HOWARD E. SOLLENBERGER

Childhood
China (1919)

Director, Chinese Language Program
Beijing (1947-1950)

Foreign Service Institute, Chinese Language Professor
Washington, DC (1950-1955)

Howard E. Sollenberger was born in Indiana in 1917. He attended schools in China and received his bachelor's degree from Manchester College. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1997.

Q: Could you tell me a bit about your parents?

SOLLENBERGER: Yes. They were both from a rural area in southern Ohio. Grandfathers on both sides were farmers, and ministers in the local church, Church of the Brethren, which is the religious background in which I come, mixed with the Quakers and Mennonites.

Q: That's a very strong, solid background, heavily rooted in the farming area. What was it like growing up as a young lad in North Manchester?

SOLLENBERGER: Well, I didn't grow up in North Manchester. I was born there, I grew up in China. My parents were missionaries to North China.

Q: How old were you when you went out to China?

SOLLENBERGER: Two years old. I don't remember [much of those early days]. I came back to North Manchester later.

Q: What spurred your parents to go as missionaries to China?

SOLLENBERGER: I've often wondered that myself. They went to China in 1919, and in those days that was not [unlike] going to the moon.

Q: No, but damn close.

SOLLENBERGER: Damn close to it, you're right. There seemed to have been a movement at that time of American church people interested in spreading [the word] and saving the world. They were a part of that movement. According to my father, the impetus came from my mother, and he followed her rather than she followed him.

Q: Where did they go?

SOLLENBERGER: They went to north China, Shaanxi Province, Taihang mountain area which is really a rural and very poor area. My father, when they first started, spent most of his time in road construction. There was a major famine in the area at that time and, with the International Red Cross, [he] had undertaken a work for food project and my father was assigned a section of road that he was to supervise the building of for which relief food was handed out.

Q: What was your mother doing?

SOLLENBERGER: Basically raising a family. At that time I had an older sister, but both parents went out as missionaries. Part of her function was to try to contact the local women in the area, and to do something with them which ultimately would lead to their salvation.

Q: I can see coming out of Indiana, not much Chinese is spoken there. How did they prepare themselves? I assume you'd get this from stories when you were older. How did they prepare themselves and how did they communicate?

SOLLENBERGER: I've been really amazed that the organization of the church that sent missionaries overseas had the foresight to understand that language and some knowledge of the culture was important. The first year that they were in China, they went to the College of Chinese Studies in Beijing to learn the language. They were ahead of the Foreign Service in those days.

Q: Was there a Foreign Service Chinese school at that time?

SOLLENBERGER: No, not at that time. That came on later.

Q: What was it like growing up as a young lad in northern China?

SOLLENBERGER: For a long time I resented it. The expectation was that I would come back, my home was in the United States, I was an American citizen, I would go to college in the United States. And it seemed that growing up in China did not particularly prepare me for the culture shock you ran into when you came back to the United States. But there were lots of interesting things that happened.

Q: Could you talk about what you remember? Did you have Chinese friends, that sort of thing?

SOLLENBERGER: I did have Chinese friends. Being in quite a rural, mountainous area, the contact with Chinese was probably greater than for those that grew up in places like Beijing, Shanghai, Tianjin, [the major urban centers]. So, I did have that contact, and I've always been amazed at how free my parents were in letting me move around in that area. The earliest memory that I have is going with my father when he was supervising road construction. I was left behind in a room while he was out doing something, and I'd fallen asleep. When I woke up, there was a strange man with a beard, something like you have. He turned out to be a White Russian engineer that the Red Cross had hired for the purpose of road construction, a civil engineer. I, of course, was young enough at that point to not only be worried, but to start yelling for my parents. At which point he brought out a nice big red apple, which was very nice.

There were other missionary children in the area. I had contact with them. We went through the usual childhood experiences of learning how to get along with other kids, and in this case to get along in a different culture. We had Chinese servants, and from the beginning I found learning Chinese easier than my parents did. So in some circumstances, I had to be the interpreter for them.

Q: There is a long oral history of John Stewart Service who grew up in some of the same circumstances, but he was saying how his mother really kept him away from Chinese. She was worried about catching disease, so he was really not as fluent in Chinese as he later became because of this separation which often happens with both Foreign Service and missionary families. But I take it this was not so with you.

SOLLENBERGER: It was a little different in our situation. In fact, I'm surprised as I look back on this. For one thing, you could understand the nervousness of parents with little kids. I think a recent study of missionaries and their families overseas indicates that the fatality rate among missionaries is higher than with any other group of people. Largely from disease, but not entirely, because in those days as you know they didn't have all the wonder drugs, etc., that we have right now. I can remember within our small mission group a number of the people that didn't make it. And yet my parents seemed to realize that we were kids, we were in this [strange] culture, and that we ought to have some contact with it. And we did. As a matter of fact, my parents did put me for a short period of time in a traditional Chinese school, which was run by mission people. I was [put with] other Chinese kids, I was the little foreign devil, and had to defend myself on several occasions.

Q: What Chinese were you learning?

SOLLENBERGER: It was Mandarin, northern Chinese but with a Shaanxi dialect which is rather strong and well understood.

Q: In later life did you have to unlearn that dialect?

SOLLENBERGER: I've never fully unlearned it. As a matter of fact just within the last month I returned from a sentimental journey to China, which took me back to the same area where I grew up. And I had a chance to not only hear but to try to practice, and I discovered that my Chinese has become a mixture of the standard Beijing variety, but all too frequently with the tones of the Shaanxi dialect which raises some eyebrows. But when I talked with the people in Shaanxi, they thought I spoke Chinese better than they did because I spoke the higher social level [vocabulary] that obviously had been picked up while I was serving in Beijing.

Q: You got out there in 1919 and were there during the '20s. I'm not familiar with Chinese history at that point except to know that there was a lot of turmoil and warlordism. Did that impact at all on you all?

SOLLENBERGER: It did, but Shaanxi Province was then under the governorship of Yan Xishan, who was referred to frequently as a model governor. But nonetheless he was a warlord, independent, printed his own currency, collected his own taxes, built a narrow gauge railway into his capital so that these outside trains that were on a different width of track could not freely move into his province. But things were relatively under control, although Shaanxi Province has always been considered a strategic province to the defense of the capital, Beijing and the north China plain. So that on several occasions, we ran into military operations in the area that, of course, to a child were exciting.

Q: Were there any incidents of things that you recall during that time?

SOLLENBERGER: I should perhaps mention here that foreigners in China at that time had extraterritorial privileges, much like diplomatic privileges, where foreigners were basically a law to themselves. They were not subject to domestic law and control. It didn't take the kids long to realize this, and sometimes would take advantage of it. There are several things as I look back on, I'm ashamed of now, but it shows that kids will be kids wherever they are. I went to boarding school for five years, eighth grade through high school at Tongzhou, which is a suburb of Beijing now. [Editor's note: for another account of Tongzhou School, from a student who also later joined the Foreign Service, see Charles T. Cross, Born a Foreigner: A Memoir of the American Presence in Asia, Rowman and Littlefield, 1999] We would have to go back and forth from home during the summer vacation, and sometimes for Christmas. I remember one Christmas trip that we made on the train, there were several of us missionary kids, we'd purchased some of these concussion firecracker, things that you throw down on a hard surface and they explode. Being poor, although we didn't know we were poor at the time - missionary kids - we didn't have much money, we traveled third class. And in this particular incident there was an old Chinese gentleman that was stretched out on a bench across from two of us who were there, and we had these little concussion bombs. He was asleep. We also had a lot of chewing gum which apparently, as I heard the story, came to China from Wrigley's chewing gum, who when they heard about the severe famine in north China decided it would be a wonderful thing if they could get the Chinese hooked on chewing gum. At that time they were talking about 300 million [people in northern China].

Q: We still talk in the same terms. There's always those million, or whatever number, potential Chinese customers out there.

SOLLENBERGER: Well, the Chinese didn't take to chewing gum at that time, but the missionary kids got all the chewing gum their parents would let them chew. We took some of this chewing gum and stuck these concussion crackers on the soles of the old gentleman's feet while he was asleep. And you can imagine what happened when he woke up. And yet a trick like this, I'm ashamed of right now in terms of what I did and the reaction [we stimulated in the] other Chinese in the train, [because we foreign kids did] something of this sort.

On another occasion, we went through the train with punches and punched everybody's ticket ahead of the conductor and got them all mixed up for him. And yet he could do nothing about it, because we were foreign kids. So we had experiences that I'm sometimes ashamed of as I look back on it.

Q: I think we all do it. What about Chinese when you were in the school outside Beijing, were you still getting Chinese, or was this pretty much a traditional American education?

SOLLENBERGER: A traditional American education to prepare us for college. We did have a course, but it was Chinese as a foreign language. They did think that we ought to be learning about Chinese, but there were no Chinese students in the boarding school for foreigners. There were several Russian but it was basically a segregated educational experience.

Q: Did you experience, and you only realized it later, that there was almost segregation between the foreign students, the missionaries, and the Chinese in general... How did your family feel about this separation?

SOLLENBERGER: There was definitely segregation. The missionaries at that time, and to some extent this was because of the Chinese insistence on it, built little separate compounds. They built American-style structures, that's the only kind of structure they understood and knew. It was difficult, particularly for the women in these rural area to establish any sort of close relationship with [Chinese] women. Partly this was because of the role and status of women at that particular time. I remember one of the missionary women, who was there before we were, talking about the way in which she was finally able to establish contact with Chinese women. And that was through the death of one of her babies. At that point the Chinese women expressed sympathy and came to her to express this. And she often said it was through the death of one of her children that she was finally able to make contact with the Chinese women.

This was, in a sense, driven home to me later on when I was back as an adult and was able on several occasions to see the mission establishments through the Chinese eyes as something that was clearly foreign, clearly from the outside. Something that from the Chinese point of view had a lot of money behind it. Also, foreigners who had special privileges, or appeared to have special privileges in China, before whom the Chinese had to, an expression they use, is to kowtow, which means to lower your head and not look at the other person in the eyes. So we had that separation, but my father was always uneasy, mother also was always uneasy with that sort of relationship and did what they could under the circumstances, as I look back on it now, to bridge that, not only for themselves but for [us] kids.

Q: While you at boarding school were there any winds of change coming around like the Kuomintang or anything like that? Were you getting any reflections...

SOLLENBERGER: ...of what was going on in China? Oh, a good deal of that. As a matter of fact there were several occasions where there were military threats to the area. The major one being from the Japanese in 1935 as they made a feint towards north China. They didn't actually invade until '37 but large troop movements in the area, Tongzhou was considered the east gate to Beijing so there were concentrations of troops there. That created a good deal of excitement, and also created some interesting school experiences.

Q: What were they?

SOLLENBERGER: Well, the major one had to do with a group of boys, there were five of us that roomed together in the same room. With troops [arriving], we wanted to go down to the railroad station and look at this. We were under strict orders not to do so. The headmaster of the school was a Danish gentleman who believed in the old discipline of the Danish navy, he'd been in the Danish navy, and applied that liberally to the students. On this particular occasion, after being denied the privilege of going down to the railway station, we decided we'd go into the city. The gates were locked to the city at that time and we had to climb over the city wall, which we did, [we were young] and had scouted out the area well before hand. And found getting into town rather interesting under these circumstances. We did it three times. And one of the roommates had a girlfriend, she found out about it through him. The matron found out about it through the girlfriend, or through gossip in the girl's dorm, and the headmaster found out about it. The result was that, since we'd gone in three times, we had to be punished three times. His pattern was, you'd be invited into [his] interchamber, he had a drawer in the dresser, the lower drawer, and he had a variety of instruments there, bamboo canes, hair brushes, straps, and generally you were given the option of choosing the one that you wanted. But after three nights of this we began to get a little sore on the behind, took pillows to school with us to sit on, and the parents finally decided that was a little too much. The gentleman did not stay with the school. But that's school life for you.

Q: Eventually you ended up in the United States, didn't you, for schooling?

SOLLENBERGER: That's right.

Q: When was that?

SOLLENBERGER: That would have been '35.

Q: So this is in the midst of the Depression. Where did you go?

SOLLENBERGER: I went back to North Manchester. I had free tuition there. It was a church college.

Q: What was the name of the college?

SOLLENBERGER: Manchester College.

Q: You were at Manchester College from '35 to '38.

SOLLENBERGER: [Yes], at which time I dropped out. And the reason for dropping out basically was that it seemed to me that the kids in college at that time were much too focused on their own problems, and were not aware that the world was on fire. From my point of view the world was on fire. In '38 the Japanese had invaded north China and the word that I got back from north China was that [the Japanese] had [implemented a] scorched earth [policy] in much of the area where I grew up. And, of course, things had happened in north Africa and began to happen in Europe. I just felt it didn't make sense to sit in school at that particular time.

Q: You're about 21 at this time.

SOLLENBERGER: So I tried to find a way to get back to China to see what I could do to help.

Q: While you were at Manchester College what were you studying?

SOLLENBERGER: History and political science. I was fortunate in my education to be with Andrew Cordier, who was the history professor at that time. He later became the Under Secretary for the United Nations, and [acting] president of Columbia University (1969-1970), [and dean of faculty at Columbia's School of International Affairs]. I was his assistant for a couple of years.

Q: That's really amazing to find that in a small school.

SOLLENBERGER: That's right. My education was really from him, as I look back on it. I found a way to get back to China in relief work for both the Church of the Brethren and the Quakers, sort of a joint emergency project. I wanted to go back to an area that I knew, and [I made it]. I spent from the end of '38 to 1940 in emergency relief work.

Q: Were your parents still in China during this period?

SOLLENBERGER: My father was there part of the time. My mother was not, her health was such that she remained in the United States.

Q: You got back in 1938. Where did you go and can you describe how you saw the situation where you were at that time?

SOLLENBERGER: I went back to the Taihang mountain area. I went to the city where I had spent the years when I was in high school, that was the home base. The area had already been invaded once by the Japanese who had gone through in an effort to weed out, or to destroy the guerrilla base. Of particular interest in that area was the fact that this was area that was under the control, at that time, of the Eighth Route Army, the communist Eighth Route Army. It was not too long after their long march, and they had moved across into Shaanxi, and set up a military base in the Taihang mountain area, and were attempting to operate against the Japanese. The city that I'd set up base in was not destroyed by the [Japanese] scorched earth [policy]. But the villages around and all the way back up to the northern area, Yangchuan, had been pretty well wiped out. The refugees when I got there, the end of '38, were drifting back into the cities. But the problem there was an emergency problem in how to deal with their homes in the rural areas. The Eighth Route Army at that time was not engaging very often with the Japanese, they were being very selective. But they had had several significant engagements in areas not far from where we were. In one of these, [the Japanese] suffered rather severely when they were waylaid in a mountain pass by the Eighth Route Army, and they retaliated by literally destroying two county seats, two walled cities. [it was] in this area we concentrated on trying to do something with the refugees, a drop in the bucket considering the problem.

Q: How were you treated, both by the Japanese and by the Chinese communists, during this period? Here you were where the line was moving back and forth?

SOLLENBERGER: It was not only the communists. Yan Xishan was still in the province as the military warlord. He had a deputy who was in charge of southeast Shaanxi which is where we were operating. We had contact with him. We had to because he had authority over all of the magistrates in the area, and relations with him and with [him and] the local governments was very good. I mean, they saw rather quickly that there was an advantage in having some foreign assistance in dealing with the problems that they had. As it turned out the deputy governor, Bo Yibo, was really an under cover communist at the time, and at the appropriate moment in 1939 he turned over, and turned over with the provincial troops that were under his command, turned over to the communists. He was later rewarded, became, I think, Minister of Finance under the communist regime, and is now probably the oldest senior communist still living in the Beijing area. I had direct contact with him because of the work that I was doing at that time. To begin with, [we had] only minor contact with the Eighth Route Army. I did have to get permission passes from them, [but] there were no problems in getting those. They again, I guess, saw the value of [our work], and at that time they were treating the local people with kid gloves. They realized they couldn't survive in the mountains without at least the tacit approval, if not the help, of the local population. And by contrast the way in which they were treating the people at that time was so much better than the way in which the government troops were treating the people, that they pretty well got the cooperation that they were looking for.

Q: Did you run into the Japanese at all?

SOLLENBERGER: Yes. While I was out on one of my relief trips in the mountains taking care of refugees, the city where I was stationed was occupied. I eventually had to go back into the city. They were obviously not pleased, made it clear that if I was going to stay in the area, I had to stay in the city. But basically they would prefer [that] I should leave. And it eventually became clear that I should leave, so I left, but came back again through the back door, going back into free China, trekking up through the Taihang mountains from the Yellow River, back to near the city that was still under occupation by the Japanese.

At that time I had some interesting contact with the communist army. On one occasion trying to get through the Japanese lines, I ran into a group of students that were coming from [the] Beijing-Tianjin area coming back to the mountains in Shaanxi to get into a school. And the communists were running some open air schools literally on the mountain side, in the little villages. It was interesting that they gave a high priority to education. There were about 300 students of them, as the students were coming through the Japanese lines from the other side, they had alerted the Japanese somehow, and all hell broke loose. It was obvious that I couldn't go through at that particular point. But we met some of the students as they came through. Their Chinese guides had gotten scared and run off and left them. They were in a strange area and didn't know where they were at night. I knew the area and knew it fairly well, I trekked over it, had hunted there as a kid. So I started back with them and we ran into some of the Eighth Route Army people who were coming down to see what the chaos was, and they took over and took me and the students back to headquarters. It turned out to be the central headquarters of the Eighth Route Army General Peng Dehuai, who was then the commander of the Eighth Route. I spent three days at headquarters basically getting acquainted, and they getting acquainted with me and finding out what I was doing. Among other things I spent one evening playing chess with the general, Chinese chess which I had learned as a kid and since I could speak Chinese it was interesting to be able to sit down with him, doing something from his culture. As it turned out I could do almost as well as he could, and speak Chinese. Among other things I wanted to get from him his story of the Long March. How he became and why he became a communist. What his view of the world was at that particular point. It was a rare opportunity.

Q: One hears about the discipline of the Chinese communist troops. Did you find this?

SOLLENBERGER: Very much so.

Q: ...as contrasted to the government type.

SOLLENBERGER: That's right. When I came back from the back door on that trip, I had to come through an area that was under Nationalist control, where the Nationalists had placed one of their most dependable generals and military units, a pretty large one, north of the Yellow River, both to block the communists from expanding south, but also to deal with the Japanese. As it turned out, this was 1939, this was the beginning of the breakdown of the United Front that [the Nationalists and Communists] had worked out to fight the Japanese. There was, in fact, going on minor scrimmages there on a three-way front, Japanese versus communist, the Nationalist versus Japanese and communist. A very mixed up situation. I ran into that.

Q: What exactly were you doing, and where was your support coming from?

SOLLENBERGER: The support was basically in money. The supplies had to be somehow [transported into] the area. At the beginning, with money, you could buy grain millet which was the staple in that area. And you could distribute it either through work projects, or directly. And because of the emergency nature much of it had to be direct. Clothing was another problem. [During] wintertime, [when it was] cold in the mountain area, the Chinese wore padded garments. The normal commerce did not bring either cotton or clothe in. One of the things that we did was to send refugees from the mountain area into the north China plain with currency to buy both millet and cotton, and to bring it back. The cotton could be used in home industry, women knew how to spin, weave, make clothe. The arrangement there was that by issuing a certain amount of cotton, say to a woman and her daughters-in-law, whoever were about, that by turning this into clothe they would get a certain percentage of this, and the rest of it would come back to us which we would hand out to people who needed it. Part of it was a psychological thing of getting the people back into their villages, even to build lean-to for temporary shelter from the ruins that the Japanese had left. You could do that by issuing grain back then. In other words, it's not hopeless, cooperatively you could get together and do something. But again, it was so frustrating because you'd get it done and the Japanese would come through again. I spent two years, probably the most interesting, and in some respects the best two years of my life.

Q: Here you were trying to build up villages while the Japanese were trying to destroy them. I would have thought they would have taken a very dim view of what you were doing.

SOLLENBERGER: They did. That's why I left.

Q: They didn't arrest you at that point.

SOLLENBERGER: No, they didn't arrest me. Well, let's back up a little bit. There were risks involved there. We were well aware of these. In another town along the railway which was 100 miles from here, three of the missionaries of this domination, Church of the Brethren, disappeared during the Japanese occupation, and all the evidence pointed towards the Japanese. We were all aware of this, and that we had to be cautious. We wanted to be cautious also because we didn't want the Chinese that were associated with us to be punished by the Japanese. So, it became clear that I couldn't deal with the refugees in the mountains, I couldn't go back and forth in other words, or I would have been arrested. I decided to leave but to come in by the back door.

On my recent trip back to China I went to the same town, the same city, and I met with an elderly woman who after we had left, probably a couple years after we had left, both her husband, her husband's brother and a third person had been, for some reason, selected by the Japanese to be examples of what happens to people that they suspected of whatever. Whether it was being suspected of communist affiliation, or because of their contact with the foreigners. But these three people had been publicly bayoneted in a demonstration to the populous, a public demonstration of what happens. That sort of thing happened. I've also felt very guilty and I expressed my feeling about that. When I met with them this time, with some of the children, it was interesting that they said it probably would have happened anyhow, and they seemed to hold no feeling or grudge about it. In fact, we were welcomed, we were warmly welcomed by them. One thing the children wanted to know what [was the wartime] situation [like]. The old lady wouldn't talk about it, and had never told them.

Q: How did money get to you?

SOLLENBERGER: Well, two ways. One way was to take a trip out to Beijing and Tianjin and bring it back. The other way when I came in the back door, arrangements had been made to the Quakers in Shanghai to send money to Xian, to a mission group in Xian, where I picked it up and then carried it into the area.

Q: What about the other people you were working with? Were there other groups, or was this pretty much an American missionary group?

This was strictly American. My father and two other missionaries were also involved in doing relief work, but they were basically there as missionaries. I was there strictly on a relief assignment. When I came back through the back door I brought with me a young Quaker, Lewy-Whitaker, then teaching in the Peking American school and when he learned what I was doing and decided that would be more interesting and joined me. He did not make it. When we were crossing the Yellow River coming in, both of us had contracted typhus. We recovered from that and then made the effort again and I made it back up [to where I was before]. But later he, because of the weakness I guess from typhus, he got typhoid fever, and died in Chendu.

Q: How about the Catholic missionaries, and other groups?

SOLLENBERGER: Yes, there were a few that were there. But so far as I know, in the area where I was working, we were the only [foreign] group. [You know that the missionary groups] had divided up [China into exclusive] territories.

Q: By the time you came back was Kuomintang the government at that time?

SOLLENBERGER: There was a new government. In 1940 was the government and I think everybody recognized that it was the end of the Nationalist and probably Chiang Kai-shek. That they could effectively mount any sort of resistance against the Japanese on a nationwide basis. I think that's basically why when he was kidnaped in Xian.

Q: By the young marshall, Jiang Xueliang.

SOLLENBERGER: That's right. Apparently was one of his, or at least allied with him and I believe he was released and according to the information that I had, at least because of the communist insistence that he be released, and their willingness to join the United Front providing he would stop the civil war and focus on fighting Japan. At least that's the story I got from Marshal Peng Dehuai.

Q: You left in 1940, how did that come about?

SOLLENBERGER: Well, one, I wasn't well, and two, it became apparent [that] what I had been doing in that area, I could no longer do. So I'd spent two years and decided that I should come back and complete my education.

Q: How did you get back?

SOLLENBERGER: Evacuation boat at that time out of Shanghai, that took me down through Australia, New Zealand, and back home. There appeared to be enough nervousness at that point about what was happening in the Pacific, even though we were not yet at war with Japan.

Q: As you came back to the United States in 1940, were you seeing the Japanese as a very real enemy to the United States?

SOLLENBERGER: I would, very definitely.

Q: Had you by any chance run across anybody in the American Foreign Service?

SOLLENBERGER: I did when I got back to Chungking on my way out. I stopped in at the embassy. It was at that time located there, and gave them a report on what was happening up in Shaanxi with the so-called United Front. They had heard rumors of that, but had no direct reports from observers [actually in] the area.

Q: Did you get any feel from the embassy at that time, what was the interest?

SOLLENBERGER: Only in a marginal sort of way. I did get the feeling that there was some exasperation in the way in which the Chinese were, [meaning the Generalissimo], in conducting the war, and was not getting the cooperation that they had hoped. And there was interest also in whether the communist would be a reliable temporary ally in dealing with the Japanese, and what the prospects were [the KMT-CCP] getting together. I could not be very encouraging about that from what I'd seen. It wasn't going to work for reasons on both sides.

Q: Do you have any recollection of who talked to you particularly?

SOLLENBERGER: One of the people I talked to was Drummond. There were a couple of people that I talked with, but I've forgotten.

Q: Where did you go when you took this circuitous route down to Shanghai to Australia, to New Zealand, and back to the States? Where did you go?

SOLLENBERGER: You mean when I came back?

Q: Yes.

SOLLENBERGER: I came back to Manchester to see if they would reinvent me to finish my education, undergraduate education. At that point I felt rather, what's the word I'm trying to think of...rather frustrated, at the slowness of the educational process. I tried to work out a deal with my professors whereby if I could pass their final examinations, I wouldn't have to sit through all the classes, I could compress within one semester a year's work. I felt I could do it. Cordier said okay, but some of the other professors felt this would be setting a precedent that they could not live with. But I did manage to finish up [in 1941].

Q: This is a great time to be a young single man graduating from college. What happened to you?

SOLLENBERGER: Well, the draft came along, and with the background that I had with the Brethren, Mennonites, Quakers, the three historic [peace churches], my feeling at that time was that I could not participate in warfare, and this was sort of re-established by what I had observed going on as a result of war in northern Shaanxi. So I took an alternative, I complied with the draft, and was assigned to alternative service under the draft. I was four years in alternative service in projects in the United States, [Puerto Rico, and] South Africa.

Q: When you say alternative work, what did this consist of?

SOLLENBERGER: Almost anything you can think of, depending on what you could agree on as meaningful. It involved conservation work on the farms, environmental cleanup projects, it involved establishing a rural hospital in Puerto Rico. It involved working in hospital wards. And the reason for South Africa on this was that I was determined to try to get back to China to work in that situation. I was trying to join the Friends Ambulance Unit, it was a British operation, operating in China and got as far as South Africa. There were six of us at that time en route [to China] with the war [still] on. [Our route was to go around the Cape to India and up the Burma Road into China.] We got as far as South Africa and an Act of Congress turned us back and I spent about six months in South Africa.

Q: What was the Act of Congress?

SOLLENBERGER: Basically, that people not in military uniform could not go overseas. That was the result basically.

Q: What was the situation that you saw in South Africa? This would be '43 or '44. It was not an official policy.

SOLLENBERGER: [Yes, in 1943, we saw apartheid even though it wasn't an official policy.] I volunteered while I was there waiting for transportation, first to go over to China, and then coming back and had to return. I volunteered to work in a hospital basically set up for the blacks in Durban. So I had a direct experience with observing the practical [application of] apartheid.

Q: Was the hand of the British administration pretty heavy there?

SOLLENBERGER: No. It seemed to me [that one saw] the hand of the local administration in Johannesburg, [rather than policy from London].

Q: How was that? Could you have social contact with the blacks, or was this pretty much...

SOLLENBERGER: Well, I had a good deal of contact with them in the hospital, and only on one occasion did I have social contact outside. That was through a special incident, I guess. They assigned me to the emergency room, and one day a Zulu warrior came in, and his ear was almost cut off. He'd been in a fight; it was dangling down. And the European doctor who was in charge, said, take it off. And I said, isn't it possible that this could be put on? Yes, he said, it is but this is a black and minus an ear is not worth the bother, just cut it off, it's much easier that way. I said, would you mind if I tried to put it on? He said, go ahead. I very carefully stitched his ear back on. He came back several times to get it dressed, etc., and it stuck. But he then invited me to his home and his wife gave me some beads. So I had that one memorable social contact. But otherwise it was just [seeing people in] one of the wards, and a few of the Africans and some of the Asians, the Indian doctors were in the hospital.

Q: You got back when, about 1944 to the United States?

SOLLENBERGER: I left the alternative service, civilian public service, and was immediately recruited by the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration, UNRRA. They were in the process here in Washington of getting people ready to go overseas. The focus had shifted to the Far East, and China, and they somehow learned that I had a good deal of background in China in relief work, and had done some training people to do relief work. So I was recruited [and came to] Washington, College Park actually, and was in charge of training people to go to China with UNRRA, an international mixed group.

Q: When was this?

SOLLENBERGER: This was '45.

Q: So this really started you off in your career of training people.

SOLLENBERGER: That's right.

Q: What type of training were you giving?

SOLLENBERGER: It was very brief. We tried to give them a little language, enough to deal with the social situation, the courtesies. There was great pressure at that time to get people out, as soon as possible. Gave them something in the way of history, background, and culture. And then on the nature of the projects that they would likely be working in. When that was winding down another project came up, and this was again initiated by the Church of the Brethren that I'd been associated with. This was through a negotiation they had had with the Chinese as to what they might do in terms of relief work back in China because of their historic interest and background [to] understand China. And what they came up with was what turned out to be the forerunner of the Peace Corps. One of the things that was needed was to as quickly as possible return to cultivation of land that had gone out of cultivation as a result of the war. The major area was the area that had been flooded by the Yellow River when Chiang Kai-shek blew up the dikes to stop the Japanese advance. [It was successful], but it washed out several million acres of the best agriculture, [which was now overgrown] with stubble and brush. [The objective was] to as quickly as possible get [area] this back into production. The idea here was to use heavy equipment. The Chinese were not familiar at all with [mechanization], meaning sending some operators. The Brethren said, we [are a rural group and] can recruit fifty young men who can understand the operation and maintenance of heavy equipment, farm equipment. UNRRA said we could put this under the wing of UNRRA, and you can work with the Chinese counterpart of UNRRA which was SINRRA, the Chinese National Relief. And because of my background and I was being freed up at that point, UNRRA said you go out and be our liaison with this unit. I agreed and the Brethren said, you'll simultaneously be the director of the unit. I said, okay. That was another interesting year that I spent in China.

SOLLENBERGER: '46-'47.

Q: How did you get there, and where did you go?

SOLLENBERGER: We flew from California. At that time the UNRRA people had a special contract, and I guess with the cooperation of some officially associated with the military unit, and military troop transports, we flew to Shanghai, with many stops along the way. At that time I was married, and had a young son, and dependents were not allowed to go at that point, so I went alone. They came about six months later. We were stationed in Shanghai as the headquarters. From there on [we] struggle [with] the bureaucracies of UNRRA, bureaucracies of the Chinese, and the renewed civil war, trying to carry out [our] project.

Q: You got there in '46. Where was your group concentrated?

SOLLENBERGER: The headquarters was in Shanghai. We had to bring them into Shanghai, and then disburse from Shanghai. The area that we were most interested in was the Yellow River area, where we thought we could do a concentrated job, a quick job, and move out. The idea at that point was not to try to introduce mechanized farming in China. Some of the major tractor manufacturers donated 2,000 tractors to our project. They probably had in mind eventually maybe...

Q: For all those millions and millions of customers.

SOLLENBERGER: That's right. As it turned out for political reasons the Nationalist government, SINRRA, wanted to satisfy demands [for] little projects all over China. [Well], we couldn't operate without their cooperation in China, [so] basically [our] group's [efforts] had to be dispersed which was the first mistake that was made. Although we did get the major operation started in the flooded area, and we got it started in time so that when the dikes were repaired and the river was put back in its course, the area was safe to operate in. We were there with tractors and training and so forth. But by that time the civil war had resumed in the area. [Our] units that were operating in the area were sometimes captured by the communists, and sometimes by the Nationalists. In a few cases they were required to haul military equipment, and we decided because of our [neutral] position, we would pull out. We couldn't operate in a situation of that sort.

Just to jump ahead very briefly. My last trip out I went back to Xian to see the terra cotta army. While I was waiting, in the area with the visitors outside, there was a woman and her young daughter sitting there and I sat down beside them. We got into conversation. Her husband and their older son were continuing walking around the area. I was sitting down because I was tired of walking, and we got into a conversation and it turned out that she came from near this flooded area, a city that I had been in and knew about. She said, after we'd talked a little bit, "You know, my grandfather told us about these foreigners that came in with iron cows, [which is what they called the tractors], in the flooded area [to prepare the land. They were very uncertain about what this was all about, and were wondering whether this another type of Japanese invasion, or just what it was. But they were persuaded to go back," and that he, in fact, had benefitted from this tractor operation, and had gone back into the area to resume his farming. At that point, the daughter, [who was] in the third grade, came around her mother and gave me a little gift, a jade locket. I said, "I can't accept this. Why are you giving it to me?" "Because of what you did to help my grandfather."

It's interesting how some of these things come back, and under circumstances one would never expect. But I think probably the interesting thing about this project was that in a fairly direct way, it became the forerunner of the Peace Corps. Here was a group of people working under an international organization, [a] government type of organization with volunteers [working] for subsistence, [an] agreement [which] was very similar to what the Peace Corps is now. You get your subsistence and your travel, your medical, and things of this sort but basically no remuneration. So when the Peace Corps idea began to blossom, I got involved with it as a consultant.

Q: How did the young men work? What was your impression of the effect on the young men of doing this type of work?

SOLLENBERGER: Well, last December we had a reunion, the 50th year reunion. Fifteen of the group got together down in Texas and we reviewed what had happened. How it affected the lives of the people. So far as these were concerned, there was a direct relationship between the experience they had, [even though] there were many frustrations and complications, and what they chose to do later on in life, almost inclusively did service type of work in their communities. And many of them as a result of this had gone on. One of them particularly had seen the health problems and decided he wanted to be a doctor. He became a doctor. Interestingly he wanted to pursue the [holistic] approach on which he had gotten from the Chinese - their approach to medicine.

Q: So we're talking about 1947 when you had to pull out. What did you do then?

SOLLENBERGER: I was approached, I think from the consulate in Shanghai. They were looking for somebody to head up a post-war Chinese language training program for young Foreign Service officers in Beijing and would I be interested. They obviously had some knowledge about what I'd been doing in the intervening years. So I went out to take a look at it. Beijing seemed very attractive as a place. My wife at that time was with me in Shanghai. She agreed [to go to] Beijing. [During the fall] of '47, [we] went up to Beijing, [where I] directed a program for young officers specializing in Chinese.

Q: I was thinking this might be a good place to stop. We'll pick it up next time, we've got you in 1947 starting a language school up in Beijing.

This is December 17, 1997. Howard, let's start with the setting of the language school - what was it called in those days? Beijing or?

SOLLENBERGER: In 1947 we called it Peking, or in Chinese Beiping, because the Chinese capital was at Nanking. I guess before we got to the school here, I was invited to come up [late] in 1947 by Tony Freeman who was then I think he was the acting CG, Consul General, in Beijing at the time, or maybe he was the consul general. He had been a language officer, perhaps one of the better ones in terms of his facility with the language. He had been instrumental back here in Washington, as I understood it, in talking with the people at the Foreign Service Institute about setting up a field school for advance training in Chinese. Training in Chinese in the Foreign Service had been suspended during the war. [There was the pre-service group]; Tony had been a member of that. He had more or less learned on his own and did very well at it, but he had the feeling that it ought to be an organized program, particularly for adult students who came in, and in the beginning didn't know their way around at all in terms of how to approach the language, or what we saw the priorities were in terms of the different skills that were necessary.

I had an interview with Tony, and a little later when I got back to Shanghai I received an invitation to join the staff, to go down to the consul general's office in Shanghai, and be sworn in, which I did, and found myself to be a member of the Department of State, having never set foot in the Department of State up until that particular time. Not knowing who my bosses were back in Washington. I did not actually open the school. This was done by another person who didn't stay with the program, he was [there only] briefly. But there were some preliminary things that were done, taken care of before I arrived. But my responsibility, as defined to me by Tony Freeman, was to run the school, and design a program training the future Foreign Service Chinese language officer corps. I took that as a responsibility throughout my entire career.

Q: Could you give me sort of your approach? This is a very important step. Chinese is, I won't say unique, but it has ideograms and it has the language. In most other languages you kind of learn the language anyway you can get it. You did not come to the language really from the academic side, but really from personal experience.

SOLLENBERGER: Personal experience and some experience in training, but at a much lower level than was required by the Foreign Service.

Q: You and Tony Freeman, you had to have almost a philosophy and approach. I'd like you to talk about what it was.

SOLLENBERGER: Well, basically, starting off with the assumption that language is what is spoken. That's what we concentrated on during the first part of the program. There's general agreement on that. And only after you are able to comprehend what is spoken to you and are able to respond to that, we felt only at that point it would be judicious to introduce the characters. We had to decide what characters to learn out of the 50-some thousand that are available. What would be useful to the Foreign Service within the limits of the training period, to be learned within the limits of the training period, and then to gradually build up from that.

The second part of the philosophy, I think, on the training was that it needed to be job oriented. We needed to find out what these officers would likely be doing when they went into assignments as Chinese language officers. And then you begin to prepare them for that. Among other things, we found that the duties that would be required involved reading the Chinese newspapers, at least being able to scan it. You probably couldn't depend on most of them for good translations of that, but at least enough to read to find out whether it was worth turning it over to Chinese translators to be translated in full into English, or whomever needed to review it. The second part of this was documentary Chinese. Documentary styles, as you probably know, have changed and were in the process of changing from the old very formalistic styles that were used, to new formalistic styles that were being introduced and were a much more informal approach basically. And that required specialized vocabulary, and specialized phraseology to be used under appropriate circumstances.

The third thing was to act as interpreters where necessary, and to be participants in negotiations. And this required a vocabulary in economic fields, military fields, and events in the political field, and to some extent in the cultural field.

Q: Were you at that time also looking at the communist phraseology?

SOLLENBERGER: At the beginning we were not.

Q: I was just wondering in the political field there was something which one would have to deal with and what the outcome was, and they have their own special phrases.

SOLLENBERGER: As the program developed later on, and as it became clear that the communist were in the process of taking over China, that was introduced. For one thing we needed to listen to the communist radio, and to know what they were talking about which we had as part of the program. Another aspect of the philosophy was that language is really a cultural subject, and it cannot be divorced from culture or the area studies side of it. This had not been emphasized in previous training. It was something that I felt very strongly about myself. Anyone who was going to be a specialist in Chinese would likely spend a number of years either working in or on Chinese affairs needed to have a pretty good background in Chinese geography, history, culture, religions. And the question was how to get that in. We started off by renaming the school, Chinese Language and Area Studies. We gave ourselves a mandate, in other words trying to introduce this into the program.

Q: In a way you were blessed by the fact, this is 1997, we're celebrating the 50th anniversary of the Foreign Service Institute, so you didn't have an institutional bureaucracy in Washington which was just forming at that time, sitting on you, did you?

SOLLENBERGER: Not at all, in fact, I felt rather uneasy about not having met my boss back here who happened to be Henry Lee Smith.

Q: Oh, yes, "Hocksie" Lee Smith.

SOLLENBERGER: "Hocksie" Smith, the head of the language school, and with whom Tony Freeman had discussed what should be done in Beijing. So I got indirectly, from Tony, as to what the philosophy of training back here was.

Q: The traditional learning process in the United States was, you sat with a book, and you learn vocabulary. I went through this in Latin and French, Spanish. You sort of learned the vocabulary, and you read and you read and don't talk it, or very little. That was pre-war. Were you picking up the wartime experience of military teaching?

SOLLENBERGER: Very much so. And the reason for that was that Henry Lee Smith was one of the instrumental people in getting the military program going during the war, and in developing textbooks that would approach language learning from the oral side of learning. I learned a little bit from that from the texts that were used, basically military text at that time, borrowing from some of the material that the missionaries had used, and at that time there was a college of Chinese studies in Beijing, the director whom I knew well, and I was able to meet with him and borrow and use some of the materials that they had. Henry [Finn], the then director of the College of Chinese Studies. My approach was to find out what situations our people would be in, and to develop oral dialogues based on those situations, and to learn the vocabulary that was necessary for those. These ranged all the way from the very simple social meetings, to hiring a [pedi]cab, to getting a train ticket, whatever, hotel reservations, all the way from that on up to the meetings that might be anticipated with officials in the government at different levels.

Q: You had not serve in the government, so whom were you tapping into to find out what would be the sort of getting around the city.

SOLLENBERGER: I was tapping into former language officers. I had gotten a good deal of this from Tony Freeman to begin with. There were several others that were around, Edward Rice was one, at my age names slip, but there were several that we contacted, plus we formally sent messages to the embassy in Nanking and various consulates that were still open in China at that time, asking them questions about usage of officers that would be coming in and how they would be used and what their functions would be, etc. We tried to build dialogues around that. [As to] hiring Chinese staff, [we hired] some old scholars who knew the tradition of China and the classical forms of the language, and [hired] some relatively young people. Had one person who spent part time with us who was a Chinese-English major at Beijing University who spent part of his time with us. We had good help and good assistance in that.

By the time I got to Beijing to start things off, Mr. Oliver Clubb, had arrived and was the new Consul General. I remember my first meeting with him. He was very uncertain as to which direction I should go, but what relationships would be having never served in such a situation before. Mr. Clubb was very approachable and [made it clear] from the beginning that this is your job, you do it, and if you have problems come to me, otherwise I'll keep hands off. That was reassuring because Clubb was a language officer himself, and by reputation was a very precise and well organized, and very focused sort of person. But we hit it off well, had a good relationship during my stay there. The major problem that I had with Mr. Clubb, he was so organized. He was so precise in his timing, [that] he had a schedule that was really based on minutes. And part of that schedule was getting in a half hour of physical exercise early in the morning, and his preference was tennis. And I was the chosen person to get up and play tennis with him in the morning, which was good for me also.

Q: On the area studies side, what resources did you tap for that?

SOLLENBERGER: Well, first of all, required reading. So we developed, with the help of various scholars that were coming through, a reading list. Asked the Foreign Service Institute back here to provide us some funds to buy the books, or better yet, buy them and mail them out to us. At that time it was hard to get material out there. And then to draw on local resources. Beijing was a cultural center, a center of universities, Yenching University, Beida, Qinghua, so there were a number of people we could call on. People really well versed in their own fields. And then there were a number of Fulbright scholars. I shouldn't say a number, there were several Fulbright scholars who were out there studying in special fields, and we were able to invite them in and to call on them. For current affairs, current events and things of this sort, correspondents liked to come to Beijing and they would usually stop by and we were able to tap some of them.

Q: Were you at that point concerned about, what in modern terms we call political correctness? For example, thinking of the book Red Star Over China by Edgar Snow, and there were some other books on China that looked somewhat favorably, if not quite favorably, on the communist side. Was this a problem?

SOLLENBERGER: It was not a problem. What we could get our hands on we used.

Q: Were there any particular books, we're obviously talking about something 50 years ago, that were particularly good for what you wanted to know?

SOLLENBERGER: Well, for basic history at that particular point, and some cultural contact, [there was] Goodrich that we turned to. But on the geography, Pearl Buck's husband, had done a good deal of work on Chinese geography.

Q: I was wondering, you talked about correspondents, particularly in this early time. The people who come to my mind are Theodore White, Edgar Snow, and is it Agnes Smedley? And there must have been others. I mean were they involved in what you were doing?

SOLLENBERGER: Teddy White was. But Agnes Smedley, no. Edgar Snow, no. Although we had Snow's book, Red Star Over China which was there. We were paying attention to what was going on. To some extent also because my own personal experience and background in China, both with the tractor unit, which had been just before this assignment, where we had run into problems with the communists. And in trying to maintain a neutral position [for] UNRRA in the work that we were doing. So I had come into contact with them, and also because I'd had contact with some of the communist leaders in '38 and '39. So I was well aware of what was going on there, and the people that were focused on them.

Q: How did your school differ from the old Chinese Language School. I think of General Stilwell, Ridgway, and other military. But I suppose with the Foreign Service prior to that. Was there a difference?

SOLLENBERGER: Well, there was a difference and it became quite clear what the difference was. When I took over the job in Beijing there was already an army language school in operation. I've forgotten how many, but there were I guess 20 or 30 people enrolled in that school. My first question really was, why do we need two government schools? Some of the things we have in common. There are some technical things that the military people would need to learn that we don't need to pay much attention to. But there's a lot of overlap and it just seemed to me...but... I was told to stay away. They were determined to have their own and to maintain a separation. I pursued it several times while I was there with the director of the army program in terms of at least when I invited in some distinguished speaker that I could also invite his people and we tried to schedule things in such a way that we could join forces on that, and certainly not duplicate. And I had contacts that they did not have.

Q: At that point, we're talking about 1947... I'm a graduate of the Army Language School in Monterey in 1950, and frankly the way I was taught there, took Russian, hasn't really differed from both languages I've taken at the Foreign Service Institute. So you're all working out of the same well, weren't you?

SOLLENBERGER: That's right, we were.

Q: This might be a point to ask about Henry Lee Smith, because he was really the person who developed the system, wasn't he? Or at least in part.

SOLLENBERGER: He was certainly one of the king pins in developing the army language system. There were half a dozen, Milt Cowin, I've forgotten the man who did the Chinese.

Q: What was his background? What did you know about him?

SOLLENBERGER: I knew practically nothing about him until I came back to the United States. But his background was in linguistics, historical and descriptive linguistics, and his approach to language training was based on linguistic analysis, and highly focused on the oral spoken language. He was a gregarious person. Had had a radio program at one point, Where Are You From, which at one time was well known. If he couldn't guess where you came from within a certain radius, you would get a free refrigerator or something like that. In those days that was the technique that he used. This was relatively easy to do once you knew the landmarks for this.

Q: And regional accents were still regional accents, too.

SOLLENBERGER: I think the strong point for Henry Lee Smith was that he had a lot of contacts in the linguistic community, and was able to attract to the Institute a number of young promising linguists who were able to build on the system that had gone into the military training program, and to adopt and apply this to this Foreign Service. And at the same time to move ahead in really relating language to culture. In doing this, he also recruited a number of anthropologists. And we can talk about that later when we get to the Foreign Service Institute itself.

Q: We'll stick to China. In 1947 when you arrived, what was the political situation in that part of China when you first arrived?

SOLLENBERGER: The civil war was a continuing problem at that point. General George Marshall's efforts to arrive at a shared power agreement, something of that sort, did not work. And it became pretty clear that the struggle was going to continue. The communists had acquired a good deal of strength during the period of the Japanese occupation, and immediately thereafter. They were held back to some extent in Manchuria. They probably expected to get more assistance from the Soviet Union in terms of being able to take over the Japanese equipment that was left there when the Japanese surrendered. But the Russians took everything they wanted first, [and the communists got] what was left over. They also took a lot of the factory heavy equipment, industrial equipment out of Manchuria, and moved it into the Soviet Union. That probably held up the communist advance somewhat, we don't know how much, but somewhat. Even when I was there in '47, at least as I look back on it now, it was pretty clear to me and to those I was dealing with, and to Mr. Clubb, that the communists would probably at least take over north China. There was talk at that time that might be a period, maybe an extended period, of a divided China north of the Yangtze River, and south of the Yangtze River. And that Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek probably had enough strength south of the river. The frustrating problem that we were dealing with at that time was that Chiang seemed unwilling to put the resources necessary into defending Manchuria. And if Manchuria went, and we were watching to see what would happen, or if Manchuria went, it was pretty clear both in terms of the way history repeats itself and plays out, that north China would soon follow. And that's what happened.

Q: What about the students who came there? The first crew. Can you tell some of their background and as you were feeling your way around to developing this program?

SOLLENBERGER: There were several there when I arrived. One of the things I learned pretty early in the game was, we're going to get students with a wide range of backgrounds, and we'd have to accommodate that which probably meant much more individual programming in training than any sort of group training. Ralph Clough was one of the students, and he had spent some time at the...was it Yale in China?

Q: I think it was Yale in China.

SOLLENBERGER: Jerry Stricker was another one. Oscar Armstrong who had some background, having lived in China. It ranged all the way from people who had some experience, some background, and a start in the language already, to those that were complete novices that didn't have any background. One of the things that I tried to work out through correspondence with Henry Lee Smith in Washington was that we try to use the language school [in Beijing] strictly for advanced training, and that certain background could probably be provided for them back here in the States, or at universities, etc., who were using the modern system of teaching. And would come out to us only when they could really make maximum use of living and studying in the culture itself. We weren't in business long enough to get any real system going on that.

Q: Were you feeling any of the winds of what later became known as McCarthyism there? John Stewart Service is having his problems and this is mainly sourced to former Ambassador Pat Hurley who had very strong feelings. I think in diplomatic terms most of Foreign Service people would describe Hurley as a prime horse's ass. But at the same time he was politically powerful. Were you feeling any of that?

SOLLENBERGER: Not directly, no. Well aware of it, and well aware of some of the problems that the Chinese language people had gotten into on that. Particularly where there was a feeling of criticism of Chiang Kai-shek. And Theodore White, of course, had his say on that and we got his views on that. We also had the views of some of the Foreign Service people that were coming through.

Q: I realize we're really talking about a rather short time before the place fell apart, but were you able to tap into people who were coming from the United States to tell about China and the political repercussions?

SOLLENBERGER: Very little. We got a little bit of that...I used Clubb also who had arrived just about the same time that I did, in terms of what was going on back here in the State Department. I also arranged for him to have briefings with the students as a group periodically to bring them up to date on the information that he was getting through the channels that are open only to the head person there. And he was very good at that, and took an interest in the students, and I think kept them pretty well abreast of what was going on.

Q: What was the plan for housing and getting the students coming in to get absorbed into the community? How did that work?

SOLLENBERGER: We had to take the housing that was available. We took advantage of property that I guess had been acquired during the period when Beiping was the...when we had a legation there, and Sanguangao, which had been probably a part of the old Han Institute, the Chinese Board of Examiners in the old days, studying classical Chinese, bordering on that. There were some Chinese style houses that were available there, and we put our students there first and by preference, because they were a little bit separated from the consulate general, from its main compound. We held our classes there also. It was also easier in a place like that for Chinese who wanted to come in freely to come in. They weren't faced with going past someone guarding the gate so to speak. Later on when things became tense we had to move out of that area, and we moved into what had been the old marine barracks which was converted into office space. I was given space on the ground floor. The Army Language School had the top floors.

The other thing that I did was to have field trips much as you do in the schools here, you take the kids out to museums. So we organized a number of field trips that would take us out to look at things. Plus, and somewhat to my later regret, I argued and got funds to send [our students] on field trips outside of Beijing for two reasons. One, to get a little experience with dialects that were spoken in Beijing itself. The second reason for this was, and this was a personal view that I had, that the Department and our official establishments in China, were too much focused on the urban areas when the majority of the Chinese population lived outside, were rural. And that we needed to know a little bit more about what was going on in the rural countryside. And the only way to get that is to send them out. So we sent them out early on, sent them out with an instructor, so they would have a companion. Later on, go out by yourself and see if you can make your way. Some of them took some very interesting trips. Later on, after the communists took over, I was to learn that they were well aware of this, and considered that I was running a spy ring in Beijing, and that one of the evidence for that was that I was sending these people out all over China, obviously to gather information.

Q: Which, of course was what...

SOLLENBERGER: ...which is what I was doing.

Q: Well, I mean, this is what the Foreign Service does.

SOLLENBERGER: That caused me some problems later on.

Q: Before we come to that, was there any debate, concern...could you talk a bit about the thoughts you had, and Clubb and others...is it Chubb or Clubb?

SOLLENBERGER: Clubb, Oliver Edmond Clubb.

Q: ...about Mandarin versus Cantonese. I mean the languages of China.

SOLLENBERGER: There was no question at that particular point as to what we would focus on in the north. For two reasons, one, Mandarin is by far the language that is used by most of the population. At least 70-80 percent of the population could manage at that time to function in the various dialects of Mandarin. Cantonese, a different language basically related, Fukienese, a different language, but related. Hakka, a different language, but related. The minority languages, the mountain people, the Turkic people, the Tibetans, Mongols, etc., were at best 10 percent of the population, and were not of particular interest in terms of political, economic focus. So concentration, no question, was on Mandarin Chinese.

Q: Was there any problems from the fact that the majority of Chinese in the United States spoke, I believe, am I correct in saying they came from the area around Canton?

SOLLENBERGER: No. Later on, when we were pushed out of China, or left China, we did begin to focus on some of the other languages, Fukienese because of Taiwan. We never did get into Hakka. But Cantonese, yes, we wanted to train some people in both Mandarin and Cantonese, and Taiwanese. But that was later, that was at a later date.

Q: Could you describe events, and how they impacted on your operation?

SOLLENBERGER: Yes, it's hard to know where to begin. It became pretty clear, we'd move when it fell.

Q: Which is when, in '48?

SOLLENBERGER: Yes, and when Angus Ward was forced to leave, in other words he was held under less than free conditions while he was there, and was really pushed out. He came through Beijing and we had a chance to meet and talk with him. But it was pretty clear from what was happening in Manchuria, and the fact that Chiang was not willing to commit enough troops. He probably didn't have enough confidence in doing that, he was harboring his strength for events later on. But it became pretty clear at that point that we were a target, and we would probably go down. How that would happen we weren't sure. There was a pretty strong feeling, and Clubb had this, as well as the committee of the diplomats who were in Beijing, and the major countries all left people there to keep a finger in the pie, and then to report on what was going on. And Clubb would meet regularly with them. There was a committee that would meet and they were trying to coordinate their reaction to this about whether when to leave, or not to leave. There was a movement underway, and I think the British probably took the lead in this, and that was to get the city declared an open city so in the event the communist came, it would not be destroyed, [because Beiping was] important internationally as a cultural center. Important to China. I know that Club felt that in a way that was, yes, go ahead with that, but he didn't think the communists would really attack the city. His feeling, I think, was that the traditional Chinese military approach to things would be such that the communist would move in, close off the city, would isolate it, and that a deal would be made with the General defending the city, and that it would be turned over without any major attack on the city.

We began to organize ourselves, obviously in '48, for an eventuality of whatever might come. I was assigned the job of laying in stores and supplies in case we ran short of food, and if there was a siege of the city that went on for a long period of time, there might be a problem, also in charge of medical problems or services. One of the people did help with the evacuation of people that might be leaving because I could handle the Chinese language. We received information from the Department that dependents could be sent home. Among the students, most of us decided not to keep our wives there, and in one or two cases I believe, they decided they would send their families home. I decided to keep mine in Beijing. Again, feeling that the risks were probably minimal, there would be a lot of inconvenience. The personal risks would be rather minimal. And I didn't expect there would be a direct attack on the city.

The other thing was, my wife was pregnant, and we were expecting another child and we didn't want to be separated at that particular time. But the program went ahead, on schedule, without very much interruption. To the extent that we could we continued field trips in areas that were still open to us. In one particular case, without mentioning a name, one of our students who had been a former Marine, this is when we were under siege, decided he wanted to go out and see how close the communists actually were. He borrowed a Jeep from the [motor] pool, and headed off towards the east, towards the city at Tongzhou. He was advised by the Nationalists that were at the gate of Peking at that time, not to go any further. They didn't know where the communists were, but we don't have any more troops out there, it's a no-man's land. But he decided he would go anyhow, he hadn't gone very far and he saw there was nobody in the field that he could see. He decided that he better turn around and come back. He got turned around, but as he started back, there was fire from some of the farm houses on both sides directed at him and his Jeep. A couple tires were knocked out, the radiator was punctured, a bullet through the windshield. He couldn't turn the thing off, it got too hot. He came to my office, white and shaken up. He had found out where the communists were. We had those kind of discipline problems.

Q: During this time, what was the feeling towards the communists among...I mean, your personal feelings. You'd had dealings with them, but there was this situation in Mukden where Angus Ward was our Consul General and his staff were kept basically as prisoners.

SOLLENBERGER: ...they were under house arrest.

Q: Yes, and it was not an easy house arrest at all. We have a long interview with Elden Erickson, who was there as a staff, sort of like a secretary, to Angus Ward. What was the general feeling, and your feeling about almost can we do business with the communists. After all, it hadn't been that long that we'd been allied with the Soviet Union.

SOLLENBERGER: There seemed to be a general feeling...well, first of all we had a pretty realistic view of the communists just by virtue of the experience that Angus Ward had had, and from reports that we were getting pretty regularly from Chinese who had contacts through family and so on out in the areas that were controlled by the communists. I personally had had some experience in trying to get a tractor operation started in the Yellow River, and knew the problems that were involved in that. I had also, even early on in the '30s, had run into several situations that made it clear to me that the communists, on one hand, could wear silk gloves for a while, and on the other hand, could be extremely ruthless. I'd actually seen and experienced both sides of that. Clubb, himself, was really a scholar, and was really the right person there at the right time. He knew the Soviet Union, he had served in the Soviet Union, his Chinese was good, and his contacts were good. He was realistic, and knew how to deal with them. I think he hoped that we could stay on because he felt it important that we maintain contact with them, that we don't completely lose contact with the communists. He needed to know what was going on in China, and the best way for that would be to maintain some contact there, whether informal or official, dependent on how things would develop. I believe this was the general view of the other representatives from other countries in Beijing at the time also. In fact, the reason for leaving us there, it was clear that Beijing would go, was with I think, the hope that some arrangement could be worked out whereby we could maintain some relations with the [incoming communists] however informal. That was the way we proceeded. Clubb, as I recall, really based his reporting, and his approach to this on that assumption, and was led in several instances I believe to believe that it might be possible that the communists might not want to put all of their eggs in a Soviet basket. That they might be realistic enough to know that in terms of economic development, assistance and so on, that they would have to turn some place else than to the Soviet Union, that had been through a devastating war period, and who else was there, the United States. But he was a realist, and [knew] there were a lot of problems.

Q: Were you involved thinking about transferring the school, or did anyone think about transferring the school to Nanking, or southern China?

SOLLENBERGER: No.

Q: So how did this play out?

SOLLENBERGER: Well, we stayed on. The communist laid siege in the city, and on several occasions fired shells into the city, but carefully avoiding the old legation area, and carefully avoiding the Forbidden City and cultural places of that sort, which was encouraging to us. But Clubb maintained close contact with the defending General, Fe Zhouyi, and I remember he was probably under siege. He came to dinner at Clubb's house, I was present at the dinner also, was able to talk with his wife. He gave no indication at that point as to what was going to happen insofar as we were concerned, at least verbally he was going to defend the city. But it was pretty clear from other signs that that was not the case. He had already made a deal to turn the city over, in return for which he would be given a position in the new government.

The actual takeover was quiet. We were told to stay in our compounds. Several of us did try to get out on the streets a little bit to see what was going on, and were not bothered. One of our students was taking movies of the liberation parade and they confiscated his equipment and film. But initially there seemed to be no problems. The city was quiet and the staff would still come to work. We kept the school going. So the predictions that we had that they would exercise their initial control with kid gloves on seemed well founded.

Q: Were you by any chance, prior to this, had you dusted off the books about the Boxer Rebellion, and the siege of Peking?

SOLLENBERGER: Oh, yes. We were all well aware of that, and were prepared. But the turnover was really quite peaceful.

Q: Did this do anything to the curriculum of the school?

SOLLENBERGER: Yes, several things. One, it became harder for us to get people in on the area studies side. We obviously couldn't get the communists, they would not recognize us at all. More of my time was spent on helping Clubb with some of his problems. There were still a lot of Americans that were in the area, and some of them wanted to leave. There were property problems, there were all kinds of problems helping American citizens, and the students decided to stay on and see what was going to happen. The communists refused to recognize Clubb's official position. As far as they were concerned he was a foreign citizen staying on in Beijing, stay on as long as you mind your business, so to speak. But it presented a problem to him. When things came up that needed to be represented to the local authorities, which was then the communists. He did not want to sort of compromise his position by going himself, so he would use me or a couple of the students to do this for him. It became sort of a game that we played with the Alien Affairs Office, which was our contact.

We would go in with a problem, so and so wants to leave, or has a property that has been occupied, this was American property. First of all, you'd be met by a low level clerk, or officer whatever it was, who would want to know what business you had, and who you wanted to see. We don't know whom we should see, but here's the problem, can you tell us whom we should see. So we would orally tell them what the problem was. Then routinely you would say, well, this was in writing and we knew this and we had it in writing, here it is. They would look it over, oh, this is signed by Mr. Clubb, U.S. Consul General. We can't accept this, we don't recognize his position. So you'd say, you know what the problem is now. Well, would you cross off his name? I'd say, I can't do that, he's my boss and from our point of view he is the American representative here, and that's his title. So, you know what the thing is, I'll just take this letter back. Oh, no, you can't take it back, you've already given it to us. So we'll cross it off. You want to cross it off, all right, then that's still what he is. Then we'd ask is there a chance that we can see somebody and talk about this issue who has some authority. Well, we'll let you know what the outcome is. This was at least a weekly affair.

Q: Would the problems sometimes be solved?

SOLLENBERGER: Sometimes it would be. Sometimes the solution would not come back to us. It would be dealt directly to the situation or the person involved.

Q: Looking at this back from the perspective, what was the American rationale, and what was the Chinese communist rationale for this non-recognition, recognition, and all that?

SOLLENBERGER: It's hard to say what the communist rationale was. My own interpretation of this was that they were uncertain when they first came in, as to whether they wanted to keep ties open or not. They could easily have made life difficult for us as they did in the south. The fact that they didn't initially do this seemed to be a very clear indication that at least within the hierarchy of the decision makers, that they were uncertain as to which direction to go.

I think the reason why they didn't want to recognize the official position of this was that they didn't want to have direct talks, negotiations, with the foreigners at that particular point. Part of it was also they wanted to wait until their position in China was clearer. Until they had achieved military control over all major parts of the country. Then their dealing with the foreigners, the outsiders would be different than when they were only partially in control. But I think there was a delay for that reason. From our point of view there was nothing we could do about it. But there was the incident that caused us to leave.

Let me build up to that. It was clear that they were moving towards the establishment of a government as soon as they were in control of China as a whole. They would formally announce an established government and the seat would be in Beijing. This was accomplished on the first of October 1949. An interesting personal incident that was involved with this. When we established official contact with the Chinese after Nixon's visit...

SOLLENBERGER: ...and to set up liaison offices rather than formal embassies. Han Xu was sent by the Chinese government to Washington to open their liaison office. The Ambassador came later, and Han Xu himself was later appointed as Ambassador. But shortly after he arrived the word came to me from the East Asian desk that it would be nice if we could find a reason to invite him to come to the Institute to show courtesy by recognizing that he was here. So I invited him and he came with several of his staff people. We were in the building in Rosslyn [Virginia] at that point. When he came upstairs in the elevator, following the Chinese pattern I went out to the elevator to greet him. They'd had let me know that he was coming up. He strode over to me, put out his hand, and his English is fairly good, he said, "Mr. Sollenberger, I believe we've met before." I said, "That's possible. I don't know. I was in Peking in such and such a time." He said, "I was the young officer at that time that handed to you at the entrance of the U.S. Consulate General, the declaration of the establishment of the People's Republic of China." I said, "I remember, but I'm afraid I don't recognize you at that particular point."

Back in Beijing in '49, increasingly we were having difficulty as the time went on. The Chinese feeling that they could come into the compound. And this began to cause me to wonder how much longer we could keep this thing going because we needed our instructors, and up to that point they were willing to come in. They hadn't faced any personal pressure or problems. There was another incident that occurred. The gate keeper one night came to the house that I was living in, banging on the door. He said, you've got to come out to the gate, there's a platoon of the Liberation Army out there demanding entrance. I said, all right, but we'd better let Mr. Clubb know about this also. So there had to be time out. I'll go out and see what the problem is. They were out there, and there was a good deal of tension. They were demanding to come in, and I couldn't quite figure out why they wanted to come in. They were trying to explain that they thought that we had done something to the guards that had been stationed in front of the consulate compound. Of course, we'd done nothing at all of that sort. And they wanted to come in and search. Well, Clubb joined us at that particular point, and we're talking back and forth. We finally agreed that we'd let them in, but we would accompany them, not into the buildings, but to the compound. We hadn't gotten very far, following the compound wall, where we found several rifles that had been thrown over the wall. What had happened, obviously, was that their guards had gone AWOL. They thought that we had something to do with that. As a matter of fact, we did. My son, he was then four years old, had a little Jeep and he would regularly go out to the...

SOLLENBERGER: Yes, a peddle car. He would regularly go out to the gate that led into the compound, and while the guards were under strict orders not to fraternize with us, a kid was something else. He established pretty good relations with them. I used to send tea out with him, and Life magazines to look at, and he would report back...I ask him what sort of questions they asked him. Well, they wanted to know whether we beat our servants or not. And what kind of food did you eat? In other words, there were all sorts of questions about our relationship with the Chinese. Apparently they thought we were ogres of some sort. I've always credited him with causing the first defection. One of the guards that was there at this particular time this happened had the same Chinese surname, that I have. So he was "da Su," and my son was "xiao Su." They got on pretty friendly terms on the basis of it, having the same surnames.

Q: One of the ways the Chinese communist, when they first took over used were very heavy handed in Mukden, but did but later in Shanghai, and I guess elsewhere, to put pressure on us were claims that we either had caned the Chinese, or we'd mistreated the Chinese. This became sort of the lever which was used a lot. Did that hit you?

SOLLENBERGER: That hit me, yes. Towards the end, various pressure was being put on the Chinese tutoring staff from the outside. They wouldn't talk about it. They wouldn't talk much about it. But when it became clear that after the decision that we move out, made clear that we were leaving, that they had to stay and make their peace. The instructors got together accused me of withholding part of their salaries. And probably several other things having to do with the students' trips.

Q: Was this cooked up do you think, by the Chinese authorities?

SOLLENBERGER: It was cooked up. Well, it was cooked up by the Chinese authorities and it was an embarrassment to some of the instructors. They said, we know you haven't done this. You're leaving. We're going to have to stay, and going to have to face it. I had already sent the message back through Clubb, and he certainly supported it, that we ought to be very liberal in severance pay for these people. I was at that time recommending...I've forgotten whether it was six months, a half a year, severance on that service they had rendered, whatever excuse they wanted to use to do this. And the answer came back, no. It was eventually negotiated that they would get, I think, three months. In the meantime they'd taken this to the authorities and I was summoned to the People's Court to explain and fortunately the records that are kept are very detailed in matters of this sort. There was a three man arbitration panel. After laying out the evidence on this for them, and being questioned by them on a number of different things, not on the students' field trips, not on spy charges. This was strictly on the way in which we had dealt with the people we had employed. They finally told the instructors, you better take what you can get, and that settled it, and I had no trouble getting my exit permit.

Q: Which is interesting because in other cases sometimes the demands, I mean from what I've gotten from other people, the demands of the Chinese employees were one, excessive, two, not really of their own volition. The Chinese communist courts sort of backed them up in order to cause real trouble. It sounds like there wasn't an unified...

SOLLENBERGER: This is not the case where we were. We got by fairly peacefully. It was only later, as I was leaving, that a piece came out in the Chinese press that I was leaving and called me the head of spy ring.

Q: When this happened, what was the situation in China overall?

SOLLENBERGER: Well, by this time the People's Republic had been established, there was a government in Beijing. They were in effective control over most of China. In other words, there was really no major resistance.

Q: And Chiang had gone to Formosa or to Taiwan?

SOLLENBERGER: The incident that caused us to leave, maybe you have this from other sources, the incident that caused us to close down and to leave was when they announced that they were going to take over the old Marine barracks, which was part of the mission, located in the legation quarter. The American point of view, and our point of view, was that these facilities were acquired by treaty rights, and we stood by that interpretation. They said there was a difference between the old legation quarter itself and the Marine barracks, and anyway we don't recognize these treaties anymore, and we're going to come in and take it over.

Q: This is where the school was.

SOLLENBERGER: Yes, at this time. Clubb obviously was in touch with Washington back here and how do we deal with that. And we decided we would stay put as long as we could, and see if they would back down, and it became apparent the day before, and they announced that they would take over, that they were not going to back down. So everybody turned to, and vacated the old Marine barracks building. Files had already been burned, and furniture and stuff like that was hauled over to the legation compound and was stacked up out there, and they came in and occupied the premises. But we had apparently made it clear to them that if they did this, any chance of recognition, or contact, would be erased as a result of this act on their part. It was from our point of view an illegal act in opposition to our treaty rights. So from that point on we began a gradual withdrawal and that incident was the sort of thing that brought the Chinese staff into play. They were concerned about what was going to happen to them, and we were concerned about what would happen to them. We'd had enough stories about the Chinese from indirect sources about what was happening to people who had close contacts and worked for Americans.

Q: What was happening, what you were getting?

SOLLENBERGER: First of all, they would put the people through a brain washing process, and sometimes with torture, and sometimes were persuaded. There didn't seem to be a consistent pattern, and to some extent on who was in charge at a particular place at a particular time as to what the pattern would be. We had one person of the staff caught up in this, he'd gone to see about his family and had been picked up and was held for several months and ____, but came back and we got his story. We had a pretty good idea as to what might happen, and what could happen to the Chinese ____.

Q: As all this was going on, the fall of Nanking and others, did the schools continue?

SOLLENBERGER: The school continued right up until the end of the year. The schedule was disrupted somewhat from time to time, partly because some of the instructors were having difficulty in getting in. But we kept some classes going right up to the end of the year.

Q: The end of 1949.

SOLLENBERGER: That's right. Then we closed down, and it was a matter of getting ourselves organized.

Q: Let's get to how you got organized and out. How did you? Was there any problem?

SOLLENBERGER: We had to get permission to leave the city, and you had to have a physical examinations to get out. There was some concern as to whether they would use that rule to hinder us or not. Our son developed pneumonia at the time that we were supposed to leave, and had gotten permission to leave, so we wanted to extend our stay a little bit until he got over it. There was also the problem of getting your household things out. The State Department had authorized an earlier shipment of effects if we wanted to do that before the communists came in. We took advantage of that to some extent, but we still had things that we wanted to ship out. It was uncertain as to what we would have to go through, whether they would take all the stuff apart and go through it and see what we were taking out, and just how they would deal with it, departed by way of Tianjin.

One humorous incident. I had some traveler's checks and they wanted to know if I had any currency, you can't take these out, you can't take foreign currency out. Phil Manhart was then consul in Tianjin and he was there helping me get out. So I said to Phil, "You keep these and see if you can find a way to get them out to me." They saw me hand them to Phil. I didn't hear anything about these traveler's checks for a year or so, until American Express said, "Your checks have been cashed in Hong Kong." I said, "That's news to me. I've already reported that I couldn't bring them out. I had to leave them there with Phil." A couple of years later I got a letter and a check from David Barrett, an assistant military attaché, with a big apology saying that Manhart had entrusted him with bringing the checks out, but he ran into a desperate situation and had to cash them. In the meantime, so many things had happened that he had sort of forgotten about this and suddenly realized what he had done, here's the check to cover everything.

In Tianjin, the Chinese inspectors only opened one box. I had everything very carefully listed. They opened one box and closed it up before we left, and we got out without any problem although there was uncertainty throughout as to whether there would be problems, blocks put in our way. They could have said, your physical exam shows such and such, we'll have to keep you here until you get over that, there were all kinds of excuses to keep us there. But they seemed to be at that particular point prepared and willing and maybe even happy to see us out.

Q: How did the timing work? Here you were in 1949 declared to be the capital of China. We'd had an embassy in Nanking. Then that fell to the communists. And then I think people moved to Shanghai, and then that went. What had happened at the time you were being expelled, what about our people in southern China?

SOLLENBERGER: I think the decision had been made back here in Washington at that point that we would withdraw, and that meant everybody. It was a matter of scheduling and timing in order to get everybody out of China. I don't know the details and never looked specifically into this in terms of the record as to what the Department's statement to the Chinese was. Judging from the results, it became perfectly clear to us in the field that we'd issued an ultimatum saying, if you take this step the chances of any relationships with you are being destroyed by you, and we'll pull out. At least that was the effect of the thing, and I presume that that's actually what happened.

Q: What was the feeling that you were getting from the officers who were talking to, Clubb and others, about this policy? I mean, here was a sort of a new nation, and in the normal course of things, we'd say, okay, there's been a civil war and these guys have won, and with a little huff and puff, you'd say, okay, let's recognize it and get on with our business. Was there any feeling at that time, or were you so far removed that you didn't get it, about there were a lot of domestic politics within the United States, or was this just because the Chinese communists were being so beastly.

SOLLENBERGER: We knew that there was a political problem back home with regard to China. The fact that we were being accused of losing China, and not supporting Chiang Kai-shek. The feeling on the spot, as I best recall it, and in talking with Clubb about this, was that we couldn't really ignore...at that time they were still talking about five hundred, six hundred million people, and the government had taken control of that area, and we needed to have a listening base at least in China, and Beijing was the place to have it. We'd been left there with the prospects that this might happen and it had gone sour, we were pulling out. The communists were asking for recognition, but Clubb's position on this, and I think he was right on this, and as it turned out he was right, was that while we might go ahead and decide to recognize them, they might not be willing or able to reciprocate, and that would put us in a difficult position. The British seemed to be more inclined to go ahead and accept the fact that China had been taken over by the communists, and recognized the argument that, because we have to do business, we have to know what's going on. They did extend diplomatic recognition, and as Clubb had sort of predicted, the communists were very slow, with all sorts of obstacles in the way of recognition. I think the French were that way also, and the Dutch.

Q: You know, there was such a to-do later about France recognizing communist China. They didn't recognize until the '60s, I think, under de Gaulle. But the British didn't get anything out of it this the whole time, I mean, it was still ended up the United States versus China. I mean, this was the big game and the rest of them were were kind of there but almost invisible.

SOLLENBERGER: A trend that we began to pick up even before we left were some reports that all was not well between the communists and the Russians.

Q: That was then in the Soviet Union.

SOLLENBERGER: How serious that was, nobody quite knew. But it did become apparent from a geographic point of view, the way in which the Chinese Communists had been sort of short-changed in their takeover of Manchuria, and in the way in which the Russians had been dealing with the Chinese on this. That some of the old feelings of the Chinese, toward the northern barbarians, seemed to be emerging. How serious that would become nobody at that point quite knew.

Q: What about your young Turks, your students? How were they doing?

SOLLENBERGER: Well, presumably they were studying. [Laughter] One of the problems, after the communist takeover of the city was that they weren't as free to move about, and certainly not to go out of the city. You had to get permission, and they were not likely to get permission to do that. The foreign community was sort of thrown in on itself, and there was a lot of social activity, invitations, etc., to the point where I had to send a letter out to the other official establishments and other countries out there, requesting them to please limit their invitations to our students to weekends. That they had homework to do, and it wasn't that they didn't want to be social, that they would probably rather do that than study. But please understand this, of course the students were not exactly pleased with that.

Q: So you played the role of the heavy hand.

SOLLENBERGER: They got along well. We could still go out and have Chinese meals together.

Q: Well, of course, if you've got to be trapped in a city, and Beijing is not the worst place to be trapped in. While we're still dealing with this period, were there other language schools? I'm thinking of the French, the Germans, the British had something there, were they using sharing of techniques, how did this work?

SOLLENBERGER: The British had their facilities in Hong Kong, so any training they were doing was confined there. We knew that, but there was really no contact. The question came up at one point about some Australian students maybe joining us. They later joined us in Taiwan at the school there. The College of Chinese Studies stayed open as long as they could, and there were some foreigners that were put in the College of Chinese Studies. The French, I don't know.

Q: Well, Howard, this might be a good place to stop. We've got you up to going back to Washington. You went to Washington in 1950?

SOLLENBERGER: There were no people going to China at that point, because our ties there had been cut off. There was a question as to whether we should continue the long term specialized training in China. As that turned out that became really one of the things that I probably fought the hardest for, and maybe had some influence on, in maintaining at least the minimal amount of training on the assumption that sooner or later we were going to have to deal with China, we couldn't ignore what was then considered 500 million people, regardless of who was in charge. And that if we ignored China, then we would be suffering the same sort of gap that they were complaining about because they hadn't given training during the war period, and found a gap of officers at appropriate grade levels. Of course, nobody knew when or how soon, and what the circumstances relations would be to re-establish. It wasn't clear at that time as to what the role of Taiwan was going play in this, although that became clear very shortly.

Q: Had you looked at the army language school at Monterey or any of the military places as far as a job goes?

SOLLENBERGER: No, I hadn't. My experience with the army training program as it was run in Beijing at the same time I was there indicated that's not a place I'd be very happy in.

Q: When you got to the State Department and you decided to sign on...this was about when?

SOLLENBERGER: May of '50.

Q: Because essentially against that on June 25, 1950 interests in the Far East began to heat up again. How did the advent of the Korean war...I mean, you didn't have time to almost find your way to the bathroom before the Korean war started. Did that have any affect on what you were doing?

SOLLENBERGER: Initially, not very much. It took a little time for it to sink in, and, of course, when the Chinese got into the conflict...

Q: We're talking about around November or December of 1950.

SOLLENBERGER: When the Chinese decided to come in, then there was some interest in training, and also utilizing the language officers who had already received training. They stationed them in the key positions around China: Japan, Southeast Asia, certainly in Hong Kong.

Q: At this time I've interviewed people who were language officers in Burma, Indonesia, Thailand, China-watching jobs. Would this pep up the program at all?

SOLLENBERGER: It would, except for the strictures within the Department itself of personnel system. The answer we were constantly getting was, if we don't have positions, assignments, there's no point in continuing training. Particularly when the Department, and particularly the Institute, was short of funds, personnel was short, the personnel system felt it was in a tight, tight situation. The Department generally would have been willing to let training slide for a while. I kept insisting that something had to be done, even though they didn't have immediate slots, there would be plenty of opportunity as things went on to utilize these people even in places like London, and different European capitals where there was some contact and interest in China, and what was going to happen in China.

Q: There's nothing worse in sort of the new boy on the block, and don't know anyone who may have had clout, prestige or anything to build on, and yet you hit at an extremely crucial time. How did you operate?

SOLLENBERGER: In September 1951, I was given the title of Assistant Professor of Chinese Studies, and was given an administrative job, sort of the executive officer of the language school. I think Dr. Smith seemed reasonably impressed with the way in which I had brought the facility, the school in Peking, and I must have some administrative skills to do that. So that was the job that was given to me. Also the job of looking after the overseas language programs which they were trying to the institute, to get people if they couldn't study the languages in Washington before they left, to study in the field, or if they did study here, to provide continuing training when they got to the post. And I was given responsibility for looking after that.

Q: There was, particularly at this point, the prestige of the Russian language officers, Bohlen and Kennan, and others. Did you try to use that as a model for saying this is what we have for China...

SOLLENBERGER: We looked at a variety of different approaches for China. Eventually on the Chinese side we looked at Hong Kong as a possible place to train, there were facilities there, and some very successful models. The British were there training in Hong Kong. We looked at Singapore as a possibility, some place where the students might have a chance to utilize the language outside the classroom. First of all, the few students that were given to us, aside from the universities, get university training here...

Q: You were mentioning Yale had a good course.

SOLLENBERGER: Cornell had a training program also, and actually the person who had written the Army ASTP [Army Specialized Training Program] text on Chinese was at Cornell, so that was an option also.

Q: Was there any problem about using university training for Foreign Service Chinese studies...I've heard at other times and other languages the university programs were designed to train scholars to do research, and were not really very practical for Foreign Service. Was this a problem?

SOLLENBERGER: This was definitely a problem, and that's why we chose the Yale which is where the Air Force program had been set up which was based on the Army system, and Cornell. As I recall also we looked at some of the California schools, Berkeley principally as a possible place. I was interested particularly not only in giving language, but in giving a few officers a good solid background in area studies, the cultural, historical, economic, political dimensions of the Chinese culture which historically had been dynamic, and from my point of view I thought in the future was going to be and that we should have people who fully understood this as well as people who could speak the language.

Q: Was it a hard sell? I mean you were talking about the language, but also about what we would call area training. Again, I find the Department of State seems to be an historical organization.

SOLLENBERGER: It was difficult to sell that. We had a window of opportunity to get that started in the Department of State when the National Defense Education Act was established. Of course, that was tied to Sputnik, it came a little bit later.

Q: That was around '56, '57.

SOLLENBERGER: That's right, and there an interagency committee was set up to focus on different parts of the National Defense Education Act. Title IV was the one that we were the most interested in, or I was, because this was the part that dealt with language and area studies. And the effort to beef this up in universities, which we were all for, but also to see within the government what resources the country had, there was a survey that was required of all of the agencies of the government. They were supposed to identify the language skills and the area skills, background, of people who may within the various government agencies, particularly those who had to do with foreign affairs. Of course, they had no standards for doing this. What sort of a standard would they use. If you used the university standards of A-B grade for second year, or third year, or fourth year, that didn't tell you what they could really do with the language. They certainly had nothing that was useful so far as identifying area expertise. That task fell to the Foreign Service Institute, and this is one of the things that was handed to me by Dr. Smith, who said, see what you can work out.

Q: This had to be the latter part of the '50s.

SOLLENBERGER: That came along a little bit later.

Q: Let's talk here about the language thing. Was there much support from what passed as the China desk, as far as language training?

SOLLENBERGER: Well, there was support, but at that time there was some strain, I think, between the operating bureaus who were constantly pressing Personnel for staff. And the question of releasing people, personnel would go to the bureaus and say, fine training, who are you going to release for training, because that's going to leave one less hand that you have on the job here, for assignment elsewhere. So there was tension there as well as between the Institute and the personnel system. But there was support because Clubb was there and he understood the necessity for this. Tony Freeman who had helped set up the program was around, and he supported it. And the students that we had trained in Beijing, some of them were being assigned to jobs on the desk and in the bureau at that particular time. So there was support, but there was no consistent pressure to continue training.

Q: How did you see Henry Lee Smith operating within the the Departmental environment?

SOLLENBERGER: He was an academic. He was frustrated. I think one of the reasons why he turned some of the administrative operations over to me was that he wanted to be free to do some of the research that he was interested in doing on language and culture. And they were working at that time, the professional linguists, on an analysis of language that they thought was a step up from the systems that they'd used before. In a way the Institute was leading the way in linguistic analysis at that particular time.

Not only was Dr. Henry Lee Smith there, but George Traeger, who is a well known linguist was also on the staff, and they brought in some anthropologists who were interested in the linguistic area studies side. Edward T. Hall, who later became famous for the best seller book that he wrote on silent language. Gerard, an anthropologist, Bert Whistle, the kinesologist who was interested in the way in which body language was used. This all was a part of an effort on the part of the Institute to find new ways, better ways of teaching. But also to keep in with the academic community.

Q: What was the state, as you sampled it at this early '50s, of the field of linguistics? Now it's a big business, but what was it like then?

SOLLENBERGER: It was rather small. It was rather difficult to find qualified linguists. They hadn't been trained during the war. There were people who had learned the languages, but not done professional training in linguistics. The fact that Henry Lee Smith and George Traeger being at the Institute was an attractive thing. And their approach to recruitment I had to admire, that was that they were trying to hire linguists on the basis of coming for just a limited period of time to the Institute, but with the objective of returning to the academic community for two reasons. One, to build back into the academic community a more practical approach to their language instruction programs. And the other one was, that the government didn't offer that much future for linguists in terms of promotions in government employment, and that linguists would probably generally become frustrated with the bureaucratic problems. I remember Dr. Smith talking to me at one point, he said, your job here in terms of administration is to make it possible for professional people to do their work with limited interference from the bureaucratic system. So anyway you can relieve them of the pressures of the bureaucracy would be helpful. That's good advice up to a certain point, but anybody who works in the government sooner or later has to realize that the matter of getting the resources to do what you want to do, has to be taken into consideration. Otherwise, you can't do your job.

Q: What were you finding about your results? You were seeing the product of the American school system - elementary, high school, college, of people coming into the Foreign Service. And with the exception of those who happened to have lived overseas, and maybe acquired it with their parents or something, what was the language capability among the new Foreign Service officers?

SOLLENBERGER: From the point of view of practical use as required in foreign affairs business, it was hopeless, very poor. The recruitment of people from the army who had been through the army language training program, there were a few of those that were coming into the Foreign Service. There were a few from missionary background who had grown up overseas who came in with the language. But by and large the recruitment for the Foreign Service at that particular point did not place any premium on knowing a language, so they were not getting the people who were qualified. And the argument at that time was that if we recruited for language skills, we're going to get people who are basically not very well suited for the Foreign Service because the people that are specializing, majoring in foreign languages, are people that are focused on that one academic thing, and we need broader people, we need to get people who have a broad background in the Foreign Service. And it just wasn't bringing in people who had the skills.

Q: I took the Foreign Service exam in '53 which was pretty much the recruiting thing then. You took the exam, and you took the language exam in one of five different languages, but you didn't have to pass it. That was just something they'd say well, you've got to get yourself qualified once you're in. You couldn't get promoted. But basically I could see what they were after.

SOLLENBERGER: Even in getting promoted, it wasn't an important factor at that particular time. What the Department wanted, I think, by giving that exam was to try to find a few people who had the language and could be assigned to the then important posts where it would be useful. Training became the subject of a study of the Department's personnel system towards a stronger Foreign Service...

Q: You're showing me a booklet, it was published when?

SOLLENBERGER: This was published in May of '54. It was the so-called Wriston Report. This is the report really that began to turn things around for the Institute. But part of the problem, as it developed that required something to be done on this, came a little before that. This was the beginning of the problem of McCarthy.

Q: We're talking about the Senator.

SOLLENBERGER: Senator Joseph McCarthy and his looking for card-carrying communists in the Department of State. And, of course, this had an effect on the Chinese program also because people were increasingly reluctant - officers - to get into a field if they were going to become targets of an investigation. For the Institute this was probably the most trying period in its history. It came very close, I would say, to putting the Institute out of business. That's because when they started investigating the Department of State, the first team that they sent in was sent to the Foreign Service Institute. I think they suspected they would find the long-hairs there and they seemed particularly suspicious of the anthropologists, people dealing with the behavior of foreign peoples. But it reached the point in the Foreign Service Institute...I can't really remember whether there were 9 or 13 investigators, and the Institute wasn't that large at that point, that took up residence and were at the Institute for the better part of three months.

Q: Good God!

SOLLENBERGER: Just an illustration if I can give this, I think it would give you bit of the atmosphere that we went through at that time. I got a long distance call in my office, a call that my secretary should not have put through to me, but she did, so I answered it. I later saw the person, he said, "What was wrong? You didn't sound very communicative during the call that I made to you." I said, "Here's the situation." There were three investigators in my office at that time. One of them was going through the files in the bathroom where I had the Chinese material that had been sent back from Beijing, much of it in Chinese. And, of course, he was very curious about what these things were. You're welcome to have somebody translate them for you if you want them. And I went there and went through them, identified what the different files were, etc. The other person was going through the books in the bookcase that I had, and these were books on China, and linguistics, language training, etc. And he was picking up the books by the covers and shaking them to see if there was anything hidden in the pages of the book. And the third one was sitting at my desk here. While I was trying to take care of these three people, he was also interrogating me on my experience in China, and particularly on the contacts that I had had with the communists back in 1938-'39-'40, and about Mr. Clubb. That was the situation.

Q: How many investigators were there at one time?

SOLLENBERGER: Nine or thirteen. They had an office, they were set up there, they were interrogating all the staff.

Q: To whom were they reporting? This was not the House... the Congress...

SOLLENBERGER: They sent someone to the Department who...

Q: This was part of Truman's Loyalty Board. Scott McLeod came in a little later. Scott McLeod was charged with consular and security affairs, so it may have been that.

SOLLENBERGER: They were also very suspicious of the instructors who were foreigners, not even American citizens many of them. At one point they started to call the tutors over to the Department of State for interrogation. And it was never clear as to whether they were using lie detector tests on them, or whether they were simply recording, but they were at least recording the interviews that they had. They started off at the beginning of the alphabet, and Burmese came up pretty early in that. When the Burmese instructor was called over, who was a well known Burmese in his own country, and his wife worked at the Burmese embassy in Washington, a quiet but very independent person. When they started to interrogate him and ask him, according to his report back to us, how much he had paid Dr. Smith, or me, for the job that he had there. A number of questions of that sort that didn't seem appropriate at all. He got up and walked out, and they didn't know what to do about that. They weren't expecting this. He came back and of course reported to us on what had taken place, and said that if this is continuing, I'm quitting. Well, this was a crisis for us because there were other instructors that were lined up to go over. We were able, through Dr. Smith, to get in touch with Walter Bedell Smith...

Q: Rooney was one of the institutional memories of the Foreign Service. People having to testify before him, he was always noted for cutting them out of representational allowance, which he called the Whiskey Fund. It was maybe grandstanding, but there was a whole school of people who were trained how to stroke Mr. Rooney. How did you get along with him? Were you appointed a stroker, I mean a stroker trainer?

SOLLENBERGER: I wasn't appointed as a stroker but I learned fairly early on, being present when Harold Hoskins was testifying, that one of the things that Rooney wanted to do was to make a speech. This was not made for me, it was made for his constituents, and I should not respond to it. So he'd make a speech, we would let it stand, not try to argue with him. Once you started arguing with him, then he would lead you on into a ridiculous situation that would be difficult to get out of. Also, at the time, I got the administration budget office to have personnel respond to the utilization question which came up quite frequently. And it came up with regard to Chinese.

Q: Oh, yes. A very famous case.

SOLLENBERGER: Where the director of personnel was talking about the Chinese language officer in London, I believe.

Q: It was London. Could you give the background to that?

SOLLENBERGER: Well, the background to that was that there was a language officer in London because this was one of the possible places of informal contact because of the British having recognized China, and we thought we ought to have someone in London who had some background in Chinese. But, of course, the response that was given by the Office of Personnel was, when he was asked about opportunities to utilize his Chinese, I guess he couldn't expose our real interests. He said, I guess there are Chinese restaurants and places like that that he could use it. And Rooney had a hay day with that.

I very nearly got caught up in a problem of that sort when Nixon went to China.

Q: This was 1972.

SOLLENBERGER: 1972, yes. I was asked by Rooney whether we had provided any training for Richard Nixon before he went to China. Of course, we hadn't, and I tried to explain about that we had trained people who went with him, and that these people were utilized, and it was fortunate that we had some people who knew Chinese who accompany the President at that particular point. Then he got off of that, and said, "Did you watch that program that showed the President sitting at the table with Zhou En-lai eating? Did you train the President to use chopsticks?" He was trying to provoke something going along that way. But I guess I squirmed out of that one all right. I didn't make the headlines anyhow.

Q: Did you find as the Wriston report was implemented, a change in attitude towards training? I'm talking about the State Department personnel, Foreign Service. Not just at the top, but within the ranks.

We almost did during the Kennedy administration. We would do Mongolia, if the Soviets would do something else.

SOLLENBERGER: There were efforts on that sort of thing. But the question was, why do we need to waste the time of an officer, and he wastes his time learning Mongolian when the chances of utilizing it are very slim. My approach on that, both with bureaus and with Personnel, was let's take somebody with Russian background and language and let's add Mongolian to that so that he'll have plenty of posts to use it in in Russia. But he can be the person who focuses on Mongolia. Let's take someone from Japan and give him Mongolian. Let's take someone from China and give him Mongolian. So we actually got several people who eventually were utilized, but it took a long time and I was afraid...

Q: Did you have a problem? Here we are, particularly during this period, with a policy of strong support, mainly for domestic reasons, of Israel, at the same time we're dealing with a big Arab world which detested this policy. And you would invite lecturers who wanted Foreign Service officers both to understand the policy, but also to understand the Arab world. I can see this would be so sensitive that it would be almost impossible to deal with.

SOLLENBERGER: Well, it was sensitive but by putting it into a broader perspective, we were able to diffuse most of the problems, not all of them. For example, on China one of the things that disturbed me greatly, almost to the point of resigning from the Foreign Service, was that the Department of State wanted the Institute to clear all of its speakers that it invited before the invitations were extended. I'll use a name here. When it came to John Fairbanks, the preeminent China scholar, we were told no, you can't hire him because he's on McCarthy's list. That was the sort of thing that I had difficulty dealing with on a personal basis, having high respect for Fairbanks and knowing that he was not what McCarthy had intimidated. These were the sort of things that we had to go through.

CHARLES T. CROSS

Ambassador Charles T. Cross was born in China in 1922. He attended Carleton College and Yale University and served as a lieutenant overseas in the U.S. Marine Corps from 1942-1946. His assignments abroad included Taipei, Jakarta, Hong Kong, Kuala Lumpur, Alexandria, Nicosia, London and Danang, with an ambassadorship to Singapore. Ambassador Cross was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2001.

Q: Let us start at the beginning. Where and when were you born?

CROSS: I was born in Peking, now called Beijing by foreigners also, which is the name that the Chinese used all along. I was born in 1922. I stayed in China - except for a couple of years spent in the U.S. - until I was 18. I spent those two years in Auburndale (Massachusetts) and Oberlin, (Ohio) - a year in each place. Much of the material in this oral history can also be found in my book, Born a Foreigner: a Memoir of the American Presence in Asia - Rowman and Littlefield 1999/2000.

Q: Tell us a little about your parents and life in Beijing in your teens.

CROSS: My parents were missionaries, essentially in the education field. My mother went to China first in 1915; she was a music teacher and a professional kindergarten teacher in Beijing. She organized some of the first kindergarten teacher training schools in China. She also established a number of kindergartens in the city.

My father came to China in 1917. His first job, after a couple of years of language training, was at Peking National University (Beida) - then and now China's foremost university. It was an interesting time for him to be there because it was a time of seething intellectual activity in China. Mao Zedong was at the University; Chen Duxiu, one of the founders of the Chinese Communist Party, led some of the discussions that had been organized by my father. So he was very much part of the surging intellectual activity which was part of the May 4th Movement. That movement was one of the great forces in Chinese intellectual history. A lot of things happened at about the same time. For example, the Chinese characters, which were used in ordinary talk, were substituted for traditional, classical-style characters. That made it possible for many, many more Chinese to be literate. The communists and the nationalists, as well as non-political forces, took advantage of this change since they could then reach much wider audiences.

My father later became the General Secretary of the American Board Mission in North China. That board was part of the Congregational ministry. Both of my parents were Congregationalists. In 1931, we returned to the States for a couple of years, as I mentioned. We returned to China in 1933; we took up residence in what is now a suburb of Beijing - about 14 miles outside the city walls. In that suburb was an American boarding school which I attended.

I attended that boarding school for seven years. During that time, the most important event in my life was the Japanese invasion of North China in 1937, starting on July 7. There was a considerable amount of fighting in our neighborhood; there were sizeable massacres first perpetrated by the Chinese and then by the Japanese. So my last three years in high school were under Japanese rule although we had extra-territorial privileges and therefore did not suffer the hardships that were rained on the Chinese.

Q: I have been reading an interview of John Stewart Service, who was also an off-spring of missionary parents. He said that his parents kept him away from Chinese kids which resulted in his Chinese not being very good. What was your experience?

CROSS: I don't think my parents kept me away from Chinese playmates. When I lived in Beijing, I had as many Chinese playmates as American. It is true that our Chinese language skills were not advanced sufficiently. We learned Chinese in school, but we didn't go very far because it was just another academic subject. We also had to learn French and Latin, for example. So I never progressed very far in the written aspects of the language. My accent in conversations has a Beijing flavor and that is an asset.

Q: Did you, in high school, manage to feel the ferment that was going on - the Kuomintang, which was then relatively new and rather progressive. Then of course came the Japanese.

CROSS: The Kuomintang had just barely finished the formal unification of China in 1937. In 1931, the Japanese took all of Manchuria. From there, they began to infiltrate south of the Great Wall into the Beijing area. Starting in 1933 and for the next couple of years, they marched inexorably south. The Kuomintang was the national resistance. In December 1936, Chiang Kai-shek was kidnaped by General Jang Xueliang, who had been a young marshal in Manchuria where he had been defeated by the Japanese. He stayed in North-West China where he kidnaped Chiang Kai-shek. The latter had come to attack the communists, who at the end of the Long March had reached Yanan. Chiang's release was contingent on his declaration of nationalist solidarity.

I remember that on Christmas night - or Eve - Chiang was released. Immediately, in the area where our home was, the Chinese students from near by schools paraded past our house and the Japanese sentries were stationed on the city walls. They shouted slogans such as "defeat the Japanese" or "long live the Kuomintang," sung to the tune of Frère Jacques.

My father noted at the time that this demonstration and those throughout China would remind the Japanese that China was united, which should have been a warning to them. The Japanese read it as a threat and decided to complete the conquest of China, which they started in July 1937.

As high school students, we visited the battlefields and had some contacts with Chinese students. A classmate of mine and I took some money, wrapped in some old clothes, and traveled from Beijing all the way out to Fenzhou in Shanxi province - that is the area from which Art Hummel, later an ambassador to China, came. Carrying that money was illegal under Japanese rule. The train tracks had been blown at a couple of spots, which made the trip quite exciting.

Q: Did your schoolmates support the Chinese rather than the Japanese?

CROSS: Oh, yes. We were fanatically anti-Japanese. I was a strong anti-Japan proponent. That is not surprising; they were brutal.

Q: Did the Japanese occupy Beijing while you were there?

CROSS: They did indeed in 1937. I graduated from high school in 1940, so that I spent three years watching the Japanese from a close vantage point. The foreigners were not mistreated, but our lives were certainly restricted.

Q: Do you have any impressions of how the Japanese were acting?

CROSS: I think they were somewhat less belligerent in Beijing than there were in the rest of China. I remember one time, in the winter, seeing a burning village. During the train trip I mentioned earlier, we noticed the communist forces being very active. In fact, the Kuomintang forces were defeated by the Japanese and had to retreat. That left a vacuum which was rapidly filled by the communists.

Q: Did your fellow students have any views about the communist resistance?

CROSS: The communist resistance was all there was opposing the Japanese. So a lot of the foreigners had contacts with them. They were all very tightly organized. Inside Beijing, they had many agents. But if you went to some of the rural areas which had mission stations - some that were less than fifty miles from Beijing - you could meet the communists quite openly. In fact, Chinese students were heading towards "Free China" - the nationalist area where Chongqing is located. They would head that way by foot transiting areas run by the communists, who would help them reach "Free China."

Q: Did any of your Chinese friends make this journey?

CROSS: Several of them did. They went to Chongqing. I don't remember any of them joining the communists, but obviously many Chinese did, including some from Yanjing University about whom I learned later.

Q: How did your parents do their work under Japanese occupation?

CROSS: They had certain restrictions on their work. Americans had the right to run certain schools; they were not interfered with by the Japanese themselves, but some of their puppets tried to place some limits on activities. But the schools and the missionaries were handled quite delicately, until Pearl Harbor. My father's travels in China were somewhat curtailed. [Note: See Born a Foreigner for more on the Japanese in China]

JAMES M. WILSON JR.

James M. Wilson, Jr. was born in China to American parents in 1918. He received a BA from Swarthmore College in 1939, graduated from the Geneva School of International Studies in 1939, the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy in 1940, and Harvard Law School in 1948. He also served as a lieutenant colonel overseas in the US Army from 1941-44. Mr. Wilson has served abroad in Paris, Madrid, Bangkok and Manila. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1999.

Q: Today is the 31st of March, 1999. This is an interview with James M. Wilson, Jr. This is being done on behalf of the Association for Diplomatic Studies and Training. I am Charles Stuart Kennedy. Do they call you Jim?

WILSON: Yes indeed.

Q: Jim could you tell me something about when and where you were born and something about your family?

WILSON: I'm a China brat. I was born there of American missionary parents and grew up there.

Q: Where were you born and when?

WILSON: I was born in a mountain resort outside of Hangchow in 1918.

Q: What type of missionary were your parents?

WILSON: My father was an architect/engineer who went out to China in 1911 to build various things for the American mission boards. He built hospitals, schools, houses, and churches all over China. As a matter of fact, the book on the coffee table right in front of you that I just got from the Old China Press has a piece in it on my father.

Q: It sounds like they were moving you all around quite a bit?

WILSON: We lived first in Hangchow, where my father also taught engineering and math at Hangchow College. Then we moved to Shanghai.

Q: How old were you then?

WILSON: Let's see, we were in Shanghai from 1925 to mid-1926 and then came back to the States while there was some political unpleasantness in China.

Q: In '26, what was this? Was this the Kuomintang?

WILSON: Yes, it was the Kuomintang forces, coming up from Canton and taking over - rather turbulent years.

Q: It is often a period forgotten I think when people look at China. The Kuomintang was also revolutionary.

WILSON: Very much so. This was in the days before the great split between Mao and Chiang Kai-shek.

Q: Do you recall those first years? How did you live?

WILSON: We lived very well on a college campus - in many respects, as you might on a college campus anywhere else around the world. When we moved to Shanghai, my father went into partnership with a fellow American architect and they planned to take over a lot of the construction that had previously been done by his engineering office in Hangchow.

Q: What was your mother's background and your father's, too?

WILSON: He was a graduate engineer from the University of Kentucky and then got a masters in architecture. She was a Phi Beta Kappa from Wellesley, also from Kentucky. During the time that Father was building things, she was usually teaching - first in Hangchow and later on at St. John's University there in Shanghai.

Q: What was she teaching?

WILSON: English literature.

Q: Do you recall sort of life at home? Did you have any brothers or sisters?

WILSON: Yes, I had three sisters; two older and one much younger. We had quite a number of friends and acquaintances. Many of my pals ended up in the Foreign Service later on.

Q: When you left Shanghai in '26, you had already gone to school for a year or two hadn't you?

WILSON: Oh, yes, both in Hangchow and in Shanghai - at American schools which were in both places in those days.

Q: How long were you back in the United States?

WILSON: Almost four years.

Q: Where did you go to school? Where did you live?

WILSON: In Kentucky, that's where the family is from.

Q: Did you find that Kentucky was quite a change from China?

WILSON: It's hard to try to quantify that or qualify that either way. I was rather young, something like eight years old when we came back and 11 when we departed.

Q: You went back to China?

WILSON: Yes.

Q: This would have been 1930?

WILSON: 1930, yes that is right.

Q: Where did you go?

WILSON: Back to Shanghai. My father had gone back to China a couple of times during the period when the family was in Kentucky. Interestingly enough, one of his assignments was with Curtis Wright Aviation, where he had a major hand in building what is now the Hangzhou Airport in Shanghai. When we went back in 1930, the Episcopal Mission Board had asked him to build a major new replacement for St. Luke's Hospital in Shanghai, along the lines of St. Luke's Hospital in Tokyo. That he tried to do manfully for quite a number of years; but as you know, there were many trials and tribulations in Shanghai in the 1930s, including Japanese occupations in 1932 and 1937. This caused all sorts of difficulties.

Q: You were about high school age when you got there in 1930.

WILSON: Yes. I went to SAS, the Shanghai American School.

Q: What was the American School in Shanghai like?

WILSON: It was very much (and deliberately so) like a private school here. SAS was conceived as a preparatory school for American children going back to college in the States. It has now come back to life, enrolling many more nationalities than just the children of Americans, as it did in my day.

Q: Were there any Chinese going there?

WILSON: Very few. They were almost all Chinese-American.

Q: Did you feel as though you were living a somewhat separate existence in those days?

WILSON: Of course. This was in the days when so-called extra-territoriality was flourishing. The “white man’s burden” mentality was still very evident.

Q: What about the presence of the Japanese when they came in, how did that catch you?

WILSON: As far as family was concerned, it didn’t bother our living arrangements especially; but in terms of my father’s duties it was catastrophic, because the area which had been chosen for his hospital was right in the line of fire for the Japanese troops. It was finally decided to move the entire operation out of the Japanese zone of occupation and start from scratch.

Q: When did you leave Shanghai?

WILSON: In 1935 to come back to college. We came back via the Trans-Siberia Railroad and Europe.

Q: At the American School, what were your favorite subjects or most interesting subjects?

WILSON: I guess English and history.

Q: Was there much Chinese history or was it more the European-oriented history?

WILSON: Mostly European, but I took a couple of courses in Chinese history. They also had courses in Chinese language which, I regret to state, I did not take.

Q: It wasn’t really pushed at that time, was it?

WILSON: Not really. The name of the game in those days was to teach the Chinese how to speak English.

Q: What were the various communities called, cantons?

WILSON: Settlements.

Q: Did you get involved with the French or the British?

WILSON: Not really. There were two different governments in our day in Shanghai, in the settlements that is. There was an international settlement which was made up of what had been the British, American and German concessions, and then there was the French settlement or concession. The French ran theirs, and an international municipal council ran the international settlement. In 1932, when the Japanese came in, however, they took over a large part of what had been the old American settlement. It was called Hongkew. The Japanese relinquished it only very, very slowly. When they came back in 1937 they made that area their headquarters. Surrounding all of this, of course, was the Chinese city, which was under Chinese jurisdiction. It was a strange and wonderful complex in those days.

Q: Can one go out and go up the Yangtze or do things like that?

WILSON: Oh, yes, in the days when there was not a war going on.

WILSON: 1935.

John Stuart Service was born in China of American parents. He attended school in China and graduated from Oberlin College. He was appointed as a clerk in Yunnanfu in 1933. He was the acting U.S. political advisor the Supreme Commander, Allied Forces in 1945. In addition to posts in China, Mr. Service served in New Zealand, India and the United Kingdom. Mr. Service was interviewed in 1977 by Rosemary Levenson, Bancroft Library, University of California at Berkeley.

Background of the YMCA in China: The Principle of Local Chinese Control

SERVICE: I've got a list here, of things that was put out at one time--Oh, here it is. When my father went to China the YMCA here at Berkeley, of which he had been president in his senior year, used to put on an annual Roy Service campaign to help support his work in China. (He was always known as Roy in his family and at Berkeley. But my mother didn't like Roy and called him Bob. So all of his China friends called him Bob, and his early friends called him Roy.)

Anyway, this has got a lot of information about him.

Q: This is very interesting. [reading] "The University of California's furthest extension work, giving instruction in Bible Study, Sanitation, Engineering, Social Hygiene, and Physical Training--a practical religion."

SERVICE: Well, that's the old YMCA--it was a practical religion, a contrast to the old-line churches and missions in China. The Y was something quite new and very attractive to a lot of Chinese. The Chinese were not exactly flocking to the gospel, but there were a lot of things about the YMCA that did attract young Chinese students particularly.

At this time the government was just starting the new schools, the new universities. They had just stopped, or were just about to stop, the old Confucian examinations. The new universities were set up in the cities. In the old days if you were studying for your exams you could do it at home or in your own village or town. But now the students going to the universities had to come to the cities. So you had a new group of university students, middle school students, growing up in these new, modern schools. The YMCA catered especially to them. It ran schools. It did a great deal of work in popularizing science, basic science, which the Chinese were tremendously interested in. The solar system, and how a steam engine works, all sorts of things. The YMCA used to set up exhibits. They had basic science museums and ran lectures. They had specialists for this.

They started the idea of public health in China, swat fly campaigns, things like that. Then they had a lot of education, free education schools, night schools, for children, for all ages. Teaching English--a lot of people wanted to learn English. The businesses needed people who spoke English, the post office, customs, these sorts of services.

In education, physical fitness was just becoming popular. The Chinese realized that in order to compete with the West they had to be strong. I mean not only as a nation, but also strong in their own personal physiques. That's the basis of an army after all. So, the whole idea of athletics was just starting in, physical fitness and so on, gymnasiums, even ping pong.

Q: [chuckle] Foreshadowing ping pong diplomacy.

SERVICE: Yes. Yes. But we don't need to do a history of the Y in this memoir!

Q: No, but in context I imagine that for your father to have been sent out to Sichuan, which was way, way out, there must have been a pretty good YMCA base in the Treaty Ports.

SERVICE: Not really. It was all pretty new, because the Y had really only started in China in 1896. So, he was there less than ten years after it first started. They were still quite small even in the cities. They started first in Tientsin, I think. The Y was relatively small.

The Y was unique among Christian mission organizations in China because it always insisted from the very beginning that it had to have local Chinese support and control. The international Y loaned or provided the services of some foreigners, Americans or a few others, but mostly Americans. It sometimes loaned or had donations of money for buildings and so on. But, in each city the first step was to find a group of Chinese Christians who were willing to sponsor it and lead it, act as directors. So the foreigners were always working for Chinese and the Y depended on local support. You had to get memberships and so on, and it had to be locally self-supporting.

Q: Do you know what sort of invitation was arranged? How did they know the Y would be welcome in Chengdu?

SERVICE: The Friends' Mission [Quaker] had someone there named Hodgkin, an Englishman. I forget his initials but he became quite well known later on and eventually came back to England and headed up the English Friends missionary organization. But, Dr. Hodgkin was in Chengdu and he knew about the Y.

Not all missions were keen about the Y. Some missions regarded the Y as being a rival, as not being truly religious because they didn't put the emphasis on proselytizing. Some missionaries felt that their only job was to save souls for Christ, and therefore the thing to do was to preach.

But Hodgkin had been working in Chengdu for the English Friends, and apparently he thought the Y would be a good idea because there was a big Chinese university, a government university, just being established in Chengdu. The missions were also talking about combining their various activities into a West China Union University. Chengdu was becoming an educational, student center. I think Hodgkin was the one that first encouraged the Y, or got in touch with the Y to see if they wouldn't consider starting a YMCA in Chengdu. So, there was a friendly welcome in that sense. Hodgkin was still there when my father arrived and helped him. He had mission contacts, but he also had some student contacts and Chinese contacts, so that he was able to help my father.

A Six Month Journey from Shanghai to Chengdu, 1905-1906

Q: In 1905, six years before the fall of the Ch'ing dynasty, did your father comment at all on the sort of turmoil that was going on in various parts of China? How was it in Sichuan?

SERVICE: My parents didn't get to Sichuan till 1906, because it was a long trip up the Yangtze in those days. I don't know whether Caroline mentioned it or not, but they lost their baby going through the [Yangtze] Gorges, twenty-one days by houseboat with no doctor.

Q: No.

SERVICE: Well, traveling was a long, slow business. They got into Shanghai actually while there were riots going on, what were called the Mixed Court riots. So, the first night my father was in China, actually was spent on guard duty, because they were staying in a house that was outside the concession. They didn't know what might happen. Actually, nothing did happen. But, there was a lot of anti-foreign, anti-American feeling.

They had to equip themselves, and then they went up the river by stages. They went by one steamer to Hangzhou, and then another steamer to Ichang. Then, there was no way to go except by Chinese junk, houseboat. Speaking no Chinese, they could not travel by themselves. They found a man who worked for the Bible Society. I think he was taking supplies to the Bible Society, and they traveled with him. Mr. Davey, I think his name was.

They had a small daughter, Virginia, who was born in 1905 before they left for China. She was one of the first children born in Alta Bates hospital. [Berkeley, California] Her picture used to be in the lobby of Alta Bates as one of the first babies born there.

Anyway, the baby got sick--with dysentery, I suppose--and died, I think, five or six days before they got to Chungking.

Then, my father came down with malaria, which he had very badly and continued to have recurrent attacks of. So, they had to stay in Chungking for a long time.

The final stage of the trip was a ten day overland journey by sedan chair. It's about 250 miles from Chungking to Chengdu. They left San Francisco in November, 1905. It was May, 1906, before they finally got to Chengdu.

But, this is a diversion from your question--which was what? Do you remember?

Q: Yes. [laughter] We're--what--five years before the fall of the Ch'ing dynasty?

SERVICE: Oh, yes. I think that things were fairly peaceful under the dynasty as far as Sichuan was concerned. My parents went away every summer to various places, to Omei Mountain. One year they made a trip to Tatsienlu, on the Tibet border. I don't think there was much internal disturbance. There were problems of banditry--but that was always there apparently--and poverty.

Perhaps in 1910, but certainly in 1911, there was a great uproar in Sichuan about railways. There was talk of building a railway from the east into Sichuan province. The Sichuan gentry were extremely desirous, extremely anxious, that this not be given over to foreigners to build. So they raised some money to build a railway themselves.

In 1911, Sheng Hsuan-Huai signed an agreement for foreigners to build the railway. This caused a tremendous uproar, riots and so on, locally. This actually preceded the outbreak in Hangzhou and Wuchang on October 10. Some weeks earlier in Chengdu there were riots, and all the foreigners were called into a large compound that was owned by the Canadian Methodist mission. We all lived for some weeks in the new hospital that was just finished.

Then, finally things got so out of hand that there was fighting between various groups. The foreign consuls decided to evacuate everyone. [1911] They all came down river, and eventually my parents ended up in Shanghai. My father was soon sent to Nanking. So he was in Nanking in 1912 for a few months when Sun Yat-Sen was setting up the Republic.

The Y was very much in the center of things because many of the people who were active in the YMCA became leaders in the new government, C.T. Wang and people like that. A lot of the people who were American-trained or active in the YMCA were prominent in the early days of the government. After Yuan Shih-Kai took over, some of them had to take a back seat.

The Far West of China: A Pioneer Life

SERVICE: When my father went to Chengdu, where there had been no Y at all, he had to really start from scratch. At the same time he had to learn Chinese, which he did at home.

He got a teacher who came in every day in the morning. He sat down at a table and read Confucius, the classics, or whatever the textbooks were. The teacher, of course, knew no English and one sort of fumbled or stumbled along.

My father learned to speak extremely well. He was absolutely superb in his spoken Chinese.

Almost at once he was forced to begin speaking. He had to start dealing with workmen remodeling his house, trying to get acquainted with students, trying to widen his circle of acquaintances, trying to call on gentry and leaders in the community because he had to have their support. He had to get people of substance to act as directors and so on. So eventually he became a marvelous speaker of Chinese--local Sichuanese dialect, pure and perfect Sichuanese.

The Chinese used to love to hear him because he was so good and could joke and all the rest of it. My father actually never learned to read and write very well, which puzzles me a little bit because I don't know how he conducted Bible classes. I don't think that he could read enough to read the Bible. How he got along--some way or another. Maybe he had someone else read the texts.

But my mother didn't become very fluent. She could speak to get along socially and with the cook. She had to teach the servants everything they knew. She started with raw country boys from the village, shall we say, who had never seen a foreigner, most of them. She taught them how to cook and make bread. My father loved baking powder biscuits and this and that. So, obviously she could manage. But she never learned to read and write, never really spoke very well.

Q: Did you eat the nearest approximation to Western food that the servants could manage, or did you ever eat Chinese food?

SERVICE: [chuckle] We lived Western. Once a week we had Chinese food. It was a big event. Saturday noon we had Chinese food. We all liked it. Later on when I got a little older, every Saturday noon we boys would go over to my father's office at the Y and then go out with him and have Chinese lunch, usually with some of his Chinese colleagues, secretaries in the YMCA. This was always a big day of the week.

We loved Chinese food, but the rest of the time we ate foreign. My mother taught each cook. We had several cooks. Finally we got this one man--Liu P'ei-Yun, who stayed with my parents then for many years--who became a very good cook.

Everything had to be done. It was like living in a pioneer settlement in a way. The local salt was coarse and very black, gray, so that we used to purify the salt. The sugar was coarse and brown. I don't know how we did it, but we actually refined the sugar. I don't know how my mother ever got it crystallized. The salt I think we just beat up with a mortar.

We bought Chinese flour, but we made our own laundry soap from lye and ash and fats. We bought, or saved pork fat.

Of course, there were no electric lights. We used kerosene lamps. There was no running water. There were no telephones. If you went out, you usually went by sedan chair which meant that we kept our own chair carriers.

We even kept our own cow for many years because there was no way of getting milk which was dependable. Apparently, we even took the cows to the mountains in the summer sometimes.

But, you lived a very self-sufficient kind of life that required a lot of work and supervision. If you wanted to communicate with anyone else you sent a coolie with what we called a chit, a note, around town.

We had our own well. But all water had to be boiled. The well wasn't very deep. The water table was maybe ten or twelve feet down. All sorts of unsanitary things were going on around, of course. There were no sewers or anything like that in town. So all water that was to be drunk had to be boiled. You ate nothing that was raw, uncooked.

The "Y" as Window to the West

SERVICE: It took my father several years of preliminary work before the Y really got going.

First my parents started by having classes at home. Chinese students came to their home for classes in English and, if they could get them interested, Bible studies. Most Chinese students wanted just to learn about the West. The West was a subject of great interest to this new generation, this modernizing generation.

They had a steady series of visitors, callers, people who just wanted to see foreigners, or get acquainted with foreigners. Mother had a group of Chinese ladies who used to come in. But all this required a lot of tea, refreshments, that sort of thing.

But I think my parents felt that it was desirable for them to try to live in a foreign, Western way. Earlier missionaries had tried to merge in a Chinese community, had dressed in Chinese clothes, worn queues and so on. This was partly because of intense anti-foreignism. They didn't want to be conspicuous.

But, by the time that my parents came along, the great attraction of the YMCA was that it represented new things. It represented the West, and there was a great interest in the West. A lot of these people that came to the house would have been hurt if they had just received some Chinese refreshments. They wanted to see Western things. They wanted to learn about the West.

The foreign community did some relief work during the war (World War I), ran bazaars. One very popular thing they did one time was to run a coffee and doughnut shop, or coffee and hot biscuits I think. Tremendously popular. Chinese would come in, and some people came every day while the thing was running, because coffee, foreign refreshments, and cakes were something that was new and strange and exotic and exciting.

I'm not sure that my parents were conscious of this. They may not have thought of it. But, certainly they were exemplars of the West and of Western ideas and Western ways of living. So, I don't think my parents felt any guilt about living in a Western way, because this was what they represented and what the Chinese wanted.

Some Chinese came to them and asked them to have a club which used to meet at the house occasionally. A club of men and women together, young men and young women, who were coping with all the problems of getting rid of Confucian ideas of arranged marriages and so on and who simply wanted to meet with some foreigners, my parents in this case, and learn about how man-woman relations, relations between the sexes, were handled in the West, what Western society was like, learning new ways, getting rid of the Confucian ways.

Q: Was there any opposition that you recall to this amongst the more conservative Chinese families?

SERVICE: I suppose there must have been. I'm sure that these people themselves were subject to criticism from their elders, yes. There was a lot of generational conflict going on all through that period certainly.

These people, of course, were talking about such things as making their own marriages. Mrs. Chao here in Berkeley is one of the pioneers. She made up her own mind that she was going to marry Y.R. [Chao]. Of course, he apparently agreed too. But, it was quite a famous early case of revolt against the old Confucian family idea, arranged marriages. It was about the time that we're talking about in China. I'm not sure when Y.R. and Buwei got married, but it was probably about this time.

SERVICE: 1921. Well, we're talking about a little bit earlier than that.

Q: Both of them had arranged marriages, had engagements that they had to break.

SERVICE: Yes, yes, that's right. But, I don't remember any criticism that was overt or violent or that involved my parents, at least not that I know of.

Q: It's an interesting concept when you think of what has been going on at the Y in the 60's and 70's--

SERVICE: Yes.

Q: --the encounter groups and so on, that already in the context of its period, back in the 1910's, the Y was facilitating relations between the sexes.

SERVICE: Oh, yes. That's right. That's right.

Q: Do you remember seeing Westerners dressed in Chinese style?

SERVICE: Oh, yes. There were some of the older people, particularly in small outstations, who still wore Chinese clothes. The China Inland Mission, and some of the more conservative groups, still went on that idea.

But in a place like Chengdu, which was a metropolis, I don't think any foreigners wore Chinese clothes by this time.

