, and Hanoi was not exactly playing by the Marquis of Queensberry rules.

So, in early January 1973, we resumed negotiations. Things moved quite quickly. The North Vietnamese stopped telling us that certain issues could not be discussed, and stopped introducing new demands, so we weren't going backwards. We reached a few of our objectives of some significance. We made no really major changes in the agreement. The agreement was marginally better in some areas. I believe these included arrangements in the DMZ [Demilitarized Zone around the 17th parallel of North latitude], resupply provisions, matters affecting Laos and Cambodia, and arrangements affecting South Vietnamese prisoners. They were issues of that kind.

We were also negotiating technical protocols. Ambassador Bill Sullivan of the State Department, who had also worked on the negotiation of the Geneva Accord [of 1964] with Governor Harriman, worked on technical arrangements affecting Laos and Cambodia, international supervision, and prisoners of war. These were technical details which we put together. George Aldrich from the Office of the Legal Adviser of the State Department was also involved in these negotiations. By now the State Department was more fully involved in the negotiations. We had a good team to deal with the final details, as well as technical matters.

We concluded the agreement in Paris with the North Vietnamese and initialed it on January 23, 1973. Toasts were exchanged, and there was a feeling of camaraderie all around. There had been too much pain and anguish, but clearly there was a feeling of relief on our part and that of the North Vietnamese.

We had to get the Saigon Government on board with the revised text, in these final days. We sent Al Haig [Deputy National Security Adviser to President Nixon] to Saigon. There were at least a couple of letters from President Nixon to Nguyen van Thieu [President of the Republic of Vietnam]. These letters were very tough and also very reassuring at the same time. I did the basic drafting, as usual, with Kissinger's direction and Nixon's approval. Basically, they said that we had done all that we could. We told President Thieu that we had gotten whatever we could and that we weren't going to get a better deal. The letters said that President Nixon felt that the revised agreement satisfied the national interests of the United States and of the Republic of Vietnam. The letters said that we would enforce the agreements and would bomb North Vietnam, if necessary, and that the United States would stick by South Vietnam. Furthermore, we would provide economic and military aid to South Vietnam. We pointed out the advantages of the agreement and our willingness to enforce it. President Nixon said, in effect, that we had given the Saigon Government all that we could give it in terms of years of blood and treasure and in terms of the deal. Now was the time for the Saigon Government to come aboard and support the agreement that had been negotiated.

In effect, the letters were a combination of reassurance, persuasion, and threat. These letters later became somewhat controversial, because Congress felt that President Nixon had promised in them to respond with further bombing to a renewal of North Vietnamese aggression, without consulting Congress. In effect, some members of Congress felt that Nixon had made some secret commitments.

Also, as part of the negotiation, we included the aid program, which was somewhat separate. We were very careful not to promise to make reparations payments to North Vietnam. However, we wanted to offer them some economic incentives. We would call them funds for the reconstruction of Indochina and provide large amounts of money for Laos, Cambodia, and South Vietnam as well. Here too some in Congress later felt that we had not consulted them sufficiently. But we had been careful to point out in the side agreement that Congress would have to approve any assistance, and that North Vietnam would have to honor the overall agreement.

Thus, with Saigon's grudging acceptance, we initiated the agreement and returned to Paris for the final signature on January 27, 1973. Kissinger stayed in Washington, and Secretary of State Rogers went to sign the agreement in Paris with the other foreign ministers. I flew with him. There were last-minute negotiations about who would sit where for the signature ceremony. There were protocol arrangements to be resolved at the last minute.

Secretary of State Rogers signed the text of the agreement for the United States, at the official signature meeting. There were two rows of American officials sitting behind him. I had written most of the agreement, along with John Negroponte, a member of the NSC [National Security Council] staff, and National Security Adviser Henry Kissinger. I had spent three years in the negotiations. But thanks to State protocol, I was sitting the farthest back of the American officials, where you could find State Department people who probably didn't even know where Vietnam was! So this probably reflected State resentment over the secret negotiations and turf battles. I was probably a GS-14 [civil service rank] at the time, so I guess that you could make that argument as well. However, I just felt that I deserved a higher position in the seating. That's human nature. I should have been seated farther toward the front. That's a minor point, but I was, of course, delighted to have been involved in negotiating this agreement and to be present at the ceremony. Indeed I was euphoric.

On top of the opening to China, the secret trip to China by Kissinger, and then the trip to China by President Nixon, the summit meeting in Moscow and the deals with Moscow on many fronts and, I believe, the beginning of some movement in negotiations on the Middle East, I really felt good about the situation in general for our foreign policy. 1972 had been a truly extraordinary year for America and the world - and the most hectic, dramatic, and successful of my entire career.

Perhaps I could explain now why we thought that the agreement on Vietnam would work. The next question is what we honestly thought ourselves of the agreement that we had negotiated. Clearly, when you are in the middle of negotiations and working out a deal, you're going to have a higher view of the agreement than an outsider would have, one who didn't have to slug it out. We were not naïve. We knew that the agreement on Vietnam was not a perfect agreement. Above all, we didn't trust Hanoi. However, we honestly felt a great sense of accomplishment and believed that the deal could work.

I say this particularly because Kissinger has been accused of cynically negotiating a decent interval between the signature of the agreement and its subsequent collapse. When the agreement on Vietnam collapsed a couple of years later, a lot of people on the Left and on the Right said that President Nixon and Kissinger knew that the agreement was going to collapse. These people said that they basically sought some time, perhaps a couple of years, a decent interval, which would make it look like the breakdown of the agreement was South Vietnam's fault and not that of the U.S. Some people, most of them on the political Right in the U.S., felt that the agreement on Vietnam was a phony setup. Those on the Left said that we could have ended the war earlier. If we were going to have a collapse, anyway, why not save lives and reach an agreement with North Vietnam in 1969 or 1970? Both sides were wrong. It was an honest deal. And we could not have achieved it any earlier.

I can tell you that Kissinger, President Nixon, and I felt that the agreement on Vietnam could work, and there was no thought of a decent interval. People like John Negroponte and Al Haig were more skeptical of it but were not violently against the agreement. No one was sure that it would last, but all thought that it might work especially if the U.S. were firm about compliance. So I want to make clear that there was no thinking about a decent interval going on here to work out a cynical deal which Kissinger and his associates didn't think would hold up.

Why were we satisfied with this deal which we knew was not perfect? First of all, there is the general principle that the United States had lost a large number of lives and an incredible amount of money, as well as losing concentration on a large number of important issues around the world. We had torn apart our society, domestically, on behalf of an ally, South Vietnam. After a dozen years of this kind of investment, and you can calculate it from 1961, if you wish, we felt that we had really done our duty for a friend. At some point the South Vietnamese were going to have to stand up and defend themselves on their own. We had given them about 12 years of a very large, American investment in lives and material. Certainly, the Vietnamization process had been going on for several years. We had trained, supplied, and built up the South Vietnamese armed forces so that they could take on this burden of defending themselves. There was sharing of responsibility, and we carried this burden gladly, along the lines I just mentioned. Further, there was the Guam Statement and the Nixon Doctrine which stated that countries should be responsible for their own security.

The problem was that time was not on our side. We preferred to reach a deal before the presidential election of 1972, but not for - indeed, in spite of - political reasons. One reason that we might be able to reach a deal with Hanoi was that we knew that they were calculating that President Nixon, whom they considered a madman, would be able to do whatever he wanted to do after the election. We believed that they thought that they had better make a deal now. But we also suspected that this was not the case. We had a better sense of our domestic scene than Hanoi did. We knew that, even if Nixon were reelected, whatever the mood of the American people, who might be the silent majority, Congress was going to restrict us militarily. Far from having a madman to deal with, who could do whatever he wanted, Hanoi would have a Congress which could constrain Nixon by cutting off the bombing of North Vietnam or by cutting off whatever else he wanted to do. Instead of facing a President Nixon who could do whatever he wanted to do, Hanoi eventually came to realize that Nixon would not have such freedom of action. We understood time was running out on compromise, if not public support, of the war and we would have liked a deal before Hanoi fully grasped this.

We realized that the agreement on Vietnam which we had in sight was the best possible deal that we could get, given the situation on the ground, as well as at home. The deal with Hanoi was very popularly received in the United States. The hawks in the United States didn't like it, and the Saigon Government didn't like it. However, overall, as I've just said, this was a major achievement. Most of the critics in the United States had been saying that we not only had to get out of Vietnam unilaterally but that there had to be some kind of coalition government in place, or some approximation of it. The fact that in this agreement we were able to withdraw from South Vietnam without determining its political future or establishing a coalition government was considered a major achievement, which I think it was. Without a doubt the idea of a mutual withdrawal of forces was out of reach.

So we had gotten the best deal we thought we could get, including getting our prisoners-of-war back, confirmed aid for South Vietnam, and a cease-fire under international supervision. We didn't get as much for Laos and Cambodia as we would have liked to get. There were provisions for the resupply of South Vietnam. We were able to provide as much military aid to South Vietnam as we could before the agreement was signed. Also, the process of Vietnamization had worked to a certain point. We weren't going to get a better deal, and it was on this basis that we decided to go ahead with the agreement in hand.

Finally, and more specifically, we thought that this deal would hold up. We thought that there might be low level, limited violations of the agreement or cease-fire violations by Hanoi, which might nibble around the edges of the arrangements made. However, through the Vietnamization program, the South Vietnamese were sufficiently equipped and trained, they had some good troops, and we felt that they could handle low level violations of the agreement. However, if North Vietnam escalated these violations to all-out or at least very serious, naked aggression, including openly sending troops and tanks across the DMZ, in a major attack, we felt that the American people and Congress, despite their being sick and tired of the war, would approve a substantial bombing offensive, though still short of sending American troops back into South Vietnam.

We could bomb the hell out of Hanoi, making clear that, in a major way, the North Vietnamese were violating the agreement. After all of the investment in American resources and lives, we thought that the American people would want to support enforcing an agreement which North Vietnam was blatantly violating, no matter how they felt about the war as a whole. There would be much lower casualties from an air war. This is not to denigrate these losses, but they would be much lower than would be likely to be incurred in a renewed ground war.

So on the military front the South Vietnamese, with our aid, would be able to handle modest infractions of this agreement. And in response to major violations of the agreement by North Vietnam, the American people and Congress would support action, including a bombing response, even though they were sick of the war.

Furthermore, there was the Russian and the Chinese aspect. With our dramatic opening to China, the major improvement in relations with Russia, both Russia and China had a stake in not seeing the situation in Vietnam unravel. We thought that the Chinese would accept even some bombing near their southern border with Vietnam. There would be some strain in the relations between North Vietnam and Russia and China. Therefore, we thought that Russia and China would help to police the agreement to end the Vietnam War. We would not expect that they would cut off aid to North Vietnam entirely, but we would expect that Russia and China would urge Hanoi to observe the agreement, pointing out that it was a good deal for the North Vietnamese. They could say that South Vietnam would fall into their laps at some point and that Hanoi should avoid giving the Americans a pretext to bomb North Vietnam even if they didn't ask Hanoi not to screw up Russian and Chinese relations with the United States. So we thought that the Russians and Chinese would help to support the implementation of the agreement.

Finally, a further reason why we thought that the agreement to end the Vietnam War would hold together was the economic aid which we indicated that we would consider providing to Hanoi. Not reparations, but aid in the reconstruction of North Vietnam. I think that we estimated this aid might amount to about $2.5 billion. This would be a fraction of what the Vietnam War had cost us and could help Hanoi to accelerate the reconstruction of North Vietnam. They could call this help reparations if they chose to do so, but whatever they called it, they would get help in rebuilding and developing the North Vietnamese economy. We could provide such aid in an enlightened way, just as we did to Germany and Japan after World War II. Also, we could try to normalize relations between the U.S. and Hanoi. Kissinger agreed to go to Hanoi in February 1973, after the agreement was signed. This would help the discussions on aid to North Vietnam, as well as to assist in resolving the status of American personnel who had been declared to be Missing-in-Action.

We anticipated that in the Communist Politburo in Hanoi there would be a debate on what North Vietnam should do. One alternative would be to work to clearly undermine the agreement, at the risk of a resumption of American bombing of North Vietnam. A counter-consideration would be that there would be some significant, South Vietnamese resistance. Open violation of the agreement by the North Vietnamese would risk annoying their friends in Moscow and Beijing and losing a substantial amount of economic aid from the United States.

The other choice would be for North Vietnam to observe the agreement, not to wait for a decent interval to pass, but generally observing it. In this way the North Vietnamese would avoid some of the retaliation that might be involved in response to large scale violations of the agreement. Given their self confidence and their staying power, as well as the pervasive corruption in South Vietnam, they might expect to be able to take over South Vietnam after the passage of a number of years. Meanwhile, the North Vietnamese could hope to get American economic help and normalize diplomatic relations with the United States. By limiting themselves to carrying out low level violations of the agreement, they could hope to undermine and weaken the Saigon Government politically without eliciting an American response. Over time they could hope to take over South Vietnam anyway, while still getting our help and economic assistance.

So we figured that a combination of threats and sticks, on the one hand, including bombing of North Vietnam, and carrots like economic aid and normalization, plus the influence of their allies in Moscow and Beijing and building up South Vietnam through the Vietnamization program, would influence Hanoi in the debate going on there. We thought that, on balance, they would choose to respect the agreement in their own self interest, biding their time, and postponing action to gain control of South Vietnam, if necessary waiting for many years to achieve this goal. Together with our aid to South Vietnam this would mean that the Saigon Government would have a fair chance to compete with the Hanoi Government and to prevail. If the South Vietnamese didn't succeed in this effort, in effect it would be the fault of the Saigon Government, through corruption and a lack of democracy, whatever you want to call it.

Well, that was our rationale. We knew that we were running some risks, but it was the best we could get. We thought that it was an honorable ending to what we had tried to do in Vietnam. We had rejected a major demand by Hanoi, which we thought would have been dishonorable in the sense of making a political capitulation. We got our prisoners-of-war back. South Vietnam was now in a position where it could determine its political future. We laid this out extensively in press releases and backgrounders which provided a conceptual framework, all of which I worked on with Kissinger and Negroponte.

Within a few months after the signature of the Paris Accord in 1973, Hanoi began to nibble around the edges of the agreement. I left the NSC [National Security Council] staff in May, 1973. As I have done throughout my career, I wanted to take a break. I was exhausted, mentally and physically. I wanted to spend more time with my family and pursue other interests. I didn't know what I was going to do next, but I was personally and emotionally exhausted. By then, the situations regarding China, Russia, and Vietnam were all looking good. We had achieved major breakthroughs. The President had received an overwhelming mandate (this was before any real hint of Watergate). So this was a good time to leave government service. Coincidentally, shortly before I left, I found out that I had been wire tapped. We'll come back to that.

Shortly after I left, and even before I left government service, the North Vietnamese began to nibble around the edges of the cease-fire and began to resupply their forces in South Vietnam in ways which violated the agreement. The North Vietnamese continued to make trouble. While I was out of government service, Kissinger went over to Paris to negotiate with Le Duc Tho (North Vietnamese Politburo member) in an effort to get enforcement of the basic agreement back on track. This effort didn't work out.

Meanwhile, Congress was beginning to put limits on what we could do in Cambodia and stopped the bombing there and in Laos. Finally, a couple of years later Congress virtually put a stop to aid to South Vietnam, a truly dishonorable and reckless act. So, over a period of time, the Saigon Government was being undermined. Whatever its shortcomings - and there were serious ones - the psychological and military impact at limiting and then stopping our aid was devastating. And, of course, it encouraged Hanoi. In 1975 there was an all-out offensive which resulted in the Communists taking over South Vietnam completely. The remaining Americans were taken out of our Embassy by helicopter, and everybody knows about that.

What had happened involved several factors, including the four assumptions that I mentioned. In terms of low-level violations of the agreement, for a while the South Vietnamese were able to hold their own. But generally, the South Vietnamese Army turned out to be weaker than we thought they might be after the Vietnamization process. Toward the end, in 1975, when the South Vietnamese Army was defeated in a hurry, Congress had already, and unconscionably, virtually cut off military and economic aid to South Vietnam. Whatever you feel about the war, we had negotiated this agreement with North Vietnam and had gone through all of this torture and losses. Even though the South Vietnamese Government was not perfect, our cutting off economic and military aid to them, when North Vietnam was continuing to be resupplied by its allies and was breaking the agreement, was absolutely immoral, in my opinion. Whether continued aid on our part would have made all of that much difference is another issue, but has nothing to do with the principle. And imperfect as the Saigon government was, it certainly was preferable to the Hanoi Communists.

In any event the economic and military aid which had been promised to the South Vietnamese was not being delivered, which weakened them further. So our military plans to handle the North Vietnamese threat turned out to be based on a mistaken set of assumptions. This contributed to the South Vietnamese military collapse.

A second consideration was the major offensive by North Vietnam against South Vietnam, to which we had planned to respond by bombing. This plan was undercut by Congressional action in September 1973, prohibiting the further bombing of targets in Southeast Asia. There was also the growing problem of the Watergate Affair, which related to the manner of President Nixon's reelection in November, 1972. As a result, over time, the executive power of the U.S. administration was effectively broken and our ability to take strong action against North Vietnam was further weakened, on top of the general fatigue over the war. In its mood at the time Congress wouldn't even go along with the promise to provide aid to South Vietnam, let alone allowing bombing of North Vietnam. The North Vietnamese figured all of this out, and so the various means of discouraging North Vietnam from attacking South Vietnam were ineffective.

China and Russia may have tried to lean on North Vietnam somewhat, but, particularly in view of their rivalry with each other and competition for influence in Hanoi, they couldn't sustain such a program and make their weight felt under the circumstances.

In terms of U.S. economic aid referred to in the Paris Agreement, Hanoi never got it. We had told them two things. First, we told them that we had to get Congressional approval to provide economic aid to Hanoi. Secondly, North Vietnam would have to observe the Paris Agreement.

There was some controversy as to whether we had made a commitment to provide aid to North Vietnam. We made it clear to Hanoi that we couldn't provide aid to North Vietnam without Congressional approval, and we had already told the Congress that. Many members of Congress didn't like the idea of providing any assistance to Hanoi. They also didn't like the fact that we had made promises to provide such aid secretly, even though we had hedged the promise by stating that we needed Congressional approval to provide it. That created further controversy, which was worsened by the fact that from the very beginning Hanoi began to violate the Paris Accord of 1973. These violations were fairly blatant, and then the North Vietnamese escalated the situation by blatantly breaking the cease-fire agreement.

Under these circumstances, we weren't about to give aid to North Vietnam, which we couldn't get out of Congress anyway. So that incentive for Hanoi was rapidly withering away.

All of the sticks and carrots, in short, were effectively removed, and the Paris Agreement collapsed.

Q: This is April 7, 1999. Win, we now have you on the NSC staff. When were you there? What did you deal with? What was your role in dealing with the Soviet Union?

LORD: Right. Going back to the NSC days, I was there from 1969 to 1973. We've already covered two of the most central areas of my responsibility as Kissinger's Special Assistant on the NSC staff. One was China, and the other was Vietnam. We've also covered an area I spent a good deal of time on, namely, drafting annual, Presidential statements at the beginning of each calendar year, reviewing developments in our foreign policy. I've also mentioned preparing early drafts of speeches for President Nixon and getting Kissinger ready for background press interviews. As Special Assistant, I played a general, utility infielder role on ad hoc issues and projects.

The other, substantive issue that I was most involved in was relations with the Soviet Union. Here, however, I was definitely in a supporting role. Hal Sonnenfeldt and Bill Hyland were the key people working with Kissinger on this issue. I sat in on many of the meetings and went on all of Kissinger's trips to Moscow during the NSC years.

As part of my duties as a Special Assistant to Kissinger, I was supposed to be a global resource person for him. I was the one person working under Kissinger who had an overall view of all of the key issues that we were working on. This included Middle Eastern questions, as we went on further into the Nixon and then the Ford administration. Kissinger wanted someone who could see the entire picture, in addition to himself. I was paired with the experts in each case, whether this involved China, Vietnam, Russia, or the Middle East.

Detente, as it became known, was one of the key Nixon foreign policy priorities, as well as a priority for Kissinger, along with the opening to China, ending the Vietnam War, and movement on the Middle East. The relationship with Russia was obviously crucial because we were in the middle of the Cold War, and the global rivalry with the Soviet Union as a superpower was, for several Administrations, the clear priority. Its expansionism presented both a geopolitical problem and an ideological, value problem. This was a global struggle. However, President Nixon and Kissinger, on a hard-headed basis, wanted to improve relations with Moscow. They believed that the best way to do that was to have a policy that mixed incentives and pressures, or carrots and sticks, and there would be linkage between them. In this way we could try to move ahead across the board.

In the view of President Nixon, Russia was his best hope for bringing the Vietnam War to a close. He had said during the election campaign of 1968 that he had a secret plan for ending the war. However, he really didn't have one. What he had in mind was to work with the Russians and try to get them to pressure Hanoi to come to a reasonable settlement with the U.S., even as he would attempt to do the same thing with China.

In addition, with respect to the Russian factor, there was the Chinese dimension, which was crucial. Kissinger and Nixon considered an opening to China as an end in itself and a very important one. They also saw it as a way to influence Russian behavior and U.S.-Russian relations. This was intended to keep Russia off-balance by showing that we could deal with the rest of the Communist world, not only in terms of Eastern Europe, which he had already begun to do, but also with China. Kissinger and Nixon wanted to show that Moscow was not the only spokesman for what some people considered a monolithic, communist bloc. They wanted to give Moscow an incentive for improving relations with us because, as long as they were worried about China, they would not want the U.S. and China to gang up on them.

Therefore, this triangular diplomacy was a central feature of the Nixon foreign policy which Nixon and Kissinger crafted. There is no question that in discussions with the Chinese, particularly the private discussions, there was a lot of anti-Soviet flavor on both sides. This was clear from the remarks made by Mao Zedong and Zhou En-lai on the Chinese side and Nixon and Kissinger on the U.S. side in talking about the Russian threat to China along its borders with Russia as well as globally. We never hid the fact that we also hoped to improve relations with the Russians on a hard-headed basis.

We didn't take such a decidedly anti-Chinese line in the discussions with the Russians. We made it clear that we wanted to improve relations with China. However, this also drew China's attentions because it knew that we had a lot more negotiations and actual business with the Russians and a generally more mature relationship than we had with China, which was just opening up.

In any event, the idea was to improve relations with both countries, and have better relations with each of them, than they would have with each other. Of course, there were growing tensions in relations between the Chinese and Russians, which most experts were sort of slow to pick up on but which were clear by the late 1960s. This gave us an opportunity. The clashes along the Russian-Chinese border during the summer of 1969 brought home to Nixon and Kissinger as never before that there was a real chance to open up here. I touched on this when I covered relations with China.

Q: During these times were you called on to look at how the Chinese might feel about the situation as we sort of played with the Soviets? Were you the person who said: "Well, what do you think that the Chinese will feel about this?"

LORD: I certainly got involved in that. Of course, John Holdridge and later Richard Solomon, both China experts, also had an input here. The Russian experts, such as Helmut Sonnenfeldt and Bill Hyland, would also look at this factor, as well as Kissinger and, to a certain extent, Al Haig, who became Kissinger's deputy as National Security Adviser. You're right that by having me included in the Vietnam, China, and Russian initiatives, Kissinger had someone who could help him and put on paper for President Nixon or for whatever other audience were relevant how these factors interrelated. For example, how the opening to China would have an impact on Russia, and we'll see in a minute how dramatic that impact was. Further, by continuing to do business with Russia, this would also give China an incentive to move ahead with us.

Furthermore, we thought that by our dealing with both giants in the Communist world we would have some psychological impact on Hanoi. This showed Hanoi that Moscow and Beijing cared more about their bilateral relations with the U.S. than they did about their relations with Hanoi. They wouldn't snub Hanoi, but psychologically this would help to isolate Hanoi, e.g. holding summits in Beijing and Moscow while we had some of our meetings with Hanoi in the winter and spring of 1972, in the middle of Hanoi's offensive in South Vietnam. Neither Moscow nor Beijing went so far as to cut off aid to North Vietnam or really lean on Hanoi. However, both Moscow and Beijing had a stake in our trying to get the Vietnam War behind us. We made clear to both Russia and China that we couldn't withdraw from Vietnam dishonorably and were prepared for a military settlement only. We made it clear that we wouldn't overthrow the Thieu government in South Vietnam and install a coalition government. The political future of South Vietnam had to be left to the Vietnamese people. We believed that both Russia and China talked to Hanoi and suggested to North Vietnam that, in its own self interest, they ought to settle for a military solution. The Russians and Chinese could tell Hanoi that South Vietnam would ultimately fall in their lap over time because South Vietnam was weak, and the U.S. would withdraw from Vietnam. We were fairly confident that Moscow and Beijing made this kind of argument to Hanoi, in their own self-interests of moving ahead with us.

So there was this interplay between the three factors, and this made it exciting and fascinating to be in on that. I was the only one, beside Kissinger, who was involved in all three of these relationships.

In the early going with the Russians in 1969-1970 the relationship between the U.S. and Russia didn't make much progress. Indeed, there were some crises. There was a challenge over a potential, Russian submarine base in Cuba [in Cienfuegos]. There was Russian backing for radicals in the Middle East. There were some tensions over Berlin. At the same time, there was the beginning of arms control talks and the emergence of a possibility of holding a summit meeting at some point between Russia and the U.S. This was a mixed bag, but the point is that during the period from 1969 to 1970 we really weren't moving ahead very effectively with the Russians, even though there were talks going on.

Of course, as with respect to most key foreign policy issues, the Russians' key interlocutor was Kissinger, and not the State Department. Kissinger and Soviet Ambassador to the U.S., Dobrynin, would meet regularly, usually in the Map Room of the White House to conduct private discussions and talks, as part of the conduct of foreign policy out of the Nixon-Kissinger

White House, which we talked about before.

So, from the very beginning, there was an effort to try to improve relations with the Russians. We showed them that we would be tough when necessary, as we were in some of these crises that I've mentioned. Also, we were prepared to try to improve relations with Russia, if we could do so. We gave the Russians an incentive to improve relations but showed them that we could be firm if they pressed us on key areas.

I remember a speech at the UN General Assembly in 1970 which, in this case, was drafted primarily by Ray Price, one of President Nixon's speech writers. He was a political moderate and we knew that when we wanted a more visionary, a more centrist, moderate approach in a speech, whether it involved the Soviet Union or anything else, Ray Price would probably be the speech writer. I worked with him, Sonnenfeldt, Hyland, and others on this particular speech. If the speech involved a tough approach to the Vietnamese, for example, appealing to the silent majority, we could generally count on having Pat Buchanan assigned as the primary drafter. Then, somewhere in between these two approaches would be Bill Safire as the primary drafter of the speech. This was a very strong trio of speech writers, to say the least.

Q: You were saying that Pat Buchanan went for the red meat.

LORD: Buchanan would go for the red meat, domestic support, and the silent majority. He would probably help people like Vice President Spiro Agnew with their speeches as well. Bill Safire was more difficult to type, although he was clearly more conservative than Ray Price. So we gained some sense of the emphasis the President was going to give the speech by the speech writer who was assigned to draft the speech. However, there was nothing automatic about this. Since I was generally of a more moderate persuasion, I obviously would be more comfortable if I thought that Ray Price was writing the speech. I had personal respect for all three of the speech writers and their ability. No question about it.

Meanwhile, we were still trying to move ahead with the Soviets, going back and forth. As we moved toward 1971 and the channels of secret communication with the Chinese were beginning to warm up and we were beginning to head toward the Kissinger secret trip to China in July, 1971, we had one, significant break that I worked on, the statement on an interim, arms control agreement. I don't recall all of the details now, but it was<sup>259</sup> drafted some time in 1970 or 1971. Sonnenfeldt and Hyland were of course central. This statement dealt with offensive and defensive arms. I received a note of thanks from President Nixon, one of several generous personal letters to me on my service. That was one significant step with the Russians. But there were other, continuing tensions, and we weren't making much progress. The Russians weren't interested, or certainly were not as interested as President Nixon was, in a possible summit meeting.

So that was the general situation as we went on Kissinger's secret trip to China in July 1971. In all of my career experience I never saw such an immediate impact of one event on relations with another country as the impact of the Kissinger trip on our relations with the Russians and the announcement that President Nixon would be going to China. As I said we were going back and forth with the Russians, at that time, and they were dragging their feet on the proposed summit meeting.

As we headed toward China on Kissinger's publicly announced trip to Vietnam, Thailand, India and Pakistan, we tried one more time with Al Haig sitting back in Washington to see whether the Russians would agree to a summit meeting, before we went to China. Of course, the Russians didn't know that we were going to China. We were originally prepared to have the first summit meeting with Moscow and the second summit meeting with Beijing.

So as we were traveling, as I mentioned already, I received a phone call on July 5 from Al Haig in the middle of the night, when we were in Bangkok. In this call Haig talked to me over an open line. He used code words for security purposes, but I knew what he was talking about. He made clear that he had seen Soviet Ambassador Dobrynin one more time to suggest a summit meeting. Once again, the Russians put it off with the vague comment that the time wasn't ripe for it. Little did the Russians know that we were about to go to China to arrange a summit meeting with the Chinese. The Russians would therefore be coming after the Chinese, which would be very annoying for them. If the Russians had known that, they would certainly have agreed to a summit meeting earlier.

Literally within weeks, if not days, after the July 15, 1971, announcement by President Nixon at San Clemente of Kissinger's secret trip and that Nixon would be going to China early in 1972, relations with the Russians really began to move. We had clearly gotten their attention. For example, within a few weeks the Russians agreed to a summit meeting, which subsequently took place in May, 1972, a few months after the summit meeting with the Chinese. There was further movement on the Berlin negotiations which had been going on for some time but inconclusively. Kissinger was conducting these negotiations, working - through backchannels - closely through our Ambassador to Bonn, Kenneth Rush, and with the Russians. There was movement on the issue of arms control, which ultimately resulted in the SALT-I [Strategic Arms Limitation Talks] Agreement, which was signed at the Moscow Summit Meeting of 1972. There was more systematic discussion of economic and trade links with Russia. So, right across the board, in the wake of the China announcement, we began to make progress with the Russians. This was the clearest example of the positive impact of triangular diplomacy.

Q: It is a puzzling thing. When you reflect on this, you might recall that Nixon was newly installed in office as President. He was showing a certain interest in foreign affairs. You would think that, since this summit meeting was to take place in Moscow, the Russians would have been eager to show that they were a big player. I think that you're right. It was probably some political affair or might have been a problem within the Politburo.

LORD: I'm sure that one possibility was that we indicated that we didn't want a summit meeting just for show, unlike the summit with China where the meeting was the message - reopening relations after 23 years of mutual isolation and hostility. We wanted to have some substantive achievements come out of it. We thought that, central to that, there had to be something on arms control. It may well have been that the Soviet military leaders, who were rather conservative, didn't like some of the arms control limitations that were being kicked around. Maybe their hesitation about entering into an arms control agreement, which would logically be the central achievement of a summit meeting, slowed things down. It may be that they were holding out and trying to make President Nixon make more concessions, thinking maybe that he was eager for a summit meeting. If they dragged their feet, they might get such concessions immediately near the summit meeting.

The Soviets may have hoped to extract additional concessions from the U.S. in order to get a summit meeting, whether they involved arms control or anything else. I think that is the most likely reason, based on tactical, rather than strategic considerations. I'm sure that the Soviets would have welcomed a summit meeting, particularly in Moscow. They probably figured that by dragging out the process, they would be able to get a more reasonable U.S. position on certain issues. They saw the negotiations leading to a summit meeting as a sort of bargaining chip. I think that is the most reasonable explanation, because the Russians were fairly crude in their negotiating tactics. They had the mentality of rug merchants.

The Chinese, although they were just as tough as the Russians, were more apt to put out their basic position at the beginning of negotiations and not haggle over it. They would say that this or that is what they had to have. They would ask: "What does the United States need?" The Russians would deliberately inflate their positions, knowing that we would chip away at their positions. They would expect us to inflate our positions in a similar way. The Vietnamese communists were totally intransigent all the way along. They were basically revolutionaries who didn't like to negotiate and just stonewalled us until conditions were such that they had to make a move, as they did in the negotiations with us in the fall of 1972. When the Israelis negotiate, they are something like Talmudic scholars, legal experts who look at every last semicolon. They are insecure because of their history and geography regarding any agreements made. The Arabs are more romantic in outlook, and you have to appeal to some of those elements in negotiating with them.

One of the fascinating experiences we had during this period was to observe the different negotiating styles of other countries. Even if Kissinger was not experienced in the history and culture of these countries, he was very skillful in figuring out pretty quickly, not only their national interests, but also their cultural, negotiating styles. He would then adjust his own tactics accordingly.

In any event, getting back to the Russians, in the course of the 1970s we made several trips to Moscow. I'll get back to some of them in greater detail. I think that I was on five or six of these trips, before, during, and after the first summit meeting, as we tried to move our relationship further along. There were two, generic experiences which were interesting in this connection.

First, except for the summit meeting itself, when we stayed at the Kremlin, we stayed in the Lenin Hills Guest House outside of Moscow. This was a VIP [Very Important Persons] Visitors' residence or dacha. It overlooked Moscow and was located near Moscow University. Of course, just as was the case in China, we assumed that our quarters there were bugged at all times and so we had to be very careful. Particularly with the Russians - we didn't do this so much with the Chinese - we used a machine called a "babblor." I'm not sure whether I've already mentioned this, but it was a recording machine in which you put in a tape. When it plays, it sounds like a dozen cocktail parties all going on at once. It's supposed to drown out bugging. If you talk softly, against the backdrop of this babbling, it does the job. It basically consists of a recording of the comments of a lot of different people all talking at the same time at different frequencies or levels. It's designed to shut out any listening devices. I'm sure that it was pretty crude and may have been ineffective, but it at least complicated Russian listening devices when we talked softly. The problem was that it could drive you absolutely crazy. After about 10 minutes of this noise, you were ready to tear your hair out.

There were a lot of jokes about this device. When we were in China, we usually found that it was easier to walk outside the guesthouse where we were staying and talk during walks outside, rather than when we were inside, where our conversations would have been bugged. I suspected, in the case of China, that the trees were probably bugged as well. The babbling was a source of great frustration but also mirth.

There were other aspects. In our dacha the attendants included some fairly attractive women. The Russians were very crude in this respect. It was clear that they weren't above using these women for blackmail purposes, if at all possible. I was never directly approached in this regard, but it was pretty clear that they were trying to tempt Kissinger and, of course, any of us if we were stupid enough, not to mention not being monogamous. I happen to be monogamous and not stupid. Any of us could have gotten into trouble, particularly Kissinger. There were sort of crude jokes made. Of course, he ignored all of this. However, this shows you some Russian crudity, which I don't think that you would find in China.

We also used to joke about how they would drive us nuts. There was a pool table in the dacha. I swear that the pockets you shoot the balls into were smaller than the balls. Actually, they weren't, but they were small enough so that it was particularly difficult to play pool at this table. The pockets seemed smaller than they should be. We figured that this might be psychological warfare.

One final note is that the Russians proved that you could really stagger around because, unlike the Chinese delicacies, the Russians would provide massive displays of food on the table in the guest house. These included caviar, very heavy bread, and all kinds of meat, fish and fowl. I'm sure that the caloric and cholesterol level in this food was extraordinarily high.

I might mention that the motorcades from our dacha to the Kremlin, for example, involved some of the most hair-raising travel that I've ever experienced. The chauffeurs would drive very fast, and each car would be about one foot behind the car ahead of it. If any car stopped suddenly, we would have an incredible, chain reaction car crash. It was always nerve-wracking to be in those motorcades. These are just some colorful aspects of a visit to Moscow.

Q: The secret meeting was the one where the U.S. Ambassador was not informed about it until afterwards. Were you sort of under strict instructions to stay away from the Embassy?

LORD: It was part of this crazy system which is now hard to believe. It wasn't just the Ambassador who was not informed. I believe that Brent Scowcroft must have been a military assistant at the time. He wasn't working directly for Kissinger. He was visiting the Embassy in Moscow as well. I believe that the Ambassador found out or was told afterwards that we had been there in Moscow. As I recall it, I think that we went to Moscow at the last minute.

Preparations for the visit were made at the last minute, as it were. As I said earlier, the summit meeting, for which this secret meeting was held to make arrangements for, was held in May 1972.

I think that we were due to go somewhere else. There was some kind of an official dinner party in Washington. We got the word that very evening at the dinner party that we were going to go to Moscow instead. It seems incredible. We traveled in Air Force Two [U.S. Air Force Special Missions Aircraft, a VC-137 Boeing, much like a Boeing 707. Air Force Two was usually reserved for the Vice President or the Secretary of State.] We left Washington so quickly that we gave a ride to Soviet Ambassador Dobrynin on our plane going to Moscow. It was truly a last minute decision.

I have some recollection that there was some place where we were supposed to go, perhaps China. We changed our itinerary. This shows you how reliable my memory of this period is. In any case, the Embassy in Moscow did not know about the Kissinger visit. The Embassy was engaged in logistical planning for the summit meeting, but we were in Moscow for last minute preparations on substantive issues. I don't recall any of the actual details.

What was fascinating was the lead up to the summit meeting itself. During the spring of 1972 Hanoi launched a major offensive in South Vietnam.

Q: This was the Easter Offensive of 1972.

LORD: Yes, the Easter Offensive. It involved the use of tanks and heavy weapons. It was clearly an escalation of the war. Therefore, President Nixon was faced with a difficult decision, as he was preparing to go to Moscow a few weeks later. It was his instinct to respond brutally and swiftly to Hanoi in terms of the offensive itself, which contained the danger of really threatening South Vietnam's viability. We also needed to try to get the North Vietnamese back to the negotiating table, because when you were dealing with Hanoi, you had to deal with them firmly, as well as making offers to them. The problem for President Nixon was that, if he responded to this offensive in a brutal way, would this jeopardize the summit meeting in Moscow? The Russians might say that they could not welcome him in Moscow while we were attacking their so-called allies.

So there were debates within Kissinger's staff in which I took part, in the Situation Room and elsewhere in the White House as to what our reaction should be to the Hanoi offensive. We needed to keep in mind our Vietnam objectives but also our interest in arranging for a summit meeting in Moscow. On the one hand there was the fear that the Russians might cancel the summit meeting if we took vigorous action against the North Vietnamese. If this happened, we would lose an awful lot of work expended over a couple of years to improve relations with the Russians. We were on the verge of reaching the SALT-1 Agreement [First phase of the Strategic Arms Limitation Talks] and some economic agreements. The Berlin Agreement was also moving forward at that point. Also, of course, the summit trip itself was a dramatic double header, with the China summit trip just a couple of months before that, in terms of our diplomatic achievements generally, isolating Hanoi, and, not incidentally, affecting the prospects of Nixon's reelection in 1972. This would show that Nixon was a man of peace and that he had made major foreign policy moves. If the summit meeting with the Russians was canceled, not only would this summit meeting be down the drain, but the SALT-1 and all of the other agreements that were being prepared for the summit meeting would be in jeopardy.

There was a general agonizing debate about whether a brutal response to Hanoi for its 1972 offensive was worth losing all of the fruits of work done with the Russians over a period of two or three years. This also included the opening to China, which could be affected if Beijing saw we had real trouble with Moscow.

On the other side of the ledger, and what was uppermost in the mind of President Nixon, was first that he could not let Hanoi get away with undertaking a major offensive in South Vietnam. This was clearly an escalation and a challenge, even as we were conducting secret negotiations with the North Vietnamese to end the war, after all. Also, there would be the embarrassment for President Nixon to go to Moscow while Hanoi was pummeling South Vietnam and American troops fighting there, killing Americans who were defending South Vietnam, as well as South Vietnamese troops. Moscow, of course, was still supplying North Vietnam with weapons and equipment for carrying on this offensive. President Nixon would be in Moscow, trying to negotiate agreements with the Russians while the Russians were backing a tough offensive in South Vietnam, killing American troops. So there was debate along these lines among President Nixon's advisers.

President Nixon decided for two reasons that he was going to bomb around Hanoi and mine the harbor at Haiphong. This would be a major escalation on our part. First there was the factor of the negotiations with Hanoi to end the war, which was a matter of face, incentives, and seeking to achieve a more peaceful settlement in South Vietnam, both to protect American troops and South Vietnam. A tough response would help stabilize the battlefield balance which in turn was key at the bargaining table. To look weak, on the other hand, would cause Hanoi to be even more intransigent.

Secondly, President Nixon decided that he wasn't about to go to Russia looking weak, both to his domestic, American audience, and to Hanoi and the world. He didn't want to go to Hanoi's chief supplier of arms and equipment for carrying out this escalation, striking deals while we didn't defend our troops and our allies.

Thirdly, and most interestingly, I believe that President Nixon was about the only American policy-maker who felt that he could get away with a tough stance, i.e. still preserve the Moscow summit. I could be wrong about this. He was confident that the Russians would not cancel the summit meeting with the U.S. So Nixon felt that he could have his cake and eat it, too. He could be tough and brutal against the Hanoi offensive and still go ahead and reap the benefits of the summit meeting. Nixon would appear to be tough, even as he made deals with the Russians, by showing that he wasn't a wimp on the Hanoi front. I believe that President Nixon felt that Brezhnev and other Russian leaders valued U.S. - Soviet relations and the summit meeting more than they did their ties with Hanoi. He thought that the Russians would stomach the bombing around Hanoi and the mining of the harbor at Haiphong, even while Nixon was in Moscow.

Frankly, I thought that the summit meeting with the Russians might well be canceled. I was wrong in this respect, both in my predictions and my advice. Kissinger was more ambivalent in this respect. He thought that we had to be tough, but he was very concerned about losing the fruits of all of the hard work we had put in to improve relations with the Russians. He was more fearful that the summit meeting might be canceled if we responded in a tough and even brutal way to the North Vietnamese. I'll leave it to Kissinger to speak for himself as to how he came out on this issue. He has done so in his volume of memoirs on this period.

Some of Nixon's advisers felt that we should be tough, even if we lost the summit meeting with the Russians. Some may have felt that we should be tough and that we might not lose the summit meeting in any case. Basically, this was a decision made by President Nixon, showing his visionary and courageous outlook. He felt that we should be tough for the reasons I have mentioned. He said that, furthermore, we wouldn't lose the summit meeting in Moscow anyway. Most disagreed with him. He proved to be right. We bombed Hanoi and we mined the harbor at Haiphong, which constituted a major escalation. Nevertheless, we went ahead with a very successful summit meeting in Moscow.

Q: This shows that it wouldn't have happened if there hadn't been the opening to China.

LORD: I think that's absolutely right. I think that if the China factor hadn't been there, in the first place we might not have had a summit meeting in Moscow. Or, the Russians might have canceled the meeting. But it was more difficult for them to cancel Nixon's trip to Russia now he had been to China.

Q: In the long run the Soviet Union would have been isolated, rather than the United States.

LORD: But when we went ahead with the meeting in China...

Q: We would have had the meeting with China, and the Soviets would have been left out.

LORD: I think that's absolutely right. I think that the China factor was crucial, not only in terms of the major impetus it gave to our relationship with Russia but also in being able to go ahead with the summit meeting in Moscow and our continued work on other issues. Keep in mind that the Shanghai Communique with the Chinese in February, 1972, specifically had a phrase in it about both China and the United States opposing hegemony in Asia or elsewhere. Now who was going to practice hegemony in the world? Who could that possibly have been but Moscow? So it was pretty clear that we were getting Moscow's attention. We walked right up to the edge of being provocative to do that. We also had to demonstrate to our public and to the Chinese public why we and the Chinese were getting together. You will remember that the Shanghai Communique had all these differences between us listed in it, both on specific issues as well as on ideology.

Q: With Kissinger keeping Soviet Ambassador Dobrynin abreast of this, we were just not going to lose in this connection. The Soviets were supplying the North Vietnamese. We could say to the Russians to knock this off and we would knock off what we were doing.

LORD: Absolutely. The constant factor for a couple of years with the Russians was, first of all, what we said wouldn't be all that explicit. It would depend on how you would phrase it. We would make our points primarily in Washington in discussions with Soviet Ambassador Dobrynin but also when we went to Moscow and would see Soviet Foreign Minister Gromyko, as well as Soviet President Brezhnev. The basic themes we would follow would be that we were trying honorably to end the Vietnam War, but we were not going to do it dishonorably. We would suggest to the Soviets to advise the North Vietnamese to settle for a military settlement only and that we would not attempt to decide the future of the South Vietnamese, which they would decide for themselves. We would say, furthermore, that it was in the interest of the Russians to get this war behind us so that we wouldn't have this major problem in our bilateral relationship. Certainly, Soviet interest with us in arms control, stability in Europe, and economic cooperation with the U.S. were of much greater importance than sticking with these fanatic friends of the Soviet Union, who were just complicating the situation.

We would make clear to the Soviets that we would not expect them to sell out their friends, the North Vietnamese. However, we expected the Russians, in their own self interest, to pressure the North Vietnamese to be reasonable. We would say that, on this particular occasion, when Hanoi launched its Easter Offensive of 1972, this was outrageous. The Russians knew that we were negotiating with the North Vietnamese in an effort to reach a reasonable settlement. Meanwhile, the North Vietnamese had undertaken this major offensive. We would also say that furthermore, President Nixon cannot go to Moscow while the Soviet Union is supplying the North Vietnamese with weapons, with which they are killing U.S. troops, without responding vigorously.

Obviously, the line which Kissinger took, at this point, was to tell the Soviets that we were escalating the pressure on the North Vietnamese. He pointed out that it was Russia's friends that had caused this problem, not us. Kissinger said: "You can understand that no President can go to Moscow and not make a tough response to what the North Vietnamese are doing."

Frankly, I believe that the Russians understood all of this. Above all, they understood that their bilateral relations with the U.S. were more important than their relations with Hanoi. And there was the continuing China factor.

Q: And Soviet control over the North Vietnamese was not that great. In the same sense our control over the South Vietnamese was also not that great.

LORD: That's correct. We can see this today in the sense that China finds North Korea a pain in the neck. China is not about to sell them out, but it does complicate life for the Chinese. North Korea fires missiles in Asia, and this upsets Japan and gets Japan and Taiwan interested in anti-missile defense.

Let me talk a little bit about the Moscow summit meeting itself. It really was a rather dramatic meeting. As I said, we stayed for several days in the Kremlin, and several agreements were reached. One of these was the initial SALT [Strategic Arms Limitation Talks] agreement. Kissinger was putting the last pieces of this agreement together, even as the negotiating team led by Ambassador Gerald Smith was in Geneva, trying to put other pieces together which related to it. There was always some lingering controversy whether, under the pressure of the summit meeting, Nixon and Kissinger made some last minute concessions to get a deal which Ambassador Gerald Smith and others felt were unnecessary. I'll leave that to the historians. The eventual, SALT-1 agreement which was negotiated was good for us and the Russians in terms of putting a cap on the nuclear arms race. It was the first major pact of its kind.

Subsequent negotiations by President Reagan and his successors were called START [Strategic Arms Reduction Talks]. That idea was to begin to reduce, not just limit, the number of nuclear weapons. What we were trying to do during this period was to stop the further escalation of nuclear weapons, both offensive and defensive.

I remember Kissinger explaining the agreement in the middle of the summit meeting, on his 49th birthday in a Moscow night club, which was quite interesting. There were also economic agreements for more trade which would take place between our two countries, as well as a variety of other things, such as a space cooperation agreement and an accord on principles of international behavior. Altogether, these made it a very substantive summit meeting, as well as a very dramatic one.

However, the single, most interesting episode for me, personally, had to do with Vietnam. The Russians clearly felt that they had to show that they were not ignoring the Vietnam issue. The Russians had to show Hanoi that they hadn't completely sold them out. So there was one meeting where, it was agreed, we would talk about Vietnam with the Russians. It was going to be held in Brezhnev's country dacha [country residence] about a 45 minute to one hour's drive away from the Kremlin. The plan was to have a small meeting on this subject. It was clear that the Russians wanted to talk tough and then send a transcript of the discussions with us back to Hanoi to show that they had stood by their friends.

One of the more hair-raising experiences of my life, which was humorous in retrospect but which left me close to panic at the time, had to do with missing a Presidential motorcade. We were in the Kremlin for a signature of a scientific and space agreement between Brezhnev and President Nixon. It was one of a series of agreements which were to be signed with the Russians. The plan was, after the signing ceremony and reception, that President Nixon would go to his quarters in the Kremlin and freshen up for half an hour or so before going out to Brezhnev's dacha for the meeting on Vietnam, which was to take place in the late afternoon and evening. Right after the signature of the agreement, while people were still clinking glasses of champagne and so forth, John Negroponte, who was the Vietnam expert on the National Security Council staff at the time, having replaced Dick Smyser, and I, went back to our offices in the Kremlin to gather up the briefing books for this meeting between President Nixon and Brezhnev. To our horror we found out that Nixon and Brezhnev, right after the signing ceremony, had agreed that they didn't need to freshen up and decided to go right out to Brezhnev's dacha.

So they went right to the motorcade, and Kissinger himself had to scramble to join the President. They entered the motorcade and left the Kremlin without John Negroponte and me. There were only four Americans scheduled to be present at the meeting: Nixon, Kissinger, Negroponte, and me. You could argue that our missing the motorcade wasn't our fault, and it certainly wasn't. That's irrelevant. You don't miss a Presidential motorcade. We had visions of Nixon and Kissinger being absolutely infuriated that their staff wasn't with them. We had all of the briefing books. We assumed that Nixon and Kissinger were planning to be looking at the briefing books in the motorcade on the way out to the meeting at Brezhnev's dacha, so that they would be prepared.

Of course, Kissinger, whom I admired in many respects, is known to have a considerable temper. We had visions of losing our jobs due to a disaster at the meeting, or holding up the meeting while they waited for us. We went out to the street, desperately trying to catch up with the Nixon motorcade. Well, of course, the KGB [Soviet secret police] was not about to allow us to get into any car and head out to Brezhnev's dacha. So they totally stonewalled us, they wouldn't let us get into a car, and they wouldn't let us go anywhere. We finally turned to Bill Hyland, who spoke Russian and interceded with the KGB people. They finally said: "Wait until Brezhnev and Nixon get to the dacha. We'll be in touch with them out there and we'll see whether you people can go out." That wasn't the point. We wanted to catch up with them. We were just frantic for about 45 minutes.

Finally, we received permission to go out to the Brezhnev dacha, and we went out in the usual speedy hair raising drive, figuring that our careers were just about over. To our great relief, when we got there, we found that Brezhnev had taken Nixon out on a boat. That was on purpose, to give Nixon a little fun before the meeting; the delay wasn't intended to fill in the time while they waited for us. We got to the dacha while Brezhnev and Nixon were still in the boat out on the lake, so we got there in time for the meeting, although Nixon and Kissinger still didn't have the briefing books. Well, even the briefing books were largely irrelevant, because Nixon and Kissinger knew that this was not going to be a negotiating session where you need your talking points and positions to refer to. They were just going to listen to some tough lectures from the Russian leaders. So to our great surprise and relief, Nixon and Kissinger took in stride the fact that we hadn't gone out to the dacha with them and were very relaxed about it. So our nightmare was over.

We then went into the meeting, which lasted for three hours, at least. On our side, as I said, were Nixon, Kissinger, Negroponte, and myself. On the Soviet side were secretary-general Brezhnev, prime minister Kosygin, president Podgorny, who was the third-ranking among the Russians, and Alexandrov, the Soviet national security adviser, plus the Soviet interpreter, Viktor Sukodorov. I may not be pronouncing the interpreter's name correctly. It was a very small meeting.

It was ostensibly the most brutal meeting I've ever been at. Brezhnev spoke first, followed by Kosygin and then Podgorny. Each one took about an hour and just ranted and raved about Vietnam, the American bombing of Hanoi, and the mining of the harbor of Haiphong. Somewhat to my surprise, President Nixon hardly said anything. He just sat there and took it. What Nixon and Kissinger realized, even more than we did, although we understood this was going to happen, was that these statements by the Soviet leaders were essentially for the record. The Russians, having welcomed Nixon to Moscow in the middle of our bombing of Hanoi and the mining of Haiphong, had to show that they were tough. They had to have a transcript that they could show to their North Vietnamese friends, and this was all for show.

President Nixon showed admirable self-restraint because the Soviet rhetoric was really rather insulting. It was hot and heavy on this. This went on for about three hours, as I say, and President Nixon barely responded. The meeting ended. Then we went upstairs in the dacha, and immediately the mood changed completely. It was 100 percent different. Brezhnev couldn't have been more jovial. They got out the vodka and the caviar.

Q: Did you catch any mood of the President's speech writers, to the effect that: "By God, we're socking it to them?"

LORD: In this case it was not one of the top three speech writers. I believe that it was a man named Andrews, who was primarily working on this speech for some reason I've forgotten, although maybe one of the other speech writers took it over after that. No, I don't recall any details about this case. Andrews just carried out the instructions of the President in drafting the speech. I saw Nixon briefly at Camp David. He clearly was in a resolute mood. He felt that we had to do this. I can't recall specifically, during the brief encounter that Kissinger and I had with Nixon, whether the President said that we were not going to lose the summit meeting with the Russians anyway. But that was his view.

That was a memorable experience on a beautiful spring day, going from Washington to Camp David, flying up on this helicopter and having this terrible feeling that we were going to lose so many things as a result of the bombing of Hanoi and Haiphong.

Now, returning to the summit meeting with the Russians and the personalities. Brezhnev, who sat in at the meeting with Nixon and Kissinger, was, of course, completely different from the Chinese leaders. He was very mercurial in his moods. He could be very tough and also could be very friendly. He could literally give you a bear hug type of approach. He reminded me of a sort of tough, labor leader. He was sort of earthy and didn't have the kind of elegance that Zhou En-lai had, of course. He was much more easy to understand than Mao Zedong who spoke elliptically and allusively..

Brezhnev had a tendency to go on at great length in his statements, which used to drive the interpreters wild, because he would speak very fast and go on for a long time without pausing. It would be very tough for the interpreters to keep up with him. It was also terrible for note taking because when the translation was made, it might last for 20 minutes or half an hour. With Vietnamese, Chinese, or Russian, you're much better off if the conversation involves going back and forth between participants in brief paragraphs. That is easier to keep up with. However, having to jot down notes for 20 or 30 minutes of a monologue by Brezhnev was something else. Brezhnev could be quite friendly and then menacing, as his moods changed. He was not above cracking some jokes. He would sometimes get up from his chair and walk around as he spoke.

I remember a famous exchange with Helmut Sonnenfeldt, in which he admired Sonnenfeldt's watch, which was very expensive. It was probably a Rolex. Brezhnev had a cheap watch. In effect, Brezhnev offered to trade wristwatches with Sonnenfeldt. Of course, Sonnenfeldt couldn't say no to the President of the Soviet Union. So Sonnenfeldt got in exchange some kind of cheap, Timex type watch in exchange for a Rolex.

Also, Brezhnev was trying to cut down on his smoking. He had a little device, kind of like an alarm clock. He couldn't get at his cigarettes except every half hour or hour. A little bell would go off, and he was then able to get out his cigarettes. But he was always cheating and getting his cigarettes out early.

So Brezhnev was a rough, tough guy in many ways, although he had a certain warmth about him. It was clear that he was ruthless, as were the Chinese leaders. However, he was very human and was not an elegant mandarin, like Zhou En-lai and not like a Delphic emperor, as Mao Zedong was. He was more human in many ways.

Q: Did you feel that Brezhnev was in command of the situation?

LORD: Yes. I thought that he was in command, but you could never tell in Russia, as in China, how much debate there was in the Politburo about going ahead. We assumed that there were people, particularly on the military side, who were more conservative and suspicious. So Brezhnev showed some courage in moving ahead with détente. This didn't mean that he wasn't tough or ruthless, but it clearly wasn't entirely easy for him to welcome President Nixon in the middle of our bombing Hanoi and mining the harbor at Haiphong. Brezhnev had his own military people suspicious of the arms control agreement he was negotiating with us. He was dominant but not totally in charge like Mao.

In 1972 and 1973, when I was on the U.S. delegation meetings with him, Brezhnev was still strong and in pretty good form. As time went on, I didn't go to all of the summit meetings, particularly as we entered the period of the Ford administration. For example, I was not at the summit meeting at Vladivostok in 1975. Over time Brezhnev became physically weaker and mentally more sluggish. As I saw Yeltsin's decline mentally and physically, it reminded me of Brezhnev, hanging onto someone's arm, and also staying on longer than he should have.

Soviet Foreign Minister Andrei Gromyko was extremely impressive. Of all of the foreign ministers I saw in action, he was one of the top three or four. Yaqub Khan, Foreign Minister of Pakistan, who was Ambassador during part of the time I was in government, was extremely impressive. Chao Quan-hua, the Vice Foreign Minister of China, who ended up siding with the Gang of Four, was also quite impressive. We met some very capable foreign ministers in the Middle East. Later in my career (in the 1990s) Qian Qichen of China and Gareth Evans of Australia were outstanding. Gromyko was very impressive indeed. He lived and served a long time and had tremendous experience and great self confidence. He didn't have to refer to his notes very often. He was on top of the issues, both strategically and tactically. Unlike his general reputation, he had a good sense of humor. Kissinger always tried to leaven his negotiations with Gromyko by telling jokes. For example, I recall that when Kissinger would have a document in front of him, he would joke with Gromyko and say: "I really would like to have another copy of this document. I'll hold it up to your camera, which is in your chandelier," or something like that. They exchanged a lot of jokes like that. Or: "which of these flower pots should I speak into?" Gromyko also had an amazing facility in English. I'm sure that it was limited, but he could speak some phrases very well. He was capable, in English, of using quadruple negatives in a sentence. Not just a double negative. He would deliberately use a quadruple negative just to have fun with it. You always think of Gromyko as being very dour and serious. That was his public persona, and, of course, he could be that way in a negotiation. However, he had a remarkable sense of humor at times. He and Kissinger had a lot of light moments.

Another Lord joke occurred when Peter Rodman and I were in a Kremlin men's room. He said the setting reminded him of Ivan the Terrible. I said it reminded me of Peter the Great.

Q: Did you feel that the Soviet desk in the Bureau of European Affairs was well plugged into what was happening, or was all of this going on around them?

LORD: During the NSC period (1969-73), it was pretty much like relations with China and Vietnam. Relations with the Soviet Union were run out of the White House. Now, this doesn't mean that we didn't draw on expertise from the State Department for background purposes. I can't recall, during the summit meetings with the Russians, who would sit in from the State Department, or whether this was handled only by members of the NSC staff, like relations with China. It seems to me that the exclusion of the State Department wasn't quite as complete as was the case with China, where we only had people from the NSC, led by Kissinger, dealing with Zhou En-lai and Mao. In negotiations with the Chinese, Secretary of State Rogers was limited to handling bilateral economic and cultural issues with the Chinese foreign minister. The negotiations with Zhou En-lai and his subordinates on the Shanghai Communique and other issues were strictly handled by the NSC, including me. I don't think that the manner of handling Soviet-American issues in Moscow was quite so closed off from the State Department, but I can't be sure. But surely the principal day-to-day conduct of bilateral relations and the preparation for the summit were strictly Kissinger-Dobrynin/Gromyko affairs.

Q: Did you see a difference between Kissinger's behavior at the Soviet summit meeting and the way he dealt with the China summit meetings?

LORD: Well, as I've said already, we had different negotiating styles with the Russians and with the Chinese. You have to remember that in dealing with the Russians we had real, substantive, concrete business to handle, including arms control, trade agreements, the supply of grain, Berlin negotiations, and scientific and space agreements. There were also questions involving our contacts with the Soviet Union around the world. We talked to the Soviet Union about the Middle East, Asia, Africa, and other places.

With the Chinese we were beginning with a sort of tabula rasa [clean slate]. We were just starting out on a brand new relationship after 25 years of mutual isolation and enmity. The Chinese didn't threaten us as much as the Soviets did, nor were they adventurers. They didn't have that kind of power. Our conversations were mostly rhetorical and conceptual with the Chinese. At this point, in the early 1970s, there weren't a lot of agreements or specific negotiations. Our discussions mostly involved strategic matters of trying to figure out how China and the U.S. could deal with the Russians. We would also talk about Vietnam, the Middle East, Korea, and other issues. However, we weren't negotiating real agreements.

We had a different kind of agenda with the two countries. With the Chinese, Kissinger was much more philosophical, conceptual, strategic, and reflective, which he was brilliant at, as was Zhou En-lai. In their discussions with Kissinger and American officials, aside from President Nixon, Gromyko and the other Russians, along with Ambassador Dobrynin and President Brezhnev, tended to be much more concrete and specific and were interested in genuine negotiations on specific issues, as well as discussing positions more broadly.

Finally, I would say, and it was true then and it's true to this day, without being pejorative, Kissinger liked dealing with the Chinese better than he liked dealing with the Russians. Some people would argue that Kissinger and President Nixon, as well as other, subsequent Republican and Democratic Secretaries of State, National Security Advisers, and Presidents, have been somewhat seduced by the Chinese, that they haven't been tough enough with them. I'll leave that for the historians, but the fact is that Mao Zedong and Zhou En-lai were extremely impressive, more impressive than the Russians. They were more exciting and pleasing to talk to. Secondly, in Kissinger's view Russia was seen as much more of a threat to us than the Chinese. Thirdly, the cultural and negotiating styles of the Russians and the Chinese were different. In effect, the Chinese would say: "Now, what do you need? Here's what we need. Here are some basic principles, and how do we get there?" They would not change their bottom line very frequently or haggle like rug merchants. The Russians were much more traditional. Initially, they inflated their positions, asking for more than they really needed, expecting us to do the same. Then we would bargain toward the middle position. This was a much more exhausting and tiresome exercise.

Fourth, rightly or wrongly, Kissinger felt that the Chinese were more trustworthy than the Russians, that the Chinese would uphold agreements, while the Russians would push the envelope, try to haggle around the edges, and not live up to the spirit and, perhaps, even the letter of the agreement. For example, in terms of translations, we negotiated the Shanghai Communique in English. We really - and this was irresponsible - did not go over the Chinese version of the communique closely until the summit meeting was already over and we had returned to Washington. When we looked at the Chinese language version of the Shanghai Communique, our experts concluded that, not only were the Chinese faithful to the English language version of the communique, but there were a couple of places where they could have chosen one, two, or three options in terms of what Chinese word to use and they regularly chose the word that was more favorable to us than to them. Kissinger thought that the Chinese had the vision to see that, as he said, rather than picking up loose change and trying to get some tiny, little tactical advantage by a translation change or not fully living up to something, they were more interested in gaining our sense of trust and credibility in implementing the agreements, a longer-term payoff. He felt that in this way they sought to earn a more flexible and understanding U.S. approach by taking the high road. By contrast there were times when the Russians actually screwed up the translation and then tried to work the resulting situation to their advantage. Or they would haggle and press around the edges.

So when you put all of these four or five factors together which I have mentioned, as a result Kissinger felt more friendly toward the Chinese than he did toward the Russians. This didn't mean that he didn't want to improve relations with Russia. However, he basically felt that the Chinese were easier to deal with and more trustworthy than the Russians, not that the Chinese weren't tough and acting in their own self interest.

That situation has continued to this day. In my view, Kissinger continues to give the Chinese the benefit of the doubt and to be suspicious of the Russians. He has always felt that the Russians will come back some day with their expansionist activities, as they did under the Czars and under the Communists. Therefore, he believes that we have to be careful about a resurgent, Russian nationalism. Similarly, Kissinger has always tended to be suspicious, to some degree, of Japanese militarism, and even of the Indians, to a certain extent, whereas the Chinese get more of a free pass from Kissinger. In answer to your question, these tendencies were seen even back then.

There are two other reasons which come to mind, I think, why Kissinger felt a greater affinity with the Chinese than with the Russians. It is a little ironic, since Kissinger himself is a European and, to a certain extent, a Russian expert, much more than an Asian specialist. He didn't really know anything about the Chinese until we opened up relations with them.

First, of course, the Chinese are much more subtle than the Russians. You can see this symbolically in their food. There is a subtlety and variety in Chinese food, compared to the heavy, somewhat repetitive, Russian food.

You can also see this in their style of protocol. The Chinese are masters at making you feel at home when you're their guest, inducing a sense of obligation in you by treating you well. They are very clever in how they conduct themselves. For example, in terms of sightseeing, we always used to marvel that when we went sightseeing in China to a series of exhibits or museums or trips to various places in the course of a day, we would often linger at various places and take longer than we figured the Chinese had planned for. Yet we would get through the entire tour on time, without feeling rushed. The secret was that on a sightseeing tour the Chinese would divide the planned schedule into, let us say, 15-minute segments. They never rushed the visitor. If the visitor was taking longer than they planned on at, let us say, some exhibit in a museum, they would just cut out the next 15 minute segment and go on to the following portion of the program. We wouldn't know that something had been cut out of the program. They would let us go at our own pace, yet we always got back to our guest quarters right on time and without feeling rushed, feeling that we had seen everything that we were supposed to see. By contrast, the Russians would tend to hurry you along in any tour.

The second reason, and it's related to this, why Kissinger felt more affinity to the Chinese than to the Russians, was the matter of self-confidence. The Chinese knew that they had been the number one power in the world for 4,000 or 5,000 years. They were the Middle Kingdom. Everyone else was either a barbarian or far distant from them. If they were located closer to the Chinese, they were tributary peoples, and China was dominant. China was Number One in the world technologically and in many other ways, up until about the 17th century. Then the Chinese began to lag and they had a bad century or two when they were exploited by the British, invaded by the Japanese, and humiliated by other, outside powers in the 19th and 20th centuries. As a result there is a curious mixture of self-confidence and arrogance because the Chinese have this awareness of having been the Middle Kingdom for so long. At the same time, they are also thin skinned and xenophobic because of the rape of Nanking in 1937 by the Japanese or the Opium War of the 19th century by the British, and so forth.

On balance the Chinese, when they look at their history and culture, are very much aware that they were the Number One power for the great bulk of their history. They figure that they will be Number One in the next century or the one after that. As a result, the Chinese have a certain self-confidence, which means that they can act in a more relaxed and less haggling, nervous, and paranoid way, whereas the Russians have a much greater mix in their history in terms of how they've done. The Russians see themselves as threatened historically and perhaps in the future on the East by the Chinese and the Japanese, and on the West by Europe and the U.S. They have less self confidence in the way they deal with us. This is reflected in everything from haggling over details of a program as to how they handle their translations. I would add these factors to why Kissinger was drawn more to the Chinese than to the Russians.

Q: Did you find that Bill Hyland and Helmut Sonnenfeldt almost had to gang up on Kissinger to get him to pay more attention to these cultural aspects of dealing with the Soviet Union? How did they deal with Kissinger regarding the Soviet Union?

LORD: No, I didn't see any problem there. There might be some disagreements on specific tactics, such as what to do on arms control, Berlin, or something like that. However, Kissinger gave extremely high priority to our relationship with Russia. Because we had more specific business with the Russians by far than we did with the Chinese, he spent more hours working on Russia than with China. No question about that. Russia, after all, presented the major challenge to American foreign policy for the past 30, 40, or 50 years. Kissinger treated it as such.

So, when I was on the NSC staff during the period 1969-1973, I noticed that he spent more time on Russia than on any other, single issue. He obviously spent a great deal of time on China, as well, in addition to the Middle East, to a certain extent. However, Russia was the overwhelming problem together with Vietnam. It was never difficult to draw his attention to Russia. This didn't mean that Nixon, Kissinger, and their key advisers would always agree. However, I think that there was a general agreement among us on the basic approach to be adopted toward the Soviet Union.

In his latest book of memoirs, and I've already dipped into it, Kissinger goes over this argument by the neo-conservatives that he was too soft on the Russians. Today it seems a little ironic that some people may think that Kissinger was too soft on the Communists. The concept of det  nte ran into some trouble because it was attacked on the Left and on the Right. I'll get back to that later. To answer your question more directly, no, it was never difficult to draw Kissinger's attention to Russia. The question of Russia always drew the attention of Kissinger and his key advisers.

I was involved in these matters myself but I want to make clear that I was always much more in a supporting role, preparing briefing papers and so on. I was there mostly to give a global perspective, to compare what we were doing with China and Vietnam, as well as to help out on the note-taking. I also did some drafting of documents.

Let me spend just a couple of minutes on the evolution of our policies toward the Soviet Union. As I said, we had this mixed bag of issues in 1969 and 1970. We were not really moving ahead. Then there was a dramatic acceleration of relations with the Soviet Union in the wake of the announcement in July, 1971, that Kissinger had visited China. Having opened relations with China we were able to move ahead with the Russians.

When Nixon was reelected in 1972, we seemed poised to be in excellent shape in foreign policy, for the following reasons. First, we had a President who had won a crushing victory in the elections of 1972 and had an overwhelming mandate from the American people. Of course, this strengthened his position abroad, because he had been reelected by such a large margin. Secondly, since he had been reelected for a second term, President Nixon wouldn't have to be concerned about domestic politics and could do what he wanted to do in terms of foreign policy, essentially because he could not run for reelection. So he could be even more statesmanlike. Thirdly, he had some very significant successes. We had the opening of relations with China and we had detente with the Russians and the specific agreements negotiated with the Russians in the areas that I've mentioned. By January, 1973, shortly after his reelection, we reached a Vietnam peace agreement and were beginning to be active in shuttle diplomacy in the Middle East. As a result, President Nixon and Kissinger both felt very good about where we stood as we headed into Nixon's second term as President.

Much more attention could now be paid to our allies and other issues. There was a turning to the year of Europe and the strengthening of our trans-Atlantic relations. Clearly, there was going to be more focus on the Middle East than there had been. We could begin to pay more attention to the Western Hemisphere, to economic and energy problems, and to the Third World more generally, including Africa. All of these matters were in Nixon's and Kissinger's eyes as issues that we could pay much more attention to in the second Nixon term. During the first term, attention was focused on problems of relations with the Communist countries, as well as the Vietnam War, which Nixon felt that he had to settle on what he considered an honorable basis. He wanted to free himself up, not only to deal with domestic debate and distractions, but also to pay greater attention to how we were spending our resources on diplomacy more generally throughout the world.

Detente with the Russians had obviously been more urgent because of the danger coming from the global relationship with the Soviet Union, which was the single, most important issue on which we had to move forward. That was moving ahead, with the summit meeting with the Russians, and so on. Of course, there was also the opening of relations with China, which helped President Nixon on all fronts. This was a dramatic development in and of itself. We also had the impact, for the American people, of easing the Vietnam trauma. Clearly, any settlement of the Vietnam War was going to be less than perfect. It had some dangers in it, and we later saw it unravel for a variety of reasons which I have discussed elsewhere.

We were extricating ourselves from Vietnam with, at best, an inconclusive outcome; it certainly wasn't a clear-cut victory in either material or moral terms like what we had at the end of World War II. For the American people this outcome could be put in perspective, because simultaneously with that were these other, major moves toward the Russians but, above all, toward the Chinese. We were now dealing with China, the world's most populous nation and a very important one. It was going to be an even bigger country in the 21st century. With this dramatic, new opening, the American people, whether explicitly or implicitly, could see and recognize that this historic move dwarfed in some ways an inconclusive outcome in Vietnam, a small part of Southeast Asia.

So for all of these reasons we were poised to move ahead with our foreign policy, while continuing our momentum on other fronts. We could deal with our allies more systematically on all of the other issues that I mentioned. We could tackle a much broader diplomatic agenda.

Well, of course, what none of us knew, and even President Nixon didn't know, as of January 27, 1973, when the Vietnam Agreement was signed, was that the Watergate Affair was going to undermine all of this. So, in addition to all of the tragedies about the Watergate Affair, which we could discuss but which wiser men who were more directly involved in it than I could better discuss, certainly the impact on our foreign policy was momentous. As this issue wore on in 1973 and 1974, and as President Nixon became more and more preoccupied with it, he paid less and less attention to foreign policy. His leverage abroad was reduced as people saw him in trouble. So our momentum in the field of foreign policy slowed down with Russia and China. The North Vietnamese, of course, broke the Vietnam Agreement of January, 1973, and that settlement unraveled.

We still managed to move ahead on certain fronts, and you have to give Kissinger credit for great skill in working against this backdrop of deteriorating executive authority, as a result of the Watergate Affair and Vietnam. Arranging two agreements with the Egyptians and one with the Syrians in the Middle East were real achievements. I was involved in the shuttle diplomacy in connection with negotiating the two Egyptian agreements. We moved ahead on issues like energy. In Southern Africa, we pressed negotiations regarding Rhodesia, and this began to move the continent of Africa toward majority rule. There were other efforts made as well, and I'll talk about this when we discuss the State Department Policy Planning Staff, which I headed, in our next session.

The point is that this effort during the late Nixon and Ford Administrations was essentially a holding action. During this period, from 1974 to the beginning of 1977, which covered the Ford administration, one of Kissinger's greatest contributions was to make sure that our overall foreign policy position did not collapse, despite the negative impact on executive authority as a result of Vietnam, the Watergate Affair, the transition from Nixon to Ford, and a host of new restrictive Congressional actions. There is no question that these great hopes that we had in January, 1973, and for the reasons I mentioned, were damaged seriously by the Watergate episode, above all.

It wasn't just a matter of one President being removed from office and under attack before he was removed which complicated our efforts. Also involved was the fact that Congress began passing all kinds of legislation and getting more and more involved in foreign policy, in reaction to the Watergate affair and the perceived excesses of the Nixon administration. Congressional attitudes also changed in reaction to the Vietnam War. The War Powers Act and the Jackson-Vanik Amendment on trade with Russia were passed. There was a series of legislative initiatives which made it much harder for President Nixon and Kissinger to conduct our foreign policy. There was a Congressional backlash and micro-management of foreign policy setting in. These tendencies greatly complicated our efforts.

I think that I'll save until later the consequences for policy planning, unless you think I should cover this now as part of the discussion of our relations with Russia.

Q: At a certain point, the difference was really not significant.

LORD: Even a more modest Soviet nuclear capability would have been a great threat to the United States. Obviously, the Soviet nuclear dimension and their ability to push the envelope internationally was a matter of concern to us. Remember that the Soviet Union had proclaimed the Brezhnev Doctrine in 1968, after the Prague Spring. By the way, this was one thing that really concerned the Chinese. In effect, the Brezhnev Doctrine said that the Russians had the right to determine the domestic system of other, socialist countries. That got the attention of the Chinese, along with the border clashes with the Russians along the Sino-Soviet border on the Ussuri River opposite Manchuria.

So, for all of these reasons we all felt that we had to be firm with the Russians, we had to maintain a strong defense, and we needed to exert some pressure in order to get the Russians' attention, given the way they negotiate and their history. Whether they deployed missiles in Cuba during the Kennedy administration, established a submarine base in Cuba [in Cienfuegos], encouraged radical Arabs, or fooled around with the access routes to Berlin, we felt that we had to react strongly to what we regarded as Soviet provocations.

At the same time, I agreed with the Nixon-Kissinger approach that, in addition to firmness, we had to give the Soviets some incentives to develop a better relationship with us. As long as we made clear that the Soviets couldn't push us around, we also had to make clear that we weren't out to dominate Russia or overthrow their regime and that we were prepared to respect them as a major power. We were prepared to have a more normal relationship with Russia, as far as arms control, trade, and other exchanges were concerned. We were also prepared to negotiate with them on subjects of mutual interest to our two countries. I think that this combination of incentives and pressures reflected our view of the Russians. We thought that they wouldn't be irrational if we gave them an option that would be more attractive. However, we had to be firm so that they wouldn't be tempted toward adventurism.

Kissinger and Nixon came under attack for appearing to be soft on the Soviets. Their view was that we had to have a closely linked position, whether this involved trying to maintain a strong defense and intelligence capability, despite attacks from Congress, whether it involved resisting the Soviets in the many crises that I've mentioned, or whether it was just plain, tough negotiations. This above all, we were not soft. But, beyond that, Kissinger and Nixon felt that an all-out confrontation with the Soviets would, of course, be very dangerous in the nuclear age. It could cause strains with our allies, and could cause some problems domestically. We felt that if we were ever going to have a major confrontation with the Russians, we had to have demonstrated to the American people, the Congress, and other countries around the world that we had tried to be more reasonable and had tried to have a more normal relationship with the Russians. We needed to demonstrate that this confrontation was forced upon us by unrelenting Soviet adventurism, as opposed to our prematurely going into dangerous confrontations. Such confrontations would not only be dangerous; we might not have the necessary allied and domestic support because we had not tried to follow a more flexible approach.

I'm sure that Nixon and Kissinger would argue that they recognized that the Soviets were not all that strong. The Soviets were certainly dangerous, but, over the long haul, we sought to buy time and wear them down by pursuing a policy of containment of Russia and also seeking better relations with them. Over time. Nixon and Kissinger believed, the Soviet system would collapse or erode, as George Kennan himself had suggested in his famous article in "Foreign Affairs" magazine in the late 1940s. He used the pseudonym of "X" for the article.

By far the most exhaustive rationale for detente and review of the record in U.S.-Soviet relations was provided in the summer of 1974. Together with the experts I worked very hard on what was basically a White Paper, and background for congressional hearings. It was a very eloquent document, but received very little attention because Watergate was coming to a climax.

Nixon and Kissinger felt that Senator Jackson, the neo-conservatives, and others, shared the strategic approach of containing the Russians, which they all agreed upon. But Nixon and Kissinger felt that the tactics of Senator Jackson and others were ill-considered, were overly confrontational, and could provoke a crisis and lose domestic support. They felt that it was necessary to play for the long run by being reasonable as well as firm at the same time. Kissinger felt that Jackson and his staff, e.g., Richard Perle, working with allies like Schlesinger and Rumsfeld, kept undermining our Soviet policy. In one example their attacks on arms control agreements being worked out with the Soviets in Vladivostok in November 1974 sunk them. By the time Kissinger got back to Washington, after visiting China, the debate was lost.

Part of the trouble that Kissinger ran into in the field of foreign affairs during the years of the Ford administration was his underestimation of the desire of our people and Congress to reflect values in our foreign policy. Fairly or unfairly, the American people aren't used to the concept of the balance of power or the European approach to diplomacy anyway, which Kissinger thrived on as an historian, and to this day remains his basic view of the world. The American people and Congress felt that there had to be a human component, that other countries' domestic systems were relevant, and that human rights was a subject to which we had to pay attention. Therefore, Kissinger encountered criticism from the Right that we weren't doing enough to bring about change in the Soviet domestic system of government, even as the Left was saying that we were being too tough in trying to affect Soviet external behavior. The Left too was concerned about human rights. So Kissinger was attacked from both ends of the political spectrum, as I mentioned before, diluting this combination of sticks and carrots. That's why detente ran into considerable trouble.

Q: You noted that the Watergate Affair sort of cut off our ability really to deal with Hanoi from a position of strength. How did you people regard this situation as it developed? This really intrudes into the work of the NSC and policy planning, but how did you see this?

LORD: First, it was a process of incremental awareness, just as it was for more or less every American. That was true for Kissinger as well as for myself. He didn't know anything about the Watergate Affair. He really didn't know. For all of us it was a process of becoming incrementally aware of what had happened and of the seriousness of it.

It wasn't even a blip on my radar screen while I was at the NSC. I don't believe that Kissinger was aware of its significance before 1973. Of course, this all began during the 1972 Presidential elections campaign. The stupidity of it is well known, not to mention the fact that by the time the burglary of the office of the National Democratic Committee occurred, it was clear that President Nixon was going to win reelection by a landslide in any case. So it wasn't necessary. Then, of course, there was the stupidity of the coverup. However, none of us knew anything about all of this up to and through the elections of 1972. I think that there was a minor newspaper article in the "Washington Post" about a burglary in the office of the National Democratic Committee on the day following the break in. However, nobody that I knew drew any conclusions from that. So this was not anything that one even considered at the time.

I left the NSC staff in May, 1973. I certainly didn't leave because of the burglary at Watergate. I wasn't aware that that was going to be a serious problem, even then. I left the NSC staff because I was exhausted. Four years of dealing with Henry Kissinger were exhilarating and terrific, but they were also exhausting, because of the long hours, the pressures, his style of work, and so on. I wanted to see more of my children, who were then quite young. I wanted to see them before they grew up. I wanted to get out and re-charge my intellectual batteries.

So I was getting out of the NSC staff for a variety of reasons. Plus, I felt that we had opened up to China, we had ended the Vietnam War, and we had moved ahead on relations with the Soviets. All of the positive elements were in place, and I thought that it was a very good time for me to leave. In particular, the relations with China were on track, the Vietnam War and negotiations had been concluded. So my two major responsibilities were looking good, as well as our general foreign policy stance.

I always thought that I would be coming back into government service and I also suspected that I would be coming back with Kissinger a few months later. However, as I left government service in May 1973, I was not really aware of the Watergate Affair. I came back to government service in September 1973. I can't vouch for Kissinger's views. I suppose by then that he was beginning to see that this incident and its fallout were beginning to become a problem. However, I only became aware of this gradually. As of the fall of 1973 we didn't think that it was going to become all that serious, as Kissinger was appointed Secretary of State.

Shortly afterwards, and certainly in the course of 1974, it began to become obvious that the situation involved in the Watergate Affair was serious, although I don't have the exact time-line here. The point I'm making is that there was no one day when we realized that we were facing a crisis, as events happened, and some of them were more dramatic than others. There was Butterfield revealing the taping system in President Nixon's office. There were revelations about John Dean [then White House chief of staff], and then the episodes when Haldeman and Ehrlichman of the White House staff were fired. The Congressional hearings progressed. The potential seriousness of the matter became increasingly clear. We began to get the feeling that we were inexorably headed for a terrible ending. I can't place this feeling in terms of any one day. It was just a series of events which made the situation more and more serious.

Similarly, the impact on foreign policy did not take place overnight. There was a gradual draining away of momentum. For example, each trip to China after 1973 became less productive, until there was a very chilly summit meeting with President Ford in 1975, as I mentioned. Relations with the Soviet Union were slowing down. There was more restraint on what we were trying to do with the Soviets, both 'sticks' and 'carrots'. Congress was counter-attacking with legislation, restrictions, and hearings. The North Vietnamese were unraveling the Paris Agreement of 1973, in part seeing the weakness of the President and the mood of Congress. Not all of this was a result of the Watergate Affair but was a combination of the weakness of the Presidency or the fact that President Nixon might actually be leaving office. Then the entry into office of Ford as an interim President meant that things were increasingly slowing down and unraveling.

So Kissinger emerged as the one person sort of holding things together. He was controversial even then, of course. The issue of wiretapping came up, as well as other things which people didn't like about him. However, some people forget that he was generally considered the most admired man in America. He appeared on magazine covers as 'Superman'. He was the one person that people thought that they could trust or who had stature, in addition to the fact that he was untainted by the Watergate Affair itself, except for the peripheral dimension of wiretapping. Kissinger was also the one American official respected abroad. So I think that was one of his more heroic accomplishments, holding our foreign policy together despite the weakness of the executive branch.

Q: Can you explain the background of this practice?

LORD: Basically, what happened was the following. There was a series of leaks on sensitive matters, early in the Nixon administration, in 1969 and then in 1970. One particular leak which triggered a strong reaction from President Nixon and his colleagues, including Kissinger, was the revelation in the "New York Times," by a journalist called Bill Beecher of the secret bombing in Cambodia of Vietnamese communist enclaves. These Vietnamese communist troops were coming across the border into South Vietnam, attacking our troops, and then going back to sanctuaries in Cambodia. I didn't know about the bombing until I became Kissinger's special assistant in February 1970.

I felt that the bombing was legitimate, in the sense that these Vietnamese communist troops were violating Cambodian soil and penetrating into South Vietnam. Our bombing was confined to Vietnamese concentrations near the border. They were designed to lessen our casualties. We talked about this and the effect it might have on the level of American casualties. However, the issue was that it was secret from the American people and almost all of Congress, and that we were bombing targets in another country, even if it was justified.

Prince Sihanouk acquiesced in this practice, as long as it was secret. The argument for keeping it secret was that Sihanouk would never agree to it if it was made public. He could not say: "Yes, go ahead and bomb my country". But he didn't want the North Vietnamese threatening his control of Cambodia. He recognized that the Vietnamese communists had invaded his country, that he couldn't do anything about this, and therefore he had no problem with our beating the hell out of the Vietnamese communists along the border, as long as it was secret. So that's why it was secret. It wasn't frivolous to keep it secret.

Nevertheless, Congress, the American people, and the press were very upset when they learned that we had been bombing targets in another country, whether or not it was justified, and without the American people knowing about it. Anyway, that particular leak drew the attention of President Nixon and his associates. Later on, the Pentagon Papers were leaked by Daniel Ellsberg, and that also fed this paranoia. This contributed to the atmosphere in which the Watergate Affair developed, in addition to the wiretapping.

A key point about the Nixon/Kissinger strong reaction to the leak of the Pentagon Papers. I fully shared their view that this was unpardonable. Whatever one's views, you don't leak a huge amount of classified material. Moreover, all the study and embarrassing revelations were about the Kennedy and Johnson Administrations. So Nixon and Kissinger were defending not against personal embarrassments for their Administration but the general principle of conducting government for future presidents. In addition, this was in June 1971, a few weeks after we had made our major, secret proposal to North Vietnam to try and end the war, and a few weeks before Kissinger's secret trip to China. Obviously the domestic uproar over the Pentagon Papers did not give Hanoi an incentive to respond positively, through this was not the decisive factor. Moreover, we were secretly trying to open up with China. The Chinese - and other governments - would have little confidence that the U.S. government could keep secrets.

I believe that some time in the spring of 1970 wiretaps were put on the phones of about a dozen people, including several of us on the NSC staff and a couple of journalists. I don't have a complete list of the people whose phones were being wiretapped. There were about a dozen. Now, why were we picked? Because these were national security leaks, involving Vietnam and Cambodia, and there may have been other aspects. Nixon and Kissinger felt that these leaks could really undermine our foreign policy. We had secret negotiations under way with North Vietnam, we had secret negotiations on the opening to China, and secret dealings to a certain extent with the Soviets. If all of these matters were leaked to the public, it would inhibit our efforts to conduct relations with those countries. It would also tell the Chinese and the others that we couldn't be trusted to keep secrets, and this would complicate everything.

There was also the general principle that if you work for the government, you don't leak secret, sensitive information. If you disagree with a given policy, you can either stay in office and work to try to change the policy from the inside, keep debating, but loyally carry out the policy while you continue to serve. You don't leak information to destroy that policy. Or you can resign as a matter of principle and then try to protest and change the policy from the outside. What you should not do, and I feel strongly about this myself, is to try to undermine a policy with which you disagree by leaking sensitive information, for example, to the press or to Congress. I never leaked sensitive information in my life. I had plenty of criticism of policy and wrote and spoke to Kissinger and others about them. But I believed that if you lost the argument, you either carry out the policy or quit. You don't sabotage it by leaking.

Of course, we all give background press briefings and say things authorized around the edges, but in terms of actually leaking classified material to unauthorized persons, I've never done that.

So there was general concern, some of which I understood, by the way, about what these leaks were doing to our foreign policy as well as to the basic principles under which it operates. As a result, President Nixon ordered the wiretaps, and Kissinger did not resist. The President and Kissinger were also told by Attorney General John Mitchell that these wiretaps were legal, which they were. So Kissinger went along with them.

The reason that some other members of the NSC staff and I were chosen to have their phones tapped was that some of the information which had leaked had been so tightly held that only a few people knew about it. Therefore, the phones of those who might be suspected of having the ability to learn about the information which leaked were tapped. In my case I had access to just about every conceivable secret in the field of foreign policy that we had. I was Kissinger's right hand man and was in the middle of many secret negotiations on various fronts. I was one of the few people who could have been suspected of leaking this material. In addition, Secretary Kissinger's staff was suspected by Nixon and his people of being liberal Democrats from, God forbid, the State Department and academia, and were considered to be rather suspicious. In fact, we were quite moderate and liberal, compared to the people on the domestic side of the Nixon White House.

Q: I assume that you are talking about Ehrlichman, Haldeman, and people like that.

LORD: That's right. So there was that general suspicion of us as well. Of course, Kissinger justified the wire taps on the ground that he was truly concerned about leaks. He thought that leaks were outrageous in principle, were also hurting our foreign policy, and were jeopardizing ongoing negotiations with the Chinese, the Vietnamese, and others. Secondly, Kissinger couldn't say to Nixon: "How dare you suspect my staff. Just wiretap other people. Don't tap my people." In fairness, we were the ones who had the information, and he couldn't be selective about the persons whose phones should be tapped. He already felt sensitive because President Nixon felt that Kissinger's staff was overly liberal anyway.

Furthermore, Kissinger would argue that he had been assured that it was legal to engage in wiretapping, which it was, however uncomfortable one might feel about tapping someone with whom you were working every day. So that was his defense.

I didn't know anything about the wiretapping, but I will say this. Even though I didn't know anything about it, I had suspicions, which I didn't really believe, that might be going on. I had a couple of reasons for this. My phone had some funny clicks on it at times.

Q: Well, did any of your colleagues quit because of this?

LORD: I don't believe that anybody quit because of wiretapping. Several people, including Tony Lake, Mort Halperin, Roger Morris, and Bill Watts had already left Kissinger's staff long before this story broke. A couple of other people like Joe Kraft, a journalist, were wiretapped. God knows why they wiretapped a journalist. So I don't believe that anyone quit because of the wiretapping. Either they had already left or, like Helmut Sonnenfeldt, who was also wiretapped, they had the same kind of reaction that I did. That is, the practice was stupid and basically wrong. But it was not something to resign over for the reasons I mentioned.

I can see why people would say that this is a ridiculously soft position. They might say that I should have been so outraged that I should have resigned. I was leaving government service anyway, so I didn't face that choice. To be honest with you, I don't think that I would have left my job because of the wiretapping. However, I was leaving government service anyway, so this issue didn't arise. Of course, I went back to work for Kissinger a few months later, so I obviously wasn't outraged.

One amusing thing that I will say is that there were times when the FBI was listening in on my phone, and my wife was talking. She would often talk to her mother in New Jersey. They would go on at great length in Chinese, which used to drive the wiretappers listening in on this crazy. My wife is not a great one to talk about recipes, but there were times when they were literally talking about Chinese recipes. Here was the U.S. Government, in this case, the FBI, learning about Chinese recipes in Chinese!

Q: We can get to it, but could you give us the background to how the role of Policy Planning was conceived of when you entered this office, and how it changed?

LORD: Let me cover quickly how I got from the NSC [National Security Council] staff to the Policy Planning Staff.

Early in 1973 I decided that I wanted to take a break from government service. I had worked hard for many years, and specifically as Kissinger's Special Assistant in the NSC. This involved a lot of traveling and very long hours. I wanted to see more of my children, as they grew up. I wanted to take a break and recharge my batteries, as it were, both intellectually and physically. So early in 1973 I indicated to Kissinger that I would be leaving the NSC staff. However, I also felt that this was a good time in terms of where we stood on the issues I had been working on. As of the beginning of the second Nixon administration, and remember that this was before the Watergate scandal really broke upon us, we had ended the Vietnam War and we'd gone to Hanoi in February of 1973, to try to further the normalization of relations with North Vietnam. We'd opened up relations with China, including arranging for the trip by President Nixon, his trip, and later ones. We were on a path in terms of relations with China that was brand new. We were making significant progress with the Soviets. I had also gone to Moscow for that summit meeting. That situation seemed to be going well. Therefore, on the issues on which I had been working most fully, I felt that we had made important breakthroughs. In the case of Vietnam the future seemed to be uncertain, but I felt that we had done all that we could do for the time being. So this was a logical time to leave government service, both in terms of substance, as well as for personal reasons.

In May 1973, just as I was about to leave government service, I learned for the first time that my phone had been wiretapped. We've covered that. Let us go over it again, knowing there will be repetition.

One day in early May, 1973, shortly before I was to leave, Kissinger called me into his office and told me that on the next day it would be revealed in the "New York Times" that there had been a wiretapping operation under way, involving the home phones of about a dozen members of the NSC staff, the Defense Department, and a couple of journalists. I was one of those whose phone had been tapped.

Kissinger gave the following explanation of this matter on this and other occasions. First, he assured me that it was entirely legal and that the administration had carefully gone over this process with the Attorney General and others. Secondly, there had been very damaging leaks to the press, for example concerning the secret bombing of Cambodia, as well as other, national security issues. These leaks had been very damaging to our foreign policy and jeopardized our opening to China and other initiatives, in the view of Kissinger and of President Nixon. Thirdly, a lot of these leaks could only have come from people who had access to sensitive information, including members of the NSC staff. Fourthly, Kissinger said that he was absolutely confident in my own loyalty and that I hadn't been involved in the leaking of information. He made it clear that the wiretapping was no reflection on me. Fifthly, he said that, as National Security Adviser, he could not tell the President, the FBI [Federal Bureau of Investigation], and others that his staff should be exempt from wiretapping. If they were going to pursue the wiretapping, since some of the people around Kissinger had access to this sensitive information and were fairly liberal in political outlook, anyway, it would have to include some of the members of the NSC staff, who had access to the kind of information that was leaked. He said that, therefore, this was a form of protection to some of the members of the NSC staff to show that we were innocent of leaking information.

To be honest about it, my own reaction to this information was not one of total outrage and was quite moderate. However, I can understand why others might feel that I should have been more outraged. My view was the following. First of all, this was a very stupid thing to do. If the President and Kissinger were worried about leaks, they were not going to find out about this over wiretapped phones because people who were going to leak sensitive information to journalists would probably go into some quiet restaurant, sit in a corner, and whisper in their ear. They were not going to leak information over the telephone. So I thought that this was a clumsy, as well as obviously somewhat unattractive way of proceeding. I recognized and felt strongly myself that the ongoing leaks were damaging to national security. One can certainly make the case that the Nixon and Kissinger apparatus was much too secretive. We saw the excesses during the Watergate Affair and elsewhere. However, if you're trying to conduct secret openings to China and secret negotiations with Vietnam and other things, one could argue that security was clearly jeopardized by leaks and by giving people in other countries a sense that we can't maintain discipline and security.

So I understood the problem and the rationale. Also, if you were going to wiretap, you had to include the NSC staff, including me, because I was one of the few people who had access to all of this information. The Russians, the Chinese, and the Vietnamese experts, for example, would know everything going on in their area. But I, along with Kissinger and Haig, was one of the few people who had access to all of the areas. I understood the rationale. I still thought that it was stupid, but I did not feel outraged, either in terms of my personal conduct toward Kissinger or my public comments. As I say, I could understand that people would have different views on such matters. To this day, I think that it was not the way to go about trying to find out about leaks.

Q: Just a further detail, from an historical point of view. Has it come out, or is the suspicion well founded, involving some person or persons over the years?

LORD: Over the leaks?

Q: Yes.

LORD: No. It has never been determined, any more than we know who was Deep Throat in connection with the Watergate Affair. No, the answer is that this operation, which proved to be very damaging to Kissinger politically and personally, as well as embarrassing to the Nixon administration generally, also didn't turn up anything. Indeed, there were even some absurd and amusing overtones. For example, when they tapped my phone, I don't really know, but I assume that the FBI [Federal Bureau of Investigation] people who listened in must have gotten excited when my wife was talking in Chinese to her mother. However, this turned out to be a conversation about Chinese recipes. Their telephone conversations were not of a sensitive nature.

I had some suspicions, even before I knew I had been wiretapped. I remember occasionally hearing funny sounds on my phone. Obviously, I knew that there had been damaging leaks, and I knew that they involved some issues that very few people knew about. And I was among those who knew about them. So we even used to joke about this, at times, wondering about who was listening in on our conversations, never really thinking that it was really happening.

My strong belief is that if you're working for the government and have a problem with the established policy, you debate it internally within the government. If you lose the debate, you carry the policy out faithfully, and you don't leak the issue in an effort to try to damage the policy. If the policy is of such overwhelming moral and political importance that you think it's of fundamental significance, you resign. We discussed this in the context of the Cambodian incursion of 1970. I don't believe in leaks. Now, there's a thin line between leaking and backgrounding. Backgrounding is at least authorized by higher authority in an effort to build support for a policy or try to explain it in a deniable fashion to influence the national debate. That's different from what a more junior person does when he goes out on his or her own responsibility, leaking information in an effort to damage the established or proposed policy.

So, I want to make clear that I was leaving government service shortly after that anyway, after a couple of months of consideration. I didn't leave because of the wiretapping. In retrospect, I should have stayed absolutely mum publicly, in terms of media inquiries. I remember that I appeared on TV once or twice under great pressure from the media to say something. I made a nuanced response to the questions. Nevertheless, I expressed more tolerance for what had happened than I should have. In retrospect, I wish I had said nothing. It would be hypocritical to criticize the tapping for the reasons which I have just mentioned. However, I should not have expressed myself publicly in any way, although it was only one or two interviews indicating that I wasn't really upset. I should have been absolutely silent in public, rather than expressing partial understanding of what had been done. So I'm not particularly proud of what I did.

I've explained why I was leaving government service. Kissinger was obviously very sorry to see me leave, in view of our personal relationship and our having worked closely together on so many of these issues. He had great respect for my work. However, he understood why I was leaving. The President also greatly valued my work, especially on China and Vietnam. He wrote several nice letters to this effect.

Around June 1973, my wife and I took a trip to Portugal. I took things easy at home and spent time with my wife and children. I began thinking about what I had been through. I didn't have any master plan as to what I would do next. I went out to the Aspen Institute [in Colorado], where I gave a couple of talks on China. It was August, I believe. I was about to have a week's vacation and also engage in an intellectual seminar on great books, when I got a phone call from Kissinger. He asked me to come to California to talk to him because he was about to become Secretary of State and, in fact, wanted me back on his team. I had my usual, ambivalent reaction because I was looking forward to a little bit longer break from government service. On the other hand, I had been out of government for three months. I was excited about returning to the State Department but also sort of wished that this invitation to return to work hadn't been extended so relatively quickly.

So I went out to California. I remember that Brent Scowcroft was there, as well as Larry Eagleburger. I believe that I met Kissinger at San Clemente, where President Nixon went when he went to California. Kissinger told me that he wanted me to become the Director of the Policy Planning Staff in the State Department. I accepted. We all began talking about the coming challenges.