There were no hotels, of course, in a place like Chengdu. It was the end of the line, so many foreign visitors stayed with us. In a place like Hangzhou or Ichang, which were transit points, the missions would set up a sort of a hostel, a missionary home, or something like that. But, in Chengdu there was nothing like this. People would come to Chengdu for missionary conferences or meetings, or an occasional tourist--but they had to be pretty determined tourists. There was a man named Harry Frank who walked around China and wrote some books about it. A man named Geil visited all the capitals of China and wrote a book about it and also a book about the Great Wall. There was a professor named E.A. Ross from Wisconsin, a sociologist, who wrote a book about China. He stayed there. A lot of people in Sichuan came to Chengdu because they needed dental work or medical care.

Q: It seems that your mother and your father entertained a most extraordinary number of guests throughout the year, the teas for students--

SERVICE: Yes, well, this was an important part of their work, particularly in the early phase of getting acquainted. I think it tapered off a good deal as children came along and she became more busy at home. But certainly before the Y was set up, formally set up and they had buildings, a lot of Y activity was getting acquainted with students, university students, and university teachers. A lot of this was done at the house.

Always, of course, Chinese called on formal occasions, such as New Year's time. My father's fortieth birthday was a tremendous affair because in China traditionally when you reach forty, you enter on old age, you become venerable. By forty, one should have grandchildren. So, when my father reached forty there was an all-day-long procession of people that came to congratulate him and fire off firecrackers and so on, and they all had to be fed.

One thing I just remembered. In the early days when I was seven or eight, like most missionaries, we had morning prayers with the servants all expected to come and join in. Then, somehow this practice just stopped. I don't remember when or why, but eventually we didn't have prayers in the morning.

I think that it was somewhat artificial. Most of the missionaries expected their servants to become Christians. My father may have felt that it was a little unfair to put this pressure on them. It did seem a bit uncomfortable and formal.

We had a wonderful old gardener. He may have been a Christian, a real Christian. Some of the others may have gone through the motions. But, I think that the old gardener probably was the only real Christian.

Eventually my father got separate premises for the Y and it gradually grew until it had fifteen hundred members or so and quite an active program of schools and classes of all kinds. The Y was dependent largely on the goodwill of officials, but also on local support. When they finally built a permanent Y the government actually donated the land. It was quite a large site near the center of Chengdu.

Local warlords usually contributed, helped the Y, were friendly to the Y, attended the Y.

Even before the Republic, before the Revolution, the viceroy came to the opening of the YMCA in Chengdu, which was a noteworthy honor in those days. The provincial viceroy actually attended the opening ceremonies in 1910.

Q: Would you say that was a tribute to your father's particular skills?

SERVICE: Well, I don't want to blow the horn excessively. I suppose you can say that it was partly because of my father's skill in making friends with Chinese. But the viceroy's acceptance of the invitation was not based on a personal relationship between the viceroy and my father. It reflected the fact that my father had won support of influential members of the local gentry.

Strains and Hardships in Grace Service's Life

Q: You mentioned your sister's death. Was this felt in any way to be China's "fault?" Was your mother bitter?

SERVICE: I don't think my mother felt that it was China's fault, but it certainly contributed to her very, very strong concern about sanitation and health. Reading things like Golden Inches, the long, unpublished autobiography she wrote in the 1930's, I realize now, much more than I did then, how repelled she was by the lack of sanitation, the conditions of the inns, the pigsty next to where you were sleeping, and all the dirt and filth, the general living conditions.

I think that it contributed to her--alienation is too strong a word. But, she dropped out more and more--partly because she got more interested in other things--from my father's work. She became, I think, disappointed. Embittered is too strong a word. After the revolution [1911], for instance, they should have gone back on furlough to the United States. But the YMCA had not succeeded in getting anyone else to go to West China on a permanent basis. There had been a couple of people who for one reason or another couldn't stay. My father had had to evacuate. [1911] He didn't want to come out, but he had been ordered out. He felt he had to go back to Sichuan. The Y wanted him to go back to Sichuan to get things started again, make sure everything was all right. So, he went back, you see, and it wasn't until 1915, ten years after they went out to China, that he had his first furlough.

He always put the Y first. This is a pattern that was repeated time after time. My mother felt that the family was second, and that he did much more for the Y and gave himself to the Y more than he needed to and neglected the family. It's a pattern that, shall we say, repeated itself later on, in my case I think.

Q: Did your father become involved with Chinese politics?

SERVICE: He actively supported the students in the 1920's when the Kuomintang was coming to power, the period of the May 30th incident in Shanghai and all the rest of 1926, '27. He was in favor of the foreigners giving up extraterritoriality and the imperialist apparatus that annoyed, that infuriated, the Chinese so much.

Q: Did this make him very unpopular with the so-called European community?

SERVICE: I'm not sure because I was out of China then. But, I don't believe it did. I think most of the missionaries that they were close to tended to agree with him.

Most of the time we were way up west in Sichuan province, hundreds of miles from any guns or any gunboat. We were at the end of the line. Going up and down through the Yangtze Gorges, if soldiers or bandits were firing from the banks at the boat, they would go up and sit behind the armor plate in the bridge, things like that. But, I don't think there was any conflict between my father and other missionaries.

There were some old-line missionaries, I think, that were less inclined to see the merit of the students' arguments because, the students wanted to take over control of the foreign schools and universities. They thought that the Chinese government should set the curriculum and really have effective control of the mission institutions. I think that probably some of the missionaries opposed that. The Chinese weren't ready yet, was the general theme.

But my father didn't have very much contact with the business people--certainly not in Chengdu. It wasn't a Treaty Port. There wasn't any foreign business community there really.

Q: Did the recurrent violence in China affect your daily lives?

SERVICE: Well, you see, what happened in Sichuan was that after the Revolution, 1911-12 Revolution, things really fell apart. Sichuan was fought over by a lot of Sichuanese, but also became a hunting ground for people from other provinces, especially Guizhou and Yunnan.

When Yuan Shih-Kai tried to become emperor, the revolt actually started in Yunnan, and the leader Tsai led an army from Yunnan into Sichuan province in 1916 to give battle to the local commander, who had bet on Yuan Shih-Kai. The Yunnan army stayed on and on in Sichuan. Almost every year, in these years we're talking about, there was fighting going on--this was a part of the life. Some of it was very bloody, some of it not so bad; but almost always with looting, first by the defeated or evacuating army and then, of course, by the victorious army. Each side grabbed what it could.

Sometimes they would persuade the chambers of commerce, the leading businessmen to pay them--a ransom, in other words. But, if the ransom wasn't paid, or even if the ransom was paid, there would still be looting and burning.

Q: Did this affect your day-to-day life?

SERVICE: Oh, sometimes. There was one period when we all moved down into the ground floor of the house because the compound had mud walls. We moved into the ground floor and lived and slept in my father's library because, in addition to the mud walls, we were surrounded by bookcases. We put mattresses against the windows. There was artillery fire going across the city from one side to the other, from one camp to the other, passing over our area.

There was a mission hospital, an American Methodist Mission hospital which for some reason was not being operated. Whether they just didn't have money or what--I don't know. But, it was empty. The missionary community thought they ought to do what they could. So they opened it on an emergency, temporary basis to take care of the hundreds of wounded soldiers.

I was, I suppose, maybe ten. Anyway, I volunteered. Some of us children volunteered to act as orderlies and fetch-and-carry boys, boy scouts. I remember it was a terrible, terrible thing to see these wounded people. Most of them had been wounded several days before. The fighting was some distance away at that time. The wounds had not been properly dressed or taken care of. So, they were suppurating and so on--awful. I remember having to leave the operating room where the doctor was cutting. I went outside and was sick. I just couldn't take it.

The foreigners did what they could. My father was always helpful in things like this. Several times he actually was able to act as a go-between, mostly to save people that were caught in between the firing. He was known to people on both sides, to officials, to the generals, and so on.

In fact, he was so well known that the British consul general...there wasn't any American consul in Chengdu, never was. The nearest American consul was in Chungking, and that was only part of the time. Most of the time the nearest American consul was six, seven hundred miles away in Hangzhou. But, the British consul general made a protest at one time to the American legation in Peking about my father's having contact with officials. The consul thought that only he should have contact with the officials and resented my father's being on very good terms with the local generals, the top people!

Q: So, he was doing para-diplomacy.

SERVICE: Well, he was getting along. He had to.

Q: You describe so calmly a situation that would be truly horrifying to most people--warlords fighting, bleeding bodies being brought in, et cetera. How did this all affect your mother?

SERVICE: I suppose it affected her more than us. She was conscious of the dangers. Children can adapt, and like excitement. Let me jump ahead to an episode in the Chungking days. We spent the summers, like most of the foreigners, in bungalows along the top of hills on the south bank of the Yangtze, across from the city. One summer--I think it was '23--a Guizhou general, from the south, decided to take over Chungking. These wars were usually more skirmish and maneuvering than hard fighting. For several days, the defenders' front line was along our range of hills. Then, one night the attackers made a night attack. Altogether, spread about, there must have been a good many thousands of troops. And Chinese make a night attack very theatrical and frightening. Everyone shouts "Sha! Sha! Sha!" ("Kill! Kill! Kill!") and fires their guns into the air or at anything that looks like a target. The defenders fired a few shots but discreetly fled, long before the attackers got close.

While all this was going on, the servants had come into the house--their quarters were flimsy lath and plaster, while the house was brick. And we were all lying together on the floor to get below the level of the windows. Actually, we children were under the beds. The house was dark (we assumed lights would draw fire) and stood on a sort of elevated terrace. A group of soldiers--I suppose a squad--came charging up the steps to the front door, which had glass in the top half. My father decided he had to go out and tell them we were foreigners. In fact, he was shouting that, but the din was so great that the soldiers couldn't hear him.

Just as my father had his hand on the knob, a soldier outside--the leader, I assume--fired his rifle from the hip. The bullet shattered the glass and passed just in front of my father's forehead. But some of the pulverized glass bounced into his eye. He fell to the floor, and thought he was blind. But he was able to tell them we were foreigners and to ask the name of their general. When they told him, he said, "I know him"--which was true. The soldiers were sorry, but we didn't know for several days whether Dad would lose his sight. He didn't. To go back to your question: this sort of thing was obviously hard on my mother.

Q: You wanted to tell me about your boyhood in Chungking and an incident that occurred.

SERVICE: This was in the summer of 1923 I think. It was actually at the same time that my father was nearly shot by this soldier during a night attack. That morning, we three boys had gone down along the range to see some friends. Foreign houses were scattered over several miles up and down the hills. We took with us a Daisy air rifle which our parents had bought from Montgomery Ward. We met a patrol, sort of an advanced patrol. Apparently these were incoming warlord troops from Guizhou. They were very much interested in our air rifle. They thought it was some fancy, new, foreign type of rifle [laughter] which was very much something they would like to have.

So they stopped us and questioned us and wanted to know about that rifle. Naturally, we didn't want to lose it. So my brother Bob tried to explain to them--he spoke the best Chinese of any of us--he tried to explain that it was just driven by ch'i. "Ch'i" is rather a vague word in Chinese but usually means air or gas.

Finally Bob said, "My brother there--" (I was holding the rifle) "I'll stand here and my brother will shoot me in the chest and you'll see what happens." [laughter] He had a khaki shirt on, I suppose. So he stood bravely--I suppose he was eleven or twelve--and I shot him in the chest with the air rifle. We convinced the soldiers that the rifle was not one they wanted. [laughter] They let us go on our way.

That night, of course, things turned much worse.

Speaking of the effect on the kids, after these various episodes of war, we found we could pick up all sorts of stray bullets, stray ammunition. We started a collection of various kinds of gunpowder, various kinds of bullets. We would pull a bullet out of cartridges that hadn't gone off, you know. Of course, we got many different kinds because every Chinese warlord army had arms from wherever they could get them. There might be old Russian stuff, and old Japanese stuff, and locally made Chinese stuff, different arsenals, different sizes, different kinds of powder.

We'd been having typhoid shots. So, we had a lot of these little bottles that typhoid vaccine used to come in. We had these all lined up, different kinds of powder from these various shells which we quite casually had unloaded ourselves with a pair of pliers. [laughter]

Reading my mother's notes, I was reminded of a time when the attackers had seized a peddler, a man who was at least dressed up and acting as a peddler selling food or something, down at the gap below our house. The road came up to a gap in the hills there.

They accused him of being a spy, and they hung him up from a tree this way with his arms behind him [stands and puts hands behind back] and then suspended him, just lifting him off the ground, which is a very painful way, and then they beat him on the back with split bamboo. Of course, he was screaming bloody murder. It went on all day, more or less. We went down and watched. My mother was not very happy about that.

But, you know, China was a cruel place in those days. I think we accepted these things since they were a part of normal, daily life, and they didn't affect us nearly as much as they did my mother or as they did Caroline when she came to China after we married.

Caroline's reactions to China simply surprised me. We were in Yunnan, which was a very backwoods, undeveloped place when we went there in '33. She was much more put off by it than I was. It didn't bother me.

Q: Jack, you said you had a few things from our last session that you'd like to expand on a little bit.

SERVICE: Well, I felt after we'd finished talking the other day that maybe I hadn't been quite fair to my mother. I'd given the impression that she had turned sour perhaps, or against, the missionary cause that my father was dedicated to. I don't think that's quite fair.

She had, of course, a harrowing introduction to West China with the loss of her child and then the serious illness of my father. She was plagued by ill health. It's obvious from reading her own account that she was suffering a lot of the time. Years later when she came to the States, the doctors at the Mayo Clinic thought she had probably had gallstones. She also had, I think, two miscarriages after the baby died, before I was born.

Probably I didn't mention the isolation of West China, the other day. It took two months usually to get there. That was before the steamer started running through the [Yangtze] Gorges, when you had to go by junk.

Q: From--?

SERVICE: From Shanghai. It was six months perhaps to get an exchange of letters with her parents in the United States, or anybody in the United States. They used to order supplies, but it might take a year for the supplies to get there. Your magazines, your mail, everything, was always much delayed.

There was a lot more housework than I think I mentioned. We lived a pioneer existence. My mother made marmalade from the skins of the oranges that we ate at breakfast. She made mincemeat, and did a lot of preserving.

There were no tailors, so she had to make clothes for all her children, besides her own clothes and the normal things of the house, the curtains and all the rest of it.

We had to do our own laundry, of course, at home. It was the time when men wore stiff collars, and she had trouble getting the servants to starch them properly; so, at times, she did my father's stiff collars and cuffs. It seems incredible to us now that they fussed about these things in West China!

She had to train new servants, really, from the ground up. They had never been in a foreign house before, and they had to learn everything.

So, I think by and large she did have a fairly hard life. Visitors often stayed and stayed a long time, but they were very welcome.

One thing that I remember as a child was that we always ate at the table, the family all together. It was the way my father's ranching family had eaten. They were a big family. My father carved.

It was always an occasion to have guests. I remember hearing my parents ask, "What's the news?" If visitors came from the States that was fine, but even if they came from Shanghai or down river, they had much more news than we had locally. So, there was always a lot of conversation and interest and excitement, having people visit and stay with us.

My mother did go on teaching in the Y even when she had three children at home. She usually taught at home, English, economics, and so on. Also they had night prayer meetings. Sometimes she was asked to teach older people who wanted to learn some English but didn't want to go to the YMCA and join a class with young people. For "face" reasons they would ask her to teach them privately, and this was usually done at home. So she did have quite a busy life.

Q: In her autobiography, your mother speaks of Chinese women friends, but she doesn't name any of them, as she does her American and other friends. Was she able to form friendships with Chinese women?

SERVICE: No, I don't think really in any very meaningful way, not in an intimate way. (I have to keep peeling off layers of memory.

In Chengdu when I was small there were very few Chinese women that were educated. Very few of them had gone to school. Even fewer had learned English to any real extent. Practically none of them had studied in the United States or studied abroad so that it was very difficult to establish communications, rapport. My mother, as I said before, never really mastered Chinese very well. She learned household Chinese, but she never learned enough Chinese so she could develop an intimate friendship, I would guess, with any of these women.

Also, entertaining was quite formalized. Most Chinese entertained at restaurants, and women normally were not included. If you were invited to a home it was usually an official home--and the women ate in the back rooms, they didn't eat with the men--so that it was a stilted occasion.

I just don't think that my mother--although she knew some of these women and they were interested in coming to the house--had friendships with Chinese women that took up very much of her time or were intimate.

Now, when she got to Shanghai [after 1925] things were quite different because in Shanghai there were a lot of Western-educated women, women who had either been educated in Western schools in China or had actually studied abroad. When she got into women's clubs and the women's group activities in Shanghai and in the national committee of the YWCA, she was thrown in close contact with many of this type of Chinese woman, and some of them she did get to know very well. Some of them were American-educated or actually American-Chinese women. But, it wasn't really until Shanghai that I would say that she developed real friendships with Chinese.

The Service "Hotel": Distinguished Visitors and Occasional Tourists

SERVICE: Going back to what we said earlier--I've mentioned the fact that there were no hotels in Chengdu. I think that our house became a well-known place to stay. It often had people there. Usually they were very interesting people. My father was rather fascinated by Tibet. So, he got to know some of the missionaries up there and was happy to have them stay with us.

My father established contacts with some Chinese businessmen who used to trade in Tibet, for them to bring out Tibetan things and so on.

My mother loved to read and she read everything she could get. She ordered books from Shanghai and America. And the local foreigners exchanged books. Talk around the table was usually interesting.

Q: What notable "foreign devils" were there, either as residents or as visitors? You mentioned, before we turned the tape on, the [Walter C.] Lowdermilks.

SERVICE: Oh, yes.

Q: I don't know whether they were up there at the time?

SERVICE: I don't think he was, because they got married later on. She, Mrs. [Inez] Lowdermilk, was there in the Methodist mission. There was this E.A. Ross that I was speaking of from Wisconsin. There was a geologist from Oberlin that was out there. There were plant explorers that used to come through, like Joseph Rock, working for the U.S. Department of Agriculture. Occasionally a businessman. There was never anyone there in all the years we were there who represented the American government. No foreign consular officer got up that far.

As I say, we sometimes had a consul in Chungking, but not all the time. But, no American consular man ever got up as far as Chengdu. The British, of course, traveled much more, and they had the British consul there although it was not a Treaty Port.

There were people like [Eric] Teichman and [Alexander] Hosie who traveled for the British and went through Chengdu. They were checking things like the efficacy of the Chinese suppression of opium. But, this was before I remember things. This was the early years when they went through.

There was an American tourist, a wealthy woman named Tracy, Mrs. Tracy from Cleveland, Ohio, who had met my mother in Nanking, in 1912. She came back to China a few years later and went up through the [Yangtze] Gorges and up to Chengdu, which was quite a trip for a tourist in those days. She became a good friend of my mother's. When we came home on furlough in 1915-16, my mother went down to Florida to visit her in Palm Beach.

Friendships with local residents tend to become very close when you are so isolated. My parents made many lifelong friendships with other missionaries that were there, mostly American but some Canadian. I think if you live together in isolated circumstances, you do tend to establish--well, you do in the Foreign Service too. You serve in a foreign post with somebody, then you're a friend for life.

The Family's Growing Love of China

Q: Did your father "fall in love" with China in the way that so many people did?

SERVICE: Yes, I think so. It's a funny thing, how to describe people's attitudes towards something like China. He certainly developed a tremendously strong affection for the Chinese people, the Chinese people he knew and, I think for the Chinese people in general. He felt strongly interested in China, much concerned and involved in China. He was always optimistic about China, that things were going to come out all right. But this was part of his personality anyway.

All of us in China--although we never really were trained or educated in Chinese; we didn't go to Chinese schools; we didn't learn Chinese; we didn't even have Chinese playmates--almost all of us grew up with this strong attachment to China. It is a rather hard thing to account for.

Q: to account Why is it hard for?

SERVICE: Well, simply because we led a very different, separate life. I never had any Chinese playmates. I grew up in China--spent all my childhood there--without learning to read or write anything in Chinese. I learned to speak Chinese from the servants, but my parents saw no advantage or necessity, desirability, of having me learn to read or write.

We never thought of going to a Chinese school. We eventually went to an American school in Shanghai which tried as hard as possible to be like a school in the United States. It had no Chinese students. It didn't teach courses in Chinese history or in Chinese language.

We lived in compounds separated, isolated, insulated from China in many ways. And yet, as I say, all of us that I know of, or practically all of us, who were B-I-C, Born in China, ended up with tremendous nostalgia for China, a desire to go back to China, strong feelings of ties to China and particularly the Chinese people.

Now, I think that's the key. I think it's the people. Here's a random speculation. The real contact, clue, key, we had to China was our servants. The servants, by and large, were village people, country people. They came from the countryside into town to find work, and maybe they found work with us.

But, they all had the simplicity and honesty and virtues of peasants, country people. They devoted themselves completely to the family. Well, maybe they were in some ways like the mummies that we read about in the old days of life in the South. But these were not people who had any tradition of servitude. In the countryside they had never acted as servants. When they came to work for us there was never any humility or servility or anything like that.

They were people. They were independent people, and they worked for you, and they looked after your interests. They were completely devoted to the family, regarded themselves as almost part of the family, served the family I would say wholeheartedly. They were just good people. Maybe this has something to do with why so many of us liked China, because really the only China we knew was through our servants.

Jack's Early Memories: Western Style in a Chinese Compound

Q: Do you think that's enough about the background?

SERVICE: [laughter] Yes, but I could go on and on if you want.

Q: What else?

SERVICE: I'm over-prepared!

Q: Wonderful.

SERVICE: Where are we? [reading agenda] Oh goodness, "Early memories." All right.

I was born in 1909. I was very late. Apparently, I was born three weeks or a month later than they expected me. My mother always said I had long fingernails when I was born, a sign that I was, what to say, not premature, postmature.

Q: Postmature, or else a mandarin. [laughter]

SERVICE: I don't remember anything, of course, until the summer of 1912 when I was three. I mentioned that all the foreigners, including my parents, were evacuated in 1911, late 1911. My father came down to Shanghai, and then went to Nanking.

Then, after a few months in Nanking, he went back to Sichuan. He was very anxious, and the Y was anxious, for him to return to find what had happened and get things going again.

Families weren't permitted yet to return. So my mother went to Kuling which is up a mountain near Kiukiang, near the Yangtze River, and spent the summer there. I got very sick and apparently they thought that I'd had it. I have a vague recollection of a room, a very bare room, which I think was my sickroom. I remember the room spinning around. It's probably my first memory.

Then, after the summer we went down to Hangzhou on our way back up the river to Sichuan to join my father. My mother got quite sick in Hangzhou. She had recurrent bad health. I think that part of the whole picture of her reactions to China was that she was plagued with rheumatic fever, and, oh, various things. I've got some notes here. We don't need to go through them.

Anyway, she was sick in Hangzhou. We had a servant who had been with my mother at the mountain, a Sichuanese, who had come down river with us. He used to take me out to the Bund in Hangzhou every day for a walk. I remember the Bund. I remember walking down the Bund--it was an esplanade on the Yangtze--with my mother along with Liu P'ei-Yun, this cook of ours.

Sometime in here I remember we were out on a little trip or a walk in the countryside. The paths between the rice fields in Sichuan were very narrow, [gesturing with hands about two feet apart] just maybe wide enough for two people to pass. I remember walking along this path and seeing a rather large, stout Chinese coming towards me and then suddenly finding myself in the flooded rice field.

I remember my mother was absolutely frantic about this because, of course, the rice fields were fertilized with what we always called night soil, human manure, which was raw usually. Therefore, everything was supposed to be highly unsanitary, as it really was. Well, my mother was simply beside herself till we could get someplace where all my clothes could be taken off, I could be scrubbed down, and so on.

And her anger that this man had pushed me off the path--I have no recollection of the man actually pushing me off. I just don't remember what happened. He may have jostled me off. He may have just been unfriendly to foreigners. A lot of people were in those days. Or he may have felt that as a child I should have stopped and waited for him to go by, which probably a small Chinese child would have done, would have waited for the elder person, this man, to walk by.

My father, of course, was not agreeing that the man had pushed me off. My mother was sure that he had, out of meanness.

We came back to the States in 1915. I remember some things about coming back to the States. I remember my surprise, for instance, at seeing white men working on the docks. Of course, I had never seen any white man doing this kind of physical work before. The idea had never occurred to me. To see men on the docks in San Francisco loading and unloading cargo was very strange.

I went to the Panama Pacific Exposition. Then, we went out to Cleveland, Ohio, where my father spent the year working in the Cleveland YMCA. I remember first grade in a public school fairly well.

Most of my memories of Chengdu really are when we went back. We went back to Sichuan in 1916, after the summer in America. We lived in Chengdu then from 1916, and I went to boarding school in Shanghai in 1920. So that most of my memories of Chengdu are of the years when I was seven, eight, nine, ten.

Q: By then you had a brother, didn't you?

SERVICE: Oh yes, I had two brothers. Bob was twenty-one months younger. Dick, Richard, was about five years younger than I was.

Q: You mentioned living in a compound. Was this a single family compound where you lived around the courtyard, or did you live in a Western style house?

SERVICE: No, it was a Chinese-style house and it was a single family courtyard. It belonged to the Methodist mission. They had had for a while a school, a middle school I think it was, in the next-door compound. So, these two compounds were opened up. They gave that up and the YMCA used it at first for temporary quarters for the Y. Then, eventually, I think we moved over there, and another family came and lived in what had been our house. But, most of this early period we were the only family in this place, the only foreign family.

There were several different mission compounds. The American Methodists, the Canadian Methodists, the Friends, would each have their own separate compounds. Each compound normally had one afternoon a week or maybe one afternoon every two weeks for its "at home" in tennis. Everybody played tennis. They'd have tea. We would all go, of course, to the Canadian Methodists on their day and to the American Methodists on their day and play tennis.

My father and mother were very keen that we children should be independent, not wanting to be catered to or looked after, waited on by the servants. This was a big thing. We always had to pick up our own clothes and pack our own bags when we traveled, wash ourselves, and not let the amah give us a bath.

When we had the tennis at our place we always earned money by picking up tennis balls.

Home Studies: The Montessori and Calvert Systems

Q: How do you look back on your childhood in China? Was it a happy period for you?

SERVICE: Oh, very happy. Yes, certainly. It was an odd life in the sense that it seems odd to have lived in a country and spent all your childhood there, and look back and realize that you never had a Chinese friend! We never played with Chinese children. I think for one thing, that my mother was terribly conscious about sanitation and so on.

Most of our servants didn't have children with them. The family was back--if they had a family--back in the village. I think our gateman at one time, or the cow coolie, did have his family with him. They lived out in the gate house. But, I don't think that the children of the servants would have played with the master's children anyway. I don't think there was that normal expectation.

In any case, my mother was simply obsessed that Chinese children were allowed to do things that we should not do, eat things we weren't allowed to do, and so on, so that we rarely saw them. Sometimes on Sundays there might be a visit to some family, university family or somebody in the Y, something like that.

Q: I've got a question down here on the agenda, what was your sense of identity as an American boy growing up in China? I know that's a hard one to answer.

SERVICE: Well, how much identity does any child have?

SERVICE: It's a matter of looking back on things now, of course, from a long time and a long distance. Looking back I'm surprised at the Americanness that my parents were so anxious--apparently anxious--to instill. We played mostly with American children, as I said, but also with some Canadians. But, we didn't go to the Canadian school. My mother felt that the school wasn't very good. It was just starting in. It was the equivalent perhaps of a one room or two room school in the early days in the United States. The teachers were usually untrained, whoever happened to be available, maybe some missionary daughter who had finished high school but hadn't gone on to college, or a wife who happened to be available.

My mother was a teacher. She had taught. After she finished at the U[niversity of] C[alifornia] and before she got married she had a couple years of teaching. At any rate, she thought the Calvert School was better.

But, also she wanted us to have an American education. She was very definite that we were coming to America eventually. We were going to an American school, American university. There was that feeling of identity.

The Americans always got together on Thanksgiving for instance. There was always some sort of a program on the Fourth of July. It seems odd that we would have, but maybe it's not odd for exiles far away from home to have put this stress on Americaness.

Obviously we felt very different from Chinese. We couldn't play with Chinese, as I mentioned. The Chinese were dirty and unsanitary. Yet, there was never any feeling of antipathy or hostility, nothing like that. My father obviously, as I said, loved Chinese. We liked our servants, and the servants were almost members of the family in some ways.

But, we did feel, I'm sure, a sort of a separateness, if not superiority, to Chinese. We were used to being considered as rather freakish, because if you traveled you were always surrounded by crowds of people, really crowds, who would keep pushing in closer and closer just to see you, just to look at you.

You were always called yang kuei-tzu, foreign devil, but without any particular animosity, because this was the only name that most of these children on the street knew for foreigners. "Look at the yang kuei-tzu! Look at the yang kuei-tzu! as you went down the street.

Of course, in villages in the countryside, you had no privacy at all. If you had to stop at a restaurant for your noonday meal when you were traveling, they'd keep getting closer and closer till finally my father or somebody would say, "Please move back. Give us some air."

If you stayed in a Chinese inn, they would try to come into the room, but you could close off the room. Then they would wet their finger and poke it through the paper of the lattice windows. [gestures] That lack of privacy bothered my mother, I'm sure, much more than it did we children.

Q: Were you curious about America? I know you spent that year in Ohio.

SERVICE: I don't remember being curious about it before then. Yes, I suppose we were curious. We read, of course, about America.

My mother was the political member of the family. She subscribed to The New Republic, I think, about as soon as it started. We got other magazines, Atlantic, and something called Survey or Survey Graphic which was published then. Century magazine was being published then. I think I read all of those. We also got things from Shanghai, The North China Herald, a weekly newspaper in Shanghai, and something called Millard's Review, which later on became the China Weekly Review. I suppose we were interested or curious about the United States, although I don't recall being much concerned.

Let me describe the day. Maybe that's the best thing to do.

My mother had started me when I was five on the Montessori system, which I think is sort of interesting, that she, way up in West China, had written and gotten a Montessori preschool outfit.

So, I had learned how to read and write--read at least--before I started first grade. I was ready for first grade, and I had that in public school in Cleveland, 1915-1916.

My mother had talked to the teacher in the first grade. Because I could read before I started first grade the teacher said, "Well, obviously little Jack can go quite well. I think he can skip second grade."

My mother decided to order the Calvert School [curriculum], which is a home study system. But, it has only six grades. They do the eight grades in six years. She ordered the third grade in the Calvert system. So, in effect I skipped more than a year, you see.

Every morning the first thing to do, first order of business, was your classes, your schoolwork. The Calvert system sent out textbooks, daily assignment sheets, examination questions. You sent the completed examinations back to Baltimore to the head office and they graded them.

I would get up and get to my studies. As soon as you finished your studies for the day, you were free. So, I was very eager on this. I used to finish up, do my recitation, and I might be through by nine thirty or ten o'clock.

Then the day was yours. I was very fond of reading and my parents had the Encyclopedia Britannica, the eleventh edition I think. I was very keen on--I'm talking now, oh, about eight, nine, ten years old probably--very keen on looking up things in the encyclopedia, categorizing things. I remember using the encyclopedia to look up all the Crusades and to study antelopes and various kinds of animals, one thing or another leading you on.

Maybe every other day or so we would go in the afternoon to some other compound, always in a sedan chair when we were small. Later on I would walk, but we always had a servant with us. Eventually we got ponies, Chinese horses, small horses. We'd play with children at this place or that place and come home.

We used to watch, of course, what went on around the house. We'd steal cookies from the cookie jar in the kitchen and watch the cook cooking the meals and so on, play around the compound.

The big thing, I think, was the trips that we used to take. My father was very keen on finding a good place for the family to go in the summer. It was accepted that you couldn't stay in a place like Chengdu during the summer months because it was very damp, very hot and humid. There was a lot of disease, cholera and so on, in the summer time. Almost everyone tried to get away.

The family kept trying to find an ideal place, and finally my father found a mountain which rather stood out from the range that was north of the Chengdu plain. It was about six thousand feet high. The top of it had been a place of refuge. If a mountain was difficult of access, the local people would put a wall around the top, and when there was banditry, civil war, or other disturbance, villagers from the area would go up and take refuge.

Anyway, there was this old chai-tzu, they called it, up there at the top. It belonged to a temple in one of the villages near the foot of the mountain. My father rented this place, took a long-term lease on the top of the mountain. First we, and then quite a few people built small cottages up there on the top of the mountain.

When we took over this mountain--when my father started this summer colony you might say--it was completely undeveloped. So we all helped building trails and paths, connecting the houses and going out to scenic places.

We boys used to have a little secret hideout of our own, a little shack in the woods, a lean-to where we would go and fix lunches. Good fun, not too different from American boyhood in a way, a place in the woods and so on.

So we went there for three or four months every summer. My father would take us up there and then go back to Chengdu--it was two days travel, fifty miles--and then come back, oh, maybe several times during the summer for a weekend or maybe a week or more.

But, always during the summer we would take a trip to the mountains. As I got older, each summer we would go further, explore new mountains.

We were exploring. It was new country. Foreigners had never been to a lot of these places before. Each year we got higher, nine thousand, ten thousand, finally quite high. Eventually we got to fifteen thousand feet.

Q: You told me you had some footnotes from our last interview that you wanted to add.

SERVICE: I think you asked me something about why we made these trips to the mountains every summer. I failed to mention what probably was the most obvious of all. That is, that both of my parents loved the mountains. They had a great feeling for nature. My mother, for instance, had John Muir's books--several of them. I remember reading some myself as a boy, particularly one about a winter trip that John Muir made by himself, climbing Mount Shasta.

This love of the mountains was carried over when we came back to the States, because every summer that we were here we went off with some of my uncles to the High Sierra.

Even in 1916, the family had a reunion at a place called Bass Lake which is a resort lake up from Fresno. But, in 1924 and '25, and again in '27 when I came here on the way to college, I went up with my uncles--my father and my uncles--up to Tuolumne Meadows. In those days that was quite a trip, dirt road, gravel road.

The road down to Lake Tenaya was a one-way road, you know, one hour up, one hour down. I drove with a cousin in an old Model T Ford, and the road was so steep at one point that we had to turn around and go in reverse. The gas fed the carburetor by gravity, so that if you had to go up a steep hill, it wouldn't reach the carburetor. Going backward we could make it.

It was quite a trip, but not nearly as much as when the family first started going there. My uncle--Fred Goodsell, who married my father's sister--has told me about going up with the Service family, camping in Yosemite Valley in either 1903 or 1904 when they went by wagon.

The main purpose of these expeditions to the mountains was fishing. They really camped. They took sacks of potatoes and sacks of onions and sacks of this and that. We lived on fish and pancakes. The real purpose was fishing. But, I wasn't very keen on fishing.

Every day we would go off to some fishing lake near the meadows, within walking distance. Then, I would decide what mountain I was going to climb. I would spend the day scrambling up one of the peaks around there. I climbed all the peaks within one-day walking distance of Tuolumne Meadows, I think. In '27 my cousin and I climbed Mount Lyell. At any rate I developed a liking for the mountains naturally.

When I was growing up in China, the best part of the year, really, was the summer and these trips. Then, eventually, as I got older--when I was ten, nine and ten--why, we'd make a trip to the mountains in the winter because there was always snow up there, at six thousand feet. There was never snow in Chengdu. Chengdu was about fifteen hundred feet in elevation but practically never saw snow. We'd go up usually for, oh, five or six days in the winter time and see the snow.

Q: The topography of Sichuan--I remember Chen Shih-Hsiang telling me--really does look like some of the fantastic Chinese scrolls. Was your sort of mountain like that?

SERVICE: Well, not so much there. Through the Yangtze Gorges you get some of the scenery that you see in paintings. But, these mountains were really more alpine mountains, Matterhorn type. Hang on. [Brings out framed watercolor by A.C. Morse]

This is painted from our mountain. We were out in front of the main range, and you can see the main range back here in the distance. We gave names to these places. These are the Three Muffins over here and some peak called Chiu-feng up there.

[Interview 2: April 6, 1977]

SERVICE: The high point of the summer, was when my father took us on vacation. My mother always said my father never took as much vacation as most other men did. But, he would take a week or ten days or so, and we would take a trip up into the mountains beyond our summer resort.

There were usually temples, incidentally, on top of these mountains, either Buddhist or Taoist temples. Both religions apparently shared the idea that the higher the mountain, the closer to heaven. So, there were old temples. By this time, after years of civil war and disturbance, they were generally in deplorable condition, but usually there were a few old monks there. We would stay at these temples.

The Winter Harvest: Ice Cream Making in Chengdu

SERVICE: Yes. Let's go back to China for a minute. You asked me if there was anything else I could think of.

The last two winters in Chengdu we made the trip up the mountain. One reason we made those winter trips was that my father had a passion for ice cream. We couldn't have ice cream. There was no ice, you see, in Chengdu.

He had gotten the idea of building an icehouse up on the mountain. There was a caretaker to look after the bungalows, and he would put away ice, you see, in the winter. Then it would either be kept for the summer or we would send somebody up the mountain to bring it down.

Well, it never worked out very well because for one thing the Chinese just couldn't really fathom the wasteful idea of using--sawdust, mainly, for packing ice. They would never use enough sawdust to preserve it.

So, we went up to supervise the building and the filling of the icehouse. The ice wasn't very thick and the only source we had--there was no pond or anything--was cisterns. We had cisterns and we'd take ice. It was quite thin ice. [about one inch thick, gesturing] It never kept till summer. By summertime we never had any ice.

So, what finally happened was that along in April my father would send a man from Chengdu fifty miles up the mountain to bring ice down to Chengdu. We would know about when he should arrive, and everything would all be ready. The custard would be made, and we would expect the man in about four or five o'clock on the second day.

We had an awful time getting ice cream makers. We ordered stuff from Montgomery Ward. Every year we sent an order to Montgomery Ward, and it would take a year maybe for the order to get to Chungking. The first one, my father decided was too small. It was a two quart or something like that. Then, we got another. Finally we got a six quart freezer.

Before the man arrived the custard would all be ready. Then, the man would come puffing in with what was left [laughter] of the load of ice. Then, we would make ice cream.

Again it was very difficult to get the Chinese to use enough salt. So, this meant we had to really do it ourselves because wasting salt--salt is very valuable and precious.

But we would finally get six quarts of ice cream. There were five people in the family. So, we couldn't eat it all. People would, of course, be invited in to help share the ice cream, the Yards and other friends. We gorged ourselves on ice cream about, maybe twice a year. All this building of icehouses and so on, all it would produce was about three gallons of ice cream!

A Geographic and Ethnographic Trip into Tibet

SERVICE: In the final year I was in Chengdu, in 1921 when I was just having my twelfth birthday, my father and two other men made a trip that they had talked about for years. It was over the range, and then into the Min River Valley north of Kwanhsien and then into what was called "tribes country" where the people were all Tibetan peoples.

It was quite an intellectually active missionary society in Chengdu. It had a West China Missionary News and the West China Border Research Society which was started in 1922, 1923. I wrote an article for the Missionary News on this trip that I'm talking about.

All these people felt that they were on the edge of things, on a sort of frontier. They were interested in research on the various ethnic groups of aboriginal peoples, Tibet and so on, and a lot of the pre-Chinese groups that were still living in Sichuan, Lolos and others.

Wherever they went, my father and these other people made notes and maps. My father carried a boiling point thermometer, a hypsometer, to get a very precise reading of the altitude, and aneroid barometers--things like that we always carried. Over the high pass, we got a reading of 15,300 feet on the barometer and 15,000 feet on the hypsometer.

All these places we went to in the summer trips were along a range north of where we were, which lay between us and the upper valley of the Min River, which comes down through Kwanhsien and waters the Chengdu plain.

Anyway, there was supposed to be this opium smugglers' trail over this range. My father always talked about trying to cross the mountains into the Min River Valley. So, this year, finally in 1921, we did it.

But when we started we didn't know very much about the height of the mountain or the distance. Our guide claimed that he'd been over it, but later on it turned out he didn't really know much about it. It took us much longer and was much more difficult and higher than we expected.

We expected a trip of about four days from habitation to habitation, four days to cross the range. We had supplies and food, but actually it turned out to take us a week, seven days. So we ran out of food.

Boarding at the Shanghai American School, 1920-1924

Q: When did you go away to boarding school in Shanghai?

SERVICE: By 1920. I'd gone through the sixth grade of Calvert School. So, the question was what to do with me. The obvious thing was for me to go down to Shanghai to the American school. My mother went down the river with me. It took, I think, six weeks, a little more than six weeks to make the trip.

SERVICE: Anyway, we got to the school late. It was October, late October when we got there. My mother expected me to go into high school because I'd finished the grades. But, I'd just had my eleventh birthday, and I was very late for the school year. The school made me do eighth grade over again, which was very boring. It was a bad idea, but there was no help for it.

This school was for American children. About half were day pupils from Shanghai. There were some missionary, but most of them were business and official children. The other half were boarding pupils, and they were practically all missionaries' children.

As I've said already it was single-mindedly trying to be an American school. There were a few non-American, white children, but there were no Chinese. They taught nothing about China. They didn't teach the language or anything like this.

We even tried to play baseball and American football and basketball, but not sports where we could compete with any other schools, because no one else in Shanghai played baseball except for the American community team. We were rather foolish, I thought, in pursuing American sports. That's when I first saw Harry Kingman because he played for the American local community team.

As soon as Kingman came out to Shanghai as a Y secretary, he began playing for the community team in Shanghai, a local team. Of course, he was far better than anyone else. He was a star. He'd played for the big leagues, I think the New York Yankees. So, he quickly became the star of Shanghai. We were all very much impressed, in fact dumbfounded, to see the way he could throw the ball from first base to third base across the diamond, almost like a bullet, without its rising at all.

He became a pitcher. I don't think he was a pitcher in the big leagues, but in Shanghai he was good enough to be the star pitcher for the local team. So we all knew Harry Kingman, although I didn't see a great deal of him outside of watching from the bleachers.

And football was a similar problem. We had to play against a local pick-up men's team or against the American Navy. If a gunboat or something was in town, they would have a team.

In any case, all these things were quite irrelevant to me, because in eighth grade at eleven, I was still two years younger than anyone else in the class. Also, I got my growth rather late. So, I was very much of a shrimp, and hadn't started really to grow. Furthermore, having grown up in a place like Chengdu in West China, I had never seen a roller skate or ridden a bicycle. I'd never played any ball games. I'd never had any participation in athletics. Being very small and unskilled when it came to choosing teams, I was always the last one to be chosen. I hated ball games and never really participated very much, any more than I had to.

This was why I waited out two years before I went to college because I was fed up with being two years younger than everyone else. I was fifteen when I graduated from high school, and I waited two years before I went to college.

Q: Apart from hating sports and being bored in your classwork, how was the rest of school?

SERVICE: Well, it was tough at first because everyone had read about British boarding schools and they had the idea of having fags, smaller boys who did errands for the bigger boys. This I found a little hard to take.

Also, just having so many other Americans, I think, was hard to take. I mean I'd lived in a community where I went over to play with the Davies boys one day or the Canright boys another day. I just wasn't used to having so many of my kind.

The whole business of hazing and fags and so on made the first term rather tough, or at least the first couple of months. My name, Service, sounds like Latin servus, "slave," so some boys tried to call me slave, and I had a couple of fights over that. After I was willing to stand up and fight it out, we outgrew that sort of thing.

I was fairly homesick in those first two or three months but there were YMCA people in Shanghai that kept an eye out for me. My parents had a friend who was a classmate at U[niversity of] C[alifornia], who was working in the consulate there, a man named Sawyer. He used to take me out, for walks on Sundays, things like that.

I was fascinated really--I became fascinated--just by Shanghai. It was such an exciting and, for me, strange place. Transportation, railways--there was a little railway out near us, not far from the school. We were in the Hongkow section of Shanghai, in rented buildings. There was a short railway that ran through Shanghai down to Woosung. I used to go out and just sit and watch the train. If you put your ear to the rail, you could hear the train coming--or I'd listen to the telephone poles, you could hear the whistling in the wires.

Then I found I could go down to the docks and watch the ships. I used to do that weekends, not always alone, sometimes with other boys. The school finally found out about this and were horrified. You read novels about crime, and the docks and the waterside are always supposed to be the worse places! Here we were young lads, [chuckle] eleven and twelve, spending our Saturdays wandering up and down the docks of Shanghai or going across the river to Pootung.

The second year I was there, we lived in what was really a residence, which had been rented and used as a dormitory. There was a heavy, cast iron drainpipe--and we could get out of our window and go up and down the drainpipe. So when friends were leaving for West China, I used to go down and see them off. Their boats left about midnight.

Eventually the school found out about this because someone reported it to the school. They had seen me down at such and such dock seeing some boat off at eleven o'clock. Well, of course, we were supposed to be in bed by eight, I think, eight or eight thirty. So, this got back to the school, and they were going to expel me. But I couldn't easily be expelled because I lived a month away, a month or more travel away. So, they relented.

I enjoyed Shanghai. I learned how to read some Chinese by the numbers on the cars, because the numbers on the streetcars were in English and Chinese. So my first Chinese that I learned was the numbers.

We had a little bit--not very much--spending money. We used to go off to Chinese shops, little tiny sort of Papa-Mama shops, you know, that sold all sorts of things to eat, various things. This was all strictly against the rules, but we used to buy peanuts, buy duck eggs. Chinese were very fond of duck eggs that had been hard-boiled and then sort of pickled in salt. They were very salty inside. Things like that--

One year there was a big missionary conference in Shanghai. There was a Scout troop, and I joined it as soon as I could. I was very active in the Boy Scouts and eventually became senior patrol leader, although it was rather embarrassing because I could never become a first class scout since I didn't swim. You see, in my boyhood in West China there was no possibility of swimming, no place to swim. I was a second class scout while I was senior patrol leader.

When the school moved to new premises in the French Concession in my last boarding year, 1923-1924, it was isolated, and there were no stores or anything nearby. So, the scout troop set up a little store. We sold candy bars and things like that. We started Saturday night movies. We ran that partly because we had a very, very active scout leader.

But, in any case, a lot of people were coming into Shanghai from other mission stations, interior and so on. Someone got the idea that they might need help in being guided to wherever they were going to stay, missionary homes or some hotel or somebody's home, residence.

So we set up a traveler's aid post in the main railway station and took care of these people. But, in between train times we would wander all around the yards, and of course, we had great larks.

It gave me--I wouldn't say it gave me--I already had the sense of adventure and of charging about and exploring, from the very beginning, from my father. Of course, what we kids were doing charging around the railway yards of Shanghai, I don't know. [chuckle]

But foreigners could do almost anything, you know. No one was going to stop you. Actually, no one was going to touch us, as I found out. Chinese kids would have been stopped, I'm sure, from running around the railway yard. Chinese kids would steal in there, go in there to pick up scraps of coal, half burned coal, or something like that. They'd be chased away. But, no one was going to chase away foreign kids. Foreigners lived a sort of special life, were special persons.

Q: Well, it seems as though you certainly got away with murder at that school.

SERVICE: Oh, yes.

Q: Was the education reasonably good?

SERVICE: Yes, I think quite good. Fair. Most of us did quite well when we came back to the States. You know, most of the children went on to college. Most of the missionaries were college-trained people. There were some that weren't, Pentecostals and so on. But, in those days they were very much of a minority. So, most of the missionaries--and certainly most of the children that went to Shanghai American School--went on to college, and I think most of us did pretty well.

Q: What did you do with your school vacations?

SERVICE: Usually people invited me. I don't think that this was arranged, because some of these people were people my parents didn't know. But, my friends would apparently ask their parents, "Well, here is this boy and he can't go home for Christmas. Can't we invite him here?"

This business of having people visiting you for a long time was accepted. Everyone did it. People had to stay with somebody. So, there was never any problem. I always had invitations for Easter and Christmas vacations to someone else's home.

I went to Soochow one Christmas vacation with a boy named Smart. His father died and his mother moved to Berkeley later on. I went out to Shanghai University once with some Baptist people. Several times I stayed with YMCA friends, particularly the Wilburs who knew my parents.

Twelfth Grade and Graduation from Berkeley High, 1924-1925

Q: I guess your parents finally got a home leave in 1924. Is that right?

SERVICE: Yes, that's right, in 1924, from Chungking where my father had been asked to start a YMCA. It was my father's second home leave, although he had been in China by that time, what, nineteen years?

The original plan was, I think, that the family was going to go through Europe. But, for some reason that couldn't be done. So, we came straight across the Pacific, to Berkeley. My grandparents' house had been burned down in the Berkeley fire. [1923] It had been on Oxford Street in that block which is now an experimental University garden.

We stayed up here on Spruce Street with an uncle. Then, we rented a house at Spruce and Rose, and I went to Berkeley High for my last year of school.

Q: How did that strike you after Shanghai?

SERVICE: Terrible.

Q: Really?

SERVICE: Oh, yes. I disliked it very much. It was not a happy year at all.

Q: What was the matter?

SERVICE: Well, I don't know. It was just a huge, big school.

Q: About how big then?

SERVICE: Oh, it was over two thousand. It was sort of overwhelming for that reason.

Q: About how many had you had in your school in Shanghai?

SERVICE: Oh, the whole school had been about four hundred, but that included the lower grades and high school. High school was a hundred, hundred and fifty, something like that. I forget, there were something like thirty people in my class there, my junior class, my last year there.

But, for one thing you arrived from a place like China with your clothes absolutely ridiculous, you know, by American standards. I said my mother made our clothes. Even after we went to Shanghai, Shanghai clothes didn't look like anything here.

We didn't realize in China that boys, by the time they're seniors in high school, wear long pants. When I started to Berkeley--I had just had my fifteenth birthday--I was still very much a runt and I was wearing short pants. I got a lot of kidding about wearing short pants, a senior in high school! So, I got my father quickly to take me out and buy some long trousers, some cords. Everyone wore cords in those days. Of course, they had to be dirty. So, it took me a while to get these dirty enough to be respectable.

I didn't want anyone to know I had been in China because the first time we came to America, when I was six, we were always being embarrassed by being shown off as coming from China.

People would say, "Oh, speak some Chinese for us!" or "Get something we can use for chopsticks. Let's see you eat some rice," and this sort of thing. I made my parents promise not to let anybody know we were from China, not make a big thing of it. So, I tried very hard to keep it a secret that I was [laughter] a strange freak from China.

You have no friends. You come as a senior. Most other people have got their friends. And I worked very hard, maybe because I had nothing else to do.

Q: Were you behind academically?

SERVICE: Oh, no. I did very well.

Q: I didn't mean to suggest that, but I mean how good was your preparation in China?

SERVICE: I think the preparation in Shanghai was okay. Later on when I started to college I had a problem because I didn't have trigonometry. But, last year of high school here at Berkeley I did extremely well, which was a great boon when I applied at Oberlin which will come along a little later.

II AROUND THE WORLD IN EIGHT YEARS: SHANGHAI TO SHANGHAI, 1925-1933

Apprentice Architect in Shanghai

SERVICE: The sensible thing to do was to go back with my parents to Shanghai. I had liked mechanical drawing very much. The YMCA had an architectural office in Shanghai because they had quite a large building program at this time. This was mid-twenties. They were building YMCAs and residences around China. So, they had an architectural office and through a little parental pull I got a job as an apprentice draftsman in this architectural office. I worked there for eighteen months.

I liked it quite a bit, and I thought for a while I would be an architect. For some reason I convinced myself that to be an architect one had to really be an artist and creative and I didn't have that. So I thought I could be a civil engineer which was related to architecture, but more practical.

Q: How was the office set up?

SERVICE: An architect named A.Q. Adamson was employed by the YMCA as head of the YMCA Building Bureau. He was a trained architect, but his main function was administrative. He ran the office, made sure things were done.

They also employed a Hungarian architect named Shafer whom my parents had known quite well. He was a refugee. He had been a soldier in the Austro-Hungarian army during the First World War. During the Russian Revolution they broke out of the camps, or no one kept them in the camps. He and a lot of other Czechs and so on worked their way clear across Siberia and finally got to China.

He had come up to Chungking when my parents were there on a contract to survey a motor road from Chungking to Chengdu. So, they had got to know him. One way or another he had gotten a job in this YMCA Building Bureau. He did most of the designing, actual architectural designing.

Then there was a crew of draftsmen, most of them Chinese except myself.

Q: What tradition did he design in?

SERVICE: Most of the houses, the YMCA residences, were very utilitarian, perhaps a trace of European. He built the foreign Y in Shanghai which is Italian Renaissance, I suppose.

Q: Eclectic?

SERVICE: Eclectic, yes, but more Italian Renaissance than anything else.

Q: What were your functions?

SERVICE: I was simply, as I say, a very junior draftsman. I was given jobs of working up floor plans. Shafer would give me the rough layout and the size of the rooms, and I drew the very simplest type of detailed floor plans.

I don't think that we had to conform to any particular building codes, certainly not in Chinese cities. We probably did have to in the [International] Settlement of Shanghai. We were building one building there, and that's what I worked on most of the time, the Foreign YMCA in Shanghai. It was a big building, I think about ten or eleven stories, which for Shanghai was big. There were several Chinese YMCAs in Shanghai. Then there was a Navy YMCA which was built to take care of seamen, particularly navy seamen.

Q: Did you get out to the building sites?

SERVICE: I don't think the Foreign Y was started because I was still working on the plans. [laughter] So I don't think that I actually saw it under construction. I didn't get to any of the other sites because they were all inland or elsewhere.

Q: I was wondering if it was the custom for architects to supervise the building.

SERVICE: Yes. I think that the YMCA Building Bureau usually had someone to supervise, just as here.

Q: Right.

SERVICE: The bureau made the contracts and, of course, you have to have some representative to supervise, make sure the contractor fulfills the contract. But, who that was in Shanghai I don't know, because there was no one around when I was there. It may have been Adamson himself that would go out and check. I don't know.

Q: Do you have any idea how the fee system worked? Did you get ten percent or was it on a flat fee for work done?

SERVICE: This was an office of the YMCA, and people were simply paid by the Y.

Q: Salaried?

SERVICE: Salaried, yes. I assume that the Y was having enough of a building program going on that it paid them to hire their own staff, rather than work on any sort of a fee system.

I actually worked in the office building of the national committee of the YMCA. The national committee had a building in the downtown area of Shanghai. We were on one of the top floors of that.

A Blank Period, A Fairly Quiet Year

Q: This was an exciting period in Chinese history. How much did you see of what was going on?

SERVICE: Well, actually, you see, I missed most of the excitement because the 1925, May 30, demonstrations took place when we were still in the States. It was just about the time I was graduating, just before I graduated. I remember my parents being very concerned and very alarmed at what was going on, reading the newspapers. But, by the time I got to China in the fall of '25 the excitement was over.

Then, the Northern Expedition was starting in 1926, coming up from Canton. Chiang Kai-shek was leading one wing. I remember our house boy that we had in Shanghai, our cook boy, being very concerned, very excited about it--he was obviously a patriot of the Nationalists--and talking to him about how good these people were. Most of the foreign press was treating them all as Reds and Bolshies. Chiang Kai-shek was called a Bolshevik and so on. But our cook was very pleased and excited about it.

Then I left Shanghai in late '26 to come home. I was actually in Shanghai from September 25, 1925, until December 26, 1926. Then, I came on a long, round the world trip to go to college. I actually read about the events of the spring of 1927 when I was in Paris. I remember buying the Paris Herald Tribune and sitting there--in front of the Madeleine, I think it was--sitting down and reading all these exciting things about the attacks on foreigners in Nanking and so on. But on the whole, except for the fact that the Northern Expedition was starting and people were beginning to be concerned about what seemed to be the anti-foreign thrust of the Kuomintang, it wasn't a terribly exciting time.

There was a build-up of foreign troops in Shanghai. There was alarm. Almost every country was bringing more forces into Shanghai by the time I left. But, it really wasn't until '27 that the big crunch came. So, I came in between.

Q: What did you do with your spare time and how did you live?

SERVICE: Well, I remember very little about it. It just was not a very exciting period, sort of a blank period.

I lived at home with my parents. I had a bout of asthma, quite a serious bout of asthma. I had jaundice that year, went into a hospital for several days. They didn't know how to treat jaundice. But, otherwise it was a fairly quiet year.

In the summer of 1926, my parents went to Tsingtao where they rented a cottage. Tsingtao was one of the places where people from Shanghai went for the summer. But, I couldn't get that much vacation, of course, so I only went up for a short while.

A friend of theirs, a Methodist missionary who later on became a bishop, was going to Peking. So, I went up to Peking with him, summer of '26, and we had, I forget, maybe a week in Peking.

But, the most exciting part of that trip was that--The fighting had just stopped between Feng Yu-Hsiang's army and Chiang Tso-Lin's army. Feng, the so-called Christian general, who had a very good army, well trained troops, had withdrawn from Peking, had been forced out of Peking by Chiang Tso-Lin. He withdrew northwestward up the railway to Nankow Pass and then fortified himself. Finally after some very severe and heavy fighting he had been driven out of the Pass northward into Inner Mongolia.

The railway had just been opened up. We got on one of the first trains to go. It was terribly crowded and we managed to get ourselves onto the cow catcher of the locomotive. It was a huge locomotive. This was the only railway in China that had American locomotives. It was because of the very steep grades. They had thought that American locomotives, being heavier and more powerful for the Rockies, would be better.

So, it was a great locomotive with a large platform out front. We had, I suppose, eight or ten people, all crowded on to this platform, in front of this huge, puffing, snorting, double-barreled steam engine, went up through Nankow Pass and so on. That was a lot of fun.

We saw the trenches and saw the battlefields. There had been a lot of serious fighting.

Some of the Sights of Peking

SERVICE: My missionary guide was very much interested in the plight of the women involved in the night life of a city like Peking. So he took me on a tour of the brothels of Peking. Being dragged around by a missionary--who, of course, was not doing any business, he was just going around and talking to the people, the girls and the madams, and just observing--was a bit bizarre, it seemed to me.

Q: What did he hope to accomplish?

SERVICE: Well, I don't know. I assume he had a sociological missionary interest in the conditions. He obviously had done it before.

Q: How did the situation strike you?

SERVICE: I think we better take this thing out of this!

Q: Okay. I'll make a note. Can you really see anything wrong with that? Gladstone did it after all.

SERVICE: Yes, well, it just seemed like an odd--It seemed to me to be a strange thing to do. I was curious in a young way, I suppose, but I had never really--I knew such things existed, of course, but I had never thought of visiting a brothel before. We went all through the places outside the Chien men [the old main gate of Peking's Tartar City].

Q: How did you react to the brothels?

SERVICE: Oh, if you mean was I attracted or excited, no. I was just sort of perplexed as I recall, curious. I don't remember having any very strong reaction.

Q: What did your parents say about that?

SERVICE: I never told them. I never told them, [chuckle] just as I never told my parents about these other incidents. My parents never knew about these things in high school I talked about. You feel sort of ashamed that you don't react or don't defend yourself, but it all happens so suddenly that you can't. So, you just feel ashamed of it afterward I think. But, this thing, there didn't seem to be any point in telling my parents about it.

I saw the main sights of Peking. You couldn't see very much of the Forbidden City, but you could see the Temple of Heaven.

The man I was with stayed with someone in the Bible Society, and they had an old Dodge which was a famous car. It was a Dodge touring car, about 1924 or '25 model, which apparently was a very sturdy car. It wasn't a four-wheel drive or anything like that, but it would go on the worst kinds of roads and was very popular in North China and Inner Mongolia. Roy Chapman Andrews was making his trips about that time, and this was the kind of car they used. I remember riding around Peking in this old Dodge touring car.

Q: Was there anything else you wanted to say about those China years?

SERVICE: I don't think so.

A Long, Solitary Tour Through Asia and Europe

SERVICE: I had the idea of studying engineering in college. It was always taken for granted I would go to [University of California] Berkeley. No other place was ever suggested. But if I was going to take engineering, I needed trigonometry and I hadn't had trigonometry. So, we planned that I would come here to Berkeley for summer school.

Q: This was in--

SERVICE: Nineteen twenty-seven. I had always wanted to make the trip through Europe. It had been talked of in '24, been impossible. So, it was planned that I would travel alone from Shanghai as far as Ceylon, and at Ceylon I would be picked up by some people from the YMCA coming on a following ship. Then, I would travel through Europe with these people.

But after I left Shanghai their plans were changed by the YMCA. They were told they couldn't take the time for the trip. They had to go directly to the United States. So, my parents telegraphed me, did I wish to go on or did I wish to come back? I could do either one. Of course I decided to go on.

The ship went to Singapore. I left it there and went up through the Malay states. At Penang I got a British India boat to Burma, spent a little while there, went up to Mandalay and back, and then to India.

There were YMCA people in all these places, and my father had written to some of them. So I could always check in with the YMCA people, and they helped me plan my sightseeing.

When I got to India I went to Calcutta and a very nice man there helped me plan my India tour, which was quite an extensive tour eventually.

I traveled alone, had a sleeping bag, a sleeping roll, and I spent nights on trains when I could--a very sensible thing to do.

I got up to Darjeeling. I had quite a trip, Taj Mahal.

Q: Did you make comparisons in your mind between India and China? How did India impress you?

SERVICE: I don't remember too much. I remember being very depressed. I did not like India, never have liked India. I'm sure my feeling was the same then, that it was so much more of a hopeless place than China, the attitude of the people.

But, I've been to India so many times since that it's a little unfair for me to try to really analyze what was my feeling at the age of seventeen, except that I never felt the affection or closeness or sympathy with the people of India that I do for the people in China.

Q: Did it bother you that it was a colony?

SERVICE: No, I can't say that it did. To be perfectly honest I thought the British did a good job of running it, the railways and so on, were good.

Then I picked up another steamer in Colombo, Ceylon, and went on to Europe. The ship landed in Genoa. I had talked to people on the boat--it was in March--and decided the best thing to do was to take another boat down to Naples, then come north with the spring.

I had gotten a guidebook by this time and looked up pensions, cheap. So I went to a rather modest pension in Naples. At the first meal--they had meals served at a long table, family style--there were two American women right across the table from me, and talking away about San Francisco, San Francisco Bay.

I said nothing because no one said anything to me. But, at the end of the meal one of the ladies leaned across the table to me and said, "Do you speak English?" I said, "Yes, I speak English and I come from the same part of the country you people come from." So, they were quite interested.

We chatted a bit. They had just arrived in Naples and I had just arrived in Naples. So, they said, "Well, we're going out this afternoon to Pozzuoli," I think it was, near Naples. "Would you like to come along?" I said, "Fine." They said, "Well, meet us down here in the lobby in half an hour."

When I came down there was a young American woman with them, a very attractive young woman. They asked my name to introduce me. I said, "My name is Service." One of the women looked surprised and said, "Younger brother of Roy Service?" I said, "No, son."

It turned out that both these women were school teachers in San Francisco and had been classmates of my mother's and father's at Berkeley. The young woman was a ward of one of them, a singer. She'd been singing in the San Francisco opera, minor singer. But, she had done well enough to get a job, a learning job, in the San Carlo opera company in Naples for a year.

She was going to take some time off and travel around Italy with her guardian and her guardian's friend--these old, old ladies they seemed. [chuckle] They were in their mid-forties, I suppose, if they were in my parents' class because at this time my parents would be forty-seven.

At any rate, I sort of tagged along through Italy with these people and then spent a week in Switzerland. It was April and you couldn't do much climbing. It was between seasons.

By this time I had gotten the idea of bicycling through England. I went to France, but I didn't like France because the French that I had had in the American School I found was very little help when I got to a real French-speaking area.

What to Major in? A Switch from Engineering to Economics

SERVICE: I did fairly well my first year, except with my idea of engineering. I had signed up for a very heavy math course. It had a woman instructor who, I think, was probably just starting teaching. At any rate, I don't think she was a very good teacher.

They had the honor system in Oberlin. You always sign the honor pledge at the end of the blue book, "I have received no help," and so on. On the first blue book that we took in this course I forgot all about the pledge, and I didn't sign it.

So, when I got my blue book back, zero. Well, it was another thing like this mechanical drawing thing business. [Allegation that Jack stole a T-square in high school] I said, "I'm very sorry, but this was the first blue book I've taken, and I just forgot all about it." Well, she finally gave me credit. Anyway, I had decided by that time I didn't like mathematics, not all that much.

This meant that I wasn't going to be an engineer. My college experience really was a sort of a floundering, groping around, not knowing what I wanted to do. After a good start in my first freshman semester, I seemed gradually to go downhill. Then in my junior year I began to get interested again and to come up. My junior year and my senior year I did quite well. But, there was no Phi Beta Kappa key like my future wife got!

Q: What did you major in?

SERVICE: Well, this again was a funny business because after I lost interest in engineering, I didn't know what to major in. I ended up with a minimum economics major, because economics just seemed the sensible thing to do--practical.

But, I took courses like economic history of the United States. I liked history. Economic history of the United States was history, but it would count for economics. I had to take a course in accounting. I took a course in foreign trade and things like that. But, I got by with just a barebones minimum economic major.

I actually took my introductory economics in the fall of 1929, right during the crash. I don't think our professor had any conception of what really was happening on Wall Street. Not many people did, except that stock prices were going up. When the market broke, he believed that this was just another business cycle. This one happened to be worse, but we would come out of it all right. In fact, for a long time he was quite optimistic that it wasn't going to be a very serious one.

I had one professor, a quiet old fellow who I think was probably a Socialist, but he was very discreet about what his real beliefs were. He sometimes would make a quiet remark that indicated that he didn't believe the old classical economics that the head of the department taught--who was sure that the Depression was not a very serious or deep one.

Q: When you were taking your economics were the theories of Keynes brought in at all?

SERVICE: Not at all. Well, Keynes may have been mentioned, but none of our professors were Keynesian, and certainly we learned nothing about Keynes' theories. I mean it was pretty much Adam Smith with maybe a little Marshall and Ricardo, but it was not Keynesian.

Q: What language did you take?

SERVICE: I offered French. I had had a little French in Shanghai American School, but it was abominable, so I told them I knew some Chinese. They sent me around to see a Foreign Service officer up in the Division of Chinese Affairs, who turned out to be someone my parents had known and I had known slightly in Shanghai.

He was rather busy and surprised. He said, "Well, I haven't spoken any Chinese for a long time." A lot of people didn't keep up their Chinese very well. He said, "Just tell me something about yourself, where you were born, where you went to school, and what you're doing."

So, I rattled on for a while in my terrible Sichuanese. He said, "Well obviously, you know some Chinese." [laughter]

After the oral, the examiners said, "Wait in the waiting room outside, the anteroom." So, I went back there and--I forget--fifteen or twenty minutes later, somebody came to me, a clerk, and gave me a piece of paper and instructions about having a physical examination at the navy dispensary.

Well, this was a tip-off. If you were sent to get the physical, then you had passed. They didn't tell you officially until some days later. I went and passed my physical exam that afternoon at the Naval Dispensary.

Then, there was the question of what to do. I had asked the man who examined me in Chinese for advice. This was January, '33. He said, "Look--there's going to be retrenchment in the department. Appropriations are going to be cut. There are simply going to be no appointments of any Foreign Service officers. You've undoubtedly passed the examination since you took the physical, but I can't give you a clue when you may get appointed, how soon."

I mentioned that I was thinking of going back to China anyway. My father was going then and my mother was going to follow later. He said, "Well, that would be an excellent idea. If you go to China, apply for a clerk's job, a clerkship. You'll probably get one if there is a vacancy because you will have saved the Department of State money by being already in China; and the fact that you've passed the examinations and are on the waiting list for appointment will also be in your favor.

So that's what we did. I went with my father to China.

Q: Supposing you had been offered a foreign service position outside of China, would you have taken it?

SERVICE: Oh certainly. I'm sure I would have. Simply that--A job was critical at that time. Almost any other job probably too. I don't know.

Trainee in the American Oriental Bank, Shanghai

SERVICE: My father and I had a difficult time sailing because the Bank Holiday intervened and my father couldn't get the money to pay for the steamship ticket. They weren't anxious to take checks in those days since all the banks were closed. [chuckling] But, he had a brother in Berkeley who had a jewelry store down on Shattuck Avenue, L.H. Service, and he helped out. All the old Berkeley people knew L.H. Service.

Anyway, we got on a Danish freighter and got to Shanghai.

Q: Were you at that point formally engaged to Caroline?

SERVICE: Yes. Oh, I'm sure we were formally engaged. After I passed the examinations we had agreed. I'm not sure that I gave Caroline a ring then. I don't think I gave her a ring till later. Even then it was a ring my mother had, that my mother gave me, that I gave to Caroline. But anyway, we considered ourselves engaged.

Q: Then, you arrived in Shanghai in 1933.

SERVICE: Shanghai was having a deflation. Things were not good in Shanghai. American firms were letting people off. My brother Bob had been to Berkeley, had dropped out--he didn't like Berkeley, was unhappy--and gone out to China. He had been fired by the company he was working with. He was working as a sales representative for a machinery manufacturer.

There was an American-owned bank in Shanghai, the American Oriental Bank, which was run by a man named Raven. My family knew Raven very well. We also knew a Hungarian who was number two in the bank. Like our architect friend, he was a man who had come out across Siberia from a Russian prison camp. He had stayed in Shanghai and gone into banking.

At any rate, the bank agreed to take me on as a trainee. The salary was $200 Mex. a month, which at that time was--well, less than $100.

Q: Two hundred dollars what? What was the word you used?

SERVICE: Mexican. We'd say Mex.

Q: Was that the currency in Shanghai?

SERVICE: Yes. Well, Mexican dollars, had circulated very widely in the early days of China trade. By this time the Chinese government was putting out its own dollars. But, the word Mexican still was used. You saw Mexican dollars with Spanish, all sorts of different kinds of coins. Most of the coins were now minted in China. But, the phrase when you meant Chinese dollars was always Mex. or Mexican.

Q: I hadn't heard that before.

SERVICE: When you meant American dollars you said gold. You never said U.S. dollars. You said gold, even after Roosevelt devalued.

At any rate, I was sort of a trainee in the bank, working with the Chinese clerks as a teller, learning how to be a bank teller.

III APPRENTICESHIP OF A FOREIGN SERVICE OFFICER, 1933-1942

Clerkship in Yunnanfu

SERVICE: Almost as soon as I got to Shanghai I went around to call on the American consul-general, Cunningham, a very elderly gentleman who had been in Shanghai a long time, and applied for a clerkship.

It wasn't too long--I think it was only about six weeks--when Cunningham asked me to come and see him and said, "Would you like a job as clerk at Yunnanfu?"--which in those days was considered the end of everything. I mean to hell-and-gone, a remote and isolated post in South West China. He said, "You don't have to say today." I rushed off and sent a telegram to Caroline.

I didn't get an answer right away, but I went back to Cunningham I think the next day and said yes, I'd take the job. Then, Caroline's cablegram came in saying, "No, don't go!" But, the die was cast. I had committed myself, so I went to Yunnanfu which is now known as Kunming. In fact, to the Chinese even in those days it was known as Kunming. It was only the foreigners who still called it Yunnanfu because that is what it had been before 1912. The old Chinese name was Yunnanfu.

Q: So, that was your first post. What did it pay?

SERVICE: The pay was $1800, U.S. dollars, for that day and age, a very fine job. But as soon as Roosevelt came in the Economy Act cut all federal salaries 15 percent across the board. That still didn't bother me. I had plenty to live on. But then they started devaluing the dollar. This meant that our paycheck went down as the U.S. dollar went down.

It was particularly bad in Yunnan because it was in the French sphere of influence and a lot of prices were based on the French Indochinese piaster, which was a gold-based currency. So, we had a very substantial cut in pay.

Eventually the government got around to compensating us, not for the depreciation of the U.S. dollar, but for the "appreciation of foreign exchange." So, it meant I had eventually quite a nice lump sum payment which I promptly proceeded to deposit in the bank, the American Oriental Bank in Shanghai.

Duties

Q: What were your duties? First off, to whom did you report?

SERVICE: When I first got there there were two officers--two vice consuls actually. The senior vice consul who was in charge was a man named [Charles] Reed. Then, there was John Davies.

Everybody in the Foreign Service was usually sent first to a Mexican or a Canadian border post for a short trial period, usually three months or so. Then, you came to Washington for Foreign Service School which was another three months, sort of indoctrination, orientation, whatever you want to call it. Then you were sent out to the field. So this was John Davies' first field post really. He'd been in Windsor, Ontario and then Foreign Service School.

Very soon after I got there they decided that with two men there--in other words the chief vice consul and me--there was no need for John Davies. They were cutting down everywhere. John then was transferred up to Peking as a language student. You asked who I reported to. Well, there was only one person to report to, and that was the vice consul.

The office, of course, reported to the legation--it hadn't been raised to embassy status. We always said Peking, but actually the capital of the country was Nanking. In 1928, the Nationalist Kuomintang government made Nanking the capital.

This was very unpopular with the foreigners because, well, they loved Peking and they had their establishments in Peking. They had no lovely buildings in Nanking. So, the ambassador kept most of his office--most of the chancery was in Peking. He would make occasional visits to Nanking to conduct business.

So, we would always say that we reported to the legation in Peking. We generally reported by mail which might take two or three weeks, because the only way to get to Yunnan was a long trip through Hong Kong, then down to Haiphong, then by train, the French railway, from Haiphong--which in those days was a three-day trip because they didn't run at night--up to Yunnan. You could come directly overland but it would have taken you weeks and weeks to make the trip. So the only practical way was this two-week trip around.

Q: When you say direct--

SERVICE: Well, you'd go up the Yangtze to Chungking and then overland to Kunming, but it would take you about four weeks to do it.

Q: What were your duties there?

SERVICE: I did everything. Files, of course. I maintained the files. I did all the filing. I did all the typing and I was not a trained typist. This was to create a lot of grief because--Reed was terribly worried about promotions and much concerned about almost everything, social position, everything else.

But he couldn't stand any erasures or any mistakes on a page. I was always having to retype things so they would go in looking perfect. I myself don't mind little things like that. [laughter]

He had me do trade letters, commercial work. But, there really weren't any commercial opportunities in Kunming. There couldn't be because the French were not about to let any Americans do business--or anyone else except themselves, any other foreigners except themselves--do business in Yunnan. All goods had to come through French Indochina.

We would get trade inquiries--what is the market for beer, for instance, in your consular district? The only real letter to send them back was just, "There isn't any." But not my boss! He insisted that we write them a full dress discussion of the market and procedures for importing and the desirability of getting a local agent, the desirability and necessity of getting a forwarding agent in Haiphong, and all the rest of this. Every trade letter had to be a certain number of pages.

I had gotten eventually to do most of the routine consular work, registration of American citizens, issuance of passports, registration of births, marriages, this sort of thing.

After a year I was commissioned as a vice consul with no increase in pay.

Q: Your first title was what?

SERVICE: Just clerk, Foreign Service clerk. But then they commissioned me a vice consul, which meant that I could perform services like passports since I had signing authority. I could do notariats.

"Bureaucrats are Made, not Born"

SERVICE: My chief was not a China service man. We had a Chinese interpreter in the office who was supposed to call attention to newsworthy things in the [Chinese] newspapers and translate them if necessary.

But, my vice consul didn't think he was doing a very good job. So he'd make poor Mr. Hwang sit down beside him, and he would point at the paper, [sternly] "Now, what is this? What's this?" You know, point at the headlines here and there and make this poor Chinese translate.

Actually, most of his political reporting was from talking to the British consul general who was an old China hand and whose Chinese was excellent. He was eccentric like a lot of British people in remote places. Homosexual and a Muhammadan to boot. He'd served in places like Kashgar.

But he was not alone in being unique or peculiar. In the French consulate, one of their members was a Buddhist.

But, anyway, Charles Reed talked mainly to the British consul general. He'd go to the club and hear the gossip at the club. The commissioner of customs and the commissioner of posts had Chinese colleagues, theoretically on the same level they were. So, they got a good deal of news because they had to know where the disturbances were. The political reporting basically was the sort of gossip Reed got from talking to other people. We had to submit a monthly political report. If anything urgent came along we would make a special report. If it was something really vital we'd send a telegram, but that was very unusual.

I remember one night. I think we were having a Christmas party and a telegram came in--any telegram was an event. We had to leave the party, rush down to the office, open the safe and get out the code book.

The telegram was from the legation in Peking relaying a circular from the Department of State saying that the president had declared December 24th a holiday because of the weekend arrangements or something like that. But, of course, we'd passed December 24th [laughter] by the time we got the telegram. So, we went back to the party.

The political reporting was, shall we say, very low key, very unimportant.

Q: So, you don't feel you really got any good training in this--

SERVICE: Negative training, mostly negative.

Q: In what sense?

SERVICE: How not to do it. This was a favorite phrase of Mao Zedong, training by negative example.

We ought to go back to Kunming because I rejected out of hand the value of serving there. That really wasn't true, because although I wasn't getting any very useful training in political reporting, I was learning to be a bureaucrat.

This is something that should not be treated facetiously. Bureaucrats are made, not born. Nothing in my background trained me or prepared me to be a bureaucrat. It's very important. It's not all negative. If you're going to get along in a bureaucratic system, bureaucratic organization, you've got to learn what things are acceptable, what you can do, what you can't do. You've got to learn prudence and caution, how to get things done, things like that.

Actually I became, I think in most people's minds, a pretty good bureaucrat. Most of my career was spent as a bureaucrat. I've made a little summary here. Actually, out of my twenty-nine years of service--which were diminished by five and a half by firing, leaving twenty-three and a half years as actual time served in the Foreign Service--I only spent about five years in political reporting.

This is what I'm generally known for, and this is probably why I'm sitting here talking to you. But, actually administrative and consular work, which are usually lumped together, were about fourteen years of my time. So most of my time was, shall we say, in bureaucratic pursuits.

Of course, in the Amerasia case I violated a lot of bureaucratic rules, and I acted in a very unbureaucratic way. That's one of the reasons why I got into trouble. But that's something that comes later.

Also, the business of being a clerk and learning from the ground up how things are actually done--filing, coding a telegram, all the routine operations--was something that always stood me in good stead.

I had it in Kunming. I had it for a while in Peking because after things got busy in China politically, then they needed extra help in the code room, and the language officers were called out for night code room duty.

Then in Shanghai, as we'll see later, most of my work was administrative.

Always in my later Foreign Service career I knew what the practical problems were. I knew the advantages of writing, breaking up a despatch, for instance, into various smaller despatches, because then they would be filed more easily under the appropriate topic. You write a grab bag type of despatch, why the file clerk has got a terrible problem.

Learning how to draft telegrams so that the night duty officer could get the subject right away and decide whether or not it's worth decoding in the middle of the night, and learning how to deal with subordinates. All these and more were improved by having had a basic grounding. Most Foreign Service officers come in and start as a commissioned officer. They never had the non-commissioned, grassroots, down-to-earth sort of experience. Anyway, that covers my addendum.

Incidentally, talking about bureaucracy, I was going to relate an incident in Kunming when I was learning to be a bureaucrat. Every post in those days was required to submit weekly, for the U.S. Public Health Service, what was called a quarantine report. It was supposed to report epidemics for the U.S. Public Health Service.

Generally, most consuls were in seaports. But Kunming was five hundred miles from any water. We didn't even know the population, and there were no medical statistics. So, we simply had a form statement. We would put it on this form each week, "The population is estimated to be 150,000. There are no statistics, but typhoid, smallpox, syphilis, are prevalent, and such and such diseases are endemic, cholera and so on." When I had spare time I would type these up in advance and have them all ready. It just seemed to me completely absurd that we should do this.

So, I kept telling Mr. Reed that we should explain and object. He laughed at me and he said it was no use. But, I persisted. He said, "Well, okay. Write a despatch and send it in."

So we wrote a formal despatch to the Department of State explaining all the circumstances. We waited months and eventually a reply came back.

[paraphrasing] The Department of State has forwarded our despatch to the Treasury Department which in turn had forwarded it to the U.S. Public Health Service (which was under Treasury). They now had pleasure in transmitting the reply back through the same channels.

The Public Health Service reported they read our reports with great interest, found them of much value, and hoped that the consulate at Kunming would be instructed to continue to submit them.

Reed laughed, of course, when this came in. He said, "I told you so."

But, he also had his foible in bureaucracy because he was trying, all of the time he was there, to get Kunming declared an unhealthy post. In those days you got service credit for time and a half if you served in an unhealthy post.

Kunming was considered a healthy post simply because somebody looked at a map and said, "Well, it's on a plateau; the elevation is six thousand feet, lovely climate." So, we were a healthy post.

But, Shanghai and Hangzhou--Shanghai was a modern city. You lived in a foreign concession. There was sewage, sanitation, doctors, and all the rest of it. But, Shanghai was listed as an unhealthy post.

Reed spent a good deal of his time in Kunming on a campaign to get this changed, but he was as unsuccessful as I. [laughter]

The Opium Trade

Q: What sort of trouble did these missionaries get into?

SERVICE: They were always trying to protect their converts against what they considered persecution by the Chinese. Heavy taxation--opium. The Chinese wanted them to grow opium. How else were they going to get any taxes out of them? This was typical pretty much all over.

I think that the missionaries were gulled at times by their converts. No doubt their people were badly treated. Most of the aborigines were badly treated by the Chinese. The Chinese took the best land. The aborigines either were left in the valleys if they were malarial, or were pushed up on the mountains. Where the land was good the Chinese were in occupation. In taxation, in everything that concerned government, they were discriminated against.

Q: What about the opium trade? Did that ever come under your official eye or did you manage not to notice?

SERVICE: You couldn't help but have it under your eye since the poppies were everywhere. Whole fields around the city of Kunming were a mass of poppies in the springtime. There was vacant land inside the city walls, right outside the walls of the consulate, that was planted with poppies.

Did the trade come to our notice? Certainly you couldn't avoid knowing about it. There were certain people there in town, French people, that had no visible means of support. One assumed that they were engaged in it some way or another.

Some foreigners smoked opium. The Frenchman who was the local representative for the Salt Gabelle which was the third Chinese organization run by foreigners, smoked opium [Others were the Maritime Customs and the Posts]. After dinner he would generally retire and smoke.

The whole life style, the daily schedule of a city like Kunming was tied to opium smoking. People got up very late in the morning, and late in the evening they would come out in the streets to get a snack. The whole town was geared to the prevalence of opium smoking.

You saw it everywhere you went. If you traveled, the inns were full of the smell of it. Your chair bearers and so on would smoke. It was a very commonly seen thing.

We took trips on ferry boats on a lake near Kunming. I remember watching an old man, for instance, curl up on deck and then smoke, just taking advantage of the relaxation, quiet on the boat crossing the lake to smoke.

One thing I may not have stressed was the fact that Yunnan was one of the principal opium producing regions of China. It was an important cash crop. The opium was shipped out through various other warlord domains down the river to Shanghai, Hangzhou, and also particularly down the West River to Canton. Of course, some of it went into Indochina, and some of it we suspected was processed into morphine and heroin.

Soldiers and opium were what Yunnan really lived on, exporting soldiers and exporting opium.

The United States government was very much interested, then as now, to stop opium traffic, narcotics traffic. So we were supposed to report on that.

I just happened to pick up recently a Bulletin of the Concerned Asian Scholars, July-September, 1976. I see there's a long article in here, a very good article as a matter of fact, on opium and the politics of gangsterism in Nationalist China, 1927-45. One of the important sources this author, Jonathan Marshall, uses are American consular reports from all over China. I find a number of reports in here that were written by Reed and Ringwalt while I was in the consulate in Kunming and which I myself typed and prepared to be sent out.

They mention in one place a figure of 130,000,000 ounces for 1933.

Q: From the province of Yunnan?

SERVICE: The province of Yunnan.

Q: Doesn't that seem like an extraordinarily high figure?

SERVICE: It's a tremendous figure but--I don't know. No one actually knew of course. It was a guess, but if you saw the countryside around Kunming in the springtime when it was just a mass, a sea of opium poppies, you could believe an awful lot was produced.

Q: How did you and your seniors arrive at these figures? This sort of statistics collection has always struck me as a tremendous problem.

SERVICE: Well yes. You had ideas of the magnitude of the trade through the size of military convoys that would take it out of the province for instance.

Q: Military convoys?

SERVICE: Oh yes.

Q: Whose army?

SERVICE: Well, it had to be by military to give it safety. Most of it moved in very large shipments. One warlord shipping it through the territory of another warlord, by arrangement of course.

There would be a pay-off. But you would hear, for instance, of convoys of a hundred or two hundred mules. Well, we're talking here about ounces, so you'd convert that to pounds, into mule loads. A hundred mule loads is a lot of opium.

Q: Of course it is.

SERVICE: And so, it's actually tons, and perhaps hundreds of tons, of opium that was being produced, that one could actually get very clear evidence of.

Q: Who counted? Was it direct observation or did you have sources who brought you these reports?

SERVICE: Sometimes scuttlebutt, rumor. Sometimes missionaries had seen them. Sometimes Chinese reported them. Occasionally something would get in the newspapers, but not very much of that sort of thing. This was generally gossip and rumor. But sometimes if you just happened to be traveling yourself you might see them on the road. We didn't do much traveling, but if a large shipment was being made it would get talked about.

Q: I look forward to reading that article.

SERVICE: The thing that's interesting about this article, one thing to me that's interesting about this article, is that in the late 1950s, or around 1960, there was a man named Koen, I think it is, who wrote a book on the China Lobby. This was his Ph.D. dissertation, a rewrite of it, and it was being published by Macmillan. In it he made some accusations, some statements tying the Kuomintang to opium business.

After the book was published Macmillan got cold feet, withdrew the book, tried to get back all copies from libraries and people they sold it to, and simply squashed the book. I've been told, and I think it's probably true, that it was the State Department that brought pressure on Macmillan to withdraw the book.

Yet here is this article written now, much later, all based on U.S. government consular reports showing absolute, complete, and very intimate tie-up of government in China, including the Kuomintang government, with the opium business, deriving income from it.

Q: On a fairly institutionalized basis.

SERVICE: Oh yes, sure. And yet the State Department apparently forced Macmillan or scared Macmillan into withdrawing this book. It became a collector's item, of course, until it was reprinted here recently.

Q: How does the book stand up?

SERVICE: Oh, it stands up very well. The part on the opium is quite peripheral. It's not at all integral to the story of the book.

Q: I think that's a very interesting footnote. Did opium users function okay?

SERVICE: Oh, yes. Opium in moderation is probably no worse than cigarette smoking, and cheaper in those days in Yunnan.

People would smoke usually in the evening. Then, about ten-thirty or eleven o'clock they would want some refreshment, and the streets would suddenly be quite full of people. A great many peddlers selling Chinese-type snacks would be on the street, noodles and things like this, for this post-smoking snack, like the after-theater crowd.

We knew it was just as well not to try to get hold of our number one boy along in the middle of the forenoon, or in the middle of the afternoon, because he was down in his room having a few pipes.

You would telephone people in government offices. We did have telephones, although they didn't work very well. Particularly in Chengdu when I was a boy, if you telephoned somebody or you tried to call on somebody, and they said, "He's out telephoning," it always meant that he was having opium!

Lung Yun, the Local Warlord

Q: What relations did you have with the provincial government? Did you have your own warlord or conflicting ones?

SERVICE: There very definitely was a local warlord named Lung Yun, "Dragon Cloud," who was part aborigine, probably mixed Chinese and aborigine. But, he had gotten Yunnan very firmly in his grip. Of course he worked with the French, but I think the French were quite content to let him govern.

But they had him really under a very tight rein because it was impossible for him to import any arms, buy any arms, except from them. The foreign trade had to come through Indochina. The only outlet to the world that was usable was through Indochina.

I think that they had agreements with him on things like handling of political exiles. There were always some dissidents, Annamese dissidents who were opposed to French rule. So, I'm sure that the French, or Lung Yun for the French, kept a pretty close watch on that.

Then, there were problems like deserters from the Foreign Legion. A good part of the garrison in Indochina was Foreign Legion, and some of them would take off and run to the hills occasionally, end up in Kunming. They always got returned to the French.

But, Lung Yun ran Yunnan as a separate country in effect. There was a representative of the ministry of foreign affairs--

Q: The Chinese?

SERVICE: Yes, the Chinese Nationalist government in Nanking. But, he had to be someone who was acceptable to the local people. In other words he was someone designated by Lung Yun and then given a commission by the foreign office.

He was the person we normally dealt with. What little business we had was with this old gentleman who was an old Mandarin holdover from the days of the [Ch'ing] empire who, I'm sure, consumed his share of opium as most people did.

Assorted Chores

Q: Was there something further on your notes?

SERVICE: Oh well, I've got all sorts of things.

We didn't have any dealings with the central Chinese government except for this local representative. We didn't have much business anyway except for missionaries that got into trouble or had complaints, or in some cases a missionary might die.

I remember one missionary who died. She was a very large woman who had lived in a remote city for many years and gotten so heavy she couldn't be carried in a sedan chair. So there was no way for her to leave. She simply died there all alone. It turned out that despite her having been there for ten or twelve years she had no converts, no one to look after her. The local magistrate took charge of her possessions and sent them up to the consulate.

We didn't have a great deal of business. We were there mainly because it was so remote; there was no other way for Americans to get the protection or consular services, passports, and so on, except by having a consulate there.

But, also we were there to watch the French. In earlier more actively "imperialist" days, there had been concern about what were the French up to.

After about a year, Reed was transferred, and a Chinese language officer, Arthur Ringwalt, was assigned to the consulate.

Also, after a year--I think after Caroline became pregnant--we were given a rent allowance, $150 a year, which was ridiculous.

But anyway, we then moved out of the consulate and rented a house belonging to an Englishman, an English Methodist missionary, I think. They had a small mission hospital there, and the doctor was going on home leave.

Ringwalt was a more pleasant person to work for. I was in charge actually for a while between the two men. Then, Ringwalt did some traveling and left me in charge.

The Long March Skirts Kunming

Q: When the Long March skirted Yunnanfu, what advance intelligence, if any, did you have?

SERVICE: Well, I'm not sure. Of course, the Chinese newspapers had something but not very much. They were strictly controlled and heavily censored. Also, we had only Kuomintang communiques which were always that the enemy is at full retreat. But, very often the enemy is in full retreat toward our rear, you know. [laughter]

Q: That's a nice expression.

SERVICE: I think that probably most of our information came from people in the customs and the post office, and also from missionaries, because in those days the Communists were super anti-imperialists. If they had a chance to snatch missionaries, they would hold them for ransom or sometimes try them for imperialist crimes.

Not so much the Mao group, but some of the subsidiary groups actually executed a few, held trials, executed them as imperialist agents, which they could be. If you wanted to talk about passing on information, missionaries did serve in some ways as spies. We'll come to some of that later on.

We got reports from missionaries who were having to flee because of the Communist advance, telegrams and so on. This got closer and closer and people traveling as best they could, began to arrive in Kunming. So, we knew the Communists were coming our way.

Late one night--The consuls were trying to keep in touch. I forget what time this was, but it was quite late. We got a chit from the British consul-general, I think, who was very close to the French consul-general--they were near neighbors--saying that they had decided that all women and children should leave by the morning train.

They'd made arrangements with the railway. There was one train a day, early morning. So I rounded up the few Americans there were, running around knocking on their front gates, got them up and got them off on the train.

There was an American plant explorer there, a rather famous man named Joseph Rock who did a lot of work for the Harvard Arboretum and for the National Geographic Society and the U.S. Department of Agriculture. He was living in Kunming at the time, and a bit of an old maid. He wanted us to tell him whether or not he should evacuate. We said, "Our instructions are women and children should evacuate." He asked, "Did we think it was dangerous?" Well, we didn't know. So he left on the train the day after the women and children did.

The Long March came very close to the city. Some of it did. Of course, an army of that size doesn't all trudge single file on a single road. They move through a country like a cloud of locusts, in a way.

Villages very close to Kunming were told the day beforehand--they had scouts out ahead--"Prepare so much rice. So many people are going to be here tomorrow. You'll be paid." The remarkable thing was that everything worked out just as the scouts had said. So many people did come the next day, rice was prepared, and they were paid.

Of course, they were robbing landlords along the way, seizing what they could in the way of silver. Apparently they did have enough money to pay. It made a tremendous impression because people were not used to being paid for anything that was provided to soldiers.

For an army like this on the move to be so well organized and to pay off made a tremendous impression. This was not in the papers. It was what you heard from talking to people, the grapevine type of news.

Obviously their intent was to make a dash for the Yangtze, which they did. They had completely sidestepped the provincial army which had marched forth to meet them in Guizhou. The Communists were so mobile, so fast in marching, that they simply marched around them.

The night of the crisis some Yunnanese troops dragged into town, dead beat from being force-marched from further west. They would have been poor defenders--Kunming could have been captured if the Communists had thought it worth the time. But they knew their lives probably depended on getting across the Yangtze. So the Communists didn't delay.

Q: Have you any estimate of the numbers in the Long March at this point?

SERVICE: We had heard all sorts of figures. I don't think anybody knew. We heard figures from fifty thousand to a hundred thousand, probably closer to fifty thousand.

Q: Did you see any of it?

SERVICE: No. No, we didn't try to go outside the city walls. It would have been foolhardy. We went down to the club and consoled ourselves with the Cercle Sportif! [laughter] So, no one saw any of them. They just went by like ghosts. After about a week, we called the women and children back from Indochina. I think it was a week. Caroline probably told you. She remembers those things much better than I do.

Q: Can you recall your own estimate of what it meant?

SERVICE: Not really, no. No one really thought that these people were terribly important. Yes, they had held out in Gansu. But, I don't think anyone felt that they were a real threat to the country or likely to take over.

Everybody felt that they were semi-brigands--and some of them were semi-brigands or had been brigands. There was always a lot of unrest and dissatisfaction. Yes, they were legendary for their marching ability, for their deftness in maneuvering.

But, they had been defeated. That's why the Long March took place. They had been driven out. They had lost, I think most people felt that this was sort of a remnant, defeated remnant, that was running for shelter and safety in some far western areas.

Q: Were leaders' names talked about?

SERVICE: Oh yes, of course, a great deal. Mao Zedong and Chu Teh and Zhou En-lai were famous names, and they were continually being reported as having died or been killed or died of wounds. Zhou En-lai died numerous deaths. All of them--Mao Zedong was tubercular, at death's door. These names were already legends.

Q: Amongst the foreign community?

SERVICE: And Chinese, yes. I don't know how much among the Chinese, but I would guess quite as much.

Q: I would have thought more amongst the Chinese.

SERVICE: Yes, My own contacts with Chinese were so limited in those days that I can't speak with assurance, as I could for instance in later days.

It was very impressive though, this organization and their treatment of the people. It made a very real impression.

Q: Did it linger? What was the effect of the March on the surrounding communities?

SERVICE: I don't think very much because they couldn't stay very long. They undoubtedly left wherever they went, a memory. People were paid and they treated the people well. In those days they took it from the landlords and gave it to the people.

What they couldn't carry away they said, "Come in and help yourselves." It was sort of Robin Hood.

The ideology didn't have a chance to sink in as far as Yunnan was concerned.

The Chiangs Visit Yunnanfu

Q: Was it soon after that Chiang Kai-shek and his wife came to visit?

SERVICE: Yes. The Kuomintang armies and Kuomintang airplanes were pursuing the Communists. This was how Chiang extended his control to some of the western provinces. Guizhou and Yunnan at this time began to come under central government control. It wasn't really effective until '37 when the Japanese war started. But, organizations like the Bank of China began to get into Yunnan.

The Chiangs came up to Yunnan, and they had a reception for the foreign community. Ringwalt, who was very absent-minded, didn't think about taking us. We found out later that the British consul had taken his cipher clerk, a man who was lower in status than I. But, Ringwalt just didn't think of it. So, we didn't meet Chiang and his lady. [laughing] Did Caroline say we did? I think she's wrong about this.

Q: No, Caroline remembers it that you went and she didn't.

SERVICE: No, no. Neither one of us went.

Q: Do you remember what impression they made? Obviously, you can't speak first person on this.

SERVICE: No. The big problem locally, the big question, was whether they were going to come before the opium was harvested, the poppies were harvested. If they were going to come before the opium was in, then the Chinese realized they were going to have to do some chopping, at least in the fields close to the city.

But, fortunately the crop was got in all right. Now, how this was arranged or why, I don't know. But the fact is that there were no great losses of the local crop.

Q: Tact, I dare say, at some level.

SERVICE: The way the Chinese work things out.

To Peking as Chinese Language Attaché

SERVICE: We arrived in Peking in December, 1935. I was assigned as a [Chinese] language attaché. That's where we sent all our people for language study. In fact, all the foreign missions sent their people to Peking for language study. I had two years in Peking, which were a wonderful two years, an idyllic place to be with ostensibly no responsibilities except to study.

Q: Was this your first serious exposure to the written language?

SERVICE: Yes, that's right. I had sat in on a course here at Berkeley for a while, but not long enough to really learn anything. As I said before, I had learned the numerals from comparing the English and the Chinese on the streetcars in Shanghai when I was a boy. But, I was basically illiterate in Chinese. I spoke a backwoods Sichuan dialect.

The first quarter in Peking we were sent to what was then called the North China Union Language School, which was run by a man named Pettus, mostly for missionaries, but also some business people and scholars.

It was the equivalent in those days of this sort of school in Taiwan now. But, there weren't very many scholars. [John King] Fairbank and Woody [Woodbridge] Bingham, people like that, were in Peking or had been in Peking just recently, Marty Wilbur and so on. All the China scholars went to Peking for a while, and they studied at this North China Language School.

But, the legation sent its people there only for the first quarter for an introduction. After that we studied on our own with our own teachers, following our own course, our own book.

We had a different emphasis. The missionaries were learning to read the Bible and to preach. We were interested in Chinese official correspondence and reading newspapers and being able to translate and interpret for official interviews.

The teachers, as I say, were horrified at my accent, my dialect, and insisted that I try to forget everything I had known and start completely anew.

Q: Was that very difficult?

SERVICE: Yes, it was. But, I think I did it fairly successfully.

Q: That's what I've heard!

SERVICE: I tried to forget my Sichuanese and just assume I didn't know any Chinese. So, I worked "wo, ni, t'a," "I, you, he," this sort of thing.

Q: What did you think of the system of teaching?

SERVICE: It's a very time-wasting system, I'm sure, because basically, after we finished the language school we were just on our own with two or three teachers. We would spend practically all day with a teacher across the table working on the text. But, the teachers knew no English, and at the beginning you knew very little Chinese. I think that the modern methods of using tapes and so on would be far better.

But, we had two years to do it. In the army and the navy they had three years to do it.

Q: Oh really.

SERVICE: Yes. So, if you're willing to invest that amount of time and you've got full time to do it, why it works. We could learn Chinese.

Q: It sounds enormously luxurious to have a one-to-one relationship.

SERVICE: Oh, yes.

My brother Dick, after my father died, had gotten a job as clerk in the consulate in Foochow. He found out at this time that he had intestinal TB [tuberculosis]. He had an operation for appendicitis in Foochow and the doctor, when he opened his abdomen, found he had intestinal TB.

So, he came to Peking and was in the Rockefeller Hospital, the PUMC [Peking Union Medical College]. They recommended that we find a place outside the city. We went out to the Western Hills, maybe fifteen or twenty miles outside of Peking, and rented a house. Foreigners had bungalows out in the Western Hills. We lived out there for something over six months with Dick after he came out of the hospital.

I only had one teacher, and he came out by bus every day. He'd take a morning bus out to the bottom of the hill--we weren't very far up the hill. Then, he would stay there all day and go back in the afternoon. This was not as good as having two or three teachers. But, we got along all right.

Q: So, you had no other duties than to study Chinese?

SERVICE: You had to read. You took an exam at the end of the first year and an exam at the end of the second year. You took exams on Chinese geography, foreign rights in China--extraterritoriality in other words--some Chinese history. You had to know something about China. This was not regarded as terribly important. Your main job was to learn Chinese.

But, I did a lot of reading. I can remember very definitely a milestone in my attitude of knowledge of China was coming across and reading R.H. Tawney's Land and Labor in China, a very good book, still a very good book. But, it was the first, analytical, economic-sociological approach to China that I had seen.

There was a good deal on foreign relations in China. H.B. Morse and Tyler Dermott's Americans in Eastern Asia. Then, there was a two volume compilation by a man named [Westel Woodbury] Willoughby about foreign rights in China, all sorts of things about extraterritoriality because, of course, we had to protect our rights and even to serve as consular judges at times.

Then, the history of China. In those days there wasn't very much. [Chauncey] Goodrich, and the old histories. The succession of the dynasties and Confucianism. You got a fuzzy idea about the wonders and virtues and ethical beauties of Confucianism and the examination system where even the poorest man had a chance, you know.

But, there was not much along the lines of a Marxist approach or any sort of a class analysis of China or what really went on with the peasants. You knew vaguely that there was an elite culture. But, no one really went down to the soil and looked. You had had agricultural people come out and write books, like a man named King, an American, who wrote a fine book, Farmers of Forty Centuries. He was lauding the virtues of the Chinese system of agriculture, how it was self-sustaining and self-supporting and so conserving of everything, like night soil. He wrote panegyrics about Chinese agriculture, but nothing about systems of land tenure or life of the peasants or anything like that.

So, to read something like Tawney's modern, social analysis of what China was all about was quite new.

Q: Did you come across [Max] Weber's work on China?

SERVICE: No, not at that time. No, actually it was not on the list, and I don't think it even was in the library at the legation. [laughter]

At the end of the first year we took comprehensive exams. We checked in about once every quarter at the embassy to find out how we were doing. Then, at the end of the year we took the exams. There were three students.

Q: Who were they?

SERVICE: Three at first. Two of them--One was Ed Rice, who's out here in Tiburon, and another man named Millet. We had a lot of jokes about Rice and Millet working together. Millet is the staple food for North China and rice for South China, of course. Then the second year another man was assigned, a man named Troy Perkins, who had already been in China, and had served for a while as a consular officer.

Q: Was there any professional training for your job as political officers?

SERVICE: Very little. I'd had some introductory political science, political theory, at Oberlin. But, it was a very sketchy course under a Hungarian named Jaszi, who was quite an interesting person who served in one of the early post-World War I governments in Hungary.

But, we really didn't have to know very much. We didn't go to anything like West Point or Annapolis. There wasn't any sort of special training academy.

Normally in the Foreign Service you went to an orientation course in the Department. But, that was only about a six week course. They'd show you what a visa was and what a passport was and a consular invoice was. You learned a little about routine operations.

I never attended the course because I'd been a clerk for two and a half years and I went from Kunming direct to Peking. So, I never had this orientation. But, I'm sure I was much better off than the people who had to rely on that.

You asked whether I'd read any Marxist and Leninist materials. No. I don't think I read anything directly by Marx or Lenin until I got to Yen'an.

When I got to Yen'an I realized--

Q: In 1944.

SERVICE: In 1944 I realized that I hadn't, and so I scratched around and asked the Communists, "Look, haven't you got any of these things here?" [laughter] They did. They found some very dog-eared, old copies that some of them had, some English versions of [Marx's] Communist Manifesto and things like that.

A Lotus-Eater's Paradise

Q: What can you remember about the foreign community there?

SERVICE: Oh, it was a wonderful place. Peking was a lotus-eater's paradise in those days. The life and the homes, the old Chinese homes that people were able to rent or buy, attracted people who simply wanted a lovely place to live. There was an artist community.

There were people like Harold Acton, a British poet. There were foreigners who were teaching in the universities there. Pei Ta [Peking National University] and Tsing Hua had several foreigners on the staff. Ivor Richards, a British philosopher and linguist was there.

There were people there that just liked living in Peking. There was an American sculptress named Lucille Swan. There was Teilhard de Chardin, the Jesuit archeologist, paleontologist, but philosopher as well.

There was a diplomatic community. There was a missionary community. And there was a community of language students. There were the Marine guards.

For those who wanted it there was horse racing. A lot of people had polo ponies and played polo. We didn't. We stayed away from the club. Of course, we were out of town, living in the hills for a part of the time. But I was more interested in study than in going to the club.

But you couldn't avoid living a fairly busy social life. You met a few Chinese, not very many.

Q: I was going to ask about your Chinese contacts.

SERVICE: Hu Shih was there and various other people. Chiang Monlin who later on was president of Pei Ta. Hu Shih was lecturing in Chinese philosophy. I went to Hu Shih's lectures one year, my second year, when I could understand enough.

Q: How did they impress you?

SERVICE: Well, it was very interesting. Philosophy is not my subject unfortunately. I'm a nuts and bolts--I'm a facts and figures man, and I don't deal well with abstract concepts. But, the lectures were interesting, history of Chinese philosophy.

Q: Did you ever come across George Kates who wrote The Years that Were Fat?

SERVICE: Yes. I didn't know him very well. He was a bit of an eccentric, sort of lived by himself.

People like [Owen] Lattimore were there. [Edgar] Snow was there. There was a foreign newspaper community, a foreign writers' community. As I said, there was quite a large, active artist colony.

We took several trips. I went up to Inner Mongolia with a man in the embassy named Salisbury. A group of us--Phil Sprouse and a couple of Marine language officers--took a trip out in the hills to an old Trappist monastery which was way back about four or five days' travel back in the mountains. They had developed their own little valley, put in irrigation, sort of a Shangri-la type of place.

But a lot has been written about Peking. I think we're wasting our time talking about life in Peking!

An Informal Study Group and Edgar Snow's Report on his First Trip to Yen-an (Paoan)

SERVICE: You asked me about Ed Snow as a person. I wasn't an intimate with Ed, although we knew each other in Peking from the December 9 student demonstrations. But we weren't very close. I've said almost everything I know about Ed in a piece that I did for the China Quarterly (John S. Service. "Edgar Snow, Some Personal Reminiscences," The China Quarterly, April/June, 1972, #50, pp 209-229.) after his death. I don't know whether we can incorporate this or not. Ed was a wonderful person, but you really don't want me to spend a lot of time talking about him, do you?

It's actually mentioned in the memoir here, my second year in Peking I joined a group, very informal group, that used to meet about once a month at one of the member's homes.

Generally these were people who were scholars, writers. Hu Shih was a member. Owen Lattimore was a member. There was a Swedish newspaper man--half newspaper man, half scholar--people who were in Peking for postgraduate study or graduate study.

Ed Snow was a member. We knew in the summer of '36 that he was out of town, but nobody seemed to know exactly where. Then, he came back in the fall of '36, and it just happened that that month's meeting was at my house.

So he came and told us about the trip to Yen-an. It was a very interesting, exciting evening.

Q: Visiting--

SERVICE: Yen-an, his first trip to visit Mao Zedong, and the Communist army--actually not to Yen-an but Pao-an, which was where they were located then. But, we always lump Pao-an and Yen-an and think of it as the Yen-an period. It was at the beginning of the Yen-an period, but they hadn't yet reached and occupied Yen-an.

What was happening then, of course, was the hope for a United Front. What Ed Snow brought back was the Communist push for a United Front.

Q: With the Kuomintang?

SERVICE: With the Kuomintang. The Sian Incident hadn't yet occurred, but it took place very soon after that. (When Chiang Kai-shek was kidnaped by the Chinese Communists, 1936.) I think most of us, and even Ed Snow himself really, didn't seem to feel that the Communists had any chance of coming out on top.

There was this possibility, a rather exciting one, that the civil war might end. But that was the extent of our expectations at that time.

Ed's political views at the time, well, [chuckling] we didn't categorize people by political views, and our political concerns were generally limited to China. Ed was certainly sympathetic with the Chinese left. He'd already published a volume of translations of stories, mostly short stories, by left-wing writers in China. But, then most of the promising young writers in China were left-wing, anti-Kuomintang, Lu Hsun and so on.

We knew that he was a friend of Lu Hsun and Madame Sun Yat-Sen. He was in contact with the left. He and his wife, Nym Wales, had been sort of co-conspirators with the student leaders at Yen-ching during the December 9 riots.

We didn't know at the time the extent of the Communist influence in those riots, but I think the Communist influence moved in very rapidly. It may not have been there as an instigator at the beginning, but certainly the Communists did move in. A lot of those leaders, of course, ended up by becoming Communists.

You ask what information we had on the Communists. Snow's description of his trip to Yenan was really all we knew about the Communists.

Q: What was the focus of the study group?

SERVICE: The focus really was whatever study or research people were doing. Owen Lattimore, I remember, was still writing his Inner Asian Frontiers of China. He was doing research on the history of the long conflict between the nomads and the settled farmers.

I remember there was a lot of discussion at one of these sessions about who first invented trousers and the significance of trousers! Of course, you couldn't really develop cavalry until you had pants. [laughter] You could have chariots. But if you were going to ride, as the Mongols did, you had to have trousers. So, there was a lot of discussion as to just when--The Scythians are supposed to have had trousers.

It tried to be scholarly. There were several members that usually had some topic of interest. I don't remember Hu Shih ever giving us a talk, but he used to show up occasionally.

Q: When you commented on Ed Snow's political views you said that people weren't categorized in those days. Now I don't know to what extent people were being categorized in the United States in the mid-thirties?

SERVICE: Probably more than we were in China. I think we were much more isolated in China and naive perhaps. But by the mid-thirties certainly there was Communist influence in the writing field and labor unions in the States. But we didn't, as I recall, think much about it in China.

Q: I just read a review of a book about Norman Thomas and a comment that like many American political activists he despised too much intellectual baggage--political theory. Am I getting the right impression that political theory just wasn't a significant part of the intellectual life of the group you're describing in the 30's in China?

SERVICE: Yes. I think it was probably felt to be irrelevant. It didn't impinge very much.

I think I mentioned earlier that in 1932, when I was a graduate student here, Norman Thomas came to Berkeley during the presidential campaign. He couldn't speak on the campus. He spoke on the steps of I[n]ternational House.

I was one of a large crowd that heard him speak. I voted Socialist in '32 and if you asked me, I probably would have said that I was a Socialist: certainly Ed Snow and his wife were Socialists. But I wouldn't have thought very much about it.

I hadn't met any Communists at this time. I didn't think of people as being Communists.

Embassies Insulated from Chinese Political Events

Q: What political judgments were you able to form? Or were you just so busy that--

SERVICE: Actually, I think it was a sort of a vacuum. No, that isn't true. The political climate was mainly the Japanese threat. The Japanese were trying by a nibbling process, to carve off North China or at least cut it out from under direct Nanking control. They talked about "autonomy" for the North China provinces, and that would mean the withdrawal of Chiang Kai-shek's own troops and strengthening local people.

There was a flight of Japanese airplanes over Peking the day we got there. They were dropping leaflets in favor of autonomy for what was called East Hopei, where they finally did set up a separate regime, East Hopei Autonomous Region.

Then only a few days after I was in Peking, the students in the universities all demonstrated, December 9 movement [1935]. John Israel has written a book about it.

Of course, I took off. I mean I didn't go to school when something like that was going on. I was the only person really, except for people like the Snows and Jimmy White who was the AP [Associated Press] man--the newspaper people were out--but I was the only American official as far as I know that was in the streets while these demonstrations were going on. I went back to the office and told them about it.

Q: Was that apathy typical of the diplomatic corps?

SERVICE: Very much. They'd got enough to do at the office, and they stayed at the office.

At any rate I had a wonderful time following the students all day. That afternoon, they were beaten up very badly by the gendarmes, sprayed with water hoses, and driven into alleys where the police could beat them up. The police had belts with heavy buckles and they used those. I'm sure they learned a lot of these things from the French police. Don't they call them gendarmes?

Q: Yes.

SERVICE: Then at the end of '36--just after a year--there was the Sian Incident when the Generalissimo was kidnapped in Sian. Of course, this was a tremendous affair.

I remember seeing Chinese like Chiang Monlin weep when the Generalissimo was released, when the word came that he was safe and coming back. The Chinese felt--people of that kind who were, you know, Kuomintang people--felt very emotional about it.

I had a shortwave radio which really we got for my brother, because when he was sick out in the Western Hills he was in bed most of the time. I was fiddling with it during the Sian affair, and suddenly I realized I was hearing Sian, Sian calling, an English voice. It was Agnes Smedley who happened to be in Sian. She was broadcasting the news.

So, I went down to the embassy the next day and told them about news being broadcast from Sian, and they were absolutely staggered. [laughing]

Q: Did they not have anybody monitoring?

SERVICE: No. Things were very simple in those days. People didn't think of these things. The idea that there were news broadcasts in English that they could pick up from Sian was something that no one had ever thought of.

Q: Was anything done to change the situation?

SERVICE: I think that they picked up--After all the navy had a big radio station there. All of our communications were by navy radio. So, I assume from then on--when they got the time and wave length from me--that they started listening.

Q: You assume, but you're not sure.

SERVICE: No, I don't know.

Q: That's an extraordinary story.

SERVICE: I just went in and told them, Agnes Smedley's in Sian, and she's telling us all about it. Zhou En-lai was there, of course, negotiating the whole settlement and the release.

Q: What did Agnes Smedley have to say if you recall?

SERVICE: Oh, I don't recall. It was just a news bulletin. I don't remember very much of what she said, but that the Generalissimo was safe and things like that, because people on the outside weren't sure. I think she was just giving an account of negotiations going on and the terms of the Young Marshal, Chang Hsueh-Liang. She was talking from the point of view of Chang Hsueh-Liang rather than from the point of view of the Communists. But, I think she mentioned the fact that Zhou En-lai was there, as I recall. Well, that's enough of that.

Q: Okay.

The Marco Polo Incident: Jack in Hospital with Scarlet Fever

SERVICE: The war started when we were in Peking, in the summer of '37. Caroline's father and mother came out to visit her. Her father had retired. His last post with the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers had been in San Francisco. They came out and stayed with us for a while.

Then, they decided to go off to a beach resort, Peitaiho. My mother was also down there with my brother Dick. On the third of July--they were going to leave after the fourth--I had a terrible sore throat. I went to the embassy guard. They had a navy doctor there, a couple of them.

The doctor was amazed at my throat. He called the other doctor over to look at it. "Isn't this a beauty?" So, they told me to go home and gargle with salt water. I said, "We've got a small baby.

How about that?" He said, "Sure, you better stay away from the baby. Don't get too close to the baby. Mustn't give the baby your sore throat."

The next day I went to the Fourth of July reception at the embassy--all Americans were invited, of course, to the embassy on the Fourth of July--and talked to everybody, but I felt miserable.

The next day--the fifth--I had quite a fever. So a doctor finally came to my house, and he said, "You know what you've got?" I said, "No." He said, "You've got scarlet fever."

They sent me immediately to the PUMC isolation ward, which was full of children. It was mostly diphtheria, and they had tubes in their windpipes. Chinese don't go to hospitals until they're in extremis normally. I think I was the only adult in this ward for a while with all these little kids with diphtheria.

Anyway, the family had already gone off to the beach before they knew I had scarlet fever and had to go to the hospital.

Then, the seventh, which was two days after I went in, I could hear the firing at Loukouchiao from my hospital bed. You know, ten miles or so outside of Peking, eight or ten miles, was Marco Polo Bridge. I could actually hear the war starting in the night and then heavy fighting in the days after that.

Germany had just developed the first sulfa drug, sulfonamide.

Q: Yes.

SERVICE: The PUMC had just gotten some, and they were trying it out. I was one of the first people that they used it on, and it was absolutely dramatic, the effect. Within twenty-four hours all my fever had gone and I felt quite normal, felt fine.

But they didn't know what to do about the normal quarantine, so they made me stay the full--I think it was three weeks that I stayed in isolation. It was quite a long period. But, eventually I got in a room by myself. There was an American dietician who tried to make me gain weight because she thought I was awfully thin. So, she was stuffing me.

They told me that I could not put my feet on the floor. It was part of this isolation. But, I found I could get all around the room by hopping from one piece of furniture to another. [laughter] From the bedside table to a chiffonier to something else, I could get all around the room without ever putting my feet on the floor.

Q: Why weren't you allowed to put your feet on the floor?

SERVICE: I don't know, but the rules were that I wasn't supposed to put my feet on the floor. The nurses came in and found me once perched on top of the dresser.

Q: Sounds like a Thurber cartoon. [laughter]

SERVICE: The nurses were all missionary-trained nurses, practically all.

Q: Chinese?

SERVICE: Chinese nurses, yes. Several of them tried very hard to find out whether or not I was right with Christ. I finally complained about it and said I thought it was unfair to take advantage of a man in this situation. The head nurse said that she would speak to them, so I was not bothered after that.

Q: So, then the Japanese had taken over Peking. Is that correct?

SERVICE: The Japanese took over Peking and I think Caroline came back with her parents from the beach when they were able to travel.

But some time after the occupation--I'm not quite sure why--it was decided that everyone should move into the Legation Quarter, where there were foreign guards. It was an enclave.

So the family moved in and stayed with some of our friends in the embassy. Everybody doubled up, sort of like in the siege of the legations--if you've ever read about that--in the Boxer time.

I was not allowed to go in because of my recent scarlet fever. I stayed in our house which was in one of the PUMC compounds, trying to find out what was happening in the city. I apparently stimulated a few rifle shots. So I gave up exploring.

After a few days, it was decided to evacuate people who could leave. So, Caroline and her family then left and went to Japan.

Edgar Snow Smuggles Ten Ying-Ch'ao out of Peking

SERVICE: About this time I took her trunk down to my mother. Trains were just beginning to run. I think I was on the first train after a long break. Ed Snow was on the train, I remember, and he had an amah with him.

I was quite surprised that he had an amah, and he seemed rather solicitous. I said something to him, and he said, "Can't tell you now." It turned out that this was Zhou En-lai's wife, Teng Ying-Ch'ao, whom I met next in Yen-an in 1944. He was smuggling her out of town. She'd been having treatment in a hospital in Peking, I think for TB.

Anyway, the train trip to Tientsin, which normally takes about two hours, took us over twelve hours, because we were always being sidetracked for Japanese troop trains coming south.

I was escorting a couple of American women tourists who had been stranded in Peking. I delivered them to Tientsin and went on to Chinwangtao. This was where my mother was catching a boat south. Because of the delays, I got there--with her trunk--just as the gangplank was being raised.

Mother got to Shanghai precisely as the hostilities were starting there, and was caught on the Bund on August 13 when the bomb was dropped by the Palace Hotel that killed Bob Reischauer and hundreds of other people.

Q: Were you physically afraid at this point in China?

SERVICE: I've never thought much about it. Perhaps a part of being an optimist is that one tends not to be very fearful. But things like war, gunfire, and bombing haven't usually bothered me very much. At least, as my mother would have said, I haven't been "frightened out of my wits."

When we came down in the houseboat from Chengdu in 1920, when I was going to school, we had to go past a place on the river bank where there were bandits. We expected the bandits to try to stop us. The baggage in the bottom of the boat was moved over to the side toward the shore, so my mother and the baby could get down behind the trunks.

When we came to the place on the river, sure enough, they started firing with rifles. The boatmen all jumped off the boat, on the far side and held on to the oars. Mr. Helde and I went out on the front deck to row the boat and to persuade the boatmen to get up. I remember watching the bullets hitting the water around us.

But, in the excitement of things like that you're not really afraid. I'd heard much fighting going on, as I mentioned before. In coming down the Yangtze--in '21 I think--there was a big battle in Ichang during the night when some of Wu Pei-Fu's troops came up and tried to attack the city. Our steamer was sort of in between. I heard the firing, but I don't remember being terribly afraid. I stayed in bed.

You don't necessarily want to walk into it. But, if you hear it you know you're not going to feel it. [laughter]

[Interview 4: May 3, 1977]

The Foreign Press Corps

SERVICE: You asked about the caliber of the foreign press corps. Actually, Shanghai was probably more the center of news. Peking was a bit of a backwater. The capital was Nanking, which is accessible and easily covered from Shanghai.