During this period I was out of the service, I hadn't missed too much in the field of foreign policy. There were no China trips, so I didn't miss any of them. Kissinger had planned to go to China during the summer of 1973, but that trip had been postponed. At the time I returned to working for the government, Kissinger was trying to work out a settlement in Cambodia, with the help of the Chinese. Previous work on a settlement had started to fall apart. In any event I didn't miss a trip to China or Russia with Kissinger. The Year of Europe Initiative was launched by the Nixon administration with a speech by Kissinger. He said that it was high time to pay attention to our European allies, given the changing outline of the world and the challenges facing all of us. We had dealt so much with Russia, China, and Vietnam during the first Nixon term. That European initiative didn't get off to a very good start, but the launching of this program took place while I was out of government.

The Vietnam Peace Agreement was beginning to unravel, as Hanoi began to probe and violate the cease-fire. Kissinger had an unsatisfactory meeting with the North Vietnamese negotiator Le Duc Tho in Paris to try and tighten up the implementation of the agreement. Meanwhile, the Watergate issue was picking up steam, though its full dimensions were certainly not yet clear.

It was in September, 1973, when Kissinger went through his confirmation hearings before the Senate. We helped him get ready for those hearings. He was closely questioned on the wiretapping and other controversial issues. He got through that, and then there was a very emotional swearing in of Kissinger as Secretary of State, at the White House. His parents, quite elderly already, were present. His mother held the Bible when he took the oath of office. It was quite a moving experience to have an immigrant become Secretary of State for the first time. A lot of people attending the ceremony were moved to tears. You might think that the person first moved to tears would be Kissinger's mother. She had escaped from the Nazi tyranny in Germany, and her son was becoming Secretary of State. We asked her afterwards: "Everyone else was crying. Why weren't you?" She said: "Well, my son absolutely forbade me to cry. He told me that it was not allowed in any way."

Q: Well, Sisco had been an FSO, but he never served abroad.

LORD: That's right. Many people thought of him as an FSO. Roy Atherton worked on Middle Eastern affairs. Tom Enders specialized in economic and Latin American affairs and tragically died a few years ago. There was also Arthur Hartman for Europe. These are some of the best Foreign Service officers. I realize that I'm leaving a lot of very capable people out. I believe that in almost every case, at least as far as I can remember, the Assistant Secretaries were FSOs. Some of the Undersecretaries were also FSOs. As I said, Larry Eagleburger and I had also been FSOs.

So Kissinger would have people on the Seventh Floor who were close to him, but they worked very closely with the FSOs. For example, in my case with regard to China, specifically, I worked very closely with Phil Habib, and then Art Hummel, Habib's successor as Assistant Secretary for East Asian Affairs. Regarding Middle Eastern affairs, Hal Saunders worked very closely with Roy Atherton, as well as Joe Sisco. On European and Russian affairs, Sonnenfeldt and Bill Hyland worked very closely with Arthur Hartman. The Assistant Secretaries and the FSOs had very broad access to information and were as much involved as any of us who sat on the Seventh Floor. So there was a very nice mix of FSOs and other people that Kissinger had brought over from the NSC. For these FSOs, of course, this was very exhilarating and exciting.

Probably, when you got to the level of Deputy Assistant Secretary, the morale situation was the same, most of them being closely involved in policies/all of them FSOs. I think that there was still some resentment, say, at the Country Director level and below that they were not so directly involved. Kissinger believed in not having very large meetings. If he was discussing particularly sensitive issues, he often would have only the relevant Assistant Secretary there. So the regional bureaus were clearly involved; it was not just Kissinger's insiders that attended these meetings. But he would also notice if a Country Director or below were sitting in on these meetings. He was always worried about leaks and sensitivities. I remember arguing with him about this to no avail. Others also talked to him about this issue, saying that this was not the way to do business. The Assistant Secretary would have to rely on his or her Country Director who would have more detailed knowledge of a particular nation or issue. The Kissinger arrangement was bad for morale to a certain extent. And it was not particularly efficient. Just to take a specific example. If you're meeting with the Foreign Minister of a given country, and the Assistant Secretary is the only person from the regional bureau attending it, the Assistant Secretary has to take the notes and prepare the memorandum of conversation. So it's a waste of senior people's time. It's good for the Country Director or below to take that burden away and also to be kept fully informed and have 'face' with his foreign counterparts. Attendance at some of these meetings would be on an individual, need to know basis, if there was a particular need.

At my regular staff meetings with about 25 officers assigned to S/P, which I thought were important as a management tool and were good for morale purposes, I would review what happened at the meetings with Secretary Kissinger and what was happening in the Department more generally. I felt that individuals should know more about what was going on with our foreign policy and on the Seventh Floor, and not just in his or her area of responsibility. On sensitive matters I would brief those officers on my staff most directly involved. However, I never let Kissinger know how much I was telling all of my people. I needed their help, I needed their thinking. This, in turn, helped Kissinger and the national interest. I wanted to promote good morale. I also told them that, because of the sensitivity of some of the subjects, I counted on their discretion.

Q: How did Secretary Kissinger respond to economic issues?

LORD: He developed a better understanding of them. There were a lot of jokes about how little attention he paid to economic affairs. At the NSC, you could talk to Bob Hormats and Fred Bergstren, both of whom worked there; they would say that Kissinger didn't spend a great deal of time on economic matters. At State, however, he began to understand the importance of economic issues and began to get more on top of them. He realized this clearly on the energy issue and at the G7 Summit Meetings. He had great respect for Tom Enders, Chuck Robinson, and Bill Rogers, Undersecretaries of State for Economics. Not only was Enders brilliant and creative and gave Kissinger a lot of substantive ideas, but he was a tough person who would argue back with Kissinger and often on turf that Tom was more familiar with than Henry was. Kissinger began to be more familiar with economic issues and realized more and more how important they were. Of course, it's a cliché now in the 1990s to say how important economics is, but even in the 1970s economic issues were important. However, during the Cold War, the balance of power was so important, and the economy was much less globalized than it is now, in terms of our dependence on exports and foreign investment. Now there is also the impact of the Internet on economic affairs. Back in the early 1970s you could make the point that political and security matters were more important than economic problems, while you can make the case now that economics have risen to the top of the agenda.

Actually, I can't think of a weak bureau in the State Department of that time. All of them performed well at least on some issues. For example, in Africa we made major strides on Rhodesia and reached a settlement there. Henry Kissinger's speech at Lusaka reflected a change in our policy. That speech received widespread approval. I think that S/P gave great help there, given the geopolitical dimension. On Asia he had good support on China, for example, from the Bureau of East Asian and Pacific Affairs and myself. In dealing with the Russians he had good support from the Bureau of European Affairs.

I'm not trying to be popular by not criticizing anybody, but I think that, on the whole, since Kissinger picked good people, in general he had pretty good support.

Q: Jomo Kenyatta.

LORD: Jomo Kenyatta, of course. All of this was quite dramatic, and I sat in on all of these meetings during Kissinger's trip to Africa. This was coming to a head during the presidential primaries in 1976 when Ronald Reagan was challenging President Ford. I find this hard to believe but, apparently, southern African diplomacy and the push for majority rule in Rhodesia, as well as black rights and majority rule, were considered significant issues in places like Texas and other states in the southern part of the United States. You wouldn't think that the people in those states would be that concerned about such matters. It just shows you how far we've come in our society since then.

President Ford lost a closely contested primary election in Texas in 1976 and, I believe, some other primary elections in other southern states. The outcome was close enough so that Kissinger's diplomacy in southern Africa might have made the difference. To Ford's credit, and Kissinger makes that point in his book, Ford never once mentioned or tried to rein in Kissinger on what he was doing in Africa regarding majority rule and black rights, even though Ford knew that it would hurt him politically vis-à-vis the Right Wing of the Republican Party and Ronald Reagan, especially in the southern primaries.

I remember specifically that we were traveling in Africa during the presidential primary campaign in Texas. I think that we arrived in Ivory Coast at the time, got off the plane, and were greeted by the press. President Ford had just lost the primary election to Reagan in Texas. The press representatives began to sing to Kissinger, "The eyes of Texas are upon you." I want to give President Ford his due. I don't want to be too negative.

To get back to Kissinger's role at this time. It's hard to remember now, but everyone knew that Kissinger, despite the wire tapping and some of the other elements at the time, was completely removed from the Watergate Affair and that he had nothing to do with that. Everyone realized the major contributions Kissinger had made and everyone was looking for someone to trust during this period. Already, of course, particularly on the liberal side, there was some angst [concern] about Kissinger. And some of the conservatives felt that he wasn't tough enough on the ideological and human rights front. However, on the whole, he was the most respected and popular man in America. He was on countless magazine covers. Equally important, of course, was that many people respected him overseas. Those who depended on American credibility and steadiness saw in Kissinger continuity from the Nixon into the Ford era. They saw someone who was able to carry on, despite the fallout from the Watergate Affair and from the Vietnam War, as well as the growing Congressional ascendancy in foreign policy, in addition to all of the other problems that I have mentioned. So Kissinger's holding this country together by virtue of his personality and prestige, making sure that our foreign policy didn't fall apart, was very important, in addition to his other accomplishments.

In addition to some of the Middle Eastern shuttle diplomacy trips and attention to some of these new issues which I have mentioned, as well as a host of other issues where we either prevented damage or even made progress, I think that Kissinger's general role of promoting trust and holding things together cannot be underestimated. Kissinger faced all of the problems that I have mentioned and managed to keep our foreign policy going.

Some people say that Kissinger was one of our greatest Secretaries of State. I think that is the wrong question because you have to look at Kissinger's contributions both in terms of his White House years as National Security Adviser and his years as Secretary of State. By the time Kissinger was Secretary of State, the Watergate Affair and other issues very quickly overtook us. I think that these issues constrained Kissinger, even though he made major contributions in the Middle East and elsewhere. I think that you have to look at his overall contributions during both the White House and State Department years. After all, it was while he was National Security Advisor that we opened to China, advanced 'détente' with the Soviet Union, and ended the Vietnam War. In that sense I think that Kissinger was surely one of our greatest diplomats. However, just as Secretary of State alone, I'm not sure that you can make as convincing a case in terms of his actual accomplishments. Even as Secretary of State I think that his record was outstanding because of his more general role, which I've mentioned, of holding things together, as well as progress on issues like the Middle East.

There was no question that we slowed down in terms of developing relations with China in 1975 and 1976. President Ford was worried about the challenge from Governor Ronald Reagan and didn't want to take on the Taiwan issue. In turn, China was going through its own transition, with Zhou En-lai and Mao Zedong sick, and then dying in 1976, and the struggle between the pragmatists like Deng Xiaoping, versus the Gang of Four, led by Mao's wife. Détente with the Soviet Union was under assault from the conservatives or neo-conservatives like Senator Henry Jackson [Democrat, Washington state] and others who gave priority to Jewish emigration from the Soviet Union to Israel as one of the conditions for extending MFN [Most Favored Nation] treatment to Soviet products imported into the United States. These conservatives also opposed arms control agreements with the Soviet Union and thus were taking away some of the carrots we had proffered to the Soviets.

At the same time the liberals in Congress and the Left were hurting our Soviet policy by cutting our defense budget and making us less robust and less of a threat to the Soviets. So the sticks and carrots we had intended to use with the Soviets were under attack. There was also the feeling that we had not been tough enough with the Russians in the field of human rights.

So our détente policy with the Soviets was running out of steam. Our China policy was also running out of steam. The Vietnam settlement of 1973 was unraveling. You could argue whether the agreement with Vietnam was realistic and good enough. I've already explained that it seemed to us that it was the best we could get. You could also argue how much of this deterioration was due to the growth of Congressional authority and lack of trust in the Executive Branch. However, the fact that Hanoi didn't have to fear American retaliation because Congress sharply cut and then virtually eliminated both military and economic aid to South Vietnam and opposed any bombing in response to Hanoi's violations of the 1973 agreement were also major factors. Indeed, Kissinger cites Watergate as single-handedly undermining the Paris Agreement, encouraging Hanoi to attack the South without fear of American retaliation because of the weakened Presidency. I agree that Watergate was a major factor but the American people and Congress had lost staying power on Vietnam, with or without Watergate.

This was a very difficult period for Kissinger. I think that you have to recognize that he was a major figure and influence holding us together during this very difficult period. I think that was Kissinger's greatest, single contribution to American foreign policy during his service as Secretary of State.

Of course, there were also individual achievements, particularly in the Middle East and Southern Africa, during that time, for which Kissinger deserves great credit as well.

Q: There may be nuances here. Did you find that? Mark Palmer was looking at people, rather than power.

LORD: There would be some elements there which we tried to introduce. Sometimes, Kissinger would accept them and sometimes not. However, I don't want to pretend that this was a major, philosophical debate, at least on the surface. Nevertheless, the debate took place around specific issues. It would reflect itself and, perhaps, either one of the bureaus or the policy planning staff would pay more attention to values, democracy, and human rights than Kissinger normally would. He might accept some aspects of this and not other aspects. Kissinger did address this issue of values and interests, pragmatism and moralism head-on in his Minneapolis speech. He would always grant a role for values in our policies.

I don't think that it would be right to say that Kissinger was pessimistic, but he was aware of limits. Part of that was accentuated, of course, by the erosion of executive authority because of the Watergate Affair and the fallout from the Vietnam War and the expansion of the role of Congress in the field of foreign policy. There were cuts in our defense budget, and we also found ourselves unable to make concessions, either. So that perhaps also gave him a greater sense of what we might accomplish. You should remember that, as Kissinger came into office, he already felt philosophically, before the impact of the Watergate Affair and the full impact of the Vietnam War, although it had already had some impact, that America could not forever be the sole leader of the Free World, so to speak. Already there was some danger that the American people would become fatigued over this role. A tendency in this direction had already started to become noticeable in the late 1960s, and this role had already gone on for two decades. People had become fatigued at the burdens, financially and in other aspects, e.g. psychologically. We were heavily engaged and trying to do everything, virtually everywhere.

So, as I said in earlier interviews, Kissinger stressed the need for our allies to do more. There was the whole Nixon Doctrine and the tendency to look to other countries to provide combat troops. We would provide the nuclear umbrella, foreign aid, and military assistance to support this effort. There was a general feeling in the United States that Japan and Western Europe were becoming stronger and that they should pick up more of the burden of the Western partnership. So these were constant themes, even before the Watergate Affair and the Vietnam War. I think that Kissinger clearly felt that America had to be the leader. However, domestically and for equity reasons he felt that we should look to our allies to assume more of the burden, in the emerging, multi-polar world.

President Nixon himself gave a speech in Kansas City in the early 1970's, in which he said that five centers of power were emerging, and this was 25 years ago. He said that these centers consisted of Western Europe, Japan, China, Russia, and the United States. He said that we were beginning to move from a bipolar to a multipolar world. I don't think that you could call this pessimism; it was a realistic analysis that the American people and Congress, even before the Vietnam War and the Watergate Affair, but certainly afterwards, were not prepared to do everything in the world. And now that Europe and Japan had become strong, they should shoulder more responsibilities. This in time would encourage the American people and Congress to continue to do our share.

That's also one of the reasons why he felt that it was important to open up to China and try to achieve more diplomatic flexibility, so that we could also meet these challenges in a more sophisticated way.

Q: You refer to trips. The Policy Planning Staff would not seem to have been a trip-oriented organization.

LORD: No, and it shouldn't be, in my opinion. That kind of activity leads to one becoming operationally oriented. Now, having said that, I was told that I could go on any trip that I wanted to make. Partly, these trips were fun and exciting. The trips with Secretary Kissinger were also very important. And they gave me policy impact, partly because they provided me with access to Secretary Kissinger himself and to his staff and reinforced my own reputation to others as a close associate.

On the other hand, we had a huge agenda and a lot of work to do in Washington. Basically, the Director of the Policy Planning Staff was not in an operational position, and our role was to look ahead, in my view. So, therefore, I tried to strike a balance. I think that some of my successors went on too many trips, while some went on too few. I think it's useful to go on a few trips, to get a sense of the Secretary of State's thinking and to maintain your personal relationship and access to him, as well as to demonstrate to people in the State Department that you're one of the key players in the building. All of these things are not insignificant. I probably went on about half of Secretary Kissinger's trips.

I of course went on all of his trips to China, in view of the fact that this was my key specific portfolio item. He made several trips to China when he was Secretary of State. I also went on some of the trips to the Soviet Union, because they were important. I went on some trips that were multi-faceted. I remember one trip when we went to Eastern Europe and the Middle East, ending up in Rome at the World Food Conference. I went on both Egyptian shuttle diplomacy trips, but thankfully I missed the trip to Syria, which was by far the longest. Kissinger made three agreements on the Middle East, and I was involved in making two of them. Having said that, I should add that I was clearly in a supporting role. On the China trips I was the leading staff person, together with a representative from the Bureau of East Asian and Pacific Affairs and with Dick Solomon from the White House NSC [National Security Council] staff. On these trips to East Asia I worked with Phil Habib or Art Hummel or Bill Gleysteen, from the bureau, as well as Dick Solomon from the NSC staff. Obviously, I remained the key China person.

On a Russian trip I would be in a supporting role with Helmut Sonnenfeldt, Bill Hyland, and Arthur Hartman. On a Middle East trip I played a supporting role with Phil Habib, Joe Sisco, Roy Atherton, and Hal Saunders. However, I could provide some perspective to the other people making these trips. I could remind Secretary Kissinger of what the impact would be on other issues. I could be a good spear carrier and, since I knew enough about the issues, I could help draft memoranda and telegrams on some of these matters, if they needed help, although they usually didn't, in most cases. I would sit in on all of the meetings. Because Kissinger was a traveling Secretary of State, he was in constant touch with Washington, in addition to what he was doing on a given trip. Lengthy cables were going back and forth on other matters. These cables would be from Kissinger's Deputy, from Larry Eagleburger [his Special Assistant], and so on. These people would be taking care of business back in Washington, and some of these matters involved questions that I was concerned with. In this sense Kissinger could use me as a kind of utility infielder.

I went on some of these trips for the reasons I have mentioned but not on all of them. It would have been a mistake if I had done so.

Q: Regarding the China trips, you say that you were a lead player. What does that mean?

LORD: Well, I was a lead player on China throughout this period. I don't want to say that I was the only specialist on China. Others from State and the NSC played crucial roles, with deep background, and we always worked very well together. However, I was the person whom Kissinger took to the meeting between President Nixon and Mao Zedong, because I had been in charge of preparing the briefing books for Nixon. Indeed, I went to all - five - meetings with Mao as well as all meetings, hundreds of hours, with and Zhou and Deng Xiaoping. I want to make it absolutely clear that John Holdridge played an absolutely central role. He knew a lot more about China than I did. During Kissinger's State Department years the Bureau of East Asian Affairs did a good part of the hard work and provided the expertise, in addition to the work done by Phil Habib and Art Hummel [Assistant Secretaries of State for East Asian and Pacific Affairs], as well as Dick Solomon, who was very helpful in the NSC in the White House. However, the fact is I was involved in the effort to improve relations with China from the beginning. I was very careful always to keep the Bureau of East Asian and Pacific Affairs fully informed, e.g. there were times when Kissinger wanted me to meet with the Chinese Ambassador. So basically, the way it worked out, there would be a memorandum for Kissinger's China trip and what he sought to accomplish. This would be a joint memo from me, as Director of the Policy Planning Staff, and the Assistant Secretary of East Asian Affairs, which we would agree on. The memo would also probably make it clear that it also was approved by the NSC [National Security Council] because at this time Kissinger was both National Security Adviser as well as Secretary of State. Indeed, we worked jointly with Solomon of the NSC on these issues. It was interesting to see that the memo would show that Kissinger, or later on his successor as National Security Adviser, Brent Scowcroft, was in full agreement, as was Dick Solomon, from the NSC staff. So this kind of memo on China was very collaborative between the Bureau of East Asian Affairs, the NSC staff at the White House, and myself as Director of Policy Planning. I think that it would be fair to say that, by virtue of our personal relationships and my role over the years on China, I was still the person, above all, whom Kissinger looked to on China, but this was a collective operation. China was the one area where I remained operational for the reasons I mentioned. I wouldn't try to be operational on other areas.

Even in the case of China, the heavy lifting in the sense of actual drafting of the basic papers was done by officers in the Bureau of East Asian Affairs and the White House, NSC staff. I would help to draft, or actually do the drafting, on some of the strategy and conceptual approach involved. I would also go over all of the documents involved. However, if Kissinger wanted one person at a meeting with Mao Zedong, Zhou En-lai, or Deng Xiaoping, it would be me. Unlike during the NSC days, when the State Department was often cut out of the operation, the Assistant Secretary for East Asian and Pacific Affairs was usually included, which was good. The result was that it was a much more comfortable and collaborative effort. It was a more comfortable situation, unlike Kissinger's White House years, when we knew that we were cutting out our State Department colleagues. Kissinger was now Secretary of State, and he believed that the State Department should be at the center of the operation.

The major trips that I recall therefore included the China trips, sometimes paired with other stops. We also went to Japan on many occasions. Kissinger knew that the opening to China was a shock to Japan. During Kissinger's term as Secretary of State he paid a lot of attention to US relations with Japan. He met with successive Japanese Foreign Ministers. We're talking about the situation 25 years ago. Now such meetings are more or less taken for granted. In a bilateral sense Kissinger met with Japanese Foreign Ministers about ten times in just about two years. Now, of course, there is an opportunity to do this, not only at the UN General Assembly, but at regional security or economic meetings, which provide the venue for meeting with the Japanese.

Q: I would have thought that dealing with Japan was a little bit like dealing with Italy. That is, governments keep changing and there is a collaborative form of government. So it's really hard to go and talk to someone who is going to be able to do anything.

LORD: That is a very perceptive comment. I may have made this point earlier on in this interview, but one reason we had a secret approach to the Chinese was due to the sensitivity of the issues with China and Russia, and even Vietnam, during Kissinger's White House years. Part of it was that Kissinger wanted to control our policy. Partly it was because President Nixon wanted things to be handled in a secret way. Nixon didn't want public comments or controversy. Part of the reason also was that we were not dealing with democracies, to say the least. Therefore, one or two leaders, or at least a few members of the Communist Party Politburo in these three countries could decide and then implement what was done.

In democracies the process is a little messier. You have to do things openly and involve more players. Japan is a classic example of this, but this situation is even true in the European democracies. This is particularly true in Japan with their collective approach to making decisions and the lack of dynamic prime ministers in general, although there are some exceptions, such as Nakasone. However, basically the Japanese come to decisions slowly and collectively. You're absolutely right, that this process of decision making was something less congenial to Kissinger. His critics would say that Kissinger was relatively uncomfortable with democracies and with parliaments. These critics considered that he would much rather have a dictator to deal with. When he dealt with Japan, Kissinger recognized that these were crucial considerations. In fact, he recognized that he and President Nixon had not treated the Japanese very well during the period of the Nixon shocks, that is, the period prior to the opening to China. He appreciated that some nurturing and tending of the relationship with Japan was important. And he considered the Japanese our key ally in the region, of course.

Other trips, particularly those to the Middle East and especially the two Egyptian shuttle trips I went on, were very dramatic. As I said, during the second one of them we had to prepare a major speech to the United Nations at the same time. That speech and the second Egyptian agreement came together on September 1, 1975. That was truly an exhaustive time.

The first Egyptian shuttle trip was also dramatic. I would like to spend a little bit of time on that. The Yom Kippur War of 1973 broke out when Kissinger was up at the UN. This is a good example of Kissinger taking a crisis and turning it into an opportunity. As the Yom Kippur War unfolded over a period of some time, Kissinger didn't want Israel to be overrun by Egypt. However, after a while, when Israel began counterattacking and pushing the Egyptians back, Kissinger recognized that if Israel totally defeated the Arabs, that wouldn't necessarily be very good, either. What he did in that connection was to make sure that the war stopped before either side scored a decisive victory. The Israelis had managed to push back the Egyptians. They had surrounded the Egyptian Third Army, and there was a real prospect that the Israelis would virtually wipe out the Egyptians. If this happened, the Arabs and the Egyptians would be humiliated once again, and Israel would have total self-confidence again. The psychological climate would not be propitious for negotiations.

Kissinger worked very hard on this. He quickly went to Moscow in this connection to arrange a cease-fire before the Egyptian Army was wiped out. He did this for the following reasons. He was already looking ahead to try to make progress on negotiations between the Egyptians and the Israelis. Kissinger recognized that here was a chance to achieve a psychological balance between the Israelis and the Egyptians. He felt that the Egyptians could take some pride, and for the first time, in having inflicted some heavy damage on the Israelis. They could honestly say that they had not been defeated. The Arabs could feel some satisfaction over this. At the same time the Arabs would recognize that, once again, if it had not been for intervention by the U.S., they might have been totally defeated by the Israelis. So, in Kissinger's view, the Arabs could feel some pride and satisfaction over the Yom Kippur War and that they were dealing from a position of some strength and not humiliation.

Similarly, psychologically on the Israeli side, the Israelis were in serious trouble, militarily, for the first time. Yes, the Israelis had made their usual comeback from a position of some disadvantage, but in fact they weren't as invincible as they thought they were. They felt that they could be a little more flexible on the peace process, in order to ensure their own security. Kissinger sought to freeze the situation at a point where both sides could claim some victory and some satisfaction. The sense of humiliation was less on the Egyptian side than before, in the sense that they were less vulnerable toward the Israelis than before. Kissinger thought that this situation set up the psychological framework for negotiations between the two sides. This was a classic example of Kissinger understanding the nuances of the situation.

Q: I think that this person also headed the Dissent channel.

LORD: You're right. I often spoke at the Open Forum meetings at which people could vent their views and sometimes differences within the Department. At times we had interesting speakers come in, including some who were controversial, like the head of the Green Party in Germany, Petra Kelly. That was another process.

We paid quite a bit of attention to this. I thought that it was important intellectually, but also for the morale of the Foreign Service, that people would think that this kind of thing could go on.

One last thing I would like to mention before I forget it. That is, the fact that Kissinger came close to resigning. I'm not sure that I have the chronology right on this, but it began toward the end of 1975, shortly after a trip which he made to China during the Ford administration. I think that it was in October, 1975. Secretary Kissinger was setting up President Ford's trip to China in December, 1975. There was a mini-massacre, not on the scale of the Saturday night massacre during the Nixon administration, when Attorney General Richardson resigned. This was another sort of massacre, involving bureaucratic changes.

As I describe elsewhere, by the way, Kissinger's trip to China had not gone well, and the Ford trip to China two months later ended up being very frosty, although we maintained a polite veneer over it. I don't have all of the details at my fingertips, but shortly after we returned to Washington from this trip to China, Kissinger lost his NSC [National Security Council] hat and was replaced as National Security Adviser by Brent Scowcroft. Also, I think that James Schlesinger [then Secretary of Defense] was fired and Donald Rumsfeld (then Chief-of-Staff) went over to replace him as Secretary of Defense. I believe that at about this point George Bush was brought back from China to head the CIA [Central Intelligence Agency].

Essentially because he lost his NSC hat, Kissinger was upset, although this change made sense. It worked out well, and Scowcroft turned out to be a close collaborator with Kissinger, having the same world view as Kissinger. Kissinger gradually began to realize that this new arrangement could work out well.

However, at the time, both in terms of losing some control, but also because there was a perception abroad that Kissinger's role had been weakened, he was concerned about the implications. We went through several weeks when Kissinger was genuinely debating in his own mind whether he should resign as Secretary of State. This seems absurd in retrospect. Given Kissinger's prestige, wearing two hats made no sense and was no way to run the show. It was an unnecessary distraction and bureaucratically awkward. Brent Scowcroft had worked closely with Kissinger, and it would have been absurd for Kissinger to leave the Department of State. For several weeks Kissinger met periodically with me, Larry Eagleburger, and some other, close advisers, as well as friends such as Bill Simon, who was either Secretary of the Treasury or had held that position. Also in the meetings with Kissinger, I believe, was David Bruce and a couple of other people. At these meetings Kissinger was wrestling over the question of whether he should resign. We met both at the Department and in private homes.

It reached the point, by the end of 1975, either in November or December, that Eagleburger and I drafted about ten versions of a public explanation of why Kissinger was resigning as Secretary of State. We did somersaults, trying to figure out how to write this letter. The more we tried to do it, the less it seemed to make sense. It was a very serious matter, and Kissinger genuinely was thinking of resigning. I still remember that it was on a Saturday or a Sunday that I had met with Kissinger again on the latest draft. I waved goodbye to him as he left the Department in a car to go over from the Department of State to the White House, to discuss his possible resignation with the White House. We thought that this actually might happen.

I forget actually whether Kissinger brought this matter up seriously with President Ford or whether President Ford asked him to forget about it. I don't know whether Kissinger said that he would actually resign. Of course, in moments of heat before, he would often threaten resignation for purposes of enhancing his leverage. These episodes were mostly not serious, but this time his resignation seemed to be a serious possibility. There was a lot of debate among his advisers as to whether he should resign, but most people felt that he was exaggerating the blow of losing his NSC hat.

Then, I guess, we got to the point where it was just about Christmas holidays, 1975. Kissinger finally decided to cool off on the matter over the holidays, noting the fact that we were having trouble drafting this letter of resignation. He said that this meant that we were having trouble finding a real rationale why he should leave the Department. He asked us to think about this matter over the Christmas holidays.

So the process of considering his resignation stopped because of the Christmas holidays, and the whole episode just faded away. He never did anything about this. I don't know how much of that is public knowledge. I haven't read Kissinger's most recent volume of memoirs yet. This was a strange episode, where a few of Kissinger's closest advisers were trying to figure out what the impact of his resignation would have on our foreign policy. He finally decided that it was in the national interest not to resign.

Q: Just to put this in context, we're going to follow the China thread through the period when you were the Director of the Policy Planning Staff in the Department of State, from 1973 to 1977. Then we'll pick it up with your service as Ambassador to China and the period of the Clinton administration. Here, we'll just stick to the China thread. Did the Policy Planning function include a China role?

LORD: I was Director of Policy Planning, of course, but I handled the China role personally. I worked very closely with the Bureau of East Asian and Pacific Affairs [EAP], first with Phil Habib, and then with Art Hummel and Bill Gleysteen as Assistant and Deputy Assistant Secretaries, in addition to people on the China desk like Al Jenkins and in INR [Bureau of Intelligence Research]. Also, I dealt with the White House, the NSC, Dick Solomon, and Peter Rodman. So this was a collective effort. As I say elsewhere, Kissinger melded together a team, drawing on the best Foreign Service Officers he promoted, who took over most of the Assistant Secretary positions, as well as people he brought over from the White House, including myself, Hal Sonnenfeldt, Bill Hyland, and Larry Eagleburger. So, contrary to Kissinger's general reputation of allegedly mistreating the Foreign Service and the State Department while he was in the White House, once Kissinger became Secretary of State, he realized the importance of using the Foreign Service. He always paid tribute to the dedication and intelligence of Foreign Service people. There wasn't just a palace guard around him. He really used the best people. He often did not treat Ambassadors with total openness, to say the least, depending on their competence. I'll cover the whole issue of Kissinger's style elsewhere.

The manner in which he handled the China matter reflects what he did on other issues. For example, he would work with Art Hartman [Assistant Secretary in the Bureau of European Affairs] on Europe and Russia, but he would have Helmut Sonnenfeldt [Counselor of the State Department] and Bill Hyland [INR Director] work on these issues as well. On Middle Eastern questions, he would work with Hal Saunders, who had come over from the White House staff, but also worked closely with Roy Atherton [Assistant Secretary in the Bureau of Near Eastern Affairs] and Joe Sisco (Undersecretary). It was always a melding of Foreign Service Officers and people close to Kissinger who had worked with him in the White House. Many of these people, like myself, had once been Foreign Service Officers.

That's the way things worked on China policy matters. I was still the key person, but clearly relied heavily on EAP [Bureau of East Asian and Pacific Affairs] and on the White House staff, because I had these other responsibilities. So that's the way policy matters were managed there.

I made 9 trips to China when I was in the government during this period. We had, of course, the secret Kissinger trip to China in July 1971; the trip in October [1971]; and the Nixon trip [in February 1972], which makes three. Then the trip in June 1972, which makes four. The trip in February 1973, makes five.

I left the government service in May 1973. I was exhausted physically, mentally, and emotionally. Working for Kissinger for four years is enough to drain anybody. It was a tremendous experience but it was also tiring. I wanted to recharge my batteries, see more of my family, and so on.

There was supposed to be a trip to China by Kissinger during that period, partly to resolve the Cambodian question. Partly because of the Cambodian bombing halt and the derailing of those negotiations and for other reasons, that trip was postponed. So I didn't miss any of the Kissinger trips to China, even though I was out of government service between May and September 1973.

The next trip to China, which was the sixth such trip for me and Kissinger was in November 1973. There were two more Kissinger-only trips in 1974 and 1975, and President Ford's visit in December 1975 (as well as to Indonesia and the Philippines).

Q: I think that we probably should record when you were made Director of the Policy Planning Office in the State Department. Did you wear, in effect, a China hat, as well as a Policy Planning hat?

LORD: That's right. This has been done on several occasions. My successor as Director of Policy Planning was Tony Lake. He wore an Africa hat, in addition to a Policy Planning hat. I'll treat the policy planning function in another session. Basically, one of the key ways to be effective in this function is to have access to the Secretary of State. One way to do that is to be a key adviser to the Secretary on one or two issues. You then have that natural and constant entree to the Secretary.

Q: By this time, in late 1973, were all operating systems go? Were things looking good?

LORD: Do you mean with China?

Q: With China, yes.

LORD: Well, conditions were improving. As I said earlier, President Nixon was reelected by a landslide [in November 1972], and this was still before the Watergate Affair really became a central preoccupation of the administration. The Watergate Affair really began to emerge more and more strongly in late 1973 and 1974. I cover this in connection with the trips to China and other places. Obviously, the Watergate Affair began to affect our foreign policy generally and increasingly became a focus of President Nixon's attention.

Still, during the fall of 1973 the ultimate impact of the Watergate Affair was far from apparent, and certainly would have been far from apparent to the Chinese. The Watergate Affair was gathering some steam, but it didn't seem to have done so in any decisive fashion by November 1973, as I recall.

Meanwhile, the Vietnam War irritant between us and the Chinese appeared to be behind us, and President Nixon was presumably in office for four more years. The Soviet problem was still there, although we'd improved relations with the Soviets, which was a good development in terms of our relations with China. We'd improved relations with one country and presumably could improve relations with the other country, because this gave us more leverage.

On the whole, yes, the situation was improving. We had more and more communications with the Chinese through the two channels I mentioned, the Chinese Embassy in Paris and the Chinese Mission to the UN in New York, and now had Liason Offices in the two capitals. We had worked in parallel on issues like the situation in South Asia, and we kept the Chinese informed on other issues, especially our dealings with Moscow. We were overcoming historical mistrust and isolation between ourselves and China. We were beginning to pick up some momentum in the Chinese-American relationship. We were working on the claims and assets question and on the economic front. We were sharing our intelligence with the Chinese. Generally, things were going quite well. That was the background to the Kissinger trip of November 1973. As I have already said, the February 1973 setting up of Liason Offices was the single best visit to China.

The November 1973 trip took place at the end of a long swing through the Middle East. The Yom Kippur War [between Israel, on the one hand, and Egypt and Syria, on the other] had broken out in October 1973, just after I returned to government and Kissinger had been appointed Secretary of State. So we went to Morocco, Tunisia, Jordan, Egypt, Iran, Pakistan. We stayed at the same Guest House in Pakistan from which we sneaked out to China on the secret trip in July 1971.

On this occasion, and for the first time, my wife went back to China. I met her there. She had gone to China ahead of me. She saw a number of her relatives. Indeed, this return to China led, many years later, to her best-selling novel, Spring Moon.

Kissinger received a very warm welcome on this trip to China. He again had very good and wide ranging discussions with Zhou Enlai. Of all of the discussions I have been involved in during my entire career, the Zhou Enlai-Kissinger discussions were the most sophisticated, wide ranging, and interesting, bar none. Kissinger himself has said that Zhou was the number one statesman that he ever met. De Gaulle tied for first place in this respect, but Kissinger only saw De Gaulle a few times. I would also put Zhou Enlai in first place.

Having said that, as I commented to Kissinger, and I think that he agreed and so stated in his later memoirs Zhou Enlai seemed somewhat more subdued and restrained than usual. Kissinger was used to Zhou Enlai as a very charismatic and very elegant figure who often commented on various issues somewhat at length, by contrast with Mao. Zhou Enlai had an elegant mandarin style. I don't want to overstate this, but Zhou probably knew by now that he had cancer, which may have begun to have an impact on his stamina. Maybe Zhou and Mao had begun by now to see the creeping impact of the Watergate Affair, but that's pure speculation, as I've already said. I don't think that it was a major consideration as yet. Zhou Enlai's comments were less lengthy, and he seemed a little bit restrained, although he was still brilliant.

Although this was a good trip to China, and the mood remained friendly on the whole, I would say that you can't expect always to develop momentum during any particular trip. Compared to the trip to China in February 1973, we didn't make as much progress. So it's possible, although we didn't know it at the time, that the struggle that would emerge, certainly during the next couple of years in China, over the succession to Mao, and the Watergate impact on our own domestic scene, meant that we were beginning to see the first signs that domestic constraints on each side were beginning to slow things down. I don't want to stress this too much. I think that this became much clearer in 1974 and 1975. This had not yet happened, and certainly Kissinger had a very warm reception during this trip. Again, Kissinger had an unprecedented, three-hour meeting with Chairman Mao, who normally met only with heads of state. Mao had already done Kissinger the honor of meeting with him in February 1973, probably the first time that Mao met anybody at Kissinger's level, although I could be wrong about that.

As I say, Mao met with Kissinger for three hours and obviously enjoyed the meeting. On several occasions during this meeting Kissinger stood up as if to leave, but Mao extended the conversation. Mao was physically frail, as he had been, but he was still very sharp in his comments. Once again, this meeting hadn't been set up in advance. We assumed that we would meet with him, since we had seen him before. Wang Hairong [Mao's grandniece] would shuffle in and out with notes, and Zhou Enlai would announce that Mao wanted to see Kissinger.

Q: One question. This will come up again, as things developed. As you describe this meeting, obviously everyone was impressed by the meetings with Chairman Mao, and all of that. However, I've just finished reading your wife's book, "Eighth Moon," about her sister. In this and other books about China, it really comes across that Mao was in a class maybe a little ahead of Hitler and Stalin, as far as what he did. In my opinion, Mao was one of the three monsters of the 20th century. Was this a factor in your contacts with Mao, or were we all caught up in something like adulation of Mao?

LORD: Well, it's a very fair and good question. Furthermore, I agree that Mao should be put up there with Stalin and Hitler as a monster. Of course, the official Chinese line is that Mao was "70 percent good and 30 percent bad." They say, and I think that you can reasonably make the case, if you try to be detached about it, that when Mao was fighting to unify China and make it stand up, his record was fairly positive, in Chinese terms. None of us liked communism, of course. But then you had the Great Leap Forward, the Cultural Revolution, the starvation of the people, the brutality, and so on. Even the Chinese admit that Mao went overboard. In view of the tens of millions of people who died, either through starvation or just in the prison camps and in other ways, and the countless others who suffered, there is no question that Mao was a monster.

Now, to return to your question, we were certainly not naïve. We knew that Mao was no Boy Scout. That was true of Zhou Enlai, as well, who was, of course, more elegant. So we knew for a fact that Mao and Zhou did not get to be where they were without ruthlessness. Having said that,

I admit that the personal impact of Mao and Zhou put some restraint on our judgment in the 1970s. First of all, we didn't know the full enormity of Mao's crimes at that point. Some people probably knew or suspected it, but it was hard to know. I think that it's fair to say that the full disasters of the Cultural Revolution, and even the famine of the Great Leap Forward were not fully known in the 1970s. But Communist China was clearly an unattractive society afflicted with the cult of the personality and with repression. That was obvious to anybody, but the full enormity of it was not known.

Secondly, we were then on a very hard-headed mission. We were not going to give the Chinese high marks for good behavior, but we tried to serve American national interests. At the time we were concerned about the Soviets, the Vietnam War, and all the other things we had to talk about. We also had the longer range desire to engage with China as an emerging, great country. So that was uppermost in our mind, rather than passing judgment on Chinese society.

Thirdly, it was no secret, however, that Secretary Kissinger always had and always will put the emphasis on geopolitics, as against human rights. Therefore, without approving of or being naive about Mao's personality, Kissinger was focused on American national interests and geopolitical considerations. In fairness to Secretary Kissinger, he also believes that, over the long run, this makes for a more stable and peaceful world, with less chance of people blowing each other up. This also serves human rights in that sense.

In addition, you had the general tendency of Americans to swing back and forth. There was this euphoria of opening up relations with China. This made the media and virtually everyone tend to downplay the ugly dimensions of contemporary China. Today, the Chinese government often tends to get a very tough press in the United States. And they deserve it. Yet, compared to the worst of the Mao days, Chinese citizens have a better life. There is still great repression and many abuses of human rights, but less serious compared to what they were going through under Mao. However, for all of these reasons, I am basically granting part of your point. No one thought that Mao was a nice person, but for all of these other reasons, this consideration was not uppermost in our minds at the time.

One other point is that both Zhou Enlai and Mao were personally very impressive in totally different ways. So it was a fact that when you enjoyed your conversations with them, you tend to think in strategic terms as you are dealing with them. The convergence of national interests also tends to affect one's judgment.

Q: At the time, in late 1973, when you were seeing Mao, did we see China as being a decisive factor in the Vietnam War?

LORD: Do you mean in retrospect?

Q: I mean, at that time.

LORD: Well, the Vietnam War was officially over in January 1973, though the North Vietnamese takeover was still to come.

Q: I guess I mean in retrospect.

LORD: We were still urging the Chinese, of course, to contact Hanoi and persuade the North Vietnamese to live up to the Paris Agreements of 1973. The general judgment was, both at the time we were negotiating the Paris Accords and then trying to keep the agreement holding together, despite the North Vietnamese violations, that the Chinese were more helpful than the Russians. This was partly in their own self-interest. They didn't want the embarrassment of a dispute with Hanoi to get in the way of their own national interest, at least on the ideological plane. We also thought that they weren't going to bend over backwards; they weren't going to do anything that would get them in trouble with Hanoi, and that would lose them influence, compared to Russia's influence in Hanoi.

The same problem existed in Korea, because China was jockeying for position, with Russia nearby. They were in a geopolitical competition with Hanoi. If China leaned too hard on Hanoi, the North Vietnamese might turn more toward the Russians. Not to mention, of course, that we now know much more than we did then, believe it or not, about internal competition for leadership within China as they headed the post-Mao period. Future leaders couldn't look too tough on their 'allies'.

Q: Was anybody telling you at that time that the Vietnamese and the Chinese really weren't blood brothers?

LORD: We knew earlier on that the Chinese put their relations with us first and this alleged relationship of "lips and teeth" [a Chinese and North Vietnamese propaganda term meaning different functions but close accommodation] with Vietnam second. However, they wanted to have their cake and eat it, too, at least as far as the competition with the Russians was concerned. I don't think that we understood the full hostility in the relations between China and North Vietnam. I don't recall anyone making this point very strongly. In retrospect, this may show that we did not have enough sensitivity to history.

Q: What about North Korea, because this must have been one of our concerns. It was one of the few, really hostile land borders we had, outside of the border with the Soviet Union. There was the division between North and South Korea and a feeling that Kim Il-sung could launch an attack on South Korea at any time. Was North Korea part of these discussions with China?

LORD: It was, but as I recall the matter, it was not a very meaningful part. The Chinese expressed a strict line of solidarity with the North Koreans. So we really got nowhere on North Korea, as I recall.

One area where we did make progress over time, and we're talking about a process which covered several trips to China, concerned our alliance with Japan. During the early talks with the Chinese, their basic line was that we were helping Japan to rearm by our alliance with them and that we were making them dangerous. We pointed out that this was an illogical position. Our alliance with Japan and our troops stationed in Japan, plus our nuclear umbrella over Japan, meant that Japan didn't really need to rearm or go nuclear. We said that it was in the interests of China and of the East Asian region that Japan feel that its security was taken care of by close ties with the U.S. Therefore, in effect, we were restraining Japanese militarism, and the Chinese should favor that. In fact, that argument had an impact on the Chinese over time, and they began to accept that it was in their interest. They never came right out and said so, either publicly or even privately, that they loved to see our troops in Japan or loved our alliance with Japan. However, they clearly got the point and were much more restrained, although that debate continues in Chinese minds, even as we speak today. Japan was an interesting subject of discussion with the Chinese.

We also talked about the Middle East in these discussions. Kissinger kept the Chinese informed in the course of his visits to China. The Chinese were clearly pro-Arab and were not willing to do much with Israel. This situation changed later on when the Chinese began to get military help from Israel. However, at the time the Chinese took pretty much a pro-Arab, pro-Palestinian position. Of course, we encouraged them to be more even handed. Basically, it was a matter of briefing the Chinese on what we were up to, usually working in our prevention of Soviet influence in the region.

On these trips there was often discussion of Europe. China always wanted us to have strong relations with Europe. They wanted to make sure that Russia had to worry about its Western flanks and could not focus all of its energies on China and East Asia. In some of these meetings with Zhou Enlai and Mao there was also discussion regarding the Central Eurasian pivot area from Turkey around to Pakistan. Of course, the Chinese had a particular friendship with Pakistan vis-à-vis India. The Chinese were suspicious of India. Chinese friendship with Pakistan was a frequent subject of dialogue between us. There were discussions about that area, and its geopolitical significance. Occasionally, there were conversations about Cuba and Africa, but these were not areas for major discussions. There was a lot of talk about what the Russians were up to in these areas as well as the Cuban role in Angola.

On Taiwan the Chinese would press us, of course. We indicated that we weren't going to do anything that would create great difficulties for China, but, of course, we also were not prepared to normalize diplomatic relations with China at that point or to back off from any of our commitments to Taiwan. That all came later. These were some of the agenda items that we were dealing with.

Q: Did the subject of Albania ever come up?

LORD: I'm sure we made some jokes. At one point, Albania was the one point in Eastern Europe that was close to China. Albania said that, between them and the Chinese, they represented one-quarter of the population of the world!

During those several trips, however, almost everything came up, including history and philosophy, in the course of regular agenda items, digressions, or jokes and conversation. Finally there would be discussion on how to strengthen bilateral ties. The Chinese maintained restraints so as to press us toward normalization. We did establish and expand Liaison Offices. Trade and cultural exchange were limited. We moved on the claims and assets issue.

As the Kissinger visits to China continued, we always took State Department people with us.

That was true even when Kissinger was National Security Council Adviser and before he became Secretary of State. Generally, Kissinger would lean on State Department people for support in discussing things like claims and assets, as well as issues of trade and cultural exchanges. Kissinger saw these matters as less than major in and of themselves, particularly compared with the geopolitical dimensions of our relationship with China. However, he saw these issues as valuable in signaling progress to the world and particularly in terms of building up constituencies in both countries for improved relations. He felt that, if we had business, cultural, and academic institutions in the U.S. which were engaged with China, this would help to broaden domestic support for American policy toward China. Similarly, within China, if more constituencies were involved in developing good relations between the U.S. and China, this would help to strengthen the overall fabric of the relationship, and help to buffer it against strains. So, in this sense, Kissinger encouraged these bilateral exchanges and contacts. However, for him these were relatively boring matters, compared to the big, geopolitical issues. And the Chinese, because of the Taiwan issue and our lack of diplomatic recognition, were not eager to allow great expansion of ties that comes with normalization. And, of course, the trips were all one way, our going to China, except for visits by Chinese officials to the UN, which we would use for bilateral exchanges.

Q: Could you talk a bit about how these meetings were conducted? Was this strictly a matter of Kissinger sitting on one side of a table and Zhou En-lai sitting on the other side? Did they talk back and forth or were there times when other people would get up, and somebody more junior might say: "Look, we're making a big thing of this, but remember that this is not as important to us as it may seem." Did people on either side try to put matters into perspective, or was it a matter of the principals talking for the record?

LORD: Well, I won't try to be precise in describing each individual trip. Kissinger went back to China several times as Secretary of State after the Nixon trip to China [in 1972]. He had people from the State Department with him. At the meetings, in addition to me, always there would be John Holdridge (until he became co-leader at the Liaison Office with Al Jenkins) the Assistant Secretary for East Asian Affairs and so on. After the U.S. Liaison Office in Beijing was opened, we had the chiefs of that office as part of the U.S. Delegation.

I was in every meeting. The most central part of the visits would be with Zhou Enlai until 1975, when Deng Xiaoping took the ill leader's place. Then, of course, Kissinger met three times with Mao on his own, plus once with Nixon and once with Ford. So he and I met a total of five times with Mao. I cannot be precise in terms of chronology, but we also met several times with the Vice Foreign Minister, Qiao Guanhua. Chao's wife was an interpreter. When Deng made a comeback, Chao made a mistake when he put his chips on the Gang of Four. Qiao Guanhua was a very sophisticated Vice Foreign Minister. He was a very able, number two man in the Foreign Ministry. In a sense, he actually ran the Foreign Ministry. The Foreign Minister was Ji Pengfei. He was replaced by Huang Hua somewhat later on. Qiao Guanhua was the key man to work with, as was Zhang Wenjin, the Assistant Minister who became Ambassador to the United States somewhat later, and who accompanied Kissinger and me on our secret flight from Pakistan to China.

Let me here recall one issue that belongs with a previous discussion of the February 1973 trip to China. On that trip we did raise again the question of American prisoners being held in China. The Chinese released a couple of prisoners who had been shot down over China as a result of the February 1973 trip. One was a CIA officer named Downey, who had been held since the Korean War. We raised his case. During the February 1973 trip, Zhou in effect invited some humanitarian reason for them to release him, or perhaps we thought of this angle. We looked into the matter. It turned out that Downey's mother had become very sick, cancer I believe. So I believe that we sent a message to Zhou, stating in effect: "Please release Downey so that he can see his mother before she dies." So Downey got out on humanitarian grounds because his mother was sick.

A couple of years later, lo and behold, Downey's mother was still alive and doing well. So Peter Rodman and I drafted a memo from Kissinger to President Ford at the time. The memo said along the following lines: "Mr. President, something has come to our attention which is deeply disturbing. The Chinese may accuse us of bad faith. We got Downey released a couple of years ago on humanitarian grounds because his mother was believed to be about to die. But she is still alive and doing well. The Chinese are obviously going to think that we misled them and that this is an example of bad faith." We then laid out several options as to what we might do. One of these options was to have the CIA wipe out Mrs. Downey so that we could show our good faith! It was, of course, a joke.

Kissinger then sent this memo to President Ford. Ford called Kissinger to the Oval Office and said seriously to him: "Henry, we can't do this."

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: Did you have a sense of how much the Chinese believed their own people on what happened at these meetings? Did you find that the officials lower down in the Chinese hierarchy were informed about these meetings?

LORD: Absolutely. The Chinese are very good at briefing up as well as briefing down. Often we would meet with other, Chinese officials before we saw Zhou, or we would be seeing their people ahead of time. We got the feeling that whatever had been said found its way up the chain, and vice versa. The Chinese were very good at orchestrating and singing from the same sheet of music.

I also said that Mao would use brush strokes in his Socratic dialogue, employing a few sentences and going from subject to subject. He was setting out the basic instructions for Zhou to carry out more elaborately.

Q: Sounds a little bit like Ronald Reagan, in a way.

LORD: True, but I wouldn't want to carry it too far.

Q: Reagan would make a broad brush comment.

LORD: However, in Mao's case you have to be careful. Mao was very purposeful and laid out his points very carefully, if briefly and seemingly casually. President Reagan would be very economical in presenting his views, but I wouldn't put the same, strategic purpose behind what he said as I would in the case of what Mao said.

Q: By this time did Kissinger also make sure that everybody on the U.S. side was well briefed, or was there still an element of secrecy?

LORD: Kissinger was much more open. By this time Kissinger was Secretary of State and was using the State Department, as well as his colleagues on the NSC [National Security Council], I think that Kissinger was fairly open. There might have been an occasional, sensitive issue on which he talked to Zhou Enlai alone. The fact that we were briefing the Chinese on Russian troop and other deployments was closely held, even within our delegation. Jon Howe and I, and sometimes Kissinger, I believe, handled these briefings. Not everyone would have known about that. However, on the whole, in the various meetings, if there was something that was really sensitive, which was not unusual for the Secretary of State, he might just have me there. Or he might just talk about the matter to Zhou Enlai in the course of a banquet.

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: But there would no longer...

LORD: There would no longer be the kind of secrecy that we had before.

Q: Was there concern, on our part, about Soviet troop deployments along the Chinese border, or was this just something that we could say to the Chinese, such as: "The Soviets are doing something there..."

LORD: Yes, we had to strike a balance. We didn't want to look as if we were deliberately trying to stoke their paranoia and fear and lose our credibility, when the threat wasn't all that serious. We didn't want to make it look as if we were trying to scare the Chinese for our own purposes. We weren't so stupid as to exaggerate the Soviet threat to China. On the other hand, we did try to point out that there was quite a formidable Soviet presence along the Chinese border, which, of course, the Chinese knew, although probably not in the kind of detail that we knew. We tried to strike a balance and gain Chinese confidence by sharing this information. We reminded the Chinese that the Soviets were a problem and, therefore, it was in the Chinese interest to continue to work with us on this geopolitical balance. However, we did this without exaggerating the Soviet threat or trying to pretend that it was more than it was. I think that, in general, the feeling was that, although the tensions were lower, the Sino-Russian relationship was still fairly hostile. However, there wasn't the kind of border clashes that the Chinese had with the Russians in 1969.

So I'll go to the details of the November 1973 trip, if that's agreeable. As I said, after a long swing through the Middle East, I met up with my wife in China [in 1973]. I felt that Zhou Enlai was more subdued. During the meeting with Mao, I felt that he was more frail. Mao mentioned the Watergate Affair. He compared it with breaking wind, and so forth. He could be a little crude. He made the point that, in Chinese eyes, this was nothing. I think that that was true of the views of most foreign countries, in Europe and everywhere else. However, it showed that Mao noticed it.

In the final, brief statement at the end of the meeting, I don't know whether you could call it a communique, after some exchanges on Taiwan, Zhou Enlai did insert the potentially meaningful phrase, the "Principle of One China."

We made it clear during this trip, and I haven't gone over the Kissinger memoirs, that we couldn't accept the Japanese formula for the normalization of diplomatic relations. The Japanese had leapfrogged us after we surprised them in an unfortunate way in 1972. Then they went ahead with their own process of normalization of relations with China. They broke diplomatic ties with Taiwan and normalized ties with the PRC [People's Republic of China]. Kissinger made clear to the Chinese that we couldn't do that. Kissinger may have said that, maybe some day or some day soon, but he said that we clearly weren't prepared to do that at the time. We said, in effect, that perhaps we could normalize relations if we could do it short of the Japanese formula, so long as we recognized the principle of One China. Zhou Enlai picked up on that. He didn't reject this but rather suggested that we try to get some language in the communique. He actually put in the communique the language, the principle of One China.

We thought that this suggested that the Chinese perhaps were willing to settle for something short of the Japan formula. We had essentially agreed to the term, the principle of One China, in the Shanghai Communique, so we were somewhat encouraged by the November 1973 trip.

We agreed to expand the staff and functions of the Liaison Offices. We agreed to more exchanges in various fields and tried to arrange for more trade. There was some progress made on the claims and assets front. However, as I've said, there was a somewhat more tentative mood in the discussions, on the whole.

On the Mao meeting, as I've said, we were summoned, as usual, on short notice to his simple residence in the Forbidden City. We entered the building. Inside there was a ping pong table and then Mao's study with a semi-circle of armchairs, with books all over the place, behind him, on the floor, and on tables. I've already described Mao.

This meeting with Mao lasted for three hours. Part of the reason for the length was that Mao seemed to enjoy talking to Kissinger. We thought that it showed confidence and that it was important. Partly, we thought, it was also because he was providing somewhat more direct guidance than he did at the other meetings. As we've said, he would provide these brush strokes, and then Zhou Enlai would carry on at great length. Now Zhou was somewhat more restrained and subdued, and Mao seemed to give somewhat more explicit guidance. At least in the course of three hours more of their positions was spelled out than in an hour or an hour and a half. Mao made some jokes about problems with the Soviets. The Soviets had complained to Mao, and Mao said that it would take "10,000 years to solve this problem." Kosygin [former Soviet Prime Minister] had come on a visit to China, and Mao made a great concession. Mao said that it would only take "9,000 years to solve this problem." There were jokes like that.

The Chinese expressed some concern about US steadfastness in facing the Soviet threat. Again, these were not as sharp as the attacks which we got from Deng Xiaoping and others on détente a year or two later. There was a lot of discussion with Mao on the Soviet question, Soviet relations with China, and European issues. Mao already was experiencing some trouble in speaking. He had to make a great effort.

On Taiwan, Mao was relaxed. He basically said that China could do without Taiwan for a hundred years. This was all in the course of discussions with Kissinger. They talked about the Near East, including the Near Eastern countries that I mentioned, starting with Turkey. On Japan Mao again talked about being careful.

All in all, this was a very long - unprecedented in length - and warm conversation. Mao had summoned Kissinger during the middle of a reception that was being held in his honor, I believe by George Bush, who was then the Chief of the US Liaison Office in Beijing. The whole Diplomatic Corps in Beijing had been invited to this reception. Kissinger had to miss that reception and we arrived there late.

This trip was the last, serious talks that Kissinger had with Zhou Enlai, because Zhou seemed to be more seriously ill after that. Kissinger visited Zhou in a hospital a year later for half an hour. Basically, we felt that Zhou was increasingly subdued. In retrospect, we can see that now, since Mao was giving more explicit instructions. Zhou was not only beginning to decline physically, but also politically.

We didn't return to China for another year until November 1974. My memory isn't good enough to recall any significant happenings with China in the meantime. We just kept working on the various issues.

Q: Regarding the initial Chinese-American talks in 1973, one of the great ties between China and the United States was American missionaries, who have had a profound influence on relations between the two countries. Former missionaries, or the children of American missionaries, have had an influence on Chinese-American relations. Did missionaries come into these conversations, either in terms of property or the ability to go back and do their work, or anything else like that?

LORD: I don't recall. This was a long time ago, and almost every conceivable subject was discussed.

Q: The issue of missionaries wasn't on the front burner.

LORD: I don't recall that there were any American missionaries who went back to China. This was not something that Kissinger had very high, if at all, on his list of topics to raise with the Chinese. I don't believe that we were getting any pressure from within the U.S. to raise the issue of missionaries. There may have been some historical references.

The next trip was in November 1974. On this occasion I went separately and met up with Kissinger, who came from the Summit Meeting with the Russians in Vladivostok. In retrospect, we felt later that maybe this wasn't the most clever thing to do, Kissinger going to China directly from Vladivostok, in view of the overtones. I remember going out to China with Bill Gleysteen in particular [then Deputy Assistant Secretary for East Asian Affairs]. We were under instructions from Kissinger to come up with formulas on Taiwan and different things that we might try out and make further progress on.

On this trip Deng Xiaoping was the host. Deng had made a comeback. He went down again later, and then made another comeback later on. The first time that we ever met Deng was when he headed the Chinese Delegation to the UN General Assembly in New York a couple of months before that, in September or October 1974. We met Deng at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel, where our UN Ambassador has an apartment.

I recall that at the time we didn't know much about Deng. Initially, we were not particularly impressed with him. We just felt that, after Zhou Enlai, he was a let down. The initial meeting was at a working lunch or dinner. Deng was the head of the Chinese Delegation to the UN General Assembly. We were struck by the fact that Deng never mentioned Zhou Enlai's name once. We just generally were not impressed with Deng at that first meeting. Of course, the times changed, and given his political ups and downs in the mid-1970s, he was surely cautious at that point.

On the November 1974 visit, we specifically began to probe on the possibility of making further progress on Taiwan. However, Deng stuck to a hard line on Taiwan. We were not overly generous ourselves, either. By then the Watergate Affair was behind us, so this was our first trip to China after Nixon had resigned and Ford had become President. At the time of this trip to China, in November, 1974, Deng himself was in a vulnerable position, trying to deal with the Gang of Four in China. Zhou Enlai was declining in health and politically, and Madame Mao and the other radicals in the Chinese Communist Party were jockeying for position around Mao, trying to get his ear and so forth. Mao was obviously fading as well. So Deng wasn't able to be very flexible on many issues, especially one as sensitive as Taiwan. He couldn't afford to look 'soft'.

Q: Did you feel any reflection of U.S. developments, when the Watergate Affair heated up and President Nixon had to resign? Were these developments interpreted by the Chinese in the sense that Nixon had opened up U.S. relations with China but Right Wing American elements brought him down?

LORD: I'm thinking of Mao and Zhou Enlai in particular, who indicated that the Watergate Affair was our business. The general tone expressed by the Chinese about Watergate was that this was a case of breaking wind. They considered it no big deal and clearly wondered why everyone was so excited about it. They were not explicit; they were not inclined to talk about it because they figured that this was a domestic issue for us to deal with. There was no evidence that they thought that this had anything to do with China. It plainly puzzled them because they just didn't understand our system. They wondered why a third-rate burglary could bring President Nixon down, particularly when he had done great things, such as achieving the opening to China. The Chinese were somewhat baffled by it and were somewhat contemptuous of American puritanical attitudes, and so on, or even of democracy as such. I don't believe that the Chinese thought that the Watergate Affair was somehow related to China. If anything, they may have thought, again incorrectly, that détente with the Russians was beginning to create some trouble for President Nixon. However, I don't think that the Chinese thought that the Watergate Affair was foreign policy related. They realized that this was a domestic problem. They just wondered why America made such a big deal out of it.

I don't think that the Chinese ever expressed any particular view of the matter, other than to indicate that they thought this was a domestic affair for us to handle. There was no evidence that this had anything to do with China.

Q: Since this interview is focused on you and your thought processes, when your wife went to China with you in 1973, did she bring any different insights? After all, she was talking to family members and getting out and around. Hers was quite a different perspective than you would get from a bunch of Occidental officials, sitting around in a reception area and talking to Chinese officials.

LORD: For listeners to and readers of these memoirs, I would refer them in particular to my wife's book, Legacies - A Chinese Mosaic, which not only talks about more recent events, like the Tiananmen Massacre, but Chinese recollections of the Cultural Revolution, and some of Bette's experiences in going back to China and our serving there.

She returned to China in November 1973 for the first time since leaving in 1946. All of her relatives were there, beside her two sisters, one of whom escaped in the early 1960s (she wrote a book about it, Eighth Moon.) and her parents. Before I arrived, she saw relatives, for example, in Tianjin. They had moved homes just before she arrived back in China. They were living much better than they had been. My wife couldn't understand why her aunt and uncle didn't seem to know their way around their own house. They had to figure out where the silverware was. This was kind of puzzling at the time. Clearly, the government had given the relatives better quarters to impress Bette. Obviously, the sidewalk and everything else had been spruced up as well.

My wife had already begun to hear horror stories about the Cultural Revolution, including how her uncle, her grandmother, and others had suffered during it. She planned to write a book, based on these experiences. Then she realized that this would have been politically too sensitive for them. They might have gotten into trouble. She ended up writing Spring Moon, a best-selling novel, which had nothing to do with her relatives.

My wife always had a more hard-headed, negative impression of the communists and what they had done to China. She was more skeptical about them. She fully believed that the U.S. should open up relations with communist China, in our own, hard-headed self-interest. She was very much in favor of that. However, then and ever since, she has been more skeptical about Chinese actions and perfidy, particularly in terms of the government and the system. Of course, her friends and relatives made her feel that even more strongly.

Q: Did the fact that you were getting this view from your wife have an impact on your views? There would be conversations in the Office of Policy Planning, and you might have said that the situation in China really isn't that euphoric.

LORD: First of all, I must make it clear that she was very much in favor of the opening to China and she thought that it was in our own national interest, even if we had to hold our noses a little bit. Indeed, she made major contributions to the relationship over the years, especially when I served as Ambassador. She always placed greater emphasis on the human rights issue. I did as well, certainly by comparison with Secretary Kissinger. However, she would put human rights as the major item in the Chinese-American relationship or at least thought that it should be among the major items. I've always held the view that human rights are very important but should not control the whole relationship. No single issue should hold our tries. But human rights is crucial in terms of American domestic support and our values. I feel that at times we have to work with some resignation as to how fast we can make progress. We need to do our best and pursue other interests as well. There can never be really positive relations so long as the Chinese government is so repressive and abusive of human rights.

So I can't say that my wife's perspectives greatly affected my own policy judgments. I greatly respect her insights and believe that she instinctively knows more about China than anyone else. For example, she predicted in the late 1960s that Deng Xiaoping would make a comeback before I got involved with China in the early 1970s. She had her eye on Deng. I don't know anyone else who did. She kept talking about the horrors of the Cultural Revolution when it was still fashionable to overlook it or even justify it. So there always was that element, and I thought that it was good to get a reality check through her. However, despite this, she felt that we should go ahead anyway with the opening to China. It didn't really have an impact on my policy judgments.

Going back to the trip to China in November 1974, I have talked about the limits on Deng and, to a certain extent, on ourselves. We proposed a lengthy, communique draft which other people and I had worked on. It noted all of the progress we were making, how we were moving ahead, and so on. We dealt with Qiao Guanhua, the Vice Foreign Minister. He preferred a shorter communique draft. We went on to Suzhou and its lovely gardens. So the trip was not negative, but clearly the momentum was slowing down because of the domestic situation in both countries. This was our first encounter with Deng in China, when he was the host. This was the trip when Secretary and Mrs. Kissinger paid farewell call to Zhou Enlai in the hospital.

I'm just doing an account of the various trips, at this point. I haven't tried to reconstruct specific events in between.

Q: With regard to policy planning, was there a change when Ford became President? Obviously, Nixon had a very hands on knowledge of foreign affairs. I would imagine that there would have been a real White House input into policy planning during the Nixon years. How was the situation when Ford became President? Ford did not bring that kind of experience or real interest with him. Did you notice a change in that connection?

LORD: Since we are focusing on China today, we'll reserve a discussion of Kissinger for another time. Just to answer your question in general, President Nixon, as the Watergate Affair began to preoccupy him, became less and less involved in the details of foreign policy. More and more, Kissinger was reporting to him and keeping him informed. Obviously, Kissinger was more and more on his own. So Kissinger, by virtue of being Secretary of State now, was wearing both hats. He was also still National Security Adviser. He totally dominated US foreign policy even during the last year or two, when Nixon was President, since Nixon was so preoccupied with the problems related to the Watergate Affair.

President Ford had less interest and less knowledge and experience in foreign policy. This meant that Secretary Kissinger dominated foreign policy to an even greater extent. Ford's primary purpose was to heal the country after the Watergate Affair and to focus on our domestic scene. That was consistent with Ford's background, but it was also his top priority at that point. So President Ford basically left it to Kissinger to run our foreign policy. He had total confidence in him. Kissinger in turn respected Ford and of course got his approval on major issues and went to him for major decisions.

We've had other examples like that in our history, although perhaps not quite so extreme. President Eisenhower was heavily involved in our foreign policy, but he left it to Secretary of State Dulles to run the basic operation. For a time, especially early on, President Clinton didn't focus all of that much on foreign policy. President Carter preserved a sort of balance between Zbigniew Brzezinski [then National Security Adviser] and Cyrus Vance [then Secretary of State] in foreign policy. Under Nixon the White House dominated foreign policy, of course. The State Department dominated foreign policy under Ford because even with his two hats Kissinger essentially operated out of the Department. President Reagan delegated a lot of responsibility to Shultz. President Bush (senior), on the other hand was more concerned with foreign policy than domestic policy. So we have had a variety of ways of handling foreign policy, and therefore diverse profiles of National Security Advisors and Secretaries of State. But to return to your question, yes, Ford was less interested in foreign policy.

We didn't feel any great shift because during the final few months of the Nixon administration, Kissinger was running foreign policy. Watergate totally tied up President Nixon. Already there was the feeling that, by virtue of being Secretary of State, Kissinger was running the show anyway. That situation continued under President Ford, so there wasn't any great shift for that reason. Obviously, there was a considerable contrast, say, between 1969 and 1973, but not much contrast, say, between 1973 and 1974. As for State Department policy planning, the staff didn't play much of a role when Nixon and the NSC ran foreign policy, before I took over the policy planning staff. After that, of course, we played a much more important role. I believe, thanks to our various assets and advantages that I have cited elsewhere, the influence of the policy planning staff was the greatest since the Kennan/Nitze years. Some, outside the staff, called our time "the golden years."

The next trip to China took place in October, 1975. The object there was to prepare for a visit to China by President Ford in December, 1975. On this particular trip, both Mrs. Kissinger and my wife were members of the official party. This was the most unpleasant, frosty trip of all of the trips I made to China from 1971 to 1976. The Chinese were very cold on substance, at meetings, and in their public toasts. They were very tough on détente and alleged that we were being naïve about the Russians. I don't know when they first made the allegation that we were, in effect, standing on their shoulders to reach toward Moscow and so forth, but that was their attitude. They really were quite tough, in public as well as in private.

During this trip Kissinger saw Mao again, and it still was quite a friendly talk, despite what I've just said. However, Mao was very sick by this time. He spoke in grunts and wrote things down. I used to joke that Mao would speak in a grunt for, perhaps, 10 seconds, then his interpreter would hold forth for, perhaps, two minutes. I suggested that Mao would attach a number to each policy formulation, and relay it to his interpreter. Number One was Taiwan, Number Two was Russia, Number Three was Japan, etc. Mao would whisper the number, and then the interpreter would give the standard policy line.

Q: Wasn't the interpreter the only one who supposedly could understand what Mao was saying?

LORD: She was Nancy Tang. Mao had a very heavy, Hunan accent, among other things. Also, it wasn't only a matter of understanding his accent. It was a matter of understanding him at all. Mao was writing things down and getting very feeble, but he still seemed quite sharp. We were trying to prepare a communique for the Ford visit, even as we had prepared the Shanghai Communique in 1971 for the Nixon visit. The Chinese resisted and rejected mentioning any real, substantive progress in the communique. We had a draft communique which we gave them. They sat on it for two days and then came back and poured cold water all over it. So we left China, resigning ourselves to making further preparations for the visit through cable traffic.

The reasons for this were essentially domestic politics on both sides. Deng was really fighting for the succession to Mao, who clearly was in his final months. Zhou Enlai was also in his final months of life and no longer an influence. Deng could not afford to look soft, vis-à-vis America, especially on the most sensitive issue, Taiwan. By this time President Ford was beginning to think about his reelection. I can't remember when Reagan began to emerge as a rival to Ford in the campaign for the Republican nomination for the 1976 elections. However, Ford had to watch his conservative flank, particularly on the issue of Taiwan. So the Chinese couldn't do anything on Taiwan, and we couldn't do anything on Taiwan, either. On this trip, as well as on other trips, we said that Ford planned to normalize diplomatic relations with China once he was reelected. However, he couldn't do anything before the 1976 presidential elections.

Q: Was any thought given to canceling Ford's trip to China?

LORD: There was no thought of canceling it. However, we were very unhappy when we left China because we saw this as a trip without any results and, perhaps, even without a friendly reception. There we were having to rely on cable traffic now. We had no agreement on the communique and we didn't know what the outcome was going to be. This was in considerable contrast to the meticulous and positive preparations for the Nixon visit at an earlier stage in our relationship.

As we got back to Washington, James Schlesinger was fired as Secretary of Defense. He had just returned from a visit to China. The Chinese really liked him because he followed a particularly hard line on Russia and was friendly toward China. Kissinger lost his job as National Security Adviser. Kissinger was very upset and started talking privately about resigning. At the time there were long discussions between Kissinger, Scowcroft, Eagleburger, and myself. Sometimes, Kissinger brought in outsiders like David Bruce, and Bill Simon about whether or not Kissinger should resign, essentially since he had lost his NSC [National Security Council] hat. He had voiced such threats before, but it got quite serious when contingency planning began and drafts of letters of resignation began to be prepared.

There was even a Sunday, near the Christmas holidays, when I remember Kissinger saying farewell to Larry Eagleburger and me at the State Department. He said that he was on his way to see President Ford, bringing with him a draft letter of resignation.

Kissinger finally stayed in office because of considerations of the substance of issues outstanding. Also, the more we drafted letters of rationale for his resigning, the more we - and he - realized that Kissinger really didn't have a good reason for doing this. Just because Kissinger had lost his NSC hat, this didn't mean that it was the end of the world. We were concerned about the suddenness of the impact on American national interest. Literally, Eagleburger and I prepared about a dozen draft letters of resignation, but we just couldn't find a credible explanation for Kissinger's resignation. As we got close to Christmas, Kissinger agreed, after all of these meetings with people and thinking the matter through, to put the matter aside and think about it again after the holidays. In the course of the Christmas and New Year's holidays, Kissinger decided to remain in office.

Q: What sparked this change?

LORD: It was in part Kissinger's concern that President Ford was putting him down somewhat, probably out of concern about his conservative flank. Later, President Ford made Rockefeller resign, and replaced him with Robert Dole as a candidate, a huge mistake which may have cost him the election. Of course, Rockefeller and Kissinger were very close. Ford also appointed Donald Rumsfeld as Secretary of Defense. Rumsfeld had been chief of staff to President Ford. Kissinger saw these developments as a possible threat to his position. But the primary consideration was Kissinger's losing his NSC hat. He felt that in the eyes of leaders around the world and of his own prestige, this was really a put down. Of course, in that respect, this was an overreaction. He was still someone whom Ford depended the most on in foreign policy. Ford felt that conservative elements in the Republican Party were upset with Kissinger over détente with Russia, and other issues. Ford was worried about his right flank. He didn't want Reagan to get the Republican nomination. Ford was sucking up to the conservatives in the Republican Party. That's why later he dropped Rockefeller, and that's probably why he downgraded Kissinger, from Kissinger's point of view. Kissinger felt that conservative Republicans didn't like the policies he advocated, particularly on détente with the Soviet Union.

So for all of these reasons Kissinger felt that he was losing influence in the Ford administration, and his ego was hurt. This was pretty ridiculous because Kissinger was still dominant and was still the Secretary of State. The more we tried to construct a suitable letter of resignation, the more we had trouble in explaining why Kissinger was quitting. However, that was his mood at the time.

Now let's get back to the December 1975 Ford trip to China. We decided to get tough with the Chinese. We really didn't like the reception we had during the October meetings in Beijing. So in follow up cable traffic we did the following. The original Ford trip was supposed to be only to China and for several days, or maybe as long as a week, to include visits to Beijing and a couple of other cities in addition. In subsequent message traffic we informed the Chinese, politely, in a matter-of-fact way, but unmistakably as a result of our frosty reception in China that President Ford would only be able to go to Beijing. He would just spend a couple of days in Beijing. And we said, by the way, he was not only going to China but also to Indonesia and the Philippines. This made an Asian trip by contrast to the original idea of President Ford's trip to China alone.

We wanted to get the attention of the Chinese. We realized that we had not been very nicely treated, both publicly and in private on the previous trip. There wasn't any meaningful outcome shaping up for this Ford visit to China.

We did get the attention of the Chinese. They immediately began to warm up in the cables exchanged and in their contacts, through the two liaison offices. The Chinese affirmed their desire to have President Ford visit China and promised him a very warm welcome. Sometimes, you have to play things this way with the Chinese.

So President Ford went to China in December, 1975, with visits to the Philippines and Indonesia afterwards. We flew out again to China on Air Force One via Anchorage, Alaska, and visited the petroleum pipeline in Alaska. I remember listening on the plane, even as we went out there, to the incredible football game between the Washington Redskins and the Minnesota Vikings. There was the usual hectic, last minute work on briefing books and toasts. After China, Indonesia, and the Philippines, the President stopped off in Hawaii and gave a major speech on his Pacific Doctrine. We went to Japan.

The Chinese public reception of President Ford was essentially a replay of the Nixon visit. I would have thought that the reception would have warmed up by then. However, we got the same, austere greeting at the Beijing airport. There were the same, welcoming banquets. The Chinese were very careful to do the same things that they had done for President Nixon. Of course, the reception did not seem as exciting and dramatic to the American people and to everyone else, since we had been through this process before. The Diplomatic Corps was at the welcoming banquet in Beijing.

Some members of the Ford party had the chance to shake Mao's hand before we had the meeting with him. I remember that there was the usual scramble as to who was going to attend the meeting on our side. I was included, as were Brent Scowcroft [National Security Adviser] and George Bush [at the time the Chief of the U.S. Liaison Office and later President of the U.S.]. Some of the White House staff, including Dick Cheney [chief of staff of the White House] and Ron Nessin, tried to force their way in. However, the Chinese Protocol Officer, Mr. Tang, kept them out.

Mao had about an hour's meeting with President Ford. Mao agreed with Ford on most issues. At the very beginning, and this is a semi-amusing story, Mao repeated his comment that he would soon receive an invitation from God. President Ford looked a little puzzled at this. He didn't seem to understand that this was Mao's elliptical way of referring to his forthcoming death. So, when we left the meeting, Ford went up to Mao and said something to the effect: "I'm going to overrule Kissinger and make sure that you get that invitation from God very soon." Ford obviously did not know what Mao's reference to an invitation from God really meant. Kissinger and I were aghast. However, the interpreter fielded the comment and surely said: "The President wishes you 10,000 years of life," or something like that. The meeting between Mao and President Ford was quite friendly. Mao agreed with the President on most issues. Unlike the trip to China in October 1975, the Chinese went out of their way to be more friendly to Secretary Kissinger personally, and showed greater respect for him. The White House staff was less friendly and gave Secretary Kissinger and me lousy treatment, including room assignments.

There was obviously a little bit of tension between Kissinger and the White House domestic staff. I was kept out of the official party for the visit to Indonesia and didn't go to the dinner with President Suharto, and so on.

Deng Xiaoping made somewhat of a better impression on us during this trip and particularly handled the American press effectively. The fact is that there was really no substantive outcome to this visit, even though the Chinese were correct and certainly didn't insult President Ford. They gave President Ford basically the same reception that they had given to President Nixon. But it was pretty easy to see that there wasn't much in the visit. We didn't even have a communique.

However, after the official meeting and in a seemingly casual encounter Deng and President Ford answered reporters' questions. One of the questions was about the absence of a communique. Deng answered that there was no need for a communique. The discussions that had been held were themselves the key element. Relations between the US and China were good and getting better. In fact, they really weren't. Relations weren't slipping back, but they clearly weren't improving. Deng showed that he was becoming adept at spin control and was trying to help us out in getting through this. I think that he considered this a holding action, aware of the domestic constraints on both sides. As he proved later, Deng was very much in favor of strong relations between the US and China. He also knew that, given our own domestic constraints, as well as Deng's domestic problems, there wasn't much of an opportunity to move relations forward.

Q: Did Mme. Mao play any role in this meeting?

LORD: No. We never saw her at all. During the visit to China by President Nixon she took Nixon one evening to one of those horrible ballets which were staged during the Cultural Revolution.

I've already indicated why President Ford and the Chinese were somewhat constrained. Kissinger and I made a sentimental, farewell visit to the Forbidden City. We figured that this might be the last China trip, even though there was another year to go in President Ford's term. We had tea in the same spot where we had tea during the secret trip in July 1971.

Then President Ford went on to Indonesia and the Philippines, with Mrs. Marcos overseeing the Tinikling bamboo stick dances. There was an incredible motorcade in the Philippines. We went to Japan while the President went to Hawaii to give his Pacific Doctrine speech.

Then, in 1976 nothing really happened regarding China. Things slowed down in terms of foreign policy generally. We didn't go back to China. Relations didn't turn sour, but we were basically just treading water. And, of course, both Mao and Zhou Enlai died during 1976. There was also the symbolic and incredible earthquake in Tianjin, a Chinese symbol of dynastic change.

Q: When the U.S. Liaison Office was first set up in Beijing, can you talk about its role as you saw it? What about the various people who served in it?

LORD: During the trip to China in February, 1973, we agreed to establish the Liaison Offices, and these were up and running a few months after that.

We had co-leaders of the Liaison Office at first, in the persons of John Holdridge and Al Jenkins of the State Department. They basically handled bilateral issues like trade, cultural exchanges, and claims and assets on a day to day basis. The heavy lifting on important, sensitive, and geopolitical issues was still handled by Secretary Kissinger. We used the Chinese Liaison Office in Washington. I don't believe that we used the Paris channel any further, since we had a Chinese Ambassador available in Washington.

Q: So much of what we were trying to do was to set up this relationship. Maybe this is just your perspective of this, but it sounds as if the Liaison Offices were really playing a very subordinate role, compared to Embassies in other countries.

LORD: Well, you have to see how Kissinger dealt with Ambassadors. Basically, when he was Secretary of State, he would use our Ambassadors a lot more than he would use them when he was not Secretary of State. He used some of our Ambassadors, like Herman Eilts in Egypt, and so on, a great deal. He had great respect for Eilts and certain other Ambassadors. Even as he used Foreign Service Officers to a great extent in Washington, I think that it's still fair to say that he didn't fully employ his Ambassadors overseas on key issues. He would not always keep them fully posted.

As to the Liaison Office in Beijing, as I said, the two officers initially in charge of it were John Holdridge and Al Jenkins. They were distinguished and very knowledgeable diplomats. They were very good choices and very competent, and Kissinger respected both of them. They were followed by senior heads (once the office had been set up and running) David Bruce, then Gates from the Defense Department, and George Bush after that. Everything that I've said was also true regarding people after Holdridge and Jenkins. The basic, sensitive matters were handled by Kissinger. You can apply that throughout this period. These were matters handled by Kissinger in Washington. Now, whenever Kissinger traveled to Beijing, the heads of the Liaison Office were fully included in whatever was going on. They were kept well posted. I kept trying to encourage Kissinger to bear in mind that the heads of the Liaison Office had to know what was going on. However, there is no question that whenever there was heavy lifting on really important and sensitive issues, this would be handled by Kissinger himself and not by the head of the Liaison Office in Beijing.

Q: When Kissinger was in Beijing or Deng was coming here to Washington, how did Kissinger do his heavy lifting?

LORD: By talking to Huang Zhen or whoever was the head of the Chinese Liaison Office in Washington. China had its own Liaison Office in Washington, after all. So Kissinger would work with him and ask the head of the Chinese Liaison Office to send messages back to Beijing. We generally kept our people in the US Liaison Office in Beijing posted on what was going on. However, there might be things that the chief of our Liaison Office in Beijing might not know. I always encouraged Kissinger to keep our Liaison Office as well posted as possible. If a sensitive matter were involved and Kissinger wanted the chief of our Liaison Office to know about it, he could send an eyes only message, or a backchannel message for the chief of the Liaison Office and not for other people in the Liaison Office.

Q: Did you see a parallel to the Kissinger-Dobrynin connection, where often our Embassy in Moscow in effect was bypassed. The Embassy in Moscow might have been informed, but the real contact was Kissinger talking to the Soviet Ambassador to the United States. Was this kind of contact developing between the U.S. and China?

LORD: Certainly, there was an analogy there, because on really sensitive and important matters Secretary Kissinger would handle them and he wouldn't necessarily tell the U.S. Liaison Office in Beijing after the fact. However, this was by no means on the same scale. Now, with the Russians Kissinger had a much more fully developed relationship. In many ways it was less friendly and more dangerous. However, we had more business to transact, and it was a more normal relationship. We had many more regular exchanges with the Russians. We had official Embassies in each other's capital. We had negotiations on arms control, we had trade agreements and other exchanges, we were negotiating on Berlin and other issues. I often went to Moscow with Secretary Kissinger for such purposes in discussions with Brezhnev, Gromyko, and so on. So there were more subjects both for the Ambassadors but also more to keep them in the dark about.

This began to loosen up too. Don't forget that when Kissinger became Secretary of State, and I want to stress this, not only was the Foreign Service more fully brought into the discussions in Washington but our Ambassadors were much better posted than when Kissinger was National Security Adviser in the White House.

Q: Did you feel that it was part of your job, particularly regarding relations with China, which you are reviewing here, to make sure that everybody was singing from the same hymn book?

LORD: Oh, sure.

Q: That was part of your brief?

LORD: Yes. First, it was important for us to be consistent. Secondly, this was essential for efficiency in the operation of our foreign policy. Thirdly, it was important for our morale. I always tried to ensure that our people were kept posted as much as possible, keeping secrecy to a minimum, in Kissinger's own self interest and in the American national interest. This was also important to maintaining the morale and efficiency of our own people.

So the situation was by no means as it was in the early 1970s under President Nixon. We would brief the chiefs of the U.S. Liaison Office in Beijing before they went out to China. I was responsible for doing that, in coordination with the East Asian bureau and the White House. I remember spending an entire day with George Bush before he went out to Beijing as Chief of the Liaison Office. That was also true of David Bruce and Gates, as well.

Q: What about David Bruce? He was, perhaps, our most distinguished diplomat. He had been Ambassador to all of the major, Western European countries. What was his attitude toward this assignment as chief of the U.S. Liaison Office, and how did he operate?

LORD: First of all, he was chosen by President Nixon and Kissinger. As you say, he was very effective and distinguished. We wanted to get some elevation in this appointment. It was only a Liaison Office. We wanted to make clear to the world and to the Chinese that we had picked someone who was at the very top of our diplomats. He was, in one sense, a political appointee but he was a distinguished and experienced person who enjoyed a very good reputation. I think that Kissinger felt also that David Bruce was very reliable. He was fairly old by this point, in his 70s. Given the limited nature of what you could do with that Liaison Office, in view of the restraints on travel and contacts with Chinese society, this really was a constrained operation in many ways, even without Kissinger's secretiveness. So Ambassador Bruce didn't need a great deal of energy in this position. He was competent and good and was a terrific human being. He was one of my heroes. Kissinger used him as a guru on other occasions, like the energy crisis, and when he considered resigning.

I think that Bruce would be the first to say that, by virtue of the nature of the job, our lack of diplomatic relations, and the limited scope, he wasn't really a diplomat. He couldn't really mingle much with the diplomatic community. He did not have much access to Chinese society outside the official community or much access to top Chinese officials. This was also true of Gates and George Bush, when they were Chiefs of the Liaison Office in Beijing. There was only so much that Bruce could do, so he wasn't exactly working himself to death.

As I recall, Bruce didn't do a great deal of reporting from China, either. However, this is not meant in criticism of him. As I said, he was one of my heroes. He played more of a symbolic role at that point. As I recall, Gates was not in Beijing very long. He seemed to do a competent job. George Bush was clearly the most enthusiastic Chief of the Liaison Office in Beijing. As you may recall, he had been the head of the Republican National Committee. He was called back from Beijing to become Director of the CIA, about the same time as the other personnel shifts in October 1975.

Some people, particularly of Bruce's, or Bush's, distinction and background, might have said: "This is a Liaison Office, and I am not even an Ambassador. Why should I want to do this?" However, Bush was genuinely interested in China, and he threw himself into the job with great enthusiasm. He rode around Beijing on a bicycle. He did as good a job as he could have, given the constraints. As he himself would say, and did say so in his memoirs, he was kept posted by Secretary Kissinger, but in fact there was not much important for him to do. There wasn't much that Bush could do, but he did what he could do, within those constraints. I was responsible, working with EAP, to make sure that he was informed about what was going on.

Q: Were we looking towards tying China into the Western world as much as possible by student exchanges, opening more Consulates, and getting more traffic back and forth? Or had it reached that point?

LORD: This was beginning to happen. You have to remember that this was before Deng launched his reforms in 1978. On the one hand China was emerging from the Cultural Revolution and from near total isolation. In the early 1970s, it recalled all its Ambassadors abroad except one, Huang Hua, in Cairo. By virtue of the opening with us, as they knew they made breakthroughs with others like Japan and parts of Europe that hadn't normalized relations as yet. They got into the United Nations. So they were beginning to open up diplomatically in that sense. However, trade was still very restricted, Chinese society was politically very restrictive, and their own people were very carefully managed. Even on the exchange of persons front, the Chinese were very cautious. They began to agree to some exchanges.

Q: By exchanges you mean cultural exchanges.

LORD: Cultural exchanges, including sports teams and academics, as well as trade. So we made progress in relative terms, including on trade, during these years. However, trade was miniscule, compared to the time when I was Ambassador to China, and even more so, compared to today. It was more a matter of building constituencies to support the relationship on both sides and giving it some content. There wasn't any feeling that we could open up China at that point. The Chinese were just too cautious to make that possible.

Q: Were we seeing much of the tail end of the Cultural Revolution, the Gang of Four, and all that?

LORD: The official end of the Cultural Revolution was in 1976, though the worse excesses were in the late 1960s. I don't want to get my sequence of events wrong. The Gang of Four was blamed for the Cultural Revolution after this period. As I recall, this was during the period of the Carter administration. Deng returned to office in 1977 and solidified his position once again, pushing out Hua Guofeng, who in turn had ousted the Gang of Four. So the blame for the Cultural Revolution was not attributed when we were in office. Much of the material is already in the history books. In 1976 both Mao and Zhou Enlai died. There was a temporary elevation of Hua Guofeng. Mao said that with Hua Guofeng in charge, he was at ease. Hua Guofeng was gradually pushed aside by Deng over the next year or two. The Gang of Four was arrested and tried. All of this is in the history books. The reforms didn't really take hold until Deng came back to power for the third time in 1977-78.

Q: When you were the Director of the Office of Policy Planning during this time, for you were in that position for, what, three and one-half years, we already had a well developed group of Kremlinologists who followed developments in the Soviet Union. They figured out who was standing where and the significance of where they stood on public occasions on Lenin's Tomb, and so forth. They had a very sophisticated ability to read Soviet newspapers and figure out what was happening. They really had quite an insight into what was going on. Did you find that you had any of that kind of expertise or apparatus to follow the situation in China?

LORD: Well, we had some of that. We respected them, whether they were in INR [Bureau of Intelligence Research], the CIA, other parts of the intelligence community, the Department of State, the NSC, or among some outside academics and specialists. We would seek out their views as much as possible. Dick Solomon was in the White House and was a scholar on China. However, in those days a lot of the China watching was still done in Hong Kong, through our Consulate General there. That was our key source of information. We interviewed refugees who came out of China and used other contacts. So even after we had a Liaison Office in Beijing, the Consulate General in Hong Kong probably produced more material on China. The Liaison Office could give us some material, but the restrictions on their travel and contacts meant that they really couldn't tell us a great deal about what was going on in China.

So we never felt that we knew a great deal about China. Certainly, we learned a lot as we established ourselves there. And, of course, journalists began to take up residence in China after a while. However, it wasn't really until the normalization of diplomatic relations in 1979 that things began to open up, especially in terms of exchanges and access. We began to get a lot of reporting out of China itself to supplement what we were getting from the Consulate General in Hong Kong. I don't think that we really thought that we had as good a feel for what was going on in China as we did for what was going on in the Soviet Union, and even there we had problems, of course.

Q: Well, it was also as difficult a situation as you could have, since this essentially was an ongoing coup or revolution and all of that.

LORD: Oh, you're talking about the power struggle within China. I don't want to pretend to precision here, when my memory can play tricks. I think that we realized even then that Hua Guofeng was not a dominant figure. He was a sort of surprising, safe choice. I'm sure that we must have speculated whether this man was going to last. I don't know whether we thought that Deng might come back again. I don't know whether we were that prescient. I'm sure that we had some feel for the struggle between the radicals and the moderates, but I don't think that we had any precise handle on that.

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: I was wondering to what extent you had contacts with the Nationalist Chinese on Taiwan and to what extent you were perhaps preparing studies on what was likely to happen if normalization went on? To what extent was Taiwan a concern in this context?

LORD: Whenever we had contact with Taiwan, it was done by the Taiwan Desk, Bureau of East Asian Affairs, as I recall. I had a great personal respect and affection for Taiwan. I thought that we should not sell them out, and I don't think that we ever did that. I was always careful to urge that we maintain good relations with Taiwan, both in terms of its reputation and our own historical obligations toward it, as well as in terms of domestic U.S. support for Taiwan. We had to make sure that we didn't stir up the more conservative people in the United States. As I said, my wedding reception was given at the Chinese Nationalist Embassy residence, Twin Oaks, in Washington, DC, and my father-in-law represented the Taiwan government on sugar.

However, I don't recall having that much contact with the Chinese Nationalists. I think that that was left to the Taiwan Desk. With Beijing we basically gave up in 1975 and 1976 any hope of making any progress on the Taiwan issue at least until after the 1976 election. We went through a lot of contingency planning regarding the impact on Taiwan of the normalization of relations with Mainland China. We considered various formulas. We realized that the Chinese communists were not in the mood domestically, and certainly President Ford was not in the mood, to take any chances. So that was essentially a holding action, although we would tell the Chinese that we wanted to keep moving forward on this issue. We said that we would revisit this issue after the election, when President Ford would have a freer hand and would not have to look over his shoulder at Ronald Reagan.

At one point, I, Dick Solomon (NSC), and either Hummel or Gleysteen of EAP sent a memo to Kissinger urging more progress on the Taiwan issue, but the time was not ripe.

I don't recall that Taiwan was a major area of concern. However, if I had been working in EAP at the time, I would probably have a fuller answer for you.

Q: You were looking at Ronald Reagan at this point as the point man for conservative Republicans. Is that right? Were you thinking that if he were to take over the Republican Party instead of President Ford at that time, that this could really set back our China policy?

LORD: I guess so, but the fact was that I personally never thought, perhaps naïvely, that Reagan had any chance to win the Republican nomination for President. I guess that the contest was closer than people realized.

Q: We're talking about the 1976 presidential elections.

LORD: I don't remember worrying about that too much because I figured that Reagan was never going to be elected. I personally was very upset with President Ford for dropping Nelson Rockefeller as candidate for Vice President. I was a great Rockefeller fan. This annoyed me, but that's neither here nor there.

You have to remember that President Ford, although he relied heavily on Secretary Kissinger, was beginning to be concerned about the conservative Republicans. I don't think that Kissinger attended the Republican Convention in 1976. There were a lot of attacks on Kissinger at that time, especially on détente. Not so much on China policy, which was still widely supported, because those who thought we were soft on the Soviets saw the advantage of dealing with the Chinese.

Again, I may have been naïve, but I don't think that I ever believed that Reagan was going to be the Republican nominee. I didn't think that this was going to be a problem. If I ever did, then I'm sure I would have thought that it wasn't going to be very positive for our China policy.

Q: What about China in the UN? Were we holding our breath about what China was going to do? Did we expect that they were going to act like the new boy on the block?

LORD: China was basically a cipher at the UN in those days. They didn't do anything. They just sort of attended the sessions. I don't think that they used their veto power, as I recall. They generally voted against the U.S., but they weren't active in doing so. They didn't try to do very much. They were very low key at this point.

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: To what extent was the Department of Defense active in our China relationship at this time?

LORD: Very little, as I recall. I'm trying to think about the whole issue of possible military cooperation, but I don't recall any particular details. When I was Ambassador, of course, in the late 1980s the Defense Department was heavily involved.

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: I'm not exactly sure, either.

LORD: I believe that the answer to your question is that the Department of Defense was not heavily involved in our China relationship at this time. We thought that it was still rather sensitive to be developing a military relationship with the Chinese at this point. We had not fully normalized our relations with China.

Q [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]: I had nothing specific in mind. I was just curious about it.

LORD: China policy was run by the State Department and Secretary Kissinger, although, as I say, Dick Solomon of the NSC was involved in most issues.

Q: Well, in Policy Planning one likes to think that your people are planning policies regarding possible developments 10 years from now. However, the reality is that you tend to deal with matters at hand. Was anybody thinking that, maybe, some time China was going to be an aggressive power and that we should think about some problems in its neighborhood?

LORD: I don't recall that, but you have to remember that this was a long time ago. Certainly, we didn't have the kind of debate that we have today because China, its economy, and its military establishment were all weak. China was just coming out of diplomatic isolation. So concern with China in those days was more a matter of whether they were fooling around with revolutions abroad, like in Southeast Asia, as opposed to any projection of a military threat.

We saw China as actually weak, although we all felt that, given their history and the inherent greatness of the Chinese people and civilization, they would make a comeback some day. However, this was thought to be some time away. I don't recall any long term projections about what the Chinese would do when they became strong. In Policy Planning I basically handled the China brief myself. However, I want to make clear that I worked with EAP most of the time, and Dick Solomon was very helpful in this regard, helping with some excellent materials and analysis.

Q: What about China and Africa? This is one area where the Chinese invested quite a bit of money, including in Mozambique, West Africa, and other places. What did we think of this?

LORD: The Chinese had some interests in Africa at the time. Remember that in Angola, the Russians and the Cubans were backing one faction, the Chinese were backing another faction, and we were backing a third faction. In the general, geopolitical game Kissinger welcomed any Chinese influence that would offset Soviet influence in Africa or anywhere else. He kept the Chinese briefed on his African diplomacy, including working with the South Africans to reach a deal on Rhodesia, which later became Zimbabwe. He did that for geopolitical reasons. In fact, to his credit, and that of President Ford, Kissinger did that even in the midst of presidential primary elections in Texas and other states. This didn't sit well with conservatives in the South.

Africa would come up in conversations with the Chinese, but it wasn't a major issue. The Chinese did have interests in Africa, as you say, and we, of course, welcomed their interest in Africa. We didn't see this as any threat to us, unlike, say, the efforts of the Russians.

Q: I think that we've talked about this before, but did you sort of keep your policy credentials polished?

LORD: Yes, I did. First, of course, in terms of my intellectual capabilities, I went to many of these meetings and study groups. I felt that I should keep on top of things as well as showing the flag as president of the organization. At that point in my career in the 1970s and 1980s, I was still a global expert. I had been director of Policy Planning and a Special Assistant on particular issues during my Foreign Service, Department of Defense, and NSC assignments. Even though I had done a lot of work on China and Vietnam, my perspective was still global. The Council on Foreign Relations was global, and this was all very good in terms of continuing the development of my perspective. I had a lot of friends in government during the Carter administration. Then I was also at the Council for the first few years of the Reagan administration. I kept in touch with these friends. In some cases, particularly on China, they would ask my advice or I would consult with them. I wrote a few op ed pieces.

I didn't have any strategic aims in terms of career goals. I never had them in my life. I felt that I wanted to return to government service some day but I didn't organize my whole life around the theme of, How can I pull this off? I spent about seven and one-half years with the Council. After about five to six years there I was ready, as I have been in any job, to move on. I also felt that I had accomplished pretty much what I could at the Council and that it was time for new blood to replace me. I was beginning to do things every year that I had done the year before, and I risked losing my enthusiasm and drive, which I think is only natural. So I was receptive to returning to government service. I had always been a moderate, liberal Republican, so I didn't think that I would get an appointment from the Reagan administration.