Most of the regular foreign press in China was chiefly interested in developments that affected foreigners, business, the principal political developments, wars, and things like that. They generally had a rather scoffing attitude about Chinese warlord affairs. You know, the Chinese armies always carried umbrellas, and they didn't fight when it rained. "Silver bullets" were what really won the wars, or were the major weapons. It was a sort of a looking down the nose, a slightly sneering attitude.

There wasn't very much real concern with what was going on in China. There were exceptions, of course. Ed Snow was probably the best exception.

When the Sino-Japanese War started they picked up people to be stringers who happened to be in Peking. A young fellow named Haldore Hanson was teaching in a YMCA school there in Peking. He started working for A[ssociated] P[ress], I think.

There were a number of people in China, young Americans. After all these were Depression days, and people were footloose. Some of them had come to China just to try to make a living as well as they could. A lot of these people started working as journalists.

There was a Reuters man in Peking named Oliver who was quite good, but then there were others that just went to the embassy for the handout and talked to a few Chinese.

I think even that people like the New York Times depended mainly on the handout material, contact with the embassy, the superficial news. Generally, they had one or two Chinese friends or Chinese contacts who they hoped could give them the inside story politically of what was going on. But, it wasn't particularly analytical reporting.

Q: With the exception of Ed Snow, would you say that there were any China specialists who really knew the language and had a detailed knowledge of the Chinese political scene who were working as reporters for the American press?

SERVICE: Not who really knew Chinese. There were people like Hallet Abend, for instance, who had been for many years with the New York Times. But these people were Treaty Port people, reporting from Shanghai and they didn't really know Chinese. They might have had Chinese informants, but basically their reporting was Treaty Port and foreign interests oriented.

Q: I think we'll go on with this later when we move to Chungking.

SERVICE: Good.

We were talking about censorship in the Chinese press. During the suppression campaign against the Communists, prior to the formation of the United Front, there was very little news published about the Communists. It was very heavily censored. The Chinese government news was always, "The Communists are near defeat and are retreating." After the United Front began to break down, you again heard very little about what the Communists were doing.

You asked me a question about circulation of Ed Snow's book. My guess is that that was probably not heavily suppressed at the peak period of the United Front. But, I'm just not sure how much it circulated outside of sanctuaries like Shanghai. In the International Concession of Shanghai, of course, Kuomintang censorship couldn't apply.

Certainly the Communists were never given a good press in China or by foreign correspondents. But, I think there was a period when they were not completely cut out of the news, as they were before and after the United Front.

Passes Second Year Chinese: Shanghai, a Disappointing Posting

Q: Let's return to chronology now.

SERVICE: Yes. We had Caroline being evacuated from China in, I think, September [1937]. She went and stayed in Japan for a while, and then the State Department decided that things were not going to be good for returning to China. So she was authorized to come to the United States. We had two small children. She came to the States and stayed with her parents.

Meanwhile, I stayed on in Peking. I kept the house, a Peking Union Medical College house, in what was called the south compound.

There was an American newspaperman that I mentioned earlier, Haldore Hanson, who had been taken on as a stringer, I think by AP. He'd followed the Japanese army south from Peking on bicycle and had gotten himself into Paoting, which was a city about seventy-five miles south of Peking, and then was found there by the Japanese.

They gave him a very hard time for a while, kept him under detention, and then finally let him out. They were suspicious of what he was doing, of course. Anyway, he was, I think, rather shaken up and he needed a place to stay. He came and stayed with me and shared the house.

He did a good book on the war ("Humane Endeavor;" The Story of the China War, New York, Toronto, Farrar and Rinehart, Inc., 1939.), but he was one of the people jumped on by [Senator Joseph] McCarthy because of his writings at this period. Some of them were published by Amerasia magazine.

The language exams were supposed to be given in late December. My two other fellow students, Millet and Rice, asked for a little extra time which was granted. Goodness knows, there had been interruptions to our studies. We were having to do night code room duty. So, we got a slight extension. We took the exams and I passed, and then got word that I was assigned to Shanghai, which was a terrible disappointment to me.

Q: What did you hope for?

SERVICE: I hoped for a smaller post and one where I would have a chance to do political reporting and to use my Chinese. We had two years of required language study. Then there was a third year optional exam, which you didn't get time off for. You simply prepared yourself for your third exam at whatever post you were at.

I wanted very much to do that. Very few people in those years had been taking the third year exam. But, since I had a good start it seemed to me a shame not to do it.

I figured Shanghai would be a difficult place, and it turned out to be exactly as I expected, a very difficult place to prepare for the third year exam, for various reasons.

Q: Why?

SERVICE: For one thing, it's not a Mandarin speaking area. But I met a peculiar situation in the administration of the post. The executive officer, a man named [Richard] Butrick, was very anti-China language service.

This was quite common. There was, I think I mentioned before, some tension between China service and non-China service people. He gave orders that I was not, for instance, to have any access to the Chinese correspondence coming to the office. I had hoped to be able to either supervise the translation--We had a Chinese interpreter, but we always had an officer that checked the translations.

He would not allow me to have any contact with the Chinese correspondence and felt that I was supposed to devote full time to my duties in the office and made it as difficult as possible for me to study for my third year exam. [laughing]

Q: What a terrible waste!

SERVICE: He was a very peculiar man. He's famous in the Foreign Service, as I say. Dick Butrick, all sorts of nicknames have been applied to him--"black bastard" probably the most common. He was very dark-haired.

He apparently believed that most China people became effete snobs or went native.

At any rate, I was disappointed going to Shanghai, but of course there was nothing to do except to go.

Q: Did you enjoy it when you got there?

SERVICE: Well, yes, a very, very busy life. Caroline came back to China after I'd been there a few months. We had a hassle when I got there. This is again, as we were speaking of, "the science of bureaucracy."

When I arrived, I was not met at the boat, which was rather typical of this man who was executive officer. Anyway, I presented myself to the consulate as soon as possible, and he said, "You'll have quarters in the bachelors' quarters." There was an apartment for bachelors above the office in a big office building in downtown Shanghai. "You'll be up there since your family's not with you."

I was entitled to quarters. There was allowance for quarters. "I am a married officer," I said. "My family--" He said, "Your family is not with you. You'll be up there."

Soon my household effects arrived from Peking. So, I applied for a quarters allowance "to store my effects," and I made sure it got on [Clarence] Gauss' desk who was consul-general. Gauss was sharp enough to know there was some background to this.

He called me and said, "What the hell is going on here?" And I explained the situation and he said, "I'll take care of that." I had very little trouble with our executive officer after that. I got a nice apartment and moved in.

Comments on the Social and Political Backgrounds of Foreign Service Officers in the 1930s

Q: You said that you voted Socialist in '32. I think we more or less talked about how you stood politically. I don't know what the Foreign Service rulings were on political affiliations for active members of the Foreign Service?

SERVICE: There were no rules. There were absolutely no rules, as far as I know. How you voted was supposed to be your own business. There wasn't any loyalty, security program, of course, at this time. I doubt if there were any Communists in the Foreign Service. But there was no effort to find out really if there were. The great majority of the people in the Foreign Service were probably good, rock-ribbed Republicans. Basically they came from very conservative backgrounds, usually from families with some money, social position, Eastern establishment.

Probably the Foreign Service in China, the China branch of the Foreign Service, was by and large more liberal than the Foreign Service as a whole. We weren't from this same sort of background. Most of us were either China-born or mid-western, this and that. There were one or two, of course, from the Ivy League schools. But, most of us were not. The group I was with were children of the Depression to some extent.

Q: Just for the record, did you know any members of the Chinese Communist party before Pearl Harbor?

SERVICE: Well, Pearl Harbor's hardly the right date to use here. I didn't know any before Chungking. I got to Chungking about the beginning of May, 1941. Almost immediately, as soon as I got to Chungking, I met them because I was introduced to them by a man in the embassy who had been keeping contact with them for the embassy for political reporting purposes.

Q: Would you still have described yourself as a Socialist--

SERVICE: Oh no.

Q: --in the mid-thirties?

SERVICE: Actually, after the New Deal came in--after Roosevelt came in and the New Deal--most of us considered that Roosevelt was carrying out many of the things that Norman Thomas had been talking about in his speech in Berkeley in '32. So, we all became, I think, good supporters of Roosevelt and the New Deal.

While I always felt that there were a lot of things about Socialism that we should try to work towards, I never considered myself an active member of the Socialist party or an active Socialist.

I figured that Roosevelt was moving us in that direction at a reasonable pace, an evolutionary way.

Jack's Estimation of the Chinese Political Scene

SERVICE: In the United Front period, which was '37, '38, perhaps the end of '38, most of us felt that the Communist party was willing to accept the leadership of the Kuomintang, work in the United Front; that the Kuomintang itself had liberalized itself and was able to take in or accept other views. None of us--I keep saying "none of us," which is bad; I should speak for myself--I don't think I thought that the Communists were an important threat to the Kuomintang or an imminent rival.

Q: I feel that this question is anachronistic, but again I'd like to ask it, because after World War II, world leadership of Communism seemed for a while firmly rooted in Russia, with the possible exception of Yugoslavia and Tito. But, now in the seventies we see that Communism is not monolithic and is polycentric. When did the possibilities of polycentric Communism with China as one of the centers seem an alternative worth considering to you?

SERVICE: Oh, I think not until after we'd been in Yen'an for quite a long time and had gotten to know a good deal more about the situation up there, and the Chinese Communists' relations with the Soviet Union, or rather the tenseness and delicacy of their relations with the Soviet Union, and until we had seen the example of Tito.

I think that this was something that came at the end, when we thought that the Chinese Communists were not necessarily Russian Communists and were really quite likely to pursue their own nationalistic way. But, this came late on.

Q: Just to wrap up this section--We keep making glancing mentions of the Kuomintang. How much really did you know about Chiang Kai-shek and other leading Kuomintang figures at this time, again, '36, '37, '38?

SERVICE: Very little. Actually, most of the political reporting in those days was not, as I've already said, particularly penetrating or analytical.

We generally tended to accept Chiang as being what he seemed to be, a leader of China. I don't think most people really gave very much thought as to how he managed to maintain his leadership and control. Internal groups within the Kuomintang, the factions, were not particularly well understood.

This is digressing, but when I came back on leave in early '43, I was in the Department, and they sent me around to talk to an old Foreign Service officer named [Clarence] Spiker who had been consul in Chungking with my parents in 1924. He was the consul in Chungking when my father was almost blinded by the shot through the glass door.

Spiker, as a China service man, had spent all of his career in China. He was in the Department, an old man. He was too old now to send to the field. So, they had him in what was then a research branch in the State Department doing intelligence research.

He had read some of our reports. Apparently he'd asked to see me because he was very perplexed by references in our reports from Chungking that I'd written in '42, '43, about different factions and groups and cliques in the Kuomintang. He didn't know anything at all about them.

So, I had this odd experience of sitting and talking to this man whom I'd known as a boy, when he was consul in Chungking, and telling him almost in A-B-C terms about the Political Science group, the CC clique, the Whampoa clique, all of the congeries of competing factions and groups within the Kuomintang which Chiang was able to manipulate, and how he was able to keep control by setting one against the other.

This poor old guy who spent all his life in China just seemed to be amazed. He didn't know any of this, hadn't really apparently been concerned about it. So, I would say that State Department knowledge of China was fairly superficial.

Q: Would there have been others better informed in the State Department?

SERVICE: Oh yes. I picked a rather extreme example.

There were people like Willys Peck who had been counselor of embassy in Chungking before John Carter Vincent, who certainly knew something about these things, understood some of them. But, there wasn't a great deal of reporting on them.

Consular Duties, Shanghai: Jack of all Trades

SERVICE: Actually, my posting to Shanghai turned out to be a very interesting, and in many ways, a very valuable assignment. I was used as a relief officer. It was one of the largest offices we had in the world at that time and the largest consulate. There were about twelve officers, I think, which in those days was a big office.

We didn't have "home leave" in those days, but in remote countries, far countries like China, we were ordered home on consultation. It was the only way they could get you home at government expense. When anyone was on home leave or away from the office, then I would move into his chair.

So, I spent three and a half years--I was there almost three and a half years--in a constant rotation from one job to another, usually three or four months in one job.

You know, we were young. Caroline liked the social life in Shanghai which was very busy. We joined the Columbia Country Club. I didn't play golf, but I used to play tennis out there. We had a social life within the consulate. Then, we had a lot of other friends in Shanghai. I had my family's friends.

We knew a few Chinese, but they were all highly foreignized Chinese that mixed in the foreign community. It was a busy life, much too many parties. I was not very keen on it, and for a while I managed to quit going to parties entirely to get ready for my third year language exam.

Press Survey

SERVICE: The first job I was given--I had just arrived--they were way behind in writing a survey of the press. The office was required to write a press summary of the English language press. This had been assigned to an officer who was in charge of the shipping section.

This was the beginning of '38. I got there just after New Year. The man in the shipping section apparently didn't know how to go about writing this sort of report.

Gauss, who was the consul general, called me in and asked me to do it. It was just a problem of getting the clippings organized. You had an outline of things to cover. And unlike the shipping man, I could give the job full time. Gauss liked my report and I got a very nice note commending me.

Incidentally, while I was in Shanghai the legislation was passed that consolidated the agriculture Foreign Service and the commerce Foreign Service with the State Department's Foreign Service. They used to have their separate--up to that time had had separate attachés abroad. A commercial attaché was responsible only to the Department of Commerce.

I was always the man that was called in when some special job needed to be done, task force and so on. So, I was the person who had to carry out all the routine of the amalgamation of the offices, inventorying their furniture and transferring it to our inventory.

Visa Section, I

SERVICE: I was assigned soon after arrival to the visa section, which was a normal thing for the low man on the totem pole. I worked under the man named [John B.] Sawyer who was a classmate of my mother and father's at UC, and had looked out for me when I was a boarder at the American school.

He had never passed the Foreign Service examination. He was what was called a non-career vice-consul. But, he was the great authority on Chinese visas. He wrote the manual on issuing Chinese visas, which were a very, very special thing in those days.

We had exclusion laws. Chinese could only come to the United States under certain conditions, as a student or as a merchant trader under Section Six of such and such a treaty. A Section Six trader, we called them.

Anyway, one day soon after I got to the desk a White Russian woman came along, a young White Russian woman, and asked to speak to me.

She told me this heart-rendering story about how her father had been an American engineer in the Soviet Union, been caught there by the revolution--there were American engineers in the Soviet Union, mining engineers and so on--and that she lost all her papers. Her father had died when they were trying to escape the Soviet Union. She had come to Shanghai with her mother, but since her father was American, she had a claim to American citizenship, and wanted a visa to the United States.

I wrote a long memorandum about this. The other men in the visa section said nothing at all until I presented my memorandum. It turned out that she was a case that had been doing this for years and years with every new person she saw in the visa section!

Political Officer: "How to be a Successful Political Reporter"

SERVICE: I did every job in the consulate except sitting in the consul general's chair--accounts, shipping, invoices. I had at least two spells in what was called the political section.

This, I think, was where I really had my first lessons in political reporting. There were two people in the political section, a man named Ed Stanton--who was a very fine officer and later ended up as ambassador to Thailand--and then quite a brilliant man named Monroe B. Hall who was a Japan language officer. But, he was stationed in China because the Chinese-Japanese war had started, and we were having a great many problems with the Japanese army occupying American properties wherever they advanced in China, molesting American missions, and a lot of protection cases, we called them.

Form is sometimes more important than content. You're not going to be a successful reporter unless your reports are read. So there is some sense in saying that the first thing is to learn to write well. People get typed. They get a reputation as being good or bad, easy to read, interesting, and so on.

Hall particularly was a good writer. He used to kid me unmercifully about what I submitted. "Terrible, tear it up. Do it over again. You're using too many words. Boil it down. Be concise."

Gauss himself was a master of concise, succinct drafting. He did all of his own, sat down to the typewriter. He had been a court reporter before he came in the Foreign Service. He was an excellent typist, and he almost never had to retype. He'd just sit down at the typewriter and be able to do it all. His drafting of telegrams was a model of very brief, concise writing.

So, in Shanghai I at least had a good training in drafting, writing. Most of the work I did was, as I say, protection cases, writing notes to the Japanese. I worked out a sort of progression of letters, the first-second-third-fourth, like dunning letters. [laughter]

For example, "We wrote you on such and such a date about the occupation of this mission chapel. Nothing's happened." The second letter would be tougher.

I finally got so mean in writing these, these final stages, that the Japanese consulate--we had to send them to the Japanese consulate-general, and they transmitted them to the military--sent a delegate to come around to the consulate and ask us to please not use such rough language because they didn't dare [chuckling] give them to the military.

Q: Did you get the properties back?

SERVICE: Oh, generally yes--eventually. The Japanese weren't seizing and holding them, but the military had absolutely no respect for foreign properties. This was partly intentional, part of the way their attitude was. In the Panay case, for instance, the officers on the spot certainly knew that it was an American gunboat. It had big American flags painted all over the top of it.

But there were a lot of wild-eyed, hot-headed, anti-foreign junior officers, I'm sure, that didn't care. We had proclamations and signs, all sorts of things. But in military operations, who cares?

Then also, of course, the missions opened their premises to the refugees. So, all sorts of people came in, and from the viewpoint of the Japanese, they felt they had a right to go in at least to search for Chinese soldiers. Probably there were Chinese soldiers in some cases, not in their uniforms. The Japanese usually raped the women. But, wartime--it's pretty hard to protect property in circumstances like that.

Third Year Language Exams: Stratagems for Study

SERVICE: One thing in Shanghai I've already alluded to was this effort to work for my third year exam. The chief interpreter was an old friend of mine. He'd been in Peking, and been transferred to Shanghai because they had a lot of work. I worked out a system where I had an hour lesson early in the morning with a young Chinese woman whom I also had met in Peking. Her family had moved to Shanghai. She came for an hour's class early in the morning before I left the house for the office.

The senior Chinese clerks in the consulate had lunch brought in from a Chinese restaurant nearby. We were very close to Foochow Road, which is a street in Shanghai which is where all the best restaurants are. They had a contract with one of these restaurants to bring in food in containers, hot food.

There was a room where the chauffeurs and so on sat around--where they had a big round table, you know, a collapsible table, which could be set up. That was always set up and the food would come in promptly at twelve o'clock. I went down and ate with the Chinese clerks.

Chinese eat very fast. We'd eat in about twelve minutes, and then I would have a lesson with the interpreter for the rest of the lunch hour. This was a bit unusual, and probably seemed strange to my colleagues. I'm sure it had never been done before.

Q: Was it frowned on?

SERVICE: I was never told I couldn't do it. I'm not sure that Butrick knew about it.

But anyway, I had the hour in the morning, I had lunch with the clerks, and then I had an hour's class during the noon hour. Then, in slightly over a year--we had a home leave in there--I took my exam.

A funny thing happened. I wrote to the embassy in Peking and told them I planned to take the exam. The customary thing was to send you a sample of the questions that had been asked in earlier exams.

Between the time that I asked to take the exam, and the time I took the exam, there had been a change of officers in Peking. When I got my exam questions for the exam I thought [chuckling] that they seemed familiar. They sent me the same exam I'd already been sent as a sample. Unfortunately, I had assumed that I wouldn't be asked the same questions, so I hadn't concentrated on them. [laughter]

Discovery of Lax Accounting and Lax Security in the Consulate

SERVICE: I think this having lunch with the Chinese staff was probably a good thing in many ways, beside the linguistic one. I was assigned, at one point, to be in charge of the accounting section.

I did all the accounts. We kept the register of fees. The immigration visa was ten dollars--one dollar for the application, nine dollars for the visa itself.

The man in the visa section, the clerk, had to come over to our section to sign in the book. There had to be a record of fees, and the record of fees for the whole consulate was kept in our section. He would come over and make an entry, describe the service, what the fee was. He would get what we called a service number which then would be applied to the document.

A Chinese clerk that was working for me in the accounts section said to me one day that he thought it very odd that so many "no fee" services were being performed by the visa section. I said, "Next time one comes, let me know about it if you think maybe it's peculiar."

Soon he came in my office and said, "Come look." We went and there was a no fee service that had just been put in by a Chinese clerk in the visa section. What the clerk did was to fill out this little slip for the service, and then he handed it to the American officer for initial. The American officer normally never read the slip. He just put his initial on it.

I went over and spoke to the officer who had signed the slip. I said, "Did you just sign a slip for a no fee service?" He said, "No." He recalled it was a visa.

We went immediately to the clerk's desk and asked him to stand aside. We looked in his desk, searched his desk, and there we found a whole lot of nine dollar fee stamps that were bogus. A nine dollar fee stamp was gray, and he had simply gone out and had some photographic ones made, gray. It was quite easy.

What he had been doing, for goodness knows how long, was putting in this slip for a no fee service for a nine dollar one, when the service was really nine dollars. Then, he pocketed the nine dollars and took one of his fake stamps and put it on the visa.

So, we had the goods on him. We asked him to come along and went right up to the consul-general's office--it was not Gauss by this time; it was another man named Lockhart--explained the situation and called the police.

But, Lockhart would not prosecute. He thought it would be too embarrassing. However, in this whole affair we then found out that the Japanese were paying some of our employees, messengers--for wastepaper, for picking up whatever they could and taking it out. But nothing was done about that either.

We had Chinese messengers going in and out of the file room. They could pick up things. They picked up things like office directories, Department of State directories. We tried to tighten up a little but, there wasn't any real security system then.

We don't know that they got anything important, but of course we had to fire a few people. The man who was working for the Japanese was a relative of one of the very senior Chinese employees, so that was a very nasty business.

But at any rate, this possibly wouldn't have happened if it hadn't been for the fact that I had established, shall we say, good relations with the Chinese staff.

Q: Did it cause trouble when you had the firings of Chinese employees?

SERVICE: No, not really.

Q: I meant disturb your rapport?

SERVICE: Oh, not that I recall. We had the goods on this man. He lost face completely on it. Everybody around saw what the situation was, so that there wasn't anything bad there.

There were some hard feelings about the messenger that we had to fire, but that was the loss of face by his uncle or whoever it was that recommended him. I didn't feel badly about whoever it was that recommended him. I didn't feel badly about it. In fact, I think I felt somewhat self-righteously angry.

Home Leave, 1938: A Class VIII Officer

SERVICE: We had home leave in October, I think it was, of '38. This was the first time I'd been back to the States for over five years since I left in early '33. We got a car, picked up a car in Detroit, drove to Washington, and back across the continent, which we subsequently always did on every home leave. We always crossed the continent at least once by car.

I've crossed the continent--I don't know; I've tried to count--something like twenty times.

Being in the [State] Department was interesting. It was my first real appearance in the Department since I'd been a Foreign Service officer, since I took my exams in January, '33. In those days you had to go calling in the Department.

You left a card on the secretary of state and on the under-secretary. You called on the chief of personnel. Generally you had to talk with everybody at that level, have a short talk.

You, of course, talked to the people in the Far Eastern section, Stanley Hornbeck and the other old worthies of the Department.

Q: How did they impress you?

SERVICE: Well, I was rather awed, shall we say. I felt somewhat differently later on after I'd come back from Chungking. But, after all, I couldn't claim any great expertise in those days. I'd studied language, but as a language student you were sort of removed from the actual, what was going on. In Shanghai, as I say, I'd been general relief man.

So, I sat and listened respectfully, I think, when I talked to the chief of personnel. He said, "You're doing okay, Service. Don't be worried."

Actually, I was doing quite well because, having passed my third year exam, I was promoted to class VIII. You have three unclassified grades. You start as unclassified C, then unclassified B and unclassified A.

It put me in class VIII four years from the time I was commissioned. That was well ahead of most of my contemporaries--in those days it was generally taking about seven years to reach class VIII.

Q: Class IX is the last class, isn't it?

SERVICE: They don't call it class IX. They just call it unclassified. Eight is the lowest numbered grade.

Q: Right. So that was accelerated promotion.

Visa Section II: The Trap Snapped Shut in Europe

SERVICE: By 1940, it began to be obvious that things were headed for trouble in the Far East, particularly after the European war really came to life in April, 1940. As soon as France fell, Japan moved into the northern part of Indochina.

This was a sort of a weather vane of what was going to happen. Japan was going to move in and take over the colonies, Dutch East Indies, French, British, and so on, the Far East if she could.

This really is what changed American policy. It wasn't so much sympathy for China as it was our concern about Europe, what we began to think of more and more by this time as our allies. The Lend-Lease Act was beginning to start.

In late 1940--I think we had already given notice in July of the cancellation of the commercial treaty with Japan--the State Department decided to order families back to the States. They couldn't expect other Americans to do anything unless they set the example of ordering their own back.

So our families were all told. An American ship was brought into Shanghai, one of the Matson liners, to evacuate them. Caroline and the children and my mother and my brother Dick's wife were all on that same ship, the Monterey, in November, 1940, which I'm sure Caroline has told you about.

Then, I became a bachelor, which was--Oh, I didn't carouse as much maybe as some, but there was a fair amount of nightlife.

By this time the Jews in Europe had no other place to go really except China. They could only get out for a while through Italy. From Vienna they could go to Italy. Italy didn't come into the war until after France fell or about the time that France fell.

Q: Nineteen forty.

SERVICE: Yes. Up to that time Jews could get out through Italy. Where could they go? Shanghai was one of the few places. So, I forget, twenty or thirty thousand came to Shanghai.

They had all registered for American visas in consulates in Europe, in Paris, or Warsaw, or Vienna, or wherever it was. But, the waiting list [for an American visa] was years and years long. They asked to have their case transferred to Shanghai. But, when the case came in, all we could say was, "five years wait" or something like that.

But then when Italy came in, when the war really started--and France was occupied by Germany--then the Department informed us in Shanghai that we had to start considering these cases, because people who were caught in Europe could no longer have any hope of getting out. Therefore, the Jews that were out of Europe in Shanghai had a right to have their cases considered.

This was a great surprise and shock to Shanghai because our little old visa section under Mr. Sawyer had perhaps handled two cases a day or something like that. Suddenly we had thousands of cases that we had to deal with.

So, I was told to organize a task force to go into the visa section, to set up a special unit in the visa section, and try to handle these cases, which we did. We got in touch with other offices to find out how big offices handled their load, got some hints on how to do it, how to set up an interview schedule--one every fifteen minutes--and how to manage files and records on a wholesale basis.

Unfortunately the American immigration law still contained a check rein in it because of the provision that you couldn't issue a visa to anyone who was "liable to become a public charge." Even though he might be qualified, even though his number had come up, if the consular officer considered that he was liable to become a public charge, you couldn't give him a visa.

This was a hangover from the Depression. We still had a lot of unemployed in the States. American labor unions were powerful.

The consul was always under a kind of sword of Damocles. Because even when he issued a visa, this wasn't necessarily final. The immigration officer, the immigration service at the port of entry, had the final say. Immigration could still turn someone back, even though the unfortunate person had received a visa in the field, in China.

This made you quite cautious in applying this "liable to become a public charge." But we did issue a lot of visas. As you probably know, Max Knight here in Berkeley, who worked for the UC Press for many years, was one that I gave a visa to. I remember him very well.

But, you got an awful lot of pressure of various kinds, emotional pressure and some offers, shall we say, of money and other inducements to get people out. A lot of them were--What I'm trying to say is somebody who'd been in a concentration camp and obviously had the scars of a concentration camp, you might not be able to give a visa to because he didn't speak any English, had no close relatives in the United States, had no trade.

People like a doctor couldn't get any assurance--They couldn't get a license to practice in the United States under many state laws. People who had all sorts of professional training would have to stay in the United States for a long time to pass licensing examinations that were obviously aimed against foreigners and people like this. So there it was--a bad business.

Q: I'm sorry to upset you , Jack. I've heard you criticized, or rather not you personally but the consular service--

SERVICE: Oh, of course. Oh, of course.

Q: --in Shanghai, criticized in your own house here by a guest.

SERVICE: No.

Q: Just for the record, I'd like to know what were the stringencies that were imposed on you from Washington. You've told me about the immigration service stringency. But, as I recall, the quotas were tiny at that point.

SERVICE: Yes, the quotas were fairly small, but that wasn't the basic problem, the size of the quota. Besides, at this time, the war was on, the Polish quota, who could come out on it? The people in Poland couldn't come out. Bona fide Poles weren't immigrating.

The quota is determined by where you're born. If you're a Jew and you're born in Austria or in Poland, you come under those countries' quotas.

The whole quota system was set up on a very arbitrary, biased basis to favor the northern European countries at this time, so that countries like Poland and Russia had quite large quotas.

After the war started and people couldn't leave these countries it wasn't the size of the quota that was so much limiting as much, I think, as this business of having to decide well, is this poor man going to be able to make a living in the States?

Of course, a lot of them could, because they would be taken care of by the community or organization helping refugees. In places like New York there were whole colonies of refugees, and a man didn't need to learn English or know English to be able to get a job in a German butchery in the Queens.

But, we felt under a good deal of pressure on it, certainly. I would say that we tried to apply the law as leniently as we could, as we felt that we could get away with, at least as long as I was running the visa special unit.

But, some of these people were pathetic. They'd been in concentration camps, as I say. But, people like Max Knight--Max Knight had gotten himself a job. He was teaching English in Shanghai and writing for the English newspaper in Shanghai. Obviously a person like this, good God, give him a visa quick.

The visa work ran until the time that I was transferred. What happened was that since my family had left I was living alone in an apartment. Really I'd had enough of Shanghai and enough of this continuous rotation.

I must say I didn't really relish the high pressure--high pressure in every way--visa work.

Comments on Gauss and His Tight Ship at the Shanghai Consulate

Q: Do you have any other comments on Clarence Gauss and the sort of character he built in the consulate at Shanghai?

SERVICE: He was always thought of as being crusty and cold, sort of hard-bitten, gimlet-eyed. He was very demanding, very hard-working. He had no real interest except his work as far as I could see.

He had a wife and a son, but they were not in China. He and his wife usually lived apart, or did in those years. He ran a very tight ship in the office, expected everyone else to work hard and up to high standards.

The only thing that most of us could criticize about him was that he put up with Butrick. But, Butrick was a hard-working guy himself. No one could call him lazy.

Actually, my relations with Gauss became very close, particularly at Chungking, not so much at Shanghai which was a big office. But, in Chungking I lived in a small house with him and Vincent. He had almost a sort of a father relationship to me.

Q: What about the rest of the staff? Were any of the other people who subsequently became called "The China Hands?"

SERVICE: There were several. Oliver Edmund came to Shanghai later on. He was, of course, considerably senior to me.

There was another China man there named Smith, but he was not much of a China scholar and he worked in the commercial section.

"Service Transferred Chungking Soonest"

SERVICE: Early in '41--I forget just how I did it--I got myself transferred to Chungking. I think what I did was to write to the ambassador in Chungking, Nelson Johnson, whom I had known from Peking; he'd been ambassador in Peking--and said that I'd welcome an assignment to Chungking, which was then the temporary capital of China.

In those days, it was not a particularly desirable post, and anybody that volunteered got it. Very quickly, soon thereafter there was a telegram came to the department, "Service transferred Chungking soonest." So, I left and went to Chungking.

IV CHUNGKING POSTING, 1941

[Interview 5: September 12, 1977]

Background to Jack's Appointment to Chungking

Q: I'm glad to be back here after the summer, Jack. When we left off last time, you said that you had applied for posting from Shanghai to Chungking. But, in rereading E.J. Kahn's China Hands, he says that your transfer was recommended by [Everett F.] Drumright, "oddly." (E.J. Kahn, Jr. The China Hands: America's Foreign Service Officers and What Befell Them, Penguin Books, 1976, p.67.) What do you think he meant by that?

SERVICE: Well I can't really speak for Jack Kahn, but when he wrote his book he decided to talk to someone beyond the circle of China hands who were fired. I don't know who suggested it or how he happened to choose Drumright. He knew that Drumright disagreed rather basically, particularly later on, with those of us who were fired.

I think that when Kahn mentioned my coming to Chungking--and this is all my hypothesis--Drumright said that yes, he was in Chungking when Service's letter to Ambassador Nelson T. Johnson arrived. I can well assume that Johnson would have asked around, particularly Drumright, if he knew Service, what do you think of him, what should he (Johnson) recommend?

Drumright probably knew me as an active younger officer. The service in China was very small. Gossip and rumor went around. Everybody had an idea of other people's capabilities, how they stood, how good they were. Certainly Drumright knew that I was the only person since he himself had done it to have taken a third year Chinese exam. I would guess that my reputation was fairly good as a very young officer. He probably said to Johnson, "Why sure, Service is a good, hard worker."

So Drumright could say to Kahn that he recommended me. My transfer was on the basis of my having written and asked for a transfer. I think that Kahn, not really knowing the situation at the time, thinks this was odd. But it wasn't really odd.

At this time, in 1941, early '42, there was no [American] debate going on in China about China policy. There was no real disagreement among people serving the government about our attitude toward the Chiang Kai-shek regime. We were pretty much all of one mind. So there really wasn't anything very odd about it. Later on, as we look back on it--Drumright having served as ambassador to Taiwan and fought many battles for the Taiwan government--now it looks odd that Drumright should have been the guy that said, "Well, yes, you better get this guy."

Night Flight, Hong Kong to Chungking

Q: How did you travel from Shanghai to Chungking?

SERVICE: In Spring, 1941, there was still a daily flight run by the China National Aviation Corporation, which was jointly owned by the Chinese government and Pan American. Pan American supplied the know how, operations, and so on. Crews were Pan Am. The flight left Hong Kong-- Haven't I described this to you?

Q: No.

SERVICE: Very late at night at an undetermined hour-- You never knew what time you were going to leave. You were simply told to come to the airport at midnight or 1 a.m. Then somewhere around two or three in the morning they would take off from the old Kai Tak airport there in Hong Kong and circle above Hong Kong, or actually go out to sea a ways. Then when they got enough elevation--those were DC-3's in those days; the DC-2 was just going out and the DC-3 was just coming in--when they had enough elevation then they would go off across occupied China. They had to head across Hong Kong, head across Canton, and so on, Guangdong, Guangxi, and on up to Chungking.

They would fly across at night. This was before effective radar and night fighting, so there wasn't much the Japanese could do about them. Then they would arrive in Chungking soon after daybreak.

SERVICE: Before the bombers. I flew up on the same plane with the Luces. We arrived on a misty morning just barely after dawn. Clouds were around.

It was pretty hairy because the airport was down beside the river, high hills on both sides. The pilot knew it well. He got down through and we came in.

You were very, very strictly limited on weight. I was very much annoyed because I knew when I went to Chungking that I was going to have to attend a presentation of credentials by our new ambassador. By that time Gauss had been appointed. The Chinese insisted on all the rigmarole. They had to do it properly. In the American system we've got no diplomatic uniforms. If you go to a presentation of credentials you've got to wear a white tie.

Q: Tails?

SERVICE: Tails. [laughter] So I had to take my tail coat, et cetera to Chungking with me because I couldn't expect to borrow anyone else's. I was thin as a rail in those days. I weighed about a hundred and thirty pounds. I had to take my white-tie outfit, taking up valuable luggage. I was allowed forty pounds, something like that.

Then Drumright, who was in Chungking, knew I was coming, and he wrote to me in Shanghai and asked me to bring his flat silver. For some strange reason he wanted flat silver! So I had all of his flat silver in a briefcase which practically weighed me down. Anyway, I got by with the heavy briefcase partly because I was a foreigner.

There was a large Chinese passenger who was being weighed just ahead of me. He just ballooned out all around, sort of like a tent. The clerk in charge of weighing in says, "This won't do. What have you got on? Let's see." So he started to take off layer after layer after layer. He had all sorts of things inside. [laughter] The whole crowd at the airport, all of us who were waiting to be weighed in, got great enjoyment out of this poor fellow's embarrassment.

Ambassadorial Styles: Nelson T. Johnson and Clarence E. Gauss

Q: Then when you came to the embassy you served under two different ambassadors. Would you comment on their different styles?

SERVICE: I came in just on the tag end of Nelson T. Johnson. He was transferred to Australia. Clarence Gauss, who had been my boss in Shanghai when I first went to Shanghai in '38 was sent to Chungking.

Johnson was very easygoing. We referred to him as a sort of Taoist. "Do nothing and there is nothing that will not be done." He was fairly inactive and passive. At that time we were neutral in the Chinese war. Roosevelt had tried in his quarantine speech in '38 to get the United States to do something. That had been strongly rejected by public opinion. I think the general attitude in Washington was that we should try to not get involved and stay out of the line of fire.

The American embassy, for instance, under Johnson had set up offices on the south bank across the city from Chungking in an area which had been largely taken over by foreign business people. So it was regarded as a semi-foreign area, not normally a target by the Japanese. All the other embassies were in the city of Chungking.

The embassy had no motor car. We were isolated, and he was quite content to let a very active and very able naval attaché named McHugh maintain close contacts with Mme. Chiang, the Generalissimo, important people. Quite abnormal in most embassies to abdicate the important contacts, the important political reporting, to a service attaché.

Q: Why not a foreign service officer?

SERVICE: Well, here was this guy. He was in the navy. He had a car. The navy had a sampan to get across the river. Crossing the river was a problem. He was a very active, aggressive person who had been in China a long time, knew these people, was adept at developing his contacts.

The embassy under Johnson was rather content to take life easy. Johnson regarded Chungking as a temporary office and made no attempt to build up the embassy. He was just, I say, a Taoist, to repeat myself. [laughter] He was a raconteur who took life quite easily, liked to socialize and talk. He played the guitar. He was a rotund, rather jolly person who liked to sit around and talk, had a great fund of anecdotes and stories.

Gauss was the complete opposite. He was a tough, hard-boiled guy, no small talk, no interest in socializing, very touchy and sensitive about prerogatives and about the embassy exercising its proper role in things like political reporting.

He brought in new staff. The old staff was due to go out anyway. They'd been there a long time with Johnson. They'd followed him up from Nanking to Hangzhou and finally to Chungking. So they were all due for a transfer.

Before Gauss came he tried to solve the transportation problem by getting a motor car from the Department. Later on that's why I was sent to Rangoon, because the Department took so long to get the motor car that it was on the high seas at the time of Pearl Harbor. It had been promised early in the year [1941], but they had to wait for the next fiscal year before they had funds, and then they had to get bids and so on, all this sort of thing, a real bureaucratic fairy tale.

Johnson himself never did any official political reporting or drafting of telegrams. Gauss did a great deal of that. He just sat down at a typewriter and would bang out a despatch.

Q: What was the norm at that point for an ambassador?

SERVICE: There aren't really any norms. I think that Johnson was nearer the norm than Gauss in many ways. Johnson was a very close and old personal friend of Stanley Hornbeck who was an old character in the State Department, had dominated the Far Eastern branch of the State Department many, many years and was a close friend of [Cordell] Hull.

John did all of his work in personal letters to Hornbeck. He just scorned writing official despatches which were going to be read by a lot of people in the Department. It was all personal letters to Hornbeck who, of course, had the ear of [Cordell] Hull, the Secretary of State.

Gauss had no real, close, personal contacts in Washington. He sat down and wrote official despatches or expected his staff to. So, we had a very much tighter organization under Gauss. It was very soon made known to the naval attaché that the embassy was going to do the important political reporting. It expected to develop contacts with the top people, Chiang's family, and so on.

Gauss was interested in a much more active role in getting his staff out in the country and doing much more reporting. There had been very little traveling by anybody in the embassy under Johnson. Gauss got the Chinese--fairly soon--to agree to let us send people out to various cities as observers, not setting up formal offices but so we could get some feel of what was going on in the country. We were isolated.

Gauss got to Chungking at the end of May, 1941. When France fell [June, 1940], Japan had moved into Indochina. When Japan moved into Indochina and began to threaten Indonesia, the United States became really concerned. Our whole attitude toward helping China began to become much more positive.

The Flying Tigers business was all being set up in the summer of '41, sub rosa. This was a mercenary force originally. But there was an airplane factory that was going to be set up on the border between Burma and China. American experts were being sent out to help advise the Chinese in improving the Burma Road, building it better, paving it, getting more traffic over it, organizing the traffic which was deplorably disorganized.

Only Nine Staff Members in the American Embassy

SERVICE: The work of the embassy started snowballing after Pearl Harbor. I got a little picture here which shows the embassy staff in the summer of 1941. You can see that it's tiny.

Q: Nine.

SERVICE: We had no women.

Q: That was something I was going to ask you about.

SERVICE: There were no women permitted. That was true for the Americans, British and other people had them, but we had no wives, no women allowed. So that four men out of the nine were clerks. Between those four they had to take care of all the coding and decoding, filing, and typing of anything that was confidential, most of it was classified. Then there's the ambassador and four officers.

This, of course, by present day standards is tiny. It's just incredible. The smallest country now has an embassy twice or three times this size. But this was in China, in Chungking. We had the ambassador, the counselor, John Carter Vincent. We had a second secretary named John Macdonald who was the economics man. He knew no Chinese, never served in China. So, all he could do was to take the handouts.

I was third secretary and a Chinese-speaking officer. Vincent was a Chinese-speaking officer, but his language was weak because he'd been out of China for most of his service. He'd been in Switzerland, at the League of Nations, for a long time. Then there was a very young foreign service officer named Boise Hart who was not a China man.

Q: How did this staff compare, for instance, with that of the British or the French?

SERVICE: Oh, we were more or less comparable. Things were all much simpler in those days. Yes, I don't think the British had a much larger staff than we did, although it may have been fancier. The ambassador was a very able man named Clark Kerr, who later on became Lord Inverchapel and was ambassador in Moscow--had a private secretary. That sort of thing. They may have had a slightly larger staff than we did, but it wasn't tremendous. But they did have some wives working and they had some girls in the embassy.

The Soviet embassy I think was considerably larger, but the Soviets always had a big staff because they brought their own cooks and chauffeurs and so on. They didn't use Chinese servants the way we did. They had language people. They had quite a big establishment.

Q: You commented that Johnson had his own people and that Gauss gradually brought in his people. Was this the usual practice for an ambassador to have a certain degree of control over postings and who he had in his embassy?

SERVICE: In those days it didn't go down very far. I'm not sure it does now. An ambassador usually had the privilege of asking for the top people. The counselor for instance, the number two man, was usually somebody whom the ambassador felt he could work with. The ambassador could ask for other people.

One of the first things that Gauss did when he got to Chungking was to tell me that he had not asked for me. He didn't want me to be under any misapprehension that he had asked for me, since I had been assigned there almost the same time that he was assigned there. I told him, of course, that I realized that, because I had asked to be assigned there before I knew he was going to be assigned! [laughter]

Q: What was the implication of that, that he didn't want you to be under an obligation?

SERVICE: No, no. He didn't want me to feel that I could expect any special preferential treatment. He was absolutely just straight as a die, you know, on anything like that, no favoritism.

Jack as "Chief of Chancery" or General Handyman

SERVICE: Eventually I got to know people in Chungking and to get around more. And then Boise Hart arrived. He took over the consular chores, and I moved more into political reporting, although even that was part-time. It wasn't a full time job. We were always very much tied to the office, tied to the desk.

Q: That's interesting. How many hours did you have to spend at the office?

SERVICE: Oh, we spent a full eight hours usually and very often more. We were busy and getting more and more busy. We had to help out in the code room and things like that. The code room staff was very inadequate. Traffic built up. We all had to give a hand at doing telegrams, and this might mean at night sometimes.

Q: What were your assignments in Chungking?

SERVICE: It's hard to recount--It was such a small staff, of course, you had to do a lot of things. When I first arrived I think I was just made general handyman. They call you chief of chancery. It's a misnomer, the title, because it just means you're chief clerk, a minor administrative officer, taking care of all the chores that need to be done. Nowadays they've built up administrative officer into a glorious, big job. But in those days, before the administrative sciences had been developed, apparently we got along with very little administration!

When Drumright left--I think some time in the fall, or maybe even before that--I was put in charge of what did they call it? I was made a sort of a Chinese secretary in charge of checking translations and correspondence to and from the foreign office. We had the Chinese translator but someone was supposed to look over it, make sure that everything was all right.

The translator, when he had some time, translated articles from the press or articles that we asked him to do. But I soon found that nothing really was done in any immediate way to check the press. It took the translator a long time. He did laborious, word by word translations. He only did things that he was asked to do generally. He couldn't do very much.

There were about eight newspapers, seven or eight papers, in Chungking. Every political grouping or faction, clique, would have its paper. I don't want to get into a lot of Chinese names here. I started looking at the editorials. We got the papers usually quite early in the morning. I would skim the editorials of all the papers and then write a paragraph or so, just the gist of each editorial.

Later on, of course, all this thing was highly developed. After the war started, the O[ffice] of W[ar] I[nformation] got organized, and they had a whole corps of people doing this, Chinese translators doing it. But for a while it just would take up a couple hours of my morning, just skim the editorials and then try to capture the gist of it in a little capsule.

Madam Chiang's Unique American Visa Issued by Jack

SERVICE: I also did consular work, visas and so on. You were asking if there were differences between Gauss and Johnson. Soon after I got there, I was doing these sorts of consular chores-- the embassy still had to do things like passports and visas--the Foreign Office sent over the passport of Mme. Chiang. Mme. Chiang apparently made a practice of keeping an American visa in her passport so she could leave on short notice.

They sent a little note saying that they had sent the passport over many times, and it seemed to be much easier if we could just issue a permanent visa. Well, there's no such thing as a permanent visa, wasn't then. Visas are limited, for a certain period.

So, I took the thing up to Johnson and he said, "Oh, go ahead. [laughter] Just leave out any expiry date. Just give her a visa and don't mention an expiration date." So, I gave Mme. Chiang a unique State Department visa!

Of course, with Gauss this would never have worked. Gauss had written a manual on notarial procedures that was the "Bible" all through the Foreign Service. He would have insisted on the regulations and the law.

Embassy Relations with American Army and Navy Intelligence

Q: So Gauss built up a professional office as quickly as he could. Another thing that you said that interested me is that he told off the navy in no uncertain terms. What sort of liaison did he have at that time with information that the army and the navy were getting?

SERVICE: Oh, I think quite good. I don't think there was any complaint. Under Johnson, of course, he was reporting [navy] information and giving credit. He would say, "McHugh has seen Mme. Chiang and reports the following," and then send it in. I don't think that McHugh was holding out particularly. The military attaché was Meyer, who had taken the place of Stilwell, who by this time had left China as attaché. I don't think that there was any problem with the army either.

McHugh got into hot water later on when he began to try to play politics a little bit. He sort of joined the anti-Stilwell faction, and this eventually got him in the wringer.

Most of Meyer's contacts were not political contacts so much as military contacts. He watched what was happening militarily in the Sino-Japanese war and gave us copies of his reports.

Chungking: A Precipitous City Divided by the Fast-flowing Yangtze River

SERVICE: The American embassy was, as I said, situated very unsuitably and inconveniently on the south bank across the Yangtze. Crossing the Yangtze at night was sometimes a chancy and perilous business. Some nights you just couldn't do it. If the water was flooding the boats wouldn't cross. You had to cross by a little sampan with people rowing, and you'd get swept way down the river and then you'd hang on and pull yourselves up on the boats on the other side.

Q: How wide is the Yangtze there? It's a confluence, isn't it, of two rivers?

SERVICE: Yes, two rivers. Oh, I suppose maybe half a mile wide. It doesn't get much wider when it floods because the banks are very steep. The Yangtze flowed down through these very steep shores. The city of Chungking is built on a high rock, like a ship almost, between these two rivers, and any place you go is up. In those days you had a long, long line of steps. People used to say that there were 365 steps at the landing where we normally went. I think that's slightly exaggerated, but in any case it would differ a good deal depending on the stage of the water because the difference between high water and low water level was a hundred feet. So obviously at low water you had a lot more steps to go up.

A lot of people found the steps difficult. Gauss usually had to get a sedan chair to go up. There were no wheel vehicles until you got up onto the top, the plateau at the top. Then you'd have some rickshaws and buses. But there was only one place in Chungking where a motor car could get down to the river. That was where they had a ferry across for trucks and so on.

Along the cliff side as the water went down people built bamboo houses, huts, and when the water came up in the springtime they all had to be torn down. This happened every year. Houses would move down as the water went down and be dismantled when the river came up the next spring.

The commercial airport was an island in the river, a glorified sandbar. But then every summer that was flooded. So then they had to use another airport much further away from town, the military field. But the river was very swift, and when it was rising in flood, it could be quite dangerous.

They had launches, steam ferries, that operated during the daytime, but they quit in very early evening. After that, a sampan, a small rowboat was the only way of getting across.

Q: Were these rowed by men or women?

SERVICE: Men. You're thinking of South China where it's women. But in Sichuan it's a man's job. They row by standing up, facing forward, not our way of sitting down, backward.

Q: I've never been able to figure out how that works!

Domestic Arrangements

Q: Where and how did you live in Chungking?

SERVICE: The embassy rented a bungalow that belonged to Standard Oil.

In normal times, Standard Oil was a fairly large company in Chungking because it was the distributing center for Sichuan and areas west. So kerosene was shipped there in bulk, and put into five gallon cans to be shipped out by other means from Chungking.

Since fairly early in the war the river had been blocked. It was barricaded just above Ichang to keep the Japanese from being able to come up the Yangtze, so that nothing could come in and Standard Oil was doing no business. They had one man there, sort of a caretaker. But several of their houses were available and they had a bungalow up in the hills, in what was called the Second Range, the south bank of Chungking. The embassy rented that bungalow, and they also had a house down fairly near the river. That was the house that was right next to the ambassador and the counselor.

When I arrived the man that I was replacing had lived up in the hill bungalow and I went up there. I didn't mind. It was a half hour or forty minutes from the office, but I normally did it by foot. Some people did it by chair. It was more arduous, I thought, by chair than by foot.

But the ambassador and the counselor and the counselor's private secretary lived in the Standard Oil house down fairly near the river, near the office.

We rented a building from a Chinese landlord, which I think was put up in a hurry, for the office, which became very inadequate. Other people rented houses. The rest of the staff lived in a couple of houses that were owned by a widow of an American doctor who had left the mission and gone into business. He started a private hospital in Chungking, a drugstore, and so on. They built several houses which they rented. But we were all there on the south bank.

In the fall of '41 I was asked to come down from my hill house and move in with the ambassador and the counselor, Gauss and Vincent. So I did that. I lived there until I left Chungking in late '42.

Q: Did you have a Chinese staff, a cook, amah, and so on?

SERVICE: Yes. Some of the staff had been brought in by Johnson and other people, from Nanking, Hangzhou.

Q: Who ran the house?

SERVICE: That was one of my chores really. I was the junior man, and so it was my job to do the accounts and pay the cook, and do things like that, watch out that we weren't squeezed too much and so on.

Coffee was a tremendous problem. These crazy, perverse things that happen in times of scarcity - Coffee became a sort of a fad in Chungking, which was completely cut off from the world. Coffeeshouses sprang up all over town. The in thing to do was to have coffee. Where did they get their coffee? They got their coffee, of course, largely from foreign establishments like ours.

We had an agreement with the cook that if we got forty-five cups of coffee out of each pound of coffee, that was okay. We sort of kept a check. [laughter] How long the coffee lasted. Of course, what they did was to dry the grounds. Grounds were all dried and sold to the coffeeshouses, maybe sweetened a little bit with some fresh coffee. But mostly it was grounds that you got when you went to town. They boiled them to death.

You had to be very careful because things got terribly scarce, terribly expensive. Light bulbs would disappear. You couldn't leave a light bulb out on the porch, for instance, things like that. You had to bring it in at night. You got along fairly well without imported stuff.

The navy had a gunboat there. I think around the time of Pearl Harbor, or maybe even before Pearl Harbor, it was decided to pull the crew of the gunboat out. It couldn't do anything. It couldn't go anyplace. So they sold a lot of their supplies to the embassy staff.

As I mentioned the naval attaché had a car, and the navy had a truck which went on a regular supply run, first to Indochina, when the road was open from Indochina, to Chungking, and then from the Burma Road later on. So they would bring in some supplies. But after the gunboat stopped operating, the truck was discontinued, and we were really cut off.

Q: Did you eat Western style or Chinese?

SERVICE: Completely Western.

Q: Really? Was this Gauss's preference?

SERVICE: Yes. He had no interest in Chinese food.

One thing that we got from the gunboat was a case of tabasco sauce, and Gauss liked tabasco sauce. We had soup at lunch, we had soup at dinner, and always had tabasco sauce. I learned that eggs with tabasco sauce are very good, so I had tabasco sauce three meals a day. I had eggs for breakfast. [laughter]

But this was normal. Most foreigners were quite nationalistic in that they insisted that the cook prepare foreign style food, bread and so on.

Q: Were there other residents in that house?

SERVICE: It was a rather small house and it was just the three of us, Gauss, Vincent and myself. The bungalow up on the hill I always shared with someone else.

Japanese bombing rituals

SERVICE: The summer of '41 was the last heavy season of bombing. The Japanese did most of their bombings in the summer in Chungking for some reason. We had very heavy, sometimes almost continuous bombing in the summer of '41, whenever the weather was good.

It was all quite ritualized. If the weather was good the Japanese from Hangzhou would send up a reconnaissance plane to check the weather in Chungking. You could hear it buzzing about. Then you would know that in about two hours or three hours, various alerts would start going off.

The Chinese had a wonderful system of air raid warnings. A lot of credit is given to the Chinese for this. But it was organized by [Claire Lee] Chennault. Chennault then worked for the Chinese. This was before the Flying Tigers, the Fourteenth Air Force.

It was made easier by the fact that the Japanese operated only from one particular locality, Hangzhou. They built their base in Hangzhou. The Chinese had watchers apparently almost beside the field, right in Hangzhou. So they knew when the Japanese were getting ready for a raid, they could tell when they took off, and all the rest of it. The watchers could tell when they got to two hundred kilometers, a hundred kilometers, fifty kilometers from Chungking. By that time you heard them and everybody went underground.

SERVICE: Oh yes. We had one for the embassy. Everyone was instructed, required, you might say, to prepare shelters. Chungking is on soft sandstone, quite easy to dig into.

We normally used to stay outside of the shelter until we could see the planes and see where they were coming from. In the city, because of so many people, police required you to go underground, but we would stand outside and watch the planes. If the planes weren't coming over us then we would normally not go in. Even that was not without some danger because Chinese did have anti-aircraft and you had shrapnel falling around.

The first day I was there-- I came up on a plane with Mrs. Luce, Henry Luce and Mrs. [Clare Boothe] Luce. They came over and called at the embassy and there was an air-raid. I was standing about three feet from Mrs. Luce on the edge of a terrace looking out toward the city, a whizzing sound, and a piece of shrapnel fell right between us on the ground, a small piece about as big as your finger.

Q: How did she react to it?

SERVICE: She reacted very well. She was very calm. I made the mistake, foolishly and ignorantly, of trying to pick it up too soon, before it got cold. Shrapnel gets very, very hot.

But anyway we would watch, and then if the planes were in a threatening position we'd go in the shelter. If you had a shelter then you were required to let the neighborhood people in. There were a lot of poor people, ordinary people who couldn't build shelters. So if you had a shelter you had to have open house.

One day we went into the shelter and I noticed a woman holding a child who was obviously quite sick. So I asked her what was wrong with the child. The mother gestured: "Something wrong with his throat." It was mumps. So at an appropriate time after that I got sick. We had a navy doctor there from the gunboat. The navy doctor says, "You've got a fine case of mumps. Get yourself up the hill." I was living up on top of the hill at that time. "Get yourself up the hill and ride a chair." That was the only time, I think, I rode a chair up the hill. "Stay in bed. Don't get up. Don't walk around."

So I went up. I got the Chinese to get me some of these mats--they use them in South China a lot--to sleep on because it was much cooler than sleeping on a mattress and sheets. I unrolled the mat and I spent my two weeks up there. The doctor never came to see me.

Q: Were you very sick?

SERVICE: Not really. We had some night air raids. So all of this made staying in bed not exactly comfortable.

But the embassy [staff] used to come up to the hill, to the cottage on the hill when they had day-long alerts. They would come up and they could work up there. The whole staff pretty much would move up--the coolies carried a few typewriters. We worked up there several times when we had these prolonged alerts. The Japanese would send over a few planes every two or three hours to keep the whole city immobilized. Food couldn't come in from the countryside. People would be kept in the shelters.

Q: What about fires?

SERVICE: Oh terrible fires, terrible fires.

Q: Did they have a reasonable firefighting system?

SERVICE: Well, very poor, very primitive. For one thing there was no water. The river was two hundred feet below, so it was very hard to get very much water. Very often the bombs would destroy whatever water supply there was, the mains and pipes. They had no real adequate water supply.

So that it very often was a matter of trying to stop the spread of a fire by tearing down, making firebreaks. You couldn't do much about putting out the fires. By the time the war was over Chungking had all been rebuilt several times. Most of it was just bamboo and sort of wattle. You know, they split bamboo and would weave it into a mat and then plaster mud on it and then outside a thin coat of lime plaster, white plaster. These things could burn down very quickly, but then they could be put up very quickly.

Q: What about communication? Was there an operating telephone system?

SERVICE: Yes but very, very poor. We could telephone to the city, but that again was subject to trouble when air raids came. But there was a telephone. It was almost like, not as bad as Chengdu in my youth, but you sent messages around. We had a coolie or two that spent his time carrying notes. It was sometimes more reliable and sometimes just as fast to send a message by courier.

We didn't try to do much business with the foreign office, for instance, by telephone. Yes, setting up appointments, something like that, with the ambassador, you could do that by phone. But if you wanted to do any business you didn't sit down and do it by telephone. You went over and saw the man.

Q: How good were Chungking's radio links with Japanese-occupied China?

SERVICE: They had small radios. I'm sure they had to move them around. In a place like Hangzhou close to the Japanese they probably had small, portable things. You could work them with a bicycle [pedaling], you know. Well, that was one way they often did things. In a city like Hangzhou they may have gotten house current. It was relayed, I'm sure, to some other point and then further on.

Q: But when you talk about sending telegrams, did you have reliable wire and/or radio service?

SERVICE: We used the navy, you see. The navy had a gunboat there and one purpose of the gunboat was for the radio. We worked through the Philippines. I'm not sure that we used the Chinese commercial telegraph at all. I don't recall ever using it at that time. I think everything went through our navy. When the gunboat was pulled out we still kept the navy radio staff. They stayed on and set up their station on land.

Jack's Evolution as Political Officer and Communist Specialist

Q: How did you become the embassy's "specialist" on the Chinese Communists? I put that in quotation marks. Again, Jack Kahn says that Gauss assigned you to find out all you could about the Communists, and Joseph Esherick (Ed. Joseph W. Esherick, Lost Chance in China: The World War II despatches of John S. Service, New York, Random House, 1974, p. 169) quotes you as saying that it was a simple career decision, that you weren't an economist and you weren't this and you weren't that, but you could make it as a Communist specialist.

SERVICE: Well, people are, you know, speaking at different times and for different forums. Or is it fora?

Q: [laughing] I don't think so.

SERVICE: What Kahn is doing is quoting in effect from Gauss' testimony when he was testifying before my Loyalty Security Board in the State Department in 1950. Gauss is trying to explain, of course, that I was only carrying out orders. He's gilding the lily a little bit and so on. Certainly, I was assigned political reporting and part of the political reporting I was assigned was reporting on the Communists, maintaining contact with them. So, he's correct, as you say, that he sent me over there to find out all I could about them, I suppose.

Esherick's statement is aimed at a refutation of the general assumption that I reported on the Communists because of a political interest in the Communists. This was a very common attitude. If you reported on something it must be because you're interested in that yourself. In other words you're under suspicion simply because of having reported on it.

I was saying that certainly I was interested in political reporting--the gravy, you know; this was the way to fame and fortune, but it's also the interesting part for most people in Foreign Service work--and that I had been very much impressed by talking to old hands like Clubb, [Edmund O.]

Clubb who had advised me, advised any young man, to make a specialty of something, get to be known as being an authority on some particular subject, some topic.

After I got to Chungking it was quite obvious--to me at any rate--that the big problem in the future, the political issue, was going to be the Kuomintang-Communist thing.

Q: You say that as though it were self-evident. But from my reading in that period it doesn't seem to have been evident to many people who regarded the Kuomintang, both in China and in the West, as the government and that the Communists were done for.

SERVICE: Well, yes. I can't say that this was immediately apparent. It became apparent over a period of time. But almost as soon as I got to Chungking, or my very first few weeks there I think, Drumright was having a meeting at dinner with Zhou En-lai and some of the people on Zhou En-lai's staff, and he took me along.

He knew that he was leaving. I was coming in. This was sort of turning over his contacts, introducing me and so on. This was a very proper, thoughtful thing to do. But it was recognition and we all recognized at that time that the Communists were an important factor.

There were very few China language officers in the embassy at that time, so I think it was just taken for granted that the Communist contact would be maintained, and that I would be the one to maintain it.

New Fourth Army Incident and the Eighth Route Army: Factions Within the Communist Party

SERVICE: The New Fourth Army incident had just recently taken place in January that year [1941]. The British ambassador Clark Kerr, made some very strong statements on it. We kept our mouths shut. We said nothing at all. Johnson was ambassador and we just saw no evil, heard no evil, and so on.

Q: Would you put the New Fourth Army incident in context?

SERVICE: At the beginning of the war--

Q: Excuse me. What do you mean? Everybody has a different date for the beginning of the war.

SERVICE: We're talking about the Sino-Japanese war. At the beginning of the Sino-Japanese war in '37 it had been understood or perhaps agreed on, but at least implicitly understood, that the Chinese Communist forces, who at that time were based in north Shaanxi around Yenan, would be allowed to operate in North China behind the Japanese lines, which they did very successfully. Very quickly they expanded their control in the North China provinces.

But at the same time there were still some remnants, old "Red" guerrillas, in the south Yangtze areas, Gansu where the Communists had operated from 1928 until 1934 when they were driven out. But they'd had a republic in Gansu, and they had left behind a lot of people who were indoctrinated, who had been in their army, who were fighters, and who had maintained a shadowy glimmer of a guerrilla struggle.

Chen Yi for instance, who later on became foreign minister, remained in that area. One of Mao's brothers had stayed but was caught and killed.

But during the early honeymoon period of the war--late '37, early '38, and particularly when the capital was in Hangzhou--the proposal was made: "Everything to fight the Japanese." Therefore we've got these people down here. They're old, experienced people, guerrilla people. The Kuomintang agreed to allow another Communist force to be formed which was called the New Fourth Army. The Fourth Army had been very famous in the 1926-27 Northern Expedition. So they took the name "New Fourth Army."

This became extremely successful, operating in the areas south and then eventually north of the Yangtze, the lower Yangtze Valley. It became so successful the Kuomintang became very disturbed. Relations from '39 got very bad anyway. So the central government ordered the New Fourth Army to discontinue any operation south of the Yangtze and move all its operation north of the Yangtze.

What really happened and why is still a matter of debate. The Communists promised they would do so. They agreed in principle they would move. Most of their forces did go up north, but they had a very large headquarters contingent with wounded and various people like that, staff, civilian cadres, which were still south. Instead of moving in early January, instead of moving north, they started to move southeast, I think it was, anyway not toward the Yangtze.

They had some excuse that they couldn't cross the Yangtze where the Kuomintang wanted them to because of the Japanese presence. They had to take a roundabout route. But the Kuomintang apparently was ready, and they jumped on them and wiped them out.

Ten thousand or so people were practically obliterated. They captured the commander of the New Fourth Army and kept him prisoner through the war. He was killed at the end of the war.

There was a great outcry. As I say, Clark Kerr the British ambassador issued very strong critical statements of the action.

Q: To the Kuomintang, to Chiang?

SERVICE: To Chiang and to the press. It was given to the press. The Kuomintang officially dissolved the New Fourth Army, said that it would no longer recognize any New Fourth Army.

The Chinese Communists, of course, protested bitterly. Both sides put out big stories to the press. As I say the whole incident is still a mystery to some extent, because there was also internal friction within the Communist party. We know much more about these things now than we did then. We knew nothing then, generally speaking.

But some of the leaders of the New Fourth Army were apparently very close to Wang Ming and the Russian-trained faction, the Twenty-eighth Bolshevik faction within the Communist party. They were not Mao Zedong men. The Eighth Route Army people generally were hostile to them.

Q: The Eighth Route?

SERVICE: The Eighth Route Army which were the people based in Yen-an.

All this goes back to my point that at some point in here it seemed to me that this was going to be a critical issue. As I began to get more Chinese friends, newspaper friends, they began to tell me this. This perhaps was the summer of '42. So that it seemed to me that I should concentrate on Communist politics.

In that sense you could say, as Esherick does, that this specialization was a career decision. It was not a decision based on my own political sympathies particularly. It was looking for something that was going to be the main--the ball game.

Japanese and American Negotiations, 1941: The American Embassy in Chungking Was Not Informed.

SERVICE: In the summer of '41, things in Washington were warming up between the United States versus Japan. Our War and Navy Departments at that time said that they weren't ready and they had to have delay. They didn't want to have hostilities if they could avoid it. So in Washington there began to be this long negotiation with the Japanese to try to reach some sort of a modus vivendi, it was called.

We in Chungking were kept completely in the dark about this. It was partly the disorganized way that the State Department very often operated. But also it was regarded as a very tightly held secret business, although the Chinese in Washington found out about it. Hu Shih was the ambassador but T.V. Soong, who was very aggressive, very pushing, and also developed excellent contacts in Washington, was there.

Gauss got called in several times by the Chinese foreign minister, named Quo T'ai-Ch'i. Quo was a wonderful old man--I think he'd been ambassador in London as a matter of fact, and educated at Oxford. Quo asked Gauss what was happening in Washington. "Are you getting ready to sell us down the river? Our ambassador has been told by your Secretary of State it's necessary to have these discussions with the Japanese. What are you discussing?" Gauss was completely uninformed, and completely at a loss.

The reason I'm mentioning it is that he always used to take me along. My job was not to participate in the talks, but simply to listen and write the memorandum of conversation when we got home. Gauss almost never changed the memoranda that I wrote. Of course, I would try to get the conversation organized a little bit better. I wasn't trying to make a verbatim thing, but it had to be something that could be the basis of a telegram or despatch.

You asked once about training for political reporting. This was one aspect of reporting. You've got to be able to hear; you've got to be able to listen. So, all through this summer of '41, I was writing the memoranda of conversation at three or four of these meetings.

Last time I was telling you about accompanying the ambassador with his meetings with the foreign minister and my function being to prepare the memoranda of conversation. I'm not sure that I made it clear that I did not take notes. You don't take notes when you're sitting there having an interview with the foreign minister. It had to be pure memory.

It was like the old boy scout game of watching, going past a shop window or being shown a certain number of things and then having to see how much you could remember. It taught you to fasten on to the key facts, dates, numbers. Anything specific, you'd try to fix in your mind.

Later on in New Zealand, to skip way ahead, my ambassador there used to do the same sort of thing. But he would go and talk to the prime minister without me being present and then he would come back to the office. He lived way out in the country: he wanted to get home. He would say, "I said this and Peter Fraser would say this and I said this and Peter said that. Now send a telegram." I would be expected to send a telegram.

But an important part of political reporting is just the ability to listen and to report correctly.

Q: Do you now have any explanation that makes sense to you of why State kept your ambassador in ignorance of these negotiations with the Japanese?

SERVICE: No, not really. The Chinese picked up some stuff, obviously, that they were not expected to pick up. I mean I'm sure they had some leaks available. But State did tell the Chinese ambassador something. I think that they may not have trusted the radio, the codes. We were reading the Japanese codes at this time--beginning to. They may not have trusted our codes. We were getting new codes. We knew our codes were not very good.

There was always a fear that Chungking was a bit like a sieve. Of course, this was the thing brought out later at Yalta, that there could be no secrets in Chungking. There was some justification that Chungking was probably more of a sieve even than Washington.

But also these negotiations were being carried on by [Joseph Clark] Grew and by [Joseph William] Ballantine, the Japanese oriented people. Hornbeck was in it. I think that they just didn't think that the ambassador to China needed to be informed. We were discussing this with the Japanese. I think that they really never thought about where this left Gauss, you see, in Chungking.

Gauss had no friends in the State Department as I say. Nobody in the Department really felt any great warmth of sympathy toward him. He was a cold man in many ways. There wasn't this sort of tie with Hornbeck, for instance, that Johnson had had. If Johnson had been there, there might have been something in a private communication, something like that.

Q: I haven't seen that commented on anywhere in the literature, and it seems, as you talk about it, fairly important in terms of later developments, that our ambassador did not have a good relationship with State or with the executive.

SERVICE: Oh yes. Yes, this is important, always important.

Q: Has that been commented on? You know the literature much better than I do.

SERVICE: I don't recall any comment on this particular episode. In my monograph (John S. Service, The Amerasia Papers: Some Problems in the History of US-China relations, Berkeley, China Research Monographs, University of California, 1971) discussing a later period in 1944-45, I mention that the State Department had no real in with the White House.

People have commented generally on Roosevelt's distrust of the Foreign Service, but in this particular case I don't think it was Roosevelt. I think it was just that Grew and those people didn't feel under any compulsion to keep Gauss informed. They could justify that on the basis that, "Well after all, we're telling the Chinese." But they weren't telling the Chinese enough to satisfy the Chinese. Otherwise the Chinese wouldn't have gotten Gauss on the carpet so fiercely.

Q: So fiercely, what do you mean?

SERVICE: Well, the foreign minister was very agitated, very alarmed! "What is going on? What are you people doing? What are you going to do to us?"

Q: Legitimately, I would say.

SERVICE: Oh certainly. Chiang Kai-shek made some statement as I recall. But the foreign minister made no bones of the fact that he was talking for the Generalissimo. The Chinese were extremely alarmed.

Pearl Harbor: Great Chinese Celebrations

Q: What was the impact of the news of Pearl Harbor on Chungking?

SERVICE: Well, there was a great Chinese celebration. It was V-J Day as far as the Chinese were concerned, fireworks all over the city, a big celebration. The Chinese were beside themselves with excitement and pleasure because to them this meant assurance of victory. The war was over, and literally almost, as far as active participation in the war went. They sat back after that and didn't do much.

The impact on us was quite different. In the first place we decided we had to do something immediately about increasing coverage. We had to have somebody on duty in the evenings, things like that. We'd never had night duty officers. So immediately we started having someone on duty twenty-four hours in the office. I drew the first night. I spent all of my first night, that first night, decoding a long message that was delayed, telling us what to do in case of a sudden outbreak of hostilities, destroying codes, burning this and that. This had been delayed in transit through the Philippines and it went on for pages.

Jack's Dash to Rangoon for the Embassy Mercury

SERVICE: One thing that we realized in the embassy very quickly was that the motor car, which Gauss had gotten the State Department to promise us, was still on the high seas and would never reach us because from where we sat we realized, just took it for granted, that Hong Kong and Burma were going to fall very quickly. Hong Kong, of course, was attacked immediately. There was no hope of them holding out. The Japanese moved immediately into Thailand and began to move toward Burma and towards Singapore.

So we scouted around and found that the British American Tobacco Company had a new car, landed in Rangoon, which they were willing to sell because everybody in Burma also realized that they were in a bag. They had to be prepared to get out. So the car in Burma was a drag on the market. Anyway, we bought the car from the British American Tobacco Company.

I was very eager and the ambassador agreed to let me go down to drive it up. But he thought that it might be a good idea to have two people, partly for intelligence reasons, I suppose. The military attaché wanted to send a young officer along, so he went with me. The Texaco Oil Company also managed to get a car in Rangoon. So the three of us went down by air, oh, just before Christmas in '41, stopped in Kunming.

The Chinese National Aviation Company was just starting this route from China down to Burma. They foresaw the end of the Hong Kong link. We spent the night at the border, Lashio, and then had to rent a car the next day and get down to the railhead and then took the train, came down into Rangoon.

When we were coming into Rangoon it was Christmas morning, which also happened to be a Sunday as I recall. The fields were just full of people, miles out of town, all these people out in the country. We couldn't understand what it was all about. Why should the Burmese all be going out and having a picnic in the countryside?

We got into the railway station. It was almost deserted. There were no porters, no crew. Vegetables and so on were piled up on the platform. We finally found somebody and asked. They said, "Oh, we were bombed yesterday by the Japanese." The Japanese had made their first very heavy bombing of the Rangoon docks.

The population--Burmese and Indian were the majority--just evacuated, just left. They had no interest in the war. The Indians, of course, were trying to get back to India. A lot of them did, overland. The Burmese just went off to the villages. We went into a quiet, empty city.

The hotel had no staff. We went in and we finally found an assistant manager--it was the Strand Hotel in Rangoon--and said, "Can we stay here?" He said, "Well, go upstairs, find a room. You can have it." So we picked out what we thought was the best room, not too near the top, not too near the bottom, no outside windows, interior light well, that sort of thing.

We were just unpacking when the air raid alarm went off in the building right next door to us. So, we went downstairs and found the air raid shelter was a ballroom on the ground floor with mattresses up against the windows. We stayed in the hotel. We had to stay there. They couldn't throw us out. Eventually there were only a few of us that stayed. Sort of a hardcore--a Greek shipowner, a one-armed Frenchman who was trying to recruit for De Gaulle's Free French, some sort of a lady singer, uncertain age, Greek or something like that. I don't know whether she was European. Anyway, we were a very odd group, but we all got to be very chummy.

There was an Austrian Jewish refugee who was a chef. There was a Swiss who was assistant manager. I don't know who the manager was. I never saw him. He wasn't around. There was Captain Cahill and myself, Americans, and these few other people, the one-armed Frenchman. We lived in a little group in the hotel.

The internal phones worked in the hotel. We got a call in our room one night. "Can you come down and help out in an emergency?" The hotel had been called up by British command. "We got a Sunderland flying boat full of VIP's coming through. You've got to put them up. We got no place to take care of them."

It was all Australian brass from Tobruk. The siege of Tobruk had just been raised, and they were trying desperately to get these people--this was most of the high command of the Australian army--they were trying to get them back to Australia because the Japanese were coming down the Solomons. Australia was almost bare of troops.

I'd waited tables in college and washed dishes and so on. We went down and peeled potatoes and helped get ready and then I said, "We'll wait on tables." We set up a private dining room, and we waited on all these officers.

By the end of the meal, they began to get suspicious about these two Yanks. I had said something about "Captain" to Cahill. So they said, "What's going on?" We had quite an evening after that. They drank up most of the case of whiskey which we bought to take up to Chungking!

I ran into one of these guys years later when I was in New Zealand. The Australians felt that their military heroes should be rewarded and given nice jobs. So, he was sent to New Zealand as a trade commissioner. [laughter] Australian trade commissioner. We looked at each other for a long time. Then finally I asked him if perhaps he had passed through Rangoon. He looked at me and said, "My God, that's it. I've got you now, mate! [laughter]"

Rangoon to Chungking Via the Burma Road, January 1942

SERVICE: We picked up the car, a Mercury, which at that time was nothing much except a fancy Ford. Unfortunately, New Year's Eve, my friend the army officer went out on a bit of a party and backed up, didn't realize one of the back doors was open. So that door was badly sprung and didn't work very well. From then on, it was better to leave it closed. [laughter] There was no hope of getting it fixed in Rangoon of course.

Gauss smoked twelve cigars a day, which meant a box of twenty-five lasted him two days. When I went down he said, "Get me all the cigars you can." Of course, the stores were closed in Rangoon. Rangoon really was a dead city. Then things opened up a little bit. We got into stores. I finally bought three thousand cigars.

We had to buy spare tires. We had to buy extra springs for spare parts, loaded them all up on top of the car, inside the car. Then we drove up the Burma Road. It was a long trip, more than two weeks, three weeks, as I recall, from Rangoon to Chungking.

Q: How did you get enough gasoline?

SERVICE: Before we left Chungking we had to make arrangements with the Chinese National Resources Commission. So we had orders from them to supply us. In all the main cities there'd be a National Resources Commission depot and we'd get gasoline. We had extra cans, of course, to carry spare fuel. No gas stations along the road.

The road was chaotic. Incredible mismanagement and lack of management. Every Chinese government organization that had an interest in transportation maintained its own trucks, own transportation services, no unity or unification. Military, civilian, all sorts of different organizations. There was no policing of the road.

The road was continually being tinkered with. It was in atrocious condition. It was built by poor farmers, minority hill people that had never seen a road! They didn't know what it was all for. They had supervisors but there was no machinery or anything like that. It was carved out of the hillside. Many places were subject to slides. You had to cross the Salween and the Mekong Rivers.

SERVICE: You go up to about eight thousand, but then you run into these tremendous canyons you see. At some of these they had bridges. Sometimes you had to cross by ferry. The Chinese drivers, a lot of them were inexperienced, inept. They tried to save gasoline, so they would coast.

You had terrific, hairpin zigzags, guys trying to coast down to save gasoline. They were issued an allotment of gasoline for the trip. So anything they could save, they could sell at the black market. At that time gasoline, you know, was the equivalent of $5 U.S. a gallon on the market.

The trucks were terrifically overloaded. The Chinese themselves officially would overload the truck, but then the driver would take extra illicit cargo and a lot of illicit passengers, "yellow fish" and so on.

Q: Yellow fish?

SERVICE: Yellow fish was what the Chinese called them. So that the trucks were subject to atrocious road, to brutal overloading, and to just horrendous misdriving. Some were wrecked. It was a tough road.

Q: What was the surface allegedly?

SERVICE: The surface was just gravel, earthbound macadam. You put in big rocks and then you put a layer of smaller rocks and then you put in fine rocks that have been--

Q: Tarred?

SERVICE: --beaten up, no tar. There was no tar except they were just starting to put blacktop on some of it down near the Burma border. There were a few miles down near the Burma border that were black-topped, but the rest of it when it rained--and it rained a great deal--was terrible because a lot of this earth was clay. It would get very slippery and slick. Then, of course, trucks pounding over it kept breaking it up.

Q: How did the trip go?

SERVICE: Without any great incident.

Q: Bombing? Refugees?

SERVICE: No. Lots of people on the road. There weren't many refugees. As I say, most of the Burmese simply had left Rangoon.

We went up north of Rangoon to a place called Tounggoo where the Flying Tigers had set their base. We spent a night there and went up to Maymyo, which is a hill station in the hills north of Mandalay where the British were training their people for jungle warfare.

It was pathetic to see these poor guys from the banks and the British trading companies who'd spent their life sitting at a desk, now suddenly trying to learn how to be a commando. I don't know how many of these guys came out alive, but they were no match for the Japanese of course, when it came to jungle warfare.

I don't know. It was all sort of dreamlike because no one really thought that the Japanese could be stopped. The Flying Tigers people were shooting down some, but had no way of getting spare parts. They were pretty much cut off. They were only fifty planes or something like that.

The poor British had outdated, old planes. They were no match for the Japanese. The Zeros just massacred them. Our people with the P-40's and Chennault's tactics did pretty well against the Zeros.

We spent the night at Maymyo. They'd hoped that they were going to be able to get parts, but the way things were going, the losses and the attrition, they didn't see much hope. These guys, yes, they were being very gung-ho and stiff upper lip and "stop in the afternoon for tea" at this hill station. But one felt a little uneasy about them.

Anyway, we got up the road okay without any serious mishap, and made it back to Chungking. Gauss said, "Did you get the cigars?" I said, "Yes, three thousand." And he said, "You'll look better when you get that beard off." [laughter]

V TRAMPING AROUND NORTH CHINA, 1942

Building Chinese Contacts

Q: You told me that when you first arrived in Chungking, Drumright introduced you to his contacts. How did you go about building on these Communist contacts and making a variety of Chinese friends? I was surprised to read that you belonged to Rotary in Chungking and founded a Masonic group there.

SERVICE: I didn't actually found it. No, that's a misnomer. There was quite an active Masonic group in China, almost all Western trained, educated in America primarily, businessmen, government people, and so on, who apparently liked the whole idea very much. It fitted in with their whole idea of clique, group, faction, secret societies and so on, but it was Western you see.

My father had been a Mason in Shanghai in a lodge where he was one of the very few foreigners. I eventually joined another Masonic network. All Masonic lodges are under a particular Grand Lodge. The lodge my father belonged to was under the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts for some strange reason. Some Americans who were Masons in China long, long ago--decades back in the last century--wanted to start a lodge and they found they could affiliate with the Grand Lodge of the state of Massachusetts.

But later on most of these Chinese who started lodges affiliated with the Grand Lodge of the Philippines which was of course mostly American started.

You can't start a new lodge unless you get a charter. By the time of Pearl Harbor the Philippine Grand Lodge was closed up. This was one of the first things the Japanese did. So, there was no way for the Masons in Chungking to start a new lodge. They couldn't get a charter since the Grand Lodge was out of business.

So we had an informal group of Masons, who were Masons from various lodges in Shanghai, who met occasionally in Chungking. It was something that for a while was sort of fun. Later on I got too busy and drifted away from it.

Rotary was again mostly all Chinese. There were very few foreign businessmen in there. But it was a way of getting to know a lot of people.

I knew already or got to know the foreign newspaper people. There were some Chinese newspaper people that dealt with the foreigners a good deal, administrative information people.

The Reuters man was Chinese. Of course, there were all the missionaries. A lot of them had known my parents. My parents lived in Chungking until '24.

Jack's Travels Begin: Irrigation Works in Sichuan

SERVICE: One thing leads to another, but I think it was through one of these missionary contacts that I got invited on a trip in the spring of 1942. The provincial government people were very much put in the shade by the national government people. When the national government moved into Sichuan, the Sichuan provincial people had to take a back seat.

There was a very active provincial commissioner of construction or public works man--the Chinese always used reconstruction, but the Chinese phrase really means construction. His department had built several dams and irrigation works in central Sichuan, to try to improve production. Some of these were being opened up. He wanted to get a little bit of notice, a little bit of publicity, a little face.

But also we had some relief funds that we were distributing, not large. We had allotted funds for rebuilding after some of the bombings in Chungking, things like that. Actually one of the fine stairways going up to the city from the river bank had been built with these relief funds.

I think that this provincial commissioner of reconstruction may have had some idea of getting into American funds, making contact with an American dispenser of funds. An embassy person along would add luster to the group he was planning.

He was a very good friend of an old missionary named Rape. One of his sons went to college in the States, and he changed the name to Rappe. But I think he went to Rappe and asked Rappe if he knew any American in the embassy that would like to join the visit to these irrigation works. Gauss agreed, the embassy agreed, so I tootled off for about a ten day trip. They had a special bus. There were several newspaper people and assorted worthies. Rappe was along and I was there from the embassy.

There was a very pleasant correspondent from the Chinese Central News Agency, official government news agency. He and I became extremely close friends. There were a couple of other newspaper correspondents along too. It was a very genial and sort of a jolly trip. Rappe was a person who had a lot of fun and good humor in him and spoke perfect Sichuanese, because most of the government people were from down river. The Central newsman was from Manchuria actually.

Buildup of U.S. Agencies in Chungking

[Interview 6: September 21, 1977]

SERVICE: During this period [1942] there was a buildup in Chungking of new U.S. agencies. Also, there was a parallel buildup in Washington of research organizations, research analysis intelligence, that just hadn't existed before. The State Department set up some sort of a research unit which I don't think they'd had before.

Very early an office was set up called COI--coordinator of information. Then the Army and the Navy--and OSS--set up their R&A branches. They were beginning to ask for information.

Eventually it got very confused because people in China felt they were too busy to be spending all their time sending in information. They were busy with current affairs. Eventually Washington created a "Joint Intelligence Collection Agency" which sent representatives to China to try to make sure that they got stuff.

In Washington there was competition for information and some people did not want to share their information with other people. But we'll hear more of this later on.

The coordinator of information was a predecessor of OSS. Their mandate was to collect publications and documents. It was under General [William J.] Donovan. The first man they sent out was a man named David Rowe. The coordinator of information was set up, like a lot of these very early agencies, directly under the White House. They didn't know quite where to put it in Washington. So, it was directly under the White House.

Rowe came out and got cards printed up in Chinese that he was the China representative of the pai kung, the "White House." This finished him as far as the American embassy, American ambassador, was concerned, because it appeared that he outranked the ambassador, you see! [laughter] David Rowe didn't last very long.

A similar development was American relief. There had been some American relief work before Pearl Harbor, not on a very large scale. But soon after Pearl Harbor and the war started, United China Relief, which had [Henry] Luce as one of its very important angels, started up.

One day in the embassy there I remember we had a visitor, a short, round fellow, quite cheerful, bustling, busy little type of fellow from New York named Albert Kohlberg.

SERVICE: He was working for something called the American Bureau for Medical Aid to China, which was trying to get supplies for the China Red Cross. He had come to China to see what was happening to supplies they were sending. He'd been down to Kweiyang, the capital of Guizhou province in the south, which was a big supply depot for the Chinese. He found great quantities of their supplies just sitting in warehouses instead of getting out to the troops. He was very unhappy about it. He also found some information that there was leakage of these drugs and supplies to the black market.

So, Kohlberg in those days was very unhappy about what was happening in China and very friendly to the American embassy and quite pleasant to me in contrast to what happened many years later, of course.

Jack Tapped to Write State Department Report on Psychological Warfare and Morale in China

SERVICE: One example of this early increase in demands from Washington was an instruction we got from the Department. Some time in the spring of '42, a very elaborate questionnaire, wanting information on morale, psychological warfare, and propaganda agencies in China. This was very perplexing. It was very un-State Department.

I found out later what happened was that a young professor at Johns Hopkins University-- Everyone in the academic field who had any sort of background on China was recruited into these various agencies. He was a young political science professor and thought that he might as well be a psychological warfare expert as anything else. After all, there weren't any psychological warfare experts in America!

He got a job in the War Department and had to start casting about for information. So, he thought immediately of having the embassy send in a long, elaborate report. I got tapped to do it. Any rate, it involved me in a lot of going around Chungking, talking to people, trying to pull together a lot of information. The Chinese were as disorganized as we were. The party was doing many things; the government was doing things; the army would do things in the propaganda and morale building fields.

Q: Did that stimulate your interest in what is now called content analysis, lead you to start looking at wall posters and so on?

SERVICE: Well, it certainly stirred my interest in wall posters and their content. I hadn't ever heard the term "content analysis," I think, till I came to Berkeley as a retired officer and went to the political science department. If you mentioned content analysis, I wouldn't have known what you meant. But yes, it started an interest in that sort of thing.

Q: What sources did you find most useful?

SERVICE: It was just a matter really of talking to everyone that you could think of that knew something about the field. I talked to a good many Chinese, but a lot of them weren't terribly helpful. My newspaper people, both foreign and Chinese, were helpful, people like Mac [F. MacCracken] Fisher.

There were several people there who had been in China a good many years working for the news services. The Associated Press and the UP had people that were quite well established in China, had been there a long time, and had a long contact with the Chinese Ministry of Information, that sort of thing. They were helpful. I talked to Chinese in these various departments.

There wasn't very much published stuff. But, it was a matter of pulling together the data. You can't be too precise sometimes. You have to convey a general understanding of what things are like.

Q: I find I'm a little unclear as to whom psychological warfare would be directed in the Chinese situation. It's clear enough in Europe.

SERVICE: There wasn't very much. They'd tried to use some of their prisoners. They tried to prepare some propaganda material. There were attempts early in the war to drop leaflets on Taiwan. They didn't have any planes that could reach Japan, and there really wasn't much directed at the Japanese. This was one of the things that you found out.

One thing that interested me was this professor--who later on I got to know--why he was so interested in Chinese psychological warfare. Theoretically he was interested in psych warfare against the Japanese. I suppose his rationale was that he had to find out what the Chinese were doing in psychological warfare against the Japanese, but most of the questionnaire was about propaganda directed toward Chinese. Of course, he was a Chinese scholar and all this was useful material for him in his professional business. Is that all?

Q: I think so. The only place I can see for psychological warfare would be in Japanese occupied areas of China.

SERVICE: I finally finished the report in July. It was a long thing. I got a good commendation on it. It gave me an interest in this subject, which later on led to other reports which are in Esherick's book.

Chungking: A Kuomintang Cocoon

Q: You said that you were in a cocoon. How restrictive were the KMT [Kuomintang] provisions on travel?

SERVICE: You couldn't travel any place without some sort of permission. This was not very easy to get particularly if you were traveling toward war areas or in the war areas.

The newspapers were heavily censored, and it was very hard to get out-of-town papers from other cities. It would take a long time to get them. But by-and-large they didn't have very much news in them. Certainly any war news was heavily censored. The Chinese Ministry of Information and a Central News Agency put out a lot of material in English. It was obviously what they wanted out, what they were willing to have out. It didn't present any gloomy side of things.

There was a lot of gossiping and talking around. Your contacts with Chinese generally were limited to social contacts, dinners. That's not always the best time to talk. Chinese don't have the habit of cocktail parties, so that if you go it's usually to a formal, sit-down dinner. As I say, we were fairly well cut off from that because of our location. We went to some things in the city at night but not very often. We tried to avoid them.

We saw our opposite numbers in the other embassies and if anybody got any news it got around. Everyone was sort of reporting the same thing. You see the same thing with Peking today. I'm sure the embassies are all talking to each other and everyone is reporting pretty much the same thing.

A Turning Point: Genesis of Jack as Outside Man: Journey to Gansu

SERVICE: When I got rid of the psychological warfare report, a chance had come to make this trip to the northwest provinces. I left on that in July--I'm not sure just when--ostensibly to attend a China Society of Engineers conference in Lanchow province, in Gansu. But, also the party was going up to Tsinghai province and to the oil wells up in the Gansu Corridor, a newly developed oil field.

I was with a party of about twenty government engineers working for some of the government departments, mainly the Ministry of Resources, some engineering professors in Chinese universities. There were three Chinese newspaper people and myself. I was the only foreigner.

We had a bus assigned to us as far as Lanchow. After that we traveled by truck. But, it was a very, very pleasant experience, and in a sense it's probably a turning point, a watershed.

Q: In what sense?

SERVICE: In a sense that I didn't realize of course at the time, but from this time on I was to be very much a sort of a traveling man, outdoors, or outside man, instead of an inside or office man. This led into my becoming pretty much an independent operator, independent reporter, partly because I was traveling, but this led to various other things.

A friend of mine, Han Ming was his name, was apparently very close to the Minister of Economics, Wang Weng-Hao. The ministry was really resources and development, more than economics in our sense.

I think Han Ming suggested that I be included. Wang Weng-Hao, with the idea of getting someone from the embassy involved, approved. The embassy was delighted--a very fine chance.

Growth of Chinese Friendships: Filling a Long Felt Need

SERVICE: I was thirty-two when we started, thirty-three soon after we were on the road. The newspaper people were about my age. Some of these professors were a little bit older, but it was a fairly young group. We got to be very congenial. We got to know each other very well. My allowance was fifteen kilos, and I stuck to it. Everyone else was on the same basis. In the nights when we'd stop at an inn, why we'd all sleep lined up on the k'ang [brick sleeping platform heated by flue from kitchen stove] like sardines in a can more or less.

For the first time I was being completely accepted as a friend by Chinese on a very intimate basis. I think that this was something that probably I had, in an unconscious way, missed a great deal in my youth. My parents were devoted to China, were obviously very much interested in China and Chinese culture. My mother's poems and so on, which you haven't seen, indicated something of this attachment for China. But because of the question of sanitation, hygiene, and the fact that we lived on an entirely different plane, I really had no close contact with Chinese.

I've mentioned before I grew up having no Chinese playmates. I knew no Chinese. Then in my experience as an adult in China I had not really known any Chinese, on a very intimate basis, who were really Chinese. In Yunnanfu we got drawn into that small, compact foreign community. We met a few Chinese who were officials, but on a very sort of arm's length, official basis. We had a few returned students that had studied in America, who were teaching or something. But this was not any close association.

In Peking we met our teachers. My language teachers were men of an older generation--long gowns, old fashioned! One of them had taken the examinations in the old imperial days. They were very much scholars of the old type. We met a few university people like Hu Shin or Dr. Chiang Monlin. Then we met a few officials.

The Chinese young people we met in Peking were attached to the foreign community and trying to be "foreign." The same in Shanghai. The only Chinese one met in Shanghai were Western educated--either abroad or in foreign-run schools in China. They were aping the foreigners, going to the night clubs in Shanghai, the Western social life.

It wasn't really until I got into this milieu, this full time immersion on a long trip that I was completely on a par and accepted by Chinese, sharing their intimacies and their own ideas. These were down-river people--almost all the government people were from the down-river provinces--who were exploring new country. They were as excited about this trip as anybody could be. It was all new country to them.

Q: When you say down-river, you mean Peking, Nanking?

SERVICE: Yes, all the coastal provinces. Han Ming actually was from Manchuria, but most of the rest of them were from along the Yangtze. One of them was from Hangzhou for instance. But, they were from Treaty Ports and Shanghai and Peking.

It was tremendously exciting to them to be making this trip from Chengdu up to Lanchow and up to the northwest. China has a lot of two-thousand-year history, and these were people who were educated, college graduates, some of them engineers--there were several Western educated--but they'd never seen-- They read all about these things, you see. To go along and realize that this town here, that little walled city, was a famous place mentioned in the Romance of the Three Kingdoms! We saw the towns where all sorts of things happened in Chinese history.

We crossed over from the valley of the Kialing into the valley of the Han River, the headwaters of the Han. The Han River comes down at Hangzhou. But, there's a narrow gorge and you could see the square holes in the cliff where a famous general during the Three Kingdoms [A.D. 221-265] period had built a road by driving posts into the cliff side and then laying planks along it.

The whole history of the country we went through was very exciting to these people. Along the road, the trees had been planted by Tso Tsung-T'ang's army when he went up in the 1860's or '70's to repacify Sinkiang and put down Muhammadan rebellion.

The cliffs along the way in China, particularly along a famous road like this, have inscriptions of characters. The temples have got tablets--they were built by such and such a person.

These were young Chinese who were modern in every sense, but not aping the West. They were nationalistic. They were for the war against Japan, of course. It was a very stimulating and exciting experience for them as well as for me.

Q: What was their political orientation?

SERVICE: Oh well, they were all critical of the Kuomintang. The intellectuals were almost unanimously critical of the Kuomintang. You had a variation among these people, of course, as to how outspoken they would be and how much they felt the Kuomintang should be blamed. Some people felt, well, you know, after all, there's a war on and there are a lot of difficulties. There were some people who would be government apologists.

But no one tried to cover up the facts. The facts were just so plain. We saw recruits on the road. We saw Sichuan recruits being marched over the mountains to Shaanxi province--you had to get your recruit away from his native province so he couldn't run away so easily--dying beside the road, starvation. There were all sorts of things. No one made any attempt to apologize or ignore the shortcomings.

There were differences of opinion. Some of them just weren't much interested in politics. The newspaper people, of course, were very politically interested and politically aware.

We had one American Chinese on the trip. Quite a few Chinese-Americans went back to China during the war for what they saw as their patriotic duty to help the fatherland. He was teaching in a university near Chungking.

He was very amusing because he was very much alarmed, as I had been once, about sanitation. He had to be assured everything was boiled and so on. They laughed and made a lot of fun of him. I was called the Chinese American. He was the American Chinese. [laughter] Well, anyway.

Values of Missionary Contacts

SERVICE: Along the way, of course, I made a point, every chance I had, every town we stopped at, of going to see the missionary. If there was a missionary in town--I could find out very easily--and having usually a chat with them. I didn't try to stay with them. I stayed with my own gang.

Missionaries, of course, were glad to see anybody. They were isolated much more than normal. Travel was difficult. A lot of them had not been able to take home leaves on schedule because of the war. They were all anxious for news, anxious to talk to somebody from the outside. In a way, I was from the metropolis, coming from Chungking. And, they all knew who I was or knew my family, knew my parents.

I would simply pick their brains as much as I could, as much as was decent and they were willing, on strictly local conditions. I didn't try to get them onto what might be embarrassing political subjects, what they thought of the government. There was a lot you could ask just on purely local matters, which they were very often thoroughly informed about, through their own church members.

Q: We talked about this a long time ago. I think you said at first you found these people, many of whom were politically quite unaware, that their mission in life was a missionary one, and they were not politically interested, and that bit by bit you sharpened your techniques of asking questions.

SERVICE: Oh yes. Yes. I'd forgotten we had this on the record.

Q: No, we didn't. This was several years ago.

SERVICE: Yes, it's quite true. As time went on I certainly became a little more effective perhaps, a little more delicate perhaps, about it. Also, I learned more questions to ask, things that they would know.

They very often had quite thorough details about the taxation picture. Various Kuomintang officials made private estimates that between a third and a fourth of what was actually collected from the people reached the government. These people knew from their own church members a lot of what went on, bribes, entertainment, efforts made to get your land classified in lower categories so your tax rate would be lower.

And conscription. They had had experience with their own people. When I got in a place like Sian where they had large schools, they knew a good deal about secret police activity against the students, political repression, thought reform camps, or schools.

But I didn't usually ask people what they thought about the government. I just asked what was happening locally, what did they know about this and that. What was the current price of a recruit? Was land being abandoned? How about refugees?

I also had ready access to the YMCA people through my father's contacts. In those days, the YMCA was almost completely run by Chinese. The secretaries were Chinese. There were a very few foreigners who served on the national committee in Shanghai.

Then another group that was active in the northwest and practically all over China was the Friends Ambulance Unit. These were conscientious objectors, first from the U.K. and later they had some Americans. They couldn't drive ambulances in China because Chinese just don't let any foreigners get near the battle. They are no roads anyway usually for the ambulance.

So what they did was to transport relief supplies from abroad on highways in China. They had depots in various places. They were another group that I got tied into.

Q: I imagine they had fairly good intelligence because they traveled.

SERVICE: Oh yes. They traveled, sure, and they were bright. Michael Sullivan down here at Stanford was one of them, you know. Rhoads Murphey was one of them, who is now at Michigan. There were all sorts of young chaps. There was a fellow Mel Kennedy who teaches at Bryn Mawr.

The Only Functioning Chinese Oil Field

SERVICE: The [Chinese] government at that time was planning to ask the United States government to fly in an oil refinery. It would have to be broken down into small segments, and flown from India to Tibet, up to the Gansu Corridor.

Q: Over the Hump?

SERVICE: Not over the Hump. Well it might have come in over the Hump, but they expected to take it in a much more direct line north from India instead of east from India. The Hump from India was east into Yunnan.

Q: Right.

SERVICE: The transport problem required a refinery that could be broken down into small pieces; it would also require a lot of high-quality steels that were scarce under war conditions.

We got up to the oil fields. They were very cautious about security there. They took away my Leica camera. They took us around the wells, the oil fields. They had a very primitive, small refinery.

They didn't produce lubricating oils. They just distilled out the primary products, kerosene and some gasoline, a very low octane gasoline. It was a very simple distillation process.

I counted paces between the wells. I could produce a pretty good map when I finished, you know, without having a camera. It was on an alluvial fan. You see many of them in Death Valley or in the West, where a stream comes out of high mountains and then there's a very gradually sloping fan or apron of rocks and boulders.

Our party, twenty or so people, were put in a schoolhouse. They'd built a schoolhouse at the lower end of the settlement. The wells were at the top. They had no place to put the oil, so they had just scooped out shallow reservoirs and put the earth around the downhill side. American farmers do it with a bulldozer to make ponds. They were very simple holding basins for oil.

They had brought in a lot of workers, just common laborers. Of course, they had engineers, but they needed a lot of common labor. Wood was very scarce. There were no trees except way high up in the mountains, hard to get at. So, most of the workmen had just dug themselves huts in the ground, dug into the ground, and then got willows and so on and made a roof over it.

Fire!

SERVICE: One of the nights we were there--we hadn't been there very long--second or third night, there was a downpour of rain, just an absolute downpour of rain, sort of a cloud burst. In the evening we were all back in our quarters. Suddenly, there was a great alarm, shouting, noise.

We all went out of the door, and we could see a fire, a big fire going on. I was anxious to see more! Just back of our place was a hill. We were right at the foot of a hill. I was better clothed in some ways than most of the other people. Anyway, I rushed up the hill and could see the oil fire blazing up.

As I was watching it--a tremendous uproar-- An oil fire is a very, you know--I think I'm overusing "exciting"--scary sort of thing. But, watching it I realized--I did a sort of a double take. There was a ditch. A drainage ditch had been dug along the foot of the hill, where the fan came against the steep hill. This ditch emptied right at the playground in the middle of which our school was standing. The ditch just ended there. It hadn't been continued down. Then I realized that it was going to reach our playground which was already covered with water.

So, I charged down into the building, the one room school-house, and shouted, "Save your lives! Save your lives! Get out!" We had bunks there, board bunks. My sleeping roll was spread out. I just threw my clothes into this, bundled it up in my arms and rushed out! Everybody thought I was crazy. But, they quickly decided to do the same thing. Some of them had to run through flames to get out. By the time the last few got out, the fire had reached our playground. The place just went up like a matchbox.

Q: You saved the lives of the gang?

SERVICE: We all got out. My own problem was that I only had two pair of shoes, and I forgot that my heavy pair of shoes [laughing] were on the floor under this bunk. So, from then on I had only one pair of shoes. My spare pair of shoes was incinerated.

But at any rate, we got up on the hill and huddled there in the rain, clutching our few possessions, our sleeping rolls and so on. Things calmed down. The fire burned itself out.

What had happened was that the retaining walls around the lower side of one of the oil pools just gave way. The oil then started running downhill, and into the lowest places which were the homes of the workers, who were sitting huddled around their little cooking fires, in the center of their earth hut or yurt. That caught the oil on fire.

The oil wells didn't burn up. They were up higher. It didn't get up to them. Most of the town itself, the main buildings, were not burned because an alluvial fan is higher in the center. So, the oil flowed off to the side and hit the ditch. The buildings and the refinery were mostly in the center and they weren't hit. There weren't many buildings burned except the one where we were staying, which of course was very embarrassing. We spent the rest of the night on wet blankets in one of the office buildings. Well anyway, that's enough of that.

Jack Recommends Against Flying in a Refinery

Q: How did they get their products out?

SERVICE: It had to be taken out by truck. But, it was a very long haul. This was one of the reasons why I recommended against our putting a lot of money into this business of flying in a refinery, because--I forget the exact mileage--but from there to Chungking was something like twelve hundred miles by road, atrocious roads, worse than the Burma Road if possible. So that a truck had to carry enough gasoline for the round trip, and there wasn't much capacity left over. And Chungking was still a long ways from the fighting zones. Most of the fighting then was done in Guangxi, and in the southwest. So that it wasn't a very practical proposition.

The oil drums in China were old, and a drum gets old quickly because every trip means continual jolting. It leaks more and more, so you were always troubled by leaking oil drums. We would have had to fly in drums. The Chinese didn't have enough steel. They couldn't make the drums. It was just not a very feasible proposition.

From the oil wells the Chinese agreed to let the party (I was not the initiator--the engineers and the other Chinese asked and I was pleased)--go on further up the corridor to Tunhuang. These are the famous old T'ang dynasty cave temples up at the extreme end of the corridor.

This was a very pleasant trip. We went to the town of Tunhuang. Then the temples are about, oh, ten or fifteen miles out from the town. But this is desert country and terribly, terribly hot. The town of Tunhuang--you've probably seen pictures of Sinkiang--the streets in the summertime are covered with rushes, just arbors above to give you some shade.

We had to leave our truck in Tunhuang. It's sandy desert. Then just at sunset we took off and went in the evening, by moonlight, across this desert to the cliff with the caves. We arrived about eleven or twelve o'clock. Beautiful--that was almost dreamlike.

Q: Was that limestone?

SERVICE: No, it's actually a fine buff-colored sandstone. The carvings are well preserved but most are inside so somewhat protected. And it is the murals that are best. Well anyway, that's all very fine and very exciting.

Q: Did you take your typewriter with you?

SERVICE: No, no. That's one trouble. I did very little reporting on this whole trip. I hadn't gotten the great urge to report. But, I couldn't take a typewriter. I was limited. I was absorbing and listening and talking, but the only reports that really came out of this were when I got back to Chungking--and I'll talk about that later--a report on the oil wells, because that was a report that was wanted, and a report on the Henan famine which we'll come to.

Jack's Message to Chungking Does Not Get Through: Private Code Breaks Down

SERVICE: There was one interesting experience, though, on this trip. We were in the Gansu Corridor, well up the corridor and in one of the towns. We found out that Mme. Chiang and a bunch of--I think maybe T.V. Soong--but anyway an important official party was flying through, going to Sinkiang.

What had happened was that the governor of Sinkiang, Sheng Shih-ts'ai, was a Manchurian who had gotten--I don't know how, anyway, it doesn't matter now--but he had gotten from Manchuria to Sinkiang, apparently with Russian help or connivance, and had taken over Sinkiang and had ruled it very much under the Russian thumb. He was very pro-Russian, allowed Russians to come in and develop and so on.

For a long time Sinkiang had been really a closed province that had no relation to, no connection with the national government. Foreigners could not travel there. The few people that did try were imprisoned and so on. A very tough regime and very much of a closed preserve.

Anyway, I heard through my Chinese companions that this plane was flying through with the party up to Sinkiang. After the Russian-German war started, Sheng apparently thought that the Russians were going down the drain, as a lot of other people did, and also they could no longer give him supplies and support, or were not willing to.

Hence he decided to turnover, become loyal and friendly to the Chungking regime. This was a party that was going up to do the preliminary negotiations. Well, I was quite excited about this because I didn't know whether the people in Chungking would know about this or not. I thought that this would be something that might have been secret even from foreign embassies in Chungking.

I had a code that I had worked out with the code room staff in Chungking, a private code I could carry in my head. So, I charged off to the telegraph office, [laughing] sent off a telegram to the embassy saying that Mme. Chiang and various other people were going through in this plane to Sinkiang.

They never coded the telegram because-- Well, the cipher ran words together, you see, so that my Chinese names, being run together, looked like gibberish to the code clerk. If they had gotten someone who could read the Chinese and have separated the Chinese names, unscrambled them, they would have been able to make sense out of it. Anyway, they never got the message. But, they knew about it. It was not as secret in Chungking as I had expected.

Q: Why wasn't the code clerk competent enough to sort out names like Chiang and Soong?

SERVICE: I forget now what the names were, but Chinese names are polysyllabic. If you take a name like Chu Chao-Liang, which was probably one of the names, and you write it all together, it can look very confusing. If I had Mme. Chiang or something like that--I probably did--she would recognize that, but the Chu Shiao-Liang or these other names he just thought I'd gotten the thing all scrambled.

Q: What did the embassy expect you to do on this trip?

SERVICE: It was simply a chance for observation in an interesting and unvisited part of the country.

We drove back to Lanchow. We stayed for some time. Most of the engineers left. I think the newspaper people stayed on for a while and then they left. I stayed on. I'm not quite sure why I stayed on, but I had decided by this time to go from Lanchow to Sian, the capital of Shaanxi province, by bus.

Wendell Willkie's One-World Trip: Jack Welcomes Him to China

SERVICE: Anyway, I was in Lanchow when word came that [Wendell] Willkie was coming through, Willkie on his great one-world journey. He had visited the Soviet Union and was coming from the Soviet Union down into China. His plane would stop over-night in Lanchow.

So, I thought, "Well I'm here, I'll certainly be expected by the embassy to welcome him to China." The local Chinese were quite excited and I was called in to help with the translations, prepare the slogans. They had banners across the streets, and they wanted them in English of course. So I helped to make sure the English was correct. The Y secretary, because he knew English, had been called in by the provincial government people. I helped him out.

I went out to the airport to meet Willkie and welcomed him to China--he looked a bit confused and startled--I welcomed him to China on behalf of the embassy and then looked over his shoulder and saw the naval attaché who had flown to Sinkiang to meet him in Urumqi! The embassy, of course, had not told me anything about this. So, I was looking sort of foolish. [laughter]

There was a big dinner given by the governor of Gansu province for Willkie that night and I was not included, an obvious snub which perplexed the Chinese in Lanchow. It was Hollington Tong's doing.

Then Hollington Tong was the Chinese minister of information which in Kuomintang China was a party job, not a government job. He had also gone to Urumqi. Hollington Tong was the Generalissimo's favorite interpreter.

The usual Chinese strategy was to try to isolate these visitors from as much local American contact as possible. This was a standard practice, but Tong used the excuse that Willkie had said that he preferred not to spend all his time with American officials. Anyway he got me taken off the guest list.

This was pretty typical of Chinese tactics with the Luces, and important newspaper people, and foreign visitors, to try to smother them with hospitality and to try to limit as much as possible their chances of talking to local Americans. I talked to some of the people with Willkie, but I didn't have much chance to talk to Willkie. He wasn't much interested anyway.

Bus Trip to Sian: The Kuomintang's Permeable Blockade

SERVICE: The bus trip to Sian was interesting because it was through the blockade zone. At that time there was a very heavy Kuomintang military blockade of the Communist border region area where Yen-an was located. One of the reasons I wanted to take the trip was that we passed through this area.

Q: Was the blockade efficiently run?

SERVICE: Oh no, not really. There was a good deal of going back and forth. There were refugees on the road at this time. There was a major famine going on in Henan, and people were coming west from Henan into Shaanxi. Even up this far north you saw refugees on the road going west.

I asked some of the missionaries about what they knew about conditions. They didn't know anything very much, except that there were more people going in to the Communist areas than coming out. So the presumption was that things were pretty good if people were going in. The missionaries had no contact, but they said there was trade back and forth, some smuggling and so on going on.

There was one interesting episode about this bus ride. Lanchow was very much a secret police town. Surveillance of all foreigners was very noticeable, very obnoxious. I had had a tail when I was in Lanchow that I got to know quite well. When I got to my bus in Lanchow to go to Sian it turned out that he was on the bus, but he was under detention, wearing manacles. He'd been arrested [laughing] for something. He was extremely embarrassed about this. He was in some trouble of some sort, being taken down to headquarters in Sian apparently.

Q: What was the surveillance? What were they looking for?

SERVICE: Just tailing you, watching.

Q: Contacts?

SERVICE: I'm sure that letters and mail and baggage were searched--I didn't really mind. But I was doing no reporting and had no documents or files. I assumed that I would be searched.

One day on the bus, we saw people beside the road searching and looking beside the road. We stopped to find out what was going on. They were passengers who had been on a bus the day before that had been robbed. They were merchants and had thrown some of their money out of the bus into the weeds. They were trying to see if they could find their valuables!

I got to Sian and it again was a heavily secret police place. I stayed in a China Travel Service hostel, talked to a lot of the missionaries. They had had a lot of experience there--because they had large schools, middle schools--with secret police surveillance of their students, midnight or early morning raids into the dormitories, taking off students.

By this time I had heard a good deal about the famine in Henan province, which was the next province to the east. So, I decided to go there. But, while I was waiting to take my trip, Willkie arrived in Sian. He had been down in Chungking. Then, he wanted to see a war zone.

The favorite place to take people to see the war at that time was near Sian where the Yellow River makes a bend at Tungkuan and the Japanese were on the north bank and the Chinese were on the south bank. They exchanged sporadic artillery fire.

It was a simple and convenient place to take somebody. With binoculars you could look and see Japanese on the other side of the Yellow River.

Again there was a big parade for Willkie, and I was out on the street all morning with the crowds watching the preparations and listening to people complaining about how they had been ordered out and mustered by the paochia organization.

I was treated better in Sian, and was included in the guest list for the dinner that was given by the local government for Willkie.

Chinese Interpreters Distort Willkie's Speeches

SERVICE: Willkie gave a speech. We Americans never had, we never used our own interpreters. So, Hollington Tong did the interpreting. It was interesting to see the distortion of what Willkie was saying.

Willkie was trying to talk about [raises voice to paraphrase Willkie], "He'd looked into the eyes of the common man of China and he realized what Chinese aspirations were, what the common man of China wanted." All this was changed in Hollington Tong's translation into Chinese. All the talk about the common man became only China. It was on an entirely different level. My Chinese YMCA friends and others asked afterwards whether or not I had noticed what had been done.

Q: Was there any way of getting around this?

SERVICE: We should have done what the Russians did. The Russians would never use a Chinese interpreter. The Russians always had their own. We never trained any interpreters. My Chinese wasn't really good enough to do it. I can interpret conversations by a speech where you've got to have it right at the tip of your tongue, simultaneous speech, is very tough. But, we should have had people who could do it. For somebody like Willkie we should have had an interpreter. When Gauss gave a talk we should have had one of our own people there, but we've always complacently used Chinese.

Nixon did the same thing. Nixon and Kissinger, they didn't want to use State Department interpreters. Kissinger and Nixon would not allow them to play any role except when Rogers [William Pierce Rogers. Secretary of State 1969-1973] talked. But, when Nixon and Kissinger had their talks with the Chinese, they used a Chinese interpreter.

Q: Why?

SERVICE: Because they didn't want the State Department to know what they were saying. They didn't trust the State Department.

A Catholic Bishop's Links with Tai Li and Secret Police

SERVICE: Loyang was an interesting chance to talk to missionaries, particularly a Catholic bishop, Bishop Megan, who was very outspoken about human and government causes for the famine, the mistreatment of the peasants.

But, at the same time it was interesting that he was using his parish priests, Chinese and foreign, scattered through the occupied areas as an informational intelligence network, for Tai Li. He was cooperating very closely with Tai Li.

Q: I wanted to ask a little-- You used the term "secret police" and you introduced the name Tai Li. I've seen in various places the term "Gestapo" applied to the Kuomintang secret police. How valid, in your opinion, are the connotations of "Gestapo" to what was going on in China at this time under Tai Li and the Kuomintang?

SERVICE: There were some parallels but probably not very close. There were several secret police organizations in China. The party had one which was under the "C-C Clique," the Chen brothers, Chen Li-fu and Chen Kuo-fu. Then Tai Li was independent, more or less directly under the Generalissimo. I'm not sure whether he was technically under the military or not, but he operated directly under the Generalissimo.

He imported a lot of German specialists, technicians, and so on, for training. This was one reason why the term "Gestapo" has been used. Some of these Germans stayed on long after relations between the governments were broken. We would still meet some of these German advisers to Tai Li walking in the hills of Chungking.

Q: When you say advisers, what sorts of people were they?

SERVICE: They were teaching police methods, that sort of thing. We'll come into this later on, but Tai Li, after the German connection was ended, started the American connection.

Very often there were other secret police. The military had their own police organization. The gendarmerie had its own investigative or police unit. There was a lot of overlap and competition between these various groups.

Their primary concern was Communists and Communism. In places like Shanghai they ostensibly were working against the puppets, the people like Wang Ching-Wei who went over to the Japanese. But, by and large, eventually they pretty much hooked up with the puppets, because the common enemy of both of the puppets and the Chungking people were the Communists. A lot of the secret police organizations were--maybe compromised is not the right word--but anyway they were working fairly closely with the puppet people.

They had prisons of various kinds--political prisons. They had, I mentioned earlier, some thought reform institutions. When foreigners talked about concentration camps in China--which we did; we used the term concentration camp--it was generally in reference to this sort of thing.

Prisoners were generally students, people they thought were left wing. As I said, people who were working for the industrial co-ops would get put in these places. Generally you were required to read proper material, study the San Min Chu I, Sun Yat-Sen's Three Principles, read Chiang Kai-shek's book, China's Destiny, write self-criticism, your own psychological history. If you acknowledged that your thoughts had been wrong and you were going to reform, generally you were let out. If you were stubborn, you might stay.

Some people were undoubtedly tortured, and we'll hear more about that. But, these places weren't at all of the scope of the concentration camps, Buchenwald or anything like that. And the purpose was not extermination.

Famine in Henan

Q: I interrupted you. You were talking about Loyang.

SERVICE: I don't know that there is much to say about Loyang, except that I saw something of the famine. I didn't get out into the worst areas. In the next year after this, the Japanese came down from the north and just walked through. The people turned against the Chinese armies that had been impoverishing them, starving them to death. The famine was partly because of the crop failure, but also because of the tremendous impositions of hundreds of thousands of Chinese soldiers. Anyway, I wrote a long report about it, which Esherick has got. So, we don't need to go into it now.

Food and Lodging on the Road

Q: You talk about famine and you talk about living Chinese style. What sort of food did you get in these inns along the way?

SERVICE: Wonderful! There was no rationing in China. It was purely a matter of having money. Even in the famine areas if you had the money, you could live pretty well. Of course, small inns don't serve Cordon Bleu food. It's simple food. Very often in north China, in small villages or towns on the road, the meal might be dried garlic and mant'ou, steamed bread, which is very nice.

The people up in the Gansu Corridor are mostly Muhammadans and will not touch pork. They wouldn't let us open cans that we had with us or use their cooking pots. But, the food was very good--beef and mutton and round flat crusty loaves of bread baked in large brick ovens.

The north China people eat steamed bread, different kinds of wheat and kaoliang millet, and so on. We didn't get rice except in the large towns. But noodles, in a place like Sian, wonderful noodles. Mien, Chinese mien, of all different kinds.

We ate at the street peddlers' stalls a lot of the time. Especially breakfast, eggs, things like that you could get on the street. We may not have eaten the fanciest food, but it was always good.

Q: Were your Chinese companions willing to eat off the stalls?

SERVICE: Yes, except for a few. Some were fussy about it. The "American-Chinese" was squeamish.

Accommodations were simplified by the fact that in the early years of the Sino-Japanese war the Russians had sent a lot of supplies to China down this route by truck, and the Chinese had set up hostels along the road in all the main towns. Each of these old garrison military post towns had a temple, generally a temple to a god of war or some local deity. The Chinese had used these old temples. They'd fixed them up, repaired them, whitewashed them, and turned them into hostels. They had a kitchen and some staff.

So, our group stayed in these hostels all the way up and down Gansu. We slept every night in front of the gods, [laughter] the Buddhist hell, and so on. But, they were very pleasant and comfortable hostels, and they helped to make it an interesting and pleasant excursion.

The hostels hadn't been used for years because '39 was probably the last time that supplies had come down. But, the Chinese, whether from bureaucratic inertia or whether they still hoped that maybe they'd get more supplies from the Russians--had kept the places up, and they dusted them out and swept them out and got them ready for our party. That's it.

Currie Requests Letters from the Field, Out of Channels

SERVICE: Also, he wanted me to write him letters from the field. Well, he hoped that I would keep him briefed on things of special interest. What he was particularly anxious for was that if I wrote a report or knew of a report that would be especially interesting to him, to alert him to its existence. A great difficulty for him was that, working in the White House, he had no reporting staff. He had no field agents or anything like that. He felt that the State Department and other agencies weren't really keeping him informed.

The old business, the bureaucratic run-around, "Well, we'll give you anything; you just ask for it." [laughter] But if you don't know what exists, you can't ask for it. So, what he wanted me to do was to let him know so that he could ask for things.

Q: Was there anything improper in this?

SERVICE: Well, this was out of channels, shall we say. It was sort of an unusual thing. It surprised me. I didn't mention it to the people in FE at the State Department. I may have mentioned it to Larry Salisbury. I'm not sure. But, I mentioned it as soon as I got back to Chungking, to Vincent. Vincent was my chief, in the sense that he was number two in the embassy.

Vincent didn't seem to be surprised. He said, "Well, this is the way the White House operates. After all, it is the White House, the office of the president. You follow your own judgment; my suggestion would be that if this is the way they want to operate, you might as well go along."

As a matter of fact, I never felt very comfortable. I never wrote very many letters. Later on, when I joined Stilwell's staff and was working under John Davies, I found that John had some contacts established. He already had his communications with people like Currie and with [Harry] Hopkins and various other people including influential senators. So that as long as I was working with John, I usually left this to him.

I didn't do very much after John was removed and I was back in China. In the Hurley days I wrote a few letters, but never very many.

Q: One of my reasons for asking at this point about your estimate of Currie's general position and ability is that I'm trying to establish the level of information on China that was reaching Roosevelt and what priority he gave it.

SERVICE: Currie had other responsibilities, I'm sure, besides simply China. He was involved in Lend-Lease, and I think most of these assistants had changing responsibilities. But one of his standing assignments was China.

I would guess, but I really have no way of knowing, that in the overall world picture China ranked relatively low. Sometimes it was more important and a hotter issue than at other times. It was certainly an important issue at the particular moment when I was there because of Mme. Chiang's arrival.

Report on Kuomintang-Communist Situation: Service as Prophet on China's Civil War

SERVICE: The only man I knew well in the Department was a man named Larry Salisbury who had been second secretary in Peking when I was a language student and with whom I had traveled to Inner Mongolia in the summer of '36. Salisbury wasn't directly in China affairs. He was handling special affairs. It was sort of an overall sweep. He was much interested in the fact that I had taken this long trip and also that I had impressions and observations that hadn't been reported. So, he urged me to sit down and write sort of a summary report. This became my memorandum of January 23, 1944.

From Stanley K. Hornbeck Papers--Box 381
John Service File
July 27, 1944

There has come to my attention recently a dispatch from Chungking entitled "The Situation in China" with which there is enclosed a memorandum prepared by an officer of the Embassy under the title "The Situation in China and Suggestions Regarding American Policy."

The Embassy calls attention to the memorandum, states that "while in some respects it may be hypercritical and while we are not prepared to support it without qualification, we consider that it is a very able and thoughtful analysis and we believe that it will be of interest to officers of the Department concerned with the political and military situation in the Far East to read the first 9 pages in their entirety as they delineate concisely the background of the present critical developments generally along lines of the Embassy's concept of what has been happening in free China and why."

The memorandum under reference covers 19 pages of foolscap, single space. The first 9 pages, to which the Ambassador calls attention, consist for the most part of an indictment of the Kuomintang and Chiang Kai-shek. In outline, it lays down propositions as follows: "The situation in China is rapidly becoming critical. The Japanese strategy in China, which has been as much political as military, has so far been eminently successful. The position of the Kuomintang and the Generalissimo is weaker than it has been for the past ten years. The Kuomintang is not only proving itself incapable of averting a debacle by its own initiative: on the contrary, its policies are policies precipitating the crisis. On the internal political front the desire of the Kuomintang leaders to perpetuate their own power overrides all other considerations. On the economic front the Kuomintang is showing itself inept and selfishly short-sighted by progressive estrangement of its allies. On the military front the Kuomintang appears to have decided to let America win the war and to have withdrawn for all practical purposes from active participation. These apparently suicidal policies of the Kuomintang have their roots in the composition and nature of the Party. The present policies of the Kuomintang seem certain of failure: if that failure results in a collapse of China it will have consequences disastrous both to our immediate military plans and our long-term interests in the Far East."

There comes next the proposition: "There are, however, active and constructive forces in China opposed to the present trends of the Kuomintang leadership which, if given a chance, might avert the threatened collapse." This is followed by two pages (10-11) in elaboration of that proposition. Therein there is underscored the proposition: "Democratic reform is the crux of all important Chinese problems, military, economic, and political."

Part II of this memorandum (pages 11-19) consists of suggestions regarding American policy. In outline, it proceeds: "In the light of this developing crisis what should be the American attitude toward China? The Kuomintang and Chiang are acutely conscious of their dependence on us and will be forced to appeal for our support. The Kuomintang's dependence can give us great influence. There are three general alternatives open to us. Our choice between these alternatives must be determined by our objectives in China. We should adopt the third alternative--a coordinated and positive policy. This positive policy should be political. The implementation of this political policy, though difficult in some respects, is practical and can be carried out by many means. There must be effective coordination of the policies and actions of all American Government agencies concerned in these dealings with China. Since all measures open to us should not be applied simultaneously, there should be careful selection and timing. Specific measures which might be adopted in the carrying out of this positive policy include the following. Most of these measures can be applied progressively. The program suggested contains little that is not already being done in an uncoordinated and only partially effective manner. The program constitutes only very modified and indirect intervention in Chinese affairs."

[Note: The material quoted in the two paragraphs above consist of sentences, verbatim and in sequence, which constitute the subheading and, in a few instances, underscored parts of the text of the memorandum.]

Comment:

Seldom if ever have I ever seen any document prepared by a responsible officer of the Department or of the Foreign Service, of no matter what age or length of experience, expressive of such complete self-assurance on the part of its author that he knew the facts, all of the facts, and that he could prescribe and was prescribing the remedy, the one and only remedy, for a bad situation and could indicate and was indicating the way, the only way, to lead from bad to good. In many contexts I have seen and have heard and have read about things wrong with China. Never before, not even in Rodney Gilbert's book entitled What's Wrong With China, have I encountered so sweeping a charge that almost everything--except a certain amount of liberal sentiment in some quarters--is wrong with China. Never before, however, have I heard or read it laid down flatly that "Democratic reform is the crux of all important Chinese problems, military, economic and political."

I have heard before, but not from trained and responsible officials, a suggestion that it might be well for the United States to forget certain outstanding features of its policy regarding China, such as the policy of the "Open Door"; but never before have I heard it suggested by an official that among three general alternatives open to us one is that we might "give up China as hopeless and wash our hands of it altogether." I have heard before many proposals and plans conceived and expounded by authors for the improvement of our policy regarding and our relations with China; but never have I seen one so elaborately compounded of prescriptions regarding what we should desist from or refrain from doing and prescriptions of what /page 4/ we should do, in detail, and with sequence of timing, which indicated so completely the lack on the part of its author of understanding of the difference between that which may be ideally desirable and that which is politically practicable.

Upon finishing perusal for the second time of the memorandum above under reference, I turned to refresh my knowledge of its author.

SERVICE: I don't think I need to go into detail about this because it's been published many times. It emphasized the probability of eventual civil war. I didn't come out and say, "The Communists are going to win," but I said that civil war would be a disaster for the peace, stability, development of China, and that the Communists might be extremely difficult to defeat. I urged that we should try to find out something about the Communists by sending people up there, sending officers up there.

John Davies was coming to the same conclusion at about the same time. Even Drumright who was then in China, made a similar suggestion. But somehow my memorandum upset the established powers a great deal, mainly Hornbeck, who had been in the Department for a long, long time, and was long away from any sort of direct contact with China. He was called adviser to the secretary of state. He didn't have any direct administrative role.

The head of FE, the Far Eastern section, was a man named Max Hamilton. Max had also been in China for a short while as a Foreign Service officer, but also back in the 20's, I think early 20's. He had resigned from the Foreign Service to take an administrative job. In those days you couldn't stay in the Department for any real length of time if you were in the Foreign Service. If you wanted to take a state department job, then you resigned from the Foreign Service, which Hamilton had done. But he was completely dominated by Hornbeck, who was a very overbearing, dictatorial type of person.

The head of China Affairs was a man named George Atcheson, who had been in China more recently but not during the war. He'd been in China most recently during '37-'38 period.

My memo, as I say, caused a lot of waves. Hornbeck's first reactions were apparently vitriolic. He wrote on the margins "ridiculous," "preposterous," "scandalous," and various other characterizations.

I was then asked to rewrite the memorandum, in a less personal way, using embassy despatches where possible. The embassy had said some of the same things in less dramatic or direct ways.

Meanwhile, the Department sent off a telegram to the embassy without telling me.

Q: The embassy in Chungking?

SERVICE: Yes. They sent off a telegram to the embassy in Chungking--without mentioning my name--and grossly distorting my conclusions. [laughter] You can see it on page 199 in U.S. Foreign Relations [China 1943]

They say, "A report has reached us,"--not mentioning me, making a mystery--"presumably based on statements made by Edgar Snow and Zhou En-lai." Well I had not seen Edgar Snow for several years. He'd been in Chungking briefly in 1941 at the time of the New Fourth Army incident, and he had broken that story by getting out of China, sending his reports from Hong Kong, I think. But anyway, he'd been persona non grata. So, I hadn't seen Ed Snow for several years. And Zhou En-lai, well, of course, I'd been traveling in the northwest for four months. I had seen Zhou En-lai very briefly in Chungking, but my report came not at all from Zhou En-lai. "To the effect that--" and so on and so on. Then, as I say, they distort my conclusions and ask for the embassy's comments without mentioning who the embassy was supposed to be commenting on.

The embassy came back and quite rightly wouldn't buy, wouldn't go all the way for the rather distorted questions. But, they did say that, "Liquidation of the Communists by the present Kuomintang leadership is a question of when rather than whether" (which, of course, was pretty strong substantiation of what I said), and that most people assumed that there would be a civil war, probably not during the war against Japan. I hadn't said there would be civil war before the end of the war [with Japan] at all. I talked about after.

FE asked me to rewrite my memo again, which I did. I spent most of the month writing and rewriting this silly memo, based on the Chungking reply. Then Bob Smyth, who was a Foreign Service officer assigned in FE, tacked on a conclusion. I finally refused to sign the thing. I got very annoyed, partly because of the rewriting of my memo by someone else. They finally said, "Well, we'll put both your names on it, Smyth and Service." I think I finally signed it after there had been some toning down and also having his name on it.

But Hamilton made some remark to Ringwalt, who was in the Department then getting ready to go to China I think. Ringwalt had mentioned my memorandum or my suggestion. Anyway, Hamilton said something to the effect: "Pay no attention to Service. Don't take him too seriously. He's young and immature." Ringwalt got some amusement, I think, in telling me about this. I was all ready to go and storm Hamilton's office, but was finally dissuaded from making a fool of myself. [Laughter]

Hamilton's attitude was very odd. It was such a contrast to Currie, who said, "Look, we've got a problem and we've got to do something about it,"--I had lunch with Hamilton, and certainly in the beginning our relations were quite friendly. He was commenting, sort of in a despairing way, about the distorted American impressions of China, how someday there was going to be a rude awakening and this was going to be very bad when Americans found out things weren't as rosy as they'd thought.

I said, "Well, after all, we've got some responsibilities. There's censorship in China. It's very hard for the true story to get out," and that we should be doing something. I argued that we should be taking an active role in informing the American public. We owed it to the public and we had to counter Chinese censorship by helping American newspaper people get the news.

[lowering voice and paraphrasing Hamilton] "Oh, we could never do that, could never do that. It would be very embarrassing and very difficult. If it became known that we were taking an active role in news, it would be very embarrassing."

His whole attitude was a dithering, milquetoasty sort of business.

Q: This situation was not unique to China. There have been plenty of other places where there's been censorship.

SERVICE: Oh yes.

Q: Were there precedents for Foreign Service officers informing the American news corps?

SERVICE: Oh, I'm sure there had been. Sure! In 1931 in the Manchurian Incident--my trials bring out--the Foreign Service people in Manchuria and in China generally made sure that the newspaper people got the true story.

Hamilton was an unusually cautious, conservative type of person, I think. And perhaps he was prescient enough to expect that I was likely to be indiscreet or controversial. I don't know.

A lot of Foreign Service people were not used to the idea of American government being in news. The O[ffice of] W[ar] I[nformation] had just been set up. The government had never had anything like this before. You know, a lot of people in the State Department are still not very enthusiastic about this role of government. They would much prefer to stick to the traditional role of diplomacy rather than get ourselves involved in public information, propaganda, cultural affairs, and so on. Particularly propaganda, that's usually the bad word that's used.

There was another comment, I remember, by a fellow Foreign Service officer who survived what came later. He read my report, said it was very interesting, and it would be a terrific assignment, this business of going to Yenan. I suggested sending some Foreign Service officers to Yenan to observe. But, he wasn't sure that he would want the job because--He said, "Oh, the KMT government would be awfully down on that person." [laughing] "It might not be a very good idea."

Q: Who was that?

SERVICE: I think I'd better not mention the name. [laughter]

Q: What sort of security was put on this document?

SERVICE: Oh, I'm not sure what the security was. The classification was probably confidential, because everything was at least confidential. There was practically nothing written that wasn't classified in some way or another.

Q: What sort of circulation did it have?

SERVICE: I think I showed the thing around to various people I talked to, but then I was talking to people like Donovan and OSS people, Currie. After all, I gave Currie a copy. It was passed around quite widely. The State Department was concerned. What they were really concerned about was the fact that I was talking to other people. This was why they went to these absurd lengths to try to rebut it, because, of course, they knew that I was talking to Currie, and they knew that OSS was interested. I was being called to go to all sorts of debriefing sessions at OSS and the army MIS [Military Intelligence Section], and Navy ONI [Office of Naval Intelligence].

When they got their reply from Chungking, this is on page 205 (Foreign Relations, 1943, China) they circularized to all the head offices of the Department their message to Chungking and Chungking's reply without sending them my memo.

So, this was all sent in, and then Hornbeck put out a memo in reply to mine which is very amusing. This is Hornbeck. It's a memorandum by the adviser on political relations. The State Department historian's footnote, says, "is commenting on memorandum by John S. Service, dated January 23."

I think it's worth reading a little bit of it here.

"We should I think maintain an attitude of intelligent skepticism with regard to reports emphasizing the strength of the (quote) Communist (end quote) forces in China and expressing apprehensiveness that civil war in China may be imminent." Of course, I didn't say in my thing it was imminent. That was circulated to try to offset my memo.

I was talking recently to an English historian, Christopher Thorne, who has written a book coming out very soon now on the relations between the Allies during World War II. (Christopher G. Thorne, Allies of a Kind: the United States, Britain and the War Against Japan, 1941-1945, London: Hamilton, 1978) He's done a lot of research in British cabinet archives and British Foreign Office archives. He was telling me that in the summer of 1943--it was six months or so after this--that Hornbeck asked to go to London to consult with the British to make sure we were together on our Far Eastern policy. He raised their eyebrows in London, Foreign Office eyebrows, by his insistence that the so-called Communists were of no importance and no concern at all and that Chiang Kai-shek, if the need should ever arise, would have no difficulty whatever in coping with the problem.

Q: Was Christopher Thorne's belief that the British were much better informed?

SERVICE: Yes. This did not accord [laughing] with their views. [laughter] As I said, Clark Kerr, the British ambassador in Chungking, was the man who was most alarmed about the New Fourth Army incident.

The British had a man named Michael Lindsay living in Yen-an who had been there since Pearl Harbor. There were other people, people named Band who'd come through from Peking, and so on. Anyway the British apparently were willing to be a little bit more realistic than Hornbeck.

Q: I asked earlier if you'd taken notes on your trip?

SERVICE: Oh, no. I didn't have any notes. I didn't keep any diary. I was just sort of reporting off the top of my head. Yes, it's been one of my drawbacks really that I never could be systematic enough to take notes. Later on I took some notes at various times. But, on this trip I didn't try to take any.

Comments on Developing Relations Between the State Department and U.S. Intelligence Agencies

Q: You've raised a question indirectly that was on our formal agenda which concerns the relationship between the various intelligence agencies that were developing. You said that you were raising eyebrows by being debriefed by these people. But, when you use a term like "debrief" it implies, at least to me, that there is official recognition that this is part of your duties.

SERVICE: Oh yes. There was no question about that. An office was set up to inform all concerned agencies about arrivals of people who could be debriefed. Generally speaking, there was an intent to cooperate. After all, we were all fighting the war. So, word was circulated that I was there and available for debriefing.

But, I think what bothered my State Department superiors was not so much my talking to the lower level analyst groups as the fact that I was being talked to by people like Currie in the White House and by Donovan of OSS and so on. I'm not sure whether they knew it, but I was asked to talk to or taken to see various senators. I talked to Senator [Claude Denson] Pepper. There were a number of people that in one way or another I saw. Michael Straight, who was then the owner-publisher of the New Republic, talked to me.

I soon got beyond the normal--proportions isn't quite the right word--of a third secretary in the field. Anyway, it upset the State Department.

A New Feel for the Need for Information from China and a New Engagement in the Influencing of American Policy

SERVICE: After consultation, and a bit more leave in California, I went back to China: a whole bunch of us took off to China in early April [1943] I think. They were building up the staff in China. People had been repatriated from internment by the Japanese. So, a whole group of us went.

I think that there had been a change in my own situation. Partly because I'd been in Washington, I'd seen the end users of the reports. I'd been complimented a good deal on the reporting from Chungking, including being complimented by Alger Hiss, I remember, who was working then for Hornbeck! I'd gotten a new feel, which I hadn't before, of the need and demand and interest in information from China. I had become engaged by having my own judgment and maturity, shall we say, questioned.

Q: Engaged in what sense?

SERVICE: I'd become personally engaged in the sense of being much more involved in trying to make sure that what I thought was the correct picture got back to the States and more interested in American policy.

The whole incident there was a sort of a foreshadowing of what eventually was the final denouement. You can change Hornbeck for Hurley, and you might change Drew Pearson and the press for [Philip] Jaffe. But, the basic issues, our concern, our conviction, our certainty, that civil war in China would be disastrous was there right from the very beginning and that American policy should be to try to avoid a civil war. We should not get involved in supporting one side, which already in '43 I thought might well be the losing side, although we weren't so certain then as we were later on.

We were still at this time thinking that the Kuomintang could be saved and that our efforts should be toward trying to get the Kuomintang to reform. At this point we didn't know much about the Communists and we hadn't gotten to the point--which we eventually reached--of expecting the Communists to win.

At any rate, what happened later on seems to be pretty much foreshadowed in this incident in 1943.

Q: Did you run into troubles at all with the embassy in Chungking as you wrote more and more?

SERVICE: No. I think engaged is not the right word. I mean up to that point I had certainly done a very conscientious job. I reported when I was supposed to report. I saw something that I thought was worth reporting and reported on it. But, I didn't have the zeal that I eventually developed. While I wrote a tremendous volume of stuff I was generally, shall we say, an outside observer. I obviously wasn't aloof later on. But I think that the embassy never tried to discourage me or disagree with me. In fact, Vincent saw things very much as I saw them.

Interestingly enough, almost as soon as we got back to Chungking, Vincent was transferred back to the Department. He became head of China Affairs. Hamilton was sent off to the Soviet Union. Acheson then became deputy chief of mission, number two in Chungking.

In the Department during the January hassle Acheson had tried to argue against my thesis by recalling that the Communists were willing, in 1937, to take orders from the national government. It's true that in the early part of the war, the honeymoon period of the United Front, that they had worked together fairly closely. By the time Acheson had been in Chungking a short while, he saw the situation much as everyone else did.

I don't think there was ever any putting the clamp on me or clamping down on me from the embassy.

VII POLITICAL REPORTING: TRANSFER TO STILWELL'S STAFF

Posted to One-Man Observation Post in Lanchow

SERVICE: Very soon after I got back to Chungking, we were opening up listening posts or one-man observation posts at various places. They weren't formally called consulates. The Chinese government didn't want us to call them consulates. We weren't expected to perform normal consular functions and duties. Lanchow was one of the posts. I'm not quite sure why I was picked to go. They had more people to fill in in Chungking. Four or five officers went out the same time I did.

I'd been in Lanchow the summer before, so I knew something of the background and the people; I was very happy to go.

One big problem was how to get there. The China Tea Corporation ran trucks up the road to Lanchow to send tea. There was no tea grown in north China. This was a government monopoly. The government set up a lot of monopolies, trading companies, during the war. Tea was one of them. An H.H. Kung enterprise. The China Tea Corporation agreed to allow me to ride in one of their trucks.

Carries Two Hundred Thousand Chinese Dollars for an OSS Caper

SERVICE: A couple of days before I was to take off, an American navy officer, Commodore Miles, who was always known as "Mary" Miles, got in touch with George Atcheson--never contacted me directly--and said that they wanted me to take some money up to Lanchow.

He just dumped on George Atcheson a suitcase with two hundred thousand Chinese dollars--officially this was ten thousand U.S. dollars at the official rate of exchange. Two hundred thousand dollars in five and ten dollar notes is quite a pile of money! Would I please take this up to Lanchow because the OSS had an expedition coming through Tibet from India through Lhasa, and they were going to end up in Lanchow? They were going to need some money to pay off the caravan.

[laughing] So, Atcheson said okay. And I said, "George, this is the craziest goddamn thing." I'm traveling on a truck just by myself. There was absolutely no guard, no security. People are held up along the roads. Banditry is endemic everywhere. I mentioned before seeing people who had been robbed the day before trying to find their valuables they'd thrown off the bus.

Furthermore, there were perfectly normal channels for transmitting funds. He could do it through a bank. He could do it through the post office. China was an operating country, and transmission of funds was a very feasible business. But, it was absolutely typical of this strange person and the weird ways that he operated. Everything had to be secret. Therefore you didn't want to transmit funds in the normal way.

It's like the Watergate business, laundering funds, and so on. People in Lanchow knew that this expedition was going to arrive. They weren't going to come from nowhere. But, Miles just wanted to operate that way, and so I was stuck with this two hundred thousand in cash.

So, what to do? I was taking some things along, a few minimum groceries. Coffee was worth its weight in gold if you could give anybody a little coffee. I was going to take some presents of tea because tea in the northwest of China is very much more expensive, very prized, and so on, good gifts. I had a few staples and stores I was going to take. I expected to stay in Lanchow for a year or two.

So, I went down and bought a lot more tea from the China Tea Corporation and took the tea out of the boxes, filled the boxes with bank notes, and then mixed them in with my groceries and other stuff in a couple of wooden boxes. When we got ready to go, why they were just thrown in the back of the truck, you see, and then I forgot them, paid no more attention to them.

Before I left Chungking I had talked to Atcheson, who was then number two as I said, about the possibility of trying to get into the Communist areas. He said, "By all means, if you have a chance, do it."

Tolstoy, who was the name of the OSS man--he was grandson or something of the novelist, had been in the Russian cavalry as a young man and then left Russia and came to the States. This was what made him, I suppose, a prime candidate to send through Tibet, because you had to ride horseback. He was a very nice chap.

Anyway, I met Tolstoy in Lanchow and delivered the money, and he stayed on for a while. He was also very much interested in my idea of trying to get into the Communist areas. We thought we might be able to do it by going down the Yellow River. From Lanchow you can go down the river by inflated skin rafts. They use cow hides, blow them up, and make rafts out of them. You can go down to the city of Ningsia. From there we thought we might be able to get into the Communist areas from the north. There were some Kuomintang troops there, but they weren't very strong and there's a lot of open country.

The news we had was that these Kuomintang troops in the north were really sort of co-existing on a rather cozy basis with the Communists. So, we thought we might be able to do it. But, the Chinese in Lanchow were much too much on the alert for anything like this. [chuckle] They weren't about to let us go down to Ningsia.

Q: Was there any value, significant value, from the OSS expedition through Tibet?

SERVICE: None whatever that I know of. It was irrelevant, peripheral to the war. There were various rumors that had started that the Japanese had gotten into Tibet, into Lhasa, and that Japanese agents were active there. There was apparently one Japanese Buddhist who had been in Lhasa for a good many years. But, they didn't really prove that he was a secret agent or that he was very effective or that he subverted the Tibetans. So I don't think the operation accomplished anything. Maybe it accomplished a negative result in proving there wasn't anything to worry about, no Japanese subversion. The Japanese weren't about to take over Tibet.

Truck Breaks Down: Two Days on the Grand Trunk Road Listening to Coolies

SERVICE: Several days out of Chungking the truck had trouble, broke down--the trucks were all old and tied together with string and bits of wire--and we spent a couple of days beside the road. The road had curved. We broke down just beyond a curve. At the curve, fortunately, there was a little refreshment place run by an old peasant woman. She made noodles mostly and things like that, just very simple fare, and tea.

Most of the traffic was not truck but two wheel carts pulled by men or sometimes by animals. But this was Sichuan, so it was mostly human pullers rather than animal pullers. Other trucks went by. There were not many on this road north of Chengdu. But, the trucks would go by. I said to the driver, "Why don't you stop them?"

"Oh no. There's no use stopping them. We'll wait for another China Tea Corporation truck to come along, because all the drivers from the China Tea Corporation are from Ningpo." In other words, [laughter] it's the old regional kinsmen business. "When a tea corporation truck comes along we won't need to stop him. He'll just stop anyway and whatever he has we can use, and he won't leave until we get fixed up." Eventually some of his cohorts came along, his colleagues and friends, and they managed to get the truck rolling.

I spent almost two days in this little shack beside the road. It was quite an interesting experience because I would just sit in the back and coolies pulling these carts would come in and have a cup of tea or a bowl of noodles or something, meet others going up or down the road, talk.

Q: What did you pick up?

SERVICE: Oh! All sorts of things! What was interesting to them. What are the conditions down the road? Where are the troops grabbing coolies, because if they needed transport, they just grabbed people, hauled them off the streets. Conscription problems-- They discussed all the things that would be of interest to them, sometimes crops, but mostly conscription and impositions by the soldiers. They talked about riots and disturbances which we hadn't heard of in various cities, where there'd been civil rebellion or resistance to some of these things.

Occasionally I would reveal that I understood Chinese and then join the conversation. But it was a very instructive two days. I was rather sorry that we had to get back on the road, although the truck drivers themselves were interesting.

Q: Why was it done in your opinion?

SERVICE: Partly I think it was simply the State Department's anxiety to cooperate with the army. It was a request that was put through the highest channels. It came through Secretary of War Stimson to the secretary of state and put in very flattering terms that they wanted cooperation.

Vincent was the man in the Department who handled it. I think Vincent saw that it could be useful. Davies had already been assigned to the army, and Davies was in sort of a freewheeling position which was producing useful reports. There was quite a bad situation in Chungking. Bad maybe is too strong a word. There simply wasn't very good liaison between the army headquarters and the embassy. Gauss and Stilwell were alike in some ways. They were both rather prickly and each took the attitude, "Well, if he wants to talk to me, I'm available. Let him come over." This sort of thing.

It's always a bit of a question in a foreign country whether the ambassador has first rank or the army. I don't think these people were particularly concerned about that. Stilwell's attitude was, "Well, I'm just awful busy." So, there wasn't much liaison or contact between the two. Davies knew that I had good relations with Gauss and thought that I could be useful being a link.

There was a rationale in the case of all the people that were brought over, but I don't think we need to go into all that.

Q: Well, why not?

SERVICE: Really?

Q: Yes, sure.

SERVICE: It's sort of out of my field. Emmerson was a Japanese language officer. We were getting ready to fight the Japanese in Burma. Davies thought it would be good to have a Japan man for propaganda, psych, warfare and so on, interrogation of prisoners. The army was not very well prepared for it, certainly not in China.

Ludden was a man who was a frustrated soldier and would prefer to have been in the army. I think Davies originally thought that he would be a good man to maintain contact with the forces down in Burma, the army, fighting front.

Davies himself was spending more and more of his time back in India where there were a lot of political problems to worry about. Congress [party] and [Mahatma] Gandhi were opposing the war, famine was coming on.

Then, one of Davies' ideas from about this time was this idea which I had brought up, and Davies also had brought up, of trying to establish contacts with the Communist areas to find out what was happening in north China. Davies apparently always thought that I would be a good man for that.

His original plan was a very fancy one of getting Roosevelt's son, James I think it was, to head up the group. I was to sort of lead him by the hand. But that didn't work out.

Q: Was the CBI, the China-Burma-India command, established at this point?

SERVICE: Oh yes. CBI had been set up--well, I forget--in February or March, 1942. Now we're already in August, '43.

There was a fairly large headquarters, Forward Echelon Headquarters, in Chungking which was where I was assigned. The Chungking headquarters actually didn't quite know what to do with me. This had all been worked out, as I say, at very high levels. The people actually on the ground weren't very clear about what I was to do, whether to give me an office and have me in an office job, or what.

For a while I was fairly busy counseling a number of agencies like OSS and Board of Economic Warfare which later on became Foreign Economic Administration. We set up a sort of a psych-war committee there in Chungking, on an inter-agency basis. Actually we spent most of our time talking about American attitudes and propaganda vis-a-vis the Kuomintang [laughing] more than we did about the Japanese. In other words what we should do to try to promote the cause and the spread of ideas of democracy in China. Anyway, that didn't last very long.

This was not a full time job. I was much more interested in doing what came naturally for me--reporting. I did some of that, started that, and kept it up.

Becomes "Road Expert"

SERVICE: The head of G-2 at that time was Stilwell's son, Joe. He wasn't particularly interested in political things. He was much more the narrowly military intelligence type, combat intelligence, nuts-and-bolts type of intelligence. I don't think he was much concerned about Chinese politics.

He found out one day that I'd been over the Burma Road. He was quite excited about this because they were trying to get information, and everybody in headquarters had arrived in China since the Burma Road closed. No one there had been over it. "You drove over the Burma Road?!" So he had me write down everything I could remember about the road, its condition, bridges, ferries, terrain, cover, everything that could be useful as one type of intelligence, [laughter] just very primitive type of intelligence. So, I did the Burma Road, as much as I could dredge out of my memory.

Then he found out I'd been to the northwest. So I did the same for all the roads in the northwest I'd covered, Sichuan to Lanchow and Sian.

A Road Reporting Tour Through Guizhou, Yunnan, and Guangxi

SERVICE: Then he decided that for contingent, future planning possibilities, they wanted to find out all they could about all the roads in the southern part of China leading into Indochina. Up until the fall of France most of the goods imported into China had gone in through Haiphong, then on up the railway or by these roads. There were several roads built into China from Indochina. This was after Hong Kong fell, of course.

After the fall of France, the Japanese moved into the northern part of Indochina. All these roads were stopped, and the Chinese had actually destroyed the roads in areas close to the border. Further back, most of the roads had simply been abandoned.

So G-2 dreamed up this idea of having a reconnaissance. They sent an army engineer officer and I was to escort him. We had two jeeps. An overseas Chinese from Singapore was assigned to us as a mechanic and interpreter, but he was absolutely no use as an interpreter. We never used him. [laughter] I don't think he knew Cantonese. His Chinese was Fukienese or something like that.

But anyway, we never got into areas where he seemed to be of any use. Almost always--and even in Guangxi--I could use my Mandarin. My ears are flexible enough so that I could absorb, understand, most any variety of Chinese as long as it's a form of Mandarin.

This is a long story that we don't need to go into in any detail, because it's just another Gee-whiz, boys! great excitement stuff.

Q: One thing I'd like to ask is--Maps were always an enormous problem in the Pacific area I know. What was the reliability or availability of maps from any source for these areas?

SERVICE: Very poor. We didn't have any good maps. Even the air force didn't. We had general maps, but they didn't show things like roads. Of course, we had to get Chinese permission. From each province we would get the maps. There were little maps, extremely primitive and sketchy. They didn't show very much in detail.

We each had a jeep. They fixed up trailers, and we carried two drums of gas. The trailer had an iron box built on it, to enclose it in other words so there was some security.

We spent two months traveling around on these mostly forsaken, empty, abandoned roads. Sometimes the grass had grown up higher than the jeep. We had to push through it. Bridges sometimes were gone. We got across by getting local sampans, sometimes by putting boards across two sampans and then running the jeep out onto the boards and maneuvering the sampans, tied together, across the river.

We did southern Yunnan, Guizhou, and Guangxi, in other words all the arc around the northern borders of Indochina. We went right up to the border. In several places we could see the Japanese posts on the other side.

Q: Did they bother you ever?

SERVICE: No they didn't. We were foreigners. The whole frontier was completely inactive, and the Chinese weren't about to let it be otherwise. They weren't anxious to stir up anything.

Generally, we traveled alone, but in Guangxi at one place, we were escorted by some young Guangxi army officers.

This was the most interesting part of the trip, as far as I was concerned, to talk with the Guangxi people. Later on I wrote a report about Chiang Kai-shek's treatment of the Guangxi clique. It's partly from my experience.

I think that the trip was valuable to me; I was seeing a whole, other, big new section of the country. I'd done the northwest, and this was seeing the southwest. If there was no town, we stayed in a farmer's home, in villages. We'd simply find the head man and say, "Here we are. Can you help us?" We had papers identifying us.

Q: How were you received?

SERVICE: Friendly. Well, let's not get into that.

A Wide Range of Contacts

SERVICE: My contacts were numerous and various. People talk now about how you never got into the homes of Chinese in the old days. Chinese don't live in a way that they can entertain foreigners very well. Certainly in China in those days they were living in a very, very crowded, ramshackle way.

But I was continually in these people's rooms, their lodgings, just as they came to me. We got on a basis of very intimate equality, so that I could drop around and see them and we'd spend evenings talking where they lived. We usually went out for meals because even for Chinese [chuckle], it's easier to go out and get a snack--perhaps even at a noodle stand--than eat at home.

And they weren't set up for entertaining. Most of my meals were in restaurants. Occasionally I would have supper with Adler, but very seldom.

I mentioned last time moving in with Sol Adler, and I think we ought to say something more about that, because I had become by this time very close friends with Adler. He had come out to Chungking for the Treasury Department in the summer of 1941. So he'd been a long time in Chungking.

A brilliant person, he'd worked for a long time in the government, in the treasury, was a very close associate of Harry Dexter White. A brilliant economist, an international chess master, a terrific bridge player. Just a very, very keen, sharp mind who was as interested in Chinese politics as I was and in what was happening in China and how it would affect us.

He knew no Chinese, but all his associates were Chinese. He was an economist in the treasury working with Dr. Kung and with the Ministry of Finance and with the government economists and the top government bankers in China, so that he tapped an entirely different layer from what I was reaching. We compared notes and worked together very closely, so that my moving to a room in his apartment on the second floor was more than just a convenience. It facilitated our own collaboration, which really is the right word to use, on a lot of the reporting that I did.

Things like my comments on, oh, the Generalissimo's book, China's Destiny, a lot of it came indirectly from Adler, from his contacts, and particularly from his friend and very close associate Chi Ch'ao-Ting, who was a Ph.D. in economics from Columbia University and whose book Key Economic Areas in Chinese History, I think was one of the best known books in Chinese economic history at that time.

Then the Generalissimo came out with semi-secret publication. It was not published in China, but it was a textbook for all the party schools on Chinese economic theory. This actually was translated by Chi and then Sol wrote a long comment on it, economic analysis of it, and I gave it to the embassy, to Davies. Chi's translation was the origin of the eventual English publication.

Q: Did the Generalissimo write it himself?

SERVICE: No. Chungking was convinced, and I think it was fairly well accepted, that the person who wrote it was a man named T'ao Hsi-Sheng, who was sort of a secretary, a member of the Generalissimo's inner secretariat. He was an extreme conservative, right-wing, traditionalist Chinese scholar.

There were a whole lot of foreigners in Chungking working one way or another in intelligence or intelligence related work. This was the period that I first met John [King] Fairbank. He came to Chungking with what was called the COI [coordinator of information], which then became, or was part of OSS. John was running their office and did a great deal of work collecting printed materials on China.

Fairbank had spent four years in Peking while he was working for his Ph.D. and had done some teaching at Tsing Hua University. As a result of that and because of his own interests and Harvard work and so on, he had a very, very extensive acquaintance among Chinese university circles.

I saw the people in the embassy, like Sprouse, of course. Most of the embassy contacts were government officials, particularly foreign office but other government--the ministry of economics and so on. We all did a lot of comparing of notes.

There was a man in the headquarters named Linebarger, who had been the psychological warfare guy that had asked for the original long compendium on morale and propaganda agencies. He eventually was sent to Chungking as a captain attached to G-2. Because of his father's connections with Sun Yat-Sen and because of his own predilections, he had a direct contact with people like T'ao Hsi-Sheng and Tai Chi-T'ao, and most of the conservative groups of the KMT.

There were other OWI people like Fisher, Stuart and others, who had been in China a long time.

Also there was a very active press contingent, the permanent group. I'm not thinking of the visitors who came in for a week and left. I talked to them of course. People like Severeid came at that time, and Raymond Clapper. Various people. You remember, this was one of the things that Currie wanted me to do. He undoubtedly told these people to look me up. Perhaps they would have anyway. I don't know.

The residents were people like Gunther Stein, Brooks Atkinson, Richard Watts, who was there for the Herald Tribune. Brooks Atkinson was the long-time drama critic of the Times. He was there for the New York Times. He didn't want to write drama criticism during the war. He asked for a war job, and they sent him to Chungking. It was a coincidence that Richard Watts, also a drama critic, was the Herald Tribune man in Chungking.

Teddy White, and with him was Anna Lee Jacoby. Harold Isaacs was there later on for Newsweek. These people were interested in exactly the same sort of thing I was interested in. They were able to talk to a lot of people I couldn't see.

Q: Why couldn't you?

SERVICE: Because I was not given prominent status in headquarters as political representative or adviser. In other words, I wasn't given big face. If I had been treated that way, as Davies was much more in India, then it would have been more possible for me to ask to see T.V. Soong or someone like that, the head of the government. John could go and talk to Nehru, or he could talk to the governor-general.

I preferred it this way. I much preferred to operate the way I did, than to have been put at a desk in a big office. It really didn't hamper me a great deal. Having good relations with the press, they often let me know before they were having an important interview.

Q: So, you could feed in your questions.

SERVICE: "I'm going to see so and so. What do you think?" Then, I would read their notes afterward. In many cases I read their despatches and could read what was censored. I was on a basis of friendly cooperation with some of these correspondents. They were tapping, you see, still a different stratum, than I was tapping.

We were all living and breathing the politics of Chungking. We shared both ways. If I knew something, if I had some rumor I was trying to check out, I shared with them. None of this material was about American policy, what the American government was going to do, military plans. It was all about what was happening in front of our eyes in China, so that although all these things were classified, we got out of the habit of thinking of them as classified, or at least I did.

Q: We know subsequently that many of these people to whom you've referred have taken very different positions on American-China policy. I'm talking about people who are now, to put it in seventies' terms, pro-Taiwan or pro-PRC [People's Republic of China]. Was there any evidence of splits at that time or any personal friction?

SERVICE: No, not really. We were beginning to get a difference of attitude toward the Communists. At this time--I'm talking about before I actually went to Yenan--most of us didn't know much about it. No one knew much about what really was happening up there.

Isaacs, I think, always from the very beginning was critical of the Communists. He himself had had a political background in China. He'd been there as a young man editing a magazine which was regarded as being Trotskyite. He asked Trotsky to write the forward to his book on China. He regarded Mao Zedong, I think wrongly--his anger should have been at Wang Ming and the twenty-eight Bolsheviks--but he regarded him as a tool of Stalin.

There some people working for the Chinese, people like "Mo" [Maurice] Votaw, who was working as an editor for the Chinese Ministry of Information, which as I mentioned before was a party ministry. Mo was restrained in his criticism, shall we say. He didn't try to pretend everything in China was hunky-dory. There were some differences, but by and large we all were talking about what's happening here, and we all saw it pretty much the same way.

Later on, when the Kuomintang started putting out prejudicial information, they made a good deal out of my contacts with some of the press, particularly Teddy White. They even claimed that I used to use his room in the press hostel for assignations with Zhou En-lai's lady press secretary, a woman named Kung Peng.

This, of course, was absurd to anybody who knew the layout of the press hostel, because the press hostel purposely was laid out to facilitate surveillance. It was like a two-story motel, built around two sides of a square. The third side of the square was a dining room, and then at the entrance you all had to go through one gate.

The entrance was where your surveillant sat, the policeman. The doors of all the rooms opened out onto balconies, verandas, so that he could sit there and watch whoever went into any door. So the idea that I would pick this place for assignations is somewhat laughable. But, we'll come back to this subject.

Kung Peng was famous in Chungking. She was a graduate of an American missionary school and Yenching University, had been active in the student movement there in 1935, and went over to the Communist side. Her first husband was killed fighting in the guerrilla areas. Her second husband was a man I knew quite well, who had escaped from Hong Kong after Pearl Harbor and was one of the editors of the Communist paper in Chungking.

He became ill, had an operation, and I found out that she was very distraught because the hospital needed blood and they couldn't get it. Chinese, at that time, weren't used to the idea of giving blood. They somehow think it's their life essence, and they just don't like the idea of having people take it away.

So I went down to the hospital to give blood. My veins are very hard to find apparently. I'm very thin, and the doctors were not in practice, I'm sure, and the needles were very old.

Anyway, they had to probe around so long and make so many futile attempts [chuckling] that I finally passed out cold as a flounder, which alarmed everybody, except me of course. But at any rate, this example encouraged Chinese comrades, and he got a good supply of blood after that. Also, I was able to get him plasma from our army doctor up at headquarters, plasma and antibiotics which they needed desperately. He's the man who later became foreign minister.

Q: His name?

SERVICE: Ch'iao Kuan-Hua. He was a foreign minister until, unfortunately, he got mixed up with the Gang of Four. His wife had died some years ago. He remarried and his new wife, who was a vice-minister of foreign affairs, apparently was quite close to Chiang Ch'ing.

People often assume, you know, that intelligence is a matter of paying money and so on. I think it's clear that the type of work I was doing was not at all with paid informants. It was all friendly, people who had the same interests that I did.

The Chinese newspapermen who were the primary people that I talked to, and the Communists were all interested in what was going on, all interested in talking shop, exchanging ideas, pumping each other. Mostly it was friendship. Of course, some people talked to me because of my position. Obviously, my position was an advantage. People knew I worked for headquarters. Some people wanted to influence me, wanted to get their ideas through to headquarters. People like Feng Yu-Hsiang and some government people tried to talk to me at various times, convince me of their views or change my views.

But basically, it was simply a matter of common interest. When we went out I very often paid for meals, but that was not exactly bribery. Most of these people were working for a pittance themselves. When I left Chungking I gave away everything I had practically--this was normal, pretty much--gave away clothes, pens, watches, anything like that. But it was not as payment for information received. They would resent

Ranked as Colonel

SERVICE: This traveling for the army used to raise some questions. At first the army was very casual. They would just say go off and do this or that. Then I found I had to have a little more identification, because the question came, "Mr. Service, what and who the hell are you?"

Boarding planes, they'd start with the highest ranking officer, colonel and then major, captain, lieutenant, sergeant, then private first class, then privates, and then Mr. Service at the end.
[laughter]

At any rate, I had army orders, which I didn't always want to pull out. But, I got an identification. Let me show it to you here.

The B-29 Bases in Chengdu

SERVICE: During this period I made several trips for headquarters. One was to Chengdu. There were rumors of anti-American feeling there because of the huge bases that were being built for the B-29's. We hadn't yet got far enough in the Pacific to try them out against Japan from Pacific airfields. We hadn't taken Saipan and Tinian yet.

Somebody dreamed up the idea that we'd build bases in west China, from which we could reach Manchuria and the southern tip of Japan, Kyushu and so on. It was done, of course, without any thought to the economic cost, or the problems and disturbance it would cause in China. It was pushed ahead as things were then when the top decided on it.

Large areas of most fertile farm land, rice paddies in the center of the rich Chengdu plain, were taken over for these huge bases. Hundreds of thousands of people were dislocated. Hundreds of thousands of people had to be mobilized to build them.

There were some incidents there. I was sent up by Stilwell to try to find out what it was all about. This was what I was alluding to a while ago, that it was something that I was able to do almost completely without contacting the [Chinese] official sources, because, of course, they would have their own story.

I talked to some local Chinese YMCA people, and through them met some local Sichuanese people, business people, newspaper people, and so on.

I actually went out to see one of the bases, talked to some of the farmers. I wrote a series of reports on it, and I mentioned a number of things that could be done. One problem was that Chengdu had been bombed very heavily early in the war because it had been a base for some of the Russian planes, that the Russians gave, early, 1937, '38. There had been an aviation school set up there, and the Japanese came and bombed it quite heavily. So the populace, very practically and from long experience, were sure that big bomber bases would provoke Japanese retaliation.

One thing I reported that could be done would be to send some Fourteenth Air Force planes up there, detach them temporarily. This was one of the things that Stilwell headquarters fixed on. So they instructed Chennault to send some fighters to Chengdu.

Chennault found out that I was responsible, and this was apparently one of his real big complaints about me, was that I--[quickly and emphatically] "Amateurs that know nothing at all about it making these recommendations!" He deals with this, I think, in his book. (Claire Lee Chennault, Way of a Fighter: The Memoirs of Claire Lee Chennault, ed. Robert Hotz, New York, G.P. Putnam Sons, 1949)

[Vice-President Henry] Wallace was coming to China. I think Adler suggested that it would be good to do a briefing paper for him. I worked on a long report which has been published very extensively, a June 20th memo I think, which was really for Wallace. I'm not sure that Wallace read it, but the State Department got it and it got very wide circulation in the Department.

Permission Granted for an American Military Mission to Communist Headquarters

SERVICE: All this time we had been working on the question of getting permission to go to Yen-an. I don't think we want to go into a history of all that. [Colonel David] Barrett (David D. Barrett, Dixie Mission: the United States Army Observer Group in Yen-an, 1944, Center for Chinese Studies, University of California, Berkeley, 1970) has written some of it and a lot of other people have written books on the Dixie Mission. It can be dug out.

When Wallace was coming we thought that this would be a good time to try to make one more try. We drafted a message referring to various earlier messages. The White House had earlier sent a request, which the Chinese had agreed to. They would let us go to north China, any areas under Kuomintang control. Of course this was not what we wanted.

Anyway, we drafted a message to the War Department for [General George] Marshall summing up all this and suggesting that Wallace's visit would be a good time for a push. We got a message back which, as I recall, simply said that the White House had agreed that our message could be given to Chiang Kai-shek as being from the White House. In other words, all we had to do was to change the head and tail, you see, and say that this was from the White House.

We were elated at this, but it turned out that that morning--Wallace was already in town--that very morning Chiang Kai-shek had agreed. Apparently he decided that this was something he was going to be hit with. So, he'd agreed without being pushed on it.

Well at any rate, this was a message which had to be delivered and we wanted to discuss details, so I was summoned with the chief of staff, who was General [Benjamin Greeley] Ferris up to the embassy where Wallace was having lunch. We discussed tactics for the afternoon meeting. We arrived out at the Generalissimo's and said that this message had come in, and although it wasn't necessary we wanted him to know that the President thought this very important. But, all this is in Foreign Relations.

Q: What was your impression of Wallace?

SERVICE: I was quite impressed. In a small group like this, he was very quick on the uptake, very intelligent, quite well informed. He was very good on absorbing all the details and deciding what was the best way. He would say this, we would say this, and so on. He carried it off very well. I mean he functioned beautifully. He had some fuzzy and wild ideas, and I couldn't support him in his run for the president. But when it came to an administrative sort of thing, he was awfully good.

Q: How did Chiang Kai-shek respond?

SERVICE: Like a stick of wood, impassive. They were very surprised when we walked in. Madame showed her surprise at seeing me there. I was there with Ferris, you see. They had expected Wallace. He was due to come out for that afternoon meeting, and Vincent was traveling with him and Lattimore. We were two extra people that they hadn't expected.

She walked into the room. Hollington Tong whom I mentioned before, was there to interpret. She was a bit surprised, and then we explained why we were there. After we'd finished this, Ferris and I withdrew. We weren't there for the last part of the talk.

Q: Was she at this point hostile to you, do you think?

SERVICE: Oh yes. By this time they had already decided that I was not a friend. I'd been interpreter when Ferris had to deliver the first messages about putting Stilwell in command of Chinese troops. I had been an interpreter on two sessions, where it was supposed to be "Eyes Alone," which meant that we asked the other people to withdraw. I think the Chiangs by this time had a [chuckling] pretty good idea that I was one of the pushers on this business--I made no particular bones of it--getting up there to Yen-an. That was an unfriendly act as far as they were concerned.

Q: Do you want to comment at all on those "Eyes Alone" meetings, or do you feel that's been covered adequately?

SERVICE: There's masses of it in the hearings I think.

I don't think there's much need to talk about Yen-an or plans for Yen-an. I had earlier on had a talk with Stilwell and suggested that the logical man to go was Barrett, and Stilwell agreed.

When we got permission then we immediately canvassed the various operating agencies in the theater to see if they wanted to be represented--the Twentieth Bomber Command, the people in Chengdu, the B-29's, the Fourteenth Air Force, the OSS of course. Then there were various OSS groups that were put under Fourteenth Air Force, air grand rescue service, and photo, something like photo--and specialists that the Fourteenth Air Force didn't have that OSS was able to supply.

Fourteenth Air Force would not officially send anybody to join our group, because Chennault was playing the Chiang Kai-shek game. He wasn't going to do anything that would complicate his relations with Chiang Kai-shek.

Impressions of Yen-an: Confidence, Friendliness, and Efficiency

SERVICE: We finally got up to Yen-an on July 22, 1944, and that's all written up in Barrett's book. I don't see the point in going into it very much.

Q: Well, only to the extent of what you thought and felt. After all, it was a turning point in so many ways.

SERVICE: Yes, but I've reported on it so fully. You know, you've got my monograph and testimony at great length. I just hate to get too redundant. My impressions of Yen-an are all written down in my reports.

Part of the thing that dazzled us--dazzled us is too strong a word--was the difference in attitude in Yen-an. Chungking was simply waiting for the end of the war to come. Most of the people were from down river, and they were waiting so they could go back to their homes and their families in Shanghai or Nanking.

Here up in Yen-an--they had nothing, and they were poor as anything, off in the boondocks--the whole atmosphere was just full of confidence and enthusiasm. They were absolutely sure that they were winning. As the Communists always say, the situation is excellent. Talk about your YMCA sort of spirit of optimism and so on, this was it to the nth degree. Everything is positive, everything is good, we're going to win, we are on the winning road.

We hadn't expected this. They obviously expected, as we got to talk to them more, expected to be very important in the post-war era, expected to share power, at least, with the Kuomintang. They were quite confident that, "The Kuomintang can never whip us, can never take away these territories."

Their whole attitude was a very different one. It was very much like my own feelings that I had found, new feelings, with my Chinese friends, of acceptance, of hospitality, of not being guarded, of not holding people off. Their liaison officers came and sat and joined our mess. People would drop in to see you. It was all very informal, as I say, like a sort of a Christian summer conference atmosphere. People were living fairly close together.

Mao Zedong might drop by for a chat in the evening, or we could go over and see them almost at any time or on very short notice. They had some telephones, very poor ones. But, you could call over to the headquarters and say, "Can I come on over?" "Sure." If you came, it might be a "Stay for lunch" sort of thing. It was all a very congenial, friendly, frank sort of an atmosphere. Of course, there were things they didn't tell us, but we didn't know what they were. [laughter]

Q: You used the word, "dazzled" and then somewhat backed off from it.

SERVICE: Yes.

Q: There have been a couple of types of criticism made of you. One was that you went "native." The other that you were seduced or converted or what have you by the Chinese Communists.

SERVICE: Yes. Well, we tried very hard, I think, to avoid that. We didn't draw our conclusions immediately. We tried to wait a time until people had traveled in the areas and gotten out and seen what the guerrillas were doing and what things were like.

But the confidence that we ran into, the difference in the morale, esprit, this was something that hit us right away. The ways things got done. If you asked for things, yes, they said they'd do it, and it was done, promptly, in fact, efficiently. In Chungking nothing was efficient. Nothing seemed to work and everything took a long time.

If we wanted to talk to Japanese prisoners, "Oh yes, we've got a lot of them down the road. You're welcome." In Chungking it was the hardest thing in the world to get ahold of any real Japanese prisoners. But, almost anything-- "Newspapers, yes, we can get them for you." Pretty soon we started getting newspapers from Peking and other occupied cities in a very surprisingly short time.

All sorts of things. For instance, they had been publishing a paper all through the war up in Yen-an, a party paper; I asked Zhou En-lai whether I could possibly get a set of back copies.

"Certainly!" A couple of days later bales of papers arrived: he sent them up. Almost anything-- They were very outgoing--cooperative.

We had a very elaborate briefing when we first got there. We told them: "We're not in a position to negotiate. We're not in a position to promise. We're here to observe. We want to find out all we can about you, what you've been doing, what the war has been like, what you think of it." So, they arranged a very extensive series of briefings.

Chinese don't seem to mind any length of talk or briefings. Each day we'd have another Communist leader come and spend the whole day more or less briefing us. Sometimes it was two days. Chu Teh, Yeh Chien-Ying, all the top military people, P'eng Teh-Huai, Lin Piao, and then people from the various areas. A lot of them were already in Yen-an.

They were talking about having their seventh party congress, apparently waiting for the opportune time. A lot of people had come in from outlying places. It might take them a month or two months to get there. So, they were already in Yen-an waiting. A lot of these people gave us briefings. I took heavy notes on all this. Then I was interviewing people, going talking to people.

Mao said at one of the very early meetings, "I suppose you want to see me," you know, with a smile on his face. I said, "Why yes, certainly I do." But, he said, "I want to see you also, but I think maybe it's better if we wait till we get acquainted a bit, you see more about us, know more about us, and then our talk will be more useful."

Just a month later I got word, "Could I see the chairman the next day at two thirty" or something. I think it was two o'clock. I said, "Of course, I can." The talk was one that lasted from two till ten at night.

I had notes on all these things, but when I came back from Japan in '50 for the McCarthy hearings, why--Caroline, I think, had always felt that these notebooks were bad things to have around--she threw them all overboard.

Q: What, all your notes from the Yen-an period?

Chungking-Yen-an Contrasts

[Interview 9: October 3, 1977]

SERVICE: I thought we'd now go back to Yen-an where we were last time. You asked me something about attitudes, impressions of Yen-an. I think that one thing that you have to remember, of course, is we went to Yen-an--and I'm speaking particularly of myself--from the background of Chungking.

I'd been in Chungking a long time, maybe too long. Maybe I'd lost my perspective a little bit. Chungking was discouraging, a gloomy place to be. People were waiting for the end of the war, or they were trying to do as little as possible in prosecuting the war. There was rampant inflation with all the suffering and dissatisfaction, complaining, that that caused. Rampant inflation with nothing really being done to check it. There was no rationing, things like that. Wealthy people did not get conscripted. Young people stayed in universities all through the war, because university students were not subject to military service.

You had all sorts of things like this. The attitude of the Chinese officials, generally, that you met was rather resentful. They had a feeling that you were critical of them. There was beginning to be criticism of China at this time in the American press. So they were rather on guard, rather prickly. They felt that we weren't giving them very much, we weren't doing what we should for China. So most of our official relations in Chungking were uncomfortable, uneasy.

High Levels of Information and Conversation in Yen-an SERVICE: Well, that got me diverted. Anyway, I was talking about the Kuomintang attitudes. We got to Yen-an and, of course, we were welcomed. They had been isolated, blockaded. They had already gotten some press people up there just before we got there.

Just going there was a form of American recognition, and this was tremendously important and very welcome. We were treated with open arms and red carpet treatment. The fact that Barrett could speak Chinese and I could speak Chinese, the fact that we had, I think, six people in our group who had spent time in China, who knew some Chinese, which was a very high proportion-

Q: Out of what, fourteen?

SERVICE: Out of sixteen I think it was. There were quite a bunch of us that had been in China teaching, or had grown up in China.

So that there was immediately a very warm, cordial atmosphere. They were interested in what was happening in the outside world. They'd been completely isolated. They wanted to talk to us. They asked us all sorts of questions.

Q: This was one of the questions on an agenda I haven't given to you. How much did they know about the progress of the war, and how good was their way of evaluating the information they got, because their frame of reference must have been so antiquated by then?

SERVICE: They were quite well informed actually as far as the news reports went, because they listened to radio news, they got newspapers from free China, and they got newspapers from occupied China. They got Japanese publications. They had very little in the way of foreign publications. They were very eager to get anything that we could get them. We got Time and Life and things like that, that were very late of course by the time we got them. But this sort of stuff they were very happy to get.

Then tended to follow the Russian line, although they didn't completely on the war because they'd been attacked themselves. In other words, they didn't buy the "phony war" line completely in the '39 to '41 period. They paid lip service to it: it was an imperialistic war. But, they were anxious for the war to reach China. [laughter]

I would say that under the circumstances they were quite realistic. In some ways they had a fairly good understanding of the United States. They realized the effect of the political campaign coming on in the fall of '44, that this was not a time for Roosevelt to make commitments. They said, "We realize this. We'll wait till after the campaign is over." After the campaign was over they wrote to Roosevelt and congratulated him. Roosevelt wrote back. It was quite a cordial letter.

They were astounded at Truman's nomination, but then so were we all. I mean we were dumbfounded when it came over the news that the Democratic convention had nominated Truman as vice-president.

We were having dinner that night with the leaders over at the army headquarters. There were two tables, as I recall, at least two tables. Generally, I was regarded as the civilian leader and Barrett as the military leader. I was generally put at the table or place of honor with Mao Zedong, and Chu Teh gave Barrett the honors.

I could sense that Mao was very impatient to get through with all the folderol about getting into our places and getting seated. So, as soon as we sat down he came out with it. [loudly] "Who is this Too-Lu-Mun? Who is Too-Lu-Mun?" Who is this man Truman? [laughter] Most of the dinner was devoted then to trying to explain how it was possible that someone completely unknown, or almost completely unknown, no great record of war or political service, could suddenly be chosen vice-president.

Wallace, of course, had been vice-president. Wallace had made a trip to China. Everyone assumed Wallace would be renamed. Chinese were worried that Wallace's visit to China had been what did him in, because it was during his visit that we got permission to go up to Yenan.

They were concerned, what this meant, you know, about attitudes toward China, attitudes toward the Soviet Union. They could imagine all sorts of things into it, because they didn't have any comprehension of the domestic political situation in the United States.

Well, we didn't know too much about it either. So we were sort of helpless. It was an amusing incident. Obviously Mao had given a hard time to Zhou En-lai, because they were quite relieved when they found we were about as confused as they were. [laughter]

This is sort of typical of the intellectual atmosphere. Most of them were intellectuals. Some were military men, but even most of the military men had had an intellectual period in their lives. Chen Yi, for instance, whom I got to know very well--did I mention before--always referred to me sort of jokingly as his teacher's son, because he attended the YMCA school in Chengdu.

But they were not tied up with government administration because government and party were quite separate. There was a local government for the border areas. The party was quite separate. Of course, some people overlapped. But people like Mao and so on had no role in the local government.

You had a scattered group--sixteen or so--of these border areas behind the Japanese lines, far away, communications very poor. They had to be there on their own. A lot of these leaders had been called in to Yen-an in expectation of a party congress, which wasn't actually held until spring of '45. But, they were expecting it and waiting for the appropriate time. So, there were a lot of people in Yen-an without very much to do. They were just sitting there waiting, people like Chen Yi from the New Fourth Army and a man from Shandong.

They were quite happy and delighted to sit and talk for hours and hours and hours. But, even people like Mao Zedong-- As I said, my first interview with him was an eight hour interview with dinner. "Of course, you'll stay for supper" sort of thing, pot luck. Pot luck turned out to be just Mao and Chiang Ch'ing and the interpreter.

Dances, Fun, and Games in Yen-an

SERVICE: I had forgotten completely about Chiang Ch'ing until later on when my reports became available. My notes were destroyed as I mentioned before. But, it wasn't until many years later that these reports were published in Foreign Relations. I was able to see that Chiang Ch'ing had been there.

Q: Any recollection now of her presence or her personality?

SERVICE: She was pleasant. I remember more her dancing. We had these dances every Saturday night, which was a sort of a-- I don't know what's the right word-- They were fun. Miserable conditions. Most of them were outdoors--it was the summer time and fall--on packed earth, under some pear trees, a pear orchard. A pickup orchestra would play one fox trot (an alleged fox trot), one waltz, and then one yang-ko, a local folk song. It was like a conga, sort of one, two, three, oomph; one, two, three, oomph sort of a thing. It wasn't only the dances, but there was a sort of a lightheartedness about the place. I mentioned before the confidence, the morale, esprit.

We had been given some games by special services in Chungking, including a game of monopoly. Some of the Chinese who were attached to the liaison offices saw up playing monopoly. The next thing we knew they had gone away and manufactured a game of monopoly, but all based on Shanghai real estate! [laughter] These were all down-river people. It was Nanking Road and the Bund and the Park Hotel and Cathay and all the rest of the hotels. It was all based on Shanghai. They just thought it was absolutely hilarious! Monopoly, by the way, is banned in the Soviet Union.

We had an accident with our plane when we landed, because the landing strip had been built over a graveyard and one wheel of the plane fell into a shallow grave. They decided to improve and extend the airfield. Everyone was contributing a day of labor, so I suggested to Barrett that we do the same since it was being built for our benefit. Barrett agreed.

We went out, but it turned out to be counterproductive in a sense because no one--there were several thousand people out there working--but none of them had ever seen any white men ever doing any work. So, everyone had to stop working and watch us! [laughter]

We played baseball. Barrett was insistent on having baseball, some exercise, some organized recreation. Usually in the afternoon before supper he liked to have a baseball game. There was enough to just get up two teams. I was a very poor baseball player. I never learned in my youth, so I couldn't catch a fly properly. I was always put out in right field, which was out among some apple trees, so that there wasn't much hope of catching any flies anyway. I could only chase them.

There was the Japanese Peoples' Emancipation League. They didn't call them prisoners after they joined the emancipation league, which was being run by Okano, the leader of the Japanese Communist party, who now is called Nosako but used the name Okano at that time. Anyway, they put on an evening benefit for us.

Everybody put on benefits. We had all sorts of theatricals and musical shows. At one of the early ones, we were much embarrassed. It was just after our arrival. After their music, they said, "Now our American friends should sing." We didn't have any choir or chorus. We did some quick consultation and found that there were a few people who could do barber shop quartet or college glee club type singing.

The only song that they knew was "You Are My Sunshine." So, they sang "You Are My Sunshine." The next question was "Translate! Translate!" Pretty silly when you tried to translate! [laughter] Might not be so bad, for the Cultural Revolution though, because "You Are My Sunshine" could apply to Mao Zedong, of course, in the Cultural Revolution.

Going back to the baseball game, we eventually had a baseball game with these Japanese prisoners, which was very amusingly written up by an OWI man, Adie Suesdorf, many years later, in the New Yorker magazine. I expect it was the only baseball game during the war between Americans and Japanese prisoners.

I mentioned we had a long series of briefings by all the military people and top leaders. After that I pretty much was on my own. I went to the briefings, of course. But, after that I went around talking to various people, meeting various people, making my own schedule.

Mao himself was very apt to say on some subject, "You want to talk about economic policy. Well, the man for you to see is Po Ku. Go talk to Po Ku." Or, I wanted to talk about party and party work in the occupied areas. "Well, the man to see on that is Liu Shao-chi." So, arrangement was made for me to go to talk to Liu Shao-chi. As far as I know, I'm the only American that ever really had any lengthy talk with him. None of the newspaper people saw Liu Shao-chi at that time.

But, I talked to lots of people. I went to Lu Hsun Academy. I talked to some of the young intellectuals from Kuomintang China who had come into the Communist area and had been sent out to work in the villages. It's just exactly the same thing that's being done now. The thing was when these people came and wanted to volunteer, "Well, you've got to go out in the villages and stay for a year or two and prove that you can live with the villagers, work with the villagers, sort of prove yourself." These people were pretty starry-eyed about it, a lot of them.

There was a nurse that I met at the dances who had been on the Long March. She was a very pleasant peasant girl really. She was a nurse at the international hospital. She seemed almost eagerly friendly and we used to go for walks occasionally. But, it had to stop there. Apart from a perhaps unusual personal caution, Barrett had set the rule, and we all agreed, that there should be no American-Chinese Communist "relations."

Q: You were going to tell me more about the nurse whom you met.

SERVICE: The friendly, cheerful nurse in Yen-an who'd been on the Long March. There weren't very many women on the Long March.

Q: Briefly, the Long March--most people reading this will know--but that was--

SERVICE: I assume they will. It was the long trek from the Communist areas in southeast China, mainly Gansu province, all through southwest and west China, finally up to Shaanxi province. The main group that Mao and Zhou En-lai were with started in October, 1934, and they finished up in Shaanxi province in October, '35. So, it was just about a year.

The nurse hadn't been in on most of the fighting. Most of the stories were all about the derring-do and the great exploits and crossing the rivers and things like that. But, one thing that she was still annoyed about was the discrimination against women when it came to the question of bathing, which was terribly important. They had no clothes except what was on their backs. They got very dirty and lousy and so on.

Chinese have no feeling about male nudity, but they're very prudish when it comes to female nudity. So, when they came to rivers and streams, why there was no problem. The men could just strip and bathe. But, because they didn't want to offend the lao pai hsing, the country people, the women weren't allowed to strip down and take baths. It was very difficult for them, and she still resented the difficulty of bathing along this Long March ten years later.

She also talked about the fact that they couldn't do very much for the wounded. If they had wounded, seriously wounded, more seriously wounded than able to walk, they simply had to leave them behind. They tried to find some peasants who would take them in.

But, it was apparently a sad business because the Kuomintang troops were following them all the time, chasing them, and if these people were found by the Kuomintang they would be killed. The expectation was they'd be killed. It was just a continual process of having to abandon their seriously wounded people. That's about all of that.

Q: We read now of people going to China and resenting the fact that the sort of personal intimacy--that develops normally between people who spend some time together is not now possible. You know the sorts of books to which I'm referring. Was it possible then?

SERVICE: Oh, absolutely possible, completely possible. In fact this was it. We were experiencing it. I mentioned this in Chungking with my own group of close friends, and it was certainly true in Yen-an.

I think that there were some things that they would have been discreet about. Ch'en Chia-K'ang whose name I mentioned a couple times--he was a secretary for Zhou En-lai--was quite frank even about many of the party affairs, Wang Ming and the background of the rectification movement which was sort of tapering off when we got to Yen-an. We were really close friends, just as I would be close friends with an American. There were very few subjects that we couldn't discuss.

This was one of the reasons why we enjoyed Yen-an because we were able to make very close friends. Koji Ariyoshi, a Japanese Nisei who was with us, became very close friends with some people quite high up in the party.

I'm sure that others also found close contacts. It was an informal atmosphere and everything was possible at the time we were there. Later on things changed of course. It became obvious that we were not going to go ahead and give them anything, that Hurley was going to be rigid and insist on everything being done through Chiang Kai-shek and so on.

The man that was sent to replace Barrett was a military attaché whose reports, I mentioned, I used to have to deflate because he was willing to believe everything the Kuomintang said. He was an incredible choice to send up there.

And then after him Wedemeyer got a man who was a Russian expert because, "By God, we needed someone who knew the Communists." The only thing we knew was that he'd served in the Soviet Union. He predicted that the Soviet Russians weren't going to last--I may be exaggerating--more than ten days or something like that. I mean he was one of the extreme pessimists who said that the Russians can't possibly stop the Germans. So, he had to be taken out of the Soviet Union. He was sitting around in Washington and Wedemeyer wanted a Communist expert, so they sent him out to Yen-an.

Q: Why was a man like that appointed? Did it represent a relegation of China to a third-class position in terms of American policy?

SERVICE: By the time Yeaton was appointed--he was the Soviet expert--I think that the idea had really taken hold that they needed to get a whole new crop. In other words, the idea became very fashionable that everyone who had served in China had preconceived ideas, had prejudices, and what was needed was a whole new crew.

In the McCarthy period the theme was: "Where there's smoke, there must be fire." During the Hurley period it was: "Anybody who has served in China already has preconceived ideas." You had to get fresh minds, fresh attitudes.

I think Wedemeyer was quite willing to buy this. I think by this time he was tired of squabbling. So, "Let's get in somebody who's a Communist expert." Everyone assumed--Hurley and I'm sure Wedemeyer too and even apparently Roosevelt--that the Chinese Communists after all would do what the Russians told them to do.

Evaluation of the Dixie Mission Team

Q: Perhaps this is a good point to ask you your evaluation of the rest of the original Dixie Mission team. You had Barrett as leader, and he wrote his own monograph. Does what he wrote jibe with what you recall his impressions to have been at the time, 1944? Did subsequent policy, subsequent historical developments, alter his views?

SERVICE: I didn't read his reports at the time, but--

Q: You must have talked.

SERVICE: I talked to him. He apologizes in his book, sort of apologizes for having been swept off his feet and not having realized the evils of Communism, this sort of thing. He protests a little too much and I think unnecessarily. But, certainly the fact that he does apologize indicates that he was supporting something different at the time, doesn't it?

The group on the whole was a good group. As I said, we had quite a number of people with some background in China. I think the people, the signal people, meteorological people, weather reporting people, air ground rescue, all these people were very competent.

The order of battle man was competent but inclined to go on his own. He tried to operate a bit independently of Barrett, and he had to be pulled in a couple of times. OSS had some people, demolition people, who were competent. The doctor was an excellent man, who had grown up in India. His parents were missionaries. He was a superb person. Ludden was there from the Twentieth Bomber Command.

The Twentieth Bomber Command sent up a colonel, a target man, and he didn't know anything about China at all. Considering that the observer mission was an army operation, it was, I thought, very good.

Most of the people were genuinely interested. We had good people. For instance, Ariyoshi who came up to work with the Japanese prisoners, psych warfare business and propaganda, was very good.

There was a certain amount of milling around and some people didn't know what to do and weren't very much engaged. A couple of them got into the habit of sitting around and drinking. One man's marriage had just broken up. He obviously was not happy, but I don't think that we ought to dwell on that sort of thing.

Q: No.

SERVICE: Going back to the nurse, a very nice person, but one could not know whether there might also have been some sort of official connection. I mean she may have been working for whatever secret police the Communists had. I don't know. That's that.

Service Sent to Washington

SERVICE: Anyway, Davies got me orders. I jumped out of Yen-an very quickly. One night with Davies, and I left on the plane the next morning with my big map, rushed through Chungking, one night in Chungking. I had a number one priority.

Gauss told me about his having suggested, and then been encouraged and approved by the Department, to suggest a War Cabinet, which was a form of coalition government. This really is all described much more in my Amerasia Papers monograph.

Then he told me that he was going to resign. He expected to actually send in the resignation just after the election. After every presidential election each serving ambassador sends in a pro forma resignation. He wanted me to tell the Department that his was not intended to be pro forma, that he really meant that he wanted out. He'd had enough. I was to tell this to the highest person I had a chance to talk to in the Department.

Then I called Hurley, and Hurley said he wanted very much to talk to me. That again is mentioned other places. It was not much of a conversation because Hurley simply held forth and kept saying that he was going to get the Communists arms, he knew what they wanted, he knew all about them, and so on.

Washington, Home Leave, and a Surprise Reassignment to Chungking

SERVICE: In 1942, I was the first political officer back from China after Pearl Harbor. This time, in '44, I was the first person back to Washington who'd been in Yen-an. So it was the same thing, only double in spades.

I was in much more demand for these debriefing sessions. I had, of course, far more to say. I'd observed far more. It was a frantic business of running around and talking to Currie and more talks with people like [Drew] Pearson, other newspaper people, a lot of them sent to me by the Department. IPR [Institute of Pacific Relations] session again, a much larger one, a crowded one of course.

I was called to Hopkins' office, had about forty minutes with Hopkins, in a little tiny office in the White House, barely enough room on the floor for me to stretch out this map. (Showing the extent of Communist controlled areas of China. He said, as I cite in the [Amerasia] monograph, at the end that, "Well, very interesting, and probably what you say is mostly true," or "Most of what you say is true." "But, after all, they call themselves Communists. Besides, the only Chinese that Americans know is Chiang Kai-shek." That was the end of the conversation.

I tried feebly to do as I had done with Hamilton on an earlier talk, to say something about taking a positive role, informing the public, and so on. I said that when word gets out what the Communists are really like, the attitude toward them is going to change. But, Hopkins wasn't really very much interested. Very close to H.H. Kung apparently--

Q: How did you feel about our China policy at this point?

SERVICE: I was discouraged, but it seemed so completely absurd that I don't think I really took it in. You know, "This can't be," was my reaction.

He asked me about Hurley as ambassador, and I said it would be a disaster. He said, "Why?" I said, "He's in the Kuomintang pocket, working against Stilwell." But Hurley was appointed.

I saw Stilwell over at the Pentagon. He was sitting in the next office to "Hap" Arnold, five stars. Joe was four stars.

I gave him my October 10 memo which I'd never had a chance to get to him before. He said something about hoping that my having worked for him wasn't going to have any harmful effects on me. There weren't any consultations about China policy. All those hopes were finished.

The Department's plan was to send me to Moscow. Somebody had decided that it would be a good idea to have someone in Moscow that knew something about China. I was to be the first "China" man sent there. Davies was going to stay in China. Wedemeyer liked Davies and they were getting along fine.

I came back out here [California] for Christmas, and just before New Year's, there was a phone call from John Carter [Vincent]. "Davies has gotten in a row with Hurley. We've got to get him out. Will you go back? Do you want to go back?" I said, "Sure."

Q: Were you glad to?

SERVICE: Oh, of course. Sure, what the hell. After all, there was a war on; we all wanted to do something. It's hard nowadays to remember how patriotic we felt--but perhaps there was also some personal interest.

I asked about Wedemeyer's attitude. He said, "Wedemeyer has asked for you. Wedemeyer wants you. We're going to ask that you be allowed to continue contact with the Communists. This is our main reason in agreeing to your going back."

It was a matter of great haste. I took off New Year's Eve, as I recall, or very near New Year's Eve, went back to Washington. In those days it was a long hop across the country.

When I got to the Department, the chief of personnel, chief of Foreign Service personnel, wanted to talk to me. The chief of Foreign Service personnel asked me to see him. Briefly, he said that he had very serious doubts about sending me back to Chungking, that he'd been told that it would very likely have bad effects on the family. In other words, he knew about the family situation. I said to him that he didn't need to worry, that we had reached a resolution on that, which would solve that problem. I was not going to go ahead with the divorce, was going to stay with the family, and so that he didn't need to feel the Department was in effect breaking up a marriage.

I said the real problem in Chungking, as far as I could see it, was Hurley, his attitude toward the Foreign Service, and particularly the circumstances that forced John Davies' recall in a hurry.

He said he understood that and knew about it, that I would be working, of course, not under Hurley but under the army, and that the State Department understood the situation and would be in effect behind me. I forget if that's exactly the words he used.

So, off to China I went. Got a telegram I think in New Delhi from my brother Dick and from Dave Barrett. I think they said, "Don't go to Chungking, but if you feel you've got to, stop in Kunming."

I stayed in New Delhi with the man who was head of the American diplomatic mission--we didn't have an embassy; it was called an American commission or something like that--a man named George Merrell who'd been in Peking years before. There I met General Donovan who was head of the OSS, who was flying to Chungking, had his own plane. He was going to Chungking, so he said, "Fly with me," which I naturally did not turn down.

In Kunming my brother and Dave Barrett said, "You're committing suicide. Don't go. Hurley will have your scalp." "Well," I said, "one can't refuse. You can't not go after having accepted the assignment."

So I went. We got off the plane in Chungking. Tai Li had turned out to meet Donovan. [chuckling] The look on Tai Li's face, when I walked out of the plane beside Donovan, helped to make the whole occasion a little more happy.

Well, I think that's probably a pretty good place to quit.

Hurley and Wedemeyer Replace Gauss and Stilwell

Q: There's a new American cast now.

SERVICE: Yes. The [CBI] theater had been broken. Wedemeyer had taken over the China theater from Stilwell. Gauss had left and Hurley was now ambassador.

Q: How much did this represent a relegation of China to a second class position in terms of American priorities?

SERVICE: Partly you've got to remember that Hurley was sent out to do a specific job. He was sent out to negotiate the placing of Stilwell in command of Chinese troops. I don't think that anybody in Washington expected it to be more than that.

But then that ended in a fiasco. Gauss resigned in anger and disgust, and Hurley was on the spot. The Chinese wrote a letter to Roosevelt--it's in my monograph--asking that Hurley be nominated. This would occur to me to be a very poor reason for making a man ambassador!

I can only assume that in Washington they thought, "What the hell. China is a headache and is not very important." (I think by that time it was regarded as not very important.) "He seems to get along with Chiang, and we've had nothing except trouble and friction with Chiang. So, why not name him?" But, I really don't know.

I was in Chungking from January 18 and I left in early April [1945], so I was only in China for a relatively short while. It's a confused and ineffectual period in a way.

Hurley wanted to talk to me, as soon as I arrived, and this was when he gave me the warning that if I interfered with him, he would break me. I said I had no intention of interfering with him. After all, any military or other commander needed intelligence, information, and I felt that was my job. Also I was working for the army, which was something he never really accepted. He felt that he was coordinating all American activity in China including the army.

Wedemeyer agreed that I was to work for him and said not to pay too much attention to Hurley's blusterings. But, his idea of what he wanted me to do was quite different from what it had been under Stilwell.

Q: Did you feel threatened by Hurley, genuinely threatened?

SERVICE: Oh, certainly it was a very threatening atmosphere. The whole atmosphere in Chungking was threatening. The embassy staff was operating under very difficult conditions. Hurley had his own little separate embassy really in a sense. He was communicating not with the State Department but with the White House, ignoring the State Department, using the "Mary" Miles navy group communications, not even the embassy or State Department radios. Also, he was threatening the staff and preventing their reporting anything that was unfavorable.

But Wedemeyer wanted, I think, a political agent much as John Davies had functioned in India. He had known John in India and Southeast Asia Command headquarters where Wedemeyer had been deputy with Mountbatten.

I was breaking up with my Chinese friend Yun-Ju. That had to be gone through. Then, Sol Adler was away. He was back in Washington I think at that time. So--and perhaps it was fortunate in a way--I wasn't able to move back into his old quarters.

I stayed for a while, as I recall, in army billets, and then moved in--there was an extra bed at the embassy mess--with the counselor and the secretaries. I moved in with them.

Return Trip to Yenan

SERVICE: In March I got word, and I'm not sure just how the word came to me--Zhou En-lai had returned to Yenan--word came to me through the Communists that it would be a good time to be in Yen-an. What I understood from this was that the party congress was about to be held. We had discussed many times the party congress and my hopes of being there.

I talked about it with Atcheson and also with the army. Since contact with the Communists had been the principal reason for my going back to China, everyone agreed I should go to Yen-an. I got official orders and went and started reporting again from Yen-an.

The spirit had changed in Yen-an. The Chinese Communists weren't sure just what American policy was. They felt rebuffed. They were angry at Hurley because he had come up there in November and worked out with them their five points and agreed enthusiastically and signed them. Then as soon as he got back to Chungking and found out that Chiang Kai-shek didn't like them, he had gone back on his word and had become in effect a spokesman for the Kuomintang.

Relations had changed as far as cooperation went. They had more or less given up hope there was ever going to be any cooperation with us.

Morale in the [American] group had gone down. The man that was temporarily in charge was very suspicious of me and rather annoyed at my being there. But I made it clear to him that I had army orders and I wasn't reporting through him. I was reporting direct. We don't need to talk much about the reporting. It's all been covered.

The Communist Plan to Take Over Manchuria: Service's Despatch Lost

SERVICE: The Chinese were extremely friendly to me and talked very frankly. The congress was still delayed. It didn't actually take place until fairly late April. I'm not quite sure why they kept waiting, mostly, I think, to see what was going to happen in relations with Chungking, what the Generalissimo was going to do about calling a constitutional convention.

People like my old friend Chen Yi, the commander of the Fourth Army, were extremely frank and told me in great detail about their plans for moving into Manchuria, how they were already preparing, getting their cadres ready, getting poised and already moving in, infiltrating people into Manchuria for the attempt to seize it before the Kuomintang could get there.

At any rate, we got these urgent, urgent, urgent orders for me to return to Chungking immediately and go to Washington soonest--

When I went through Chungking--I was only in Chungking for one day--headquarters asked me if there was anything I wanted to dictate, anything that I had in my mind I hadn't been able to write when I was in Yen-an.

I said yes, there was one thing I thought was pertinent, and I sat down and dictated to the chief of staff's secretary, additional information on the Communists' plans for going into Manchuria. I had already written some, but I had more details to write.

Somehow, this has disappeared. We've never been able to find whatever happened to that. It would have been very helpful, in loyalty board and other hearings, to have had it, but it disappeared without a trace, at least as far as the army is concerned.

Service Recalled to Washington, April, 1945

Q: What were you wanted for back in Washington?

SERVICE: Hurley had found out in Washington that I was in Yen-an, and that apparently enraged him. He stormed over to the State Department, demanded I be recalled. The State Department said, "He's not working for us. He's working for the army." Then he went to Stimson. The orders were issued and signed "Marshall," given highest priority. I was ordered home on army orders, and then released.

This was the beginning of controversy and disagreement in Washington, you might say. In 1944 when I'd come home, everyone was interested in what I had to say and there was pretty general agreement. But this time people were already beginning to divide a little bit.

Some people in the State Department--Drumright, for instance--were arguing that there was a civil war in China, the Communists are in rebellion, we can't have any dealings with them. There were people in the Far Eastern section, particularly the old Japan contingent, Grew, Dooman, and other people, who represented the anti-Communist point of view.

The European people were anti-Communist, bitterly anti-Communist. They couldn't believe that there was any difference between Chinese Communists and Russian Communists. So, you began then at this period to have a sort of splitting in the Department.

As soon as I got in Washington I went to the State Department and was sitting in John Carter Vincent's office just after I arrived, when his telephone rang. He picked it up and said, "My God." Roosevelt had just died.

Assigned to Committee to Draft New Foreign Service Legislation

SERVICE: My original assignment--I was told--was that I was going to have a liaison job between the State Department and the Pentagon, more or less on handling information, intelligence reports and so on, making sure that each side was informed by the other.

After a couple weeks, before this job started, they said they had changed their mind and I was put on a task force that was preparing to write new Foreign Service legislation.

The Foreign Service was administered under a 1924 act, the Rogers Act, which had set up the modern Foreign Service, taken it out of the spoils and political field, and made it a career service. This was out of date, and it was felt that the Foreign Service needed to be modernized.

So, there was a task force set up, and I was one of the six or seven people, mostly young and reputedly with ideas, put on this group to study various proposals, and produce draft legislation.

In May, rather surprisingly, I got a double promotion. Promotions had been held up during the war, and so to rectify it, some people were given double promotions, which was rather unusual. That came through in May, I think May 18 or 19, the double promotion from grade six to four.

Feels Exploited by Jaffe, Roth, and Gayn

SERVICE: It had no connection in my mind, but before this change was made I met [Andrew] Roth, and then Roth introduced me to [Philip] Jaffe. [Mark] Gayn had also come into the act.

Q: These were people, just to put them in context, who were--

SERVICE: Gayn was a free lance writer who had done writing for Saturday Evening Post, Collier's, magazines like that. He had published articles which were obviously based partly on my reports. One of them was practically a steal of my June 20 [1944] reports. He was getting, as many people were, background information, being allowed to read reports and so on.

Roth was a young chap working for the navy, and he had come to the I[nstitute of] P[acific] R[elations] session I had in the fall of '44, talked to me then. Gayn had written me letters, hoping to meet me when I got to Washington. They were all indicted in the Amerasia case. Gayn had written me letters before.

But all this is gone into in so much detail in all my hearings that I think we don't want to waste time going through it all here. Anybody that's going to be this much interested, I think, is probably also going to have read the transcripts of the Loyalty Board hearings where it's gone into ad nauseam and the Tydings committee.

I began to feel that I was really being exploited by this group of people.

I went to New York and talked to the Foreign Policy Council. [T.A.] Bisson was one of their research people, and he had invited me for the weekend.

I said, "Sure." I was glad to meet Bisson. He'd been in China. He'd stayed in my house in '37 when I was alone in Peking. He'd been in Manchuria and then stayed with me for a while. He lived out on Long Island.

Then it turned out that Jaffe was also invited. He called up and was going to give me a ride out there.

I didn't have any feeling that I was under any cloud or threat or anything. What I had done with letting Jaffe see some of these reports I'd written in China was not different from letting many other people see them. They'd been circulated fairly widely and many people had read them, for instance, in John Davies' office in New Delhi.

On June 6, Vincent asked me to write a memo about something that was happening in the international Communist field. The French Communists had just had a very blunt calling down by Stalin. It was a signal that they were going to have to stop wartime united front line and start a more independent line. Vincent asked me whether I thought this was going to apply to China. I wrote a memo and said that I didn't think it was going to. The Chinese were going to follow their own line.

I walked up to Vincent's office to give it to him, and I noticed some people hanging around the hall outside. I asked them if I could help them. "Oh no," they said. "We're just waiting for somebody."

Then later on I walked out of the building and walked down the sidewalk--lunch time this was--and saw them coming out of another door very hurriedly. It seemed very odd to run into these guys twice.

I was staying in the apartment of a girl in the Far Eastern division that was on leave. She knew I was alone in Washington--Caroline was still in California--so she said, "Well, just use my apartment while I'm away." She was away for a week or something. After leaving the office, I went to her apartment.

"We're FBI. You're Under Arrest"

SERVICE: About six thirty, the doorbell of the apartment rang. I opened the door, and here were the two guys that I'd seen in the State Department. They said, "We're FBI. You're under arrest," and so on.

They came in and I was naturally a bit stunned. They asked if they could search the place, and not being smart or experienced, I said yes. They said, "Where are the papers? Where are the papers?" Well, they didn't find any papers. They thought I had the place stacked full of my reports.

I said, "My reports are all in my desk at the State Department."

Anyway, they searched the place, and they found a sort of private code that Davies and we "advisers" used writing among ourselves. Our letters had to go over Japanese territory in Burma. There was always a possibility of the plane being shot down, so we had an agreed on private code of using fictitious names.

Stilwell wasn't Stilwell. I forget--Just code names, this sort of thing. Sort of silly. This was how Dixie got started. We referred to Yen'an as Dixie, and so it was the Dixie Mission.

I was taken to the FBI offices and we had a long talk. I said, "This is crazy." I was perfectly willing to cooperate. We had a long, long, long session. They kept referring to little notebooks. They obviously knew all of my movements. They kept jogging my memory. "Did you see so and so? When was it?"

Finally I said, [chuckling] "You've got the dates here. I can't remember."

I don't know how long it took, but they wrote out a statement which I finally signed. Later on, of course, my lawyer was very sorry about that. I don't think we need to go into it. We'll include this in the record, can't we?

Q: Oh yes, we can.

This is a terrible question to ask, but how did you feel while this was going on?

SERVICE: Actually, I felt more terrible after I got in the jail than I did here. At this point I was just sort of flabbergasted and stunned, angry, but mostly just stunned.

Although these people were very clumsy in their tailing tactics--all this business of hanging around outside my office door in the State Department, chasing out another door of the State Department when I was out going to lunch, and this sort of thing--they obviously had instruction on how to interrogate. They were not giving anything away. They didn't ever tell you anything. I kept trying to find out what it was all about. They kept saying, "We're asking the questions."

Then they called up, while I was there, they called up the big cheese. They didn't say it was Hoover, but this was what I was supposed to assume. "Yes, he's being very helpful." I was supposed to be impressed by this and I was somewhat.

They sent out eventually for some sandwiches. I complained it was getting late and I was hungry. I was supposed to have supper that night with a girl that was working in the office. They called her up and told her that I would be unable to meet her.

Eventually we were taken, quite late at night, to the U.S. Commissioner's office to be arraigned. He set bail at $10,000. All three of us were there, Roth, and [Emmanuel S.] Larsen, and myself, the three people in Washington. The other three people accused in the Amerasia case were in New York.

By this time it was late at night. There's a picture of the three of us sitting like--I made an ill-advised complaint to the commissioner. The FBI likes to get maximum publicity for all this sort of stuff, so they had all the newspapers alerted.

This is Larsen. He tried to talk to me in Chinese, and I said I didn't think it was a good idea for us to be talking in Chinese there, with the newspaper people all hanging around. That made him very angry; he was a strange character. He wanted to find out what I knew, who else had been arrested.

Of course, none of us knew any of the details, who was involved. It was obvious that they were interested in Jaffe. Most of their questioning was about him.

Jail. Charged under the Espionage Act

SERVICE: We were taken to jail and processed in. This was very late at night. This is not much to waste time over. Processing into jail is about the same, I suppose, anywhere.

There's an account in Solzhenitsyn's First Circle of a young chap who was a foreign office guy being taken to Lyublyanka, and it's not too different from the District of Columbia jail.

Q: What did they do?

SERVICE: You're forced to strip--you take off all your clothes--shoved into a shower room, wash off thoroughly, given a one piece garment. Mine was ripped in the crotch, and I said, "Can't I get another one?" "You better take it. It gets pretty cold up there in the cell block, ha, ha, ha." You know, this sort of thing. The attitude of the people in these places is pretty chilling.

You're put into a cell. You've got a blanket and a mattress, absolutely nothing else in there. They won't let you have a belt or anything like that. This was very late at night by the time this was all finished.

The next morning they took me down to finish the processing, which they hadn't been able to do the night before because the photographers weren't on duty, and I had to be photographed.

By then the jailers were very much interested because the daily papers had come out, big spread, pictures. "Hey, you pretty big guy, huh? What d'ya think of this? Must be hot stuff."--sort of attitude.

You asked a while ago about how I felt: I think that the period in jail, especially when I woke up the next day, was very, very depressing because you felt so completely disgraced. You know, how could one possibly come back from this sort of public degradation? I was pretty low.

I wanted to telephone, but the official rule is that you can only telephone your immediate family. Caroline was in California. I saw no point in trying to phone her. Apart from your immediate family, you can phone a lawyer.

I didn't know a lawyer, so, they said, "Here's a list." They've got a list that they give you. These are lawyers who presumably are interested in taking care of people in on larceny or burglary charges or routine things. But, I didn't want any of these lawyers. I wasn't going to call up just a lawyer blind. My case was not the ordinary run-of-the-mill criminal case that most of these guys were used to handling.

By afternoon my sister-in-law--My younger brother's wife was in Washington. He was in Moscow. She had had a hard time in Moscow. The kids had been sick and there was no satisfactory housing. They had come back to Washington just shortly before.

She had gotten in touch with people in the State Department and they in turn had talked to the former judge of the U.S. Court for China, Judge [Milton John] Helmick, who was in Washington. They had arranged bond and that evening, that night actually--I was only in there one full day--I came out.

The next day I had to go around and talk to the bondsman who was a black man, very pleasant guy. He wanted to meet me, apparently, and get some sort of an opinion of how good a risk I was.

Q: That's unusual, I think.

SERVICE: Well, maybe. Maybe he wasn't used to handling espionage. After all, you see, I was charged under the Espionage Act, which is silly because none of us were accused of espionage really. But there wasn't any other act apparently that could be used.

Using the Espionage Act, of course, gave the Chinese Kuomintang press a field day because they cheerfully and loudly printed that I was a Japanese agent, Japanese spy.

No Help from the State Department

Q: What sort of help did you get from the State Department?

SERVICE: None at all. The State Department was almost immediately subjected to a lot of criticism. Roth had a book in the press which was critical of State Department policy on Japan. Roth represented the American left, which thought we ought to get rid of the Japanese emperor because he was a war criminal, had certainly been involved in decisions and couldn't be absolved of all responsibility.

Grew was the other side. We must preserve the emperor as an institution that will help hold the country together.

Jaffe was also sort of left. He was Communist or very close to the Communists. He was a very good friend of Earl Browder, who was the leader of the American Communist party during the war.

Gayn generally was considered liberal.

At any rate, the liberal press, New Republic, which was a newspaper in New York then, Washington Post, Irving Stone, even Winchell and a lot of the columnists, felt that the Amerasia case was politically motivated, the whole thing. And they had good cases--precedents--where classified material had been made available to people like Ernest Lindley who spoke for the State Department point of view.

There was a famous case at this time of Lindley having written some article in Harper's or Atlantic Monthly based entirely on classified State Department materials that were made available to him.

I think Grew was the acting secretary at this time for a short while. James F. Byrnes may have been out here at the UN meeting and Grew was therefore acting in Washington. At the first press conference, Grew made some remark, "Well, it's really nothing to fuss about. We heard a noise out in the chicken coop, so we just went out there and caught the fox."

Q: The fox being you?

SERVICE: Yes, I and the others. So, at any rate, I went around to the State Department and asked to see somebody and of course, couldn't see Grew, but I saw somebody in the Secretary's office. I said, "Look, I object to this sort of statement. It's prejudging the case." The man looked as though he'd seen a ghost. He said, "You mean, you're not guilty?"

I said, "Of course, I'm not guilty. I'm going to be cleared, and it is very foolish of the State Department to make this kind of statement."

The State Department discontinued [chuckling] such statements.

Choice of a Lawyer: No Common Cause with the Other Defendants

SERVICE: At any rate, to go back to the account, Judge Helmick had made some inquiries, and he'd heard of a man named [Richard Strobach] Munter.

I went around to see Munter. He was very confused by the whole thing, just as the FBI people were confused. They couldn't understand why I had all these Communist materials, why I was interested in Communists, why I was dealing with Communism, and all the rest of it. He couldn't understand all the ramifications of the case. It seemed very complicated to him. He'd never had anything like this. But, he agreed to handle it on a contingency basis. I had to pay him $2,000 down, which my mother loaned me, as I recall. He made the various appearances that were necessary--you plead not guilty and so on--appearances in court.

Then we waited for a grand jury. The government took it to a grand jury that was about to expire and then withdrew it for reasons we don't really know. They may have had some problems in the case.

In this early period, I was angry. I felt that my career had been ruined. It just didn't seem to be possible that I could come back into the State Department disgraced. I was thinking about resigning, about taking a job as a newspaper man. The New York Post was interested in my working for them.

I went up to New York. Larry Salisbury had just retired from the State Department. He was working for the IPR in New York. I went there. I saw lots of friends in New York, people that had been in China, Epsteins and other people--Gunther Stein was in New York--and talked to a lot of people.

Some of the other people in the case wanted to get in touch with me, wanted to work together. The Field papers, P.M. and the Chicago Sun, I think it was, owned and operated then by Marshall Field who was quite a liberal guy, supplied a lawyer and took over the defense for Gayn because Gayn was writing for them.

They offered to take on my defense, but I thought I'd better not make common cause with any of these other people, just do it on my own.

I had talked to Currie and people like that who were much concerned, Vincent, in the State Department. I had talked to a lot of Foreign Service friends, and they urged me--and it began to sort of sink in--to calm down and to fight the thing out, since I was innocent of anything beyond indiscretion, which was not an uncommon kind of indiscretion. They convinced me that I would win and be able to continue and the public impression would be much better than resigning.

So this was what I finally did. Currie urged me to talk to a man named Corcoran, "Tommy the Cork," who was a very good friend of his. All these people were New Dealers together. It ended up with Corcoran actually as my lawyer, unofficially, with Munter the front man.

I've got a long memorandum here that I had to write in '51 for the lawyers which we'll put in the record. I don't see any point in my repeating a lot of it. (On deposit in The Bancroft Library.)

These are actually two memoranda that I wrote in early 1951. This first one gives a more detailed account of what I was doing after the arrest, and it leads into the Currie-Corcoran contact, Currie putting me on to Corcoran and Corcoran taking over. The second one completes it and goes into specific detail about my relations with Corcoran.

Links Between the FBI, "Mary" Miles, and Tai Li: An Early Collaboration to Prepare Jack as Scapegoat for America's "Loss of China"

Q: Now, more than thirty years later, have you arrived at a judgment as to why you were picked as the prime culprit for American's so-called loss of China?

SERVICE: Yes. The Chinese were looking for a scapegoat after the Stilwell affair blew up in their face. They'd had it in for me for various obvious reasons.

But there is also, an FBI angle in here that I think--I can't prove it--but I think is quite clear. I've mentioned the Sino-American Cooperative Organization, SACO which was a navy and Chinese secret service, Tai Li, operation. The Chinese wanted to get police instructors, instructors in police methods. They had had this from the Germans, but after Pearl Harbor the Germans had finally departed. So the Chinese wanted whatever the Americans could offer.

"Mary" Miles was quite proud of the fact that he had FBI cooperation. I don't know whether these people were on leave, but he always spoke of them as FBI people working in his outfit, supposedly on police methods, police training. The Chinese Communists say that they were also instructors in methods of torture. There were FBI people there.

According to "Mary" Miles, they taught things like poisons, drugs, and God knows what secret means of murder like we've heard about the CIA trying to use against Castro. "Mary" spoke about this quite freely in his talks with American government officials as one of the advantages of his arrangement.

There was a lot of opposition among Americans and also among Chinese to collaboration of this type with Tai Li. Stilwell was opposed, and Wedemeyer was opposed to it. Stilwell told me once that Marshall had told him you just had to quit fighting it because Admiral [Ernest Joseph] King had put his foot down, insisting that the navy was going to have a piece of the action. So there was nothing we could do about the "Mary" Miles--

Q: King?

SERVICE: Admiral King was the chief of naval operations. He was the opposite number of George C. Marshall who was the head of the army.

I had written quite a number of memos about Chinese hatred of Tai Li and the political dangers in our collaboration, some for Wedemeyer and some for Stilwell. I had been asked about this by Jaffe, and I had mentioned something about it. Jaffe knew about it.

Jaffe's telephone was tapped, and the FBI certainly knew about my view, my criticism of the association with Tai Li. But, the interesting thing is that never, in all the accusations and interrogations, has anything of this surfaced.

It's a suspicious fact because the FBI leaked all sorts of things to friendly newspaper people and to friendly people like the counsel for the minority in the Tydings hearings. But this has never leaked, and the fact that it hasn't leaked makes me suspicious.

The FBI told the Department of Justice within a week of my return from China--or I think on the very day I returned from China--that they had solved the Amerasia case and were willing to have it taken to court. This was before I'd ever met Jaffe. When I stumbled into this, I think they obviously wanted to have me included.

In the Tydings hearings, the Department of Justice was asked about my inclusion in Amerasia or the timing, and they made sort of a lame excuse: "Well there was information indicating contacts, and ninety percent of cases are solved after arrest by confession." So, they thought it was worthwhile to arrest me. But they admit themselves that the case against me was very weak.

When Hurley resigned later on [November 26, 1945], he made various accusations about my giving my reports to the Chinese Communists. He and other people spread reports about my contacts with Chinese women and so on, particularly Zhou En-lai's secretary, as I mentioned before.

It wasn't until Hurley agreed to testify in the Davies case in 1953 that we discovered that he'd been fed forged materials by Tai Li, forged materials supposed to be notes between me and Teddy White, who was the Time man, setting up meetings to discuss opposition to Hurley and how we could get Hurley recalled, things like this. These were forged notes. No such meetings took place and no such notes were ever exchanged.

I don't think that Tai Li--who insisted that Hurley not show these to anyone else and then return them to him--I don't think that Tai Li's people, Chinese, were up to doing this in a very convincing way. I think they undoubtedly had cooperation.

Q: From the FBI?

SERVICE: From the FBI people or from "Mary" Miles' people who were with the FBI people. I think that the fact that my sister-in-law picked up this story from a wife of a Chinese embassy person that I was going to be in trouble, indicates there was collaboration very early on.

Q: When did she pick this up?

SERVICE: It was before my arrest, some time before my arrest.

Q: Did she alert you?

SERVICE: No. I didn't hear about it until later.

Q: Why was that?

SERVICE: Because I don't think anyone thought anything of it. It was lady gossip, that sort of thing. I think that it is obvious that there was collaboration between the FBI, navy and Justice.

When I was in Japan at the end of '45, Wedemeyer came through, going from China to the States for consultation. He wanted to get hold of me and John Emmerson who'd been out in China. He was very friendly and told us that he'd written commendations for us. I think we already knew about the commendations. But he'd also put in to get us a medal which the army can give to civilians for meritorious actions.

When he came back from the States he did not see us. The only person he saw was a man named [Max] Bishop whom he'd known in Southeast Asia Command. Bishop had been in Ceylon, political adviser down there. He told Bishop--I didn't know this from Bishop directly; I only know it second hand from somebody that Bishop told it to--that Wedemeyer had seen J. Edgar Hoover and had been told by J. Edgar that they had evidence that Service was a Communist but they couldn't prove it in court.

Hoover obviously had a great interest in the case. One of McCarthy's favorite lines was that Hoover had said there was a hundred percent air tight case "against Service." Well, when we pinned Hoover down--he never would reply directly--but he replied through the Department of Justice, he said he'd never made such a statement. This was a statement that I think very obviously he had made or FBI people had made.

All this is not really answering why I was arrested, but describing maybe how it happened. I think unquestionably FBI interest in the case was prompted by FBI cooperation with the Chinese secret police under Tai Li.

Then, Fulton Lewis apparently also picked up something; he was broadcasting then for Mutual Broadcasting Company. This was before the big days of TV, and he was a very popular radio news broadcaster then. Mutual, I think, was very worried about the broadcast. They got in touch apparently with Corcoran. This was why these memos were written, to try to get the record straight.

We have a transcript of the broadcast which we had in advance. My interlineations are where he departed from the actual script. He adds a word here and there with a very, you know, accented, sarcastic tone. He makes it a much more lively document orally than it appears in the cold print.

Q: How did you get an advance copy?

SERVICE: Because Mutual got in touch with Corcoran. Corcoran talked, I think, to Mutual, and the script was more or less agreed on. I'm sure it was not as libelous as it originally was. Also, it does not reveal the fact, the obvious fact, which was that the FBI was tapping telephones. I don't know how many phones. But, the original accusation in the Fulton script would have involved the attorney general of the United States in giving information about the case to Corcoran.

State Department Security Entirely in FBI Hands

Q: Were you aware at the time that your phone was tapped? You say, "of course" now.

SERVICE: Yes, we assumed by this time that we were tapped.

Q: I'm speaking about '45.

SERVICE: Forty-five, yes. After the arrest we assumed we were tapped.

Q: But, before the arrest--

SERVICE: No, we didn't--no. I had no feeling of threat or of anything wrong at all. After my arrest, then everybody in the State Department assumed their phone was tapped. Everyone in FE assumed their phone was tapped.

Q: Do you now, and did you then--sounds like a pickup of the McCarthy style speech--bitterly resent the lack of support you got from the State Department?

SERVICE: Oh, no.

Q: I'm sorry. That was a loaded question. I'd rather rephrase it. It's unimaginable to me that you'd be thrown to the dogs in that way.

SERVICE: Well, the State Department was completely unorganized for anything. They had no security division or security section. They had one man who was sort of liaison with the FBI and a couple other agencies, who was in charge. They just left security entirely up to the FBI.

The FBI apparently suspected everyone in FE, or practically everyone in FE, because in their eyes the whole State Department policy of being agreeable to collaboration, cooperation with Chinese Communists, was just crazy. It was one that they couldn't fathom.

I don't think that anyone at the top of the State Department kept in touch with what was going on or realized what the FBI action was going to lead to. [John Carter] Vincent was head of FE and he was, I think, under suspicion just as the rest of us were.

The security liaison, a fellow named Lyon, just left everything in the hands of the FBI.

I certainly resented the Grew statement which I protested, about the fuss in the chicken coop and catching the fox. Nothing like that happened again. Well, one might say the State Department could have warned me, but I think once things were started, why, there wasn't very much they could have done. If they had known more at the top, they might have educated the guy at the bottom as to what was going on.

I acted in a completely unbureaucratic manner. I was talking to people, very freely and frankly, talking outside the State Department. I loaned reports. They weren't from the files. They were my own reports. This was all a little bit irregular. I obviously felt that I had authority to discuss things with the press, which I had had in China but didn't really have in Washington. It had never been clarified, how much authority I had in Washington to behave in the way I was behaving.

We had already reached a point, as I said, in the Department of having a debate as to what policy should be, whether we should try to maintain a neutral position in China. Some of us were already talking fairly freely that we were backing the wrong horse if we got behind the KMT.

China Policy: State Department in Ignorance of the Yalta Agreement for Four months

Q: The Yalta agreement was February 11, 1945. According to the resume that appears in the Tydings hearings, the Chinese Communists did not learn about it until much later.

SERVICE: Yes, I'm sure they didn't know about it until July or August. Of course, the State Department didn't know about it themselves until July. Chiang Kai-shek named a Communist member to the Chinese mission at the UN conference that established the UN. I saw them in Washington in August, early August I guess it was, and told them about Yalta. I think it was a surprise to them.

The operating people in FE did not learn about the Yalta agreements until they were on the ship going to the Potsdam Conference. Vincent was a member of the group that went with Truman to the Potsdam Conference which was July.

They had been told to prepare papers to guide the delegation's discussion on policy in the Far East. While they were on the ship, Secretary of State Byrnes came down to Vincent's cabin and, according to Vincent's account to me, threw the papers on the bed and said, "Sorry, but these are all no use," and then proceeded to tell Vincent about the Yalta agreements. This of course threw all of our thinking and planning into a cocked hat. Up to that time we'd all been operating blind, all the assumption about American neutrality in China were meaningless.

Q: What comment do you care to make on that, thirty years past the date?

SERVICE: Incredible. To keep your own operating people in ignorance is bad. But, the terrible thing was that the Yalta agreement was founded on such completely erroneous reasoning and assumptions. It was based on the idea that if we made a deal with Stalin, the Chinese Communists would very nicely and quietly go along with what Stalin told them to do, which was the exact opposite of what all of us in the field were busily reporting.

Who advised Roosevelt and how he came to the idea is still a mystery. But, it guaranteed the civil war, which was what we all had been working so hard to prevent. We knew a civil war would not only be a long, drawn out, disastrous civil war--but it would result in a Communist victory. I must say by this time some of us weren't sure that was a bad thing, but for American policy it was certainly a bad thing.

Jack Cleared Unanimously by Grand Jury on Amerasia Charges

SERVICE: Back to Amerasia. The big issue was whether or not I was to appear before the grand jury voluntarily. If you're the accused and volunteer to appear before the grand jury, you waive all rights, all immunity, and you have no counsel present.

The lawyers were concerned because the case on the surface looked so weak that we assumed that there must be some manufactured stuff or some Chinese stuff in the background. We wanted to find out whether or not it was just what we knew about or whether there was some trap being laid.

Corcoran eventually called me and said, "Okay, everything is all right. You can go ahead." I suppose my phone was tapped, but Corcoran's phone was probably also tapped. The person who Corcoran presumably talked to was Tom Clark, who was the attorney general. This was introduced into the Tydings hearings, presumably based on leaks (or information) from FBI people.

During the McCarthy period there were two very new and popular professions that got a lot of attention, ex-Communists and ex-FBI officers. Ex-FBI people were all over the map and providing all sorts of information and getting jobs as security people, becoming experts and advisers to people running blacklists and so on.

Robert Morris, the minority counsel for the Tydings committee, obviously had information that some sort of--information, I used the wrong word--some accusation, some sort of a fix, was put in. So, he interrogated me in the hearings.

Q: Jack, at this point I think that I would like to ask you--because I realize that we're only at the beginning of your loyalty hearings--what were the forums and dates of your various judicial and legislative and administrative hearings?

SERVICE: The easiest way to answer that is to simply insert here a list that I prepared for my lawyer, Mr. [Charles Edward] Rhett, at one point.

Q: Good. As far as I can recall, the only case in which there was a jury of ordinary people was the grand jury in the Amerasia case. How did you feel about presenting your case--and I know you appeared voluntarily--before ordinary, non-specialist people?

SERVICE: [chuckling] Nineteen forty-five is quite a long time ago. Actually I didn't have a chance to present my case. I submitted myself for questioning--is really what it amounted to. The Department of Justice attorney, in other words the equivalent of a prosecuting attorney, asked me various questions about my involvement with Jaffe and the other people, but primarily Jaffe. These were all facts that had pretty well been gone over. I was repeating some of the material that had been in my statement that I gave to the FBI, which I assumed the grand jury had. They obviously were familiar with the general circumstances of the case.

Then the foreman of the grand jury took over and asked some questions. This was not especially hostile. It was not particularly difficult questioning because it related to fairly recent events, and as I say, it had been gone over.

Then the foreman and some of the other members of the grand jury asked some questions about relations between people in my position, the government, and the press, particularly when they had information, as I did, about developments in foreign countries the press people couldn't get to, get direct knowledge of.

It was a fairly friendly--friendly is too strong a word--non-hostile meeting. It was what, twenty people. I don't remember the composition now really, but it was just sort of a cross section. They were neither friendly nor unfriendly I think, certainly not out to get me. It lasted--it's hard to say now whether it was an hour or two hours. It wasn't a terribly long hearing.

I think I mentioned the fact that I'd had a son born that morning, and that I hoped that it was going to be a good day for me. They sort of laughed in a friendly way.

Of course, the Senate committee was quite a different matter. That was divided very strongly. The Tydings committee was two Republicans one of whom, Hickenlooper, was very unfriendly, and three Democrats who generally were on my side I felt.

You had two counsel, one majority counsel who was inclined to try to develop the case in a way that was favorable to you, and a minority counsel who was vicious. He was later the man who was the committee counsel in the IPR hearings, Robert Morris. He was obviously being fed information by the FBI and any place else he could get rumor or gossip and scandal.

Q: We can talk about that later as we get to that.

The Family's Reaction

Q: What was your family's response to these events? You've described your reaction to your arrest as total disgrace.

SERVICE: The family didn't accept that. I think all of our spirits picked up pretty much when, as I say, a large section of the press, including the Washington Post, the New York Herald Tribune, and so on, became critical of the way the whole case had been handled, the way it seemed to be politically motivated, to silence critics and so on.

My mother never faltered. I've got correspondence which I think we can put in as papers. We don't need to have them all in the record here. Caroline was obviously distraught. She came on to Washington fairly soon from Berkeley. I'd already gotten a house. I think we were waiting for the children to finish school. She had her baby the day that the first [atomic] bomb dropped and the grand jury met. And the day that the grand jury decision was announced was the day that the Japanese announced they were willing to surrender.

Q: You certainly were upstaged by a number of enormous international events.

SERVICE: I forget how I got news of this. The minority counsel on the Tydings committee tried to make something out of it, that I heard it from the Department of Justice. I'm sure I didn't hear it from the Department of Justice--it was probably from one of my lawyers, Munter probably. I was downtown and walked around to the Washington Post--I knew the Washington Post people quite well; they were friendly--and went in to see Herb Elliston the editor. He had been in China in the early days--a lot of newspaper people had wandered to the Far East and worked on English language papers in China or in Japan.

I said, "It's just my luck that the grand jury clears me on a day that all the front page will be about Japanese surrender." He said, "Don't worry, you'll be on the front page," and so I was, in a small story.

Pro Forma Probation and a Posting to Japan

SERVICE: The Department then was confronted with having to do something about me. I was asked to appear before something called the Foreign Service Personnel Board, which doesn't meet very often, but is supposed to handle disciplinary cases.

I think they were a little embarrassed. The man who was running it, Julius Holmes, who was I think partly responsible for the way the thing was handled in the State Department--in other words in accepting the idea that all of FE was under suspicion--he said, "Service, you certainly violated this regulation." He showed me a regulation about criticism to newspaper people of officials of friendly governments.

This was a regulation that had been passed during the 1939-'40 years when a lot of Americans were unhappy about American neutrality and very critical of the Nazis. This had been put in the regulations then to stop Americans sounding off about Hitler openly.

I said, "Yes, of course, I violated this." They said, "We'll have to put you on probation." The time was limited. Maybe it was six months.

Then, they said they'd send me to a European post. I said I thought it would be a mistake to send me to a European post since the Chinese Kuomintang papers had made such a field day out of this thing, accused me of being a Japanese spy. I thought that it would be wise of the Department to send me to a place in the Far East, although everyone realized I couldn't go back to China where I would be persona non grata.

So, they said they'd think about that, and in a few days they asked if I'd be interested in going to Tokyo with George Atcheson. He had indicated he'd be willing to have me. I was very pleased. George was being sent as State Department representative with MacArthur. So I went out to Japan with George to be his executive officer, his number two.

Washington Post Editorial: Accused with Maximum Publicity; Cleared with No Publicity

SERVICE: Before that though, Elliston of the Washington Post had called up and asked me to drop by. He asked me what the State Department had done--this was about August 20. I said that I'd been reinstated, I'd gone back to work, and that I had received a letter, I think, from Byrnes and from Grew.

He said, "By God, I think that we ought to say something about this. There's been no publicity." I said, "I'm not sure that I can release these letters to the press." He said, "Don't worry. We'll take care of it."

The next day he had an editorial, quite a nice editorial about doing something about people that get accused with a lot of publicity but cleared with no publicity.

I went down to see Ben Cohen who was regarded as a friend of Currie's. I said that it seemed to me that the State Department ought to let me release the letters from Byrnes and Grew. He said, "Don't do anything. I'll take care of it." This was Ben Cohen who was another one of the New Deal crowd that had come into Washington with Roosevelt in the 30's, been a big figure in the early days and close associate of Corcoran's.

The next day at the Secretary of State's press conference these two letters were given out as a press release. You can have them if you want them, but they've been printed in many places. So then I was officially reinstated.

Q: Clean as a whistle?

SERVICE: Clean as a whistle. All right now--I had an odd footnote to that though. [chuckling] Late in August, before I went to Japan, I happened to be in FE when Grew, who was resigning, came around to say his farewells. Of course, he was an FE man originally himself, a Far East man.

I was a little bit embarrassed. I felt this was maybe not the place to be. But everybody was sort of falling in line, so I fell into the tail of the line. Grew was coming along, shaking people's hands. But somehow before [chuckling] Grew got to me, he just changed his direction and went off. Apparently he didn't want to shake my hand!

Q: Embarrassed?

SERVICE: I don't know what was in his mind, but we didn't have our meeting at any rate.

Various things happened during my arrest period that were sort of interesting. I don't know whether they're worth mentioning or not.

Stilwell was then out in Okinawa. He'd taken over command of the Tenth Army when commanding General [Simon Bolivar, Jr.] Buckner was killed. His family had me around for breakfast to show solidarity and support.

The Chinese Communists had a member in the delegation that came to the San Francisco UN conference. It was Tung Pi-Wu, an old friend of mine. He was accompanied by Ch'en Chia-K'ang. The delegation came to Washington from San Francisco. Linebarger, who had been in Chungking but was now back here, arranged a supper for them. Some of us who'd been in Chungking came to the supper. I went around also and saw them in their hotel.

When we came out of the room, out of their room in the Raleigh Hotel--a rather rundown hotel in Washington--as soon as we came out of the room, two men came out of another room, a few doors down the hall. It was so obvious--came out and waited for the elevator with us because they were obviously seeing who it was. It's just a very obvious FBI tactic.

I had become more accustomed to the FBI at this time. The FBI used to tail me for a while. Eventually I think they gave up tailing me, but we assumed that our phone was tapped always.

Q: Were you ostracized, cut, et cetera, by people other than Grew who wouldn't shake your hand?

SERVICE: Not at all. This was a big surprise. As I said, my first feelings were that this is a terrible, terrible disgrace, to be arrested on espionage charges. The Vietnam War objectors got used to going to jail. It became sort of a badge of honor. But, under those circumstances, it felt like an unmitigated disgrace.

But I remember Vincent introduced me to Dean Acheson, who was assistant secretary at that time I think. Acheson joked about it, "Well, you don't look like such a dangerous man."

I had lunch at the Metropolitan Club with Mortimer Graves, who was the secretary of the American Council of Learned Societies, and he was very much interested. He became treasurer of a legal fund that was started to raise a little money to pay costs.

I don't recall anybody, except people like Dooman and a few Japan types, who seemed to treat me as a leper. Most of the people carried on as normal.

While Out on Bail, Served as Expert Consultant to the Pentagon on Report on the Chinese Communists SERVICE: One interesting experience. An officer over in the Pentagon called me. He was Wedemeyer's man in the Operations Department, OPD, in the Pentagon. Colonel Lincoln, "Abe Lincoln" he was called. He said, "We've got a big report here," and showed me two big volumes that had been prepared by their research people. They had a big research shop in the Pentagon working on China.

He said, "We've got a summary here that's been prepared. We think it's pretty good, and Wedemeyer thinks it's pretty good, and we'd like you to look it over."

I started looking at the summary and things began to seem odd, mentions of "Soviet-type this and that." So I went back to the basic stuff, and a distortion was clear.

Q: This was an account of what?

SERVICE: An analysis of the Chinese Communists.

It had been prepared by the research people in Washington. It was based primarily on our reporting from Yenan, not only mine but all the other army and OSS people sending in reports, various reports from other sources. It was a huge compilation of stuff, as complete information as they could get on Chinese Communists.

Then, the summary had been prepared, I believe, by a man who had lived in China, a naturalized American--originally a Swede--who'd been a free lance newspaperman. He was violently anti-Communist, and wrote his summary on the line that the Chinese Communists were complete appendages, stooges, of the Russian Communists, following the Russian line and methods and model.

I said, "Can I sit down for a while?" He gave me a desk. So I wrote out very hurriedly, some contrasts between what was said in the summary and what was said in the basic report and said, "The summary isn't worth a damn. It's written by someone who is so prejudiced that he just can't see straight."

Lincoln was quite surprised by this. Apparently, from what I heard later on, from people who worked in MIS (Military Intelligence Section), the thing was squashed. It was later on rewritten and published by [Lyman] Van Slyke at Stanford just a few years ago, thirty years or so after the event. (Lyman Van Slyke, The Chinese Communist Movement; a Report of the United States War Department, July, 1945, Stanford, Stanford University Press, 1968.)

It seemed odd that here I was, you know, on bail, awaiting grand jury hearings, but the Pentagon still was willing to accept my views!

NORMAL FOREIGN SERVICE CAREER RESUMES, 1945-1950

MacArthur's Japan: Separate Communications Mean Separate Accommodations: Mitsui Bank Building, the Directors' Suites

SERVICE: Atcheson went out to Tokyo as political adviser. An old friend from China, Reynolds, who'd worked with Pan American, was then working with the Navy, helping to operate the Navy Transportation Service, NATS. Reynolds found out that Atcheson and I were going through, and persuaded us to go NATS; it was very nice. [laughter] They were very good to us.

At any rate, we went out and landed at Yokosuka, across the bay from Tokyo. We were flown across in a small three-seater plane, as I recall, over the bay. It was not long after the surrender, and all the navy was there. The whole U.S. navy, and the Japanese navy and the Australian and the British navies, joined, were all lined up there in Tokyo Bay. It was a terrific sight.

Anyway, we landed in Tokyo and our first call was, of course, on MacArthur. He was very cordial, very pleasant. He had refused to have various other State Department people. He'd refused Grew. Then Dooman thought he would get the job, but MacArthur didn't want Dooman.

He'd accepted Atcheson partly, I think, because Atcheson was a particularly well known person, was not going to grab the limelight; and perhaps also because Atcheson was not a Japan man, would not therefore presume to advise MacArthur as an old expert. At any rate, he was cordial.

The question finally came down to communications. MacArthur was very sensitive about any outside people operating under him. He insisted on having control. Our instructions were that we were to have our own communications with the State Department.

If we'd had army communications we would have to send all our communications to the War Department. We were supposed to have our own communications sent direct to the State Department. MacArthur said, "Then you can't be in our office here. You can't be in our headquarters. You'll have to be separate."

We were told to contact the headquarters officer concerned with requisitioning Japanese buildings. John Emmerson was there by that time. He was joining us. We checked the list of buildings and found out the Mitsui main bank building hadn't been taken over. John said, "Why, that's a good building." We went over there. Most of Tokyo was flattened by the bombing and fires.

We went to the Mitsui main bank building, an imposing granite building, went in, found the building custodian--he was bowing and scraping--and said we required some space. He started showing us around downstairs.