I think I've described how I got the assignment as Ambassador to China. Both President and Mrs. Reagan were impressed with the briefing on China which my wife and I gave them at a White House lunch before they visited China in 1984. She also liked Bette's book "Spring Moon." Secretary of State George Shultz had been a director of the Council and NSC Advisor Bud McFarlane knew me from the Ford days. Reagan knew of my having worked with Kissinger on China. I was invited by the Reagans to attend a number of social events.

Naturally, I tried to keep up my intellectual abilities. This was natural with the job, in terms of foreign policy, as well as visibility through occasional articles I wrote and trips I made around the country to visit our committees and speak elsewhere. I would stay in touch with Washington and so on. I was just generally interested in foreign policy and had no specific game plan. I had a desire to go back into government service at that point, unlike now, when I no longer have that desire.

PARKER W. BORG
Officer, Staff Secretariat – Kissinger China Visit
Washington, DC (1970-1972)

Ambassador Borg was born and raised in Minnesota and educated at Dartmouth College and Cornell University. In 1965, after a tour with the Peace Corps in the Philippines, he joined the Foreign Service and was posted to Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia. During his career he served in Vietnam and Zaire, and in the State Department in senior positions concerning Vietnam, West Africa and Counter Terrorism. He served as US Ambassador to Mali (1981-1984) and to Iceland from 1993 to 1996. Ambassador Borg was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2002.

Q: No, we're talking about '71/'72 when Vietnamization was going on and you had an election with McGovern talking essentially about getting out of Vietnam completely and all that.

BORG: I think the battle fatigue was beginning to show very much in the United States. We'd been in Vietnam longer than we had been able to explain to the American people and the war seemed to be going on forever. What people didn't realize was that there had been a lot of progress on the ground and things were not nearly what they used to be, but as a result the North Vietnamese were becoming much more closely involved than they had been in the past. And there were the Paris Peace Talks that were going on about this time. Kissinger's trip to China took place in '72, didn't it? It was clear that nobody was paying attention, as far as I was concerned, to what was happening in Vietnam. We were looking at the American perspective on it.

Q: What was the attitude of the Secretariat - obviously you're closely connected to the Secretary of State - about the news that Kissinger had gone to China and all that?

BORG: People were stunned. Now, did the Executive Secretary know it and not tell anybody? Possibly, but we certainly had no idea. We were all surprised. We had stamped up a paper which identified ping-pong diplomacy as a way to open a dialog with China, and I remember this as being one of the better policy papers that I had ever had a chance to review because it set forth here is an opportunity and, if the Chinese do this, then we might do that, and if they do this, then we might do that, and this might lead to that and then we might do that, and it set it all out in stages that I thought were very perceptive, and they played the way that they did. There were six of us on the line at the time, and we each had responsibility for a separate regional bureau, and we had secondary responsibilities. We backstopped one of our colleagues who was on another regional bureau. For most of the time I worked on Latin America and East Asia, so I had much more knowledge of some of the things there.

Q: Did the opening of China sort of change things around from your perspective?

BORG: Well, one of the things that I had studied in graduate school was the China lobby and the ties between the anti-recognized China elements and the various wings of the Republican Party, and I knew that Nixon was sort of at the core of this group that refused to have anything to do with China, but there was no Democrat who had dared to suggest that we might do anything in China because of the wrath that might have appeared from the Republicans. So when Nixon went to China, I certainly knew that it's a new ball game on China and things were going to change very rapidly, because once Nixon's on board, it's going to happen. I was very interested from the very beginning then in going to China myself.

Q: Did you feel that as an Asian-type person that this gave a broader field for you?

BORG: Long, long overdue. I was of the school that felt we had had our head in the sand for much too long and that our recognition of China should have come at least 15 years earlier if not more. You don't recognize countries because you like them; you recognize countries because they're there and there are reasons to deal with them.

JAMES A. KLEMSTINE
Economic Officer
Taipei, Taiwan (1970-1973)

James A. Klemstine was born in Pennsylvania in 1930. He received a bachelor's degree from the University of Pennsylvania and a master's degree from Yale University. He served in the U.S. Army from 1952-1954 and entered the Foreign Service in 1956. Mr. Klemstine's career included assignments to Germany, the Soviet Union, China (Taiwan), and Korea. He was interviewed by Jeff Broadwater on April 15, 1993.

Q: Then in 1970?

KLEMSTINE: I went to Taiwan.

Q: ...and stayed there until '73. What did you do in Taiwan?

KLEMSTINE: I did the economic work there. I did various reports, but especially the Foreign Economic Trends. That's a quarterly report that you send in to Commerce which is then printed and distributed it to American business. What it did was to summarize the economic developments in the country during the quarter, and also what opportunities were opening up for trade, which fields they're investing in, etc. I did a lot of economic analysis. In fact I was chosen one of the five finalist, for reporting in 1973. Everybody else was political. If you can imagine, political and one economic. But at least I did a lot of good work in proving that Taiwan was going places. This is when I came across the problems with American journals. I guess it was '72 after the Red China recognition. Of course there was a horde of people who descended on Taiwan to determine what's going to happen to this place, whether it was going to cave in, are Americans going to leave, would the economy collapse, etc.

And there was this individual from Newsweek who came in. I gave him an interview. I gave him a real upbeat report because I felt at that time, always did feel, that the Chinese were good businessmen and this little island was really progressing. We know now it has probably, next to Japan, the world's largest reserves. So I gave him this interview for Newsweek. About a month later Newsweek magazine came out and I read this article, and instead of upbeat, it was downbeat. Taiwan was going to go to the dogs, no future and all that. And, of course, I got a call from the ambassador's office, "What the hell..." And I told him, "Its just the opposite of what I told this guy."

So the reporter came around again in a couple of months, and I said, "What is this?" I had clipped this article. I said, "This is exactly the opposite of what I told you." And he told me, "Yes, I submitted that, but my editor didn't feel that was right, and he revised it in the opposite direction." So that's when I first learned, and learned subsequently, that these reporters for magazines may send in something, but if the editor doesn't like it and feels different, he'll just revise it. So what you read sometimes may be the editor not the reporter. Maybe things have changed since the 1970s, I doubt it, but anyhow then if the editor felt this was what he wanted, he would change it.

Q: What did you think of the decision to normalize relations with China? That happened while you were there.

KLEMSTINE: It came as a surprise to everybody.

Q: It was a surprise to the people in Taiwan?

KLEMSTINE: Oh, yes. It was a surprise to everybody. The main surprise, I think, was that the Red Chinese at that time were willing to do this. I mean there had always been, within the Department, a feeling that sooner or later relations should be normalized. For public and that, they were always expressing support for Taiwan. There were a lot of papers that had been written on recognition. There was a realization that the Republic of China (Taiwan) was not China. But a lot of us felt that the Red Chinese weren't really interested in it (recognition). I think that was the big surprise, at least for the people in Taiwan that the Red Chinese actually were ready to do it.

Q: Where did you go after Taiwan?

KLEMSTINE: I came back to Washington and was on the Thai-Burma desk.

WILLIAM VEALE
Staff Assistant to Director of Arms Control and Disarmament Agency
Washington, DC (1971-1973)

Mr. Veale was born in Washington, D.C. into a US military family and was raised primarily at Army posts in the US and abroad. Entering the military after graduating from Georgetown University, he served with the US Army until joining the Foreign Service in 1971. Throughout his career Mr. Veale dealt primarily with Political/Military and Disarmament affairs, serving both in the Department of State and the Department of Defense. Among his assignments, Mr. Veale was posted to Strasbourg, Berlin and Rangoon. He also taught in the Political Science department at the US Air Force Academy. Mr. Veale was interviewed by Thomas Dunnigan in 2000.

Q: Speaking of police states, what was the Soviet influence there and the Chinese Communist influence?

VEALE: The Soviets had a large Embassy there and I suspect that they were using it as a China listening post as much as anything. There was not a lot of interaction with the Soviets there. The Chinese, on the other hand, also had a large Embassy and Ne Win looked at himself more with a Sino affiliation rather than the Sino-Tibetan background that most Burmese identify with. But, Ne Win was critical of the liberalization that China was undergoing at that time. He thought that the Chinese were doing too much too fast and I think he tended to take a kind of senior player role with the Chinese and trying to pontificate that what they were doing was not the way he would do it. I don't have the impression that the Chinese were all that influential in Burma during this period.

I think that the U.S., through its assistance in narcotics programs and communications support that we were giving the Burmese army, was very important. Germany, surprisingly enough, was a major supplier of weapons. Germany, Singapore, and South Korea were major suppliers of weaponry to the Burmese army. The Burmese army was going after drug running private armies and there was a communist insurgency as well. One of the things that I saw while I was there was what a shadow that this insurgency had become, that the Chinese support for it had withered considerably and it really was a bunch of people who were trying to maintain the appearances of a communist organization but the Burmese were very much anti-communist during this period. They were openly anti-communist in their efforts to deal with the Burmese communist party.

MARK E. MOHR
Non-Immigrant Visa Officer
Taipei, Taiwan (1971-1973)

Chinese Language Studies
Taichung, Taiwan (1973-1974)

Mr. Mohr was born in New York and raised in New York and New Jersey. He was educated at the University of Rochester and Harvard University, where he studied the Chinese language. After service in Korea with the Peace Corps, he joined the Foreign Service in 1969, and served abroad in Taipei, Taichung, Hong Kong, Tokyo, Beijing and Brisbane. In his service at the State Department in Washington, Mr. Mohr dealt primarily with Far East Affairs. After his retirement he worked at the Department of Energy on Nuclear energy matters. In 1997 he was recalled to the State Department, where he worked as Korean desk officer.

Mr. Mohr was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2009.

Q: Yes, and they would come and lean over the desk and they would be up against the flak catcher. He was a guy with horn rimmed glasses and some pencils sticking out of his pocket and all. He would listen to these guys screaming and yelling and reply in very dulcet tones about well we will look into that and thank you very much. That was his job, to catch flak. The Polynesians were "mau mauing," which was trying to scare the hell out of him.

MOHR: So anyway I spent my time basically doing the office correspondence. I also was in charge of clearances throughout the building for policy papers. I would take, for example, a dozen of these long papers in shopping baskets and wheel them around the building, dropping them off in the various offices as required. Then I would follow up on the phone and bug the offices for their clearances. After about a year of this, with about six months to go on my assignment, I got a call from my personnel officer. He said they had a job for me in Taiwan. I was excited. I asked about the job, and he said it was to be the non-immigrant visa officer. I had no idea what the job was really like, but I told him I had two requirements. I wanted to be able to speak Chinese, and meet Chinese people. My personnel officer chuckled, and said those two requirements would surely be met. So I was very happy and thought the foreign service was the best. Of course I had no clue that in my desire to be a China expert, I would be starting at the very bottom, interviewing non-immigrant visa applicants.

It was not all the foreign service's fault that the job turned out to be so bad. Naturally, there was a lot of misrepresentation. People said they just wanted a tourist visa to go to the States, and then on day one after arriving in the U.S. would head over to the immigration and naturalization service (INS) and apply to adjust status to be an immigrant, to stay in the U.S. You knew this because every month copies of the INS application forms of people you had issued tourist visas to would appear on your desk. They were particularly noticeable because the INS adjustment of status forms were printed on blue paper. For the first several months of my job, I interviewed between 30-40 applicants per day. This wasn't too bad. However, in October 1971, Taiwan got kicked out of the United Nations, as the People's Republic of China (PRC) was voted in. There was mild panic in Taiwan. People thought that it would be best, just in case China decided to invade, to have a tourist visa to the U.S. as insurance. So in a very short period of time, visa applications jumped from about 40 per day to over 160 per day. They quadrupled. And I was the only visa officer. We were a three-person office. Besides myself, there was the consul, a very kind-hearted man, and a very nice woman who did American citizen services. Occasionally, the consul, who spoke Chinese, would help out, but essentially I was on my own. After trying to get help, State replied that I would be replaced by two people when my tour ended, but because training took so long, I just had to hold the fort in the interim. It was very stressful, so I was extremely happy to see my tour end. I guess there is some benefit, when you're starting out your career, to have your worst job at the beginning.

Q: What was the sort of, I mean I realize you were besieged with your non-immigrants. What was the political situation in Taiwan in that period?

MOHR: Chang Kai-shek was president. It was a dictatorship, but it functioned fairly smoothly.

Q: Was there still the tremendous tension between the Kuomintang and the Taiwanese?

MOHR: Oh yes, most definitely. But the Taiwanese were allowed a safety valve in the business sphere. As long as they stuck to making money, they were fine. They were not allowed into politics, or into the military at the officer level; that was the purview of the mainlanders.

Q: Was there concern about the mainland Chinese invading. I mean real concern?

MOHR: Yes, there was concern, but for those without means, there was not much they could do. For those with means, it was time to get a U.S. visa.

Q: What language were you speaking, Mandarin, Cantonese, or Taiwanese?

MOHR: I spoke Mandarin. I later figured out that trying to communicate in Mandarin to the visa applicants was a bad idea, since they had the upper hand, since their language ability was obviously better than mine. So when I could, I used a translator, and then I could appear as the stony-faced higher official, rather than the hesitating person trying to speak their language.

Q: Was there much of a pressure group in the United States working on your visas, I mean Senators and so on?

MOHR: Yes. All the time, and it drove me crazy. For example, Taiwan had a law that if a male was 16 years old he couldn't go overseas until completing his required military service. So many 15 year-olds would apply to visit their grandmothers whom they had never known. I would reject these applicants. Then State would forward a letter from some Senator or Congressman, demanding to know why I had rejected the fine brother of some person who, while housing the grandmother, was probably not even a U.S. citizen. I wondered why the visa office at State, who knew the regulation regarding military service in Taiwan, would not answer the letter, but instead passed the buck to a junior officer.

Q: What about social life there?

MOHR: Let's see, I married someone I met in Peace Corps, just before entering the foreign service. My first child, Jennifer, was born on Taiwan, so that kept us busy. There was a large U.S. military presence, so you could use all their facilities, such as movies and the post exchange. My wife also got a job helping edit an English language magazine devoted to Chinese culture. Occasionally, we would take trips around the island.

Q: So you were on Taiwan until what, 1971?

MOHR: From 1971 to 1973. Things looked up as my next assignment was advanced language training in Taichung. That would get my ticket punched into the China club.

Q: This is still in Taiwan.

MOHR: Right. Taipei is on the northern part of the island, and Taichung is toward the center, on the western side. The school, which was run by the State Department but was actually the advanced Chinese language school for the entire U.S. government, was in Taichung at the time. After normalization with China, the school moved to Taipei.

Q: How did you find this year?

MOHR: I loved it. I had a house with a double yard, and one yard had a volleyball court. Every Saturday, I was host to my schoolmates, who came there to play volleyball and let off some steam. During the week, studying was intense. We had about five hours of class work and five hours of homework per day. The volleyball was a great outlet.

WARD BARMON
Chinese Language Training, Foreign Service Institute
Washington, DC (1971-1972)

Economic Officer/Assistant commercial Attaché
Taipei, Taiwan (1972-1974)

Chinese Language Training
Taipei, Taiwan (1974-1975)

Ward Barmon was born in Huntington, Long Island in 1943. He graduated with a double major in American and Chinese history from Yale University and then studied at the University of Madrid for a year before coming into the Foreign Service in 1967. In 1992 he served as Director of the Narcotics Affairs section in Bogota, Colombia. In addition to Colombia, he was posted to Belize, Taiwan, Thailand, El Salvador, and Honduras.

Q: Today is the 27th of July 1998. This is an interview with Ward Barmon. This is being done on behalf of the Association for Diplomatic Studies and Training. I'm Charles Stuart Kennedy.

To begin with, can you tell me when and where you were born and a bit about your family?

BARMON: Sure. I was born in Huntington, Long Island in 1943. My father was an airline executive for most of his career. We lived in Lima, Peru, from 1947 to 1951. He worked for Panagra and then worked for Civil Air Transport. We lived in Hong Kong and Taipei, Taiwan from 1954 to 1956. Then, my mother and brother and I moved back to Long Island and Dad retired in 1972. So, that is a little of how I grew up partly overseas.

Q: Did you pick up Spanish?

BARMON: Yes, which I subsequently lost and had to relearn.

Q: That's the name of the game. Then you went to Hong Kong?

BARMON: Yes, for a year in 1954. Then we went to Taipei and lived there for a year.

Q: I don't imagine that you got much Chinese as a kid?

BARMON: Just swear words, basically. Then I studied Chinese at FSI later.

Q: When you came back where did you go to school?

Q: When you left Hotchkiss did you have any idea of why you wanted to go to Yale?

BARMON: Well, it was a popular school among Hotchkiss students. I really did not want to go to such a large University, but my father pushed me towards it. So, I ended up there and loved it.

Q: You said your major was Chinese studies?

BARMON: Well, at Yale, at least in my day, you had to do a double area major in history. So, I majored in American and Asian history. I was pre-med, too, but it did not last that long.

Q: Was there still a tradition about Yale and China? Were you getting reflections of that?

BARMON: I believe so. I did not express an interest in the Yale/China Program. I was more interested in studying for my Ph.D. in Chinese history. One of my professor's, Mrs. Wright discouraged me. Well, she did not discourage me, she just said to come back when I have studied Chinese/ Mandarin, French, and German at least so I could speak and read those languages.

Q: That was pretty daunting.

BARMON: It was, and it effectively discouraged me from pursuing an academic career in Chinese history.

Q: Was there any thrust, would you say to the Chinese history? Were you getting much about what was going on in China at the time about the "Great Leap Forward" and the Cultural Revolution?

BARMON: Most of the courses that I took were prior to that period. Mrs. Wright taught modern Chinese history, but it only went up to the 1911 Revolution.

Q: Had you picked up any feel for the Foreign Service at this point?

BARMON: Yes, when we lived in Hong Kong we had some good friends whose father worked in the consulate general. That, I guess was my first taste. I also met some embassy people when I lived in Taipei, so that was perhaps my first exposure, my first interest.

Q: When you got out of Yale in 1965, what then?

Q: At this point, did the NSC, did you pick up any emanations about Kissinger operations and the White House bypassing the State Department?

BARMON: Sure, what you read in the press. We were so busy, very active with a lot going on. So, I do not think we paid too much attention.

Q: After the two staff assistant jobs, what then?

BARMON: Then I studied Chinese.

Q: And you studied Chinese starting 1971?

BARMON: Yes, at FSI for a year. Then I went to Taipei in the embassy for two years and did not do my second year of Chinese until that.

Q: So, you went straight to the embassy?

BARMON: Yes.

Q: Well, let us talk about 1971, 1972, the Chinese training. How did the Chinese sit with you?

BARMON: Well, it is something that I always wanted to learn after living in Hong Kong and Taiwan. So, I got my chance; it was hard to get. I think a lot of the reason for going to the staff assistant job and EA was the hope to get Chinese from there. It is probably easier to get it from EA than from another job outside the Bureau. So, I was able to get Chinese training, but did not want to do two years in a row. It was an unusual way of doing it, but I am glad that it worked out that way.

Q: How far along were you coming by 1972? Did you feel it was going fairly well?

BARMON: Yes. I cannot remember exactly what I got, but almost nothing reading. You do not start your reading until your second year. I went to Taipei and got along fairly well with the Chinese on my job.

Q: You were in Taipei from 1972 to 1974?

BARMON: Yes.

Q: How would you describe Taiwan and Taipei at this time?

BARMON: Well, of course, I had the perspective of living over there in the mid 1950s when Taipei was very poor. There were very few automobiles on the streets. Many people were hungry, disease everywhere, entirely polluted. By the time I arrived in 1972, they outlawed burning of soft coal. People were in much better health. Taiwan started to produce for export, particularly textiles, electronics, and manufacturing components. So, when I was there, it really started to take off economically, but was still very backward and politically repressed. In those 15 years, it had progressed tremendously, and it was quite a different place.

Q: Who was the ambassador there?

BARMON: Walter McConaughy, a wonderful southern gentleman, and a Chinese language specialist. This was his last tour.

Q: You were there during the opening to China? That must have been quite an earthquake!

BARMON: Well, it was very traumatic for the Taiwanese, particularly the mainlanders. Yes, it was a difficult period. The Taiwanese adjusted fairly quickly, however. Shortly thereafter, we downgraded the embassy to an "Institute."

Q: What were your interests?

BARMON: I was the junior economic officer and also the assistant commercial attaché. So, I did a variety of things. The most interesting was the commercial side doing trade work, promoting American investments, and promoting Taiwanese purchasing in the U.S. It was wonderful. It was an ideal job because the Taiwanese had decided to buy from the United States. They wanted to try and keep us as close as possible. So, they would all of a sudden be sending a trade mission of 10 people to purchase, giving them 800 million dollars and saying do not come back until you spend it. So, this made my job quite easy! All I had to do was arrange appointments!

Q: And take credit...

BARMON: Oh, of course.

Q: Did you find sort of an uneasiness towards the end?

BARMON: Sure, there was a lot of uneasiness. They kept a very close eye on our assistance structure. Of course, we phased out AID in the mid 1960s, but military people were there, and we started to phase them out. Yes, they were very nervous about us abandoning them. And of course, we were among the last to leave. Taiwan was left with very few countries that had diplomatic relations: a few Latin American countries, a few African and Arab countries, and not much else.

Q: Were getting much from them about what was going on in China itself?

BARMON: Well, from the cable traffic and news media. Yes, a fair amount, there was a lot of information.

Q: What about piracy of records, etc.?

BARMON: There was patent and copyright infringement; there was a lot of that going on. We got involved to a certain extent, but there was not a great deal that we could do because the Taiwanese were very adept closing their operation and opening one three blocks away. The government would go through the motions, but it was pretty hard to catch these people.

Q: Was that part of your job?

BARMON: Yes.

Q: I would think that you would have been sending reams of lists of pirated books, and records.

BARMON: We did not spend a large amount of time doing that unless we got a specific complaint from a U.S. company. Then we would go in and encourage the U.S. company to hire a local lawyer after the company had already spent a considerable amount of money. As I said before, they would be successful in getting the operation close down, and three months later, it would open up three blocks away. I remember, Aladdin, you know, for Thermos bottles, drinks, those were being pirated like mad. I don't think we ever succeeded in totally closing them down. You could buy a whole set of Encyclopedia Britannica for $50.00. Of course, the pictures were not very clear, and the print was smudged. I must confess, I bought a few pirated books myself.

Q: I have one or two tucked away!

BARMON: I do not think either government was too serious about going after these people.

Q: In 1974, were there any demonstrations against the United States?

BARMON: I do not remember. But there was a lot of noise in the media.

Q: In 1974 did you go back to Chinese studies?

BARMON: Yes.

Q: By this time had you made pretty good progress in your speaking?

BARMON: Well, yes and no. The problem is that those habits that become ingrained after two years of speaking, you have to break. That was the hardest part for me. That was the disadvantage that I had competing against those who had just come from FSI, who did not have those habits ingrained.

Q: What habits are these?

BARMON: Well these are ways of expressing yourself at the one plus, two level. Then, to get over that barrier to reach a three level, you have to break a lot of those phrases and patterns that you have memorized in order to learn new ones. It took me months before I was able to get back into the swing of things. The advantage was, I was perhaps fresher. I was more anxious to start than some of the other students who had already had a year of studying Chinese. Also, I had a certain level of confidence after using it for two years. I could express myself easily, but just not on a very educated level. I think the way I did it was good, at least for me. It was a useful way of doing it. I just did not want to study for two years in a row.

Q: From the teachers there, were you getting much of the politics of Taiwan?

BARMON: Oh, sure. Of course their biggest hatred was directed against the Japanese. Many if these were mainland teachers and they just hated the Japanese. But, of course the mainlanders hated the communists as well. So, we learned to take on some of their prejudices, especially against the Japanese. They just said awful things against the Japanese. They described them as “dwarf slaves.” Awful! I am not sure that I have ever gotten over that.

Q: At one point I took Serbian for year with a couple of honest to God Serbs who fit in very nicely in the Serbian government in Belgrade today. We picked up all sorts of things about the Croats. Where did you go after you got out in 1975?

BARMON: I thought I might be going to Beijing. We had just opened up an interests section in Beijing. George Bush was sent to head the interests section. I thought that I might be going as the economic officer, but one of my colleagues was selected. So, I was looking around for a job. Then, there was some kind of commercial conference going on in Taipei. I met the commercial attaché from Bangkok. We talked and I ended up going to Bangkok.

Q: From 1975 to?

BARMON: 1975 to the end of 1977.

Q: Well, we will stop at this point for today, but when you left in 1985, where did you go?

BARMON: Back to Washington. I went to the Economic/Commercial Policy Office of the ARA Bureau.

Q: What about your wife, where did you meet her? How did she get into the business?

BARMON: We met in Taipei. Her father was the assistant chief of staff of MAAG, the U.S. military assistance group. She finished to high school there. I went out for vacation and we met. We took an instant dislike to each other after having dinner, which was arranged and paid for by my father in good Chinese custom. We met again and dated a couple of times back here during college. We met again at Georgetown University, where we were both doing an MA. We married shortly thereafter. She was a Spanish teacher. She taught in Belize, Taiwan, and Thailand. In the early 1970s, we had two daughters and she was pressuring me to get out. Instead, I said, “Why don’t you try to get in?” So, she took the test and passed. She came in and we went through a tremendous problem trying to get an assignment together. That is why we ended up in El Salvador.

Q: I guess there was not a lot of competition.

Q: When you left in 1994, where did you go? What job did you have?

BARMON: I came back to Washington. I worked in the Economic Bureau for a few months working on some of the summit of the Americas issues in the Investment Office. There was not enough work for me to do, so I moved to the International Organization Bureau in their Economic and Social Affairs Office. I was there for about six months and then went to the retirement course.

Q: What was your impression of working on international organizations?

BARMON: I think the people in IO were dedicated, worked hard, and felt it was useful. A lot of it was frustrating because working with these large, international, bureaucratic organizations, it was difficult to get anything done. People went about their day to day jobs. I think the feeling was now that the UN was less ideological with the end of the Cold War, that we could get more done. It was difficult because the U.S. was way behind in its dues, so we received a lot of criticism. Despite that, we were able to do a lot because the situation was more normal. Not everything was the U.S. and its allies against the Soviet Union and its allies. Before the end of the Cold War, everything turned into an ideological confrontation in the UN.

Q: What particular aspect of this did you have?

BARMON: I worked on some international conferences - for example, the Conference on Social Affairs in Copenhagen. I worked a little bit on the Beijing Women's Conference. I did a lot less on that. They needed some help staffing up the Copenhagen conference and I helped out there. Then, since the position in the Economic and Social Affairs Office covering Asia was vacant, I filled in there and went to the biannual meeting of ESCAP in Bangkok.

Q: What about the conference in Copenhagen on social affairs? I thought we had moved out of UNESCO. Where were you a member of UNESCO?

BARMON: We were not, but we were still very involved in this conference. We were one of the prime pushers for the Conference on Social Affairs. Hillary Clinton ended up going over for a couple of days. It was a very high level delegation and we worked very closely with a lot of non-governmental groups here in the States. We were very interested in the issues. We did a lot of work on that conference.

Q: Your dealing with the women's conference in Beijing, what was the feeling about how that one went?

BARMON: Well, again, I did not work closely on it. I was more of an observer. I think people were happy in the end. There was a great deal of consternation in the beginning of the conference because of the way the NGOs were treated by the Chinese. I think the conference, in the end, was a success.

Q: When did you leave the Foreign Service?

BARMON: At the end of September 1995.

WILLIAM H. GLEYSTEN
Deputy Chief of Mission
Taipei, Taiwan (1971-1974)

Deputy Assistant Secretary, EAP
Washington, DC (1974-1976)

National Security Council
Washington, DC (1976-1977)

Deputy Assistant Secretary, EAP
Washington, DC (1977-1978)

Ambassador Gleysteen was born in China of Missionary parents. Educated at Yale and Harvard Universities, he entered the Foreign Service in 1951. After service in the State Department's Executive Secretariat, Mr. Gleysteen studied Chinese and was subsequently posted to Taipei, Hong Kong, and to Seoul, Korea, where he served as Ambassador from 1978 to 1981. He also served in Washington with the National Security Council and in the State Department as Deputy Assistant Secretary for East Asian Affairs. The Ambassador was interviewed by Thomas Stern in 1997.

Q: In 1971, you were assigned as DCM of our Embassy in Taipei. How did that come about?

GLEYSTEN: When my tour in INR was coming to an end, I asked Marshall Green whether there were any opportunities for me in the Far East. He sent me to Paul Cleveland, who was then his executive assistant. Paul asked whether I would be interested in the DCM position in Taiwan. I jumped at the chance.

There was a possible hitch. I had known Ambassador McConaughy since Tokyo days and got along well with him, but his views and mine were quite disparate on the issue of policy toward the PRC. Marshall doubted that this would be a barrier; I wanted to ask McConaughy personally. So I wrote him a letter. His reply was gracious. Acknowledging our differences, he said that he respected my views and did not believe they should adversely affect our working relations. I found that to be generous to a fault; I don't think I would have accepted a DCM with views so different from mine.

As I reflect back on my second tour in Taiwan, four things come to mind: the striking change within the embassy from the intellectually constipated, conservative administration of Rankin to the humane if still conservative approach of McConaughy; the stunning shift in our China policy that coincided with my arrival; political changes within Taiwan; and the beginnings of real prosperity on the island.

In contrast to the 1950s, my policy views were never an issue during the second round; Ambassador McConaughy treated me as trustworthy. We disagreed openly about normalization of relations with the PRC and later we disagreed on what was going to happen to Taiwan. These were gentlemanly disagreements. To some extent, I think McConaughy - by now about 62 - understood that a new era in policy was emerging and that he belonged to a generation that was passing from the scene. In any event, he was showing his age. He no longer defended his position with the verve he used to display. He had already decided this Taiwan assignment was to be his last, and he allowed me - even encouraged me - to do things that I, had I been ambassador, would have reserved for myself. For example, I wrote the commentaries on reports of his meetings with Premier Chiang Ching-kuo and his father, President Chiang Kai-shek. I tried hard to avoid any obvious disjuncture with his opinions, but inevitably there was a new flavor of the changing times. I suspect Washington may have been amazed sometimes by the ambassador's commentaries which were much more in tune with its thinking than previously. The same was true for assessments of developments in Taiwan and the region. He let me proceed with my analysis and encouraged me to express my views, for example in a briefing of Congressmen where we were both present. I never dared ask him why he was giving me so much leeway, but I don't think our differences led to any serious problems and they may have well have served a useful purpose.

Our staff knew of our differences. Political section officers more or less shared my opinions, and if they encountered difficulties with the ambassador, they would come to me, assuming I could take care of it. Bill Morell, the economic counselor and a very savvy older officer who had been in Taiwan for quite a long time, understood the economy far better than I and also felt confident of his political grasp. Of the key officers he was the only one who leaned decidedly in the ambassador's direction. There were a few occasions early on when he felt that the ambassador would be more sympathetic than I and got his approval before talking to me. That practice didn't last very long. Morell, who was a good man, became a good friend and we worked cooperatively.

Although we obviously didn't advertise our differences to people on the outside, government officials and political leaders - both the Kuomintang and Taiwanese opposition elements - were certainly aware of them.

The ambassador and I carried on in friendly disagreement for about two years. In 1974 he was replaced by Leonard Unger, following a gap during which I acted as charge'. Unger asked me to stay for the balance of my tour. This was after President Nixon's visit to PRC and the Shanghai Communique, a watershed development in East Asia that fundamentally changed the environment of our China policy.

The overwhelming event for me in Taiwan was this change in our China policy, a change that was sprung on us by stealth and carried out by Nixon and Kissinger with a degree of clumsiness toward Taiwan that contrasted with the exquisite care they devoted to the concerns of the PRC. Our first news in Taipei was an informal phone call from a desk officer in the State Department alerting us to an important announcement about to be made by the White House. A few minutes later we received a flash message with the text or essence of the president's statement about Kissinger's trip and his own plan to visit China before May of 1972. Coming from the conservative, anti-communist leader of the United States of America, this was indeed a big deal, and, along with most others, we had been left entirely out of the loop. If I as a person who supported the change in our policy viewed our behavior in this manner, you can imagine the effect on Walter McConaughy, a conservative gentleman of the old school thoroughly entwined in our moral crusade against communism.

The historic announcement was made in July 1971 about a week after my arrival in Taipei. Unaware of White House maneuvers, McConaughy had underestimated portents of change. I, although expecting the administration to crack the China door open, thought that it would approach the PRC cautiously and certainly give us notice. We were both jolted by the news. The ambassador was outraged. He felt he had been done in along with his friends in the Republic of China, allies of long standing. Apart from petty feelings of annoyance about being deliberately cut out of such an important process, I was mostly concerned by the speed and abruptness of the change, fearing it could easily result in unintended consequences. In essence, McConaughy was uncomfortable if not entirely opposed to recognition of the PRC; if the PRC was to be recognized, he would insist on maintaining diplomatic relations with Taiwan. I was sure Beijing would never accept such an arrangement. Yet I had much sympathy for the population of Taiwan and believed we could and should find a way to accommodate their basic needs.

Once we had overcome our astonishment and differing reactions to the news, the ambassador and I turned to practical concerns. We knew the Kuomintang authorities would be astounded that we had taken this action without any kind of notification or consultation with them. Chiang Kai-shek had probably been assuming the status quo would be everlasting; his son, Vice Premier Chiang Ching-kuo and the operational ruler of Taiwan, may have been mentally prepared for some change but surely would be shaken. Almost all people would be worried, and many, including nationalistic party members, would be furious. At a minimum, we would face the excruciating discomfort of trying to explain a policy about which we were uninformed. We expected the leadership would probably keep negative reactions under control, but we were not sure. I naturally remembered the sacking of the embassy fourteen years earlier during my first tour in Taipei, a nationalistic frenzy indulged by the authorities if not actually stimulated by them. It was not a morale-booster to be back in the same building, wondering how crowds might behave this time.

Not having been prepared for a change of policy, either by their own government or by us, ordinary citizens of Taiwan were obviously surprised and confused. Most of them probably found it hard to believe that the U.S. would recognize the PRC or withdraw recognition of Taiwan. They knew their island was the location of important U.S. bases and manufacturing operations for big American companies. No one welcomed the announcement, except a few members of the minority favoring Taiwan independence. The huge majority of Taiwanese, including most independence advocates, were more realistic. While happy to see the end of U.S. support for Chiang's claim to the mainland, they worried that Taiwan would be dangerously isolated. Quite uniformly, people of recent mainland extraction feared that the U.S. change would undermine their status and growing prosperity.

These popular views did not become immediately clear. In the first rash of reactions in the press controlled by the regime there was a tone of "down with the US, we have been betrayed," but there were also comments from some sober observers who analyzed the situation judiciously. The most worrisome noises came from deliberations within the Kuomintang party structure where, for a day or two, some quite senior people talked of violent actions against the US.

We worried about demonstrations. In fact, the government must have shared our concern, because shortly after the announcement they sizeably increased the police presence around the chancery, the ambassador's residence and my house. Lamp posts, walls, and other inviting places were plastered with anti-American slogans - rather like the protest style of the communists in Beijing. Although the situation was tense and worrisome, McConaughy and I felt the regime would not allow matters to get out of hand. We warned our staff to be careful, nevertheless. Fortunately, we were right. The leaders let their Kuomintang colleagues blow off steam and then quelled radical talk; they called us in to make strong remonstrances about our obligations as an ally, etc.; and then the tensions eased. No violence was tolerated for seven years - until the final outburst during Christopher's negotiations for our post-diplomatic relations in 1978.

The process by which we in the embassy - as well as the leaders and people of Taiwan - learned of what our government had in mind was shapeless and confusing, surprisingly clumsy for men who prided themselves on their acute understanding. Little advance thought had been given to the operational issues. Political bromides, such as Nixon's assertion that "our action in seeking a new relationship with the People's Republic of China will not be at the expense of old friends," were viewed with proper cynicism in Asia. Within a fairly short period of time people in Taiwan suspected they were an annoying fragment complicating the implementation of a grand American strategy devised in Washington.

At the beginning stage, I did not feel so critical of our "planning," and I never wavered from my basic support of Nixon's intent. After months of unsuccessful attempts to get meaningful infractions from Washington, however, I was really disturbed and quite angry. The ambassador was less inhibited by lack of instructions; he stuck his neck out in assuring Taiwan's leadership that we would not be withdrawing our support of them. Washington's instructions were minimal - primarily because the State Department and its East Asian Bureau knew little more than we did about what our leaders really had in mind about time tables and specific actions. In this atmosphere of basic ignorance, McConaughy chose to emphasize the happy side, presenting the issue as a long term one, unlikely to harm our ties to an old ally. Although I did my best to keep up people's courage, I suggested with increasing frequency that it was only a matter of time - within the foreseeable future - before we withdrew our military forces from Taiwan and extended diplomatic recognition to the PRC.

McConaughy's optimism was shaken in late 1971 when the U.S. effort to introduce a dual representation formula into the UN failed and resulted in Taiwan's expulsion from the organization, an event that stunned the people of Taiwan. That year, the State Department had finally gotten White House approval to propose an arrangement that would have given China's seat on the Security Council and General Assembly to the PRC but preserved a place for Taiwan in the Assembly. It was a scheme that I had promoted vigorously in earlier years. Kissinger had opposed it in 1970 as unworkable but had relented in the new atmosphere of 1971. Taiwan was bullied into submission. In retrospect, I am sure Kissinger was right about his original prediction of a negative, zero-sum reaction from the PRC. More to the point, he must have known the prospects for success were minimal after his spectacular visit to Beijing in July. This caused a huge shift in voting patterns among countries that had chafed so long under our old policy. The Chinese arranged a humiliating defeat for our position, and Taiwan was out of the UN. This was lesson number one for them about the implications of our new strategy.

Lesson number two was the Shanghai Communiqué issued on February 28, 1972 at the conclusion of President Nixon's visit to China. The key section read:

The U.S. side declared: The United States acknowledges that all Chinese on either side of the Taiwan Strait maintain there is but one China and that Taiwan is part of China. The United States does not challenge that position. It reaffirms its interest in a peaceful settlement of the Taiwan question by the Chinese themselves. With this prospect in mind, it affirms the ultimate objective of the withdrawal of all U.S. forces and military installations from Taiwan. In the meantime, it will progressively reduce its forces and military installations on Taiwan as the tension in the area diminishes.

Along with others, we learned in advance from the New York Times something of the communiqué's content and the course of its evolution. We were not given a text until just before its issuance, and our efforts by telegram, helpful visitors, etc. to get some exegesis were unsuccessful. I was rather relieved by the communiqué, because it clearly identified the issue of peaceful resolution and suggested gradualism in the process of normalization. I took exception, however, to the blatant falsehood of its assertion about "all Chinese on either side of the Taiwan Strait" agreeing there was "but one China." Our Kuomintang friends couldn't contradict this clever manipulation of their pretense about sovereignty over the mainland, but our Taiwanese friends - both moderates and extremists - were outraged. Personally, I saw no reason why the U.S. could not have adopted the Japanese or Canadian formula (i.e., "take note of" or "acknowledge" the Chinese position) that was less offensive. Marshall Green tried to get this language modified but didn't succeed. At the time, I thought the American authors were ignorant of conditions in Taiwan, and my later experience working with them convinced me that my deduction was correct.

My criticism did not detract from my basic support of the Shanghai Communiqué, and I did my best to use this one-and-only guide for the conduct of our extremely delicate operations in Taiwan. Ambassador McConaughy, burned by the July, 1971 announcement and the UN defeat, also took hope from a document that did not announce an explicit timetable for normalization. The phrasing of the communiqué was a work of art subject to different interpretations. I thought it meant that we would eventually terminate diplomatic relations with Taiwan; McConaughy didn't. Marshall Green, who was despatched along with John Holdridge from the NSC to tell us what it meant, refused to settle our argument but he noted the absence of any flat commitment to normalize. This encouraged McConaughy. He could not conceive that his country would de-recognize an old ally.

Among all groups in Taiwan the communiqué was a hot topic for discussion. We were subjected to lots of angry criticism, especially for the language I have highlighted. Native Taiwanese were extremely critical of the text. They questioned our right to set policy that would govern their lives. Some did not agree with our basic premise; i.e. that Chinese on Taiwan wished to have one nation. They were interested in independence, not one China, particularly one run by Beijing. Along with almost everybody else on Taiwan, the independence advocates worried about their future and the possibility of a cut-off of military supplies. Mainlanders feared the collapse of their universe. Despite vociferous criticism, I also detected a sense of relief in many quarters that the United States had not said something even more radical.

The third lesson for Taiwan was that the US military presence really was going to be withdrawn. This was the most operational effect of the new policy. Predominantly, our military base facilities and forces were in Taiwan to support our war effort in Vietnam. The most important facility was CCK Airbase near Taichung used for logistic purposes and refueling of aircraft such as B-52 bombers headed for Vietnam. Further south we had a Cold War strike base for F-4 aircraft along with a small complement of nuclear weapons. There were also other facilities scattered around the island for a variety of purposes, including rehabilitation of aircraft and tanks. Seventh Fleet ships made frequent use of the port facilities in Chilung and Kaohsiung, and the Commander of the US Taiwan Defense Command was a three star admiral. The arrangements struck me as serving a useful purpose so long as the Vietnam war was going on. I should mention that we also had a MAAG for military supplies and training purposes.

Almost immediately after the July 1971 announcement and very actively after the Shanghai Communique, we assumed in the embassy that we should prepare for the phase out of our forces and certainly discourage our military from any thoughts of expanding activities. I wasn't sure what would happen with the MAAG; I hoped we could reach some agreement that would leave a military assistance component on Taiwan. This was an uncomfortable prospect for McConaughy, but I don't recall much resistance from him. Our military commanders, however, were on a quite different wave length, particularly since Washington delayed so long in providing us with so much as a sketch of a withdrawal plan. CINCPAC had little appreciation of what was going on in Washington, and the Seventh Fleet and Taiwan Defense Commanders had even less. They didn't want to think about withdrawals; they even spoke of beefing up forces. The JCS in Washington, who were closer to senior policy makers, had more than an inkling of what might happen, but they were in no hurry to issue guidance until ordered by the president.

Feeling more strongly about this than the ambassador, I struggled to get Washington to rein in our local military and introduce some realism about our new policy. I failed, and we were left dangling in Taiwan. As a result we sometimes had senior military personnel from the Pacific commands, including CINCPAC himself, reassuring their Taiwan counterparts that all would be well.

To make matters worse, we asked a big favor of Taiwan. I am embarrassed not to remember whether it preceded or followed our first notification on force withdrawals, but the impact would have been equally confusing in policy terms. When we reached our first fragile agreement with North Vietnam in 1972, we suddenly realized we were short of aircraft to beef up the South Vietnamese Air Force in the window of time before we would have to cease our own operations. We needed about a hundred or so F-5A,B planes used by the South Vietnamese, and we turned to Taiwan for help. Taiwan had plenty of these aircraft that were being phased out in favor of new F-5Es to be co-produced with Northrop in Taiwan.

After getting instructions from highest authority in Washington, McConaughy, the Taiwan defense commander, and I promptly called on Vice Premier Chiang Ching-kuo and the chairman of the Taiwan JCS. Not surprisingly, they agreed and were able satisfy our needs quickly. In partial return for this, we guaranteed eventual U.S. Government approval of the F-5E co-production agreement, an action that might otherwise have been de-railed by the Shanghai Communiqué.

Chiang obviously saw the longer term benefit of doing us this favor, and we were pleased to have been able to accommodate Washington so rapidly. The net effect, however, was politically confusing - on the Taiwan leadership, on our military commanders, and on Ambassador McConaughy. To varying degrees, they were briefly lulled into hoping our force withdrawals from Taiwan would be postponed indefinitely. In fact, there was a modest build up of American forces in Taiwan for a few months to reinforce our resumed bombing efforts against North Vietnam. I remained sure, however, that we would have to give up our military structure on Taiwan.

In any event, it was not long before we had to tell Taiwan we were about to begin staged withdrawal from the island. The ambassador and I made the initial presentation of our plans to Chiang Ching-kuo who took the news glumly but without great resistance. Over the next year or so we continued the process and after Ambassador McConaughy left for Washington, first for consultations and then retirement, I carried on alone. Our meetings with Chiang were not to seek concurrence; we phrased our remarks in the most diplomatic terms possible, but we had no intention of allowing Taiwan to interfere with our plans. As the embassy's point man, I found this a very difficult task, far more delicate than most. Boiled down to its essence, our message was as follows: to fulfill President Nixon's commitment to your enemy in the Chinese civil war, we are removing our military presence from your country. We know you are a long standing ally of the United States, and we of course support the right of your people to peace and security.

Understandably Taiwan was very unhappy about what we were doing to them. In these circumstances I was most impressed by Chiang's conduct, less so by his stubborn subordinates. At one point, the Taiwan side deliberately leaked information in violation of an explicit understanding not to do so. Partly to signify I was a loyal US team member, I asked Washington to order me to see Chiang. I called on him alone and, speaking in reasonably good Chinese, braced him with our strong objection. Apart from this and a few other problems, Taiwan sensibly did not give us a hard time over the withdrawals - probably less than our own commanders. The process of notification was virtually complete by the time Ambassador Unger took over, although the final withdrawals, the F-4s, intelligence facilities, and headquarters structure, took place after I returned to Washington in 1974.

The most important issue for Taiwan, i.e., the ultimate significance of all that was happening to the country, was not at all clear to anybody during my service in Taipei. In what time frame would the U.S. normalize relations with the PRC? What would be the effect on Taiwan's status? Would a U.S. presence remain on the island? Would the defense commitment remain? Would Taiwan be able to procure arms? etc. For understandable reasons Washington could not provide clear answers to any of these questions, but it could have done much better in helping us cope with Taiwan's trauma. It did not do so, I believe, largely because the White House was playing its cards very close to its chest and did not trust the State Department, which was unable to make a case on our behalf. Thus instead of a consistent U.S. message, people in Taiwan were subjected to confusing voices from Americans with different opinions.

Looking back now, it is interesting that the closest thing to an answer about Taiwan's future status came not from the US but from Japan. When Japan raced ahead of us in 1972 to normalize relations with the PRC, they faced many of the same problems that would complicate our negotiations. Although Japan's arrangements for Taiwan were governed by their discussions with the PRC, they also had to be acceptable to the Taiwan authorities. This led to a drawn out negotiation in Taipei as well as Tokyo - with both help and interference from the governing Liberal Democratic Party. The Japanese ambassador in Taipei, who was a friend of many years, kept me well informed of this process, and I reported it in great detail to Washington.

At the time I got no reaction from Washington, although there was great interest in the Japanese experience. Effectively, Japan cut off all official relations with Taiwan, but preserved a wide range of unofficial relations by means of a facade which was tolerable, if not entirely "acceptable" to the PRC. Granting that the Japanese didn't have to cope with the security issue, their experience was nevertheless very pertinent to what we might eventually do. Japan, the PRC, and Taiwan were quite aware of this as they negotiated the details.

In the absence of guidance on how to deal with these long range issues, our job in Taipei amounted to damage control, and we went about it in different ways. The ambassador never abandoned hope that we would maintain full diplomatic relations with the Republic of China, and he was very sincere if somewhat misleading in his repeated expressions of continuity of policy. Convinced this was impossible, I plugged for maintaining as much of a relationship with Taiwan as could be salvaged. Even after losing its UN membership and diplomatic status, I thought Taiwan could survive as a national entity and prosper economically very much as it has. My main concern was that the process of change be orderly and systematic so as not to endanger Taiwan's political stability or security. In these early days I had some embryonic views on how we should maintain non-diplomatic relations and defense cooperation with Taiwan, but these did not crystalize until I returned to Washington.

Although McConaughy and I tried, when talking to the authorities and citizens of Taiwan, to maintain a common line of "reassurance" about U.S. constancy toward friends, our differing visions of the future were fairly apparent, and they were exposed when we had visitors. We had lots of visitors with a wide range of views: admirals who talked to us as though we would have perpetual military access to Taiwan; senators and congressmen who told us they had been assured by Nixon that the policy was just what had been publicly stated - no more, no less. Our visitors spoke in the same vein to Taiwan parsonages. The overall impact of visitor comments was to reduce the sense of alarm on Taiwan.

Of course, we had a few visitors who told us in confidence that they expected sharp departures from current policy, and over time they turned out to be three-quarters right. My sense was that the future might be somewhat between the extremes. In any event, I was desperate to know more about what was going on in Washington. With the ambassador's approval, I wrote and phoned Marshall Green, but I must say that my probing was not very successful. I then asked that I be allowed to return to Washington for consultations, and my request was approved, but not for quite a while, and the result was not very productive. Although Marshall was slowly getting some grasp of the Taiwan issue, he was still being kept at arms length by the White House. John Holdridge, my former boss, friend, and colleague in the NSC, was sympathetic but unable to cut me in. I returned to Taipei little better informed.

Although the watershed Shanghai Communique provided us a kind of blueprint, it was vague on key points and left most questions unanswered. What I hoped for was an authoritative, two-sided message from Washington. For Taiwan I wanted as much reassurance as Nixon could give about protecting Taiwan's basic needs. For ourselves, and especially our military representatives, I wanted forthright guidance about force withdrawals. I have already explained that we didn't get the latter until late in the game. On the former, however, President Nixon was responsive, perhaps overly so, before his visit to China. I had the impression he really wanted to maintain close relationships with Taiwan as long as he could - unlike Kissinger who shunned the place. He had some respect for Chiang Kai-shek, and he was willing to listen to the Walter McConaughys and Ronald Reagans of the world. In response to McCaughy's request, he selected Ronald Reagan, then Governor of California, as his personal representative to visit Taiwan in the fall of 1971 to assure Chiang Kai-shek and the people that the United States would behave responsibly.

Reagan carried out his mission with zeal. We wrote his speech, blending the kind of sentiments we knew he would want to express within the strictures of the newly emerging policy, and limiting promises as much as we could. It was much more the kind of speech I would have given, than the more positive and hopeful version that McCaughy would have provided. Reagan dutifully delivered the speech as we had written it, but in his answers to questions he spoke for himself, sounding much more like McCaughy than Gleysteen and wandering way out of line in talking about the future. The ambassador and Reagan hit it off very well. Chiang Kai-shek was reassured, Chiang Ching-kuo may have been slightly reassured, and the tame media loved it. Unfortunately, Reagan's answers were misleading; he was speaking for himself, not Nixon and Kissinger. Some elements of the bureaucracy, media, and commercial community understood this. They were more sophisticated and understood the situation better than their bosses. Anyway, we got more reassurance than I thought was wise!

The kind of easy reassurances offered by Reagan were undercut by the Shanghai Communique a few months later. By this time, I had become more pushy in expressing my own views, because I was convinced they were more in line with administration policy. I assumed the U.S. would recognize the PRC relatively soon, that Taiwan would survive and prosper, and that one way or another we would help ensure Taiwan's security. With the ambassador and American colleagues - civilian and military - I talked very frankly this way. After we had begun our military withdrawals, I also became more and more frank with Taiwan citizens - by this time with the full approval of a new ambassador. I tried to conduct these conversations on an off-the-record basis, and I had little trouble doing so, because the regime, with strong powers of censorship, didn't want my remarks to become public. In discussions with high officials I was circumspect, but if asked, I responded frankly. I had no occasion to talk about grand strategy with Chiang Ching-kuo; if I had I would have probably pulled my punches without offering false consolation about the future.

By the time Unger arrived, the situation in Washington had stabilized. Through informal channels and with the passage of time, we managed to get a better understanding of what was going on. We became more active; I stuck my neck out pretty far by end of my tour. I gave a number of background interviews to editors in which I warned them that a change in the U.S.-Taiwan relationship was bound to happen. I gave these interviews with Unger's blessing, and we reported what I was doing to Washington. This was a painful process for both sides. Although many persons did not want to hear my conclusions, I think I people in Taiwan considered me "an honest man," and I finally gained respect from the regime when my predictions turned out to be right on the money. People probably felt that McConaughy was "morally" right, but that Unger and I were more in step with the times.

The embassy's situation was unprecedented, at least in my experience. First and most extraordinary, we were not consulted by our own leaders about a major change of policy radically affecting our country assignment. Second, we were given virtually no guidance about what to say to our host regime. Third, there was a split in the embassy front office as to where policy was going - or should be going. Obviously, all of this had a impact on the staff who were left with many questions and few answers. Nevertheless, morale was good. As I have mentioned, most of the staff saw East Asia more or less as I did. I think most of them felt that our opening to the PRC was a very significant shift that was bound to occur sooner or later. All, including two ambassadors, felt that it was handled badly on the Taiwan end. There was no way major surgery could have been painless, but with more care we might have been able to soften the hurt for our friends in Taiwan.

Nixon and Kissinger chose to circumvent the normal channels when they moved almost overnight to change the direction of our foreign policy. I think they paid inadequate attention to the effect of the new policy on Taiwan and the nervousness that it created in Korea and other East Asian countries, particularly Japan. I know their justification for being unorthodox, and I would have a hard time arguing they should have relied more heavily on Secretary Rogers. But at least they could have used Marshall Green, who was the Department's stalwart in this process, and they could have assembled an inside team at the NSC with some Taiwan competence. Fortunately, the Department came back to life when Kissinger moved over to become the secretary of state.

In Taiwan we were exposed to decisions one at a time, which made it difficult for us conduct ourselves in ways that would cause the least possible damage in Taiwan. We were very upset by these tactics and continually tried to find out from Washington what might be coming next. For many reasons, this was not possible during the early stages of normalization. Certainly the State Department did not have the blue prints. I am not sure that Kissinger did either. In his talks with the PRC after the Nixon visit he discussed possible formulas for recognition as well as the timetable for force withdrawal from Taiwan, and we now know that Nixon pledged to complete the process after the election in 1976. Although Kissinger apparently assumed fairly rapid progress, the process was, in fact, quite drawn out. Nixon's and Kissinger's hopes that their new policy would induce the PRC to put heavy pressure on the Vietnamese were disappointed. Dealing with Taiwan's future security proved more complicated and more politically sensitive than anticipated. The failure in the UN came as somewhat of a surprise; until things fell apart, we thought we could hold the line in the UN for at least another year. Then came the final demands of the Vietnam War followed by Nixon's resignation. Whatever neat plans may have existed in leaders' minds, these events gave our Taiwan policy an ad hoc quality it didn't deserve.

Having been at the receiving end in Taipei, I developed a very active interest in trying to protect Taiwan as much as possible within the constraints of the new policy. Just as in my final months in Taipei, I insisted on calling a spade a spade in my dealings with Taiwan representatives after I returned to Washington to serve under Phil Habib. Moreover, I made a point of telling representatives of the PRC that they didn't understand what was going on in Taiwan, and I tried to explain to them what I saw as the important characteristics of the islands. I was filled with missionary zeal on this subject.

Enough about the effects of our new China policy. We didn't spend all of our time taking things apart in Taiwan. In fact, the negative impact of the Nixon switch coincided with the emergence of very positive trends within Taiwan, political as well as economic. Since I have already touched on this elsewhere I can be relatively brief.

When I returned in 1971 for my second tour in Taipei, Taiwan was undergoing great political change, not dramatically from a police state to a democracy as in later years, but nevertheless significant. Although Chiang Kai-shek was still alive, his almost exclusive focus on return to the mainland no longer governed events. Both he and his preoccupations had virtually disappeared. The new focus was on Taiwan's development. The economy was enjoying rapid growth thanks to well managed export industries and extensive connections with the US and Japan. The old socialist industrial sector was being privatized, and market forces were being allowed to play a major role. Standards of living were rising rapidly.

Most significant for the democratic pattern of today, Taiwan's new leadership under President Chiang's son, Chiang Ching-kuo, was co-opting growing numbers of the native Taiwanese community into the government, the Kuomintang, and the army - even slowly into the senior officer corps. Police state controls were being softened; political power was beginning to be shared; and Taiwan had become a very egalitarian, educated, and socially mobile society.

To be sure, there were more than a few ugly traces of the old regime. Mainlanders still dominated the government and politics. Although oppositionists were elected to the parliament and local governments, they were still barred from organizing any political party outside the Kuomintang. Human rights abuses against Taiwan independence activists and other dissidents were prevalent and often ugly. The mainlander-native divide that I saw during earlier years was still a dominant factor of public life, despite encouraging trends toward accommodation on both sides. The government's implacable hostility toward the PRC - and its periodic resort to para-military pinpricks against the communists - remained, even if younger Taiwan citizens sought to learn more about the mainland, some even wanting to travel there. Permission for cross-Strait business and travel was still ten years away.

Citing these traces of the past, some people, including Taiwanese opposition leaders, independence advocates, and some of our missionaries, argued that the regime was as ugly as ever. As in Park Chung Hee's Korea, they stirred up support from sympathizers in the U.S. and Japan in hopes of stimulating foreign intervention. Before I discuss this, I want to emphasize that these people were surprisingly blind to the longer term significance of major changes, particularly the leadership's gradual but real accommodation of the Taiwanese majority throughout the society, the de facto military truce with the PRC, and the evolution of a new value structure in urban areas as a result of market driven growth and foreign exposure.

Unlike the embassy under Rankin and Drumright, the embassy under McConaughy and Unger deserves credit for understanding and being in the forefront of reporting this evolution. Our political counselor, Burt Levin, a shrewd and colorful "China-type," had a firm grasp of it, including the way average people were accommodating to the new vision. So did his successor, Harvey Feldman. I joined Levin on some of his "take the pulse" trips, and I took advantage of my position to cultivate the senior individuals around Chiang Ching-kuo who were implementing this low key but major reform in Taiwan. I praised them and, whenever appropriate, Chiang Ching-kuo himself for what they were doing. Given his old time associations, McConaughy was less fascinated by this process than I, but he let us react positively and convey the message to Washington. From my INR days before going to Taipei I recall there was already some appreciation of this evolution in Taiwan, and after I returned to the EA Bureau in 1974, I think Embassy Taipei's view had become conventional wisdom in the Department.

President Chiang Kai-shek and his son, Chiang Ching-kuo, were the symbols straddling this profound change. As I have mentioned several times before, my opinion of the father was less than favorable. I know he played some positive role in China's modernization, but I saw him as a disappointing authoritarian leader; by this time he was a spent force, completely out of touch with the times. His public life was apparently controlled by his wife, who was always with him, or by his secretaries. I was uncomfortable when Americans fawned over him and probably gave him the wrong impression of his status in the U.S.. I accompanied the ambassador on a few calls, once to talk about the impending collapse of Taiwan's position in the UN. Usually, the reason for the visit was taken care of quickly and the rest of time it was "memory lane." McConaughy liked this, and the two men got along very well. Despite my lack of esteem, I did not have hostile feelings about Chiang Kai-shek.

I had a very different view of Chiang Ching-kuo. My opinion of him went through an evolution. I first considered him a junior version of his father. That changed when I got to know him; eventually I had a very positive view. In fact, historically speaking, I would list Chiang Ching-kuo as one of China's more impressive leaders - even compared to the mainland competition. During my second tour he was first deputy premier and then premier before becoming president after his father's death. These were promotions without a distinction; he did the same work in all these capacities. He was effectively in charge of the regime and the country for many years.

Chiang the younger was Taiwan oriented. He visited all parts of the islands to see for himself how people lived. He wanted native Taiwanese to support the regime. He was a smart, moderate man who tried his best to live down his own and his family's checkered past. Although he was very down to earth, Chiang Ching-kuo had a concept and vision about what was needed in Taiwan; i.e. a prosperous, well educated, egalitarian society embracing native born as well as immigrant citizens and depending on strong military forces and international engagement for protection. I often heard him talk this way, but I don't really know how his vision extended to China proper. In his youth he was sent by his father to be educated in the Soviet Union. He denied ever having been a communist, but clearly the experience left him more concerned than his father about the fate of common man. For a leader who had traveled so little to the West, he was quite well informed about the world.

For all the improvements over his father, Chiang Ching-kuo was also authoritarian, very tough, and solidly anti-communist. He maintained firm control over the military establishment and intelligence community - undoubtedly responsible for some of the activity we opposed. He could be quite brutal, as a number of people who crossed him found out. Nevertheless, I admired him for his intellectual growth and for what he did for Taiwan. I don't know if Taiwan could have survived without Chiang Ching-kuo or someone like him.

I had a good relationship with him, although it was not nearly as close as, for example, Ray Cline's, the CIA station chief during my first tour in Taiwan. Ray became known as the "American ambassador" regardless of who actually filled that chair. He was perceived - to some extent correctly - as running the show. None of his successors had the same entree or power even though they all lived in the "Pink House" reserved for station chiefs. Ambassador Drumright allowed Ray to do his "own thing." He traveled with Chiang Ching-kuo and became a kind of foreign confidant. In those days we were still using Taiwan as a base for many anti-communist operations. Cline's role was useful for this purpose, but he should never have been allowed to appropriate such an important role. In any event, my contacts with Chiang Ching-kuo were more innocent. Many of them were in the company of the ambassador. Occasionally, I would escort visitors to see Chiang. I dined with him many times, and I did see him privately on rare occasions.

I remember one such time when Speaker of the House McCormick came with a "small" delegation of 16-20 representatives plus wives. I was charge' at the time, and I invited the huge group to my house. I also invited Premier Chiang Ching-kuo, who got the time wrong and arrived a half hour early. Alerted by our security officer, I rushed home to greet him, and the two of us had a completely private conversation about many things including policy matters until the throng arrived. Chiang's willingness to come to my place, combined with our private conversation, didn't harm my standing in Taiwan officialdom. I must say this was a remarkable experience for me; I found that I could talk with him informally and comfortably about very delicate issues.

Despite Chiang Ching-kuo's relatively enlightened rule and the changes he was nurturing, Taiwan was still enough of a bad boy in the period 1971-74 to be singled out quite often for American punishment. With little public notice, we complained, sometimes very sharply, to the authorities about human rights violations, censorship, harassment of opposition forces, and so on. This was usually done by the political section although occasionally by the ambassador or me. Opposition elements, who knew we did this, appreciated it and often made a show of their relations with us in hopes it would provide a protective screen against the authorities.

During this period we also vigorously discouraged lingering tendencies in Taiwan to conduct para-military and intelligence adventures against the PRC, especially cloak and dagger operations mounted from Hong Kong, which I will touch on later. In the same vein we detected and began strenuous efforts to stop a clandestine nuclear weapons program. We came across intelligence and other evidence that the regime was diverting substantial resources into development of nuclear weapons. We had a difficult time verifying this, initially treating it as probable but not conclusive. Over past years we had cooperated extensively with Taiwan in peaceful uses of nuclear energy. We had helped with the construction of several nuclear power plants. Our Atomic Energy Commission had good rapport with Taiwan scientists, had provided assistance in improving Taiwan's scientific base, and was familiar with Taiwan's nuclear labs. So we first looked to the AEC for information about what the regime was really doing. They were not very useful.

A senior AEC representative came out to help us. For some time we had been trying to pry our way into the nuclear lab at the Chung Shan Institute where we were fairly certain Taiwan was reprocessing fuel to extract plutonium. Having been given a run around by the authorities, we finally succeeded in getting access. When the Washington visitor, the embassy's Science Attache, and I inspected Chung Shan we were told flatly that the labs there were not used for reprocessing and that Taiwan had never been engaged in the process. Our AEC man saw clear evidence, however, of lab design for that purpose, and we later discovered they had temporarily dismantled part of the facility to hide their operations. These observations at Chung Shan, combined with increasingly convincing intelligence, led us to make a strong demarche, demanding that all nuclear facilities in Taiwan for reprocessing or other military uses be closed down. That was done - more or less, for a while.

An ironic footnote. On a subsequent visit, this same AEC representative told me that he had been approached by his Taiwan counterparts to ask that we "loan" Taiwan a small amount of plutonium for peaceful research purposes in their labs. I was astounded that Taiwan could be so brazen, even more by our man who said he was inclined to oblige them. Washington quickly helped us snuff out this little ploy.

My view on leaving Taipei was that the nuclear genie had been put back in the bottle, or at least had not been allowed to get further out of the bottle. However, a few years after I returned to Washington, the issue again became acute; we found more incontrovertible evidence of Taiwan's experimentation with nuclear weapons production - somewhat akin to our problems with South Korea - and we had to make an extraordinarily strong demarche to stop it. This Taiwan experience sensitized me to the Korean scene. I was a strong supporter of the tough actions we took in both countries.

I would like to conclude with a few more comments about the embassy and the effects of the new China policy on its relations with other U.S. organizations in Taipei. The issue of our force withdrawals from Taiwan created tension between the embassy and the Taiwan defense command. The commanding admiral, a submariner, while being a basically good man, was not skilled in the diplomatic game and lacked sympathy for the direction in which we were moving. Since his guidance from Washington and from CINCPAC was sometimes at cross purposes with Nixon's new policy, we worked out stringent new rules of conduct for all of our military forces to minimize potential misunderstandings. In the early stages, the admiral wasn't very cooperative: we were trying to lower our military profile on Taiwan; he was trying to keep it high. Under McConaughy, who was cozy with admirals, it was hard to keep the commander down.

Under Unger it was easier both because of his views and the fact that he was under pressure from Washington to ensure firm control over all elements of the country team. Our policy had also become more clear. Shortly after Unger arrived I had a big fight with the admiral who wanted to talk to the ambassador rather than me to try and get around the rules. Since I was the designated contact for the U.S. military, I didn't let him, and we argued back and forth angrily for a long time. He accused the embassy of pandering to the PRC against the interests of our hosts in Taiwan; I warned him that if he kept on giving us a hard time, we would have no trouble getting Washington to order him to behave, or words to that effect. This sobered him down. Unger backed me fully. The admiral's behavior improved markedly.

The admiral was not always present at our high level meetings concerning the military draw-downs. He was, however, very much in the picture when we negotiated the transfer of Taiwanese F-5A and Bs to South Vietnam, and was most helpful. Of course, after each meeting that the admiral didn't attend, we would give him a complete read-out. There was no personal animosity between the embassy and the US command; they were very good to us. But most U.S. military officers understandably thought they were defending a close relationship with an ally and anything that smacked of a departure from this bothered them. It was a real shock for them when we changed directions.

I should say that in general I had very good relations with the U.S. military in Taiwan. I went out of my way to be helpful to them. But sometimes on specific issues, such as the one I just mentioned, I had to be, and was, quite tough. I also had a pretty good relationship with the senior officers of the Taiwan military, including the JCS. I saw a lot of them, mostly in social settings. They knew we had fairly ready access to their boss, Chiang Ching-Kuo; some of them sometimes attended our sessions with him. They always invited us to their parties; we periodically reciprocated.

The station chief during my DCM tour was Daren Flitcroft. The deputy was Bob Grealy. By this time, the station had only residual contacts with the kind of people who had been powerhouses in Cline's days. Because of our cooperation over many years, they knew the intelligence community well, including presumably some of the operatives working against the PRC. But our policy had changed since Cline's days - even before Nixon's opening to the PRC; the change probably started in the Kennedy administration. We stopped talk about their return to the mainland, and we tried to stop them from using violent tactics - poisoned pens, bomb throwing, etc. This new position may have gotten blurred sometimes because of longstanding close personal relationships between our people and the perpetrators of such activities.

McConaughy had a good formal relationship with the Station Chief, but he insisted that his DCM manage the relationship between the Station and the rest of the Embassy. That left me the main job of liaison with the Station, even though the Chief participated in country team meetings. I discussed this aspect of the job with the Ambassador soon after my arrival; I accepted the role willingly because I thought it was important that the front office know what the CIA was doing; I am not sure what my predecessors had done in this regard, but I thought it newly important since there had been a number of embarrassing incidents, particularly in South East Asia, caused by the failure of embassies to exercise firm supervision over stations. Although he obviously agreed that intelligence activities must conform with U.S. policy, McConaughy didn't want to play the supervisory role directly himself, but he pledged he would support me in case of differences with the station.

In fact, that commitment was not really necessary, since both the station chief and his deputy were exceptionally cooperative. As I said, the station had a lot of embarrassing entanglements from the past from which we wanted to distance ourselves. I soon became well versed in intelligence matters, although perhaps not as well as I became later in Korea. With Unger's arrival I remained involved in this process, but the ambassador resumed a more traditional, direct role in supervision of all agencies.

I think I was comfortable with the activities of other agencies-USIA, MAAG, etc. I kept a close eye on USIA; I had troubles with the MAAG chief who, although under a military chain of command, was also subject to the ambassador's guidance for most of his work. I think we had three MAAG chiefs during my tour. The first was a very difficult person a gung ho army major general who was always on the borderline of inappropriate behavior. As I recall, we eased him out before his tour was scheduled to end. His replacement ran afoul of military discipline for financial irregularities. He also had to be removed. Finally, we got a MAAG chief who did a fine job. McConaughy really hated to fire anybody; he was particularly anxious to keep good relationships with all the senior staff and considered the MAAG general "one of his boys." My recommendation caused him some pain, but he approved, nevertheless.

We frequently had airmen who got into trouble with Taiwan's strict rules against drug possession, mostly for marijuana, but sometimes, more dangerous narcotics. Taiwan also hosted many families of both military and CIA personnel assigned to Vietnam. Quite a few of them were involved in drugs, and we had a substantial drug problem in the American schools.

The Taiwan defense commander was responsible for the military schools, and the embassy for the civilian school. We worked together closely. I got the nickname of "Mayor" for my supervision of the schools on behalf of the ambassador. On two occasions, the admiral and I called all the American families together and really laid down the law with the support of the ambassador, who also attended. It was a gathering of thousands. When serious violators came to our attention, we took quick, decisive action - we sent the family home. Those draconian measures helped reduce drug usage among Americans, including our own foreign service families, to manageable levels.

Embassy Taipei was fairly large - not as large as Embassy Seoul - but substantial. If all agencies, except the military commands were included, we had a lot of Americans and Chinese working for the U.S. government in Taiwan.

I mentioned at the beginning that McConaughy was very generous in his treatment of me. Had I been in McConaughy's place as ambassador, I don't believe I would allowed my DCM such a free hand. The relationship is a tricky one. I don't believe a DCM should march in lockstep with his or her boss. A reasonable difference of views is acceptable, and probably a good thing. Some constructive tension in the front office can be helpful; it may on occasion encourage one or the other officer to challenge conventional wisdom, whereas an overly compliant DCM can inhibit healthy argument and even invite danger in some situations. A rebellious DCM is almost sure to be destructive. The difficult question is where to draw the line between useful and destructive.

I think the situation in Embassy Taipei fell somewhere between the two. On the one hand, it was quite apparent to the host country that there was a significant difference of opinion in the embassy's front office. Both McConaughy and I tried to be circumspect about our differences, but acute observers could have detected them. I was never aware of any opportunity or effort by Taiwan to exploit the situation; nor was Washington concerned about it. It might have been different if I, the DCM, had been off base in terms of policy rather than a distinguished ambassador.

In retrospect, I think it was useful that I - or someone with my views - was in Taiwan while our PRC policy was undergoing a major shift. With a DCM who fully agreed with McConaughy, our government would have had a very difficult time getting the ship to steer in the right direction. There might have been serious consequences for Taiwan because the embassy might have delivered the wrong message at critical times. This entire problem melted away under Ambassador Unger. I think he and I had a rather ideal relationship. We had very different backgrounds and some differences, but they posed hardly any problem for our cooperation.

I should not leave this issue without also saying that I really liked McConaughy. After his retirement, I used to visit him. My articulation of my views was always known to him. I didn't go behind his back. It is the ambassador's role to set the views of an embassy, not the DCM's. It is best if the ambassador and a DCM broadly agree on the nature of our national interests in the host country as well as on the basic objectives to be pursued. Although McConaughy and I differed on the merits of recognizing the PRC, he gave me full credit for trying to keep our relations with Taiwan as close as we could. I think my views represented the majority of the embassy staff, even if I was more outspoken.

I want to add a footnote about something that severely embarrassed me while I was in Taiwan. Provoked by the war in Vietnam, some rogue official in our government provided hundreds of classified telegrams to a journalist, Walter Winchells' successor, I believe, who began to print them one by one in his columns. Some of them happened to be from Embassy Taipei, and apart from the shocking degree of irresponsibility involved by both men, I don't think great harm was done. However, one telegram was a message I had sent Marshall Green asking for his help in getting special permission for Taiwan's Foreign Minister Chou Shu-kai to visit Washington at a time we were trying to lower Taiwan's profile in our country. To support Chou's cause I had adopted a rather patronizing tone about his being one of the good guys in Taiwan, and I had been successful in getting him the visa. When the whole damn message was printed in the Washington Post, however, I was shocked and acutely embarrassed. Washington was never able or willing to explain how this had occurred, and I was forced to go and apologize in person about our inability to secrets.

***

Q: In 1974, you were appointed as deputy assistant secretary in the Bureau of East Asian and Pacific Affairs (EAP). Who was the assistant secretary and how was the appointment made?

GLEYSTEN: The assistant secretary was Phil Habib, and he wrote to me asking whether I would be interested in the job. It came as a surprise, but I jumped at the chance. Despite being the most junior deputy to Habib, I inherited Art Hummel's China responsibilities and retained them throughout my Washington tour. My other duties varied from time to time, depending on the strengths and seniority of other incoming deputy assistant secretaries. For example, when Owen Zurhellen joined us for about a year as the senior deputy, he was given the Japan and Korea portfolios. When he left, they were re-assigned to me. At various times, I also had responsibility for the Philippines, Australia, New Zealand, Southeast Asia (but not Indochina) and the Pacific island areas. For a period I also supervised the Office for Regional Affairs. Throughout this period Bob Miller had normal responsibility for Southeast Asia - overwhelmingly the problems of Vietnam that were so vexing for Habib in those years. Economic issues were the province of our colleague, Les Edmonds.

Vietnam did not prevent Phil from working on other issues. He was thoroughly engaged in China policy, which was so dear to Kissinger's heart. Although he looked to others for expertise, Phil had strong opinions about how to manage discussion in the American camp. I could always see him about China, Japan or any other problems that were arising in my area. He shared my sense of Japan's importance and paid steady attention to Korea. All his deputies, including junior me, were given more than the minimum time we needed with him.

Let me turn to China. Like others I was fascinated by our new China connection, even more so perhaps because of my boyhood and foreign service experience. I wanted to act in Kissinger's China play, and I wanted to make use of my considerable expertise on the PRC and Taiwan. Getting into the play was easy, because my predecessor, Art Hummel, had earned Kissinger's respect, and Habib helped get me into the act as his apprentice. Contributing my expertise was more of a struggle, but fairly successful over time. In one of my first sessions in Kissinger's presence, Habib said he thought I had important things to say about Deng Xiaoping, and I was invited to explain why I thought Deng was not only a worthy successor to Zhou Enlai but probably considerably more important. Kissinger was skeptical; I stuck to my view, and after a year or so he more or less acknowledged I might be right. But whether the process of education was written or oral, it was always frustrating. Kissinger and his inner squad had been in the new China play from the beginning. They had a kind of conceit, and they were not eager to hear from others. Certainly, they did not want help in writing the play. Thanks to Habib's steady cover for me, I sensed that I was eventually accepted by Kissinger as a useful member of the bureaucracy to work with his inner circle. However, I was never part of that circle.

Despite my reservations about the way we had handled Taiwan, I felt our new relationship with the PRC was a radical improvement over the past policy of all-out confrontation. The change was demonstrably helpful to us in the conduct of our foreign policy, both internationally and to some extent domestically. Nevertheless, by the time I began working for Habib, we had reached a point of stalemate in our efforts to complete the process of full normalization of relations with China. The obstacle was Taiwan. In discussions with the Chinese we had not yet come to grips with this nitty gritty problem, largely because of substantial forces of domestic resistance reflected in Congress. This was the situation when I started in 1974 and it remained without substantial change until after the 1976 elections. Even so, great amounts of time and effort were devoted to China. We tried hard to find ways of signifying progress that would benefit our dealings with the rest of the world, especially the Soviets, and sustain the domestic credit earned by Nixon's daring move. High level visits to China were continued with much public fanfare, and large numbers of other Americans began treks to the land of cultural revolution. Internally, we spent much time and imagination preparing for and conducting this activity. It didn't lead to a breakthrough but it laid the ground work for the next administration.

Although Kissinger rarely shared his inner thoughts with persons such as me, I was quite involved in most aspects of our dealings with the PRC. Habib used me as his additional eyes and ears. He wanted me to keep him abreast of what was going on, and he passed on what he learned from on high. When crunch time would come, he got more directly involved, often saturating himself in the problem. I think it was a good technique. He normally took me along for discussions he had with Kissinger on China, even those that were quite small. Similarly, he made sure I went along on all the trips that Kissinger took to China. I was one of the "China experts" who might be required.

The most important issue consuming us during this period was how to sustain momentum toward normalization. Although I had been quite unhappy in Taiwan about what seemed like careless planning in Washington, I committed myself fully to the cause of normalization after I got back to our capital city. I really thought it could be accomplished without undermining the security of Taiwan, and if it couldn't, I was convinced the effort would still benefit us. I never doubted Kissinger wanted to complete the process of normalization. He had a transparent commitment to the PRC to finish the process, as did President Nixon who had been forced to leave the political scene. Ford, however, did not have the same emotional allegiance to our PRC policy. In contrast to Nixon's almost brazen reordering of the national agenda, Ford was more orthodox, worrying about the potential domestic repercussions of normalization just before going to the voters in 1976. In any event, I, along with others, annoyed Kissinger by pressing him (usually via Habib but sometimes directly) to push all the way to normalization. He didn't appreciate having puppies yap at his heels and told us to keep in mind the complexity of decisions faced by the president. Coping with Taiwan was another of my main responsibilities. In our dealings with the PRC during this two year period we fenced around the Taiwan issue - a fair amount of talking but no major effort to break the stalemate. As he had with Zhou and Mao in 1972 and 1973, Secretary Kissinger raised the issue with Deng Xiaoping during his trips to Beijing in both 1974 and 1975, emphasizing it was a problem within our body politic that had to be resolved. He described the concerns of Taiwan's defenders in Washington and stressed our government's need to take account of their opinion if we were to have the degree of consensus necessary for a successful normalization of relations with the PRC. Although I may be doing him an injustice, I never felt that Kissinger manifested much personal conviction that Taiwan's survival was in our national interest. He talked dispassionately from a Washington vantage point about the political strength of those who identified themselves with Taiwan.

In the first session I attended in 1974 Kissinger probed for Deng's reactions to a variation on the Japan formula; i.e., we would recognize the PRC as the sole government of China and withdraw completely from Taiwan in a military sense, but to ensure domestic support we would need to have a liaison mission in Taiwan and we would also want some assurance about Taiwan's security pending peaceful unification. The implied or stated premises were that all treaty relations with Taiwan would be terminated, people to people relations would continue, while Taiwan would be able to purchase defensive arms until the unification issue was peacefully resolved within the extended period mentioned by Mao Zedong. Kissinger always appealed for Chinese statesmanship and patience in dealing with this problem of history. No comprehensive model of a proposed solution was ever tabled, which was probably wise in the absence of presidential resolve to reach a solution.

In response, Deng pointed out that the principle of China's sovereignty, enshrined in the Shanghai Communiqué, could not be compromised by any continuing official or unofficial U.S. government relationship with Taiwan. Like Mao and Zhou in earlier meetings he specifically rejected any U.S. continuing role in the defense of Taiwan, even commercial provision of arms. He always added that we "owed China a debt," presumably for our failure to deliver on Nixon's pledge to normalize relations and to compensate China for enhanced risks in its confrontation of the Soviet Union.

While we remained deadlocked with the PRC about the next step of normalization, we proceeded to prepare for it rather systematically within the government. Force withdrawals from bases in Taiwan proceeded on the phased schedule that had been established while I was still in Taiwan. I supervised a careful study, lasting into the Carter Administration, on what Taiwan would need to maintain a "credible" defense effort. We not only surveyed Taiwan's requirements but also identified weapons and equipment that we should and should not supply. With little guidance but clear approval from my superiors, I worked hard to strip away all unessential functions from our civilian and military establishments in Taiwan. Very importantly, I kept the Taiwan authorities informed of our adjusting policy and cautioned them that I was virtually certain we would be switching recognition within the foreseeable future. My main interlocutor was the ROC ambassador, James Shen. I became the senior liaison for the Taiwan Embassy; by this time Kissinger refused all contact with Taiwan officials, and none of my other seniors, including Habib, wanted to hold Taiwan's hand.

Mostly through lunch meetings, I told Shen that official activity would become more and more difficult for Taiwan. I tried to paint as realistic a picture as I could, always asking him to convey my views to Taipei. Once - in 1976, he managed to break through our fence and called on Deputy Secretary Ingersoll for the undeclared purpose of requesting agrement for his successor. Taiwan knew that the future of its embassy in Washington was in doubt. Shen was said to be ailing, and they wanted to put a new ambassador in place before it might be too late. We had no forewarning of this move and were caught by surprise. Ingersoll was non-plussed by the request and looked to me for signals. After flash thinking, I blurted out something along the line: "Mr. Ambassador, you can't do that. We can't agree with your request. You will have to plan on staying here for a while." Ingersoll, following my lead, went on to emphasize the need for realism by Taiwan.

Our answer was very painful for Shen and somewhat insulting to his government, but a shift of Taiwan ambassadors at that point would have caused a real rumpus with the PRC. I was certain Kissinger wouldn't accept a new ambassador from Taiwan, so leaving Shen in place was the best tactic. In this zero-sum game, my attentiveness to PRC sensitivities didn't help my relations with the ROC. After the Ingersoll meeting, I talked to Shen and others, apologizing for a response that I knew was painful for them. In fact, however, Taiwan was a bit too clever. They should have tested the water before trying such a bold ploy, conceivably designed by one of their American lobbyists. In any event, Taiwan left Shen in Washington until the bitter end.

I want to touch on a few other aspects of our China activities. A very important feature of our high level contacts with Chinese leaders was to use the warmth of this relationship as a lever in our dealings with the USSR. We engaged the PRC in a broad range of well advertised discussions. We met frequently at Kissinger's level and once at the summit. There were other high profile sessions with the Chinese, for example, at the UN where I believe Kissinger first met Deng. These sessions were long, comprehensive, and remarkably candid in appearance. I sat through hours and hours of conversation, fortunately, not as the note taker. I had an advantage since I was one of two of us who spoke Chinese.

Although I thought the implicit consequences of our China connection were a useful factor vis a vis the Russians, I felt the overt manipulation of the triangle was overdone. I didn't like the cloyingly friendly, almost worshipful quality of some of our behavior toward the Chinese leaders, especially Mao, Zhou, and to some extent Deng. I could forgive some of this as an understandable pleasure to discover that Chinese Communists weren't so bad after all, and I could indulge a bit of it to keep the Soviets on edge. But I often reacted badly to the display. I thought it denigrated America's importance, and it ground against my conviction that the Chinese needed us as much as we needed them. It really pained me to hear Kissinger describing our policy of containment/detente with the USSR as a combination necessary to satisfy the softies in our own society and among our NATO allies. I did not like his habit of letting the Chinese keep the high ground of inviolable principles or not being rebutted when they spoke of our owing them a debt. I would have liked to hear a more robust defense of our policy, calling a spade a spade and noting our differences and common interests with both China and Russia. It would have worked just as well if not better, and we Americans would have felt better. Although I made these points to Habib and people in Kissinger's inner circle, I never had the opportunity or guts to tell him myself.

Another area where I sometimes parted company with Kissinger was military cooperation with the PRC. On the basis of long experience, I felt instinctively that as competitors for hegemony in Asia we were destined to have serious differences with China, even while trying to maintain the best relationship possible. I didn't oppose some military and intelligence activities with the PRC, but I was generally wary of measures that would militarily strengthen China. I was thinking of the effect on our East Asian allies, on a newly isolated Taiwan, and ultimately on our own armed forces. This applied not only to weapons but also to dual use technology such as advanced computers. The first time I really choked over this issue was on learning that Kissinger had given the British a green light to sell Spey engines (British built engines used in the F-4) to the Chinese to jazz up one of their fighter/bombers. I argued that this wouldn't sit well with the Koreans, Japanese, and certainly not with the Taiwanese. And it didn't. When the Japanese found out they were furious, particularly military officers. Computers were also controversial. In one long debated case I was the only semi-senior official to have objected, but I did object, and in writing. Subsequent history does not make me look bad. However, my problems under Kissinger were puny in comparison to the ill-considered moves we later made under Brzezinski's influence. A few additional comments about Kissinger's China travels. During my first visit with Kissinger back to the land of my birth in the fall of 1974, Deng was very much in charge. The meetings with him were quite fascinating to me if only because they were my first exposure to the process I have just described. Then in 1975 there were two important visits, one a preparatory trip by Kissinger in the early fall and the other by President Ford toward the end of the year. At the time the PRC was undergoing leadership struggles; Mao Zedong was in the final stages of his life as was Zhou En-lai. Deng had already moved to take a leadership role but unbeknownst to us had run into difficulties with Mao and leftist rivals, requiring him to take more cautious positions. The problem was reflected in the foreign ministry which was in a state of flux and less helpful than in the past. And perhaps it played some part in a sophomoric Chinese effort to tweak Kissinger into a more cooperative stance.

Almost coinciding with our delegation's arrival in Beijing we read foreign press stories, dated Beijing, stating that Chinese officials were unhappy with Kissinger's failure to complete the normalization process and that they were going to invite Defense Secretary Schlesinger to visit China to move things along. Kissinger, who saw himself as having earned a very special, if not unique, place in U.S. dealings with China, was furious over this ploy and set about showing the Chinese who was running China policy in the U.S. government. And he did this quite well. Even if he didn't like the treatment of Kissinger, Deng must have known about this petty gamesmanship.

During this preparatory trip, we were trying to get the PRC to agree on a communique announcing Ford's visit, and we wanted to insert some creative language along the lines of the Shanghai communique to fortify it with a sense of incremental progress. Our PRC counterparts understood what we were trying to do, and they didn't want to help us build a half way house to normalization. They wanted a timetable and public commitment. In wording that I slaved over with Dick Solomon of the NSC and Oscar Armstrong, one of our key China officers, we concocted a statement declaring that normalization was our common goal, vaguely implying progress, but lacking any specifics about substance or timing. The PRC didn't like it and was determined to squeeze more out of us. The Chinese in effect told us no communique and no Ford visit were preferable to ratifying our procrastination.

After our sessions with Deng, we had provided the PRC with a draft communique early in the evening, and we hoped they would accept it so we could wrap it up by the next morning. Instead, the Chinese sent us a counter version about midnight. I no longer remember its contents, but it was quite unacceptable. Kissinger called a small group of us to his room, including Habib, Lord, and myself. I remember the infernal quacking machine that was supposed to muffle words enough so they could not be picked up by monitoring devices. This was one of the few times when I felt Kissinger was listening to me carefully. He asked me a series of questions about what I thought the Chinese were up to. He absorbed my answers and seemed to weigh seriously all the points I was making. He even accepted the thrust of my recommendations. For me, this degree of attention was a singular event. I said I thought that the main issue was a political judgment about the importance of the president's visit. Was it critically important, or were we willing to risk its cancellation? Assuming the latter, I explained that cancellation might be even more of a problem for the PRC than for us, and I therefore advocated a hard line, responding to the PRC in the tough manner that they had used with us. I suspected they would eventually become more reasonable. There was a consensus among us to do this so we sent a firm message back and after some dickering the PRC agreed on a compromise statement of some sort.

I was pleased by the outcome. I might add that, personally, I thought cancellation of Ford's visit would have been most unfortunate. Normally I am not a high stakes gambler.

To spite the Chinese for their behavior over the Kissinger communique, we slightly "downgraded" the Ford visit to China by combining it with a stop in Indonesia, theoretically making the Chinese share the limelight with Southeast Asia. Ford's summit sessions with Deng and Mao were not a great turning point in Sino-US relations. They were harmonious but didn't really resolve any of the major outstanding issues. I remember when discussion at the last session with Deng concluded before its allotted time and Deng was about to let people enjoy a few free minutes, Ford embarrassedly urged him to keep talking so as not to provoke media interest.

It was also during the same contentious preparatory visit in the early fall of 1975 that I had my one and only glimpse of Mao Zedong. Perhaps Kissinger included me as a reward, more likely because Habib told him to do so. I remember the Chinese kept us in the dark as to whether any of us would see Mao and when. Even after there was an agreed list and general time, they had us sight-see the Forbidden City, waiting for word from on high. The session, which took place in Mao's study, was substantively questionable, but the symbolism was important to Kissinger, and I was delighted to have a chance to gawk at a man who in his younger days was certainly one of the main figures of the 20th Century.

As we filed in, Mao greeted Secretary and Mrs. Kissinger effusively, grunting a few words in his Hunanese dialect that were translated first by his niece into mandarin and then by Nancy Tang into English. Despite my language ability, I couldn't follow the dialogue, but it seemed rather contrived. One grunt became many coherent English sentences, etc. Not necessarily phony, but surely padded out by Mao's female assistants. By far the most interesting phenomenon was the interplay between Mao and Deng. All other Chinese were reverential and obsequious toward Mao. Not Deng, who, while showing no disrespect, treated Mao as a peer. I couldn't read much into Mao's reaction except that I sensed a distinct lack of fondness. As a "China watcher" I found this intriguing. (After about fifteen minutes of this, most of us were escorted out leaving Kissinger, Ambassador Bush, and Winston Lord to carry on with Mao.)

The Chinese were very effective in their efforts to fence us off from observing their domestic strife. Although we came across occasional nuggets, such as I have just described, we needed far more information to dope out who was doing what to whom with what consequences for our dealings with China. We had virtually no worthwhile intelligence reports and, like the Chinese people, we were forced to rely on clues from the media, such as the anti-Confucius campaign conducted against Zhou and Deng by the leftists, and occasional bits of luck, a process I described at some length in recounting my Hong Kong tour. We speculated about what was going on, and we had some feel for the emerging post-Mao era, but we had little evidence of the rugged struggles going on.

Not long after this glimpse of Mao and Deng, I was back in Beijing for the Ford visit, and instead of going on with the delegation to Jakarta I stayed a few extra days during which I bought a Chinese Communist periodical to read on the plane to Tokyo. I was struck by a prominent article that had the flavor of pieces written just before and during the height of the Cultural Revolution. The article mentioned Deng in unflattering terms completely out of keeping with previous commentaries. I alerted my colleagues in Washington, but we didn't recognize that we had stumbled across pretty clear evidence that Deng was being ousted from his leadership role.

I forgot to mention another of these nuggets of intelligence about what was happening within the Chinese leadership in Mao's declining days. In the spring of 1975 I accompanied the Speaker of the House, Carl Albert, and the Minority Leader, John Rhodes, with their wives on an official visit to China. Although I was experienced with Congressional travel, this visit was exceptionally difficult, because of the Speaker's great fondness for drink as well as a self-centered, provincial American style that he maintained regardless of the occasion. His Chinese hosts let me know that they were offended by his interruption and his monopolizing conversations, mostly to offer anecdotes about minutiae or describe the wonders of the U.S. Constitution. Despite the Minority Leader's noble help, I was not able to prevent Albert's starting off in the same manner with Deng Xiaoping who flushed with anger and seemed about to break off the session. Fortunately, Deng calmed down and then delivered a long exposition on China's need for decades of peace so it could attract foreign investment and develop itself economically through a mixed socialist/market system.

Deng's statement was a much longer and more systematic presentation than we had heard from him in 1974, and it was delivered with a tone of real conviction, probably reflecting the challenges he was encountering from the "Gang of Four." The Speaker, who managed to interrupt Deng two or three times, displayed no interest when I later told him the importance of Deng's message. In fact, none of us appreciated its full significance until Deng was temporarily overwhelmed by the leftist radicals about six months later.

I should clarify my comments about the state of Sino-U.S. relations in the mid-1970s. When I spoke of lack of progress or stalemate, I was referring to the normalization process and our inability to move it forward. We, for domestic political reasons, were reluctant to take the leap, while the PRC was eager to conclude the process. In a broader context, however, our relationship with the PRC was greatly improved; in fact, it was quite solid in some respects, particularly in relation to our mutual concern over the Soviet Union. We were becoming more and more engaged with the PRC. The new relationship allowed us to bring intelligence experts to Beijing to share aerial photography of Soviet deployments. We were talking about using PRC territory to add to our intelligence collection capability. There were times when I thought that we treated the PRC better than Japanese or Korean allies. That bothered me, and I expressed my view to Kissinger, to his displeasure.

There were, of course, problems. For one, there were personality conflicts. As I indicated earlier, the PRC had become somewhat annoyed with Kissinger and his style, and this sometimes affected the atmosphere of meetings. The core problem was Taiwan. The PRC was not buying any of Kissinger's formulations. They repeatedly reaffirmed the language of the Shanghai communique - as far as they were concerned, there was only one interpretation, their interpretation. For us, Taiwan's future security was the most troublesome element. In 1974-76 the PRC showed no flexibility on this issue; it was going to be their way - i.e. no American military relationship after normalization - or nothing at all.

Of course there were problems in addition to Taiwan. Kissinger would have liked a more assertive and confrontational PRC policy toward the Soviet Union. He often made elliptical references to this objective but was never very specific about it. He also tried to involve the PRC in Korea and Vietnam without much success, which was the experience of his predecessors and successors. In fact, the PRC did not help us much, if at all, on Korean matters in those days, and it greatly disappointed Kissinger on Vietnam, playing its own cards in the peace process and substantially aiding North Vietnam's war effort - despite the latter's heavy tilt toward the Soviets.

In turn, the Chinese, who were quite shy of real danger and firmly determined to avoid the risk of serious military conflict with the Soviets, nevertheless wanted the highest possible tension between the Soviets and ourselves short of war. They kept telling Kissinger the Soviets' main target was Europe and ourselves, asking Kissinger why we followed a policy of detente, why we were so interested in arms control agreements when we could have far outmatched the Soviets in military spending, and so on. In the final analysis, neither the PRC nor we managed to alter each other's basic behavior.

I saw Kissinger in action not only on China, but also on Japan and Korea and sometimes Southeast Asia. Clearly, China was the topic of greatest interest to him; I would say that 80 percent of our meetings were on that subject. I mentioned earlier that there were times when I could not get through to the Secretary. For example, it was becoming clear that the Japanese mood was changing from post-war depression to a more normal national pride. This was a most important development for East Asia. While this was going on - and Kissinger was not only aware of it but quite talkative with the Chinese about it - he was fawning over the PRC, talking about the wonders of China's leaders and the greatness of Chinese civilization. Although the Japanese had also made a large mark for themselves and happened to be our allies, they sensed Kissinger was rather dismissive of them. From my own observation, I would agree that neither he nor his staff showed enough responsiveness to Japanese concerns. When the Japanese made reasonable requests for attention, they tended to get short changed in relation to China or West Europeans. Effectively, they were treated as second class citizens, carelessly ridiculed in discussions with the Chinese. If the Japanese ambassador wished to have an appointment with a high level official to discuss a soybean emergency, he would be deflected down to see Habib, whereas we thought nothing of asking the U.S. ambassador in Tokyo to see the foreign minister, or better yet the prime minister, about far less consequential matters. This was upsetting to the Japanese and embarrassing to us. Japan just didn't rank very high on Kissinger's agenda. I thought that Japan was far too important to be treated so cavalierly.

When the PRC normalized relations with Japan in 1972, the two countries side stepped the issue of a treaty of peace, Japan having signed the 1952 San Francisco Peace Treaty with us and 48 other countries, including the Republic of China under Chiang Kai-shek. In the mid 70s, the Chinese successfully pressed Japan to negotiate a treaty of peace and friendship, something that was completely unnecessary from the viewpoint of international law but a favorite gimmick of both the communist hegemonies. The Chinese proved very hard-nosed about the language they wanted to include, particularly a gratuitous reference opposing hegemony that was clearly aimed at the USSR. This was at a time when the Japanese were trying to improve their relations with the Soviet Union, so they resisted the Chinese demand in what was a bilateral squabble over a petty matter. Kissinger sided with the Chinese, although not as brazenly as Brzezinski. To jump ahead for a minute, Brzezinski in 1978 took it upon himself to tell Prime Minister Fukuda that the U.S. did not object to the clause and favored conclusion of the treaty. The Japanese felt cornered and humbled by Brzezinski's simplistic anti-Soviet gamesmanship. In my opinion, it was a needless insult to an ally; the PRC didn't deserve our support for its hypocritical rhetoric denouncing hegemony.

To put it bluntly, I felt our allies in Asia deserved higher priority than they usually got from Kissinger. I feared that treating Japan this way would ultimately provoke a nationalistic reaction, which wouldn't be in our interest - or China's. Although I was outspoken about this, Kissinger and his inner circle seemed indifferent

I have no reason to question that intellectually Kissinger appreciated Japan's importance to us, and I understood his preoccupation with China in relation to the Soviet threat. Even so, I am convinced he could have - and should have - handled the Japanese more skillfully. Apart from time pressures, etc, I suspect he was influenced by Chinese skill in managing (and manipulating) foreigners in contrast to Japanese awkwardness in complex discussion with foreigners.

I remember one important exception to this general tendency; i.e. the Tanaka scandal involving bribery of Prime Minister Tanaka by Lockheed, the American aircraft manufacturer. Kissinger paid close attention to what was happening during the resulting crisis and closed ranks with his fellow conservatives in the LDP. My own reaction, uncharacteristic, since I was usually the voice in the Department defending the Japanese, was that our relations with Japan and Japanese society as a whole might be improved if the Japanese went through a real cleansing, even if that meant that the LDP lost the next election. I favored taking a tough line with the Japanese, but I was overruled by Kissinger who tended to dismiss me as a novice regarding Japan. In this case, Kissinger showed his Metternich tendencies. He did not want to upset the stability of the Japanese political system; he wanted to help the Japanese conservatives - all honorable objectives, and he displayed the proper kind of concern by a secretary of state - even though I disagreed with him. The crunch issue that we wrestled with was the degree of pressure we should apply to the Japanese to get them to reveal the full nature of the scandal. There were prosecutors in both countries who were anxious to nail the perpetrators. Eventually, we went along with the Japanese in a drawn out investigation that nevertheless destroyed the powerful Mr. Tanaka. Not surprisingly, the LDP survived.