I said, "Wait a minute. Have him bring us the blueprints," all this through an interpreter. He found the building blueprints. I said, "Where are the directors' offices?" Seventh floor. So I said, "We'll go to the seventh floor first." We went up. Beautiful paneled offices, each one about twenty-five by twenty-five or thirty by thirty. I said, "This is the space we'll take." The army was furious about it later on. [laughter]

At any rate, we set up shop. The army gave us some clerical personnel. The State Department was finding various people that lived in Japan, that had worked in Japan, some Foreign Service officers.

We had to handle a lot of Nisei Americans who'd been trapped during the war and had American citizenship. They'd been born in the States. We set up a consulate in Yokohama which handled those cases.

I won't go into a lot of detail about the work there. It was not terribly important. John Emmerson was there and worked with the government section of the headquarters, keeping in touch with all the new political parties that were starting up. All the political prisoners were released from jail. It was a very exciting time to be in Japan.

Herb Norman represented the Canadian interest there. He was a wonderful scholar, famous scholar on Japan, Meiji Japan.

Max Bishop, Volunteer Aide to the FBI, Photographs Jack's Memos to Acheson

SERVICE: I've already mentioned the Wedemeyer visit and his return. Bishop, who was the man he talked to when he came back, was a State Department man on Acheson's staff from very soon after our office was set up. Bishop was mostly interested in exploring events before Pearl Harbor.

He had been in the State Department in 1941 when they were trying to work out a modus vivendi, when there was talk of Konoye meeting Roosevelt someplace in the Pacific and having a talk. The U.S. named Konoye as a war criminal.

Bishop was furious about this and he became very much wrapped up in trying to prove that we could have averted the war by doing something else in '41. So he wasn't very helpful in the office.

Eventually, after talking to Wedemeyer, he asked one of the army GIs who was working in our office, to bring him documents on which I had made notations. I was executive officer, there was a tremendous lot of material passing through, and to save Acheson reading everything, I would make notations or call his attention to things I thought he ought to see.

Bishop got this GI, who was sort of chief clerk, to bring these notes to him. Then he took them out of the office and was having them photographed by the local secret service people, apparently as a volunteer helper for the FBI.

Q: Why?

SERVICE: I think his motivation was mostly patriotic: it was also jealousy. Some of the Japan people in the State Department felt eclipsed by the fact that China men (Vincent, Acheson) had been given the top jobs--even relating directly to Japan. The Japan men seemed excluded. Acheson was China. I was China.

Bishop was particularly bitter. He and I had both been leading our class all the way through. Recently, with a double promotion, I had gone ahead of him. I don't know that this was one of his motives.

Q: Did he believe you to be a Communist or Communist sympathizer?

SERVICE: I don't know. He certainly believed me to be either a Communist dupe or Communist sympathizer, one or the other.

Hurley Resigns, Blasting Service and Acheson: The Press Interrupt a Foreign Service Celebration

SERVICE: In late November the press called the office one day about a flash that had just come over the wire that Hurley had resigned. I went in and told George about it.

Some way or another we had gotten some whiskey. MacArthur wouldn't allow whiskey to be brought into Japan because shipping space was scarce. George had complained about this in the hearing of the "principal naval officer present," whatever the title is, in the dining room at the Imperial Hotel. We lived in the Imperial Hotel, George and I, which was limited to chiefs and executive officers of staff section.

Anyway, soon after that, a case of whiskey, I.W. Harper, was delivered to George's door! For safekeeping we had taken some of this down to the office. We had the whole floor, with all the directors' offices, including the vault. So we had it in the vault.

Without saying anything more, I just went down the hall to the vault and got a bottle of whiskey and brought it up to George's office. The rest of the staff by that time had assembled to join in the excitement. We had some paper cups and were just having good slugs of whiskey when suddenly the press was at the door, because by this time they had gotten more news about Service and Acheson--For instance, they were the principal culprits accused by Hurley in his letter of resignation.

Q: Accused of--?

SERVICE: Working with the Communists, opposing American policy and telling the Communists that he didn't represent American policy. Also working with the imperialists and so on and so on.

It's a long blast, a famous blast. There's a whole section in U.S. Foreign Relations for 1945 on the Hurley resignation, which they decided was worthy of handling separately, pages 722 to 744. This contains a lot of telegrams that George sent off.

Poor George was frantic. Well, it was his first experience with anything like this. Also, he was much more at stake. He was already at the top. He was designated as ambassador to Thailand. He was temporarily in Japan before going on to his post. I think he saw his whole career being shattered.

At any rate, I wrote the State Department a long message answering Hurley's charges which again, I suppose, we can make reference to. It's page 733 to 738 of U.S. Foreign Relations, 1945, volume 7.

Q: Did you feel dangerously threatened by this?

SERVICE: No, I don't think so. It seemed to be just a venomous kick from a senile, old fool. It seemed so incredible.

I had come through the Amerasia case and been cleared. Hurley had been frustrated that I hadn't been fired in the Amerasia case, and of course he had failed in China.

By this time the two parties in China were squaring off at each other. Hurley's attempts to bring about a peaceful settlement right after the signing of the Russian-Chinese treaty at the end of the war hadn't worked. What we predicted was coming true. The Chinese Communists were not going to lie down and play dead.

I felt that the Hurley letter, and its patently absurd accusations, was something that would be taken care of fairly soon. The Senate Foreign Relations Committee did hold hearings. Hurley did make a fool of himself. They discontinued the hearings because he couldn't make any case at all.

The hearings were buried until a few years ago when Fulbright dug them out and reprinted them as being of new and timely interest after the Nixon visit [1972] was announced. Up to that time it was sort of collector's item since it had existed only in transcript form.

Caroline was at the hearings. The official reporter was so interested that she was the wife of one of the men being accused that he gave her a copy of the transcript. That was quite a gift because you pay by the page for those things. Jack [George] Kerr brought it out to me in Tokyo.

Washington: Promotion to Class II, and Appointment to Foreign Service Selection Board, 1948

SERVICE: You asked about whether I thought the future was okay. In April, 1948 I was promoted to class II. I'd been put on a sort of probation, the pro forma punishment that was given me in 1945. Promotion meant that this had been disposed of. A promotion put me in a very conspicuous spot in a way; I was the youngest man in my class, both in age and in years of service. So this was very good news.

Then, in late '48 I was ordered back to Washington for duty on the Foreign Service Selection Board. At that time they had two panels, one for senior grades, one for the junior grades.

I was to serve on the junior panel and then remain in Washington to take charge of an office called Foreign Service Planning, which was the budget and management office of the Foreign Service. The Foreign Service was then quite separate from the departmental service.

In March, '47, the President had set up the loyalty security program officially.

Q: Now, this is Truman.

SERVICE: This is Truman, executive order 9835. Already there were beginning to be rumblings of-- I think Whitaker Chambers had already started accusing people, Bentley also, and so on. But, you know, we seemed to be in the clear. The promotion seemed to seal it all, wipe out the past.

Q: You had your clearances.

SERVICE: Yes, except I didn't know about these at the time. There were forms sent out when the executive order was put in. Everyone had to fill out some forms. I've got my memo that I circulated to the office staff, instructing them all to fill out [chuckling] these forms and send them in. In fact I've got my own form. It was completely innocuous, you know.

Q: So, you were cleared in '46, and '47, and again in '49.

SERVICE: That we know of. This is all put together from testimony that State Department people have given in various committees, because appropriations committees almost yearly later on began to ask them for this sort of information. McCarthy made a great deal of, "How many times have you cleared this man?"

The selection board was to meet in early January. As I recall, I flew direct to Washington because I had to stay in Wellington until my successor arrived. Caroline and the family came home by ship, and then I flew home and went direct to Washington. Caroline and the family stayed out here in California. I think the children went to school. I'm not sure, maybe not. Caroline probably has that sort of thing.

The selection board was an arduous, interesting experience.

The Scripps-Howard Press Blasts Service's Appointment to Selection Board.

SERVICE: Very soon after the board met, the Scripps-Howard papers got news of my being on the board and came out with a great blast that Service, that Amerasia character, was sitting on a board that was deciding all Foreign Service promotions and assignments. It was a very exaggerated type of thing, sensational. All this sort of stuff is in the clippings files.

I went to the administrative people and said, "Do you want me to retire from the board?" I was perfectly willing to do it. "Absolutely not! Scripps-Howard is not dictating who serves our selection boards" et cetera, et cetera. So, I carried on.

The Department was very brave about my staying on the board, but they obviously were worried. So, my assignment to the Division of Foreign Service Planning was changed. They felt it better to find an invisible job for me.

Q: Just one minute. How did Scripps-Howard find out that you were on that board? In the university this sort of committee is very, very confidential.

SERVICE: I just don't know. I don't know how it got out. Gossip, Washington is full of it. But membership of the Selection Board was not secret. There always have been superpatriots, and the State Department had its share, generally down in the clerical levels. These are the people that became McCarthy's quote, "loyal American underground."

There were some of them in personnel whom we later were able to spot. So, I would guess that that was how it got to Scripps-Howard.

Scripps-Howard had always been very fierce on the Amerasia case. They were the most violent in 1945. Gayn had a suit against Scripps-Howard and one of their specialty writers, who made a sort of a career out of the Amerasia case, a man named Frederick Woltman. It may have been Woltman who picked it up. I've forgotten.

The China White Paper: A State Department Boomerang

SERVICE: Meanwhile though, I think before we take off for India, I've got to talk about the White Paper, the China White Paper. In hindsight it's remarkable that intelligent and experienced men in the Department, people like Dean Acheson and so on, had so little realization of what a hot topic China was. They should have known, because China had been a hot topic since '45, and all through the Chinese civil war--the civil war had been going on--the Department had been under tremendous pressure.

Before Truman was elected [1948], and then particularly after Truman was elected, he was bitterly attacked. The critics charged, "We're letting China go down the drain."

By the summer of '49, it was apparent that [Kuomintang] China was finished. All through the civil war we had abstained from anything which could be interpreted as being critical of the central government, Chiang Kai-shek. We couldn't appear to push him out of China.

By the summer of '49, the administration had had enough of criticism. They were going to counterattack and defend themselves, prove that they had done everything they could to support Chiang, that it was not our fault that the Communists were winning. It was Chiang's own failings.

The administration decided to put out a White Paper, but they didn't foresee what the effect was going to be, how this would really boomerang, which it did.

My selection board work was finished, and Caroline and I came out to California and had some vacation.

John Davies was then serving in the Department on the first policy planning staff with George Kennan, when it really meant something, under Acheson.

John called me and said that it had been decided to add an annex to the White Paper, summarizing the views of some of us in the [China] field who had predicted what was going to happen.

Apparently the State Department wanted to have it both ways. First it hadn't done anything to push Chiang Kai-shek, and also it wasn't so stupid that it didn't know what was going on. So they decided to put in some of our field reports.

John wanted to know if I could get back to Washington and help write this annex, since we presumably knew our own reports better than anyone else. We drove rather hurriedly across the country, eliminating some of the visits we were going to make.

In Humboldt, Tennessee, on a hot Sunday afternoon we were driving down the main street of the town, and some black kids in a car coming from a side street ran right into the side of our car. It wasn't badly damaged, but had to be left there to be fixed up. I got a train and went to Washington where I put together annex 47 of the White Paper, which is reports of officers in the field. (United States Relations with China, with Special Reference to the Period 1944-1949. Department of State Publication 3573, pp. 564-576, August 1949)

I would have been happier, maybe, if we had put in some whole reports. After discussion we decided to do it by subject: Soviet intentions, Chinese Communist background, Kuomintang disintegration, and so on.

These are all excerpts from reports that we wrote. It was accepted without change, as I recall, and was incorporated in the White Paper.

At this time, oddly enough, I was also shown a draft of Acheson's long letter of transmittal. It's really an introduction to the book. It's got Dean Acheson's name on it, but the first draft was done by a man named John Melby who had been in China after I was--he came in after I did--whom I knew quite well, who was later fired, primarily because he was the editor of this White Paper, I think. The pretext was different, but I think this was the real reason.

At any rate, I suggested that they had been unduly critical of the national government during the Kuomintang decade, '27 to '37, and I suggested that they had done some constructive things. I suggested some revisions that actually improved Chiang Kai-shek's image.

SERVICE: Oh yes.

Q: Over a thousand pages.

SERVICE: It was sensational, of course. It came out in the fall of '49. It was bitterly attacked by [Representative Walter H.] Judd and the China Lobby. It couldn't avoid criticism because it couldn't be the whole record. As big as it is, it had to omit a good deal.

I was critical of it in my Amerasia Papers because, of course, it had to protect the State Department's face in a sense. Thus it doesn't indicate that the State Department agreed with our February 26 [1945] telegram from Chungking. It prints the message, but not until later, twenty years later or more, was it revealed that the Department had sent it to the White House with commendation and support. But, perhaps that was too much to expect.

Gauss Predicts Danger for Foreign Service Officers Identified as Despatch Writers

Q: In hindsight what could have been done to protect the Department and Foreign Service officers?

SERVICE: In hindsight--Gauss was the only smart man. Gauss said to me that we made a great mistake in letting our reports be in there. [chuckling] Of course we were pleased. You know, we thought this was fine. We even thought it was good to have it on the record, to prove we were right.

But Gauss said it was a great mistake to put people in the limelight in this way by having the authorship of reports identified. He was absolutely right. This gave information and ammunition for the attacks on us. This was all used later on. It proved to a lot of people that we were the villains.

What could the State Department have done? Well, it's hard to say. I don't think that it was necessarily the wrong thing to do. The character of public opinion and the nature of the issue was something that probably couldn't be predicted, even by a wise man. I don't know if that should have stopped an attempt to clear the record.

The editors had to make some difficult decisions. They eliminated the Wedemeyer report because it recommended a trusteeship for Manchuria. This proposal would annoy and hurt the Chinese. But this allowed the report to become a mystery. Many people assumed the Wedemeyer report had recommended more aid to China, which it really didn't. The mistake was being unduly worried about the susceptibilities of the Chinese.

Maybe they should have had it done by outside people. Maybe they should have turned the material over to scholars earlier. They did eventually. They asked Feis to come in. Feis wrote a book, a privileged book, China Tangle, (Herbert Feis, The China Tangle; the American Effort in China from Pearl Harbor to the Marshall Mission, Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1953) but that was several years later. Perhaps outside people could have seemed a bit more convincing than people who obviously had a self-serving interest, as every government has--it's fairly common.

Q: There's one more question before we leave the China White Paper. Had it been made clear to you at this point or had you yourself arrived at a conclusion that because of Amerasia and because of the Communist victory in China, that you were not likely to have any further Foreign Service career associated with the Far East?

SERVICE: No. I was assigned to India, after all. No, I didn't expect to be finished in the Far East, particularly with the Kuomintang government having lost.

Q: How much active interest were you able to take in FE?

SERVICE: Oh, I didn't try to. I thought it was much better for my friends in FE for me to stay away. We still had good friends, but it was all personal.

I did have some discussions at this time on a personal basis--about Vietnam, because this was the beginning of our involvement in Vietnam, '49, whether we should supply the French. This was with a young man I had worked with in 1945.

He was a young man going out to Saigon. We had several talks. I thought it was a hopeless cause. He disagreed with me. His background was all European.

Then a younger friend of mine who had served in Chungking--not a China service officer, but an EUR man--was very anxious for me to talk to some of the people from the European area, French types, who were very anxious for us to support the French in Indochina.

They took the line, of course, that France was all-important, and this is what Acheson says in Present at the Creation. It was essential that we support the French in Indochina because we needed French support for our policies in Europe.

FE generally was anti-colonial, trying to end colonialism, and anti our involvement in Vietnam. A little later Melby, whom I mentioned, went out on a survey trip with some Pentagon types, and he recommended the same thing. But FE lost. The EUR was all-powerful in the Department at that time.

When Congress met in early January [1950], there was a leak to the press that some sort of a circular had been sent to posts in the Far East anticipating the fall of Taiwan to the Communists.

Q: The fall of Taiwan?

SERVICE: Yes. The mainland had fallen, and Chiang had fled to Taiwan, but he didn't have much to fight with. The National Security Council had decided that we had no strategic interest in holding Taiwan. We would give economic, but no military aid, to Chiang Kai-shek.

Some sort of a circular had been sent out, guidance for information purposes, that we were to minimize, not to maximize, the probable loss of Taiwan. It was not to be regarded as a disaster for American interests. Knowland, who was known as "the Senator from Formosa," jumped on it, and demanded to know who drafted it, was it Davies or was it Service?

Then McCarthy jumped in the Senate and said, "Oh well, Service is the same man that was arrested in the Amerasia case." Judd made similar noises in the House. There was a great furor for several days. The State Department refused to reveal who had drafted this memorandum. It had been approved, of course, by high people.

Q: Was it you?

SERVICE: No, of course not. I had nothing to do, as I've been saying, with anything in FE.

THE FIRING

McCarthy Opens Campaign Against "Communists in the State Department." Names John Stewart Service

SERVICE: We came out on leave in California, and then McCarthy started his speeches around Lincoln's birthday, early February, Wheeling, West Virginia. All sorts of numbers, 207, 257, 81, 57, and so on.

Q: Numbers of what?

SERVICE: Of people employed in the State Department who were Communists or pro-Communist.

Q: Or traitors.

SERVICE: Or traitors, security risks, and so on, all sorts of things. Perverts were apt to get thrown in too at that time.

Q: Perverts then meaning--?

SERVICE: Homosexuals, but they were usually called some such name, you know.

I assumed, of course, that I would be in the list. McCarthy had already attacked me on the floor of the Senate. So I went every day down to the Berkeley Public Library to see the New York Times. Senators challenged McCarthy: he couldn't just indulge in this sort of wild, random accusations. They wanted some evidence.

He said to protect the rights of people, he wouldn't give any names, but he would give some details. Then he went through eighty-one cases that he said were the real substance, the core of his accusations.

None of these eighty-one cases fitted me. I called up the State Department, called the chief of Foreign Service personnel, my old boss, the man I'd been working for. I said, "Well, what do I do? Here I am. Do I go to India or not?"

He says, [loudly] "You're not on the list. Go! Take off!"--the intimation being the sooner the better.

We were going by freighter from Seattle. As Caroline has probably said, we were in the mid-Pacific, going the great circle route from Seattle to Yokohama on our way to India. The freighter had twelve passengers. We all got friendly with the officers.

We got to know the radio operator. He had taken our son Bob, who was about thirteen at this time, up to his radio shack and the purser had given Bob a job doing this or that.

The radio operator one night at supper said, "Say, is your name John Stewart Service?" I said, "Yes." He said, "There's been a lot of stuff about you on the radio news, talking a lot about you in Washington." This was the first intimation we had. We went up and heard a news broadcast over his radio.

A day or two later I got a telegram from the Department saying I should return because of charges by Senator McCarthy. The family could either remain in Japan or go on to India.

We decided they should go on to India. We expected that there would be a hearing. We knew from the radio broadcast that a Senate committee had been set up--but something that shouldn't take long. So Caroline went on to India to get the children in school and get settled. I flew back from Yokohama.

Q: How did you feel at this point?

SERVICE: Oh, hell. We were not well informed. We didn't really know what was happening. The news broadcasts were very sketchy. Certainly annoyed, uncertain of course, about what was going on, but not particularly concerned. After all, I'd been through the Amerasia case and gotten a unanimous clean bill.

Frantic Press Conference. "I Welcome This Chance to Have an Investigation. I Have Nothing to Hide"

SERVICE: I wasn't prepared for the tremendous hullabaloo. But every place the plane stopped, the press were after me. I evaded them once by simply staying on the plane.

Q: Were they hostile?

SERVICE: Oh no. Well, not really hostile. They were just sort of pressing, and asking the same foolish questions.

Q: [laughter] Sorry.

SERVICE: You keep saying, "I welcome this change to have an investigation to clear the air. I have nothing to hide." You keep saying the same thing. And yet they pursue this at every single stop.

What surprised me was the friendliness of the people on the plane.

Q: A regular commercial plane?

SERVICE: Yes, Northwest Airlines. When we got off in Seattle, they all gave me a friendly hand clap. This was true all the way through. With one or two exceptions, you always have friendship from people that know you, even on just a sitting beside you in an airplane basis, or tradespeople, liquor store clerks you deal with-- Anytime anybody has any sort of personal relationship with you, they don't believe any of this garbage at all. They're very friendly and sympathetic.

Q: What conclusions do you draw from that, Jack?

SERVICE: You read about somebody in the paper, it's somebody far away. There's no intimacy or humanity. He's just a sort of cipher. You can believe something about somebody like that. But if you actually live next door to a person or see him, why, what you read in the papers doesn't seem to affect you.

The Department Turns Out in Force to Meet Jack's Plane

SERVICE: The Department went all out. The Department's policy was obviously to meet McCarthy head on. A big welcome was planned for me. I don't know how much planning. But, word went around, "Go out and meet Service."

The chief of personnel was out there. A lot of people I'd worked with in the Department the year before were there. Some friends in the Foreign Service were there. I think Marshall Green was there; I forget.

I came into the Department--[John E.] Peurifoy, who was the administrative head of the Department, the deputy assistant secretary for administration, or whatever the title is, he greeted me.

There was a Foreign Service lunch on-- The Foreign Service Association had monthly luncheons at that time. I wasn't planning to go. I was busy with other things, and I thought it might be an embarrassment for me to go. Donald Smith and various other people insisted I go. At the lunch I was introduced by the president of the association, who merely said, "We know nothing about Service's case, but he's got friends."

They gave me a big clap, a rising clap. McCarthy soon found out about this and made a big thing about it in the press-- Foreign Service Association members had been ordered to give Service an ovation, and so on.

I don't remember any particular accusation over Department officers meeting me; but the fact that I was given facilities and help by the Department was later criticized in the press. There was sharp criticism of any official help or assistance as favoring the accused.

Q: At that preliminary meeting was it a sort of adversary discussion to try to probe any possible weak points in your story?

SERVICE: Oh, yes. He said, "I expect you to be perfectly honest and frank." It was adversary in the sense of being probing, yes-- not antagonistic. But you expect a lawyer to really want to know the truth about the case. I didn't resent that at all.

We became very close friends, so much so that when they went to Europe a year or two later, we were designated guardians of their children in case anything should happen to them.

Speech of Senator Joe McCarthy
Wisconsin Retail Food Dealers Association
Milwaukee, Wisconsin
August 6, 1950

Then we come to John Stewart Service. Service was arrested by the FBI in connection with the theft of hundreds of secret government documents. The FBI testified they had microphones in the hotel room of Jaffe, whom they labeled as a Communist, when Service visited him. The microphone recording showed that Service discussed military secrets with this Communist while the war was still on. Service admitted having turned over to him classified State Department documents. At the time Service and his five co-defendants were arrested, J. Edgar Hoover, according to a Washington paper said, "This is a 100 percent air-tight case of espionage." But Service did not go to jail. However, Under-Secretary of State Joseph Grew who insisted he be prosecuted, left the Department. Acheson took over and service(sic) was re-hired, promoted and put in charge of placing personnel in the Far East area.

The Tydings-McMahon Committee said he was a bit indiscreet, but that it was oh so unfair to expose him.

Letter of Charges: On Salary, with Office Space and a Stenographer

SERVICE: The Department was very helpful. The board gave us a letter of charges. Do you want it?

Q: Yes, I think so.

SERVICE: You want to turn that off till I find it here?

Q: Thanks, I have it, March 24, 1950. (Encl. #1)

SERVICE: The letter of charges is not very specific, but the basic charges are there. They didn't go into detail, and they said in effect to simply answer everything derogatory that had been said about me, everything that I knew about, everything that appeared in the papers, that they wanted to clean the slate once and for all, and do an exhaustive job.

Excerpt of remarks of Herve J. L'Heureux, Chairman of the Executive Committee, Foreign Service Association, while presiding at its monthly luncheon March 19, 1950:

"I hope you have enjoyed your lunch. There is one thing we have today that is different -- Service! Yes we have Service. By this I mean John Service, who has just arrived from the Far East." (The audience applauded for more than two minutes, before the speaker could proceed). "John Service is a fellow-Foreign Service Officer. He is a colleague. He is one of us. He is a member of our Association. As such, he is a 'fraternity brother' and, as a fraternity brother, he is entitled to our affection, to our esteem, to our confidence, to our best wishes.

"I do not know whether John Service is guilty of the charges that have been made. I have not seen his record. I do not know precisely what charges have been levied. But I will say this: Until such time as the charges have been proven by a court or other body of competent jurisdiction, he is innocent. He is entitled to our respect, to our support, to our assistance. As John Service goes forth to meet one of the greatest challenges of his entire career, let us, his 'fraternity brothers', express to him our every good wish; let us pray that his cause may be righteous, that he may be given facility of expression, strength and courage to wage his defense successfully, and that the cloud that tends to despoil his honor may soon be dissipated." (At this point, the audience rose and gave John Service a tremendous applause that had in it warmth of feeling and of friendliness). Mr. L'Heureux continued:

"I just wish to say one more thing: As a body, our Foreign Service has been pretty free of scandal. We need not bow our head in shame. We are not infallible. We are human. But, man for man, I am prepared to match our Foreign Service with any organization, with any group -- on the Hill or in the valleys -- in intelligence, ability, judgment, integrity, devotion to duty, patriotism, morals and loyalty!"

Kuomintang Propaganda from Taiwan Supplied to United States Senators and Translated by Library of Congress Staff

SERVICE: About this time--in February actually I think it was--the press told us that Chinese intelligence reports from Taiwan had been supplied to some senators interested in the question of China policy--the assumption was Knowland and McCarthy--and that they were being translated for the senators by the Library of Congress.

I went up to the Library of Congress and talked to the head of the Far Eastern section, which was old Arthur Hummel [Sr.], you know, compiler of Eminent Chinese of the Ch'ing Period.

Q: Oh, sure.

SERVICE: I wanted to get either copies of the Chinese originals, or copies of the translations. He was very sorry, but the Library of Congress couldn't allow me to. It was an agency of the Senate or the Congress, and they could only work for Congress. So, it was something that he couldn't let me have. Whichever senator it was, and I assume it was McCarthy, he leaked the reports to Fulton Lewis. Then Fulton Lewis had a fine sensational series of his reports.

"Chiang Kai-shek had a wily crew of Chinese counter-intelligence agents on his payroll." It describes how they followed John Stewart Service around, and it has the silly garbage about my having an affair with Zhou En-lai's secretary. Chinese Mata Hari. It's just absolutely, absolutely ridiculous sort of stuff. Anyway, that's sort of an interesting exhibit maybe.

Q: I certainly think so.

SERVICE: I wrote some corrections and so on, but I didn't try to publish them. Nothing was ever done with them. I just pointed out the many errors and inaccuracies.

Q: To whom did you send that stuff?

SERVICE: I didn't send it to anybody. [laughing] There was no use trying to get in a public fight with J. Fulton Lewis Jr. Oh, you have a question?

Q: Yes, I had a question, Library of Congress and Arthur Hummel. Public funds, light security-- how was it that you couldn't get copies?

SERVICE: Well, this was what he said. A mission had been given to him by whatever senators were involved--he wouldn't even mention what senators it was--and therefore it was confidential. So the only thing we had was what Fulton Lewis Jr. was able to get and publish.

Q: Were you ever aware of Chiang Kai-shek's counter-intelligence following you around?

SERVICE: Oh yes, in Chungking certainly.

Q: But not in Washington?

SERVICE: No.

Q: This business of the Chinese Mata Hari, was this picked up by other press people?

SERVICE: Not at the time. No, the press ignored this. It was so silly I don't think there was very much on it. My press clippings would show. (To be deposited in The Bancroft Library.)

An Intimation of Trouble

SERVICE: About this time we got an intimation of trouble. I was talking to Tony [Fulton] Freeman, whose family I'd been living with for part of the time. Tony was in the Department.

Some American woman had come to see him in some agitation after she'd had lunch at the Chinese embassy.

By now, it had appeared in the press that Service had been cleared. The wife of the Chinese ambassador had said, "Isn't it terrible how they could clear that man Service?" Then, she went on with the story about my having an illegitimate child in China.

This woman came into the Department, rather agitated, because she wanted to be sure that the "full facts were known." She or someone else apparently also went to the FBI. So, a few days later the FBI came around to interview me.

Anyway, we wrote a long letter to the Loyalty Security Board about this whole business, pointing out absurdities in the story, the claim that Val was a Communist, and so on, and noting that the child was born seventeen months after I left China.

We told this to Caroline, but I don't think we told the children about this at this time because we didn't expect it to become public. Later on it was obvious that it was liable to become public.

When we get to the Loyalty Review Board we'll find that the Loyalty Review Board had this same story, although they never used it in the hearing. But this was very much in their minds. We got more information later on.

Q: What about standards of evidential validity, the sorts of things that lawyers are supposedly trained in doing, assessing the value of evidence?

SERVICE: I would say that the most shocking example of that was the Senate later on. I don't remember these people being so outrageous.

Q: Why, in your opinion, did Humelsine take so long perusing your record? He must have known it backwards and forwards by this time.

SERVICE: Things did keep coming up, you know. I think I mentioned before that the Loyalty Security Board would make a decision, and then there would be a new evidence. This kept happening. We had the new Chinese intelligence stuff that was put out by McCarthy through Fulton Lewis. Then, we had the Chinese embassy starting the story about my having an illegitimate child. Then, we had changes in the regulations, change in the standards, and every time, it all had to be reconsidered.

Humelsine and the State Department were in a real quandary. The Loyalty Security Board, the State Department board, cleared me, but Humelsine didn't want to have to grasp the nettle because he knew there was going to be a lot of heat. So, I think he put it off and put it off, because they really didn't know just what was going to happen if they publicly cleared me.

He couldn't give his final okay until the Loyalty Review Board had post-audited it. The system then was that the Loyalty Review Board had to post-audit. They had thrown the case back once already before. So that they had to wait for the Loyalty Review Board.

That's probably the most important reason of all really, in practical terms. He felt he couldn't make any sort of final and firm decision until the Loyalty Review Board had acted. The Loyalty Review Board was subject to these same things, the changing of standards, new evidence coming in, and so on.

Q: Do you feel that you were used as the Department scapegoat in the China matter?

SERVICE: No, I don't think so. I wasn't used as the Department scapegoat. There's just no basis for that. The Department, as I say, was pretty much on my side. The State Department at the Humelsine level, the top level, tried to cut its losses at the last minute. They weren't going to make any fight about it. But, up to that point they had stuck by me through a lot of thick and thin.

I was a scapegoat in a sense, a whipping boy-- That isn't the right word. I turned out to be an easy, vulnerable target for McCarthy and for the China Lobby and for the Kuomintang and for [Albert] Kohlberg.

Q: Then, you found for me this Saturday Evening Post article by Drew Pearson, "Confessions of an S.O.B.," 1956. How much validity do you think there was in his comment?

"Despite all my precautions I feel that I was responsible for a serious injustice being done to two government servants. One was John Service, a State Department Foreign Service officer, who was fired on the charge of being a poor security risk because he had talked to newspapermen and others. One of those newspapermen, I suspect, was I, for on at least one occasion I went to Service's apartment and talked with him about Patrick J. Hurley with whom he had served...Later, I learned that microphones had been planted in Service's apartment."

SERVICE: I talked to Pearson a good many times. As I recall that particular incident, at least what I think was that incident, he called me and came around and picked me up. Then we went riding in his car, which I assumed was caution on his part. But, it's true that if our phones were tapped, why, it was known that he called me.

But, he was simply asking about the story that Hurley and [General Robert B.] McClure had almost come to blows at some sort of a gathering in Chungking. He wanted to find out if a story which he'd already heard had any basis in it or not.

Q: Had it?

SERVICE: Yes.

Q: Had you had any opportunity to keep up your spoken Chinese?

SERVICE: No, none at all.

Q: What about your reading knowledge? Had you used Chinese material?

SERVICE: No. I had been completely away. I could still speak some Chinese. I got a 3+, which I think was a tough grade. I think I really deserved a 4, on a grading scale of 5. But, they gave me a 3+, which makes me "reasonably fluent" or something like that.

I'd had no contact with China.

We had collected all of our effects by this time. They'd been stored for years in attics of various people in Washington. We had lots and lots of books including a lot of books on China. We simply lined them up on the big front porch, lined all the books up on edge and let any friends come and help themselves. Passersby on the street would come up and say, "What's this?" Then we'd say, "Help yourself." We gave away nothing really valuable but a lot of books. Of course, I never thought I'd have any more connection with China at all at any time.

First Signs of a Change in U.S.-China Policy: Jack One of Four Americans Who Would be Welcome in China

SERVICE: About this same time, out of the blue, we got a post card from Edgar Snow from Pao-An, where he had gone in 1936 before the Communists set up their headquarters in Yen-an, and where he first met Mao Zedong.

Somehow, to get a post card from Pao-An, China, from Ed Snow seemed like a message from the moon. Of course, things were moving. That was the real reason the Eastland committee brought out the Kubek books--to try to head off any move towards China by the Nixon administration.

Nixon started in fairly promptly with gestures toward relaxing our isolation of China. First he took off the strict boycott and then raised the limit on purchases that could be made, various things like that. Travel restrictions were withdrawn. American subsidiaries abroad, foreign subsidiaries of American companies were allowed to trade with China.

On October 1, 1970, Ed Snow was invited to stand with Mao and the other leaders on Tiananmen during the national day parade. The ping-pong team invitation was a few months later. Kissinger's secret visit was in July, '71. By August, the New York Times had gotten Scotty [James] Reston into China. Reston had a marathon interview with Zhou En-lai, which was broken by an intermission for dinner. At the dinner table, there was some reference to the obvious fact that attitudes were changing from the former rigidities. It was Reston, apparently, who recalled that a number of Americans had suffered rather heavily because of their early views about the Chinese Communists. Perhaps, Reston suggested, it would be especially interesting to them to see the changes in China.

Zhou seized on the idea with his characteristic alacrity, and spontaneously mentioned four persons who would be warmly welcomed in China. "If they should wish to come." I was one of the four. The other three were John Fairbank, Owen Lattimore, and John Carter Vincent. The first I knew of this was a telephone call from somebody at the Times in New York asking what I thought about "being invited to China." The story had just come in by radio from Peking and wouldn't be appearing in the papers until the next day. I collected my wits enough to say that I indeed would like to visit China.

Q: What did you think of that?

SERVICE: I thought it was great stuff. I was very pleased, of course. I wrote to Marshall Green, who was assistant secretary for FE and asked him if the Department would have any objection, and got the answer, no objection; to the contrary, they'd be pleased if I were to go. They were obviously fostering contacts.

I then wrote to Huang Hua, an old friend, who was then the Chinese ambassador in Ottawa. Canada had already established relations with China, and he was the first Chinese ambassador in Ottawa. I wrote to him, alluding to the news story and saying that I would indeed be glad to go to China.

He wrote back saying that I was invited. I had asked for Caroline to be included, so he was happy to tell me that we were invited to be guests of the Chinese government for a month or something of this sort.

Back to China with Caroline, 1971

SERVICE: I'm not sure that we want to say a great deal about the China trip. It was a very moving experience simply to go back to China and see the changes, see what had happened, see a lot of old friends, not so many Chinese friends as foreign friends, the Adlers, Rewi Alley, people like that who stayed in China or, like Adler, had gone back to China.

The Chinese friends were most of them too old or too high up or their political health wasn't particularly good at the time. Some of them, of course, had died. My very good friend Ch'en Chia-K'ang had died, apparently of a heart attack, in a May 7 school, so I was told. Kung P'eng, the wife of Chiao Kuan-Hua, at that time deputy foreign minister, had died. Another good friend named Wang Ping-nan, who was in Chungking during the war, was apparently in a May 7 school, and unavailable.

Then the older people like Chu Teh, Tung Pi-Wu and others were simply too high or too old. I tried to see Madame Sun, but she wasn't very well, I was told, so I didn't see her.

Meetings with Zhou En-lai

Q: What about Zhou En-lai?

SERVICE: We had several meetings with Zhou En-lai, very pleasant. First was a session fairly early in October where he talked to all the Americans in China--and there were quite a group of us--and a few non-Americans brought in like Rewi Alley. I kidded him about being an honorary American.

Q: Was he from New Zealand?

SERVICE: Yes, legendary New Zealander.

We actually met first at an October 1 dinner. But after a handshake, Zhou En-lai was at a table far away; we didn't have a chance to talk to him. He and Chiang Ch'ing were up at the head table, along with others, of course.

Then we had this interview with the Americans in which Zhou picked me out and said quite a number of things to me or about me. Later on before we left China, Caroline and I were invited to a meeting with him, which happened to be just the day after the Chinese had been accepted in the UN.

I was surprised. We were about to leave, and apparently he determined that he was going to see us. So, we were crowded in although the meeting went on for, I think, almost three hours.

He didn't want to talk very much about the old times. I had hoped to get him to talk something about Hurley and that period of history I was involved in. But, he sort of brushed it aside, [saying], "That's all past. Let's talk about the present."

Q: Did you have a feeling of an old friendship renewed?

SERVICE: Very much so. He's a very warm, intent, sincere person. He remembered me very well.

That evening when the Americans were there he started thinking about who was around whom I had known. He suddenly thought of an old, now an old, man named K'o Po-Nien, who had been one of the liaison officers assigned to our group in Yenan. He later on became ambassador to Denmark and had various other diplomatic posts. He'd been a professor of history at some university before he joined the Communists.

This was eleven o'clock at night, I think, by the time we were at this stage of the interview with all the Americans around in a huge circle in this big room in the Great Hall of the People. He sent a word [loudly], "Call K'o Po-Nien. Get him here!" [laughter]

So poor old K'o was routed out of bed, I'm sure. He arrived sleepy-eyed and blinking. Zhou insisted a chair be brought in so he could be seated next to me.

There was a great deal of warmth, and Zhou made a lot of complimentary references to me. The picture we've got downstairs, I think is quite characteristic.

When we had the private meeting with him he asked about old friends whom he'd known, Fairbank and Lattimore and various other people, about Dave Barrett who, after the Communists took over Peking, had been accused of fostering a plot against Mao's life.

That was a crazy, sort of a wild-eyed intelligence thing. It's a long story which we don't need to go into here. The Chinese had accused Barrett of providing money for the plotters who were supposedly using an old trench mortar from about a mile away to try to hit [chuckling] Mao Zedong while he stood on Tiananmen.

Q: When was this, '49?

SERVICE: Yes, this was '49.

At any rate, he said, "Mistakes were made and we're very sorry. Give my best regards to Colonel Barrett."

It was very, very warm and pleasant.

Q: Did you have any opportunity to raise the question of Mao's supposed request to come to America in '45?

SERVICE: No. If we had had a chance to talk about that period--this was one of the questions I had in mind. But, he didn't want to have a historical session, so, I never did.

Q: Was your impression of him that he was well versed in international affairs?

SERVICE: Oh, very well versed, most certainly.

Zhou was a person with all the intellectual capacities of a Kissinger. I think no one had any better mind than he did. He had traveled a great deal, of course, as premier and as foreign minister. He'd been at the Geneva conference and the Bandung conference and many conferences around the world. He toured Africa. He was not parochial or ill-informed at all.

I think the Chinese do tend to put too much credence in foreign movements that they hope are strong. When we were there some of the Black Panther people were in Peking. They had some Puerto Rican group, the Young Lords from New York. They had one of these splinter Communist groups, a split off from the Socialist Workers Party. The Socialist Workers Party had gone against the Chinese because of their being willing to receive Nixon. Then one group split off, and they were invited to Peking.

You had the feeling that perhaps they gave these people more importance than they really had. But I don't think that Zhou himself was naive at all.

Our private talk was mainly a tour of the horizon kind of thing.

Q: Briefing you?

SERVICE: Yes.

Q: With the idea that you should take a message back with you?

SERVICE: Well, I suppose so. Huang Hua asked me to come to Ottawa to pick up the visas before we went to China. I had told Huang Hua, so there would be no misunderstanding, that I wasn't going to China as a representative of the government, I wasn't going to China as a writer, but I expected I would probably write something, and that anything I was told or learned should, I thought, also be reported to my government.

So Zhou knew that I would be interviewed. So it's possible that he was talking partly to the U.S. government, but Kissinger had just been there. I guess it was the day after Kissinger left.

Kissinger In Peking: An "Invitation" to San Clemente for Thanksgiving

SERVICE: While Kissinger was in Peking, I was asked to talk to him. The way they put it was that Kissinger had heard I was there and asked to see me. Well I doubt that, because the eventual conversation made it quite apparent that Kissinger was very foggy about who I was.

Q: When you say "they," do you mean Chinese officials?

SERVICE: The Chinese, yes.

Q: What was your impression of Kissinger?

SERVICE: He's a very smart, intelligent, quick person. But I made a mistake. There were two other people there. There was [John] Holdridge and a man named Al Jenkins from the State Department. Holdridge I think was National Security Council, and Jenkins was State Department. They were present and I thought that they wanted my impressions of China. I'd been in China at this time for over a month.

So, I was talking about my traveling and things I'd seen. I was talking mostly to Jenkins and Holdridge, because they had some China background. Neither one of them had spent any time in China to speak of, but at least they were so-called China specialists.

That was a mistake. I was supposed, I think, to talk only to Kissinger. Neither Holdridge nor Jenkins would say a word. They were almost embarrassed by my talking to them rather than directing my talk to Kissinger.

I changed. I got myself better oriented, shall we say, Kissinger asked me at one point, "Were the Chinese serious about Taiwan?" In other words, that they wouldn't have normalization of relations until we broke off with Taiwan.

I said, "Yes, they're absolutely serious."

He said, "You don't think they're bargaining?"

I said, "No, on this question they're not bargaining. It's a symbolic issue. They may be willing to accept some sort of a formula which would still not incorporate Taiwan, unified in the mainland, wholly. We have to recognize Chinese sovereignty, and that means we have to break off diplomatic relations with Taiwan."

I think Kissinger found this very hard to believe. He said, "Oh, my people are always telling me something different. They say they're like the Russians. This is bargaining."

I said, "No, this is not a bargaining point."

During this dialogue here I said something about Mao. He suddenly stopped and looked at me, sort of surprised, and he said, "Do you know Mao?"

I said, well yes, I knew him quite well.

Then the wheels went around for a little while, and a moment later he said, "Would you be willing to come to San Clemente?" Kissinger said, "When are you getting back to the States?"

I told him when it was. It was going to be somewhere before November 15.

He said, "Would you be willing to come to San Clemente? We're going to be out there about that time. We're going to be out at San Clemente for Thanksgiving."

I said, "Certainly. I'd be perfectly willing to come to San Clemente." He never mentioned the president's name, but it was obvious that coming to San Clemente, "We'll be there at Thanksgiving"--

I said, "Certainly."

Then he said, "As soon as you get back to Washington I want you to call my secretary and tell her where you can be reached and how we can get a hold of you anytime we want to." He said this twice and saw me out the front door and again made a point of this business of calling his secretary. He said, "She'll know all about it. She'll be briefed. But, we want to know how to get in touch with you."

I agreed to do that, and [chuckling] nothing came of it.

Services Mobbed by the Press in Hong Kong

SERVICE: When I was in Peking the New York Times got hold of me and wanted me to write an article for their magazine. I agreed to do that. But I didn't try to write it in China.

When we came out and got to Hong Kong we were really unprepared--I wasn't prepared--for the terrific furor. I should have been. I should have been prepared really. There was a tremendous interest, you remember, at that period about Nixon's visit which was coming. Kissinger had just made his second trip to China.

When we got off the train in Hong Kong, we were simply swamped. Every newspaperman in Hong Kong seemed to be down at the railway station, firing questions, some of them friendly, some unfriendly.

The French news agency, Agence France Presse had a Chinese who wanted to bring up my old views, and did I still feel China was, you know, paradise, and so on and so on. At any rate, it was very hard to get away from these people.

The main thing, of course, was the Lin Piao affair. In China we heard nothing about Lin Piao. He obviously wasn't visible. There had been this rumor of a plane shot down. That was just before we went into China. All air traffic in China was stopped for a day or two. But, it hadn't yet been tied up in China with Lin Piao's being on the plane.

I had made various random inquiries in China, what had happened to Lin Piao, and was always put off. "Important leaders often disappear for conferences," or something like that, or "Lin Piao's health has been bad; maybe he's not well."

Only one man had said, "Well, later on it will become apparent." I should have perhaps been better attuned to realize that this was some sort of an intimation that the true story wasn't being told. But, by and large, Lin Piao was simply a non-subject. You couldn't find out. Nobody talked about him.

When I got to Hong Kong, just having come out from China, everyone expected me to have information about this business. All I could say was, "In China you don't hear anything; you don't know anything," which made me look like a bit of a fool.

The press club wanted me to come and have a session with them at their luncheon. I declined. I simply wasn't set or prepared for this. I wasn't really trying to make a big thing out of the whole thing. As far as I was concerned it was a personal trip, a sentimental journey, if you want to call it that, rather than a news-gathering thing.

I did talk to the consul-general in Hong Kong, spent a day talking to him and to some of the people on the staff. I didn't ask and I wasn't told who they were. I had told the Chinese that I was going to talk to my government. And I had written out a summary. Right after we left Zhou En-lai I borrowed a typewriter from the Adlers and had written out a summary of the talk. So, I had that.

SERVICE: Yes. Anyway, we just sort of holed up. I'd gotten in touch with Loren Fessler. He used to be with Time magazine and then was working for the Universities Field Service. He found us a room in a small hotel, a comfortable enough room, but not one of the tourist hotels.

We stayed there. Various people tracked us down. I talked to a Newsweek man, Sidney Liu. Several other people, NBC and ABC got a hold of me. I was on the [Frank] McGee show, the Today show. We got out of Hong Kong as fast as we could and came home.

Q: How did Hong Kong seem after China?

SERVICE: Oh, it was a terrible shock. It's depressing to come out of China and as soon as you get across the border you start seeing beggars, and filth, the crowded shacks, and all the development in the New Territories. The commercialism and the advertising and everything in Hong Kong is a cultural shock after you come out of China where we'd been for six weeks.

Plus the fact that we felt harried and pursued and unhappy—

The Oakland Tribune had a very enterprising woman that I'd met before I went to China. She called up long distance and interviewed me in the hotel. It was a pretty good piece in the Tribune, apparently was passed by old Senator [William] Knowland himself. He was still alive then.

Q: That was a turnaround, wasn't it?

SERVICE: Yes. Incidentally, while we're thinking of it, the big turnaround really came with the announcement of the Nixon visit and the Fulbright hearing, because all the papers and all the magazines, the news magazines, wrote it up quite extensively, wrote up the Fulbright hearing and our interview afterward.

The coverage was astonishingly different in tone. Newsweek had been less antipathetic, less hostile than Time in the old days. But, even Time magazine just fell all over itself to be friendly.

I had promised an article for the New York Times Magazine. I wrote it when I got back and sent it in. They held it for a while and decided not to use it.

There were several things wrong. Partly I simply can't get away from writing State Department reports. Also I think I didn't draw conclusions--didn't do the analysis. I tried to say, "This is what we saw," and let the reader draw his own conclusions.

So they turned the thing down. Harrison Salisbury, whom I had had some contact with before, heard that the magazine section had turned it down. He called me and said that he'd seen it, would like to make some excerpts and use them in the Op. Ed. page. I said, "Go ahead."

So he did, and they ran I think for three days in the Op. Ed. page.

Q: Under your name?

SERVICE: Yes. One mistake I perhaps made was in not asking to check his excerpting. He cut out all the qualifying sections where I point out that, of course, the reader will know that it's a Communist country, that the Chinese don't have democratic freedoms as we know them in this country, that education, propaganda, and the press are all controlled, and things like that.

Well, those weren't interesting so far as Harrison Salisbury was concerned; so the published excerpts are more rosy perhaps than my full picture. It made me look a little bit like a starry-eyed apologist, I'm afraid. However, I can't worry too much about that.

Foresight, Nightmare, and Hindsight

"Both before and after his banishment from responsible governmental affairs, Service talked extensively with the highest Communist Chinese leaders, and during the Second World War he was one of a very few American diplomats whom Mao Zedong and Zhou En-lai knew well. The fact that this man, whom the future rulers of Peking grew to like and trust, was quiet, dignified, candid, compassionate, and that he represented the very best in America, could have been most helpful to our country."

"Among some of the crueller jabs at Service in his years of limbo, was the allegation that he was somehow personally responsible for the deaths of American boys in the Korean war. The fact is that if he had been listened to, and the United States had taken a realistic view of China and its Communists, there might not have been any Korean war."

"Meanwhile, Stilwell's successor, General Wedemeyer, passed through Tokyo on his way home for consultation. He had a cordial chat with Service, in which he said that Service was being recommended for a medal awarded to civilians for exemplary work during the war. In Washington, Service later heard, Wedemeyer saw J. Edgar Hoover, and afterward there were no more cordial meetings and no further talk of a medal."

"As another friend of Service's has remarked, few men have been so mightily defamed by nasty people and so meagerly defended by nice ones."

"The rendezvous was arranged with typical Kissinger furtiveness, but nothing much came of it; Kissinger, unlike most senior members of the United States Senate, didn't seem to be aware that Service had ever met Mao."

From a Profile of John Service, ex-Foreign Service officer and political casualty, by E.J.Kahn, Jr.

Appearing this week in The New Yorker. Yes, The New Yorker.

Generally Low Level of Press and Public Information on China

SERVICE: Fulbright had wanted me to come back for another session after I'd been to China. I couldn't very well refuse, although I wasn't really seeking publicity or press. But I did agree to go. He had [Ray] Ludden at that time and also a man named Warren Cohen who's a professor of diplomatic history at Michigan State University. That was in February of '72. That wasn't much of a hearing actually.

Q: What was your policy on dealing with the flood of requests you must have had for speaking?

SERVICE: I turned most of them down. I turned all of them down that I could. I was getting two or three requests a day, lecture agencies, commencements at universities. But I simply didn't want to do it. I made several talks at university centers. I did it where there was some personal tie or personal obligation--I didn't want to talk to the World Affairs Council. Then they said, "Will you talk to the board?" So I said okay. Then it turned out to be a huge mob in a home of Madeleine Russell.

I got sucked into a press conference in Washington, much against my will and against my wishes. I didn't realize what was happening. My old friend Bob Barnett was in Washington, had retired from the State Department, had become Washington representative of the Asia Society. The Asia Society had always been a genteel, cultural organization, and a child of John D. Rockefeller Jr.'s, interested in Oriental art and culture.

Barnett had gotten in touch with me as soon as I came back, along with the Council of Foreign Relations, all sorts of people. I told him I wasn't looking for any platform, I had nothing to sell, I wasn't trying to do this sort of thing.

So, he said, "If you do come to Washington let me know and we'll just have a few people in my office, just people that are interested in the Asia Society, in my office."

I pictured a group of elderly worthies in an ordinary-sized office. Well, I had to go to Washington for this Fulbright thing, and was going on to London. So, I let him know.

He said, "Yes, we'll just have a few people in my office. It will be very informal."

I had told him I wasn't giving press conferences, so I thought he understood that. When I arrived at his office it turns out that he had an office about 40 feet square. At least fifty or sixty people crowded in there, all the newspaper people from Washington, top people, who were just getting ready, a lot of them, to accompany Nixon because it was just before Nixon was due to leave for China.

Anyway, it turned out to be an unpleasant, embarrassing sort of a thing, because I thought the thing was off the record and they thought it was on the record. A lot of them were skeptical about my views of China.

They were extremely put off by the fact that I couldn't give any inside story on Lin Piao. They said, "How could you have been in China while these things were going on? After all, you're supposed to be a great political reporter, observer," and so on and so on. A lot of these people, of course, had never been in China and didn't know how things are.

Q: What did this tell you about the state of public information in this country on China?

SERVICE: Obviously it was very poor, but then I couldn't have given them very much either. My information was also poor. But, I didn't go to China to find out what had happened to Lin Piao!

Q: No. What I'm trying to suggest is that they were not aware of the restrictions that-- SERVICE: Oh, no, of course not. Eric Sevareid was there, and he was very disappointed. As one man put it, "It's just as if the whole top floor of the Pentagon had been fired." How could this not be known? How could this not be the subject of everybody's comments? They couldn't understand how a closed society and disciplined party could maintain so effective a control of sensational and important news.

Jack's War-Time Despatches Published. Lost Chance in China...Edited by Joseph W. Esherick

SERVICE: In 1972, I got a call from Random House. I think this was probably just after the profile was published in the New Yorker. They wanted me to put together my reports from China. I said I didn't think it could be done successfully, that the reports were too episodic and a lot of them were repetitious. I didn't think there was enough there really to make a book.

I think the idea had come from Orville Schell. I don't know. Because they had published a book by Orville and Joe Esherick on modern China, sort of a high school textbook. At any rate, they came back after a while and asked whether I would be willing to have a scholar, a historian, look at my reports and see if he could do something. I said, "Well sure." After all, it would be no work on my part. So, why should I refuse? They came up with Joe Esherick and I was delighted. I had known Joe when he was getting his Ph.D. here.

So, Joe did it and produced Lost Chance in China. I think he did an excellent job.

By this time, of course, a great many of my reports had been published in the State Department volumes, U.S. Foreign Relations, my reports or parts of my reports. I had some. John Fairbank had some. Some came from the Lauchlin Currie files.

Kubek's The Amerasia Papers had published a lot of my reports. Then we got many more out of the State Department. Esherick was consulting me and using clues from The Amerasia Papers or from U.S. Foreign Relations. We got dates and despatch numbers to transmit.

The State Department cooperated very nicely. They dug up almost everything that we wanted. Even some of the things that they couldn't find but they said might be in my security file, sure enough, Joe wrote and got them from the security file. I'm not sure why some of them had been in the security files. Probably they were documents that we had used or submitted as evidence in my hearings, some of them.

Anyway, we got most of what we wanted. There are a few things that are missing. They said we could go to Washington and search the files ourselves, but neither Joe nor I had time or wanted to do that. Joe turned out to have far more than enough for a book. His first draft came out to something like 750 pages. Random House said, "You're going to have to cut this down." So he did.

A very nice thing that Joe did was to suggest that the royalties be split since the reports themselves were mine. So, actually I made a little money out of it.

It was the most painless book that has ever been written. Unfortunately I usually get all the credit for it. It's considered my book, although he's the man that did it.

One little embarrassment is the dedication which he put in, which I didn't know about, "to those who chose honesty." [chuckling] A lot of my Foreign Service friends think that it's my dedication and that I'm sort of pointing a finger at other people, which I'm not.

I don't think anyone else has taken the reports they wrote and made a book out of them without rewriting or revising or bringing them up to date.

Oliver Edmund Clubb has had one report published--it's a very small book--a report that he wrote on the Communists when he was in Hangzhou. This was when they were still in Gansu, in 1932 I think. (Oliver Edmund Clubb, Communism in China, as reported from Hangzhou in 1932. New York, Columbia University Press, 1968.) That's been published, but otherwise I don't know of any report that basically is simply reprinting reports that are thirty years old.

Q: That's remarkable.

SERVICE: One thing that contributed to making it possible was the fact that I was fired and cut off all connection with the State Department, so that I never had a need to hedge or revise my views. People who stayed in the State Department, who were not fired, had to join the team. Their views, in most cases, changed during the years of estrangement with China. It would be rather embarrassing perhaps for their reports to be published. But, in my case, I can stand on what I wrote back in 1944.

Q: Is there anything in the despatches that you regret or feel was wrong?

SERVICE: I wasn't a hundred percent right, certainly not. We didn't foresee everything that was going to happen. We didn't foresee the rapidity of developments in China in the late 40's. We took too much at face value some of the things the Communists were saying. I think we didn't realize that they were stalling and playing for time, in much the same way the Kuomintang was. It just happened that they strengthened themselves by expanding and taking more territory when they could. They weren't really fighting as wholehearted a war against the Japanese perhaps as we thought, things like that.

They were talking of the socialization process in China taking decades. When the Communists got into power, they did it in a very few years. I don't think that I have to feel badly or regretful that I didn't foresee all those things. The general direction was correct. I wouldn't have published them if I felt badly about them.

Q: What about the word that caused you so much trouble, the "democratic Chinese Communists?"

SERVICE: You know, we weren't writing political science papers. People like Tang Tsou have written articles and made a lot about our folly in talking about the Communists being democratic. Yes, we were careless. We didn't think we were writing for anyone except the man on the China desk in the Department of State. We were using the language and terms that were being bandied about at the time.

If you read the reports themselves I pretty much explain what I mean by being democratic, giving the people at least a sense that they had a voice in what was going on, a real feeling, in their local affairs. These are difficult issues to grapple with and pin down. We're still having trouble.

The Chinese model of Communism is certainly very different from the Russian. Even critics will agree that people do have more say about things that affect them directly than they have in the Soviet Union. That's democratic in our sense. If you insist on defining democracy as having two parties competing against each other and things like that, it's not democratic.

The fall of the Gang of Four is, in a sense, a working out of popular will in China. Zhou En-lai was very popular, and there was great resentment at the Gang of Four's treatment of him after he died. The demonstration on Tiananmen Square was in a sense a democratic gesture, a popular gesture.

I regret certainly that we weren't more specific or more careful in using [chuckling] these terms. But, it's not all that simple.

Q: No.

SERVICE: Of course, the problem is that people simply say, "Oh, Service said they were democratic." They don't read my report, which may be ten or fifteen pages long describing what their policies were.

But, this is, you know, part of my whole feeling about China now. It's disappointing that some of the things that we saw in Yenan have become bureaucratized and the party has become much more totalitarian than it was in those days. The regime is a heavy-handed regime in many ways. We can't even argue that people enjoy the same kind of civil rights that we would like to have them enjoy.

Q: How was the book received, Lost Chance [in China]?

SERVICE: Oh, extremely well. It was well reviewed in almost every magazine except Esquire magazine, whose review was by Malcolm Muggeridge, who is a well known anti-Communist.

Q: Editor of Punch for many years.

SERVICE: Yes. He ridiculed the book in a very brief, two-sentence review. But, most of the other reviews were very friendly. The New York Times gave it a prominent review by Harrison Salisbury. Also they carried it on the page where they have the bestseller list, and have their editor's recommendations. We were listed for three weeks in that recommended category. It's been reviewed very widely over the country.

Our time had come. It was a sort of a swing back of the pendulum. As I said before, the Nixon visit to China, which was announced just before my testimony before the Fulbright committee, marked the big watershed, although before that my Amerasia Papers had gotten a few friendly reviews.

Q: Joe Esherick concludes Lost Chance with a statement that if the policies that you and your colleagues recommended had been followed, it's possible that the Korean and Vietnamese wars would not have occurred, but it was necessary for them to have occurred in a sense to prove that you and your colleagues were right. That's a rough and I hope fair summary of what he says.

SERVICE: Well, I can't disagree. I think there's logic in it, yes. Certainly, we would never have been recognized as having been right if none of these other events hadn't happened since then.

The Halberstam book is a little wrong. Halberstam's The Best and the Brightest argues that if we had remained in the State Department, if we had not been fired, that the Vietnam War would not have happened. This is, I think, more questionable than Esherick's statement, because if we had stayed in the Department, as I said before, our views would have had to become those of the Department. We would have had to change our views.

About this time I was asked to review a book by a Russian who was in Yenan while I was there, a man named [P.P.] Vladimirov, who was there ostensibly representing Tass, but he'd been sent then as a representative of the Comintern. These journals were published in Russian and then they tried to sell them to an American publisher. Doubleday asked me to read it. (Petr Parferovich Vladimorov, China's Special Area, 1942-1945, Bombay-Allied Publishers, 1974, and Doubleday, 1975.)

I wrote them a critique pointing out that I thought that things had been added to the journal--undoubtedly the man had a journal and basically it was material from his journal--but that things had been added.

One of the ironic things is that the journals pay a great deal of attention to my presence in Yenan and talks with Mao Zedong. Vladimirov does me the honor of calling me "the most dangerous American in Yenan," because I was encouraging Mao Zedong in his nationalist tendencies. It would have been very nice, of course, to have had this for the loyalty hearings.

It points up a fact that we simply couldn't convince anybody of in the 50's. John Davies, as well as myself, said our whole approach to the situation in China was basically an anti-Soviet one. We were premature anti-Soviet. It wasn't the fashion in those days. But, we were concerned about the post-war situation, and the desirability of trying to put a wedge between the Chinese Communists and the Russians to separate them if we could, which we thought was possible.

Three Months in China in 1975

SERVICE: By 1975 we thought we'd like to go back to China. The Chinese had kept mentioning the subject, you know, "Why don't you come back?" every time I saw them. We were in Washington for another set of Fulbright hearings on the future of American foreign policy. I gave a very strong statement on why we should normalize relations with China. Fulbright was interested, but he felt that my views were a little too extreme, that the American public would react in favor of Taiwan. He was right. Anyway, we had lunch at the liaison office, and they came back to the same idea, "Why don't you come to China again?"

I said, "It's a long way to go and it costs a lot of money, and I don't want to go just for a two or three week trip."

So, they said, "Well, what's in your mind?"

I said, "I'd like to stay at least three months."

They were rather surprised. It took some time to get approval, but it did go through.

We said we only wanted to stay in Peking. We wanted to stay in the little hotel, an old, converted Chinese residence, where our friends the Adlers live. So we got to Peking, and we were met at the plane by several of our old friends, including the Adlers and George Hatem, the American doctor. We just settled in and had a lovely month in Peking at the Peace Hotel.

Q: What did you do when you were in Peking? Did you feel that you were under surveillance?

SERVICE: No. We had a really wonderful woman assigned to us, a graduate of Tsing Hua University, who had majored in American literature. Her English was very good. She was not normally a guide or interpreter.

She came around every morning. I had said that I wanted to brush up my Chinese, so that she was assigned partly for that purpose. I read the papers, and I'd discuss with her the editorials or an article, something like that, and read various other things she recommended. I read several plays and a novel.

We'd have an hour session and then sometimes we had something scheduled. Once or twice a week we would go to a school or have an excursion of some sort. Sometimes she and Caroline would go out shopping. But most of the day was free.

I would generally go out for a walk or bicycle--I was going to buy a bicycle, then It turned out that Mrs. Adler had a bicycle which she wasn't using.

Q: Did you go out very early in the morning?

SERVICE: Sometimes. It depended. I went out early sometimes just to watch the people in the parks doing their exercises, their Tai Ch'i and joggers, all sorts of groups going out in the early morning.

Sometimes I went out in the middle of the day to various parks. I visited all the parks in Peking. I went around the old line of the city wall. I explored Peking probably more on this visit than I ever did when I lived there, because I went systematically each day to a different part of the city.

Q: Did you ever have any trouble photographing?

SERVICE: Occasionally, yes. If I was in an old or shabby area. Two or three times somebody would come up and say, "What are you doing?"

It was soon after the controversial Antonioni film on China had been released, and there had been a lot of hullabaloo in China about Antonioni because he was supposedly unsympathetic, unfriendly to China. It was supposed to be a Russian-inspired attack on China. It was the period when the Gang of Four was fairly powerful and there was a certain amount of xenophobia and concern about spies.

If someone objected, I would desist. If they didn't want me to take pictures I didn't insist on taking them. There was never any trouble. I never got arrested or anything like that. By and large, I just wandered free as the breeze. I was quite sure I was not under surveillance. I got a lot of pictures of Peking, and even some that showed old shabby buildings for that matter.

Then they said, "Well surely you want to travel some?"

So we said, "Yes, we would like to do some traveling. Where could we go?" I told them we would very much want to go up the Yangtze by steamer, because I'd done it as a boy many times.

Some visitors had made the trip down the river, but no one as far as we knew, no foreigners, had gone up the river. I said, "Well, boats come down; they've got to go up." It's much slower going up. You don't whisk through the gorges in such a rush. Anyway, they arranged it and we made the trip.

Q: I've seen your slides of the trip up the Yangtze. It looked marvelous.

SERVICE: We were lucky. We had a perfect day going through the gorges. It was very clear and sunny. We started going through the gorges before dawn, and ended just about dark, so it was a full day. We were on the boat four days from Hangzhou to Chungking. They gave us de luxe accommodations. We had our own saloon and deck and so on. It was all very nice.

We saw Yunnan again, our old haunts where Caroline first started out in China.

Q: Do you ever wish to go back to China to live?

SERVICE: Oh yes, I would like to go back.

Q: And live there?

SERVICE: Well, I'm not so sure of living. Certainly to visit and travel. It's much easier to get back and forth now.

I think the people that have settled there are quite happy, people like Alley and Hatem. They lead a special sort of life, though it's not like the foreigners in the old days. The attitude is very different, of course. Perhaps I could do something useful there, editing or something.

Preconceptions and Prejudices about China

Q: This is somewhat truistic, but do you think people see what they expect to see in China?

SERVICE: Oh, of course. This is very definitely true. I've seen some people go to China, I could tell before they went what they were going to write. They've got preconceptions.

Q: How do you try to counter this in yourself?

SERVICE: Well, in the first place, I probably wouldn't agree that I had preconceptions, would I? Most people don't. I don't know. I just think that I'm trained to be a little more skeptical perhaps.

What so many people who go to China lack, of course, is a background of what China used to be. Therefore, they believe a lot of things that are told them about the old China, which are exaggerated and not true.

To take an obvious example. We went to Yenan in 1971. There's a historical museum there, quite an important, large one. We went through, and they have guides that take you and give you a spiel, explain all the exhibits and so on. It was a young man that was taking us through.

Although it was after Lin Piao's fall, the museum hadn't yet gotten the word. Lin Piao was still Mao's designated heir, and the whole exhibit was centered around him. People like Chu Teh had disappeared, and Zhou En-lai appeared, but not importantly. P'eng Teh-Huai, who had been number two in the army, the vice deputy commander, just wasn't there at all.

I knew the truth. I knew what really was the situation, so that I was prepared for this sort of thing. But someone who hadn't had any history could have been misled.

When I came out I spoke to our own interpreter, a man that traveled with me who was from the foreign office. I said, "It was very interesting. But, when I was in Yenan there were always two pictures in every public room, two pictures of equal size, side by side, Chu Teh and Mao Zedong." He knew exactly what I meant, of course.

He said, "Chu Teh is very old now, and Lin Piao is now very important and the public has to be educated," and so on.

My background, shall we say, helped me to not be swept off my feet entirely. I think generally speaking I tend to be a little skeptical. At the same time I've got to agree that my prejudices, my sympathies, tend to be with China. I tend to find an explanation or perhaps an excuse for things.

A lot of the things that strike people that go to China are denial of personal liberties and so on, I can see in a historical context, that after all there never was much individualism in China anyway. They never valued individualism as we did. The clan system was very strong. The five Confucian relationships subordinated women to men, junior to senior, younger brother to older brother, and so on. So that the average Chinese doesn't miss any individual rights which he never knew, never enjoyed.

This may be my prejudice. Somebody like William Buckley, of course, who talked here recently, would say that this indicates soft-headedness or a great prejudice on my part. Maybe it does. I think Caroline's and my reactions to China are somewhat different, partly because she didn't really know the old China well. She had superficial impressions of it, and she didn't like old China very much. She went back this time on a very different basis, where people were friendly and she had much more contact with Chinese, and she saw the good side.

I think I was a little more reserved, although on the whole my reactions were very good, my impressions were good. It was different for me, from what I'd known in Yen'an in 1944 and '45. China has become bureaucratized, and the people that I knew so well and so informally are now much less accessible.

Even talking to Zhou En-lai, although he was very friendly and very kind in many ways, talking to a man who has been the head of state, the premier for twenty years, is a lot different from talking to a man in a cave in Yen'an who's not yet held any real government position at all. It's bound to be very different.

The general atmosphere of secrecy in China now is very different from what it used to be. They won't even tell you, you know, when you're going to see somebody. When we actually did see Zhou En-lai, I was having an interview out at Peking University and got a sudden phone call in the middle of the interview, "Come quick!"

My interpreter said, "We really have to go." He wasn't even going to let us finish up what we were talking about. "We have to go right now!"

So, we had to rush down. I assumed we were going to see Zhou En-lai, but we weren't told that. But all this, of course, is very different from what I remember of China.

People like Jack Belden were quite put off by the lack of openness. You can't really talk to anybody frankly or freely. It was easier in '75 than it was in '71. But by and large everyone tells you the same thing. No one can really say anything except the man at the top.

I don't think there's very much more to say. We'd come back from China on our '75 trip. For some reason I felt now that I'd retired and I'd had the long trip to China, I wanted to be more available for giving talks. I agreed to give quite a number of talks at various places.

Richard P. Butrick was born in Lockport, New York in 1894. He joined the Consular Service in 1921. His career in the Foreign Service included positions in Chile, Ecuador, Canada, China, Brazil, and Washington, DC. Mr. Butrick was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1993.

BUTRICK: While I was on temporary duty in the Department, Homer Byington who was chief of personnel called me into his office one day and said "We have received a request from China for the assignment of six men. We have carefully chosen them and you are one of them." Well I was very bucked up by that. I thought that was wonderful being chosen among six people. So that is how I went to China. Many years later I found out that the real reason why we had been selected for China was that the Department was short of funds and we were all bachelors so they did not have to send out families.

Q: So this was in 1926 that you were sent to China.

BUTRICK: Yes, I think so. I went to Hankow.

Q: Do you recall at all what happened, the feelings...the Foreign Service Act, the Rogers Act, was signed in 1924 and you were in the Consular Service. How did you feel about the Foreign Service?

BUTRICK: We were inducted into the Foreign Service.

Q: Did you think it was a good thing or a bad thing?

BUTRICK: We thought it was a good thing, but we weren't really affected very much by it because our salaries remained the same, etc. But it did offer a career which probably the old Consular Service did not because the Diplomatic Service was separate in those days. The Diplomatic Service was all appointed, one didn't take an examination for entry.

Q: When you were in the Consular Service what was your feeling towards the Diplomatic Service? Did you think they were a bunch of fancy boys or something?

BUTRICK: We had no particular feeling towards them that I can remember. We corresponded with the Embassy when we needed to. They didn't offer any oversight of us. We were completely independent so far as I can recall.

Q: You went to Hankow in 1926. I assume you went by ship.

BUTRICK: I crossed the Pacific by ship and then went up the river by ship too. When I went up the river, the Consul at Shanghai asked me to take some papers up to the Consul in Nanking. We were always taught that the consulate should be on the sea coast, so I expected this consulate to be near the river. When I got to Nanking it was not on the river, it was way back in the interior and I took a rickshaw to deliver the papers. I talked to him a little while and by the time I got back to the river, my boat had already left. There I was stuck. Fortunately we had a warship in the port of Nanking at the time and I went out to the warship and they kept me for three or four days until the next river boat came along.

Q: We had the Yangtze River Patrol there.

BUTRICK: Yes. So this destroyer, I think it was, was in Nanking at the time. They were nice and took me on and kept me until another boat came. I was left with nothing but a fountain pen. (At that time, the U.S. Yangtze Patrol consisted of several ships, under the general control of a Vice Admiral.)

Q: What was the post like at Hankow and what was the situation there?

BUTRICK: In Hankow we occupied one building, a huge building. On the first floor were the offices, on the second floor all the bachelors had living quarters, and on the third floor was the Consul General's residence. The Consul General at that time was Frank Lockhart. So we were all quite happy there. It was a busy time. It was a time of much change because the Communist Chinese were coming up from the south. They came into Hankow while I was there.

Q: This was the KMT/CCP Northern Expedition?

BUTRICK: Part of it. We used to see Chinese walking along the Bund tied by a silk cord. They were taken by their captors out near the Hankow Club and all beheaded. Their heads were displayed on long poles so that all going to the Club could see them.

We were next to the old Russian consulate, which was by then occupied by the Chinese Communists. They also had a military group there and they used to exercise out in the yard of the former Russian consulate. They had a captain in charge of this company and he would march them back and forth and finally he got the idea of sitting down on one end of the marching area and directing them by a whistle. He had a whistle that he would blow and they would march back, etc.

We were right next door and overlooked this display. We had a chap named Russell Jordan who was with us. Russell was quite a character. He perceived the idea of getting a whistle and blowing it from a window upstairs. We did that and sure enough the troops all turned around and started marching the other way. We had a lot of fun with things like that. We were always up to some devilment.

It was a busy time. While we were there, the British concession was taken over by the Chinese. We were in the former Russian concession, ourselves. At that time we had the French concession and the Japanese concession in Hankow, but no American concession. But we still had extraterritoriality and were under American law. We had an American court there as well as in Shanghai.

Q: Did you have anything to do with the court?

BUTRICK: No, I had nothing to do with the court in Hankow. We had nothing to do with the court in Shanghai either, although we were very friendly with the judge, Milton Helmick, and other members of the court.

So it was an exciting time. One time we slept on board ships in the harbor at night rather than staying in our homes because it wasn't safe to stay at home.

Q: Well, what was happening?

BUTRICK: The Communists were taking over.

Q: The Kuomintang...?

BUTRICK: If I recall correctly, and I am not sure that I do, the Kuomintang was taking over all of the British concession and we had all the British people in our consulate for a while with their trunks and all their baggage while they were trying to evacuate down to Shanghai on a boat. It was quite an exciting period of time. The French had their own little police force, all Annamese, under a French chief. The Japanese had their own police, too.

Q: What type of work were you doing there?

BUTRICK: I was administrative officer for the entire office. Of course we had Chinese language officers that took care of the Chinese. We had Chinese writers, as they were called, because even our Chinese language officers could not correspond with the Chinese authorities in Chinese. We had to have Chinese writers who would do all that. They were a nice group. We had about six writers. There were as many of them as there were of us.

Q: Whom were we dealing with?

BUTRICK: We were dealing with the Chinese authorities there.

Q: Were they the Nationalists?

BUTRICK: They were the Nationalists at that time.

Q: Were there any problems that you can remember?

BUTRICK: No real problems. It was very amusing to me. I was recently arrived in Hankow and knew nothing about China. One of the officers was a son of a missionary, Gordon Burke was his name. Gordon spoke Chinese fluently because he had been brought up in China. One day he was going to the local branch of the Foreign Office...the Foreign Office in Peking had a branch in Hankow and he said, "Dick, how would you like to come over to the Foreign Office with me?" I said, "Fine, I would love it." We had a case of a Standard Oil boat that had been forced to pay some levies on the river which they were not supposed to pay. They call it the likin tax. So he was going to complain about that and get back the money.

We went over to the Foreign Office and he spoke to the man in charge there in Chinese. I suppose he was giving him greetings or something, I don't know what it was. Then they began discussing the case in English. It turned out that this man was a graduate of Princeton University and spoke English perfectly. In the course of the conversation this man deliberately lied and told a false story about the whole event. It didn't seem to bother Gordon at all.

Finally, the conversation was finished and we were walking back to the office which wasn't far away. I said, "Gordon, how did it go?" He said, "Oh, fine, fine." I said, "What do you mean fine. That man lied to you outright." "Oh, yes, he lied to me, that's all right. It doesn't make any difference." He said, adding, "He knows that he lied, he knows that I know that he lied, and he knows that I know that he knows that he lied. So it doesn't matter," and in reality so it was! Well, that was my introduction to China. I would not have understood at all what Gordon Burke readily understood.

Q: What about the missionaries? Did they cause a problem for the consulate, particular with the Communists in the hinterland?

BUTRICK: They got along as well as they could with people. They really didn't cause any trouble.

Q: What about our Yangtze River Patrol?

BUTRICK: They were a lot of fun. Sometimes the wives would come out and stay in Hankow, so we got to know the ladies quite well. We would see them at the club, playing golf. We had a very nice club in Hankow. The most unusual club I have ever seen in the world, for a country club. We had a race track, a nine hole golf course inside the race track, an eighteen hole golf course outside the race track, 12 or 15 tennis courts on grass, a swimming pool which was indoors and in winter was covered over and made into a ballroom.

Q: That made up for Guayaquil.

BUTRICK: That made up for Guayaquil, it certainly did. China was quite pleasant indeed. It was exciting and pleasant.

Q: You were in Hankow from 1926-32. At that time how did we get along with the Japanese?

BUTRICK: We got along fine with the Japanese. We were good friends. The Japanese consul general would have us out for parties, etc. and we would entertain them. We had no problems at all.

Q: Then you moved to Shanghai in 1932.

BUTRICK: Yes. I didn't go home because we had no home leave at government expense. You had to pay your own way if you went home. So I didn't go home until I had been in Hankow for four years. Then I went home and met in Washington the lady who became my wife. Then we went up to St. John...

Q: Again?

BUTRICK: No, I was mistaken, I didn't go earlier. As a matter of fact we were married in St. John.

Q: How long were you in St. John?

BUTRICK: Oh, a very short time. I couldn't have been there for more than four months.

Q: Then ...?

BUTRICK: Then I was brought back to Washington and sent out to Shanghai.

Q: You were in Shanghai from 1932-42. What were you doing there?

BUTRICK: I was the number two in the office and ran the office. We had a political reporter, Ed Stanton, and then we had some commercial reporters. The office was pretty well organized along those lines. Jack Service was also there. Jimmy Pilcher was there at that time too. The whole staff was highly competent.

Q: Things began to heat up with the Japanese while you were there.

BUTRICK: Yes, they did. You see the Japanese were at war with the Chinese before we got into war with them. It was very amusing because the International Settlement in Shanghai...there were various international sectors within it...one was patrolled by the British, another was patrolled by the Japanese and another by the Italians, etc. So when the war broke out we used to see these British and Italian troops patrolling in the International Settlement although they were at war with each other.

Q: Prior to the breaking out of war, there was the International Settlement. Did this mean you had very little dealings with the Chinese authorities?

BUTRICK: We had dealings with the Chinese authorities too. I remember one case came before the settlement court about a Chinese who brought birds and chickens in huge big baskets. There was some rule that they could put only so many in a basket. We had a Chinese before the court one time because he had too many chickens in the basket. They put him on the stand to explain the whole thing and he said that so far as he was concerned it was not that he had too many chickens in the basket but that the basket was too small for the number of chickens he had to carry. That nearly floored the American judge. I don't remember how the case came out but remember that angle of it.

Q: What were our concerns in Shanghai at that time?

BUTRICK: There was quite a lot of American business, including the Standard Oil Company which was all over the country. Then we had other business organizations out there too. For example, the power plant in Shanghai was managed by an American. One of the big businesses in those days was tung oil which was brought down the river from up around Chungking. It was shipped to the United States. We had business with the Philippines too. It was a very busy port.

Q: Did you get involved in the suppression of the opium trade at all?

BUTRICK: No, I don't remember anything of that sort. I think the opium trade was pretty well over by that time. Although there were opium dens in Shanghai and the Chinese did go to them and smoke opium.

Q: What was our navy doing, the Patrol?

BUTRICK: They were to keep order and make sure that American ships...you see we had private American ships, Yangtze Rapid they called it, that carried cargo up and down the river too...from Chungking down to Shanghai. We had American businesses located along the river in smaller towns.

Q: When the Sino-Japanese war started in 1937, did that have much of an effect on us?

BUTRICK: Not to any appreciable extent. It was 1940 when I went out to China again as Counselor of Embassy at Chungking. When I was transferred from there to Peking, I was hoping the war would break out before I got to Peking so I wouldn't have to go there. But I did get to Peking and it didn't break out until three or four months afterwards.

Q: But the Chinese were already at war with Japan.

BUTRICK: The Japanese were in charge in Peking, for example. All of Peking was under Japanese control even though we had our Embassy branch office in Peking. Other countries had their branch offices there too, but their principal offices were in Chungking.

Q: Before we came into the war in 1941, when the Chinese and Japanese were fighting each other, did this have much of an effect on your work in Shanghai?

BUTRICK: No, I don't think the Japanese bothered us much at all. They certainly didn't bother us at all in Peking. But we didn't have much of an interest in Peking at that time anyway. The National City Bank was there and we had the university there which was run by Americans.

Q: Were you in China when the Japanese bombed the gunboat Panay?

BUTRICK: I remember the incident but can't remember just where I was...Hankow or Shanghai. I knew the Consul in Nanking at that time.

Q: Who took the wounded survivors from the ship?

BUTRICK: I don't know the details of that.

Many of the British river boats had a toilet on the rear end of the boat. Some member of the royalty was out in China at that time interviewing people. This man had been shot and injured at the time of the Panay incident. She said to him, "Oh, my, how were you injured?" He said, "Well, Madam, I happened to be at the rear of the boat at the time and where I was shot if it had been you, you wouldn't have even been touched."

Q: Did the Japanese get nastier towards us when you were in Shanghai?

BUTRICK: They were pushy a little bit, but not nasty. They didn't like us coming into the Japanese area much at all.

Q: You went to Chungking around 1941. What were you doing up there?

BUTRICK: I was Counselor of Embassy. Mr. Gauss, who had been Consul General in Shanghai, was the Ambassador at that time. Then John Carter Vincent came afterwards and replaced me. He was a Chinese language officer. In Chungking I felt there was more need to know Chinese than in Shanghai, which was much more cosmopolitan.

Q: Chungking was not an international city in the way Shanghai was?

BUTRICK: That's right although many people spoke English, especially the officials. But the general public did not. So it was better to have people there like Jack Service who spoke Chinese fluently.

Q: So then you were sent to Peking where you served...?

BUTRICK: I relieved Bob Smyth, who came home on vacation and transfer.

Q: You were doing what in Peking?

BUTRICK: I was in charge of the office there.

Q: Now Peking was not the capital of China in those days. It had been Nanking and then had moved to Chungking.

BUTRICK: Peking, as I say, was sort of a branch office of the Embassy.

Q: Did you deal at all with the Chinese or only with the Japanese?

BUTRICK: There were some Chinese there who we dealt with, but the Japanese were in control of final decisions.

Q: Was there sort of the feeling among the Foreign Service there that eventually the United States was going to go to war?

BUTRICK: Oh, we thought that before I even got to Peking. I was hoping war would break out before I had to go to Peking because I thought for sure I would get caught in Peking...and I was.

Q: What happened to you when the war started?

BUTRICK: Well, we had to lower the flag. We had Marine guards at the Embassy and they were taken prisoners. The Japanese demanded that the colonel in charge of the Marines surrender, and he came to see me. We agreed that it was absolutely hopeless to resist, the Japanese could have killed every one of the Marines without any difficulty whatsoever. So he had to surrender. Then we had to lower the flag. There happened to be a Marine sergeant there and when the time came to lower the flag I said, "You go up and take down the flag and give it to me when you bring it back down." He said, "I have never lowered a flag this way." I said, "It is very simple. You just lower it and fold it up the best you can and bring it down." He went up and brought the flag down. I took it carefully in my arms and walked back through the crowd of mostly Japanese military to the office and kept it there. I kept the flag for four years and then lo and behold I was sent out to China to reestablish our offices out there and I took the flag back with me and we raised the same flag over the Embassy that we had taken down four years earlier.

Q: How did the Japanese treat you?

BUTRICK: Well, we were on very friendly terms with the Japanese before the war broke out and we knew them. One of them was an American, really. He spoke English fluently. We were treated very well by the Japanese. We had no real complaint. The only thing was that toward the end of the six months or so that we were there, we were running out of liquor and it would have been pretty tough after that.

Q: How did they get you out?

BUTRICK: We were sent by train from Peking to Shanghai where we were supposed to take boats. As it happened we were in Shanghai for a couple of weeks before we were loaded on the boat to come back home.

While we were in Peking I had a Japanese language officer on my staff, Beppo Johansen, a very fine man. He followed the Japanese newspapers. The Counselor of the Japanese Embassy had made a cryptic speech to the Japanese and that speech was carried in the Japanese language paper. Beppo saw that and said, "This means war." So we immediately sent a triple priority telegram over the Marine radio to Washington indicating that this had happened and that Beppo thought this meant that war was imminent. About five days later we sent a follow up telegram at Beppo's request saying that war seemed certain in the very near future. So, as far as we were concerned, we were in the clear about notifying the Department.

But recently I attended a meeting of the Far East Group here in Washington and apparently there were all kinds of other warnings that had arrived in Washington that the war was imminent. But they stated that Roosevelt thought the war was going to start down around the Philippines and wasn't prepared for Pearl Harbor at all. But I sometimes wonder about that and maybe the American public in order to be thoroughly aroused had to have something like Pearl Harbor.

Q: It is one of the theories. I find it a little hard to think that we could orchestrate something like that. But certainly the Japanese did exactly the right thing to make us unite.

BUTRICK: At a terrible cost of American lives and equipment. But it did arouse the American people.

Q: My brother was on a battleship at Pearl Harbor.

BUTRICK: What happened?

Q: He is still alive. Well now, how did they get you out? You were down in Shanghai for a couple of weeks. This would be in 1942.

BUTRICK: We stayed in a hotel where all the heating arrangements had been taken out. We were shipped out of Shanghai on the Conte Verdi, an Italian ship with an Italian crew. We went as far as Singapore. The Italians were very nice to us. They made fun of the Japanese all the time. We had tea every day on board. We had a swimming pool. We were treated beautifully. In Singapore we joined with the Suna Maru, I think it was, coming from Japan. From then on we had a Japanese captain and no more swimming pool, no more tea, etc. So the trip from Singapore to Lourenco Marques wasn't all that wonderful, but it was all right. The Italian crew talked behind the backs of the Japanese. They didn't like the Japanese at all. And when the boat went back to Shanghai, the Italian crew sank it.

Q: What I gather was the Japanese diplomats were brought on the Gripsholm to Lourenco Marques and you came on the Italian ship and then there was an exchange.

BUTRICK: They took the Japanese back to Japan and then we came back to the United States on the Gripsholm. A number of our officers were transferred direct from Lourenco Marques to other posts.

Q: I remember talking to one person, I think it was Fred Hunt, who was left in Lourenco Marques.

BUTRICK: Yes, Fred Hunt was there as was Tom Weil. Tom was transferred to Australia I think.

Q: Then you came back to the United States in mid 1942. Was there much in the way of debriefing you?

BUTRICK: We were debriefed and had to write up reports. But I don't remember the details of that.

Q: How did they treat you once you were back?

BUTRICK: I think all of us had a "looking us over" period to see how we had come through all this. I don't remember exactly, I must have been assigned to the Far Eastern Division, I am not sure. I went on various trips like the one to reset up the Far Eastern offices. Went on a trip around South America with two other people...I was an inspector for a while, too.

Ambassador Gleysteen was born in China of Missionary parents. Educated at Yale and Harvard Universities, he entered the Foreign Service in 1951. After service in the State Department's Executive Secretariat, Mr. Gleysteen studied Chinese and was subsequently posted to Taipei, Hong Kong, and to Seoul, Korea, where he served as Ambassador from 1978 to 1981. He also served in Washington with the National Security Council and in the State Department as Deputy Assistant Secretary for East Asian Affairs. The Ambassador was interviewed by Thomas Stern in 1997.

Q: I am delighted to have this opportunity to talk to my old boss. We appreciate greatly your willingness to participate in our Oral History project. Let me start with the usual question: What is your background - birth, early childhood, education, etc?

GLEYSTEN: Two obvious influence pushed me toward a Foreign Service career: being raised in Asia and having parents with a very international point of view.

I was born in Beijing (known to me as Peking), China in 1926 just before Chiang Kai-shek and the Kuomintang briefly unified China. My parents were Presbyterian missionaries. While my father was an ordained minister and my mother was also very committed to her faith, they were professionals - school teachers, not evangelists. For a number of years my father was the principal of a large Chinese middle school for boys, which had a variety of self-help schemes permitting bright but indigent students to attend. My parents were great believers in the moral and practical virtues of physical labor for intellectuals, a concept alien to the Chinese scholar class in those days. Although it might have been better for me, I didn't attend the missionary school. Along with most other Americans I was sent to the Peking American School where I received an excellent education. Many of my fellow students were Chinese, but the teachers were American and the language of instruction was English.

I was in China at the time of Pearl Harbor. The Japanese controlled Beijing, having captured it in 1937, and we immediately fell under their control. After a relatively brief period of house arrest, we were released to remain within the city under rules that kept us apart from our Chinese acquaintances. About a year later we were sent to an internment camp in Wei Xian, Shandong - a fairly rugged experience. From there we were eventually repatriated to the U.S. - after a very long voyage on a Japanese troop ship to Goa, India and then the Gripsholm to New York by way of South Africa and Brazil.

After getting back to the States in December 1943, I went to Westtown Friends School in Pennsylvania for one term. Although I had missed most of my formal high school education, I had been tutored by superb teachers and Westtown was very generous in allowing me to graduate after one term. I was in the Navy for about two years first as a V-12 student and then as an enlisted man. After the war, I attended Yale, got a BA in 1949 and an MA in 1951 before going to work for the Department of State. During summers I worked as a laborer to supplement my meager financial resources at school. I was a merchant seaman in the summer of 1947, exposing me during that contentious year to the Taft-Hartley Act and the process of labor unions evicting communist elements within their ranks.

There are several ways my childhood experiences influenced my career choice. My parents were very dedicated to China, and I was taught that service to others - secular as well as religious - was very important. These values were drilled into me as they were into my brothers and sisters. China was a place that easily evoked sympathy in the late 1930s and 1940s. It was poor and economically backward, but the people were friendly, capable, and enjoyed a glorious tradition - even if the old society had collapsed.

I have especially strong memories about the period in the mid 1930s when I suddenly began to comprehend what my parents were telling me about Japanese aggression against China. I became very conscious of Chinese nationalism, which I experienced vicariously through my Chinese friends. Having learned after the event about the Japanese invasion of Manchuria in 1931, I was politically conscious and saw the devastation when Japan attacked China proper in 1937. At a young age I was convinced that the Chinese had been victimized by inexcusable Japanese actions.

Despite this powerfully negative view of Japanese behavior, I should note that I was exposed to a variety of Japanese during my childhood, both in China and Japan. We knew Japanese - particularly Christians - who were anti-military and anti-war. Some of them visited China from time to time and came to see us. The Japanese as a people were not demonized in my upbringing.

Two foreign institutions in Beijing fascinated me in my childhood - probably because of their privileged status. The first was a large detachment of U.S. Marines, frequently mounted on Mongolian ponies for parades or polo. These remnants of our colonial era were present during my whole childhood, and a residual force was still present at the time of Pearl Harbor. The second was the Foreign Service. My parents were acquainted with many of the American diplomats, and most diplomatic children attended our school. Their lives looked opulent compared to us poor missionary kids. Many Americans raised in China joined the Foreign Service or the Marines. Some did both. Along with my brothers and sisters I was indoctrinated with my parents' world view. My father and mother made a great point of discussing international issues with us around the lunch and dinner table. We talked about what Japan was doing to China, what Germany was doing in Europe, etc. My father went to Geneva in 1932 to observe the League of Nations debates on Japanese activities in Manchuria. Five years later he was very disturbed by events in Europe and sensed war was coming. In 1939 we traveled to Europe on the trans-Siberian railroad. Going through Stalin's Soviet Union was an ugly experience (involving NKVD harassment, scenes of soldiers with bayonets marching prisoners near the tracks, and other manifestations of a police state) that left a deep imprint on my psyche. We visited Germany, Holland, England, getting to the States one month before the Russo-German invasion of Poland.

By the time I went to Yale, I had pretty well decided that I wanted to get involved in something related to international affairs, particularly some activity that might benefit other human beings. Like many others of my age I was enthused by what sometimes seemed to be heroic efforts in the post-war period to construct international institutions, promote development, and (later) cope with Cold War threats. Yet, at this point in my life, I was not focused on the Foreign Service, and I was very depressed by events in East Asia. China was being torn apart by civil war. I had been brought up as a child with a rather benign view of Chiang Kai-shek and the Kuomintang revolution, so as a young man I was particularly discouraged and disappointed by Chiang's corruption and ineffectiveness. I had no romantic notions about the Communists. I saw their assumption of power through a Cold War prism, not the more objective manner of my later years. China seemed to be regressing from the goals that had energized my family. Elsewhere in Asia I was disgusted by the efforts of the British, French, and Dutch to reassert their colonial control.

My strong reaction to these events led me to abandon East Asian affairs. At Yale, I majored in European intellectual history and got my MA in international relations. I did not return to Asian issues until toward the end of graduate school. In the meantime, my older brother Culver had joined the Foreign Service. He had already had very interesting experiences that tempted me. I also met a number of Foreign Service officers in graduate school who impressed me by their caliber. I had a professor of international relations (and master of Pierson College at Yale where I lived), Arnold Wolfers, who was quite high on the Foreign Service. My parents looked favorably on the Foreign service. The Foreign Service and State Department enjoyed much prestige. However, no one lobbied me or put any pressure on me during my slow drift into the Foreign Service by way of the Civil Service.

After getting my MA from Yale, I was still undecided about the "next step." I had in mind a job at the Department of State or a fellowship to continue my graduate studies. When I naively asked Professor Wolfers to recommend me for both, he told me quite properly that he would endorse me for one or the other but not both. So I chose the State Department. I took and passed the Civil Service Junior Management Exam, a standard test in those days for entry level professional positions. But I was not bent on becoming a China or Asian specialist when I started work in 1951 as a Civil Service clerk typist, GS-3, in the Executive Secretariat, a temporary appointment to get me on the rolls - for a salary of less than $3,000 a year!

Q: When did you start in the Department and what were your duties?

GLEYSTEN: I started in March 1951. I was still in my anti-Asia mood. Although I had relented a little bit by taking a refresher course in Chinese along with a number of Asian related courses at Yale, I was still leery of becoming a Chinese expert.

I had a friend in the Department who told me that there was a vacancy in the executive secretariat (S/S). I had also met with a number of people in INR, who seemed interested in me. So I had a few choices; the secretariat sounded quite interesting and in fact, my job did turn out to be interesting from the start.

I shared a small office with Richard Hennes, a friend who occasionally still drops in on Washington. Our job was to summarize key documents for quick reference. (I later found out that most of the material we were summarizing was destined for Acheson's archives.) We also summarized cables for the "Digest" that went to the president and the secretary every day. Our most awesome responsibility was to review drafts of foreign policy speeches to insure conformance with Administration policy. This function, which was created after Truman and Acheson decided to squelch some of the more free-wheeling appointees, at times put us in direct confrontation with very important people. Secretary Acheson supported us when the official in question went over our heads to complain. I greatly admired Acheson - more in those early years than later.

I might note that I had little Foreign Service executive or management training in my government career, with the possible exception of a year as a fellow at Harvard University and the DCM course toward the end of my assailment as DCM in Taipei. I just got thrown into the jobs. Of course, I learned on the job, but I think I should have been required to take a number of training courses.

After about a year of summarizing and speech clearance, I was put "on the line" in S/S, the equivalent in those days of today's Operations Center. By this time John Foster Dulles had replaced Acheson. I saw a great deal more of him than I had of Acheson, largely because I often went on trips with him.

The secretariat went through a number of evolutions. In the early 1950s, its basic function was to manage the paper flow to the seventh (actually fifth in my days) floor principals, starting with the secretary. Later, by stages, S/S became a 24-hour activity culminating in the elaborate Operations Center for dealing with crises. During the years in the early 1950s when I was on the line in S/S my main task was to review documents going to the secretary dealing with East Asia and with NSC activities. I kept sensitive files, and I attended most of the secretary's meetings with Walter Robertson and his staff as well as NSC-related discussions centered around Bob Bowie, director of policy planning, and the secretary. My impression is that S/S was probably more actively involved in the decision-making process at that time than during my later service. We were omni-present, although we rarely spoke up, unless there was a question about the files and records.

McCarthyism was an ugly disease that struck the country during my S/S days. Since my family had lived abroad, and specifically in China, I was in a category subject to suspicion. Furthermore, I was married to the daughter of O. Edmund Clubb, one of the prominent China officers pursued by McCarthy's witch hunt. Although Clubb was exonerated in the final analysis, the process destroyed his career and he resigned in disgust at a relatively young age. I also knew John Davies-through my brother Culver; I did not know Service, but had a high regard for him and most of the others.

Let me expand a little on my personal experience. As I said, I was interrogated under klieg lights by our security office, primarily about any connections with communist that I might have formed during my China days. Interestingly enough, they chose not to question me extensively about Clubb. They had a fuzzy dossier on me - I was guilty of being born abroad, in China moreover, I was acquainted with a number of "suspicious" people, and I behaved strangely, for example reading the Communist "Daily Worker" newspaper in the Philadelphia Public Library. In fact, I had done so at the suggestion of a very conservative anti-communist professor for a "content analysis" paper required in his course at Yale. My brother Ted, who had once worked for the FBI, warned me about undertaking this project, predicting it would get me into a lot of trouble. And he was right. The dossier also noted my alleged sympathy for the communists during my Yale days. This was stimulated by a talk I gave to a U.S. Army reserve unit in New Haven while I was a graduate student. I made some disparaging comments about South Korean President Syngman Rhee, stating that when I first learned the Korean War had broken out I was not initially certain whether the provocation had come from the South or North, although it soon became obvious by the massive attack that North Korea was the aggressor. Some time later in a New Haven bar I ran into an army reserve officer who had been in the audience. Quite drunk and failing to recognize me as the speaker, he described to me the terrible talk I had given and branded it as pro-communist. Presumably, he reported that to Army intelligence which passed it on to the State Department's security apparatus. The most amusing accusation was that I had been the leader of a Chinese communist guerrilla unit during WW II. I pointed out that I would have been rather young for such activity.

These and other equally baseless allegations were left to fester in my dossier without analysis and then took on significance in the McCarthy period. I had been given security clearance in 1951 so that I could join the Department, and I also had no problems obtaining renewed clearance when I was "Wristonized" into the Foreign Service in 1954. But for some reason the allegations against me were given sufficient weight to bar me from a foreign assignment. In 1955, while I was awaiting assignment to the Chinese language school in Taiwan and wondering why the assignment was not finalized, I learned from my boss, Walter Scott, that it was my security dossier that kept me from being assigned overseas. I told Scott the clearance issue had to be resolved immediately or I would be forced to find other employment. He agreed with me. In fact, I was interrogated one afternoon and had my clearance 36 hours later.

Apart from my obvious personal revulsion, I think "McCarthyism" damaged the effectiveness of the Department of State more than most people realize. Many of the best China experts that the department had were either discharged or sidetracked into non- China related work. This deprived China affairs of some very smart, even brilliant people. Even worse, an aura of what today might be called "political correctness" permeated the department, resulting in caution of expression and considerable intellectual cowardice. For example, when I was assigned to our embassy in Taipei in 1956, I found the political section appalling. It was so conservative, so cautious, so wedded to the safe path, that its intellectual contribution to US policy making was almost nil. This was the most unfortunate legacy of the McCarthy era. Any bureaucracy finds it difficult to consider new approaches - much less take them - and when that is combined with fear you have an unthinking institution.

So my first impression of Dulles was rather negative, the views of a fairly "liberal" anti-communist Democrat, working in a very Republican administration. But I generally measure people on how they perform and over time, and my opinion of Dulles rose measurably. Initially, I feared he was an adventurer; he sided with the military in several debates concerning the development and use of nuclear weapons. In the secretary's and deputy secretary's offices during meetings and phone conversations I listened to the arguments dealing with China; I was appalled. Bedell Smith, a fine soldier and good deputy also disappointed me by siding with Dulles. Fortunately, President Eisenhower had the sense to toss out an almost unanimous State and Defense recommendation to use nuclear weapons. This aspect of Dulles jolted me, but as time went on, my anxieties diminished.

I have one story - both amusing and disturbing - about my relationship to Dulles. During one of the off-shore island crises with China - before the well known Chinmen and Matsu crisis in 1958 - the PRC (The People's Republic of China) and Nationalist Chinese had been exchanging artillery fire back and forth in some small islands in the Taiwan Straits, the Da Chen islands, as I recall. We intervened, moving Seventh Fleet ships to the vicinity to deter the mainlanders and eventually evacuate the Nationalists. In the process we demanded the Nationalists cease firing unless fired on. A truce of sorts developed after tough negotiations with President Chiang Kai-shek. I was following the crisis closely. While Dulles was in Europe, the Nationalists resumed shelling and the Communists responded, so that we had renewed hostilities - although at a relatively low level. In a meeting with the assistant secretaries in preparation for an NSC meeting, Dulles asked Robertson whether the truce had held. Robertson assured him that the Nationalists had behaved. In the back benches I created a stir by letting everyone know Robertson was wrong. I think it was Bowie who urged me to speak up. In any event I finally raised my hand - very much like a school boy. Dulles recognized me and I disputed Robertson's answer, giving the facts, which were in a memorandum already sent to the secretary. Robertson was furious and when I stuck to my guns mentioning the memorandum, Dulles asked O'Connor to check, which he did promptly and confirmed my account. Dulles grumbled an acknowledgment. Bowie, Byroad and Merchant were amused, while Robertson was fit to be tied. The issue was not a minor one since several admirals were in favor of using nuclear weapons against the Chinese. I was baffled by Robertson's behavior. He was too involved to have been ignorant; he wasn't stupid. He must have been suffering from a powerful compulsion to protect his pals in Taipei. O'Connor told me I was lucky to have been right and laughed; Robertson did not talk to me for a month; but my good relationships with his staff in EA continued without noticeable damage.

My attendance at the SEATO ministerial and Geneva meetings generated some prejudices in me about international conferences, reinforced perhaps by my second-hand observation of the negotiations for the Korean War armistice, the peace and security treaties with Japan as well our treaties with Taiwan and Korea. International conferences with their opportunities for high level contact were more important in the 1950s and 1960s than they are today when there are so many venues for personal contact. Now, international conferences are a debased currency. In my time in the secretariat, high level international meetings were rather rare and therefore targeted on critically important matters. Now, they are routine, often very large and frequently frivolous. Their cumbersome size was a drawback in those days, and remains so today.

I found conference preparations very tedious. I was quite cynical about the amount of paper produced by the bureaus and offices; that was particularly true for the Geneva conference where in my S/S capacity I had to read every paper from beginning to end. I knew that the Secretary and his senior assistants would never read most of these documents. Many were not worth reading; quite a few were prepared to fill arbitrary briefing book requirements. Even with all this paper flow, there was not enough attention paid to contingency situations which, for example, dominated at Geneva. Some important papers on critical policy issues were warped by the kind of ideological posturing that obstructed communication with our adversaries. The extremes of these papers were reflected in Dulles' refusal to shake the hand Zhou Enlai extended to him or to communicate directly with the Chinese. Not only did we demonized the Chinese to our own disadvantage but we also complicated our dealings with the Soviets. Today, of course, we have better means of communicating with both countries, but we still like to demonize our adversaries.

Q: In 1955, you were assigned to the language school in Taipei. How did come about?

GLEYSTEN: I was "Wristonized" in 1954-55. I was not unhappy by the prospects of joining the Foreign Service. In fact, the process went very smoothly. I worried that some Foreign Service officers might resent my joining the ranks by way of the Civil Service, but I came across no apparent animosity. In the long run, I don't think Wristonization of civil servants hurt the officers who entered the Service through the regular examination process. I transferred at about the same pay level as in the Civil Service: GS-11 to FSO-5 (later reclassified to FS0-7).

About the same time I saw an advertisement seeking applications from officers who were interested in becoming Chinese language officers through a difficult languages program. I put my name in, and I soon found myself in the first class of the Chinese language school that had just resumed operations in Taichung, Taiwan, having been dormant from the time the Communists captured Beijing in 1949.

I spoke ordinary Chinese quite fluently, but I was only semi-literate. While I knew some characters, I could not read a newspaper or a novel. I had grown up bilingual in English and spoken Chinese and this enabled me to cover the full language course in about one year, less than half the time that a non-Chinese speaker would have taken. I graduated with a high rating-good enough to interpret informally in both directions.

There must have been seven or eight of us at the Chinese language school. Over half were from the Foreign Service; the others belonged to other agencies-USIA, CIA, and Defense. We had to work in makeshift quarters in a rented house. My classroom was a kitchen; there was no furniture so that we sat on the floor until simple furniture finally arrived. By the time I left, the school had appropriate class rooms and adequate furnishings.

There was a lot of comradery among us. We studied hard for long days for many weeks. Then we would on occasion indulge ourselves - sometimes at a resort and some of us drinking too much. That cemented friendships. We had close relations with our teachers; we lived as a small community. Among my colleagues-most of them married-in the first class were Paul Popple (deceased), Bill Thomas, Paul Kreisberg (deceased), Harold Champeau, Frank Burnett, Jim Elliot, and Randy Raven. David Dean arrived about the time I left. Most of them were newcomers to Chinese language. In general, I think the course was very good. FSI did a first class job in reopening that language school. I well remember how hard I worked-sixteen hours each day. I wanted to raise my level of comprehension so I would be able to navigate well in Chinese, and I wanted that done sooner rather than later. The extra hours helped me graduate after the first year. If I had not spoken the language as a child and if I had not had brushed up at Yale, I would have had a much more difficult time.

The faculty was locally hired. Nicholas Bodman was the first head of the school. He was an established linguist -although with little knowledge of Chinese and somewhat impractical. Despite some criticism of his performance and lots of practical problems, he successfully managed to revive the school. He was replaced by Gerald Cox.

I learned Mandarin which is the Chinese dialect that we generally use in our discussions and negotiations. I think we were pig-headed in limiting ourselves to Mandarin, largely because that was what our teachers thought we should be taught. It suited me, of course, because Mandarin was the dialect I learned as a boy, and it was the national language in both the PRC and Taiwan. But the reality is that dialects are used extensively in both places. It would have been very useful to have officers fluent-or close to it-in both dialects. It would have helped me in both my first and second tours on Taiwan - even though it might have resulted in a greater emphasis on the China area in my future career. I recognize practical limitations, particularly finding the extra time to study a dialect.

At the end of my training I was assigned to the Political Section in Embassy Taipei. The political counselor, Paul Meyer, invited me and my wife to Taipei for an interview and dinner. He was a friend of my wife's family, having been a colleague of Edmund Clubb. After a very pleasant evening with the Meyers, I learned a few weeks later that he arranged with the ambassador to have me shifted to the consular section, because he decided my views were out of line with embassy thinking. Indeed, they were! So I was shuffled off to the consular section without training, reporting to a wonderful, almost always drunken consular veteran who gave me an abbreviated version of the consular course.

I spent six months in the consular Section. I never regretted the assignment; it was good experience. I was a bit disappointed about being diverted from the political Section, but I thought officers should have broad experience in their younger years, including consular work. I learned a lot in the consular section - how to issue visas, how to interview people, the complications of immigration issues, etc.. There were just two officers in the section, so that my exposure to the various aspects of consular work was quite wide. I also was able to use my language skills quite frequently-much more than if I had been in any other section of the embassy. I usually did my own interviews without the help of a translator.

While in the consular section, I worked on both non-immigrant and immigrant visas as well as services to Americans - including protection and passports. In the mid-1950s, Congress authorized a vast increase in the Chinese immigrant quota. The new law allowed people who were refugees from the mainland, who could make a case, to immigrate to the US along with their families. Most of these people were in Hong Kong, but there were also some in Taiwan. A special consular section staffed by State and INS was established in a different building to handle this work-load. By the time I got to Taipei this special program was coming to an end. The residual work fell to the consular section, giving me some exposure to many of the applicants. Some, like Anna Chennault, struck me as hardly fitting the definition of refugee. I didn't have much sympathy for them. Incidentally, Chennault later managed to wangle a visa from someone else.

I refused quite a few applications, both for immigrant and non-immigrant visas. I was reversed in a few cases by the DCM, James Pilcher. I told him it was not his business, and I made sure that he, rather than I, signed such visas and that his action was noted in the files. All of those cases were matters of political favoritism - a not uncommon practice. My genial boss was more willing to bend than I. In the process I learned a negative lesson, and throughout my career I tried not to pressure decisions by consular officers.

My first ambassador was Karl Rankin. He was succeeded by Everett F. Drumright in 1958. The DCM for my whole tour was Jimmy Pilcher, who just died recently. He knew little about substance but had considerable experience as a senior consular officer, including a feel for management. He had served in China, but was not a language officer; I felt his principal agenda was to get along with people, especially the ambassador and the Chinese in Chiang Kai-shek's regime. Rankin was a newcomer to the Chinese scene who had distinguished himself in emergency relief activities and Cold War operations in Greece. He became our ambassador at the peak of our confrontation with the PRC, and he was very ideological about Communists - Greek or Chinese, they were all the same to him. Pilcher echoed him.

Drumright, on the other hand, was a China expert, a language officer with several tours in China. He had been DCM in Korea during the Korean war and had held a number of senior positions in EA area. Although liked personally by most of his colleagues from China days, some thought he was over his head as ambassador. I don't entirely share their uncharitable view, after seeing the variety of characters appointed to ambassadorial positions. Drumright may not have been brilliant, but he was an improvement over Rankin; he had a better grasp of the Chinese situation and reality. He was only slightly more moderate.

About this time I was promoted on the basis on my performance at the language school-a rare occurrence designed to encourage study of difficult languages. I was surprised and delighted but it made me senior to my boss. To solve that problem I was moved to the economic section, which might have happened in any case. Joe Yager, a strong officer and friend, was the economic counselor for the major part of my two year plus tour. He later succeeded Pilcher as DCM.

I had only been exposed to basic economics at Yale. That was not much of a hindrance. My job didn't require fancy training. Essentially, I took care of issues that did not fall clearly within the responsibilities of the other officers. I was responsible for agriculture, which turned out to be a very important function because the Nationalist government had reorganized itself on retreating to Taiwan, making land reform and agricultural development show cases for aid purposes. These efforts were managed by the Joint Commission for Rural Reform (JCRR), which was one of my liaison responsibilities. I got to know certain officials of this agency well. The present president of Taiwan, Lee Teng-hui, was an agronomist and deputy secretary general of the organization, which was a joint American-Chinese enterprise; its commissioners represented both countries, although by the time I started my job Americans were being phased out.

I attended the commission's staff meetings. The secretary general was a member of the Kuomintang Central Committee. My language comprehension came in handy. There were occasions when the Chinese commissioners and staff would argue in Chinese sometimes in order to shut out the Americans present - the commissioner, the head of US AID, etc. I could follow the debate, which often proved to be quite interesting. I reported what I had heard to both my boss and the political section.

I shared the commercial work with another officer. During my last year, Yager allowed me to work on specific projects. I wrote a big report on the forest industry in Taiwan. I had the benefit of very important help from one of our forestry experts and others in AID. My analysis showed that the very expensive assistance we were providing to the forestry industry was being used to sustain a badly run government monopoly designed to keep prices high as a source of revenue with little regard to forest regeneration. Soon thereafter, our assistance was terminated. I was told my report played a role.

Although Drumright was willing to listen to different views, he was unquestionably a hardliner. To make matter worse, we lacked challenging minds in the upper echelons of the embassy's political structure. Paul Meyer, the political counselor was not qualified for his important position even though he was a Chinese language officer and had served in China. Whether from conviction or because he thought his bosses would applaud his views, he was an unimaginative, unmitigated Cold Warrior who literally censored all attempts to criticize Chiang's regime or deal objectively with Communist China. He had some good political officers under him, whom he kept bottled up doing routine chores. With Joe Yager's collusion, I cheated a little bit to compensate for Meyer. I inserted a good deal of political analysis into the economic section's weekly and monthly reporting. There were occasions when we got bleats from Meyer, because we didn't clear our messages with him. While it was unfortunate we had to resort to this, I felt we were justified in what we did, given the special circumstances. In any event, I'm glad I never served under Meyer.

Part of the staffing problem in China posts was scarcity. A generation of Chinese experts had been decimated by McCarthy; it was not until the next generation came along in the sixties that the Department had an adequate China corps. The other part of the problem was that even though there may have been considerable talent in the pool, the poison associated with China kept many good people away. There were not many volunteers for China assignments. I decided to run the risks of an assignment to Taipei. In fact, I relished the work, and as far as I could tell, it never interfered with my career.

Most controversy about Taiwan centered around assessment of the facts and the almost verboden subject of diplomatic relations with the PRC. Assessment of the facts was complicated by more than the divide between communists and anti-communists. The Chinese population on Taiwan was not of one mind. In the first place, there were two Chinese populations on the island. There was the huge majority descended from immigrants who arrived two or three centuries earlier. Known as Taiwanese or "native" people, they were bitterly resentful about the way the Nationalist Chinese had treated them after the Japanese surrender. There were good grounds for that feeling; the Nationalists had been thoughtless, cruel and terribly corrupt. When these unsavory practices were partially exposed by public protest, it caused a drastic crackdown in 1947 involving massacres of thousands of people. So there was a bitterness that you could sense readily in native constituencies. These people wanted development of Taiwan, not a hopeless and costly effort to recapture of the mainland.

The second group of Chinese - about fifteen per cent of the population - were recent arrivals after the collapse of the Nationalist regime on the mainland. Among them were "good" guys and "bad" guys. The most senior "bad guy" was Chiang Kai-shek himself, but there were many others. Even his son Chiang Ching-kuo, who later became one of my heroes, was at that time associated with ugly activities, including police brutality. Although this group was split between reformers, conservatives, and reactionaries, the latter dominated, and naturally most of the group tended to be mainland-oriented.

The Embassy reported these facts, usually with some bias in favor of the controlling regime. I don't think much fault could be found with our reporting on how the Nationalists maintained their control or about the splits within the Chinese community on Taiwan. The contest between groups came through pretty clearly in our reporting. However, the embassy usually short changed the concerns of the Taiwanese and gave excessive weight to the Nationalist point of view. Spiritually, it was defensive of Chiang and his regime. That was a source of friction for me at all times.

Both Chinese communities on Taiwan viewed us favorably. Both had high expectations about US actions: the Taiwanese - and Nationalist reformers - hoped that we would side with them and ease the repression. The ruling Nationalists wanted us to let them go on as in the past; i.e., supporting their attacks against China, minimizing complaints about their heavy handed rule, maximizing our aid, and boycotting significant contact with prominent Taiwanese natives or other opposition groups. During my first tour on Taiwan, the Nationalists were still talking semi-seriously about returning to the mainland.

I want to add a word about views in Taiwan toward the mainland. Those who were hoping for a return to China proper were members of the Nationalist military and civilian establishment who had fled with Chiang Kai-shek to Taiwan in 1949. The older these people, the more they wanted to return. Over time, a new generation began to participate in policy making and they were not nearly as interested in return to the mainland as their fathers and mothers. I noticed the beginning of this fundamental change during my first tour.

The embassy under Rankin and to a lesser extent Drumright sided with the older generation Nationalists, favoring intelligence and para-military cooperation with them against the PRC. The embassy leadership and the Washington establishment clung to hope that the Communist regime on the mainland would collapse, somehow allowing the Nationalists to return home. People like Walter Robertson, Rankin, and Drumright didn't know the new generation. They had a skewed image of Taiwan.

Although the Kuomintang and the Nationalist government continued to conduct a number of small operations against the mainland, as time went on, there was less and less support for this activity, especially among the younger generation of mainlanders who tended to think a return to the mainland was a pipe dream. Some of them shared the Taiwanese view that provocative activities by the Nationalists might well back-fire with an armed response from the Communists. In the 1950s, these young people did not yet constitute an alternative to the old guard.

Along with a few other young officers, I sympathized with this emerging group of mainlanders. I believe we conveyed some sense of its importance to our conservative superiors in Washington. While this group downplayed its differences with its parents, its focus was firmly on Taiwan - and how to make it a better place to live - rather than the mainland. Members typically believed that if their stewardship of Taiwan was successful, then perhaps their chances of returning to the mainland would be increased.

As part of their approach, the younger leaders recognized the need to entice elements of the Taiwanese population into collaboration, slowly bringing that majority of the people into the government, army officer corps, Kuomintang, and the policy making apparatus. In a muffled but radical break from his father's failed policies, Chiang Ching-kuo became the leader of co-option. Of course, even in this new group there was a nostalgia for China, but the new generation were far more realistic about what could be achieved in the foreseeable future.

In a political sense, the vast majority of Taiwanese were disinterested in, or actually opposed to, the idea of a military return to the mainland. Their opposition seemed more a matter of self-preservation than ideology. They didn't want to be destroyed by a Nationalist pursuit of a lost cause. They didn't want to be the soldiers giving their lives for someone else's foolish dream. Incidentally, by the late 1950s Taiwanese were a majority in the army. Virtually all the soldiers on the off-shore islands were Taiwanese. So there was real significance to this tension about a return to the mainland.

In the 1950s the idea of Taiwan "independence" from "China" was not yet a red hot topic, but it was nurtured in certain parts of Taiwan, especially in the city of Tainan. Its subsequent spread came as a reaction to the old Nationalist policies, to the development of opposition politics, and to the long physical separation of the island from the mainland. The most extreme proponent of independence in those days was Peng Ming Min, who recently ran unsuccessfully in Taiwan's first democratic presidential election. Peng's group emphasized the cultural and historical differences between the Taiwanese and the mainland Chinese and urged the establishment of a "Republic of Formosa." These views were fairly popular in Japan, especially in former colonial circles. Peng was allowed to enter the United States where a substantial independence community also emerged. Taiwan "independence" was an anathema to me, an arbitrary action sure to complicate problems on both sides of the Taiwan Straits.

In May 1957 we were stunned by an astonishing event in Taipei. The Chinese authorities allowed, or did not prevent, a mob to attack and completely trash the Embassy chancery. At a time of maximum conformation with the PRC, this was hardly what we expected in the capital of our great anti-communist ally. The precipitating event was an American soldier's killing of a Chinese whom he claimed was a "Peeping Tom." The victim, Liu Tze-jan, may have been peeping into the bathroom window but he was also a Chinese intelligence operative, possibly engaged in a black market operation. The American, a master sergeant named Reynolds, was court-martialed. Charged only with one count of murder, he was found not guilty by the American army tribunal. A civilian court might have reached the same conclusion on murder but would have permitted conviction for a lesser offense. All Chinese deeply resented this outcome, particularly when they learned that the court had erupted into loud applause on hearing the "not guilty" verdict and that our military had whisked the soldier out of Taiwan.

Following the court-martial, the embassy was subjected to well organized demonstrations - obviously government approved, if not actually sponsored, since some of the demonstrators were members of the government youth league. Normally, no demonstrations took place in Taiwan; anyone who did so risked his or her life. We were of course concerned and kept asking the authorities to clear the streets. Instead, the demonstrations went on and on, with some participants coming from an unruly neighborhood near the embassy populated with discontented Nationalist ex-soldiers. Also nearby was a community of very poor Taiwanese - slums. Rioting began over the lunch hour when the embassy was normally closed leaving just a skeleton staff-marines, communicators, and a few others in the building. The lunch hour was also the time the demonstrators put on the day's special show of anger. On this occasion zealots tried to lower the American flag and the ensuing struggle raised the crowd's fervor. People, led by a vanguard that seemed experienced, then forced their way into the chancery, smashing everything. In my office, for example, they smashed open the safe and totally destroyed my desk, even unwinding the coils in my telephone. Far more serious, they broke into the communications area breaking open all the classified cabinets and ripping out all equipment, including encryption devices, dumping everything all over the place. After several hours, they found and attacked the eight or nine Americans hiding in the vault under the protection of our Chinese staff. This included the marine guard who was disarmed by a courier, himself an ex-marine who had the wits to prevent another killing.

By late afternoon the embassy was demolished. As far as we could tell, nothing was stolen, but we couldn't be sure about our documents and considered everything compromised. Fortunately, none of our American or Chinese staff was killed. There were several injuries - Meyer got brutally hit over the head with a hammer and was never the same again. The marine guard and the courier who disarmed him were badly beaten.