In the soybean crisis I mentioned earlier, the Japanese wanted assurances that the supply line would continue. Soybeans were a major US export to Japan. Yet when we had a severe shortage, we embargoed all exports without much consideration being given to Japan and our other steady customers, who were of course furious about our decision. I believe some exceptions were made but no prompt action was taken to help the Japanese. The ultimate effect was a Japanese decision to take control of some of the US business in this country as well as to diversify their procurement to other countries, including China. In this instance and in the second oil crisis in 1974 Kissinger may have sympathized with the Japanese, but he didn't spend any chips on them.

The Japanese ambassador, who was so often given short shrift by Kissinger's staff, was capable and trustworthy. Habib did very well by him and tried to massage his bruised feelings. Less sympathetic persons around the secretary were sometimes not as careful. They explained to the Japanese that Kissinger was a very busy man who had to focus on the Soviet Union and new diplomatic initiatives, such as with the PRC; these were at the heart of U.S. national security and demanding his undivided attention. On other occasions, the Japanese were told via the media that they were being given short shrift because they could not keep secrets. This really offended them, even if it was partially true. The worst insult of all to the Japanese came from those who justified our treatment of Japan by aggressively questioning their standing among other Asians, reminding them, for example, of their colonial exploits and aggression.

Apart from these not very happy memories of Kissinger's involvement with Japan, the East Asian bureau spent a great deal of time dealing with Japan matters, which is what one would expect of such an important country. Much of it was economic in character and related to trade practices that were already a source of serious friction. STR (or its precursor) and Commerce dominated the handling of these issues with Japan, but in those days our bureau and our seventh floor were still able to inject far more foreign policy concern into the battles than they are today. Habib had the chutzpah and fighter qualities to make a difference. Moreover, the bureau benefitted from a strong crew of Japan specialists who knew Japan and treated it with sophistication and sympathy. Although I did my bit as well as I could, the key player was Bill Sherman, our Japan Country Director and senior specialist on the Japanese matters. I was impressed both by his bureaucratic effectiveness and by the way he selected and nurtured the careers of his fellow Japan specialists. Tending loving care from Habib, Sherman, and me took the edge off Japanese resentment over Kissinger's shabby treatment.

My third area of concentration under Habib was Korea where we were faced with a variety of problems: human rights and political governance, nuclear weapons development, U.S. military deployments, and the "Koreagate" bribery scandal. Since I have covered these at some length in my book, Massive Entanglement, Marginal Influence, Carter and Korea in Crisis, Brookings Institution Press, 1999, I will limit my comments here.

Human rights problems and Koreagate were most corrosive in their impact on American attitudes, which shifted in a few years from growing admiration for South Korea's economic leap to dismay over its political repression. In the eyes of many in the church, labor unions, media, and Congress, South Korea had become a political pariah - a favorite target for the bashers. The principal reason was President Park Chung Hee's abrupt, rightward shift in the early 1970s to a regime of political repression. Worried domestically that Kim Dae Jung had almost defeated him in the 1971 election and convinced, almost paranoically, that the U.S. was going to downgrade its commitment to Korea as it had in Vietnam, Park adopted self defense measures. He introduced a harsh new authoritarian constitution and other means to circumscribe political activity, let his cronies kidnap Kim Dae Jung from a Tokyo hotel and almost kill him, authorized an ill-conceived bribery operation among American officials and Congress, began a costly buildup of defense industries, and covertly launched a nuclear weapons program. All but symbolic vestiges of democracy were lost; Park's critics were harassed and jailed; and much of the urban populace was intimidated. The only bright spots were continuing progress in economic and social welfare in rural as well as urban areas. Granting that average citizens were not much affected, the atmosphere was ugly for anyone inclined to criticize Park or protest his regime.

The kidnaping of Kim Dae Jung caught peoples' attention in spectacular fashion. The crudeness and barbarity of Korean intelligence operations in Japan was exposed at great cost to Korea's prestige. Militant foreign missionaries and other human rights activists in Seoul descended on Ambassador Sneider to denounce our support of Park, and in Washington the church, labor unions, and media activated considerably more than the left liberal fringe in the Congress.

Before giving you some miscellaneous recollections about my time with Habib, I want to make a concluding comment about Secretary Kissinger. Along with many of my Foreign Service colleagues who worked for him I found Kissinger very bright, conceptual, politically skillful, decisive, and terribly energetic. There is no question he had much insight about a complex world and a dazzling didactic ability to convey his views persuasively to others. But there was a distinctly negative side to the man that frequently bothered me. He was too inclined toward self adulation as well as mockery and derision of others, particularly those below him in rank, wealth, or brains. More disturbing to me, he was also too comfortable in manipulating people and facts, apparently justifying it by the nobility of the causes to which he was dedicated. When he displayed these characteristics toward hostile groups or opponents I was not too bothered, but when he dealt this way within his own camp, it really jarred my own moral standards. I found it reprehensible. I don't think my reaction was a case of sour grapes. By Kissinger's rugged standards, he generally treated me pretty well as a competent bureaucrat and useful resource person on China. I was given adequate access to sensitive information; and my views were allowed to trickle up to the great man himself or at least into his inner circle.

I must admit that I was never comfortable in Kissinger's presence, and there were times he really annoyed me by arbitrarily singling me out as the person responsible for something that he didn't like. I will never forget an infuriating instance of this. When the last withdrawals of our Air Force contingents on Taiwan were being implemented - a subject that I knew well from working on it in both Taiwan and Washington - I responded to questions from Bernie Gwertzman of the New York Times, carefully hewing to the party line and doing it on a background basis. The same day the Times story appeared, the Christian Science Monitor also printed a fuller story, the source of which I think must have been Kissinger or someone close to him. The Monitor story went beyond the limits we had set on the discussion of this issue, even though it was not a catastrophe, and the thrust - the drive to normalization with the PRC - was correct. In any case, the two newspaper stories got confused in Kissinger's mind or imagination. He accused me of having leaked sensitive information, whereas I hadn't even talked to the Christian Science Monitor. When I learned that Kissinger had the FBI investigating me, I went in fury to see Larry Eagleburger - Kissinger's man who was then the Deputy Under Secretary for Management. I raised hell about what was being done to me - the lie that was being circulated - and after a few days the matter was dropped. The next time I saw Kissinger, I protested angrily. He didn't apologize, more or less laughing off my complaints. I never forgave him for subjecting me to calumny to give cover to the real culprit, who might have been Kissinger himself. Fortunately I didn't have many experiences of that kind, but I saw a lot of it happen to others.

Despite my sharp criticism, I still strike a positive balance in assessing Henry Kissinger as secretary of state. Although it is premature to make a definitive statement about his place in history, he will certainly be regarded as one of the greatest to serve in the 20th Century, considerably more impressive than his peers.

Now for the miscellaneous points. Thinking about Koreagate reminds me of Taiwan's extensive lobbying activity in those days with both the Congress and White House. I felt uncomfortable with those efforts that surely involved money and favors. There was some similarity between Taiwan and Korea on this score, although there was no evidence of direct bribery as in the Korean case. The Taiwan government ran a well oiled operation, less brazen than the notorious "China lobby" of older days but still very generous and often obnoxious in trying to get its way - and complicate our efforts toward normalization of relations with the PRC. Ironically, the Taiwan independence lobby, working separately with different contacts, used similar techniques, resulting in lots of lobbying from the beleaguered island.

Which brings me to intelligence relationships. Habib kept the sensitive part of the process pretty much to himself. He shared information quite liberally, but he was cagey about sources of intelligence and actions he had approved. That was hard on his deputies. Fortunately, we ourselves had pretty good contacts with CIA and knew much of what the head of its East Asia Division was doing. Habib almost always met privately with this man and allowed him to undertake operations that we might not have approved. Most of these concerned Southeast Asia. The result of this compartmentalization was that we deputies had to be careful about where we stepped lest we interfere with an activity already approved by Habib. For example, 1975-76, there was a major drive to reduce the government's overseas presence; it had gotten out of hand during the Vietnam era. The Department was eager to cooperate so long as there was a mechanism to ensure that CIA and the military intelligence agencies took their fair share. We deputies pushed and pushed for the reductions in our various countries of responsibility only to find periodically that Habib was undercutting us.

***

Q: Then in 1976, you were assigned to the National Security Council. How did that come about?

GLEYSTEN: The assignment came from the top. When Dick Solomon was thinking of leaving his China job at the NSC in 1975, there was some pressure on me to replace him. I resisted because it would have narrowed my responsibilities. Other arrangements were made in the NSC, but in 1976 Brent Scowcroft combined China with all of East Asia in a four person unit and personally offered me the job of heading it. Kissinger let me know he wanted me in the NSC, either as a promotion or to get me out of his hair in the Department. I was attracted by the job but not its timing - just before presidential elections. So I temporized. Finally, Larry Eagleburger gave me a boy scout lecture from his perch as the under secretary supervising assignments. In effect, he told me I was under orders from Kissinger to go to the NSC. If I refused, I might find myself banished to some forsaken place. I capitulated and became the senior staff member for East Asia in the NSC around June, 1976.

I had a good relationship with Scowcroft, which was important because, absent that, I would have been miserable. His door was always open to me - even though I sometimes had to wait until 9 p.m. if I needed more than a few minutes of his time. He would always listen carefully and seemed to appreciate my advice. Of course, he got a lot of advice from many quarters - often quite often conflicting. I found that it always helped if Kissinger was leaning the direction in that I wanted to go.

Bill Hyland was the deputy. Colonel Bud McFarland, as the senior assistant, spent a lot of time sifting through the volumes and materials received from the departments and agencies to winnow out the nuggets for Hyland and Scowcroft. This was after the NSC regional and functional staffs had already screened the documents to determine which were important enough to send to the front office with a covering memo and recommendations. The decision on whether to send it on in to the president was Scowcroft's. He and only he decided what was to go to the president and in what form. My memory of the three of them in their cramped quarters in the White House is dominated by the mounds of paper on their desks. I admired Brent for his diligence and intelligence and his centrist approach to foreign affairs. I didn't see enough of the NSC's over-all operations or even my own area long enough to judge the efficiency of Scowcroft's operation. I suspect he should have been more selective and had more assistance from one or two more Hylands. He was always overwhelmed by paper, compensating for covering the waterfront by sacrificing his entire private life.

I had three officers working for me: Alan Romberg (China), Jay Taylor (Korea and Japan) and Ken Quinn (Southeast Asia). My main responsibility was to supervise the work of these three analysts and to serve as Scowcroft's East Asia person.

The issues which are most memorable dealt with Korea, including tree cutting event at the DMZ in August 1976, hardline development in China, and Indochinese refugees.

Let me turn briefly to the PRC. During 1976, Mao Zedong died and was succeeded by his designated successor, a little known regional official named Hua Guofeng. Mao's widow, Jiang Qing, and her radical leftist colleagues seemed to be gaining the upper hand. Deng Xiaoping was harassed and retreated for his life to the south under the wing of Marshal Ye Jianying, a powerful and prestigious military peer of Mao. A hard line seemed ascendant in China. Changes introduced by Zhou En-lai and Deng were suffocated by leftist orthodoxy. In this atmosphere, normalization of US-PRC relations went into a deep freeze. There were no interesting meetings of US and Chinese officials. When Senator Hugh Scott traveled to China and initiated a discussion of normalization, Zhang Chunqiao, the tough communist ideologue from Shanghai, talked of forcibly liberating Taiwan. This left-wing distraction didn't last long thanks to a sudden coup-like strike by the PLA organized by Marshal Ye under the authority of Hua Guofeng. The "gang of four" were arrested, tried, and jailed in a decisive shift in the domestic balance of power that soon brought Deng back into the leadership. Nevertheless, combined with President Ford's inhibitions, the turmoil within China extinguished any thoughts of progress toward normalization before our elections. While things were relatively quiet on the policy front, developments in China remained, of course, a subject of intense high level interest.

***

During a brief six months in the NSC I was not involved enough with President Ford to develop any feel for his personal views. In fact, I had a better understanding of where his administration wanted to go on China when I was in the Department. However, my tour gave me some appreciation of how the making of foreign policy looked from the perspective of the national security advisor. I had quite a few conversations with Scowcroft during which he shared his views quite candidly. I got a sense of how the State Department "sausage factory" looked to others, and I observed the inter-agency battles with some detachment. My sense of how the NSC functioned was somewhat skewed, since Secretary of State Kissinger was so dominant in the administration.

***

Q: In January 1977 you moved back to your old office at the State Department. How did this come about and what happened in EA?

In early January, before inauguration, Dick arranged for us to see Vance, whom I had gotten to know superficially at a variety of long weekend conferences on foreign policy chaired by Harriman. We focused on China, which we discussed at length, and we also talked about Korea, particularly about troop withdrawal. Vance and Holbrooke sought my perspective both as a specialist and person familiar with recent dealings. I felt comfortable with discussion; Vance was very positive about moving promptly to normalize relations with China, and he agreed that Carter's plans on troop withdrawal could not go ahead without careful advance study of the consequences in Korea and East Asia generally.

For the China papers, Thayer in turn assembled some extremely talented staff members, including Alan Romberg from S/P and Stapleton Roy from the desk. Working directly with the drafting officers, I supervised the design and review phases of the paper writing. I was proud of the product in most cases, although we had our share of monstrosities.

By far the most important papers in the first few months of Vance's leadership were on China and Korea. All we had tried to do on China while I was in the NSC was to ride out the political storm in the PRC and await our own presidential election. By the end of the 1976 there more and more indications that Deng Xiaoping was returning to power presumably with the policies he had espoused before his downfall, and with a new president, we were finally hopeful we could soon move ahead with a major effort toward full normalization of relations. Yet there was still much doubt. For all the rhetoric about wanting progress on China, I was far from sure that Carter was really going to move. The 1976 election was not a referendum on our China policy; China was not even an election issue.

In our first meeting I made clear to Vance and Holbrooke that I had long favored normalization. Acknowledging that China had been very difficult in 1976, I suggested there was again hope for progress if Deng continued his climb back to power. I urged that we test the waters in a systematic way to see whether there was any reciprocal interest in the PRC. The crunch problem was Taiwan, which obviously had to be handled with great care. I remember putting very heavy stress on two points. One was my personal view that Taiwan would definitely survive the strain of de-recognition. Its economic progress and easing political constraints would provide a helpful buffer. The second was my conviction that we would do better with both the Chinese and Soviets if we "played it straight," letting each know that we were dealing with the other because of common interests and acknowledging to both we had important disagreements with both. In effect, I questioned the benefit to us of Kissinger's implicit tilt toward China. Vance seemed positive on all these points, perhaps overly so regarding the second one. In the name of an even hand, I later discovered, he at least subconsciously rated arms control issues with the USSR more important than moving briskly on normalization.

Since Vance, Brzezinski, and many others have discussed how the Carter Administration went about normalization, I will limit my comments mostly to main impressions. Vance had us prepare a memorandum from him to the President arguing the case for moving ahead with the PRC. In an effort to engender State/NSC collaboration we brought Oksenberg fully into the process, even though we assumed he was privately doing something parallel for Brzezinski. As part of the effort we reviewed the quite complete files that Kissinger had left us. They were kept in my office after being turned over to us by Winston Lord. Oksenberg, completely new to this material, was the most eager reader. Of course, the files contained vital information, including the pledges made by Nixon, Kissinger, and Ford, but not the bombshells suspected by some of the new people. The record showed clearly why the PRC had reacted negatively to some of our policies. The Chinese felt that they had been led down a garden path on prompt normalization and resented it.

I thought we did well by Vance, producing a document for the president making the case for normalization in terms that I found more accurate and persuasive than some of the rhetoric from the Nixon period. None of us knew Carter's real intentions. He had spoken publicly in favor of normalization - almost every one had, and he had privately told Vance he was serious about moving ahead. In any event, after reading the paper, the president convened a meeting in the spring of 1977 that was attended by Vance, Habib, Holbrooke and me from the Department, Brzezinski and Oksenberg from the NSC, and, I believe, Harold Brown. Carter gave us a little homily about normalization and his support for it. I was then excused while the others remained to discuss modalities. I still wasn't sure that Carter was determined to push forward, but I was glad that he spoke as he had.

As a result of this session we were charged with producing a paper, PRM 24, on the specifics of normalization. Vance's interest in the China issue was then at its height. Preparation of this blueprint was time consuming. The paper was very thorough and covered all the issues. Like the earlier paper, it reflected the view that our China policy should not be governed simply by anti-Soviet considerations, but by a more comprehensive view of strategic interests, including, of course, our need to counter the Soviet threat. Vance soon became a missionary for this argument, which suited him as he negotiated SALT and other issues with the Soviets. The paper also reflected my concern to minimize the damage to Taiwan that would be the price of normalization. This led to some controversy later. At the outset, every one agreed that we had to be careful about Taiwan, since we had a lot at stake there and would have the world watching to see how we dealt with an ally. I probably had the most intense feeling about this issue, being the only one of us to have served in Taiwan, but I didn't find much quarrel with my position. I was certain Vance would not be a party to any deal undermining Taiwan.

PRM 24 was completed some time in June 1977. Again, I was not included in the deliberations with the President that resulted in the decision to send Secretary Vance to Beijing in August 1977. The accounts in Vance's and Brzezinski's memoirs more or less confirm what I remember being told at the time: Carter's commitment to pursue normalization was clear, but not the priority he would accord it. Vance wanted to get the Panama issue out of the way before facing the Congress with the consequences for Taiwan of normalization with the PRC. He also wanted parallel progress on Soviet issues. Thus, although he was determined to get started, he was in not in a great hurry to complete the process. At this early stage Brzezinski favored pushing ahead with normalization, but given his concern about the Soviets, he was even more interested in reaffirming and underscoring the tilt toward China symbolized by the Shanghai Communiqué - as was Secretary Brown. Faced with this complex of concerns, President Carter declared himself resolved to carry through with normalization, and he approved a draft communiqué to this effect that Vance could use if he achieved enough progress in Beijing. At the same time, however, Carter opted for a negotiating tactic that flawed the Vance mission to China.

Based in part on the results of extensive consultation with Congress, much of it conducted by Holbrooke, the President decided for domestic political reasons that we should try to get Chinese acceptance of a recognition formula that would improve on the Japanese model, allowing us to retain an unofficial US governmental presence on Taiwan in the form of a consulate or liaison mission. We were to argue with the PRC that a governmental but unofficial presence of some kind in Taiwan was a practical necessity for us because of our extensive involvement in Taiwan, and that this presence would in no way constitute continuing diplomatic recognition of the Taiwan regime. If the Chinese rejected this scheme, it was my clear understanding that we would then fall back to the Japanese formula of no governmental representation. As I recall, I favored authority to retreat quickly to the Japanese formula, since I had personally witnessed Deng Xiaoping slap down Kissinger's effort to do virtually the same thing in 1974. Nevertheless, having accompanied Holbrooke on most of his consultations on the Hill, I more or less accepted the domestic political rationale of trying to improve on the Japanese formula to ease widespread anxiety about switching recognition from the ROC to the PRC. Whatever may have been said later in self justification, none of us at the time - specifically including Brzezinski and Oksenberg — saw the tactic as a deal breaker so long as we handled it carefully. Unfortunately, circumstances during and immediately after the Vance trip made it appear that Vance had naively sought a better deal for Taiwan than we could have realistically expected, causing a major setback in the normalization process.

In his first meeting in Beijing with Foreign Minister Huang Hua, Secretary Vance made a very systematic presentation of our position, including the points about a governmental presence on Taiwan, peaceful resolution of the unification issue, and limited defensive arms transfers to Taiwan. Hua's response the next day was negative, and during a subsequent session Deng characterized Vance's position as a retreat from the Shanghai communiqué. Although Vance stressed that his proposals were a starting point for discussion, he did not offer any immediate sign of flexibility. The Chinese, whose appetites had been whetted by the Carter Administration's rhetoric and reaffirmation of Nixon policy, were clearly disappointed. Yet this was hardly the first time they had faced tough American negotiators, and they displayed no hostility. The Chinese treated us in the same normally friendly fashion they accorded to important U.S. visitors. For our part, we were quite aware that if we wanted to succeed we would have to yield on the representation issue, and we left Beijing feeling that we had begun a dialogue on a very difficult process. This was the tone of the very objective report we sent back to the White House.

As we were leaving our Tokyo stopover on our way back to Washington, you can imagine how stunned we were to learn that a Hearst correspondent (Wallach) claimed that members of the NSC told him they saw "progress" in Vance's discussions in Beijing, quite at odds with what Vance had actually reported. Regardless of who said what to whom in Washington press circles, this story, which made us look like fools or deceptive manipulators of the press, infuriated the Chinese who issued a prompt denial. Some days later Deng himself publicly characterized the Vance position as a setback to progress.

As one of the drafters of Vance's report to the White House, I shared Vance's anger over this Washington interpretation - so much so that I half convinced myself that Brzezinski must have been the source and deliberately set Vance up for a fall. Although this was probably unfair of me, it was symptomatic of the uncomfortable relationship that had already developed by this time between the NSC and ourselves. In any event, based on my observation of many previous conversations with Chinese leaders, I thought Vance was competent in his presentation of our initial position on normalization. Even though he was not as polished or as free wheeling as Kissinger, he also conveyed clearly that the administration was adopting a sophisticated mixture of firmness and flexibility to deal with the Soviet threat. To be sure, the Chinese were not thrilled to learn of a U.S. view that placed the PRC as only one of several special American concerns. Vance made that point quite skillfully, and it was an important message for the PRC to hear. My main criticism of Vance's performance was his failure to signal more clearly that we were prepared to compromise regarding our future presence in Taiwan, but even so, I assumed the Chinese knew we would eventually retreat. In short, I fully expected another round of talks and some progress toward compromise. And this might have occurred sooner if the U.S. Government had been able to keep its big mouth shut.

Our first move on the normalization chess board was clumsy. The bar for the Taiwan jump was set unrealistically high; we underestimated the damage of overloading the administration's first negotiating contact with Deng; and in striking contrast to Kissinger, we screwed up in briefing our own press. Obviously there was no collusion between Deng and Brzezinski, but each for his own reasons decided to categorize the Vance trip as a "failure." This somewhat unfair judgment prevails today.

The unhappy outcome of the Vance visit to China did not smother expectations for progress on the China front, and we continued busying ourselves with our growing contacts with the PRC, holding Taiwan's hand, and conducting studies about various aspects of normalization. Among these I have already mentioned the very careful examination we made of arms transfers to Taiwan, trying to determine the kinds of defensive weapons Taiwan needed to maintain a "credible deterrent" against a PRC attack, which at those days was not a great danger. Although there was some effort on the part of our military to provide Taiwan with unnecessary items, the study for the most part was an objective one and served as a guideline for our behavior even before normalization. Another important study was the legal aspect of abrogating or renouncing the security treaty with the ROC. This was a complicated matter of special interest to Secretary Vance, and it was not completed before I left the scene to go to Korea.

By the spring of 1978, it was apparent that Soviet policy had taken an aggressive turn in many parts of the world - i.e. the Horn of Africa, Angola, Afghanistan, etc.. Our new friends in China and Americans such as Brzezinski were quick to recognize and perhaps exaggerate this, but many others without such a pronounced animus against the Russians also sensed the hard line and saw the need for somewhat tougher policies. Vested interests burst into action - variously favoring a big buildup in defense, a tough line across the board with the Soviets, playing the China card in new games, etc.. Vance - and even more the President - seemed slow in facing up to this phase of Soviet policy, partly perhaps because they were so committed to a more hopeful prognosis about detente with the USSR. Of course, both men eventually accepted the facts. Carter swung around quite far toward Brzezinski's position. While not sharing Carter's previous naivete about the USSR, Vance also had to toughen his position. Yet he seemed distinctly reluctant and clearly uncomfortable with the tactics of flamboyant confrontation and games playing that were so elemental in Brzezinski's style.

Whatever the reason, Vance appeared a bit soft in confronting the new twist in Soviet behavior, and this worked in Brzezinski's favor. Even though Vance had far more prestige and clout in the Administration and Congress, Brzezinski's posture was more appealing and popular in the Cold War atmosphere of the time. He denounced the Russians and simplified the world into a black and white picture of zero-sum games. He wouldn't, for example, mention Vietnam without adding the prefix "Soviet proxy."

Vance and Brzezinski didn't have major differences over normalization with China, but their differing approaches did affect the debate about many other aspects of our dealings with China. In the struggle I felt Vance did not exert himself when he should have, and I winced as Brzezinski took advantage of this and sought to emulate Kissinger in his NSC days. He began to invite the PRC ambassador to his office for chats - without telling the secretary of State. He maneuvered the president into making important decisions without Vance's participation. It had become obvious to many that the secretary of State and the NSC advisor did not get along. They were very unlike and saw the world through different prisms.

This high level friction accumulated to become a serious impediment to objective treatment of important questions, such as security relations with the PRC, the conduct of Brzezinski's visit to China, and relations with Vietnam. In dealing with these matters I usually found myself in the middle, but nearer to Vance's side. On the security issue, Brzezinski wanted to flaunt our China card in front of the Russians, using various devices to underscore our potential for altering the strategic balance between the Russians and Chinese. Effectively, he favored an explicit tilt toward the PRC, symbolized by a visit of the secretary of Defense to China (fortunately delayed until after normalization), close intelligence cooperation, military contacts, relaxed controls on dual-use technology, tolerance of allied military sales, and possibly even military assistance in limited areas of defense. Brzezinski calculated that the Soviets could be bullied this way into a more cooperative posture, while Vance worried that some of these actions would only antagonize the Russians, stimulating the arms race and damaging prospects for detente in addition to worrying many of our allies. From my less exalted level, I shared Vance's concerns, but I felt we should energetically counter Soviet behavior - mostly by ensuring our own military superiority and trying promptly to normalize our relations with the PRC. Both of these sober actions would convey the right strategic message to the Soviets without the cost the explicit tilt in security.

As I noted earlier I did not object to some forms of military and intelligence cooperation with China, but I was strongly, outspokenly opposed to military assistance to the PRC. My problems began in the previous administration with our approval of British military sales, but in this earlier period the limited measures proposed were conceived as compromises with our allies and China, not pieces of a grand scheme to encircle the Soviet empire. Initially I thought Brzezinski was going to continue Kissinger's cautious approach, but in early 1978 Mike Oksenberg began trying out ideas on me that I found alarming.

Reflecting his boss, Oksenberg talked not only of our interest in a "stable, prosperous, and friendly" China but also a "strong" China, and he acknowledged that this might mean possible military assistance to China by our allies or even ourselves. Apart from the questionable effect on Soviet policy, I argued that China's Asian neighbors would be appalled by such action, which would also make Taiwan's defense more complicated. But even more important, the concept failed to take account of the prospect that at some future point US and PRC interest might well clash. This consideration seems pedestrian in today's climate, but in those days the intellectual infection of US-PRC military collaboration spread from NSC whizz kids to significant numbers of sensible people in the defense community as well as less sensible persons with various axes to grind.

My recollection is that Vance and I were among the most cautious on security assistance to the PRC, and as a practical matter during Vance's tenure military activities with China were minimized. Later, several foolish decisions were made by the Carter and Reagan administrations, particularly help to the Chinese with the avionics for their F-8 fighter bomber. To put it bluntly: Brzezinski was an ignoramus on East Asia in general; Oksenberg was very savvy about China but not about its neighbors; and neither man paid enough attention to their colleague, Mike Armacost, who was both very expert on East Asia and to our own bureaucracy.

Although I was only briefly and peripherally involved, policy toward Vietnam was another example of how antagonism between State and the NSC complicated an already complicated situation. Like President Ford, President Carter did not feel legally bound by the Kissinger era agreement to aid Vietnam in the post-war period. Vietnamese failure to comply with key provisions of the Paris settlement provided ample grounds to refuse, and Americans generally were lukewarm or opposed to relations with such a recent enemy. However, both the President and Vance as well as a bi-partisan minority in Congress favored normalization of relations with Vietnam and gave the issue considerable priority. I am not sure why. Perhaps it reflected the need for expiation among some who served in the new administration. In any event Leonard Woodcock, former president of the UAW and later Ambassador to China, was promptly dispatched to Vietnam on a fact finding mission, and his favorable report was the trigger for an effort toward normalization that was to last twenty years.

While I had no burning sense of sin about our actions in the war, I too favored a rapprochement with Vietnam. Partly this was my standard reaction of wanting to deal with all significant governments that were effectively in power; partly it was a feeling that it would be smart to try to encourage Vietnam away from its steadily increasing dependence on the Soviet Union. Treating Vietnam as a pariah and Soviet proxy in the style of Brzezinski struck me as satisfying Chinese, not US national interests. To be sure, if I had been forced to choose, I would have given priority to moving ahead with China. Although Vance and Holbrooke shared these opinions and pushed negotiations with Vietnam near to success, ultimately they were unable to prevent the issue from being mired down in an ideological debate and questionable reasoning on our part. Brzezinski won the battle over whether we could risk normalizing with Vietnam in the midst of trying to do the same with the PRC. Effectively, we pulled back and halted the process with Vietnam.

Vietnam's invasion of Cambodia obscured the error of our ways. While this crude Vietnamese action took place after I moved on to Seoul, I was still in Washington while the bloody Khmer Rouge took over Cambodia and began their aggressive border incursions against Vietnam. If the Vietnamese in response had limited themselves to punishing counterstrikes, history might have taken quite a different turn, but when they went on to occupy most of the country and establish an alternative government under Hun Sen, they blighted prospects for an early opening to the non-communist world. We adopted hostile policies that helped push Vietnam further and further into the Soviet camp. In late 1978, early 1979, I was amazed to learn in Seoul that Brzezinski had given the Chinese a virtual green light to "teach a lesson" to the Vietnamese by a limited military strike and again later when we joined the Chinese and some ASEAN countries in a loose cooperation with the Khmer Rouge against the Vietnamese and Hun Sen. Perhaps if I had held some responsibility in Washington, I might have felt differently, but I doubt it. After my retirement I spent many hours over many years arguing with former colleagues for a more sensible policy toward Vietnam.

The third issue I want to mention was the most unpleasant for me and my colleagues in the State Department, namely the NSC's preemption of the core negotiations with the PRC on normalization. As it became increasingly transparent that Vance and Brzezinski were vying with each other for presidential support and control of strategy toward the USSR, PRC officials began to play games with us, as they had done before. Sensing that Brzezinski was eager to put US-PRC cooperation high on the US policy agenda as an anti-Soviet strategy, they welcomed a dialogue with him beginning in the fall of 1977. Through Oksenberg, Holbrooke and I were more or less aware of the NSC advisor's contacts with the Chinese, but we were never consulted. In his memoirs Brzezinski claimed that "Holbrooke and his State Department colleagues looked increasingly to the White House for leadership," because Vance was preoccupied with other matters. This is a shameless distortion of the facts: Brzezinski knew damn well that Holbrooke and I were struggling to prevent him from usurping what we believed to be the State Department's proper function. Anyway, Brzezinski had no trouble soliciting a Chinese invitation to visit Beijing, which was publicized along with Brzezinski's courteous acceptance in November, triggering a fight with Vance, Habib, and Holbrooke, who recognized it as a power play and immediately opposed it. During the next few months Brzezinski used his proximity to his boss to lobby Carter into approval of a visit, while Vance struggled to head him off or instead to have Vice President Mondale be the emissary to China. Brzezinski won the battle in March, reflecting a major set back in Vance's standing with Carter.

Under presidential instructions, we began preparations for a Brzezinski trip to China. This time the process was centered in the NSC with only the minimum necessary help from the State Department - and sometimes not even that. The formal decision making process was relatively proper. Whatever reservations Vance may have had regarding complications in his dealings with the Soviets, the State Department strongly supported a major push by Brzezinski toward normalization, and we were delighted when the president instructed Brzezinski to tell the Chinese that "the United States has made up its mind." Thus Brzezinski was authorized to agree to the Japanese formula of no U.S. governmental presence in Taiwan, although on security matters he was still instructed to stress our insistence on a peaceful resolution of the Taiwan problem and our intention to provide defensive arms to the island. These terms constituted our best shot to achieve success on an acceptable basis, and we all supported them without qualification. Speaking for myself, I also had little trouble with the way Brzezinski planned to underscore the vigor of our response to expansionist Soviet policies, even though I was openly unenthusiastic about his plan to take along a number of senior advisors to be publicly cozy with Chinese counterparts on matters of strategy, military intelligence, science and technology, and economics.

Despite this substantial consensus about the national security advisor's instructions for Beijing, the NSC had effectively cut State out of the policy development process. Essentially, Brzezinski and Oksenberg developed positions secretly, obtained the President's concurrence, and then presented them to Vance and us as a fait accompli. I suspect the NSC had some pangs of conscience about deflecting the bureaucracy from giving them the benefit of its judgment, because Oksenberg got permission employ a CIA analyst as a secret advisor. The person he selected was a good friend of mine - feisty and imaginative, but not someone I would rely on for balanced opinions.

To some extent my role also breached the NSC's iron curtain around preparations. Although I was kept well away from the inner deliberative process within the White House, Brzezinski and Oksenberg needed someone such as me to vet key papers and critique their ideas. Very transparently, they also enjoyed using me as a semi-legitimate way of cutting out Holbrooke - and infuriating him. Despite my resentment, I in turn felt it was my duty as a senior career officer to try to insinuate State Department views in ways that would make the visit as successful as possible. On many occasions I was asked by Oksenberg for comments about papers, but I was never allowed to keep a copy, and I was always enjoined "not to tell Holbrooke." While always taking advantage of the opportunity to comment, I made clear that I strongly disapproved of our not being given copies and would keep Holbrooke informed. Each time I immediately reported back to Holbrooke who always hit the ceiling. However, sore as he was over this manipulative abuse, Holbrooke to his credit never tried to stop me from my rather truculent cooperation with the NSC.

As the time approached for Brzezinski's visit in May 1978 our problems became even more excruciating. The State Department had to fight to get Holbrooke and me onto Brzezinski's delegation as the State Department contingent. On the plane Oksenberg conspiratorially pulled me aside to ask me to review Brzezinski's talking points, which I did with Brzezinski himself, and I insisted they be shown to Dick. Initially they were not and other papers were treated the same way - to the point that I refused any further cooperation. Holbrooke was finally shown the papers.

Matters did not improve after we arrived in Beijing. To note the positive first, Brzezinski was able to achieve the beginnings of a breakthrough on normalization - as Vance conceivably might have a year earlier if he had the same instructions. Moreover, with the exception of some childish anti-Soviet pranks in public, Brzezinski conducted himself skillfully. On normalization, he effectively conveyed Carter's readiness to move promptly, resolved the issue of unofficial US representation on Taiwan without much trouble, made very clear to Deng that we did not want to be contradicted in our public insistence that the Taiwan issue be resolved peacefully, and signaled indirectly that we would need to provide limited defensive arms to Taiwan during a historical transition period. Deng's failure to denounce this latter point as a violation of the Shanghai Communique, etc. struck me as a possible break through, and I immediately said so to Brzezinski when I read the transcript of the session. Although I was less impressed by Brzezinski's customary anti-Soviet rhetoric, I liked his robust defense of our policy toward the USSR and his asking Deng to stop publicly berating us when we had enforced the balance of power so effectively for so many years. I felt this pugnacious point was a considerable improvement over Kissinger's normal response.

In other respects, however, Brzezinski's behavior was outrageous, particularly his delight in humiliating Holbrooke and the State Department both in private and public - behavior that would have been unimaginable for his Chinese hosts, who of course took careful note of this gratuitous advertisement of strains within the American camp. Although I seriously fault Holbrooke for his part in this battle of egos, Brzezinski was the instigator, and to this day I consider his conduct a national disgrace.

Holbrooke and I were included in the lower level meetings in Beijing as well as the brief greeting sessions with Deng Xiaoping and Hua Guofeng, but we were ostentatiously excluded from the key meetings with these leaders, a very clear break in our practice since 1973. Given my blunt, almost violent argument with him about the importance of having State Department representation at these sessions, I was naturally angered to read a few years later in Brzezinski's memoirs that "other members of the delegation accepted this restriction, except for Holbrooke, who made a great issue of personal privilege out of his exclusion." On the plane on the way home, resentments boiled over. Once again I, but not Holbrooke, had been allowed to read the memoranda of conversation, and once again I had demanded they be shown to Holbrooke. They eventually were but not before a disgusting shouting match among all of us and the threat of a school yard physical battle between Holbrooke and Oksenberg. It was awful, probably the nadir of my bureaucratic experience.

Despite the clash of two powerful egos, I never fully understood why two very intelligent people behaved as Brzezinski and Holbrooke did. It may not have done much serious damage to US foreign policy, but it certainly didn't help the cause. To show how personal it was, I might note that I am fairly sure that if the NSC could have invited me to attend those meetings without Holbrooke, they would have done so. It didn't help matters that Ambassador Woodcock was included in all of the meetings with Chinese leaders, because he was playing along with Brzezinski; getting his instructions from the NSC, not the State Department. Fortunately, records of all the meetings became available to us, and I always felt that they accurately reflected what had happened. I am not sure that I would have had the same confidence in Nixon's NSC apparatus.

The net effect of this strain within the administration, when added to the hard line taken by the Soviets and our own tough reaction to it, was to take us back toward the simplistic bipolar world where the line was "let's be good to the PRC as a way of putting pressure on the Soviet Union." This suited the Chinese, because it gave them leverage in their dealings with us. Furthermore, we had a secretary of State in these circumstances who was sensible, judicious, and a real gentleman, but not very adept in the ugly kind of infighting that took place under our Christian leader, Jimmy Carter. After the struggle, the NSC became the real manager of our relations with the PRC, even though most of the expertise was in the Department of State. I thought it was a risky way to conduct policy.

After the end of the Brzezinski trip, I wrote him a memorandum, giving him my evaluation of the visit and criticizing our treatment. At the time I felt I was being pretty hard on him, but on re-reading the memo a few years ago, I found it too polite. I did compliment him on the outcome of the Taiwan discussion with Deng, stating the visit was more successful than I had anticipated. Of course, I gave Vance and Holbrooke copies of my memorandum.

All this happened in the last few months of my tour in Washington. Just before leaving for Korea, I also wrote a long polite memorandum to Vance that temporarily strained our relationship. As objectively as I could, I discussed where we stood with the PRC - the pluses and the minuses. I praised his role in the development of our policy towards the PRC; pointed out that the Brzezinski visit might well prove to be the breakthrough for us; criticized the way we were being pushed around by the NSC; and urged that Vance insert himself back in firmly with the President. In my memorandum I asked for an appointment, which he granted. We had a very frank private conversation during which I re-emphasized the need for him to take firm hold of the reins of foreign policy. Of course, I was being presumptuous. I was emboldened to do what I did by the power of my feelings, and I am sure Vance got the same advice from many others. He listened to me in obvious pain, made no comment, and changed the subject.

Finally on the PRC, I have two thoughts. First, I thought then and still believe today that our policy toward China was essentially balanced. During the first phase of our rapprochement with China, I felt we could have done better by Taiwan, but by the time of the Carter Administration I was convinced we were doing everything possible for Taiwan short of calling a halt to the entire process with the PRC. I definitely favored going ahead on the terms set out during the Brzezinski visit, and I am convinced the ambiguity of the agreement with the PRC concerning Taiwan security was the best we could do. In other words, I have no apologies.

Second, far less important and somewhat contradictory to what I have just said, I feel we might have done slightly better by Congress and Taiwan in the very final phase. Despite the dangers, it was a mistake not to keep the Congress better informed. The backlash was Congress's revision of the Taiwan Relations Act in ways that significantly reduced our flexibility. Similarly, Taiwan deserved more notice than it was given, and I suspect we could have adopted slightly more favorable arrangements for practical contact with Taiwan, obviating some of our later troubles with visitors from Taiwan. We might have been able to get away with the practices of Singapore and other Southeast Asian countries. Be that as it may, when Christopher went to Taipei to work out the final arrangements for the future, the Taiwanese really took after him - they were very nasty. I understood their ire, and, if I had been a Taiwanese, I would probably have done the same. I am not suggesting that the outcome would necessarily have been better if I had remained in the DAS position in Washington, but I think I would have opposed some of the self-depriving provisions that were finally adopted by persons less sensitive to Taiwan than I.

***

I frequently faced Christopher and Derian together, Derian as the prosecutor, Christopher as her sympathetic judge, and I as the defense attorney for the offending Asian countries. In some of these situations I could have used more help from Vance and Holbrooke. East Asia was by no means the only area of concern to our human rights activists. Most of Africa and the Communist world was off limits for a variety of reasons. The Middle East as well as Central and South America got their share of attention, but East Asia seemed to have a special fascination. In part because of the international church network, Korea's sins, for example, were a steady target. Derian also focused on the Philippines, Taiwan, and Indonesia. The PRC was exempted, largely because of our normalization effort but also because the prospect for human rights progress in China was close to zero.

***

I have two final comments focused less directly on the Foreign Service. First, I am grateful that fate exposed me to some important aspects of world history in the making, particularly China. China has undergone huge change in my lifetime, and I had an unusual degree of exposure to this from many vantage points. As I have stated repeatedly in this account, I was critical about how long it took us to face up to realities. Needless to say, I was fascinated to be part of the process that finally broke through the forces of resistance. In the 1970s I hoped that the Nixon experience would open up a sustained new era with China; in fact it did, but US policy toward China remains peculiarly vulnerable to shifts in the political winds - romantic surges of absorption with things Chinese followed by displays of hostility toward China.

I have watched these swings all my life, beginning with my missionary parents in Beijing. I don't know why is it so difficult for us to have a steady relationship with China, reflecting a sensible consensus about what is important and what is less important in dealings between two large nations entangled by history. Driven by domestic forces, we spend too much time on Tibet, human rights, and Chinese domestic practices that are beyond our power to change. In the process we often obscure the importance of security, political, and economic considerations that call for our engagement with China - even when China is being very difficult.

STAN IFSHIN
Chinese Language Training
Washington, DC (1971-1972)

Chinese Language Training
Tai Chung, Taiwan (1972-1973)

Bureau of Intelligence and Research, China Analyst
Washington, DC (1978-1980)

American Institute in Taiwan, Commercial Officer
Taipei, Taiwan (1980-198?)

Mr. Ifshin was born in Brooklyn, New York in 1942 and graduated from John

Hopkins University. He entered the Foreign Service in 1967. He has served in numerous posts including Saigon, Taiwan, Kuala Lumpur, Jakarta and Philippines. He was interviewed by David Reuther in 2001.

IFSHIN: When I studied Chinese, that was always a big thing to go out to the Chinese restaurants together and try the various kinds of Chinese cuisine. I don't remember that being an issue in Vietnamese language training. We were more concerned about learning how to say give me that rocket launcher, or I'm a French journalist. There was certain vocabulary we concentrated on.

Q: While you were in language training there though, Tet appears on the scene, didn't it?

IFSHIN: Yes, and that was a big shocker. I can't remember if it was Henry Cabot Lodge who met with us. He was of course the U.S. ambassador at the time. He came and spoke to us at the training center, and a number of other people came and spoke to us. Let me mention one thing, this is sort of retreating. In CORDS, we were on loan from the State Department to AID (Agency for International Development), who then in turn loaned us to the military. And when all the other members of my A100 class went off for consular training, those of us who were going through the CORDS program went off to some sort of an AID training program, which was truly one of the most colossal wastes of time I've ever been through, and I've been through a lot of wastes of time, but this was one of the prize ones.

Q: What did they cover, how to fill out forms?

IFSHIN: I can't remember now, it's been a long time. But we were really silly. Those of us who were State Department officers assigned to the program made ourselves really obnoxious. I can see why people don't like foreign service officers.

Q: Well, at this point, what did you understand about CORDS, because CORDS in fact has already undergone a number of changes. It didn't become CORDS until '67 I believe. It wasn't an AID program until Comer made it CORDS in '67.

IFSHIN: Right. Well, it was something that was undergoing change. Dick Holbrook had actually met with our A100 class, it wasn't our Vietnam training center. He was one of the young officers who had gone through a precursor type program where he had something to do in the provinces. He explained it to us how career enhancing it would all be for us and what a great opportunity it was and how exciting it was.

Q: He quit two years later. [laughter]

IFSHIN: Yes, I think we all recognized at the time that this is a bunch of bs, but we listened politely. We were young, and young people tended to be more polite to their elders in those days. In any case, returning to the Vietnam training center, we got area studies and lectures about the overall strategies and what was involved in the war, but basically it was language studies more than anything else.

Q: That something's coming down the line. So from this office, you are calling people at night, you're calling the desks during the day, you are making sure everybody is linked up.

IFSHIN: Right.

Q: Basically.

IFSHIN: The last half of that assignment, I was an editor. The job of the editor was to take his selection of the most important cables that had come in during a 12-hour period, both before he came on duty and during the time he was on duty, and do a summary of those cables for the secretary. This was not an unimportant thing because it was your opportunity to draw cables to the secretary's attention. And I don't want to talk invidiously about anyone, but particularly at this time when William Rogers was Secretary of State, I think he did not read a whole lot, so having this opportunity to draw cables to his attention was very important.

My great triumph on this job, that is when I was editor, is that I was on duty when the cable came in that the Chinese, the PRC, had invited the U.S. table tennis team, which was then in Japan, to visit China. I did a item in which I started out saying, Ping, Pong-China Calling, and then went on from there. I worked in the egregious pun about tabling tenets Communism, but people talked about that for a long time after I wrote it. [laughter] I had a lot of fun there.

Q: So this office is, as it's watching the world, is another platform for bring to the highest levels of the State Department various pieces of information and trends.

IFSHIN: Well, at this point in my career, I had no idea about the CIA's daily intelligence report, and I didn't know that INR is doing the same sorts of things. But this was the State

Q: They didn't have CNN in those days.

IFSHIN: Yes. It was an interesting thing that happened. This was the period of the war of attrition along the Suez Canal, and it was the occasion where the Israeli's shot down a number of Soviet pilots, although they were ostensibly Egyptians, but they were actually Soviets who were flying the planes. And that of course caused a great deal of interest and excitement at the time. I think they subsequently did away with that position.

Q: The state position over at the Pentagon command center.

IFSHIN: Yes, it didn't really amount to a whole lot. I remember on one occasion I found a NODIS cable that had gone into general circulation and I had to make an effort to recall that [laughter]

Q: [laughter]

IFSHIN: But I don't know if we got it all back or not.

Q: From that exalted exposure to the seventh floor, you go back into language training.

IFSHIN: Right. Well, there was a change. After I'd joined the operations center, they made a change to make this a 2-year tour. And instead of a 1-year tour in the operations center, people were supposed to then go out as staff assistants...

Q: SSS.

IFSHIN: SSS or Staff. Either. And among the people who served with me at that time, Jerry Bremer who of course went on to exalted things after his service with Dr. Kissinger. I'd already bid for language training and was very anxious to study Chinese. They interviewed me, and I remember Karl Ackerman, who was then the head of the operations center, said we'd like you to take one of these exalted positions. I told him I really didn't think I was cut out for staff and I was up for a line job. I was more of a hands on guy who wanted to get out there and do my thing.

Q: See, Vietnam did teach you some things.

IFSHIN: [laughter] These were all terrible mistakes in terms of building a career, but I did what I wanted to do. I started Chinese. I was offered either Japanese or Chinese at the time, I was given an option.

Q: How did you choose?

IFSHIN: I'd always wanted to study... I shouldn't say always, but at least since my Peace Corps service, I had been interested in particular in the overseas Chinese and was anxious to study Chinese. In fact, at that time, I thought I wanted to study Cantonese, and they arranged a meeting for with Chas Freeman, who was our great language guru although relatively a junior officer still. Chas said, well, it's fine we need people who speak Cantonese, but you'd be better off starting out learning Mandarin and mastering Mandarin first and then studying Cantonese. So I adopted that as my goal and decided I would study standard Chinese.

Q: But prior to your Peace Corps experience in the Philippines you hadn't focused on Asia or China?

IFSHIN: No, it grew strictly out of Peace Corps. In fact, when I entered the foreign service, I'm skipping around a little bit here, I told them I wanted to serve in Asia... any place but Vietnam. [laughter] What I really saw with Chinese in part, and of course at this time we did not have any relations with the Peoples Republic of China, and we had a number of these listening posts, these Chinese language positions around the periphery. While I recognized that Japan was more important to the U.S. than China, and was likely to be so for some time to come, at least from my point of view, it seemed to me that I had a chance to serve in more places and it would be more fun to do Chinese. So I chose to study Chinese. The year at FSI in Rosslyn.

Q: Who was the linguist in Chinese at that time?

IFSHIN: Sollenberger, Howard Sollenberger. He was the head of FSI at that time, but he was keeping his hand in as the China linguist because that was his background. He had been a China linguist and he wanted to do that and he continued to do that. I remember when I was just starting Chinese, he sat in on one of my early classes and he listened to me for a few more minutes and he said to me, you're from New York, aren't you? And I said, yes I am, how did you know? He said I could hear your hard Ps. I said does this mean I'll never be able to speak Chinese, and he said, no, it means you'll speak it with a New York accent which is as good as a Minneapolis accent or a Dallas accent or a Los Angeles accent, it's just another accent in Chinese. Not as good as a Chinese accent, [laughter]

Q: [laughter] I was always under the impression that the accent one had was also a function of the last language FSI had pumped into you so you probably were speaking...

IFSHIN: I had an initial problem in learning Chinese in that I had Vietnamese tones. And Vietnamese tones are different from standard Chinese tones. They're more like Cantonese tones actually.

Q: Right. Aren't there six tones in Cantonese and six in Vietnamese?

IFSHIN: I think there are five in Vietnamese but I could be wrong. It's been a while since I studied it. In any case, I made a very conscious, deliberate attempt to try to block out my Vietnamese and try to master Chinese.

Q: Were there many people taking Chinese at that time?

IFSHIN: When I started, there were four of us as I recall. Myself, and Ward Barmon, a fellow named Phil Myer who subsequently left the foreign service, I think that was his last name, and Tom Penfold who was really going to Singapore and was just doing this to fill in a couple of weeks he had between various other things when he had to leave or report, so they gave him a little Chinese training. Ward and I were the only ones who did this for the full year. Then Ward left for an assignment in Taipei and I went to the language school in Tai Chung.

Q: He gets one year and goes to Taipei probably in the consular section?

IFSHIN: No, I think he was in the economics section.

Q: Yes. And anything about that first year, about how interesting Chinese was? To begin there aren't as many [Chinese] restaurants or whatnot in Washington.

IFSHIN: [laughter] Well, maybe not as many as there are now, but there were quite a few. Matter of fact, one of the better ones The Shanghai, which still exists out here in Northern Virginia. But it was a lot of fun studying Chinese then. One of our instructors, well, they were both very nice, but one of them was Li Tsungmi, I don't know if you ever studied with Li, but he had been a teacher of Chinese in Beijing for FSI.

Q: Right, in the late '40s.

IFSHIN: So there was sort of a link there, you were in the middle of history and that's kind of fun. I remember some of the anecdotes he would tell. He would tell about being a member of the gentry in China in those days, and some of the things he had done. It was kind of neat and interesting.

Q: Now actually, the way the foreign service works is that you have to have an onward assignment before you get language training, so you knew what job you were going to...

IFSHIN: I don't think I did at that point.

Q: You were the luckiest thing. [laughter]

IFSHIN: I don't think I was assigned until I was in Tai Chung when I was assigned to Kuala Lumpur. I don't think I had an onward assignment.

Q: Yes. Interesting.

IFSHIN: In fact, while I was in Tai Chung, I think it was George Beasley. What was the name of our... he subsequently went into USIS and had a successful career as a USIS officer, a black FSO. But he was the scientific linguist in Tai Chung when I was there. When I was about halfway through, so I guess I hadn't been assigned yet, but he approached me and said I was making good progress and wanted to suggest that I do a third year. I might possibly or would get into translator or interpreter quality if I could do that third year of Chinese. But I said I'm going crazy as is, and two years is about as much as my brain can hold and I don't want to do it. I think that might have been a mistake because I might have imprinted the Chinese in a real way, but instead what happened is I had really decent Chinese when I left Tai Chung and it gradually declined.

Q: [laughter] Now the foreign service for Chinese, Japanese, Russian, Arabic, these are two-year programs. Generally, you do one year in Washington, one year in a field location. So for Chinese, you did one year in Washington in '71 and '72, and then FSI in Tai Chung in '72 and '73. Now if there's only one guy from the first year program going to Tai Chung, how many people were in language in Tai Chung when you got there?

IFSHIN: We must have had 20 or 30 people.

Q: Where did they come from?

IFSHIN: In addition to...

Q: If that's the second year...

IFSHIN: There were people who were coming there not directly from Washington, it's not always done as a 2-year straight.

Q: Refreshing one's second year...or they've had it one year at a previous time and now they're getting a second year...

IFSHIN: Or they're coming back, or there are people who learn their Chinese outside the foreign service. Of course FSI Tai Chung, I don't know about these other languages schools that we run around for the other languages, but FSI Tai Chung trains military and CIA and NSA personnel.

Q: Sort of senior language, senior Chinese for the government.

IFSHIN: Right, a number of agencies were represented at Tai Chung in those days. Now it's in Taipei. But that was an interesting experience too because getting to know these people... Most of them are really like the foreign service, of course the CIA guys are almost very little distinction between, you'd have trouble picking one out.

Q: Did they walk with a limp, or? [laughter]

IFSHIN: Sometimes there's a difference, but the military types tended to be very... the same interests and similar... The NSA were distinctly different, and that was partly their insistence upon protecting their covers. They were all DOD civilians as opposed to NSA employees and they'd all give you these cover stories and expect you to believe them.

Q: What foreign service officers were with you in Tai Chung?

IFSHIN: I can't remember.. Peter Smith, he subsequently left the foreign service and went to NASA where he was their Chinese linguist. He was there and he did the 3-year program. I'm remembering more USIS people who were there when I was there.

Q: Like...

IFSHIN: Rob Geary was there. John Thomson, John was one of the best Chinese speakers we had in the program and he's really very good. It just popped into my head.. Joe Lake was in Tai Chung the same time I was there. Joe and I became quite close at the time.

Q: One of the things I've always heard about Tai Chung was here you are studying Mandarin Chinese which is spoken in northern China, and you are sitting with a population that is Taiwanese and there are actually very few Mandarin speakers in the area.

IFSHIN: A lot of your contact is with the faculty, the instructors, and of course they are all Mandarin speakers by definition and speak with the proper accent. It was interesting being exposed to the accents. I remember very distinctly... we made a field trip to Taipei in which we were briefed by, I think the title was the head of the mainland affairs committee of the KMT who was a native of Hunan Province. He spoke to us for about an hour in Mandarin. We were all fairly advanced in our course and some of us were quite good. I'm not including myself in that. But I sat there and after losing track of what he was saying in about 10 or 15 minutes, I sort of wrote a note to John Thomson, who was one of the best speakers in our class, and I asked do you understand what he's saying. John said, no I don't. So we sat there for the hour and after it was all over we asked our Chinese language instructor what language was he speaking? And she said he was speaking Mandarin. I said, did you understand it? She said, I understood about 75% of it.

Of course that's one of the notoriously difficult Mandarin accents, the Hunan accent.

Q: Which is Mao's accent.

IFSHIN: You were a Chinese speaker, so you understand what I'm saying. I don't think spoken Chinese is terribly hard. The great difficulty in Chinese is the number of nonstandard accents and adjusting to those nonstandard accents. To me that's the hard part of Chinese is understanding. So hearing a southerner speak wasn't necessarily a bad thing, especially for someone like me who went off to Kuala Lumpur. In addition to my Chinese, I tested in Hokkien Taiwanese, and came out at a 1+, big deal. But that's what most of the Chinese in Malaysia speak. So knowing a little Minan hua was useful.

Q: So you found living and working in Tai Chung comfortable?

IFSHIN: I enjoyed Tai Chung. When they approached me about staying a third year, it would have been a second year in Tai Chung, I turned it down. But I had a very nice time. I had a house. There was a large U.S. air base at the time, CCK, and there was a PX and commissary and everything was available. I had a good time. I don't know if I want to put this in the tape, but they used to tell me I was making great progress in my Chinese, but how come I sounded like a bar girl?

Q: [laughter]

IFSHIN: You got to practice where you can practice.

Q: How did you find the economic situation in Taiwan at that time? Now we see them as so successful.

IFSHIN: Well, it was already beginning to be successful and there was a great deal happening in Taiwan. It was very comfortable living for someone getting an American salary.

Q: Now you're there for language study, but actually isn't this the Nixon goes to China timeframe?

IFSHIN: Right. Just to retreat for a moment, just during the time I was studying Chinese in Washington, this is when Nixon's trip to China occurred. We then, as the language students, were among the throngs who went off to the White House lawn to see him off when he left by helicopter for Andrews Air Force base. Subsequently I think Mike Mansfield accompanied him on that first trip. If not, Mansfield went to China shortly thereafter. I always remember Mansfield came in and spoke to our class about his experience of China, his impression. Which I thought was a very gracious thing for him to do. He was the Senate majority leader.

Q: Nixon's gone to China, and but in fact you are only 1 or 2 people in the Chinese course. It doesn't necessarily look like anybody's necessarily looking to far ahead that there's going to be tons of consular s and need for Chinese speakers.

IFSHIN: [laughter]

Q: Did this get bandied about?

IFSHIN: Well, Chas Freeman wasn't senior enough at this point. [laughter] Subsequently I had conversations with Chas about how a quarter of the foreign service were going to be Chinese speakers, and we were going to have them all over, but I don't remember when that happened exactly, that conversation. I think that was somewhat later. We opened up the liaison office. But we had so many Chinese speakers who had never served in China and were anxious to get there. But I didn't compete for a job in Beijing. In fact, I went after the Kuala Lumpur job, that was the job I wanted. I had this interest in the overseas Chinese which I'd had for some time and that's what I wanted to do then. Probably another one of my many mistakes. But I had a good time in Kuala Lumpur... we'll get to that later.

Q: We were talking about the economic situation in Taiwan at the time. What are you seeing?

IFSHIN: Not so much in Tai Chung which was then a provincial city, and I guess still is. I haven't been to Tai Chung recently.

Q: It was the capital of the province, too.

IFSHIN: I first visited Taipei as a Peace Corps volunteer in 1965. When I was in Vietnam I also visited Taipei. So, I'd been to Taipei a number of times already. At this point, Taipei is a rather unattractive, a provincial city with rows and rows of shop houses, the climate which hasn't really changed. In the winter, it's this rather gloomy, gray, unattractive city and climate. But a lot of good restaurants even back then. I think the food was better then, but the Chinese food, back then there was more variety to it.

Q: Actually, there wasn't much in the way of Western food was there?

IFSHIN: No. The only place you could have a Western meal was at the various U.S. military officers clubs. And maybe at the Hilton hotel. Basically you ate Chinese food in Taipei, and it was great. Full of great restaurants.

Q: So you finish your language training, you test out marvelously at three 3s?

IFSHIN: Yes three 3+s, as I recall.

Q: In the Tai Chung system, were they teaching the abbreviated characters you used on the mainland too?

IFSHIN: Yes, you had to take both and you had to be able to read the simplified as well as the traditional characters. You started studying with the traditional characters and then they introduced the simplified and you had to do both. At first, it's I just learned this and now you're giving me this - this is a whole different... But after a while you begin to see...

Q: You begin to see the common thread. Now handling the jentizi, the simplified character material, was not a problem, but something one had to be careful of.

IFSHIN: I don't remember. We were getting People's Daily, but I don't know if we were allowed to bring it home from the classroom and just protect it. I had a Chinese servant, I was going to comment on that. She was a marvelous cook. She was from Szechwan and was just great. Here I was this single guy, and usually I eat by myself. She'd make these fabulous meals for me, then stand behind me and say it was too hot this time, I made it too spicy didn't I. I'd be wiping the sweat from my brow and say, No, this is just the way I like it. Don't make it any less hot. [laughter]

Q: [laughter] So you are out of language training and you get home leave and then you go to KL.

IFSHIN: I don't know if I got home leave at that juncture or not. No, because I had home leave before leaving for Tai Chung. As a matter of fact, when I was supposed to leave for Tai Chung I was on home leave. And my father died in an accident that weekend. I was leaving that Monday and he died on the Friday before. Originally I was going to go to Europe on my way to Taiwan, I was going to go the long way. But of course, I stayed with my mother and her family I think a month or a month and a half, and then flew directly to Taiwan from New York. I was pretty shook up at that point actually, I was in emotional turmoil.

Q: But your foreign service assignment now is in Kuala Lumpur, were you in the political section?

IFSHIN: Right.

Q: Was it is a joint political/economic section?

IFSHIN: No. We had three FSOs, and one other officer. And one other officer in the political section. There was the chief of the political section, a Malay speaker, and myself as the Chinese speaker.

Q: So of the three, were you the lowest ranking, youngest officer then?

IFSHIN: Yes.

Q: So you that meant you got to do the biographic reporting, or... what were your duties?

IFSHIN: It's interesting, actually, because Kuala Lumpur or Malaysia, as you know, the politics are very much ethnic politics. You have these Chinese-based parties, and the Malay-based parties, even a couple of Indian-based parties, and a few mixed parties which tend to be Chinese. So I'm basically responsible for the Chinese parties. So in addition to the usual, being the protocol officer and the biographic reporting officer and the normal cats and dogs, and map procurement and publications procurement and those other good things, I had these very distinct responsibilities for covering the principle opposition parties then, as well as component parties of the ruling coalition. Which was an interesting way for it to fall out.

Q: Fairly serious. This was basically your first foreign service overseas tour.

IFSHIN: Right.

Q: And you're talking to the highest level of the opposition party... senior gentlemen in their own...

IFSHIN: Yes.

Q: How did you feel? They were obviously older than you were by 30 years... the aura of being from the American embassy can carry a young officer quite a ways?

IFSHIN: In Malaysia, then at least, the U.S. carried somewhat less weight than it was to subsequently. They tended to be very British-oriented at that point. But I didn't find any problem getting in touch with people. Maybe I dealt with the second level people more than the first level.

Q: But that's good liaison anyway.

IFSHIN: Right.

Q: You have a very distinct portfolio and it's a crucial one. Malaysia has gone through the insurgency period and they're trying to integrate these groups so the trends and whatnot that you are picking up are telling. Where was Malaysia at that time?

IFSHIN: The traumatic event that pretty much hung over things was the '69 race riots. Just to trace the history there, if you'll recall Malaysia was formed of Malaya, Singapore, and Borneo provinces, east Malaysia. The Chinese-Malay balance tended to be fairly close at this point. At least from the Malay point of view, the understanding was that the Chinese would dominate economically but they [the Malay] would dominate politically. Of course, Lee Kuan Yu was not going to take a back seat to anybody. I think it's unrealistic to expect that, and he was making a bid for power nationwide, so they expelled Singapore. Subsequently the remnant Chinese still made a bid for political power and came darn close to winning the '69 elections. The Malays came out and rioted and all sorts of rules were instituted to ensure that the Malays would continue to hold political power indefinitely. Plus the various, for want of a better word, affirmative action programs which were meant to promote the bamiputra, the sons of the soil, the Malay, as opposed to the other communities. And there was a great deal of dissatisfaction on the part of the Chinese. There were Chinese who of course were interested in working out a different kind of accommodation and there were Chinese who were interested in overthrowing things and radically changing them. There were all sorts of movements and currents and developments among the Chinese. And then quite a few Chinese were leaving, a big Chinese emigration to Australia at that time.

Q: So in fact from this position, you are talking to all kinds of Chinese groups, not just the established political opposition. You're getting around town and you have a fair arm around the Chinese community. What were their concerns at this time, which is '73-'75?

IFSHIN: Well, they were, what's our future in Malaysia. We've got it okay now, but what's the future for our children was the major question. Are we going to continue as second-class citizens here?

Q: You're there through the American withdrawal from Vietnam, which is just up the street, if you will. Is that impacting on the domestic situation in Malaysia?

IFSHIN: There was tremendous ferment in that part of the world at that time. I remember... a little back-patting here. I was out on a trip when somebody threw in some sort of anti-U.S. remark in the context of Vietnam. I was speaking to some group, I don't remember what it was. But I kind of exploded and said, let's remember the context of American involvement in Vietnam. You as Malaysian should remember Konfrontasi and the Pyong Yang, Hanoi, Jakarta, Beijing axis that was going to sweep Southeast Asia or Asia. America sacrificed to give you time to build your country, etc., in fact all of the southeast Asia countries were allowed to have that time, and now you have a chance to either use it or our sacrifice has been in vain. It cost us a lot but you've gotten a lot out of this. There was a lot of applause, and everybody was rah rah, and I felt very good about it at the time.

The other thing was we were dealing with boat people.

Q: Your major reporting responsibility was the Chinese political parties. Did you see opportunities to touch bases with colleagues in other embassies who were also looking at the same issues?

IFSHIN: Yes, basically the Australians of course and the Brits had very good contacts in Malaysia. And the Japanese on occasion.

Q: This is a regular procedure? In Beijing, we had Tuesday monthly lunch.

IFSHIN: No. They were a group of youngish diplomats who sort of hung out together and gravitated together, but it was never... It was more social than work related. Although as Al LaPorta, who was number two in the section, used to tell me... I remember once something had happened, I can't remember what, but it had us all puzzled and I would say I'm going to a party tonight and maybe I'll learn something. The next morning I would come in and Al said, what did you learn? I said, it wasn't that kind of party. He looked at me all disgusted and said, Stan, they're ALL that kind of party. [laughter]

Q: [laughter] What did you think was America's priority in Malaysia at that time?

IFSHIN: Our priorities were almost strictly economic. Malaysia was a major provider of natural rubber and tin, and we were interested in its continuing in that role and being a trading partner of the U.S. Human rights did not exist at that time as part of foreign policy. We were sort of interested in democracy, out of our own personal predilections we favored those things. But our basic interests were economic.

Q: Just about the time you arrived...

IFSHIN: Let me just mention that during the time I was there, our ambassador was succeeded by Frank Underhill who had been political consular in Manila and then deputy chief of mission in Seoul before coming to KL as ambassador. He was really a brilliant political officer in many ways, a brilliant drafter, and a lot of fun. Again, another anecdote just popped into my head. The South Korean ambassador was calling on him. The Korean issue was coming up in the UN and he had been to see the Malaysian foreign minister and had gotten their agreement to support our position, that is the U.S. – South Korean position. Our ambassador, Frank Underhill, reported this conversation, whether the Malaysian said ‘yes, I hear you’, or ‘yes I hear you and agree with you’, or ‘yes I hear you and agree with you and will do what you want’ remains to be seen.
[laughter]

Q: Free will always is one of the great diplomatic problems, isn't it?

IFSHIN: Bringing it back to my Peace Corps anecdote about getting people to commit. People don't like to say no in that part of the world. They will always say yes if they possibly can, but what they mean by yes is another question. Pinning them down and circumscribing their freedom of operation pretty sufficiently so that you can be pretty certain of what they will do is the trick.

Q: After you arrived in KL, the Thai government fell. Did that get any notice in Malaysia?

IFSHIN: When you mention it, I have vague recollections, but I can't say that it did. Part of my responsibility was to cover the area around Penang because it was largely Chinese, so I would at least get that far up the coast. When I left Tai Chung and went to KL I got a boondoggle in which I had stopped off in Bangkok and Songkhla and the Philippines as well to discuss insurgencies and the Muslim problems in the border areas. So I was aware of these problems and of course they were always the Communist remnants in southern Thailand. But I can't say that people were terribly concerned with what was happening in Thailand. Maybe they were in the foreign ministry.

Q: Malaysia's focused basically in other places, they're looking at Indonesia, that where threat, danger was coming to them.

IFSHIN: I think so.

Q: As your first full tour in the foreign service, what did you think of your duties and what you were learning professionally?

IFSHIN: I found it professionally rewarding and very interesting. One incident occurred when I was there which we have not talked about which might be of interest, and that was the Japanese Red Army seizure of the American consulate and the taking of the consul and other persons as hostages at that time. The American embassy occupied the eleventh, twelfth, and penthouse floors of a downtown office building. The Consulate was on the ninth floor, a suite of offices. The Swedish embassy was also on the ninth floor, in an adjacent suite. I forget what floor, but the Japanese were in the same office building. The Japanese Red Army seized the consulate, and took our consul and a bunch of other people hostage. I was happened to be outside the building when this all occurred and there was a big mob scene in front of the embassy when I was coming back. I spoke to police and they weren't letting anybody through. I called the embassy and they said, go stay with our consul's wife. I went off, she was Latin American, and I was doing my best to comfort her and various other American wives started showing up.

I went back to my apartment and spent the night in my apartment, a full night's sleep. The next morning I got up and the siege was still going on. I went up to the police and identified myself. They let me through and I actually went up to the embassy this time. They wanted me to go down to the Japanese embassy to act as liaison. I took a walkie-talkie and was in the Japanese embassy for the next 24 hours or so as this drama unfolded. What the terrorists were demanding was the release of prisoners as I recall. Eventually, the Malaysians agreed to their demands and the exchange was to take place at the airport where they were to get a plane and fly off.

I went off with our chargé d'affaires, Bob Dillon, who was the DCM. I don't remember if Ambassador Underhill was out of the country or what, but in any case he was not there. I went off with Bob Dillon to the airport where the home affairs minister was on the phone with various heads of state around the world trying to persuade them to allow this plane to land. Eventually, we got Madame Bandaranaike to agree to let them refuel in Sri Lanka. Colonel Qadhafi agreed to let them land in Libya. Eventually we had our hostages released, and they left with the prisoners. I think the prisoners had been flown in from Japan. They wanted Japanese prisoners. They flew in from Japan and the exchange took place at the airport.

Q: Your job as liaison at the Japanese embassy, were you talking to the ambassador or their DCM or their political consular ?

IFSHIN: I think basically their political consular, more often than not.

Q: He was finding out what was going on in Japan and then you would be able to pass that on to our own people?

IFSHIN: Right.

Q: Who was the consular officer?

IFSHIN: There was only one consul. It might have been Bob Stebbins. He was released eventually. There was also an embassy employee who was taken hostage. Everyone else was Malaysian, visa applicants of one sort or another.

Q: Anything else about that full assignment that struck you as an interesting description of either the foreign service life or how an embassy operates? Did you get the feel that we did understand what was going on in Malaysia, that we did have enough contacts?

IFSHIN: Yes, I think so. As I say, our interests tended to be economic rather than political. But I think we basically understood what was going on and we had a broad range of political contacts.

More than I've seen in other places I've served, in fact.

Q: You're saying our interests are mainly economic and you're the officer liaisoning with the large Chinese community which is economically oriented, and I see that the next thing you're going to do is go to FSI for economic training. Is there any connection? [laughter]

IFSHIN: Well, I thought, this is making me a well-rounded foreign service officer. Again, this was lack of understanding of how the foreign service really worked and what the foreign service wanted me to do. But I thought I should know about economics and that would make me a better political officer.

Q: When did you leave KL then?

IFSHIN: As I recall it was December of 1975.

Q: So you did the January '76 FSI economic course?

IFSHIN: Yes, January to June. Six months.

Q: Do you remember that I was in that same class with you?

IFSHIN: No! I do not remember.

Q: I didn't either until I was looking at your scheduling. That's when I came out of Bangkok, same thing. Political officer, doing political parties stuff and realizing that what they're really arguing about is economic resources.

IFSHIN: Yes.

Q: I was thinking, "I better spruce up my economic background." I begged my DCM and he did some heavy shoveling for me and got me into that class. That was a beautiful place. It was the most stressful thing I'd been through in a long time.

IFSHIN: I did very well in that class...

Q: [laughter] I knew I didn't like you...

IFSHIN: I think this had to do with the fact that I had a science background and a math background.

Q: True.

IFSHIN: I remember everybody was in a terrible uproar about the math, and the math was all stuff I had done before, so it was all review for me. So I did well.

Q: But the individual courses came at a fair clip. In one week they would knock off a semester...

IFSHIN: Sure. It was intellectually challenging and fun in that way. I enjoyed that... and I think I got a lot out of it. I learned things which I think were important to know and have stood me in good stead over the years.

Q: I'm under the impression that when you talk about professions like the foreign service, that education or continuing courses are important to help the mind focus on things. Assignment after assignment after assignment gains a certain amount of skills, but...

IFSHIN: What I did not understand was that by doing economic and taking an economic assignment I was guaranteeing I would not be promoted. [laughter]

Q: [laughter] oops.

IFSHIN: I was condemning myself to language and grade. But that's just ignorance. I didn't get into the personnel system until toward the end of my career. That's when I learned all this stuff. [laughter]

Q: Some of us never learned it. Just do a quick description of the economic course. It was six months long.

IFSHIN: Well, as you said, it included a number of courses and it's supposed to be equivalent to an undergraduate degree in economics of about 20-24 credits of economics. The math was basically at the differential calculus level so you could handle statistics. I found it interesting and challenging enough and quite useful. I think it gave me some intellectual rigor to back up some of my prejudices.

Q: Did you find that the embassy was receiving a number of visitors, congressional or otherwise, in your area?

IFSHIN: No. Not particularly, not at that time, not in our area. There wasn't that much of that going on.

Q: Now, your next assignment, from '78 to '80, is back in Washington. How did you go about getting that assignment, or did it fall out of the air?

IFSHIN: Well, no, remember, I had been on that job...

Q: You had open bidding at that time...

IFSHIN: Yes, as I recall, we had open bidding, and I wanted to go back to Washington. I don't recall where this was on my list of desirable jobs, but it worked out very well for me. I was assigned to INR as a China analyst. Before returning to Washington, I got a familiarization trip to China, this is '78, and I went to Hong Kong and got various types of briefings and meetings there. From Hong Kong, I took the train up to Canton and flew from Canton to Beijing, where I was met by the embassy. Now the embassy had a big delegation, as I recall the White House

Science Advisor was heading a big delegation...

Q: Yes, Frank Press.

IFSHIN: Yes, Frank Press.

Q: I was in that delegation. [laughter]

IFSHIN: Oh, were you in that delegation? In any case, it worked out. It was interesting for me in the sense that the embassy was all tied up in this delegation and its care and feeding but I got included in their banquets, etc., and so it opened some doors for me and at the same time it left me free to do a lot of things on my own.

Q: Now, you are talking about your orientation trip between Indonesia and Washington?

IFSHIN: That's right.

Q: The one I'm thinking about was right after normalization.

IFSHIN: No, this was before normalization. This was still an embassy office; the liaison office was rather modestly staffed at that time. They didn't have a lot of personnel, so having a relatively large delegation meant that they were really kind of tied up and didn't have really all that much time for me. So I was on my own a lot of the time in Beijing, as well as elsewhere in China, obviously. This was a fascinating time in China, things were opening up, and I remember I'd go out to a restaurant, for example, and be seated at a table with a bunch of Chinese. These were modest restaurants. So I would be conversing to the extent that I could, I was somewhat out of practice with Chinese, but it was coming back and I was trying to use my Chinese. I would be conversing, nothing all that exciting with people, but people were talking with me. I even had people stop me on the street and want to practice English, but learning I spoke Chinese we'd go back and forth in the two languages and it was all very interesting. I'd rush into the embassy the next morning, and I'd say, do you know what happened? I did dot, dot, x, y, and z and this happened, and the people would say, oh, yes, they just started doing that about a month ago, where they actually stopped isolating us in a room by ourselves and letting us sit with the other people in the restaurant. The liaison office people were not astonished by what to me was all very new, and it was new, and it was among the first times that it happened, but it wasn't the first time. So it was very interesting, China was clearly changing. In any case, after Beijing, I went down to Huangzhou and Nanjing where I visited various factories and schools.

Q: All on your own.

IFSHIN: Yes, I was traveling on my own. This was arranged through the Chinese authorities, so I was met in every location with sometimes an official party. I remember visiting a factory with a group of other people, I don't even remember who they were, but they were other foreigners. And then we went to Shanghai and from Shanghai I flew to Tokyo and off to Washington where I assumed my job as a China analyst in intelligence and research. And it was a fascinating time to be working on China because there was so much ferment going on at that time. The Chinese media in particular were opening up and we were reading things that were in fact news. It wasn't just a list of who had visited what cities and pronounced things good, or bad as the case may be, and it wasn't just a matter of propaganda diatribes. It was an actual discussion of issues and things being written that were fairly astonishing at the time. We were all kind of, what's going on in China?

Q: It was a question that could in fact be answered.

IFSHIN: We were convinced at the time, I remember, that there was a secret democrat that somehow-

Q: [laughter] One of theirs or one of ours?

IFSHIN: No, no, it was [said] that there was somebody who was interested in opening up the windows and letting some breezes blow through the... And subsequently, from what we know, I would say Hu Yao Bang, who at this point, I forget whether he was general secretary of the party at this point or became general secretary of the party subsequently, but certainly from what we know about Hu Yao Bang, he was a liberal in our terms. I always hate those terms, liberal and left and right, when we're discussing these countries because they're fairly meaningless, because we tend to call people we don't like "conservatives" and people we do "liberals" and those terms mean nothing in terms of actual policies and what they stand for. But it was an exciting time in China. Back in Washington, we were supposed to have four China analysts at that time...

Q: Do you recall who you replaced?

IFSHIN: I can't recall if I replaced Doug Spelman or whether Doug Spelman was there. We never had all four, we never filled all four slots during the time I was there, or we never filled them with four State Department officers. During the time I was there, sort of the constant was Carol Hamrin. Carol has been a China analyst for the INR for a long time. I don't know how many years she'd been there. She was certainly a young woman at the time. I don't know how much experience she'd had. She had a Ph.D. in China studies and was very well plugged in and she was there. Doug Spelman, I can't remember whether he was there or subsequently left before I arrived. But I remember seeing Doug and meeting Doug and working with him to a certain extent. At one point, Lilian Harris, and I don't know what's happened to Lilian, but...

Q: She moved on to Middle East things.

IFSHIN: Right. But Lillian joined us as a China analyst. That was after I'd already been there for a while. And then we had various people who we'd borrow. I remember somebody from the Congressional Research Service came over and worked with us for a while. Someone from FBIS, one of the FBIS analysts, came over and worked with us for a while. That said, I'd say that we had a very strong analytical team in INR, and while there were many, many people in the community working on China, some of them were outstanding, very knowledgeable, very bright, very good in what they did, I thought INR stood up very well, because we were all kind of doing everything, so we tended to be very well-informed across a broad spectrum of issues. Where, I think for example in CIA, and particularly in DIA, people tend to be more specialized and don't get the kind of broad gauge familiarity with issues in a country like China that you do working in INR. In any case, during that particular period, I thought that INR was doing the best analysis on China of any of the various intelligence agencies.

Q: One of the stereotypes that I've always heard... the difference between a job at the embassy or a job at the desk in INR, is that the INR analyst can sit back and has a much more leisurely pace...

IFSHIN: In terms of China, that's absolute nonsense. Again, this is the same thing that I had always heard, that when you were writing something at length, that no one was going to read it beyond the summary, well, maybe the guy in INR would read it because he has time. Well, the guy in INR has no time. He's being inundated with so much, on China at least, he's got so much to read in terms of what is coming in from CIA, from other agencies, from the unclassified traffic. And as I said, what was both FBIS and academic writing about China was being published at that time was extremely interesting in the Chinese press, especially if you were able to read it informed by the classified reporting which we had available to us.

Yesterday, which is leaping ahead, but I was listening to a program about this U.S. plane that had been landed in Hainan island yesterday, and somebody made the comment that 70% of our intelligence about China comes from these kinds of intercepts. That's nonsense. I don't know what the percentages would be and I don't think anyone knows, and it depends on what you mean by intelligence and how you are discussing it, but 70% or even 90% of our intelligence is unclassified. If you know how to read the unclassified stuff and if you have all the classified stuff to give you the background and help shape it, it really helps opens up some new light on what is being published in the papers and what they are saying in unclassified areas. But that's neither here nor there.

Q: But that's important. Basically, the classified sets up a framework which...

IFSHIN: Absolutely, I'm not saying the classified stuff is not valuable, and when I say 70%, maybe I'm just talking about volume and not importance, but the numbers get very... Anyway I just heard that and reacted to it last night. Getting back to my tour in INR, it was a fascinating time to be working on China, and a tremendously interesting assignment. One of the things I got involved in, this was the time of the China-Vietnam war. I see you are trying to recall what happened there.

Q: It was January, 1979.

IFSHIN: Yes. It wasn't the most important fighting that ever took place, but it was an interesting time for us. In INR, in fact, the State Department never set up a task force and never did anything to follow this as we often do for international crises, but we set up one within our own office. I remember it was basically myself, Rafael Ungerich, who was a Vietnam analyst at the time, who subsequently has passed away, and Tim Hamilton who was the Thai analyst at the time. The three of us set up a 24-hour watch, we were all working 16 hours a day at that time, but we made sure somebody was on duty around the clock for the few weeks that this lasted.

Q: The stereotype of that action is that the Vietnamese used the national guard, they didn't even bring out the army, and they gave the Chinese a very difficult time.

IFSHIN: Well, the buildup, there was a long period before the actual fighting occurred, we were doing a lot of fighting at that time, and I think I was among the very first people to say that the Chinese were going to go ahead and do something significant, because I thought it was obvious that governments don't move this amount of money and equipment around without intending to use it, it's very costly to be moving this. It seemed to me that they were going to do something.

Q: Do you have a recollection of the time line vis-à-vis Deng Xiao Ping's trip to the United States?

IFSHIN: Oh, yes, well, he had come, and I think exploited his trip. I don't think he told us a darned thing about what their plans were, but he made it look like he had gotten American agreement. I think that's... Well, obviously he had bigger fish to fry in the U.S.-China relationship than making it look like we were supporting his efforts in Vietnam, but I think that was one of the additional benefits he saw. Clearly, a very clever man.

Q: But that buildup that you are watching, does that predate his trip?

IFSHIN: I believe it is concurrent. The buildup started and continued during his trip and after his trip. Of course, the actual fighting took place and this was a matter of... I think most people feel that the Vietnamese had the better of the fighting, although it was taking place on Vietnamese territory, of course the Chinese were the invaders. Then and maybe stubbornly, I've taken a somewhat different view of it... at the time the Chinese were saying they were teaching Vietnam a lesson. And my point of view was always that the lesson was not that we could wipe the floor with you, but we're on your border, we're not going to go home, and you've got to live with us. And that means you have to take account of what we want. I think that was the lesson and I think the Chinese delivered the lesson. But other people felt that the Chinese got their eyes blackened and Vietnam had sent them home with their tail between their legs. Again, I never saw it that way.

Q: It was a costly venture for the Chinese. They had significant losses.

IFSHIN: Oh, sure, I think in the fighting the Vietnamese enjoyed more success than the Chinese did. The Chinese learned a lot about their inadequacies, and what they didn't have in the way of military strength.

Q: Can you give us a sense of how projects in INR were tasked at that time? When you arrived in the morning, did you know what you were doing, or you were already working on something, or were there rush projects? The desk calls up and says we want a study on...

IFSHIN: Well, they were always pressing us to do more in terms of longer studies, analytical studies. When I say they, I mean our superiors. Particularly, now there was a change in personnel which involves events. Shortly after I first joined the office, David Dean became head of the Asian analytical area. David subsequently got very involved during the time of normalization, with the process of normalization, and emerged as the first head of the American institute in Taiwan's Washington office, when the dust finally settled in that area. Bob Drexler replaced him. I can't remember whether it was David and Bob or mostly Bob who was always anxious for us to do longer pieces analyzing what was happening in China studies. But at the time, we, the China analysts, the shifting cast of characters with Carol and myself being the constants through most of this period, did a lot of short pieces which went into the sort of daily product that was being published for the secretary. We had pieces on a daily basis, sometimes two or three pieces.

Q: Okay, there was a daily INR report that goes up to the seventh floor..

IFSHIN: The secretary, right.

Q: And INR/EAP was getting a fairly constant placement in this...

IFSHIN: Yes, normally, the size of this report varied, let's say a minimum of five articles or as much as twelve or even larger than that. These are short, one paragraph, type summary items, just highlighting important event. But of that, every day there would be one, two, or three China items. It was just a very interesting and important time in China where every day things were happening, or we were learning of things every day. There was a constant debate within China about policy, and about political parameters, opening up of the system, changing of the system. And then we were always trying to see what was happening on the personnel side of China, although that tended to be fairly opaque and remains fairly opaque. We were always convinced that there was a secret democrat and we were always debating who it was. At times, I think we were way off.

Q: So in some cases, you are deciding what you are writing on, say you need something for the secretary's morning briefing. Things are coming down from David Dean or from above. Is the desk asking for things out from INR?

IFSHIN: I don't remember ever being tasked by the desk. We were doing a daily briefing, of course, of SI material for the desk, and had fairly close contact with them. They always got the China items that we prepared for the secretary's briefing. I don't think people get the whole briefing, or that they are routinely circulated to the desk, but the specific items dealing with their country would be given to a country desk. I can't remember precisely what the procedures were then. During the Chinese buildup on the Vietnamese border and the subsequent fighting, I remember we did several oral briefings for a variety of individuals including then David Newsom who was Under Secretary for Political Affairs, and Dick Holbrook who was the EAP assistant secretary. These were at their request.

Q: You had arrived in INR summer of '78. And December 15, '78, Carter announces that he's going to recognize Beijing. What were you doing on the 16th of December? Does this pick up the pace significantly?

IFSHIN: No, I don't think so. David Dean disappeared at that point, or shortly thereafter, and got very involved in the mechanics of what was going on. I don't remember it really changing things at the working level all that much. We continued doing what we had been doing. Obviously we were doing a lot of sort of reaction reporting and what is going on and how various people are reacting to this change.

Q: The change in diplomatic recognition, the derecognition of Taiwan and the recognition of Beijing, would put Taiwan in an area that raised its profile for us. What was going on there? Were you also doing background pieces on Taiwan?

IFSHIN: Yes, we were.

Q: And the impact there and how they looked at it...?

IFSHIN: Yes.

Q: What were some of the trends you were seeing out of Taiwan?

IFSHIN: Of course, the initial reaction was one of tremendous dismay, and then there was some violence, with demonstrations in front of the American embassy. But I guess they came to terms with it. The handwriting had been on the wall, and the fact that we were going to establish normal diplomatic ties with China had certainly been in the cards with Nixon's opening in 1972. In fact, I always felt that Carter- Brzezinski handled it in an unnecessarily clandestine type manner. It seems to me that there was a tremendous concern about the Taiwan lobby, or the China lobby as it was still called then. I think that concern was probably misplaced. It faded and there was generally widespread acceptance in the U.S. political circles that it made sense to establish diplomatic ties with China. In fact, controversy did emerge, because I think what the administration had in mind for AIT, the American Institute in Taiwan, and I'm not sure that name existed at the time, but for that institution that there would be a fairly minor operation that only concerned with conducting trade and other minor sort of relations. Congress, in drafting the Taiwan Relations Act, played kind of a useful role in outlining a much more developed and larger relationship. I know, typically we don't like to credit the Congress with any kind of useful role, but in this case I think they did in fact play a useful role, and what emerged with AIT was a much better instrument for U.S. policy.

Q: Now, INR is reporting on normalization... My impression is that there are a fair amount of congressional trips and cabinet level trips that go over. Are you doing any support of those? Background papers, or there was a standard background paper already, the Chinese economy is...

IFSHIN: I think that tended to be fairly standard stuff. A lot of, for example, biographical reporting came out of CIA, so that we weren't all that involved. The desk was extremely busy at the time, and sometimes I suppose would levy a requirement on us and ask us for assistance in putting something together. I don't remember being all that involved in preparing for the trips. Though, you are quite right, there was an enormous volume of them.

Q: One of the things that happens in late '79 in Vietnam is the Kaohsiung incident, which I presume is Taiwan processing its new relationship.

IFSHIN: In part, but although obviously there were domestic pressures there.

Q: Right. Did INR get involved in any of that? Summarizing and reporting?

IFSHIN: I'm sure that we did, but I honestly don't recall a great deal about it. We didn't have a great deal of Taiwan expertise, which is kind of strange when you think that's where we had our embassy all those years and people serving. I think there was a general feeling that we knew Taiwan and we didn't know China. That often seems to be the case... the more open a country is, the less a feeling that we are depending on intelligence to tell us about that country. Although, we are often more ignorant than we think.

Q: Of course, that's INR's forte, all the intelligence from all the other agencies is coming to one place in the State Department that's INR, so you are looking at all sorts of descriptions of things and summarizing that for the politically active.

IFSHIN: Precisely. There is an enormous volume of stuff that comes in.

Q: So this can be more than a 9 to 5 [job].

IFSHIN: Oh, yes, this was a very involved, very interesting job. And you can always take home unclassified stuff with you and try to do some reading at home and stay abreast in that way. But the image of the relaxed INR officer having time to sit back and read, at least as it applies to China, was a totally false image. Maybe if you were working on, let's see, what would be a good country to be working on? Some obscure country where we don't have to do a whole lot of reporting, and you have time to read all the available material to read on it. But that was not true about China.

Q: Anything else that would have come out in that timeframe of normalization?

IFSHIN: I can't recall a whole lot. There were a lot of interesting meetings, intelligence community where we would all sit around and try to figure out what was going on...

Q: So there were a number of sessions where you would go over to the agency and talk to their guys...

IFSHIN: The agency, and I remember at least one trip over to NSA as well.

Q: You guys were busy, but did you get an opportunity to go to academic conferences, or...

IFSHIN: Yes, the Association of Asian Studies annual convention, in New York, as well as events in Washington. We went around to the various sessions and listened. It was all very useful, very worthwhile. I'm leaping ahead of myself. I did a tour in personnel at one time and I'm going to get into this a little bit more. I always used to advise people to look hard at INR jobs, which are always difficult to fill, and nobody bids on them, at least that was the case then, I assume it's still the case... I think they can be extremely worthwhile and you could learn an awful lot on them. I've seen a lot of fairly senior people, or people, particularly on the political side, who in my opinion didn't fully understand intelligence and what it really was and wasn't.

I remember when we were briefing, I mentioned during the Vietnam-China clash period we briefed various high level officers. We'd always go through this is what happened, and they moved 70 planes, and they had this capacity, and 700,000 men in these various locations and they had this and they had this kind of support... I remembered that the questions always boiled down to intentions. What are the Chinese intending? I was always willing to give people my opinion, but I always wondered if they understood that that was exactly what I was doing, giving an opinion at that time. This was not based on any special knowledge. Their opinion was just as good as mine. If they wanted my opinion I was willing to advance it, but I had no direct line to the Chinese authorities. They weren't sending me a missive saying, well, we did this because we intend to do that. I was guessing as to what the intentions were, or I was analyzing and trying to figure out what the intentions were. But, having presented the information to them, presumably they were as well placed as I was to figure out the intentions.

Q: The point is, it's worthwhile to have an understanding of the intelligence that's coming in, its capabilities and what it's able to do for you because at some time in your career as an action officer you're going to have to move on the basis of that intelligence.

IFSHIN: Precisely. And it's also important to understand the limitations of intelligence and how often we are operating in a murky situation and intelligence doesn't tell us what we need to know. We have to figure that out. I don't know if you have any other questions, but just preceding, the other interesting thing about the INR job is that coming out of that job I had very good contacts in the China area across a broad spectrum of persons and there was a great deal of interest in me for my next job, which is a fairly unique situation at that time. And I remember that originally I had wanted to bid on Mark Pratt's job, that is the job of the general affairs political section chief in Taipei, and Mark extended [his tour], so I thought, well, I'm not going to go after that job.

Then I was approached by Chas Freeman. I guess he was the director of the desk, and he wanted me to bid on a political section chief job on the desk. So I went to personnel to talk to them about bidding on that job, and I said, well, you know, the desk has talked to me about this and they want me to bid on this job and it sounds like it would be a good job. And they said, yes, well, except that it doesn't exist. I said, what? And they said, well, they're trying to create it and they'll probably be successful, but at this time, there is no job so there's nothing for you to bid on. I guess the reason I went to see them is that I'd tried to enter a bid and had not been successful, and that's why because the job was not in the system yet.

Q: Well, that's funny because I thought Gerry Ogden was sitting at that job. Or Gerry was his deputy at that time.

IFSHIN: I guess, well, in any case, this was a new job that did not exist, and at this point I got very upset and said, well, here I had this job and I let that go, and then I had that job, and the job I really wanted was Mark Pratt's job and now he's extended, and now you're telling me this job doesn't even exist. And they said, well, wait a second, we can give you Mark Pratt's job, we just have to figure out what we're going to do with you for a year. I said, oh, I can still bid on Mark Pratt's job? They said, well, it's a language job and it's still listed and you can bid on it. Ok, what are we going to do with you for a year? There were several possibilities, and then they mentioned they had a vacancy for the commercial officer position in Taipei. I said, oh, I have an economic background, I did economic commercial work. So I can go to Taipei and do that job.

So that's what I did, I went off to Taipei for a year as the commercial officer which was again a very interesting job. It was a new experience for me. There was a trade center there and there were two commerce department officers there and I was the State Department officer, and of course we were all AIT at that point, we'd resigned from our various agencies...

Q: Well, explain that.

IFSHIN: The procedure at the time, you submitted a letter of resignation and it was understood that you would come back to your agency. It was interesting because we continued to earn seniority, we continued to have money paid into our pension fund, so this resignation was a strange one in many ways, and I'm not sure of what the legalities of it were. But in essence, they withdrew your diplomatic passport and gave you a so-called green passport, a normal tourist, civilian type non-governmental passport.

Q: My understanding was that the executive branch's version of the Taiwan Relations Act was done by a few lawyers in a back room to basically accomplish this. Take foreign service officers who had presidential commissions. Suddenly wash them, they resign from the foreign service, they happened to be picked up by this contractor, called AIT, perform very similar foreign service like duties, and at the end of their contract with AIT they can be rehired by State Department. That apparently was the original version.

IFSHIN: Again, this gets into my future reincarnation as a personnel officer as a career development officer. I had some dealings with people who served in the Sinai field mission. The situation that I subsequently discovered there, for example, I had young officer who I was the career development officer for who was promoted during the time he was in the Sinai field mission, but the promotion did not take effect while he's there. It only takes effect when he rejoins the State Department. So that subsequently, he lost pay and he lost various other things, eligibility to compete, all sorts of things.

I remember at the time I went through the system, and spoke to someone, and said I served in AIT and none of this stuff worked that way. We got everything. [If] We got promoted, we got promoted and we started earning our new salary and we started earning seniority in our new positions. Why is Sinai Field mission position being treated so differently? Subsequently, and retroactively, they went back and straightened it out with the Sinai field mission so that they were treated much more fairly, I think, in those terms.

Q: Actually, that impacts on the whole AIT thing too, because when they created this AIT, nobody knew how it was going to work, nobody knew what the impact was. In fact, at the time didn't they tell people who were at the embassy that if you want to leave and not sit this out, you may do so. Mark extended, but maybe he didn't bid fast enough, did he extend because he was enjoying it or they were afraid there wouldn't be any bidders?

IFSHIN: I don't know, but maybe he was prevailed upon that this was a very important and delicate time in Taiwan-U.S. relations and it was very important that continuity be maintained. For example, Chuck Cross was brought in as the first head of AIT and again, that was sort of they wanted somebody of ambassadorial rank who had been an ambassador previously. There were all sorts of issues attached to what they were trying to do.

Q: So, what you've done now is gotten yourself assigned as Mark's successor, but you do the year on the commercial side to position yourself.

IFSHIN: Right.

Q: So you've actually got two assignments.

IFSHIN: Yes.

Q: And how was that commercial year?

IFSHIN: It was an interesting year. First of all, you have an important commercial relationship with Taiwan, as well as just an important relationship in general. The U.S. figures very large in the Taiwan universe, in the Taiwan scheme of things. So being the commercial officer, I was important to a lot of Taiwan businessmen. In addition, I had a really outstanding staff. I had a number of Taiwan locals working for me who were just extremely able and quite familiar with what they were doing, quite capable people. I went over...

Q: Are you working in the economic center or the trade center?

IFSHIN: I'm in the trade center, physically located in the trade center, although my boss is in the economic center. I'm working for Sam Lee, who was a U.S. foreign service officer. Sam was State Department, I don't know if the foreign commercial service already existed at this point, I don't know when exactly that arrangement took hold.

Q: Do you remember who you replaced?

IFSHIN: When we met Stu Kennedy, I was saying he had served in Taiwan because I would swear that was the name of the person I replaced. I thought the name was Stu Kennedy but I've forgotten now. I don't think he was particularly a China type, the person I replaced.

Q: Can you describe some of your duties?

IFSHIN: With this excellent staff that I had, my duties were to brief American businessmen on the ongoing economic relationships and business opportunities and to identify business opportunities for Americans. We maintained a commercial library, largely for Taiwan businessmen looking for agents or to be agents or representatives of American businesses and to import the American products as well as to find representatives for their exports in the United States. We had various trade shows, those were largely the two commerce department persons who were responsible for the trade shows. I was responsible for the day-to-day facilitating of American and Taiwan businessmen finding each other and doing business with each other.

Q: Was there a fair string of American businessmen coming to Taiwan?

IFSHIN: Yes. That was still quite prevalent. Taiwan was then our fifth or sixth largest trading partner. An awful lot of it was Taiwan exports to the U.S., at that point they were running a big surplus. I don't know if they still do, but they were always interested in whittling down that surplus, from their own self-interest point of view of showing what valuable customers they could be as well as sellers of products. There was a significant commercial relationship.

Q: I sounds like there would be a fairly large American chamber of commerce.

IFSHIN: Yes, there was.

Q: Larger than Jakarta?

IFSHIN: Certainly more heterogeneous. Where Jakarta tended to be dominated by the petroleum sector, this was a broader spectrum of companies and interests.

Q: You were saying that most of the local businessmen were Taiwanese as opposed to mainland Chinese that were running the government?

IFSHIN: Yes. Certain sectors had large mainland representation.

Q: Such as?

IFSHIN: Banking. China Airlines which largely comes out of the air force and is kind of operated as a fully owned subsidiary of the air force, so that tended to be mainland Chinese. But business, by and large the private sector, was then largely Taiwanese. But there were certain important businesses that were mainlanders' ownerships, just certain companies were traditionally mainlanders.

Q: Banks are sort of choke points for small businesses... if you can't get your loan..., I wonder if that's one of the reasons the mainlanders were into banking, it also served a political purpose.

IFSHIN: I don't think it was established in that way. A lot of the banks came out of the government, or were originally government owned, or were then government owned or controlled. And then you had the big Shanghai banking sector which had moved with the nationalist government. Taiwanese were increasingly involved in banking types of things, but I think they tended to have a slightly different legal personality than the traditional banks. They tended to be trusts. Whatever the distinction is, really, is not something I'm terribly familiar with, but like we had savings and loans, they had some other entity.

Q: Trust cooperatives or something like that.

IFSHIN: Right.

Q: While you are there in the commercial side, you were saying that the government on Taiwan wanted to be a good customer to the U.S. Do you remember any trade disputes or major things like that that came up, or major purchases?

IFSHIN: I honestly can't at this point. It's all kind of faded. When I was writing my, or making input into my EER, I was responsible for enormous amounts of Taiwan purchases, but I honestly can't remember any of them now.

Q: Were they starting or had they been doing this trade delegations to the states? The different buying delegations...

IFSHIN: Well, yes. During that year, this was a big thing where we had a number of states visit Taiwan state delegations and they would also send Taiwan delegations to the U.S.

Q: My point is, did that start with derecognition, or had they been doing that state buying things at an earlier time?

IFSHIN: I honestly cannot tell you. It was ongoing during the time that I was there and it's hard for me to believe that they just ginned it up so quickly. But it was an increasingly important instrument of policy for the Taiwan side.

Q: Explain how they used that.

IFSHIN: Having lost the formal diplomatic ties with the U.S., they were interested in promoting all kinds of Taiwan sister city relationships, sister university relationships, sister this, sister that. Or they would entertain these trade groups from various states. I remember South Carolina coming out and was headed by then Governor Richard Reilly, the man who was just Clinton's secretary of education. But there were a number of others that came through during the time that I was commercial officer, it was fairly common. Lots of exchanges.

Q: And then Taiwan would send these buying delegations to the states and announce the purchase of wheat or...

IFSHIN: I don't know how much of this was actually additional purchases beyond what they would have been making in any case, but they would try and make it look like they were making a big gesture by announcing them together in large amounts, just in the normal course of events we bought so much wheat. Instead, they would give us some publicity and some play and do it.

Q: Now, as commercial person for that year, did you have much opportunity to drive around the island for business, visiting other businesses, talking to people, or were you mostly in Taipei?

IFSHIN: As I recall, I was mostly in Taipei. Although, I remember going down to visit some of the significant businesses that were somewhat south of Taipei, in the Taipei suburbs...

Q: Chin Hsu industrial park?

IFSHIN: Right, the industrial park, and the China petroleum company which is located outside of Taipei and a number of entities like that, but it was basically confined to the Taipei area. I must have gone down to Kaosiung to the trade center down there, but I don't remember a whole lot of travel. I had been around the island a number of times before I got there. As a language student I traveled extensively in Taiwan. We were encouraged to travel, in fact, we were given a lot of time to travel. As long as we were using the language we were supposed to get out. I'd been all over the island. I mentioned Burt Levin... when I arrived as a language student... I'm going back now... Burt made a comment that he wished he could take me around the island sometime, or that I could go around the island sometime. I don't know how sincere he was in saying that, but when I got down to Tai Chung, I told George Beasley that Burt Levin said he wants me to travel with him around the island. George said, that's great, sure. A month or two, three months after you've been here, that'll be fine. So I contacted Burt and said, remember that trip you wanted take? George Beasley says it's fine. So we took a trip around the island together, starting from Tai Chung and went around to Tai Nan and Kaosiung, and Taidong, and up the coast to Keelung.

Q: Visiting the government people?

IFSHIN: Visiting government people, opposition people and calling on all sorts of people.

Q: So, as a language student, you got an enormous introduction to Taiwan and its politics..

IFSHIN: Right.

Q: Well, given that introduction and the introduction you would have had to Taiwanese businessmen in the year...

IFSHIN: I found the introduction to Taiwanese businessmen extremely interesting and I think it was useful in filling in a lot of background for me in my subsequent job as the chief of the general affairs or political section. The businessmen for the most part avoided politics like the plague. This was the time when the Kuomintang was running a pretty tight ship, and it was not necessarily...

Q: Well, your arrival was after Kaosiung, which is a signal, they rounded up the entire opposition. They're all in jail now.

IFSHIN: Right. It was not economically healthy to be involved in politics for businessmen. But nonetheless, I got to talk to a lot of businessmen and establish a certain relationship with them where they felt a little bit more open and willing to talk. While they weren't talking politics per se, a certain amount of the unhappiness that they had with the prevailing political structures came through and they felt comfortable enough to hint at some of these things. It was a good background, that commercial officer tour.

Q: In that tour, what was your liaison with the local authorities? Were you going over to their department of commerce? (End of tape)

You were just coming to the end of your commercial tour.

IFSHIN: At that time we were pretty religious about not contacting the government, although I think it was somewhat more relaxed on the commercial area than the political area in our dealings with the foreign ministry. Nonetheless, we worked basically with the CCNAA (Coordinating Council for North American Affairs). I had a really outstanding team of locals working for me who conducted a lot of more official relationships, but I didn't know about that and didn't try to know about that.

Q: Did you come across a circumstance where the authorities on Taiwan wanted you to attend something or do something that was a little more official? Were they making the attempt that the relationship was more official than the Americans wanted it to be?

IFSHIN: I don't recall that when I was working in the commercial area. Now I would refer businessmen to the Taiwan authorities at times because they needed to deal with them, and I would have one of my locals help facilitate such a meeting. But I don't recall them ever trying to exploit that to get me involved to make that relationship look more official. I don't recall anything like that ever happening.

Q: Now it's 1981, and Mark is leaving. He had been in place before normalization so he had transitioned.

IFSHIN: Right.

Q: You were there after normalization.

IFSHIN: Yes.

Q: So you are the first general affairs section chief in this new period, if you will. What kind of a political relationship did Mark turn over to you?

IFSHIN: Yes, well, I think we operated very much like a normal political section would. We didn't meet with the foreign ministry per se, but in a sense, that was, we dealt with CCNAA, and in a sense that was more like a traditional embassy. The embassies of course tend to contact every ministry, and be in contact with all sorts of people. But the more traditional embassy goes through the foreign ministry. We were going through the CCNAA which was acting exactly like a foreign ministry, and whenever we needed to contact anyone, that's the way we did it. In addition of course, we were meeting with the opposition. You mentioned the Kaosiung demonstrations and subsequent arrests and imprisonment of a number the significant leaders of the opposition, nonetheless, the opposition continued to function in despite of the absence of many of these leaders, although, I always feel that there were a whole number of people I don't really know because they were in prison, a whole bunch of significant leaders. Nonetheless, I became familiar with the people who were carrying on at that time. Some of them were very interesting people to get to know. Taiwan is a place that is undergoing very rapid change, political and economic, and it is always interesting to watch that.

Q: Just to set the scene, who's the head of AIT at the time that you now become the head of the general affairs section?

IFSHIN: You know, as I mentioned earlier, Chuck Cross was the first head of AIT, and he was the head during the time that I was there as a commercial officer, and I can't remember exactly what the transition was, and he was replaced by...

Q: Jim Lilly...

IFSHIN: Jim Lilly, and I can't remember whether Jim Lilly and I assumed our positions more or less concurrently or whether it's just fading in my mind.

Q: Because actually, Jim Lilly is as the Reagan administration comes in and Jim is basically NSC to start off the administration and then he gets that job. So if they came in at '91...

IFSHIN: '81...

Q: '81, yes, and then spent some time in the NSC and then he comes...

IFSHIN: Yes, I think Chuck Cross must have been in place when I first took over in the general affairs section, but it wasn't very long after I was in general affairs that Jim Lilly took over. I can't remember... Stan Brooks replaced Bill Thomas as the deputy and I can't remember what the exact timing of that, either. Bill Thomas was certainly there when I was commercial officer and I think for a while when I was general affairs. I think Stan Brooks replaced him some time after I had already become general affairs officer. But it was all more or less about the same time, the changing of the guard so to speak takes place.

Q: So we have a fresh crew after this traumatic event. Do you have any sense of either Chuck Cross or Jim Lilly's connection with CCK at that time?

IFSHIN: Let me just say that when Jim Lilly came on board, I remember attending some meetings with him and the Taiwans and CCNAA personnel, I believe, where he used what I thought of at the time as kind of retrograde language that sort of set my teeth on edge... he was talking about the Chi Coms and various stuff out of the '50s and I really had to sort of, what's going on here? But I became a big fan of Jim Lilly's and he's a very capable guy, and a lot of that stuff I think was meant to kind of put the Taiwans at ease and kind of establish, 'hey, we speak the same language here and we all know about the Chinese bandits or the communist bandits and you can relax with me'. He was extremely effective with the Taiwans, with Kuomintang, and with the opposition figures as well, just kind of putting them at ease, and making them recognize him as someone they could talk to. I admired him, watching him operate. As I said, my initial reaction had been a little bit of being appalled at some of this, but he was very good.

Q: There's obviously a number of tensions going on, I mean there's the whole emotional reaction to the derecognition, and then there's the internal political turmoil, which is Kaosiung and the subsequent trials. How did your reporting priorities reflect some of this?

IFSHIN: Our reporting priorities tended to be focused on Taiwan, China, well, Taiwan-U.S. was always our main priority, and Taiwan-China was a second priority: how is that relationship evolving. And somewhere much farther back was how is Taiwan's internal politics evolving? That was of particular interest to me, and was of a higher priority to me than it was to the U.S. government, but I was very interested in Taiwan's internal politics and how that was evolving.

Q: How did you follow up on that?

IFSHIN: I tried to develop relations with both opposition figures and with Kuomintang figures, particularly the Li Teng Hui kind of Taiwan KMT, the bulk of the Kuomintang membership of course at this time was Taiwanese, although the leadership was still largely mainland. One of the things I kind of regret was that I never really got to know James Sung who was then in Tai Chung, where he was the governor, and the...

Q: At that time he had a KMT party position, head of the GIO.

IFSHIN: Head of the government information office, but most of the time that I was in Taiwan, he was not in Taipei, so I really didn't get to know him very well. I did get to know, his successor as governor, who was a Taiwanese, Lin Yang Gang. I got to know him a little bit and I got to know some of the other people who I identified as movers and shakers. I had this thesis for a long time that Taiwan mainland relationships would only be worked out at a period when you had an indigenous Taiwanese leadership that would be comfortable and would be seen by the Taiwanese population as representing their interests in a way that the CCK and the mainlanders never could. I always felt that they would be seen by the Taiwanese as trying to work out some sort of deal for themselves, whereas if you were a Taiwan politician, then at some point most of the people would accept that you were trying to work out something on their behalf as well as your own.

Q: Well, doesn't this come from the fact that it was the KMT position that there was but one China and Taiwan is part of China?

IFSHIN: I thought there could be a deal at some point, but that it required a leadership that was in some sense democratically selected by the majority of the population by the Taiwanese, or at least seen as representing the Taiwanese. I still feel that, and that is obviously the way that things have evolved to a certain extent, but it's not been as simple as I thought it would be. For one thing, I expected the Chinese to be more pragmatic than they've proven to be. I think they've gotten more ideological, nationalistic, perhaps as Communism lost legitimacy as an idea, then they've had to depend on nationalism as their authority and that's complicated any attempt to work out relations with Taiwan. I thought this evolution of Taiwan's politics was critical to the evolution of Taiwan. Obviously it would be critical to the evolution of Taiwan-China mainland relations.

Q: Now along these lines, I remember reporting out of Taiwan that would indicate that OCKs put another Taiwanese guy as the head of something... the Taiwanization of the KMT and the legislatures that was something that people were watching. Were you seeing that at the time?

IFSHIN: Yes, well, it was moving very slowly. The legislature, through the whole period I was there, and I don't know exactly when the change comes, but the legislature was the legislature that represented mainland China.

Q: Yes, the election of 1947.

IFSHIN: Yes. When somebody died, they would replace him with someone who ran second if he was living in Taiwan. It was incredible that they were able to maintain this for as long as they were. They had all these ancient politicians who were extremely long-lived who managed to hang on there. It was inevitable, you knew that there were demographic changes that were coming because people do die, but it was hard to see just when it was going to change and how it was going to change. So the legislature tended to be less interesting than what was happening within the party, the KMT...

Q: The party was the focus of much of your reporting...

IFSHIN: Right, and then you had the opposition.

Q: Now in a professional sense, you had been there a year, and Mark had been there three years. When you take over, is there a quick handoff, or he's been including you in the last few months in his meetings and everybody knows you are taking over, or is it as though you just walked in from a different world?

IFSHIN: A lot of people knew I was taking over. In fact, I guess it had become common knowledge. I had not tried to broadcast it. And once I heard my locals talking about it, and I misunderstood what they were talking about because they used terminology that was not clear to me about a promotion or something, and I didn't know what they meant by I was getting promoted. I was hoping that they had some secret that I didn't know about. But of course, what it was they knew about my move to general affairs, and I hadn't told them, I hadn't told anyone. But it was common knowledge coming out of the personnel section of AIT, and obviously it got from there into the general community, and people knew it was happening and then it did happen. I think the handoff was sort of a mix between what you described as sort of a handoff and gradually working me into things. It was neither, but somewhere in between, there was a certain amount of introduction, but it was done basically at the end.

Q: What does a general affairs section look like? How many people?

IFSHIN: At that time, we had four American officers, including myself. One officer from another agency, and two junior officers, they were both second tour officers. Can't remember whether I inherited them or if they arrived after I got the job. I don't remember anybody before them, so I must have inherited them. And as with the luck of the draw, one was very good and one was not so good. There were two secretaries. I had a staff of four or five locals in the political section, one of whom was the social secretary receptionist who didn't really work for me but was nominally under the general affairs section. And then I had three other locals, the senior one was very knowledgeable about politics, the other two somewhat less so. But they all basically worked as translators, doing translating of Chinese press on a daily basis.

Q: So the political section put out a press summary. But now there's the USIS office, aren't they also doing a Chinese press summary?

IFSHIN: I honestly don't recall. But we would identify specific things that we wanted translated, and that's how that worked. I would want to say this about USIS. They were in a different location, in a different building, but nonetheless, I thought we had an excellent relationship and I thought the AIT relationship in general where we were all nominally separated from our various agencies and working for AIT that it worked very well. I thought it was one of the most cooperative organizations that I've ever worked for from all the various aspects and all the people that were involved in various parent agencies that they represented. Now it happened during much of the time that I was there, that the number two man, or the information officer for USIS, and I forget what its designation was called in AIT, it had a different name like general affairs in political section, but the number two guy was a State Department officer Joe Moyle. I don't know whether that improved things or not because we had good relations with his bosses as well, Harry Britton... But it was in general a good relationship. We had a good relationship with the military attachés as well, who were, in fact, retired U.S. military. The military was a little bit more scrupulous about not rehiring.

Q: One of the things that happens when [one] converts from an embassy to AIT is, there's a whole shuffle of facilities. We leave the old embassy building and now AIT is in a new building. Have all those administrative logistic changes been handled and you no longer have any particular problems... you have enough chairs, there's enough... no more logistics problems?

IFSHIN: Yes, I think everything was working very smoothly at the time I moved in. They were not the nicest offices I've ever had but they were certainly adequate. From an administrative point of view, we were working smoothly. It was an adequately funded operation, and had a very high degree of operation.

Q: As head of the general affairs section, what is your relationship with the front office, Jim, Stan Brooks, are you dividing up contacts, how does that fall out?

IFSHIN: The way Jim Lilly and Stan Brooks operated, was kind of Jim Lilly was sort of Mr. Outside, and Stan Brooks was Mr. Inside. Maybe that's the way an embassy typically operates. Stan did less contact work than either myself or Jim Lilly. But we all had our contacts and tried to pool information. Jim Lilly, coming out of the NSC, had a good sense of how our reporting could have the most impact in Washington and was very interested in timing of reporting, and when we got our reports in and getting them in at the strategic moment when it would have the most impact. Very often, he would instruct us along those lines, that we wanted to do this at such and such a time so that it arrived in Washington when they were contemplating this or contemplating that. And then there was also a good deal of competition with Beijing, where when Beijing did a certain kind of reporting we wanted to come in with the other side or the counter report, or in some cases before they reported, and in some cases after their report, but we were always watching their reporting as well. And again, Jim Lilly was always very alert to that kind of nuance.

Q: That must have been very instructive.

IFSHIN: Yes, it was.

Q: You are head of the political section, this is a senior position within the mission. Are you accompanying Jim on a lot of his calls, or is he doing a lot of his own reporting?

IFSHIN: No, I'm accompanying him on a lot of his calls and subsequently writing the report.

Q: Did you ever get in on a meeting with CCK?

IFSHIN: I don't recall. This is a historic figure, and I remember seeing CCK, so maybe it was in a meeting. I remember a meeting between Jim Lilly and CCK, as I recall it took place across the street from the presidential palaces or the foreign ministry... I can't remember. But it wasn't held in the building, I don't know if it had an AIT non-recognition aspect to it. But a lot of these meetings would be held elsewhere. I don't think we would meet with CCK very often.

Somewhat more meetings were held with Chien Fu, Fred Chien who was then foreign minister. A lot of it went through CCNAA. Raymond Hu was the head of CCNAA during a large portion of that period, and then John Chang was number two and he was a special figure and had special relations with the Kuomintang leadership, including CCK, so they dealt a lot with him.

Q: Did you at this time see circumstances in which Taiwan was trying to project an image of a more official relationship than we were comfortable with?

IFSHIN: Yes, occasionally we would call them out. We'd have a visitor, let's say an official U.S. government visitor and it would get into the press, and we'd kind of call them on it and say if this leaks or gets undue publicity, we won't be able to have these kinds of visits in the future and that would be very unfortunate. And they'd say, oh, well, we don't know how this happened or why this happened. But basically, it wasn't tremendous strains, they were always trying to promote the look of official relations. But I don't think they were obnoxious about it. Obviously, they had their interests and we had our interests and we both understood where we were coming from, and they recognized that a certain degree of cooperation was necessary if they wanted our cooperation. Getting our noses too far out of joint would be against their interests.

Q: The main political situation is that much of the opposition is in jail now because of the Kaohsiung incident. There's a postponed election that takes place maybe when you were still in the commercial area.

IFSHIN: I don't remember any elections. [laughter] I mean elections were all that critical at that point. I remember that I was dealing with one wives of the imprisoned Kaosiung figures at that time. And Kang Ning Hsiang who subsequently fades from the scene, I guess, although I remember reading his name in the... The Chinese apparently refused to allow him to accompany whoever was leading the Taiwan delegation to the mainland in a meeting a couple of years ago. But Kung was someone I met pretty frequently with and got pretty close to. I liked him, of course he was kind of a moderate figure, the kind that Americans tend to like, and I guess wasn't enough of a firebrand for the subsequently evolution of the opposition.

Q: The Kaosiung incident itself raised a lot of thoughts of human rights and that sort of stuff. Were you getting anybody interested in the human rights situation in Taiwan or a lot of congressional inquiries?

IFSHIN: Well, yes, there were congressional inquiries and there was always an interest in the human rights situation. I wouldn't say that I was getting people interested in it, because for us it was a problem. But one of the... this is a slightly different aspect of things... in talking to... I remember John Chang in particular, making this point to him... I was always kind of pushing the line that their friends in Washington were the people who would be the most helpful to them in Washington were not the traditional lobby. Jesse Helms or people on the right in the American political spectrum, but it would be people like Steven Solarz, for example, who were interested in democracy and human rights, and that this was the line that they should be pushing and pursuing, that they are an evolving democracy, that they're not some right wing retrograde government and that this would be their natural line of support in the U.S. Congress. Again, I think that's the way that things have evolved to a considerable extent although they've maintained their support on the U.S. right as well. But they've managed to add a number of people who recognized that as they've evolved into a more democratic, I guess now you'd say fully democratic, government that they've added this support of people who are supportive of democracies.

Q: Does this new platform of the general affairs section give you more opportunity to do some traveling around the island again?

IFSHIN: Yes, I got out and visited various parts of the island, but again, because of our unofficial relationship, you don't call on the county magistrate and various governmental officials when you travel, but I managed to get out and see people, both official and unofficial.

Q: There's always the stereotype that foreign service only sees the upper level of people and doesn't get down, and now you're in an unofficial situation where you're not supposed to necessarily see the upper level people. Yet, how would you describe your understanding of the environment in Taiwan at that time?

IFSHIN: I think it was reasonably good, but not as good as I would have liked it to have been. But we got around and saw people. It was still an authoritarian system where you couldn't necessarily talk freely with a wide range of people, or people would not talk freely with you, to put it more accurately. People were still cautious about contact with foreigners, at least most people were. It was problematic. We had a good sense of what was going on, but not necessarily firsthand. We spoke a lot to the press and to, there were some of these magazines that were coming as part of the liberalization of Taiwan, the number of magazines that were opposition inclined, or at least non-KMT, being an important one. We would talk to those people regularly, publishers, editors, reporters, and that gave us a somewhat broader insight into the society and what was going on.

Q: There's been some thought that evolved thoroughly and could be anticipated that there would be a shift in recognition, that there was still was hard feelings in some quarters of the Kuomintang officials. Did you get any sense of that... were there people who didn't return your calls or you couldn't... were you trying to keep up with the Kuomintang offices as well as the government offices?

IFSHIN: Yes, we were trying to work with the Wo Man Dung and get insights from them rather assiduously, in fact since we couldn't contact the government, I think we focused on the Kuomintang somewhat more than we would have otherwise. I don't remember anyone not returning any calls. I'm convinced there were hard feelings on the part of some people, generally a mistrust of the Americans and our goodwill and our faithfulness, but I don't remember anybody stiffing me or being overtly rude. I'm sure there were people who were less cooperative than they might otherwise have been.

Q: What else is Taiwan doing to then to maintain its relationship with the United States?

IFSHIN: One of the big efforts they had going on at this point was the congressional staff delegations that they were being invited over, ostensibly under the guise of private missions. It was a non-governmental entity, that is a non-Taiwan entity, that was sponsoring them.

Q: Sun Jo University...

IFSHIN: Yes, there were a number of them. There was a series of them, but obviously it was all government money that was in fact behind this. It was a very well-funded, very well organized operation and sometimes they'd run them by us, that is they'd inform us...

Q: Congressional staffers...

IFSHIN: Congressional staffers, they inform us that they had a group of four or eight or however many were in the group, who were going to be visiting in Taiwan and they wanted a briefing from the AIT.

Q: This would be the first time that you would know that these people were coming.

IFSHIN: Right, that would usually be the case. We'd arrange a briefing, and spend sometimes a couple of hours, sometimes a morning shooting the breeze. Sometimes we wouldn't really have any contact with them at all. We'd know that some people were in town, but we wouldn't be called upon to do anything. I suspect, I believe, that it typically was at the request of the group whether we were involved or not. That is, the Taiwan authorities didn't make any particular point, or it was not routine to set up a meeting with us, but they were willing to do so if the group requested it.

Q: So a fair number of congressional staff people are coming to Taipei at this time.

IFSHIN: Perhaps numbering in the hundreds.

Q: How about congressmen themselves?

IFSHIN: You know, I just don't really recall. There must have been some, but I don't remember any congressional delegations at this time.

Q: Hm. Because we're saying, this is a brand new relationship, nobody's done this before... well, the Japanese did it prior...

IFSHIN: Well, ours was just very different, a much larger relationship.

Q: Right, so you're feeling your way, they're feeling their way, and I guess the question is as the two of you are feeling your way around and bumping into each other, did it look like it was working?

IFSHIN: My sense is that it was working very well, surprisingly. Yes, there were bumps in the road, but nothing that we weren't able to work out.

Q: Now at this time we were also pushing them on some trade issues, if I recall.

IFSHIN: I don't really recall what you are referring to.

Q: I think there's some stuff on the copyrights stuff in the books and these were the last days in which Taiwan versions of...

IFSHIN: You could get those pirated versions cheap. [laughter]

Q: [laughter]

IFSHIN: I was not involved in that. There were a number of negotiations going on, on a whole series of issues. My colleague, Clarke Ellis, who was the head of the economics section, was deeply involved in those negotiations at that time, but I never got involved in that.

Q: So, you're building relationships with party people and dealing with government people through the CCNAA thing. Any other particular incidents or circumstances come to your attention that you...

IFSHIN: I don't recall anything particularly exciting at that time.

Q: We were talking about the Kaohsiung earlier, and you'd think that the opposition had been rounded up, but my impression is that those that weren't and the wives of those who were continued to be quite aggressive, and looking for contact with the AIT.

IFSHIN: Well, the politically active members of the opposition were very open about wanting to be in contact and criticizing the government and yes, that was going on. I always had the idea that there were a lot of people who felt that they were under the Kuomintang's radar who kept a low profile and were not anxious to be... But, I had frequent contact with the opposition and they were more than willing to meet with the Americans. They wanted to meet with the Americans.

Q: I would suppose they would have some fairly interesting insights on the local political scene or why a certain set of appointments were materializing.

IFSHIN: Yes, of course they always had their take on all of the developments, it wasn't always a complete take or the most accurate one.

Q: And you were saying you were watching the Taiwanization of the Kuomintang, or of the government.

IFSHIN: Yes.

Q: Wasn't Soong the vice deputy or premier?

IFSHIN: As I say, I never got to know James oong.

Q: No, I'm thinking of another Sung who had a heart attack or stroke and that's why Lee Teng Hui became the deputy. I can't think of the name.

IFSHIN: Lee Teng Hui became...

Q: You were saying Lee Teng Hui is within your radar screen, you're seeing him move up?

IFSHIN: Oh, yes. We did have an occasion to meet with him and I always found him to be a fairly impressive figure. I did not anticipate his becoming president or doing what in fact he did. In fact, I had identified some successive generation which I thought would do some of the things that he perhaps did. I didn't anticipate it happening as quickly as it did.

Q: But even against the background of Kaosiung, you were seeing reform and movement?

IFSHIN: Yes, I think we all saw an opening and saw that Kaosiung was a setback, but a temporary setback to what was an ongoing process. Again, it all happened so much faster than we anticipated, but we did see it happen. We did anticipate it. It was the speed that was surprising.

Q: Well, after Taipei, then you moved to the Philippines where you'd started out twenty years earlier. Did you feel your career was going in circles? [laughter]

***

Q: Well, it was an interesting intellectual adventure in that you understood what you were involved in and where you were going and a little bit afterwards. As I was saying, when we were in Beijing after Tiananmen Square somebody did the same thing, took some songs, put some new lyrics to them. It was a matter of how you handled the frustration, because we'd evacuated the embassy, there were no dependents, we'd pulled 1,400 Americans, students and businessmen and there was nobody but us for about two or three months. And this process boiled up these songs. "P L A" to "Surfing USA" was interesting.

But we were going to pick up a few other things.

IFSHIN: Oh, yes, I'm sure we were, but I don't remember. It's been quite a break between this, not that it's your fault, I'm the one who became scarce.

IFSHIN: It's after my time and I think it's some years down the road. I can't give you an exact date. It all did happen and it all makes very good sense from my point of view and I believe that it has all worked out fairly well.

Q: So sitting in PIA, what are your main pressures and what are your main problems that you are working on?

IFSHIN: The main problem we have is that we are such a small office, and from the State Department's point of view, a not terribly consequential area who is getting attention. In fact, in some ways that was nice. We kind of made policy in a way that if you are a desk officer working on China you don't get to make policy, I don't think, because the amount of interest that is being shown in China by all sorts of people. But in Pacific Island Affairs, for the most part, unless there's a problem, no one's paying a whole lot of attention to what you're doing. We used to feel that basically that it was us and then it was George Schultz because George Schultz had been a marine in the Pacific in World War II and had some interest in the islands, actually. But up until that level, I don't think there were a whole lot of people who were interested in the Pacific Islands. But whenever we needed to get into see him or needed a decision we found that we had a friend in the office of the State Department.

Q: What were some of the policy areas then that you dealt with?

IFSHIN: There's a tuna treaty where we provide them, and then it was $10 million, chump change from the point of view of the State Department or the United States, but we provided the countries of the Pacific with $10 million for the rights to U.S. tuna boats to fish in their waters. It was always a big deal getting the appropriation out of Congress and keeping it going, but it was done. Nuclear issues were important. The transportation of nuclear waste and nuclear fuels basically between Japan and the United States. Plus of course the French were still testing.

Q: Yes, isn't this their main testing area?

IFSHIN: Yes, they tested in...

Q: In fact is this the main U.S. testing area after the war?

IFSHIN: Well, yes, but we were no longer doing above ground testing and hadn't been for some years. But the French, well, I don't know that they were doing above ground testing, but they were still doing nuclear testing in the Pacific. The Pacific islanders are sensitive to that. It was just coming on the horizon, but environmental issues were of increasing importance, although global warming was not yet on anyone's radar screen as far as I can recall...

Q: Just before you come on board with the desk, the New Zealanders, the Kiwis... New Zealand and the United States have this argument over nuclear issues and, in fact, the Reagan administration writes them out of the SEATO alliance. Was any of that impacting on your policy areas?

IFSHIN: Yes, it was. Obviously, we did not deal directly with New Zealand, but this was an area of great interest to New Zealand and it was an area where they wanted to show that they could show that they could still operate as an ally and be helpful. So that facilitated our work in many ways. The New Zealanders were very cooperative and helpful to us in the Pacific, as were the Australians for that matter. I think the Australians always had the attitude that they needed to educate us with regard to island issues and bring us along, which quite frankly is true. To them, this is an extremely important area, and to us it was obviously a secondary area. Although, I would maintain that again, in the U.S. government structure, although the State Department might not have put great emphasis on the Pacific islands, the defense department put a whole lot more emphasis on it and CINCPAC for example was vitally concerned.

Q: So you found yourself liaised a lot with the DOD...

IFSHIN: Yes, we worked a lot with DOD, probably more than most desks would. They were much more interested in Pacific affairs.

Q: And they had presence out there...

Q: On the analytical side, you've got capabilities and intent. It's the human intelligence that State Department collects that gets you to the intent issues.

IFSHIN: Well, I suppose. We have so many foreign students studying in this country... Well, we don't have so many Americans studying overseas, I guess [laughter]. This doesn't prevent the enormous misunderstandings. Obviously, relations with ourselves and Iran hasn't been helped by the enormous numbers of Iranians who studied in the United States in the good years or the friendly years. Now we have significant problems with China and of course, we've had enormous numbers of Chinese studying in the United States. I don't know if that has improved things or not. But managing those relations requires people who are familiar with both cultures and can address the American needs thoughtfully and foreign service officers are in a position to do that kind of thing.

HERBERT E. HOROWITZ
China Desk, Bureau of East Asian Affairs
Washington, DC (1972-1973)

Economic Counselor, American Liaison Office
Beijing (1973-1975)

Ambassador Herbert E. Horowitz was born in New York in 1930. He received his bachelor's degree from Brooklyn College in 1952. He received a master's degree from Columbia University in 1964 and from the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy in 1965. He served in the US Army from 1953-1955. His overseas posts include Taipei, Hong Kong, Peking, and Sydney. He was ambassador to the Gambia from 1986 to 1989. Ambassador Horowitz was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on December 9, 1992.

HOROWITZ: A brief stop at the China desk as deputy there, which was really the Taiwan desk; a separate office of Asian Communist Affairs covered communist China. Not long after I arrived it was announced that there would be a U.S. Liaison Office in Peking and a Chinese Liaison Office in Washington, and I was among those chosen for the first group to Peking.

Q: What were you doing when the news of the Kissinger visit to communist China came so suddenly?

HOROWITZ: I was at the National War College when some of these things were happening, and then at the Republic of China desk. Most of that was kept very closely and at a high level; not too many people were involved. When that Kissinger visit occurred where they announced that there would be a Liaison Office, I just ruled myself out because I had just started a new job. We went to a farewell party for the advance team that was going to Peking, and I was politely informed there that I would join the first group; within hardly any time at all, my wife and I were packing.

Q: Before we get to that -- you were at the Taiwan desk: What was the perception of our people dealing with Taiwan just as this whole new world was opening up? Where did they think this was going to go?

HOROWITZ: I think most of the officers who had studied some Chinese and had had some experience in the China area were very interested in the opening to Peking and were hoping that this would provide an opportunity to visit communist China -- we used to say communist China, now we say mainland China. There was also some concern about the relationship with Taiwan; but at that time I don't think anyone perceived that it would advance to the point of breaking formal relations with Taiwan. After all, for a lot of years we had a close tie to the KMT, the Kuomintang, in Taiwan. After 1949 we had given them a lot of support, a lot of military assistance, a lot of economic assistance; it was hard to imagine that this would change in the way that it subsequently did change.

Q: You were with the first team to go to China. Could you talk a little about the composition of the team, what you expected you would be doing and your experiences when you got there?

HOROWITZ: We had little in the way of expectations because the idea of a Liaison Office was a new one. We knew that technically we would not have diplomatic status so the head of the Liaison Office was to be called the Chief of the Liaison Office, the head of the political section would be the Chief of the Political Unit, and I would be the Chief of the Economic Unit. We didn't know to what extent we would have access, how easy or difficult it would be to collect information. It was a new thing; we really had very little time, it had happened so quickly, to prepare. Part of it was to feel our way. David Bruce wanted the office to be small.

Q: He was the first Chief?

HOROWITZ: Yes, the Chief of the Liaison Office. He resisted pressures from other agencies to send their representatives at that time. I know that because in Washington I accompanied him on calls on different economic departments such as Commerce and Agriculture. Those departments were anxious to have people at the Liaison Office. But Bruce put everybody off saying that we don't know what it is going to be like, we have to keep it small and feel our way. So he resisted; he wanted that office to be small. I remember him telling some anecdotes about his past experiences, e.g., being Ambassador to London where there were so many people in the Embassy he didn't know who many of them were or what they were doing.

Q: Well he had been Ambassador in London, in Paris, all the places where you never get to meet your staff.

HOROWITZ: So he was anxious that it be small and compact, and that is the way it was. We started off with Bruce, two deputies (if the Liaison Office was unlike any diplomatic mission, it was also different in that it had two deputies; John Holdridge who had been at the NSC and Al Jenkins who had been at the China desk), two officers in the political section, two in the economic section, and communicators and administrative staff. It was really quite a small operation to begin with.

Q: And you were the Chief of the Economic Unit?

HOROWITZ: Yes. One of the things that I did which did not endear me to some of my colleagues in the State Department, was to decide that we be called the "Commercial/Economic" section. I did that because at that point there was a lot of interest in the American business community, and we began to cover the Canton trade fair where American businessmen for the first time were allowed in. We got lots and lots of inquiries about trade. Also, I was not sure of how much economic China watching we could do from Peking so I thought it would a good idea to call it a Commercial/Economic section. My successor changed that.

Q: Why would there be a problem with our colleagues back in Washington by calling it Commercial/Economic?

HOROWITZ: I was trying to put the emphasis on the commercial. This was the period when Commerce had begun asserting its independence and State was trying to hang on to its turf. I really felt that "commercial" was appropriate. Incidentally, we also had a very good desk officer in Commerce at that time, and with his help managed to disregard burdensome Commerce procedures and forms; we improvised as we went along, the best we could. We had a lot of cooperation and support from State and Commerce.

Q: When you arrived there how did you set up?

HOROWITZ: We all lived at the Peking Hotel. Some of us had little children and they were running up and down the halls in the Peking Hotel. We had a couple of rooms at the Peking Hotel that we used for office purposes. My first secretary came on direct transfer from Saigon and she was bright enough to put in her suitcase some paper, some carbon paper, some envelopes and pencils and that is what we had at the beginning. At that point, the Chinese were putting up the building in the diplomatic area that was to become the Liaison Office and behind that the building that was to be the residence of the Chief of the Liaison Office, but it was a few months before we were able to move in. Those buildings are still there; the building that we used for our office is now the USIS building and the residence is still the Ambassador's residence. The Embassy is spread out in some other buildings in the neighborhood. We had no files to begin with, that was the second time in my career that we had to do reporting without any files, and it is amazing what you can do. We all knew something about China so if you were doing a reporting message you drew on your memory, what you had read about, what you knew about, and drew some comparisons.

Q: Did you find there was a quantum change by being at the center -- you had been on the periphery before -- or not?

HOROWITZ: Yes there was a change in that what we benefited from was a sort of first hand, visual kind of feel, and having for the first time working level contacts with Chinese counterparts, which in Hong Kong you don't have. However, our lives were very circumscribed; the lives of all diplomats were circumscribed -- though technically we were not diplomats. We couldn't travel very much; Chinese officials were very withdrawn and circumspect about what they talked about. During that period, I was there from 1973 to 1975, I think the reporting we did was a contribution, but in many ways the reporting from Hong Kong was better. They had more people, they had files and they were getting bits and pieces of information from different parts of China -- people who left China, travelers, provincial radio broadcasts. So there were a number of things that they in Hong Kong saw in better perspective than we did sitting in the Liaison Office. I think what we did was a contribution but it didn't supplant the China watchers in Hong Kong.

Q: China is such a vast place and there are so many provincial aspects that being in the center is not necessarily the best vantage point.

HOROWITZ: It was a wonderful personal experience.

Q: Let's talk a little about the commercial side. The Chinese were more responsive on the commercial side -- they have always been a commercial people. What are your comments on this?

HOROWITZ: You have to remember that at that period China had not yet opened up. In the sixties, there was limited trade with the western world; then the Cultural Revolution. In this period when we were there, in the seventies, there was more foreign trade but the power struggle in leadership was developing between the Gang of Four and the pragmatists.

Q: Yes, the Gang of Four was on trial.

HOROWITZ: No, they were making a bid for power and resisting the expansion of contacts with the West. The pragmatists, then led by Zhou En-lai, were trying to bring Deng Xiaoping back; they were trying to make their place in the sun. So it was not a time for great commercial opening. There was a limited commercial opening; they were interested in beginning to sell some things to the west and they were interested in American wheat and some other products, but they were still rather skittish about it. The Chinese officials were not very open; they were afraid to be in many ways. What we learned was mostly what our businessmen would tell us; we would digest it and then give advice, without revealing any secrets, to other businessmen. There were so few business visitors to Peking in those days -- that's where businessmen wanted to go because it was the headquarters of the state trading companies -- that they would come to see us. American businessmen would come to Peking and the first thing they would do is contact the Liaison Office. We would tell them what to expect and how to conduct themselves and very often they would come back later and give us a report. So we were able to build up a body of knowledge on doing business with China, at that time.

We did a similar thing at the Canton trade fair, a twice a year vehicle. That is where the Chinese did most of their selling, but also a lot of their buying too. The Canton fair was an important first step for an American or other foreign businessman in dealing with China. So if they could get a visa to go to the Canton fair they might have some hope of developing a relationship and later on maybe traveling to Peking or other parts of China. What we did was to take a suite at the hotel opposite the Canton fairground to serve as a mini-office. We would man it through the whole month of the fair with one or two people. We would give advice and help, and learn from the experiences of American businessmen. The Chinese still published no data and gave you very little information.

Q: Did you kind of wonder what you were doing?

HOROWITZ: No, we were quite busy and I think we did help a lot of American business people as intermediaries, as providers of information. I can think of a number of instances when we were helpful to American businessmen at that time. The commercial side was interesting and active but it was different than a usual commercial operation.

Q: On the economic side, as there wasn't much published much of that work could have been done better from Hong Kong, could it not?

HOROWITZ: Yes, but we were able to pick up some information that would be part of the input; some impressions, what the Chinese were buying, what they seemed to be interested in. If they really were in the market for a lot of wheat we knew that something did go wrong with their crop, for example. So we were able to provide certain inputs. But for the broad economic China watching that could be elsewhere.

Q: Did you feel at all the problems that plagued us serving in the Soviet Union where the KGB was trying to entrap you. Were there any of these games or were there just restrictions on you?

HOROWITZ: We always felt watched but so did other foreigners, I don't think we felt more watched than other people. I don't think they ever tried to entrap; they listened, we were positive our apartments were bugged and to the extent that they could bug our offices they probably did that too. I remember that when we finally moved into some apartments, the elevator operator must have been the head party cadre because she seemed to be the font of all information. We were watched quite carefully, what we did and where we went. We had to request permission to travel outside of Peking -- we learned the technique of asking to visit five places and hope they'll approve two. When you went to another place you had to check in with the police when you arrived and you had to check in when you left. That was true for all foreigners. So they kept close touch, but I didn't sense they were trying to entrap us.

Some of the politics did get into the trade things. I remember very vividly that one of the problems we had was the Chinese complaint that in American wheat which they bought there was a type of wheat smut which they didn't have in China and they were afraid that this would contaminate their wheat. We had to bring out experts in from the Department of Agriculture to look into this and explain that there was no danger. The issue was more political than it was economic because at that time the Shanghai papers, and in Shanghai the radicals had a dominant voice, were criticizing Chinese officials who bought poisoned wheat from abroad. There was a political conflict going on and it impinged on our commercial operation. At the Liaison Office we did not have much contact with the radicals of the party, the Gang of Four crowd. Most of the people we saw and had dealings with in the government were the pragmatists, the ones who were trying to get the country back on the road again and working and to get the economy improved. Occasionally we would have some contact but generally speaking we did not.

I remember we had a visit from the Philadelphia symphony, Ormandy was the conductor. It was a great cultural thing. One of the things they did was to play a Beethoven symphony, I think it was the sixth. We later learned that Madam Mao had requested this. They had to scurry all over China to get the music, because the orchestra didn't bring it with them. Not long after that a political campaign was launched, the anti-Beethoven campaign. It was a campaign, initially probably aimed at Madam Mao, but it got twisted and became a leftist vehicle. So we did get marginally involved in some of these things.

Q: Were we concerned about the transfer of technology? Not just military technology but also that they might get our techniques and copy them.

HOROWITZ: Yes, but it was not a serious problem then. We visited factories where there would be one piece of Western machinery, very old, and then several more that were copies. At that point we still had very stringent controls on export of technology to China as well as other communist countries, and copying of new technology was not a serious problem. Their economy was not very advanced at that time.

Q: What about intellectual property problems, basically copyrights and that type of thing?

HOROWITZ: Not a serious problem then because they had total control over publications. Very, very little material had been published in China in any language since before the Cultural Revolution. There was no free market anywhere so it was a totally controlled situation; it became a problem later on. To illustrate the atmosphere about books: There was an international club, it is still there, which was designed for foreigners: tennis courts and swimming pool and things like that. It wasn't really a club, it was the Chinese conception of what the foreigners might want. There was a very nice room that was called the Library; it had a lot of windows, easy chairs, a lot of shelves, most of which were empty. The only books on the shelves were Mao's works and three or four communist publications, that's all.

Q: How were we reporting on political events? How were we getting our knowledge?

HOROWITZ: Conversations with other people, impressions -- there was always a big exchange among people in the foreign missions -- some little bits and pieces that the Chinese would tell us, what we would see in the newspaper. It was limited. We knew when there was a big meeting in the Great Hall of the People from the number of limousines that would be pulling up and one or the other of us would bicycle by a few times to see what was doing -- that type of thing. I think we did a fair bit of reporting but it was limited to what we would have exposure to. It was frustrating to some extent; Bruce stayed about a year and then George Bush came and I think they were both to some extent frustrated that they could not deal more with Chinese officials. The Chinese were very uptight in those days, very reserved; they would not speak in a relaxed way or off the record. I know that Bush tried very, very hard. He was great to work for; he read our briefing papers and listened to what we had to say. I remember going with him to pay calls on Chinese officials -- the economic minister or the head of their civil aviation or someone like that; we would do a briefing paper, he read it, we talked about it in the car, and he really tried to get some information, to break down the barrier. It was very, very frustrating because the Chinese officials would only reveal or say what they felt authorized to do.

Q: By the time you left in 1975, what was the political situation?

HOROWITZ: It hadn't changed much. Actually after we were there and set up the Liaison Office and the radicals had been on the counterattack, things tightened up. Relations were not so good. As a matter of fact, I think the second year we were there there was a drop in the U.S. trade with China; instead of an increase, it fell. Our relationship with the Chinese was in many ways tied to what was happening in China and the political struggle that was going on. But we had made some contacts and knew some of the people and gotten some information.

Q: How about developments in Vietnam, as things were going from bad to worse; did that affect what you were doing or was it pretty much over the horizon?

HOROWITZ: It was pretty much over the horizon. The Chinese at that point were primarily concerned with the Soviets. In the 1950's they leaned toward the Soviets, in the 1960's there was the Sino-Soviet split, and in 1969 there was the border clash in Manchuria and the Chinese got socked. It finally dawned on them that the Soviets had really built up considerable military strength all along the Sino-Soviet border. All the Soviet buildups in Europe were balanced by Soviet buildups in Asia. So the Chinese were very concerned about the Soviets. This was one of the reasons for their opening up to the West and the United Nations. They wanted to gradually build some sort of normal relationship with the West. As I recall, that seemed to be their main concern in that period.

Q: Did you have any contact with the Soviets when you were there?

HOROWITZ: Oh, yes. The Soviets in Peking felt very isolated; they wanted to be friends with us because they knew it would aggravate the Chinese if we were friendly. The Soviets would invite us, and frankly we wanted to keep the Soviets a little bit away; if we got too close it would harm our relations with the Chinese. The Soviets had magnificent embassy grounds and they would open up their place -- they had a pond -- for ice skating and hockey on the weekends, invite our kids to go there, invite us to films. Bill Rope, who was my colleague on the commercial/economic side, and I, along with our wives, would be invited by our Soviet counterparts; they would give us vodka, drink and food. They wanted to be our pals in the worst way. They were helpful too in that they would explain to us how Sino-Soviet trade was carried out. Also the other East Europeans who were there were friendly; we heard a lot about the trade patterns of China and the rest of the communist world. To the extent that we could, we would compare notes with them. The Soviets were very anxious to be friendly.

Q: You left there in 1975, and what did you do then?

HOROWITZ: I went to INR. It was my hope that maybe at that point in my career I could get to another part of the world. That is when Kissinger started a program that got the acronym, "GLOP".

KATHERINE SCHWERING
Lending Officer
Chase Manhattan Bank (1972-1976)

Ms. Schwering was born in Wyoming and raised abroad and various localities in the US. She was educated at Northwestern University and Johns Hopkins School of Advanced International Studies (SAIS). She joined Chase Bank, where she was trained as an international economist, and worked with them until joining the State Department in 1978. During her career Ms. Schwering worked primarily on international economic, monetary and terrorist matters in Washington and abroad. Her overseas posts were in Burundi, Yugoslavia and Turkey. Ms. Schwering was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2005.

Q: Where did they put you; what was your first job?

SCHWERING: Into a staff job, but I lucked out. This was 1973, and China had just contacted David Rockefeller to invite him to China. He was the first American since the revolution in '48 to be invited to China. I forget now, but I think it was that Chase was the only U.S. bank that had maintained relations with China, even though all of China's assets were frozen. Well, then they needed somebody to monitor this account, and I was chosen; but it was a staff position.

While the law prevented us from dealing with China, there were dual claims on bank accounts. That is what it was called as both Taiwan and China claimed accounts dating from 1948. These were frozen until such time as a court might decide to whom they belonged. However, we also didn't recognize China. The People's Republic of China said they were not about to deal with anyone in the United States until they received recognition. It was also around this time they were finally granted observer status in the UN. It was all very new, and I was monitoring it. Then they created a lending officer position in the Asian banking group for China, and I was moved into it, because I was the only one in the bank then working on China. That was an incredible opportunity.

Q: When you say China, which do you mean?

SCHWERING: People's Republic of China. I worked in that position from '74 to the fall of '76.

Having been granted observer status to the UN, the next thing the Chinese did was open a representative office here in Washington. Of course I wasn't really familiar with the State Department at that point, so I don't know how this was arranged. But there were other issues that came up. When a Chinese delegation flew into New York to attend a meeting, for example the general assembly of the UN, there were attempts to seize the airplane, because it was a Chinese asset on U.S. soil. That was when I first met one of the two people in the U.S. who had been trained linguistically, and otherwise, to eventually deal with China. One, I can't remember his name, he became an ambassador. He later was our ambassador to Saudi Arabia.

Q: Oh yes, Chas Freeman.

SCHWERING: That's right. I met him when he was up at the UN.

Q: I've interviewed Chas.

SCHWERING: He was quite impressive.

Q: He is one of the most remarkable people you ever could meet. You have to put him in the genius category.

SCHWERING: Really. Well, I was impressed by him. I remember his approaching me at Chase. I may not have been on the China account any more. He asked me about the assets question and other things.

Now, China, having once made contact with David Rockefeller and having him travel there, decided they wanted to do business with us. It was trade initially; and, of course, because they had to avoid having any assets in the United States, they arranged with Chase (I was the person on the other end) to have banking transactions done through a Japanese bank. They also, somehow, had the trade restrictions lifted, and they began to export very basic things to the United States, like beeswax, batteries, and acupuncture needles, even though I don't think they were used in the U.S. at that time. To make payment for these, American importers would pay the Japanese bank, which would then remit the money to China. So, in effect, I was dealing with the Japanese, not the Chinese.

What was fascinating, though, is that because Chase was the very first institution in the United States to begin dealing with China, I must have met every CEO of every major company in the United States. They just swarmed in to any meeting with the Chinese. They just swarmed to Chase, because we were the only bank to have a relationship. It was absolutely amazing, you know. These companies included Reynolds tobacco, John Deere, Boeing – you name it. Sooner or later, they would come to me, because I was the desk officer for China.

I also must have met every student in the United States who was graduating in Chinese studies and wanted a job. I also discovered that at the time the CIA (this was before they were not permitted to operate domestically) were sent to me under cover. This was not classified, it was somebody who purported to be from the Department of Commerce. Now, in those days, I could have counted on one hand the number of people who really had anything to do with China. This guy didn't fit; it just didn't ring true. No one from commerce had ever contacted me. I was called into David Rockefeller's assistant's office at one point after this. I was told that this individual had gone back to Washington. He said that I knew too much, and that there was no way he was going to be able to maintain his cover, and they told me who he was and that I was free to share with him whatever information I wanted to. The U.S. government had offered to share with us unclassified financial or economic information. Also, at that time, I was asked by the Department of Commerce to write an article on doing business with China, which I did.

Q: Just to put this in perspective, Kissinger and Nixon went to China. Where did this come in?

SCHWERING: They went in '72. I totally forgot about that. That was the opening.

Q: The opening, but not official recognition, which was coming.

SCHWERING: That's right. I had forgotten about that. Well it didn't come until what – '78? As I say, we were the first institution to have relations with them. This was before they were permitted to open their observer missions in the U.S.

Q: Did you get any contact with Chinese?

SCHWERING: Yes, I was going to go on to that. As a result of Chase's relationship with China, the very first Chinese delegation was invited to visit the U.S. I don't remember what year it was. It might have been '75 or '76. It was a textile delegation. Textiles are labor intensive and, like most third world countries, China could produce these cheaply. They were hoping to export to the U.S., but they ran into our textile quotas. After the Chinese contacted Chase, some businessmen managed to visit China. It was the private sector that hosted the first visit to the U.S. We did invite the State Department and government officials to attend the lunches and meetings.

The Chinese delegation had a schedule. They were going to be in New York for a couple of days, and then they were going to go to a couple of other places. I remember this Chinese delegation was going to visit a textile mill in the South. Well, it didn't take them long after they arrived here to realize this was not a good thing for a textile delegation from China to do. Plus, I think there was a strike on at the mill they were going to visit in North Carolina; so that part got cancelled.

I remember I worked with Manufacturers Hanover Trust Bank (Manny Hanny) in New York City, and a couple of other banks to set up their financial day in New York City. Now the interesting thing about this was translation. We needed translators. This being the time it was in the U.S. there were no translators. There were no Chinese speakers who were familiar with the vocabulary used on the mainland, much less any translators, and even much less any simultaneous translators. So I put on my thinking cap. Mind you, I was just in my early 20's at this point. I contacted the UN and I asked if I could borrow a couple of translators. The answer was "Yes, as long as it is kind of off the record, you pay them. You must understand there is no connection to the UN, because this still wasn't official." So we set up a half-day banking seminar. I forget what the other half day was.

I was the one who organized the banking seminar. I started two or three weeks beforehand to work with these two Chinese simultaneous translators, because things were highly politically sensitive. If you talked about WWII and up to the revolution in China, mainland Chinese referred to it as "the liberation," but Taiwanese referred to it as the revolution or something like that. At this point, if we had used the wrong vocabulary, the Chinese delegation would have gotten up and gone home. Not only that, but you find that in almost any language, banking and commercial translations are almost non-existent. For example, what is a lien, what is a mortgage? These things were very tough. Also, I had studied socialist economies in graduate school, and I understood them and a lot of these concepts didn't exist there. So, I prepared lists of words and concepts for these translators, because they were going to have to translate them during this seminar. They, it turns out, would sneak to the Chinese observer mission in New York City, which would then telex Beijing and work with them on appropriate translations, which would then be sent back. This was all off the books you know.

When the time came for the morning seminar, we had these two translators, who could only do 15 or 20 minutes at a time, so they had to switch off. We had presentations by the big bank. We explained some concepts, and we also explained how financial markets – at least the banking market, not the investment market – in the U.S. worked. I was so pleased when one of the older members of the delegation casually walked over to me during one of the coffee breaks and said, "You know this translation is excellent." He had no idea what had gone into this. Neither did my bosses. I didn't even check with anyone at the bank. There was a lot more autonomy in the private sector.

A couple of things were interesting about this delegation. First of all, I was pressured by Chase and other banks to schedule something for all three evenings the Chinese were going to be in the U.S. Now, I didn't want to do that, because they had just arrived from China and I knew they were suffering jet lag. Also, one of the oldest members of this delegation had participated in the long march. However, despite my trying to convince my colleagues, who weren't internationally oriented, that these guys should have some evening of rest, I had to set things up. It may have been August or something and the only thing I could find for them to do was the New York Planetarium. Well, that turned out to be a real mistake. I don't know if you have been in there, but they have the moving heavens, and you look up and see all the planets and stars and other things. Well, it made at least one member of the delegation very ill. He got so nauseated they had to escort him outside of the planetarium. I was criticized later for subjecting these elderly people to something like this. Which was quite funny.

There was a woman leading this delegation, which was also in the U.S. in business at that time a knockout punch. They were all dressed in Mao suits, with the short hair cut. It was very hard to tell she was a woman. I remember it was at a dinner or lunch. I thought I would have a little bit of fun and asked one of the members of the delegation a slight question about their being able to do something if they wanted to. I can't remember what I asked – something like if they wanted to go off in New York City on their own and look around or something else, could they do it. They all the heads turned to look at this young woman with very sharp features who had been very quiet all along. She was obviously the Communist Party guard dog in this delegation. It was very funny.

Then our job was to get them to Washington DC, which was their next stop. I borrowed David Rockefeller's plane, and Manny Hanny lent their plane. These were small executive jets. This is the only time in my life I have been a stewardess. We put half the delegation on Rockefeller's plane and half on Manny Hanny's plane, as I recall, and we flew them down to Washington, where we handed them over to, perhaps, the Chamber of Commerce or whatever, someone like that. I stayed down there with them for awhile. I remember their very first lunch was held at a hotel. It was hundreds of people, because of course, every business man in the United States wanted to do business with China.

Q: Oh yes, think of a billion customers.

SCHWERING: Yes – and sell a billion toothbrushes.

Q: And oil for the lamps.

SCHWERING: This was, I believe, the third time this century that you had seen this. I knew this, but these businessmen didn't. I couldn't believe it. Well, first of all I knew about the Chinese because I had a retired Chinese general as my only customer of mainland Chinese origin at this time – an American customer. He was someone who, rather than choose between the communists and the nationalists, had emigrated to the U.S. in '48. His wife was later hired to help design the new Latin-based alphabet that they use to teach children. Apparently they were viewed as politically neutral by the Chinese. In the mid 70's, she was invited back. That is why you see all the X's and Q's in Chinese translation.

We were down in Washington. The delegation was hosted to this huge lunch in some hotel here. You know the Chinese don't like big chunks of meat and they don't eat dairy products – things like that. I couldn't believe it when I looked at the menu and the host of this luncheon decided to serve chicken Kiev. That was three fails in one; but I think it was totally innocent.

Q: Oh I'm sure. But chicken Kiev is one of the standard rubber chicken dishes on the conference circuit.

SCHWERING: Yes, you have to consider the politics between the Soviet Union and China at the time; that's what made me laugh. Plus it was full of butter. The Chinese delegation were very good sports. While they went on to other visits, it was really quite an interesting exercise here.

Q: You think of the Chinese, and I think of two things. One, you have the after effects of the cultural revolution.

SCHWERING: That was '66.

Q: Oh, it had already ended, but there were reverberations. I think the gang of four was still at it, and there were still great problems there. On the other hand, the Chinese were probably pre-eminent in the mercantile world. They have an astute business sense. They had that connection all along in Hong Kong. Did you run across the Hong Kong connection? Did that crop up while you were dealing with it?

SCHWERING: Well, yes. They had a Bank of China. That was their only institution permitted to deal with the outside world and they had an office in Hong Kong. However, I was not permitted to travel as I was a woman. So, Chase wouldn't send me to China or to Hong Kong. But I got around that too. What happened was that in 1975 I took a vacation in Southeast Asia. By that point, the U.S.-China Business Council had been set up in Washington DC. Again, that was private sector. It was an association like the Soviet-American business council. I knew all of those guys very well. One of those young men and a friend of his and I decided to go to Southeast Asia together. It was quite a trip in Laos at the time when the communists in Laos were coming to the top. I took the liberty, when I was in Hong Kong, of calling on the Bank of China. I didn't have the bank's permission to do it, but I did it. I just introduced myself. That was the only connection, because they dealt through the Japanese with us.

Q: I am trying to go back just to capture the time. Was it that you weren't permitted to travel to places on your own? I mean, you weren't in the company to seduce the male members on a trip. But how about by yourself? Was there concern that you might be vulnerable or was it just that women didn't do business? What was going on?

SCHWERING: They never said it, of course, but it was A. women didn't do business, and B. no one would take a woman seriously, and our clients wouldn't take a woman seriously. I think it was just so unheard of. They also would not assign any woman overseas. This infuriated me, because people who had been recruited into the training program along with me, who were simply English majors and had no advanced degree, were then sent to run a branch in Africa or Europe or something, and here I was with an international studies masters from Johns Hopkins, and they wouldn't even let me travel. The discrimination was considerable at the time.

At the time that I was working on this account, I secretly joined a group of women who were bringing a class action suit against Chase Manhattan Bank for sex discrimination. We chose a labor lawyer who was very good, as we thought the best kind of lawyer to represent us would be somebody who was used to representing workers against big management. We toyed with hiring a guy who was the famous lawyer who got convicted of using his client's funds and who was known as a liberal lawyer. It wasn't Kunster; I will come up with the names. We toyed with hiring them all, but we chose this woman who was very smart; she kept our names secret until the very last minute.

When we finally held a press conference, we timed it well. I had friends in journalism who told us the best day and time to hold it. I think it was held on a Friday afternoon, because most people don't read the Saturday and Sunday papers. This was going to hit Wall Street like a bombshell, and it did.

It was very interesting to see the reaction at Chase. Management became very careful about handling us women. But, what stunned me was that all of my female colleagues, except for the 13 members of the suit, avoided me and the others like the plague. But I had male colleague after male colleague come up to me and say, "Good for you." It was just the opposite of what you would think. The men of my generation were behind us.

Q: Looking generationally, I have watched this in the Foreign Service. The women who had made it up through very tough times, and had made a niche for themselves, even though they may have been discriminated against, felt threatened because here are some people who are going to rock the boat. They have made it, but on men's terms. All of a sudden here you are – a bunch of young squirts – saying, "Let's change the rules." These other women would rather play by the old rules.

SCHWERING: Well, the few blacks that had been admitted into the training program had also done something similar. They hadn't sued, but apparently, they had gathered together and talked. I was unaware of this. It was before we brought our suit. But, apparently, management cautioned them they didn't want to see any groups of blacks getting together and talking; which in that environment was a threat. So it was interesting. I didn't consider myself any better or different from anyone else at the bank. But, it was extraordinarily hard to get what I wanted, and I wanted to go overseas. I was very lucky with this China thing, because I was literally part of history. Like I said, the Commerce Department later asked me to write a China trade article. I may have written the very first article in the United States on how to do business with China. It was called, "Doing Business With China." The Commerce Department published it as a pamphlet for companies all over the United States.

Q: Were you able, at that point, to pick up on some of the problems in China? As you said, there has been this gold rush three times in the 20th century of people running to China thinking, "Oh boy! We've have got these billion customers." They almost all have come a cropper, because of the issues of just dealing with China.

SCHWERING: The Chinese can outsmart anyone.

Q: Certainly, there wasn't that much money to be gained at that time as these were mostly poor peasants.

SCHWERING: China had a huge lack of foreign exchange. I seem to remember that when I did my analysis of China, their entire balance of payments both in and out amounted to 13 billion dollars. That was just nothing for a country that size. So, they didn't have much foreign exchange to buy foreign products, they weren't selling much around the world, and the quality of their products meant they didn't earn much foreign exchange.

Q: Did you have access anywhere? This is before American businessmen had the experience. You know, over time, they would come back and talk and pretty soon you built up quite a few case histories of what worked and what didn't work.

SCHWERING: Well they didn't get much trading done. That was one of the stories I was going to tell you. It was absolutely hilarious to talk to these businessmen after they had come back from China, because they would tell me stories about how they would be in negotiations with the Chinese for three days, and the main guy they would be dealing with would be flipping business cards, and he would put them down on the table. Gee the top business card would be the card from the main competitor, the company they had been dealing with. Or they would find out the guy who had been pouring tea for three days was the head negotiator. The Chinese were just so clever. I knew this. I had studied the Chinese, and I had this Chinese general who took me down to Chinatown all the time. From him I learned a lot about how the Chinese view money. They don't trust banks. There wasn't a person in Chinatown who kept their money in a bank.

Q: They collected together in clans or whatever and would lend it to each other.

SCHWERING: I don't know if they did that. I know that is Korean. I never heard much about that, but they would keep their money in their mattresses. The money of course, stayed in the family. They don't have the same societal structure as Korea, not in that regard, as far as I was aware of. But of course, they were so smart. They would force these businessmen to buy things they didn't need at all, just for the privilege of getting a visa. I remember one of the first businessmen – I don't remember if it was John Deere or someone else, was forced to buy thousands of gross of acupuncture needles. He didn't know what the heck to do with them, so he had them encased in Lucite and handed them out as company gifts to manufacturing firms. Oh, the Chinese were so funny, and I used to get so amused.

Ah, what was interesting was during this time Chou en-Lai died. That is the story. Chase wanted to send condolences, but nobody really was quite sure what position he held in China. He wasn't a government official. That was the first time I called the State Department, and they did have kind of a China desk. The guy there was really helpful. He said, "The official position Chou holds was chairman of some council or other." So I said, "Okay, we would like to send condolences. How do we get it there?" He didn't know. The State Department didn't know, because they didn't do business with them. So he got back to me. I forget how, but we telexed, or sent a telegram to something. Anyway, I wrote out the condolences, with the address and everything and sent it up to Rockefeller's office. I got the funniest call from his administrative aide at the time, Joseph Reed, who, as you know, later became our ambassador to Morocco. Then, the senior vice president who called me about the telegram for Chou said, "You know, we wanted to send it this way, but you recommended we send it that way, so we are going to do it." So they had a lot of confidence in me in that regard. So we sent it off.

But also another interesting episode during my time in the Asian banking group when I was the desk officer for China, was that there was that assassination attempt on Park Chung-hee. And wasn't his wife or something....

Q: His wife was killed. An assassin came up and shot at Park Chung-hee but hit his wife.

SCHWERING: He was wounded I think, right?

Q: I don't think so. I think his wife took the bullet. I can't remember.

SCHWERING: Our Korean desk officer was Frank Han, a Korean, who later went to China. He was classmates with all the vice ministers. He later went back to Korea for Chase, after I joined the Foreign Service. Well, anyway, Frank Han was very funny. We had him to handle the Koreans; we had a Japanese person to handle the Japanese accounts. Nobody in the Asian Bank Group liked Park Chung-hee. We knew him for what he was. So again Rockefeller's office wanted to send condolences of some kind, or an acknowledgement. So we had to figure out what we would say. To tell you the truth, most of the individuals at that time felt that it was too bad the assassin had missed. I believe we crafted something very diplomatic to President Park saying we were very sorry to hear about the loss of his wife or something like that. We didn't address his injuries. The bank sent that off. So it was a little like working in the State Department.

Q: Were you getting anything from the tremendous financial network out of Taiwan? I mean these people were all over the place.

SCHWERING: Yes, we had a Taiwan desk also. Of course, that was where our business was. But, what was interesting was banks for both Chinas were cooperating very quietly. Because our operations departments didn't really understand the difference between the Democratic People's Republic of China and the Republic of China, on occasion a bank transfer, a trade payment, would get put into a frozen account when it should have been put into a Taiwanese account or we would accidentally put a payment amount for the mainland into a Taiwanese account, which, under U.S. law, the Taiwanese account could then seize because they had claims. We would then get these quiet little calls from the operations department at the Taiwanese bank in town, whose accounts weren't frozen saying, "Pssst, you have accidentally..." or, "Pssst, this payment wasn't meant for us. It should have been put in the Bank of China account with the Japanese bank." They were surprisingly cooperative on the business side.

On the political side of course, they were geared up and lobbying heavily in the United States to prevent the U.S. government from going forward with any plans to re-establish relations with the People's Republic of China. The Taiwanese were furious when the People's Republic was granted an observer mission at the UN and then, later, when they opened their observer mission here in Washington, in the same building where their embassy is.

I used to travel down to Washington, DC periodically and meet with them. I would take bank customers with me. It was very funny. I remember some of the representatives of some of the biggest corporations in this country would go into the embassy for this meeting and all of a sudden talk about what they would do for their workers and how they treated their workers. Everything was workers this and workers that. Of course I knew differently. It was absolutely hilarious. How they would try to cater to the Chinese!

Q: Show they were very much proletarian...

SCHWERING: I would sit there and be really amused. I've always had a perspective on things.

NICHOLAS PLATT
Liaison Officer
Beijing (1973)

Ambassador Nicholas Platt was born in New York, New York in 1936. He attended Harvard University and Johns Hopkins University, and entered the Foreign Service in 1959. His career included positions in Hong Kong, Japan, China, Washington, DC, and ambassadorships to Zambia, the Philippines, and Pakistan. Ambassador Platt was interviewed by Paul McCusker in 1994.

Q: I think he showed that too with his talks with Marshall in Jakarta before he was President. They had a lot of very serious conversations about China. Now, I don't know who was briefing who because I wasn't there.

So you got to the Liaison Office and George Bush was there...

PLATT: No, George Bush was not there. I went there during the year that George Bush was not there. I went there when we first opened up. I was asked to be in the Liaison Office I guess on the strength of the fact that I had been on this trip. I was scheduled to go to Japan, having asked for Japan because I didn't think China would open up for a long time, to leave the Secretariat when I was supposed to leave in the spring of 1973 and go to Japanese language training for a year and then go to Tokyo and take the number two job in the political section. And I did that.

Well, I was called upon to go to China and be the head of the political section when the Liaison Office blew up. What I mean by that is it became an immediate reality, it suddenly blew up onto the horizon and I was asked to go. I thought it would be an historical opportunity and broke the assignment to Japan. I went and worked for a better part of a year with David Bruce. Bruce was the first of our heads of the Liaison Office.

Q: I had forgotten that.

PLATT: Yes. He was a wonderful man and totally inexperienced in China, but he was our senior most diplomat. It was a very strange office, I have to tell you, because this first year there was amazing. The way I pieced it together, Henry Kissinger told both John Holdridge and Al Jenkins that they would be the head of the Liaison Office when it was ultimately opened, and I think that he meant it. I think he perceived it as a small outfit with relatively low level leadership, just, for example, as the liaison office we are setting up in Vietnam now, is going to be. But the Chinese upped the ante by sending their senior most diplomat as head of their Liaison Office. He had been ambassador four or five times and was the one ambassador who had not been purged during the Cultural Revolution and the one ambassador who was a member of the Central Committee. So Kissinger had to respond and his response was to send our senior most diplomat who was David Bruce. But in order to somehow do right by Holdridge and Jenkins he sent them both as DCMs. We had two DCMs. We had ten officers. One chief, two deputies, three kind of heads of sections and some number twos and that was basically it. Well, it didn't work very well. The two DCMs canceled each other out. And so the counselor level people basically ran the place. But we will let that all come out in the wash.

In any case I worked through that first year. I got involved in a fatal accident which occurred in November. It was a broad daylight affair where I was driving my family to the Great Wall and a young girl, a 15 year old, pedaled in front of me. Just came right across my bow and I hit and killed her. I flagged down a truck and put her on the back of the truck, with the language I could do all of this, and took her to the hospital. It was the hospital that didn't deal with heads, only with broken limbs, so I took her to another hospital and she died there. The Chinese reacted to this in a very traditional way. After a month of investigations, they found me responsible and assessed the insurance for this, damages to the family, etc. Then they called me in and said, "When a diplomat is involved in a fatal accident, he or she invariably leave of their own accord." I said, "Fine, I will be gone in a month." They said, "Fine."

If I had stayed and fought about it I would have ultimately left not of my own accord. This has been a bone of contention amongst those who were working the issues, but I convinced Holdridge and all the others, and they agreed with me that this was the way to do it and that while we felt ill-used and that it was not a fair judgment that it was the right way to manage it. In subsequent years, the Germans had another similar situation in which someone who was trained as an interpreter and had absolutely no other job alternatives got involved in a fatal automobile accident and they fought it tooth and nail and in the end the person was PNGed.

So this is what we did. Kissinger was very kind to me. He was very supportive. People were all wringing their hands and saying, "Here you are our coming China guy and now you have to do something else."

Q: While you were talking I can't help remember this obituary. He must have been...

PLATT: I knew him. He was a wonderful man.

Q: He got a great write up.

PLATT: He looked as nice as his picture.

Q: He must have been involved because he was chief of protocol wasn't he?

PLATT: He ran the trip for Zhou. He was Zhou's right hand man. He was one of their top diplomats.

Q: How do you pronounce his name again?

PLATT: Han Xu.

But anyway I left and Kissinger said, "Well, you can have any job that you want provided that there is a China element in it, because even if you say that this is a traditional thing, I think that the way they have handled it deprives us from your services and China experience and I don't want them to think that the way they have handled that will have that impact. So you can take any job you want but it has to have a China element." I said, "Well, how about this job in Tokyo. It is the senior job in the political section under the counselor, deals with foreign policy, covers China's policy towards Japan and vice versa as well as towards Korea, Southeast Asia, Russia, etc." He said, "Fine." So I went and just did what I was going to do minus about a half year of language training.

CHAS W. FREEMAN, JR.
Liaison Officer
Beijing (1973)

China Working Group
Washington, DC (1978-1979)

Country Director for China
Washington, DC (1979-1981)

Deputy Chief of Mission
Beijing (1981-1984)

Ambassador Chas W. Freeman, Jr. was born in Washington, DC in 1943. He graduated from Yale University in 1963 and joined the Foreign Service in 1965. His overseas posts included India, Taiwan, China, Thailand, and Saudi Arabia. He also held numerous positions in Washington, DC in Washington and also served as Assistant Secretary in the Department of Defense. He was interviewed in 1995 and 1996 by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

Q: I thought we might stop at this point, because I think we want to talk about the opening up of the liaison office in some detail. You were put on the team that went to open the liaison office when?

FREEMAN: That was March of '73. But, actually, I should discuss some of the follow-up to the Nixon trip. There were several National Security studies done, on which I worked, and a number of initiatives taken, which perhaps require a little bit of explanation, which has not been made public.

Q: And one of the things I'd like to throw in is your impression of the role of the CIA, at this time. Okay?

FREEMAN: Up to a point.

Q: Today is the 18th of July, 1995. Chas, you wanted to talk about some studies that were done after the Nixon trip was over.

FREEMAN: Obviously, part of the process that led up to the Nixon visit was signaling the Chinese by the removal of restrictions on trade and travel and exchanges of one sort or another. But that process was far from complete, and there needed to be major adjustments made in American law and regulation to accommodate the new relationship with the Chinese.

As I recall, within a week or so of the president's return from China, Dr. Kissinger commissioned two National Security studies, one on economic relations and one on cultural relations with China. And he set about a one-week deadline for the conclusion of these, imagining, I suppose, that there was a vast army of bureaucrats below him who could now fill in the details of what he had done.

Well, that vast army of bureaucrats for both studies was basically me. So I spent a week, often a whole night at the office, now out of the Ops Center, drafting two National Security study memoranda, and then circulating these drafts on an interagency basis, and spending much of the following day negotiating with other agency representatives in an effort to get some kind of agreement. The bureaucracy was especially recalcitrant on the issue of relaxing export controls, and the difficulty of coming up with agreed language was quite considerable.

I discovered a number of things about the culture of Washington bureaucracies.

For example, if you called a meeting for five o'clock in the afternoon, by about six-thirty, the Department of Commerce representatives were desperate to go home and have their martinis and dinner, and would begin to make major concessions. So the first lesson was always to call meetings late in the day when there was a controversy with Commerce.

The second lesson was that the Department of Defense, unlike the Department of Commerce, would sit there all night and obstruct. But their bureaucracy was so cumbersome that if you stayed up overnight and produced a redraft and then scheduled a meeting for the early afternoon, they would not have had time to coordinate their position, and you could rule them out of order as not having a position, and push forward.

Treasury was the wildest and most insistent of all the bureaucracies we were dealing with, partly because the subject matter in which they had real expertise was minimal. They had opinions on many things, but their expertise was quite limited.

Q: Was it limited because China had just not been in their orbit? Or was it limited because they were limited?

FREEMAN: Treasury historically has professed some sort of a major role in trade policy. But Treasury doesn't promote trade in any way. It has no direct involvement with the business community, as opposed to bankers. And there is a real question as to whether bankers are an intelligent life form or not. So it was Treasury speaking as the custodian of national interest, as it saw it, even though it had no effective role in the issues that it often addressed.

There were a number of things that I remember with particular satisfaction from that period.

One of them was the proposal to form an organization that became the National Council for U.S.-China Trade. As trade began to become possible with the Chinese, there began to be a proliferation of trade promoters and associations. And it was quite apparent that, left untended, this field would eventually be filled by some sort of Chinese front group, which would be an advocate not for American interests, but for Chinese interests.

So I had the idea, and a young man at Commerce named Driscoll worked with me very hard, to produce a proposal whereby the U.S. government would sponsor, but not fund, the creation of a prestigious business council that would preempt the field.

In the event, this organization was approved, and there was a meeting at the Department of State auditorium to kick it off. I helped recruit the first vice president of it, Gene Theroux, who had been the legislative assistant to Hale Boggs and who is now a prominent attorney here in Washington. Then I helped to recruit the editor of their publication, the China Business Review, which has become the premier journal in the field. But its first edition was written almost entirely by the consulate general in Hong Kong and me, on the q.t., trying to ensure that this organization got off to a good start.

Eventually, Chris Phillips, who had served at the U.N. with George Bush and who later served as ambassador to Brunei in the Bush administration, became the president of this organization, later renamed the US-China Business Council.

I spent hours and hours and hours over the succeeding period trying to help this organization get organized, recruit personnel (I interviewed most of them), and trying to produce a commercial library for them and publications and the like.

Of course, following the Nixon trip, as I mentioned, and even before, there had been a great outburst of misguided interest in China trade on the part of people throughout the country. After I switched over pretty much to economic-commercial work on the Desk, suddenly I found myself besieged by people with tape recorders who had come in to receive wisdom from the font.

I had the wonderful experience of having somebody come in, ostensibly just to ask me about how to do China trade and interview me for about fifty minutes, and then he said, "Well, you know, this was so interesting, I'd like to come back. Could I do that?"

I said, "Sure."

He came back and did another fifty minutes.

And then I found the tapes of our conversation on sale for $1,500 apiece, which was a good deal more than I made in a month at that time. That was a nice lesson.

I also found myself the subject of recruiting efforts by major companies. I've forgotten what I made at that time, but it was probably something below $30,000, and I was being offered $300,000 and so on. And I realized that, in business, if the result is large enough, any price, in terms of salary or commission, however astronomical it may seem to the individual concerned, is worth it, because it's a small percentage of the total.

So it was an interesting time.

The Nixon administration had been essentially unable to send any speakers to campuses, because of Vietnam protests and the like. Suddenly, however, China became an acceptable topic, a politically correct topic, on campuses, and I found myself doing a great deal of public speaking. I think, in the first year after the Nixon trip to China, I did more than a hundred public appearances, including a few that were rather odd. I remember standing in for Nixon at his alma mater, Whittier College, on some occasion, anointed by this great but rather strange man to represent him. There was great curiosity in the United States about China, and it took me all over the country.

Q: Did you find yourself in the position of trying to throw a little cold water on these flames of enthusiasm as you went around to colleges? China has always excited people, right from the beginning, in the United States.

FREEMAN: I don't know that I was trying to douse the enthusiasm. Perhaps I was trying to direct it in more realistic directions. There was so much ignorance, it's hard to recapture that moment, but the spectacle of this Red-baiting president going off to China and then to Russia was quite difficult for people to understand. It intrigued them greatly. So I tried to concentrate on putting the events and the various issues, which had been, if not resolved, at least addressed with creative ambiguity in the Shanghai Communique, into some sense of perspective, rather than to talk about the internal workings of Chinese society.

There was a very interesting phenomenon, however, which I found rather appalling, and that was when the American right wing began to go to China, politicians of one sort or another. They discovered a society in which students sat straight upright in their chairs and had short hair and respected their elders and adhered to family values of a sort that were then already nothing but a matter of nostalgia in the United States. They found no theft or significant crime. There was order and what appeared to be a measure of progress, although terrible poverty. And there was this sudden, strange fascination by the American conservatives with this really very conservative society, which Mao had attempted to radicalize, but had failed to radicalize. I found this very, very interesting. Liberals I had expected to be a bit woolly minded on the subject of revolution and the like; I was surprised by the conservative reaction.

Q: As both a bureaucratic and an American attitude when something new happens, we kind of discard all the experience of other people and we go ahead. This goes from the individual bureaucrat up to the government. Here you're working on economics and trade with China. There's a vast pool of experience on trade with China, by the British and French particularly, but others. They'd been doing this for a long time (much to our annoyance). Did we start from the beginning, or were you able to tap into the British and the French experiences?

FREEMAN: We basically made our own way. And it was a different way. Even as we were fascinated by the Chinese, the Chinese were greatly fascinated by us. There are many elements in the Chinese character and the American character that are mutually appealing. There are also many elements that are the subject of misunderstanding, so there were mistakes made. But, generally, the process of opening trade relations went rather smoothly.

Of course, we were dealing with a society in which there was essentially no commercial code, no legal system to enforce contracts, and in which trade was done by a sort of law merchant. The law merchant was the customs of trade, initially in the Mediterranean and the wool trade in the Hanseatic League, eventually incorporated into the common law and into the Napoleonic Code, but initially enforced by merchants themselves, in tribunals or arbitration panels on which merchants would interpret contracts in terms of the customs of their trade. And we were thrust back into this sort of medieval environment.

I should say, this law merchant in the Mediterranean was the bridge between Arab and European traders, and it was the Arabs who took the system that later became the Canton Trade Fair to China initially. It was a system in which foreigners were expected to live in hotels, called funduq in Arabic, and to regulate themselves. The national state didn't want to be bothered with the quarrels of pesky foreigners, so it essentially allowed them extraterritoriality. And this medieval system evolved into the Canton trade system in the nineteenth century. Oddly, the Communists, in their own strange way, resurrected it with a semiannual, or annual, depending on the period, trade fair in Guangzhou (Canton). And it was this that was the initial introduction of Americans to the China trade.

Q: That's when Shaw went out there and all that. Just a historical note, that the idea of this separate compound goes back to Egyptian times. The Pharaoh, in about the year 1000 BC, set up a little island in which Greek merchants had to take care of themselves, but didn't step off the island.

FREEMAN: I didn't know that. But it's something that really does have Mediterranean roots and which found its way to China.

There were great adjustments to be made. The Chinese essentially had the attitude of Henry Ford: "You can buy a shirt, any shirt, as long as it's white and it's got our label on it." The Americans, obviously, specialized in going in and buying things for the American market, which meant that the shirts had to be specially designed and had to have the Bloomingdale's label. So the process of persuading the Chinese not to insist on their brands and their designs was a very difficult one for the Americans.

And there were wonderful jokes about Chinese brand names that had a different connotation in English than they did in Chinese.

For example, elephants are powerful beasts, and those that are white are pure. So the largest-selling brand of batteries in China was the White Elephant brand.

Shoes in Chinese are pee-shyeh, and in the Chinese Romanization, that comes out as pixie. So we had Pixie brand shoes for men.

And so forth and so on. It had its moments.

There were also differences of culture and a lack of understanding in financial arrangements.

Boeing told me this story (I don't know whether it's true or not) that, as a direct follow-up to the Nixon visit, they sold ten Boeing 707s to the Chinese.

Q: Large passenger airplanes.

FREEMAN: Exactly. These are jet aircraft that were the workhorse of international aviation at the time.

That when they had consummated the deal, which I think was $40-some million, the Chinese said, "How would you like to be paid?"

They said, "Well, what do you mean?"

The Chinese said, "Would you like cash or a check?"

And they said, "What?"

So the Chinese went into a back room, pulled a curtain, and there was $40 million in cash sitting there.

There had, of course, been no banking relations.

But generally I think it was a very interesting process of mutual discovery, made all the more exciting for both sides because each side had created vast myths about the other. Everything about China, in the period of our separation, was evil, and China was the Empire of the Blue Ants, and the Chinese were faceless, anonymous, collective-minded persons. Well, of course, the Chinese are consummate individualists, and when Americans finally encountered them, they discovered this. The excitement of discovering that your assumptions had been wrong led to an excess of good feeling, I think, at least on our side, and distorted our image of China much more to the positive than was justified.

In other words, this was a period when, once again, the United States, as it had done before in history, swung the pendulum and oscillated toward an unrealistically positive view of China. There is something about the U.S.-China interaction that is almost unique, because it does seem to swing between unrealistically positive and unrealistically negative views.

Q: Right now, we're going through quite a negative view.

FREEMAN: Equally inaccurate.

Q: You might say, at this point in '95, it's sort of our designated potential enemy.

FREEMAN: You have to have illusions in order to be disillusioned. And that's what we have become.

Q: Did Dr. Kissinger look at this swing and see what was happening? I can understand the euphoria of the politicians, because, if you're Nixon, you get a lot of credit for opening up and doing this great thing. But Dr. Kissinger has a reputation of being a much more analytical, cold-blooded looker at things. Was he saying that maybe we better damp this down, let's not go to extremes? Or did that ever come up?

FREEMAN: I don't think that his forte was the handling of American public opinion. Personally, however, he remained relentlessly realistic, I think, although he was much charmed by the Chinese.

The Chinese have a political culture that puts an emphasis on strategy and the long-term view.

I can remember interpreting once for one of the first visiting Chinese scholars, I'm sure the first one to visit the Senior Seminar at the Foreign Service Institute, who gave a lecture on the objectives of Chinese foreign policy, in the course of which he remarked that the essential purpose of Chinese foreign policy was to redress past wrongs and overcome past humiliations. And he stressed that he was speaking of the recent past.

The first question after the lecture was, of course, "What do you mean by the 'recent past'?"

And he said, "Well, some people would argue that this means everything since the Yuan Dynasty," which was the Mongols in the twelfth century. He said, "I don't agree with that. I think it's everything since the Treaty of Nerchinsk," which was in 1689. So the "recent past" was the last, roughly, three hundred years.

This kind of long view and sense of strategy was greatly appealing to Kissinger. Once, after interpreting for him at a meeting in New York, when he was secretary of state, with his Chinese counterpart, I can remember him commenting afterwards that if these people ever become powerful, they would bury us, because of the adroitness of their strategic thinking. I don't think I agreed with that at the time, and I don't agree with it now, but it is an indication that he was aware of the need occasionally to correct the admiration that one tended to feel in the presence of very able men, on the Chinese side.

Q: Before moving on to the liaison office establishment, I have two questions. There are two men I've interviewed, actually one I'm still interviewing, and I'd like you to comment on their roles, because they were in the NSC. One was Peter Rodman, and the other was Richard Kennedy.

FREEMAN: I can't really comment directly on either of them during this period. They were very much staff people in the NSC. My dealings, to the extent I had any, were with Dick Solomon and John Holdridge, who handled East Asia. They did not. Peter Rodman is what I call a securocrat, meaning a Washington national security policy official, not an area expert, and very much at that time bound up with Vietnam, which was the principal obsession of the country. I know Kennedy quite well, but I don't know what he was doing at that time. I'm sure I didn't encounter him then. I saw him a great deal later, in other incarnations, dealing with nuclear issues.

Q: Okay, why don't we go on and talk about the establishment of the liaison office. We're talking about something you've written some textbooks on, on diplomatic things. I don't think a liaison office was in the vocabulary until you all invented it.

FREEMAN: As I discussed before, by the fall of 1972, the infirmities and inadequacies of occasional contact through our embassies in Paris became quite apparent, as we began to try to deal with more technical issues. Consular questions arose on the Mainland. There was a desire for more regular contact directly with decision makers in China. This led, in the view of those of us who were working day to day, to a need for the establishment for some sort of office in China.

We clearly couldn't have an embassy, because we had one in Taipei, which was accredited to the government of China. We could have had a consulate, I suppose, but that would have been complicated because it had a precedent in international law. So we came up with this concept of the liaison office. As I mentioned, the two authors of this were Roger Sullivan and myself.

Q: Roger Sullivan?

FREEMAN: Roger Sullivan was then the deputy director of the Asian Communist Affairs Office.

Kissinger was most reluctant to see this happen, because it meant that some measure of influence, control, and transparency to the bureaucracy would be ceded, and that he would no longer have the exclusive management of the China relationship. And so the initial effort to persuade him was quite soundly rebuffed by him.

On the eve of his travel in early 1973 to China, however, I drafted a paper that made the argument for a liaison office really quite compelling, I thought, and that argued that the merit of a liaison office was that no one knew what it was, and therefore we could allow events to define it, rather than worrying about it setting a precedent or raising questions of diplomatic recognition and the like.

The proposal was for the reciprocal exchange of liaison offices. And, leaping ahead a little bit, when we actually reached agreement on liaison offices, in January or February 1973, Kissinger, not being a constitutional lawyer, or indeed any sort of lawyer, and being rather contemptuous of domestic legal process in the United States, frankly, stoutly resisted the idea of legislation to confer privileges and immunities on the Chinese liaison office. And yet it was perfectly apparent that we, in dealing with a society as lawless as China, where arbitrary and capricious decisions were a fact of daily life, required reciprocal privileges and immunities to operate, and that, to do that, we needed legislation. Because we could not confer diplomatic privileges and immunities on the liaison office, since it didn't fit any category of American law, we had to go for legislation. I think Kissinger was correctly concerned that this legislation might be taken hostage by Congress and various elements added to it. But, in the event, we got the legislation we required.

When Kissinger presented the arguments, the point paper that I had drafted for him on the establishment of liaison offices, it was as though Zhou En-lai and I had read the paper in advance. Before Kissinger could complete all the points, he essentially went down them. And so there was easy agreement that this moment had come.

It was a good thing, because this was just before the spring of 1973, and it was a moment at which the authority of the leadership in both the United States and China began to collapse.

Q: We're talking about Watergate in the United States.

FREEMAN: We're talking about Watergate; we're talking about the Gang of Four in China. And the institutionalization of the relationship, which was not terribly appealing to Kissinger, was very appealing to me and to some other people who believe that entangling bureaucracies with each other is a good way to create inertia in a relationship, and therefore preserve it against adverse times.

In any event, in early March, [see page 23] six of us, led by Al Jenkins, who became the first acting chief of the liaison office; myself, as interpreter and factotum; Bob Blackburn, who was an administrative officer, and a very senior communicator, who turned out not to be familiar with the one-time pad, so I ended up as a code clerk. It was below his pay grade, I guess, or above his practical knowledge and technical skills.

Q: As an old consular officer, I know that if you want to really find out how to do something, you never go to the top person.

FREEMAN: Absolutely not. He was a splendid fellow, but not well versed in the work of his minions.

At the last minute, a seventh person was added, who was a CIA communicator. The Chinese made quite a point of putting him at the seventh seat at the seventh table and sort of snickering about the CIA turning up. The purpose of this was to give Kissinger a private channel outside the State Department, and it was perfectly obvious. Indeed, he appointed John Holdridge as a second DCM, also with the title of DCM, to serve as the NSC representative in Beijing.

Q: I must say, you do have the feeling of a person (Dr. Kissinger) not wanting to give up his baby.

FREEMAN: I think that's right. But I would also say that there really is a period, when you are tacking the ship of state in a new direction, when the captain has to call the shots. He was the captain on this, and it's probably a very good thing that he did hold onto the details, although many of us found him somewhat lacking in an adequate grasp of the details as they became more complex. Still, I think he was right to do this. But it was also right to institutionalize the relationship as we did.

Q: We had quite a weak State Department, partly because of Kissinger, at the time, under William Rogers, who was not...

FREEMAN: Was not terribly interested in foreign policy. We had an arrangement that I would say made the NSC the foreign ministry for great-power affairs, and the State Department the ministry for dealings with petty barbarians and the like. [See Freeman.1, page 83.] This was a workable, if somewhat novel, arrangement.

This group set off into terra incognita to open an office. We flew to Hong Kong and then walked across the railroad bridge at Lo Wu into China, where we were greeted by people from the Chinese Foreign Ministry. We went on up to Beijing, staying in the Beijing Hotel, which was then the only hotel worthy of the name in the Chinese capital.

The first days were spent in introductory meetings with senior Chinese officials. We ended up spending a great deal of time with Qiao Guanhua, who was, in effect, the acting foreign minister; Ji Pengfei, who was the nominal foreign minister; Zhang Wenjin, who was the assistant minister in charge of American and Oceanian Affairs, an extraordinarily able diplomat; and Han Xu, who was the acting chief of protocol, since this was during the Cultural Revolution and no one had formal titles.

It was interesting, there was cordiality and cooperation from these people and from the Diplomatic Services Bureau. The Chinese, in the true Soviet style, had established an office to manage and control and staff the offices of foreign barbarians in their capital, and everything -- the buildings, electricity, car registration, and, of course, local staff -- came through this office.

There were many occasions for contact with Chinese officials outside the immediate America-handling and administrative crowd.

Of course, this was the Cultural Revolution, and people had been taught in China not to reveal their identity or their work unit or whatever to foreigners. This was a matter of national security. The papers would routinely identify those who attended meetings as "responsible persons of the department concerned," and you really couldn't get much more identification out of people.

So one of the things I did, which wasn't easy but became a good move in terms of opening up these officials, was to go out to the local printing press, where calling cards could get printed, and after about six days of negotiation with them, I succeeded in getting them to print a card that said, on one side, in English, "Responsible Person of the Department Concerned," and on the other side it said, "Youguan Bumendi Fuzeren," in Chinese. So when they would ask me who I was, I would say, "Allow me to present my card." They would look at this thing for a minute, and some of them would just break down laughing. It was a good introduction.

Q: I would assume that, because of this, in a way, in military terms, one of your prime jobs must have been to try to develop the equivalent of an order of battle. In other words, to find out who did what to whom. Otherwise, how do you work?

FREEMAN: Absolutely.

Your mention of the military reminds me that one of the things we did was to put in Marine guards, Marine guards not in uniform, because the Chinese insisted that the Marines had had a history of uneasy relations with the populace.

Q: Oh, absolutely, in the Boxer Rebellion and then the concessions.

FREEMAN: Exactly.

I became the sort of custodian of the Marines. There were several things that were quite interesting about that. I ended up measuring for the curtains in their apartment. Nobody could speak Chinese in the Marines, of course. I ended up taking them to get their hair cut. I can remember the barber, a very old man, saying to this Marine, "Are you really a Marine? Oh, I'm so glad to see you!" So there were some in China who remembered the Marines fondly.

But the most embarrassing element of that was that the Chinese had not only great sensitivity to the Marines, but they also had great sensitivity to anything overtly sexual. They had claimed, and probably they had more or less succeeded, that they had eradicated venereal disease in China. And indeed, as I say, maybe they had. One of the Marines turned up with the clap, which his girlfriend had given him.

Q: I might just say, for the tape, since language changes, "the clap" refers to gonorrhea.

FREEMAN: In any event, this unfortunate young man had gotten gonorrhea from his girlfriend, and the question was: What do we do with this? You know, this is rather embarrassing. The Marines are remembered ambivalently because of their sexual prowess, and here is the first Marine to set foot in China after a quarter of a century, turning up with the clap. We debated whether to send him out for treatment, and concluded that that was too expensive and that we couldn't do it. So we took him to the Chinese for treatment. The medical people we took him to were delighted; they hadn't seen a case of gonorrhea for years. They called an all-North-China medical conference to examine this, so that everyone could see this strange disease. This poor, poor young man was thoroughly humiliated and I'm sure was much more careful in the future. But he was cured, and life went on.

Q: While we're on that subject, one of the great problems, which was a terrible problem for us when I was in Yugoslavia a decade earlier, was the Marines and young ladies. What did you do with the Marines and young ladies?

FREEMAN: There were many alternatives in Beijing. The Polish Embassy rather specialized in providing nubile young creatures to horny bachelors in Beijing. But they were out of bounds, because those young girls were probably KGB controlled.

Q: That was one of the horrors of the Cold War, I think.

FREEMAN: The Marines found a warm welcome in the ladies of the diplomatic community support staff.

Establishing the office, we leaned very heavily on advice from our British and Canadian colleagues, and the Canadians were especially helpful. But we had to locate office space. In the end, we were shown a site that was under construction and had been intended as the Embassy of Brazil. But, of course, the Brazilians had not come through on diplomatic relations, so the Chinese offered it to us. It was a small cement residence, with a very small office with a quaint cupola, rather an odd octagonal room at the top, which they explained was for signals. Well, obviously, our communications gear isn't put in such places and requires special handling.

I can remember going over to the Diplomatic Services Bureau one afternoon with Bob Blackburn and explaining that, indeed, we needed more office space on the compound.

And they said, "Well, what do you want?"

So I drew a building and explained that the top floor should have no windows, and that this should all be built to vault specifications and whatnot. They said, "Well, let's take your drawing."

Two hours later, they called us back and showed us a completed architectural drawing. They broke ground about six o'clock that evening, and they built that structure. I've never seen anything like it. They worked around the clock. They basically used workers and threw them away when they were exhausted. They built the whole thing in sixteen days, and most beautifully. The upper story, where the communications were to be, had false windows, so it looked perfectly normal from the outside. And inside, it had beautiful walnut paneling.

Of course, the first act that we committed when we got into it was, for security reasons, to rip out all this beautiful paneling. We were so embarrassed by this desecration of Chinese craftsmanship that we sawed up all the pieces of walnut and sent them out in the diplomatic pouch, rather than bring them out of the building where the Chinese could see what we were doing. We never found any evidence of bugging or anything of that sort in that area.

At any rate, it was quite a performance.

Q: Just to nail it down, when were you in Beijing for this liaison office?

FREEMAN: I think it was probably about two months, March through April, maybe early May, '73.

During this period, I was, as I say, a factotum. I was interpreter. I was sort of a GSO (General Services Officer). I was a political officer. I was the code clerk. I was doing trade and economic work, contacting business people on both sides. Of course, I was also, because I was interpreter and because I was doing all these things, having a great deal of contact with senior Chinese officials.

I was asked whether I would stay on at the liaison office, whether as a political officer, economic officer, in the administrative section as interpreter, or, because of my previous USIS experience, as the manager of cultural and information programs.

And I declined, on what proved to be the very well-founded grounds that probably, in this initial period of setting up the liaison office, I had had more contact with Chinese officials than the entire office put together would have in succeeding years, and that to be in China at that time was to be under house arrest. It wasn't that the surveillance was particularly intrusive, although it was there.

I can remember going one day with a British diplomat on a picnic to the Ming Tombs. We were driving along in his car, and there was a motorcycle behind us. He said, "Just wait a minute." He stopped the car, and we sort of looked at the scenery. The motorcycle stopped, and the driver began to pretend to repair the motorcycle. So he walked back to the driver and said, "Is there a problem with your motorcycle?"

And the man said, "Yes, I don't know what's wrong."

He said, "Well, let me see if I can help," and he started taking apart the motor. He pocketed the spark plug, without the other fellow noticing it. Then he said, "I think we better go on ahead, and I'll try to send someone back to help you." And then we took off, leaving the poor fellow stuck there.

But it wasn't intrusive; it was social control, not police control.

I can remember walking near Tiananmen Square, which is not far from the Beijing Hotel, late one night, and being accosted several times by what we called the granny police. These were senior ladies of a neighborhood whose responsibility it was to make sure that no stranger wandered into the neighborhood and that nothing untoward was done. This was a responsibility that was theirs as citizens, not as officials.

When snow fell in Beijing, there was no municipal snow removal. Neighborhoods pitched in together and cleared the snow.

There was a great sense of neighborhood cohesion and defensiveness, all organized by the Party, of course, but really quite spontaneous, and now remembered by the Chinese with some nostalgia, because a lot of this cohesion has broken down as rapid urbanization has taken place and the market economy has come to the cities.

In any event, I was not enthusiastic about house arrest in China, and said to myself that I would return to China for an assignment when one of two conditions was met, or both: either China had changed, to open up a bit, which I thought it might, or I had reached a sufficient level of seniority in the Foreign Service where I didn't really care whether my freedom of movement was restricted.

In the event, both those conditions were met when I went back as charge in the summer of 1981.

Q: While you were there, where would you describe this as far as the Cultural Revolution? The high Cultural Revolution, the start of it, the end of it?

FREEMAN: The worst excesses of the Cultural Revolution had occurred in the late mid- '60s. The Lin Biao incident and attempted coup d'etat, which I mentioned, occurred in 1971.

China was in a period of lull. Mao was failing. Jiang Qing, his wife, whom I met and saw many times, was using her nominal position as his wife and her access to him, along with a number of other women who were around him, to build her own political authority. The cultural artifacts of the Cultural Revolution, such as they were -- revolutionary operas and this rather dull, highly polemical repertoire of literature and art that the Cultural Revolution produced -- still had a monopoly. The streets were still renamed in revolutionary style: The street in front of the former American Embassy in the old legation quarter was named Anti-Imperialist Street; the one in front of the Soviet Embassy was named Anti-Revisionist Street, and so on and so forth.