While the riot was in progress, DCM Pilcher made several efforts to get in touch with President Chiang Kai-shek. He couldn't be reached because he was "taking his usual walk"; Chiang Ching-kuo, was similarly unavailable. The foreign minister seemed to do his best to get in touch with the military, but nothing ever happened until too late. Eventually, the military deployed hundreds of military police, but never in sufficient numbers to stop the rioters. Late in the day, the demonstrating crowd became increasingly Taiwanese as the riot spread beyond the embassy, particularly to police stations where demonstrators were being detained. By early evening, things were so out of control that the government declared martial law and brought in two army divisions with tanks and truck-mounted machine guns to stop the struggle. Perhaps more than a hundred demonstrators - mostly Taiwanese - were killed. The episode was a humiliating embarrassment to the government.

Inexperience led to some lapses in my own behavior. I was not in the chancery when the riot broke out. When I left for lunch, the atmosphere was tense, but there was no sign of what would happen. Having lunched at my house with the director of the language school in Taichung and dropped him off at the rail station, I noticed a boisterous crowd as I approached the embassy. As a precaution, I left my car outside and tried to walk in the gates, but I was warned away. I tried every other access was known to me, going to the defense attache's office - which had no idea what was going on - and then to the USIA headquarters, where I picked up some intelligence about what was going on, and stayed there until we evacuated just before the mob sacked that building.

The ambassador was in Hong Kong leaving Pilcher in charge. My own mistake was not to report to Pilcher who had set up a make-shift office in his house. I had tried hard to call the senior officers without success, and I also assumed the USIA people would have passed on word that I had been with them. After leaving them I found my car and drove home, because I was very concerned about spreading chaos affecting my family - my wife and recently born baby. So I became one of the "missing" for a couple of hours until I was finally able to get through on the phone to my boss that night. His comments taught me a lesson.

I am not aware of any definitive US analysis of this extraordinary event. It was very apparent to us in 1957 that the Nationalists in Taiwan were competing fiercely for China's national mantle with a PRC that was vaunting its role as China's new national sovereign. Without the prosperity that later mollified them, it was also clear that the indigenous population in Taipei, especially the poorer people, was disaffected from the ruling authorities. Nationalism and discontent were surely the basic ingredients for the riots. In addition, there were obvious misjudgements - on our side for letting the sergeant go unpunished and on the government's side for allowing the demonstrations to go on when they knew that tempers were running so high.

I accompanied the ambassador when he formally protested the incident to Vice President Chen Cheng who conveniently substituted for the elusive Chiang Kai Shek. Chen, a former general widely admired for the way he cleaned up the brutality and corruption in Taiwan in 1949, apologized and seemed genuinely shocked by what had happened. But neither he nor other leaders provided us many clues. My own speculation was that the Nationalist authorities, faced with both strong competition from the PRC and their own angry countrymen in Taipei, decided to give us a real scare by permitting demonstrations that they cockily assumed they could control. When they finally realized things were getting out of control, they repeatedly miscalculated the amount of counter force necessary, perhaps because commanders were loathe to admit they had lost control.

My explanation did not demonize the Nationalist regime. Coming from a person not known to be enamored of President Chiang, I thought it would appeal to Rankin and Pilcher. Instead, these gentlemen briefly lost their cool about the Generalissimo, accusing him of authorizing a deliberate strike at the embassy by intelligence forces trying to break into our secrets. I rather enjoyed defending the president and his son whom I considered too smart to run such risks against their foreign protector. After a few weeks Rankin and Pilcher resumed their praise of Chiang as a leader of the Free World, and I was also back to my normally critical stance.

Washington was furious about the mob's actions in Taipei - as it should have been. In Taiwan, the story was suppressed, but the regime was chastened. It really bent over backwards to make amends, completely rebuilding the Chancery using its own resources. Washington sent people to help us with the clean up. One of our main tasks was to sort through the material strewn on the floors of the chancery. We decided to burn most of it. Given my S/S experience, I was one of the better trained persons to assess the importance of documents. My impression was that we were not seriously compromised by the mob's actions - although there really was no way to check that impression.

While this was going on, we surveyed all Americans on the island to be sure they were okay and found temporary office space in NAMRU (the Naval Auxiliary Research Unit), an American medical organization. Our move was simplified by having nothing much to take with us. Virtually no equipment escaped destruction. For about six months we had to make do with borrowed furnishings and gradually acquired replacement equipment such as typewriters and communications gear. Although we had our marines, there was no way the temporary building could be made secure; we had to begin from scratch with our files; although we had a few miscellaneous safes that had not been broken into. My memory of our months in those temporary quarters is a real blur.

As I reflect back now on those days in the late 1950s, I would fault the embassy and its mentors in Washington for complacency. We were overly optimistic about Taiwan's alliance and attitude towards us. We did not fully appreciate the agenda of Chiang Kai-shek and his cohorts in the control apparatus. In the intelligence area and military assistance we tended to assume that there was a higher degree of commonality of interests than in fact existed. Of course, we had a shared interest in defending Taiwan from invasion. We also came to share a common interest in the political stability of Taiwan and its economic development.

Ultimately, our government was not prepared to give Chiang Kai-shek a carte blanche, largely because we did not want to risk the dangerous kind of crisis that broke out a year later over the Chinmen-Matsu offshore islands. Yet the behavior of our officials, especially intelligence officers, kept the Nationalists ever hopeful that in one way or another we could be brought to support all of their activities. In sharp contrast to the situation during my second Taiwan tour, our intelligence officials in the 1950s often lacked a nuanced understanding of our policy or pushed it to its limits. They seemed too ready to accept the analysis and information provided by the Nationalist services - after all, they were originally in the same business with the same lingo and aliases during the Korean War period. To make matters worse, by 1958 the CIA Station in Taiwan began dominate the embassy in dealings with the Nationalists - both in reality and appearance. As a result I suspect we were parties to a number of operations against the PRC that should have been squashed by a strong ambassador. Many of these adventures took place in or through Hong Kong, which complicated our relations with the British.

As for the question of responsibility for the embassy's trashing, I think Ambassador Rankin should have pushed harder and longer for a personal explanation from President Chiang - less for what he might say than to register our deep anger with his behavior as an ally. If we had been more forceful and persistent with Chiang Kai-shek, we should have coupled it with some parallel action against the sergeant, whose trigger happy finger started the whole mess. On the later issue, I was in sympathy with the Chinese-it was justice gone awry.

In any event, I learned that it is healthy to have some suspicion of one's allies, that evacuation and emergency procedures should be written and rehearsed from time to time. The Taiwan experience was later useful to me in Korea. The riot shook me thoroughly; it was a traumatic event in my Foreign Service career.

Let me now go to some other issues. We had a big assistance program in Taiwan, especially military. Much of the earlier aid was in form of budget support, which indirectly provided the resources for Taiwan to pay for imports, including military equipment. By the time of my service I believe military assistance was a mixture of grants and credits, administered by the Military Advisory Group (MAAG) and supervised by the Embassy's Political Section. Economic assistance, including agricultural, was administered by a large contingent of experts in AID in coordination with the Embassy's Economic Section. By the latter half of the 1950s the focus was on project assistance: mostly import substitution, such as fertilizer plants, power plants, and other infrastructure projects. Export industries flourished considerably later when aid was drying up. We provided advisors for a variety of industries, forestry management, sugar and rice production, and rural development (through the JCRR). The "Green Revolution" began in Taiwan.

I concluded that agrarian reforms in Taiwan were highly successful; the program was rather brilliant-one of the best then in existence. Some things were handled better in Japan, but Taiwan was a very good show, much to the credit of JCRR and the agricultural advisors we provided. The genetic work done for the "Green Revolution" was pioneering of the highest standards.

The most powerful hope I had when I left Taiwan was that the younger mainlander generation - more realistic about returning to the mainland and less corrupt than their elders - would coalesce with moderate Taiwanese, so that both groups could work in blending the society together. No thoughts of recapturing the mainland, no false hopes, but a focus on accomplishment in Taiwan. To accommodate this, I favored a "Two Chinas" policy that would recognize two Chinese regimes. I knew Chiang Kai-Shek was violently opposed, but I didn't appreciate adequately the resistance such a policy would also encounter from the PRC. I felt dual recognition was a worthwhile goal; faithful to our allies and realistic about Communist China. At least it would have forced us to face up to the issue of recognizing the PRC.

I left Taiwan with "two Chinas" thoughts very much on my mind. I also felt a distinct loyalty to the people on Taiwan. I felt we had an obligation to them; they were victims of an accident of history - ruled by an emigre regime. But I was firmly convinced any successful policy had to embrace the reality of the PRC.

My first tour in Taiwan left me rather sour about many aspects of Embassy Taipei, which I thought it was a badly managed institution. I needn't repeat my criticism of the Political Section under Meyer; Rankin was aloof and out of touch. I felt strongly that an ambassador should know and mingle with his staff. Rankin kept me waiting a month and a half before he deigned to let me pay a courtesy call. That was just rude, particularly since it was not a large organization. Drumright brought some measurable improvement as did Dave Osborn when he replaced Meyer. Nevertheless, orthodoxy hung heavily over Embassy Taipei throughout my first tour. Joe Yager, who became DCM after my departure, deserves much credit for sheltering us and running an effective Economic Section.

Q: In 1958, you were transferred to the Political Section in Tokyo. Was that an assignment you had sought?

GLEYSTEN: Yes, as I recall, I did seek the assignment, although it was one of several possibilities offered by Personnel. I was attracted by the opportunity to work in a political section, and I had an interest in Japan. The combination seemed ideal for me.

As a junior officer in the Political Section, my job was to report on Japan's relations with China, Taiwan, Korea, and East Asia generally as well as to assist the ambassador in a vigorous US effort to promote normalization of relations between Japan and Korea. Like my assignment to Embassy Taipei, my posting to Tokyo began with a jinx. Ambassador Douglas MacArthur complained about the Department's sending him a Chinese language officer who didn't know Japanese. Probably for lack of alternatives, the Department dug in its heels. I survived pretty well for four years despite a very real handicap.

My language deficit was a detriment to my work; I had to use translators and interpreters. I leaned heavily on some my colleagues in the political and economic sections, particularly Al Seligmann and Rick Straus, to help me; they were very kind to do so. Fortunately, most of my contacts in the Foreign Ministry spoke English, and I was able to use my Chinese extensively in my work on China. For example, the head of the China Office in the Foreign Ministry, Okada, did not speak English; we communicated in Chinese in which we both were adequately fluent.

China and Taiwan were also lively issues for Japan in those days. The Chinmen-Matsu off-shore islands had led to a major dispute in 1958 between the two Chinas. The Japanese were very uneasy about our tough but defensive position; in fact, the issue had caused a semi-crisis in US-Japan relations before I arrived. In 1959 the Japanese were still nervous, though less so once Khrushchev publicly disassociated the Soviet Union from Mao Zedong's militant posture. In general the Japanese favored a softer line with the PRC. Within Japan, there were several voices. The LDP reluctantly supported us; the Socialists opposed us - the left wing Socialists particularly because they were very close to the Communist Party. But within all parties there were cleavages - moderates and extremists. Sorting out who was on which side was sometimes very complicated, but I found it extremely interesting. I had to know which faction favored what if I were to have a dialogue with them.

Despite much sympathy for Taiwan, Japanese generally felt China was more important to them than Taiwan, and if it had been left to a majority vote, the country would have switched recognition long before 1972. However, the conservative, anti-communists who dominated US China policy also kept Japan in line by firm advice and trade offs, beginning with Prime Minister Yoshida during negotiation of the Japanese Peace Treaty, and still continuing while I was in Tokyo. I spent a great deal of time talking to varieties of Japanese in contact with China: officials, politicians, and journalists. From these contacts I tried to convey an accurate assessment of Japanese opinion, and, of course, did my duty in explaining our own policy - even though I was out of sympathy with some aspects of it. My years in Tokyo were a wonderful introduction to the kind of detailed analysis that I had to do when moved to Hong Kong in 1962.

Now let me get into greater detail about the Japan-PRC relationship. They did not have diplomatic relations; Japan recognized Taiwan as the government of China, just as we did. But behind this facade, considerable contact developed. PRC officials came to Tokyo where they visited with foreign ministry officials, politicians, and businessmen. Our rules precluded my seeing them. Generally, our Japanese and foreign hosts took this prohibition into account whenever they invited us to social functions. They accepted it as being a silly rule. There were a number of LDP politicians who visited Beijing in addition to greater numbers of Socialists, often shown making deferential approaches to Mao Zedong. So a substantial relationship was developing. Trade was growing. The LDP was trying hard to prevent the Socialists and Communists from monopolizing relations with the PRC. That approach was not viable with our stubborn policy and got the LDP and government into hot water with us on occasion.

The United States tried vigorously to block Japanese contacts with the PRC, sometimes in feckless ways. We sought to hinder the growth of trade as much as we could; failing that, we tolerated trade in civilian areas, such as agriculture, but correctly we stood firm in our objections to Japanese exports of advanced technology and items that could be used for military purposes.

Our negative posture did not change measurably during the four years I was in Japan, but it was clear to me by 1962 that Japan-China relations would grow closer as time passed - regardless of our policy stance. Furthermore, I felt that the Japanese were right and we were wrong. From the beginning of my Foreign Service career until Nixon's visit, I thought the US was wrong in its China policy. This made my tasks sometimes very difficult.

The Japanese had been forced to recognize Taiwan as part of the peace treaty process. They maintained better than just "proper" relations with the Nationalists in part because Chiang Kai-shek had forsworn a demand for reparations. In addition, the Japanese had a nostalgia for Taiwan, their former colony. Unlike Korea, the people of Taiwan had a view of Japan that was almost positive. The occupation had been much more benevolent than Korea's, and some compared Japanese behavior favorably to the early years of Nationalist rule.

Although economic considerations helped drive Japan toward a closer relationship with Beijing, the Japanese wanted to get along with the government on the mainland for moral and strategic reasons as well. Following the disaster of the war against China, the prevalent view by this time was that it would be smarter for Japan to accommodate itself to the powerful ruling government in mainland China. They hoped a closer relationship would advance Japan's security and trade interests. The Japanese thought that we should be more understanding of their position, and I thought they were absolutely right.

There were also some sentimental factors at work, although these were often exaggerated by Japanese under the influence of alcohol. Japanese felt indebted to China for its influence on their culture, and quite a few of them were genuinely remorseful about the barbarity of their past behavior. In those days the Koreans didn't fare so well; the Japanese were much more deferential towards China than Korea.

When I was in Tokyo, the Japanese were much less concerned about China's military strength than we were; there was some talk about Chinese power having a negative effect on Japan, requiring perhaps some degree of remilitarization, but the concern was buffered by the alliance with us. Japan-China relations are much more complicated today than they were in the 1950s and 1960s.

We also spent a lot of time on the Soviet Union. Washington in its directives to us tended to assume a relatively monolithic communist world. Most of us in Tokyo felt differently and when talking to Japanese, we tried to express our views in more sophisticated ways than the black and white oratory stemming from Washington. To their credit the Japanese had a rather accurate sense of complex relations within the communist camp. They would stress that the Chinese communists were quite different from those in the Soviet Union and that within the Chinese Communist Party there were divisions about domestic and foreign issues. The Japanese would provide me with the analysis of their intelligence community, which I eagerly reported to Washington. -particularly since I agreed with much of the Japanese analysis. My reporting was well received at least by some factions in Washington. Since strains were becoming so apparent in Soviet-Chinese relations, it is amazing to me that our ideologues managed to hold off a realistic assessment for so long.

I might at this stage talk a little about Japan's international orientation in the late 1950s and early 1960s. This is important because it affected Japanese policy on Korea, China and the security treaty. When I arrived in Tokyo in 1958, Japan was a country trying to sort out its past and its future; it was a society in flux. The conservatives were in control - Yoshida was no longer the Prime Minister, but still influential. Although a conservative, he did not unqualifiedly defend Japan's actions during the war. He was proud of many Japanese accomplishments, including its post-war effort to pull itself up from the ashes. Yoshida was part of the establishment which tended to be internationalist, anti-communist, pro-business, concerned by left wing radical movements - beyond the Communist and Socialist Parties. All of these views were welcomed by us.

The left was much larger than it is today. There was a large Communist Party, an even larger and growing Socialist Party. Ambassador Reischauer and the political section wondered if and when they would take the reins of government. Within the Socialist Party, there was a faction with views close to the Communists. There was another faction which sometimes sounded radical, but was in fact quite moderate. There was an anti-Soviet nationalist faction within the Communist Party. There were even pro-Soviet, pro-PRC, pro-North Korean figures within the conservative camp! A rather complicated pattern. In general, most of Japan fell into a category between the extremes. It was this middle group that was sometimes hard for us to assess - as in the case of the aborted Eisenhower visit.

I don't think the embassy distinguished itself in mapping out the Japanese political scene for Washington. I remember occasional presentations that were excellent, but the ambassadors, especially MacArthur, had a proclivity to doctor assessments to suit Washington's Cold War thinking. We could have had a better understanding of the political process in Japan, and if we had, we might have done some things better. We did not handle our relationship with forces of the right in a very intelligent way; during the occupation we let the war criminals off too easily; we tolerated the presence of the right wing in places where we could and should have removed them. Many Japanese felt that we were letting our concern with communism and the Cold War stand in the way of a proper appreciation of Japanese sentiments. To some extent, I would say this was a fair criticism.

We also failed to appreciate the degree to which the Japanese left had earned credibility in society because of its anti-regime, anti-war positions in the 1930s and 1940s. Although we took note of this in our reporting, we didn't give it enough weight. When I first arrived, I went to a lecture by a semi-academic politician - who had been recommended to me by some of my moderate Socialist contacts on China. His lecture stunned me by its naivete about the Soviet Union and PRC as well as the severe misunderstandings he had about US foreign policy. He had a neutralist vision devoid of reality about the practical world; his policy recommendations were disastrous. I wondered how reasonable Japanese could support such crap, but in fact this man had considerable influence in university and political circles. It stemmed from his cache as an opponent of Japan's military governments. Baffling as they sometimes seemed to us, these attitudes affected Japan's behavior - regarding revision of the security treaty, policy toward China and so on.

In the late 1950s and early 1960s, I was worried about the Japanese public's apparent receptivity to left-leaning neutralist ideas. I was more bothered by left-wing of the larger Socialist Party than by the Communist Party that had already demonstrated some genuine nationalistic sensibilities vis a vis the Soviet Union and China. Nevertheless, I didn't really fear that the left would come to power in Japan; I thought that the LDP would find a way to block them or that they would come to their senses before taking power.

On the conservative side, I underestimated Japan's willingness to go along as a sort of junior partner to the US - even though gradually moving along to a more equal relationship. I predicted that by the end of the 20th Century, the Japanese would become the "Gaullists of East Asia"; a more independent, nationalistic, and possibly nuclear Japan - though no more hostile to us than France. I did not cherish that prospect and urged that we try to forestall it by establishing a web of carefully crafted relationships. I remember writing a number of commentaries along these lines. Reischauer disagreed with me, and so far he has proven right. In the complicated "sorting out" to determine Japan's future policies, the direction and speed of Japan's economic development and trade have played an enormous part, helping the conservatives and damaging the left, which has proved unable to accommodate if not completely incompetent to deal with these matters. Failures of the communist world have further limited Japan's choices. The conclusion of this process has not come as a great surprise to me, but I did not believe that the pattern would be quite as clear or as helpful as it has been to our interests.

Last, I might just make few remarks about the Japanese decision-making process. When I was in Tokyo - and I think this is still very much the case - bureaucrats, all the way down to lower levels, played a powerful role and were exceptionally aware of the political context in which they operated. For example, in making recommendations to the office director, the third ranking officer in the Korean section of the Foreign Ministry would know our views, probably from being the silent note-taker at a variety of our meetings with Foreign Ministry officials. He would also be familiar with opinions of key Diet members, often by having talked to politicians himself as a result of personal relationships. My sense was that Japanese bureaucrats were more knowledgeable of views in the Diet than we were about the Congress. This exposure helped young officials shape decisions to be approved by their bosses. Incidentally the number three on the Korea or China desk was often a marked man expected to rise to deputy foreign minister or ambassador. Many of the senior officials I worked with later started there.

In addition, every level of the bureaucracy was more conservative than the one below - which is not uncommon in any bureaucracy. Decisions made by consensus moving upwards were hard to overturn; sometimes we did succeed but it was always tough sledding. The process gave the Japanese bureaucracy an image of independent power, but it was not quite as self-contained as people imagined. It is interesting to note that much of the consensus building between the government and the politicians was done at junior levels. That these officials could advise their superiors about political sentiment struck me as quite a contrast to the Department of State.

JAMES COWLES HART BONBRIGHT
Vice Consul

Ambassador James Cowles Hart Bonbright was born in 1903 in Rochester, New York. He received a bachelor's degree from Harvard University. He entered the Foreign Service in 1927. His career included positions in Canada, Belgium,

France, and Washington, DC, and an ambassadorship to Portugal. Ambassador Bonbright was interviewed by Peter Jessup in 1986.

BONBRIGHT: I think in my class there were about 35 out of maybe 750. I think that was about it. They didn't call us up right away; we were passed and then put on ice for the summer. I got called up in September of 1927. I took the oath. Our class was divided. Of course, everybody wanted to go to Europe, and the result was that one out of 35 did. He went as vice consul to Seville, Spain. The rest of us were divided half and half between South America and the Far East. We were asked which we preferred. For some reason, I never cared a hoot or had any interest in South America -- none. So I opted for the Far East. Then we were asked whether we preferred China or Japan. I put down that I would prefer to go to China. So finally when the assignments came along, I was assigned to Nagasaki as vice consul.

Q: Maybe somebody thought that was in China.

BONBRIGHT: Possibly, but I don't think so. Anyway, I knew there was some openings in China, so with some trepidation, I went to the fellow who was the head of the Foreign Service school, who had taken care of us, and I said to him, "I'll go, naturally, wherever I'm sent, but I had expressed a preference for China." I wondered why the shift had been made.

He said, "You want China, so we'll fix it." They did; they changed it and sent me as vice consul to Canton.

Q: Which would be much more interesting than Nagasaki then.

BONBRIGHT: I would have thought so. I did think so. So that was that. In those days, you went through the Foreign Service school, so-called, before you went abroad. They had this school in the State Department. We all went in together and we were divided into groups and would spend a week in different sections. One week we'd spend in the visa office, one in the passport division, one in the economic reporting division, one in the political office, to give you a taste of what was going on in the Department. Actually, I was late. I got acute appendicitis and had my appendix out that spring, so I didn't get out as soon as the rest of my class, but I did finally get underway in late July of 1928.

Q: Good morning, Ambassador Bonbright. We will continue. You were approaching Canton.

BONBRIGHT: I sailed for Canton from San Francisco in late July of 1928. It was one of the President lines. It was a lovely trip, found some time to walk and read and stops at Honolulu and Japan, Shanghai, finally Hong Kong, and then a river boat up to Canton, as I recall, about 90 miles up the Pearl River. It was interesting to see the boats. There had been a lot of pirating at that time and the engine room had been wired off with heavy bars so that if the pirates came aboard, they couldn't get at the vital part of the ship. I think that probably discouraged them.

In Canton, the consulate general was located, along with the consulates of many other countries, on the island of Shamin. It had not been the garden spot of the East; it was originally a sandbar lying close to the native city. It had undoubtedly been given over to the foreigners to use because of its unattractiveness and lack of value to the Chinese. As so often happened out in the East, western occupation soon turned even a very poor site into a garden, compared to the native part. When I was there, there were some lovely big trees, lovely gardens and walks, and it was a very pretty place. The island was about a quarter of a mile across, I think, and maybe half a mile long, and that was it. It was divided into two concessions: the British concession, which took up about two-thirds of the island, and the other third was the French concession. Our Consulate General was located in the French concession.

It was a strange feeling at first, because when I arrived it was only two years after the British had been having a lot of trouble with the Chinese -- in '26. Things were still moderately tense, so much so that the island was surrounded -- not completely surrounded, but the whole side of the island which faced the canal and the native city was protected with barbed wire and machine gun nests at the two bridges. On the other side of it, on the river side, there were always two or three foreign gunboats, British and French, and sometimes one of ours, from the South China Patrol. At first this gave one a sense of security, but eventually -- and it didn't take too long -- one got a little restless. It's like the feeling of living on a ship, and you wanted to get the hell off of it. We didn't fuss around with the native city, but we did take trips up and down the river by boat, and then also there was a nine-hole golf course, which was some miles outside the city and on property owned by the railroad company, which ran from Canton to Kowloon. We were able to get there without any trouble, and this provided some recreation for those of us who liked golf, as I did.

Q: Was there a provincial general in charge of the area? Was there a more central government?

BONBRIGHT: There was a civilian governor, but, of course, there was constant fighting in one part or another down there, one warlord or another trying to take over somebody else's territory. In fact, when you went out on the river at one period there, you'd quite often see bodies of soldiers floating by, though they were never near enough so that we heard any gunfire. The nearest thing to a fight that we saw was when the Cantonese Navy, if you could call it that, mutinied. We went up on the roof of the consulate general and watched the proceedings. There were one or two gunboats of very modest size and equipment, and the rest of the Navy consisted of motor boats with a piece of iron stuck up in front with a pole and the gun stuck through it. I think it was only able to move when the tide was favorable. Not very impressive. Then the government Air Force attacked the Navy and started dropping bombs. I was surprised to see a great splash in the water, but nothing was hit. Since there was very little defense and they could fly fairly low, it looked like extraordinarily poor marksmanship, to say the least.

Q: Were these old biplanes?

BONBRIGHT: Yes, I think they were. Some time later, I was talking to a Chinese official at some function or other, and I remarked about this strange thing. He looked at me with some surprise, as though saying, "You idiot. Don't you know that those were the best ships we had? By no means were we going to hurt them." So it was just play.

The consulate general itself consisted of a moderately large building with the offices on the ground floor, and the top floor was a comfortable apartment for the consul general and his wife and family. The second floor was divided in half: one half was for a married couple among the subordinate officers, and the other side had a mess and, I think, three bedrooms for single officers. We were all very comfortable and very well looked after. I think we had five servants working for us in the mess, keeping the apartment for us. It cost, I think, 100 Cantonese dollars a month for that. That was the equivalent of about 37 U.S. dollars, which, divided between three officers, didn't come to very much. So we lived well.

Q: Would you say that by that time on were already old China hands, or people who were there about your time who would become the old China hands? In other words, were there officers who had done several tours in China already?

BONBRIGHT: They always tried to have at least one officer there who had gone through the language course up in Peking. The rest of us didn't know any Chinese. The one who was there when I was, was a man named Newhall from California. He was a delightful companion but didn't stay very long; he retired and went home. This pointed up to me one of the faults of the language system up there. It began with three glorious years of study in Peking, where you became an interpreter for the legation and lived the life of Riley. After those first three years, then you went out to the sticks. You got the cream at the start of the tour instead of at the end, and I think they lost quite a few people because of that process. People were tempted to go into the language school and all because of the pleasant and interesting life. I don't think many of the ones who were at the language school when I was there stayed on, but some of them who had already been through did -- John Carter Vincent and John Davies, a number of them. Most of them had been children of missionaries who already had a start and knowledge of China and the language, and just naturally continued when I was there.

Q: Missionaries were still there in strength, different denominations?

BONBRIGHT: Very much so. I remember one coming into the office where I was, and he wanted to check in. I was talking to him about it, and he was going into what seemed a bad part of the country at that time. I asked him, "How are you going to make out? For several days you're pretty much out of touch with anybody."

He said to me, "God will provide." That closed the argument.

Q: With that conviction.

BONBRIGHT: I wished him well but wasn't too hopeful for him.

The language problem was difficult. Most officers wanted to work on language of some sort to get along, but it didn't really make any sense to study Cantonese, because it wasn't understood about 30 miles outside the city -- no good. The official Mandarin language that was taught in Peking, that was all right for dealing with officials, but unless you were going to spend your life out there, it really didn't seem too profitable. I thought I'd try to take a go at Japanese, just to study something. I made an arrangement with the Japanese vice consul there; weekday mornings at 7:00 o'clock, I went over to his apartment and took Japanese lessons from him. This didn't last more than a few months, because I became sick later and had to leave. But at the end of it, my Japanese was very, very elementary, to put it mildly, whereas I thought there was decided improvement in his mastery of English.

In the office we had a consul general who was Douglas Jenkins, a very nice man, with a nice wife. Number two consul was a man, a bachelor, named James McKenna, whom I'm very fond of. I admired him and liked him. He went home on leave fairly soon, though, so he was away for a couple of months. While he was away, the rest of us didn't pay much attention to the servants, except that we did sort of notice that the quarters for the servants, which were separated from our building by about 20 feet with a gangway between, seemed to be getting pretty crowded. We didn't do anything about it. When McKenna came back from leave, the first thing he did, he went out there and saw what was going on. He'd go up to one fellow and say, "Who's that?"

"That's my son-in-law."

"What's he doing here?"

"He's here on a visit."

"When is he going?"

"He's going tomorrow."

And he'd move on to the next fellow. "Who's that?"

"That's my mother-in-law's cousin."

"What's she doing here?"

"She's here on a visit."

"When is she leaving?"

"Tomorrow." So within 48 hours, he had it all cleaned out and in ship-shape again. He was wise enough not to just throw them out. He let them do it themselves. A nice man.

For recreation, there were some tennis courts there, too, and then the thing that we all looked forward to was a trip to Hong Kong, which was like going to Paris. The pouch from the State Department would arrive and be unloaded there.

Q: In Hong Kong?

BONBRIGHT: In Hong Kong.

Q: Was it weekly?

BONBRIGHT: Yes, I think it was about once a week that one of us would go down. We'd take turns, because it had to be accompanied, so we'd take turns going down for the pouch and bringing it back. There was no courier service.

Q: Were those caricatures that you see now and then of them strapped to your hand, did that exist?

BONBRIGHT: No, I never had one strapped to my hand. You'd carry it and you'd keep it with you, and you'd sleep on the boat with it. But that gave us a chance to get a breather in Hong Kong a night or two. We'd get the courier duty about once in six weeks, and that was great. There was a certain amount of social life, but mostly the same people that you'd see pretty much all the time, rather formal in its strange way. We used to wear -- not tuxedos, which were too heavy, but we wore these white monkey jackets when we went out to dinner, but we always wore stiff shirts still, and it was hot and damp, and all the men would take an extra collar in his pocket, and after dinner he'd go out and change his collar, just soaking wet. No fun, that. Really, it was a miserable climate.

Q: Did you have Marine guards then?

BONBRIGHT: No. The French had somebody, and the British. They had troops there that were stationed at the bridge into the native city. They must have been English officers or off the gunboats; I forget which.

Q: How long did you stay in Canton?

BONBRIGHT: I was only there about ten months. I felt very poorly all winter; I don't know what I got, but I felt so badly that I'd have to go to bed, and I'd be dragging myself for a week, and then I'd get up and go to the office for a week and drag myself around. Finally, one day I just keeled over in the office. They got a rickshaw and dragged me off to the little hospital on the island. I was in the hospital for about a month under an oxygen tent. They said I'd had some kind of a heart condition, an enlargement of the heart. But I never had any trouble with it afterwards. I was sent home in June of 1929 in a boat, and was met out west by my father and family doctor. They got me home, and I was in bed for six months or more, I guess, and wasn't able to get back to work until the following March of 1930. I hadn't wanted or expected to spend my life in China, but I hoped to last a little longer than that.

Anyway, I was glad, in a way, that I'd been there, and I was glad, too, that I had not tried to make a career out of it, because a lot of those people were very badly burned in the McCarthy era -- the ones I know, I think, quite unfairly.

Q: Service.

BONBRIGHT: They reported as they saw things, which we were paid to do. Speaking of pay, my salary was $2,500 a year, with 5% off for retirement. I think it was several years before I got a big raise to $2,750. In fact, when I entered the Service, the entire budget for the State Department and all our offices abroad was, I think, $19 million.

Q: The whole thing?

BONBRIGHT: The whole thing. They collected about nine or ten million in transport and visa fees, so it cost the American taxpayer about $10 million to run the whole Foreign Service. Fantastic.

Q: And now today?

BONBRIGHT: That wouldn't pay for a consulate in Sarnia, Ontario.

Q: The Secretary asked for a separate 2-point-something billion to fortify and strengthen the embassies for security.

BONBRIGHT: Yes. I might just mention one word about the actual work which I had in Canton, which is not very interesting, nor unusual, either, for a very junior officer. All the political reporting was done by the consul general himself. I had the onerous task of sitting at a desk signing invoices of shipments, tea, rice, and what have you, to the States. When McKenna was home on leave, I took over his work with the visas, or rather, what we called section six certificates in those days, a special part of the immigration laws. The Chinese didn't have regular visas; they got a thing called a section six certificate, which was mostly for students and bona fide merchants who wanted to get over. Just to show how greatly a lot of these Chinese wanted to get to the United States, they would buy part of a business in town and would sit there in the office for a year waiting for a consul to come to investigate. He had a set of books made up to make it look legitimate, when it wasn't at all. I used to go for that, and I was told by the Chinese fellow at the main office, who I went with, that there had been a great opportunity for an aspiring crook to make a lot of money. They figured that you could make about half a million dollars by selling visas and these section six certificates, and if you did this for about six months, that was all the traffic would bear, but that would cover the time that the man would actually get over to the States, get set up somewhere and finally get investigated. By that time, you took your half a million and beat it. I had heard there was one non-career vice consul who did just that, but I don't think he lived to enjoy his ill-gotten gains.

Q: Was there a gimmick where, if they could indicate they had a relative in the States, that entitled them to come?

BONBRIGHT: Yes, that helped, too.

Q: That was very hard to trace whether anybody was a relative, wasn't it?

BONBRIGHT: I think the students were apt to be more legitimate, that they had been accepted by some school or other, as long as the school was in good standing.

Q: Was there an embassy in Peking?

BONBRIGHT: There was a legation at that time, not that there's much difference. As you know, the chief of mission in the legation, the top man can go to the foreign minister, and at an embassy, of course, the ambassador has access to the chief of state of the other country. At that time I think we only had about eight embassies in the world -- Argentina, Brazil, and Chile in South America, and then Britain, France, Germany, Italy -- I'm not sure that even Russia was. But that was sort of an artificial thing and was resented by some people. Sumner Welles did away with it when he came in. He thought the Latin Americans had been discriminated against and were not being treated as well as they should, so he pushed through, making practically every mission in South America an embassy, including Nicaragua and Honduras. Well, of course, then the lid was off; you couldn't very well refuse anywhere. So now for some time there was only one legation left, I think, in Tangier. Now I think they're all embassies -- even Luxembourg.

Everett Drumright received a bachelor's degree in business administration from the University of Oklahoma in 1929. His Foreign Service career included positions in China, the United Kingdom, Korea, Hong Kong, Taiwan, and Washington, DC. Mr. Drumright was interviewed by Mr. Lee Cotterman on December 5, 1988.

DRUMRIGHT: In September 1931, I was assigned back to Washington to take the Foreign Service School course. There I met with about 12 or 14 of my Foreign Service colleagues and we were put through the typical three-month course, from accounting, to immigration, to reporting, political and economic. On the conclusion of the school, which, by the way, was run by James Stewart, I received word that I was being assigned to Hankow, China. Whereupon, I said, "Where is that?" That, in a word, is how I got associated with China.

Q: May I interject there? I note that you were specialized during your Foreign Service career, then, after that, almost entirely in the Far East. How did that come about? I mean, at your personal wishes, or did the Department take a hand and feel that you should remain in that field?

DRUMRIGHT: To continue, I proceeded to Hankow. I might interject here that I received a rough reception upon entering China in that there was a very considerable war going on in Shanghai, where I landed, at the time. The Japanese, who had taken Manchuria in September of 1931, when we were at the Foreign Service School, had, again, attacked the Chinese in the Shanghai area.

I recalled we had to wait at the mouth of the Yangtze River for some time before we were allowed to proceed. And it was very fortunate that we were allowed to go into Shanghai at all. While there, I had to stay about two weeks awaiting transport to Hankow by ship. And I do recall, while in Shanghai, meeting George V. Allen. In fact, I put up with him at his flat in the consular building while I was waiting to proceed on up river to Hankow.

After about two weeks, I did proceed to Hankow by a river boat. And I do recall that that river boat was iron-sided. And I asked the captain why. He said, "Why, we're shot at from time to time by these communist bandits that roam along the river banks so we have to protect ourselves." Well, fortunately, in my case, there didn't appear to be any shooting and so we arrived safely in Hankow.

I had a pleasant several months there under the tutorship of Walter A. Adams, Consul General. And while I was there, I think it was about August of 1932, I received a telegram from Washington inviting me to go to Peking to take the two year language course in Chinese. I thought about it. I talked it over with Lewis Clark, a language officer, and Edmund Clubb, another language officer, and also the consul general, who, by the way, recommended against it.

But in the long run, I had found the China that I had gotten to know by that time, after traveling to Sichuan and Hunan and meeting some Chinese in Hankow, to be charming. I found the Chinese to be an interesting and enjoyable people. And, on that basis, I decided I would, perhaps, try to make China my career. Whereupon, I accepted the invitation and proceeded to Peking where I started my language training, I believe on October the 1st, 1932.

I found the study of the Chinese language to be incredibly difficult, but I stayed with it. I worked very hard at it. In fact, one time I was ordered by doctors to leave for a month because of my health. But I came back and, in due course, finished the language. Whereupon, I was assigned to Shanghai.

I proceeded to Shanghai in December of 1934 and was assigned to what we call the land office, which took care of Chinese affairs, and which also took care of the deeds of Americans who had property in the international settlement at the time. And we also had the protection work, which was not inconsiderable in the land office. I worked there under Edmund S. Cunningham, an old line consular officer.

And while I was there, I recall having one rather interesting event occur. I was sent to Swatow in Guangdong Province in Southern China to obtain a release of a Catholic priest who had been kidnapped by Chinese bandits up in the mountains of Guangdong. I did go to Guangdong. And I went up river and I went as near as I could to where the priest was said to be held. And I worked there with the officials and the like, and made some investigation, and started staying put there. Whereupon, one day, I think after about three weeks, I got word that the priest had been released, not to me, but to the consulate general in Canton.

My work in Shanghai did not involve a great deal of politics or economics at that time. Clarence E. Gauss succeeded Edwin S. Cunningham in 1935 in late 1935, I think it was. And then I was put on political work there. I was there at the time of the so-called Sian Incident when Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek was kidnapped by the Northeast General Chang Hsueh-liang. I recall we had some very interesting times endeavoring to obtain information about this kidnaping.

It made a very interesting story with almost no information coming out of Sian that we could obtain, nor could the embassy seem to obtain very much. We did make contact with an advisor to the Northeastern General Chang Hsueh-liang, and did get some information that threw a little light on the kidnaping. But the kidnaping was over, I believe, on December the 26th of 1936.

Details were slow in coming out about it. And probably some items about that kidnaping have never been made public to this day. But it suffices to say, Chang Hsueh-liang, who had been sent to Northern China to launch a campaign to subdue the Chinese communists who were situated to the north, never took any action. And it was then that Chiang Kai-shek had gone there to investigate this situation. He had gone there himself and then, while he was there, he was kidnapped. It seemed that there may have been some influence on Chang Hsueh-liang from the Chinese communist who, evidently, were in some kind of contact with him.

And it also seems, by hindsight, that the Soviet Russians were involved in that they recommended to the Chinese communists, and probably to Chang Hsueh-liang, that it would be best if Chiang Kai-shek were released. Why? Because the Soviet Russians were very concerned about Japan and the possibility of Japan attacking their eastern borders in Siberia. And they wanted another opponent and the logical opponent was China. Well, that was perhaps the most interesting event that occurred during my assignment to Shanghai.

Then, about March 1937, I received instructions to proceed again to Hankow. I did so and I was doing political reporting up there. I should mention that, when I went there in 1932, banditry, guerilla activity, communist activity, was rife all around that area. But by the time I returned there in 1937 it was quiet. Chiang had actually gone there himself in 1932 and had launched what he called a bandit suppression campaign against the communists, which drove them away from that central China area and enabled the communications between there and Shanghai and on west to Western China to be opened up freely.

I was engaged in some political and economic reporting then at Hankow when, on July 7, 1937, we had the so-called Liuko Chiao (Marco Polo bridge) incident happen near Peking where Japanese military forces attacked the Chinese. That was significant because, rather than being another common, ordinary incident in the annals of Chinese-Japanese affairs, it became the starting point of an eight year war of resistance by the Chinese. That was the main thing in China from 1937 to 1945.

It was not long after the war started that the Japanese also attacked Shanghai in a very large way and started bombing up as far as Hankow. I recall that we had several bombing attacks on the airport, which was just at the outskirts of Hankow. Of course, with the war going full blast and with the Chinese determined to fight a defensive war rather than surrender, we had to think about evacuating, perhaps, some thousand missionaries who lived in the back country of Western, Northwestern, and Southwestern China, which came within our purview at the Hankow Consulate General. I recall we were very busy by the end of July writing letters to our constituents throughout that whole area urging them, unless they had very essential business there, to evacuate or make preparations to do so in case the situation worsened.

Of course, as time went on, the situation did worsen. The Japanese took Shanghai after two months of very intensive fighting and then commenced their offensive toward Nanking, which is about 200 miles west of Shanghai. Again, Chiang Kai-shek threw his very best forces into the fight trying to stop this Japanese offensive. But the Japanese had too much power, and their equipment, their tanks, their artillery, and their very well trained forces, to put up a successful resistance. And so gradually the Chinese were forced back. And it was along about December 10 that they reached the outskirts of Nanking.

That meant that our embassy had to be evacuated and our Ambassador Nelson T. Johnson and part of his staff came up river to Hankow and set up shop in our consulate general. In the meantime, the remainder of the staff, except for one or two, had taken to the U.S.S. Panay, a Yangtze River gun boat of ours, and were moving up stream on about December 12 when that ship was bombed by the Japanese, although they had advanced word that the ship was there and that it was an American ship with official personnel on board. Well, the ship was bombed anyway and it sank, but all personnel managed to get off. We had some injured but, eventually, they, with help from the Chinese made their way to Hankow. That, of course, was another stirring event in the history of the times.

The war went on, with the Japanese gradually advancing. And I should say here that, along about February of 1938, they did make some advances to the Chinese to settle the war on what might have been regarded as somewhat advantageous terms to a country that was being beaten. But Chiang Kai-shek refused it flat out and said he was going to continue the war. And that, you might say, set the policy for the next seven years. So the war went on with the Japanese.

They had taken Canton about the same time they had taken Nanking. No, I'm sorry. It was later. They took Canton later in 1938. And they advanced on the central front up the Yangtze Valley toward Hankow. And, eventually, in August, the Chinese Government decided to move its temporary capital again, this time from Hankow to Chungking in Southwestern Sichuan Province.

They duly made the move with the result that our embassy, then a small group composed of Ambassador Johnson, and Counselor Willis Peck, and three or four other junior secretaries, boarded the U.S.S. Lausanne, the flagship of the U.S. Yangtze fleet, and proceeded to Chungking. I recall that we arrived there about the 8th of August. We had no place to go, no place to sleep, no nothing. But within a short time we arranged with the Standard Vacuum Oil Company to lease one of their warehouses on the south bank of the Yangtze River and set up our embassy with radio communications with Washington.

And we were able to rent some housing from the British Oil Company that had an extensive compound in Chungking and wasn't using much of it. So the ambassador and some of the other personnel arranged housing. I arranged housing up in the hills behind the river from the Standard Vacuum Oil Company. So we began to settle down and establish ourselves in Chungking. It was a difficult situation. Chungking was a backwards city which had come under government control only a few years before that. And there was a period of some months of settling in there.

Meantime, Hankow was lost in October of 1938, and Canton about the same time. That meant that China no longer had any access to the China seaboard. It had lost all the richest and most industrial part of China and the ports to the Japanese. That meant that China had to rely on the back door through Indochina and Burma for assistance from abroad. I would say that the United States, during the first year or two of the war, complained, of course, to the Japanese about their attack on China but did little else. It was more or less a repeat of what had happened in 1931 when the Japanese had taken Manchuria.

But about the time we went to Chungking or a little after, the U.S. Government began to take an added interest in the future of China. And I recall that in 1939 our relations became closer and we began to give them some financial assistance. Meantime, our relations with Japan began to worsen as we put on an embargo against some of these metals and things that they had been importing from us for use in their war efforts.

By 1940, with the Japanese advance then stalled more or less. I would say during the years 1940 and 1941 we had some intense bombing of Chungking by the Japanese. They bombed the city on many occasions and very indiscriminately. I am convinced that the purpose of the bombing was to try to intimidate the Chinese into surrender or the making of some kind of a peaceful settlement. But it didn't work. Mind you, there were well over a million people living in Chungking. And the end result of all this bombing was that the Chinese, within a few months, built a large underground system where that million people could congregate in safety during those indiscriminate raids.

Other than that, I would say the war went along more or less in a desultory way. With the Chinese, of course, becoming weaker and weaker in that they could not receive any help but financial help from abroad because of the distances from the seacoast, and with inflation beginning to heat up vigorously.

I recall that early in 1941 back in Washington we were beginning to take a much deeper interest in China and Roosevelt sent one of his advisors, a fellow named Lauchlin Currie, who, by the way, later turned out to have some communist connection. They sent him out to China to advise the Chinese on their inflation problem. Well, ironically, Currie made a suggestion that the Chinese did accept. And that was that China set in motion immediately a tax plan in kind. In other words, they set up a system of taxing the farmers, who were really about the only productive element in the area under the government's control, to pay a good part of their taxes in kind. After it was set in motion in 1941, this plan helped to curb the inflation problem to a considerable extent.

Toward the end of 1941 an American volunteer group began to become active under General Claire Chennault, with the result that the Japanese air attacks in Western China were curbed. That was an important element there. I might say in regard to 1941, that in April, Nelson T. Johnson, who had been Minister and Ambassador to China from 1929 to 1941, was reassigned to exchange places with Clarence E. Gauss. In other words, Johnson went to Australia as minister and Gauss came to Chungking as ambassador. It was a point of considerable change as far as China was concerned.

Nelson Johnson had always been sympathetic to the Chinese effort and had appreciated all that the Chinese had done under the most difficult circumstances to carry out the war against Japan. Clarence Gauss came in with the idea, it seemed, that the cause was lost in China and he had very little interest in doing anything about it. Nevertheless, the United States did continue to make some financial assistance available to China. That was about all we could do, other than help them build the Burma Road and try to ship in some supplies that way. Of course, that proved to be largely a failure because of the distances and the difficulties of the road.

Late in 1941 I had orders to proceed back to Shanghai, which I had left in 1937. I flew to Hong Kong and spent a few days there. I arranged to get a ship to Shanghai. As it turned out, it was the last commercial ship to make the trip from Hong Kong to Shanghai because the British had premonitions that something was going to happen and they ordered their shipping back. In the case of my ship, the radio word was not received and we proceeded on into Shanghai. I arrived December 2, 1941.

The war started early in the morning of December 8th for us. I was sleeping peacefully in the Cathay Hotel on the Bundt when I heard the opening cannon shots which were directed from the Japanese concession to the American and British gunboats which were anchored down river about a mile from the Japanese settlement. Well, that bespoke the opening of the Pacific War as far as we were concerned.

I went over to the consulate and we burned our papers and were ordered to go into internment in a hotel across the street from the consulate at noon of December 8th. We did so and we were then interned under Consul General Frank Lockhart and his Deputy, Edwin Stanton, until the end of June of 1942, when, with the help of the Swiss and negotiations undertaken through them with the Japanese, there was a swap of diplomats. We and our diplomats in Japan proceeded by ship then to Lourenço Marques, in Portuguese East Africa, where there was an exchange of diplomats.

Q: Ambassador Drumright, what was your personal feeling toward the host government after you were interned? Did you still have the same viewpoint on the ability of the Chinese to make a good accounting of themselves in this war?

DRUMRIGHT: I felt when I left Chungking that they could manage to stall out the war. China is a tremendous country and it would take millions of Japanese to overrun the whole country, if there was someone deciding to put up opposition. Chiang Kai-shek was a very determined man. I knew him personally. I had met with him quite a few times. And there was no doubt in my mind that he would continue to prosecute the war as long as it was possible at all.

Mind you, he also had to contend with the Chinese communists. They were utilizing this war -- this was an important matter, too -- to build up their forces, to build up their strength in Northwest China. From the start of the Japanese War Chiang Kai-shek could no longer divert any attention to them up there, so they had a pretty free hand in parts of Northwest China and North China where they very cleverly penetrated behind the Japanese lines and began to build up their forces. In 1938 they were supposed to have reached an agreement to fight the war together, but there was virtually no effort on their part thereafter to do anything to forward the war against Japan. They were 100 percent bent on building up their own forces, of course.

I was not one who was defeatist about it, no. In that way I differed from our ambassador in Chungking. And I still felt that way when we returned to Washington in August of 1942. I was assigned some work there. I helped arrange a treaty whereby we gave up our extraterritorial rights in China. We had had those rights since 1840. And we decided as a gesture, at least at that time, to rescind those rights. And I also wrote some reports on conditions in occupied China when I was there.

I was then reassigned to China. I was told that we were opening some one-man posts in the interior of the country; namely, places like Chengdu, northwest of Chungking, and Sian in Northwest China, and Luichow, further in China, and even Dawai or Urumqi in Sinkiang, and I believe, also, Kueiin in Southwest China.

Q: Did you identify with the old China hands, as they were called in some places in those days?

DRUMRIGHT: Well, I might have been considered an old China hand, in a sense, since I went there in 1932 and here it was 1943, 11 years. By that time I had been living there most all those years. Yes, in a sense, although I was not the old China hand of the treaty ports, which largely meant the business types and the missionaries, also, if you want to call them old China hands. People who lived out there for 20, 30 years, yes.

Q: I ran into many of them in London, where I was in the early 1940's.

DRUMRIGHT: In when?

Q: In London in the early 40's.

DRUMRIGHT: In the early 40's? Well, I went there in 1946, myself. I'll tell you about that later.

Q: Sure.

DRUMRIGHT: Anyway, I returned to West China in January of 1943. And I was asked by Ambassador Gauss which post I wanted. And I chose, at that time, Chengdu, where we were about to build a big airport to bomb Japan. I spent a few months in Chengdu, which was on the quiet side. Whereafter, I was told there was an opening in Sian if I wished to go there. I wrote back and said I did like the idea of going to Sian.

So I went up there about May of 1943. I took up my abode there and spent the next 13 or 14 months in the Sian area. Now, Sian was the most advanced area toward the Japanese occupied areas and also the Chinese communists to the North. So it was a place of considerable importance, although we had never had anyone there before. I was busy there reporting, both on the Japanese in the occupied areas, and, as much as I could get, on the Chinese communists about 100 miles north of Sian where they had their headquarters in Yen-an.

During that time I made a long trip to the area east of Sian to look into the situation and investigate our missionaries and that sort of thing. I suppose I spent three weeks or so, including bicycling throughout Hunan Province in central China, and going over as far as the town where exchanges took place between Japanese occupied China and Chiang Kai-shek's China. There was a town there where they exchanged people and goods. It was a rather interesting little town where you could see a great deal of activity going on all the time. I was curious to see this town and I did so. And I wrote a report to the State Department about it later.

One of my main activities in the Sian area was to evacuate American missionaries who had remained there after 1937, and had done so safely until about April of 1944 when the Japanese launched an attack south to open up their corridor there from north to south, between Peking and Hankow. We, fortunately, had a couple weeks word that something was in the wind so I was able to contact our missionaries, mostly by letter, who were over in those areas and to urge them to move out. And virtually all of them did so. I recall arranging for their evacuation to Chungking by special trains and by buses. It turned out to be a successful evacuation.

In about August of 1944 I was instructed to return to Chungking. I spent about three months there in the embassy doing some political reporting. And during this time we had the changeover from General Stilwell to General Albert Wedemeyer. That is to say, Wedemeyer took over the command of American forces, such as they were, as Chief of Staff to the Generalissimo. The selection of General Stilwell had been an unfortunate one. He had never managed to see eye to eye with the Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek. And finally, the Generalissimo felt obliged to ask for his recall. It was then that General Wedemeyer came and took over. I would say the atmosphere improved tremendously at once.

Q: Fortunately, I'm old enough to remember all those names from the World War II press of those days.

DRUMRIGHT: In the meantime, President Roosevelt had sent General Pat Hurley as his special representative to look in on the situation out there in West China. I have a feeling that his recommendation had something to do with the replacement of General Stilwell. And shortly thereafter word came that General Hurley would replace Ambassador Gauss as ambassador. I recall that occurring about mid-November, at which time I was called back to Washington. As a matter of fact, Ambassador Gauss and I left about the same time.

Now the situation out there had worsened by that time because the Japanese had conducted this further offensive in Central China that I mentioned before. And they also had advanced to Kweilin in South China, and were threatening to advance on Hunan. But that proved to be a bit too much for them. I think Wedemeyer and the Generalissimo working together threw more forces into the action down there and slowed that advance so that it was not effective.

The situation in China was almost verging on the desperate. Many people, including Ambassador Gauss, thought the Chinese had no chance of holding out. And other people, like Theodore White, the writer, were of that mind. Some of my colleagues in the Foreign Service thought we would do better to work with the Chinese communists whose power had advanced very considerably, as I mentioned before. So that was the situation, in a few words, when I left in November of 1944.

I reported in to the Department at the beginning of 1945. And I recall one of my first jobs was to write a paper on the potential for some kind of a settlement in China between the government and the communists. I did submit a paper. I think a few people have looked at it since but I think things turned over a little too rapidly.

Anyway, the war was over in Europe during the spring of 1945. And President Roosevelt died and President Truman came in. I was in Washington when that all occurred, that melancholy era. In the meantime, things continued to worsen in China. Vice President Wallace was sent out there to check into the situation and submitted a report. That's just in passing. It became a question, then, in Washington as to what to do. And about that time the atomic bomb was dropped on Hiroshima and the second one on Nagasaki. And the war in Asia came to a conclusion in August. Whereupon, the situation in China became more and more acute, what to do, how to solve the situation.

Well, at the beginning we helped Chiang Kai-shek and his forces recover the occupied areas of China. General Wedemeyer was very instrumental in that activity on the military side. Then there came a recall of Pat Hurley and his going before the Congress. Perhaps you might remember that?

Q: Yes, I do.

DRUMRIGHT: Anyway, there was the big hoopla about China and should we continue to assist the government, our ally, as we had in the past, or should we try to do something to work a compromise between the government and the communists. And this became a big issue after the surrender of Japan and the return of the Chinese government to East China.

Then, there came along the question of Manchuria. As you recall, there had been the Yalta Agreement which had, unfortunately in my view, returned the Russian rights to all they had given up before in Manchuria and Mongolia. And that meant the Russians had moved in. In fact, they moved into Manchuria a few days before Japan surrendered and made an effective seizure of Manchuria, which under treaty was to go back to the Chinese Government. Well, we made a few stabs at helping the government, but they came to nought.

The Chinese Government actually made a big mistake, and this is, perhaps, hindsight, in sending their main forces into Manchuria to try to seize it from the Chinese communists, who were being put in place there by the Soviet Russians, and handed over all the Japanese military equipment that had been left there. This did not succeed with the result that the Chinese suffered some serious military defeats there. This led, eventually, to their being driven off the Mainland.

Our help had been desultory, to say the least. Perhaps it was more difficult than we certainly wanted to get into. The question then came to what to do about it. And that resulted in the sending of the Marshall Mission to China at the end of 1945. Now I was on the China Desk at the time and I took the position that trying to work out a compromise between those two groups was futile. It would not work and it would probably redound to the disadvantage of the government. My position was that we should assist the government in reclaiming all of occupied China, including Manchuria. But we chose to send the Marshall Mission out with the objective of getting a settlement between the Chinese Government of Chiang Kai-shek and the Chinese communists.

General Marshall worked hard on that for about a year out there. And in the interim, after meeting Leighton Stuart -- who was a university president and a real old China hand out there, he'd been born there and then brought up in China, and then educated in the United States and had gone back to China, and was head of the university in the Peking Area -- General Marshall met him and was charmed by Stuart. We had not had an ambassador out there during that critical time. You might say Marshall was ipso facto the ambassador. We had not appointed one after the departure of Pat Hurley. Marshall had been very much impressed with Stuart, and his background, and his talk about China. And he, therefore, recommended that Stuart be appointed ambassador. And that was done. I remember carrying some of the papers around the State Department that accomplished this appointment. It was probably a good assignment.

And Stuart went to Nanking, took over the embassy. And there he worked with Marshall. And as I said, they worked hard to try to achieve a settlement. I think Stuart, in his own mind, felt that it was not very likely that one could be achieved, but he went along with it. But it failed. Early in 1947 Marshall issued a statement of a "plague on both your houses," and came back to the U.S. And later, not long later, he was appointed Secretary of State.

Q: During this period, Mr. Ambassador, were the Chiang Kai-shek forces still on the Mainland?

DRUMRIGHT: Yes. Our help had diminished to nothing. It started diminishing in 1946. I'd say the beginning of 1947 when they sent Marshall out there would be no more help. Because if you gave help that would blast the negotiations for a settlement. It couldn't be done anyway. So there was no help. And as time went on we withdrew our help almost completely. So in 1947 Marshall left China but left Stuart there to be the ambassador and came back. And there was no further help from us to the Chinese Government which had fought this long, hard, eight-year war. As I said, we withdrew our support of China except in terms of hoping and trying to work out a compromise between the communists and the government. But it was to no avail.

Meantime, I was reassigned in October of 1946 to London. I was there until about March of 1948 and my job was to cover the Far Eastern area. Most of our work at that time related to British problems, getting out of Southeast Asia, and that sort of thing. Otherwise, there wasn't very much in terms of China and the like.

To go back to Washington, my assignment in the State Department was on the China desk [1953-54]. We began to have increasing tensions with the Chinese. And in those, I usually took a fairly strong line, stronger than some of my superiors liked.

So after about a year in Washington I was reassigned to Hong Kong as consul general. My service extended to over three years [1954-58]. Our main jobs there were to report, as best we could, on Communist China. And we were able in that time to report to Washington on some of the main things that were occurring there, such as the famine that was coming up, and some of Mao's moves, which later proved to be disastrous.

Other than that, the main thing that occurred in Hong Kong was the development of a plan to stop the fake emigration that had been going on there for many years. That is to say, Chinese had established ways, and means, and schools to prompt potential emigrants in ways of getting into the United States. We set up a program of investigators. In fact, at the end, we had about 30 who were investigating these cases that were coming to us. And our investigations in the long run showed a great many of them were fakes. We were rather proud of that program there, which was based on a report by one of my vice consuls, Leo Mosher, who, I think, is in Washington today.

After Hong Kong, much to my delight, I was assigned to Taiwan, where I knew the Chinese officials from Chiang Kai-shek on down, and where I felt there was some opportunity for advancement of Chinese aims. I was glad to go there. My wife and I arrived there in March of 1958, following Ambassador Carl Rankin who had been there some six or seven years. He had done a fine job of establishing the mission there at a time when it seemed, just before the Korean War, that we were going to abandon Taiwan completely. But as a result of the Korean War starting, everything changed and we decided that Taiwan was a very important piece of property as far as our defenses of the area were concerned. And so we resumed a relationship that had been in arrears since the late 1940's in China.

To relate one or two important things that took place, within six months of my arrival we had the offshore island of Quemoy incident, which pitted the Chinese and us against the Mainland Chinese. They opened up a heavy bombardment of Quemoy in September of 1958. And that went on continuously for over two weeks. In that case, I am glad to say that President Eisenhower and Secretary of State Dulles presented a very firm front. We assisted the Chinese as we could, but they did most of the defending there and with the result that, after four to six weeks, the Chinese communists pulled back and stopped their bombardment.

Q: Tell me, sir, about Quemoy, why was this energetic defense of Quemoy undertaken? My recollection is that Quemoy is a small island very near the Chinese coast, maybe four or five miles away. Whereas, the Formosa Strait there is about what, 40 miles wide?

DRUMRIGHT: A hundred.

DRUMRIGHT: Well, it's mainly symbolic. They held onto all the territory that they could. In fact, when they retreated in late 1949 they defeated a Chinese attempt at that time to try to take Quemoy. That isn't a well-known event but it happened. And they turned back the Chinese communists. It was largely symbolic. And also it seemed to them a harbinger of, perhaps, a return sometime to the Mainland. So it was something they wanted to hang onto. And they did. And they still have it today.

I recall after that that President Eisenhower made a visit. He was very warmly received in Taiwan, probably one of the warmest receptions he ever received anywhere. Also, Secretary of State Dulles came on two or three occasions. He was very active and instrumental in protecting Taiwan. And, in fact, he had laid the plan, along with the Chinese foreign minister, for the defense treaty that we established in, I believe, December of 1954.

Other than that, I was proud of our military advisory group that was doing a good job of helping to train Chinese forces for defense of Taiwan, and also our economic group, under Wes Haralldson, that helped a great deal in establishing the base for the Taiwan we know today. That started during those years, about 1960, with the Chinese establishing programs or inviting foreign investors into Taiwan, establishing laws and regulations to encourage them to come, and all that sort of thing. Now we helped them, but I think on the whole, most of the credit goes to China itself and the Chinese for what they did at that time and what they're still doing today.

Q: So I presume that the U.S. Government and the embassy did lend every support feasible to economic progress in Taiwan?

DRUMRIGHT: We had a program there of about $100 million of economic aid and a fairly similar sum for military aid during the four years I was there, and it began to show up very clearly before we left. We left in March of 1962 on orders from President Kennedy. I think he felt I was much too supportive of the Chinese there. And there seemed to be an apprehension in Washington that Taiwan would take some step to invade the Mainland, which I always decried as nonsense and so forth. I went back and found I had no further job, so I retired. And that's the end of it.

Q: I see. Well, now a little reflection there. As one of the four tigers of East Asia, as they call Formosa today, with trade surpluses with the United States every year, how do you see Taiwan's future economic development and activities?

DRUMRIGHT: Well, they started out agriculturally and that program was remarkably successful. But within a few years of the start, let's say by 1970, they had turned to an industrial society. Now this was an industrial society founded on cheap labor, along with the rest of it. And that had gone on until about the last two or three years when the Chinese have found that they've got to go high-tech. In other words, they don't have the surplus of labor they had when I was there or for several years thereafter -- cheap labor, good, intelligent, hard working labor.

So they have now decided, like Japan, they've got to go high tech. And they're following in the footsteps of Japan in developing a high tech type of industry and economics. And they're probably going to be successful at it and continue their high trade margins and that sort of thing.

Q: I'm very glad to have your assessment of that, Mr. Ambassador. For the benefit of young research scholars of international and diplomatic history, can you give us your view of the Foreign Service as a career? Can you tell me a little bit about your viewpoints on that?

DRUMRIGHT: Well, I look back upon my career as having been a most adventurous and interesting one. And I have no regrets whatsoever for having pursued the course I took. I had lots of opportunities in the Service. I was basically well treated throughout. I was given promotions, I think, on the basis of my performance; I hope so. I feel that I made some contribution to the welfare of the United States by my service in some of these countries. And so I'm very happy that I took the course I did. As for people now, I am not very close to the State Department. I know almost no one in it anymore. I have not set foot in it for over ten years.

I think the Foreign Service has a future for those who have an interest in our foreign relations, those who wish to work hard, those who wish to prepare themselves in the fields of the Foreign Service, including languages, and who are willing to take the knocks, as well as the good parts, of being abroad. Yes, but if you want to get to the top, you've got to work hard and do what you're told to do. That's about it.

Q: Many thanks, Mr. Ambassador, for a very interesting and sharp account of your experiences in China and other Far East areas. You rose to the top of the ranks in your favorite profession and are certainly indicative of a career that was well-founded and of value to your government.

DRUMRIGHT: Thank you.

Q: Thank you. This is signing off here on December 5, 1988, in Poway, California.

CECIL B. LYON
Vice Consul

Cecil B. Lyon was born in New York in 1903. He graduated from Harvard University in 1927 and joined the Foreign Service in 1930. His posts included Cuba, Hong Kong, Japan, China, Chile, Egypt, Poland, Germany, France, and Ceylon. He was interviewed in 1988 by John Bovey.

Q: So then after Tokyo you went to Peking in 1934, I think?

LYON: That's right. Of course I realized we'd have to go, sad as I felt about it, because I'd broken the unwritten law of marrying my chief's daughter, and as you know, you're not allowed in our Service to serve with any member of your family -- which I think is quite just. However, anybody who knew Mr. Grew would have known that he would have bent over backward to avoid showing any favoritism, but, on the other hand, his wife would have had Elsie around all the time which probably would have annoyed the other members of the staff. So we set forth in January on the Nanrei Maru. That year they had about the worst storms they'd ever had in the China Sea and the moment we got aboard Elsie collapsed in her bunk -- she is not a very good sailor. I didn't dare tell her that for two days our rudder had been broken, and for about a day our radio had been out of whack so we weren't able to communicate with anyone. Finally we arrived at Taku Bar which was all frozen in and we went crashing through the ice and finally got to the railway station at 2:00 a.m. in the morning and got on the train about an hour later for Peking. On that trip our suitcases were rifled, so all in all we had rather a pleasant journey from Japan to China.

Q: How long did it take?

LYON: It took about three days on the boat -- three or four days -- and then about six hours from Taku Bar to Peking. We were met at the station in Peking by some members of the staff plus the Ting-chi, a marvelous fellow who practically ran the Embassy. He was at our beck and call for the next four years and he made our life very much pleasanter. Nelson Johnson was the Minister, we didn't have an Ambassador then, but the Johnsons very kindly took us in and we stayed with them until we moved into a rather lovely house in the San Kwan Miaou compound.

San Kwan Miaou used to be, before the Boxer Rebellion, a temple. The student mess where the Foreign Service Officers studying Chinese in the service lived was part of it. It had a little swimming pool, and also three houses where secretaries lived. It was really a delightful place and we took over from Bob Buell, whom I was succeeding, his very nice house and quite a number of his servants; in fact I don't think any young couple nowadays would end up by having about ten servants as we did on my munificent salary. You had to have a special amah for each child, you had to have a special maffo, or groom, for each pony and I played polo so I had about four ponies. But enough of the easy life. Do you want to ask me something more?

Q: Yes. When did the Japanese hit China then? Was it a year after you got there?

LYON: They were up in Manchuria then and they worked their way down. Then there was the Marco Polo bridge incident which I think was about '34 or '35, I'm a bit vague on dates.

Q: But you were there then?

LYON: I was there then and I was there when the Japanese captured Peking. Elsie was at the seashore, Ching Wang Tao, which is about overnight from Peking and I remember going to bed reading Gone With the Wind to the boom-boom-boom of the Japanese approaching Peking. Suddenly I woke up because of the silence -- I was so used to the guns -- and I wondered what had happened. I slipped on some clothes and got in my car and I drove all around the outskirts of the city and found that during the night the Chinese had slipped away towards the south and the Japanese were just about to march in and take Peking.

Q: You mean the capital was evacuated in effect by the government?

LYON: Well the troops evacuated. The capital had already moved to Nanking.

Q: Oh, even before the Japanese came in.

LYON: The government offices in Peking had already moved to Nanking. Second Minister Johnson used to go down there on business from time to time though we kept the office in Peking and Minister Johnson spent most of his time in Peking.

I had a very funny experience because I was captain of the polo team and we used to play polo, we foreigners, mostly diplomats and the Marine Corps officers. We had a Marine detachment which was the Marine Guard, and they had a mounted squadron or whatever you call it -- platoon, I guess -- and you remember "Captain Jinks of the Horse Marines." Well anyway, we used to play polo on the Glac's, which is an open space which surrounds the city walls. I believe the city walls now have all been torn down, but in our day there was a wall all around the Legation Quarter. We used to play out there, and all the Chinese used to stop as they went along the street, which bordered the polo field, and watch us. The great question was whether we would play polo the day the Japanese marched in to take Peking, and we decided that if we didn't the Chinese would think that if the foreigners are scared things must be very bad. We thought that would stir them up and worry them, so we decided it would have a calming effect if we went and played polo the day the Japanese marched in. And we did and, of course, we were criticized for being heartless, not worried about the poor Chinese. But actually we had considered it very carefully. Perhaps we made the wrong decision, I don't know, but looking back on it I don't think so.

Q: That's curious. It reminds me of the occupation of Paris. Was there collaboration going on between Chinese and Japanese or whoever was left there? How did it affect life?

LYON: Actually it really didn't affect life much at all, strangely enough, particularly for the foreigners. I think the Japanese in north China were not very hard on the Chinese. Later on as they went south in Shanghai I think they got very ferocious, but in Peking we really seemed hardly conscious of it. We westerners went about our normal life. People gave parties; some of the Chinese didn't come to our parties because they were nervous with the Japanese around. We used to spend much time out in the Western Hills which was about an hour's drive from Peking beyond the Summer Palace. The foreigners used to rent sections of monasteries and temples where they'd go for weekends. That had to be stopped because the Japanese didn't like us wandering around there, but otherwise there wasn't a great deal of change. Of course, as I say, the government was out and the Japanese were being rather careful, I think, not to do too many things that would get reported by the foreign Legations in Peking. The mass of Chinese people in Peking and its surroundings carried on just as before the occupation.

Q: But then there was no real underground resistance?

LYON: Not a thing. The Chinese were used to having invasions from Mongolia. I remember a fellow called Dr. Hu Shih who was quite an intelligent Chinese. I think he later came to this country to teach at some university. He said to me, "Oh, a hundred years from now this won't matter, this will all be forgotten, we will have absorbed the invaders." And I thought, "My goodness! To be able to think a hundred years ahead." It's what you hear about the Chinese and it's what you expect them to do, but usually they're much more realistic than that. We always hear about the inscrutable Chinese...

Q: But I would say Dr. Hu Shih was quite realistic in the light of what's going on now, yes. Anyway, go ahead.

LYON: I was going to say, you think about the inscrutable Chinese who never shows his emotions. We had a dog, Kim, an Alsatian, which we'd brought to China with us and we had a coolie who absolutely adored him. He used to groom him and take care of him, and one day he came rushing in -- Elsie had gone to Japan to have our first child, Alice -- and the coolie came in rushing, crying absolutely like a child, "Come quick master, Kim dying, Kim dying." So he certainly showed his emotions, he was deep in tears over the death of a dog. When we were transferred to China, Elsie, who had been there on a visit a few months before, remembered this coolie who had been her rickshaw coolie during her visit. So we sent out and we got him and he became her personal rickshaw coolie. He was fleet of foot, and he always got everywhere ahead of everybody else. He was a marvelous man.

We also had a little Chevrolet convertible, which came with Elsie too. The coolie used to polish it and keep it all shiny and whenever we'd go to a party, to the movies or anything like that, where we had to park the car out in the street -- we'd take him with us so he would prevent people from stealing the hubcaps and all that sort of thing. It was very funny because as I was trying to park, he'd say, "More backside master, more backside, stop it." Well anyway he fell in love with this little Chevrolet and so I said, "Oung-Pu, I'm going to make you a chauffeur." So I'd take him down to the polo field and try to teach him to drive and having pulled a rickshaw all your life, it was as if you'd been a lowly runner in Wall Street and were suddenly made a partner in Morgan's because it was such an exalted position. But he crashed through the garage door, he did everything wrong and he couldn't learn and finally I hired a man to teach him. And one day he came to me crying and said, "Master, I no want to be chauffeur. I think motor car all time. I can't sleep master. I don't want to." And I said, "Pu, you have to." And so he stuck to it. Eventually he got his license after about three tries, and then he was the proudest man in Peking. One day I was driving back from the country, I'd been out hunting, and just making conversation I said, "Pu, how old are you?" "Thirty year, master." "Are you married?" "No, master." I said, "What? Thirty years old and not married?" which was very unusual for a Chinese. He said, "No master, I no find any girl she like me -- no find any girl I like." He evidently thought about this and thought that I was displeased because he wasn't married. He came to me about six weeks later and said, "Master, I find one girl she crazy about me so I'm going to marry him. You borrow me fifty dollars and I'll marry him." So I "borrowed" him fifty dollars and probably ruined his life.

Q: Times have changed haven't they? I was going to ask you, the Legations were all in one quarter. So you really had your own forbidden city there?

LYON: We had our own forbidden city because you see after the Boxer Rebellion when the foreign diplomats were caught there in the trouble, the allies demanded a special quarter. It had a wall all around it, and the Embassies all had guards; as I mentioned we had a Marine Guard, the British had a guard, the Italians had a guard and the French had a guard. It was really rather confining.

Q: Where was Kai-shek at this point? Was he unknown, or was he...

LYON: Oh, no. He was already in Nanking.

Q: Oh, he was?

LYON: He was president and Madame Chiang Kai-shek...

Q: He was already president?

LYON: He was already president then and she came up to Peking a few times. She was always -- I mean the Chinese ladies used to wear dresses with slits way up the side which were rather revealing and rather attractive. Madame Chiang Kai-shek decided that they had to close those slits because she was very puritanical. I guess from her American education, because she was educated in American schools, if I remember correctly.

Q: That reminds me of Madame de Gaulle. Do you remember that look that used to come over her face when any woman's gown was a little bit too décolleté? Well then, what happened finally? The Japanese, they just stayed there in Peking and meanwhile all hell was breaking loose down south.

LYON: They were also still in Peking when we left.

Q: Well, Chiang had to move out of Nanking too at some point, didn't he, or was that much later?

LYON: Well later on he went, of course as you know, to the island, Taipei.

Q: No, no, I know, but I thought the capital was moved again too wasn't it?

LYON: That's right, he moved to Chungking before Taipei, you're quite right.

Q: Well, anything else?

LYON: On China? Oh, there must have been a lot more on China. The change from Tokyo in the heart of a devoted family to Peking was rather hard on Elsie. She's a very sensitive person and there was so much poverty in Peking that Elsie wanted to help everybody and I think by the time we left we had 104 people who were being supported by Elsie. Not out of my meager earnings but financed by her mother, who was equally kindhearted and would send Elsie money. This had its sad effects on one occasion. There was a Russian family called Klemm; they were living in Peking -- White Russians -- and they had their son in Berlin and they were longing to join him, but we, of course, didn't have any money to send them there. Elsie appealed to her mother and her mother sent the money for the family to get to Berlin. They got to Berlin just about the time that the Russians got to Berlin, so we've never known what happened to them.

There was a White Russian who played polo with us. He was a horse trainer and he looked like a centaur when he played polo. When we were transferred to Chile he begged me to take him and his wife with us. Of course we couldn't afford to, and he said, "Then when you get to Chile will you try and find me a job there?" Well I did. I asked a lot of the rich Chileans who had big fundos -- plantations -- if they'd hire him and nobody would. So I must say I didn't pursue it too hard and I've regretted it until today, its on my conscience, because when the Japanese came into Peking he fled to Shanghai and then of course the Japanese got into Shanghai, nothing has ever been heard of him since.

Q: I haven't asked you anything about relations with the Soviet embassies or legations in Tokyo or in Peking. Yes, they were represented there, weren't they?

LYON: That's a good question but nothing comes to mind particularly.

Q: Wasn't there a Russian embassy in the compound there?

LYON: No, there wasn't and I can't think why. There was what used to be a Russian embassy which was occupied by the Austrians for some reason. Was it perhaps that China did not have relations with Russia?

Q: How about Tokyo?

LYON: Oh, yes, in Tokyo there were Russians. I mean there was a Soviet embassy and the various embassies had relations, never very cordial, stiff and perfectly correct.

Q: No, but there were no problems between the Soviets and the Japanese of the terrible kind they have now about the islands and Vladivostok and all that stuff?

LYON: I can't remember.

Ralph N. Clough was born in 1917 in Washington. He attended Lingnan University in China from 1936-1937. He graduated from the University of

Washington in 1939 with a B.A. He received his M.A. from the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy in 1940. In 1941, he joined the Foreign Service. His postings included Toronto, Tegucigalpa, Puerto Cortes, Kunming, Peiping, Nanking, Hong Kong, London, Bern, Taipei, and Washington D.C. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1990.

CLOUGH: Well, I grew up in Seattle, born and went to school there. Graduated from the University of Washington, 1939. But I had a brush with China during my college years that really directed my future.

When I was a freshman at the University of Washington, I applied for and received an award for an exchange scholarship at Lingnan University in Guangzhou (Canton), China. I hadn't particularly been interested in China before that, I had been studying Spanish. I had four years of Spanish in high school. I was majoring in foreign trade at the university and hoped to get into business with Latin America. But suddenly came this offer to go abroad, and I was interested in traveling. It happened to be China; it could have been Argentina or Germany or whatever. So I went off to China.

And after a year as a student at Lingnan University, I was hooked. I started studying the Chinese language. I came back and took second-year Chinese at the University of Washington, and finished up with a major in economics and business and a minor in East Asian Studies. I went on for the Masters at the Fletcher School in order to prepare myself for the Foreign Service examination, to fill in some of the gaps that I hadn't had in my undergraduate work. Took the Foreign Service exam in the fall of 1940 and the oral exam in early '41, and was appointed to the Foreign Service in April of '41. I was assigned to Toronto as a probationary post, which we had in those days.

Q: I wonder, could you talk a little about what you saw, because going to China... In the first place, wasn't your family a little bit nervous about going to China, because the China incident was in full swing, wasn't it at the time?

CLOUGH: No, it wasn't in full swing. Actually, the Lukochiao incident that set off the full-scale war between Japan and China was in July of '37. I went out in September of '36. There was war, intermittent battling in North China, but it was mostly a kind of encroachment process of negotiation, intimidation and so on as the Japanese encroached from Manchuria into North China, and finally set off the full-scale war by that attack on Lukochiao in July of '37.

But I went in '36, and at that time, the Province of Guangdong had been governed by a warlord, Chung Jitong. Just before I arrived in Canton, or Guangzhou as it's known now, the central government succeeded in prevailing over the local warlord. They sent him on a world tour and took over the province. At that time, Guangdong Province still had its own currency, which was at a different rate with the U.S. dollar from the national currency (it was five-to-one rather than three-to-one), and the process of bringing Guangdong into the national system was underway.

Q: Obviously, you were a young lad at the time, but what was your impression of the Kuomintang government?

CLOUGH: In that year, the Kuomintang government was very popular among the students. Although it was felt that it was moving too slowly to resist the Japanese, there was a lot of patriotic pressure. They started an ROTC program on the campus that year. It created some problems, because the officers spoke Mandarin and the local students mostly spoke Cantonese -- they couldn't understand each other. But there was tremendous pressure on the government to stand up to the Japanese, resist encroachment.

In December 1936, when Chiang Kai-shek was kidnapped at Sian by the Communists in an effort to pressure him into a united front against the Japanese, the first reaction on the campus was gloom. People had regarded Chiang Kai-shek as the best symbol of resistance against Japan, the best leader against the Japanese. Now he was captured; no one knew what was going to happen to him. It was a very sad few weeks while he was held by the Communists and by some of his own troops from Manchuria, who were involved also in the sequestering.

In any case, the result was they worked out a deal for cooperation between the KMT and the Communists against the Japanese. Chiang was released, sent back to Nanjing, along with Chang Hsueh-liang, the nationalist general who had collaborated with the Communists in holding him. There was rejoicing in Guangdong. It was around Christmastime when the news came of his release, and there were firecrackers going off all over the city and great joy that Chiang Kai-shek had been released and that a united front of resistance against the Japanese was developing.

Q: Did you have any feel for incipient Communist movement in the students at the time?

CLOUGH: No, not at that time. The Kuomintang was the symbol of nationalism. The Communists were far off in the northwest. There was no significant underground Communist movement.

Q: The enemy was warlordism.

CLOUGH: No, the enemy were the Japanese. As far as the national government was concerned, the warlords were a problem, because they still hadn't gotten control of the west and the southwest. Even in the south, even Guangxi Province, next to Guangdong, was governed by a couple of warlords with whom the KMT had to make deals. In resisting the Japanese, the KMT had to make deals with the various warlords in order to get the use of their forces against the Japanese. And that's one of the things that, over the long run, weakened the KMT.

Q: Then we move back to your Foreign Service time. You were in Toronto from '41 to '42. What were you doing there most of the time?

***

Q: Then in 1945, you were able to get out there.

CLOUGH: In 1945, the reason I got out was that I was drafted. I had wanted to use my Chinese, and I had written to the China program. The Navy was running a China program in Colorado, and training people to become China specialists in Naval Intelligence. That attracted me, so I wrote to them and tried to get into that program, but they said my eyesight was too bad. It didn't meet Navy standards.

Q: The Navy, I recall at the time, was death on bad eyesight.

CLOUGH: That's right, so they turned me down. And then the next thing, the Army wanted to draft me. So they said report either to the closest place, which was Panama, or your home city, which was Seattle, where I'd originally registered for the draft. So, of course, I chose Seattle, because I had a wife and a small son at that time, and I wanted to take them back and establish them with her parents for the duration, while I went off to be drafted.

So we all went back to Seattle, and I went down and reported to the draft board. They gave me a physical and said, "Well, you're ok for limited service, but we're not drafting anybody for limited service right now, so just wait." And so I waited and audited some Chinese courses at the University of Washington.

Eventually, the State Department was ginning up the San Francisco conference to set up the United Nations. They needed to send about half of their Public Affairs Division out to San Francisco to handle those problems during the conference, and they were very shorthanded in Washington. So they discovered that I was sitting there doing nothing in Seattle, and they said, "Come back to Washington, get your papers transferred to a local draft board in Washington, wait there, and work while you're waiting."

That seemed reasonable to me, so I went back to Washington and worked in the State Department, the old War Navy Building, what's now the EOB. I was there for several months, the spring and early summer of '45.

While I was there, of course, I went around and got acquainted with the people in the China Division. They were shorthanded; they needed people to serve in China. I worked it out so that I would get assigned to Kunming as Vice Consul when I finished my stint in the Public Affairs Division.

Q: Where's Kunming?

CLOUGH: Kunming is in southwest China, not too far from Burma. It was the place where the Burma Road ended, and where there was a great airlift going on at that time from India into Kunming. They had a huge airfield there and a large number of American Air Force people stationed there.

Q: Before we move there, did you have any impression of the China Desk? How were they looking at things in 1945?

CLOUGH: It was wartime, and I knew relatively little about China or our relations with China. I'd been down in Tegucigalpa for the past three years.

After the end of the war with Germany, of course our efforts were concentrated on the Pacific. One of the things we were doing was bringing in as much material as we could, over the Hump, to supply the Nationalist forces against the Japanese, while we hit them in the Pacific. So our whole China effort was aimed at resisting the Japanese. There was an effort by the Japanese to drive toward Kunming from south China through...

Q: To wipe out those airfields that were bombing.

CLOUGH: Yes, they did capture airfields in Guilin, a couple of airfields in Guangxi Province. And they were moving toward Guizho and trying to come toward Chungking and Kunming from the southeast. So that a lot of the air sorties by the American Air Force, which had succeeded the Flying Tigers, were trying to stop that penetration by the Japanese.

Q: Were you getting any feel while you were in Washington about the Stilwell-Chiang Kai-shek disagreements, because it was about that time, wasn't it?

CLOUGH: Stilwell had been eased out before that. Wedemeyer was in Chungking, along with General Hurley. I did get some murmurings about problems between General Hurley and his Foreign Service staff in China, but not very much. I was pretty innocent when I went off to China.

I got on the plane early July of '45, and I had to go through North Africa and India in order to fly into Kunming. I had a low priority and I was bumped.

Q: Vice Consuls don't amount to very much in a wartime situation.

CLOUGH: That's right. I was bumped in Casablanca. I was bumped in Cairo. I was bumped in Karachi. I was bumped in Calcutta. But I didn't mind, because it gave me a chance to see a little bit of those places that I'd never visited before. And then, finally, I flew in over the Hump into Kunming and became Vice Consul there.

Q: Was it about August or so?

CLOUGH: No, I got there in July.

Q: Before the war ended.

CLOUGH: Before the war ended. I had been there a few weeks when the war ended.

Q: What was the situation in Kunming as far as your office and your work was concerned?

CLOUGH: My assignment was Political Officer, which was new to me. I'd maybe written a couple of attempts at political dispatches in Toronto, just to try my hand, but I didn't really know much about political reporting. But that was my assignment in Kunming.

Bill Langdon was the Consul General there, and he had a staff of, I suppose, five or six officers doing consular work and political work. But it was small, very self-contained.

We lived in a compound that had once been the Governor's mansion. It had a big wall around it, and a huge gate, and a number of separate buildings inside. We used part of the buildings for offices and part were our living quarters. A two-story building in the center was our living quarters. Very simple. We had no flush toilets. We had toilets that had to be emptied every day by the servants. We ate together in a central mess on the first floor of the large building. It was very interesting.

We were next door to a dormitory where a number of professors from the Southwestern United University lived. This was a university that had been set up by Peking University, Tsinghua University, primarily, when they moved. They had to move out of Peking, and they set up again, finally, in Kunming. They were sort of a hotbed of anti-KMT sentiment. The people there belonged to the Democratic League, which was an opposition group promoting a more democratic system, coalition with the Communists of some kind. I think it was not long before I got there, I can't recall exactly when, a well-known professor named Wonido was assassinated in Kunming. It was quite a political sensation at the time. I talked with a number of these professors, did some reporting.

Q: Did you have any feeling on your reporting that your Consul General was saying: Lay off this? Or was there sort of a world-your-oyster, as far as whatever you saw, you could report on?

CLOUGH: As far as I recall, he was pretty easy going in that respect. I don't recall his having any fixed... Well, he must have had fixed views. He was a strong-minded individual.

I recall, particularly, we had an American professor who taught English at this university, and he had been there a long time. He had been in Beijing before and then moved with the university. He and Langdon used to argue. They would sit at opposite ends of the lunch table (he ate his meals with us), and they would argue about anything. They both loved to argue, and they always took opposite sides on whatever the argument was. I remember, this fellow's name was Bob Winter, and his favorite remark at some point in the argument was always, "Langdon, you're talking out of McGuffy's Second Reader."

Q: What was your impression and, you might say, of the others there, of the KMT and its doings in the Kunming area?

CLOUGH: I wasn't really there long enough to get much of a grasp. I was there July, August, September, about three months, and I was transferred to Chungking, so I was just beginning to establish my contacts and so on, which, in a new environment and a new function, for me takes time.

Q: It takes time in any case. Now in Chungking, you got there in October of '45?

CLOUGH: I arrived just a couple of weeks after General Hurley had left, so I never met him. And I was never caught up in that "Hurley versus the Foreign Service, the China Service."

Q: Were you getting any of the aftershocks of that whole thing?

CLOUGH: Yes, I began to get that once I got to Chungking and talked to people there. It was evident what had been going on.

Q: What was the problem?

CLOUGH: I think the problem was a very strong feeling on the part of the political reporting officers that the KMT was declining, that it was in a very weak position, there was a lot of corruption. It had a big army. Its forces outnumbered the Communist forces by a considerable amount, but it seemed to be so inefficient and so incapable that the reporting that went in from Chungking on the KMT, by people like Jack Service and Ray Ludden and John Davies and so on, was uniformly unfavorable to the KMT. I mean, they saw the feet of clay.

But Hurley didn't like that. Hurley felt it was exaggerated, that it was unfair to the KMT, that the Generalissimo was somebody we ought to support, and by this kind of reporting we were undermining him.

Q: Did Leighton Stuart take over as Ambassador right after that?

CLOUGH: No, he didn't, not right away. The first change was the employment of General Marshall, who came in December of '45. He came as a result of Truman's decision for the United States to mediate between the Communists and the Nationalists and try to work out some sort of coalition government. General Marshall was sent to carry out that mission.

Walter Robertson was the Chargé d'Affaires when I arrived. He had been an Economic Officer in Australia during some part of the war, and then he was sent to Chungking as Economic Counselor. He was a former Richmond banker. When General Hurley left, he became Chargé, and was Chargé for several months until General Marshall arrived.

I remember Robertson saying, when he read the instructions about the U.S. function in mediating and trying to set up a coalition government, "Well, we have a variety of means by which we can put pressure on the KMT, but I don't see any way we can put pressure on the Communists." So he was rather pessimistic about the future, although he worked at it. He was named by General Marshall as Director of the Executive Headquarters in Beijing later on when the operation moved up there.

Q: Was the Marshall mission, was he really going there... Did he become Ambassador?

CLOUGH: My recollection is that he was, for a short time, before Leighton Stuart was appointed. I think it was a temporary arrangement, but he had responsibility for things beyond just the mediation mission.

I recall my own personal experience. I was a Vice Consul, Third Secretary, so I had rather menial assignments. One of the things I did was to write letters, memos to the Foreign Ministry complaining about invasions or damage done to foreign mission premises by the KMT military.

This was happening here and there around China. The missionaries would complain to the embassy, the embassy would go to the Foreign Ministry and complain about it. That was one of my jobs.

Another job I was assigned in the aftermath of the war, and after General Marshall came, was to work on a project, which he conceived, of turning over to the Foreign Service a lot of the equipment that the U.S. military would be leaving behind in China when they pulled out.

They had all kinds of stuff that they had used for their war purposes, and it wasn't worth shipping back to the United States. We were going to turn it over to the Chinese at one cent on the dollar, or something like that. But General Marshall thought that before we turned it over to the Chinese, the embassy and the six or seven consulates in China at the time ought to have first call on any of that material that we could use. Most of it we couldn't use. It wasn't suited to...

Q: Anti-aircraft guns and all...

CLOUGH: No, but there were a few things that could be useful: light bulbs, trucks, Jeeps, pots and pans, a lot of things of that sort. So I was designated by General Marshall to visit the various consulates and to draw up with them a list of the kinds of things that they could use.

So I thought about this, and I thought, you know there is a problem. One of the things that would be most useful to consulates around China would be generators, because the electric power was notoriously bad in China, it was always going off. If we had our own generators, we would be independent of that problem. And that was one thing that the military had quite a few of.

The problem was that I didn't know anything about generators or how big a generator you needed for such and such an installation. So I went to General Marshall and said I needed an engineering officer to go with me, somebody who knew something about electricity, electrical engineering.

And he said, "Well, all of our engineering officers are very busy in China. I don't know that we can spare any."

I said, "I happen to have a brother who is a Lieutenant at an aviation engineering battalion in Okinawa, maybe he could be freed."

So General Marshall said, "What's his name and serial number?"

I gave it. The next thing my brother knew, he was sitting peacefully in a tent in Okinawa, he got this message marked "Gold" from General Marshall: "Report to Shanghai." He didn't know what it was all about. He knew that I was in Chungking, so he suspected that I had something to do with it.

So I went down to Shanghai, and after several days in a hotel there, reporting daily to the headquarters, my brother and I finally encountered each other. I saw him sitting in the dining room in the hotel. It turned out we'd been going to different places and had never encountered each other. But we finally got together, and we made a tour of various consulates: Beijing, Tianjin, Quingdao, Hong Kong.

Q: What was your impression of a consular establishment, the people? Here you had a chance. Obviously, you were a junior officer, but you'd been around for awhile. What was your impression of what they were doing, but also the people there and our operations there?

CLOUGH: I had a chance to meet some of the older China Language officers, people like Bob Smyth, who was Political Counselor in Chungking. Later on, after I went to Beijing myself as a language officer, I met Harry Stevens, who was Consul General in Beijing for a short time before Edmund Clubb arrived. I saw in the Foreign Service Journal the other day he just died at the age of 92.

Harry Stevens, I remember him particularly, because in June of '46 I was appointed Language Officer to study Chinese in Beijing. I was the first of the post-war crop of Chinese Language Officers, so I reported to him. His idea of how to learn Chinese was to take the dictionary and memorize each meaning of each character. But he didn't stay long, he was soon succeeded by Clubb.

Q: We had a very extensive consular establishment in China at the time.

CLOUGH: We did. We did, but it was still a very disturbed period. It wasn't a normal period. There were still a lot of military around. Our own Air Force was engaged in transferring Nationalist troops across Communist-held areas into Beijing, Tianjin, into Manchuria. There was a unit of U.S. Marines stationed in Beijing and in Tianjin, also, and they were responsible for the safety of that rail line, which was attacked by the Communists from time to time.

On the one hand, there were these negotiations going on at the top level. Zhou En-lai with Chiang Kai-shek. Chang Chun was the chief Nationalist negotiator. They had this elaborate Executive Headquarters set up in Beijing, with a large number of field grade officers whose job was to go out in groups of three -- American, Nationalist, Communist -- and check on reports of clashes between Nationalist and Communist forces.

This was a little later. I sort of jumped ahead of my story. During the period when I was touring the consulates to make up lists of things they required, I didn't have much chance to find out what was going in a political sense in these places, because I was concentrating with the general services officer trying to make lists of stuff. And I spent only two or three days with my brother at each place.

I was struck particularly by Hong Kong, which we reached early, maybe it was January, February 1946. All of the houses above a certain level on the peak had been stripped. Nobody lived there. When the Japanese occupied, they had been abandoned, or the owners, mostly foreigners, had been interned. The houses were empty. The Chinese simply took out the wires and plumbing and everything else that was movable, leaving the shells of the houses. And that's the way it was when I got there in 1946. It was a sad sight.

Q: After you finished this tour, were you getting any of the rumblings of Hurley making problems back in Washington?

CLOUGH: Yes, we were getting reports on that. And we were also very much concerned with the negotiations that were going on and the attitude of the Chinese. We had particular contacts, as usually happens, with the Chinese who thought like we did about democracy in China, people in the Democratic League. We had contacts with the Communists as well. Zhou En-lai had an office in Chungking.

We moved down from Chungking to Nanjing. The whole embassy moved in early '46. One of my jobs first was to go down there and take over from the officer who was the first one sent down to Nanjing to rent houses for embassy personnel who would be moving back to Nanjing, which was the capital where the government would be moving. And, of course, there was great competition for housing, everybody was going back at the same time. He did a good job of renting a number of houses.

Then I was sent down to run the motor pool and to handle the shipment from Chungking on LSTs of office furniture and stuff.

Q: LSTs being landing ship tanks.

CLOUGH: Yes. They had some on the Yangtze, which were sent up to Chungking to pick up all this stuff. They were good for carrying that kind of cargo. They just let down their front flap on the bank and everything could be carried off. So we rescued all of this pitiful furniture out of the embassy in Chungking, very simple Chinese-made desks and chairs and so on, but we figured it was better to bring it down and use it than junk it and have to buy new. So that was my principal job in Nanjing until I was sent up to Beijing for language study.

So, as you can see, I was not one of those engaged in the political of the embassy, but I did know the people who were more active in that work. John Melby, for instance. I knew John very well. He arrived in Chungking while I was there, and then we were both stationed in Nanjing. And then later, when I came back after my language study, I was assigned to the embassy in Nanjing, so I got to know John fairly well. And Ray Ludden was another Political Officer.

They were, I would say, generally rather pessimistic about the way things were going. The war was continuing sporadically here and there. The Executive Headquarters system had not successfully created a cease fire. Both sides were throwing accusations at each other. And the worst thing that was going on was the terrible inflation, which was already underway in Chungking and spread over the whole country. That continued right up until '49 when the Nationalists were driven off the mainland.

Q: One of the people, of course, who figured very strongly in our policy for the next decade, really more than that, was Walter Robertson. And you saw him when he was within the service and not a dominating figure. What was your impression of him, and how was he looking at things at that time?

CLOUGH: I think that quote that I gave you about how to deal with Nationalists and Communists generally typified his view. He felt that we had no effective way of putting pressure on the Communists. If they wanted to create a civil war, we couldn't stop it. He tended to blame the Communists more than the Nationalists when negotiations broke down.

Q: Did you feel that there was any sort of almost a generational thing in the Foreign Service there?. I mean, the older officers tended to maybe see where the KMT had come from, and the fact that they had initially been a force of reform, whereas the younger officers coming in there were looking at things as they were at the time and finding the KMT being corrupt?

CLOUGH: I think there may have been that sort of division. I guess the officers that I knew best in Chungking were Bob Smyth and Knight Bickerstaff, who had been my professor at the University of Washington. He was a temporary Foreign Service officer in Chungking doing political work. And they both knew the KMT from the earlier days and had this historical perspective, which, I agree, some of the younger officers didn't have. Although the younger officers, in a way, had a longer perspective, because people like Jack Service and John Davies had grown up in China.

Q: You went to the language school then in Peking from '46 to '47. How did that operate?

CLOUGH: We had to start from scratch. There were no teaching materials available. One of the books we were given, for instance, was a two-volume work by a Colonel Aldrich, an Army Colonel who had prepared this, pre-war, for the use of foreigners in China wanting to learn Chinese. It was very ill-designed for the uses of the Foreign Service. It had very little of political or economic interest in it. It mainly dealt with how you run a household in Beijing, how you talk to your Number One Boy and your cook.

Q: Sort of kitchen Chinese in a way.

CLOUGH: It was more than kitchen Chinese. Within its realm it was very sophisticated, and it taught you characters that you'd never encounter anywhere else, but not of much use in the Foreign Service.

There was a young China specialist named Thurston Griggs, who had also been an exchange student at Lingnan University. He was also from the University of Washington. He had been there the year before I went, so I met him after he came back, and got some tips on the program at Lingnan. Anyway, he somehow (I'm not sure just how) found his way into the Foreign Service, and he became the director of the language school. He'd had some graduate work in Chinese. He hired about a dozen Chinese as instructors. About half of them were engaged as tutors, the other half were preparing materials, getting extracts from newspapers, documents, and things that would be useful to us in our Foreign Service career. So we had six students, initially, and 12 teachers. Pretty good teacher-student ratio.

Each of us studied in our own houses. Most of us lived in a little compound there called Sankuon Miou, a number of Chinese-style houses in a good-sized compound with a swimming pool.

Q: Was your family with you at the time?

CLOUGH: We had our families with us. Actually, I was the only one who had been in China, and I was assigned to language school from a job in China. My family came and joined me when I went to the language school in June of '46. The other students came from other places, and they came with their families.

Our tutors came around to visit us. We had fixed hours each day for tutoring -- one hour with this teacher and another hour with another teacher. About half of our time was tutoring, the other half was independent study. It was a very good program, we learned a lot. We spent a lot of time going to plays, to movies, to Chinese church, any place we could take advantage of to get some practice with our Chinese.

Q: When one is a language student, in some ways you're a little freer than you are at almost any other time to get out and meet people. Were you getting any feeling from the people you were meeting about the situation and how things were going?

CLOUGH: Yes, we spent time with students at the universities, for example. Generally speaking, the students were very critical of the KMT. They were also critical of the United States. There was a famous case of an alleged rape of a Chinese student by an American Marine, and that occupied the newspapers for quite awhile. So there was a widespread feeling among the students that the United States and the KMT were in the wrong, and that we were not really backing democracy.

The Communists had considerable appeal. They were seen as more upright, less corrupt. And they had this vision for the future: a peoples' China that would not be at the service of the compradors and the rich people, the Cadence and the Sung. Compradors were merchants who served as middlemen with the foreign merchants in the Chinese market.

Q: You then went back to what was now our embassy in Nanking. You served there from '47 to '50. What was the situation when you got there, and what were you doing?

CLOUGH: I was given the title of Chinese Secretary, which is a title that doesn't exist anymore.

Q: That sounds like the old British Foreign Service. They had an Oriental Secretary, actually, in Egypt or something like that.

CLOUGH: Anyway, my job, about half of my time, was taken up with the documents that went to and from the Foreign Ministry. Normally, as you know, in a foreign post, in an embassy, you write to the Foreign Ministry in your language, and the Foreign Ministry writes back in their language, and you have to do the translation.

But in Nanjing we had such a heavy volume of correspondence, in those years, with the Foreign Ministry that they simply couldn't have kept up if we depended on them to do all the translating, we'd be too far behind. So we had a staff of translators, who translated both our notes to the Foreign Ministry and the ones that came back from the Foreign Ministry. That way, we more or less kept up with the flow of correspondence.

My job, as Chinese Secretary, was to check the translations to make sure that these translators were accurately turning the English into Chinese and vice versa. The rest of my time I was a political reporter, or sometimes high-level interpreter going with one of the Counselors at the embassy to talk with some high-level Chinese official.

Q: Could you describe a little about the embassy. Leighton Stuart...

CLOUGH: By the time I was assigned to the embassy, Leighton Stuart was there as Ambassador. He had a strong commitment to try to get this coalition to work out. He was China-born, he grew up in China. He had been president of the university for years. He wanted China to be a peaceful, progressive place.

He had many, many connections, both on the Communist side and on the KMT side. He knew many of these people personally, had known them for years. For example, the head of the Aliens Affairs Office in Nanjing City was a man named Huang Hua, who had been a student of his at Yenching University and then gone over to the Communists and worked his way up in the ranks. He had meetings with Huang Hua on several occasions. This was reported in Stuart's own autobiography and in the dispatches that were written during the period. I'm sure a lot of this is reproduced now in FRUS.

Q: Were you getting any sort of instructions as you did your reporting? What were you, particularly, looking for?

CLOUGH: We were looking for rays of light, I suppose, in this gloom that surrounded the political situation. The negotiations were not progressing. Of course, Marshall left long before I came back in '47 to Nanjing. He later became Secretary of State, I've forgotten just the timing of this. [JANUARY 1947]

In any case, we talked to people in the government. We talked to professors and businessmen. We studied the publications of various kinds that came out with all kinds of rumors and stories about politics, much of which was not fact. It was very hard to sort out fact from fiction in this confused period.

And this was the worst period of inflation. People were scrambling to try to make ends meet. I can recall how the embassy had to send a truck to the bank to get a truckload of currency. Each of us got an allowance of local currency, as part of our salary, in order to pay our servants and to buy things that we needed on the local market. We'd line up at the accounting office in the embassy and each of us would get a mail sack full of bundles of notes.

Q: I understand at that period of time nobody bothered to unbundle notes.

CLOUGH: That's right. I don't know how many million each bundle stood for. But I'd take my sack back to the house, and I would pass out the appropriate amount to each of the servants (I think we had about three servants at the time), and they would rush off to the market to buy something before the currency lost any more of its value. They'd try to turn it promptly into rice or cloth or gold coins or whatever. It was a hectic time.

Now the political situation was simply going from bad to worse, because in the middle of '46, the civil war broke out in full scale. The Nationalists, at first, made an advance. They captured Yen-an up in Shaanxi Province. They seemed to be making progress, but it was an illusion, because they had disregarded Marshall's advice about Manchuria. He had felt that they couldn't maintain themselves in Manchuria. They had Shenyang and Changchun, several cities, but the countryside was mostly controlled by the Communists. He felt they simply couldn't keep their supply lines open, which turned out to be the case.

Gradually they lost the battle for Manchuria and then the battle for North China. And finally, in '48 the climactic battle, the so-called Huai-hua battle north of Nanjing, was fought. Millions of men on either side. The Nationalists lost, and that was the end of them. For all practical purposes that was the end of the KMT.

But we could see it coming, you know. We'd go into the embassy and our Military Attaché would put a map up and give us a briefing on the latest military situation. Any layman could see it was going badly for the Nationalists.

Q: Of course it only came up later, but was there any feeling there was anything we could do about it? A few years later, it was: Who lost China? How did that feel? You were there at the time.

CLOUGH: I was there, and those of us who were in the embassy and in touch with our American military were strongly opposed to getting any more deeply involved. You remember General Wedemeyer was sent out on a mission to tour China and see what might be done. He went, together with Phil Sprouse, who was the Director for Chinese Affairs at the time.

The Wedemeyer report was so negative, I guess, to the Nationalists that it was not published for a considerable period of time. It became one of the political footballs back here in the United States. But Wedemeyer's judgment was that it would have required an enormous investment of American military to maintain the Nationalists in China. And in the opinion of those of us in the embassy, it was not worth it. We couldn't support this collapsing structure.

I recall one occasion when Congressman Walter Judd came out. We had an evening session with Walter Judd, and he kept saying "What can we do? What can we do?" And none of the embassy officers had any very good ideas. It was a gloomy session, and I think he came away with the feeling that those China specialists in Nanjing are not much good, they can't think of any useful things for the United States to do at this critical point.

Q: Judd was China-born, too, wasn't he?

CLOUGH: I can't recall, but of course he was a missionary in China for years and years.

Q: He was a missionary and then a very influential Congressman on the Right in the political spectrum in the United States.

CLOUGH: He was a very strong pro-Nationalist, along with Senator Knowland from California. Those two, I think, were the outstanding ones.

Q: Were we making any effort that you know of to make contact with the democratic groups?

CLOUGH: Oh, yes, we had contact with those people all along. But as always happens in a situation when you have two strong antagonists fighting each other, the people in the middle tend to be very small in number and very weak. They wanted something which the Americans approved of very much, they wanted some democratic, peaceful arrangement. But the two sides who held the power weren't interested in what these people were peddling. They wanted their own views to prevail.

Q: How about your contacts with the KMT at the Foreign Ministry? What was your impression of how they were operating?

CLOUGH: They were very professional. Ninety percent of what we did with the KMT didn't have much to do with the high politics of the situation. We negotiated a trade treaty, for example, that consumed a lot of time and effort. We had an aid program going in China. We had a very active cultural affairs program. The Fulbright Program was started in China; it was the first country where we had a Fulbright Program.

Q: So as things were falling apart, the chairs were being rearranged on the deck of the Titanic. This was a very slow collapse, wasn't it?

CLOUGH: Yes. It tended to accelerate as it got toward the end. In the beginning, when I was in Chungking, I would say the prevailing view in the embassy was that if we could not work out a coalition agreement (and people were rather pessimistic that we could) between the Nationalists and the Communists, then China was in for a long period of civil war. Very long. People did not think the Nationalists could be defeated. On the other hand, they didn't think that they could defeat the Communists, and therefore it would drag on and on. No one, in 1945 or '46, would have predicted that by 1949 these huge Nationalists armies with all their equipment and so on, so much superior in material terms to the Communists, would be reeling back in total defeat.

Q: Well, you had the climactic battle. It was near Nanjing, wasn't it?

CLOUGH: It was north of Nanjing, a couple of hundred miles.

Q: How did you all view it there, and then what happened to you after that?

CLOUGH: We could see that the Communists were winning the civil war. It was very evident, particularly as the Huai-Hua battle developed and the Nationalists began to use desperation measures to try to shore up this place with airlifts and that place. It was obvious they weren't going to be able to do it. Therefore, the government was going to have to move, because Nanjing would be immediately threatened once they couldn't hold the ground to the north. There was talk of forming some sort of line along the Yangtze River to hold the Yangtze, but it wasn't that formidable an obstacle to the Communists as it turned out.

So we had to divide the embassy. The government prepared to move. It was going down to Guangzhou, Canton. And we sent the larger part of our embassy. I guess this was late '48 when we did this. Louis Clark, who was the Minister Counselor, headed the group that went down to Guangzhou. Leighton Stuart stayed on, along with all the other Ambassadors in Nanjing, with the exception of the Soviet Ambassador who moved down to Guangzhou. I think the senior Foreign Service officer was Johnny Jones, who was a Political Counselor.

So we were there, and we anticipated the Nationalist withdrawal and the Communist arrival, which occurred in late April. I think it was April 25th that the Communists came in. There was an interim of about 24 hours, between the time that the police and military from the Nationalists pulled out and the Communists forces came in, when there was some looting in the city, some disorder. But not too much. It didn't affect any of us.

When the Communist troops came in, they were very orderly, and they informed us that we had to stay in our compounds. For the first few days they wouldn't allow us out. They posted sentries at the gates and wouldn't allow the foreigners out. But within a few days we got a notice from this Aliens Affairs Office, which had been set up.

You have to remember that in April of '49 there was no central government. The People's Republic of China had not yet been established. This was simply a military government, and the Aliens Affairs Office was the office that was set up to deal with the foreigners. We assumed that we could function in a consular capacity, as we had done in Manchukuo. After the Japanese took Manchuria, we never recognized Manchukuo. We never had any diplomatic relations with that government, but we kept our consuls there, and we dealt with the local government on a consular basis. Never had any serious problems. I think the Japanese accepted that. And that's what we had done throughout Latin America. When there was a change of government, we'd keep our consular officers on, and we'd deal with the successor, whoever it was. So we thought we could do that in China, but the Chinese Communists took a different attitude.

They sent a notice around to all the embassies in Nanjing saying: "You people have no official status whatsoever. You're just ordinary citizens, and you're not allowed to leave the city without permission from the Public Security Bureau. There's an eight o'clock curfew. No one is allowed on the streets after eight o'clock. And if you have any business, you have to deal with this office and present your business in the form of a written statement in so many copies in Chinese and English, or Chinese and a foreign language, whatever your language is." So that was the setup that we encountered.

We did have this incident involving Leighton Stuart's quarters. Early on, the first few days of the occupation, some soldiers wandered into his house early in the morning before he was out of bed. They intimidated the servants, and they bulled their way upstairs into his bedroom, actually, where he spoke to them in Chinese and explained that this was foreign government premises, that they were violating the law by coming there and so on. But they didn't pay much attention.

One of my jobs was to go to the Aliens Affairs Office and make a protest of this invasion of our Ambassador's quarters by soldiers. So we wrote it all out, and I went down to the Aliens Affairs Office. The first problem I had was to get in, because you had to fill out a form at the gate, all this in Chinese, saying who you were, what your position was, what your business was, who you wanted to see. So I filled this all out, saying that I was the Second Secretary of the American Embassy.

The gatekeeper said, "No, you're not. You have to say you're the former Second Secretary of the American Embassy."

And I argued with him. I said, "No, as far as my government is concerned, I still am the Second Secretary of the American Embassy."

So we argued awhile, and then he took the paper and wrote "former" in front of it and took it in.

So I went in, and I made my protest to the appropriate official. In fact, this was Huang-hua himself. He lambasted me. He said, "You have no right to make a protest. You have no status. You're just an ordinary citizen."

We found out later that these soldiers were tracked down and they were punished. We heard indirectly, but they wouldn't acknowledge our protest.

Q: Why did we hang on there?

CLOUGH: The theory was (and this was a theory widely shared among the foreign Ambassadors in Nanjing at that time) that the Nationalists were on the way out, that they were losing the civil war, that they were going to be driven off the mainland, and that the best way to make the adjustment to the new government that was taking over was to keep our Ambassadors there so we would have some representation. We could begin a dialogue and work out the arrangements. That was the theory, but in fact it turned out to be much more difficult than anybody anticipated.

The British, in January 1950, recognized the People's Republic of China, which had been established on the 1st of October 1949. But they were not allowed, immediately, to set up an embassy in Beijing, which was the new capital. The Communists were not going to use Nanjing as the capital, they were going to set up in Beijing. The British had to send a negotiating team to Beijing to negotiate the terms under which they would establish a mission there after they had recognized.

They had a special problem that nobody else had. They had a consulate in Tamsui in Taiwan, which they didn't close down. Taiwan, of course, was still under the control of the Nationalists. The Communists wanted them to close that down, and they refused. As a result of which, the British were not able to send an Ambassador to Beijing for about 20 years, until the early '70s, when they finally closed their Tamshui consulate. They had only a Chargé d'Affaires in Beijing.

Q: Did you ever hear anyone talking about: Well, let's get the hell out of here and go back when the spirit is right? This hanging on seems, in retrospect, a bit odd.

CLOUGH: As far as we were concerned, that's what we did. But we only did it after we'd been there from April '49 until February of 1950 when we finally pulled out. We pulled out because there had been a number of problems. First, we'd had the imprisonment of Angus Ward, our Consul General Shenyang, in Manchuria, and his staff, and they were held for a long time. And then there was an incident involving a Vice Consul Olive in Shanghai, who was mistreated by the police.

So there was concern that, as you say, we weren't accomplishing anything by staying there, that we might as well pull out. Because as long as our people were there, they were to some extent hostages. They could be arrested or mistreated.

The final straw, as far as we were concerned, was when they confiscated a piece of property in Beijing that had been embassy property. They simply took it over. And at that point, we said, "Ok, well, we're pulling out." We moved our people down to Shanghai and closed the embassy.

We tried to negotiate for a ship to come and take us out of Shanghai, but the Nationalists were bombarding Shanghai and Nanjing, sporadically, from Taiwan during that period. The government said: "It's too dangerous to bring a ship into Shanghai, you can't do it." So we finally worked out a deal to bring the ship into Tianjin and take everybody on the train up to Tianjin, and we got the boat out to Hong Kong.

Q: Were you getting instructions from Washington telling you to keep hanging in there?

CLOUGH: We were doing useful things, I think. We were reporting on the situation in Nanjing. After the first few days, we could move fairly freely around the town. Not outside the walls, but within the town. We could talk to people, and we could report on what the newspapers were saying. They had taken over the former Central Daily News and turned it into the Shenwa Rebao, the new China daily published in Nanjing. And we also got newspapers, sometimes, from other parts of the country. We could analyze what they were saying, what campaigns were going on.

Q: How did you get your communications in and out?

CLOUGH: We had our own radio. We had our own broadcasting, transmitting set, encoding equipment. So we operated entirely by radio. For months, we didn't get any pouches in or out.

Q: If somebody left China, they couldn't get back in?

CLOUGH: That's right. So when Leighton Stuart left, we had to negotiate for his departure. It was decided by June or so, well, certainly by the time that Mao Zedong made his famous "Lean to One Side" speech, which was of July 1, 1949, that there was no point in keeping our Ambassador there any longer. We had an Air Attaché there with an airplane, so we had to negotiate the terms for the Ambassador to leave with the Air Attaché to fly to Okinawa, with some other people from our staff. We reduced the staff considerably.

We had a problem, because the Communists had established a system of guarantors. If any foreigner wanted to leave China, somebody who stayed on had to guarantee that nothing that he did would be damaging. In other words, they wanted a hostage for everyone who left. And we had to negotiate this for the Ambassador, as well, since they regarded him as only an ordinary citizen.

Q: I talked to somebody not too long ago who was supposed to be going up to Manchuria and was a guarantor for almost everybody towards the end. And then he stayed. He was a little bit worried about getting out.

CLOUGH: That might have been Phil Manhard.

Q: It wasn't Phil Manhard, it was somebody else. We've done Phil Manhard, but I can't remember who.

CLOUGH: Anyway, that's what we had to do. Have you interviewed Lee Bacon?

Q: That's who it was. He was the one.

CLOUGH: After Johnny Jones left, Lee Bacon, the Consul, became the senior Foreign Service officer in Nanjing.

Q: How did you all feel? Did you feel that this was a transition period and that there were signs that the Communist authorities were probably going to open up? Was this hope, or was there anything to sustain this?

CLOUGH: Yes, I think we were optimistic. We drafted a telegram, I guess probably the summer of '49, to the effect that the Nationalists were losing the civil war, that it was important for us to maintain some connection. It was a longish cable in which we sort of analyzed the whole situation: the declining fortunes of the Nationalist government, the almost-certainty that the Communists would be taking over as a new government. But we expressed the view that, in time, strains would develop between the Soviet Union and China, in spite of the lean-to-one-side views expressed by Mao on July 1st, and that we should wait for that time, take advantage of what we felt then would be a growing division between the Soviet Union and China.

Q: Was Washington, did you have any feel for...

CLOUGH: I think that telegram was later utilized by the Secretary of State when he met the British Secretary, Nevin, at some meeting, mid-Atlantic meeting or something. The British Foreign Secretary and the Secretary of State talked about China, and I think this telegram from Nanjing was one of the exhibits. I didn't know that, until I got to Hong Kong and looked in the files. In one of the Top Secret files I found this telegram right next to the report of the meeting with Nevin.

Q: You then left, you went to Hong Kong, is that right?

CLOUGH: We had a lot of problems that maybe Lee Bacon has told you about in more detail.

We had labor problems with the staff at the embassy, who were stimulated by the Communists to organize themselves into a labor union and demand a high severance pay that the State Department was not very keen to pay out. So there was a lot of negotiating going on, on that issue. We finally came to an agreement.

Q: By the way, what had happened to your family? Had they gone by this time?

CLOUGH: No, they were still there.

Q: Still there. So you went out en famille.

CLOUGH: Yes. Actually my wife died in Shanghai, so I went out with our two sons through Tianjin.

Q: Well, just as the State Department goes, I'm surprised that with the death of a wife you weren't taken out, no matter what.

CLOUGH: This happened right at the end. We were on our way out. So I was then reassigned, assigned to Hong Kong.

Q: Did you go home?

CLOUGH: Oh, yes, I went home. I had home leave and consultation, then went back to Hong Kong, where I was in charge of political reporting, the political section of the consulate general there.

Q: When you were back in Washington, now we're talking about 1950, what was the feeling there about the situation that you were getting? You were the people who were dealing with it.

CLOUGH: You were beginning to get this Who-lost-China syndrome by that time. The people in charge of Chinese Affairs, Phil Sprouse, the Director, and Tony Freeman, the Deputy, were feeling it very, very strongly. I've forgotten just when they left those jobs, but after they did, they never again were given an assignment in China.

Q: In Hong Kong, you were doing political reporting.

CLOUGH: Primarily, on the mainland. It was our only remaining nearby post where you could get information about China. We also had the Korean War. The Korean War had just started in June, and I arrived in Hong Kong about July or August.

Q: How did you view the Korean War? China didn't come in until later, in the winter, late fall. How did you view the Korean War, with just the Koreans fighting the Koreans? Did you all at the post in Hong Kong see this as an expansion of Communism and that Chung might be the next...

CLOUGH: The most immediate question was whether the Communists would stop at the border of Hong Kong. They took Guangzhou in, I guess it was late '49, and they were moving south in May 1950. They took Hainan Island. They were at the border of Hong Kong, and nobody knew whether or when they might cross the border, because there was no way of defending Hong Kong militarily. The British couldn't defend it. So we had a rather tense period there in which American dependents were advised to leave. The British did not advise their people to leave, but the American Consul General, Walter McConaughy, made that decision.

Then the next question, of course, was: What would happen in Korea? Would the Chinese get involved? We had reports of the Chinese moving troops from south to north, toward Manchuria. These were rather persistent and rather well-established. So that was the main question coming at us from Washington. They wanted any information that we could get on what the Chinese attitude toward Korea was. We scrambled around to pick up every scrap of information we could, bearing on that issue. That was our prime directive at that time.

You may recall that in late September, Zhou En-lai made a speech in which he warned that they couldn't tolerate the destruction of a neighboring country, or something to that effect. At about the same time, we got a warning through Ambassador Pannikar, the Indian Ambassador in Beijing, from Zhou En-lai, to the effect that we should take this seriously. And there began to be reports then of an occasional Chinese being captured in northern Korea.

The question then was: Were the Chinese serious? Were they going to come in, in force, or were they just trying to intimidate us or deter us? MacArthur decided, on the basis of his intelligence, that it was the latter, and he issued his famous statement about getting the boys out of the trenches by Christmas. Went ploughing full steam ahead.

Q: Over the 38th Parallel and all that. Well, they were already over the 38th Parallel by that time.

CLOUGH: The Inchon landing was September 15th, and they moved north quite rapidly over the 38th Parallel. The question was whether they should go all the way to the Yalu. I was getting reports. I remember I had one White Russian informant in Hong Kong, who had connections in Manchuria. He had lived in Manchuria, and he would get messages from time to time. I remember once he told me that the Chinese were having people put tapes on their windows in the event of bombing, a suggestion that perhaps they were expecting to get involved in the war in Korea.