But there was no overt unrest. There were no demonstrations. The Red Guards were a thing of the past. There was lingering political tension and a sense of oppressiveness from ideology. It turned out that this period was indeed the moment at which the Gang of Four began to emerge as the de facto leadership of China. So that, by the fall of 1973, early 1974, U.S.-China relations began to become much more tendentious.

Of course, Watergate was going on in the United States, and Nixon was in the process of falling from power. There was something similar going on, with Zhou En-lai greatly hampered, in China. Both sides, for strategic reasons, in subsequent visits by Kissinger to China, continued to put much the best face on the relationship, but inside, it was rotting, because of the ideological and power struggles in the United States and in China.

Q: When you were dealing with the Chinese, I was wondering whether you saw a parallel to what I observed slightly later when I had dealings with the South Vietnamese bureaucracy, which I was told was based somewhat on the Chinese one. One of the things I found there was that there really wasn't an awful lot of power down. In other words, the bureaucrats had a lot of power, which was usually to say no; whereas, at the top, maybe they would understand what the problem was and try to get something done, but the mid-level bureaucrats... We can call in the president or the equivalent, and things happen, usually, not always.

FREEMAN: That was very much the case. This initial period of the liaison office was one of great Chinese cooperation, in part because the senior leadership was directly engaged. We would have lunch with them once in a while, and problems would get solved.

But all bureaucracies tend to behave in the manner you describe. Bureaucracies, like the one in China or those in Eastern Europe or, I suppose, in Vietnam, don't delegate much authority down the line, and, where the consequences of mistakes can be quite severe, tend to be very reluctant to innovate.

And there were some odd things that happened, due to the rigidities of the Chinese.

For example, I helped to negotiate the lease for the liaison office, which, by the way, is now the ambassador's residence. That rather small, quite inelegant place that we accepted in 1973 remains the residence of the American ambassador, and has been quite off-putting to a number of politicians who otherwise would have sought to go to Beijing as ambassador (and therefore maybe a good thing).

In negotiating the lease, the Chinese initially put in a clause that the lease would be renewable after five years, on different terms, and that they reserved the right of price escalation.

I said to them, "You know, this I don't understand, because China's very proud, and correctly so, of not having any inflation. So, if there's no inflation, how could there be a justification for a price increase? So I think that we should put in a clause that says, 'Inasmuch as there is no inflation in China, there will be no price increase.'"

And they agreed.

Subsequently, they had second thoughts, and I think the next lease did not contain that language. But it was possible, occasionally, to hoist them by their own bureaucratic and ideological petard.

Q: Both when you were dealing in the NSC, looking toward economic matters, trade and all, and when you wore the commercial trade hat a little bit while you were with the liaison office, did the problem of intellectual properties come up? We all knew what had happened in Taiwan, where they stole our intellectual property right and left. They copied everything that you can think of. It was a long problem.

FREEMAN: It came up primarily in the context of concern by the export-control community about reverse engineering of what would be sold to China. Indeed, there were attempts to do this. The Chinese took the Boeing 707, studied it carefully, and built something that we dubbed the "Boeing 708," which turned out to be a rather awkward flyer and never went anywhere.

They were famous for copying things generally.

There was a story, which I think is correct, that when the Russians shipped some MiG-21s to Vietnam, by rail across China, the rail cars somehow got lost, and some of the MiG-21s didn't turn up for quite a while. And when they did turn up in Vietnam, some of the dials in the cockpit were upside down. Obviously, the whole thing had been disassembled. And, indeed, the Chinese began to produce an aircraft quite similar to the MiG-21 a couple of years later.

But I think the general answer to this was that Chinese technical capabilities were so limited that, by the time a commercial product had been reverse engineered and they were in a position to produce it themselves, one or two further generations of technology would have been introduced in the United States, and it wouldn't be a threat to the market position of companies. So they didn't worry about this very much.

And in the area of music, literature, and the like, China was a society that banned the distribution of any foreign literature, except through controlled channels. They had this marvelous publication, to which I referred the other day, Reference News, which distributed, in some twenty-odd million copies, articles from the New York Times and whatnot, for internal use only, which meant only Chinese could see it, although, of course, I did, too.

But that was essentially the extent of it. So there wasn't a terribly great concern about that issue.

That issue, which had been at the center of our relationship with Taiwan for many years, as you indicate, is one that is typical of the relationships between advanced societies and developing ones. In the nineteenth century, the greatest violator of copyright was the United States.

Q: Oh, yes. Gilbert and Sullivan had long stories about the problems.

FREEMAN: And Charles Dickens. That is why, in the used-book stores here, there are so many crummy editions of Dickens from the nineteenth century and knockoffs of his books. It wasn't until the United States emerged as an exporter of ideas that we became strict on this subject.

So it's normal for developing societies to regard intellectual products as the common heritage of mankind, rather than as entitled to protection for the benefit of their originators.

But this wasn't an issue with the Chinese at that time.

It became an issue later, largely because we did succeed, as Taiwan became an exporter of technology, in persuading Taiwan to clamp down, at which point they simply relocated all of their factories to the Mainland. The great crisis that we had with China a year ago over intellectual property was caused by Taiwanese investors relocating plants to the Chinese Mainland to produce CDs and the like.

But at that time, it was not a concern.

At any rate, I traveled several times to China with delegations, but remained on the Desk. I continued to interpret, but I made a real effort to get Language Services at the Department of State to recruit a proper professional interpreter, since I had no interest in making a career of interpreting, and did not want, in fact, to be pegged as a China specialist. I thought of myself as a professional diplomat and believed that there were more fields in which to exercise whatever ability I had than just China.

***

Q: Back to your time working on the Deng Xiaoping visit. What were our concerns at the time?

FREEMAN: Among other things, it was clear that China was about to administer a lesson (actually an entire curriculum) to Vietnam, in response to Vietnam's invasion of Cambodia. Indeed, one of the motives for Deng Xiaoping's compromises with the United States on normalization was to clear the American flank before addressing the issue of Vietnamese imperialism and the occupation of Cambodia.

At one level, I suppose, there was a malicious delight in some quarters about the prospect of the Chinese administering a drubbing to the Vietnamese, which they did, though at a huge cost to themselves.

On another level, there was apprehension about the implications of this sort of Chinese activism in Southeast Asia. This issue was a very ambivalent one.

There was considerable concern about the prospects for U.S.-China relations, in terms of congressional shenanigans on Taiwan, which centered on the Taiwan Relations Act.

There was a lawsuit, by Barry Goldwater and others, to set aside the president's termination notice for the mutual defense treaty with the Republic of China, and to claim that the Senate, having consented to the making of the treaty, had to consent to its unmaking. That ultimately produced a Supreme Court decision that reaffirmed the president's power.

There was the Jackson-Vanik freedom of immigration issue to address. Indeed, Deng Xiaoping, as has been widely reported, did say to Jimmy Carter at one point, when he mentioned freedom of immigration, "I'd like you to speak with Senator Jackson and ask him how many Chinese he would like for the State of Washington. Ten million? I can give him that many tomorrow." And that rather disposed of that issue, which, of course, had been generated by concerns over Soviet Jewry, rather than over Chinese immigration.

There was a mad scramble to get a series of basic framework-setting agreements for cultural exchange and other things in place.

We had to do an enormous amount of administrative work to upgrade the embassy.

There was the issue of who the ambassador was going to be, although it was fairly much a foregone conclusion that Leonard Woodcock, having been the liaison office chief, would be the first ambassador, as indeed happened.

It was an extraordinarily busy and complex time, without even mentioning the corresponding negotiations with Taiwan, to which I referred.

At any rate, this work on the China working group was essentially completed by the middle of February 1979. I was preparing to return to USIA, when I got a call from the under secretary for management, Ben Read, asking me if I would come see him. And I did. He said that there was a terrible management problem in refugee affairs. At that time, we faced a terrible crisis of Vietnamese boat people, and first asylum in the Southeast Asian countries, and African refugee flows, and Afghan refugee flows, already, although the Soviet invasion didn't occur until the end of '79. This matter was under the control of Pat Derian, Hodding Carter's wife, who was the assistant secretary for human rights and humanitarian affairs. She had already, five times, been in violation of the Anti-deficiency Act, which is a provision of law that says you can't write Treasury checks in excess of appropriations. In other words, you can't bounce checks on the U.S. government. Mr. Read said that this all needed to be reformed and straightened out. And he asked would I please head a working group to do this, and to prepare for the establishment of the position of United States coordinator for refugee affairs, who would have broad oversight over the function, and also design a reorganization of the manner in which it was conducted.

And I said, "You've got to be out of your mind. I don't want to have anything to do with that," because I could see that it would be a totally thankless and extremely difficult job, involving alienating the Bureau of Consular Affairs; obviously Human Rights Affairs; probably International Organization Affairs, which had UNRRA, the Palestinian relief organization; the various geographic desks; the Bureau of Administration; the under secretary for management's office, not to mention Health and Human Services, various state governments, and so forth. So I said, "I really don't want to do it."

Well, I went away, and I got another call from him. And he said, "I've talked to the secretary, and he really wants you to do it."

And I said, "Well, he'll have to call me himself and tell me that's he's drafting me for this. I will have to speak with him, because there are some guidelines I need if I'm going to do this."

So Secretary Vance did call me, and I did speak to him. And he said, "I want you to solve this problem, but I don't want Patt Derian on my case."

So I said, "Yes, sir."

And I went back to the Ops Center and started figuring out what had to be done.

Q: Can we stop here for a minute. I keep going back, but I don't like to leave things unplugged. When we were preparing to have the Chinese vice premier, Deng Xiaoping, how did we view his position within China at that time, from your point of view, and what were we trying to do? Was this a pure bread-and-butter type visit, or did we have things that we wanted? And a little about the interface with the White House, which always wants to get somebody down on the peanut farm, or the LBJ ranch. What were you after?

FREEMAN: This was Deng Xiaoping's third coming. He had, at the age of 23, been secretary general of the Chinese Communist Party. He had been purged for anti-Soviet sentiment. He was purged a second time, during the Cultural Revolution, for anti-ideological sentiment, for pragmatism. He had arisen again, and he seemed to be in an increasingly unchallenged position. There had been, in 1978, a plenum of the Communist Party that basically embraced his aspirations for reform of the economy and an opening up of China.

I suppose the White House, in looking at this, had several considerations.

In terms of foreign policy, wanting to consolidate the China relationship and give it some momentum, thereby increasing leverage on the Soviet Union and on others, such as Vietnam, to whose activities, both internal and in Indochina, we strongly objected.

There was, as always, some aspiration by the administration for the business opportunities that a normal relationship with China, especially a China that was opening its doors, might bring.

In domestic terms, Deng Xiaoping's visit was seen by the administration as something that could turn the atmosphere, excitingly, in the direction of a favorable American view of relations with China. Indeed, it did, and it was a remarkably successful visit in those terms.

There was a desire for direct communication between the de facto leader of China and our own president on many issues, ranging from those that I mentioned, the broad global strategic picture, to regional issues in Southeast Asia and South Asia. And there was a very good dialogue.

But it was an opener, an ice breaker, and that was the purpose of it.

Q: What was the situation, as he was coming and you were doing this preparation, between China and Vietnam? From your observation, had we seen how things were developing? At one time, they were as close as lips and teeth. We always saw Vietnam and China as being part of one big Communist conspiracy. When were we seeing the real split and the war that went on there? How did that develop?

FREEMAN: It really developed over the course of 1978. The relationship between China and Vietnam was always a great deal more complex and nuanced than what we perceived.

I might say a couple of things about that.

First, it is an article of faith for many American specialists on Vietnam that the Chinese played a minor role in the war. On one level, that's correct; on another, it isn't.

For example, I have spoken with Chinese generals, including one who was present in Da Nang when the Marines landed in 1965, and watched the battle with the Vietnamese, as an advisor. The current Chinese defense attaché in Washington, who is a very fine man indeed, went down the Ho Chi Minh Trail at about the same time. There were Chinese all over the place, intermingled with the North Vietnamese, not with the Viet Cong. There were Chinese in Cambodia. And, of course, there were Chinese defenders of the railway system in North Vietnam, and so forth. So the Chinese were strong backers of Vietnam, in terms of advice and support and providing a sort of secure rear area for the Vietnamese.

On another level, of course, there was no affection between them at all. Vietnam's main partner was the Soviet Union, not China. China and the Soviet Union were in a virtual state of war, so it was an uneasy relationship. Ideologically, the Vietnamese were Soviet-oriented, not Chinese-oriented. China had little appeal to anyone, except the Khmer Rouge, in the middle of the Cultural Revolution. The Khmer Rouge, who had a connection with the Chinese Gang of Four and who fell out of favor with China after the fall of the Gang of Four, were in a terrible relationship with the Vietnamese. I know some Chinese military men who were with the Khmer Rouge, who described firefights with Vietnamese units even back in the '60s and '70s. So this was a difficult relationship.

In the spring of '78, as events in Cambodia took their course, and as Vietnam began to become more and more threatening to Cambodia, and as the Vietnamese lock on Laos got stronger, the Chinese-Vietnamese relationship began to deteriorate substantially. And it was very clear, as I say, that, after the Vietnamese invasion of Cambodia, the Chinese would react. Which indeed they did, shortly after Deng Xiaoping left Washington.

That Sino-Vietnamese interaction, I think, is poorly understood. The purpose of the use of force is not to avoid casualties on your side, and not to inflict damage. It is to make a political point. The political point the Chinese wanted to make to Vietnam was that they could take Hanoi, if they wished. They demonstrated that. It cost them more, and it revealed more weaknesses in their armed forces, than they anticipated. Indeed, it provoked a thoroughgoing reform of the Chinese military, as those lessons were digested. But the Vietnamese themselves, in talking about these battles, describe a level of ferocity and level of casualties on their side that was vastly greater than anything they experienced at the hands of the Americans. The political point was made.

China also learned some lessons, which were reflected in later reorganizations of the Chinese military.

It is said that was a defeat for China. It was not, any more than China's advance into India in '62 and subsequent withdrawal was a defeat. It was a demonstration of Chinese power. And once they had demonstrated what they wanted to demonstrate, they called it off.

The Chinese, for a long time thereafter, in what we would consider to be a remarkably cynical fashion, used the Vietnamese border as the live-fire training ground for their troops. It was real live fire. They rotated entire divisions through there on a regular basis, to give their military a taste of combat. The Vietnamese obviously are a very skilled infantry, perhaps the best in the world, and they were used by China to good effect.

As I said, the point was somewhat lost, when China said it was administering a lesson to Vietnam. It was not administering one lesson, but a whole curriculum. And the basic point of the curriculum was to demonstrate to Vietnam that it could not afford a hostile relationship with China, and it could not exercise a regional imperialism in disregard of Chinese interests. And that point was made.

Q: Do you think this was understood by the China watchers, yourself included, at that time?

FREEMAN: Oh, I believe so. I believe so.

At any rate, this issue was, in public perception, a background issue, but in official perception in Washington, it was very much a central issue during the Deng Xiaoping visit.

Q: One last question on this. I keep coming back, but while I've got you here, I'm going to milk you for everything I can. What was the impression of the people dealing with China at that time about Leonard Woodcock as ambassador? He came out of the American automobile union, almost an unlikely figure, yet automobile union people are pretty tough, and we were up against some pretty tough people in China. What was the undercurrent of feeling among the China professionals, yourself included, about Leonard Woodcock's time?

FREEMAN: Leonard Woodcock is a man of strong will and excellent, seasoned judgment, and personable. He was very much in charge, presiding over the liaison office. I think he had the respect and admiration of his staff, in part because he didn't pretend to expertise on China that he didn't and couldn't develop, not speaking Chinese and not having studied it. What he was an excellent judge of character and a fine negotiator. He deferred on most questions, I think, to Stape Roy, who was the deputy chief of the liaison office and later DCM in the embassy. He had a very fine staff of officers, quite gifted, reporting on China, and he used them well.

I want to just make a point that is probably forgotten, but it was an obvious point at that time. Prior to Deng Xiaoping's visit to Washington, which followed normalization, no Chinese official of any senior rank had come to Washington. And the reason was that there was an embassy purporting to represent China here, and we had a semi-official relationship with Beijing, not a formal one. It was only when the Republic of China Embassy was being converted into an unofficial presence that Deng Xiaoping was able to come.

The normalization of relations set off an avalanche of American official travel to China. And not just official travel, but travel by Cabinet members. For a period, the relationship was trip-driven. That is, it was driven by the requirement of senior officials, on both sides, but especially in the United States, to produce results from visits that they made. And this was something that, when I was country director for China, I used, I hope, skillfully, to...

Q: But these trips were mainly for people who wanted to go see the other side of the moon, weren't they?

FREEMAN: They were motivated by many factors. There was serious business to be done. There was a scramble by bureaucracies to establish relations with their Chinese opposite numbers. There were people, like Mike Blumenthal, the secretary of the treasury, who had been born in Shanghai and who wanted to go back. There was a natural curiosity. There was an element of tourism. There was prestige associated with a visit, and publicity and public prominence. And there was the possibility of achieving things -- which is not the case on every trip -- because the United States and China suddenly faced the requirement to establish, in short order, the sort of relationship we might have developed over decades had we had relations.

Indeed, when in 1979 I became country director for Chinese affairs (I'm again leaping ahead), one of the first things I did, with the encouragement, indeed the stimulus, of Dick Holbrooke, was to sit down and write out a five-year plan for where we wanted U.S.-China relations to be. And the basic premise was that we wanted them to be what they would have been if we had not had thirty years of their absence.

So you could go to China, and if you succeeded in producing a program of cooperation or an agreement on some area, you were pioneering and pathbreaking in a way that you couldn't very well do in any other country. Everything was new, everything was innovative and creative, and it was a very exciting period.

But I think I've gotten ahead of myself.

***

Q: You finally got back to where you really wanted to be. Or is China just a tar baby, and once you get into it, you can't get away from it? Or is it a narcotic?

FREEMAN: It may be, for others. For me, I think I have been driven throughout my career by some relic of my Puritan ancestors' philosophy, which says to me that those who have the capacity to be, have the duty to become, and that the significance of a life in public service is measured by the contributions one can make. Those contributions depend on when and where one is. And so, to be country director for China, with the opportunities that normalization presented, was to have an opportunity to shape a relationship of enormous strategic importance not just to the United States, but globally, and to guide it, because it was a relationship in motion that could be deflected; whereas, relations that are well established and have some inertia to them are hard to move. So, to my mind, this was an enormous opportunity to be creative and innovative, to resolve old problems and to find new opportunities. And that's very much what attracted me to it. Less China, in a way, than this aspect.

Q: Policy.

FREEMAN: The professional fulfillment that might come, and which did come.

Q: We're talking '79 to '81.

FREEMAN: That's right. In the two years that I was there, we were on a bit of a roller coaster, by 1980, because of the election in the United States and some things that I'll mention. I either personally negotiated or oversaw the negotiation of some 36 treaties and agreements. Really, within two years, using the availability of Cabinet officers whom I recruited to travel to China and the people whom I recruited to come from China, I had overseen and helped to drive the U.S.-China relationship into something very much like what it might have been had we not had the thirty years of nonintercourse and unofficial relationships we had.

But I think that whole chapter probably should be the subject of another discussion, because it'll go on for a bit.

Q: All right, why don't we stop at this point. So we're going to pick up '79 to '81, your time on the Desk. One of the questions I want to ask, I'll put it on here only to make sure, I'd like you to talk in depth about your dealing with Richard Holbrooke and your impression of how he operated at this time.

Today is the 2nd of November, 1995. We're talking about your time in Washington. You were talking about getting deeper into a matter.

FREEMAN: In the last conversation, which was some time ago, I was beginning to talk about my time as country director for China, and you asked about Dick Holbrooke and his role.

I think I would broaden that to say that we were very fortunate during that time also to have Mike Oxenberg, now an academic, a very imaginative, enthusiastic, positive person, with a great deal of creativity, at the National Security Council staff. I was able to work very effectively with Mike.

Dick Holbrooke has the most brilliant policy mind that I have ever encountered. He is someone with enormous quickness to see the political realities of Washington and understand how to use those to create results. So he's a very driving personality, with acknowledged brilliance.

He has succeeded then and subsequently because of that brilliance, not because of his charm. He began his tenure, before my time, in the East Asian and Pacific region by throwing out a great number of older people and bringing in people with whom he felt more comfortable. He paid a great deal of attention to personnel. I think he created, in the end, a more dynamic bureau by doing that, but he broke a lot of rice bowls and made a lot of enemies.

And he's infuriatingly distracted always. He would often have a meeting, with two television sets going, on different channels, and while he was reading a newspaper, he would be discussing a policy issue. He has a notoriously short attention span, but somehow the sheer power of his intellect compensates for all of that.

I think he was personally very frustrated, for the first two years of the Carter administration, by his inability to move on Vietnam. In effect, he was told, and the rest of us sensed, that the guidance on Vietnam was that it was not timely to think about Vietnam and that we should refrain from doing so.

Q: At that stage, we had no relations with Vietnam.

FREEMAN: Exactly. This was the period in which, in retrospect, drift in the relationship allowed the issue of the missing in action and the suspicion that there were still prisoners of war held by the Vietnamese to achieve the strange salience it later achieved in U.S. views of Vietnam.

It was also, of course, the period in which Vietnam's misbehavior and miscalculations about the United States, its continued insistence on reparations when that was obviously inappropriate, and its actions in Cambodia paralyzed that policy.

I think Dick Holbrooke really looked to China in part as an outlet for his creative energy, and he certainly applied it very, very effectively.

Now I was country director for China from July of 1979 to the beginning of July 1981. So my tenure was three-fourths in the Carter administration and one-fourth in the new Reagan administration.

Of course, normalization had, as I indicated, been accomplished, and it was really my task to lay down a plan, a strategic vision, of how to take advantage of that, which I did. And that was something that Dick Holbrooke encouraged.

I think it was probably best reflected in a speech that I wrote for Dick, which he gave on June 4, 1980. That speech, which he has described as the best speech he gave during his tenure as assistant secretary, I think probably is still the best single statement of a positive vision for U.S.-China relations and the future of China.

The genesis of it was this: Sometime in the spring of 1980, there was a gathering at the Woodrow Wilson Center to discuss China in the year 2000, twenty years thereafter. I joined this meeting, and I was so disgusted by the pedestrian, straight-line projections that were going on, that I went back, literally, on my motorcycle, from the meeting to the office, and I stayed up all night and wrote a paper on China in the year 2000 that laid out a very different vision, a vision that was subsequently, I must say, derided by everyone in the intelligence community. And there was a great meeting at the consulate general in Hong Kong, which at that time was still the center of China-watching, to discuss it and critique it. It was provocative.

I projected that China would grow, economically, at the rate of seven or eight percent a year, and that Chinese agriculture would grow at five percent, and I had various other projections on the economy. And I drew some conclusions from that about the nature of China. I also made some predictions about the political system, military posture, and so forth, all of which were derided, as I say, as wildly over-optimistic.

Well, as it happened, Chinese growth, over at least the first fifteen years of that period, averaged around ten percent, not seven, and agriculture actually grew by fifteen percent. So, if anything, I turned out to be pessimistic.

But it was symptomatic of the view of the time, which was that China was a sort of economic and political backwater that could not hope to achieve very much, that the projections I made were greeted with such disdain.

In any event, Dick Holbrooke was somewhat taken by the paper, and that paper eventually turned into the speech. I guess the occasion for the speech probably was the meeting of the U.S.-China Business Council, then called the National Council for U.S.-China Trade.

In it (in retrospect, with some prescience), he outlined the emergence, for example, of China's contribution to global environmental pollution as a looming issue. He referred obliquely to corruption, by speaking about the Chinese bureaucracy as an issue. And he looked forward in a way that didn't, of course, capture everything that happened in the Deng Xiaoping revolution, which was just beginning then, but that captured a great deal more of it, I think, than anyone else did at the time.

So he was the kind of person who inspired subordinates who were willing to take risks, whether in making predictions or outlining policy objectives, to do so.

Q: I'd like for people to get a feel for how things work. A speech by an assistant secretary for a regional bureau usually is not just somebody getting up there and making a speech. It's a policy statement.

FREEMAN: That's correct.

Q: So you looked at this and you made your projections, saying basically China is going to loom a lot larger than most of us think. This went against the traditional straight-line projections of most other people dealing with the subject. How did Holbrooke come out with this speech as far as within the State Department, within the administration, the White House and all that?

FREEMAN: I think the speech itself had some resonance with the National Security Council staff -- Oxenberg, in that time, Brzezinski. It was, of course, cleared around there. I don't believe it was cleared at the CIA, which, at that time, in the pre-Bill Casey era, was not regarded as a policy agency.

The basic points that the speech made were an extrapolation from, or consistent with, those that Vice President Mondale made in August of '79 during his visit to China, when he spoke at Beijing University. That speech, largely drafted by Mike Oxenberg, but with some input from me, was a very strong statement of an American willingness to pursue a relationship with China, which went well beyond the strategic triangle of Washington-Moscow-Beijing relations that had dominated the relationship in earlier days.

And so I think the main points that Holbrooke's speech made were that our relationship with China was not simply a function of our relations with the Soviet Union, but should be pursued on its own merits. That we didn't see our relationship with China as coming at the expense of others. That we saw a national interest in a friendly and modernizing China. That we had an interest in China's territorial integrity and security, which was important. And, finally, that we would adhere strictly to the normalization understandings we had reached with regard to Taiwan (and I'll come back to that).

There was actually a last point in addition to those, which was that we saw China as a partner in the resolution of global issues, whether they were environment, food, population, energy, and the like, and that we intended to pursue those relationships with the Chinese. That was a reference to a process that, as of 1995, is still incomplete; that is, integrating China into the world system of states, the international order, and doing so without disrupting arrangements that have been very congenial to the United States, which China, if left outside, could eventually challenge or overthrow.

So the basic themes were these.

Now I think none of us really recognized, on June 4, 1980, that over the course of that summer, George Bush, who was the vice presidential candidate for Ronald Reagan, would be enmeshed by Reagan in a frontal challenge to the normalization understandings, encouraged, I believe, by Jim Lilley, who was at that time principal advisor to Bush.

Ronald Reagan essentially proposed, over the course of 1980, to reverse two elements of the normalization understandings with regard to Taiwan. First, he felt that an official relationship, of some sort, should be reestablished with Taiwan. And, second, he did not agree with the formulation that the Carter administration had carefully preconcerted with the Chinese on arms sales to Taiwan.

That formulation was that the United States would continue to sell carefully selected defensive weapons to Taiwan, on a restrained basis; that is, the weapons would be defensive, they'd be carefully selected, and there would be overall restraint in the level of sales. And he objected to that.

To jump ahead a little bit, when he came into office, both issues immediately arose. The issue of official relations arose in the context of invitations to officials from Taiwan to attend his inauguration.

As country desk officer, in a situation where the Carter administration, of course, had departed and the new administration was not in place, I was the most senior official in the U.S. government dealing with China. And I really had to scramble, with Bud McFarlane's help and Al Haig's help, to persuade the Reagan White House not to, in effect, restore an official relationship with Taiwan at the inauguration.

Subsequently, Reagan thought better of this, when he began to realize the importance of China to our overall international strategy, and specifically the things that the Chinese were doing with us with regard to Afghanistan -- the collection of intelligence on the Soviet Union and the like. And he backed away from that.

But, on the arms sales issue, he persisted in his view. It found expression, over the course of the early part of 1981 and subsequently through the summer and early fall, in the so-called F-X issue, the F-X being a fighter bomber aircraft, but basically an interceptor, that the Carter administration had authorized. This would have been the first such major-weapons system produced by the United States specifically for export, rather than for acquisition by our own armed forces.

This issue was a very political one. There were two companies competing for it: Northrop, which was based in southern California, and General Dynamics, which was based in Texas. The General Dynamics aircraft was a downgraded version of the F-16. The Northrop aircraft was a newly designed aircraft, in effect, major re-engineering, based on the old F-5.

Q: Which had been our principal export fighter.

FREEMAN: Exactly. That competition was left open during the campaign, because, of course, Carter wanted to appeal to the voters of both southern California and Texas, and didn't want to alienate one or the other. And he bequeathed this decision to Ronald Reagan.

In the event, Reagan, Solomonically, decided not to tear the baby in half, and to let both of them compete, which meant, in effect, since everyone knew what the F-16 was, that General Dynamics was likely to get the business. And that, of course, is what happened. It also meant that Northrop, which had put a huge amount of money into developing the F-20, as they called it, their version of the F-X, was going to be in deep financial trouble if it couldn't make a sale to Taiwan. Taiwan was the key to Northrop's corporate strategy.

So there were powerful economic interests and political interests involved. The conjunction of Ronald Reagan's sympathy for Taiwan and his gut feeling that it was wrong to deprive a former ally and a friend of access to this very potent weapons system with the economic and political muscle that was behind it from Texas and California meant that he strongly favored selling this aircraft to Taiwan.

This was a clear challenge to the normalization understandings with Beijing, and ultimately, in the fall of 1981, resulted in the Chinese demanding a clarification of U.S. policy, setting off a negotiation from which, frankly, both sides lost, resulting in a joint communiqué on the issue of arms sales, which was issued August 17, 1982.

At any rate, when Holbrooke gave his speech, all this was, in a sense, before us. Ronald Reagan had begun, however, to make his rumbles about Taiwan, and although he wasn't yet the nominee for the Republicans, it looked very likely that he would be. So one of the motivations for Dick giving his speech was to put a cap on and define the Carter administration's policies on China clearly, which the speech did.

Q: Brzezinski, the national security advisor at that time, was of Polish extraction and renowned for hating the Russians. Did you find that Brzezinski had the same abhorrence for the Chinese, or was this pretty much a Polish-Russian thing? Did you find that he was looking realistically and helpfully at the China relationship?

FREEMAN: Brzezinski was, as you said, viscerally anti-Russian, and his anti-Russian sentiment led him to be quite pro-Chinese. In other words, his concern about the Soviet Union was a geopolitical concern, not primarily an ideological concern. In fact, on occasion, his anti-Russian sentiment, as in his, I think, ludicrous capering at the Afghan border, firing a rifle over into the Khyber Pass and so on, was sometimes embarrassing. During his visit to China, he remarked to his Chinese hosts, when he went to the Great Wall, "Last one to the top gets to fight the Russians in Ethiopia." He had a sort of schoolboy-like, almost appealing, naive enthusiasm for sticking it to the Russians. And he liked the Chinese for that reason.

I'm sure the Chinese found all this entertaining. They are a very sober-minded people, and I'm not quite sure what their reaction to Mr. Brzezinski was. On the other hand, they clearly knew that Mr. Brzezinski was a very strong supporter of the U.S.-China relationship.

During the period from '79 to '81 in which I was country director for China, there were several different currents. There was a deep current, I would say, in U.S.-China relations in which state governors, congressional delegations, business delegations and the like, and provincial delegations and business delegations and scientific delegations crossed the Pacific between China and the United States and began to really build a deep and cooperative relationship, and to explore the potential for trade and investment, although investment was not yet really possible directly, and for cooperation on science and technology and the like.

Many of the agreements that were negotiated during this period, and subsequently, came under the heading of science and technology cooperation. I'm now talking about a second current, if you will; that is, knitting the two bureaucracies together, the bureaucracies in Beijing and in Washington. They had two motives. One, the Chinese record and Chinese achievement in some areas provided unique data and insight.

For example, in the area of astronomy, Chinese records are the longest and most complete on astronomical events. And access to these records was very important to astronomers and physicists studying interstellar events.

If you look at the public-health area, there are records in China of very large populations that have been subjected to consistent environmental stress (for example, elements in the drinking supply), which allow you to study the impact of the environment on the human body in a way that can't be done easily elsewhere.

Chinese geology is vastly interesting.

Zoology. The Department of Agriculture had, in the late nineteenth century and early twentieth century, essentially created the U.S. ornamental plant and nursery business with plant stock collected in China. Much of the rhododendron and azalea stock, and many, many other things that we now take for granted, was originally collected by USDA employees in China. They were very eager to get back into such a relationship. The payoff was potentially enormous.

For example, I remember one of the reasons for seeking cooperation in this area was that the Chinese sow, although very fat, which is not desirable, has a litter of a dozen piglets. Whereas the American sow, which tends to be lean, has a litter of six to eight piglets. Well, if you could breed the two and collect the germ plasm from China and introduce it here and produce a larger litter of lean piglets, you could instantly make a hell of a lot of money for American farmers.

Soybeans originated in China, and many strains were of interest. And so on.

So there was real scientific interest.

But I have to say that, politically, the motivation for doing all this was very clear, and that is that those of us charged with promoting U.S.-China relations wished to ensure that the relationship was sufficiently broad and engaged a sufficient number of bureaucracies and special interests on both sides so that it would be insulated, to some extent, from political cross currents. So that was what we were doing.

Finally, as I mentioned earlier, to a great extent, the relationship during this period was trip-driven, meaning that the travel of high-level officials from either side has a tendency to concentrate the mind of the bureaucracy, and to lead to instructions from the top that appropriate achievements be produced for the visit to consummate. So, trip-driven diplomacy accelerated the negotiation of framework agreements and the like.

This process continued until the Taiwan arms sale controversy arose in 1981 and derailed it temporarily. It resumed, at a slower pace, later.

Q: Were there any trips of particular note, either way, that you can think of? Every time you have one of these trips of a major personage, things go right, things go wrong. As you say, it concentrates minds and also events.

FREEMAN: There were so many that it's hard to single out any in particular. I suppose I remember most vividly a visit by the first delegation from the Peoples' Liberation Army. Being new to military matters at that time, I was pleasantly surprised, indeed astonished, to discover that, through reminiscence about old battlefields on which people had faced each other, veterans of the Korean War on both sides found they had something in common, and that this common experience quickly established camaraderie, rather than reinforced ancient enmity.

Q: It happens every time.

FREEMAN: I gather. But also by the extent to which intelligent discussion focused largely on the Afghan issue, which appeared to both China and the United States to threaten a general Soviet advance.

Q: We're talking about the December 1979 attempted takeover of Afghanistan by the Soviets.

FREEMAN: The Christmas coup and occupation of Afghanistan by the Soviet Union. And the threat that this posed to Iran was of particular concern.

In fact, the Holbrooke speech of June 1980 had foreshadowed the fact that the U.S.-China relationship could expand to meet challenges to common interests. It held out an implication that indeed the relationship could move beyond friendship into what Holbrooke called alliance (what I would think you'd more accurately call coalition), namely, that if there were a frontal assault on our common interests, such a relationship could expand rapidly. And that was referring to Afghanistan.

Q: You're sitting there, you've obviously got your antennae out, how did the Chinese respond initially, and then subsequently, to the Afghan coup and invasion?

FREEMAN: Their initial reaction, rather similar to ours, was quite panicked, for several reasons, I suppose. China and the United States have long shared a relationship of alliance, or at least patronage, with regard to Pakistan. In the case of the United States, that relationship's been quite erratic and had its good and bad moments. In the case of the Chinese, it's been very steady. And the Afghan invasion was an obvious threat, immediately, to Pakistan, to its territorial integrity, stability, and perhaps to its very existence, especially given the Indian-Soviet collusion on many matters. So I think the initial reaction was one of very great concern.

But the Chinese, rather quickly, I think, within a matter of a month or two, concluded that in fact the Soviets were more likely to become bogged down and regret their Afghan adventure than to use it as a springboard for further advance.

Indeed, U.S.-China cooperation, conducted primarily through intelligence channels, with money from many sources, was absolutely central to creating the Mujahideen resistance to the Soviet invasion. And that program cemented relationships between the United States and China in yet another dimension.

Q: The great crisis of the Carter administration was the overthrow of the shah, the Iranian Revolution, particularly the seizing of our embassy and the hostages, who stayed there for 444 days. We were seeking support everywhere, to do something about this. Did we find that there was a China card?

FREEMAN: No, there was no China card, really, for the simple reason that the Chinese, like the United States, had earlier embraced the shah as the gendarme of the Gulf, and looked to Iran as the principal bulwark for stability to the south of the Soviet Union and to the north of India. Therefore, they had exactly the same sort of relationship with the overthrown regime, although on a lesser scale, that we had.

Second, I suppose, there was no natural affinity between the religious radicalism of Khomeini and Chinese secularism and agnosticism or official atheism, although, I must say, the Chinese noted eerie resemblances between their Cultural Revolution and the chaos that descended upon Iran, which tended to make them quite disdainful of Iran as a society, which, as they had done earlier, was going through a sort of nervous breakdown.

So they were not able to be particularly helpful. I think they would have been, had they been able to be. Of course, one of the things that happened in the Cultural Revolution was that they had their own instances of sacking of embassies and besieging foreign-government establishments, which should have been entitled to protection by the government.

Q: The Boxer Rebellion.

FREEMAN: The Boxer Rebellion, at the beginning of the century, but during the Cultural Revolution, the sacking of the British Embassy in particular comes to mind. There were other instances.

I think, in fact, the two matters -- the Chinese experience with their xenophobia and the Iranian lapse into xenophobia -- are related in terms of psychological reactions to colonialism and the humiliation of proud non-western civilizations by the period of western ascendancy. But this is not the time to go into that.

Q: Going back to the Holbrooke speech. When there's a speech, essentially you write it, Holbrooke plays with it. Did it get passed around?

FREEMAN: He did something that I didn't at all expect him to do, and never would have done myself, and would have recommended against, and that is, he actually showed the speech in advance to the Chinese Embassy here, which, of course, had to object to the language on Taiwan, which was balanced language, saying, on the one hand, we would adhere to our understandings on normalization, but on the other hand, we would continue to insist on a peaceful settlement of the Taiwan issue. It referred, of course, to the Taiwan Relations Act, which the Chinese had found to go well beyond what they had expected, in terms of authorizing the unofficial relationship with the people of Taiwan.

So that is the only element of clearance difficulty that I recall. I don't think he was trying to clear the speech with the Chinese, but I think he was trying to gauge their reaction to what was a rather more comprehensive and forward-looking statement than any that had previously been made.

Q: Obviously, the Chinese would be happy with the rosy predictions of their economic future. But on the Taiwan business, after they objected, what happened? Did they come to you and say no, no, no?

FREEMAN: They just sort of made a stink. Holbrooke's motivation for doing it, I believe, was in part to ingratiate himself with the Chinese. And, of course, it had precisely the opposite effect.

Q: It doesn't work.

FREEMAN: That sort of technique does not work, so that was, I think, naive on his part. But I think in part he was proud of the speech and wanted to trumpet it and make sure that it got attention in China. That part of it, I think, might have been handled in a slightly different way.

Q: Not just in your speech, but before, you sat down and asked yourself whither China. And you were moving away from the straight-line projection of China's like this and it will grow at a certain rate and everything will sort of remain static, which is very easy to do, rather than to see major changes. How did you see China, as you were looking at it back in 1979 to '81, politically?

FREEMAN: China, in that period, had just emerged from the combined ravages of the Cultural Revolution and the Gang of Four. I believed that what was likely to happen was the continuation of an autocratic system of government over the twenty years forward. I did not believe that there would be a frontal challenge, on the national level, to the control of the Communist Party, but I predicted, as I recall, that there might well be local disturbances, including some in Beijing, which would be brutally repressed.

I thought that, in effect, China was beginning to recapitulate the East Asian model of development, in which autocratic government liberalizes economics, economics booms, and political reform follows, with a significant lag, behind economic reform. I think probably that thesis, which was central to my paper, was what was least acceptable about it, in the context of the time.

And I continue to believe that is exactly what has been happening in China. If you look at, particularly, economics and growth rates, and compound them over a sufficient period of time, you begin to get results that are very startling to people and that they don't want to accept.

Q: You're talking about a quarter of the population of the globe.

FREEMAN: Exactly.

In the military area, as it turned out, I was wrong in some respects, because I imagined the continuation of Sino-Soviet rivalry over this period. Of course, the Soviet Union collapsed halfway through it.

Q: You're talking about particularly '89ish.

FREEMAN: Yes. I thought that, by the end of the '90s, the Chinese would have deployed submarine-launch ballistic missiles (SLBM) in the eastern Mediterranean and the northern Indian Ocean. If you have an intermediate-range SLBM, there are two areas from which you can successfully launch on European Russia: one is the Arctic, which I thought was a bit far away from the Chinese, and the other is the Mediterranean. And I had noticed a pattern of Chinese assistance in port development and the like that appeared to be designed to meet the requirements of operations in the Mediterranean. To operate in the Mediterranean, you need one base outside and one inside. And it was clear that the Chinese, in Mauritania and in Malta, and in their relationship with the Egyptians, in the submarine area, were covering their bets for such a venture.

Submarines are vastly expensive, and in the end, as the Soviet Union collapsed, I think the Chinese abandoned this plan, if they ever had it. I don't think we'll ever know whether my speculation was correct and simply overcome by history, or whether it was just wrong from the beginning.

Q: There are two trends in China: one is centralized government, which you have, the other is a breakdown, when it gets too big, into warlordism and all. As you looked at it, again going back to the time, how did you see this other trend?

FREEMAN: I did not believe then, and I do not believe now, that China is in danger of breakup, or that the military, which is a strong, centralized, national institution, would develop warlordism. I think we know a lot more now about China than we did in 1980, because it's a vastly more open country. And what we now understand is that China was never anywhere near as centralized as many imagined, and that provincial governments always had a fair amount of latitude within the general guidance of the center. Deng Xiaoping's revolution enhanced that flexibility for provincial governments, and economic growth has buttressed their authority.

But there is still, after the past 150 years of tortured Chinese history, a strong sense among Chinese that the country cannot be allowed to fall apart, that unity is all important, and that the maintenance of social and political order has to take priority over virtually everything else. The Chinese have this conclusion because, literally, over this period, something on the order of one hundred million of them have died in disorders either caused internally or by foreign invasion.

So I believed that these psychological and political factors would outweigh others, and I continue to believe that.

I think Tiananmen is a perfect example...

Q: We're talking about the shooting of students in Tiananmen Square. This was when?

FREEMAN: June 4, 1989. I think that is a perfect example of the sort of local disturbance, albeit in the national capital, to which I was referring. The only thing that surprised me about it was that the government did not move quicker to put this down. And I wish, in retrospect, that they had, because the loss of life would have been far less if they had been more resolute early on, rather than allowing the students to, in effect, get out of control and pose a direct challenge to their authority.

Q: Again going back to this '79 to '81 period, did Tibet raise any political problems? We're talking about the Chinese takeover, as many people feel, of Tibet. And this has become sort of a cause.

FREEMAN: Not really.

The background on Tibet, as you know, is that, in the 1950s, the CIA spent a vast amount of money to produce a rebellion in Tibet. And that rebellion was the precipitate cause of the Dalai Lama's flight over the border to India. That is, we attempted, as part of our general policy of destabilizing China, to destabilize Tibet and, if possible, detach it from China.

I think we were all very sensitive, in the 1980s, as perhaps people are not now, to the way in which American maneuvers on Tibet might be viewed in Beijing, given this history, which the Chinese are well aware of, even if Americans have forgotten it. So Tibet and the Dalai Lama loomed as an issue in the realm of religious freedom, but it was not a political issue.

Subsequently, the issue of Tibet has been embraced by quite a range of people in the United States: some are simply drawn to exotic cultures and favor primitive peoples out of some sentimental impulse; others, for one reason or another, as the United States has become more anti-scientific, are more drawn to mysticism. There is a significant portion of the American public now that is avowedly dedicated to what is, in my view, superstition and mystical malarkey, and Tibetan Buddhism is about as mystical a malarkey as you can find.

Q: What are sometimes known as the New Age people.

FREEMAN: Exactly. So there is a natural affinity between Tibetan Buddhists and this segment of American opinion.

There is, of course, in the post-Soviet-collapse era, a sense that, well, if the Soviet Union broke up and various nationalities that had been incorporated into the Russian Empire flew out of it, why shouldn't Tibet do the same?

I think this is a cause of considerable friction now between the United States and China, because every Chinese, whether he is a dissident who participated in the events in Tiananmen Square in 1989 and is in jail or has been in jail, or whether he is a high official of the government, agrees that Tibet is and always has been and always will be part of China. There is absolutely no sympathy for separatism, or any willingness to tolerate it. Therefore, gestures that, in terms of American politics, seem innocent and noble and perhaps are seen as free shots in the political arena, like congressional resolutions proposing the recognition of Tibet and independence and the sending of an ambassador there, are seen by the Chinese (and technically they're correct) as justifying a declaration of war in response, since the initiatives proposed to sever a portion of the country from central control, and promote rebellion and secession. Well, of course, Americans don't see that, and therefore are somewhat puzzled by the strength of the Chinese reaction to all this.

Finally, I think Tibet is a very different issue from what is often presented here. It is not so far the case, as is often charged, that China is deliberately populating Tibet with Han Chinese. To the extent there is economic opportunity in Tibet (and that is not a wide extent), Chinese who want to make money will and do move there. But most Chinese with whom I've spoken, who've lived in Tibet or been there, find it an exotic, but very harsh, environment. It's a nice place to visit, but they don't want to live there.

The Tibetan population is quite distinct, quite resentful of Han economic and political dominance, very much devoted to the Dalai Lama, and chafing under Chinese rule. All that is true. But it is also true that Tibetan culture was a primitive and remarkably unsuccessful culture, in terms of producing a decent lifespan or state of public health or economic opportunity or engagement with the outside world by Tibetans. And Tibetan association in the broader Chinese family has brought the Tibetan people all of those benefits. There is some sort of tradeoff, I suppose. Tibet is not viable as an independent country in the modern era. It is viable as an independent country only if it is prepared to live at medieval standards of living, which I don't believe anyone is.

So it's a complex situation. And because Tibet is so far away from the United States, it's a blank screen on which you can project your own mystical fantasies with great ease.

I think we were better served when we dealt, as we did in the '80s, with that issue with some caution and some sense of the inflammatory potential that appearing to sponsor secession by a part of China from China might have.

Q: We're going through a sort of Republican revolution in Congress now. Tibet is one of those things that is very visceral; anything that's anti-Communist sounds good, and this sometimes comes up.

FREEMAN: Generally speaking, countries, including the United States, are well advised not to sponsor causes that are hopeless. Tibetan independence can only succeed if there is massive foreign intervention. In other words, a war with China. And I don't see the United States or the American people being willing to make that sort of sacrifice for that cause.

Q: I was a Balkan hand, and I must say, Bosnia was a hopeless cause. And we're still dealing with it.

FREEMAN: And we have not yet, to this date, been willing to commit our blood for that cause, much as we may sympathize with it.

Q: Again going back to this early period, we now have established diplomatic relations with China. Could you talk a bit about your relations with the Chinese officials who came over, because I would imagine that, speaking Chinese and all, you would be somebody whom they could turn to, to say, What is all this about so and so -- the press, the Congress, the presidency, the academic world. I would have thought they would look to someone to give them some ideas of the importance, how people react in the United States. Did you find yourself in that position?

FREEMAN: In fact, I did. And I think it was assisted by the fact that, as the Deng Xiaoping miracle began in China, many officials who had been incarcerated or rusticated in the earlier regime were brought back, and while they were, of course, extraordinarily cautious in their contacts with foreigners, including Chinese-speaking foreigners, for the first time, they could begin to engage on a truly personal level. And I began to find that friendships were forming between myself and people who later became quite senior in the Chinese establishment. I mean, by friendships, personal relationships that went beyond the official friendship that diplomats always have to espouse.

One of the things that I was trying to do was to strengthen and broaden strategic dialogue between the United States and China on a variety of important regional issues, some of them remote from Asia, on the grounds that it was important for the Chinese not to misunderstand what the United States was doing, as they had tended to do in the past. That, conversely, we needed to be able to influence the Chinese in the direction of policies that were at least not contradictory to, and hopefully, in fact, were tacitly supportive of our policies. So we began quite a range of dialogue. And this brought experts on a variety of areas remote from East Asia to Washington, or it took us to Beijing, to discuss this with them. Certainly, the broadening of contact between us I participated in.

We had some very difficult negotiations during this period, the civil aviation agreement perhaps one of the most difficult, because we insisted, correctly, on maintaining our air links to Taipei. After all, the arrangements that we had agreed to with the PRC for post-normalization relations with Taiwan included economic ties, and aviation is a principal such tie. But the Chinese regarded, at that time, aviation as a state activity, and the state airline (a miserable excuse for an airline), CAAC (Civil Aviation Administration of China), wanted to come to the United States. They saw Pan Am as a sort of functional equivalent of the official U.S. airline. Of course, we were in the process of beginning the deregulation of airlines. We saw the promotion of air links as a legitimate state activity, but we saw their actual management as a private one.

In any event, eventually we were able to reach an agreement with the Chinese. We reached a parallel understanding with Taiwan, through the American Institute in Taiwan (AIT), and we were able to inaugurate air service. This was, however, as I say, one of the many rather contentious, difficult negotiations.

There was a series of other issues that began to emerge during this time. For example, the longstanding issue of financial and property claims resulting from Chinese confiscation of property, or the repudiation by earlier regimes, including the Sun Yat-sen 1911 Revolution, of ancient railway bonds and the like. And I later had to deal with these issues in Beijing.

Finally, this was a tumultuous period on another level, because Taipei was obviously highly dissatisfied with a circumstance in which the only relationship it enjoyed with the United States was unofficial. Earlier, Taipei had enjoyed a privileged, official relationship with Washington. So the unofficial representatives of Taiwan throughout the country, and their many, many offices, were constantly engaging in petty moves to demonstrate the officiality, as they put it, of the relationship. This would include arranging with local officials to fly the flag of the Republic of China over the mayor's office, or, in some cases, to acquire consular license plates from the local officials, since there's no federal regulation of this, or to list themselves, as they did in many telephone books, including in Washington, as the Embassy of the Republic of China. They took out ads in the Yellow Pages, portraying themselves as an embassy, and stressing that they were the Republic of China and so on. All of this entirely understandable from their perspective, but enormously irritating to the State Department and to the PRC, as they were endlessly ingenious in the way in which they sought to score these political points.

Q: I've talked to Nat Bellocchi, who is with the American Institute in Taiwan, who said that the Nationalist Chinese, a Taiwan group, are remarkably adept at networking in the United States. They have developed contacts not just within the Chinese community, but all over, as opposed to the PRC group, who tend to be more dour and more unto themselves.

FREEMAN: I think that's absolutely correct. I might speak for a minute about that, because it was very striking in 1980 what the consequences of this were. That is, it's now 1995, and Taiwan now has forty, fifty years of experience lobbying in the United States. If you remember, in the 1950s, there was the Committee of One Million, which was a right-wing, Chiang Kai-shek operation. As time went on, Taipei got increasingly sophisticated about lobbying, publicity, public relations, and the courtship of interest groups.

I remember, in 1980, U.S. trade with the Chinese Mainland was booming. In fact, in that year, the Chinese were buying one out of every seven bales of cotton produced in the United States, and had emerged as a major factor in some key American economic sectors.

But no one was aware of this. It was as though the Chinese found this embarrassing and they wished to keep it secret. I knew it, as country director, and presumably the Board of Trade in Chicago knew it, and the cotton traders knew it, but no one else knew it.

But if Taiwan bought a Q-Tip cotton swab, that little bit of cotton would be trotted out by a congressman, who would say, "I have with me my dear friend Mr. Lee, from Taipei, who has just bought this bit of cotton. This was grown in our district, and it will increase employment. And you can see how important this relationship is." Taiwan, of course, very cleverly, understood that allowing a congressman to announce that sort of deal, however small it might be, ingratiated the congressman, who then owed one to Taiwan. This helped the congressman's reelection. It gained publicity for Taiwan, of a favorable nature, in the district. And no official had to be there. So they did this with great skill.

They courted governors. President Clinton, prior to becoming president, when he was governor of Arkansas, was in Taiwan four times. The lure, to a governor, of being able to take a trade delegation over to Taiwan, do some business, and get some publicity back home as a promoter of state exports, was simply irresistible. So they did a great deal of this.

They had a really very subtle and effective publication, which I have always enjoyed looking at, both for what it contains and for the technique that it embraces, called The Free China Weekly, which is a sort of tabloid that comes out every week, with a bit of information about Taiwan and cross-Strait relations (Taiwan Strait), Taiwan versus the Mainland, and interaction between all of the above. It very skillfully flogs three to five different themes in each issue, written in colloquial American English. They have a very slick publication on trade that they put out.

They have what I consider to be by far the most professional and skilled congressional-relations staff of any foreign regime represented here. They are much better than the Israelis, who are usually regarded as the best, because, whereas the Israelis gain their way by threatening political retaliation through Jewish or right-wing, Christian, pro-Israel supporters, Taiwan threatens no one. Everything is done by inducement. In the long run, courtship is more effective as a tie that binds than ultimata and threats.

So Taiwan has brought to bear on diplomacy all of the skills of interpersonal relations that Chinese culture embodies, and they've done it supremely well because, as a small place overshadowed by the rest of China, they've had to try harder.

The PRC, by contrast, is much more similar to the pre-modern China of the Emperor Qian Long, who told George III to take his trinkets and buzz off, because China had no need for intercourse with barbarians.

So Taiwan, island China, if you will, has developed an outward-looking philosophy that has caused its influence in the United States to prosper, whereas Mainland China has a continental and inward-looking approach that has left it essentially disarmed in the battle of propaganda, influence, and ideas.

Taiwan has developed what I consider to be a truly admirable society. It has successfully modernized. It is a China that has achieved the dream of Chinese reformers in the nineteenth century; namely, wealth and a measure of power, such that people in Taiwan can stand on the same level with foreigners and look them in the eye, confident that they are, technologically and economically and politically, quite as sophisticated as the foreigners with whom they are dealing.

Ironically, this dream of all Chinese, which is very much the dream on the Mainland as well, has been realized in Taiwan. So as Taiwan's economic prosperity has advanced and its democratization has proceeded, it has had an easier and easier task of selling itself in the United States, since it has, in fact, become increasingly admirable as a society, and its natural affinities with Americans have grown, rather than diminished.

So the contrast that Nat Bellocchi points to is a very real one, and it's rooted in the small size of Taiwan and in its economic and political modernization. I suspect that this path will be followed by the Mainland, although at a far slower pace, because it will remain, as the United States is, primarily obsessed with its own affairs, rather than with affairs abroad. Taiwan, of course, as a small place, pays more attention to foreign events.

Q: What about, again going back to the Carter period, your connection within the State Department as you dealt with the American Institute in Taiwan? In other words, essentially the Taiwan Desk. Here it was, unofficial, but official as all hell, in practical terms, wasn't it?

FREEMAN: Smoke and mirrors, perhaps. The contrivance of elaborate forms can make something that might otherwise be official appear very unofficial.

I would say, referring back to those petty moves by Taiwan, that they led to my spending an enormous amount of time doing what I did not want to do; namely, prescribing rules for the U.S. bureaucracy in dealing with Taiwan, shutting doors.

For example, the design of the license plate that would be issued to Taiwan's unofficial representatives. Issued by whom? Well, issued by the American Institute in Taiwan. Well, how was anyone to recognize that was empowered? Also, the design of the identity card. All of these things took on extraordinary sensitivity because of the fact that Taiwan was constantly pushing the envelope. Had it accommodated, we probably would have been able to do far better for Taiwan than we were able to do.

I had learned Taiwanese and always had a fond spot in my heart for Taiwan, yet I found myself in the ironic position of being the ogre on Taiwan policy. I think Taiwan came, during this period, to regard me personally very much as the evil genius behind all their distress, which, to some extent, I suppose I was.

Bureaucratically, the necessity to keep the Taiwan operation somehow related to the China operation, but separate. In bureaucratic terms, what does this translate into? It translates into the usual thing: How can I get the Taiwan coordination staff moved so that they're next to my office, so that they're not up on another floor, doing their own thing, out of sight, out of mind, and making mistakes, since everything they were doing had to be measured against what we had agreed with the PRC. Often, Taiwan would come in and want to do something, and it was eminently doable, but they would insist on doing it in a way that made it impossible. And then, if it was desirable, we had to find a way to do it that preserved the appearance of unofficiality and didn't breach the normalization understandings with Beijing. This took a great amount of time and was an endless irritant.

I can remember, in the fall of 1980, as Ronald Reagan prepared to be inaugurated, speaking with a very senior official from Taiwan's foreign ministry, who was a longstanding friend, and going over all these items with him, and saying, "Look, you now have a much more sympathetic regime coming in, which has not experienced this. If you continue this pattern of behavior, you will very quickly alienate this new group, which will find you irritating. Don't do it. Try to remember what the larger picture is. And don't push too far on arms sales, because if you do, you will pay a price in terms of restrictions. In the end, the United States, if forced to choose between its strategic imperatives of a decent relationship with the Chinese Mainland and its sentimental imperatives with you, will always choose the strategic over the sentimental. Don't force that choice on the new administration, with which you can work and from which you can gain a great deal, if you do so with sensitivity."

Well, of course, they did continue exactly what they had been doing, with precisely the result that I predicted. They soured the new administration on them. And they did, in the August 17, 1982, communiqué, find their access to arms restricted.

You asked about friendships with Chinese officials. Throughout this period, indeed throughout my entire career, I have maintained friendships and relationships with people on both sides of the Taiwan Strait. And I've always been accessible to people from Taipei, providing the context was not a violation of my official position. Of course, since I'm no longer in the government, I don't give a damn about that, and I feel free to go to Taiwan, and have done that several times. But I could not, in that earlier era.

By the same token, I've been very open to and accessible, informally, to many, many people from the Chinese Mainland.

I think both of them have respected the fact that I have not concealed these relationships from either. They're each aware that these are going on, and no one has objected.

In fact, ironically, to jump ahead a bit, when I was stationed in Bangkok, all three of my children were studying Chinese in Taipei, and I wished to go visit them, en route back to the United States. I checked both with the Taiwan representative in Bangkok, to make sure that I could visit Taipei with no publicity, and I checked with the PRC Embassy there, to make sure they would have no objection to my doing this. The PRC had no objection, and Taipei assured that there would be no publicity.

My trip was then vetoed by the State Department, on the grounds that it was excessively sensitive, that I knew too many people in Taipei, that Beijing probably would object, etc.

I was then confronted with the irony of arriving in Hong Kong with my wife, to meet with the publishers of a cookbook in Chinese that I had helped to write earlier, who were Communists, who said, "Well, aren't you supposed to be going on to Taipei?", and seemed very surprised when I said no, that I wasn't doing that, and that my wife was going on alone, since the State Department couldn't really control her.

The rules that produced that perverse result were, ironically, formulated by me, in an earlier era, precisely because there were all sorts of abuses and problems, in which Taiwan was complicitous. I have always regarded that period and those antics with a sense of disappointment.

Q: Just to get very bureaucratic, where was the American Institute in Taiwan located? Who was doing it? Just the day-to-day checking back and forth, how did this work?

FREEMAN: There was a small Taiwan coordination staff in the Bureau of East Asian and Pacific Affairs, which, as I indicated, I eventually succeeded in having moved down adjacent to what was then the Office of Chinese Affairs, now renamed the Office of Chinese and Mongolian Affairs. There is an internal corridor connecting the two (called the Taiwan Strait, of course). That move greatly facilitated cooperation within the Department.

The American Institute in Taiwan has its Washington offices in Rosslyn, Virginia, and it is responsible for day-to-day contact and providing a venue for meetings, of an unofficial character, with officials from Taiwan. It is also the body that is responsible for the post-management and other administrative support functions for the American Institute in Taiwan offices in Taipei and Kaohsiung, in Taiwan. So if a delegation from Taiwan came here, it would be received by AIT, and AIT would arrange appropriate meetings with American government officials, outside of U.S. government offices, in appropriately informal settings.

Well, it turns out, of course, that appropriately informal settings are far more productive than the usual formal settings, and that to insist that all business must be done over a working lunch or over a drink in a hotel lobby produces far better results than making people come to your office. So I don't think Taiwan lost, in any respect, by this, and maybe even gained.

Q: Ronald Reagan started his run in early 1980, and he was seen by many as being an extreme right-winger, devoted to the cause of Taiwan. It was a major point of concession of his political persona, you might say, at the time, where he was coming from. As he gained more and more power and was coming in, this must have put quite a bit of strain on you to try to explain the American political system and how things worked to the Chinese Embassy and their officials. Could you tell me about how you dealt with this.

FREEMAN: Indeed, I did spend an enormous amount of time, and I had to take the initiative, and I spent a fair amount of my own money, having Chinese officials, visiting both from Beijing and from the embassy, over to my house for dinner or lunch.

All of this culminated, I recall, in a terrible evening in November 1980, when I invited everybody from the Chinese Embassy, I guess the ambassador was off somewhere else, but everyone else from the Political Section, the ambassador's office, the DCM, the military attaché, the whole bunch, over to my house for an election watch. I remember my son was tossing pizza in the air, making it. My wife had produced copious quantities of hors d'oeuvres and the like. Just as this group was walking in, around eight o'clock, Jimmy Carter was on the television, conceding to Ronald Reagan. It was a highly depressing evening, as it became apparent that Reagan, who'd really campaigned, apparently, for Taiwan, against the PRC, had won a sweeping victory in the election.

So I found, throughout the course of 1980 and certainly after the election, that I was spending an enormous amount of time cautioning the Chinese not to overreact, to recognize that what's said on the campaign trail may get altered, and that they should build bridges of communication, rather than be standoffish or be aloof to the new forces taking charge in Washington.

You're right, this role of sort of counselor, if you will, to an embassy that at that time still had a rather shallow and ideologically constrained vision of American politics was a very important one.

Q: Coming now to the transition, where you almost have to put your other hat on and try to explain to a new administration coming in the facts of life in the world. It happens with almost every administration, but the Reagan administration came in with more, you might say, international ideological baggage than most others, particularly regarding Latin America and the Soviet Union, but also China. Could you talk a bit about what you were doing?

FREEMAN: The transition was a somewhat bizarre experience, because it went in two phases. First, there was a group of congressional right-wing types who landed in the State Department.

Q: These are the staff people.

FREEMAN: They were ostensibly representing the president, before he had really selected a new secretary of state officially, although Al Haig was rumored. This group arrived, and they were hostile. I was told that Senator Helms had a list of seventeen people who had to be purged, and that I was on that list. And various other statements were made. So there was a very nasty atmosphere. These people went around and interviewed the different Desks, including the China Desk, and tried to get some sense of what the state of play on the relationship was. They were writing papers for the secretary-to-be.

But the instant Al Haig was named as secretary, he thanked all these people for their good work, sent them packing, and brought in his own people, who were a great deal more strategically sensible and less ideological. So there was a sort of sigh of relief.

As we went toward the inauguration, we had, as I've mentioned, problems with various Taiwan officials, who had pretty much managed to insert themselves under the reviewing stand at the inaugural parade. We had difficulty persuading the president-elect that this was not the way to start off, with a crisis with China, and that if he wished to pursue this matter of official relations with Taiwan, he should do it in a more deliberate manner than that.

So it was a difficult transition, although I must say, in retrospect, despite the change in political parties and philosophies from the Carter administration, which in many respects was ideologically quite on the left, to this far-right administration, it was a friendlier takeover than the one between Bush and Reagan in '88-'89, which was a very unfriendly thing indeed, as different wings of the Republican Party succeeded each other.

But China was obviously at the top of the right-wing hit list. I found myself writing a great deal and working with, particularly, Secretary Haig, who was a strong supporter of a good relationship with China, and who had maintained close contact with the Chinese when he was at SHAEF as SACEUR, and who had, of course, been involved with the opening of the relationship with China as Kissinger's deputy back in the early '70s. I found myself working very closely with him in a series of efforts to educate the president, writing short little memoranda for him, providing him with briefing material, making suggestions for points that he should raise with the president, and the like.

He did gradually gain ground with the president on these issues, and convince him that the enemy was the Soviet Union, not China, and that there were merits to maintaining a good relationship with China, and that meant that we had to go through a certain level of contortion in our relationship with Taiwan to demonstrate that it was unofficial.

So that all worked, thanks to the, I think, genuinely heroic willingness of Al Haig to impale himself on this issue.

***

At any rate, as 1981 proceeded, I was selected to be DCM in Beijing, and in June of 1981, I went with Secretary Haig for his first visit to Beijing as secretary. Then I came back, packed up, and returned to Beijing July 17, 1981, to become chargé, my predecessor, Stape Roy, having just departed. Subsequently, he was deputy chief of mission in Bangkok, then ambassador to Singapore and, of course, most recently, to China.

Q: I always like to get the dates. You were there from when to when?

FREEMAN: I was in China from July 17, 1981, until the beginning of November 1984, just about three and a half years. The new ambassador, Arthur Hummel, did not arrive until September 24, 1981.

I started off with a bang, right in the middle of what was building toward becoming the Taiwan arms-sale crisis with the new Reagan administration.

Q: What was the situation in China at the time, as you saw it?

FREEMAN: When I arrived in 1981, we were two and a half years into Deng Xiaoping's revolution. In fact, one of the first things that I did as chargé was to take Warren Burger, chief justice of the United States, and Charlie Wick, who was the head of USIA, over to see Deng Xiaoping. As I recall, Jimmy Carter also arrived during that period. Deng was very clear in stating at that time that he believed, when the history books were written, people would see the real revolution in China, the real march to modernization and restored wealth and power for the country as beginning in 1978 with his third coming. So it was a time of considerable hope inside China.

It was also a period of mounting crisis in U.S.-China relations, as the undertaking of the United States, at the time of normalization, to sell to Taiwan carefully selected defensive weapons on a restrained basis was ignored by the Reagan administration, which was intent on saving the Northrop Corporation's investment in the F-20 fighter, one of the two versions of the F-X.

So, as the summer proceeded, I began to get signals from Chinese contacts of, really, two things. First, a renewed effort by them to engage Taiwan in peaceful reunification.

I was able, in fact, on the basis of those contacts, to predict pretty accurately, well in advance, the statement that Ye Jianying, a Chinese leader, made to what he called "Taiwan compatriots," a very detailed proposal on reunification, with major new elements of flexibility in it.

And I anticipated, but not adequately, I think, in retrospect, that this indication of flexibility by the Chinese on the Taiwan question would be accompanied by a ratchetting up of the pressure on the United States to read here to the commitments that we had made at the time of normalization.

In the event, as I recall, Huang Hua, the foreign minister, went to Cancún and then came to Washington.

Q: An economic conference of world leaders, held in Cancún, Mexico.

FREEMAN: He went to that conference and then came to Washington, and essentially threw down the gauntlet on the Taiwan issue. So that, in the fall of '81, it appeared, first, that the sale to Taiwan would go through, and, second, that its consequence would be a break in diplomatic relations with China.

Ambassador Hummel arrived right as this began. I can recall the first series of quiet meetings that we held with Ambassador Zhang Wenjin, who was the vice foreign minister at the time, to explore the Chinese position and lay out ours.

By the end of 1981, I think the two sides had concluded that we had to attempt a clarification and restatement of this issue in the form of some sort of document. Those negotiations had a number of nasty twists, including a visit in January 1982 by John Holdridge, the assistant secretary of state for East Asia and Pacific affairs, and subsequently, visits by many others, including George Bush, as vice president, making efforts to find a basis for compromise.

By the early part of 1982, we were engaged in intense negotiations. The first phase of these was really quite memorable, in that we were thundered at by the then Chinese vice foreign minister, Mr. Pu. In the best Mandarin tradition, he lectured and hectored and put us in our place, seated in a high seat, with us in low seats, in the room. When it was clear that was going nowhere, the Chinese then switched interlocutors, and we got Han Xu, who was assistant minister for American and Oceanian affairs, who had been here in Washington and was very well known, and passed away late last year, 1994.

As the negotiations proceeded, they developed effectively two tracks: first, a series of formal meetings, chaired by the ambassador, and, second, far more productive and detailed, a series of informal lunches at my house, with two of the senior, but subordinate, members of the Chinese delegation, Zhang Zai and Zhang Wenpu, in particular, with some others, and the political counselor from the embassy, Jay Taylor, as well as a couple of other people, talking ostensibly totally on an ad referendum, off-the-record, theoretically not official basis, trying to explore the basis of a compromise, on a sort of what-if basis -- What if we said this, what would you say to that? What about this set of words, would that do it?

Although informal, these discussions were very closely controlled from Washington. The president was personally reviewing every account of these discussions, and they were conducted with meticulous care on both sides. These discussions proceeded and ultimately began to produce the outlines of a communiqué.

Q: Just to get a flavor for this, when you were doing the negotiating and you got somebody lecturing you, à la Mandarin, trying to put you in your place, what was the American riposte?

FREEMAN: That initial set of meetings was very much a set of set pieces, with both sides stating, for the record, positions that were obviously very far apart and appeared almost unbridgeable. The American reply to this, through Art Hummel, who is a consummate diplomat, was tough, but not strident, reasoned, and refused to allow us to be put on the defensive, as Mr. Pu was attempting to do.

But, as I said, this exchange of set-piece statements clearly wasn't going to go anywhere. The informal discussions over at my place were conceived, by both sides basically, as a kind of off-conference method of producing something that could then be fed into the conference, which is what happened. There actually were very, very few formal meetings, until the precise end. But, between formal sessions, we worked on communiqué language, as I said, tightly controlled from Washington and from higher levels in Beijing.

I think the Chinese had not been accustomed to this kind off-site, informal session. They, however, quickly grasped the ground rules and played very fair in the course of this rather intense and often quite unpleasant set of exchanges, over lunch, good Chinese meals, at my house, which tended to make things a little more civilized. However, I think people on both sides came to have increasing respect for each other. That helped subsequently in rebuilding the relationship, once we were able to get past this bad moment.

Q: The Chinese have had their embassy or liaison office for some years now. Did you find that there was a growing expertise or knowledge about the American political process and how things worked? As Americans, we know the possible and impossible in our political world, and where we can and can't go. Did you find that there was some understanding of these?

FREEMAN: I'm sure there was some understanding. Both sides, frankly, postured. The Chinese would say that they could not ignore the feelings of 1.1 billion Chinese (at that time; now more). By which they meant that they couldn't ignore the feelings of the handful of people who really mattered in China. We would cite congressional sentiment, on our side, as a constraint on what we could do. I'm sure both sets of statements did reflect some sort of reality, but both of us, I think, were aware that we were posturing.

Q: You say this was tightly controlled. The Reagan administration was quite new in office. Ronald Reagan came as a strong adherent of Chiang Kai-shek and Taiwan and all this. There is always a learning process. Alexander Haig had sort of gotten his political teeth in the Nixon White House; he'd been commander of NATO. I would think that you would not have a very knowledgeable White House, and perhaps not even a knowledgeable secretary of state, at this point, in Chinese affairs.

FREEMAN: I, of course, was not in Washington, although we kept in extraordinarily close contact with Washington. Much of the most important sort of scuttlebutt that we received came in exchanges of official informal telegrams. This was a device that the Soviet Desk had originated for communication with Moscow, to kind of give the embassy in Moscow a bit of a sense of what was going on bureaucratically or politically back home. It was something that, as country director for China, I had picked up. We actually communicated mainly in Chinese, written in Roman letters, in order to keep prying eyes from being able to read the comments that we were making about the state of play, and it produced candor.

Bill Rope, who was the country director for China, I think performed valiantly, and in fact was so strong in arguing the case for good U.S.-China relations and for a measure of compromise on the fighter sale to Taiwan issue that it set back his career, I think.

Q: How do you spell his name?

FREEMAN: William F. Rope, currently, I think, director of the Johns Hopkins SAIS Nanjing Center in China.

Al Haig was passionately committed to this relationship, and personally undertook to educate President Reagan. Even before I went out to China, he did something extraordinary, early in the Reagan administration. He brought Ji Chaozhu, who was at that time still a mid-ranking Chinese official, but who had gone to Harvard and was actually on the ship of Chinese students who returned to China at the time of the Chinese Revolution and the Korean War, and who had served as Zhou En-lai's interpreter, a very personable, fluent English speaker, in to spend some time with the president, which was rather unusual. Haig's motive was very clear, and it worked, and that was to show the president that the Chinese might be Communist, but they were also decent human beings, and that you could talk with them. I think he did everything he could to try to help President Reagan get a more sophisticated understanding of China.

So there were huge battles going on back in Washington, the precise details of which I didn't, of course, entirely know.

But this resulted, as I say, in very, very specific instructions with regard to wording changes and different approaches that we might take. Now we, in Beijing, made many of the suggestions that resulted in those instructions. We were occasionally overruled on our suggestions, but often they were accepted, although, I gather, not without a battle.

The break point in these negotiations was a personal communication from President Reagan to Mr. Deng, saying, "I just can't go any farther." That was the essence of it. And that came in about July. Mr. Deng, I guess, at that point, and President Reagan, both decided to hold their noses and call off the fight.

We had a series of rapid plenary sessions between the ambassador and Han Xu that wrapped up the communiqué text in mid-August.

In the event, I think both sides ended up losing from these negotiations, which I considered, from the time they began, to be a really tragic and unnecessary exercise. Had we simply adhered to the understanding that we had with the Chinese about arms sales to Taiwan, we could have, in my view, finessed the issue and never would have had to make an explicit statement about it.

The core of the compromise was that the Chinese had to accept that U.S. arms sales would continue to Taiwan, something which stuck in their craw, but explicitly to accept that, thus making the United States the only country that had Chinese permission, if you will, to sell weapons to what they regarded as a province in rebellion against the central government.

We, for our part, had to agree to cap the quality of the weapons we transferred at existing levels and to reduce the quantity of sales progressively, with a view to ultimately reaching some complete solution of this problem and ending arms sales entirely.

Now, on the Chinese side, I thought at the time that it was very unlikely they would be able to accept U.S. arms sales to Taiwan, politically, indefinitely. I thought that there would inevitably come a moment at which this very controversial, indeed inflammatory, undertaking would collapse under attack in China.

And on our side, our undertaking to cap the quality and reduce the quantity, it seemed to me, strained our ability to manage a policy that had as its very sensible premise the maintenance of a military deterrent in Taiwan sufficient to take a good bite out of an invading force from the Mainland. I say this because obviously the quality of weapons systems marches on. The nature of the threat would change as new weapons systems were introduced in the area, by the PRC in particular, but by others. Old systems would go out of production and have to be replaced, if at all, with newer systems. And quantity was never really defined. Was it dollar volume, or was it numbers of bullets, or what?

The intelligent policy always had been (and this is something I had pushed for, in fact, back in the '70s when I was on the Taiwan Desk, in anticipation of this sort of argument), rather than to make arms sales, to transfer technology, so that Taiwan, admittedly at somewhat greater expense, could produce major-weapons systems in Taiwan. And there would not be the visible export and all of the debates in Congress and publicity that we uniquely generate when we transfer weapons to some foreign purchaser. In fact, that was attempted, and it was the genesis of the so-called IDF (indigenous fighter) program in Taiwan, as a substitute for the F-20 (F-X). It was also attempted with other items, such as patrol boats and the like.

On the day that the communiqué was actually released in Washington and Beijing, I was far from jubilant. I was happy that we had reached a compromise, but I frankly found the compromise very distasteful, and I was quite pessimistic about its longevity.

I turned out to be a bit too pessimistic, because, in fact, the agreement survived until August of 1992, when George Bush, ironically, given his connections with the PRC, in order to appeal to the voters of Texas, authorized the largest arms sale in U.S. history, in this case 150 F-16s, made in Texas, to Taiwan.

That totally destroyed both the cap on quality and any restriction on quantity, and, in effect, shredded the communiqué. It released the Chinese from their undertaking to tolerate arms sales to Taiwan, as well. And it began the process that has produced a reemerging crisis in U.S.-China relations today (today being 1995, in November).

So my pessimism turned out to be somewhat overdone, but ultimately correct.

Q: Going back to the beginning, you said you took Chief Justice Burger and Charles Wick to meet Deng, rather early on in the Reagan time. Charles Wick was the head of USIA, a close friend of Ronald Reagan, and almost a show-business type person. The Voice of America, which became a rather powerful instrument in China, was under his sway to some extent. This must have been his first look at China and the power structure. How did he react to this?

FREEMAN: I think, like many Americans with no previous exposure to China, he was startled by what he discovered. I must say that visit, the conjunction of the Chief Justice's visit with that of Charlie Wick, was a rather strange experience.

Charlie Wick began to lecture Deng Xiaoping on the iniquities of the Soviets, when Deng had been purged twice for his own distaste for the Soviets, and hardly needed to be told that they were dangerous people. Charlie's objective was to try to see whether Voice of America could set up relay stations in Xinjiang for central Asia, which he was eager to destabilize. Deng didn't rule this out. In fact, that visit produced the beginnings of some exchanges between the Voice of America and Radio Beijing.

To jump ahead quite a bit, toward the end of my tenure in Beijing, almost three and a half years later, the then head of Voice of America came out and met the head of Radio Beijing, a very tough old lady and very candid, and they had a pretty good discussion about what they were doing. Of course, there were many points that we had in common with the Chinese, on the Soviet issue in particular. At the end of this session, reflecting Charlie Wick's handiwork at USIA, the head of VOA asked the head of Radio Beijing what she thought of VOA's programming. She thought for a minute, and she said, "Well, the news is not bad, but, frankly, your editorials sound like we used to during the Cultural Revolution."

Of course, she was absolutely right. There were editorials that were appallingly ethnocentric and parochial and right wing, which purported to represent U.S. policy, but clearly represented one element of thinking in the administration, rather than the administration's actions. These things caused endless problems, not so much in China, but everywhere around the world, misstatements of policy and so on.

The second thing that made that visit of Wick and Burger rather strange was that Burger wanted to come look at the ambassador's residence. It became apparent, as I was showing him around, that Ronald Reagan had told him that if he wanted, he could displace Arthur Hummel as ambassador, and he was just checking out the facilities. Of course, Art Hummel hadn't even arrived yet, so I thought this was a little unseemly. When Burger looked at the very modest quarters that the ambassador occupies in Beijing, he turned up his nose and said he didn't think he wanted the job after all.

Q: As the deputy chief of mission, how did Arthur Hummel use you?

FREEMAN: He was an absolute model manager, in my view. In fact, in my own later years in the government, I tried very much to model myself on him. He's a laconic man, very taciturn, and very quick to decide. Excellent judgment. Delegates easily.

A typical encounter between him and me was brief. I would go in and describe a problem. He'd ask a question or two. He'd say, "Well, what do you think the choices are?" I'd give him some options. He'd either say, "Well, there's another option," or he'd say, "Of those, I think we ought to do this. Go do it." So the whole procedure took very little time.

He never looked back on a decision. If he had made a mistake, against my advice, or with my advice, he accepted full responsibility for the decision.

As a negotiator, one of his merits indeed was his ability to maintain silence. Unlike many Americans, he's not bothered by a couple of minutes of sitting silently, looking at someone. I think some recent studies have shown that the average American can only tolerate about seventeen seconds of silence. Not Art Hummel. He would sit there, poker-faced, and wait for the other side to say something.

He's very personable, a warm person. His wife, very charming and very much in the old Foreign Service den mother mode, not excessively demanding on the women of the embassy, but very supportive of them.

Stape Roy (J. Stapleton Roy), who's just finished a tour as ambassador in China, had been the chargé in Beijing, following the departure of Leonard Woodcock. Stape has a very controlling style.

One of the first things I did when I got there was to change things around. I don't believe that the job of the DCM or chargé is to edit other people's work. I think they should be capable of editing it or proofreading it themselves. If it was a purely analytical piece, with no real policy implication, I just told people, "Send it out. I'll read it afterwards. If I don't agree with it, you'll hear from me. If I do agree with it or it inspires another thought, I'll let you know. But you have to take responsibility for what you write."

Stape, I think, had been approving even visa cables, and I just cut all that off.

Second, there was a staff meeting that went on for about an hour, and I used a technique there, which I subsequently used elsewhere, just saying, "This staff meeting is going to last twenty minutes, and after twenty minutes, I will get up and leave. So you've got twenty minutes to say what you need to say."

So I tended to delegate a great deal and to try to use my time to direct and inspire, working with the different reporting and analytical offices. I would call them in, and we would chew over an idea for a new look at something or other, and then maybe toss out a few ideas to them for organizing it, and then tell them to go to it. And they either would, or would not, check back with me before it went out.

Anything that had a policy implication, and certainly anything that had a policy recommendation, I did want to see, early on, in draft. I did read everything, and I did write comments on everything, but I believed in having people take responsibility.

Art Hummel very much was the same way. So he looked to me to do the long-range strategic planning papers for U.S.-China relations.

I also did a five-year master plan for the development of the embassy. We had constant tension at that time between the fact that we had requirements that were very large and we had no housing for people. There was a limit to how many people could be housed in hotels without producing a terrible morale problem. If we didn't have people in hotels, however, the Chinese wouldn't accept our protestations that we were in pain, and wouldn't allocate apartments as they became available, as they were building them. There was, at that time, an explosion in the diplomatic and business presence in Beijing going on. So we had, at any point, between a dozen and a half and thirty households living in hotels. This was a terrible morale problem.

But it also meant that we had to think ahead, to try to project what sort of staffing pattern the embassy might have once it matured. Remember, it was coming out of a liaison office and was in transition.

I paid particular attention to, and I'm very proud of having insisted on, the language designation of virtually every position. And the reason I did that was that if you don't designate positions, the Department of State's personnel planning process will not provide training slots, and no one will be trained. I wanted to have administrative officers who were capable of dealing in Chinese. And that meant that I had to construct career ladders, so that someone could come in as a junior GSO, have a tour in China, then go out and do something else, maybe have some more Chinese-language training, and come in as the administrative officer at a consulate, and then go out, and then maybe come in as administrative counselor. I was very insistent on this, over a lot of opposition. And I'm sorry to say that, subsequently, there was quite a bit of relaxation. But at one point, we had the only embassy in Beijing in which everyone, down to the secretaries, was able to handle some Chinese. Essential, in my view, to really understand the place and work in it.

So Art Hummel let me be CEO of the embassy, and he was chairman of the board. He set the broad policy, he made the major decisions, but he looked to me to not just bring problems to him, but bring solutions. So that's what I tried to do.

In terms of the management of relations with the Chinese, I tried very hard to broaden dialogue with the Chinese. I set up a series of regular luncheon discussions with the leadership of different geographic bureaus, at the Foreign Ministry, for example. I continued a practice, which Stape Roy had very wisely initiated, of meeting with some of the party ideologues and think tanks, editors of People's Daily and Red Flag, which was the ideological journal, and members of different institutes.

This was quite innovative, in the Chinese context, because China, even though it is not a world power, thinks like a world power and expects to be a world power, and the United States was unique in that we were interested in what the Chinese were thinking about Africa, even though we weren't African. So the African Department over at the Foreign Ministry saw Africans and us, and that was about it. Once in a while, a European would go over and say hello. We were interested in what the Chinese were thinking about Latin America, and we wanted them to know what we were thinking, so we would do that. And the same with the Middle East and Europe. The Europeans hardly ever talked to the people in the American and Oceanian Affairs Department, which was the one that took care of us.

So we were very active, and I was very personally active in a lot of discussions and contacts with many, many departments of the Chinese government.

Q: What was your impression of these bureau heads that you were talking to in the Chinese Foreign Ministry, as far as how they were thinking? They had come out of the Cultural Revolution, in which you had to tread a very careful line or you were off to Mongolia. How did you find that breed at that time?

FREEMAN: There were several exceptions, but by and large, these were really quite sophisticated people; as you say, very cautious because of the experiences they'd had. But, suddenly confronted with an embassy that talked to them in Chinese, rather than demanding that they go through interpreters or speak a foreign language, they opened up quite a bit. We had some very good discussions. We even got a discussion going, for example, with the Korean Desk, even though, at that time, Korea was the great symbol of the Cold War in Asia. That turned out to be very useful, as time went on.

There were a couple of exceptions. We had major legal difficulties with the Chinese over antediluvian, literally antediluvian, railway bonds. Some railway bonds had been issued in 1911, which actually had a role in provoking the 1911 Sun Yat-sen Revolution, to build a railway in south China, between Hunan and Guangdong. These so-called "Hu-Kwang" railway bonds had been bought out by someone in New York at half a penny on the dollar. And they were planning to attach Chinese property to get these things.

Q: This was the Chinese equivalent to the czarist bonds?

FREEMAN: Exactly, absolutely, only more like Russian bonds issued during the Napoleonic Era, because the most recent Chinese revolution was in 1949, and this was from 1911.

And we had other issues of that kind, so we had a great deal of dealing with the Chinese equivalent of a legal advisor, Mr. Huang, a very charming, Soviet-educated lawyer, who was absolutely aghast at the American legal system, and refused to believe that it really could operate the way we described it. I spent, I think, more than a hundred hours, in effect, drawing on my legal education at Harvard, trying to help this fellow become educated on the U.S. legal system. Finally, the American legal advisor and others came out, and we managed to resolve this issue.

That was very interesting, because I was in the position, which diplomats often are, of trying to explain the peculiar viewpoint of the Chinese to American lawyers, and trying to explain the peculiar viewpoint of American lawyers to the Chinese, while understanding both perspectives and really agreeing with neither. In the end, we were able to succeed.

Mr. Huang was a product of Soviet education that was extraordinarily rigid and difficult to deal with.

This issue, I might add, went all the way up to Deng Xiaoping, who at one point angrily stated,

"How many governments does the United States have? Let's see, you've got the Executive Branch, which doesn't pay any attention to the Congress, which doesn't pay any attention to the Executive Branch. And then you have this other thing, the courts. I can only deal with one government." He was exasperated by all this. We finally got through to him.

I would say, the other notable exception to sophistication was the Consular Department, with which I spent a lot of time. I thought we needed to liberalize visas on a reciprocal basis. There were some other issues that they dealt with that I was interested in.

For example, although I never succeeded in doing it, I was very interested in getting an agreement on the employment of spouses and dependents, and opening up opportunities for people. Many of them did work illegally.

The Consular Department was headed by a bunch of, you know, not bad people, but they were country bumpkins, who'd come in through the military. They were not terribly well educated, and they were from the interior. They were very closely associated with the public security people, very xenophobic and rigid, doing everything in a sort of nineteenth-century-ledger style, by the book, controlling everything centrally, no delegation of anything to embassies, very rigid about varying the rules. Of course, we were trying to negotiate a consular convention with them, and had done so.

Anyway, I spent a lot of time trying to convince them that not all foreigners were bad, and that there were things they might learn from us. We actually sent them here on an IV, to spend some time in the Consular Affairs Bureau at State, and to talk to INS (the Immigration and Naturalization Service). We sought to cultivate them.

And I think the third sort of frustrating Chinese official, really quite aggravating, was the leadership of the Diplomatic Services Bureau. The Diplomatic Services Bureau at that time controlled virtually every element of our daily lives. It provided (or, rather, didn't provide) apartments to American officers and their families. It was the source of all of the local employees, who were actually employees of the DSB, not ours. And it was the source of all domestic help -- "ayis," as they're called, governesses, nursemaids, cooks, and the like. Frankly, an outrageously exploitative organization. We would pay them hundreds and hundreds of dollars a month for the services of the Chinese; they would then turn over ten dollars a month to him or her. They were part of the Beijing municipality, not really responsive to the Foreign Ministry, and having difficulty in a place where, since the government theoretically owned everything, nobody really knew who had the power to dispose of property. They couldn't find land to build apartments. They didn't have the capital. They weren't terribly interested in learning anything about how westerners wanted apartments designed.

We actually sent some of them here to the Foreign Buildings Office (FBO). I shudder at the thought, since I think FBO is one of the most catastrophic organizations in Washington. But we sent them here to look at apartments in Rosslyn and the like, to give them some of idea of why we liked our kitchens laid out the way we did, and why we wanted closet space and things like that, and why all the electric power that they put in was grossly inadequate for a modern household. This was an unending campaign.

This was in support, obviously, of the administrative counselor, basically, I guess, with the counselors of embassy, including the station chief of CIA and the defense attaché and others. I tried to make myself available and use my notoriety within the Chinese establishment, as the conductor of negotiations with them on a wide range of issues, to give the counselors a higher level of access than they would have otherwise had, and to help develop a sort of court of appeal for them, so that if something broke down at their level, that if whoever was on top had been over to dinner at my house, or seen a movie there, or gone on a picnic, he knew, therefore, who I was, and was predisposed to at least answer my phone call, if not to listen seriously to what I had to say.

So this was a very active managerial and diplomatic role, an exciting one, as a great new embassy emerged from the kernel of the liaison office.

Q: Can you talk a bit about the reporting officers, both political and economic. How did they operate in this atmosphere at that time?

FREEMAN: From a managerial point of view, I should have mentioned, we were also in the process of establishing consulates. We had consulates in Guangzhou and Shanghai; and were working on, and indeed opened, a consulate in Shenyang, the former Mukden, in China's northeast, former Manchuria; and in Chengdu, in Sichuan; and we were planning to open a consulate in Wuhan, which to date has not opened.

So one of the issues was how to sort out reporting responsibilities between consulates and the embassy. I took the view that if the consulates were reporting purely on events and trends within their consular district that didn't have any clear national analog, they should just report directly and they didn't have to clear it with us. If they disagreed with us, that was fine, they could say so. But they had to justify why they did.

This led to a bit of friction with the reporting officers, because I also insisted on, and we got a budget for them to do, quite a bit of traveling around the country. We were exploring a piece of virgin territory, since the reporting that had been done on China previously was reporting on national politics from the vantage point of Hong Kong. We were now trying to fill in details, look at what was happening at the provincial level, the local city level, and what was happening in ordinary Chinese lives.

We set up a series, in fact a very active series, called China Essays, in which we looked at issues. We would plan an essay about a month in advance and get input from the consulates, and then we'd send out reporting officers to talk.

Sometimes reporting officers, in dealing with normally very reticent Chinese, would just have an extraordinary experience. I remember somebody going to see the Ministry of Railways about a plan that had been published in the People's Daily about railway construction and so on, and the Ministry fellow was trying to explain the People's Daily thing. Finally, he just threw up his hands and said, "Oh, for God's sake, that's all a fraud. Here's the real plan." And he pulled it out of his desk drawer and went over it with our officer.

Sometimes people would be surprisingly open about things that, frankly, they would be open about normally in another society, and sometimes they'd be extremely standoffish.

We had the odd incident, over this time, not where we were set up by the Chinese, but there were dissidents, nuts, in some cases, who would do things like jump over the wall and try to get asylum in the embassy. We were always trying to, on the one hand, not give them asylum, because we're not interested or authorized to do that, but on the other hand, smuggle them out, so that they didn't get zapped by the local authorities. We usually succeeded.

Jay Taylor, in particular, who was the political counselor, a very gifted writer and manager, insisted that his reporting officers be out of the office a certain amount of the day. And if he found them in the office, he'd really kick them out. He said, "If you don't have an appointment, go sit in the park and talk to people. What makes you valuable is that you're here, not in Washington." I think we had a group of, by and large, very talented, certainly dedicated, officers, who really dug away at the subjects that they were looking into.

Of course, China, at that time, and it has continued to be the case, was undergoing really kaleidoscopic change. All of the old givens were being undermined and overturned, as the reform process proceeded. Even the economic officers (the practitioners of a dismal, pessimistic science) were astonished, and forced to continually upgrade their projections for the Chinese economy, as the reforms began to liberate labor power and produce more efficient use of capital assets and, therefore, astonishing growth rates in this period. Some provinces, in this early period, were growing at eighty percent a year, economically, as the sloth of Socialism was sloughed off and the natural energy and entrepreneurial spirit of the Chinese began to be liberated.

So, from an intellectual point of view, it was an exciting time. And the reporting officers, I think, were, by and large, excited.

There were one or two, I must say, and they were probably useful correctives, and often they tended to be people with a background in the Soviet Union, who just couldn't believe what was going on, and who were always darkly pessimistic about it: It wouldn't work. It was all a fraud. What seemed to be happening couldn't really be happening. After all, this was a Communist country.

But I think, for most officers, there was a sense that, as difficult as life was in China, and as constrained as politics were, and as hampered by Socialism as economics were, the country really was opening up and moving in interesting directions.

Q: There are two subjects that I would think, for somebody like yourself, managing the reporting, could always cause a problem. You want to foster good relations with a country, yet report accurately, in a totalitarian state, which it still was, human rights and also corruption. Because the problem is, it's my impression, that if you send in really good reports on corruption or human rights, they get zapped right off, immediately, into the hands of unfriendly people in Congress, newspapers, etc., who use this rather than seeing its totality. It's a hard one to deal with. You want to be truthful, yet you don't want to give too much food to, basically, enemies.

FREEMAN: Yes, you're quite right to point to those dilemmas. On human rights, the principal exercise, of course, was the production of the annual human-rights report, where we did try to be very scrupulously honest and straightforward, but also to put things a bit in perspective. Sometimes Washington didn't want that perspective, that's true. Things always look different from the field than they do from headquarters, and they always look different on the spot than they do from Washington.

At that time, the issue, for example, of birth control was far less controversial than it is now. Chinese coercive birth control practices we reported, but it didn't have the level of controversy in Washington that it now does.

To understand why the Chinese were doing things, you had to back up and look at the context in which they were operating. And we tried to explain that.

For example, China is, geographically, about the size of the United States, including Alaska and Hawaii, actually a little larger. But it only has one-third the arable land. And it's got 1.2 billion people now, whereas we have 260 million. So if you look at the basic problem of feeding and clothing 1.2 billion people, housing them, and so on, I think the correct way to look at this is in terms of the ratio between population and arable land. If the United States, with three times the arable land that China has, had the same population-to-arable-land ratio China has, we would have 3.6 billion people in the United States. And I would contend that if we did have 3.6 billion people, we would take a rather different view of things like Planned Parenthood and the like.

So I think that reporting on human rights from the field always tries to state the context. And the context is sometimes dismissed as ideologically irrelevant in Washington. But I think we struck a good balance. We were not overly kind to the Chinese, but we were also not willing to accept Washington's dictates of how reality ought to be.

I can remember we had quite an interesting exchange of telegrams with Jeane Kirkpatrick, who was, at that time, elaborating her totalitarian-authoritarian dichotomy.

Q: She was a former George Washington University professor, quite from the right, who was ambassador to the United Nations at the time.

FREEMAN: Very ideological and very prone to prescribe what reality ought to be, rather than to look at it and then decide what it was. So, even though she didn't really know anything about China, she knew everything about it, and we had, as I say, some interesting exchanges with her.

Q: What about corruption?

FREEMAN: Corruption, at that time, was not that serious a problem, in the way that has subsequently become a problem. It is a major problem in China now. There was corruption, and we certainly reported it. The point being that if bureaucrats buy and sell commodities, people buy and sell bureaucrats. That's just a law of nature.

I can remember one case (which I think we did report, and certainly should have if we didn't) that was fairly typical. At that time, all housing and benefits for workers and so on came from this so-called work unit. So the Ministry of Posts and Telegraphs would build housing, high-rise apartment buildings, for its workers. And I can't remember which ministry it was, I think it might have been Chemical Industries or someone, built some high-rise apartment buildings for their people. And then they sat vacant for a long time. I was quite puzzled (these were not far from my house), so I started looking into it. What had happened was that the electric company said they wouldn't provide electricity unless twenty apartments were turned over to their people. And the water company said they wouldn't provide water unless a certain number of apartments were turned over to them. And the PTT said no phones unless they got a slice of the housing.

So there was always this bargaining process, rather like the outrageous, under-the-table trades of space and equipment that go on in Washington bureaucracies, where budgets are not fungible, and in order to get things done, you've got to engage in barter. This kind of corruption was pretty bad, but by and large, China was still, at least on the government level, a pretty honest place, and people weren't taking cash and so on. That really began to come along later.

Q: Were you seeing, at this time, any signs of a breakdown of central authority at the provincial level?

FREEMAN: I don't think we were. No, I don't think that was the case. And I'm not sure that I'd even describe the situation today in those terms, although I know the press does. But certainly you got a very, very vivid sense of the differences between different regions and provinces and cities throughout the country.

I mentioned that we had quite an elaborate system of coordination for reporting from the consulates and so on, inviting their input on things that we were preparing. It was almost a joke. We would send out, I think every two weeks, a cable in which we would say, "In the next two weeks we're going to be looking at this issue, especially in light of this policy statement that was printed in the People's Daily on such and such a date in an editorial that they did, which represents the thinking of the Communist Party on this matter. We would like to have your analysis of what the local reactions to all this are."

Invariably we would get, from Shanghai, "The people are aware of this. They're talking about it. They disagree with it. They're angry. They think this is apostate." Or "They endorse it." Strong opinions and active debate.

And we would get, from Shenyang, something that said, "The people up here are aware of it, but they're not really terribly concerned about it. We can't find anybody who really gives a damn about it."

And we would get, from Guangzhou, "They never heard of this policy down here, and they could care less. Nobody down here reads the People's Daily anyway."

And when Chengdu began to come on line, toward the end of my tenure, we got yet another perspective from there.

So you began to get a sense of the diversity of the country.

In my mind, I'd always had an image of China as centrally directed. But when you looked at it more closely, you realized that it was centrally coordinated, not centrally directed. That each province was essentially self-sufficient economically. In fact, they even had non-tariff trade barriers on the borders. They all had automobile and truck factories, and they tried to be self-sufficient in grain and so on and so forth. That the center was really coordinating it.

Recently, a statistic came to my attention that I think really illustrates this in a startling way. The normal percentage of GNP that a modern western economy cycles through the government varies from around 55 percent in Europe (about 55 percent of GNP shows up as government revenue to be recycled in some way or another) to just less than a third in the U.S. (if you take state, local, and federal levels of government, something just under a third is government revenue). In China, the figure is only 9.8-12.5 percent. It's a very, very undergoverned society, in many ways. Now, obviously, that doesn't include state industry and all the things that the government does as a manager of business enterprises. But, in terms of government services, government bureaucracies that do government things, you've got a very, very low percentage of the country actually engaged in this kind of stuff.

So China has always been more coordinated than directed. This, notwithstanding the fact that directives come out of the center and are dutifully studied and applied (or misapplied, as the case might be) at the local level by officials.

When Deng Xiaoping's revolution began, he took advantage of this. He very, very deliberately fostered experimentation at the provincial and city level, with different ways of doing things. Then he would go out and have a look at the six or seven ways that people had tackled Problem A, to see what lessons might be drawn for a national system. He fostered differentiation. To the extent that there is a serious problem in center-province relations (and I think there is), it's partly the result of that. But it's also just expression, in new form, of something that was always there -- a lot of autonomy for provinces.