The most notable incident was when we had a Chinese, who came down from Beijing. He was known to the consulate general there, particularly to Howard Borman, who was in my section in charge of translating Chinese materials, the Chinese press and magazines. He had known this man, and the man had given them some information about developments in Beijing before the consulate general closed down and pulled out. He turned up one day in Hong Kong, and I had him, with Howie, up to my house (didn't have him come in the office). He told us that there had just been a very important meeting in Beijing at which all of the members of the Democratic League and the other so-called democratic parties had been called in, and they had been told that there was a new slogan: "Resist America. Help Korea." And that there was going to be a full-scale campaign on this all over China. This was the first word we had of it. So we reported this.

We didn't know that this man was a hundred percent reliable, but we had some confidence in him, and we reported it on that basis. Turned out to be accurate. He went back into China and was never heard from again.

I should say that that message from Pannikkar, the Indian Ambassador, was not taken as seriously in Washington as it turned out it should have been, largely because of Pannikkar's own views. He was known in Nanjing as being very pro-Communist, and he wasn't regarded as an entirely reliable intermediary. I've often thought afterwards that if Zhou En-lai had given that message to, say, the Norwegian Ambassador in Beijing, instead of the Indian Ambassador, it might have been taken more seriously.

Q: In Asian relations, we've always looked on the Indians with a certain amount of suspicion, I think.

CLOUGH: Particularly in relation to China, because we always felt they were pro-PRC in most issues.

Q: With Vietnam and all we never... so that as an intermediary they didn't carry the weight. In your reading the papers and all this, were you seeing anything about getting ready to go into Korea?

CLOUGH: We saw the usual attacks on the United States, of course, but it was very hard to interpret those as to what they would actually do. I remember (you could probably find this telegram in the file somewhere) from time to time we sort of added up the pros and cons as to whether the Chinese were planning to come on a large scale. And we came down on the side that they probably weren't.

I think that was based on a misreading of the Chinese. A feeling that, after all, their country was less than a year old (their government was established just about a year earlier). They still were in the process of consolidating their rule in China. They were poor. They had a long road ahead of them. Was this the time to get involved in a full-scale war with a country like the United States, which was the most powerful military state in the world?

There is an article, which will be coming out in the latest issue of the China Quarterly, written by a couple of students who were here at SAIS, Chinese from the PRC, based on interviews that they had with senior Chinese officials and some materials that have been written since then, about the decision to enter the Korean War on the part of the Chinese. Apparently there was a big debate in senior circles in China about whether it was wise to do this. And finally, Mao Zedong made the decision. He had been convinced, ever since '48 or '49, that sooner or later they would have to fight a war with the United States, because it was such an implacable, imperialist enemy. And that if they were going to fight such a war, Korea was the best place to do it. [Hao Yufan and Zhai Zhihai, "China's Decision to Enter the Korean War: History Revisited," China Quarterly, 121 (March 1990), 94-115]

Q: When you look at this, so that's Mao Zedong, and on the other side you have MacArthur, who also had very firm and fixed ideas, too. So no matter what was being fed into both sides as far as rationale, an awful lot depends on, at the top, the ideas of whoever's leading.

CLOUGH: That's right. Presuppositions.

Q: Was there a difference, or were you sharing views from those who were watching China, say, from Japan and MacArthur's headquarters?

CLOUGH: We got very little of that traffic. We didn't really know what was going on between MacArthur and Washington.

Q: Washington at the time was relying on you to give everything you had, but there was no real sense of direction that you were supposed to go this way or that way or anything, was there?

CLOUGH: No, I don't think so. Of course, we heard the rumblings of all the McCarthy attacks on Foreign Service officers. We were concerned, but I never found that that affected our reporting particularly. Perhaps we were in a more fortunate position, because we were in the period of war with China, and everybody was hostile to China.

Q: So there wasn't the matter of looking at them as peaceful, peasant agrarian reformers. How about Walter McConaughy, who was the Consul General part of the time you were there, what was your impression of him and how he saw the situation?

CLOUGH: I found him a very good boss, perhaps partly because he gave me a free hand. He very rarely made any changes in the things that I wrote for reporting to Washington. He was not a China specialist himself. He was trained in Japan, initially. But he was a very good officer, I thought, good instincts and good reasoning. He wasn't afraid to make difficult decisions when he had to, as when he advised Americans to withdraw dependents from Hong Kong. It wasn't entirely popular, as you can imagine.

Q: You were one of a growing corps of new China hands, as opposed to old China hands. Old China hands were more from missionary families and all. Normally, when you become a specialist in something, you have orientations towards different groups in the country. And here you are with the Communists being as nasty as they could be and yet a thoroughly discredited Kuomintang sitting there. It would be very hard for an American Foreign Service officer to identify with and root for one or the other of them. How did you feel about this situation there?

CLOUGH: I felt that China was a huge country we were going to have deal with one way or another, whether we liked it or not. My job was to find out as much as I could about what was going on, what were the trends internally, as well as in their foreign policy.

This is for our later interview, I guess, when I was in the Office of Chinese Affairs, but I felt that the economic policies followed by the Communists in the late '50s were going to be disastrous for them. If you looked at their demography, if you looked at the very small proportion of budget they were putting in on agriculture, it was clear they were going to have food problems. And, of course, within a few years, they did.

Q: So while we were looking at the immediate and, you might say, almost tactical, intelligence-type information, we were also looking at the long-term picture. Were you able to get fairly good ideas of what was going on, from the various newspapers and the people who came in?

CLOUGH: Not really very good. It was spotty. For one thing, they were reluctant, particularly in those early years, to put out any reliable statistics that an economist could use to put together what was really going on. So it was rather impressionistic, what we learned in Hong Kong. And there were also a large number of peddlers of information, who wanted to sell it, who wanted to gain access to American visas or something. They were very troublesome, because there were so many phonies. And it wasn't always easy to spot the phoney.

The CIA was very new in those years. We had a small unit of CIA people in the consulate general, whose job was to gather covert intelligence. They had money to pay people for intelligence. We didn't. As political officers, people would come to us wanting something, and we were never able to offer them anything. Which was probably just as well, because what you got for money was less likely to be genuine.

I recall one case of an individual who had come to me and offered information about what was going on in Guangxi Province (the second province back beyond Guangdong), and this was of some interest to us. The main rail line to Vietnam went through Guangxi. I listened to what this fellow had to say, then, by accident, I was able to get hold of a newspaper that came from Guangxi that told about a severe accident, burning of a bunch of railway cars, that had occurred in the city of Wuzhou. I read about this and the dates and so on. And so the next time this guy came in (he claimed to be able to go back and forth to Guangxi Province), I began to question him rather closely about the dates when he was in Wuzhou. He claimed to have been in Wuzhou when this happened, but he never said a word about it, which pretty well convinced me that he wasn't there. It was too juicy a morsel not to have reported if he had been there.

Q: A lot of information has come out, obviously. Now, in 1990, looking back on it, how do you feel our reporting was at that time?

CLOUGH: I'd say it was pretty spotty. It would be interesting to go back now and make a careful survey of what was being said. I think we were fairly cautious. We weren't inclined to be taken in by the more extreme claims of the Communists.

I was there mostly during the Korean War and for about a year after the war ended. I think one of the things we were concerned about, of course, was Soviet-Chinese relations. Those relations, as far as we could see, were getting stronger and stronger, because of the close military relationship, the supply of large amounts of tanks and planes and all kinds of military equipment, which continued after the war.

I recall one occasion, it must have been '54, it was after the Korean War, and I left Hong Kong about July '54, so maybe the spring of '54, Joe Alsop came through.

Q: He was a newspaper columnist.

CLOUGH: Yes, but he had also written a big article for the Saturday Evening Post, in which he had a new theory. He had been in touch with people in the Pentagon, and he had gathered up some military terms like "division slice," which had to do with the supporting units you needed in order to support a division, and he was following the Soviet resupply of the Chinese military. He had concocted a thesis that at the rate that the Soviets were building up the Chinese military forces, that by a certain date, about a year from then, a year, maybe two years, they would have enough force on the southern border of China so that they could just overwhelm Thailand, Indochina, it would all become part of China.

Q: There's a little problem of terrain.

CLOUGH: I took issue with him, I argued with him. I said, "You know, if the Chinese wanted to do that, they wouldn't have to have all this Russian equipment. They've got manpower to burn compared with these countries. They could go down there and take them over. You're building up a house of cards here, based upon a lot of calculations, which really don't... It's the intention of the Chinese that's important, not what they happen to have in the way of military equipment." But he brushed that aside. He'd made up his mind and wasn't going to listen to anybody out there.

Q: One last question on this, and then we'll have an interview another time. Were you getting anything from the State Department, or by word-of-mouth corridor talk or anything about: Boy, watch this McCarthyism business, I mean, for the China hands?

CLOUGH: Oh, yes. We were getting quite a lot of that. Not formally, but through the back door.

Q: What was the thrust? What was the problem? How did you see it?

CLOUGH: It worried us, because, after all, we were China specialists, we were China language people. But we were not caught up in it, because we were not in responsible positions at the time that China was lost. All of us, who were trained after the war, were the new generation, and we were, I think, reasonably confident that nothing serious would happen to us, because the whole attitude of the United States toward China had changed.

We had had the Korean War, which had created a kind of semi-permanent state of hostility between the United States and China. For at least several years after that, we were concerned about the next move on the part of the Sino-Soviet bloc; it was still a bloc in '54. And it was evident that they were already beginning to strengthen the Viet Minh. The Chinese were giving help to the Viet Minh. They had been extending their railroads down to the border so they could get equipment down more easily. That was our main concern, this and a lot of the propaganda that was coming out. In '54, I think the Huk movement was still quite active in the Philippines. The various Burmese civil wars were going full tilt.

Q: The Red Flag, White, Black Flag or whatever it was.

CLOUGH: Yes, and the Communists in Malaysia were still fighting very vigorously. Northeast Thailand had its own Communist rebellion. There were Communist rebellions all around. So we were very much concerned with what seemed to us to be a Sino-Soviet advance into Southeast Asia, the next move by Communism.

Q: How did you feel, from, you might say, the corps of China hands, about the permanence of Chiang Kai-shek and the KMT on Formosa or Taiwan?

CLOUGH: We didn't have a lot of confidence in the future of the KMT on Taiwan. Of course, once Truman had made the decision to put the Seventh Fleet in the Taiwan Strait, then it was obvious that the Communists didn't have the military capability of overcoming that kind of obstacle. So, in that sense, the KMT was safe. But I don't think those of us who had been associated with the KMT in China had any confidence that they could turn things around the way they actually did. It was quite a remarkable feat.

***

CLOUGH: Well, I stayed interested in China [while in Honduras]. I had the good fortune that sometime during this period the State Department sent a notice around to all the offices saying that the military had developed a series of language records, about 50 or 60 different languages, and they were using these in the program (I can't recall the acronym) that the Army ran in many universities for teaching various languages. One of the languages was Chinese, and they developed a set of records and a couple of booklets that went with them for learning spoken Chinese.

This was very attractive to me, because I hadn't had much spoken Chinese, my Chinese had been written. The spoken Chinese I learned in Guangdong was Cantonese. I had to change my pronunciation to Mandarin in order to take second-year Chinese at the University of Washington.

Our professor of Chinese there, Knight Bickerstaff, was a historian, not a linguist. He was pressed into teaching language courses simply because they had no one else. His teaching of language was to take a sixth grade Chinese primer on the history of China, and we plowed through that, learning the characters as we went along, including some rather unusual characters that you wouldn't normally come across in conversation.

So when I saw this set of records offered to any Foreign Service post, I wrote in and asked them to supply Tegucigalpa with a set of the Chinese records, which they did, no questions asked. I found them very useful in building up some capability in spoken Chinese, because I still had the ambition to go to China.

Q: Ralph, may I say first of all that our careers, at this point of your career, began to overlap. You were at the National War College '54-55. I was at the National War College the following year, '55-56. You came out of the National War College and went into the Office of Chinese Affairs in the Bureau of Far Eastern Affairs, as they called it at that time. I, when I got out of the War College, went to the same bureau to become the Regional Planning Advisor. Both of us were working for Walter Robertson -- a great man, but a very, very strong, ardent supporter of Chiang Kai-shek and had absolutely no use for the more balanced view that some of us took with regard to Chinese issues. However, he was very much the voice of the Administration at that time and had the strong support of the China lobby, we used to call it. Now, let me go back then to your arrival in the State Department to work on the China Desk, or, at least as I understand it, you were the Deputy Director of Chinese Affairs.

CLOUGH: That's right. Deputy Director to Walter McConaughy.

Q: Now in 1955, when you arrived there, I'm wondering if you could tell me a little about your work in the bureau and the problems you faced in that period of '55 to '58.

CLOUGH: Our China policy had just come through the period of late '54, early '55, when we signed a defense treaty with the Republic of China. The Formosa Resolution was passed authorizing the President to intervene in any attack on off-shore islands, which he considered to be part of or preliminary to an attack on Taiwan. So that had happened in early '55.

Q: That was after the first off-shore Taiwan Strait crisis.

CLOUGH: That's right. In January of '55, the Chinese Communists had attacked and occupied Yijiangshan Island, which was one of the Dachungs, and then we assisted the Nationalists in withdrawing their troops and civilians from the Dachungs, because they were beyond...

Q: Was that the only place where they attacked? They didn't attack Quemoy or Matsu?

CLOUGH: Later they did. That was the main attack. I don't recall whether at that point they had fired some shells at Quemoy and Matsu, but I don't think so. They occupied Yijiangshan Island. They launched a very effective amphibious assault.

Q: That's just off the shore of...

CLOUGH: Zhejiang Province. It's north toward Shanghai, and it was beyond the range of the fighting...

Q: Are they still there today?

CLOUGH: Oh, yes.

Q: So they permanently occupied them.

CLOUGH: These islands have always been considered part of China.

Q: So what was our military operation designed to do then in '55?

CLOUGH: In '55, our military operation was designed to help the Nationalists withdraw from those islands, because they were considered too far away...

Q: How many people did they withdraw?

CLOUGH: Oh, I can't recall the exact figures, but it was ten thousand or more.

Q: So that the capture of those people would have been quite a blow, then, to Taiwan and to the Republic of China.

CLOUGH: Yes. And in exchange for Chiang Kai-shek's agreement to withdraw, with our help... We weren't willing to help him defend those islands, so he had to withdraw.

Q: So it was a very limited operation.

CLOUGH: Very limited operation, but it involved, at least implicitly, a greater commitment by us to the other off-shores, the bigger ones, Quemoy and Matsu particularly.

Q: But it was still left unclear as to whether we would defend those islands if they were attacked.

CLOUGH: That's right. We would never give an ironclad commitment. What we got from the Congress was the Formosa Resolution, in February of '55, which gave this authorization to the President.

Q: And only if those islands were attacked as part of an attack upon Taiwan itself would we come to the help of those on those off-shore islands, as I recall.

CLOUGH: That's right.

Q: So then in '58, when the Chinese Communists, as we used to call them in those days, launched this artillery interdiction against Quemoy, then they made the declaration that this was the first step towards Taiwan, and thereby gave, really, Dulles the ammunition he needed for invoking the agreement we had with the Republic of China with regard to defense.

CLOUGH: That's right, although we still did not intervene militarily in defense of the off-shore islands. In other words, our forces weren't involved in combat. We moved the Seventh Fleet in...

Q: But we escorted them to three miles off shore.

CLOUGH: We convoyed the supply ships to within three miles, but we did not engage in combat, nor did we agree to the bombing of mainland airfields by the ROC Air Force.

Q: So this period when you were a Deputy Director really involved these two incidents, although one was pretty much over.

CLOUGH: I left before the '58 crisis began.

Q: I thought you left before the '58, because Larry Lutkins, I think, replaced you.

CLOUGH: No, Ed Martin. Ed Martin came from London.

Q: But Ed Martin became the Director, didn't he?

CLOUGH: Well, I was the Director. I became the Director in '58. I had been Deputy, but I was barely in the job before the agreement was reached to open the ambassadorial talks with the Chinese Communists in Geneva.

Secretary Dulles sent Ambassador Alex Johnson to Geneva, August 1, '55, to open those talks with Wang Pingnan, the Chinese Communist Ambassador from Warsaw. Alex was at that time Ambassador to Czechoslovakia. They met in Geneva amid great press attention, hundreds of press people there at the first official relatively high-level meeting between Americans and Chinese Communists.

There had been an international conference in '54, at which there were somewhat distant encounters. That was the conference at which Dulles was accused of having refused to shake hands with Zhou En-lai.

Anyway, I was sent to be the advisor to Alex Johnson at those talks in Geneva, and I was there for probably two and a half months. We reached our first agreement with the Chinese on the return of civilians, which was, from our point of view, the number-one object on the agenda. We signed that agreement in September.

Q: What civilians are we talking about?

CLOUGH: We're talking about a group of people who were detained in Communist China, about 40 or so.

Q: So they'd been there for five years or so.

CLOUGH: Some of them were missionaries who had been there a long time.

Q: But I mean they'd been there since the takeover.

CLOUGH: Many of them had been arrested at the time of the Korean War. And there were also 13 American Air Force people who had been shot down.

Q: How did you persuade the Chinese to release these people?

CLOUGH: The Air Force people, they released on their own. They announced, on the day that Wang Pingnan arrived in Geneva, that they were releasing the 13 military people. As Wang Pingnan put it: to create a good atmosphere for the talks, which it did. Then we began negotiating on the return of the civilians. It was a very complex negotiation; took about six weeks.

Q: That was really the major achievement of these, we used to call them the Warsaw Talks, but the antecedents of these, of course, was Geneva. Were they held in Vienna at any time?

CLOUGH: No.

Q: Started in Geneva, then went to Warsaw.

CLOUGH: That's right. We got this agreement signed. A number of these imprisoned Americans were released, came home, but not all of them. The Chinese then wanted to go on to other subjects. They wanted a Foreign Ministers meeting. They wanted exchange of correspondence between the United States and China. They wanted lifting of the American economic embargo on China.

Q: I take it that this was all bad news from Taiwan's viewpoint.

CLOUGH: Oh, yes. Even the fact that we had sat down to talk with them was bad news from Chiang Kai-shek's viewpoint. They were very nervous about what was going on in Geneva, because it was kept very secret. After the first few meetings when some scraps of the proceedings leaked out in Washington, Dulles clamped down and restricted all of the correspondence to and from the State Department and Geneva to a very small number of people in Washington so that this wouldn't happen again.

Q: Did we keep Congress informed of this?

CLOUGH: I'm not sure exactly what arrangements we had with the Congress during this period, but we kept them generally informed. We kept Chiang Kai-shek generally informed, but, of course, he wasn't confident that we were telling him everything, which we probably weren't.

Q: But the principal effort was made to get the Americans released and back.

CLOUGH: That's right, that was the first order of business.

Q: That seems to me a very defensible position for us to be taking with anybody. That's the kind of thing we would have to do. If we didn't do it, there would be a lot of questions raised as to why we weren't doing it.

CLOUGH: Of course.

Q: So did we more or less explain our talks with the Chinese in those terms?

CLOUGH: Yes, that was the main emphasis in the beginning, because that was what we were talking about.

Q: And then Beijing tried to make use of this to expand our relationship.

CLOUGH: That's right.

CLOUGH: Not only discomfiture, but eventually, they hoped, a shift of our diplomatic relations from Taipei to Beijing. But they made a mistake in that they wouldn't release all the Americans. They had evidence that some of them actually were spies. Most of them were accused of being spies.

Q: And those cases lingered on from year to year.

CLOUGH: Those cases lingered on, and we took the position that we couldn't go on to talk about other things in Geneva until they had released all the Americans. They had to fulfill their first and only agreement with the United States before we could talk seriously about closer relations.

We soon moved on to the Taiwan issue, and we demanded a renunciation of force with respect to Taiwan, which they would not give. Their position was that the Taiwan issue was composed of two parts: a domestic part and an international part.

The domestic part was their own problem, and they didn't want any foreign interference. That was the problem of reunifying China, ending the civil war, bringing Taiwan under PRC control.

The international part was what they called the U.S. occupation of Taiwan, American interference in Chinese internal affairs, interference in the civil war. Civil war was not over, because Chiang Kai-shek had not been totally defeated and he still occupied a piece of Chinese territory. So they wanted to separate the two. And they said they could not renounce the use of force against Taiwan so long as the United States was interfering there.

Q: Ralph, did that become sort of the permanent sticking point in these talks?

CLOUGH: Yes, it did become the permanent sticking point. It went on for years. We put forward a number of drafts. We exchanged drafts (these later were made public) on this issue of renunciation of force. They were willing to sign a general renunciation of force with the United States -- they wouldn't use force against the United States -- but not with respect to Taiwan. We weren't satisfied with that. We wanted it to be specifically with respect to Taiwan.

So as time went on, the intervals between meetings got longer. We had less to talk about. We were just repeating what we'd said in previous meetings. After about two and a half months, I came back to Washington and somebody else was sent to take my place. Ed Martin, actually, became the advisor at one point.

Q: What was the job of the bureau itself? More or less to write the instructions?

CLOUGH: Yes. In fact, when I came back to Washington, that was my principal job, to draft the instructions to Geneva for the talks. Then Walter McConaughy and I would take them to a meeting with Dulles and the legal advisor, Herman Flaiger, and Walter Robertson. Usually there were just the five of us in those meetings. Dulles himself went over the instructions line by line, made changes here and there, and approved it. Then the telegram would go out.

Q: But after the return of this first group of Americans, the talks really didn't achieve much, did they?

CLOUGH: No, they didn't. They became rather sterile.

Q: They gave us an opportunity to quiet some people by saying we were at least in touch with them.

CLOUGH: That's right, and we could say that we'd had more high-level contacts with the Chinese after awhile, say we had more high-level contacts with them than most countries did.

Q: And the families of those who were still detained in China must have been after the State Department all the time.

CLOUGH: Of course.

Q: And so at least, again, we were able to answer them that we were trying to do something about it. There were very compelling reasons, in other words, practical reasons, for conducting the talks, even though they seemed to be going on and on like a broken record?

CLOUGH: Yes. It got so that really the only thing we'd agree on at the end of each meeting was the date for the next meeting. Even that dwindled off. The State Department wanted to transfer Alex Johnson from Czechoslovakia to Thailand, make him Ambassador to Thailand. Obviously, it wouldn't be convenient to commute from Thailand to Geneva for talks, to have Ed Martin, who had been Johnson's advisor and had the rank of First Secretary at the embassy in London, to represent the United States against a Chinese of appropriate rank to continue the talks.

But the Chinese said no. They said, "We agreed at the beginning these were to be ambassadorial-level talks. We have great respect for Mr. Martin, but he's not an Ambassador. Therefore, we can't continue the talks on that basis." So we had no agreement, and the talks were de facto suspended.

Q: The Chinese representative was Wang Pingnan at that time?

CLOUGH: Yes.

Q: What kind of a person was he? Alex seemed to rather like him.

CLOUGH: He was a very correct, professional diplomat. He did his job. He repeated whatever he was told to say at the meetings, but there was a little give around the edges. At one point in these talks about the civilians, before we reached agreement, we'd come to a sticking point, and so he and Alex Johnson arranged to have dinner together without the advisors, just an interpreter and themselves, to talk about this, and then they made some progress.

Q: Now I'm leaping ahead in history, but looking back from the time Nixon went to China, to those Warsaw talks, do you think they had any influence at all on China's decision to enter into talks with the Nixon Administration and the invitation to Peking? In other words, did they have any lasting, subtle effect on U.S.-China relations?

CLOUGH: I think they had some effect. I think if you read Ken Young's book on the early period, he talks about the Quemoy crisis at considerable length, and the meetings. I was involved in those, too. I had just been in my job at Bern a few weeks, long enough to have our second daughter born there, when I was sent off to Warsaw to be Jake Beam's advisor at the talks there.

If I could go back for a minute, what happened was that the talks were suspended from about December of '57, and there were no talks in the early part of '58. And about June, I was by this time the Director for Chinese Affairs, we decided that we ought to try to get the talks started again.

We looked around Europe for an appropriate Ambassador, and we decided on Jake Beam, who was Ambassador at Warsaw at that time. It would be convenient to have him deal with the Chinese Ambassador at Warsaw, it wouldn't involve commuting. Jake was also a Soviet specialist, a person who knew something about Communism, and had also served in Indonesia, so he knew something about East Asia. He seemed to be the logical choice.

So we were just about to make the proposal in late June of '58, when the Chinese came out with a blast against us for suspending these talks. That caused us to hold off on making the proposal. We didn't want to seem to be reacting to this kind propaganda rhetoric, so we held off a few weeks.

Then we made the proposal later, I think in early August. By that time I'd left the department, Ed Martin had taken over as Director. And the Chinese didn't respond immediately.

The next response we got was the August 23rd commencement of the bombarding of Quemoy. So that brought the idea of talks right into center stage. Dulles made his speech at Portsmouth, then Zhou En-lai made his proposal that talks be resumed, and we agreed on Warsaw. And I think it was about the 10th or 16th of September, mid-September sometime, when we sat down in Warsaw to have the first talks.

Q: While the shooting was still going on.

CLOUGH: The shooting was still going on, right.

Q: (Kennedy) Excuse me, I wonder if I could just interrupt for a second. Could you give a little feeling for the atmospherics when you would sit down for instructions with Dulles and Walter Robertson and McConaughy and Flaiger. What was their attitude towards these talks?

CLOUGH: They took them very seriously as a way to keep in touch with a very important adversary of ours at that period, with the hope that the effort to at least promote a more peaceful atmosphere in the Taiwan Strait would be successful. I don't know what Dulles had in mind as sort of long-term, whether he thought these might lead eventually to a diplomatic relationship with Beijing. He might have.

Q: Just one more thing about your role in these talks. You spoke Chinese, were you actually interpreting for our side?

CLOUGH: No, I was not the interpreter. At the Geneva Talks, we had an Army officer, Bob Eckvald, who had grown up in China, missionary child, spoke Chinese well. He had been interpreter at P'anmunjom at the end of the Korean War, so we drafted him as our interpreter. I was the advisor, I helped to draft statements and messages.

Q: But you could understand, of course, the conversation both ways.

CLOUGH: Yes, I could understand.

Q: That was a big advantage. With your background in China, having served in Kunming, Chungking Nanjing, and Beijing, you must have had a great deal of subjects to discuss with Wang Pingnan's assistant or others on that delegation. Did you have any such?

CLOUGH: No. There was no outside contact, and that was the difficulty. It was a very formal sort of set up.

Q: So Alex and you and the interpreter would be on one side of the table...

CLOUGH: And a note taker from the consulate general in Geneva.

Q: So there was no contact then, except between the principals.

CLOUGH: That's right. Occasionally, we might exchange a few words before or after a meeting, but not much.

Q: That's very interesting.

CLOUGH: In Warsaw, we were given the Mischleviskiye Palace by the Polish government as a place where we could meet. It was nicely arranged for this purpose, because we had separate entrances. We'd go in separate entrances, and we had little rooms where we could gather and consult about our tactics and so on before we went in, then the meeting room was in the center. We'd go in from opposite ends.

Q: Having worked for both Alex and for Jake, two of our leading Foreign Service officers who reached high positions, I was wondering if you noticed any major differences in their style of approach to the problem, whether one had a strength the other lacked, or vice versa? Let's put it this way, were they equally effective, would you say, in handling this rather interesting and delicate and unique job? Alex, for one thing, tends to be quite talkative; Jake tends to be rather taciturn. And I was wondering whether the differences in their personalities and the way they articulated made much difference in terms of their negotiating capacities.

CLOUGH: It's hard to judge, because the situations were so different. In '55, there was no fighting going on. It was relatively calm. The Chinese Communists were in a period just after the famous Bandung Conference, where Zhou En-lai had taken a rather mild attitude toward the United States, so that things were more relaxed. In Warsaw, when we began, it was very tense. Nobody knew how far this war was going to spread, or what the intentions of the Chinese or the Soviets were at that point.

Q: Do you think that the Warsaw Talks had anything to do, really, with what actually eventuated in the resolution of the Taiwan Strait crisis of 1958?

CLOUGH: Let me add something to the question earlier about the two Ambassadors. My impression of Alex Johnson was that he was more broad-gauge. He had a sort of broader view of the negotiations, and he did more of the actual drafting of reports on meetings and recommendations for the next meeting. Jake left more of that work to me. There was that difference between them, aside from the more tense atmosphere that just grew out of the situation.

Now, as to what effect the talks had on the conflict. Ken Young gives them considerable credit (I think more than they are actually due) in his book on negotiating with the Chinese Communists.

I've always felt that what really impressed the Chinese was the rapid massing of the Seventh Fleet in the vicinity of the Taiwan Strait, and the fact that we were willing to convoy ships. We took a very hard line. I think their effort against the off-shore islands was, in part, a probe to see where the United States stood. Mao Zedong had just come back from Moscow the previous year, where he had talked about the East Wind prevailing over the West Wind. In '58, they were getting their "Great Leap Forward" started. They were in a period of high confidence, and I think he wanted to test the United States on the Taiwan issue.

Q: Since I was handling this Taiwan Straits crisis as Dulles's principal assistant, working on the problem, I would tend to agree with you, as opposed to Ken Young, with regard to the impact of the Warsaw channel in the resolution of this issue. I would agree with you that the U.S. military commitment and our apparent willingness to go pretty far... We didn't have any air involvement. There were very, very tight restrictions on what we were doing, but obviously we had the capability of extending it. Furthermore, when the Chinese Air Force did start circling around in the combat area, that they were shot down by the Republic of China airplanes that were equipped with Sidewinders. I think that also had a little bit of impact. But, overall, it was an effort to strangle Quemoy and prevent supplies from coming in. When we brought these two large LSTs on station, with all the small craft that could swim out of them, which were manned by "Chinats" as we called them, GROG, it was clear that we had the capacity to resupply the islands at long last. I think that they wanted to take the initiative and not be seen as having lost out, and that's when they came out with their first announcement. Now I don't think that the talks in Warsaw had much to do with the outcome. But what I would like to hear from you is something that has long intrigued me about that second Taiwan Strait crisis, and that is whether the relationship between the Soviet Union and China, which had been rather disturbed by the Sputnik in 1957, had resulted in what seems to be a growing antagonism between Beijing and Moscow, whether that was reflected in any way in the talks, or in the crisis itself.

CLOUGH: We couldn't sense it at the time, I must say, honestly. Looking back, we know a lot more, of course, about what was happening between those two countries at that time. But we didn't sense this tension, that the Chinese themselves elaborately attacked the Russians for lack of support in '63, when the big polemic exchange occurred.

There was one thing about the meetings in Warsaw that we had considered when I was still on the desk in Washington. We knew that if we selected a Polish building in which to meet, it would be bugged. The Poles would listen in. And we assumed that what the Poles heard, they would pass on to the Soviets. That didn't bother us too much. We thought it was useful for the Soviets to know what we were saying to the Chinese, and what they were saying to us, at this particular point.

Q: On the other hand, the Soviets had supplied the artillery and most of the shells that were being expended on the islands by what we used to call the "Chicomcs," PRC is a better word to use these days. In other words, the Soviets had the capacity for turning off the supply of these shells, and therefore it could have been a factor in the decision of the Chinese to call off the shelling. But as you say, we didn't know much about the depth of the Sino-Soviet breach. We knew that there were tensions between Beijing and Moscow at that time, but the full flavor of the Sino-Soviet split didn't become manifest for another two or three years. When I arrived in Hong Kong in 1961, it was already clear that this feud was blowing up.

CLOUGH: Because in 1960, the Soviets pulled out all of their...

Q: That's right, they pulled out. And the Chinese ability to depict the Soviet Union in the worst possible language was used. In other words, our translator and our political officers in Hong Kong soon ran out of language to use, because it kept intensifying, and the Chinese had ways of describing people in those scatological terms that we just lacked.

CLOUGH: I've always felt that, in respect to the Sino-Soviet relations, the evidence that we had broken the blockade was of vital importance. Because if you look at the dates of Khrushchev's first message to us and his second message, which was the more intemperate one and the one which the President refused to accept, the more intemperate one was sent after the blockade had been broken. I've always felt that the Soviets felt they weren't taking as much risk then, because the actual fighting was going to diminish.

Q: Of course, when you say "blockade," you're really talking about an artillery interdiction, and the fact that we were able to get supplies ashore, whereas we were receiving these reports from CIA, largely from their people on Quemoy, that depicted the island as just about running out of supplies and obviously of the Howitzer shells and things like that that they had expended, so that we were at the point ourselves, almost, of yielding and calling for some kind of international approach to it. Dulles had gone up to New York to call for a U.N. resolution calling for the neutralization of the off-shore islands, which I thought was a crazy idea, but it was that desperate.

CLOUGH: So we were making proposals, too, through the talks in Warsaw for such things as neutralization, cease-fire. We put a lot of emphasis on trying to get a cease-fire. And all of these ideas were rejected flatly by Beijing.

Q: Of course, you can't achieve through talks really much. They always reflect the realities, the scene, and that's what was happening. Is there anything else about that particular period of your career, when you were in CA, Chinese Affairs Department and in Warsaw, or shall we move on to your next assignment?

CLOUGH: There's sort of a link between the two. I was in Warsaw with Jake Beam for three years, from '58 to '61. The first six months, I was based in Bern, but then I was transferred in January to London. Really, I commuted from London.

Q: So really, your Bern and London assignments, basically, were still China-related assignments.

CLOUGH: I was still China-related. People often assume, because I was from the East Asian Bureau, that I was doing that job in London (they always had an East Asian guy in London), but I wasn't. Frank Galbraith was there at the time, he was doing that job. I was put in London only to facilitate my commuting to Warsaw. They gave me a job in the political section reporting on the Conservative Party and dealing with relations between Britain and Scandinavia, but that was the lesser part of my job. I had to keep up on what was going on in China, and I had to make a trip every few weeks. In three years, I made 25 trips from Warsaw.

Q: It's a pretty long, frustrating business.

CLOUGH: Yes.

Q: Sort of matches Phil Habib's performance in the peace talks on Vietnam in Paris, where he stayed on year after year going through the same threnody.

Q: (Kennedy) Weren't you the subject of a Congressional inquiry at one time?

CLOUGH: Oh, they got me mixed up with Cal Maillard, our interpreter, who was also stationed in London. The two of us used to go back and forth to Warsaw. He had told some newsman about how he spoke Chinese to some counterpart in the Foreign Ministry, and somebody in Congress decided to make fun of the State Department: Here's this guy specially trained in Chinese, but he's living in London. It didn't amount to much.

Q: Really tenuous charge. So when we're talking then about your Bern and London assignments, we're really talking still about the Warsaw Talks.

CLOUGH: Yes, that was my primary function in those places. Although after the talks slowed down and they didn't occur very often, they were able to spare me from London for other jobs.

For example, in 1960, I was sent to the Law of the Sea Conference in Geneva for about six weeks. That was headed by... a lawyer in New York, the name escapes me. Anyway, he headed the Law of the Sea delegation. It was the last effort to get worldwide agreement on what we called the U.S.-Canadian proposal for Six Plus Six: a six-mile territorial sea and a six-mile fishing zone. This failed by one vote. Anyway, that's beside the point.

The point is, they were able to spare me in London, because the talks in Warsaw dragged out. I had to go once from Geneva while I was on this special assignment to Warsaw and back for a couple of days. And then on another occasion I was sent with the Librarian of Congress to Hong Kong and India to look into the situation of refugees from China. We spent three or four weeks on this round-the-world trip and writing up the results. So that shows you that the demands in Warsaw were not very pressing.

Then I was transferred in July of '61 to Taipei. This is where the two things get linked together. Because when I arrived in Taipei, one of the first things that was going on at that point was the question of the admission of Outer Mongolia to the United Nations. It was linked to the admission of Mauritania. And Chiang Kai-shek was threatening to veto this proposal, because they regarded Mongolia as part of China, not an independent state, just a Soviet puppet, and therefore it couldn't become a member of the United Nations.

But the threat to do this was infuriating a lot of Africans, who wanted to see Mauritania get in. And Africa was a very important area for the Republic of China. To maintain its position in the U.N., it had to have the support of a lot of African countries. They were coming into the U.N. as independent states in increasing numbers, and we needed their vote on the China representation issue. So one of my early chores in the first week or two after I got into Taipei, was to talk to Foreign Ministry people, to persuade them not to take this foolish act.

Q: They probably agreed with you, didn't they? It was the old man who was holding out.

CLOUGH: Yes, it was the old man, and he...

Q: But they must have tried to convey to him that this was a disastrous policy in terms of upholding their position in the United Nations.

CLOUGH: Yes, I would hope so. Anyway, he finally desisted, and that crisis passed. In early '62, we began to get reports. Drumright was the Ambassador in Taipei when I arrived. I was the DCM, and this Mongolia crisis occurred while he was there. But then in March, the following year, he went on home leave. Averell Harriman had become Assistant Secretary, and he didn't care much for the position that Drumright took on the Taiwan-China issue. Harriman, I think, wanted to see some movement on the China issue. So Drumright proposed that on his way home he stop off in Manila, where there was going to be a Chiefs of Mission Conference, to which Harriman was coming. Harriman said, "No, you go right on. We'll have our DCM in Taipei come to represent you."

Q: So you were at that Chiefs of Mission meeting in Baguio in 1962. Because you remember I had made a presentation as Consul General, Hong Kong, with regard to what was going on in China and what the implications of this were. It delighted Harriman, because basically what I was pointing out was information that supported the thesis that we should be taking another hard look at what our basic China policy should be. And, of course, Chester Bowles, who was Harriman's superior at that time, being the Under Secretary, also shared that same point of view. And, furthermore, at that Chiefs of Mission meeting, you'll recall that Harriman was really quite dictatorial, and he was very short and sharp with certain people at the conference, particularly Sam Gilstrap, who was our Consul General in Singapore. You must have sensed, in other words, in 1961 when you arrived there, that the Kennedy Administration was taking a rather different look at the China policy, which was very difficult from your viewpoint, because they were leaning a bit in the direction that was going to make it very uncomfortable for our representatives in Taipei.

CLOUGH: That's right, but I think the experience on Mongolia had a somewhat chastening effect on the Kennedy Administration, because they hadn't realized the strength of the Nationalist views and how it would affect the China lobby. After all, Kennedy had got in by a rather narrow margin. Schlesinger later said in his book that they had a talk about the China issue, and Kennedy said that we haven't got the political support to do very much on China. Let's leave that for the second term. And, of course, he never had a second term.

Q: So you must have succeeded Rankin, did you?

CLOUGH: No. Drumright succeeded Rankin. See, Rankin went up there as Chargé in the early '50s, and then he was appointed Ambassador.

Q: So who did you succeed?

CLOUGH: I succeeded Joe Yager.

Q: I see. Well, now tell me about some of the problems.

CLOUGH: Let me tell you about the problem of '62, because this is where the Warsaw Talks and the situation in Taiwan are linked together.

After Drumright had left we began to get these reports about preparations by the Republic of China to do something militarily about the mainland. You had no doubt reported to the Chiefs of Mission Conference about how bad things were on the mainland. There was starvation and all kinds of problems that the PRC was having after the collapse of the "Great Leap Forward," so Chiang Kai-shek was encouraged to feel that maybe there would be some sort of rebellion on the mainland, and that the time would come for him to move in with his troops.

So he started, secretly. He didn't inform us what he was doing, but we found out. He started getting certain units prepared. He imposed a defense tax to raise money. Of course, the Communists got word of this, and they moved some additional air units into Fujian Province, opposite Taiwan. And this disturbed our government, so that Kennedy, through the Warsaw Talks, informed the Chinese Communists that we did not intend to back Chiang Kai-shek in a military attack on the mainland.

Q: Or take advantage of their internal problems.

CLOUGH: Yes. And later he made the same statement at a press conference in public.

Q: That was really quite an important statement, wasn't it?

CLOUGH: It was a very important statement, and it cooled the ardor of the people in Taiwan.

Q: I had forgotten that the statement had been made at that high level.

CLOUGH: I'm not sure that the Warsaw channel was quoting the President, but he himself made the statement at a press conference.

Q: See, I get involved in this thing, too, here as Consul General in Hong Kong. The Governor of Hong Kong called me in one day to urge that I get in touch with our government in Washington and our embassy in Taipei with regard to the way Chiang Kai-shek was using Hong Kong as a launching base for certain covert operations against railroads and that sort thing, kind of spoiling operations. That was kind of a lightning rod that might bring the war into Hong Kong somehow. He was very unhappy over this. I sent this message on to Washington and never got very much of an answer with regard to it. And I went up to Taiwan. Actually, I think I must have spoken to you, certainly spoke to Drumright to urge that some action be taken on this, because it was making for a very bad relationship with Hong Kong and the British. Furthermore, these little needling operations, all they were doing was causing the Chinese Communists to be all the more alert and to bring more forces to bear in the area and stirring up, in other words, a dangerous crisis situation. Meanwhile, China was going through the last toils of the "Great Leap Forward." Conditions in China were very, very bad. Refugees were beginning to flow over the border into Hong Kong. That happened in May 1962. So that there was always this concern that China might lash out in desperation. And that's where that assurance came in. Not only that we weren't going to help Chiang Kai-shek in any of his operations, but we weren't going to try to take advantage of their internal problems.

CLOUGH: So then we get back to your longer-term question: What effect did the Warsaw Talks have on the decision the Chinese made in '69 or '70, '71 eventually, to open up relations with us?

It's interesting that in some of the talks in the early part of the Kennedy Administration, they made some proposals to China. They offered grain to China. Having heard about the famine conditions, they offered grain, which the Chinese rejected. They offered to have an exchange of correspondents, which we had earlier not been willing to do. The Chinese had now shifted their ground. In the early period, they were proposing things, and we were saying, "No, not until you renounce the use of force and release all the American prisoners." In the '60s, it got turned around, and they began to say: "No, we can't have any improvement of relations with the United States until the Taiwan problem is settled." And so they rejected these initiatives that we took in the early '60s, and the talks became very sterile through the mid-'60s. Of course, they were in the Cultural Revolution. For a couple of years there, they practically had no foreign policy.

Q: When would you say the Cultural Revolution started, '65?

CLOUGH: It started in '65, and the worst period was through '67 into '68. By '68, the military was taking over and calming things down, but the Chinese date the Cultural Revolution as ten years, running until the death of Mao in '76, because the Gang of Four took over...

Q: But already by '69, why, things were limited to...

CLOUGH: The severe fighting between various groups of Red Guards and troops and so on was ended by '69. But the thing that happened that affected the Chinese most, I think, with respect to relations with us, was what the Soviets were doing.

The Soviets began, about '64, to build up their forces on the Chinese border, and this process continued. That disturbed the Chinese, because during the Cultural Revolution, the anti-Soviet polemics became very strong. In fact, they attacked the Soviet Embassy in Beijing. Then in 1969, there was this actual military clash, two military clashes on the Ussuri River.

Q: But what were the relations between Taiwan and the Soviet Union then? In view of the growing bitterness between Beijing and Moscow, was there an inclination to try to take advantage of that in some way, by either side, that is, by either Moscow or Taiwan?

CLOUGH: No. No, there were rumors. I mean, people in Hong Kong were passing around rumors about meetings between people from Taiwan and the Soviets, but I don't think there was anything to that. Our relations with the Soviets in those years were such that if we thought that Taiwan was trying to make some kind of deal with the Soviet Union, we would be very upset. And they were very dependent on us.

Q: But I was thunderstruck when I talked with Chiang Kai-shek in 1969, just before I became Assistant Secretary, to find him thinking that all this Sino-Soviet split was a lot of propaganda designed to fool the Western world. Now clearly that was not the case, and surely that couldn't have been believed by people in the Foreign Office. Did they feel that the old man was sort of losing his marbles, or whether anybody in the professional capacity who shared the Jimo's views...

CLOUGH: Well, they used to express those views. Of course, I wasn't in Taiwan in those years. I had left Taiwan in '65.

Q: Yes, but I was just saying that the Sino-Soviet split was clear from '61 onward, and clear to a lot of us before that time.

CLOUGH: But it wasn't just the Jimo. A lot of people in Taiwan were saying this is just a fake, it's being put on, a show to deceive the West, because it served their interests to get the West to believe that. It would prevent the West from making any move to draw closer to China.

Q: Oh, yes, the multi-polarization of the world was something they certainly didn't want to see. So as long as you had a Cold War atmosphere...

CLOUGH: In taking this view, there was an element of wishful thinking. There was also an element of calculated policy, to convince the Americans and others that nothing was to be gained by trying to improve relations with Beijing.

Q: Yes, well, of course we were moving in that direction. And in 1962 onward, we were making certain moves to allow certain Americans to travel to Communist China. We had under consideration moves to change our foreign access control regulations so that Americans could buy things that came from mainland China. These things must have been known to the authorities on Taiwan and must have been discomfiting. Furthermore, within the State Department, we had broken up the China Desk so that there were two desks. It was no longer just CA controlling China, where almost all the attention of the desk was focused on Taiwan, but there was another desk set up, called PRCM, which basically was the PRC and Mongolia.

CLOUGH: And Hong Kong.

Q: And Hong Kong. That meant that all of a sudden the PRC and Mongolia, you might say, had representation in the State Department, which they had lacked before. Did this kind of thing come to the attention of Taiwan? Caused some concern I imagine.

CLOUGH: Oh, yes. I think that any move...

Q: And then Roger Hilsman made this speech in 1963.

CLOUGH: That was quite disturbing to the people in Taiwan, where he intimated that we would keep the door open to possible improvement of relations with Beijing.

Q: How did they take the death...

CLOUGH: It's interesting (this is a sidelight, but if you don't mind my throwing it in, it's current), that since June 4 last year, the government in Beijing has been accusing the United States and the West of trying to promote "peaceful evolution" in China -- the peaceful evolution of Communism into Capitalism. That's the main charge that they make against us. And one of the things that people in the Institute of American Studies have been researching is to find statements by Americans which support that accusation. One of the things they cite is Roger Hilsman's speech of 1963.

Q: Which, by the way, gave, I think, Dean Rusk considerable agony, because he had not had proper clearance on it. But since the speech had such a good reaction in the American press as a whole and the academic community, Rusk acted as though he was entirely in favor of the speech. But I think it came as something of a shock to him, too. There is an awful lot to cover, of course, during this particular period, but one thing that I would be most interested in is what was the reaction in Taiwan to the assassination of President Kennedy? That occurred, of course, while you were there.

CLOUGH: That occurred while I was there, and the reaction was shock...

Q: But in as much as he and his Administration seemed to be moving towards a civil dialogue, discourse with China, and beginning to open up travel and trade...

CLOUGH: You know, not much of that had happened under Kennedy. That really came later under the early Nixon, those signals.

Q: No. No, there were certain moves that were already made at that time. I know, because I was the Deputy Assistant Secretary back there, called back by Kennedy to look at our China policy. And I was working with Hilsman and didn't do...

CLOUGH: So some moves were made in that period, too.

Q: That's right. So there were moves made in that period. Therefore, if not Kennedy, certainly people like Harriman and Bowles and others who were working under him. And the new Administration, in general, wasn't taking at all the rigid views that were taken under the Eisenhower Administration. And what I was wondering was, when Kennedy's death suddenly occurred, whether this was greeted with any kind of, even relief, in Taiwan?

CLOUGH: I don't think so. My impression... It's a long time ago and I...

Q: They could never say so, I was just wondering whether you sensed that there was a...

CLOUGH: No, I think the main reaction was uncertainty as to how this happened, for one thing. And for another, how this would affect U.S. policy. I don't think anyone was confident that a Democratic successor, Lyndon Johnson, would necessarily be any more friendly toward them than Kennedy had been.

Q: Well, maybe. Of course, McGeorge Bundy was continuing on with the Johnson Administration, and so were a lot of other people. And so was Bobby Kennedy, for that matter. Now meanwhile, of course, we were getting more deeply involved in the war in Vietnam.

CLOUGH: Exactly. That's the next thing.

Q: It seems to me I'd be very interested to know a little bit about what you thought our policy should be with regard to Taiwan and its relationship to the war in Vietnam. In other words, did we look to them to be a source of supply? Did we look to them to be a source of any kind of support of operations?

CLOUGH: Yes, we did. I was present when we notified them, in '65, that Johnson had taken the decision to put in 25,000 ground troops in Vietnam. Chiang Kai-shek's reaction was interesting. He questioned whether American troops would be very effective in the kind of war which was going on in Vietnam. Of course, he had his own ulterior motives. His view was that you don't really solve things in that part of the world until you get rid of the Chinese Communist regime.

Q: But basically they must have greeted this American involvement in Vietnam with some relief, didn't they?

CLOUGH: It became clear fairly soon that we were going to have to depend on them to support the military operations. Early on in the '50s, when I was in the State Department, we had appropriated $20 million to improve an airfield near T'ai-chung to accommodate the B-52, the big aircraft, in case we might need it. It didn't become an American base, but we created the facilities there so we could use it. And then, when the Vietnam War came, we did base aircraft there. We had refueling aircraft for the B-52s, which came from Guam, and we had transport aircraft to take things into Vietnam. Taiwan was also important as a place for repair and maintenance. They had very good facilities at Air Asia, which had CIA antecedents. They could repair fighter aircraft, overhaul engines, overhaul tanks, trucks and so on.

Q: Was this capacity used?

CLOUGH: Yes. Yes, it was quite important during that period. And, of course, Taiwan, Taipei was a very important R&R place for people coming out of Vietnam, American soldiers. So there were various ways in which Taiwan became important, and this...

Q: Did Taiwan benefit economically from the war?

CLOUGH: Yes, sure. It benefited economically, and it benefited diplomatically from this. The demonstration of how important Taiwan was in this containment...

Q: And in as much as China was giving active assistance, not active ground force assistance, but giving lots of supply assistance and encouragement, it would seem to us at the time, to North Vietnam, that, again, it would be greeted with some relief, I would think, in Taiwan to realize that now we saw that really our enemy was Communist China, and that all this propitiating of Communist China was certainly something we wouldn't continue in this atmosphere.

CLOUGH: Yes, and that was what happened, actually. I was in the Policy Planning Council from '66 to '69, and I was responsible for East Asian Affairs. I came up with a couple of minor things in the field: international relations, dealing with international organizations where we would soften our position a little bit with respect to Communist China and Nationalist China.

But the IO was still dominated by Ruth Bacon and people who still were acting very vigorously against any slippage at all. During the Vietnam War, I think Dean Rusk felt that it would be a mistake to divert any attention from getting that war ended to doing something about China.

Q: Yes. Well, you bring up the name of Dean Rusk, and of course this looms large in all we are talking about. Because there was a man who was very deeply committed to upholding the position of the Republic of China, diplomatically and otherwise. A man who took a very strong view on the Cold War and also the war in Vietnam. He is not the kind of man who would ever back down. This must have been considerably comforting to Taiwan, to know that Dean Rusk was Secretary of State. Probably just gave them the same kind of assurance that they had when Dulles was the Secretary of State.

CLOUGH: I think that's true. What was happening in the United States, though, in public opinion and in the Congress, was that the kind of almost automatic support for the ROC against the Chinese Communists, which had existed in the early '60s, was dissipating. Do you remember the Congressional hearings that were held in '66, at which John Fairbank and Bill Barnett and others testified? What was Doak's phrase? Can't recall, something without isolation.

Q: Were you aware at that time, either when you were in Taipei or when you were on the Policy Planning staff, of the basic hostile feelings between the Chinese and the Vietnamese? In other words, I had always assumed, even when I was Assistant Secretary during that period, which was '69 to '73, that the relationship between Beijing and Hanoi was, if not amicable, they both recognized the importance of staying in there together. The idea that any kind of latent hostility could break out between the two of them never occurred to me. Did it to you?

CLOUGH: At some point I began to read some of the history of Chinese-Vietnamese relations. And, as you know, the history is one...

Q: I didn't have the luxury of reading back in history. Because I think if one did, one recognized that this was always an underlying possibility. Well, just to go back once again to the relationship between the Soviet Union and Taiwan. I recall there was a Soviet merchantman that was seized, I've forgotten what it was...

CLOUGH: Yes, the Tuopsi.

Q: It was held indefinitely there. Were you involved in that case?

CLOUGH: No. I don't think it happened while I was in Taiwan. But those seamen were held there for years and years. I think some may be still there. But I don't think they'd be prevented from leaving now if they wanted to.

Q: To me, it made absolutely no sense for the Republic of China to hold on to those people, unless they really believed that Moscow and Beijing were working hand in glove, which seems incredible that they should ever have thought that after '61. What about the troop-community relationship? We had a lot of forces on Taiwan, and we had the Taiwan Defense Command there. We had a lot of men in uniform coming in and out. How did the people on Taiwan view our military and our military presence? Was there a kind of a nationalist reaction against it at all?

CLOUGH: There was some. The attitude was mixed. On the one hand, most people felt that they were threatened by Communist China and that the United States had come to the rescue, and that it was necessary to have these American troops around in order to defend Taiwan. And so they were willing to have them.

And then various elements of society benefitted by running a black market with stuff out of the American PX and commissary and that sort of thing. A lot of people were employed by the American MAG (Marine Air Group) and other American military who were assigned there. We had one of the largest MAGs in the world; I think we had 11,000 people in it at one point.

But there was a certain amount of friction, because the Americans, of course, were far better off.

Their living standards were much higher. They drove cars around. Sometimes they had accidents, they'd run into a Taiwanese.

Q: And there were red light districts, undoubtedly, that flourished around a base presence.

CLOUGH: And then there was this case in '57 when an American serviceman shot and killed a Chinese, the Reynolds case, which resulted in the sacking of the U.S. Embassy by a mob.

Q: That's right, and scattering all these officials papers around the streets, picked up, spuriously, by a newspaper in Bombay which printed all these things. They were very incriminating, but they were false documents. But we couldn't tell the world that they were false documents, because in proving that they were, we'd be giving away some of our secrets. So we just had to live with this situation. That's going back too many years, I was just wondering. I would gather from your remarks that there was sufficient feeling of being embattled, of being pretty lonely, certainly up against a great power of Red China, that to have a friend and to have a trip wire, by having a friend there was very important, certainly from the government's viewpoint. But down the line amongst the people there were these feelings.

CLOUGH: Yes, there were personal frictions that you get when any large foreign community is imposed on another, but they weren't very strong. For the most part, the people in general were friendly to Americans. There was very little unfriendliness.

Q: My general impression from meeting Chinese Nationalist officials was that they were pretty decent people to work with, and that it must have been a fairly pleasant experience dealing with the Foreign Office in Taipei. Is that a correct surmise?

CLOUGH: I think that's right, although there were issues on which we disagreed.

Q: But they were reasonable, they were rational.

CLOUGH: Yes, they were rational. Most of the people in the Foreign Ministry were Western-trained, they were graduates of American universities, many of them, and they were friendly and...

Q: Meanwhile, the standard of living in Taiwan was going up. Was it perceptibly going up while you were there?

CLOUGH: Oh, yes, it had already started, although the real takeoff had not occurred in those years. It was underway in the early '60s. You were talking about relations, though, between the United States and the Republic of China. The real shock came in '71, when the announcement was made that Kissinger had been to Beijing and that President Nixon would go there, actually.

Q: Where were you at that time?

CLOUGH: I was retired. Of course, I was going back and forth to Taiwan frequently. I was writing a book for Brookings on East Asia, and then later I wrote a book on Taiwan. So I have made a lot of trips back and forth, kept in touch. And the shock later in the Carter Administration, when we actually established relations with Beijing and broke relations with Taipei, was demonstrated by the crowd that gathered when Christopher arrived representing the department, and his motorcade was attacked by people with sticks and...

Q: But a great deal of your efforts when you were in Taiwan must have centered upon upholding the Republic of China's position in the United Nations.

CLOUGH: Right. That was...

Q: That must have taken up a high percentage of your time.

CLOUGH: It took more of the department's time, I think, because we had to deal with countries all around the world. Every September, or a few months before, we'd send out these messages and try to line up all the support for the annual vote on the Chinese representation issue. Up until about '61, we were able to get support for not considering the issue, just...

Q: No, but in your position in Taiwan, though, it would have been very important there, from your viewpoint and our national viewpoint, that the Republic of China do all possible to maintain its diplomatic standing, and that it certainly maintain the support of countries, Africa and so forth, who had voting powers in the United Nations.

CLOUGH: That's right. They spent quite a lot of money on Africa. They sent out these agricultural technical advisory teams to African countries. They had a...

Q: They called it a Viking program, didn't they?

CLOUGH: Yes, I think it was, at one point. They had plots of land in Taiwan to which they invited Africans to come and learn about agriculture. They had a steady, very large-scale interchange. I think at one point they had teams in 20 or more countries.
[Operation Vanguard was the U.S. Public Law 480 Agreement with the Republic of China]

Q: And they did a good job, too.

CLOUGH: They did a good job, and this was appreciated by the Africans. And this was a way of maintaining this diplomatic link and getting that crucial vote every year.

Q: And have fewer white men around in Africa telling the Africans what to do or how to do it.

CLOUGH: And Hsi-k'un Yang, who was the Vice Minister in charge of the African operations, was very good. He spoke French, and he had a feeling for how to deal with African leaders. He knew them all. He traveled back and forth frequently.

Q: I know that when I was back in the department, few things impressed me more favorably about the Republic of China than its efforts to maintain its diplomatic position through these kinds of helpful support of African countries. And they had the kinds of agricultural technicians and so forth that were just needed. They knew how to make proper use of manure and things like that, where we were using chemical fertilizers. Their technology, in other words, was a little bit more applicable to...

CLOUGH: And also, as individuals they were willing to go out there for a year or two or three without their families and live under circumstances which were pretty spartan, whereas American aid people wouldn't do that.

Q: And they didn't have to have commissaries and other things that tend to create divisions. So you retired, you say, in 1969. But before you retired, I see that you were at Harvard for a couple of years.

CLOUGH: When I came back from Taiwan, I was there for a year, '65-'66.

Q: What were you doing?

CLOUGH: I was a diplomat-in-residence. I was at the Center for International Affairs for a year at Harvard and Associate of the East Asian Research Center.

Q: And what you were working on basically was China?

CLOUGH: Yes. Well, I wasn't doing a single research project. I did a paper on China, the Chinese representation issue, during my time there. But mainly it was a sort of place to catch up on the current state of the disciplines. I audited courses from Sam Huddington in political development, from Merle Fainsod in Soviet politics, a course on Japanese politics. Spent my time reading up in these areas.

Q: And then you went to the Policy Planning Council.

PAUL GOOD
Childhood
Tientsin (1940-1941)

Paul Good was born in Kentucky in 1939. After receiving his bachelor's degree at Cascade College he received his master's degree from Ball State. His career in USIA included positions in Thailand, Chile, Colombia, Dominican Republic, Nigeria, Australia, Yugoslavia, South Africa, Morocco, and Senegal. Mr. Good was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in August 2000.

Q: What denomination?

GOOD: It's from the Methodist branch, but specifically at that time, it was the Evangelical Church. The Evangelical Church was a branch of the Methodists, which had broken off in Germany about a century before. It later joined with the Brethren and those then joined with the Methodists and that's how you have the United Methodist Church today. His particular denominational branch in Oregon did not. It's now called the Evangelical Church of North America, but that's basically Methodist.

Q: Where did your father go to finish up his undergraduate study?

GOOD: He went to Asbury College in Wilmore, Kentucky. He and mother both finished up there and then he went on to Divinity School there

Q: What mission areas were there?

GOOD: China.

Q: China?

GOOD: It was an organization called the National Holiness Missionary Society, later changed its name to World Gospel Mission because they didn't want to be associated or identified with the Holy Rollers. But they had formed somewhere at the turn of the century. I can remember that when we were living in Chicago, the couple - Maude was a widow at that point with her daughter - living below us had gone out to China with this group in 1910. Above us in that apartment house, was a couple who had gone out in 1925. Dad went out in 1940.

Q: That's an interesting time to have taken off for China.

GOOD: It was a very interesting time to be taking off for China, but then I guess most any time was an interesting time to go off for China in the 50 years before that.

Q: You, of course, were very young now when your father went off in 1940. Did you and your mother go there?

GOOD: Yes, we did in what I've recently seen to be a very small steamer. We went docked in Seoul and then went on into Tientsin, where he was located for language training. I understand that Mom and I did not get up to Peking, as we called it then. Dad still has his pictures from his unit there and of course we vacationed in Betzha, which is, I gather, still the vacation spot for the elite of the Chinese.

Q: Yes, I think Mao and company used to head off there.

GOOD: Yes.

Q: Obviously this is when you were, I 'd say pretty young; you were very, very young. So what happened?

GOOD: Well, they didn't stay very long. Mom got sick. They weren't ever sure quite what she got, but it ended up giving her early death when she was 46 from subsequent developments. But they never knew what it was she got there. The story I remember hearing was that she was in the hospital and she heard a baby crying. She said, "That sounds like my baby." It turned out I was in for worms in the same hospital; they hadn't told her. From the pictures that we have, the motion pictures of the time, it was a very dirty, smoggy, or not clear, not many vehicles on the road, two-wheeled rickshaws of course, lots of bags of charcoal being carted around, and lots of people.

Q: This being the Shantung Peninsula, was it?

GOOD: Yes.

Q: This was under, by 1940s, would be under the Japanese, wasn't it?

GOOD: Yes, the pictures I've seen of the times showed barbed wire fences that were set up. Yes, they were in charge then. This was part of the reason of course for the return to the U.S. It wasn't just the illness, but they were beginning to move the missionaries out. We came back in 1941. Because of Mom's illness, Dad never went out again as a missionary, but he stayed with the missionary organization for most of his career, retired from it eventually, although he did take a few years as a pastor in Oregon before continuing with it.

Q: Where did you go?

GOOD: After we came back from China, we went to the San Francisco area where my grandfather was living in Novato, at that time just a very small town, then back to Chicago, where we stayed until 1944, when Dad took a pastorate back in Oregon for two years and worked for the conference for a year. Then we went back to Chicago in '47. In '47 we came back to Chicago, October, Columbus Day.

Q: At any point was there any part of the world you were looking at, for example China or elsewhere, or was this not?

GOOD: Well, China would be the place I looked at, if I looked anywhere. I was, of course, overwhelmed by the depth of the knowledge necessary to know China. I'd steered away from focusing on Chinese history or anything to do it, especially in Asia, all the way through because I felt that it was too late to learn. You needed to have the language and to know as much as you needed to know; it was a never-ending fight. I remember Dad's friend Jack Trachsel, whose daughter I dated at Cascade, and who married a Cascade roommate, had wonderful Chinese. I think he'd spent 50 years over there. But he said he never felt that he was fluent, really fluent. He could preach in the language, but he said there's so much more to know. I remember talking to a professor at the University of Washington when I was teaching high school in Oregon (1959-1961). He was just overwhelmed. The Japanese were publishing a volume a day from the archives of ancient books in Chinese. And he said, "Look at those shelves. I'm getting a new book a day. How am I supposed to read all that information? I can't read it. It's too much." Now he had his Ph.D. (Doctor of Philosophy) in Chinese Studies, so I never felt that I was capable of becoming what I thought you had to become to be a specialist.

Q: As you were looking over this whole thing, as you're looking at the map, were there areas in

Thailand where you felt that we needed to concentrate more or that were more dubious as far as supporting their cause?

GOOD: You mean who might be approaching the borders?

Q: Yes.

GOOD: There were three areas, one of which, well, four I suppose, although for different reasons, of which two were not communistic in their threats. The border with Malaysia, the Malaysian uprising or revolution or submersion, was...

Q: Insurgency.

GOOD: Insurgency they called it, yes. It was really finished by '63, but that didn't mean that there wasn't concern that it might start up again on the Thai side and then work its way south. There was some concern down there, and as a result, we opened up another post in Yala, which was closer to the border of Malaysia on the east side.

The border with Burma was not of the concern it is today, although across from Victoria there was a little bit of concern, because you had water communication, communication between the Thai port and the Burmese port.

The two areas of real concern were up in the Chiang Rai area bordering with Laos and fairly close to China and, of course, in the northeast, bordering with Laos along the Mekong, where we were fairly close to the Ho Chi Minh Trail, almost shooting distance at points. So close, that by the time I got up to Ubol in '64, you no longer could take the river side road that ran from Pakse up to Vientiane. It wasn't secure. Any communications were being done by plane at that point. Air America was acting up then.

Q: It does sound like these were almost "untalkable to" (not able to talk to) people.

GOOD: Yes, exactly and even in a social setting you had to be very careful. But remember I said they didn't have a university education generally. They were not truly professional.

Q: One of the things striking to me would be that as the world is changing, particularly in the technical field, you have countries like China and India which are producing hundreds of thousands, if not more, of highly educated people, particularly in the science fields and all that. Here's Australia sitting down unable to compete on that level or not?

GOOD: Well, it's true. A couple of other things I should put in for background. New Zealand was slightly more educated by about a tenth of a percentage point. There had been no increase in slots at the universities in Australia from 1972 on, certainly in '85 when I left. The Liberal government had not expanded the system, so there hadn't been a place for people to go. Now this was at the same time it was becoming much more difficult to go to Europe to get your education because you couldn't work with the EC (European Commission) coming in. There was a definite divide between the people in 1981 too, who were 35 and above or 35 and younger. Those who were over 35 were more likely to have done a year or more in Europe.

Q: This is, of course, during the Reagan administration and early on when particularly when we were taking a pretty tough line on the Soviet Union and all. How was that plane?

GOOD: We'd occasionally get campers, protesters in front of the embassy in Canberra, not the Russians usually. It was the Yugoslavs, the Croats accusing us of not being even handed in our treatment. We would be reporting on any Soviet activities there, but no, that didn't seem to be a big problem. Their problem was China, not Russia.

Q: Yes, you were saying the big problem is China?

GOOD: Yes, from their perspective China is a threat. They were trying to develop relations. CCA (Canberra College of Advanced Education) which I think is now called the University of Canberra, and the main university in Canberra, the ANU (Australian National University) had exchange programs, bringing students down, sending students up, exchanging professors, that sort of thing. They have a fear of this monster on top of them; this billion-population country that they feel definitely must be interested in this empty country down below. The truth of the matter is that the Chinese aren't. They're not interested in taking it over from a political point of view. It's too far away, it's too empty; they've got resources, but it's easier to buy them than it is to steal them. But if an Australian saw an Asian on the street, it ruined his day, or did back then.

Q: Oh.

GOOD: So it was better to be down there on the shore, which was where they had originally been. Ultimately, shortly after I left the project and they started to get some transmitters, then they had a bad fire while it was still under the control of the contractor. So it wasn't something the Voice was responsible for. Unfortunately, Bob, who was in charge of this, suffered career damage from the way it was handled.

There was another particular problem for Sri Lanka, the worries of India that this was going to be broadcasting to India. It took some serious negotiations in New Delhi to calm the Indian government down by pointing out to them that technically this station was too close to India to be broadcast into India. This station was broadcasting up into the interior of China, and I guess the "Stans" (countries north of India whose name ended in S-T-A-N). To a certain extent, that was one of their (concerns). They were aiming into two main directions, into the hinterland of China and into the southern areas of Russia. The primary location, however, was the hinterland of mainland Asia.

RUTH WALTER CROOK
Job not specified
Philippines, China (1940's)

Ruth Crock joined in 1941 what was then called the U.S. information service, which was later absorbed by the office of War Information. Working in the Overseas Branch, she prepared employees for duty in various aspects of the Information Programs abroad during World War II. This involved programs in support of our military operations throughout the world. After the war, she joined the State Department's Foreign Press Liaison Office and worked there until transferring to the Voice of America, where she worked, with minor interruption, until her retirement. Ms. Crock was interviewed by Cliff Rance in 1990.

CROOK: Among the things I worked on was obtaining specialties which we shipped out to Australia and were then gotten into the Philippines by submarine. These included such things as chewing gum, sewing kits, pencils – that was before the advent of the ballpoint pen, cigarettes – oh, a great many different kinds of things, all with the slogan, I SHALL RETURN, on everything, because MacArthur insisted on it. These were prepared by the publications division as an adjunct to their work for MacArthur, and this became part of the same program where the leaflets were developed for dropping.

Q: Were these dropped as well, or just distributed?

CROOK: At this point, no. The leaflets came later, when we were based on Hollandia before we moved into the Philippines. Then, once we were in the Philippines, when we got a beachhead on Luzon, then they were dropped over the parts of the Philippines still held by the Japanese. So it was a very interesting time.

I remember one set of publications we did was a magazine called Free Philippines, which was the name of the newspaper that had been very popular in the Philippines before all this happened. We had to get a statement, I remember, in one of them, of encouragement from Cardinal Spellman, who was then the archbishop of New York. I remember going over to the cardinal's office and talking to him about it, and getting his letter and then having it incorporated into the magazine.

Once the team finally got into Luzon – they started at Leyte and then worked their way up; they were in the second wave with the troops going in there – they finally got into Manila and commandeered the printing press which had put out the Free Philippines before. Fritz Marquardt had worked on the Free Philippines before he moved back to Chicago. So they began issuing a daily newspaper, in English, called the Free Philippines – the name was kept. And that was publishing all through the rest of the war.

Another thing they did was to go to Santo Tomas University, which was a Japanese POW camp, as early as possible, and they found an NBC correspondent, Bert Silen, who had been broadcasting off the roof of the Manila Hotel as the last broadcaster from the Philippines before the Japanese took over Manila. So NBC was of course immediately interested, and he began his first broadcast again saying, "I take up my broadcasting after having been so rudely interrupted," etc., etc.

Q: He had been interned?

CROOK: He had been interned by the Japanese. His daughter had been shot. He had a lot of interesting but terrible experiences, as did all the Americans who were interned there. Of course they didn't suffer as much as the Bataan survivors, but they had a lot of problems getting food and medical attention. It seems that just before the war, Silen had been hired by OSS to continue broadcasting clandestinely once the war started, if it reached the Philippines. No one was sure that was going to happen right away.

So he came out of the war without anything. Evidently he had resigned from NBC at that point. I had the job of reestablishing the fact that he had been hired by the government and got him back pay and all that. It was very interesting. I made several trips to Washington tracking that down. At that time Arsine Butts, who was our top administrative man, was very helpful, and Bert Silen, needless to say, was very grateful. He went back to work on – I think it was NBC – on the West Coast, and eventually he died very prematurely, and a lot of the things that happened to him during those war years were pretty much responsible for his early demise.

Another thing I worked on which was fascinating was the Phoenix. Did you ever hear of the Phoenix?

Q: I don't think so.

CROOK: This was an Italian ship. Remember when the Italian navy all went into Bari, and we got a lot of the cargo ships? I don't remember whether it was before or after the French navy, but anyway, we got a lot of ships at Bari. This was an old ship used to transport food or something, and it was given to the OWI. The purpose of that ship was to go to the coast of China and bombard the Chinese with VOA and other propaganda about the war effort: your friends are coming to relieve you, etc. Also, a leaflet operation was getting into China clandestinely.

Q: How could they distribute the leaflets?

CROOK: I don't know. These were people who somehow or other got into China. Don't ask me; I don't know the details. Anyway, there was to be a leaflet operation, because I know one of the things I had to buy was a Webendorfer printing press. Maybe that was to be done once we got on the coast of China.

So I remember OWI getting that ship. It had to go through the Panama Canal, and the crew was all Italian; nobody spoke English. Some of them got into trouble in Panama, and I had to get the Panamanians and the Americans at the Panama Canal to get them out of the jails. Finally we got the ship out to San Francisco, and I was working on the servicing of that ship – meaning getting people who were going to work on it. It had to be completely re-outfitted by the Navy; it was an old ship and needed a lot of work. Then getting rid of the Italian crew and sending them back to Italy, and putting on an American crew – it was a tremendous effort. Then one day word came down that we were abandoning the ship.

Q: Why?

CROOK: Because the plans were already afoot for us to drop the atom bomb, which of course none of us knew anything about. At the same time we were also beginning to stockpile for the Japan landings, and again the word came down: forget about it.

Q: Overtaken by events.

CROOK: Overtaken by events. But of course none of us knew what the main big event was. We all found out on August 6th, when the first atomic bomb was dropped.

Q: I would think that the preparations for Japan would still continue.

CROOK: Well, they were continuing so far as people were concerned, but the psy-warfare parts of the operation were dropped. And of course there were a lot more people that were to be hired than MacArthur wanted. Once he got control of Japan he wanted his own people every place. Then of course the Philippines became an information program, on which I worked.

ARTHUR W. HUMMEL, JR.
World War II Experience
(1940-1945)

Office of Information, Bureau of Far East Affairs
Washington, DC (1951-1952)

Public Affairs Officer, USIS
Hong Kong (1952)

Ambassador Arthur W. Hummel, Jr. was born to American parents in China in 1920. He received his master's degree from the University of Chicago. His career with USIS included assignments in Hong Kong, Japan, Burma, and Taiwan. He served as the ambassador to Burma, Ethiopia, and Pakistan. Ambassador Hummel was interviewed by Dorothy Robins-Mowry on July 13, 1989.

HUMMEL: Okay. Let's see, my parents were missionaries and I was born in China, and spent my early years mostly in Peking. I left when I was eight years old.

My father moved to Washington where, being more of a scholar than a missionary, he was asked to be the head of the Library of Congress Oriental Division. He stayed there from 1928 or late '27, I forget which, to 1954. I more or less grew up here in Chevy Chase.

Q: Do you remember anything specific about Beijing or Peking, as it was then called?

HUMMEL: Oh, yes.

Q: By comparison with the more recent --

HUMMEL: I remember quite a lot of street scenes. We got out quite a bit on excursions to the hills in the west and so on. However, like a number of missionary kids, I think, coming back to the States was traumatic and I sort of put all that away and didn't even want to speak Chinese anymore.

As a matter of fact, because of the Chinese servants and the fact that my parents were practicing their own Chinese, I spoke Chinese before I spoke English but that withered away considerably.

I went to prep school. My father became a Quaker and I went to a Quaker prep school. I was one of the rebellious young people, like a preacher's son very often will be.

Q: Preacher's sons are very notorious. My husband is a preacher's son.

HUMMEL: As a matter of fact, I got kicked out of prep school, but then returned. Then I was a drop-out from Antioch.

Q: What was the prep school?

HUMMEL: Westtown, Pennsylvania. I went to Antioch but dropped out for lack of interest, and spent a couple of years roaming around, mostly in the Midwest, doing odd jobs and floating from town to town. I had a great time.

Then my father was invited to go back to Peking for a book buying and research stint of several months, so my parents decided to take me with them and sent me ahead. I arrived in September 1940. Then, their trip was canceled because of tension in the Far East, but I was too dumb to leave.

When I arrived there, I immediately went to a Chinese language school, the same school where my father had been part of the faculty and where I used to live as a child, the Peking Language School. My language came back in a rush but, of course, I had to study the written language for the first time.

I was studying Chinese with a tutor and teaching English to support myself. I was too dumb to leave before Pearl Harbor. I got interned by the Japanese, first, one year in Peking, a very loose kind of internment. Then they shipped all of us enemy aliens - British, Canadians, French and so on -- down to a camp in Weihsien in Shandong Province.

I was there for a year and then eventually escaped with a British friend and joined Chinese guerrillas nearby and stayed with them until the war was over.

Q: Let me just ask, by reason of policy, were you adequately informed by the Embassy or by the American authorities that it was time to get out? Policy is the reason for asking this.

HUMMEL: I think so; yes, there was a concerted effort made. As a matter of fact, there were married couples in which the wife was sent home in response to the urging of the American government.

When the man stayed on -- and this happened in many cases -- and was interned by the Japanese, he was eligible for repatriation as a reward for having done what the government said. Those whose wives who stayed with them were not eligible.

Q: I never knew that difference before.

HUMMEL: All American women and children were eligible, but men were eligible only if they had obeyed the instructions to send their wives home.

Q: How tough were those Japanese internment camps at this time?

HUMMEL: It depends on where you were. I was in the one that was farthest north, closest to Japan, and that meant supervision by the Gaimusho, the Foreign Ministry. The military ran the camp, but the Gaimusho supervised them and ameliorated a lot of the hardships.

So, the camp I was in was much more bearable than the one in Shanghai, which was really quite grim. Santo Tomas in the Philippines was worse and, of course, Borneo was horrible. The farther away you were from Japan, the worse these civilian internment camps were.

In this particular camp, we had more births than deaths but it wasn't pleasant; the diet was substandard, so it was no picnic.

Q: How did you manage to escape?

HUMMEL: My friend and I had been trying for a long time to make contact by letter, smuggled letter, smuggled out by Chinese coolies who worked in the camp. We eventually got an answer from a Nationalist guerilla unit nearby, set a date, and got permission from the camp authorities to leave.

The guerilla outfit wanted to be in contact with the Americans, hoping that they could parlay this into some kind of support. The camp authorities felt it would be a good idea to have somebody out in the boondocks nearby, in case of -- well, in case of whatever happened.

Nobody knew whether, at the end of the war, the Japanese would start massacring people or whatever, so they felt it would be a good idea to have some people outside. So, in a sense, we were emissaries from the camp.

The guerilla outfit was very interesting and very self sufficient and very patriotic. It was one of the very few such efficient and patriotic Nationalist guerilla outfits. Communists were all over the place; it was just an accident that we wound up in contact with the Nationalist guerrillas rather than the Communists.

If we had escaped into Communist hands, we could have walked back to Yen'an and gotten out, possibly, but the Nationalists were just in small pockets -- not so small, an area of about ten miles by twenty miles that was in a densely populated flat plain.

There wasn't any running around and riding horses in mountain forests. It was a typical North China plains area and the Japanese didn't come in unless they were in overwhelming force, trying to mop up the place. They did that several times the year and a half that I was living there. That's another story. I've got the memoirs of the guerilla commander and I am translating and annotating those.

Q: I hope you're going to do something with that.

HUMMEL: Some day. I've done some of it.

After the war was over, I spent a year working for UNRRA in North China doing survey trips into Communist areas; that was my first contact with the Chinese Communists.

Then I went back to the States and worked for awhile for the United China Relief Organization.

In 1947, I went to the University of Chicago and in two years, got an M.A. in Chinese Studies.

Q: They must have given you credit for a lot of practical experience.

HUMMEL: I had to pass some comprehensive examinations that were given to a lot of people whose education had been interrupted by the war; there was a rather lenient program for that purpose. I had to make up a deficiency in Economics 101, I think.

Q: So, you finally did get your academic credentials.

HUMMEL: Right after that, when I got my M.A., Phi Beta Kappa, I almost immediately joined ONI, the Office of Naval Intelligence, and worked for them for about six months. Then, through the good offices of people who later became USIS people like Joe Bennett, Brad Connors and others, I joined FE/P (the Office of Information of the Far East Bureau), in the State Department. The Information Function was still at the State Department.

Q: We've gotten now to what, to about 1950?

HUMMEL: Somewhere in the 1950s for the State Department.

Q: What were you doing for FE/P?

HUMMEL: We were still trying to mop up the tag ends of USIS programs in Hong Kong and establishing them in Taiwan, as far as the China program was concerned. Also, we were engaged in supporting, with research materials, some of the people who were being harassed by McCarthy in the McCarthy hearings period. So, we would help them with background materials and public statements and so forth.

Q: Did that affect what was going on in FE/P at all, except for your support work?

HUMMEL: Not particularly. I think because, when the Communists took over in 1949, they showed, themselves not to be agrarian reformers, and they showed that they were not abiding by their promises to have a multiparty system and accommodate other parties. Also, because of the well-documented killing of landlords and class enemies, there wasn't anybody who wanted to do anything differently in American policy, particularly after the Korean War started.

By the time I joined the State Department, the Korean War was on, so there was no occasion for the dissent. Our relations with China, whatever they were, did not leave room for anybody to be thinking about conciliation or advancing heretical views about American policy. We were all polarized by these events.

Later on, in the '60s, when we began to have tentative contacts during the Laos negotiations in '61 and then the Warsaw talks, there were some possibilities for contact, but the Chinese themselves showed that they were not terribly interested in what we had to offer unless we would simply abandon Taiwan and deliver Taiwan to them. That, of course, wasn't possible.

Q: Did we have any official offices in China at that time?

HUMMEL: No, none.

Q: None at all?

HUMMEL: None.

Q: Everything was closed?

HUMMEL: Our embassy was in Taiwan. For a time afterwards, our people stayed in place on the mainland, but the Communists treated them so badly that there wasn't any hope. I am fond of reminding people that we terminated all assistance to Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek, military and civilian, and left our people basically in place in the mainland. But the Chinese Communists spurned us in the beginning and then, of course, the Korean War was guaranteed to stop any contact.

Q: The Korean war presented a whole new picture or it clarified things.

HUMMEL: Yes, it did. Now, when Chinese troops crossed the Yalu, when we were fighting Chinese troops, there wasn't much point in anybody advocating anything conciliatory.

So, my view is that American analytical reporting about China was not appreciably affected by the McCarthy tide, certainly not after the Communists took over in 1949.

Q: What about some of the people who became the focus of McCarthy's displeasure?

HUMMEL: A lot of people continued to have a bad time; Clubb, Remington and so on, those whom I met. Having been cut off behind Japanese lines, I was not part of that group that was back there in Chungking.

Q: You were a younger generation.

HUMMEL: A younger generation and I did not have the mainland experience that they had.

Q: How long were you in that position, then, in FE/P?

***

HUMMEL: Two years. I met my wife in the State Department. She was working on the Near East Information Program. Let's see, I joined in '50, we married in '51, and in '52, we were assigned to Hong Kong.

Q: That's a good place to go on the first assignment in a family. What did you do in Hong Kong?

HUMMEL: I was sent out originally to replace Doak Barnett, who had been called the Evaluation Officer, trying to organize evaluations of USIS programs, not only in Hong Kong but on a regional basis; that is, polling, surveys of various kinds, as assets for our USIS planning. Not much of that got off the ground. Doak Barnett, I think, got bored with it and left and so I was sent out to replace him.

***

Very shortly thereafter, a few months after we arrived in Hong Kong, Paul Frillman, the PAO, left, resigned, I believe, and they made me PAO. We had such bright lights as Dick McCarthy and Charles Cross, who became Ambassador to Singapore. There were some good men.

Q: Was Hong Kong a pretty big post, given the situation in China at that time?

HUMMEL: It was, very big. One of the innovations that I am proud of -- I didn't invent the idea, but I helped to get it started -- was the establishment of a Chinese language magazine called "World Today" which circulated throughout Southeast Asia for the overseas Chinese, in Chinese, and circulated also in Taiwan.

It was so good in its content and format that it was sold through the regular news networks. It was not a give-away.

Q: Was this in English or in Chinese?

HUMMEL: Chinese.

Q: What kind of Chinese?

HUMMEL: Mandarin, the written language.

Q: Was this the first of these magazines that USIA published overseas? Subsequently, there were any number of them.

HUMMEL: I can't be sure it was the first. I honestly don't know. It was an early one, and the key to its success was that it managed to meet newsstand standards and compete with all other magazines.

Q: What kind of material would you carry in it?

HUMMEL: News, commentary, anti-Communist stuff about the mainland, things about the United States. It was sort of a generalized magazine, fairly popular, quite a bit of stuff on movie stars, Chinese movie stars.

I remember having the pleasure of getting the absolute top Chinese movie star, a beautiful girl named Li Li-hua, in Hong Kong, getting her together with Clark Gable for a picture for this magazine.

Q: That's quite a combination, isn't it?

HUMMEL: They had their picture taken on a boat with the Hong Kong Island in the background. That was on the cover; that was a great issue.

Also, I took the opportunity to travel throughout Southeast Asia to all of the major places.

Q: But you couldn't get into China then.

HUMMEL: No, I couldn't get into China. I did surveys of the overseas Chinese, just simply to survey places, and I can't name them all, but Vietnam, including Hanoi and Saigon, at that time still in French hands, Thailand, Indonesia, Malaysia, Singapore, Indonesia, and I didn't get to Brunei, but the Philippines, Burma, doing comprehensive reports of local Chinese populations.

We, in Hong Kong, were publishing materials in Chinese for the whole area, and, of course, visiting Taiwan, too. All that was personally very pleasant.

Q: This was your first real encounter in these areas.

HUMMEL: With overseas Chinese, yes.

FREDERICK HUNT
Consular Officer
Shanghai (1941-1942)

Frederick Hunt was born in Maryland in 1927. He received his A.B. from George Washington University in 1935 and joined the Foreign Service in 1938. His overseas posts include Bucharest, Shanghai, Lourenço Marques, Johannesburg, Port Elizabeth, Nuevo Laredo and Martinique. Mr. Hunt was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on December 7, 1987.

HUNT: I got to Bucharest, the ministers told me there was a telegram transferring me to Shanghai, and he sent one right back saying I couldn't go until they furnished a replacement. That took six weeks. That was the end of my European tour.

Q: How did you get to Shanghai?

HUNT: By a devious route. I had a choice. I could go by Trans-Siberian railroad, which would have been interesting, but I took a much better route. I took a real Cook's tour; a mixture of railroad, airplane, and ship. I flew to the Black Sea. There again I had a Romania general friend to intercede with the Luftwaffe who controlled the airport down there and took a ship from there down to Istanbul. Then I stopped to see a friend of my step-father who was a naval attaché; he had an apartment overlooking the harbor. I also had another friend in the legation. I took a train to Baghdad, and a flying boat that the BOAC used to run used to make a horseshoe from Australia around to South Africa. I took that, and stopped at the Bosphorus. There I saw ships bringing troops from India. It was in the paper the next day; I wrote a letter to my mother about it. The censor got it and said I was a terrible guy. They told me it was a secret. Then I went on to Karachi. There I spent nearly a whole week, because we had a Consul and a Vice Consul there at the time. The Consul was also assigned to Kabul. We had nobody in Kabul. I remind you that this was spring of 1941, and no one in Kabul. This guy once a year would go and make a grand march through the Khyber Pass, and come back. The Vice Consul had been stationed in Bucharest, so he wanted to hear all about it. It was the height of the season; it was the time when the racetrack was open, the Governor's Cup -- I was ready for that. I got a bearer from the Thomas Cook Company who -- two famous Americans that he loved dearly. One was Tony Biddle, the other one was Believe-It-Or-Not Ripley. The bearer was modest. I took a train, it was still all one country then, up to Bengali and crossed eventually to Calcutta, but I stopped along the way, so I took about a week. At that time we didn't have any office in New Delhi. In India, we had a large Consulate-General with a very senior officer in charge in Calcutta. We had a fair-sized one in Bombay and a Consulate in Madras.

From Calcutta, I took the flying boat again to Burma, and overnight there was entertained. I flew on down, stopped at Penang, and so forth to Singapore. At Singapore I was around there for a couple of days. There was a Vice-Consul there who had entered the Service with me, then a Dutch ship took me up to Hong Kong. We were supposed to take American transport, so at Hong Kong I decided to wait for the President Lines. So I saw a little time in Hong Kong, and that was my first taste of China. It so happened that we were changing Ambassadors in Chungking then. Swapping with Australia. And a man who was number two...we had a big office in Shanghai. Also, the naval attaché's office was not in Chungking, but in Shanghai. It was a marine officer with a line officer-lieutenant.

The number two fellow, still there, came in and said: "Well Hunt, where have you been, on a world tour?" I said, "Just about." Apparently, to show you how things work, when my minister in Bucharest had sent word back saying I couldn't go until my replacement arrived, the Department agreed with it but they failed...having sent a copy of the first telegram to Shanghai, they failed to send the second one.

So they were looking for me. When I went there, I found that the women and children of our office had already gone home. We'd been telling everybody to get out of China, and of course businessmen and missionaries said when they saw the consuls go, "we'll go". So, Washington decided that the women and children should go. We had one woman officer who took care of the China Trade Act. There were twenty of us, all bachelors.

Q: What was your job in Shanghai?

HUNT: There again, I got the economic treatment again. We just began, at this point, to issue export licenses. The commercial attaché was an old China hand. I was put under him, and I took care of investigating who was the importer and what he was going to do. The whole idea was, since that was such a big, cosmopolitan city, the idea was to keep the American stuff out of Japanese hands. Keep them from buying it.

Q: The situation then was that the Japanese basically controlled that area?

HUNT: In 1937, the Japanese took control of the Yangtze Valley. The League of Nations didn't do anything when they went into Manchuria, and they did nothing then.

Q: Shanghai...you were living in the international zone, is that right?

HUNT: International zone. But the Japanese had taken over what had been the old settlement, which was where all the dock area was. The Suchow Creek drew the line, and our old Consulate-General was over on the other of the creek alongside the Japanese and the Russian consulates. The creek was the No-man's Land.

Q: Could you get outside of the international zone?

HUNT: Oh yes. But I didn't go over to the Japanese side very much because they always had guard challenge you at the bridge. They wanted to see health certificates, because they were nuts on that. Occasionally I had to go down to the docks, but I just kept right on going. It was known as the Japanese landing party. That was the name given to it in 1937. They made their headquarters on the , a battleship they'd taken from the Russians in 1905. They were sitting there in the mud in front of the Japanese Consulate-General but so situated, the river made a bend there, that it could see up river and down river. It had the flag of the Chief of the Japanese Naval Landing Party. The International Settlement and the French Settlement were still out of Japanese hands, and the Japanese didn't come around very often. When they did, U.S. marines manned entrances in the International Settlement by that time because the British had left. There used to be double thing. The police were British.

Q: Sikh?

HUNT: The cop on the street was a Sikh, but the detective and the chiefs and the top were all Englishmen. The French Consul General wore two hats. He was supposed to be mayor of Frenchtown, as it was called, but there weren't enough Frenchmen to fill the municipal jobs.

Most of them were French-speaking Russians. There was a whole new generation growing up from those Russians who came to Tientsin and Shanghai after crossing over with Admiral . That was the situation in Shanghai.

Q: You were dealing with economic...you got there in May?

HUNT: I got there seven months before Pearl Harbor. I was launched into this because there was a special job to be done. Chinese merchants would come in saying how they had to have this thus and so. There you get around to trouble with the English again. The British commercial attaché was also in Shanghai, just as we had...he was an old-timer. The great stupidity back in Washington, as I told you everything was buttons for Britain. Well, you had to have an export license to send something to China, you didn't have to have one to send something to Hong Kong. When I was in Hong Kong, on my way to Shanghai, I noted so many ships with British flags on them, coastal steamers, etc. -- Hong Kong registry, Chinese crews, and they were loading British and American and other goods, going up to Vladivostok, where it was railroaded over to Germany. I learned this, I noticed this in the harbor, and I told our Consulate-General about that. "Oh yes," they said, "that's a sore point." So in my work in Shanghai, the Portland Cement fellow comes in, complaining to me that he can't get his shipment. When I asked him why not, he said: "Now it goes to Hong Kong, and the Hong Kong people route it up here. So the fellow imports from Hong Kong. "Really?" I asked. That was one of the times I went down with him to the warehouse to take a look. There was the American cement -- via Hong Kong. That made me angry. I sent a communication to Washington, and of course being British it was all right.

By July 1, we figured something was going to happen sometime. Things were getting tough. We put our switchboard on 24-hour basis. The Fourth Marines were still there. Everybody will tell you now that they admit to hindsight, as to what they thought then, sure war was going to break out one of these days, but the Japanese were going to go south -- they weren't going to go way off close to Hong Kong. They were going to head for the Philippines and Dutch East Indies. They wanted to get the oil out of the Indies.

So we thought that. As time went on, Admiral Koch soon came as a special envoy, and we used to talk about this among ourselves, all ranks. Sure something was going to happen, but as long as Japanese Peace Delegation stays in Washington we felt safe. But once he gets home, look out. So, another colleague of mine wanted to go to Peking for Christmas. He'd been a language officer up there in the old days, and wanted to show me Peking. We took the trouble to make our reservations through a Japanese travel agent through to Peking. Never happened. But even the day before, which was a Sunday the 7th, to me on the other side of the dateline. I still thought that way. We had been rationing gasoline, bringing small tankers up from Hong Kong, their argument being there shouldn't be more than three days' supply in Shanghai so that if the Japanese took it over, they wouldn't get very much. It was a very generous allowance, however. Fifty gallons a week or something. You couldn't get it out of the city very well.

Q: What happened when Pearl Harbor was bombed?

HUNT: It got so that the import-export license business was slowing down to, and it was five o'clock in the morning when I was awakened by a fellow who worked in my office, Frank Duda. I was sleepy and I said: "What do you mean? You must be drunk. They've been talking about war for ages." I lived in the French Concession, four miles from the waterfront, and apparently about 5:30 the Japanese manned the guns under Hezuma and sent a net to cover the small boats that were heading up the river. What I forgot to tell you was that just about Thanksgiving -- I remember it was my birthday -- the Fourth Marines left Shanghai.

Q: This is the Fourth Marines regiment?

HUNT: Yes.

Q: That was the protection force there.

HUNT: They'd been there a long time. When they first came, the Chinese didn't like it, but there were many tears when they left. They marched down and got on the President Madison, I think it was. They were to go down to Manila. I remember them marching down that street, everybody cheering and waving and so forth. The next night, I was at a dinner party in the old Cafe Hotel, which is called the Peace Hotel now. About a month before, the gunboat Wake, which had been sitting up in Nanking and really been used as a telegraph office by our Consulate in Nanking, came down to Shanghai to join the others. I noticed that day carpenters working out there in the middle of the river on the gunboats, nailing up big boards all around. Gunboats sit very low in the water, and I thought, "That's interesting, but not on the Wake." That night, about midnight, which was just as the party was going well, the Admiral Glassford, Commander of the Yangtze patrol got up and said he had a hard day the next day and had to go home early. He got up and left. When we came down to the bund the next morning, all the gunboats had gone except the Wake. The Italian gunboats, and the French one, but no Americans except the Wake.

It had been customary for the two flagships of the British and the Americans to anchor side by side with a meter between them. The old rule was that when the whistle went everybody on the American ship went over to the wardroom of the British ship and they all had drinks. Then again the whistle blew and the British came back to the American ship. As usual, the British would have the better drinks on theirs and the Americans would have better food.

So the Wake had pulled up -- it was fairly close -- I guess just behind. The Wake had been instructed by the Admiral, "Now look, if something happens, don't you waste a thing on this hunk of junk. It was an old tub. Don't endanger the life of anybody. Give up." So, when the shooting began, the British ship fired back at the boat bringing the boarding party. They had six casualties, the British did. After that, they were put in jail, but they did not stay there was a barracks there that the British forgot to pull down before World War II, so the Japanese used that as a prison camp.

Q: What happened to you all after Pearl Harbor?

HUNT: Nothing that day. Here we all are in our respective places of abode, two people lived in the same building with the Consul General. There was a big building that had a post office and bank on the ground floor that belonged to one of the in-laws of Chiang Kai-shek, one of his sons.

Upstairs, Coca-Cola had an office there, and above that there were apartments. Our number two consul and vice consul both lived there. They were there when everything began. I finally decided that maybe my friend wasn't so drunk and I would pick up the phone and call down. I heard this Chinese operator say: "Aren't you Mr. Hunt?" "Yes." "Plenty trouble, plenty trouble." "Really?" I asked for one of the men there. He told me what had been happening, and the firing there. He said they'd taken all the codes down, and there was a great tall building that had a long chimney through the middle of it. The only trouble we had was with the janitor who couldn't understand why we wanted to put the blower on. It wasn't that cold a day. They wanted to turn the blower on in the furnace to make it burn. I asked if he wanted me to come down, but he said: "No, take your time."

I had a chauffeur, and he lived outside the settlement and he used to come in every day. He'd take the car out of the garage and wipe it off. He couldn't understand what I was doing up without him having to wake me. I told him the Japanese were making war on the Americans. I looked at the front door as I expected to see them come in. Anyway, I told him that when the chauffeur comes, tell him to see me. When he arrived, he had U.S. Air and U.S. on his other lapel. I told him to take them off, and he looked shocked. I told him the Japanese had made war on the Americans and that we were going downtown. We couldn't have the flag on the car or anything like that. He said: "Now I understand. When I came through the barrier, they grabbed me and said 'You're Chinese or American?' I said Chinese, of course."

We did go downtown, about 9:00 am. We parked across the street from the parking lot, across the street from the American Club, and I told him to sit there with the car. I went across and on my way to the office, I saw some Japanese marines coming down the street. I went upstairs and emptied all the stuff that I had of a personal nature. When the U.S. Marines left, they left us an auxiliary radio. They had a big, high tower. This had no trouble getting Manila. Good weather you could go way beyond Manila. We had a sailor from the Wake who could operate it, and we walked the next floor up, put him on the switchboard. This guy was up there just chatting away, giving a play-by-play account to Manila.

I went in and got my stuff, and about 10:00 am Ned Brookheart, a son of the old Senator Brookheart was a colleague of mine, and also in London. I was going to take my stuff to the trunk of my car. Afterward, we noticed the Japanese marines had gotten that far and were going to take over the American Club. We thought we'd go over and check them out. It had a great long bar. Behind the bar was a big, big picture of the cruiser "Houston," showing the 1937 episode when the Admiral had parked himself in the middle of the Whangpoo River and threatened these guys not to hit him so they were shooting over this ship to the other side at the oil tanks and all that. I was a great big picture, seven feet long, I guess. We went in and thought to see about the liquor. I said: "Ned, let's take that picture." "Oh, no. Leave it up there for those yellow-bellies to see it."

The manager of the hotel was shaking, and the major commander of the Japanese marines, a very proper man, was talking to him. He asked if he had a lockup place down below. He answered yes. The major said: "I want you to put all your liquor down there. Lock it up, and don't let my men get to it at all." He took the cigarettes, everything, locked them up. Marines are marines everywhere.

We heard all this and decided we were going to liberate some stuff before it got down below. They were busy hauling cases down there, and so we decided to have a drink. Not usual in the morning, but we had one. We said to the bartender: "You've got some odd bottles and all that, give us two or three bottles." That's how we started out. They brought in carrier pigeons and were stashing them in the ladies' waiting room. In what we call chicken crates. The word had been that everyone had to be out by noon. Well, a lot of American businessmen lived there, and they had zipped out of there early in the morning not knowing the Japanese marines were coming, to get to their offices to get their papers and things. So, I felt badly about them. I remembered a picture. There was a pretty big photograph of the same ship, a little placard underneath it saying "friends of the Army-Navy club, thanks for the hospitality." I took the pigeons down and took the picture, went on over to the car. I put all that stuff in.

Then we decided to go back to the office. We found that there wasn't much we could do except...it was quite late in the morning, mid-morning, when the Japanese came around. You would think they would come there first. They came around; they had Chinese clerks with them with pots of paste and seals with which to seal up all the doors. The fellow who lived in the building called the sailor who was talking on the radio, and asked how he was doing. He said: "Oh, I've got Manila going, we're just fine." He said: "You're going to have to tell Manila that you're signing off because don't look now, but there is a Japanese outside your door. So you tell Manila that's the situation, you're signing off, and you're breaking up the machine." He had an axe there for that purpose. He did. He stepped out and was immediately grabbed by the Japanese since he was a military man. So he became a prisoner of war.

Another fellow from the Wake had been tooling down Nanking Road in a rickshaw about 5:30 that morning, the navy hours begin at 6:00, and a fellow from Jimmy's Kitchen, which was an American restaurant standing in the door way stepped out and stopped him. "Don't stop me now, man. Don't stop me now. If I don't get back by 06:00 the chief will give me hell." "You're going to catch more than that." "What do you mean?" "The Japanese are shooting out there. You'll get more than what the chief will give you if you go out there." He couldn't believe it. He had to go see for himself. This fellow spoke Chinese, and told the rickshaw runner to turn around and take that man back to where he got him, which was a Russian girl's place. That girl protected him. We knew where he was, but nobody else did.

A lot of incidents like that occurred. I went back to my apartment, because I rented from an Englishman who'd gone on leave, and all his personal gear was there. I began thinking what I'd do. I took as much personal stuff as I could to stash in the trunks. I got a phone call after lunch saying I should be down at the Metropole Hotel at 6:00, and I'd better bring a suitcase. I had gone to pick up a girl, a Latvian girl who worked for a Swiss company. I picked her up early and had taken her to lunch. She was helping me with this packing. Her uncle, with whom she lived, he was a Baltic German, married to her mother's sister who was a Latvian. He belonged to the German Club; he had a business that made things out of aluminum. He told me once that if anything happened he could take my car as a business car and the Japanese wouldn't get it.

So, I went back down to the hotel, and said to my chauffeur: "Here is some money. This is the end. Take this lady where she tells you to go. That's it." He did take the car in. Good thing, because within a few weeks the Japanese were picking up cars bellowing to foreigners right and left. Anything that was more than five years old went to junk, and under five years old they used as vehicles. They didn't get mine.

Q: What happened to you?

HUNT: Only the night of Pearl Harbor did we go to the hotel. The interesting thing was that these two men of equal rank, they were put in the same place, and they got in a fight. The British were accusing the American of being a coward, and the American saying the other man...there six families in England who wouldn't be happy with him. The Japanese had to separate them. Put them in different places. I don't know if that story ever got out. So, we went to the Metropol Hotel. It was still operating as a hotel. There were other guests there. My brother was in the navy. He was on a battleship in [?] fleet in Honolulu. I happened to know before the gunboat left that his ship had gone up to Puget sound for overhaul of some kind. I had surmised, when they started naming ships and all, that his ship wasn't there. However, I got a telegram delivered to me at the hotel sent by my mother via Argentina, delivered to me telling me my brother was [?]

Q: The Japanese then interned the whole...

HUNT: Only the officers. The clerks could live where they wanted to live. We wanted house arrest, as had been done in small places like Tientsin but there were too many of us. We were all brought to the Metropol Hotel. Then they wanted to consolidate the Belgians and the British. The British were all in there...they had their own enclosure. Belgians, Dutch, Panamanians, Mexicans, Brazilians. All had declared war. So they started looking around for a place. The Park Hotel, across from the racetrack was a good place that the Chinese owned and had a good supply of coal. The Germans knew that too; they moved in and they wouldn't move out. Finally, it was agreed that the only place to go was in the French Concession. They had been picking up everything that was British owed, and the Sassoons owned the two best hotels. That was a British thing they were taking.

The French Consul General was marvelous. The first thing he did on that day as acting president of the French Club was send out word to all members that you couldn't have guests because there was a handful of Japanese [?] He held out. He didn't mind his colleagues occupying that hotel. But, he didn't want any Japanese gendarmes. They went around and around over this. Finally, they came to a compromise in which they could have four gendarmes on duty at any one time in plain clothes. You had to admire that Frenchman for holding out. He had nothing but Tonkinese police, that's all he had.

Q: How long were you kept?

HUNT: Seven months. It was much slower than we expected because the [?] had to go back and forth through the Swiss and also, they wanted to trade old, sick missionaries for young Japanese who had been working in our schools and factories.

Q: Were you kept confined to the hotel?

HUNT: We were supposed to sign out. A Japanese consular officer was assigned to us around the clock. They did it in 24-hour units. They were supposed to be the buffer between us and the gendarmes, who didn't speak English. One of the Japanese Vice-consuls was born and bred in Billington, Iowa, and spoke with an Iowan accent. He had been our liaison before the war with the Japanese. Another one had been to Oxford. So we got along well with them, but we were supposed to go out to exercise. The Japanese wanted us to take walks and all, but you had to get a pass from the gendarmes and you had to check it in when you came back. I didn't want them to get to know me, so I used to just walk on out.

When we were put in Cafe Mansions and consolidated, the British and the Belgians and the Dutch had all their women and children and everything else with them. They had suites and all, and there we were twenty men. It took a little getting on with them, but finally one of them had a birthday party and that broke the ice.

I was on the ninth floor; the elevator had to stop at the sixth floor. That was where the gendarmes were. Everything sixth and above was [?]. I would walk down the back steps, all that way to get out into town. But that way I didn't have to check in and out. Spring came early, I went to the French club, I had strawberries and cream. We could go to the movies. We had our radios. Every night, about 9:00, you'd hear San Francisco Radio, shortwave radio. Their version of the war was entirely different from what we were seeing, I assure you. They were saying how good things were. They never mentioned the sinking of the Prince of Wales, which we saw on the newsreels. That really hurt our British friends.

Q: When you look at it, these were two battleships that really shouldn't have been there. They really wouldn't have changed things. But, they were put there, and they got sunk.

To end this, how did you get repatriated?

HUNT: Finally, after all this argument about who would go where, and what ships would take us, the last day of June, 1942...There were a lot of trucks there, but the Japanese Consul General had to hire Swiss trucks to carry our luggage. There was a gloomy, dismal rain and little Mr. Yamamoto from Iowa was shaking hands with everybody getting off the bus.

Q: This was the Japanese Vice Consul.

HUNT: Yes. He later married a girl from Los Angeles. I said: "Yamamoto san, you know very well that you should be getting on this ship with us." "I know, I know," he said. I saw him later; we talked about what happened to him. I saw him at the Japanese peace treaty.

Coming back to this, we went on board, there had been some discussion about who would go on board. Of course, anybody with any diplomatic status, and then we had business friends, newspapermen and missionaries. There was a fellow named William Hunt, no relation to me, he had gone out there many years before as a vice consul, decided there was a lot of money to be made -- in the old days in Shanghai. He ended up with William Hunt and Company, he had a coastal ship, and he represented the Philadelphia Banknote Company which furnished all the Nationalists' money. He would talk back to the Japanese. He would run down to Hong Kong, when he realized the war was coming. He had just gotten a big shipment of banknotes to go up to Chungking, and he spent one night down there with the CNAC plane running back and forth to a point far enough to be inside protective zone. He moved all the money that night. Of course, he was captured there.

We had just the case of these few Japanese marines and some new recruits of the Japanese army, because the Japanese had taken the place before. All the tough army went south. They went to Hong Kong and Malaysia. We didn't have that. Furthermore, Shanghai was so cosmopolitan, nationalistic, and had so much stuff in the warehouses, that they wanted to buy it all up before they did anything. So we really had it soft. Everybody back here was worrying about us, but we had it soft.

In the meantime, our Consul General's wife had left. She was on her way back, got as far as Manila with an inspector. The daughter of the secretary of the international settlement, who happened to be an American, he was half Chinese, half American, his daughter had gone down to see her old girlfriend who had married one of our marines. They got caught down there. The Japanese military brought Mrs. Lockhart and this girl back by military plane to Shanghai to join us. They brought Bill Hunt back from Hong Kong. They had great respect for him because he would talk back to them. So they asked his advice about the ship. There was a big go around. The Conte Verde which used to come from Trieste, make stops all the time back and forth, built for the tropics. The people from Tokyo and Hong Kong went on the [?] which is built for the North Pacific. A much bigger ship, a lot of inside rooms. The number two at our Embassy, Mr. Grew had a fine suite, but the number two did also. He said: "Oh, those poor missionaries and all." He put all the Vice Consuls and all back in the lowest, worst part of the ship. Bill Hunt said to the Japanese, this is a diplomatic exchange so you begin with your number one diplomat. The number one diplomat we had was the Consul General in Shanghai. Give him the best, then work down from him through the lowest of them.

You take your missionaries and you put the lowest one of them and you put him at the lowest place on the ship, and you work up through them. In between you put the journalists and the businessmen. That's what they did. I had a beautiful room. But, that ship made so many stops it didn't make its own drinking. So, we were limited on baths. But it had a swimming pool, and they put in a second swimming pool in the stern. Up in the lido deck, we were determined to keep the missionaries out of it, so we got the girls to dress skimpily and use cuss words when they saw a missionary coming, and put a bottle of whiskey on their table. That settled that. They had their own pool. It was Bill Hunt who really fixed this. The commander of the Japanese naval landing party sent him a note, which he opened in my presence. It said after the sailing, introduce yourself to the Japanese captain. That brings me to telling you that when the Italian wouldn't give them a [?] charter because they had their crew there, they had to take care of their crew. They didn't trust Italians. They didn't trust anybody. There was an Italian frigate in there, they only gave him enough oil to keep his generator going.

So, they had seven naval officer they disguised as NYK personnel so they had somebody on the bridge and somebody in the engine room around the clock, and then one chief. He didn't even have to introduce himself. The next thing you know, the bell hop came along and said the Japanese captain sent this to you. He opened it up. He had a case of scotch whiskey which was like gold there, and a case of French champagne. My remark was that we Hunts have got to stick together. We were the only people on the passenger list named Hunt.

Q: You eventually came to Lourenço Marques?

HUNT: We met the [?] and they stopped in Hong Kong. We did not. The people from Bangkok had all been brought up to Hong Kong. The two ships came together at Singapore, tough Japanese boarded, a Swiss man representing the Swiss foreign office was no good to us at all. That was another trouble we had in Shanghai. They had so much business there, they were not being nasty to the Japanese by any means. But the Italian captain, an old Austrian from Trieste, he stood up for us.

Q: Did the Department pay you for the time you were interned?

HUNT: We got our regular pay. We were able to draw local currency as we needed it from the Swiss, which was charged against us. Eventually, when we got off the boat we could then draw all the back pay we hadn't received. We were paid our regular salary. But we did lose things like automobiles and local currency accounts.

Q: On that financial note we will have to end the interview. Thank you very much.

HENRY BYROADE
US Army Officer, China-Burma-India Theater
(1941-1947)

Ambassador Henry Byroade was born in Indiana in 1913. He graduated from West Point in 1937. He served in the Hawaiian Islands from 1937-1939. While still in the service, he received a master's degree from Cornell in 1940. His Foreign Service posts included Egypt, South Africa, Afghanistan, Burma, the Philippines, and Pakistan. He was interviewed by Niel M. Johnson on September 19, 1988.

Q: Was there experience from the Hump that was used in the Berlin airlift, and were some of the same persons involved in that one?

BYROADE: Well, you asked for my favorite story in this world, and that's to point out that if we hadn't had the experience of the Hump run into China, I don't think we would have attempted to supply Berlin by air. If we hadn't saved Berlin, my feeling is the whole map of Europe would be changed today. When we got into the Berlin situation, there were enough of us in Washington--now I still was only a colonel--but there were enough of us and some generals, who had gone through the Hump experience, that said, "Wait a minute, we'll supply Berlin by air." Everybody--almost everybody--said, "You're crazy; they need things like coal." We said, "So what, they need coal--we'll fly coal." From Frankfurt to Berlin was just a twenty-minute milk run compared to the hazardous Hump run.

Q: There were no mountains in between either. You flew coal over the Hump?

BYROADE: Yes, of course, we flew coal and all kinds of necessary consumer items. I think, I really think, we would have probably lost Berlin, except for supplying the city by air. So that may be the greatest contribution that came out of the whole thing; because keeping China in the war didn't in the end accomplish very much, on the Hump run.

Q: How long did that go on, that lifting supplies over the Himalayas?

BYROADE: Oh, about three years. We were trying to build a road, the Ledo road, at the same time, and run a pipeline along the road, which would have been a great project if the war had lasted another couple of years. But by the time we got the road, and the pipeline into China, it was only a matter of months until the war was over.

Q: That was used, and that still is used, that road and that pipeline?

BYROADE: It was used some, not enough really to make any big difference. The road is no longer there, most of it isn't, because even while we were building it, the jungle would start taking it over again.

Q: It was a lot harder to build than the Alcan Highway, I suppose.

BYROADE: It was a real bitch, and our troops really struggled through that.

Q: What were your exact duties, or functions, there with that airlift during those three years?

BYROADE: I was in charge of building the airfield--in charge of supplies for our own troops and lend-lease in China.

Q: Where were you stationed, mainly, in India?

BYROADE: I moved up to Chabua in Assam. I built a little headquarters at Chabua and we started with elephants pulling out trees and built our first field at Chabua.

Q: So you're in Assam. When did you get into China? I mean you didn't fly yourself.

BYROADE: Well, not legally, but our Air Force friends let me get in lots of flying hours. I guess I could have got my service wings if I'd stayed one more week, but I couldn't do that.

I was in the India end of the Hump, I've forgotten, but I guess for maybe a year and a half. Then I was transferred to the Advance Section No. 4 of the Services of Supply, which was the eastern half of China, in support of the forward echelon of Chennault's 14th Air Force, and old AVG. It was a prewar outfit...

Q: The Flying Tigers?

BYROADE: The Flying Tigers had become the 14th Air Force, with General Claire Chennault in command. It was quite a show in Eastern China. I again was in charge of supplies and construction. I was a colonel, about thirty [years of age]. The head of the Air Force was Casey Vincent, who was a brigadier general at 29. They added an Air Service Command. I can't remember the Commander's name at the moment; he was an old guy about 35 years old. Bruce Holloway, a classmate of mine at West Point, was in command of the fighters. He was 29.

Q: So now you're stationed in China?

BYROADE: In Kweilin. I got there as one of the first Americans. It was supposed to be the Paris of China, but there wasn't a fork to eat with within a hundred miles.

Q: Where was that respective to Chungking?

BYROADE: Oh, several hundred miles southeast of Chungking. It's the southeastern-central part of China.

Q: How far was that from the Japanese occupied territory?

BYROADE: When I first got to Kweilin, I guess I was part of a cover plan; I didn't know it at the time. Along with a native, I took a jeep and went from Kweilin up to just outside of Shanghai; went down along the Jap lines from Shanghai to Canton. We were looking for bomber sites. Whether Washington had decided they weren't going to use the mainland of China for major forces, and we were merely a decoy, I never knew. We did our survey, and we were ready to go to build fields, but we never got the orders to build them. I stayed on in Kweilin. It was an exciting adventure in east China with Chennault's P-40s; their ratio was about 13 to 1 to the Japs.

Q: You mean in the Japanese favor?

BYROADE: No, in our favor.

Q: Thirteen to one.

BYROADE: Well, one reason was that Chennault was a tremendous man to command fighters. He had an intelligence net that was unbelievable, and he was smart enough to not have any American at all in that intelligence net. Normally, it might take three days to place a long-distance telephone call in China. But when the Japanese fighters started their motors wherever they were, the Chinese took over the phone system, and it worked. We were, of course, short of gasoline; we were flying our gasoline across the Hump. So Chennault would sit there in his cave in Kweilin and watch the Chinese plot where the Japanese were. He wasn't going to waste any gas, and when the time came, Chennault would give the okay. Our fighters would go up and get on top of the Japs, and bingo.

Q: They had cave headquarters there?

BYROADE: Yes, natural caves. There were a lot of caves; it's a cave country. It was a beautiful country with upside-down ice cream cone mountains, with lots of caves. I built a headquarters there. There was a tremendous cave fifty feet behind my headquarters. We had desks in there and when the Japs came over, my secretary would just take her typewriter and we'd move into the cave.

Q: Did they bomb our airfields, the Japanese, or did they try to bomb them?

BYROADE: Oh, yes, a lot. Of course, eventually we lost many of those airfields. I had built about 30. When I say "I," of course, the Chinese did the labor. Some of them were good fields; some of them were just fighter strips.

Q: When was this? When were you building these?

BYROADE: Well, this would have been '43 or '44. Eventually, of course, the Japanese came through and we had to abandon some of the fields. I'll never forget abandoning Sichuan, which was in eastern China. We put bombs in the runway and ran the fuses to piles of oil barrels and waste. The last man off fired tracer bullets into the dump and up went the runway, but the trouble was that the Japanese would fill in the holes in three or four days. When I was building that field, [General Joseph W.] Stilwell came through, and he said, "What are you building a field here for?" I said, "Because General Chennault wants it."

Well, he said, "Who's going to protect it?" I said, "My job is to build airfields." That was the great dispute between Chennault and Stilwell. Chennault thought he could hold up the Japanese and really win the war by air power alone, and of course, it didn't work. Stilwell kept saying it would not work, and this was the big bone of contention between them--other than having personalities that just didn't jibe at all.

Q: Chennault--did he speak Chinese?

BYROADE: Oh yes.

Q: Married a Chinese woman, didn't he?

BYROADE: He did after I left. Anna Chennault is now a very good friend of ours here in Washington, but I never met her in China. Chennault's family was in Louisiana. He was married and had several children, but after I left China in '44, he married Anna.

Q: You say Stilwell and Chennault had rather conflicting personalities?

BYROADE: Oh, very much so. On one of my first jobs in China, I received verbal orders from my commanding general, Raymond Wheeler. He said, "In spite of everything else you're supposed to do, see if you can't get Stilwell and Chennault talking to each other." Well, I got them together once, under the wing of an airplane on Kunming airfield, and I rather wished I hadn't because it didn't work.

Q: We're talking about 1944?

BYROADE: Probably late '43.

Q: You're in Chengdu?

BYROADE: I left Kweilin and eastern China very suddenly. The Air Force took over all construction in China and I was transferred back to the Air Force, a little chagrined at the idea, because I was building things for them and I still could, in my own mind, sort out what made sense and what didn't. Suddenly I was back in the Air Force and told to go to Chengdu, and build fields for our B-29s, which were just coming into being, to hit Tokyo. Chengdu was in northwestern China, too far from Tokyo really. You could use a slide rule and figure out that you couldn't carry very much weight in bombs at that distance. I took about fifteen people with me and we quite secretly designed and laid out four or five, I've forgotten, of the big fields, for the B-29s, and seven fighter fields for protection. I say secretly, because when we moved into an area in China and started construction, the prices of everything went sky high. Pipe was $1 a foot. Incidentally, we almost set our watches, and everybody went over the area and bought all the pipe all at once. But that was an unbelievable project.

The Generalissimo, of course, drafted the work force, coolies. They would arrive there in groups, walking from as far as a hundred miles away, all organized in groups with their own cook, etc. We had 496,000 laborers on that job. We located the big fields along rivers, as a source of rock, and they would carry the rock on their shoulders and heads up to seven miles in each direction; break the rock by hand. We had no concrete, no cement, in China; we had no asphalt. We had to build these runways for the biggest planes any of us had ever seen; the runways were 24 inches thick, with crushed rock, and then clay and sand on top.

Q: Well, we have the Marshall mission that we need to deal with. It's apparent that you had experience over in China, but do you recall how and when you were selected to be part of that Marshall mission, and what kind of function you served?

BYROADE: Well, I remember when I was selected by General [George C.] Marshall to go with him to China, it was a great shock. I didn't know General Marshall. I had briefed him a few times. I was having lunch in the Pentagon with some other officers and there was a newspaperman at the table; I couldn't remember his name. I didn't introduce myself. In the conversation he said to everybody at the table, "The deal on Byroade firmed up this morning." And I said, "I'm Byroade; what are you talking about?" He said, "Well, you're going to China with General Marshall." Well, I said, "No way, I just got back." I went back to my desk and sat there thinking about this. I had been gone for forty months; left a family back here. Went on a bomb-Tokyo mission with one suitcase thinking I'd be home in a hurry and forty months later I got back; and here he was taking me back with him. I just sat there and looked out the window for a half an hour.

A man came running down the hall and said that General Marshall wanted to see me. I walked in and saluted. He said, "Do you want to go back to China?" I said, "No sir." And he said, "Why not?" Well, what do you say? So he said, "Well, I want you to go with me." "Yes sir," I said.

"You have to have a title," he said. "I guess you had better be military attaché to China. You go tell General [Clayton] Bissell, who is head of G-2, you're military attaché to China."

I knew Bissell from the war, and I walked in and told him I was the new military attached to China, and he just about went through the ceiling. He finally calmed down and said, "All right, we'll put you through a six-weeks school." And I said, "I'm sorry; we're leaving in three days."

Well, I was in the attaché office out there maybe an hour total, but it was a good cover.

Q: You say you had briefed Marshall prior to this?

BYROADE: Only once or twice. He didn't know me.

Q: That was on the China operation that you were involved in?

BYROADE: Yes.

Q: Had he paid much attention to China, do you think, before he got appointed to this mission?

BYROADE: Well, in a way, of course, his primary concern and working hours were on Europe and the Pacific up to that point. But, yes, he had been very much involved in the problems of Stilwell and the Generalissimo, and Lord Louis Mountbatten and so on.