Q: How were the Chinese, during this period, looking at the Soviet Union? We didn't really realize that the Soviet Union only had less than a decade to go.

FREEMAN: The Chinese thought, I think, that they had repositioned themselves a bit too close to the United States and too far away from the Soviet Union. So during this period, they were trying to move a bit back into the middle. And that meant some minor improvements in their relations with the Soviets. Those, of course, were the subject of great alarm in Washington and great interest.

On a personal level, the Soviet Embassy, which is this enormous sixteen-hectare plot centered on the former Orthodox Church property (granted to the Orthodox Church, I think, at the end of the Ming, or in the early Ch'ing, Dynasty), the Russians were essentially isolated; no one would speak with them. They had extremely limited access to the Chinese government. Some of them were really quite fine Sinologists, and, I think, genuinely, personally distressed by this situation. I kept some contact with them, with the DCM in particular, who was a very fine Sinologist, just to make sure that I could have their perspective on what was happening in Sino-Soviet relations.

But not much was happening, really. Not much was happening. The tensions between the two over border issues and ideological problems, as well as Soviet foreign-policy activities in Afghanistan and, in an earlier era, in Angola, remembering that Mr. Savimbi was originally a creature of the Chinese, later adopted by us, divided the Chinese very much from the Soviets. While there was some minor movement, there wasn't anything too much going on.

Q: At one point, we used to talk about the China card. Were we, at least from Washington, trying to manipulate China in any way vis-à-vis the Soviet Union?

FREEMAN: We were trying to give the Soviets the impression of their being effectively encircled, and the idea that the U.S. and China could, if provoked, respond together to the provocation. This was part of the general policy of keeping the pressure on the Soviet Union and containing it. It, I think, did contribute rather directly to the ultimate collapse of the Soviet Union, so it was a successful policy.

The shift in Chinese emphasis was illustrated in the wrangling we had in the August 17 communiqué negotiations over how the Chinese would state their opposition to hegemonism and whether they would recognize common strategic interests with us. They, frankly, didn't want to be quite so closely associated with us, by 1982, as they had in 1972.

Q: Did any of your contacts say, "Look, fellows, we don't want to get too close to you"? Or was this the type of thing you had to pick up by osmosis?

FREEMAN: You had to pick it up by osmosis and by listening to what people didn't say as much as to what they did say. The Chinese didn't want to state flatly that they did not want an intimate strategic connection with the United States, but they clearly didn't.

Q: Since 1945, Korea has been divided between the Communist north and the non-Communist south. How was Korea, in its totality, seen by the Chinese?

FREEMAN: That was an interesting subject, because I thought they grossly misperceived Korea, through ideological blinkers. Frankly, I think, in retrospect, that probably we did the same. I was concerned to try to help them develop a more balanced view, and specifically to facilitate some sort of relationship between them and the South Koreans. The South Koreans were fumbling around with the Chinese, through the KCIA in Hong Kong.

Q: That's the Korean CIA.

FREEMAN: Yes. Koreans are very direct and tough people, and they were making quite a hash of this. They tended to demand things up front, and to use a very blunt and insulting bargaining technique, and to misunderstand the difference between things that needed to be done with a wink and a shrug and things that could be done explicitly. And so they were getting nowhere.

As China opened up, part of what was happening was a political relaxation. China was letting some dissent blossom, and there was a good deal of discontent, particularly among former adherents of Maoist revolutionary thought, with what was going on. I thought that there would, at some point, be an aircraft hijacking, from China to South Korea. I thought it was just a matter of time. It occurred to me that the Koreans were totally unprepared for this, and that what might be an opportunity for them to begin to establish a relationship with the Chinese would probably be bungled by them and turn into a negative, rather than a positive, event.

So I decided, quite on my own, that I would go to South Korea and talk to the Koreans. And I did. I spent two and a half days in consultations with the embassy, and I saw the KCIA and the National Security Planning Agency, which was an intelligence organization, and I saw the Foreign Ministry and the Ministry of Reunification and the military. I found it really quite fascinating, and I came back, I must say, to China full of ideas, and talked to the Chinese very, very directly and enthusiastically about what I had seen. I think that had an impact.

At any rate, I spent the better part of a day talking to the assistant foreign minister for political affairs, whose name was Kung. He was one of the descendants of Confucius, whose ancestors had gone to Korea as sort of foreign assistance technicians in the Ming Dynasty and stayed on. I talked to him about what to do in the case of a hijacking and how to handle it. I tried to make the point to him that you can't, with the Chinese, be unsubtle. Of course, he argued that there was no word for subtlety in Korean. He'd gone to Harvard and he knew what it meant, but Korean didn't have a way of translating this concept.

Anyway, when, in fact, there was a hijacking, several months later, this connection was invaluable, because I was able to tell him, through a patch through the Ops Center and by cable, who was who in the Chinese delegation, and who was really who they said they were and who was not, and what the characteristics and personal likes and dislikes of the Chinese were. And I was able to tell the Chinese who was who on the Korean side, because this fellow ended up dealing with the Chinese for the Koreans. So I got in the role of orchestrating both sides, and they were both turning to me for advice and counsel and information. And that gave me some credibility on the Korean issue with the Chinese.

Q: The plane was returned, wasn't it?

FREEMAN: Yes, it was.

Q: This was the beginning of an opening.

FREEMAN: It did turn into an opening, as I had hoped it would, mainly because the Koreans restrained their worst impulses and didn't ask for anything. That was my main point to them: "Don't ask for anything. Do the right thing, and your reward will come," which is what they did.

This gave me some credibility on Korea, and over the spring of 1983, I had quite a number of discussions with the Chinese, arguing with them that they should find a way to have an opening to South Korea, which was something the South Koreans desperately wanted and which we supported, in general terms.

This culminated (actually, this was very interesting) during Weinberger's visit to China, which I think was in the summer of '83.

Q: He was secretary of defense.

FREEMAN: Deng Xiaoping actually proposed to Weinberger a meeting in Beijing between the South and North Koreans, with the U.S. in attendance, all hosted by the Chinese. I was astonished. I thought it was a great idea, and wasn't entirely surprised, because it had been foreshadowed a bit by my own discussions with the Chinese.

That evening, after he left, as we got the reporting cable done and the Weinberger party took it took Hong Kong, we confirmed with the Foreign Ministry that indeed he had said this, that indeed it was very important, and that indeed he was making a major policy initiative. And we sent off a cable saying that, only to discover that Paul Wolfowitz had edited this comment out of the conversation. Washington was mystified by our cable reporting a Chinese initiative in Korea.

Q: Paul Wolfowitz being...

FREEMAN: Assistant secretary of state for East Asian and Pacific affairs. In any event, he had edited Deng's comments out of the reporting cable, alleging that he hadn't heard any such thing. Then he denied adamantly that it had been said, and accused us of having put words in Deng's mouth. We had two note takers, both of whom had this in their notes. In the event, this whole issue was stillborn, because Washington chose to ignore it. Korea was subsequently a problem as well during the visit of Secretary Shultz. Al Haig did not see the August 17 communiqué through to completion, because George Shultz came in just before it was brought to fruition. I think probably the change on our side helped to convince the Chinese that they needed to reach a compromise, since their great champion, Al Haig, was leaving.

During George Shultz's visit to China with President Reagan in the spring of '84, the Chinese again raised the issue of meetings with South Korea, the U.S., and North Korea. Shultz agreed, talking to Art Hummel. Between Beijing and Shultz's arrival in Seoul, Paul Wolfowitz again reversed this.

And then there was a very nasty leak in the Periscope section of Newsweek, accusing Art Hummel of having manipulated George Shultz on the Korean issue somehow. In fact, I later discovered that there was a notation made in my personnel file to the effect that I had put words in the Chinese mouths on Korea and so on. Very nasty stuff.

Korea was a very ideological question for us as well as for the Chinese, and evidently, by the middle of '83, the Chinese were thinking a little more creatively and less rigidly on this than we were. So that's all that went on there.

I mention this because, if people look at the record, they will see a cable that refers to something that we thought was in the reporting cable, but which wasn't in the reporting cable because it had been struck. It's probably a little hard to understand that record without that.

The point here was that the United States and China share an interest in maintaining peace and stability in the Korean Peninsula. And I must say, this issue had a history of which the Reagan administration was blissfully unaware. Dick Holbrooke, in his last days, had begun a discussion with the Chinese on parallel moves by China toward South Korea, and by the U.S. toward North Korea. That, of course, was killed by the defeat of Jimmy Carter in the 1980 election. Probably, therefore, I was one of the few people left in the government who was aware of that. We had made some commitments to the Chinese about moving in parallel. They then began to do things with South Korea, but we did nothing. From their perspective, this was puzzling backtracking by us. But this was a very controversial issue in Washington, very dear to certain elements of the right wing. I think, in fact, we had some openings to produce a relaxation of tension in Korea, in the early '80s.

And I have to say that the Chinese also were absolutely disgusted when, right in the middle of their efforts to broker some contact between the U.S. and North Korea with the South Koreans, Kim Chong Il, Kim Il-sung's son, now the heir apparent but not yet the formal leader in Pyongyang, evidently inspired and directed the bombing in Rangoon of the Korean Cabinet, which resulted in the deaths of many able people, including some that I knew personally, and was an absolute terrorist atrocity.

The interesting thing to me was that, having spent a lot of time talking to the Chinese about Korea, I got a sense of the extent to which they maintained a stiff upper lip about their alleged allies in North Korea, but really regarded them with a mixture of contempt and derision.

At any rate, the North Koreans, by their own actions, ended up obviating any possibility of an opening to either South Korea or the United States. And maybe that was what they tried to do.

Still, we had some opportunities that I think we missed, because of people not hearing what they didn't want to hear.

Q: Before we leave your time in China, a couple of things I'd like to take up. One, about the flow of Chinese students to the United States, some defections and how these were dealt with. And also generally monitoring how you felt about this process and its influence. And then Vietnam, as an issue or non-issue. Tibet. Also, you had the Reagan visit. A presidential visit is equivalent to one major earthquake. I think it's always interesting to hear about how this went. But also even more about visitors, because it's always struck me that the Chinese are very good at impressing visitors, which sometimes can be a bit annoying to the embassy, because they come away just fascinated with little schoolchildren dancing and all this sort of stuff, when there are real issues to be dealt with. Maybe we could cover some of these.

FREEMAN: Great.

Q: Chas, let's start with Chinese visitors to the United States, particularly students, and how, at the time you were there, you saw what this was going to do.

FREEMAN: Over this entire period, that is, from normalization right through the time that I left and continuing beyond it, there was an extraordinary trend in progress in which the children of the Chinese elite came to the United States to study. I think, at this point, there are very few members of the Chinese Communist Party Central Committee or senior officials in ministries who have not had one or more children graduate from American universities. Even Deng Xiaoping's children came here to study, and, in one case, to serve as a wife of a military attaché in the Chinese Embassy. So the Chinese elite is increasingly very...

Q: I take it, up to this point, there had been a dearth of foreign education. It wasn't as though they were switching from the Soviet Union to the United States.

FREEMAN: No. In the 1950s, there was significant exposure to the Soviet Union, but in far smaller numbers than later occurred with the United States, for many reasons. The Soviet system was just a lot less accommodating and much more controlled than the American one. That was the early period of restoration of full sovereignty under the Communists, and there was suspicion of foreigners. So that the people who tended to be trained in the Soviet Union were being trained as specialists of one kind or another for specific purposes, either for the Foreign Ministry or, in some cases, as engineers. The current premier, Li Peng, for example, studied in the Soviet Union. He's an electric-power engineer, who has come to specialize a bit in nuclear power.

But the point I was about to make is that this enormous flow of young people, middle-aged people, many of them, whose educations in China had been interrupted by the Cultural Revolution and domestic turmoil, to the United States has given a younger generation of Chinese an extraordinary familiarity with the United States. This has been followed more recently, subsequent to my departure from Beijing, by another flow of, in this case, Chinese business people, many of whom have bought property here, have condominiums in strange places, and who are doing business here. So that the human ties across the Pacific have reknit very quickly. Some who had been in the United States before 1949, what the Communists call, "liberation," came back. Others who had no exposure at all to the outside world suddenly sent their children here and often came to visit them.

The effects of this were rather interesting. I think there was enormous regard for the American economic system, the openness it has to new ideas, the way in which ideas can move from the university laboratories or company laboratories, but often universities, into innovative production technologies. I think probably the Chinese reforms were inspired in no small measure by the discovery of this whole new way, for them, of doing business and managing technology and so forth.

On the political level, I think there was a mixture of admiration and distaste for what the Chinese discovered here. No Chinese that I have met seems to want to emulate either the U.S. federal system or the constitutional democratic presidential system that we have.

In fact, as an aside, the pattern of American democracy was exported to Asia, in the Philippines, and the results have not inspired others to follow this path.

So there was certainly an admiration for the intellectual freedom that the U.S. provides, but at the same time, a great distaste for what many of the Chinese see as the inevitable results of excessive acquisitive individualism and First Amendment rights. The Chinese tend to tie social disorder in the United States -- high rates of teenage pregnancy, drug use, the extraordinary crime rate in the United States, which is, if not the world's highest, certainly among the world's highest, the lack of personal security on the streets, some of the things that we Americans also find least admirable about our society to our political system. I don't believe, therefore, that most Chinese who came here left the United States feeling that China should abandon the authoritarian pattern it had followed for the previous four thousand years, most recently in an extreme variant under the Communists.

So the English language, admiration for many American ways of doing things, many ideas found fertile ground in China. The Chinese, for example, came here and interned in law offices and discovered the merits and perils of the legal profession. All these things have had an influence, and I think that influence is likely to be a lasting one, which will mount over time. But it didn't produce an impulse to emulate the United States.

Q: It's interesting, because in a slightly earlier period, '76-'79, I ran the Consular Section in Seoul, Korea, and looking where people were going, it was astounding -- the top schools, many of them technical, at the graduate level. Also, from what I understand, more by hearsay, on Taiwan, the same thing was happening. And both of these groups brought back technocrats. But, along with the baggage of technocracy that they brought back and that they're putting to extremely good use, there were obviously germs of a more democratic society. And both those countries, at least in 1995, are on a democratic course, to some extent because of the American influence on people who came back.

FREEMAN: I think this may well be the future course of events in China. But the key difference, during this period that we've been talking about, was the absence of the sort of economic prosperity, rising tide of property acquisition, that occurred in both Korea and Taiwan some decades ago. It remains to be proven if, as I believe will happen, a Chinese middle class, which is already emerging, expands and, like middle classes elsewhere, demands a measure of predictability in decisions, and therefore raises increasing demands for the rule of law. I think it is doing this already. Over time, some of these ideas might well be adapted to China.

But, in fact, I believe a more potent example for the Chinese, one that they cite among themselves frequently, is Taiwan, which evolved in an earlier period in which things were perhaps somewhat simpler in the United States. There was a greater sense of optimism and confidence in the United States than there is now, and many of the social problems I cited hadn't emerged in their current virulent form.

So the Chinese look for models, those who espouse democracy or expanding liberty, which is a common sentiment in China, to South Korea, to Taiwan, to Singapore. That is: Let's get on with the business of economic reconstruction, building prosperity first, and then deal with some of the political problems of the system later, in a gradual way.

I think the dominant sentiment for the Chinese, and the reason they react the way they do to some of the untidy aspects of American life -- pornography and crime and addictions and this sort of thing -- has to do with the searing experience of Chinese history. Disorder in China can have catastrophic consequences, and you don't have to be very old, if you're Chinese, to have actually experienced some of those. So that, while people would like to see human liberty expand, they're very cautious about how authoritarianism is to be relaxed.

As I've said before, China is, in a sense, in my view, recapitulating the experience of Taiwan, with a time lag of a quarter century or more. And it may be that, as time goes on, ideas will be borrowed from the United States. Some of them seem to have a great deal of applicability. For example, federalism, in some form or other, even if greatly diluted, is an obvious point of reference for resolving the difference between center and province in China, which has become more acute in recent years as market economics has raised new demands for government activity.

But the expansion of student exchange was quite something to observe. And the management of this, just from an embassy technical view, was very difficult. First of all, we had visa forms that were deeply offensive to the Chinese, because they asked whether you were a Communist, pusher, prostitute, or whatever, all in the same section, and the Chinese, who were rather proud to be Communists, didn't see why these other affiliations should be associated with their political philosophy.

But even when we got past that form, which we did, with some dickering with the Department of State, most of the Chinese who came here were Communists, and every one of them required a waiver from the attorney general to get in. This added inordinate delay to travel, and complicated things. We began to press hard for a simplification of procedures, because we had to send a telegram on every visa applicant and wait for a name check and so on.

Q: I used to see them at the other end. I was, at one point, the State Department's liaison officer with INS, and every morning, there was a couple-of-inches-high set of telegrams from China. They all went, so it wasn't a...

FREEMAN: Eventually, we did, progressively, manage to simplify and streamline this procedure, and, in effect, go to a presumption of issuance that could be rebutted, rather than having to wait for actual approval.

But management of this was difficult.

Then we come to the question you posed earlier about people staying on. I don't think the Chinese pattern really differed, in any material respect, from that of other developing countries -- India, or Taiwan, in an earlier era, or South Korea. Many of those who came decided to stay.

They may not have had that intention when they arrived, but economic opportunity here, salary levels, income levels; opportunities to break out of rigid academic hierarchies, where seniors had a lock on supervision and jobs; fewer bureaucratic restrictions, not political restrictions, but customary restrictions on the ability to launch research on projects and pursue them; better equipment, etc., all tended to drive a lot of the technocrats to try to stay on, for a while.

The pattern elsewhere has been (and this may likely prove to be the case with China) that as prosperity rises, as new ways of doing things, particularly in academic institutions and companies, set in, then people begin to go back in greater numbers.

It's really quite extraordinary in Taiwan, which had notorious levels of non-return (at one point, about eighty percent didn't go back), I think the vast majority now do go back, although they may delay for a few years, to work here.

In China, also, I was more surprised by how many did go back than by how many didn't, because living and working conditions in China, in the early 80's, were really pretty awful, and you had to be fairly dedicated to want to go back.

Our laws and visa restrictions, particularly on exchange visitors, were sufficiently rigid, for people who were bewildered by the complexities of the process and didn't have the habit of going to lawyers, to drive many of them out, anyway. So they went back.

We had a number of notorious defections, not particularly by students. The Chinese seemed to take a very relaxed attitude about whether people came back or not. And during this period, there was a large number of people who were coming here on their own, rather than sponsored by an institution. And they didn't seem to care at all whether these people ever came back. But there was the Hu Na incident, a tennis player.

Q: A woman tennis player.

FREEMAN: A woman tennis player from Sichuan, who had been a sometime tennis partner for Wan Li, who was vice premier, and for Deng Xiaoping. Her defection was contrived by the immigration lawyer for the Kuomintang in San Francisco, and I suspect was contrived in part for political effect.

Q: Often this is the case, they jump in on the...

FREEMAN: There is some reason to believe that she was put up to it by these KMT operatives. But whether that was the case or not, she did defect, and all holy hell broke loose, and we lost our cultural-exchange agreement.

Q: Were you there at the time?

FREEMAN: Yes, I was, and was present for protests by the Chinese and counterprotests by us.

I think one of my finest hours was at the Ministry of Culture, giving them a half- hour lecture on Marx's view that people were not commodities and did not belong to anyone but themselves. I took great pleasure in reading their scripture back to them. USIS doesn't generally do good reporting cables, so it was probably not adequately summarized in the reporting cable they sent. But I truly enjoyed the experience.

Because of Deng's personal involvement in the case, this became really quite a nasty matter. And Ronald Reagan got personally involved and made various defiant statements about how she could move into the White House and whatnot. So it took a while to defuse the whole issue, but defused it eventually was.

Q: I would think that, almost before this exchange thing got started, there would be an understanding that, look, we're going to have these things. In the first place, you always have émigré groups (I dealt with this in Yugoslavia, wherever) who want to play up. You know some of these well, and you've got to look at the big picture. And the bigger the noise you make about it, the worse thing it is. Just let it go and say, "Well, you know, we'll see her when she comes back."

FREEMAN: I think the Chinese did finally learn that, from this incident and a couple of others.

The problem was that, in the case of China, this sort of stuff got so easily bound up with Taipei's then-rivalry with Beijing. Of course, it's a different situation now. I remember arguing strenuously with friends in the Foreign Ministry exactly the point that you made, that these things become causes célèbre only to the extent that you make them such. If you leave them at the personal plane of decision making, where they belong, they don't become a great source of political struggle between the United States and whatever country has lost a citizen for the time being.

In this regard, I think I should say one other thing. At the same time China was opening up, allowing its citizens to go abroad, people in the overseas Chinese community, including many who had fled the Mainland during the Communist takeover, or who had later fled from various periods of turmoil in the People's Republic of China, began to come back in very large numbers. By the end of my tenure, I was repeatedly visited by friends from Taipei who had come, semi-clandestinely, to the Mainland, to look at their old homes, to meet their old schoolmates, to see the Great Wall, to look around and rediscover their native place. People who had been prominent defectors in earlier eras also came back, and came and went with impunity.

This overseas Chinese connection, although at various points it's been attenuated, is one of the great differences between the Chinese Revolution and the Russian Revolution, in an earlier era. The Chinese seem to be very willing to forgive and forget, not make terrible demands on émigrés. They haven't had a history, for example, really, of going out and killing émigrés. In fact, ironically, during this period, agents from Taipei killed a prominent dissident from Taiwan who was resident in the United States. It was so uncharacteristic; the Chinese, whether on Taiwan or the Mainland, just haven't done that kind of thing.

Q: Certainly, in an earlier period, and it may be true even today, the old KMT group in Taiwan had a very effective apparatus in the United States. Basically, it looked after émigrés, public relations and all. Really a very effective network, including spying for its own interests. What was your impression, during the period you were in China, of that of the Mainland Chinese?

FREEMAN: I don't think, certainly on the side of the PRC, work with so-called overseas Chinese (meaning Americans of Chinese origin or naturalized Americans) was a great focus. Much less effectively managed, on many levels, than comparable work from Taipei. Also less overtly demanding. Taipei really demanded positive loyalty from people. Beijing was much more tolerant and willing to have broad contact, perhaps because it was starting from a very low base and needed to appear flexible and accommodating. I don't think this sort of work was done terribly well by Beijing during that period. To some extent, this kind of activity came at the expense of the sort of efforts that Beijing should have made to cultivate Americans with no close connection with China.

For example, they monitored very carefully Taiwan's activities with the overseas Chinese in Chinese. They didn't monitor Taiwan's activities with non-Chinese in English. And that pattern really continued right up to the present day.

So, in terms of Beijing's interactions with Taipei on this overseas Chinese battlefield, it seemed that Beijing was treating this more as an extension of the Chinese civil war than as something really involving the United States. And it was kind of interesting.

Now Beijing does have, as I think you suggested earlier, as Taipei does, the great advantage of Chinese culture as an attractive force. And in Beijing's case, it also has the historic monuments of past dynasties and the mystery and grandeur of this vast state on the Asian continent. The Chinese are exquisite hosts. They are very subtle and effective at putting people at ease and leaving a good impression. They're good stage managers of meetings. Increasingly, as Deng's Revolution unfolded and China opened up more, there was a lot of prestige attached to going to China. That, we were able, as I think I may have indicated earlier, to use to good advantage in reconstructing the U.S.-China relationship.

You asked about Ronald Reagan's visit. That was something fairly extraordinary.

He had entered office with an ideological stereotype of China really untempered by any human contact with the Chinese. Early on in the administration, as I mentioned, we sent sort of the equivalent of a deputy assistant secretary, Ji Chaozhu, now under secretary-general of the U.N. for political affairs, in to see Ronald Reagan, for the simple purpose of showing him that Chinese Communists were also human beings. Ji went to Harvard, and he's a very glib spokesman for Chinese views, in terms that Americans can understand and relate to. This was, I think, not appreciated by the Chinese ambassador, at the time. But, anyway, it began to break down a bit of the stereotype in Ronald Reagan's mind.

Reagan had thought about going to China, I think, even during the campaign, although he ended up sending George Bush, which was just as well, because Bush took a pummeling from the Chinese on the Taiwan issue. But when Reagan actually came to China, he suddenly discovered very warm, reasonable human beings, who spoke in pragmatic, non-ideological terms. And he drew the extraordinary conclusion, which he voiced in a statement that he made during a stop in Alaska en route back to the United States, that the Chinese really weren't Communists at all, which was news to those of us who were dealing with them. What he meant by that was that they were decent human beings, rather than ideological fiends.

His visit was fascinating. First of all, as you suggested, this kind of thing puts an enormous strain on an embassy. In his case, I think the entourage was over a thousand. Given his responsibilities as commander in chief in a period of the Cold War when every president was mindful that a submarine-launched missile attack on the United States meant that warning was down to seven minutes, when he traveled in China, he had to be within range of earth's satellite stations. We actually installed these at intervals along the route, for example, that he traveled from the city of Xian out to the Qin Dynasty clay warriors at the Qin emperor's tomb.

Q: A wonderful thing that they excavated, with all these warriors.

FREEMAN: Exactly.

I was personally very much involved in this, first, of course, as the overall control officer for the visit, although I had the wit to appoint an executive control officer, who did all of the legwork.

There were some bizarre elements of it. The president wanted to have an American meal (I think it was turkey or something), and the newly opened Great Wall Hotel, which was associated with Sheraton, I think, and was one of the first Western-style hotels in Beijing, was selected as the site for this. We went out and ate this damn dinner, in rehearsal, three or four times, my wife in particular, criticizing it and whatnot. In the end, it wasn't bad. California champagne was flown in, and California wines.

There were all sorts of hassles, as usual, about who would use what car and that kind of thing.

Q: Often, the advent of the advance guard of the Secret Service is as close to a political disaster as one might think. How did the Secret Service handle this one?

FREEMAN: Actually, by and large, they weren't too bad. Very often, as you say, since they want to treat foreign visits as they would treat a visit to Peoria or some other place in the United States, they tend to try to run roughshod over foreigners. Very quickly, if you try to do that in China, you discover that you cannot run roughshod over the Chinese. They are in charge, and you have to persuade them. But it went, as these things go, less badly, and we were less offensive than we often are.

There was great attention by the Reagan advance people to staging, of course. Ronald Reagan was not called the Great Communicator for nothing, nor did he communicate in a vacuum. So people from the advance team came out to sort of find out where China was and learn the basics of U.S.-China relations and collect material for speeches and the like. And they spent hours sitting in my office, typing on the laptop of the time, GRID computers, as I had sort of said, well, here's a nice theme that you could strike, that would be good politically in the States and good here, and so on and so forth.

Anyway, I started to say that concern about security was pathological on both sides, and the city of Beijing was essentially shut down. I think the ill will that was caused was less due to the Secret Service than to the Chinese acceding easily to American security requirements, which meant that the whole rush hour was stopped for two hours -- people outside, unable to move, bicycles everywhere, and so on and so forth.

In any event, because of the concern for security, the Chinese equivalent of the Secret Service protective detail chief was, along with the head of the U.S. Secret Service presidential detail, in the car with the president, and there was a Chinese driver. The concern was that something might happen, and someone would have to be able to communicate in Chinese. So they wanted someone who could handle that, and, on the odd chance that the president might actually be interested in substance, someone who could also do something substantive on the policy side. So Ambassador Hummel very graciously yielded this place to me. I think his Chinese is solid, but not as good as mine. So I ended up riding around in the car with Ronald Reagan, probably for about six hours.

It was a fascinating experience, because I had not been a political admirer of his, and had been somewhat bemused by him, and I didn't know what my reaction to him would be. By the end of the six hours, I had concluded that he wasn't very smart, and he was awfully lazy, but that if I were ever marooned on a desert island, he'd be the man I'd want to have with me. Just about the most charming individual I have ever met.

On the trip in from the airport, there was dead silence. So I decided I would start acting as tour guide. And I said, you know, this is this.

He said, "Well, what kind of trees are those?"

And I said, "Beats me, I don't know."

Then I said, "This is workers' housing."

That set him off, and he told a Soviet joke. So I told him one back. I guess maybe I told him a Chinese joke. Then he responded with another joke. And I responded with yet another. And so it went. I know, because I exhausted my total repertoire of seventeen jokes. I told these to him, and was amazed to hear him, a couple of days later, retell those jokes he liked, vastly better than I had told them. Just a perfect sense of timing, and a great memory for this kind of thing.

I remember sitting in there at one point, going between the state guesthouse at Diaoyutai to the Great Hall of the People for a meeting. I was sitting in the jump seat with the Secret Service chief, and Jim Baker was sitting next to the president.

Q: He was secretary of state at that point.

FREEMAN: No, he wasn't. He was chief of staff of the White House. He had a folder, and he turned to the president and said, "Mr. President, there is a dam project, and the Congress has passed this thing. You have a veto recommendation from the Department of Interior, and you've got to act on this in the next couple of days. I really think you should look at it." And he handed the president the folder. The president looked inside the folder for a second, and then he turned to me and said, "Did I ever tell you the one about..." And so he told some Irish joke, which was pretty funny. Baker was so disgusted; you could just see him, absolutely disgusted. But that was Ronald Reagan.

Nancy Reagan was extraordinarily protective of him, in the car a great deal, most insistent on this, that, and the other. On the departure, she wanted the car to speed up, to get out to the airport. Of course, the motorcade arrival was timed to the arrival of various Chinese dignitaries, and there was no way they were going to speed up. She was very frustrated. But she made sure that he got his rest and whatnot.

George Shultz, who was the secretary of state by then, was along, and had very good talks with the Chinese, which, as I mentioned, included yet another Chinese offer to deal with the issue of Korea, which Shultz, who got a little note passed to him by Art Hummel, our ambassador, readily acceded to. Then, between Beijing and Seoul, to which he flew directly, Paul Wolfowitz and company managed to talk him out of it.

Q: Again we were talking about opening relations at that point?

FREEMAN: We were talking, in that case, about a Chinese proposal to host a South Korean-North Korean meeting, with the U.S. in attendance, in Beijing, which would have involved, inevitably, U.S. and Chinese mediation between South and North Korea, and which, frankly, I thought was a pretty creative and useful suggestion. It followed up on Deng Xiaoping's earlier suggestion, which I mentioned. This resulted in a very nasty little Periscope item in Newsweek, directed at Art Hummel and at me. Somehow it was presumed I was the evil genius behind this Chinese suggestion. I had, in fact, encouraged them to think creatively, and was rather pleased that they did, and sorry that we weren't politically, apparently, able to take up the idea.

Reagan was the most prominent of our visitors, but Caspar Weinberger, the secretary of defense, also came out, in what was a very important meeting, because, unlike Harold Brown's earlier travel, it was not in a condition of crisis. It was after the Taiwan arms sales issue had been brought back under control. It did open a broader dialogue and some greater cooperation between the U.S. and China. In fact, as I left China, we began to get involved in assistance to the Chinese in building a new interceptor aircraft.

We had other visitors, some of them quite notable. Admiral Rickover, certainly the most unpleasant, arrogant, self-centered man I've ever met.

Q: He was in charge of the Navy's nuclear force, and he was a power unto himself.

FREEMAN: Very much so, and very unaccustomed to anybody telling him no, which Art Hummel, to his great credit, did, since Rickover struck me as brilliant, but essentially a nut, in many respects. He had a visit to a Chinese nuclear submarine, which I suppose pleased him, but only barely. I was very proud of Ambassador Hummel for bringing him up short.

We had most members of the Cabinet, and much of the Congress. I spent a fair amount of time, as DCM, and even, on occasion, as chargé, when Ambassador Hummel was not there, accompanying congressional delegations out of Beijing, thinking that actually was a very good investment of my time. And it was.

Q: This is something that I think sometimes is forgotten. We talk about political junkets, but, particularly to areas where there is a matter of easy misunderstanding, it's very good to be able to have these congresspersons, under your control is the wrong term, but to get to them.

FREEMAN: To make sure they learned something.

Q: Did you find that you were having to peel off the layers of euphoria that the Chinese were wrapping around these people? China is very exciting and all that. Did you have to bring them back to reality?

FREEMAN: Yes, but also, quite honestly, I saw my role in accompanying these delegations as building a bit of enthusiasm for the relationship. There were a lot of things that the congresspersons might not have asked about, which I put them up to asking about, precisely because I wanted them to have their stereotypes shaken and to get a more accurate view of China. But, yes, they were often prone to very misguided positive over interpretation of things that were going on, and they did have to be brought back to earth once in a while.

Q: What about the American media in China at that time? I read a book recently by a couple from the New York Times. She's of Chinese descent, and he's American. There was the implication that the embassy is often uninformed. The reporters are out in the field all the time, talking to people, whereas the embassy is too busy running the embassy. Could you comment on that?

FREEMAN: I think there was actually, in this era at least, not very much of that sort of criticism leveled against the embassy, and certainly it would have been unjustified.

I had a practice, as DCM, with the ambassador's encouragement, of meeting regularly with the press, off the record, and sharing interpretations of events. I sometimes learned something from them, but more often than not, I was pointing them in directions they might not have otherwise connected with.

We had also, during this period, the beginnings of a resident business community.

I spent a fair amount of time helping to get the American School (actually the International School, because it was jointly founded by five English-speaking embassies) started. It began on the landing outside the DCM's apartment in San Li Tun, which is a diplomatic residential area in Beijing, moved into what is now the Marine House at the old Pakistani Embassy that we took over, subsequently expanded enormously, and is now out in the direction of the airport.

But at that time, it was very small and not recognized by the Chinese. I spent a lot of time trying to explain to fairly unenlightened Chinese officials in the Diplomatic Services Bureau and the Consular Department and elsewhere that part of opening up China to economic interaction had to be to provide education to the children of business people who would be going to China. I laid the basis for the recognition of the school and for the Chinese acknowledgment that this was a legitimate function. I think that some Chinese, in the beginning, as they had done in the '50 and '60s, wanted to insist that foreign kids go into Chinese schools. There's something to be said for that, but there are also grave demerits, and it's not very attractive to people. So that was an activity.

I helped form the AMCHAM (American Chamber of Commerce) in Beijing, which also needed to get recognized by the Chinese.

Q: Back to the school thing. At the beginning, you can create something. Given your proclivities and interests, were you able to get, in this International School, a course on China, to give some knowledge of China? Because, often, these international schools seem to ignore the country, and they sort of recreate a good school in Des Moines or in Oxford in the UK. Were you able to get much Chinese?

FREEMAN: Yes. The principal at that time, whose name was Ritter, who had served in a similar capacity in Nepal, was very enthusiastic about that. Chinese language was part of the curriculum, and Chinese culture and history were taught.

But at the same time, I have to say, we had to be a little careful about this, because if we overemphasized this, the Chinese might have taken umbrage, since the school was essentially something that we had cobbled together without Chinese permission.

Although this was certainly included in the curriculum, the greater emphasis was on picking the best elements of various national curricula, to ensure that the school was more demanding than the American school system, which is notoriously undemanding of children. We had to do that in order to make the school congenial to Australian, New Zealand and British participants. Canadians, of course, have a system that is not dissimilar to our own.

One of the major issues of the time was that places in the school were severely limited by space. English-speaking embassies, or embassies that, if not English speaking, at least wanted to have their children educated in English, were continually imploring me, as chairman of the board and the manager of the American Embassy, to get their kids in. And it was very difficult.

I started to say, on the American community at that time, there were several elements of it. There was a rising group of business people, many of them housed in hotels, living and working under difficult circumstances.

A growing body of American students there, learning Chinese.

A group of foreign experts, so called, people who'd been hired by Chinese organizations to do things, translate into English, polish English, and the like, some of them old-line leftists, but many of them just Americans with an interest in China, recruited by the Friendship Association or some other group.

One of the great events that we put on, and I introduced McDonald's to Beijing in connection with this, was the Fourth of July picnic. This was sponsored by several of these community organizations, with the Embassy Employees' Association, and was on the grounds of one of the embassy compounds. We had, as I suggested, initially, homemade, and later, McDonald's, hamburgers, and games and prizes and so on, and was an opportunity for the American community to get together.

We had also an official July Fourth reception, but this was just for Americans, and it was casual. As I left, this was beginning to get out of hand, because the American community was growing beyond our capacity to absorb them. And I'm not sure what the tradition now is.

We charged admission and financed the thing that way, with the proceeds going to what became the American Chamber (it was not then called that, because the Chinese didn't recognize foreign Chambers of Commerce) and to the Embassy Employees' Association.

So there was a lot of emphasis on our part, within reasonable limits, on serving the needs of a growing American community in a very adverse environment.

That included, to go back to your original question, the American press, which were, by and large, very competent, hard-working people, obviously focused in a different way than we were. Our focus was what was in the national interest of the United States. Their focus was what was novel and of interest to their readers. The two weren't always the same. In fact, sometimes they conflicted.

Q: One foreign-policy aspect that I didn't ask you about was whether Vietnam come up as far as what was happening in Vietnam? Or was this just not an issue, particularly?

FREEMAN: Vietnam was an issue only in the sense that there was some reason to believe, as '84 marched along, that the Chinese might be planning a further seizure of Vietnamese-held islands in the South China Sea.

Q: The Spratlys?

FREEMAN: The Spratlys were part of the problem. Yes, I suppose you could say it was the Spratlys; they were an issue.

Q: So basically you were talking about oil.

FREEMAN: From a Chinese perspective, we're talking about, first and foremost, questions of sovereignty and, second, strategic position. If the Chinese, as I believe they will, are able to establish a military base of some kind in the Spratlys, they will be in a position, not now but some decades hence, to exercise dominance and to control that region in the event of a rise of international tensions. It is a major sea lane. So that's the second consideration. I think oil, economic exploitation of the region, is only a tertiary consideration. Perhaps Vietnam, the Philippines, Malaysia, Brunei, and the others who have an interest in this put economics first, but certainly, for China, economics is not the primary consideration.

We had no relationship, to speak of, with the Vietnamese in Beijing. That, I think, was a subject of regret to some of the Vietnamese-speaking officers in our embassy, some married to Vietnamese wives.

The dean of the diplomatic corps at that time was the Cuban, who was an impressively intellectual man who would go on at exceptional length at farewell ceremonies for members of the corps. I can remember when the Egyptian left, that, about the time he'd gotten to Ramses II, which took him half an hour, I had to leave. He would give very erudite presentations on the history, culture, and relationship with China of each country. But we didn't have that much contact with the Cubans.

The major embassies with which we did have interaction were the predictable ones: the Japanese, the Australians, the British, the French, the Germans. I continued a tradition, organized by my predecessor, of having a five-power lunch, so called, with the deputy chiefs of mission, or equivalents, from Britain, France, Germany, and Japan. Once a month, we would meet to talk about the situation in China and international relations as they affected China.

We also had very close relations with the Yugoslav Embassy. They had an advantage over others, because they had a party-to-party relationship with the Chinese, and tapped into the International Liaison Department, which had a whole different set of insights and focuses than the Foreign Ministry. They often were very knowledgeable about goings on within the Chinese Communist Party, or at least more knowledgeable than those of us who were not Communists. So that was a good relationship.

Q: It's an interesting thing, because I was in Yugoslavia during the '60s, and, of course, then, we had no relations. The Yugoslavs, at that point, were a prime source for information. They're quite willing to share.

FREEMAN: Yes, and very charming people, whose subsequent tragedy was not yet entirely apparent. This was a period, however, in which Kosovo emerged as a major issue. The Chinese took that to heart, and one of the results of that was a significant loosening up of the Chinese press, because one of the arguments was that the unrest in Kosovo had occurred...

Q: This was with the Albanian...you can't even call it minority, in Kosovo. It was the majority then.

FREEMAN: Ninety percent. But the growth of separatist sentiment in Kosovo had been overlooked by Belgrade, because, in the view of the Chinese, the Yugoslav press had not felt able to report. So, facing their own difficulties in Xinjiang and Tibet and the like with possibly restive minorities, they loosened press reporting rather considerably.

There were interesting things happening during that period. Perhaps the most liberal force in Chinese politics, liberal to the point of being anti-Communist, was, ironically, the Institute of Marxism, Leninism, and Mao Zedong Thought. This think tank emerged as a driving force in liberalization of Chinese politics, as well as economics.

It was later savaged, I might say, during the Tiananmen incident, as having been engaged in activities that were subversive of the established order. And I think it was guilty. I used to meet regularly with the people in that institute for lunch. I had a superb chef, and lunch at my house was a treat, so people very willingly came. I would do two or three lunches a week, and sometimes a dinner or two, in addition to whatever was going on with delegations.

Finally, speaking of chefs and lunch and the like, with my then-wife and then-chef, I collaborated in writing a bilingual book, in Chinese and English, called Cooking Western in China, which was about 250 recipes, in menu form, with erudite explanations of the art of eating in the West and similar subjects, how to treat meat.

The inspiration for this was that, although I tried very hard to stay off the diplomatic circuit except to go to national days to meet the relevant Chinese and say hello, for symbolic purposes, to Europeans, Latin Americans and Africans, they tended to have dinner at exceptionally late hours, interminable affairs... They didn't seem to go to work at eight o'clock in the morning the way I did.

Q: This has been one of the great crosses that the Foreign Service has had to bear.

FREEMAN: Not only did they have these long, unproductive dinners, with maybe one token Chinese official, or often none, so that the opportunity to do serious work was not great (most of them didn't speak Chinese, and they didn't like Chinese food), but also the food they served, which was prepared by Chinese chefs, was a terrible travesty of Western cuisine. There were only, as I discovered, about four recipes that the Chinese chefs had mastered, so you ate Beef Wellington every time you went out.

So my wife and I decided that we would rectify this. As our gift to the community in Beijing, we would explain Western food to the Chinese, and provide them with detailed instructions on how to prepare it. So I sat down, over Chinese New Year's, which is an extended three- or four-day holiday period, and batted out a series of essays, and sort of forced my wife and the chef into writing down all sorts of recipes. At that time, I didn't know how to cook, myself, I just knew how to eat. Eventually, this was published and, I think, was welcomed by the community. Probably, if it didn't relieve the boredom of these affairs, it improved the cuisine.

Q: The last thing before we move on, was Tibet much of a problem during this time?

FREEMAN: No, I don't think we considered it much of a problem, but we followed it closely. There were some fairly promising exchanges going on between the Dalai Lama and the Chinese. At one point, it looked as though the Dalai Lama and the Chinese were about to do a deal, and that he was coming back. I think that was sabotaged by militant members of the Dalai Lama's entourage, rather than the Chinese.

We were in the process, during this period, of establishing additional consulates. Shenyang opened. That's in the northeast, the former Mukden. Chengdu, the capital of Sichuan, which has a district including Tibet, was opening, toward the tail end of this period, in a hotel. And the consul general and others were frequent visitors to Lhasa. So we did monitor the situation, but it was not at a particularly acute stage.

In fact, this was a period, as I recall, of continuing liberalization in Tibet. The Cultural Revolution sacking of monasteries and libraries and the like was being repaired at the expense of the Chinese government. Large amounts of money were going into Tibet for reconstruction. The Chinese had reversed the Red Guard mentality. Although many of the Red Guards in Tibet were Tibetan, not Chinese, they had made an all-out effort to destroy both the relics and the reality of Tibetan culture. The Chinese had turned 180 degrees and were trying to restore and protect Tibetan culture. Tibet had not yet, at that time, attracted the odd coalition of international supporters that it has since. So, no, it wasn't much of an issue.

I should say that, in terms of opening consulates, we also planned to open in Wuhan. I went to Wuhan to select a site for consulate facilities. Of course, later, a combination of budget and intelligence-agency-generated reciprocity considerations prevented Wuhan from actually opening. I think that is a great mistake. Wuhan's right smack in the center of China, and we should have a post there.

Q: What was your feeling about the value and use of our consulates during this period?

FREEMAN: China is a vast country, somewhat larger than the United States, including Alaska, with a huge population and an exceedingly primitive transportation network. At that time, many areas in China were still off limits to foreigners. Americans would turn up there and get themselves into trouble, and all of the usual sort of consular problems would occur. People in the interior needed access to American visa services. So, on the consular level, in terms of trade promotion, in terms of facilitative assistance to Americans and travel services to Chinese, they were invaluable.

But, beyond that, each region of China has a different pulse and different atmosphere. As we began to spread our presence more broadly in China, we were able to take these different pulses and sense these different atmospheres. Before 1949, we had fourteen consulates in China, recognizing all of these factors. The fact that we now have four, with the right to open a fifth in Wuhan, in my view, hardly begins to scratch the potential utility of such postings.

Q: Where were the consulates when you were there?

FREEMAN: Guangzhou, which is Canton, Shanghai, Shanying, and Chengdu, with the right to open in Wuhan. We had previously been represented in Xiamen (Amoy), Ürümqi, and various places, most of the major cities in the interior, and additional areas on the coast.

So I think we were probably more foresighted than others. The Japanese have moved in their own directions. But there is no substitute for a presence on the ground. Whether it's in terms of reporting and analysis, or it's in terms of discharging responsibilities to American citizens and promoting bilateral relations, you just can't substitute for this.

RAY E. JONES
Position not specified
Beijing (1973-1974)

Ray E. Jones attended the Lafayette Business College. After a year in Washington, DC working for the Department of Interior, he entered the U.S. Army. He served overseas as a court reporter in 1945. In 1946, Mr. Jones went to Berlin, Germany with the Department of the Army. His Foreign Service career included positions in Korea, Germany, Switzerland, Vietnam, Liberia, the Netherlands, Sudan, and China. He was interviewed by Thomas Dunnigan on August 23, 1994.

Q: Did he and you and the others get cooperation from the Chinese in opening up the Embassy there or were they difficult?

JONES: No. We had very good relations at the time I was there, '73 to '74. We were not an Embassy. We were ... It was called United States Liaison Office, USLO, they called it. I don't think full diplomatic relations were established till about ... After Mr. Bruce left, and the first Ambassador was President George Bush.

Q: I see. I think it was President Carter who may have established relations but I'm not certain about that. I mean raised it to embassy status.

JONES: No, all this time it was Nixon.

Q: Yes, but I was referring mainly to moving USLO to embassy.

JONES: That I don't remember. That we can look up.

Q: Did Ambassador Bruce think that he had been effective in his mission there, doing what he wanted to do?

JONES: I think so. I believe so, but during that time, during our status with USLO, it was kind of unique because the staff accepted no national day receptions or anything else like that.

Q: And of course they could not perform any of the normal consular functions or anything like that?

JONES: Not at all.

Q: It was largely a reporting unit?

JONES: It was indeed an honor to be accepted because there were about five or six of us. We were the advance party to go into Peking. It was also a unique set up. We had two DCMs.

Q: Tell us about that.

JONES: The two DCMs were John Holdridge who went on to be Ambassador to Singapore and I don't know the other posts. And the other DCM was Alfred Jenkins.

Q: Oh yes. They're both Chinese language men, I believe.

JONES: They're both Chinese experts. John was on the secret mission when we were establishing relations with China. John was the one who went in with Kissinger.

Q: I see. But how can two DCMs function when one has to be sort of looking after the running of the Embassy.

JONES: During this period of time though there really wasn't much work to do because we had no contacts or anything else. The first post I ever had where we called them DCM 1 and DCM 2.

Q: I see, and I presume that in dealing with a country like communist China, where everything was centralized, that the most effective representation could only be done at the highest level, by Ambassador Bruce.

JONES: By Ambassador Bruce, yes. During that period of time, you had to get permission from the Foreign Office to travel and that has changed over the years.

Q: Were you personally able to see anything of China while you were there?

JONES: Canton on my way. I took a vacation back to Hong Kong and we had to stop overnight in Canton and then proceed the next morning. All of that has changed. It's simplified. Also I got to Tientsin.

Q: A seaport.

JONES: A seaport, yes.

Q: And you saw the great wall?

JONES: I must say I did go back for three weeks to China in 1985 and traveled all over the country.

Q: Were you bothered with high level visitors during this period of your service in the Liaison Office in Beijing.

JONES: We had very, very few.

Q: Was there a Kissinger visit at that time?

JONES: Yes, we did have a Kissinger visit and that involved a lot of work. That was very interesting because the whole staff was invited to a banquet at the Great Hall and at that time Zhou En-lai was still alive. Very, very interesting time, and also very good food. During the first six months, housing was very difficult and before we all got apartments, we lived at the Peking Hotel. The food there was just absolutely magnificent.

Q: So one did not suffer?

JONES: China has completely changed since the days when I was there. I think they have enormous staff and maybe too big. I don't know

J. RICHARD BOCK
Chinese Language Training
Washington, DC (1973-1974)

Chinese Language Training
Taichung, Taiwan (1974-1975)

Political Officer
Hong Kong (1975-1976)

Political Officer
Beijing (1976-1979)

Chief, American Institute in Taiwan
Taipei, Taiwan (1986-1989)

Richard Bock was born in Philadelphia and raised in Shelton, Washington. He attended the University of Washington and Princeton University and entered the Foreign Service in 1955. His career included posts in Germany, Vietnam, Taiwan, Hong Kong, China, and Australia. He was interviewed in 2002 by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

Q: By the way, your father being involved with the lumber industry, did you both in high school and in college pick up any of the lumber, particularly the labor problems and also conservation and some of these themes that ran through the lumber industry? They're quite apparent. It's like the fishing industry.

BOCK: In a couple of ways, I did. First of all, about the time I left to go to college, there was a major dustup over water pollution involving my dad's company. The area around Shelton included a number of oyster farms, including a particular type of oyster which is very small and quite rare. It doesn't grow anywhere else. It's called the Olympia oyster. And the oyster beds, the oysters started dying. The oyster growers and others who were in the budding environmentalist movement claimed it was caused by discharges from the company's plant. And the company, of course, denied it. There was, I think, a lawsuit. I didn't pay much attention to the legal aspects. But eventually the company had agreed to set up a major monitoring effort to try to determine what was going on. This issue dragged on for years. So I was definitely aware of that.

Then while I was at the University of Washington, I had a series of summer jobs. I should mention that shortly after I went to Seattle, my dad was transferred up to Vancouver, Canada.

Rayonier, the company he worked for, had been bought by IT&T, which at that point was developing into this octopus that it became. IT&T in turn bought a Canadian pulp and paper company, which also had a research lab up in Vancouver. I never lived there, but I would visit them on holidays and part of the summer. One summer, I asked whether there was any possibility of getting a summer job with Rayonier. My dad looked into it and he arranged for me to apply for work at a little mill. It was in the north end of Vancouver Island, British Columbia, at a place called Port Alice. It was a pulp mill which was totally isolated. The only way you could get in there was either by seaplane or by barge. There were no roads that connected with anywhere. And it was a very curious workforce. You had a combination of company lifers who were there on transfer for a couple of years or so in management positions, a large community of Chinese from somewhere north of Hong Kong, none of whom spoke English, and a large number of – I don't want to say drifters; it was kind of a mix of people who had either no place else to go or people who were making their stake - "I'm coming to this place for two years. I'm going to save my money and go out and do X." And then a few of us college students. I remember as a condition of my employment, I needed to join the union. My dad wasn't real happy about that, although he... He wasn't a union person. And I got a pretty good view of labor relations in what was very much a company town. This was the company town.

Q: I assume the Chinese were unto themselves.

BOCK: Yes. The guy who ran the mess hall, I think his name was Jack Wong, seemed to have a way of bringing in all of his clan over time in there. So there was this huge number of people, all of whom, I think, were related to Jack Wong. I worked on an assembly line and the Chinese would work there, too. But after hours, they pretty much kept to themselves.

Q: For today we'll finish up just when you go out. But were you picking up any atmosphere from your Foreign Service colleagues about the Vietnam War? And then also beyond that, you were a young man. How were the tides of the Vietnam involvement hitting you?

BOCK: Well, I was in the Vietnam course throughout the entire election campaign, so obviously that was impinging. A couple of impressions. Among my classmates in the Vietnam training program, there was a large number of people right out of the A100 course, most of them straight from campus. They had signed up to go into the Foreign Service and here they were being sent out as cannon fodder, which was the common view. Most of them were extremely unhappy, some more so than others. One guy was going around passing out essays on how all this was a violation of Geneva conventions and handing them to the military instructors and so on. I probably selfishly, maybe unrealistically, considered myself a little bit removed from all this because, like several of my other colleagues, I had one or two assignments under my belt already. We had volunteers in this group, too. I wasn't a volunteer, but I figured, well, I've had one tour in the Foreign Service; I have had at least the opportunity to get a sense of whether or not this was what I want to do with my life. I can take a couple of years in Vietnam. A lot of these folks were not in that position at all and were really unhappy that they were being dumped into this. Then I can remember some of the area studies where we were being told how all of this was a proxy war against China. At the same time, we were reading some of the background on Vietnamese history and the two just didn't jibe. A lot of the rhetoric about how this was a struggle against worldwide communism just did not make sense. And there was a lot of discussion within the class about this. Of course, I didn't finish the course until after the election had taken place. The fact that Nixon ran and won on the platform of Vietnamizing the war was something I think made it a little easier for most of us to live with.

Q: Language training. What type of language?

BOCK: It was Chinese. After I finished my regular tour in Vietnam, I was not quite sure what I wanted to do with the rest of my career. The French desk was fine, but, you know, where do I go from here? I think, having been in Vietnam triggered an interest in East Asia. If you were going to be in East Asia, China was the top banana.

Q: By this time, we were just opening up to China.

BOCK: Yes and no. The Kissinger secret visit had taken place. So, we were in the process of opening up. At the time I applied for Chinese language training, we had no people stationed in China. By the time I started it in 1973, we were just opening a liaison office there. So, the question of what this would mean in terms of concrete assignment was very much in flux, but there was already the big China watching operation in Hong Kong. There was also Taiwan. There were lots of places to go.

Q: And also as you started there must have been a certain sense of excitement. Generation after generation of language students had gone through with the idea of eventually we're going to go into China and it was actually happening on your watch.

BOCK: That's right, and that became stronger as I went along. However much of a factor it was when I applied for language training, it certainly was a factor by the time I was in it. There was very much that sense.

Q: Was it a year here and-

BOCK: A year here and then a year in Taiwan.

Q: How did you find Chinese?

BOCK: Well, probably more difficult than I expected. As I think I had mentioned earlier, I did not have that much difficulty learning Vietnamese. I did pretty well in it. I figured, Chinese is another language, but another language from the same region. There is some relationship to Vietnamese. How difficult can it be? With the whole business of the characters, however, that was an entirely new dimension and that caused me a certain amount of struggle. Plus, and it may just have been the teaching method, but there seemed to be more need to deal with grammar in Chinese than there was in Vietnamese. So it was not easy.

Q: You were taking Chinese when?

BOCK: '73-'74 in Washington and '74-'75 in Taiwan.

Q: On Taiwan, how many were in your class?

BOCK: There must have been 20-something, maybe about 25, which was a mix of Foreign Service, military, various intelligence agencies, USIA...

Q: Was there a conscious beefing up of people learning Chinese?

BOCK: I don't think it had really gotten much beefed up yet. The large classes started later. We had in my Washington class seven people. It was a slightly different mix in Taichung. There were eight or nine State Department people, so this was not a big group. That did come later. I think there was still great uncertainty as to the amount of staffing we were going to be doing on the mainland.

Q: How did you find Taichung?

BOCK: I enjoyed Taichung. It was then still kind of a small town, although it wasn't actually that small. There were 100,000 people, I'm sure, but it had a small town atmosphere. It allowed one to experience Chinese society certainly in contrast to Washington, but also in contrast to Taipei.

Q: Did you get any feel for how the Taiwanese were feeling about the change in relationship now that we had some type of relation with Mainland China?

BOCK: There was a certain amount of nervousness, but I wouldn't say it was that striking. Our relationship then with Taiwan was still pretty much unchanged. We still had military all over the place. There was an Air Force contingent, an air base, outside Taichung. On the ground, things really hadn't changed and all this was something kind of on the horizon that some people thought and worried about but they didn't have to deal with yet.

Q: How did your wife feel about China, coming from the Philippines? Was there chemistry one way or another?

BOCK: No, I don't think so. The one thing that she felt immediately was the inability of the local people in Taiwan to sense that she wasn't Chinese and that was a considerable frustration. We had wonderful three party conversations where we'd go together to some place, a restaurant or a market, and I'd try to say something in Chinese and the answer would come back in Chinese to her, not to me. Of course, she couldn't deal with it because it was only after we got to Taichung that she started to learn the language.

Q: Yes, this is always a problem. Were your teachers pretty disciplined or were you getting what amounted to political indoctrination by osmosis?

BOCK: In Washington, there was a very small Chinese staff, three teachers for most of the year I was there. All of them were of Mainland origin. That was necessary for the language aspect. All of them had in some sense fled. They were all native Mandarin speakers, so I think they were all born on the Mainland. So, there was a certain amount of anti-communism which came through.

However, only one of the three was associated with the Taiwan government. Her husband was a retired Taiwan diplomat. The other two, I think, were probably as excited as any of us about the idea that there was going to be a U.S.-China relationship. That was here in Washington.

In Taiwan, you had somewhat different things. There, there was at least one teacher who was pretty strongly Kuomintang. But on the other hand, they realized that most of us were either going to be going to China or to Hong Kong and that we needed to learn everything we could about Mainland China. So, we were learning the Mainland Chinese. To the extent that there are differences of expressions used on the Mainland and Taiwan, we were learning those. So, while we were picking up some of the Taiwan perspective, it was not dominant by any means.

Q: Were you getting any feel about the schism between the native Taiwanese and the Mainland Chinese who came over in '48?

BOCK: I think at that time it was something I was vaguely aware of, but our focus was so much on learning about what was happening in China proper that except for those people who knew they were going to the embassy in Taipei, and only one or two were, that wasn't something we were focused on.

Q: What was the situation in Hong Kong when you got there?

BOCK: Of course, the famous Nixon trip to China had taken place. Following that, a liaison office had been established in Peking in 1973, just two years prior to my arrival. So we had a very small establishment in China itself. Hong Kong was still at that point the major China watching post, although people were starting to think about how to handle that in the future, how much to transfer up to Peking. But most of the analytical reporting on developments in China was still coming out of Hong Kong and that was the function we had there.

Q: In Hong Kong at that time, the reversion to China was...

BOCK: Oh, that was far in the future. The negotiations had not started on that. Reversion itself took place in 1998, but the negotiations started sometime in the '80s.

Q: When you went there, were you a China watcher?

BOCK: I was a brand new China watcher. We had a China watching section consisting of about eight people divided into an economic and a political side. On the political side, there were three of us looking at Chinese internal politics largely by analyzing broadcasts which had been picked up by either FBIS or the British and some other materials, including some Mainland Chinese newspapers.

Q: The local press in China was quite important, wasn't it?

BOCK: The press was important, but the broadcasts were more accessible. The "People's Daily," of course, was available to everybody. But that was very tightly controlled.

Q: If you could get hold of it, the City Press would tell what was happening in the provinces.

BOCK: That was much harder to do because there was relatively little travel to the provinces by any foreigners.

Q: What was going on in China when you were there in '75-'76?

BOCK: Well, it was still considered the Cultural Revolution period, although it was kind of in the winddown phase. Mao Zedong was still in charge, but his health was extremely poor. About a year prior to my arrival, Zhou En-lai had died. He had been not always officially number two but was de facto number two for much of the period since 1949 and had been generally considered both by outsiders and Chinese as kind of a moderating influence on Mao. The spring before I arrived, there had been a violent demonstration in Tiananmen Square in honor of Zhou En-lai but, in effect, protesting radical influence in the Chinese government. So, there were definitely signs that this was kind of the end of the regime in some sense with a succession coming up and a lot of uncertainty. So, there was a lot of interest in the western analytical community as to how this was going to play out.

Q: in effect, was the Gang of Four running things?

BOCK: The Gang of Four was pretty much running things. Deng Xiao-ping had been rehabilitated out of his exile to a potato farm in 1973 but had again disappeared in 1975 or '74. So, that was seen as a sign that the Gang of Four, as they subsequently became known, their influence was rising.

Q: Did you have the feeling that the China watchers were sort of invigorated by the fact that we were beginning to open up to China? Prior to that, you had had Hong Kong, Taipei, and maybe the China guy in Burma or Indonesia or something like that.

BOCK: Yes. It was a little difficult for me to make comparisons because I was very new to the China watching business. But for people who had been doing it longer, there was certainly a sense of excitement that now you could actually get into China after, in some cases, many years of standing outside peering in.

Q: Did you get into China?

BOCK: No, not during that year. We had a very limited program of trips up to the liaison office in Peking. I think the idea was to minimize the burden on the small staff there. The expectation was that during any three year tour in Hong Kong, you'd get up at least once, but I was not at the top of the list, of course, so I didn't make it.

Q: What piece of the action were you looking at?

BOCK: To the best of my memory, we had divided up the provinces geographically and I was looking at the southern provinces. Then several functional issues, too, but I'm not sure I can remember exactly what the functional issues were. But I think they changed a little bit during the course of the year.

Q: Were you seeing at that time a difference between particularly the coastal southern provinces compared to other parts of China? This has become and is now the hotbed of economic movement. Was any of that around?

BOCK: Well, not in the same sense. You still had virtually no outside influence in China and it's the outside influence subsequently which has caused so much of this disparity between the coast, which gets the outsiders, and the interior, which doesn't. There were individual hotbeds. I can remember the city of Wenzhou, which is in South China, where they were doing all sorts of not necessarily authorized experiments of one sort or another. There were other individual cases, but you couldn't generalize geographically.

Q: You learned Mandarin?

BOCK: I had learned Mandarin.

Q: Were you able to use it in Hong Kong?

BOCK: To a limited extent. Most of the Hong Kong citizens in those days didn't speak Mandarin. We had some contact with the unofficial PRC representatives there. They had a Xinhua News Agency office which was, in effect, the Chinese Communist Party headquarters for Hong Kong. They were there under semi-official guise and you would interact with them a little bit also with some of the communist press, which were also essentially Mainland based. They all spoke Mandarin. There were other Mandarin speakers here and there that we would have access to, but not very much. I was reading it all the time but not speaking it.

Q: How was the U.S. being played in the press and in broadcast?

BOCK: We were still the hegemonists. I would be hardpressed to remember the specific issues involved, but generally speaking, it was a fairly hostile treatment of the United States. Of course, we still had our defense treaty with Taiwan at the time.

Q: Did the China-Vietnam war take place while you were there?

BOCK: That was later.

Q: Were we looking at that?

BOCK: We had in the consulate a person who was looking at Indochina in particular. There were two Indochina watchers overseas in the Foreign Service at that time, one based in Hong Kong and one based in Bangkok. We still had kind of a rough embassy in Laos, I think, but we were out of Saigon, we were not in Hanoi, we were not in Phnom Penh. His job, however, was more to look at what was happening in Vietnam itself than particular issues involving China-Vietnam relations. I should have mentioned that in the organization of the China watching division in Hong Kong, we also had an external relations section with two people. They would have been looking at that to the extent anyone was.

Q: Were we thinking of China being an aggressive power or one that was likely to implode?

BOCK: I think that was starting to change. We had, of course, looked at China as an aggressive power, particularly during the Cultural Revolution and then with respect to Vietnam. That was part of our motivation for the war. With the Nixon trip and the subsequent developments, we were obviously trying to build a relationship with China which would serve our interests. And we hoped that this could be done on the basis of a non-aggressive China.

Q: Did we have much contact with what you were doing with the British?

BOCK: They were doing the same thing we were. Of course, they ran Hong Kong. The governor was pretty much focused on running Hong Kong, but he had a senior political advisor and at least one junior political advisor and that shop tended to do a good deal of China watching. And we had a good deal of contact with them.

Q: How did you find life there?

BOCK: Oh, I loved Hong Kong. It's such a scenic city. The whole shopping and restaurant atmosphere was so interesting. I think some people eventually got kind of an island fever from Hong Kong because you couldn't get across the border and if you wanted to go anywhere, you had to take a plane out. But I don't think we were affected by that in our year there. We always had enough to do.

Q: Was one hearing any complaints about the lack of American troops coming through? This must have generated a lot of business.

BOCK: There was still a lot of American navy coming through. In fact, during part of the time, part of that year we were there, my wife got a job with the Navy credit union down in Wanchai. So, I was well aware through her every time one of these big aircraft carriers or frigates came through because there was a flood of people coming in to get their money. That happened on a very regular basis.

Q: Was anybody prognosticating whither China?

BOCK: Well, a lot of people were trying to. Whether there was any consensus about it, I'm not sure. Everybody was kind of waiting for Mao Zedong to die to see what was going to happen.

Q: Did Taiwan have any influence at all?

BOCK: Little. There were pockets of Kuomintang loyalists in Hong Kong, but they were controlled fairly tightly by the British. The British had enough problems with China. They didn't need a Taiwan problem. So, there was this Kuomintang organization. Later there were semi-official Taiwan representatives there. I'm not sure what there was in 1975.

Q: Had the British started to Chineseify the administration there?

BOCK: I'm not sure how well I remember that. They certainly had a number of Hong Kong Chinese in their administration. I'm reasonably sure that the chief secretary was still British. In fact, I think he was British up until near the transfer.

Q: What I recall is that the British were pretty slow about working this out.

BOCK: Yes, I don't think they were in a real hurry. I suppose from the British point of view, they had to watch both sides of this. If they went toward an indigenization of the structure, that could be interpreted by the Chinese in Peking as saying, "Ah-hah, they're preparing for Hong Kong independence." That would get the British in trouble with the Chinese. So, that, I suspect, was one factor in their thinking of not going too fast.

Q: You left there within a year. Were there any major developments in China or in Hong Kong while you were there?

BOCK: I don't remember anything really earth shattering during that year.

Q: In 1976...

BOCK: What happened is, when I was in Hong Kong, this was the time that George Bush, Senior, was the liaison chief in Peking. He left then the spring of 1976. He had gone out there with his own private secretary and the State Department had created a slot for her. So, he had her, Jennifer Fitzgerald, as well as a State Department secretary assigned to him. When he left, the bureau cast a covetous look at that slot and said, "We're not going to give another liaison office chief two secretaries. Let's turn that into an officer slot." So they created a new officer slot and cast around for somebody to fill it as a part-time special assistant. My boss in Hong Kong was Don Anderson, who had just a year earlier come out of Peking. I guess he recommended me. So, on very short notice, I was asked would I like to go to Peking and I couldn't say no.

Q: How long were you there?

BOCK: Almost three years. Hong Kong was my first real assignment with my wife. My wife was less enthusiastic about going to Peking than I was.

Q: I was going to say, it would take a hell of a lot of diplomacy to take a new wife from the fleshpot of Hong Kong and go to the more austere Beijing.

BOCK: It wasn't so much that. She was game. But I mentioned she had had this temporary job at the credit union. She subsequently got a job as office manager for a major architectural firm in Hong Kong and was just starting on that job when this Peking assignment came up. So, her view of it was a little bit colored by that.

Q: How did Beijing strike you when you got there?

BOCK: Well, you'd have to imagine somebody who's been a China watcher and never seen China. Again, this image of peeping over the fence and then all of a sudden you're there. There is a good deal of excitement getting there and actually seeing the place. By that time, I knew a good deal what to expect, I guess. So, I'm not sure there were any tremendous surprises. But there was certainly a sense of excitement about being in the middle of it.

Q: One does have the feeling Henry Kissinger and his crew looked upon this as being their particular place.

BOCK: There's no question that Kissinger had a lot of personal stake in the whole operation there.

You were asking me my impressions of Peking. They were skewed by the fact that the second night we were there, still in a hotel, the 8.2 Richter Tangshan earthquake took place, which eventually – not right away; I think it took a day – resulted in the evacuation of all or virtually all Peking residents from where they lived. Everybody was out in the street. We were all regrouped at the liaison office building, where the GSO [general services officer] dug out mattresses and spread them out on the ground floor everywhere. After a couple of days, all the dependents were sent abroad. The Chinese government was totally consumed with this. But of course they weren't telling anybody what had happened. In fact, I have a very vivid memory. The earthquake took place at two or probably three o'clock in the morning. We shook a lot in the hotel. We didn't go out in the street. My wife asked me, "Should we leave?" I said, "Well, they'll tell us if we need to" and they didn't, so I said, "Well, let's go back to sleep" and we did. Then I got a phone call from one of my colleagues a couple hours later saying, "Are you still in the hotel?" I said, "Yes. Where are you?" "We're out in the street." I said, "What are you doing out in the street at 5:00 AM?" Anyway, we got out. We were wondering whether the hotel dining room was going to open for breakfast. It did. Once it did, we went in for breakfast. This colleague of mine ran upstairs and got his shortwave radio and brought it down, tuned into BBC or VOA to get information on the earthquake. All the Chinese waiters gathered around because there was zero information in the Chinese media. This entire city had just been shaken apart and there was no news as to what was going on. You can imagine the kind of atmosphere at that time.

Q: You might describe what the earthquake was as far as distance and what the consequences were.

BOCK: It was centered near the industrial city of Tangshan maybe about 100 miles from Peking. It would be in the northeast direction. Peking is a little bit inland from the Bohai Gulf. If you go to the Bohai Gulf and then head north, eventually you hit Manchuria. On the way up is Tangshan. It was built on the site of a major coal seam. It was originally a coal mining city and then industry developed around it. It was a city of well over a million people, totally destroyed, totally destroyed. I was through it on the train a year later. You couldn't get off. What you saw was some temporary structures which were... At first, I couldn't understand what I was looking at because they seemed awfully high up off the street level. Then I realized that they had dug down, found the original street level, and anything else was on about six feet of rubble. Then you could still see some twisted metal around where some of the bigger buildings had been. So, Tangshan was destroyed. Tianjin, the port city near Peking, was fairly heavily damaged. Peking suffered some damage, but not catastrophic. There were a lot of the older mud brick buildings which simply collapsed. Most of those were one story.

Q: These didn't kill as many people.

BOCK: They never came up with an official figure for how many were killed. Several years later, some Mexican seismological team was allowed to come in and do some kind of a survey and they came up with an estimate of 250,000 dead, which I think is the generally accepted figure now.

Q: How did our embassy and all react?

BOCK: Well, we were first of all trying to find out how bad the damage was and then to assess what the government was doing about it and what effect it was going to have on the government, which was very difficult to do. Sources of information were very limited. But it was almost like the China watching operation in Hong Kong. It was in little bits and pieces. At the same time, the liaison office had to worry about its own people. I mentioned all the dependents were sent out. Everybody was regrouped. And the entire functioning of the liaison office was pretty much changed. The Chinese government was not business as usual by any means, so the normal diplomatic duties were on hold. So, almost everybody in the liaison office was given the assignment of getting out and around, looking at what was happening in the city, whether there was unrest, get some idea of damage, and so on.

Q: Was the term "mandate of Heaven" being withdrawn, bandied about? My understanding is that when the dynasty is about to go, all Hell breaks loose – earthquakes, floods and all. With Mao on his last legs, I would think this would be some- (end of tape)

BOCK: The question of the mandate of Heaven was certainly being bandied around in the Western community, in the foreign community. Whether it was being done so among the Chinese was hard to know. I assume it was. But as I said, there was a lack of real access. The local feeling wasn't only anti-American. There was still a real isolationist atmosphere, a distrust of foreigners, permeating China. The ability to find Chinese who would sit down and discuss candidly their views on political subjects was almost zero. There were a few exceptions, but it was very difficult. They wouldn't discuss it among themselves for the most part.

Q: We're still talking about the time when the Gang of Four were running things. The Cultural Revolution was not over at that point.

BOCK: It was not over. What I possibly should have mentioned during the Hong Kong time - you asked about what was going on - is that this was the time of one of these periodic mass movements which were sponsored by the central regime which was called Pi Lin Pi Kong, literally "Criticize Lin Biao - Criticize Confucius," but "Confucius" was generally understood to mean "Zhou En-lai." The focus was on criticizing the moderating elements of policy which were associated with Zhou En-lai. That was happening in early 1976 and was still kind of petering out maybe by the time we arrived in China, but that was the kind of atmosphere you were in.

Q: I take it that at this point you weren't having Chinese sitting down to tell you horrendous things that happened.

BOCK: No.

Q: Now there is a whole art form of these memoirs of the Cultural Revolution that are being written. I've read many of them.

BOCK: This started not too long thereafter. The key two events that triggered it were the death of Mao Zedong and then the purge of the Gang of Four, both of which happened in very rapid succession.

Q: Is there anything we should cover to set the stage before things started to happen?

BOCK: Probably not. We arrived in Peking in July. Mao died at the beginning of September. Everybody was still kind of under the influence of this horrific earthquake and then the old man's gone. And that was, of course, very interesting to watch. The Chinese were just in shock. This was a time when you really could tell what people were thinking. They were in shock. A lot of them may not have loved Mao Zedong, as all the propaganda would have it. But he had been in charge of the country for 27 years. It was very difficult to imagine a future without Mao Zedong. So, there were people just sort of wandering around almost dazed. There was an organized campaign of mourning, of course. There was a big gathering of hundreds of thousands of people in Tiananmen Square when they had the memorial service. But there was great uncertainty as to what was going to happen next.

Q: You were doing what at the embassy?

BOCK: I was sent up as a part-time special assistant. So, part of what I was doing was the administrative work, helping out the head of the liaison office. But otherwise, I was assigned to the political section. At the outset, I was doing some internal political work. Eventually, I did external, Chinese foreign relations reporting. But during those early months, most of us were focused on internal political matters.

Q: When Mao died, did we have a reporting plan? "Okay, Rick, you watch the lights in the Ministry of Defense..." Were we anticipating coups, countercoups, disturbances? Were we monitoring or just trying to see what happened?

BOCK: Well, we were monitoring things as well as we could. I don't remember anything quite as finely laid out as you're describing. But part of what we were doing was going out and looking for the so-called big character posters. Everyone knew this was the traditional way of, kind of a first indication that something was brewing. These things would go up. So, that as much as anything to do with lights on in a building was the focus of what we were doing.

Q: What happened?

BOCK: Well, within the course of... First of all, what initially happened was, official posters went up all over the place showing pictures of Mao Zedong and Hua Guofeng as his designated successor with an appropriate quote from Mao Zedong which said, "With you in charge, I am at ease." This was the regime's announcement to all concerned that the succession had been decided and it was Hua Guofeng. Hua Guofeng was a relatively recent addition to the top political circle and he had been in charge of some security functions in the past. But it was a little bit hard to believe that he had enough clout to really keep everybody in line. He was not completely identified either with the radical wing, the Gang of Four, or the more moderate group around Zhou En-lai and Deng Xiao-ping. So, I think we were pretty skeptical that this was the end of the story. We were proved right about a month later. It was in October when small groups of people started marching down the main street, Chang An Jie, toward Tiananmen Square with their unit designation - everybody in China belonged to a unit, and so you'd get such and such office or such and such factory - denouncing the Gang of Four. And for about a day or two, it wasn't clear whether this was really the end of the Gang of Four or simply some kind of trial balloon or some attempt to provoke a movement. Then it snowballed. Soon, you had masses of people on the street calling for the arrest of the Gang of Four. Then in the period thereafter, you had huge displays of these big character posters, including some dredging up all sorts of horror stories from the Cultural Revolution, including both obscure people and people very high in the hierarchy who had been mistreated, in some cases hounded to death, and it was all being blamed on the Gang of Four, of course. The Gang of Four were Mao Zedong's widow and then three people from the Shanghai region who were allied with her.

Q: Was there a feeling that these parades... I mean, obviously, somebody was directing them, but was there real passion behind them? Was the Gang of Four that unpopular?

BOCK: Yes, it seemed quite clear that they were. The initial parades were a little bit tentative. But once it was clear that this really was a mass movement, there was a lot of passion in it. People were very willing to blame these four individuals for all sorts of things. In the Cultural Revolution, which lasted for nine or 10 years, everybody had had something bad happen to them, some more than others, but everybody had a grudge. It was a convenient target to bring all these things up against.

Q: As this was going through, was there any disquiet on the part of the Americans there that this thing could blow up or could cause other repercussions which might not be to our advantage or not?

BOCK: Well, I suppose there was a little bit of that in the background, that this could result in a total breakdown of authority, which would not have been welcomed. But I don't remember that being a terribly prominent concern. The whole rapprochement between the U.S. and China had been done under the auspices first of Zhou En-lai and then of Deng Xiao-ping. Mao Zedong, too, but Mao Zedong was kind of the emperor in the background and it was generally attributed to those two individuals. So, the question of who would take over for Mao and whether that would be somebody identified with the relationship with the U.S. was very much in the forefront of our government's thinking. To the extent that these radicals were being taken down from power, that was all to the good.

Q: I take it that we actually had no cards to play one way or the other. We were watching developments.

BOCK: Yes. First of all, we had no knowledge of the inner workings. Whatever knowledge we had was always after the fact. We didn't have a current knowledge of what was going on. Whether there were people in Washington that had information which wasn't being made available, I don't know, but I suspect not. No, I never had the sense that we felt we could have much of an impact on this internal power struggle.

Q: How was our embassy foreign national staff responding to all this?

BOCK: That's an interesting question. Our foreign nationals were all, in effect, Chinese government employees. They were always at that time considered very - I don't like to use the word "suspect," but we always assumed they had their own reporting requirements. So one had to be very careful of what one said. On the other hand, you could talk to them. The reaction to the extent I can remember it was extreme caution when this stuff started up. But then increasing relief and excitement as it became clear that there was a change in direction going on. After all, given the fact that their loyalties were clearly with the Chinese government and not with us, the fact that they were in this business at all meant that they had some kind of a broader outlook usually.

Q: Were we getting much from the hinterland?

BOCK: Not a lot. The liaison office had a program of trying to get its officers out to the provinces on a very regular basis in order to just get a sense of at least that posters were going up and any other signs of political debate. It was very difficult to travel in China at that time. You couldn't drive significantly outside Peking except to a couple of tourist destinations. You had to go either by plane or by train. In order to get a plane or a train ticket, you had to have a special stamp from the foreign ministry. This meant that if you wanted to plan a trip, you would submit a wish list through channels to the foreign ministry and rely on them both to get the travel arrangements and the permission. It usually came a day or two in advance of when you planned to go. Then once you traveled, you were always met at the train station or at the airport by a China Travel Service guide who had made all the arrangements for you. So, it was all very controlled. But given those constraints, every few weeks, if not more often, somebody from the liaison office would be making a trip someplace if they could. Some areas you just couldn't get to. We couldn't get to Tibet in those days. You couldn't get to Xinjiang in the far west. Some other provinces were off-limits. But you never knew for sure what was off-limits and what wasn't. So, you would submit a travel itinerary, including a couple of places you felt pretty sure they would let you go to, and then throw in a couple that were much more iffy and see what you got.

Q: What was your wife doing? What were your living conditions?

BOCK: We started out in the hotel, rapidly were evacuated. Once everything settled down and family members came back, which only took a couple of weeks, we were back in the hotel for about a total of three months. Then we moved into one of the diplomatic apartments. The Chinese had built a large number of apartment buildings, mid to high rise, all in several compounds. The Diplomatic Service Bureau, which ran these things and ran everything else concerning the foreign missions, would parcel these out on the basis of requests from the various embassies. So, it was always a little bit of a delay to get one, but at the time I was there, it wasn't too bad. Two or three years later, you had people going to Beijing to serve in the embassy and they would be in the hotel for a year or more. We were okay. We were in an apartment by October, I guess. It was a small two bedroom apartment in a high rise, not together with other Americans; we were the only Americans in that building. I think we had on our floor an Australian family, a Belgian woman, and a Hungarian couple. It was all mixed together. A few countries, a few embassies, had their own housing, particularly some of the Eastern European embassies, especially including the Russians, who had everything in one compound. Everyone else was on the arrangement that we were. I mentioned about travel. My wife and I did make a weeklong trip in October. It was just in the aftermath of the fall of the Gang of Four. Although we were doing touristy things, which was what we had to do for the China Travel Service, at the same time, I was trying to keep my eye out for demonstrations, for posters, and so on. We saw a lot of posters. These things were going up everywhere.

Q: Were we seeing much support for the Gang of Four?

BOCK: No, not much. A little bit. Some of the posters that would go up, for instance, would be very obscure. Upon analysis, it looked like some of them might actually be saying, "It's not really the Gang of Four that's at fault. It's somebody else." But by and large, not much of that.

Q: Were we able to monitor what the Chinese military was up to?

BOCK: I don't think we were able to monitor them very well from the liaison office. To what extent long distance monitoring was going on, I don't remember. I don't know if I was aware of any. I'm sure there were efforts to do that. We always kept our eye out for concentrations of troops or something like that, but that wasn't what we were seeing.

Q: When you were working with Gates, was he making representations to the Chinese? Were you going with him?

BOCK: Usually not. It would depend on the nature of the representation. Normally, if he went in, he would go either with his DCM or with a section chief, depending on the subject matter.

Q: Who was the DCM?

BOCK: The DCM at that time was David Dean, a longtime China hand, or Taiwan hand. He had also served in Hong Kong. For the entire time that Gates was there, Dean was the DCM.

Q: How was the election of '76 viewed? Were you getting any reflection on that either from our embassy's side or from the Chinese side? This was when Carter beat Ford.

BOCK: I can't say that I really remember much of an impact. I suspect there was some concern on the part of the Chinese because of the Carter emphasis on human rights. But I'm hard pressed to remember anything specific on that.

Q: There wasn't speculation on the Chinese that, okay, we're moving away from the Nixon-Kissinger period and we may be going back to the bad old days?

BOCK: There could have been. I really don't know. What rapidly became clear after Carter took office was that China policy was being pretty much run by Brzezinski, who with what I would characterize as a fairly strong anti-Russian bent, just looked at China through a fairly narrow strategic focus and saw this [strategic rapprochement] as somewhere we really want to go. I don't remember now how rapidly that became apparent, but once it did, the Chinese would have been fairly reassured that there wasn't going to be any big shakeup in the China policy.

Q: Did the Indochina-Vietnam-Chinese war cause any particular problems?

BOCK: We paid a lot of attention to it. That's getting a little ahead of the story because that came right on the heels of our own normalization with China. But it took place in early 1979. I was still there. One of my responsibilities was just to find out what I could about it, which wasn't a whole heck of a lot. The information available in Beijing was pretty slim on that. But we were following it the best we could. There was also a spinoff from that... I'm not quite sure of my timing on this. The Chinese incursion into Vietnam, of course, was a reaction to the Vietnamese occupation of Cambodia. I'd have to go back and check to see when exactly that took place. But the result of the Vietnamese occupation of Cambodia was that Sihanouk showed up on our doorstep. We went through a period when the liaison office was the main channel of communication to Sihanouk. There was great turmoil in our own Indochina policy at that point.

Q: Let's go back. Carter came in. Was it expected that he would normalize relations?

BOCK: I don't know that there was an initial expectation in that regard. Eventually it became clear that he was working very hard to find a way to normalize. The Nixon and Ford administrations had wanted to normalize relations and the stumbling block was always how do you handle Taiwan. That was a very big bullet to bite. It wasn't until Carter that they finally determined they were going to bite the bullet and figured out a way to do it. But the desire for normalization was there throughout, I think.

Q: Were you seeing a changing attitude towards not only the embassy work but also towards the world with the Gang of Four being edged out?

BOCK: Yes. What you had along with the fall of the Gang of Four was a considerable criticism of the whole period of the Cultural Revolution, sometimes including criticism of Mao Zedong, although that was very touchy and didn't really get resolved (to the extent that it's been resolved at all) until after I had left. But the Cultural Revolution among other things was a time of extreme isolation on the part of the Chinese. To the extent that you were criticizing that, you were also by and large saying, "We need to interact more with the world." That was certainly taking place. Deng Xiao-ping did come back into power in mid-'77, I think, not too long after the fall of the Gang of Four. That was one of his roles, to bring China in some way more back into the world. This whole period was still characterized by very tense Chinese-Soviet relations. That hadn't really changed. So, bringing China back into the world was in a way looked upon as a kind of safeguard against any difficulties with the Soviets.

Q: Was Deng Xiao-ping sort of looked upon as a hero or “our boy?”

BOCK: By the Americans?

Q: Yes.

BOCK: To some extent, yes. I think that’s fair. He was seen as a key to U.S.-China relations.

Q: Did we know a lot about Deng Xiaoping by that point?

BOCK: Not too much in personal terms. He had had some role in the establishment of the liaison office. He had [experience] in dealing with Americans to that extent during the ’73-’74 period... His role prior to the Cultural Revolution and what he had gone through was also becoming known through Chinese sources. That was always getting published in one form or another. Of course, if you look back to Deng Xiao-ping in the 1950s, he doesn’t come across as much of a reformer. He was a very hard-line communist, which they all were. But I think more because of the dealings with him in the early ‘70s, he was seen as someone that we could usefully work with.

Q: Did we make any entrée into the universities while you were there?

BOCK: We began to. At the time I arrived, the only Americans, virtually the only foreigners, who were in the Chinese universities were the old true believers. There were still a handful of them left even after the Cultural Revolution, people who had seen Mao Zedong’s revolution as the wave of the future and had tied themselves to it and stuck it out. They, of course, were very shy of dealing with the U.S. liaison office. That changed to some extent after normalization, after 1979. In addition to that, though, starting maybe ’77, the Chinese began to accept non-ideological people coming in, doing some teaching, began to accept the idea of academic exchanges. There had been no academic exchanges for a period of probably 20, maybe more, years. I do remember escorting a visiting American astronomical group and going around to various observatories in China with this group. It was amazing to watch. You had all these Chinese scientists who had had no contact not only with the United States but no contact with the West. Some of them had a little contact with the Soviet Union back in the ‘60s. They were just so pleased and so anxious to catch up with what was going on in the world. Now, that was in a scientific discipline. But it carried over to some extent everywhere in the academic world.

Q: Were you able to make any friendly contacts with artists or businesspeople?

BOCK: Very little in that period. That really started to loosen up in 1979, early ‘80s is when the big change came. Even though the government policy was clearly moving in the direction of better ties, I think on a private level, people were still very cautious.

Q: Well, they had gone through the 1,000 Flowers Campaign.

BOCK: Oh, they had gone through so many political campaigns and they knew that if you stuck your neck out, you were going to get it chopped off. Also until the spring of '79, we had not yet normalized. We were an ally, if not "occupier," of Taiwan. What was also happening, however, was a good deal of ferment. You may remember the period of the Democracy Wall. In the wake of Deng Xiao-ping being rehabilitated for the second time, there was a sense that there was going to be some real political changes in China and some people got out in front and started organizing a movement. We as a liaison office had some contact with those people. I did not. There were a couple of people who were handling that and I was not one of them. But that was going on. But it was still pretty limited. There were relatively few who were willing to stick their necks out to talk candidly about political subjects with Americans.

Q: Did you get any piece of the action or observation with the opening of official relations?

BOCK: I had only a very small piece of the action involving the negotiations. That was extremely closely held. I mean, we all knew people were working on it. Woodcock got his instructions from Washington through CIA channels directly from the NSC. They were not shared with anybody except the DCM. He went into a whole series of negotiations in the summer and fall of '78, trying to cut this Taiwan knot basically. That was really the only thing that was left to resolve. I was aware that he was going in to see the foreign ministry and other people but I had no access to his instructions. The only exception was, one time he was given an instruction to go in and the DCM was away on leave. So, I was asked to accompany him. I was a little bit surprised because here I was in effect going around my boss, the political counselor. But I think because I had somewhat more access to certain things than he did that I guess they figured it made more sense for me to go along. I went along as a notetaker. This was not one of the crucial meetings. It wasn't one where a breakthrough was being scored. But that gave me a little bit of a window into the process.

Q: Woodcock... Were you still acting somewhat as a special assistant?

BOCK: Yes. My job did not significantly change from Gates to Woodcock. He was asked whether he wanted to keep the same arrangement and he said, yes, that was fine with him.

Q: How did he use you?

BOCK: Several ways. One, kind of document culling stuff from the daily take, what comes in to be read. I figured out what was worth his while to read and what wasn't. He wanted to do some traveling around China. Gates had had a bad leg. He had some difficulty getting around. So, he did relatively little traveling during his period in China. Woodcock was quite vigorous and he wanted to get around. So, I would make arrangements, accompany him on trips, including one amusing trip to an automobile factory in Manchuria. Here was the head of the United Auto Workers and he was going to a Chinese automobile factory. Just watching his reaction... He said, "Jesus, this is 1920s technology." So, those were the two major components. And arranging other stuff, just meetings and so on.

Q: How did he operate? One thinks of a union operator as barking orders and being confrontational.

BOCK: I think he saw his job pretty much in terms of carrying out the President's instructions on normalizing relations. I think that's why he took the job. He was happy to let the DCM do most of the work in running the mission. So, no, he was not going around barking orders at people. He had a narrower focus.

Q: Under Gates and under Woodcock, did you find that this new liaison office was a happy ship or a focused one?

BOCK: I think it was a pretty happy ship. It was a small office. Virtually everybody was there because they wanted to be there. Not all of the positions were Chinese language positions, but most of them were. These were people who had studied Chinese and, having studied Chinese, the chance to actually go into the Middle Kingdom was a great thing. For some support staff, that, of course, was not true. But I think with very few exceptions there were... It was a very isolated place. You couldn't travel. There were certain tourist things you could do in and around Beijing, but you eventually played those out. Very little entertainment. Some health problems. Terrible dust. But given all that, morale was pretty good. That changed to some extent after normalization, but I didn't see it. What happened after normalization was, becoming an embassy, you had a huge expansion in the number of people there. There was difficulty in accommodating them in housing and for certain periods of time in office space; we had to get additional office space. So, I became aware after I had left, talking to friends, that there were considerable morale problems in the early '80s because of that. But it was pretty good when I was there.

Q: When you were there, did we have anything in Shanghai or Guangzhou?

BOCK: Absolutely nothing. The Chinese had an annual or semi-annual- (end of tape)

During the annual trade fair in Guangzhou, we would send people from the embassy from the economic section, commercial office, agricultural trade officer, down there. They'd set up shop for the duration, which was maybe a month or so. But we had no permanent representation anywhere else. We got to Shanghai on a regular basis, but it was always on visits.

Q: Were you feeling that we needed to take the temperature of what was happening and really needed somebody in Shanghai?

BOCK: I think there was a sense early on that we wanted to have people there. I don't know how this had been discussed, but I think it must have been looked at and decided, well, that's nothing we can deal with until after we have full diplomatic relations; we're just not going to be able to accomplish it. But once diplomatic relations were decided on, then one of the early things on the agenda was a consular agreement which would invoke consular protections but also the opening of consulates around the country.

Q: Did Japan play any role? Were we making an effort to include the Japanese in our efforts?

BOCK: Yes and no. The Japanese may have had a larger embassy than we did. We had a lot of contact with them. Again, sharing of information. You were living in this island there where you had extremely limited ability to talk meaningfully to the Chinese. So, the diplomatic community was kind of forced in upon itself. Of all the places I've ever served, you had much more feeling of community in the diplomatic community there because everybody was in the same isolation. We talked to the Japanese, the Germans, the French, the Egyptians, the Romanians... But the Japanese were high on the list. They, of course, were extremely interested to know what we were doing on normalization. We weren't in a position to tell them. I can remember feeling rather bad myself. I was aware of normalization talks going on, but I was as surprised as anyone else when we were informed one weekend that Ambassador Woodcock wanted the entire staff to assemble in his dining room the next morning. On that morning, we were all there and he made the announcement. He said, "President Carter is going to announce later today a normalization agreement." So I, just like anyone else except Stape Roy and possibly the communicators, was not aware of the timing of that at all. The Japanese at that point were put out. They wanted advance notice and they didn't get it.

Q: It's always been a problem with the Japanese. The Japanese leak like mad.

BOCK: Well, we had the whole Taiwan situation to deal with. I wasn't dealing with it, but I sure heard a lot about it, calling Chiang Ching Kuo out of bed at 2:00 AM or whenever it was to inform him at the very last minute. With that story, Taiwan was going to be going ballistic and you certainly didn't want the Japanese blabbing things earlier.

Q: You were talking about the diplomatic community. So often, the French are the odd man out. Did you find that they had a different cast on things?

BOCK: Not really. We had pretty good contact with the French. I don't remember them having... They had had diplomatic relations with China before the rest of us.

Q: De Gaulle in the '60s-

BOCK: Very ostentatiously. Although the British actually had a consulate or something even earlier. They never let it go. But they didn't officially normalize until later. So, the French had that wealth of experience, having been there through the Cultural Revolution. But I didn't particularly sense either any resentment or anything else. The French probably were like the rest of the Europeans; they thought that U.S. normalization with China would probably make their life easier. I don't think they had a special take on that.

Q: What happened after...

BOCK: The announcement was in December and it stated that the embassies would be opened in April. So, we had a kind of a transition period. The reason for that was, you had the whole dismantling of this establishment in Taiwan to take place. I don't remember now what the specifics of the negotiations were, but I'm sure they had something about getting all the military off the island before we had formal diplomatic relations. So, with all that, there was a Deng Xiao-ping trip to the United States. Remember him in Texas with his 10 gallon hat? This took place early in '79. You had the complication of the invasion of Vietnam, where there was some feeling that the Chinese had taken advantage of us, that they had been planning this all along and they got the normalization out of the way and now they had diplomatic cover for doing this, which didn't make some people happy. And then finally where you had the normalization itself, which was a big show. We had the formal opening of the embassy and Deng Xiao-ping came and several other people. We had security issues and press issues, all of that.

Q: Did Brzezinski come over?

BOCK: He was there during the course of the negotiations. I think it was summer of '78. I was only tangentially involved in that visit. We had a number of visitors coming in '78, a number of Cabinet visits as this thing gathered momentum. That kept a lot of us busy, of course, as expected.

Q: Did they seem to be productive or was this everybody getting used to each other?

BOCK: It was a little bit of both, a lot of, as is typical in our government, of these Cabinet agencies had things they wanted to do with China and they couldn't really do in the absence of normalization. So, this was all kind of laying the groundwork for agreements of one sort or another.

Q: You left there when?

BOCK: I left there in late April or early May of 1979.

Q: Did you feel a little put out or out of joint that you weren't going to be doing normal relations time or did you really see any great developments at that point?

BOCK: There were all sorts of things to look forward to, but on the other hand, I had had a pretty full time there starting with the end of the Cultural Revolution and up to normalization. It was as good a time as any to leave.

Q: How about your wife? Was she able to find work?

BOCK: She worked at some different jobs in the liaison office, but she had a difficult pregnancy which caused her to stop working. Then our child was born. That was late '77 and she was busy with that.

Q: Yes. How did you feel, having served in China and Berlin? Did you feel yourself part of the German club or the China club?

BOCK: I was a bit ambivalent about that. I had kind of one foot in each. On the one hand, I rather of liked the ability to go back and forth, but on the other hand recognized that I risked being looked at askance by one or the other for not being true blue.

Q: How were relations between the People's Republic of China and the U.S. during this time? Were there issues?

BOCK: There were always issues, but they were relatively calm. The Reagan administration early on had signed the so-called August 15th Communiqué under which he agreed to limit arms sales to Taiwan. There was a lot of kind of “angels dancing on pinheads” in the implementation of that. Politically, it stabilized the relationship so that in the ’84-’86 period, there wasn’t anything really serious on the plate there.

There were problems in Korea. Kim Dae Jung was in exile in the United States and went back during that period accompanied by several congressmen to make sure there wasn’t another Ninoy Aquino on the tarmac of Seoul airport. So, the administration was trying to deal with that in a way that didn’t totally upset the Korean government.

One of the issues I spent an enormous amount of time on was the compact of free association with the Pacific Island states. At that point, they were all still UN trust territories but under a specific regime. They were not like the other UN trust territories. There was a general commitment on the part of the State Department certainly and the U.S. government as a whole to find some more permanent setup for them. There were a lot of issues involved. The Pentagon wanted to make sure that its rights, particularly for missile ranges, were preserved. There were issues involving nuclear cleanup in Bikini. There were also bureaucratic political issues. The Interior Department, which ran the trust territories, was somewhat reluctant to let go of them. The Interior committees in the Congress were extremely reluctant to end their oversight.

Q: What were some of the issues?

BOCK: Now that you mention it in those terms, you asked earlier about China and I said China wasn’t terribly on the front burner, but there were people in the Senate who were constantly trying to pick fights with China and trying to get resolutions on the floor or riders attached to appropriations or authorization bills or whatever, stating positions on issues involving China. The State Department position was “Let us take care of that.” So, yes.

Q: What was the situation on Taiwan when you went out there in ’86?

BOCK: Actually, it was an extremely interesting time to be there. The government of Taiwan was run by Chiang Ching Kuo, the son of Chiang Kai-shek. He was getting very old by that time. He had made the decision, encouraged by the United States, to gradually democratize the political life on Taiwan. He was just starting to implement this in 1986. Up until that time, there was a legislature which was totally dominated by holdovers from the Mainland, people who had fled from Mainland China in 1949 and had been there ever since. They were getting pretty old. Of course, his hand was being forced. Something had to change. There were elections on Taiwan but only for a minority of the seats in the parliament and no opposition party had been allowed to form. There was an active opposition, many of whom had been jailed following an earlier series of demonstrations early on, some of them were just getting out of jail at that point. So, there were these moves. He was starting to open up the political system. He also set in train a rethinking of relationship with the Mainland. Up until that time, all contact by residents of Taiwan with the Mainland was banned. But China, of course, had gone on its new economic path in the early ’80s and was inviting overseas investment and there were a lot of Taiwanese businessmen who were quite interested in doing so and were doing it despite this ban, setting up front companies in Hong Kong or elsewhere. Again, to some extent, his hand was being forced. He was going to have to regularize this somehow. This was a major issue because the government of the Republic of China considered itself to be the government of all China and had ever since 1949. So, how to square that with any sort of contact with the Mainland was a real problem.

All this was happening, and the Taiwan opposition was to some extent... First of all, they were almost all Taiwanese, very few people who had any real ties to the Mainland, the difference being the Taiwanese are Chinese that came over three or four centuries ago as opposed to the ones who came over 30-40 years ago. Some of them were strong advocates of formal independence for Taiwan. So, from the U.S. government point of view, we were caught in not exactly a dilemma but kind of a tricky issue. On the one hand, we were clearly in favor of democratizing Taiwan. On the other hand, we were not in favor of anything that would look provocative to China, like declaring independence, because then that would call into question what our obligations toward Taiwan were. So, in dealing with this emerging opposition, we had to walk that very fine line, and in dealing with the government, too, but particularly with the opposition because they had people back here who were lobbying Congress and carrying on public relations activities. They were sometimes hearing what they wanted to hear from their contacts in the United States that, "Yes, independence would be a great thing. You guys deserve it." We had to make clear that that was not the U.S. government policy, us coming to their aid if they did anything too drastic. So, that was very interesting. That was the biggest part of my job.

Q: Let's talk about the opposition. If you're doing what we always profess to want and what we do want, growing democracy and all this, if nothing else, let's say they didn't declare independence but they were going to be sitting there as a bright little island working away with good economics and good democracy and all and then you look over at this huge monster over there which essentially doesn't have that... The more we promoted democracy, the more we were promoting trouble for ourselves.

BOCK: Well, you have to remember, this was before 1989 and before the Tiananmen incident. The general sense both here and in Taiwan was that China was opening up economically and politically. People were able to talk about things they couldn't have talked about before. They were even in some cases able to write about things they weren't able to write about before. The trends were favorable. Therefore, a demonstration on Taiwan of how democracy could work in a Chinese society could perhaps help that process along in China and that if it ever did, then the choices facing Taiwan would be somewhat different. On the one hand, they might be able to deal with a democratic China and say, "You guys don't really want us. Let's be sensible." Or a democratic China might be attractive enough to the people on Taiwan that they'd say, "Okay, yes, let's work out a deal here and we'll be part of you under certain conditions." All of those roads seemed at least possible in 1986 and '87. It wasn't until after '89 that people had to look at it in a different way.

Q: What was your impression of the Kuomintang types on Taiwan and then the new breed coming up on the Taiwanese side?

BOCK: First of all, the nationalists were a very mixed bag. The top rung were still the Mainland establishment. But in the party structure, because the party was there to run elections as a major part of their job, they had to appeal to the Taiwanese electorate. They had a lot of native Taiwanese in their party structure who were to some extent at odds with the leadership in the legislature, these old Mainland holdovers. So, the Kuomintang was undergoing this transition to become a party to appeal to the population of Taiwan. It wasn't easy but it was still very much a top-down structure so that when Chiang Ching Kuo indicated "This is where we're going," even the old guys at least halfheartedly signed on. On the opposition side, you had these people who were operating as an opposition on Taiwan who actually ran an election that first fall I was there, although they could not run on any party affiliation. They were called the Dang Wai, which literally means "Outside the Party." There was one party [the KMT] and they were outside it. They were the ones by and large who had been the lawyers for the people who had been imprisoned. They had been trying to work within the system to get their people released. However, over time, more and more of the more radical elements who had been either in jail or in exile in the U.S., in some cases Japan, were getting back into the country. So, the people who were running this incipient opposition in 1986 gradually started to lose control toward the more radical, more pro-independence types. So, there was a real shifting of ground there on both sides of the equation.

Q: How did it work? You were an independent organization. The desk is in Rosslyn and is not part of the State Department. Who was running the show? Who was getting the orders?

BOCK: From our point of view, that was never a problem. We looked at it as a useful fiction. Our policy instructions came directly from what would have been the Taiwan desk, called the Taiwan Coordination Staff in the East Asia Bureau. We communicated directly with them all the time. Administratively, it was different. But on the policy side, that was clear. The managing director of AIT in Rosslyn would come out for visits, but he was also taking guidance from the State Department on anything he said. So, it all worked quite well. There were occasionally egos involved between the managing director in Rosslyn and the director in Taipei. But on the policy side, we didn't have a problem.

Q: With the KMT there, were they comfortable with us or was the relationship beginning to fray because they were seeing they were beginning to be outmoded and we were part of the problem?

BOCK: There was a little bit of that. To the extent they were uncomfortable with us, it tended to be on China policy rather than on domestic policy, particularly because Chiang Ching Kuo had said this is what he was going to do, he was going to open up. We said, "Hey, great. We're with you." Sure, there were issues. I can remember at one point our [CIA] station chief came to me and said, "The security people are upset because you and your section are meeting with all these opposition people." It was his job to pass on that message. He was the liaison with the security people. But we talked about it in a staff meeting and it was absolutely clear and he was told to go back and talk to them and tell them what our policy was. So, there were elements in the government which were not happy about this, but we felt that we were doing things that were quite compatible with what the President wanted.

I should mention that Chiang Ching Kuo died in office, I think in '86. This led to a great deal of uncertainty as to what was going to happen next because it was such a top-down structure. We were scrambling to find out. We didn't have a lot of influence on the internal situation, but we were scrambling to find out what was going to happen. Eventually, he was replaced by his vice president, a Taiwanese, had been brought into that position specifically as part of this policy of opening up the KMT to the Taiwanese. He was always going to be succeeding as president because that's what the constitution said. The real question was whether he was going to succeed Chiang as head of the party. There was quite an internal struggle over that. It lasted several weeks.

There was another issue which paralleled this. Years earlier, there had been indications that Taiwan had been pursuing a nuclear weapons development policy. Somehow we had gotten a hold of that and we shut it down. I don't know any of the details on it. We then put in place a cooperative mechanism of nuclear exchanges that allowed us to keep track of what they were doing. Despite that, I think in the fall of '86 or early '87, somebody who was working in their nuclear field defected to us and told us they were doing it again. The defection became public just after the new president took office. We had to again try to ensure that the program was being shut down. The question was, was the new president in a position to do that? He had barely made it into office. He was not one of the old boy network. We didn't think he had control of the military. All sorts of questions. It was a military program. So, we had a very dicey few weeks there which I was not directly involved in in terms of talking to people because the people who needed to be talked to weren't my contacts. But eventually it worked out fine. It was not only a question of how is democracy going to go, but this other issue as well.

Q: Were there issues concerning the Taiwanese government's agents in the Chinese community in the United States? Sometimes they seemed to have a heavy hand.

BOCK: The big issue had been an earlier one when there was an assassination of a critic of Chiang Ching Kuo. That was well before I was there. There were still some repercussions from that. I don't remember any specific issues coming up during that '86-'89 period. We were well aware that part of the job of the Taiwan representatives over here was to mobilize Chinese Americans in favor of their policy. That's fair game. Everybody tries to do that. During the course of those three years, there was competing policies. The Taiwanese opposition was doing the same thing. They didn't have any official representatives, but they had lots of unofficial ones. No, I don't remember that being a big issue for us.

Q: What about arms sales?

BOCK: On arms sales, I mentioned earlier that there had been this negotiated communiqué with China on Taiwan arms sales in 1982. That said that under the assumption that China continued to pursue a policy of peaceful settlement with Taiwan, we would limit our arms sales to Taiwan and gradually decrease them. There were some more specifics involved which we interpreted and gave the interpretation to the Chinese that we would not exceed the level of arms sales as of whatever the base year was. Then there were all sorts of machinations that were a little bit like Enron accounting. You try to make sure that the numbers conform with this. I think by the late '80s most people felt that this was a ticking time bomb. Taiwan's weaponry was getting more and more outmoded. There was also a qualitative restriction on arms sales which was seen as worse than the quantitative one because the longer we said we weren't going to upgrade in quality Taiwan's weapons, that meant eventually they were going to start falling behind. But nobody wanted to tackle that until they had to. When this all came to a head was during the Bush reelection campaign of '92 when he decided to throw a bone to General Dynamics [and approve the sale of F-16s to Taiwan]. For reasons that were really domestic politics rather than foreign policy, he decided to approve this very massive arms sale, which clearly busted that '82 agreement even though he tried to claim it didn't. But in the '86-'89 period, we hadn't reached that point yet. The program was okay.

Q: Did you have the feeling that on China policy you had maybe a series of groups but one group which was very influential, those that were on the initial opening to China with Kissinger and really looked on Taiwan as being just a plain nuisance – let's get on with the big game – and these people dominated things for a while? Was there a feeling that there was this group and you were having to deal with this?

BOCK: The group had been there, but we were in the Reagan administration, so they weren't quite so dominating. Reagan in his campaign had talked about normalizing relations with Taiwan and was finally talked out of that. Sure, there was tension over the policy, but the big tension had been in the early couple of years of the Reagan administration. After that, everybody had kind of come to terms with the general outlines of the policy and you just had these little things that would come up from time to time. But I would say there was no big struggle over China policy within the administration during my three years in Taipei.

Q: Did you have a feeling that the people in AIT were being monitored very closely by Mainland Chinese agents and if you got what they conceded to be out of line, there would be screams of bloody murder and all this?

BOCK: Well, monitoring in the sense of following any news about what we were doing, sure. We didn't feel that there were agents in the streets.

Q: I would think that on any sensitive issue like that, they would be looking at what you all were doing to see if you were getting beyond...

BOCK: That was only one part of the equation. We had to be very careful for a whole bunch of reasons. You would go and talk to some leading opposition figure. You had to be very worried about what was going to appear in the opposition press the next day. They were quite capable of distorting what you may or may not have said. On the one hand, sure, Mainland watchers would pick that up, but so would our own government and so would people in Taiwan on both sides of the independence issue. So, we had to not only watch what we said but also be careful if something came out which was a distortion to make sure it was corrected quite promptly.

Q: Did you see a problem or lack of problem in recruiting Foreign Service China types for Taiwan? Was all the action seen as being over on the Mainland or was there a fairly easy flow back and forth?

BOCK: We didn't have a big problem, no. There was a good flow. It was a relatively small structure as opposed to the embassy in Beijing. Some people found that attractive. You could do your political-economic work there.

Q: Much better living, too, I suppose.

BOCK: Yes, particularly in the '80s when housing was extremely shorthanded in Beijing and in Taipei we were nicely set up. Since service in Taipei was by no means a bar or even a disadvantage to later service in Beijing... If it had been-

Q: It's like we had in Israel at one point where if you had served in Israel you couldn't serve in the Arab world.

BOCK: There was nothing like that. There were concerns at the outset with AIT as to... For a time, nobody was assigned directly from one to the other. That broke down. A deputy director in Taipei went directly from there to be consul general in Shanghai. I think he was the first to do that kind of direct transfer. So, the Chinese knew what we were doing. As long as we didn't throw it in their face and declare these people to be diplomatic officers [while in Taipei], they basically didn't care.

Q: Were you seeing developments within Taiwan of a growing strength of the economic community? Were you seeing this turning into one of the tigers?

BOCK: Yes. This was very much economic miracle time. The Taiwan economy was growing extremely fast. They were starting to get into the semiconductor business but most of the growth was still in consumer electronics. They had the U.S. market for toys sewed up. Shoes. All this kind of stuff. Then toward the end of the '80s, a lot of that lower wage type stuff starting moving to China. By the time I left, there was beginning to be concern as to whether the Taiwan economy would be "hollowed out." I think that is still a concern now, but in fact, they were able to handle it very nicely through the 1990s, so for the longest time, they kept doing very well by pushing overseas across the Straits their low wage stuff and retaining the higher value-added things in Taiwan.

Q: How about exchanges? Did we have a good student exchange? We had a big one with Mainland China.

BOCK: There was a student exchange, but it was very much one sided. There were a certain number of American students who were interested in going to Taiwan, particularly people interested in Chinese culture who found better access in Taiwan than in China. Huge numbers of Taiwan students going to the United States. This was self-financed. Some of them even went as high school students in order to avoid the draft. They violated our immigration regulations in doing so and that became an issue at one point. I think around that time, mid-'80s, Taiwan students in the United States may have been the largest group of foreign students. This is from a relatively small place.

Q: On the academic side, I would imagine that Taiwan would almost fall below the radar of academic interest with a few exceptions in the United States. All of a sudden, Mainland China was opening up and all the goodies were over there.

BOCK: For Sinologists, people interested in Chinese culture, Taiwan was still attractive. For some people in political science, there was some interest in Taiwan, both because of this relationship with China but also as a very prime example of an authoritarian country which was democratizing. Thirdly, people with academic economic interests also were interested in Taiwan because of its example as an Asian tiger. But that's not to say that that wasn't overshadowed by the very great interest in China, which had been closed off for so long and suddenly in the 1980s was available.

Q: Was there any problem there?

BOCK: Congress does what it likes. Congressmen visited all the time, sometimes very briefly, sometimes longer. Solarz came out at the time of an election. That was a lot of fun. People in the KMT government were very distressed. We spent a lot of time calming nerves. The only issue with Congress was their desire sometimes to come out on U.S. government planes. We had more or less of a prohibition of that. Sometimes there were some exceptions where they were dropped off and the plane flew off, but it was very tricky. We had a rule that no U.S. military would come to Taiwan. That was part of having gotten rid of the defense agreement. Of course, the government planes the Congress fly on are military planes. So, that was an issue with Congress. Otherwise not, by and large. With the administration, it was a very different sort of thing. Higher level representatives of the U.S. government were not supposed to come to Taiwan. However, given very serious economic interests of ours in Taiwan, there was a very good case to be made for Cabinet level people on the economic side to come out. That was normally done under the auspices of two counterpart private sector economic committees, one in Taipei and one in Washington. Each year, they would have a joint meeting alternating between the U.S. and Taiwan. So, when it was in Taiwan, we would normally send somebody of Cabinet rank out there. We always elicited a Chinese protest. So, there was sometimes a little reluctance in Washington to do this. It normally took place, though, and the Cabinet member involved was heavily briefed and heavily monitored to make sure he didn't say anything stupid because these people had nothing to do with Taiwan policy and were not really well equipped to dance the fine line that we normally did.

Q: As you were sitting with your colleagues in the interests section, what were you figuring was going on in China?

BOCK: It became clear that there was a serious difference of agreement within the Chinese government. If there hadn't been that, the whole series of demonstrations would have been ended with very little chance of the loss of life that happened. There had been efforts at controlled democratization getting back to '86/'87. Hu Yaobang was purged because of them. The question of how these demonstrations in '89 were fitting into all that was looked upon in different ways by different people. We didn't have any great insights as to what was going on. We would read whatever was available, the cable traffic, from our embassy. But certainly by the beginning of June, it looked like it was getting out of hand. Everybody was fearful that something bad would result.

Q: What did the Australian-American alliance mean?

BOCK: Well, it's an interesting question. It wasn't an easy one to answer because the original Australian-American alliance was anti-Japanese. Then it became anti-communist and depending on the point of view either anti-Soviet or anti-Chinese. By this time, very few Australians wanted an anti-Chinese alliance and we weren't pushing that either. But then looming over the Australian horizon was Indonesia with some people seeing it as an opportunity and some seeing it as a threat. In population terms, it just totally overwhelms Australia. So, one of the perspectives you could bring up was that our role in the Pacific was a way of integrating these various countries in a way which would be of mutual benefit. That included what was at the time our increasingly closer relations with ASEAN, including Indonesia. That drew a positive response from a lot of Australians.

Q: What was your impression of the absorption of and the Asiatic influence? It was really quite new.

BOCK: It was mostly new. There was an old line Chinese population in Melbourne that had come over in the gold rush, but the vast majority of Asians in Melbourne tended to be Chinese and Vietnamese, although you had a sprinkling of Indonesians as well. Clearly, integration was much slower there, but it was happening. I should describe the setup there. Melbourne is a city of three million but the mayor of Melbourne only has control over the downtown business district and then you've got all these separate suburbs that have their own town councils. We were starting to see Vietnamese being elected to these small town councils. So, they were gradually finding their way into the political system, but it was slow.

Q: What were you doing?

BOCK: I was assigned to the political science department. The way ICAF worked was that in the first semester, they had a core curriculum which took up most of the students' time. The core curriculum was divided into a bunch of segments, one of which was the political science segment, which really was an in-depth look at American political institutions and policy formulation but also with a foreign policy component to it. What we did was, the eight or nine of us people on the faculty of the political science department all taught the same course in our sections. So, we would get together as a group, work out the curriculum, which was based on last year's curriculum, so you sort of tinkered with it. Then we'd all then do the separate teaching. That was the first semester. The second semester was much more technically oriented where my expertise didn't fit in very well. However, I did lead an area studies course on China and I also helped out with some organization of a computer related course.

Q: The organization had become rather mature by this point.

BOCK: Yes.

Q: How did you see its operation by that time?

BOCK: The office in Rosslyn was quite a small office. We had a total staff of about ten. It served a couple of functions. One, it served as an administrative backstop for the AIT office in Taipei. That was kind of a can of worms, that I didn't get involved in any more than I had to, although I did to some extent. Then we were also sort of an interface for Taiwan representatives in Washington, either stationed in Washington or traveling to Washington. This gets back to the nature of the U.S.-Taiwan relationship as it evolved after normalization with China in '79. We had no "government to government" relations. All relations were to be filtered through these private organizations which were set up, AIT on the American side and a counterpart organization on the Taiwan side. Well, the Taiwan government folks were never happy with this arrangement. They agreed to live with it but they were always tinkering at the edges. We had a relationship with Taiwan which covered a very large number of aspects. It wasn't just a political relationship. Virtually every agency of the U.S. government had something, some program or some interest in Taiwan. All of these then had to be filtered through this artificial channel. That was what I spent most of my time on, dealing with all the agencies of the U.S. government to make sure that they understood how they were to deal with Taiwan and to offer our services in helping them to do so. Some of these agencies had longstanding programs with Taiwan and somebody assigned to run them who knew the drill and they were easy. Some did not and they were difficult.

Q: Who was that?

BOCK: The exception was David Laux, who had been in the CIA and then been in the White House and been assigned to AIT. However, in '95, the White House decided that it had a new person they wanted to assign into that position who had virtually no China background and whose brief experience in the State Department as a political appointee had apparently been an unhappy one, a fellow named James Wood. There was a lot of resistance within the State Department to his appointment and it was delayed for a long time. It was finally, however, made. AIT has a formal structure - even though it's this artificial creation, it had a formal structure of a board of directors of three individuals, one of whom was the managing director and the other two were just separate directors. They formally elected a chairman of the board. When Wood was named by the State Department at the White House's insistence, the other two directors resigned in protest, publically. Belocchi as the third director was prevailed upon by the State Department to stay on so there wouldn't be a zero board with only this one new person coming in. He was not happy about it, but he was a good soldier and did that. But then there was a struggle to find new directors and there were a lot of things that developed in the wake of that. Wood had an agenda which was not transparent. He wasn't there just to implement U.S. Taiwan policy.

Q: I interviewed Nat Belocchi while he was still in the job. Was there concern in AIT in your office about there being an awful lot of money in the Chinese community, particularly those that are interested in Taiwan, and various connections? Was this something you knew was out there?

BOCK: Oh, yes. This had been a well known fact for years that Taiwan was considered next to Israel to be the best managed, best funded foreign lobbying operation in Washington. In fact, at one point, somebody dealing with China who was fending off all these complaints about how the U.S. was always catering to Taiwan's interests, said to this Chinese representative, "You ought to look at the way Taiwan operates. You might learn something." It was a complicated system because, first of all, they are a semi- official representation in Washington. Then there were various consulting contracts with some of the top notch lobbying firms in Washington, some of which were run through the Washington representation of Taiwan and some of which were not.

And then finally there was the whole Taiwan independence movement operation, which was quite separate but which was also increasingly well funded from various Taiwanese-American groups and was in close with a number of congressmen.

Q: You had been dealing with Chinese affairs and had covered both sides of the Straits. Were you noticing a growing problem after Tiananmen that China per se, Mainland China, was pursuing this quite authoritarian stance, still run by a communist regime, and was pretty hardline with economic changes? And then you have Taiwan, which is increasingly, particularly on your watch, was treating democratic and much more what we all hoped other countries would be. When you get this, it gets harder and harder to not have an American response of saying, "Dammit, this is a democratic society and this other one ain't."

BOCK: Yes. It was becoming much more confrontational than it had been in my previous tour in Taipei. On the one hand, there had been the clampdown after Tiananmen so that moves toward democratization of China seemed to be pretty much on hold, although there were little things that a person could point to if you were looking. Secondly, the Taiwan government under Lee Teng Hui, who had taken over in the late '80s, was becoming increasingly, although it was a nationalist KMT government, Lee Teng Hui himself took a line increasingly looking toward independence, although he was usually careful not to use that term. He was very aggressive in trying to raise Taiwan's international profile. In fact, it was during my watch there that we had a major incident where he gave a speech at Cornell University which really outraged the Chinese government. It may be worthwhile to give you a little background.

Q: Yes. This is major.

BOCK: We had had a policy as of '79 that visits to the United States by a president of Taiwan were out of bounds. We had Cabinet level visits which were all "unofficial," even including the foreign minister, although the foreign minister could never come to Washington, but he would make stopovers. Taiwan had relatively few countries around the world that recognized it officially. One concentration of those countries was, still is, in Central America and to some extent the Caribbean. So, as they tried to increase their international profile, they wanted to send their president to various places like San Salvador and Panama City, but the only way to get there was to go through the United States. So, that raised the question of stopovers. And this was an awkward one from the U.S. point of view. The Chinese, of course, said, "This is totally outrageous for any so-called 'Taiwan president' to come to the United States under any guise." Well, that wasn't the U.S. policy. The U.S. policy was a refueling stop would be okay. But we were very cautious about somebody like Lee Teng Hui in particular using a refueling stop to engage in political activities.

So, this question came up in '94 or '95 of a stopover in Hawaii on the way to some event in Central America. What was proposed was an overnight stopover because of how long a flight it is, after all, from Taipei to Central America. The proposal that went up through channels in the State Department had several options involved on the basis of how long a stopover could be and where it could be and so on. For reasons that I had never understood, at a fairly senior level, another option was added which was "refuse." That was the option which was adopted by the Secretary of State. It was communicated to Taiwan and greeted with outrage. "This has nothing to do with U.S.-Taiwan relations. You are preventing us actively from dealing with our diplomatic partners.” Well, it was an untenable position and the U.S. had to back down.

Q: Did you all get involved?

BOCK: Not really in the policymaking process, no. AIT’s role was, once the policy was set, then it was up to AIT to manage the actual stopover. So, eventually, the State Department backed down and said, “Okay, but only a refueling stop. No overnight.” Nat Belocchi was sent out to Honolulu to handle this. The story is that when Lee Teng Hui got to Hickam Air Force Base, he refused to get off the plane as a sign of his great displeasure with the way this had been handled. The plane was refueled and was sent on. That was not the plan. The plan was, there was a VIP room set up and he was to get out there and have an hour or an hour and a half stopover. He refused to get off the plane. The Taiwan people leaked the story that the U.S. refused to let him off the plane. It was only after a while that that was sorted out. This raised a lot of anger in Congress among friends of Taiwan.

That was the background, then, for the next thing, which was a request by Lee Teng Hui to accept an invitation by his old alma mater, Cornell University, to receive an honorary degree. The State Department’s position was that this would be a big breach of our policy. Stopovers were one thing, but an actual visit, even though it wasn’t the president coming to Washington, was going to be seen as a real change in our policy and also was going to be real troublesome because it would allow all sorts of demonstrations and meetings and so on. But the result was that Congress passed some kind of a non-binding resolution virtually unanimously saying that the State Department should grant a visa to Lee Teng Hui to go to his alma mater. So, eventually the State Department backed down. It’s my view that if we hadn’t had this Honolulu incident in the first place, which had created this whole atmosphere, the original State Department policy on Cornell could have been maintained. But maybe not. You never know. Anyway, Lee Teng Hui came to Cornell. We worked with the university authorities there to try to see that this would not be politicized, but of course he had a huge entourage of press, he had various congressmen waiting for him on a change of planes in Syracuse for private meetings, and when he got to Cornell, he gave a very political speech. Of course, the Department had been giving assurances to the Chinese that this would not be a political speech. So, it was a disaster all around.

Q: Was anybody that you know of saying, “Let’s not give these assurances. This guy is a loose cannon?”

BOCK: Not that I know of. I was one step removed from the people making the recommendations as to how we should handle it, but as far as who was talking to the Chinese embassy, that was still another step away.

Q: Were people in AIT braced for the disaster?

BOCK: Yes.

Q: So what was the fallout?

BOCK: The fallout was not in the U.S. It was a ratcheting up of confrontation across the Taiwan Strait resulting in exercises in which the Chinese fired missiles off the Taiwan coast, in which then the U.S. sent two carrier battle groups down to the Taiwan area, saying, "This is unacceptable," and things were kind of wound down after that. But there has been more of a state of confrontation between China and Taiwan since that Cornell speech than there had been previously.

Q: Was there any disquiet on the part of the people who were in AIT about the aging military potential of Taiwan to defend itself? Was there a feeling that time was not with Taiwan?

BOCK: Yes, I think that feeling's been there all along. I had mentioned earlier when talking about my period in Taipei that in the 1982 Communique between the U.S. and China, in which we agreed not to quantitatively or qualitatively increase our military assistance, that the qualitative part was a ticking time bomb... With the decision on the F16s in 1992, that removed the qualitative restriction, although we claimed it didn't. But even so, yes, there were concerns. There was a fellow in the AIT office in Rosslyn whose job was the military portfolio. He was a liaison with the Defense Department and handled all these visits by Taiwan generals coming over. With the decision on the F16s, the next problem was whether Taiwan was really in a position to absorb these properly. That was a constant concern. There were other concerns. Taiwan wanted submarines. That was a big issue. We said, "No, because it looks too much like an offensive weapon." That decision recently has been reversed. But you're right. Regardless of what decision was made on these individual issues, there was still the reality that you had an island of 20 million people facing a continental power of 1.2 or 1.3 billion with growing economic power.

Q: Did you feel by this time- (end of tape)

Did you see a change in our relations with Mainland China? Had we gotten over the Tiananmen shock of '89? Were you seeing steps towards an improvement or was there always a qualification?

BOCK: Well, I think Tiananmen certainly continued to dampen any expectation of internal democratization in China, expectations that were fairly widely held in the 1980s. But what became the issue was no longer what was going to happen internally in China, although that was always an issue. But the major issue after this missile confrontation was, has China made a new determination that it's going to seek a military solution to its problems with Taiwan? After 1979, there was a general expectation, although Beijing was always a little bit cagey, that they were prepared to be patient and would look for ways to unify Taiwan into China by peaceful means. After 1995, that was increasingly in question and still is.

Q: Did you find that the approaching absorption of Hong Kong in '97 or '98 was looked at by everybody as saying let's see how this works and this might be something for Taiwan to look at?

BOCK: There was something to that, yes. People were interested in Hong Kong and the idea that the Chinese were going to want to handle Hong Kong smoothly because they need it as an example of how peaceful integration can work. On the other hand, there was realization that the circumstances in Hong Kong and Taiwan were very different. One was a colonial outpost which had never been run democratically although in the last years Governor Patton tried to establish democracy. On the other hand was Taiwan, which was running itself increasingly as a democracy. It had been running itself for 40-50 years and had been democratic now for maybe 10 years. So, the issues involved were very, very different.

WILLARD B. DEVLIN
Chief, Consular Section
Hong Kong (1974-1976)

Willard B. Devlin was born in Massachusetts on September 30, 1934. He obtained a B.A. from Tufts University and went to Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy where he received his M.A. and completed his doctoral residence in International Relations. He served in Baghdad, Lima, Hong Kong, and Santo Domingo. He also served in the Visa Office in Washington, D.C. He retired in 1980. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on October 15, 1986.

Q: You left Lima in 1974. Then you moved to Hong Kong as chief of the consular section there. Hong Kong has always had the reputation of being sort of a fraud capital of the visa world. Did you find it quite a change regarding the visa function?

DEVLIN: No, not really, because Hong Kong's reputation as the fraud capital of the world was, to a large degree, based upon the old immigration law, where the only way for a Chinese to get in was via fraud. But with the new law...

Q: ...this would be the 1967 amendments to the immigration law.

DEVLIN: That's right. So since most of the people in Hong Kong applying for visas were not born in Hong Kong, and therefore they were not subject to the 100 limitations per year from Hong Kong. Those who were born in China had 20,000 visa numbers available. Therefore, the need for fraud was not as strong as it had been before when whatever the quota was, if there was a quota for China, it reduced the chances of the individual applicant to virtually nothing.

But fraud is a habit and a custom in China, and we had absolutely marvelous, incredible files on the Chinese. We had files which would tell us about a certain village in a province, and it would tell us everything about that village. It would tell us where the well was, and the names of the principal families. And most of these villages really concentrated on one little family group there, another family group here, so that if a Chinese came in and said that he was from such and such a village, and he said that his name was Chung, we could check that file -- and did check the file -- and find that very, very rarely, if ever, did Chung live in this village. Then we could ask him more questions about the village and more than likely, he would be unable to answer those questions.

Q: You used interpreters?

DEVLIN: We used interpreters. This was a great, great disadvantage, because Chinese, particularly Cantonese Chinese, it is not a Western language, it is not a language that the average American with a normal ability in foreign languages can pick up off the cuff. It is not a language that if you listen to it, to an interpreter and so on, in this process day in and day out, that you gradually pick up words and so on; in Chinese, you don't. So that the dependence upon interpreters was total, and this is bad.

Q: Were there any problems with interpreters?

DEVLIN: Yes, yes, there were problems with the interpreters. Very shortly after I left, one of our interpreters was fired because he -- some of the charges amongst all those against him were that in order to process the papers well, he was getting sexual favors from the women.

The same type of fraud applied not just with the visas, but the same type of fraud applied to passports.

Q: This would be Chinese who claimed American citizenship.

DEVLIN: Chinese who claimed American citizenship.

Q: Were you adequately staffed there on the visa side?

DEVLIN: The staff was very good and quite adequate. I forget how many we had, but we could very well have had 50 people.

Q: How about the officers? Would you say they were happy with their assignment there, not happy? How did they feel?

DEVLIN: Most of them focused their satisfaction or dissatisfaction on Hong Kong, as opposed to the work itself. People either loved Hong Kong or hated Hong Kong, and much of this depended upon, obviously, the individual and on the housing. The housing intrinsically was pretty good; 99% of the people lived in very nice apartments. But it was still a concrete jungle, and not everybody wants to live in an apartment. It restricts one in terms of getting out easily and so on, and the recreational facilities were not as good as lots of people would have liked. So some people found the opportunity to be in a place as culturally exciting as Hong Kong to be one of the greatest gifts in the world. Others found it to be oppressive, because they were cramped up in a little corner.

Q: Back to the flow of immigrants. What were the pressures? We're talking about the Chinese. What were the pressures on them to go to the United States?

DEVLIN: It was pressures primarily economic, and it was an incentive, primarily economic. The Chinese, as most of the applicants evidenced, had an excellent ability to work in a western society. But they could do far better in the United States than they could in Hong Kong. They could do far better in Hong Kong than in China. So that it was a matter of just moving up economically to a better life for themselves.

Q: In the period you were there, were people beginning to feel concerned, particularly the wealthy Chinese merchant class, about the mainland British claim on Hong Kong, which runs out in 1997?

DEVLIN: Yes, they were. Every year that that came closer, there was something of a decline in their willingness to reinvest in the economy, more apprehension of what would happen, a greater desire to ensure that their children would be able to get to the United States, get to England or Australia. The United States, Canada, and England were the major objectives. It was difficult to get into Australia. Clearly, a Chinese tradition was to prepare the way for their families and looking at the date of 1997 coming up meant that the time to prepare is now.

Q: I assume a fairly large number of rather wealthy people using their wealth to gain legal admittance to the United States but then would return, keeping their alien residence status.

DEVLIN: Oh, yes. Yes, this happened quite often. Quite often. As a matter of fact, some of the local employees in the consulate were in a situation like that.

Q: You left Hong Kong in 1976. You happened to be, if I recall, in Washington, and they told you instead of returning to Hong Kong, you were sent to Santo Domingo as chief of the counselor section. It's not only a change, but from a work point of view, a change for the worse, wasn't it?

DEVLIN: Well, Santo Domingo doesn't compare to Hong Kong in any sense. Santo Domingo is the place where, if you win a prize, first prize is two weeks in Santo Domingo. The booby prize is a year in Santo Domingo.

DEAN RUST

ACDA; Staff Assistant to the Director Fred Ikle
Washington, DC (1974-1976)

Mr. Rust was born and raised in Ohio, and was educated at Bowling Green University and Ohio State University. In 1970 he joined the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency in Washington, D.C. and worked with that Agency until his retirement in 2005. An expert in nuclear and conventional disarmament issues, Mr. Rust was a major participant in the US government's international treaty negotiations during five Presidential Administrations.

Q: What was the state of nuclear non proliferation in '74 when you were there. I mean what did this mean and were there any underpinnings to this?

RUST: Well, between 1945 when the United States developed nuclear weapons and through 1970, that is 25 years, five countries had become nuclear weapons states. The Soviets followed the U.S. then the British, the French and then the Chinese in '64. The nuclear non proliferation treaty was negotiated in the mid 60's. It came into force in 1970; that treaty drew a line in the sand. It was based on the assumption that proliferation would contribute to instability and increase the risk of nuclear war. It said "let's stop proliferation where we are." Under the treaty, states that didn't have weapons pledged not to get them, and to accept international inspections. Countries that had nuclear weapons (the Five) pledged not to transfer the possession of nuclear weapons to others and not to assist others in the acquisition of nuclear weapons; they also agreed to try to negotiate an end to the nuclear arms race and to reduce their own nuclear arsenals. So that is where we were when the Indians conducted a nuclear test in 1974. This test was kind of a rude awakening because people thought that by that time, i.e. after the NPT had entered into force. most countries had accepted the notion that it was not a good idea for proliferation not to go beyond the five.

Q: Was India a signatory to the NPT?

RUST: No. And the fact is that in 1970, when the treaty entered into force, not everybody embraced it initially. Fifty or sixty states joined. Many countries like the Indians said, "Hey, this is a discriminatory treaty... it allows some states to keep their weapons, but it requires others who join it to forswear their acquisition. We are not going to be party to that." Of course, the truth is many countries did join the treaty despite its discriminatory nature, while others wanted to keep the nuclear option open. The Chinese, a neighbor of India, had nuclear weapons. And of course India always followed a somewhat independent path in its foreign policy.

Q: How did we view the Chinese at that time?

RUST: The Chinese were a non-player during the negotiations. The U.S. of course had not recognized "mainland" China at this point and it wasn't even in the UN. The Chinese criticized the treaty as a condominium between the U.S. and the Soviets. The U.S. and Soviets were seen by the Chinese as two countries who were trying to deny other countries the right to get their own nuclear weapons. "The U.S. and Soviets want to rule the world." Chinese propaganda suggested that nuclear proliferation would be a positive development as it would break U.S.-Soviet hegemony. In reality, I suspect the Chinese were more cautious about proliferation after getting their own bomb in 1964. But you would never know that from their stated positions. In the long run, China joined the NPT (1991) and changed its position considerably, although it's generally accepted that Pakistan's nuclear weapons program was aided by China during the 1980's.

MARK E. MOHR
Political Officer
Hong Kong (1974-1977)

Mr. Mohr was born in New York and raised in New York and New Jersey. He was educated at the University of Rochester and Harvard University, where he studied the Chinese language. After service in Korea with the Peace Corps, he joined the Foreign Service in 1969, and served abroad in Taipei, Taichung, Hong Kong,

Tokyo, Beijing and Brisbane. In his service at the State Department in Washington, Mr. Mohr dealt primarily with Far East Affairs. After his retirement he worked at the Department of Energy on Nuclear energy matters. In 1997 he was recalled to the State Department, where he worked as Korean desk officer. Mr. Mohr was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2009.

Q: So you went to Hong Kong when?

MOHR: In the summer of 1974.

Q: And you were there until when?

MOHR: For three years, from 1974-1977. I helped report on the death of Chinese Premier Zhou Enlai, Chairman Mao's death, the end of the cultural revolution, etc. I just loved the job. We read four to six Chinese newspapers a day, from the mainland and Hong Kong, read translated transcripts of provincial Chinese radio broadcasts, and talked to fellow China-watchers at other consulates and from the media. As we had only a small liaison office in Beijing, consulate Hong Kong produced a sort of Time Magazine weekly review of events in China. For some unknown reason, it was called the Weeka, and we went to press every Wednesday. We got it out before lunchtime, and then the political section would usually go to our favorite Italian restaurant in Hong Kong for pizza. At last, I was a real China-watcher, and I loved it. I could talk about Chinese politics all day long.

Q: Let's take your classic Chinese watcher. What were you watching and how do you do it, or did you do it?

MOHR: You read. You read the newspapers; you read the transcripts of the radio broadcasts, and you figured out, or you tried to figure out, what was going on with the leadership, who was in and who was out, what were the policies they were trying to pursue in the provinces, what were their economic policies, and of course what were their attitudes toward the U.S. It was all very analytical, and there was a lot of guess work, but for someone who up to that point had never had a "real" political job at an embassy, it was great fun. I was doing internal Chinese politics, so in my last year in Hong Kong, I switched to Chinese foreign policy so I could work on issues a little bit closer to more classic foreign service work, which centered on foreign policy issues and particularly the host country's attitude toward the United States.

Q: With regard to internal politics, had you had much experience in America following politics?

MOHR: No, not really.

Q: In Hong Kong, were you able to tap into the people who were coming out of China?

MOHR: The refugees?

Q: Yes.

MOHR: The British systematically interviewed them, and gave us copies of the interviews. But China was an elite communist political regime, and the refugees for the most part were in the same boat so to speak as we were: they had to guess at what was really going on. So the refugee debriefings were not all that useful, but they were interesting nonetheless. I recall that one woman refugee from Anhwei province, when asked in 1976 about the influence of the Cultural Revolution on her village replied, "What's the Cultural Revolution?"

Q: Well in Hong Kong were there people, like those on Taiwan, who were trying to prepare to leave if they had to. Was that going on in Hong Kong too?

MOHR: No. This was the mid-1970s, and Hong Kong was a British colony. The people of Hong Kong, although they didn't like the British, felt safe enough.

Q: Did you get any feel for a change in U.S. policy toward China, with the beginning of the Carter administration?

MOHR: Carter won the election in 1976. By that time, my tour was winding down, and in any case, I don't think we were privy to any sensitive negotiations of the time.

Q: I mean we had opened up with China. Did that play any role or was...

MOHR: Not much, because even though the U.S. liaison office (USLO) had opened, it was quite small. At the time, there was only a two-person political section, and its time was taken up mostly in the care and escort of visitors, so Hong Kong remained the basic political reporting base for events in China. The Weeka continued. It was a little strange. The post hundreds of miles from the capital of China did the basic political reporting, and the post inside China did not.

Q: Well was the Gang of Four over doing its bit? What was happening?

MOHR: Mao died in September, 1976, and the Gang of Four, including Mao's wife, was arrested within one month of Mao's death. As a matter of fact, I entered China on the day the Gang of Four was arrested. Each of us in the political section was allowed one trip to visit our colleagues in USLO during our tour, and mine was scheduled for the fall of 1976. It was an interesting time to visit. There were wall-posters in all the cities celebrating the arrest of the Gang of Four. I traveled to Beijing from Hong Kong with my wife on the train. We stopped off for a day or two in Guangzhou (Canton), and then went directly to Beijing.

Q: Well after your time there, did you have any impression of how China might go after the death of Mao?

MOHR: Mao was initially replaced by Hua Guofeng, but he didn't last very long, and then Deng Xiaoping took over. Deng was certainly more pragmatic than Mao, and he knew how to develop and grow an economy. There was a misperception in the West that because we could understand (and approved of) his economic policies, that he was a moderate. This was incorrect. Politically, Deng believed in the dictatorship of the proletariat, led by the communist party. He was not a cute, cuddly little guy. He was a communist dictator. In the 1960s, there was a down-to-the-countryside movement when millions of college students were sent to the villages to “learn from the peasants.” Their academic lives were destroyed. Deng, not Mao, was behind the movement. Unlike Mao, however, Deng did believe that pragmatic economic development was important, so long as the Communist party maintained control.

Q: Did you get any feel of the central government and its rule, sort of the cadres running equivalent to the counties or not? Did the writ of Beijing run all the way to everywhere?

MOHR: No, in Hong Kong we really didn’t get a feel for how policies played out at the local level. We were mainly studying the central leadership. It was a bit odd. We were living in this British colony, and we were the supposed experts on what was going on in China, even though there was a small U.S. liaison office in Beijing. We were the experts, but it was an academic kind of expertise.

Q: Did you feel that everything was in the hands of academics? You know academics have a tendency, a very strong tendency, to have firm ideas and often diverse ideas from each other. Was this sort of academic warfare sort of playing itself out?

MOHR: We weren’t academics. Within the U.S. government (USG) in Washington, there were at times fierce disagreements on what was going on in China. Especially as the Sino-Soviet split built up, many within the USG failed to see this coming. Also, in the years leading up to the Cultural Revolution, only a very few analysts believed Mao was not in full control of China. But in the political section in Hong Kong, while I was there, there were no such disagreements. For example, there was a political campaign in China starting in about 1973 that began as the anti-Lin Biao campaign. Let me explain here that Lin Biao was a very famous Chinese general, hand-picked by Mao to replace him. Lin reportedly betrayed Mao, was discovered, and was fleeing China to the Soviet Union, when his plane crashed and he died. Anyway, this anti-Lin Biao campaign soon morphed into an anti-Lin Biao, anti-Confucius campaign. We in Hong Kong reported that the anti-Lin Biao campaign had been an attempt by the conservatives within the Chinese government and party to attack the radicals, led by the Gang of Four. The Gang of Four tried to turn the tables, and began their own anti-Confucius campaign, with Confucius being the fairly obvious stand-in for then Premier Zhou Enlai. So it was a real battle, played out with a war of words daily in the media, between the Gang of Four’s faction and Zhou En-lai’s faction.

Ironically, Henry Kissinger, who then I believe was head of the National Security Council (NSC), was concerned that Zhou might be in political trouble, so he actually contacted Zhou and asked him. Of course Zhou replied that he wasn’t being attacked, so Kissinger decided that our reporting to the contrary was all wrong. It didn’t occur to Kissinger that Zhou was not admitting the truth. By this time, it was 1975. As Zhou Enlai remained in power, Kissinger and his people felt vindicated that our reporting was seriously misguided. As a matter of fact, one of Kissinger’s senior aides in the State Department received a “courageous” reporting award for writing memos to him that Hong Kong’s reporting was wrong and Zhou Enlai was not in any political trouble. It was only after Zhou died in early 1976, and following the purge of the Gang of Four that fall, that the Chinese media let loose with a torrent of reporting stating the evil Gang of Four and its followers had continuously attacked “beloved” leader Zhou Enlai during the anti-Confucius campaign. So history proved us right, but it was too late for us to receive any awards. At the time, all we received was criticism. But fortunately, there was no Senator McCarthy around, so no one really suffered. All that happened was that we didn't get promoted.

Another interesting reporting "moment," I believe this was in 1975, occurred when the West German prime minister visited China. In a meeting with Mao Zedong, it was reported in the Chinese media that Mao said, when talking about Deng Xiaoping, that Deng "didn't listen to him anymore." Now I recalled that when Deng Xiaoping had been purged during the Cultural Revolution, Chinese documents had claimed that one of the reasons for Deng's purge had been that he was arrogant, and didn't listen to Mao anymore. I thought that Mao telling a foreigner that Deng wasn't listening to him was very significant. So I wrote up a report stating that this indicated Deng was in political trouble. The problem was that there was no previous indication that Deng was in any political trouble whatsoever. So the political counselor, Don Anderson, who was my boss, said he did not want to send the cable. I rewrote it, and made it much more conditional. I said although this was merely a straw in the wind, it might be important, and we were reporting it so that the Washington China community might factor this one tidbit into its analysis. As I was about to depart for home leave, Don said the cable looked OK and he would send it.

When I returned from home leave, I was surprised to learn that Don did not send the cable. He said upon reflection, it was just too "iffy," and did not merit a report. A few months later, Deng Xiaoping was purged, and all the China-watchers in the Washington community came under severe criticism. There was even a study, launched I believe by the CIA, to find out why nobody ever reported that Deng Xiaoping was in trouble. Another possible moment of glory, and it passed me by.

Q: Well were you getting the feeling of reclusive scholars?

MOHR: Well, in a way, yes.

Q: But China really wasn't throwing its weight around the world in those days was it?

MOHR: No, except for supporting Vietnam.

Q: They were also doing things in Africa. I am not quite sure what that was all about.

MOHR: China was trying to use its influence to win support in the Third World, and not having a lot of money, I think they felt a little foreign aid could go a long way in Africa. They funded some major projects, such as the Tan-Zam railroad. They were also trying to compete with the Soviets. But because of the approximately 10 years of the Cultural Revolution, 1966-1976, where they were almost totally focused on internal problems, their foreign policy and influence abroad was fairly limited.

Q: Were you a source for say the Japanese or the French or other people coming around and saying what is going on?

MOHR: Yes, we were. There were only a few serious China watching posts among the consulates in Hong Kong. Of course, the British has great resources, and the Japanese put a lot of effort into China watching. Other than those two countries, other diplomatic posts were not serious China watchers, and drew much of their information from us. I was surprised that the Europeans, particularly the French and the Germans, just did not seem very interested in what was going on in China.

Q: Was anybody looking at the Chinese influence in other places, such as Indonesia, Malaysia and all that.

MOHR: In our political section, we had one Vietnamese language officer, to monitor Vietnamese influence in southeast Asia. Also, since we graduated more Chinese languages officers from school than there were postings, there were slots in various political sections in Indonesia and Malaysia for Chinese language officers to follow China's influence there.

Q: Yes, I think you are right. I have talked to people who were in Burma and Malaysia. Of course we had one who was doing something in Warsaw. But that was as a translator.

MOHR: Right. But in Hong Kong, in our political section, we had about a dozen people, and one slot designated for a Vietnamese language officer. When I was there, it was a fellow named Charlie Lahiguera. He had a very interesting background. His father had been a Spanish diplomat, who, in 1937, closed the Spanish embassy in Washington when Franco took over, and then asked for, and received, political asylum. So young Charlie then became an American citizen. We liked Charlie a lot, but our work rarely intersected, and he knew very little about China.

Q: OK, so what did you feel like? You were in the Chrysanthemum club, the club for Japanese specialists, but you were a China hand. Did you feel like a fish out of water?

MOHR: Well, I wasn't in the Chrysanthemum club, composed of Japanese language officers. I was more like an observer. But I soon grew to be interested in Japan and Japanese society. So I asked my colleagues a lot of questions, and as is normal with human nature, when they realized I was interested in what they were doing, they grew to accept me as a sort of honorary member of the Chrysanthemum club. About halfway through the tour, the deputy chief of mission called me into his office and offered me the opportunity of Japanese language training. It was a great honor, but after thinking it over for several days, I declined. I thought that if I learned Japanese, when I was in China, I would feel guilty and anxious because I wasn't doing enough to keep up my Japanese, and when I was in Japan, I would be worrying about losing my Chinese language skills. So, I declined. Some foreign service officers have been able to do both, but I knew I was not one of them.

Q: What was your job at the Embassy?

MOHR: Well, my job was in the external section, to report on Japanese foreign policy in various areas, especially of course China. My other areas of responsibility included the Korean Peninsula, the Soviet Union, and the United Nations. I would go to the Gaimusho (the Japanese foreign ministry) several times a week, and usually call on the deputy director of the relevant office, because the deputy director was my equal in rank at the time. The members of the Japanese foreign ministry all spoke good English, even those for whom English was their second foreign language.

Q: What was the Japanese attitude or approach to China during this time?

MOHR: A very good question. Their basic overall attitude was a bit critical. They felt we were too carried away with China, that we were too emotional. Of course one major concern was that our preoccupation with China would translate into ignoring Japanese interests.

Q: China does this. People are falling in love with China over and over again.

MOHR: Yes, the Chinese are very good at manipulation. One example was long-time conservative columnist Joe Alsop. He was a friend of Taiwan, and a critic of China, for many decades. Then, sometime in the 1970s I believe, China invited him for a visit and he went. His column afterwards was incredible. He basically said something like, after going to China, he understood that they were communist, but underneath it all, they were still Chinese! Since they were still Chinese, they were basically good. An incredible flip-flop. The Chinese are good at this, and the Japanese are not. The Japanese spend great sums of money on public relations, invite Congressmen and their staffs to Japan, and still most Americans have a warmer feeling towards China. The Chinese have this amazing ability to beguile foreigners that very few other foreign countries have. The Japanese are particularly bad at this, and so are the Koreans.

DENNIS G. HARTER
Political Officer
Hong Kong (1974-1978)

Mr. Harter was born and raised in New Jersey and educated at Georgetown University, Seton Hall and American University. He joined the State Department in 1966 and was assigned to the CORDS program of USAID in Vietnam. He subsequently studied Chinese and served in Taiwan, Hong Kong, Guangzhou, and Hanoi, where he was Deputy Chief of Mission (1997-2001). In his Washington assignments Mr. Harter dealt primarily with East Asian matters. He also served as Director of the State Department's Press Office in Washington and as State's Representative to the Washington Council on International Trade in Seattle. Mr. Harter was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2004.

Q: You went to Hong Kong and were there from when to when?

HARTER: I went to Hong Kong in the early summer of 1974. I went there on a four year assignment, two years, home leave and two more years in Hong Kong. So, I ended up leaving Hong Kong for an US assignment in the summer of 1978.

Q: What Section were you assigned to and what were your assigned duties?

HARTER: I originally came in as the number two of three in the internal reporting unit in the Political Section – the section basically for the China watchers. The other half of the office, the external affairs unit, followed Chinese foreign policy while we tracked the Party and Government operations at the national and local levels. My boss the first year was Sherrod McCall who has been retired now for some time. I then took his job for the remainder of my tour. His counterpart in charge of the external side was Jay Taylor; he's written several books on China. Jay was replaced by Richard Hart who previously had been working at the Consulate on Refugee issues – the Chinese who were coming into the colony from the mainland, not the Vietnamese who would be the major focus for the incumbent of that position a couple years later. Since I was there for four years, there were also changes in the Political Section Office Director position as well. I started initially under Wever Gim. Wever was a Chinese American, one of the earliest Asian Americans taken into the Foreign Service. Wever's name was one of those INS (Immigration and Naturalization Service) creations. When his family arrived in the U.S. his name was pronounced in Chinese and the INS guy said, "Sounds like Wever to me!" And so his first name became Wever. After that it was Stan Brooks, who had been my office director in INR and finally Donald Anderson.

When I first got there I was working with Sherrod McCall on analysis of internal developments in China. Sherrod did national issues and I did provincial issues. My responsibility was to look at developments in all the various provinces of China. There was a third officer, Mark Mohr, who covered some of the specialized issues. He looked at political-military issues and a couple of other topics. So internal PRC affairs were covered by the three of us. There was also an Economic Section that covered mainland affairs, but it was a smaller unit, and for part of the time was directed by Lin Starbird who was on that China Task Force I referred to earlier when we were trying to determine if we could ensure the Republic of China's seat at the UN.

Sherrod was a great boss who spent a lot of time working with me to sharpen my analysis of events in China. He was also an excellent drafter and editor and he really improved my writing – so much so that when Stan Brooks became the Section Chief he noted the significant change from when I had worked for him in INR. One of Sherrod's most important contributions to my work was to get me to stop writing my reporting messages long-hand on those legal size yellow tablets. Sherrod said I had to think at the typewriter and get my material down more quickly. It took time but I became more proficient under his direction and I was soon turning out my reports much more rapidly. Of course, as you well recall, we were all using manual typewriters – only the secretaries had electric typewriters and then not all of them were so blessed. You also recall those terrible telegram forms, the green ones with the carbon copies and how hard they were to prepare and type and then correct if you made a mistake. Today's officers don't realize how difficult it was to get those messages into useable form for the communicators.

Q: Mainland China during a lot of this period falls into different things like the Great Leap Forward, etc. etc. Where in 1974 while you were looking internally was China at that point?

HARTER: The Great Leap Forward was in the mid-1950s, the big events for this period were related to the Cultural Revolution. And, I would say this four year period was probably one of the most interesting periods of the modern Chinese era. It was a time in which the fundamental changes that you now see dominating the Chinese scene were all in their gestation stage. This was the period when Zhou Enlai convinced Mao Zedong to start winding up the Cultural Revolution. Mao rehabilitated Deng Xiaoping for the first time in the decade following his purge during the Cultural Revolution. When Deng returned, he became sort of an understudy to Zhou Enlai. But, Zhou Enlai died before any such transition could take place. There was still a great deal of opposition to ending the Cultural Revolution and those who had gained their power and influence during that period did not want to relinquish it. This group was led by the so-called “Gang of Four” – Chairman Mao’s wife and three other three key party cadres from Shanghai who tried to push the whole revolution leftward again. They successfully conducted a criticism campaign against Deng Xiaoping and he was purged for the second time for his rightist tendencies. However, before the leftists could consolidate this triumph, Mao Zedong died. Although Mao had selected a personal successor to lead the Communist Party neither he nor the Gang of Four could really take control. Hua Guofeng, Mao’s successor, collaborated with Deng Xiaoping and other senior Party leaders to purge the Gang of Four and restore Deng to prominence. Hua was then slowly eased out of the Party Chairmanship and he was replaced by a Deng ally, Hu Yaobang. Before the Cultural Revolution, Hu had been head of the Party’s Youth League. Deng turned over running the government to a former governor of Guangdong and Sichuan by the name of Zhao Ziyang who as Premier, under Deng’s direction, led the way to transform the economic structure of the nation. During these next few years, there was a steady pressure against the forces that had taken control during the Cultural Revolution and an easing back into power of those who had been purged by the ideological leftists of that period. So a very dramatic period: Deng’s return from the Cultural Revolution purge to a government role under Zhou Enlai; Zhou’s death and the Gang of Four’s successful manipulation of the aging Mao Zedong to force another purge of Deng; Mao’s death and the ousting of the Gang of Four coupled with Deng’s return and the successful “reversal of verdicts” against others purged in the Cultural Revolution and the simultaneous removal of the “leftists” all came about during my tour in Hong Kong as a China watcher. The economic and social experiments which Deng Xiaoping undertook to open up China to the outside world, particularly on the economic side, then led to the creation of the special economic zones and a recognition that it was important to be a part of the world economy.

Because Sherrod McCall left at the end of the summer of 1975, I became the head of the internal unit at a most interesting time. At that point, my job shifted to cover national politics and I re-divided the portfolios for the other two officers in the internal affairs unit, Mark Mohr and Rick Bock, so they shared provincial and topical assignments. As I said before, the US Liaison Office (USLO) officers were stationed in Beijing and they could observe the daily events reported in Beijing, but they didn’t really travel, and they didn’t have a chance to talk to Chinese officials very often. They were there, but they were not very operational in normal reporting and analysis terms.

Q: Were they able to read the wall posters?

HARTER: Yes, they could get out and do that, absolutely. And that was very important. They could also talk directly to personnel at other embassies who had access to Chinese officials and who also had better travel opportunities. So, I’m not saying they didn’t do significant reporting, it's just that the post was still not considered the premier China-watching post. China-watching was still considered to be Hong Kong's responsibility during this time.

Q: That became quite an art didn't it?

HARTER: Yes, it certainly was. It was a tremendous art form then – historical allegories, cartoons, satires, and of course the written word. I still have a collection of photographs that were informally taken in Beijing and Shanghai and a few other provincial cities depicting wall posters and people reading them. This included the period when Deng was purged by the Gang of Four and then the posters when they ended up purging Jiang Qing, Mao's wife, and the other members of the Gang of Four. The caricatures of the Gang of Four were particularly lively and imaginative. Some also cover posters from the democracy movement which occurred later. This was a period of tremendous change and upheaval. And you knew what was being written at the universities and on the streets was being read, and read probably by people at very high levels. It was difficult to do analysis of developments in China but we regularly received commendations for our analytical work from the East Asia Bureau, from the Secretary and other people in Washington. So we had a pretty good audience for our reporting.

Q: Let's talk about - first just to finish up. Would you explain what the wall poster movement was? What generated that?

HARTER: The wall posters originally were part of the mass campaigns directed by the Party. They had been used in the past and in the '50s and '60s to purge those already discredited by the Party authorities and to develop mass support for the campaigns. In the early days, these were part of the mass campaigns organized by the Party – sloganeering for the Great Leap Forward, the anti-Soviet campaigns and of course the Cultural Revolution itself. During the Cultural Revolution you had people targeted by personal attacks and posters but they were largely part of a larger Party-run effort more than expressions of public concern or criticism. They were used during the Cultural Revolution to discredit individuals and they were used by all sides. It was only later that the posters became more of a public expression of intensity or even rebellion. That was most evident during the Democracy Wall movement and again later in the 1980s after the death of Hu Yaobang which led to the Tiananmen demonstrations in 1989. But the involvement of students and ordinary people in the poster writing campaigns of the late 1970s were clearly the start of this form of individual or group expression and the start of real criticism of the government and the party. During the seventies, the poster campaigns were designed to generate public support for the downfall of the Gang of Four. They used all sorts of caricatures of the people being criticized. Because Jiang Qing had been a 1930s movie actress and then, as Mao's wife, associated with a series of dramas, operas, ballets to commemorate the revolutionary spirit she was portrayed and written up as “the white boned demon” a traditional opera figure. Posters showed a caricature of her head on top of the body of a snake. Then written below these drawings would be the criticisms of specific actions she had taken, to purge good people, to elevate her cronies, to undermine Mao and the revolution etc. During this period, there was certainly no critique of Chairman Mao, as there would be later on, and many of the posters continued to praise his contributions while pointing out how Madame Mao had distracted him and corrupted his policies.

Q: As this was going on, we're talking about 1970 what?

HARTER: Well the whole thing started in 1974 with Deng's re-emergence and the posters and the purges of the "Gang of Four" would have been in 1978 which is when I left, summer of 1978.

Q: Was there within this a certain amount of democracy? In other words, were local people beginning to put up their own wall posters?

HARTER: Yes. There were people who did, because they felt that this was a part of a new openness and individuals were putting up posters and student units at the universities were putting up posters. During the period, particularly in the latter phases when the gang of four was purged and Deng Xiaoping came back there were discussions of political change. Deng had proposed major changes and "four modernizations" for China – agriculture, industry, science and technology, and national defense -- and at the end of 1978, Wei Jinsheng put up a poster on the Fifth Modernization, Democracy. It was posted on a wall outside of Beijing University and that became the center for this sort of expression. The location became known as Democracy Wall and activities there just grew and grew. The Chinese media made much of Deng's early post-Liberation slogans "seek truth from facts" and "it doesn't matter if a cat is black or white so long as it catches mice" and the students took these slogans as the impetus for spelling out all sorts of complaints about the Party and how the people were being treated. Unfortunately, because the party and government leaders were not ready – the government and party personnel were still largely synonymous – the Beijing University location was gradually closed down and the posters were moved to a more obscure location where to enter one had to register and the wall posters there died out by the end of 1979. There was no indication the leadership was ready for any real relaxation of control, and there was certainly no commitment to a western style of democracy. There had been a change of people at the top and a greater flexibility in how these new people wanted to deal with the rest of the world for China's economic benefit, but there was certainly no intention to move for political change. There was no plan to change anything politically. So, Deng and the others said enough is enough and they just closed it all down and arrested people and sentenced them to long terms in jail.

At this time there were a number of very well-known poster-writers, like Wei Jinsheng, who achieved great readership not only in China, but outside, because the journalists who were in China, all began to go out with their interpreters to photograph, to copy down the posters, translate them and publish them abroad. So, you had big articles coming out of the New York Times, the Washington Post, and LA Times all about these wall posters. There were appeals for democracy and freedom as well as named criticisms of some of the leaders for their politics, particularly during the Cultural Revolution. The posters in these instances served the Party well as it made it easier to eliminate leaders who had been "leftists" in the Cultural Revolution but who tried to hold on to their positions afterward.

Q: Now we move back to you in Hong Kong. How did you get your information? I mean for example, were there duplications of democracy wall in other parts in the provinces and all that?

HARTER: Yes. There were certainly some big character poster displays in most all of the provincial capitals. The campaigns for example in the major cities like Tientsin and Guangzhou not surprisingly focused more on local than national issues. In Shanghai, because it was the base for the Gang of Four, there was a lot of criticism of them in particular. As had been the case during the early Cultural Revolution when different groups struggled against one another, there were “old scores” to be settled and a lot of what we heard about in the provinces was one factional group getting back at another that had suppressed them during the Cultural Revolution. In addition, there were still quite a number of people crossing the border from China into Hong Kong. People took advantage of the unsettled political situation to flee to Hong Kong which at that time still had what they use to call the “touch-base system.” If you could cross the border, get through the New Territories on the Kowloon side and reach a certain point, I can’t remember now whether it was on Hong Kong Island or in Kowloon itself, as long as you got there you were “home free” and the British would accept you as a refugee and permit resettlement in Hong Kong.

I mentioned earlier that Dick Hart first had been the head of the Refugee Office at the Consulate General and this subsequently created a problem for him with the authorities in China. All of us knew PRC officials paid attention to us and knew what we did. Once the Liaison Office had been established in Beijing, we periodically tried to send people from the Consulate to visit Beijing and simultaneously do a little traveling in China. My boss, Sherrod McCall had gone in 1974 and the next person in line was Dick Hart. Dick’s application sat, and sat, and sat and Chinese officials never did anything about it. We’d ask the China Travel Service in Hong Kong and they’d say, “Beijing officials are still considering the request.” So, finally the Consul General decided -- its been six or seven months since our first request for his visa and we haven’t had anybody go into China -- Harter, you’re next in line, we’ll put your name in and see what happens. It was instantly approved.

When our liaison staff got the written approval, the word came back from the PRC officials; “your people at the Consulate General don’t have a ‘right’ to visit China. We agree you can visit from time to time, but we’ll decided who visits and when. And,” they said, “we know what Mr. Hart’s job responsibilities were.” The Chinese were letting it be known they were not happy that Dick had been helping mainland refugees and occasionally worked to get someone of interest out to the United States. So, I got a chance to travel to China for the first time in 1975. It was a period where things were still very controlled. It was before the death of Premier Zhou Enlai and Madam Mao’s group was still a very powerful force.

Q: But, Zhou had died?

HARTER: No, Zhou didn’t die until early the next year, 1976. So, I went in and how and where I was to travel was very structured. I asked to visit a lot of different places besides Beijing. The answer was no, no, no, no, no, except for Shanghai and Guangzhou. The only travel “concession” was to permit me to travel by train leaving Beijing all the way back to Hong Kong. But, they wouldn’t let me get off the train except in the two approved stops, Shanghai and Guangzhou, and both were approved because one generally switched trains in those locations. I wasn’t permitted to have any meetings in those cities with local officials but I did manage to stay overnight in the Peace Hotel in Shanghai before I caught the train to Guangzhou. When they put me on the train in Beijing, they put me in the soft-seat car, the soft-sleeper car which normally is for all the foreigners and high ranking officials inside China. They put me in a four-person compartment by myself and nobody else was permitted anywhere near me. On the train, there were scheduled times for meals, but the schedule they arranged for my meals was set up after everybody else had eaten. So, I didn't have any contact on the train with anybody else, with two exceptions. On the ride between Shanghai and Guangzhou, a very high-ranking military officer came in and sat in my compartment. This was a time when the People's Liberation Army (PLA) personnel didn't have identifying insignia or ranks on their uniforms. You judged a military man's rank by the quality of the cloth of his uniform and by how many pockets he had on the uniform. The man who came into my compartment had two breast pockets and two lower waist-level pockets and several pins on good material. He chatted with me for part of the time that it took to travel between Shanghai and Guangzhou. He got off at an intermediate stop and that was it, I was by myself once again.

The other time I had "contact" with Chinese on the train was a less pleasant experience. I was hungry at the time of the mid-day meal and about five or ten minutes before I was scheduled to eat I went to the dining car. Two Chinese passengers were still eating. The staff on the train made them get up and leave, because I came into the dining car. Aside from service performed by railway staff, those were my only contacts with Chinese during this entire on-the-train experience which lasted for more than 3 days.

Q: It's interesting, because when you look at our officers in the Soviet Union, sometime would get permission to travel and they had a wonderful time, because they'd be out on the train and they'd meet all sorts of people. Normally, things are controlled, but there, I mean, the people would put on pajamas and people would ask all sorts of questions, even in more difficult times.

HARTER: This was just absolutely out of the question. You just had no access whatsoever. And, as I said, at all the various train stops you could not get off the train. One of the features of the Chinese train station stops was the peddlers who would sell local snacks. About the only thing you could do was to hang out the window and look for what was being sold. Then you'd have to call out and point to somebody and order one of the local snacks just so you could try it. Now I must admit, none of these were prolonged stops so you weren't being prevented from doing a lot of wandering around or talking to people. Each stop along the way was only to let people disembark and board for the next leg of the trip. But, it was made absolutely clear, as a foreigner, you were not allowed to disembark. During this period, a number of the cities were troubled, there was fighting and unrest in the cities. Rural areas were also not excluded and many of them were still suffering from mismanagement so there were food shortages and struggles in the countryside too. As a provincial analyst, that's what I spent a lot of time looking at and describing for Washington readers. So, in a way, you could understand why the Chinese were not eager to let you off the train.

Q: How did you get your information?

HARTER: We got our information from refugees, from reporters who were in and out of China, from diplomats who actually had embassies in China and who then would come in and out of Hong Kong and the China watchers at other consulates and commissions. Before I arrived in Hong Kong, a group of China Watchers had set up a weekly luncheon meeting to review developments in China. It included a lot of the journalists, Jay and Linda Matthews, Joe Lelyveld and Fox Butterfield, Dan Sutherland, David Bonavia, Tiziano Terzani, Sydney Liu, David Chen, David Aikman, Ross Munro of the Toronto Globe as well as the local diplomats and a couple of people from the Hong Kong Government who did China watching. Because there was so much going on and so much interest in trying to learn about it, the group kept getting bigger and bigger. I think there were a dozen regulars when I started and after a year or so we were up over thirty people coming each week. That became a bit much and while I still would go some of the time, I organized a different smaller group made up of representatives of Consulates and Commissions who were most serious about the China watching work. I used similar groups with varying country memberships in later postings as a way to get a broader look at local developments. Anyway, with the smaller group we could really concentrate on important issues without just feeding information to people from consulates who didn't have any other sources or answering questions from a group of journalists. I'd then just meet with the journalists one on one to share opinions and information.

Several of these journalists wrote books about China during this period and they'd often pump us for anecdotes or stories they could use. I remember Jay Matthews, who is now the education writer for the Washington Post, included one story in his book I had related to him which I called "the Umbrella Theory of Courtship in Revolutionary China." While I was visiting Shanghai in 1975, I'd taken a walk in the rain along the Bund, which is part of the old foreign settlement area from pre-war Shanghai. This stretch along the river was filled with young couples standing and talking in the rain. All were carrying umbrellas to ward off the rain but I noticed that some had the umbrellas raised high above their heads while others were lower. Some used only one umbrella to shield the two young people and that seemed to suggest a greater degree of intimacy and affection. But I then concluded that the ones who were the most serious in their mutual affection were the ones who used two umbrellas but who had brought them to shoulder height and formed them into a sort of shell which protected them from the eyes of their neighbors or those passing by. My "umbrella theory of courtship" thus concluded that the degree of intimacy between the young couples was reflected in the heights of their umbrellas until the penultimate stage when they shared one umbrella and the final stage being the two umbrella shell formation.

Another big asset we had the Foreign Broadcast Information Service (FBIS) and its monitoring and translation of provincial radio broadcasts.

Q: FBIS.

HARTER: FBIS monitored Mainland broadcasts and we'd review daily translations to try to piece together information about political campaigns. Sometimes there would be local newspapers that had been picked up in the provinces by people from different consulates so we'd share that information as well.

Q: What about the Chinese staff, the Foreign National staff? I would imagine that these would be a prime source?

HARTER: Yes. They were also a very important. They would look at the local newspapers, the local PRC newspapers which reflected Beijing policies. We had a couple of analysts who worked on those issues. But what was most important was their institutional memory of what had been going on in China over the past twenty years.

Many of the local employees, particularly in the Consular and Admin Sections had been there for more than twenty years. The Economic Section analysts were also ones with long tenures. Our chief analyst was a good bit younger but he'd been at the Consulate long enough to know the ropes very well. His family had left the mainland when he was a small child and he'd grown up in Hong Kong but he was always fascinated by the mainland. He was one of the most knowledgeable people I've ever worked with on China affairs. His name was Vincent Lo. Later on, when it got closer to 1997, he emigrated to the U.S. with his family. We had huge subject files, biographic card files on all the various people in the Chinese leadership at all levels. We had files which tracked leadership appearances, who showed up, when and, at what event. This was used to try to determine – particularly when people did not appear where they should be – about possible purges, transfers and power shifts. The local employees would keep track of all of this and Vincent would regularly come up with reports suggesting where changes were about to occur based on this record keeping. I would direct the local employees to look at specific issues and personalities. We'd create a series of watch lists of things that one tried to keep up with. Then, you would periodically review these materials with them and look at who was appearing and what was going on. Then you'd factor in items you've read or heard about from other reporting and try to create patterns of where political activities were taking place. We had a very elaborate system for cross-checking and cataloging information.

Q: Who was the Consul General back then?

HARTER: When I arrived, it was Chuck Cross. He was the Consul General and his Deputy was Norman Getsinger. Then when Getsinger left the Deputy was Burton Levin. Tom Shoesmith was the Consul General after Chuck Cross. He later end up in the EA Front Office as the Senior Deputy Assistant Secretary covering China and then he went to Malaysia as Ambassador. In the early eighties, Burt became the Consul General and he was the one who asked me to go back to Hong Kong in 1982 to reorganize the China Reporting Section. By that time we had normalized relations with China. Hong Kong no longer had the primary responsibility for China reporting. That was Beijing's job. But, there was certainly a feeling Hong Kong had a role to play because of its unique location and resources. Even though we had an Embassy in China and we had Consulates at Guangzhou and Shanghai, those who focused on China affairs felt Hong Kong still could contribute to the reporting and analysis. But that's jumping too far ahead, it was late 1981 or early 1982 when Burt asked me to return and refocus Hong Kong's China reporting.

In the mid-1970s in Hong Kong you had the feeling you had a real audience in Washington for what you were writing. The China situation was dynamic and fluid and China had become a major Washington focus because of the Kissinger-Nixon trips which opened up a relationship with the PRC. Everyone knew it would only be a matter of time before full normalization of relations would take place. It was just a question of when. Of course in Hong Kong, we were cut off from that debate and we had no knowledge of the discussions going on back in Washington about normalization. That was certainly a distraction, particularly for those working on the external or foreign affairs side of the Political Section, because Hong Kong was not included as an addressee on any information about those types of policy discussions. But, for those of us “reading the tea leaves” and interpreting the leadership and political dynamics of China, there was a feeling your analysis was certainly being widely read and was being used in the decision-making process back in Washington.

I want to stress that our ConGen China Watcher team had a very good idea of where China was going. Vincent Lo, our chief FSN (Foreign Service National) analyst and I worked a lot on trying to project China’s next steps to reform the country. And, shortly before I left, we collaborated on a think piece about the likely direction of China’s political steps and we accurately predicted a couple of years in advance the appointment of Zhao Ziyang as Prime Minister of China. Unfortunately for Zhao, he ended up on the wrong side of Deng Xiaoping during the 1989 demonstrations in Tiananmen. And, when more conservative leaders and the military convinced Deng he should clear the square and end the student demonstration, Zhao was dismissed and put under house arrest until he died more than a decade later.

Q: When you arrived there what were the changes? What was your view of the direction of events in Mainland China? I mean, were they going to the left, was the situation in doubt? Were things going to become more friendly towards us or what?

HARTER: Well, during the time that I was there it went back and forth in very sharp swings. As I arrived, Zhou Enlai was still alive and the Chinese leadership was bringing back Deng Xiaoping so it was a swing to the right. Politically, it looked like they were going to open up a bit more, but as soon as Zhou died things went into a swing back across the center and hard to the left with the purge of Deng and the ascendancy of the Gang of Four. That lasted until Mao’s death in the fall of 1976. That immediately resulted in a bumpy shift back toward the center that kept moving further and further right with Deng’s ascendancy and the purge of the Gang of Four. Things were bumpy because nobody wanted a wholesale purge within the leadership and it took several years to remove many of those high ranking officials who had ascended as a result of the Cultural Revolution. Dumping Madame Mao and her immediate cohorts, Zhang Chunqiao, Wang Hongwen, and Yao Wenyuan, was relatively easy because they were not very popular but the others were scattered around the country in positions of influence which made it hard to get rid of them all at once. I think there was a great deal of optimism in China when Deng Xiaoping returned because he was seen to be less doctrinaire. There was no question the Communist Party was going to be in control, but it was a pragmatic control, the basic focus was results. Deng Xiaoping’s phrase “It doesn’t matter if a cat is black or white so long as it catches mice” had been used against him in the Cultural Revolution with the leftists arguing he wasn’t willing to follow Mao’s line and would be all over the place with his policies. But that “pragmatism” was what China needed, and perhaps needed most at this particular time in order to get back on its feet.

Q: Were you picking up stories, there was almost an avalanche of accounts in the 1990s that came out of China of people who were caught up in the -- HARTER: Caught up in the Cultural Revolution, that period? Yes, there certainly were lots of those first-hand accounts that we heard. In fact, though, some of the stories about the mass campaigns and the purges had come out much earlier. I can remember reading some of those early first-hand stories when I was in graduate schools in the 1960s. But, the ones with a strictly Cultural Revolution focus were indeed the ones coming out in the mid to late 1970s.

During those years, a considerable number of American and foreign journalists covering China were based in Hong Kong. They could not live very easily or very well in China and if they did live there they tended to have a harder time getting stories than those who worked on the outside and came in from time to time. Although I had good relations with most all of them, one, Eddie Wu, I considered to be a good friend; our families did a lot of things together. Eddie was the number two correspondent for the Baltimore Sun. Eddie was a Burmese Chinese and had gone from working with the U.S. Army during the Second World War and helping us in the Burma-China-India Theater up to Beijing in 1950 after the Communists took control. He bounced around working for various embassies as an interpreter/translator, I remember him saying the Dutch Embassy was one of the places he worked at that time. He got to know the ins and outs of Beijing and Chinese officialdom and then gradually moved out of China to Hong Kong where he joined up with the Baltimore Sun. The chief China Watcher for the Sun was Arnie Isaacs. Eddie and I would talk all the time. He had a lot of contacts with people from the Mainland, including people who had recently managed to get out. He worked to relocate them in Hong Kong, helped them find employment and such and got to know a lot of their personal stories as well as what was happening in a number of places around the country. Our conversations gave me the opportunity to tap into some of those stories and contacts.

Q: Were we looking towards people sharpening their daggers for when the time came? I mean, an awful lot of people were almost destroyed by their neighbors. I would think there would be an awful lot of concern about revenge.

HARTER: Well see, that was part of what we were looking at in the provincial areas when I first arrived. A lot of these fights were going on in some of the provinces as a direct carryover from the Cultural Revolution. Factions were still trying to settle scores between factories, within factories, within work units where one group had gained the ascendancy over another during the CR period but now was experiencing what the Chinese were calling a “reversal of verdicts” with those “ins” now becoming the “outs” and vice versa. Groups that had been up or down at one time or another were trying to exact vengeance against the people who had criticized them and who had pilloried them in an earlier period. This was going on quite regularly, particularly in provinces along the coast, like Zhejiang and Fujian.

Some of these places got to be pretty wide open. There were entrepreneurs developing private businesses, smuggling operations involving products going to and from Taiwan and Hong Kong, as well as the rise of groups in these cities who, if they had been in Hong Kong, would have been called gangsters. I remember writing a piece about a little town in Fujian called Shishi. Not such a little town, it probably had a hundred and fifty thousand people or thereabouts at the time. But Shishi was one of those places where they smuggled all kinds of goods from and to Taiwan. There was fighting to control markets and lucrative trade as well as the CR score still to be settled. We’d get reports from travelers who had been through and we’d review the provincial radio broadcasts as they reported on local events. We’d also occasionally see local newspapers and were able from that to piece together the violent activities that were taking place there as well as all the smuggling and profiteering. I remember writing a report about Shishi, saying about the only thing you couldn’t find there was a Nationalist (Taiwan) flag. And, I sarcastically claimed that was only because they were still trying to reproduce the design at one of the local factories. In fact, you could do just about anything in Shishi that you wanted. The local party and government leadership was corrupt and ineffective and shared in the smuggling profits and got involved in the fighting. Ordinary people were involved in all sorts of illegal trade and gangsters who had smuggled guns in from abroad were robbing banks. It was a wild little town for a couple of years before provincial authorities stepped in and toned things down. But the factional fighting itself continued for more than just a couple of years in places like Fujian and Zhejiang where there was a lot of physical clashes. Some of the very senior Cultural Revolution figures didn't lose power and influence until they died several years later. They were so well entrenched in the system it would have been too disruptive to have tried to force them out before they died.

Q: I realize this wasn't in your particular area of interest, but you were there when Vietnam fell. How did this hit you and your wife and all and then what was the general prognosis? What did this mean? Did this mean -- we had considered China and Vietnam are closest lips of teeth or something like that. How did this play from your perspective in Hong Kong?

HARTER: Well, there were several issues involved. First, there was the U.S. Government policy which said USG personnel should not complicate the evacuation process by returning to Vietnam. Second, there was the personal situation where individuals who had served in Vietnam felt they had to help former associates or family members to get out. I was one of the individuals who followed Secretary of State Kissinger's instructions and did not try to go back in as the country was collapsing. Personally, I had been in to Vietnam as a visitor just after the lunar New Year in 1975, and I was able to arrange for my wife's family to depart while I was in Hong Kong.

Not too long before the fall of the country. My wife and I went right after Tet, the 1975 lunar New Year celebration. My wife's brother had died just after the western New Year's. It was a tragic case. He was a bright young man and worked as a translator with the Americans at MACV (Military Assistance Command Vietnam). But, he got sick during the Christmas holidays. His family took him to the main hospital, a civilian hospital, not one connected to the military. When the hospital discovered he was in the military – he had an ARVN rank – the family was told he had to go the military hospital. Before anybody had even looked to see what his problem was, they had him shipped over to the military hospital. The military hospital was, as usual, inundated with people with war wounds. To the doctors there, he was just another “sick” patient and not somebody who needed a lot of immediate attention. He was shunted off to some room and he died two days later, from meningitis. If properly diagnosed, the disease could have been treated and he could have been back home or at work in a couple of weeks. He was already preparing for a post-war career and had been translating popular U.S. novels of the day into Vietnamese – he'd done a couple of Frederick Forsythe novels and some others. He left behind a wife and three kids; the oldest one a little over three. My wife and I were there in February because we couldn't go when he died a few weeks earlier.

While I was there I went in to visit with a friend of mine who worked in the Political Section at the Embassy, Lacy Wright. Lacy and I talked about the general political situation and the military confrontation. He said, “Our basic assessment is the (Vietnamese) Government is going to come under a lot of pressure in the provinces, particularly in II Corps and it's conceivable we're going to lose a provincial capitol in the highlands. But, basically the rest of the country is in good shape. The government seems to be in good shape; they've got a good forward strategy in the placement of military personnel and aside from the fact the enemy can pick a target and concentrate its forces on that target and give the government forces a hard fight, most think we'll still do alright, it won't be really bad." So, I'm guessing this was the American Embassy's official position in February. And of course by April 30th it was all over and Hanoi's forces had overrun the country down to the delta and occupied the Presidential Palace in Saigon. When we had this discussion, I nonetheless said, "If things get really bad, can you keep an eye out for my in-laws?" He said, "Sure, no problem, just tell them how to get in touch with me and I'll see they're taken care of."

In one of those unusual coincidences where everyone seems to be related, Lacy was dating someone related to my wife's family. My wife's "aunt" was Lacy Wright's girlfriend. So, where others felt they had to go back to Vietnam to try to rescue family members or to help former associates when Vietnam collapsed I did have that immediate pressure to go back in. When the II Corps highland provinces collapsed, I called Lacy on the phone and he reiterated his commitment to help them out. As the situation deteriorated in April, Lacy moved my then mother-in-law, father-in-law, sister-in-law and three kids into his house and told them to stay there until he told them it was time to go to the airport.

When Ambassador Graham Martin decided it was time to evacuate the Embassy dependents, and people associated with the U.S., it was pretty close to the end. Before that he had refused to permit a structured exodus or much planning for one because he said it would demoralize the Vietnamese if they saw us pulling out. Actually, at that point, the Vietnamese had already seen the writing on the wall and they were more than demoralized. They were panicked and were looking for every possible way out of the country before the Hanoi troops reached Saigon and moved down into the delta. Lacy managed to get the family gathered at Tan Son Nhut and they were evacuated on the second Embassy evacuation flight.

I had no idea that anything had even happened until my sister-in-law called me from Clark Airbase in the Philippines and said, "We're out and we're on our way to California." That "we" included my mother-in-law, father-in-law, sister-in-law, her three kids, Lacy's girlfriend and her parents. All were evacuated under my name, just one big family sponsored by me. They were sent directly to California via the Clark refueling stop. They didn't go through any of the refugee processing centers or any of the other special arrangements which the U.S. Government was hurriedly trying to set up to deal with the influx. Our group was just dropped in California. The reason they ended up in California was because the family on Lacy's side of the group had a son studying in California. With virtually no forewarning he woke up to discover all of these other people moving in with him. He already had a wife and young baby living in a very small apartment over a garage. Now, he had four infants and another dozen people all staying in there with him. My friend from language school, John Thompson, was a big help because he had a place in California where I could relocate my more immediate family group. She also had a Vietnamese friend who worked as a stewardess for Pan Am who was based in California and she and her boyfriend who worked for the telephone company helped keep an eye on everyone until my wife and I could get back to California.

A couple of days after they arrived in California my wife and I arrived to separate the two parts of the group. I moved my wife's relatives out into the other apartment while the others remained with the son and his family. Then I visited the British Consulate in San Francisco to get visas for all of my wife's immediate family to come back and live with me in Hong Kong. It took a little bit of time because all of them were traveling on international refugee travel documents – they didn't have any real status in the U.S. INS system – and the UK wanted to make sure these people were all going to be appropriately taken care of and not become a burden for the Hong Kong Government. My wife's employment with Pan Am was a big help because we got discounted tickets to get to California and then again to bring everyone back to Hong Kong. Now, however, my family of four had grown to a family of ten in a four-bedroom apartment. It was a good size apartment, but it quickly became crowded. My wife and I and my two kids kept the two bedrooms we had been using and then moved the mother and her three children into one room and my wife's parents into the other. We lived that way for the next year, until it was time for me to return to the U.S. on home leave. My father-in-law got a job with the French Government radio station in Hong Kong, the French Version of VOA, broadcasting news and commentary about Vietnam issues to listeners throughout the region. He also did some volunteer work with some of the refugee groups in Hong Kong. His wife helped out at home and, along with our regular Filipina amah, did the cooking. My sister in law had her hands full with her three kids.

From the policy side, there was obviously a great deal of concern among our contacts of how much further the takeover of the south was going to go. I mean, obviously, not only did Vietnam fall, but the communists also took over in Laos and Cambodia in short order.

Q: We're talking about the dominos.

HARTER: All of these countries had been part of an ongoing conflict in the preceding decades both before and after the French had left in 1954. And, it was already quite clear the new regime taking over in Cambodia was in a special category all by themselves. There was no fraternal brotherhood operating here and the Khmer Rouge was already fighting with the Vietnamese Communists as they moved into the areas in the Mekong delta adjacent to Cambodia. There were a number of quite nasty cross border clashes with significant casualties. The Cambodia takeover also produced an unusual personal story. When I had been in Vietnam just after Tet in 1975, I had purchased some lacquer objects, including a lacquer table that had to be shipped to me by sea to Hong Kong. The ship it was loaded on to come to Hong Kong was the Mayaguez and it arrived just before the fall of Vietnam. On May 7, about a week after the fall of Saigon, the Mayaguez left Hong Kong on a routine voyage back toward Southeast Asia. Khmer Rouge military forces seized the ship as it passed into the Gulf of Siam. U.S. Marines were subsequently sent to try and rescue the crew and others and a number of the Marines were killed there on an island where the Mayaguez crew was being held. Later on when I was serving in Hanoi after we had normalized relations, our POW/MIA investigation teams were actually operating on that island trying to recover remains of the Americans who died there trying to liberate the Mayaguez and its crew.

In the aftermath of the Communist victories in Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia the non-Communist nations of the region were able to prevent any further southward movement of the Communist forces. The Thais, in particular, had used the Indo-China war period to strengthen their own capabilities and to build up their economic power. They prepared to defend their borders, shifted defensive forces, assembled aircraft at advance airfields, etc., as the Lao and Khmer Communists took control of the other side of the Thai border. I still believe the United States assistance to the South Vietnamese in their struggle against the North over the previous decade, made the difference for the Thais and those other nations on the Southeast Asian mainland to be strong enough to stand up to the threat of North Vietnamese forces. In the 1960s, these countries didn't have the social, economic or political cohesion, to say nothing of the military wherewithal to defend themselves against Hanoi's forces if they decided to keep moving forward. So, while those of us who had served in Vietnam were greatly disappointed at the outcome of the conflict, there was still some sense of satisfaction there was no further advance into the neighboring countries. I think some, myself included, felt a certain resentment that the political forces in the United States had undercut the southern resistance against Hanoi's invasion. We failed to fulfill the commitments we had made when our troops were removed in 1972. The U.S. political arena was in a shambles, the President was totally discredited, Congress no longer supported any of the President's policies, the American people wanted out of the war and had no desire to continue involvement even if it didn't mean the presence of American troops. Now, I don't know if Nixon's commitments were sincere, maybe they weren't. Maybe his promises were just a part of his planned way to get out of Vietnam and claim credit for ending the war. Maybe he was willing to promise anything just so we could remove our troops. Nixon's reputation for deception and double-dealing had certainly been strengthened by the Watergate revelations, so maybe the commitments to provide supplies and air power to help the Saigon Government were whole cloth from the beginning.

Having said that, I and others felt disappointed the American Government had not been involved in trying to block Hanoi's advance. I'm not sure there was any way the South Vietnamese regime would have been able to build enough public support to stand on its own even given another couple of years of ammunition and armaments. The reputation of the government was poor -- incompetence, corruption, nepotism, no real macro-economic development strategy. On the other hand, none of us had any confidence that whatever Hanoi was going to bring in from outside was going to be anything better for the people in Vietnam. I stress here bringing the regime and policies in from outside. This was no civil war. The southern communist cadre were all tools of the north and when Hanoi's forces took over the southern cadres largely were pushed aside. Historically, Vietnam had not been a unified country, even before the French operated three different zones for the country. Although some southern officials took on important roles in developing the Hanoi economic modernization effort in the late 1990s the people in control were northerners. I felt that way in the '60s and '70s and still feel that way today. I don't think there has been any evidence produced since then to contradict my feeling.

Q: In your looking, although you were looking at internal matters, were you picking up early on the enmity between Vietnam and China? I mean, I think while you were there the war took place didn't it?

HARTER: No, the border war actually didn't take place until I was back in Washington. That was in February of 1979.

DAVID G. BROWN
China Desk Officer
Washington, DC (1974-1976)

Office of the Republic of China Affairs
Washington, DC (1976-1978)

David G. Brown was born in Boston, Massachusetts in 1940. He graduated from Princeton University in 1964 entered the Foreign Service. His assignments include Taipei, Saigon, Yokohama, Tokyo, Vienna, Beijing, Oslo, and Hong Kong. Before retirement in 1996, he served as Director of the Office of Korean Affairs. Mr. Brown was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on January 28, 2003.

Q: Well, then when you in 1973 after this real immersion because there's nothing like being in a place where you really have a challenge which I would imagine that you'd felt that you'd been through the fire as far as having to deal with.

BROWN: I'd thought that I had learned the trade so to speak.

Q: So, what did you do in 1973?

BROWN: I came back to INR to work on China. I wanted a job on China and I couldn't get one on the desk so I accepted one working in INR analyzing China.

Q: You were doing that from '73 to?

BROWN: I did it for just less than a year because I found out that I really didn't like being an analyst, writing and rewriting papers and carrying classified papers to the desk. That wasn't terribly satisfying. So as soon as I could work it out I got out of that business and got on to the Japan desk. That was thanks to the help of Bill Sherman who had been my Political Counselor in Tokyo and who was then the Director of Japanese Affairs. He managed to make it possible for me to go work as an economic officer on the Japan desk for two years.

Q: That would be basically '74 to '76?

BROWN: Yes 1974 to 1976.

Q: Quickly on INR, what piece of the action did you have?

BROWN: Some of China's foreign policy. I remember one thing I did was a study on China's ability to project military power into the South China Sea and the capabilities of other military forces of countries involved in the South China Sea. What would be Vietnam's capabilities, what were the Philippines' capabilities? What else I was doing, I really can't remember. I do remember that I didn't take to it very well, which is funny right now that I'm in academia and enjoy history and analysis. At the time, writing papers, which were then rewritten by three other levels before they saw the light of day, didn't appeal to me. I just wanted to get back into the action.

Q: Well, it's really very frustrating. I know I had a short stint in INR and I took a different path where I was a consular officer. I made decisions. I liked running consular sections and you know, getting patted on the head and told yes, your paper is alright, but let me really change it and all that. Some people take to this. You're showing in one way this is why being a China hand at the time when you started was of that nature.

BROWN: Right.

Q: Were you suffering from schizophrenia, sort of personnel wise, were you a Japanese or a Chinese hand or was there such a creature as an Asian hand?

BROWN: There really wasn't. I considered myself all along a China hand. Japan was an interest I developed in addition to my interest in China. My career took me to many parts of Asia, but I always thought of myself as a China hand.

Q: Did you notice with the Japanese hands, you know, we talk about the China hand going back and forth to a few places, well, the Japanese hand has one place to go and did you find that this your exposure to both the desk and in Tokyo, did this produce somebody who was almost overly localized, too much localities in that?

BROWN: There is this danger. As I said earlier, I know some China hands who worked on China pretty much their whole career. There were some Japan hands who spent much of their career on Japan. In Japan, you said there's only one place. In fact at that time, there were more places to go as a Japan hand than as a China hand. In China, you could go to Taipei or Hong Kong and that was it, but in Japan you could go to Sapporo, or Osaka or Naha, Fukuoka or Nagoya in addition to Tokyo. A Japan hand could study the language training, go out a consulate, go back to the desk, go out to the embassy, come back to the desk, get a higher job, go back to the embassy a third time as a DCM or political counselor. There are plenty of examples of people who had that kind of very focused Japanese career and would have maybe one or two non-Japanese jobs. I was quite happy with a more diversified set of experiences.

Q: Be more fun.

BROWN: Yes.

Q: It gave you also a much broader view.

BROWN: I think so.

Q: Well, now in '76 what did you do?

BROWN: I went to the Office of the Republic of China Affairs which was the desk dealing with Taiwan and I was there for a little over two years until the fall of 1978.

Q: Well, this also was a very interesting time, wasn't it?

BROWN: There were, I would say, three interesting aspects of it. One concerned Carter and human rights. Carter created a new U.S. human rights policy, which brought some tensions between desks and the human rights bureau that was being created then. Second, we had the first confrontation with Taiwan over nuclear weapons development when I was there. The third was the lead up to normalization with China. I actually left the desk before normalization, but I was there under Dick Holbrook when my boss Harvey Feldman was very much involved in planning how we would handle the relationship with Taiwan along the lines of the Japanese model when we recognized the PRC. He handled that part of it pretty much on his own. Normalization was being managed out of the White House by Mike Oksenberg and Brezinski. Only a few officials in the Department were involved, including Harvey Feldman.

Q: Let's go to the human rights. You started in '76 so that you were on the Republic of China's desk during the end of the Ford administration. So, when the Carter administration came onboard, was there concern that they were going to upset things or not?

BROWN: There was a tension. We were in the process of doing something that hadn't really been done before which was to articulate a human rights policy with respect to Taiwan. We were dealing with a country, Taiwan, where there were very serious human rights issues. Taiwan was still a one party dictatorship. Chiang Kai-shek had just passed away. His son Chiang Ching-kuo, who had run the security services, was Premier. There was no freedom of expression on political issues. So, there were serious human rights concerns. I was fortunate enough to work for a great officer, Burt Levin. He was determined and I shared his view, that the desk were going to stay ahead of the curve and set policy for Taiwan before the human rights bureau -- I think her name was Pat Derian -- tried to cease the issue.

Q: Yes, Patt Derian.

BROWN: Burt's approach, and one I shared, was the desk would be active on this acting in a way that made sense and would yield results, rather than being driven by Pat Derian.

Q: It sounds like this was a very forward policy because so many of the desks sort of resisted the idea of well we can't do this because of such and so. In other words, rather than being proactive, they sat back and tried to be instructive.

BROWN: We didn't take that attitude. Also, the Congress was getting interested in human rights issues on Taiwan and that kept some pressure on us.

Q: This is tape three, side one with David Brown. Well, how did we see things? In the first place when you went to that desk, it must have been on everybody's mind that things were changing. I mean Chiang was dead. We recognized China.

BROWN: Recognition came later.

Q: I mean hadn't recognized, I mean we'd opened to China, which was a whole new ball game, and Taiwan was not going to be the major player anymore.

BROWN: That's right.

Q: Was there a sort of sitting around and regrouping and saying okay, where do we go from here?

BROWN: It was very clear when Holbrook came into the Department that things were going to change, that the U.S. was going to move ahead and normalize relations with the PRC. How that was going to be handled was an issue, but not whether it was going to be done. I guess there were two aspects of it from our perspective. One was how do you fit Taiwan into this? I can remember the first briefing we had with Holbrook. He had been around to the various desks and I can't remember whether we were the last or not, but we were definitely not at the high end of his list of priorities. I can remember sitting down with Burt.

Q: Burt?

BROWN: Burt Levin. Holbrook came to talk with the desk. Of course when one had a briefing with Holbrook, most of the talking was done by Holbrook. He started it off by explaining how proud he was that he had never been to Taiwan. He had never accepted a visit, had no contact, and wasn't being sucked in by the ROC lobby. I recall that the main point we wanted to get across was that if we wanted to normalize relations successfully with Beijing, we would have to take care of the relationship with Taiwan in a manner that would be acceptable to the Congress. Holbrook wasn't interested in that aspect of it.

Q: I recall around this time I was in Seoul. I was chief of the consular section there and I remember Holbrook making a visit. He came across in those days as a young hotshot who was very full of himself, which he probably still maintains, but he had been on the outside and was not really overly accepted within the establishment.

BROWN: Well, I don't know if you remember how his time at the Department started or not. Art Hummel had been DAS and was moved up to be Assistant Secretary for a period at the end of the Ford administration. Holbrook just sent a word around that Art and all of the DAS's should be out of their offices by the 20th of January. Hummel offered to brief him, but to the best of my knowledge Holbrook never met Art Hummel to talk about the transition and what the issues were. He knew what he was going to do. He was sure he was well informed. He knew the people he was going to bring in. These were professionals. Roger Sullivan I think came in as the DAS for China, but Holbrook was cleaning house, things were going to be different. I have a lot of respect for Holbrook, but in his personal relations with people, he can be either very charming if you are cooperating with him, but if you're in the way, he just pushes you aside.

Q: Yes. How did you go about? Let's deal with the first thing: human rights? It would have been an ambassador in Taiwan at that time.

BROWN: Yes, I believe it was McConaughy who was a four square supporter of the KMT. We were not out crusading, but Burt's view was that Taiwan was a society which was in the process of gradual change and that we should be trying to nudge them in the right direction. We didn't have many of the tools that we have now. For example, we didn't develop AID programs then to strengthen the Legislative Yuan. I don't recall that we changed the way the embassy operated. The embassy as I said earlier had long had an officer responsible for dealing with the opposition. We just tried to stay out ahead of the curve on the demarches to be made. We were going to write them in our office and clear them rather than let the human rights folks take the lead.

It was just at this time that the first Congressional hearing on human rights in Taiwan was held. It was Burt Levin who was asked to present the administration's testimony. I'd love to go back and find the testimony to see if it sounds today as good as I recall thinking it was at the time. We tried to lay out the history of political change in China, where we thought things were going on Taiwan and how the U.S. could work effectively in Taiwan society to bring about change. How the U.S. ought to encourage change, not just criticize mistakes, without being heavy handed. Not to threaten cutting off aid or reducing military assistance, but by pursuing subtle diplomacy.

Q: Well, did you feel that Holbrook, did he spend any time on Taiwan?

BROWN: No. He did bring Harvey Feldman into the planning on what kind of relationship the U.S. would maintain with Taiwan after normalization. Harvey worked on a variety of alternatives for a consular relationship or for establishing a liaison office. But in the end, the decision was to accept an unofficial relationship along the lines of the Japanese. The Japanese arrangements were very informal. No legislation passed by their Diet. In the U.S. system everyone recognized that you would have to have a piece of legislation to establish the future relationship and give it, what's the term I'm looking for? Legal viability in the United States. That led to the legislation that Carter put forward in the spring of 1979. What Harvey was working, with some research help from those of us on the desk, was how do you structure this. What kind of office do you have? What should it be called? How do you maintain the legality of our agreements with Taiwan so that they would stay in effect? How do you set up a procedure where you could have new agreements and keep business going? All this was being studied by Harvey. There were scholars in the United States that were doing research on these subjects and presenting proposals. We collected their materials to ensure that their expertise was available in the Department.

Q: Was Chas Freeman there or not because I've interviewed the guy.

BROWN: I don't know where Chas was at the time.

Q: Moving back to the human rights side, how did Chiang respond? I mean was there, how were things going human rights-wise?

BROWN: The most positive thing happening in this period was that Chiang Ching-kuo was opening up the KMT to young educated Taiwanese. The KMT was a party dominated by mainlanders. So this new policy was extraordinarily important thing; it had started maybe three years earlier and was just beginning to pick up some steam. So, when I said we tried to encourage things that were happening, we were patting him on the back for doing this and we were trying to get credit for him in the U.S. for moving in this direction. I can't remember just who was thrown in jail while I was on the desk. We weren't apologizing for such things, but we were trying to get people to see that there were other positive things happening as well.

Q: Were there any problems with the Taiwanese I hear they have a wonderful network in the United States, almost as powerful as the Israeli network. Did that; was that something you had to consider politically?

BROWN: Not at that time. The McCarthy era was over. Anti-communist attitudes were still strong.

Q: We'll pick that up another time. How about the intelligence operations in the United States? Was this an irritant or not?

BROWN: Not that I recall. However, later when I was working on Taiwan affairs again in the 80s, we did have problems.

Q: You mentioned there were three things you had to deal with. One was human rights. We've discussed that. What were the other two now?