Q: Do you think he got feedback from these people, Mountbatten, Stilwell, maybe even Chennault?

BYROADE: As far as my selection's concerned, I think it was somewhat Stilwell, probably more Wedemeyer, at that point.

Q: Had you become pretty well acquainted with General Wedemeyer?

BYROADE: Yes, in the General Staff in the Pentagon.

Q: There would be a Wedemeyer mission in China in 1947.

BYROADE: Well, he was theater commander at the latter stages of the war in China. He was in command of the China theater. I'm not sure how I was picked. I know that Marshall wanted to take McCarthy, his Secretary of the General Staff in the Pentagon. He was very fond of Frank McCarthy who then went out to Hollywood in the movie business.

Q: Couldn't take your wife.

BYROADE: That's right. However, later on, when Marshall made a trip back to see Truman, he said, "I'll bring your family back with me." I had a wife and one son. I said, "I appreciate that General, but you can make me the most unpopular man in China, because nobody else has a wife out here." He said, "It doesn't matter; this is a special mission, and I'll do it." And he did.

Well, the Marshall mission to China was something that most Americans have misunderstood. I told Marshall in the beginning I didn't think he had more than a 2 percent chance. I felt sorry for him. Marshall was a winner, and Marshall had never tackled anything he didn't manage to do. I couldn't quite foresee his mission to China working out. Actually, we came a lot closer than I thought we ever would.

Q: Had you met Zhou En-lai or Mao [Zedong] while you were in China prior to this mission?

BYROADE: I never met Mao or Zhou En-lai during the war. I saw a great deal of Zhou En-lai, every day in the Marshall mission, for a while. I only saw Mao, I think, twice.

It took us thirteen days to get the truce agreement. Marshall was magnificent in the negotiations. Zhou En-lai was the chief negotiator for the Communists; the negotiators for the Nationalist Government kept changing--they were usually lieutenant generals. We got the truce agreement finally, in 13 days. In the afternoon it was signed and Marshall turned to me and he said, "I want executive headquarters in Peking to be opened and working tomorrow." That is a long ways away.

Part of the truce agreement was that there would be a truce headquarters, which would be manned at the top by three high commissioners. Walter Robertson was the American High Commissioner; he was a banker from Richmond. Yeh Chien-ying, a great old man, who is about 90 now, if he's still alive, was the head Communist. And again the National Government rotated their people. I was made the executive director of the truce headquarters. I was chief of staff to all three of these: the Nationalist Government, the Communist side, and the American. That was in theory. Below me we had a tripartite staff--one section on transportation, one operations, one supply, and so on. Then there were field teams; we had 46 of them in the end. Each was tripartite; they had all three people who were supposed to go out in the field and supervise the cease fire.

There was no way to get this in operation that fast, except to call General Wedemeyer and take every plane he had, except his own. We moved the Chinese Communist staff, the Nationalist Government staff, all up to Peking. We took over two hotels; we couldn't put the Communists and the Nationalist Government in the same hotel. We took over the Rockefeller Memorial Hospital complex, which was about 20 houses, and a beautiful hospital building that was empty. It wasn't being used. We literally had a team in the field the next day. It shocked the Communists; they weren't ready to move that fast. It was a little too fast, but that's what the General wanted.

In the beginning it accomplished a lot of good. The fighting did stop; food and medicine started moving. A lot of sieges were lifted. It looked like progress was being made, and then both sides, but particularly the Communist side, started violating the agreement. They even went so far as to sometimes put the truce team in jail while they took a place, and then after they had taken it they'd let the truce team out of jail. In one place they kept them confined for about a week while they did their military movements and ended up where they wanted to be.

Q: There are historians who think it was more the Nationalist right-wingers who refused a coalition with the Communists that helped break that truce. But you didn't see it that way?

BYROADE: Well, I want to answer that rather lengthily. The big problem in China was that a political party, the Communist Party, had their own army. Obviously, there wasn't going to be peace in China, as long as that prevailed. Somehow or other you had to get rid of the Chinese Communist army. Now Zhou En-lai in every meeting, over and over again, said something to us that really didn't make any sense. He said, "We acknowledge the fact that the Generalissimo is in command of all military forces in China." As I say, it really didn't make any sense. So, finally, General Marshall's staff agreed to find out what he meant by this. I remember we didn't sleep for about three nights. We took all the Chinese Communist forces, called Eighth Foot Army then, the bulk of it, and split them up [on paper] and put them under Nationalist Government commanders in areas where it looked safe to do so, and presented this to Zhou En-lai. Now in return for that, if they would do that, give up their army, Marshall was prepared to let Chinese Communist officials, a carefully selected number, into certain slots in the Chinese Government--but being careful not to put them where they really had a veto over total power in the Government. This is why Marshall is accused to trying to set up a coalition government with the Communists.

Well, to that extent, he did, but the other part of that equation was it would have gotten rid of the Chinese Communist army. We felt that if that were possible, and if we gave even more support to the Generalissimo, and got him to put through the reforms that were absolutely vital to stop the trouble in China, reforms which would take the platform away from the Communists and their appeal to the people, that China might be able to swallow this up like they had everything else for thousands of years. That was the plan and I could not believe it when Zhou En-lai agreed. He initialed the agreement. We set the signing for two days later. Marshall flew back to report to Truman. Two days went by and Zhou En-lai refused to sign the agreement.

Now, at the time I thought they had had enough time to check it out with Moscow, and that's what the problem was; I had no evidence of that, but that's what I thought. And again, I have no evidence of this, but looking back on it I think it was Mao himself who probably vetoed the idea. That showed the difference really between Zhou En-lai and Mao Zedong. I was caught in a two-days flood with Zhou En-lai--where we couldn't move in either direction, with the rivers on both sides, literally couldn't move--and we commandeered a little hut for the first night. Then, after the rain stopped we slept the second night in a graveyard. That's really when I had my best talks with him.

He said, "Make no mistake about it, we want to communize China. Mao thinks we can do it almost over night. "But," he said, "you know, we really can't. We've got less than 30 really well qualified people. We couldn't even run Shanghai at this moment if you wouldn't help us. As an example, where would we get fuel oil from?"

I said, "Well, you know damn well we will not help you." He said, "Mao has spent most of his life in caves and he doesn't know anything about finance; he doesn't know anything about economics; he doesn't know anything about world affairs; he doesn't know anything about world opinion, but he's a very dedicated Communist and he thinks we can just go right ahead and do it." And, of course, that's what they did in the end. I'm sure Zhou En-lai was just as surprised as I was how quickly they took over, and for the first time, really in Chinese history, they unified China.

Q: Well, what were Chiang Kai-shek's main obstacles or weaknesses, from your point of view at the time?

BYROADE: Well, Marshall thought he was a deplorable military commander. He did everything wrong in his military moves. But the fault was much, much deeper than that. Americans look at the map of China and say, "Well, that's China, and there's Chungking; that's the capital and there's the Generalissimo, and he's in command." This was not really true. The Generalissimo was in power by carefully balancing warlord against warlord. He literally did not have the power to put through the type of reform that would affect the common man and get rid of the Communist menace; I mean give them a better standard of living.

Q: He had warlords and absentee oppressive landlords to contend with?

BYROADE: That's right. And John Davies, a China expert, said, "Well, the Generalissimo has lost his mandate from heaven." I think that's a good way to put it. I've seen Chinese Nationalist troops just lay down their arms and walk away. They didn't know what they were fighting for.

Q: Who said he lost the mandate?

BYROADE: John Davies.

Q: Yes, I was going to ask you about these people, the "China hands."

BYROADE: Yes, well that's a good way to put it, "He lost his mandate from heaven." Now, I thought at the time, even after we failed, that it was worthwhile supporting the Generalissimo even more in hopes that we could really give him the strength to carry out reforms. Looking back on it, I don't think it would have worked.

Q: It didn't have peasant support--popularity among the masses of peasants--most of whom were landless I suppose.

BYROADE: That's right.

Q: The landless peasant was the base of Mao's support?

BYROADE: That's right.

Q: You were acquainted then with John Davies and John Service?

BYROADE: Yes.

Q: How about John Melby, do you remember him?

BYROADE: No, I don't remember him.

Q: John Leighton Stuart?

BYROADE: Yes. He took over eventually from Walter Robertson as American High Commissioner. Then, later when Marshall left, he became Ambassador.

Q: Were you acquainted with Hurley, Patrick Hurley?

BYROADE: I never met Hurley; I've read a lot about him, but never met him.

Q: What's your opinion of the job that he did? I think he was Ambassador there toward the end of the war in China.

BYROADE: Well, I didn't think he knew much about China. I thought he was too vain a man, who thought he knew a lot more than he did. I thought he should have listened more to the real experts he had around him, the China experts.

Q: How about John Davies and John Service? Of course, they got into trouble for the kind of advice they were giving and their apparent sympathies...

BYROADE: Well, this, of course, ran into the McCarthy era.

Q: But did you feel that they had a better finger on the pulse of China at the time, or were you skeptical too about their loyalty to America's friends?

BYROADE: Well, I was skeptical in the beginning before I knew any better, but eventually I became very well acquainted with John Davies. I think the positions he took on China were absolutely right. I felt so bad about the trouble he was in--this was much later on when I was in charge of German affairs in Washington, and Jack McCloy was our High Commissioner in Germany. I went to Jack and said, "Look, you've got to take John Davies on your staff and get him out of Washington. We've got to save this man." McCloy said, "I don't want to do that." I said, "You've got to do it; he's really good. He'll be one of the best men you've got." Jack finally agreed and he took him. A month later I went on a trip to Germany. Davies was in Berlin, and I was amazed at John Davies' knowledge of that situation, just in a month. But the next week he was called back for more hearings and eventually he had to leave the Service.

Q: When the truce was broken, of course, war broke out again over there, and the Nationalists began losing ground. I guess you could say the Marshall mission eventually did fail.

BYROADE: Marshall stayed too long. As I explained before, he had never really known defeat; he couldn't quite give up, and a stream of elderly Chinese, very old people, would come to see him, begging him not to leave, that he was the only hope China had. He stayed on and on. I remember flying down from Peking to Nanking, the capital was then Nanking, and seeing Marshall and telling him that I thought we had to accept failure in the mission. I said, "The important thing left is to explain to the American people why this didn't work. That's got to be done well." I said, "Who can do it?" I said, "I could do part of it, but I was in Peking; you could do part of it, but it's not fair that you have to do it in the beginning. I think we need help. We'll get Til Durdin of the New York Times, Art Steele of the Chicago Sun, or whatever it is, who really know more about China than we ever will, and let's get their newspapers and release them and put them on the job of writing the White Paper, about what happened to the mission." Marshall said, "All right." So I cabled the newspapers and I got them released, flew back to Peking, and came back a week later. They were sitting on a porch, their feet on a coffee table, and I said, "Why the hell aren't you guys working?" They said, "Well, the boss won't let us." So I went in to see Marshall and he said, "Look, if I get in your frame of mind, we have really failed, and I'm not willing to admit that." He said, "They can't start unless I sit down with them and go through it. During the war"--this is something to remember about Marshall--"everybody told me I should keep a diary." And he said, "I could have spent the last fifteen minutes every day dictating what happened. I would have it, but that would have meant I ended every day looking backwards." He said, "When your responsibilities are so great, involving so many lives, you make the best decisions you can and you forget it, and you turn to the next problem, but you don't look backwards." That's what kept Marshall there really too long.

Q: The gentlemen who were going to write, these were reporters that had been released to write a White Paper?

BYROADE: That's right.

Q: But they didn't have a job; once they got over with Marshall they found out they were not able to start it...

BYROADE: Well, eventually the State Department had to write it and they were a little too far away from it. I didn't think it was very well done.

Q: At least you missed going to Outer Mongolia.

BYROADE: I got there before it happened, on a trip. Yes, I've probably seen more of China than any living white man. You see, during the war we built about fifty airfields south of the Yangtze and I got to all those. Then we had forty-six truce teams, all north of the Yangtze, except one in Canton. I got to all of those.

Q: Were you up there at Yen-an where the Communists had their headquarters, in the caves of Yen-an?

BYROADE: I was there just once with Marshall. We went up there to call on Mao Zedong; he was still living in a cave with his actress wife.

Q: You did meet Mao in his cave headquarters in Yen-an, and you got to talk to him personally then?

BYROADE: Well, along with Marshall.

Q: What were your impressions of Mao the first time you met him?

BYROADE: I couldn't believe it; he didn't look like a leader at all. He was a blubbery, misshapen kind of man. He didn't look forceful. He had a very limp handshake.

Q: Seem to be quite different from Zhou En-lai?

BYROADE: Well, Zhou En-lai was a remarkable personality. You couldn't help but like Zhou En-lai, personally like him. He was one of the smoothest liars in the world, but you couldn't help but like him as a person.

Q: You had respect for Zhou En-lai all the time you were there?

BYROADE: Oh yes, indeed. So did Marshall. Marshall worked very well with Zhou En-lai, probably trusted him a little too much. Zhou En-lai was a very educated, articulate man. I don't know; he's the type of person that an American would slap on the back and call "Joe," which happened to be the sound of his name. But Mao left you cold. It's hard to realize how he had the adulation of millions of people.

Q: Did you feel at the time that they were more under the thumb of the Kremlin, of Moscow, than they actually were, as it turned out?

BYROADE: Yes, I did at that time. That was to some extent true, but it was a natural assumption we made in the world at that time, that the Communist bloc was monolithic.

Q: Of course, the Soviet Government had already made an agreement with Chiang Kai-shek which more or less recognized him as the chief executive of the Government of China.

BYROADE: Right. Well, I was extremely worried about the long-range Russian intentions. When I went to Manchuria on the trip that I got sick on, I got to Changchun; it was sort of the Pittsburgh of Manchuria. I flew over it and there were all of these big smokestacks, and factory buildings, absolutely impressive. Again, no people.

Q: Had the Russians gutted those factories, taken them...

BYROADE: Everything. Absolutely everything! They'd tear out the light switches. Those buildings were just shells, and it left me wondering because had I been given the job as an engineer to destroy that complex, I would have just toppled all those smokestacks. They had left them all standing, so it looked to me like they thought they were coming back someday.

Q: On the other hand, if they felt that Mao and Zhou En-lai were going to get control of China, this would not be doing them a favor, would it. It would be taking their industrial equipment away from them. In fact, didn't that become a bone of contention between the Communist Government of China, and the Soviets?

BYROADE: I think it did. Looking back, it looks rather stupid. They moved even blast furnaces, things that are almost immovable. And I don't really know why.

Q: Especially since that essentially was Chinese property, more than it was Japanese. They were taking it, I suppose, as spoils of war, supposedly from the Japanese. But it would, of course, become part of Chinese property when the war was over.

Okay, then after your illness, after you recovered, you came back, and by that time was the mission over?

BYROADE: No, I had to leave it, I would guess three or four months before Marshall came home. I came home on a slow Navy boat. I was going to San Diego but I kept hearing every night that General Stilwell was dying and I was determined to go see him, because I admired him so much. He was up in Carmel; but he died the day before the boat got in. I came back to Washington; my illness was such that most people back here thought I was going to die. General [Thomas T.] Handy was then deputy chief of staff, and he said, "Since you survived, you can have any job in the military within reason that you want." I wasn't up to working, and so I said, "I'll go down to the Armed Forces Staff College in Norfolk." That was the first class at Norfolk. As a general, I already had credit for the course. I went down there, and got back to health, rebuilding a Chris Craft. I really didn't go to school much.

Q: Council, or maybe to the three-power conferences, that he was too eager to reach agreement with the Russians. He felt the British were a little too eager at this point to come to an agreement with the Russians. My question is, do you think that Stalin himself really miscalculated in apparently giving the green light to Kim Il-Sung who ordered the North Koreans to invade the south, not realizing what kind of backlash there would be not just in regard to Asia, but in regard to the rearming of Western Europe?

BYROADE: Well, yes, I think it was a mistake on Russia's part. That seemed to be sort of a habit. Every time it looked like we might make some concession that was really important, they seemed to do something stupid, and I think that was one of them. Zhou En-lai later on said that the biggest mistake China ever made was getting into the Korean War.<sup>4</sup>

Q: He thought that was kind of pulling Russia's irons out of the fire?

BYROADE: That's right; and they shouldn't have gotten involved.

Q: Laukhuff also said the State Department seemed to be giving in on a matter of making the demilitarization of Germany a separate agenda item for these Council of Foreign Ministers meetings. There seemed to be a lot of back and forth correspondence going on just on this matter of a separate agenda item for demilitarization of Germany. We did not want that as a separate item; we wanted that to be part of a larger picture. Yet, he thought the British were going too far in accepting the idea of demilitarization as a separate item on these agenda. Yet, I think you have already said that the British did side with us on these issues.

Warsaw, Poland (1969)

Walter E. Jenkins, Jr. was raised in Texas and New England. He attended the University of Hawaii and graduated from Harvard University in 1941. He served in the U.S. Army during World War II, including two years in China. He joined the Foreign Service in 1950, serving in Bonn, Taipei, Berlin, Poznan, Warsaw, Stuttgart, and Washington, DC. Mr. Jenkins was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on February 20, 1991.

Q: Well, did you have any experience of either the Far East or Europe during the war before you graduated from college?

JENKINS: Well, before graduating from college, the contact with the Far East was basically my early childhood in the Philippines, during which we did visit China, and then my late teens in Hawaii, where I associated with many persons of Japanese, Chinese and Korean heritage at the University of Hawaii as well as during my summer job in the pineapple fields.

Q: Well, now, you graduated in 1941. What happened to you then?

JENKINS: Well, I did take ROTC, so I went to summer camp at Ft. Devens during the summer of 1941. And then I was called up for one year of active duty. I thought that would be great -- but of course within a month, Pearl Harbor. And so I went into the Army, field artillery, for the duration.

Q: Did you get any sort of international experience while you were in the Army?

JENKINS: Yes, I spent two years actually, until the end of the war, in China with the Stilwell Y-Force and later, the Chinese Combat Command, training Chinese and then taking them into operations.

Q: Because we're looking at sort of the whole foreign relations field here, not just limited to the Foreign Service, could you tell me about some of your experiences in this as an instructor under the Stilwell command -- I mean, it's a very controversial, very difficult period -- what you were doing and how you saw the situation at that time.

JENKINS: Yes. The first part of the experience was at an artillery training center at Kan Hai-tze, just outside of Kunming, in which we would train officers and a corps of noncommissioned officers in the basics of artillery, and then take them out to their battalions and help them train their battalions in artillery, and then would accompany them in the mission of opening up the Burma Road, stopping the Japanese offensive in Guangxi or protecting the border with Vietnam.

Well, I did get some very special feelings at that time. In Kunming was one of the best of the Nationalist forces, the Fifth Army. It became quite clear that the Chinese government under Chiang Kai-shek, was less interested in using them to open the Burma Road than for keeping an eye on the provincial Yunnanese forces under Warlord Governor Lung Yün. And I began to get the impression that one of the key things of concern to Chiang and the Kuomintang was this separatism of warlords and how you keep them under control. So some of his best units were actually used for that purpose in our region of southwest China.

Then, on accompanying the officers and non-coms of the 18th Artillery Regiment to a training area near the Burma Road, I noted they did a good job in training their troops, but it became quite clear from the lectures of the political officers that what they were really training for was a post-war confrontation with the Communists. This unit never did go down to open up the Burma Road, but was transferred east to Guangxi to face the Japanese there. Thus, I got a second impression that really a lot of this training and preparation was for post-war consolidation of Nationalist authority.

Q: What was your impression of Stilwell when he was replaced by Wedemeyer?

JENKINS: My feeling was that Stilwell really knew China but he couldn't harbor any nonsense, either from the "Little Peanut," as he called Chiang Kai-shek, or from us. I remember when we arrived. We had flown over from Miami, and I was the junior officer, the captain. All the others were older lieutenant colonels and colonels. We waited in the headquarters in Kunming, and after a half hour Stilwell came in, with his campaign hat and his riding crop. He looked around, finally saying, "You know, I asked for some first rate officers, and all I get is a bunch of broken-down old brass." This was our first welcome by General Stilwell.

But then we learned to respect him and emulate him, in the military sense -- we too began wearing campaign hats and carrying riding crops.

And so I think that he might have been on target as far as his assessment of Chiang and what we were trying to do; but he didn't fully appreciate all of the political factors involved, like China's tendency to go after local warlords, his felt need to finish things off with the Communists after the war, and so forth. He didn't fully appreciate the political complications in my opinion. He wanted Chinese participation in defeating the Japanese, while Chiang focused on the Communists and warlords and was sure the U.S. could take care of the Japanese.

Q: You were there for how long?

JENKINS: A little over two years.

Q: You left when?

JENKINS: I arrived in early September 1943 and left China in late September of 1945.

Q: So the war was over.

JENKINS: Yes.

Q: Were you involved at all in, you might say, the preparations for the next war, the civil war there?

JENKINS: Yes, very indirectly. By this time a Lieut. Colonel, I decided to stay on a while and to take a surrender team to Hankow. We had an OSS team to go in with us. They were to parachute from our plane and make sure the airfield was secure; then we'd land and accept the Japanese surrender and collect a lot of nice Samurai swords. But we never got there, because all of the planes were being used to transport Chinese forces to Manchuria, to counter the Soviet presence there and their support in bringing Chinese Communist troops up there. It became apparent that things were really building up for this Nationalist-Communist conflict at the end of the war. So I had my required points and came home.

Q: You earn points for military service overseas.

JENKINS: When you got a hundred points, you were eligible to go home.

Q: Then what happened? You didn't join the State Department until 1948, so what happened in between there?

JENKINS: Well, I went back to graduate school, international law and relations at Harvard, and was studying hard, when I got a call from Bill McAfee in Chinese Affairs at the State Department (he had been Wedemeyer's aide). He asked, "Would you be interested in a job in the State Department? There's a job opening up because one of our boys is going over to USIS in Hankow."

I said, "Sure." So I came down for an interview. Fantastic. State was then in what is now the Executive Office Building. I had my interviews. And then the officer in charge said, "Incidentally, our president is meeting the Mexican president across the street at Blair House. Let's go out on the balcony, have tea and watch the parade and ceremony."

I replied, "O.K., let's do it." We did, and my overall reaction was, "Boy, this is the job for me."

But the Congress knocked out the USIA post in Hankow, so I had to wait an additional year, and joined State in '48. By then State had moved to the former War Department Building at 21st and C Streets, so I didn't have tea on the balcony that frequently.

Meanwhile, I spent a pleasant year teaching at the University of Texas in Austin.

Q: First, you were a civil servant, from '48 to '50, is that right?

JENKINS: From '48 to '50 I was a Civil Servant and then became a Foreign Service Officer (FSO) in 1950.

Q: What were you doing? What were your responsibilities?

JENKINS: Well, Bill McAfee knew my military experience in China, and he wanted a helper. He was political-military. And basically my job was to help him follow the course of the civil war. These were turbulent times in China, of course, and it wasn't going well for the Nationalists.

Q: Forty-eight was really kind of the end of the line.

JENKINS: Right up into '49, when they went over to Taiwan. And so we followed the course of the military operations, and also I monitored the $125 million military aid program we were giving to the Nationalist Chinese. Those two jobs kept me pretty busy, and it was a fascinating period.

Q: What was the impression at the time? You know, so much has been written about the China hands and all this, but as a practical measure, I mean, here you are on the ground working on the East Asia...it was East Asia at that time I guess?

JENKINS: Yes, it was the Far Eastern Bureau (FE) and the "China Desk" (CA).

Q: What was the feeling at the time about the Communists and the Nationalists -- who was going to win, what American interests were and all that sort of thing?

JENKINS: We were not all of one mind, but I think we were following it very closely. China language officer Jack Service wasn't there, and Edmund Clubb wasn't, but two others, Phil Sprouse and Tony Freeman, were. They were my bosses. We saw various options. As these dispatches came in from the China posts -- from Edmund Clubb, Jack Service, Bob Service, Al Siebens and others- -we began to see the Nationalist side disintegrating and contemplated what could be done about it.

For instance, on the military side, Chiang had taken away command of ten divisions -- American-equipped and trained in China during the World War II -- from Sun Li-jen, who was a VMI graduate but just too objective -- and gave the troops and command to Fu Tso-yi, who had been a warlord. Fu Tso-yi eventually defected, with the 10 divisions, to the Communists.

And then you began to see warlord cliques develop and split off. One was the Guangxi Clique, led by Li Chi-shen and Li Tsung-jen, who was vice president to Chiang Kai-shek at the time. And you got a feeling from the reporting that the Guangxi Clique was trying to join hands with Fu Tso-yi and Governor Lung Yün of Yunnan to provide an alternative to Chiang.

So these reports poured in from the so-called China Hands. But you also had, on this side, the "China Lobby," led by John Foster Dulles and other likeminded political figures.

Q: Senator Knowland, Walter Judd, who was at that time a congressman.

JENKINS: Right. And so you could see three alternatives, at least I could, and you could see people thinking about them. Should there be a support of alternative groupings the Guangxi Clique and other factions? "Look, the Chinese Communists are obviously winning," others would say, "why not establish contact with them, establish diplomatic relations, and wean them away from the world-wide monolithic Communist movement?" And then you had the viewpoint, represented by the China Lobby, "Follow through with Chiang to the very end, even though he had retired to Taiwan, and someday we'll return to the mainland," which became the slogan.

Q: Were you feeling any particular pressure on you? I mean, was this really some people sitting down and weighing these things and trying to figure out what do we do? Or was there pressure to "think right"?

JENKINS: Not from the hierarchy. No, I think there was objectivity...from my point of view, and remember, I was a relatively new junior officer.

Q: Oh, no, I understand. No, but this is important to get this feeling.

JENKINS: But in the broader political environment you did have the feeling of pressure from the Judds and the Knowlands that we mustn't be "traitors," and you began to feel that Jack Service and others were not exactly welcome in this environment.

Q: But did you have the feeling that you were getting good reporting out of China?

JENKINS: I felt we were getting excellent balanced reporting out of China, even including that wonderful jewel from Tihwa, capital of way-out Xinjiang. The consul had just isolated himself out there, and the dispatches came in only once every six months. And it became apparent (because I read the dispatches first) that what he might be writing were chapters of a book about the situation in Xinjiang. The villain of the piece was a Russian named Alexis, who lived in the area. Finally, as the civil war approached its end, the consul had to pull out, with his deputy who was an OSS type, through Tibet into India.

Q: But you didn't have the feeling at the time, this '48 to '50 time, that you were in a bureau almost besieged by the political right in the United States?

JENKINS: As a junior officer focusing on the military I was perhaps less aware of the siege. But I had a feeling that Edmund Clubb, the Services and others, and maybe my two bosses, Phil Sprouse and Tony Freeman, were feeling this pressure a lot more than I was. Of course we all know what happened to the Services; and John Patton Davies was another. And Tony Freeman, who was one of the best China language officers I've ever known, of course, left the Far East and became ambassador to Mexico eventually. And Phil Sprouse did go out to Cambodia eventually. But their careers with China or anything important in that region was ended. And you could sort of feel that by 1950.

Q: When did you leave the China desk and go to Germany?

JENKINS: Well, both Phil and Tony, who had been encouraging me to go to China language school, realized that it was all over in China, and that young officers would not serve there for many years to come. So something came up with the High Commission in Germany, (HICOG), and they said, "That looks like a good opportunity; if you're interested, take it." HICOG wanted to train a group of young candidates waiting to be Foreign Service Officers (FSOs), to serve in Germany as Kreis Resident Officers, which in essence was to be county representative for the High Commission throughout the American Zone. So after family consultation, I joined 26 other FSO candidates to attend the Foreign Service Institute for three months of orientation and German language study, and then off to Germany.

Q: So you left about when?

Q: Then you got yanked back there to your China side, didn't you, at that point? I have you going to Taipei from '52 to '55.

JENKINS: We actually arrived in January '53. I was quite, quite sure I was going to continue to serve in Germany for another tour. And I was transferred to the political section of the High Commission (HICOG) in Bonn in the summer of '52.

Q: Ah, well, then let's talk a little about that.

JENKINS: Well, it would have to be "a little." Because HICOG had the authority to transfer us, as junior Foreign Service officers, directly from a Kreis to Bonn, then notify the Department of the reassignment. But the dear administrative officer didn't do it by wire, but by surface pouch. And so I was doing my first job of sorting out files in the political section, when all of a sudden a cable came in stating that I was being transferred to Taipei. Well, John Patton Davies, the old China Hand, who was then head of the political section, wrote a beautiful cable trying to retain me in Bonn. But a fatuous cable came back which said that the Department feels that young officers should have a variety of experiences, and since Mr. Jenkins has already served in China, the Department feels he ought to go back there. There were condolences. One of my friends was sorting through his cables in the file room and said, "I'm awfully sorry to see you go."

I replied, "Well, Pete, it has to be, I guess."

And then, looking at a cable, he said, "I'll be damned, I'm transferred to Taiwan, too!" So we went to Taiwan on the same plane.

Q: What was your impression, before we leave that, about how the civilian American side was doing, both at...well, it wasn't even an embassy, it was still High Commission, wasn't it?

JENKINS: It was formally the High Commission because the "contractual agreements" negotiated with the Federal Republic were not ratified until 1955 because of French opposition. But we operated as an Embassy. Within the U.S. Zone the civilian American side was doing well, but internationally there were problems -- East-West problems with the USSR, impact of the Korean War, stalemate over the "European Defense Community", etc.

Q: Well, then you went to Taipei. What were you doing there?

JENKINS: Well, in Taipei, my initial job, after several months training in Washington, was to be administrative officer for the embassy, which I did for about six, seven months. And then I replaced the person who was the political-military officer, again because of my background in political-military work.

Q: What was the situation when you were there? We're talking about '53 to '55, in Taiwan. I mean, the Korean War was going full blast. I'm sure the wounds from the civil war had not really healed at all. How did you see the situation there?

JENKINS: Well, as you say, it was a pretty turbulent time in the Far East. And of course we were in Taiwan with our military assistance program, and we were also in Korea. And by this time mainland China was also involved in the Korean War: and this had its repercussions in Taiwan. There was much emphasis on "return to the mainland," parading, training, and maneuvers to emphasize that goal. But there was also some internal upheaval and competition for authority on the island.

I remember going over with our navy during the evacuation of the Tachen Islands. Chiang Ching-kuo, the older son of Chiang Kai-shek, was there and I got to know him somewhat. And then I went to Quemoy, which is just opposite Fujian Province on the mainland -- very close, artillery distance -- with Wild Bill Donovan and Maxwell Taylor to look over the situation there in terms of its viability under the Nationalists. There was considerable military tension at that time.

Also, there was internal tension. Chiang Ching-kuo, the older son, was having a struggle with Madame Chiang and her son, Chiang Wei-kuo, for a position of power and influence on Chiang Kai-shek. And it had its impact on the diplomatic corps, too. For example, when Madame Chiang organized a fashion show, supported by Wei-kuo, and invited all the diplomats there, Ching-kuo surreptitiously got his bully boys to disrupt the fashion show, turn over diplomats' vehicles, while appealing to the public that the fashion show was a frivolous event at the time of serious civil and Korean wars with the Communists.

Also, Sun Li-Jen, the VMI-educated general who trained the troops that finally opened up the Burma Road during W.W.II, was put under house arrest in 1954. And two of his generals were sent to Green Island, a detention re-education camp for political prisoners. I remember going to Green Island with a U.S. Army colleague and Chiang Ching-kuo, who controlled security for the Nationalist Government. During the tour of the camp he pointed out that they were reforming the resident political dissidents, and that ninety-five percent of them, after re-education in the Three People's Principles, returned to Taiwan. Well, that was interesting so my colleague and I asked, "Well, what happens to the other five percent?"

"Oh, we don't hurt them. No, actually, we give them a boat, food supplies and a radio, and send them back to the Chinese mainland. And after three or four days, we start sending radio messages to them asking: "When are you going to report?" And the Communists take care of them."

Q: Oh, my God.

JENKINS: Well, he was a very, very clever man. But he was also very clever in a more positive sense: he cultivated the Taiwanese and supported their involvement, developing close relation with them, and not relying exclusively on the mainlanders resident on Taiwan.

Involving the native Taiwanese brings me to the one real positive development during this period. We Americans helped develop a Joint Commission for Rural Reconstruction (JCRR), headed by Chiang Mon-lin, a former university president on the mainland, an inspired, far-sighted person. In essence, JCRR emulated what happened in Japan back at the time of the late 19th century Meiji Restoration, during which land was taken from the feudal lords and dispensed to the peasantry. Similarly, land was taken from the wealthy landowners in Taiwan and given to the peasants, and the government reimbursed the landlords with government bonds. They became the bankers and the industrialists, just like the Mitsubishis and other feudal lords in Japan back during the Meiji Restoration. This JCRR development laid the foundation for the fantastic economic development that has occurred over the past few decades on Taiwan.

Q: Well, Karl Rankin was the ambassador.

JENKINS: He was our ambassador.

Q: What was your impression of Karl Rankin?

JENKINS: My impression was, he was a nice, even-handed person, and he was like several other ambassadors with whom I have served, believing that you don't muddy up the waters. I mean they emphasize that this is the policy -- the way we're going to do it. To illustrate, I recall one fascinating report prepared jointly by officers of the Political Section. It was a despatch analyzing the feasibility of a military "return to the mainland," concluding that it was most unlikely. It was drafted by FSO China-language experts and sent up to the ambassador. He recognized a problem, with the "China Lobby" now pretty much in control in the Department. He left the analysis intact but changed the conclusions -- this was his report. But the underlying message stood out when it got back to the Department, because the analysis was still there. Ambassador Rankin tried to be fair to his reporting officers and at the same time avoid rocking the boat in Washington. All copies of the report were recalled from distribution by the Department

Q: Was there any feeling at the time, particularly when you got into the political-military side, that this idea of returning to the mainland just was a non-starter from the very beginning?

JENKINS: Yes, and I think that most of the political officers, economic officers and most everyone in the embassy felt the same way; but "return to the mainland" like many other slogans of autocratic leaders, seems to help hold things together.

I just read in The New York Times, day before yesterday, about Mr. Wu, an elderly Kuomintang legislator, still taking the line, "We're going to return to the mainland in a few years."

Such slogans tended to hold the mainlanders together in a disciplined fashion; and they had their impressive military parades, and we trained them and gave them equipment to maintain the unified posture. So, while I think the analysts thought it was a non- starter, I also concluded that it had its politically unifying purpose among the mainlanders.

Q: Did you feel under any sort of constraints, at least among the Chinese, not to say, "Oh, come on, fellas, this isn't going to work."? I mean, was this something we talked about among ourselves, but there was no point in displaying our thoughts to the Chinese?

JENKINS: I'm trying to think if I ever had an opportunity. No, I don't think that we were ever inclined to do that. We wanted our government to know what we felt about the possibility. We had pretty close associations with some people like General Sun Li-Jen and others we had known back during the war, and they didn't seem to believe in the feasibility of a military return to the mainland. But you didn't discuss such things with Chiang Ching-kuo or other inside members of the government.

Q: What was your impression of Chiang Kai-shek, Madame Chiang and all, as far as their grasp of how to run the government? You know, one always thinks of the tremendous corruption. You've talked about the device of the cliquism. Was there a reform going on within their ranks at that time?

JENKINS: Well, as I said, it's a very strange source of reform, but Chiang's older son, Ching-kuo, who was, after all, educated in Moscow, took all of the Communist techniques, developed them for the Kuomintang against the Communists. Now that's one side of him. But, as I said, I think under his influence there was a tendency, demonstrated by the JCRR land reform, to compensate the Taiwanese with economic prosperity in exchange for maintaining Kuomintang political and military control. That was my impression by the time I left. And Ching-kuo was very good at it; that was his technique: Cultivate the Taiwanese economically, maintain political and military control.

Q: Were you there during the sacking of the embassy?

JENKINS: I left, fortunately, three months before that. But it was the same group that was turning over the diplomats' cars at the fashion show, and I think it was Ching-kuo who was a little bit behind that, too.

Q: This was over a...

JENKINS: It involved an American sergeant who, as I recall, caught a "Peeping Tom" outside his house and shot him with a .45. Wasn't that it, the way you think it was started?

Q: I think it was something like that, yes. Well, then, you seemed to have a sort of a split personality here. You left Taipei and back again to Berlin. You were there from '55 to '57.

***

Q: Walter Stoessel came. He was ambassador there from '68 to '72, so you had him for the first half of his tour. How did he operate? Was there a difference? I mean, how did he use you, and how did you see him heading an embassy?

JENKINS: He was a wonderful guy. He was not a person who said, "I've got a lot of views on this, and this should be done, and I think our policy should be so and so." He kept things on an even keel, and very, very professionally. He developed very good relationships with other diplomats and Polish officials, because they really recognized him as a competent professional.

Initially, in speaking Polish he had a Russian accent that I used to tease him about occasionally, but it ironed out.

I think the first experience of how we worked together was a cable that came in from Henry Kissinger in early '69 that said: "It's time to reopen our China talks." (They had been discontinued in the mid 60's due to problems in the Far East, including Vietnam.). "I want you to make contact with the Chinese ambassador to reopen these talks." So we talked about it: How should we do it? Ambassador Stoessel asked, "You speak a little Chinese, don't you?"

I replied, "I've forgotten most of it, but I know a little. I know how to say hao bu hao and so forth." Then I added, "I have a good idea. You know, Mr. Ambassador, the Yugoslavs are going to have a fashion show and party early next week, and everybody's invited. I suggest we both go, and we'll sit at separate tables. But when the Chinese ambassador leaves, at the cloak room, I'll go at the same time and sort of bump into him, and 'Oh, excuse me,' and introduce myself. And then I'll tell him, 'I want you to meet my ambassador.'"

"Do you think it'll work?"

I said, "Well, we can try it."

And so we did: Fashion show, cloak room, and I introduced myself. And he was, you know, being very Chinese and bowing hands clasped. I said, "I want you to meet my ambassador." So they were introduced. And then Walter Stoessel said (they found a Chinese interpreter then, I wasn't good enough in Chinese) that he hoped we could meet again sometime soon.

"Hao, Hao, Hao," (OK), said the Chinese Ambassador.

So we invited them over to our embassy. We didn't put it in the old place, one of the palaces in a park across the way, because we found out that it was pretty well tapped by the Poles. And they showed up at the embassy the following week in one of the biggest black limousines I've ever seen. Anything to be a little bigger than the Russian Zis. They entered and I met them. We had the interpreters and specialists down from Stockholm, who were the China-talks specialists. I had it all arranged with the Marine guards, you know, send us up to the fourth floor to meet with the ambassador in his office. The Marine guard accidentally pushed the wrong elevator button and sent us down to the basement. I think they thought I was kidnaping them at first. But that was rectified, and we went up and had our first meeting. And that was the reopening of the talks with China.

Well, of course, Kissinger was already thinking and had talked a lot...

Q: He was then the head of the NSC, National Security Council.

JENKINS: Yes, that's right. And he probably was already thinking about a Nixon visit to China, and the preparation was underway, you know, in his own mind. He had been talking with a lot of people, including Fairbanks.

Q: This was John Fairbanks, at Harvard.

JENKINS: Who had mentioned in a number of talks with Kissinger (of course, they were both at Harvard) that this would be a good opportunity to reopen things with China.

So that's how I remember the reopening.

JOHN A. LACEY

Chungking/Beijing (1944-1945)

Analyst, Bureau of Intelligence and Research

Economic Officer

Bureau of Intelligence and Research
Washington, DC (1957-1958)

Economic Officer
Hong Kong (1960-1964)

John A. Lacey was born in Illinois in 1917. He joined the Department of State in 1950 and the Foreign Service in 1955. He served in Taiwan, Hong Kong, Singapore, Australia, and Rangoon. He was interviewed by Henry Precht in 1989.

LACEY: I then decided I would go to work and earn my living like a real businessman. My family had moved to Chicago. I followed them to Chicago. My first job was selling printing. I quickly despaired of my ability to sell anything including printing. But one day, mid 1938, on a Friday afternoon, there was a heavy rain, and like any good salesman, I spent most of my time in the buildings in the loop of Chicago. The elevator carried me past an exciting eighth floor where I caught a quick glimpse of gold, of cinnabar, and the smell of incense and sandalwood. When I reached the bottom, I said to the elevator operator, "Take me back up."

There I met George F. Ruby, Inc. George F. Ruby was a charter member of the Illinois Athletic Club. Was himself director, owner, and operator of an import/export house that dealt in oriental goods. I was so intrigued that I said to him, "Mr. Ruby, I would like to work for you." That was late Friday. I went to the printing office on Saturday, announced my resignation, and on Monday I showed up at George F. Ruby, Inc.

"I'll be goddamned," he said. "I didn't expect to see you here."

"Well, here I am, I said, but I won't work for nothing."

"How are you on books?" he said. "I need a bookkeeper in the worst kind of way."

I said, "Accounting was the only course in college I flunked, Mr. Ruby."

"Good," he said, "you are just the man I want." And he slapped his hand down on his desk and knocked out his English pipe and shook my hand. And that's how I became further interested in things oriental.

At about the same time, I fortuitously received a letter from the University of Chicago answering an application I had put in maybe three or four years earlier -- three years I guess it was -- saying that yes, indeed, I was eligible for a scholarship. In 1938, I resumed my studies. This time at the University of Chicago of Chicago's Department of Oriental Language and Literature. I got my degree in 1940. Meantime I continued to work for Ruby part time. The customers stole him blind which he was.

Q: You learned Chinese in that process?

LACEY: I was learning Chinese. However, Henry, I never did gain a good command of Pai-hua, that's spoken Chinese. My teacher was an outstanding expert in literary Chinese. Though I still can read literary Chinese, I have difficulty now speaking any Chinese at all.

Q: So by the outbreak of World War II, you were graduated from the University of Chicago with this degree in oriental literature.

LACEY: And still aspiring to become the United States best teacher of things Chinese. But Pearl Harbor changed all that . . . changed the lives of many, many millions of Americans, a fact that still colors my attitudes towards the Japanese. As soon as Pearl Harbor occurred, I immediately quite schooling. I tried to get into the government service one way or another, fighting those dirty Japs, as I used to say to myself. The best I could do immediately was to join the Office of Censorship in the Chicago branch where my Chinese enabled me to censor Chinese mail that was picked up, intercepted.

By August of '42, however, I was able to get myself in stream, this time as a Yeoman Second Class at the U.S. Navy Japanese language school in Boulder, Colorado. The fact that I did get in the school at all still is remarkable to me. Because I think, Henry, the gravest shortcoming of American foreign affairs is the general lack of knowledge of foreign affairs among the public at large. In this case, when I protested that I knew nothing about Japanese, the answer was, "Well, they are more or less the same." That has occurred several times throughout my career.

At the conclusion of the Boulder Japanese language training school, I was shipped off to Washington where I served in the Naval Communication Annex on Massachusetts and Nebraska Avenue. It was quite apparent that I was no better in deciphering Japanese codes than I was in my accounting practices. I loathed it. The only thing I had going for me was a greater capacity for coffee than the warrant officer, who served as the chief flunky in the Naval communications office system of personnel. He was a sour man, like most warrant officers, but grudgingly acknowledged that if anyone could drink more coffee than he could, that fellow must be all right. We became good friends. One day he said, "You are interested in China, aren't you?"

"I would give anything to get to China."

He said, "Are you ready to go right now?"

I said, "I will go as soon as I get orders."

He said, "You are off in two weeks."

So he wrote up the orders to send me to the U.S. Naval Group China. And in two weeks, I was off and away.

Q: What was the U.S. Naval Group in China?

LACEY: It was a goof-off outfit, a President Roosevelt and Chiang Kai-shek deal whereby the U.S. services -- in this case, the Navy Group China -- would train Chinese soldiers in the arts of war. My unit trained cryptography and the arts of bicycle riding. By the way, at that time, Chinese could not ride bicycles. They had no sense of balance, they had no sense of speed. It was rather laughable to watch them being trained.

Q: Where was it based?

LACEY: It was based primarily outside of Chungking about sixty miles in a place that the Americans called Happy Valley. The official name of the organization was the Sino-American Cooperative Organization, SACO.

Q: Who was the commander of this overall operation?

LACEY: Admiral Milton Miles was the --

Q: Navy commander?

LACEY: Navy commander, yes, but I believe he commanded all SACO units.

Q: And he reported to whom?

LACEY: He reported to Roosevelt.

Q: I see. Was Stilwell --

LACEY: Stilwell was sent to China, but he was not involved. He was a separate --

Q: On a separate command.

LACEY: In fact, Uncle Sam had a very poor wartime organization in China. As you know, Stilwell fought with the "Peanuts" i.e., Chiang Kai-shek. The U.S. Ambassador to China was --

Q: Hurley.

LACEY: Patrick Hurley. He was a stinker, at least that's how I felt he was. He may have been different, but that's the kind of impression I got.

Q: Did your group fight with Stilwell's command or the ambassador, or what kind of a relationship did you have?

LACEY: We had an almost independent relationship because our effective leader was General Tai Li Dai Lee, whom you may remember as being the chief of the Chinese gestapo. He was infamous for the rough way in which he herded people around including his influence with Chiang Kai-shek. Through him I saw the innate cruelty of the Chinese people.

Turning back to a more general approach to that period of my life, the good thing about it was, while I had no job, there was no billet for me and took about two months for the authorities to find out what to do with me, they finally gave me a job in which I was able to do some of the things I enjoyed doing. One was to help rescue American pilots, mostly from the "Flying Tiger," the 14th Air Force. Another was to resume my study of Chinese and Chinese ways of life.

That was an exciting experience and one that exposed me to an aspect of China which I never dreamed existed.

Q: What year was this?

LACEY: March 1944 to December '45.

Q: I see. The end of the war.

LACEY: Yes. Speaking about the end of the war, you may remember, Henry, the false armistice. I think that was on August the ninth. In any case, it was a false armistice, but I was then back in Happy Valley as one of the two best Japanese language officers in the China theater -- in fact, there were only two of us able to be moved -- Lieutenant Roy Wald, who was six months my senior, and myself. As soon as the false armistice was declared, orders came through that Wald and Lacey should be flown to Shanghai to help that aspect of the Japanese surrender.

As it turned out, it was a false armistice, but we ultimately did get to Shanghai the day after the real armistice. I am ashamed at all that we were called upon to do. Americans abroad, especially soldiers, have very little cultural sensitivity. They are so keyed up and ready to believe that the Japanese are dirty bastards, that anything goes. Looking back upon that era, I am ashamed of the way that our little contingent treated the Japanese.

Q: The Japanese who surrendered in Shanghai and elsewhere in China?

LACEY: The Japanese generally surrendered overall, but each area general had its own directions to surrender.

Q: Right. But didn't the Americans have a role in determining how the Japanese would be treated? Weren't the Americans running things with the Chinese taking orders?

LACEY: The MacArthur syndrome, as I think of it in retrospect, even then was beginning to percolate. There was a sense of superiority, uncalled for I think, but nevertheless exercised.

Q: Why were you ashamed of the way the Americans performed?

LACEY: Well, for example, we had caught the Japanese gunboat in the Whangpoo River going downstream en route to safety in Japan. That had been captured and brought back to Shanghai. Commander Martin, a San Diego fire chief, was the senior officer of our Navy group. Under his orders and instructions, Roy Wald and I, shamefully, were among those who stripped Japanese down naked. We went through their photograph albums -- and there were many, many photograph albums -- looking for what was presumed to be secret documents or orders or codes. It was a shameful show. That's what I really meant.

The commander of the Japanese gunboat was held prisoner in his cabin and saved for the last. When Martin was satisfied that nothing was really worth collecting, Martin went down to his cabin with Wald on his right and I on his left. The Japanese officer was sitting on the other side of a big billiard table, a green cloth table like a billiard table, by himself. Martin asked him, among other things, "What do you think of the way we are treating your boys now, as compared to the way you treated us at Bataan?"

I put the question in Japanese to this naval officer. The answer came back, which I interpreted, "That was war, this is peace, now all men are brothers."

Whereupon Martin, a big-armed guy, freckled face, brought his hand down on the table and said, "Lacey, you tell him that is chicken shit." Well, in all of my training that I had at Boulder Japanese language school, I never learned the word, "chicken shit."

So I scowled and said, "Dame des'u'," which literally means, "that's too bad." But Martin couldn't tell the difference. [Laughter]

Then from Shanghai, I had the great joy of being reassigned to Peking. This was around September of that year.

Q: '45?

LACEY: '45. And from September to about December 1, I had a heyday.

Q: Were you assigned to the naval attaché office then?

LACEY: No, this was still SACO operation. It was our function in Peking to make an inventory of the Japanese military installations in North China.

I remember one day especially that involved General Sun in charge of the Peking area. He was greedy, vain and corrupt. He was responsible to Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek and like so many generals was more interested in lining their own pockets than fighting the Pa Lu (the 8th Route Army, which answers to Mao Zedong's communism). General Sun made a fortune selling rice and coal from government sealed stores.

Do you recall, Henry, the old fashion way of using a flash pan to take photos?

Q: Right.

LACEY: Well, we were in a bunker, and Wald and I were translating the Japanese names on the different ammunitions in the bunker. General Sun was vainly posturing for a camera we didn't see. He had one of his photographers flash off the flash pan, Roy and I hit the deck. We didn't know what was going to happen.

Q: You thought he might ignite the explosives.

LACEY: Exactly. Well, it turned out he did not.

Another thing I enjoyed about Peking was our senior Chinese translator was a fellow by the name of T'ien. A very fine person whose main love in life was Chinese opera. He knew so much about Chinese opera that under his guidance, he and I would go off every evening not to one opera but to many, maybe three, four or five, to hit just that one point in time when the famous actor was doing a popular aria. Well, that was quite a fulfilling experience.

Q: What kind of attitude did you and your colleagues have in the Navy group there towards the Chiang government?

LACEY: We were by then rather down on the Chiang government.

Q: What did you think? They were inept, corrupt, what?

LACEY: It was well-known that, first and foremost, the country was saddled with impossible inflation. I think I can remember having a dinner in Shanghai where the four of us paid for a dinner that cost us seven-million plus local currency. Inflation was so bad that people would carry money around in wheel barrows.

Q: Suitcases.

LACEY: In suitcases. Well, they would bag it up and carry it openly. That was one obvious sign of maladministration. But I think the worst thing that we all felt -- at least my colleagues and I felt -- was that Chiang's generals were most interested in lining their own pockets. Chiang's senior minister of finance, T.V. Sung, was well-known to have milked China dry. None of us felt very kindly toward the Sung clan including Madame Sung, Madame Chiang Kai-shek, who was a Sung girl.

Q: Did they have any contact with the embassy during that period or were you pretty much without that?

LACEY: Our contacts with the embassy were very slight. In Chungking, a good friend of mine and still a very good friend and one of our outstanding Chinese language officers -- Harald Jacobson his name is -- was then a commander and served as deputy military attaché in Chungking.

You asked, Henry, about contacts with the embassy personnel. It's very vague in my mind.

Q: What about the communists at that stage? What kind of attitude or knowledge did you have of the Chinese communists?

LACEY: I may have had a better knowledge of the Chinese communists than did the boys in Washington. Remember, Roosevelt was still in charge. He --

Q: Well, not at this time. This is after --

LACEY: But his policies were still prevalent. At Yalta, among other places, he and his cohorts plus Stalin and Winston Churchill and disgracefully no Chinese representation at all, proceeded to carve up eastern Europe and China according to their plan. The Yalta hangover enabled Stalin to send his own forces into the Far East within one day I think before the war finally ended. I am a little fuzzy on that, but it was a belated gesture to show that Stalin and Russia also had a stake in the treaty, of peace in Japan.

In the meantime, what actually was the case was the Russian communist forces were commanding almost all of North China, and as they retreated, they turned over their arms and their territory not to Chiang Kai-shek but to Mao Zedong. I could see that going on right within the perimeter of Peking.

Now one thing very much on my mind, even today as China is in turmoil, is that at that time under Mao's leadership the Chinese Communist forces unquestionably were well-disciplined. Unlike the Nationalist forces, the Chinese Communist troops would take over cities and towns and instead of raping the women and looting precious stores, they would take off their shirts and work in the fields. It was a majestic example of how good propaganda can be a partner of diplomacy.

In the meantime, Chiang Kai-shek's soldiers and generals were vainly trying to hold ground. Against the advice of General George Marshall who was sent to China as a presidential advisor, the Nationalist forces went into Manchuria and tried to regain that territory.

Some years later, in '56-'57, when I was assigned to Taipei, China, the then minister of economic affairs, a wonderful fellow by the name of Kiang Piao, himself an engineer, told me several times how he was the chief engineer of a group in Manchuria that was assigned to build a bridge across the Liao River. There were about 200 of China's best engineers building that bridge. Suddenly, out of nowhere, the Pa Lu -- that was the way the communists referred to themselves. Pa Lu meaning the Eighth Route Army -- suddenly the Eight Route Army cutoff retreat of these 200 or so engineers who were on the other side of the river. They captured the bridge, and that was the end of that expedition.

It was also one of the reasons why Communist China was able to get off to such a good start. They not only had some of best trained manpower, but they also had the capacity to --

Q: Motivate people?

LACEY: Motivate people, yes. And along with motivating people, they inherited all of the five and ten-year plans which the Chinese government under Chiang Kai-shek had been developing. I've heard from many different sources -- they had blueprints of bridges to be built, of roadways to be repaired, of dams to be erected. These fell into the hands of the Chinese Communists. I think this was a primary reason why initially the Chinese Communists were so successful.

If one were to look into this more careful than I have, one would probably find much of the material achievements of early stages of Chinese Communist rule over the mainland were due to the fact that they just put into place plans that had already been made.

Q: Right.

LACEY: But unlike the Chiang Kai-shek's boys, the communists had popular support.

Q: That's interesting observation. Let's get back to your time in Peking. This is the end of 1945, now, and you and your colleague, Wald was it, were surveying what remained of Japanese installations. Now, what other duties did you have at that time?

LACEY: That was about it. Wald and Lacey's job was to translate documents that described Japanese installations throughout what the Japanese called the North China area.

Q: Did you go to visit the Yen-an at that time?

LACEY: I got to Yen-an earlier.

Q: Oh, tell us about that incident.

LACEY: Well, it was very accidental. I spoke earlier about being in China without direct orders, and for about two wonderful months, I could wander around doing what I wanted, visit monasteries and gorge Chinese food. What I remember most was the self-confident attitude of the basically pro-Chinese Communist person.

Q: This was in 1944, then.

LACEY: Yes.

Q: You think they were confident of ultimate victory? Was that the kind of sense you had?

LACEY: They were not only confident, but they deliberately exploited Uncle Sam's misguided desire to try to bring the two hostile forces together. Mao and his Zhou En-lai and a couple other leaders pretended to fight the Japanese. However, they criticized the Chiang Kai-shek government for failing to fight the Japanese as determinedly as they wanted or as they believed was desirable.

Q: What was the attitude of the Americans. Did they think the Chinese were a more effective fighting force against the Japanese? How did they look at them?

LACEY: On this I can only refer you to the wonderful source book called U.S. Relations with China put out by the Department of State, August '49. Remember that the Department of State, especially Dean Acheson, was under heavy criticism from the China lobby for --

Q: Loss of China.

LACEY: Yes, for the loss of China.

Q: Well, you couldn't foresee the momentous changes that were coming.

LACEY: No.

Q: No one could. Well, let see. Unless there is something else that you want to say about that China period, you left China then and returned to the University of Chicago and then entered the Department of State?

LACEY: Yes, I returned to the University of Chicago. I maintained my naval reserve status for a couple or three years as a source of income. I was already married, wonderfully married. I reentered the University of Chicago determined to, as I said earlier, become the best goddamned teacher of Chinese history and culture in the United States. That was my dream.

Let me tell you quickly a story. For my doctoral thesis, I decided on the functions, the system concerning the Ming dynasty magistrate during the Hung Wu period which was the first of the Ming eras. I really feel that I know more about the Ming dynasty magistrate than most people would ever care to know.

The magistrate was, in essence, the representative of the emperor. He was the local Gauleiter, the father of the people, the principal Confucian in his district. He was the chief policeman; he was the chief tax collector; he was chief enforcer of law and order. His relations with the military were, even as now, uncertain, uneasy. He was the high priest in the district, which is tantamount to a county. He was the officiator at many state ceremonies which the monarchy mandated by customary law.

Q: Anyway, this gave you a very good understanding of the dynamics of political life in China at that time. But let's --

LACEY: But, no, the reason why I stress this is that in 1949, I was approached by a Rhea Blue from the Department of State's intelligence research on the Far East to go to Washington. Interestingly, Henry, the Department of State had reason to believe that now that the People's Republic of China had been established on October 1 of '49, that the next move would probably be into Korea. So Rhea Blue was running around the country trying desperately to recruit people who knew anything about China.

At that time, there were only five universities in the United States that taught Chinese. To my knowledge, there were only about 200 who had more than two or three years of Chinese.

Q: But there were officers in the service who knew China. Had they been discredited because of the debacle with Chiang Kai-shek?

LACEY: Almost all of them were not only discredited but left the service because of --

Q: So they had desperately to get new staff.

LACEY: Yes.

Q: So you were hired to come down and work in the branch of intelligence and research?

LACEY: Yes. I resisted at first, but I finally gave in to Rhea Blue the second time she came. Because why? Because I had one daughter already and another one on the way. Can you imagine this, Henry? I had a debt owed to my mother of $750 which is nothing today, but back in those days, that burnt on my back like a scarlet letter. Anyway, I finally capitulated to Rhea, and I went to Washington in 1950. I remember reporting on March the third in 1950 of that year to a Joe Yager who was then chief of the China branch of intelligence research for the Far East.

I remember -- Joe denies this story, but I will tell it to you anyway because it is true. Joe, in interviewing me, said, "Are you acquainted with Fei Hsiao-Tung?"

"Yes, I was."

"What do you think of him?"

I said, "His analysis of Chinese society and dynamics was excellent."

"You know he's a communist," said Joe Yager.

I didn't know he was a communist. But this was a time when McCarthyism was beginning to rear its ugly head.

In any case, despite that -- and Joe denies this story -- I went to work. I ended up directing the National Intelligence Survey on not only China but later on Indochina. The NIS was a fine effort to get at the fundamentals of civilization, the political and economic dynamics, the military systems, the heart of history.

Q: Did you feel any pressure during this McCarthy period to cast your analysis in certain directions?

LACEY: I mentioned earlier Joe Yager's name. Let me mention him again because he was a godsend to me. Joe was a very stubborn, tough-minded analyst. He is still a best friend. Joe Yager insisted that nothing leave his office that he hadn't personally examined. But it wasn't for the purpose of pulling our punches. Joe insisted that we call them as the shots fell, but he always made certain that we worded our analysis in such a way that it wouldn't offend McCarthy. I am always grateful for that. I am also grateful that he honed my writing skill.

On the other hand, some of our best people were dragged through the McCarthy grinder and had to leave the government. It was a very uneasy period, a shameful period in terms of our democratic process.

Q: What was the assessment that you all came to in this period on the Mao regime? How did you evaluate its longevity, what future did you see for Chiang Kai-shek on Taiwan? What was your analysis of the dynamics at work?

LACEY: Of the two Chinas, there was no question in my mind at that time, that Chiang Kai-shek had had it.

Q: In China?

LACEY: In China, first, but then when he came to Taiwan, he was instrumental in a wide purge of what he regarded as commies or leftists or radicals. He and his wife had a very poor reputation except with the China lobby. They played that one to the hilt.

As for Mao and company on the mainland, I remember being the director and writer on public law and order in China for NIS, the National Intelligence Survey. I was glowing in my claim of the Chinese Communist government. I didn't realize then, as I did later, some of their successes were due to just taking over or fulfilling what had already been on the drawing board.

Q: Now, if you had a positive estimation of the communists and a negative one of Chiang Kai-shek, one, was that view shared by colleagues of yours in the Department of State? And, two, how did that view affect those that were calling the shots at the time, the Secretary of State, the White House?

LACEY: Actually, you are asking two questions.

Q: Right.

LACEY: The rank and file attitude and the top echelon attitude.

Q: Right.

LACEY: I think, then and now, the top echelon was more motivated by domestic political considerations than they were by U.S.-foreign developments. The China lobby was a very potent force. It still was for a long time. Pro-Taiwan was built into U.S. policy towards the two Chinas. I disagreed with it then, and I take issue even now with a black-white view of China.

My colleagues, on the other hand, the rank and file working officer, more familiar with the facts of the two Chinas, were inclined towards . . . Well, I would guess that seven out of ten of such people would have opted for Communist China at the time.

Q: Seven out of ten?

LACEY: That is a guess, a wild guess.

Q: Did you then see as their careers progressed that those who were correct in their evaluation of the strengths of the Chinese regime prosper, or did their careers suffer as a result of having a view that was divergent from American policy?

LACEY: Ralph Clough's name comes to mind. He is a long-standing China watcher, a real expert. Ralph I think would be inclined to view events in both China's in terms of their impact upon the U.S.A. Such is his stature as a scholar, that he has been able to not only write effectively about Taiwan, but Communist China as well.

Q: But not in the Foreign Service. He was dumped, right?

LACEY: No, I don't think he was.

Q: Was it he?

LACEY: He may have resigned, but I don't think he was dumped.

Q: I see. Okay.

LACEY: Because I think Ralph is held in high regard by the people that counted. Bill Gleysteen also comes to mind. Bill was a outspoken critic of Chiang Kai-shek, and yet he rose rapidly in the service, indeed became ambassador to Korea.

Q: Right.

LACEY: His career was not unduly affected.

Q: Okay, what then about the period leading up to the Korean War? You analysts in the Far East division, did you see that coming? Did you see the North Korean invasion as a real danger?

LACEY: I didn't. Now, Rhea Blue, who I mentioned earlier, Joe Yager, whom I mentioned, a number of my seniors were much more cognizant of what was going on in Asia at the time -- I was just a junior officer. They said as much to me, but I didn't really believe it.

Q: What about the Chinese entry into that war? Was that foreseen?

LACEY: Well, that was foreseen because that was why I was brought to the China branch in the first place. There was a hunch in the Department of State, and probably elsewhere in Washington, that sooner or later Mao's forces would move into Korea. Certainly at that time, they had already proclaimed a close friendship or support of the North Korean government. I think what prompted their moving in, however, was not so much preordained as it was prompted by the fact that MacArthur moved his United Nations forces beyond the Ya Lu River.

Q: Now you stayed in intelligence and research throughout this period of the Korean War.

LACEY: Yes. Let me mention one specific in my career. First of all, I had gone in as a civil servant not as a Foreign Service Officer. In 1954, John Foster Dulles made his speech on the steps of the old Department of State to the effect that, "Those of you who want to serve Uncle Sam must join the Foreign Service." This was a consequence of Wriston's plan.

Q: Wriston plan for unifying the Foreign Service.

LACEY: Yes. A group of us were Wristonized, that's the phrase we used. So I joined the Foreign Service. I remember spending a week of anguished discussion of this issue with my favorite wife. Being brought up in the small town of Ashland, by no means a small town girl, but she felt that the Foreign Service was a life that she didn't know and didn't particularly anticipate. I argued to the contrary because by that time, Henry, I had developed a very keen interest in a phrase that few people use but what I call "the arts of governance." It was fascinating to me to see the bureaucracy in action.

Now going back to my Ming dynasty doctoral thesis, the reason why I spoke at length on that was by the time I hit Washington, I knew the names and numbers of all the players. I knew what the considerations were. I had so studied the dynamics of Chinese government that they were one-for-one similar to the American system. In fact, you probably know, the American system is an indirect copy from the Chinese traditional bureaucracy. So I felt right at home and I think have been able to profit from my application of Ming dynasty politics to current history.

Q: So, John, you then made the decision, over your wife's reservations, to enter the Foreign Service, but you continued in intelligence research. And I see from your CV you were an analyst of Vietnam, of Indochina, in that period.

LACEY: That illustrates another continuing point of my gripes against the American public and Uncle Sam's operations in terms of the American's ignorance of foreign affairs. I was called in by my boss, my senior boss, in INR and told that I was now being assigned to Indochina. Why? Well, the battle of Dien Bien Phu, you remember had occurred -- well, I think it started in March and ended in May of '54. In any case, whenever it started, it became a turning point in history, the end of colonial rule and the beginning of America's involvement in Asia.

Uncle Sam suddenly realized that we knew nothing about Indochina. Now, why did we know so little? Because up to that point in time, Uncle Sam was quite content -- and I use Uncle Sam in the sense of Washington leadership -- to leave the administration and problems of Indochina to the French, just as we looked to older colonial powers to administer other Asian countries. Suddenly, we were left with a vacuum.

Of our several people in the Department of State, only Paul Kattenburg -- whose name may ring a bell with you -- had any claim at all of being knowledgeable about Indochina. Now, we did have a couple other people. Conrad Becker was an authority on Burma, Dick Stuart on Indonesia. But that was more of a personal pastime than it was a matter of State. Certainly, when I said to my boss, "I don't know anything about Indochina."

"Well, you know something about China, don't you?"

"Yes."

He said, "That's half the battle."

Well, you chuckle rightly because anyone halfway familiar with the world knows that it is not half the battle at all.

Anyway, I was assigned to the Indochina desk in 1954, about the summer thereof. I remained there until '56. Because of my NIS, National Intelligence Survey, experience I was put in charge of the NIS program for Indochina. That was illuminating, but primarily for me. I am not certain that the product represented anything spectacular.

In any case, I wanted to get abroad. Lo and behold, I had the opportunity in '56 of being assigned to Taipei, Taiwan, which was then the Republic of China. I went off gaily with some trepidation.

My wife, as I indicated, was completely unschooled in foreign affairs. I had two children. We proudly bought ourselves a new Plymouth automobile, our first new automobile to go with us. And we set off. I'll forego some of the personal vicissitudes that happened to me on the way. I had great health problems throughout my Foreign Service career, and that was one of the periods.

But we finally got to Taipei, rather to Chilung (Kee lung), on the good ship AMY LIKES. AMY LIKES was going south and typhoon Emma was coming north. AMY LIKES had just off-loaded cotton in Kobe, Japan, and was bouncing around in the water like a cork. It didn't bother my two children who practiced their ballet dances with regularity and ate the ship's heavy, greasy food with pleasure. Typhoon Emma certainly bothered my wife and me.

In any case, we arrived in the port of Chilung which closed by six o'clock every night because of martial law and the fear that the Chinese Communists might invade across the Straits. The captain of the AMY LIKES got us through the barrier, a long iron chain strung across the mouth of the harbor. He managed to get it lifted on the grounds that a very important envoy was aboard. Of course, I wasn't important at all. I was the second secretary of embassy.

Anyway, we got into Chilung in the pouring, typhoon rain. Looking down on the dock, I noticed only two persons whom I knew, John Stanley and his wife. There was a big hulking fellow whom I didn't know -- later was introduced to him as Phil Davenport, the outgoing chief of the economic section -- and a few others of the economic section. That was a Friday. All week long, we moused and catted each other, but Phil Davenport entertained us as a good Foreign Service officer would a new arrival at the post.

My orders read that I had been assigned to the political section, not the economic section. So when Monday came, I saw the DCM, Jim Pilcher his name was. Ever cheerful. Jim officially let it be known that I was earmarked for the acting chief of the economics section to replace outgoing Davenport. The reason was that Joe Yager, who was slated for that job and who eventually took it over, for personal reasons was then unable to attend. So for '56 and early '57, I was the acting chief of the economics section.

Henry, that was the most fortuitous development in my career. I have never been good at mathematics. I have never been good at figures. But I realized rather quickly that being chief of an economics section was not mastering data, it was -- well, I will use the phrase -- taking advantage of the position in terms of collecting information. Whereas the Embassy Taipei's political section was a prisoner of Chiang Kai-shek's foreign office, I was free and my colleagues were free to wander afield and to really see what was going on and to really report on developments affecting U.S. policies.

That was a fascinating experience including a friendship which I still enjoy with a Martin Wong, who was then in Taipei, the chief of the China-U.S. Organization, or Agency I guess it was. CUSA agency. China-U.S. Administration, that was the correct title. Martin Wong --

Q: What was that organization?

LACEY: That was a Chinese government-U.S. collaboration to administer economic --

Q: Like an aid program?

LACEY: Yes, economic not military.

Q: I see.

LACEY: It was the senior office in China concerned with the administration of U.S. economic aid.

Q: Oh, I see.

LACEY: Economic aid and military are so closely intertwined that Martin Wong wisely had invited to attend his weekly meeting a General Chiang Ching-Kuo, who represented the Chinese government military side of the aid program.

Q: Was he their intelligence or security man or what?

LACEY: No, not at that time. I think his main title may have been chief of the veterans program. That involved a very major source of U.S. assistance as well as the military side of it.

Anyway, that was my first exposure to Chiang Ching-Kuo. I saw him once a week from 1956 to '57. And I didn't like him one bit. I was prejudiced beforehand, I think, because of my prejudice against his father.

Q: Was he the son of Chiang Kai-shek?

LACEY: Yes.

Q: I see.

LACEY: But I saw him as a thick-necked Gauleiter, a strong-arm man, not one that I would particularly like to associate with. Fortunately, I got to know him well, at least on speaking terms. In 1953, I think it was, when I was back in the Department of State, Al Jenkins, one of our truly able Chinese language officers, was appointed to be Chiang Ching-Kuo's escort for three weeks when he came to Washington, the invitation being based upon the fact that someone in the Department of State or someone in Washington had foreseen the day when Chiang Ching-Kuo would succeed his father. And it was thought desirable to introduce him to things American.

I was then a very good friend of Al Jenkins. We browned-bagged on the banks of the Potomac. While I was low man on the totem pole and, therefore, not of sufficient rank to be included in the formal schedule of Chiang Ching-Kuo's visit, Al very kindly let me have twenty minutes personal interview with Chiang Ching-Kuo.

Q: This is before you were assigned there?

LACEY: Yes. This was in 1953. At that time, I already told you what my impressions of the Chiang family were, and nothing I saw then with my contacts with Chiang Ching-Kuo changed my mind about him as they did not later in '56 or '57 when I saw him weekly in Taipei. Only late in life, 1986 or '87 did I come to admire Chiang Ching-Kuo for his efforts to liberalize the ROC.

Q: What was his attitude towards you and other Americans?

LACEY: I honestly can't tell you. It was to his advantage to be friendly, brave, clean, and reverent.

Q: Right.

LACEY: But I always suspected that this was more a matter of tactics than it was of genuine feeling. Now I was later proven wrong, and I will come to that later.

In '56-'57, as I said, I was able to do things and to report to Washington information which the political section just could not begin to touch. I don't know with what consequence that was, but it was a lot of fun and enabled me to meet a lot of new people.

Q: Now, did you see the base being laid down for the kind of prosperity Taiwan has come to enjoy?

LACEY: Yes, I did. And the base was the very multimillion dollar, multibillion dollar aid program that the U.S. government had with Taiwan. Taiwan, at the time and I think for some while afterwards, was our major aid recipient in the world.

Q: And you think the aid money was spent effectively?

LACEY: I do, indeed. My answer was I am fairly confident that it was. Certainly it was on the civilian side. I am less informed about the military aid program. But on the civilian side, Martin Wong, whom I mentioned earlier, and his very able group of colleagues, including people who are still active in aid administration or economic administration, were quite punctilious about making certain that the U.S. economic aid dollar went to a long-range cause. The long-range cause was, of course, then and still now, return of Taiwan to mainland China. Rather, the return of mainland China to Taiwan, because that was their ideal, to establish ROC sovereignty over all of China.

Unbeknownst to many people -- and I think maybe this is the first time it has been revealed, at least to my knowledge, in a semi-public forum -- is that in 1968-'69, or '67-'68, the U.S. aid program had come to an end. And thanks to U.S. aid, Taiwan was off to the startling development progress that it has been making ever since. But unbeknownst to many, it was understood, certainly by those in the know, that our job was to "wean away" Taiwan or the Republic of China from U.S. aid programs.

To that end, I was instrumental in being appointed the senior officer in charge of U.S. technical relations with the ROC. My mandate was to, first of all, find somebody in the technological community who would be willing to go to Taipei in a special capacity as scientific advisor. Not in the conventional sense of science Attaché to the ambassador, but science advisor to the whole of the Republic in terms of his ability to acquire contacts with various centers of technological expertise in America.

As it turned out that fellow was Bruce Billings. Bruce was basically my selection, although in the end, it was the appointment of the Johnson Administration, by Johnson's science advisor, Dr. Donald Hornig, co-opted from Eastman Kodak. What happened was that I had been cashiered from the Department's Bureau of East Asian-Pacific Affairs (EA/P).

Q: This is in 19 --

LACEY: '68. I had taken open exception with our policy towards Asia. The then Assistant Secretary of East Asian-Pacific Affairs, Bill Bundy, was a hard-liner. His brother, McGeorge Bundy, was then National Security Advisor in the White House. The two of them had enormous clout. Vietnam, or rather our growing involvement in Vietnam, had made Vietnam one of the major focuses of U.S. policy concern. Under that concern, many young officers were hired right out of college to go off to Vietnam in various special capacities.

In the meantime, however, back in the Department, I was the fall back position for this U.S.-Republic of China technological mission headed in the field by Bruce Billings. He was a China language man by avocation not by training. He just learned it because it was something to do. He retired as vice-president of Polaroid Camera. So he was well-acquainted with the technological people around the country. It turned out that he was a magnificent selection. Rather zesty, somewhat brittle in terms of temperament. Rather arrogant, probably with good reason, but nevertheless arrogant.

And Bruce Billings was responsible as was any single person for helping propel the Chinese economy into its leadership role that it enjoys today. He introduced something as simple as computers, which back in those days, was still an unknown, an uncharted field.

In any case, that was a signal success and another reason why Taiwan today enjoys the success that it does.

Q: That's very good. That is something you can well be proud of.

Unless you want to make any more remarks about your service in Taiwan, I see on your record you served in the State Department in the East Asian division and then intelligence research again. Then you went out as economic officer in Hong Kong. Anything on that tour that struck you?

LACEY: Well, before we go off to Hong Kong, I would like to speak about my return to the Department of State.

LACEY: I returned because of my second serious illness. I've had now three major illnesses. In this case, I had an operation on my jaw, and I had to talk for six months like this with jaws wired together. That meant I had to eat liquid foods, thanks to my good wife who prepared them. She, by the way, claims my jaws were wired only three months.

In any case, I was back in the Department and after a brief sojourn, sort of a convalescent leave, I was picked up by the intelligence research bureau as chief of the Far Eastern branch or Far Eastern office of intelligence research.

That was particularly important for this reason. I learned, for the first time, the agony of suffering the ignorance of senior officers regarding the importance of intelligence information on Asia. To make a long, grim story short, Hugh Cumming, who was then the head of the Bureau of Intelligence Research, and Loy Henderson, who was a buddy of Hugh's, connived to nullify what had been up to that point, a magnificent program called the National Intelligence Survey.

We had, over the years, built up a staff in the Far Eastern office of seventy-eight people, trained clerks as well as astute officers. I had the miserable job of overseeing reducing that staff within two months by one-third. The only case of -- what is it you get when you get stomach trouble? Ulcers.

Q: Ulcers.

LACEY: The only case of ulcers I ever had occurred during that period. I resisted it strongly. But had no choice as a senior officer in charge to either resign in protest or to carry out orders which I chose to do. But thinking back upon that episode, as I have so many times, it seems to me that what was happening was again a case of American domestic political interests taking precedent over longer-term world-wide interests including, importantly, Asia. I have often regretted the breakup of the NIS staff because that was really the end.

The redeeming part about that was, the CIA in the meantime, had been developing into a mature, professional organization. I worked very closely with senior CIA officers concerned with Asia. They were all very good, very knowledgeable, very savvy, and very gutsy. But the Department of State's role, its intelligence role, was an important counterpoint to that CIA point of view. With the castration of Department of State's intelligence program, which was then aided and abetted by Roger Hilsman, our total grasp of Asian developments was seriously crippled.

Q: What was the motivation for that? Was it an economy, budget move?

LACEY: No, I don't think anybody worried about the economy and the budget then as they do today. I think the motivation was more a case of personal aggrandizement, of game playing, of trying to win points, to influence the powers that be, in terms of one's ability to do things the way that seemed appropriate at the time. It was the kind of politics that you have run into also, I think.

Q: Right.

LACEY: So I won't go on further with that.

Q: Okay, well, then you left Washington. You were destined for Hong Kong as chief economic officer.

LACEY: I might say now that the two best bosses I have ever served under in the Foreign Service were, both in Hong Kong. The first was Julius Holmes, whose name is very familiar to you as the great man -- now deceased -- that he was. And Marshall Green.

But, at the time, it was Julius Holmes who was the Consul General. I was chief of the economics section. Sam Gilstrap was deputy principal officer. Fortunately for me family affairs called Sam home. I don't know what happened, but I was informed by Sam Gilstrap that Mr. Holmes wanted me to be his DPO. I was very excited about the prospect. I called the Consul General's secretary, Emma Johnson, and said with excitement, "How soon can I see Mr. Holmes to find out what I am going to do?"

And she said, "Right away."

So I was ushered into the Consul General's office and Julius -- did you ever work with him?

Q: No, I knew his son, Alan.

LACEY: Well, Julius was a small man really who affected height by wearing higher heels than normal. He affected Pince-nez glasses and was every word the English gentleman that he purported to be. He had been Minister Counselor of Embassy in London for six years. So he knew the ropes backwards and forwards.

I dashed in and found him in his office reading a magazine. After exchange of amenities, I said, "Mr. Holmes, how can I serve you?"

He said, "Very simple. I have four rules. One, I am the boss. Two, I am lazy, and I expect you to do all the work. Three, if anything good goes on around here, I want the credit for it. Fourthly, if anything goes awry, I sure as hell want to know why."

Henry, that was the best instruction I ever received from any senior officer because that gave me carte blanche to run the show. I kept Julius' trust. I kept him informed of everything that was important. I drafted some of his personal telegrams, which he always changed because he had a great command of words. I could tell many stories about Julius which I won't take time to relate. Let me tell one though because I think it is indicative of the man and the quality of Foreign Service Officer who best serves Uncle Sam.

Julius and his wife, Henrieta, were expecting their two children for Christmas that winter of 1960. I knew how much they were looking forward to it. I knew also the great disappointment they suffered and felt when they learned that neither child, boy and a girl, were able to join them. So I said to Mr. Holmes, "Well, if you want to celebrate Christmas at the Lacey household, you are certainly invited. But I must warn you, you must be there at least eight o'clock because my two daughters will be impatient to open the presents."

So exactly at eight, up drove the ConGen's car. I opened the side that Henrieta Holmes was on, and my wife opened the other side. Both of them immaculately dressed. He dressed in morning coat, morning trousers, English cravat, and top hat. He bowed to us each formally by way of greeting but said nothing. Walked into our attractive little house on Shousan Hill Road, where my two daughters were eagerly awaiting him. He stepped before my two daughters, took off his top hat and made deep bows to each. He then put it back on his head tapping the top. And then he turned to Lorene and me and said by way of explanation, "We always wear top hats in Kansas on Christmas." He was a great guy. [Laughter]

My job as deputy principal officer was one of the best jobs I ever had. We had a large Consulate General. I think it numbered 145 officers and secretaries. Now of those 145, only a handful were Department of State. The rest were other agencies, and you could imagine which agencies predominated. And, yet, under Julius Holmes' leadership, we had a very effective group of China watchers. That was our main mission.

Much of our reporting was regarded as gospel in Washington, at least by some people, as the final word on the China scene. I remember a contretemps that we had with the Department of Agriculture, or maybe the Department of Commerce, over China's food grain production. We had aboard a fine officer by the name of Brice Meeker who guesstimated -- not just guesstimated but estimated -- that China's production in 1960-'61 was on the order of 130,000 metric tons of grain. CIA experts disagreed radically. They felt the figure was much too low. But, as it turned out, we were right; they were wrong. That was the quality of our reporting on China, generally.

After Julius Holmes left, we were blessed with the leadership of Marshall Green, whom you know well. You know him to be the ebullient, pun-cracking, wise-cracking serious officer that he is. Of all the people that I have ever served under, Marshall was the only one who studiously reflected on the past. He kept copious notes on his most recent tour which was DCM in South Korea Embassy Seoul. He would go over those notes time and time again, rework them, read them, and discuss them with me. I would offer questions, not criticism, but things that occurred to me. We made a fine team.

Another one of Marshall's traits was his ability to handle visiting congressmen. We had untold numbers of VIPs, mostly congressmen, but also generals and admirals and ICA directors by the dozens. I remember keeping track of the one month that I was chargé over the Christmas season. My wife and I entertained 142 official parties, not including their wives and friends.

Q: Were most of them there on serious business?

LACEY: I'm glad you asked.

Q: Or were they Christmas shopping?

LACEY: Well, thanks to Marshall Green, primarily, we made it a point of assuming that they were there seriously concerned about China. But first I have to go back to Julius Holmes, who started the practice. But under Marshall, whose refinements were enormous, we automatically assumed that every single congressional mission, called CODEL, you remember, was there to really learn about China and the U.S. mission in the Far East rather than to shop. Of course, we knew better.

Q: In your heart of hearts.

LACEY: But nevertheless, we insisted upon briefing every single group that came to Hong Kong. We had worked out a one-half hour topnotch briefing mission in which we gave the political, economic, sociological, and strategic information available and our interpretation thereof in terms of the U.S. interests in China. And what's more, those CODELs, for the most part, if they weren't asleep welcoming this insight.

Q: How good was the work of the Hong Kong Consulate General as a listening post? Your frank assessment --

LACEY: Well, at that time --

Q: When you looked at the developing Sino-Soviet rift or internal turmoil in China, how reliable was the information? Did it come out through people traveling out of China or what was it? The radio or press? What was it?

LACEY: It was surprising how much direct information came out of all places, from all over China. There was, for example, in 1962 an extreme drought, a critical water shortage in the South China provinces. It reached the point where the government had to erect cordons of barbed wire, or whatever it is called, around the border of Hong Kong proper to try to hold back the refugees who nevertheless managed to break through regardless because the situation was desperate. Those refugees were interrogated both directly and indirectly by officers in the ConGen and by other contacts we had, including the British by the way.

I can't say enough for the British administration at that time who shared even more vested interest in what was going on in South China than did Uncle Sam because the British colony of Hong Kong was dependent upon water, dependent upon food, both of which came from Mainland China. There was a constant commerce between the two. There are many practical issues that concerned the British administration in the colony of Hong Kong.

They, in turn, shared with us much of their information that they got surreptitiously. Not openly, but they shared it with us. So I would say in terms of our availability to information, the Hong Kong ConGen was probably the center of information as far as American interests were concerned.

Speaking of the American public, we had in Hong Kong excellent working relations with the Fourth Estate. Stanley Karnow was one who was outstandingly good, Bob Elegant another Stan Rich a third, Fessler a fourth. A small group of us had lunch in the old Foreign Service Officers' Club, which was a former house of a taipan, rich Chinese gentleman. "Love is a Many Splendored Thing" was filmed there. Once a week, a group of us lunched including people interested in China and including, especially, foreign correspondents. The relationship that we officials had with these foreign correspondents was invaluable. Unlike today, one could say, "This is off the record," and give them the background without fear of being trapped in any kind of news leak. They could be trusted. It was another source of information because it worked both ways. They would also repeat stuff to us based upon their many contacts. So to repeat, we had good information.

Now as for interpreting that information, I think we made two grave mistakes. First of all, I for one at least, was inclined because of my earlier NIS exposure in Washington to give the Chicoms too much credit for having more power than in fact proved to be the case. When Khrushchev broke off directly with Mao Zedong, I didn't appreciate the significance of that development both in terms of the effect upon China and also the effect of a threatened Sino-Soviet bloc stance against the United States. I think we should have learned earlier than we did -- or at least it should have been built into our briefing earlier than it was -- the notion that now the Sino-Soviet bloc is broken up, China became a wholly different kettle of fish or kettle of dragons.

Q: It was at this period also when we began to take the first steps towards our heavy involvement in Vietnam, was it not?

LACEY: Yes. The Vietnam build-up, under primarily President Kennedy, was something for which I have ever since felt personally embarrassed and personally ashamed. Just this noon when we lunched with the two presidents of Ashland College, former President Glenn Clayton raised the question of the importance of Taoism in China. I pontificated by saying, "Yes, the Te of the Tao Te Ching means virtue. But it also is translatable in terms of power, power not in the military, iron-fist sense, but power in the moral sense of acceptability on the part of the public."

I think going back to the Vietnam War, I was thinking like a Taoist when I argued as I did, and also some of my colleagues did that the only thing that the Chicoms understand is power. We must stand up to them. Well, I fail to translate power in U.S. Pentagon terms because in their terms, power was guns.

Q: In American terms.

LACEY: Yes, in American terms. Kennedy was, I think, responsible for transforming what had been a Military Aid Advisory Group (MAAG) in Vietnam into a combat force.

Q: Why did he do that? Why did we feel it necessary to declare the area of Indochina a strategic zone of high importance to the United States and to invest so much treasure and lives in what turned out to be a futile effort to block the communist-led independence movement?

LACEY: Henry, I come back to a simplistic answer. I think, then as now and hopefully less so in the future, I think the American people generally and certainly too many of our officials are ignorant of what is really going on in Asia. Therefore, our politicians are able to exploit that indifference or ignorance in terms of responding to domestic pressures rather than to developments in Asia. I think the domestic pressure was caught up in a sort of frenetic, emotional thought that we are going to stand firm for democracy. We are going to stand firm against authoritarianism.

Q: Now, your contacts in Hong Kong in the business community there, bankers and government officials, were they supportive of these gradual slow moves in the beginning for the U.S. to replace the French in their involvement with the Vietnamese?

LACEY: I think the word, "supportive," is too strong. I think the business community of Hong Kong -- which meant both the Americans and the local people, who were mostly Chinese but also Parsi and Jews -- saw this as a moneymaker. They were able to enjoy the prosperity that spun off from our involvement in Vietnam.

As our involvement in Vietnam grew to the hundreds of thousands, the recreational programs that the Army or the Pentagon sponsored for morale purposes involved many R&R trips throughout Asia including Hong Kong. Somewhere I read that only 2 percent of troops sent to Vietnam actually saw combat. The 98 percent "bolstered morale."

Q: So Hong Kong stood to benefit the same way the Japanese benefited from the Korean War. That is, acquiring capital to help them develop and expand their economy.

LACEY: Yes, I would say that.

Q: You went from Hong Kong to serve as consul general. You were your own boss there in Singapore, is that right?

LACEY: Yes. But I have more to say about Hong Kong.

Marshall Green did me the great honor of remarking that I underplayed my role as a bridge between mainland China and the Colony of Hong Kong. In one respect he was right. One could say that in January, 1960 when I arrived, Hong Kong was a remote outpost of empire, important principally because of the impact of the Colony's textile producers on British industry. The ConGen's principal function up to my arrival was China watching.

But as the newly arrived Chief of the Economic Section I inherited a situation in which the Hong Kong Government authorities were being propelled into radically new situations. The momentum of Mao's revolution showed signs of waning. Instead of fleeing from Hong Kong as did many American firms. Big enterprises like Chase Manhattan were seeking to return and I facilitated those endeavors. Whereas the American business community in Hong Kong numbered at most 200 firms when I arrived that number close to or possibly exceeded 1000 in mid 1964 when I left for Singapore.

And the Hong Kong Government itself was being drawn into the international textile market. Hong Kong's textile industries were dominated by Chinese entrepreneurs who with their looms fled Shannhai from advancing Chicom armies. They joined forces with Hong Kong based manufacturers, making some 45 major textile firms. Textiles represented about 50% of the Colony's exports. As Economic Section Chief I stepped into a heated textile battle between Hong Kong and the USA. Shortly after I arrived -- it may have been my very first day on duty -- the feisty editor of the Hong Kong Standard, K.T. Wu, printed a heated front page editorial that screamed, "Who Stole Hong Kong's Shirt?"

Hong Kong's ire was directed increasingly at the U.S. government as Uncle Sam turned its fangs away from Japan, which was moving into heavier industry, toward Hong Kong. Fortunately for me, the Lacey's had become close friends of the Hong Kong Financial Secretary, John (later Sir John) Cowperthwaite and his attractive wife Sheila, as outspoken as she was beautiful. John had intimated, despite his fierce belief in laissez faire, that quotas perhaps were not too evil. At least they enabled Hong Kong manufacturers to set garment categories among themselves rather than being subject to New York dealers playing one off against another.

That argument became my battle cry as I wine and dined the leaders of Hong Kong's textile community. I also briefed Under Secretary of State George Ball when he came to Hong Kong (July, 1961?). I arranged a high tea at the Peninsula Hotel in his honor, invited textile leaders and suggested to Ball that frankness was the best course in questions and answers. That occasion helped reduce the ire. (An account of this tea party and Ball's role as the Department's chief textile negotiator is recorded in his memoirs, pp 188-193, "The Past Has Another Pattern.")

One evening as the textile tensions between the U.S. and Hong Kong were reaching a climax over quotas, I strolled in walking shorts down Shouson Hill road to the Cowperthwaites who lived below us. That day the ConGen had received an urgent telegram directing us to expedite negotiations. That was on my mind as I called upon Cowperthwaite. One brandy led to another as our textile discussions became more vague. I left at 3:00 a.m. but before stumbling into bed I drafted my recollections of Cowperthwaite's points. Next morning I reworked my notes and made an appointment to see the Financial Secretary at 10:30 a.m. Said John, to whom I had shown my draft cable to D.C., "Did I say all that?" When I nodded my head in agreement, John made a few grammatical changes but did not change the heart of the cable which was sent to Washington after clearing the content with the ConGen.

I should explain here that one of the several tricks I learned from Julius Holmes was what he called "the art of connivance." The essential purpose of connivance was to establish trust with the host government by first showing contemplated reports to Washington to your counterpart, primarily to insure that your reporting was accurate but also to establish good working relations with the host government.

This particular report was received in Washington as a generally accurate statement of the Colony's position which the Hong Kong government accepted. And that is how the U.S. government signed the first "Long Term Cotton Textile Agreement on the Export of Hong Kong's Products to the U.S.A.

I have much more to say about my Hong Kong tour, but let's move on to Singapore.

Ambassador Edwin Webb Martin was born in India of American parents in 1917. He received his bachelor's degree from Oberlin College in 1939 and his master's degree from the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy in 1940. He joined the Foreign Service in 1941. His overseas posts include Leopoldville, Peiping, Hankow, Taipei, Rangoon, London, Ankara, and Hong Kong. He was the ambassador to Burma from 1971 to 1973. Ambassador Martin was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on June 4, 1987 and by William Johnson and Harold Hinton on December 9, 1987.

MARTIN: I guess I didn't answer the question about Asia. You want to know how I happened to get into the China business. Well, that was one of these almost accidental things. After I got out of the Army -- and I was let out early because all Foreign Service officers who were drafted were let out early, so we could resume our careers of service -- I went to the State Department. They asked me where I wanted to go, and I didn't express any particular preference. They said, "How about Shanghai? We need people there?" I thought Shanghai was interesting. So they sent me up to the Office of Chinese Affairs, and there I met a fairly young vice consul named Fulton Freeman, who was a Chinese language officer and a brilliant linguist. He had been given the job of recruiting Chinese language officers, and he soon persuaded me it would be more fun to be in China if I knew the language. So I was one of the first three post-war China language officers, and they sent me to Yale.

Q: At that time, mainland China was under Chiang Kai-shek.

MARTIN: Had been for a long time, yes. That's right. During my tour in China as a language officer, and then subsequently as a vice consul in Hankow, the civil war was raging. While I was in Hankow, not only Manchuria, but most of North China fell to the Communists. This was an interesting period in China.

MARTIN: I was first of all in Peking for about a year and nine or ten months doing Chinese language study. I'd started at Yale. My first post, really, in China as a reporting officer, was in Hankow, now part of Wuhan. Hankow is on the Yangtze River, about 600 miles up the river. There I had sort of a grass-roots view of what was going on in China.

The consular district, which I covered as the Chinese language officer and reporting officer, consisted of five provinces in Central China. They had a population of about 100 million people. To put things in perspective, how many countries in the world in 1948-49 had a population of 100 million? But this was just part of China. I was the only political reporting officer covering that territory.

I might say that in China, as you gentlemen know, at that time, and it had been so for decades, political reporting from the consulates was more important than in most countries, because it was a country where power had been in the hands of warlords and of regional political factions. Even as late as 1948, when I went to Hankow, there was a faction, you might say, in control of Central China -- not in control of it, but it was very important there, namely the Guangxi clique, sometimes called the Li-Pai clique, lead by Li Tsung-jen and Pai Ch'ung-hsi. It was around early '48, as I recall, that Pai Ch'ung-hsi was installed in Wuhan as the commander of the Central China area. Pai Ch'ung-hsi and Li Tsung-jen, of course, were not the best of friends with Chiang Kai-shek, and we had the feeling that Chiang was often reluctant to call on Pai for support. For example, I think in the Huai-Hai campaign in the winter of '48-'49, Pai Ch'ung-hsi either refused to come to the aid of Chiang or Chiang didn't call on him. There were a lot of troops there that could have perhaps (probably wouldn't have) made a difference, but in any case there was a significant lack of cooperation.

As far as what I could bring to shed light on what was going on, I think perhaps what I call the grass-root reporting that I did was a useful input to the embassy in Nanking and also to the State Department. We could send our reports directly to the State Department with copies to the embassy, and I was rather flattered when I got back to the State Department on a home leave in '49, that Walt Butterworth, who was then in charge of the Far Eastern Department, asked to see me. I came in and we talked about what had been going on in that part of the world. Nowadays, the State Department is such a large bureaucracy that a vice consul coming in from the field would be lucky to see the office director, to say nothing of the Assistant Secretary. [Laughter] Those are the ways things have changed.

I was just going to ask you if you'd like me to describe the kind of field trip that I did and the people that I saw to get information. I don't think I'd have anything substantive to contribute that would enlighten you particularly as to what you already know, but I think it might give you an idea of how we political reporters went about doing our job.

Of the last couple of trips I took out of Hankow, one was to Sian. This was in the fall of '48, and Sian was the headquarters of General Hu Tsung-man, who was a veteran military commander of the national government, and I called on him, had dinner with him. I called also on the governor of Shanxi and on the mayor of Sian, who was a man named Wang, a rather interesting person who had studied for eight years in the Soviet Union, had once been a member of the Communist Party but was a renegade now, a very strongly ideological anti-communist. I went up to him primarily, at least on the consular side, to try to help some American missionaries there whose property had been occupied by one of the government offices. I went up there to try to help them solve this problem, get their property back, so they could return it to the use they had acquired it for. I called on all the newspaper editors, and on the president of the university and several department heads. I talked to people like the head of the agriculture department of the province of Shanxi and of the commerce and industry department. I talked to, of course, the missionaries and the few other Americans. There were some oil people up there.

In other words, I tried to get an idea of what the situation was from a broad spectrum of people ranging from General Hu Tsung-man at the very top, down to private individuals in universities, in business, in the newspapers, the media, and in this way gather a general picture of how people viewed the situation and particularly how they felt about the government and its activities and how they felt about the prospective arrival of the Communists. And by that time, most of the people that I interviewed were convinced that it was just a matter of time before the Communists would take over, and there was speculation about how they would behave, and whether or not one could carry on. There was no real consensus on that.

The last field trip I took out of Hankow was down in the other direction, down south through Jiangsu province and Hunan province. There I was accompanied a good deal of the time by a Standard Vacuum Oil person, because on the consular side I was trying to help with getting this American company's properties released from the occupation, usually, of Army troops. So, even as the Communists were coming down from the north -- this was the spring of '49, this was March of '49 -- we were still in the business of trying to get our properties back and help American business. But at the same time, this was also a great opportunity to try to take the pulse of people, look at the economic prospects, political and so forth.

Again, I saw a fairly broad range of people. But the thing that I remembered about that trip was that in Hunan, the governor, Ch'eng Ch'ien, unlike other governors that I called on and mayors, refused to see me at all. It wasn't outright refusal, just a put-off -- "He's too busy," and so forth and so on. Well, we had a feeling that I'd gotten from talking to other people that Ch'eng Ch'ien was deliberately distancing himself from this American official (me) and that he would not be one on whom either Li Tsung-jen or Chiang Kai-shek could depend. As it turned out -- I think it was in the summer of '49 -- that Ch'eng Ch'ien just turned over the whole province of Hunan to the Communists. This made the position of Li Tsung-jen and Pai Ch'ung-hsi, who had retreated down to Guangxi and Kwanglung, untenable, and led to perhaps their earlier defeat than might otherwise have occurred. Ch'eng Ch'ien was duly rewarded, as were other people who turned over, like Fu Tso-Yi and Cheng Chihchung, with various sinecure positions in the PRC. Ch'eng Ch'ien seemed to have lasted longer in these positions than some others.

So I can't say that what we did was all that important, but in this case, I think we did get an advanced signal, for whatever it was worth, at least to our embassy, that here's a governor that is very soft and already showing the direction which he'll probably go.

Q: Did you witness the Communist troops entering Hankow?

MARTIN: No, I didn't. Of course, our consulates stayed on there in Wuhan, but I happened to be overdue for home leave for almost a year. I had been separated from my wife and two girls for six months, and during that period my wife gave birth to twin boys in Manila. We were only able to communicate by cable. So I was mercifully granted home leave and transferred to Taiwan in May of 1949. So I got out of Hankow just a few days -- literally a few days -- before the Communists took the city. The situation was, as it was in many places in China at that time, one where it was anticipated that the Communists would take the city. The Nationalists had produced a lot of prefabricated pillboxes, which they put along the railroad line going north, and these were obviously sitting ducks for the mobile tactics of the Communists. In fact, the Communist guerrillas were operating south of Wuhan between Wuchang and Changsha, and I was going to drive a jeep down to Changsha, hoping I could get through. The very morning I had the jeep ready to go, the very morning that I was going to get out, I got word that there was a CAT plane over on the airfield at Wuchang, and if I went there I might be able to get a ride. I might add that all regular airline service had stopped into Wuhan by that time, and, of course, our own military assistance group which had been stationed in Wuhan had long since been evacuated. Anyway, I went over to the airport, and there was an American pilot. I said, "Can I hitch a ride out to the coast?"

He said, "Where are you going?"

I said, "I'll go to any place that will take me to the coast." [Laughter] "I've got orders to go down and fetch my family in the Philippines and go home on leave." So he gave me a ride. He was going to Canton, which was actually the most convenient place for me to go. That's how I got out. But I was not there when the Communists came in.

Q: If I can just go back over some of this fascinating material with sort of a different angle, while you were still at a junior position by this time. You were there in Peking and Hankow at a rather decisive period.

MARTIN: Yes, yes.

Q: From '46 to '49, was the period, after all, when there was apparently some hope of settlement (inaudible end of sentence).

MARTIN: Yes.

Q: And a decisive turnaround, however you date it, at least by early 1948 or mid-1948. I'm just wondering, even while you were a language student there, do you recall what your own personal assessment of the situation was concerning the conflict between the KMT and CCP, how that might likely turn out, sort of what the mood was among you junior officers?

MARTIN: Yes, yes. I think that the mood was one of general pessimism, as far as the government was concerned. I think you're right, at the very beginning -- well, when I got there in September of 1946, the Marshall mission, the Executive Headquarters was still in existence, but General Marshall wasn't very active at that time, and yes, we hadn't given up hope that there might be some way of solving this thing peacefully, entirely. [Laughter] In other words, Marshall went home in January of '47, and he sort of said that his mission was really hopeless and he blamed both sides for their intractability.

As I say, I wasn't active in political reporting or making contacts or anything like that, but there were so-called Third Force people there. Around the universities and so forth they tended to be fairly optimistic about the possibility of doing business (with the Communists) or setting up some sort of a coalition government.

Q: Did you have the impression that the group that you worked with or the official staff there in Peking placed much confidence with the sort of Third Force group?

MARTIN: Well, looking in hindsight, of course, it's very difficult, after 40 years, to put yourself back in that period. But I would say that yes, we had more faith in them -- that's a strong word, "faith." We had more hope about the possibility of some sort of a coalition with these chaps in it than was justified, I think, by subsequent events. But anyway, I think so, yes.

Q: Was there any particular Chinese you remember? Did you associate with that group? This is a long time to remember.

MARTIN: Yes. No, as I say, I really can't remember names now. I'm sorry. I'll tell you about my own experience. I did a thing which none of my language officer colleagues did that gave me a rather interesting entree into the university, Peita. I attended, audited, a course taught in Chinese, and, I'm ashamed to say, I can't even remember the name of the professor, though I thought he was very good; he was a Chinese professor, of course. It was a course in diplomatic history, really -- Chinese relations with foreign governments. It was an eye-opener to me, because it was obviously from the Chinese point of view, and none of the stuff I had read before was from the Chinese point of view. I found it very interesting.

But perhaps the main value of this to me was that as a student who sat there at a desk with other students, all of whom were Chinese, and I was a little older than most of them but not that much older, I had a chance to become acquainted with a number of Chinese students. I visited them in their dormitories and had some over to the house. My wife was born and brought up in China, and her Chinese accent is beautiful, so that was a great help in talking to people. Certainly the strong impression I had of the Chinese students was that as far as the Kuomintang was concerned, it was just beyond the pale; there was no hope for it really. This was due, in part, to the fact that the economic situation was very bad, and they had very poor prospects for getting jobs and so forth. On the other hand, a number of the students actually left the university and went over the hill to the Communists, where they got some sort of a job. I used to have arguments with these people. Of course, they were very critical of American policy, which was seen as supportive of the Kuomintang, and I think we did give about $3 billion in aid to the Nationalists after the war. We used to have arguments about that and whether American democracy and the capitalist system was applicable to China and so forth. They generally felt that it wasn't, that socialism was the only way for China to go. As far as I could tell, the students that I knew and talked to on a very friendly basis were not doctrinaire Marxists; in fact, I think they were fairly illiterate, as far as Marxist literature was concerned, but they looked at it from a point of view of nationalism. To them, the Communists represented Chinese nationalism more than the Nationalists. They also represented what they felt was a hope for the future, but the idea that China would be independent, stand up and be a power in the world was the main attraction, and they felt the Communists offered that more than the Nationalists did at that particular time.

Q: Did you ever discuss with them the possible relationships between a Communist China and the Soviet Union?

MARTIN: Yes, yes. I think that it came up in the discussions about which was the better way to go for China. Naturally, I tried to put forth the merits of the American system, which they generally would not argue about, except in this sense, that they would say, "Well, it's all right for America, but it really doesn't apply to China and our situation." I wouldn't say that any of them were strongly pro-Soviet, neither were they strongly anti-Soviet. Their view was, it seemed to me, very Nationalistic and also, in terms of their own future, they felt that the Communists offered them, as young people, a future, whereas the Kuomintang offered them no jobs, depression, and an appearance of weakness, corruption, and really sort of doing the bidding of the United States. I think it's important to realize this, because I think there was a period, as we all know, when China and the Soviet Union were very close, but eventually the sense of Chinese nationalism came out. It's much more complicated than that.

Q: You mentioned Li Tsung-jen and Pai Ch'ung-hsi and the Guangxi clique. I believe by January, Chiang had resigned, January of '49.

MARTIN: That's right.

Q: And Li becomes the president of the republic and is trying to save the situation one way or the other. Certainly much of the literature suggests that there were persons in the American diplomatic establishment who had probably more confidence in the military abilities of Li and Pai Ch'ung-hsi than they did in Chiang. Were there any efforts while you were in Hankow, or did you make any recommendations to the effect that the United States should try to really support in any operational sense or aid? Did we, in other words, identify in any practical way with Li Tsung-Jen, once he had become responsible for the situation in China? Or did we ignore him, in effect? Were you satisfied or dissatisfied with what we were doing in that regard?

MARTIN: I guess I'd better just be frank with you and say that as a vice consul concerned with this 100 million population and consular duties and what was going on there, that I really don't think we got into that at all. I would try to report the best I could on what the local situation looked like, and I would occasionally get a chance to get some perhaps stories or rumors or reports of what Li Tsung-Jen was thinking or doing. But by that time, things were getting pretty fragmented. The Communists had been on the north bank of the Yangtze, up at Nanking since -- what? -- for some time. In April they actually crossed the river. In March I was away about two or three weeks on this field trip, and I was concerned with the local situation. So I can't say that we got into this.

I might also say that the consul general in Hankow was a very fine old-line consular officer, Leo Callanan. But as far as any feel for the politics of the situation in Central China, he really didn't have it. That wasn't his bailiwick. So we really didn't get into that sort of thing.

Q: If I could ask one last question. As a political officer, a reporting officer in Hankow, did you get requests or instructions to seek out particular kinds of information?

MARTIN: No, I can't remember.

Q: From the State Department at all? Was there any indication that they were interested in finding out certain things?

MARTIN: No, I don't remember getting anything, especially on the political side. We had our required reports we had to send in on economic business, and I was covering economic stuff as well.

Q: So that was on your own initiative, what you did or did not report?

MARTIN: That's right. It was really on our own initiative. Yes. I don't recall. Undoubtedly there were some specific things that happened that the embassy might send us a query on or something like that, but as far as the -- of course, Li Tsung-jen, by the spring of '49, was, as you know, the acting president. He was in Nanking. I don't recall anything significant, really.

Q: Since we're concentrating on your time in Burma, you went to Burma as a second secretary in 1950 to '51. What brought about this assignment?

MARTIN: Well, I think that's important, too, because it gives you a flavor of the times. I was in Hankow, as I said, when most of North China fell to the Communists, and because of the threat of a civil war to the safety of Americans, many Americans were evacuated in the latter part of '48, and among those were the dependents or the families of Foreign Service officers in certain posts. I was in Hankow, which is about 600 miles up the Yangtze River and rather exposed, and my wife and our two little girls were evacuated from China, along with families from Nanking, the embassy in Nanking, and Shanghai, by the U.S. Marines. They were flown to Manila, and there they were -- I forget how many, there were certainly 100 or more, including women and children -- and they were put up there in an abandoned U.S. Army camp, under rather trying conditions. So that I was separated from my wife and children, and during our separation, she gave birth to twins there in Manila.

Q: Good heavens! That brought the number to four.

MARTIN: That brought the number to four, doubled our children, and I was in Hankow all this time. Our communications were virtually cut off, so that we had to communicate by cable.

Well, all this by way of background to say that when I finally got a transfer, after being overdue for leave for nearly a year, I was transferred to Taiwan after home leave. I managed to get out of China, and I won't take time to tell that story. Got down to the Philippines, and we had a nice boat trip back to the States, for home leave, consultation, and so forth, and on to Taiwan, where I arrived in September of 1949.

Well, by January of 1950, the mainland, having fallen to the Communists, and they were threatening Taiwan, the State Department decided to reduce the staff in Taiwan, in anticipation of a Communist invasion. Since I had been separated from my family already for some period of time, and the twins were then -- they were born in the Philippines -- were less than a year old, they decided that rather than evacuate my wife and family again, leaving us separated, that they would transfer me to Rangoon. I had only been in Taiwan for four or five months.

Now, another aspect of that transfer was that we still had consular and diplomatic officials in China, but in the latter part of January, the Department had made a decision, for reasons which I don't have time to go into now, to pull out of China. So we were facing a prospect of not having the usual flow of information from China, so the department decided to put Chinese language officers, that is, Foreign Service officers who had been trained in the Chinese language, and most of us had served already some time in China, put them on the periphery of China. I was assigned to Burma in that capacity. I was a political officer, of course, but my particular expertise was China and Chinese. My particular job in Rangoon at that time was to become acquainted with the Chinese community, which was very large in Burma, as it is in most Southeast Asian countries, to try to watch what was happening on the China-Burma border, which was the longest border of any Southeast Asian country.

Q: When you were in Taiwan, you must have witnessed something of the transfer of the Kuomintang. Can you say something about that?

MARTIN: Yes. Well, by the time I got there, which was September of '49, most of the troops and so forth had come over. The government was still in the mainland. I don't know whether by that time they were still in Canton or whether they'd gone up to Chungking. In any case, they were over there. The American establishment was very small in Taiwan at the time. In fact, I have a memory -- it may not be accurate -- that the number of Americans on Taiwan was less than 100, including women and children. Bob Strong, who was the designated charge of our embassy to follow the national government around, arrived, I think, in December. He was just one man, and he just came and camped on our consulate, which was quite small at that time. I was there in the capacity, incidentally -- it didn't make much difference what you did then, because lines weren't that rigid -- but I was actually there as an economic officer, the only assignment I had in the Foreign Service as an economic officer, although my undergraduate major was economics and my graduate work at Fletcher School was primarily in economics, too.

But what I do remember about that fall of '49, particularly, was several things. One was the fact that the Communists failed to take Quemoy. That, I think, is something you can't blow up too much, but perhaps hasn't been given enough attention. That was a real morale boost. After all, the Nationalists, in the last six months, had been swept so easily away. When they got to Chungking, they didn't last very long, and even a shorter time at Chengdu. But you had an American-trained general, in whom we had a good deal of confidence, Sun Li-jen, a graduate of VMI [Virginia Military Institute]. We had some of the, I guess, best equipped troops there in Taiwan and then on Quemoy (or Chinmen). And the Communists obviously underestimated either the will to fight -- maybe it was the combination of will to fight plus the difficulty of making this rather short but still amphibious attack. And they were beaten back, and they didn't try it again.

Q: Was Sun Li-jen actually in command of the defense?

MARTIN: I'm not sure he was in command of the defense, but he had been in Taiwan for some time, and he was responsible for training these troops. I think he was given a good deal of credit for the victory there, whether he was in actual personal command or not.

Another interesting thing that happened -- I'm trying to fish back in my memory -- during that period in Taiwan was a rather ambiguous message which came from the State Department at the end of October, effect, which we were supposed to go to Chiang Kai-shek with, which said, in effect, that we thought that the Nationalists had enough materiel and equipment and so forth on Taiwan to defend the island adequately. As I say, the message was sort of mixed, because, on the one hand, it was the first communication we had sent from Washington to Chiang Kai-shek since he'd retired. It was sort of an acknowledgment that he was the head man, although at that time he had not yet actually reassumed his title. He was really sort of unofficial. This was a formal message to him, and so in a sense, it was a kind of a boost, because here we were saying, "Okay, you're it, and we're going to deal with you." On the other hand, it wasn't a very clear-cut statement of just what we were going to do. [Laughter] It more or less said, "You've got enough materiel here and we have confidence that you're going to defend the place."

Jessup came over. Ambassador Jessup came over. I think it was in January of '50. It was right around in there. He had an interview with Chiang Kai-shek, in which I was present. Chiang did most of the talking. He thought it was a matter of time before Japan went Communist, and Southeast Asia was bound to go the same way. War between the U.S. and the Soviet Union was inevitable. Conclusion: the U.S. must support his anti-Communist fight. Our own military estimates were that it was just a matter of time before the Communists would attack Taiwan and that they would be able to conquer it. The earliest estimate, as I recall, was something like March of '50 and all the way up to the spring or summer of '50. March may be a little early, but there was a lot of reporting about the fact that the Communists were massing junks on the Fujian coast and things like that. Another indication of what the State Department anticipated, I think I mentioned this in my book, or at least in a footnote in it, was that we evacuated dependents, especially families with children, like mine, and in my case, I was transferred to Rangoon, because we wanted to cut down on the staff in anticipation that there would be an invasion, trouble, and so forth.

Q: Why do you think the Communists did not actually attack Taiwan during that period?

MARTIN: I think that they were, as I said, surprised by their failure on Quemoy, and this was a heck of a lot bigger operation. I think they felt they needed to accumulate a lot of transport and get a lot more training and perhaps try to get air superiority. I don't know, but I think they were primarily military reasons.

Another reason might have been that, after all, they had launched their offensive across the Yangtze at Nanking in April of 1949, and in the next six months they had taken all of South China, and by the fall of 1949, late fall, they had taken most of West China as well. It was enormous territory. And then they had set up their government, of course. It was set up on the first of October 1949, as you know. In other words, they had a lot of things that were preoccupying them and having been set back at Quemoy, I think they probably just hadn't been able to organize and prepare well enough. The outbreak of the Korean War of course, and the intervention of the Seventh Fleet, changed things.

Q: You said that you accompanied Jessup.

MARTIN: Yes, I did.

Q: To have a discussion with Chiang Kai-shek, in which there was this rather mixed message.

MARTIN: That's my memory. I would have to go look at the documents.

Q: Did he request a firmer statement of assistance?

MARTIN: He probably did.

Q: From the United States at this time, do you know?

MARTIN: He probably did, yes, but I cannot tell you exactly. I'm sure you can find that in the documents. That was their general request, always for aid. [Laughter]

Q: Were you puzzled at the time by the rather uncertain stance by persons like Jessup, while, at the same time, perhaps the military estimates are that the Communists would take the island and that the dependents were being reduced?

MARTIN: Yes, that I remember very well because it's an impression rather than a specific fact. It's something I remember, that we were puzzled. We didn't really know what the signal was supposed to be. It was sort of, you know, "We wish you all sorts of success, and we think you can defend the island. You've got enough materiel here and so forth," but we were very cautious about any kind of support we were going to commit ourselves to.

Q: Did those of you representing the United States in Taiwan at that time take issue with this, make a counterproposal, a recommendation back to Washington?

MARTIN: I don't think so. I don't recall. Wasn't it in January of '50 that Truman made his statement? I think we felt rather unhappy that we were getting such mixed signals, that we were not getting more clear-cut -- it sort of left us in a difficult position.

Q: Did you feel you were in any position to in any way influence policy from Washington at this time?

MARTIN: Well, Bob Strong was in charge, and I was the economic officer in a small outfit. Bob Strong was a person who was quite outspoken. He didn't hesitate to express his views. Bob Strong had also been up to Chungking, and he had seen the collapse of the GRC, of the Kuomintang. I think Bob Strong was very skeptical of the capabilities of the GRC to do any better and to hold out. In fact -- and I think I mentioned this in my book -- at the time just before he left -- and this is before the Korean War in May 1950 -- he recommended drastic reduction of the staff, even more reduced than it was. He had, I think, very little faith that Taiwan would last. Of course, that was before the Korean War and our Seventh Fleet intervention. So the mood, in other words, I think is well reflected in Truman's statement that the U.S. would keep hands off Taiwan.

Q: Ambassador Martin, while you were on Taiwan, did you formulate an impression of how well or badly the Kuomintang was administering the place?

MARTIN: Well, I think that we didn't feel that they were administering it too well, but there was an improvement as compared to the time of Governor Chen Yi, which was, I think, in '47, when they had the riots and so forth. You still got overtones of that -- or undertones, whichever they are -- from the Taiwanese. But in fact, due in large part, I would say, without appearing to boast about my country, to our stimulus, there was under Governor Ch'en Ch'eng (who was the governor in '49, replaced by K.C. Wu about the end of that year or beginning of '50) there was a land reform program going on there which, I think, was one of the best land reform programs that I know of anywhere in that part of the world. And under this land reform program, large landowners were deprived of the land which they had over the minimum, and I forget the exact amount, but it was a fairly reasonable one. They were compensated partly in rice and partly in industrial bonds. This was administered by a joint Chinese-U.S. organization, the JCRR. I think the Chinese side's man was Chiang Mon-lin. He was the Chairman. On the U.S. side there were people like Hunter and others. No, I don't think Hunter was one. Ray Moyer was the principal U.S. member.

I think this turned out to be a -- we didn't know how successful it was going to be, but I was impressed with it at the time. It seemed to me a sensible thing. It gave the Taiwanese a stake in the industrialization of Taiwan, and we all know how successful that's been in the long run. It led also to an increase in agricultural production in Taiwan. So I would say that the program was well administered, and it was probably because the Kuomintang, the Nationalists, were fairly desperate then. Certainly land reform on the mainland, if it had been carried out like this, might have been quite decisive in the future of China. But by the time we came to Taiwan, as I say, the Nationalists were pretty desperate. They were more amenable to do what we advised, and also Taiwan's a small place, and it's much easier to do it there than it was in a very large land mass with a huge population.

Under the Japanese, of course, Taiwan had become more developed than probably any single province in China. I remember being impressed when I first went there by the fact that electricity was very widely available in small towns and that it was so cheap that people would keep the lights burning in their little shops and so forth all day. I guess they didn't have any meters or anything, so they might as well. [Laughter] They charged by the bulb or something; I don't know. But the whole place was better developed. I think you have to be very cautious about saying, "Well, if they'd only done this on the mainland." [Laughter] It was a lot easier in Taiwan. But they did do it; I think that's important.

But on the other hand, as far as the administration is concerned, perhaps they didn't really have time, they hadn't been there that long, I mean, to try to recover from the very poor administration that they'd had under Chen Yi. I was rather impressed with Ch'en Ch'eng. I thought he was an able guy and, of course, with K.C. Wu as well. I think they were lucky to have people like that there at the time.

Q: You mentioned earlier that you got to know Chiang Ching-kuo.

MARTIN: Yes. Chiang Ching-kuo was an enigma in a way. He came there from Shanghai with a rather bad reputation, and at that time -- I'm talking about '49 and '50, January, when I left, the latter part of January of '50 -- I forget exactly what Chiang Ching-kuo was doing. I think it was something to do with the veterans or something like that. He was a fairly young guy, of course. He had studied in Russia, as we all know, and he had a Russian wife. I didn't have a great deal of business to take up with him, and I can't even remember the occasion on which I got acquainted with him, but I found him fairly easy to talk to and less dogmatic, I thought, than his father seemed to be, although I can't say I ever got really well acquainted with Chiang Kai-shek. Ching-kuo was a person that seemed to me to be more realistic about going back to the mainland and so forth. Naturally, that was the line, and nobody was going to undercut it, but he struck me as being a fairly down-to-earth, practical sort of guy. Obviously, he was prepared to execute people, and he did. [Laughter] but he wasn't a dogmatic tyrannical person at all. That was not my impression of him.

Q: I don't want to interrupt, but what led you to believe he was less doctrinaire about the return to the mainland position? Were there any specifics that you recall that he said, a general tone? That is, I must say, rather surprising that you gained that impression.

MARTIN: Yes. Well, let me say two things. One is that he was not directly concerned with that. In other words, whatever his concern, it was local and had to do with the veterans and so forth, and that's what we talked about. The other is that the last time I saw Chiang Ching-Kuo was in 1968, when I stopped in Taiwan returning to Hong Kong from home leave and we had breakfast together. By that time, he was in a much more important position. The impression that I had -- and I can't give you specifics that I had from that early acquaintance with him -- was maintained in this private breakfast I had with him. Perhaps it's because we didn't talk about it. He didn't give me the line. I think that's the thing. I'm trying to remember. I think it's that I didn't get a kind of set line from him that I often got from other officials when I visited. We seemed to be on a more practical basis. He just struck me as a guy who was more in touch with the realities of the situation, and I think his record of Taiwan indicates that, at least -- I don't know how much, because I haven't really been in touch with this in the last ten or 15 years, how much you can give the responsibility for the obvious prosperity of Taiwan and the fact that it hasn't gone into reckless adventures and so forth, I'm not sure how much you can give credit to Ching-kuo, but he's gone up and up until he finally became the top man. So he's obviously been influential. I think his influence grew. I always felt that his influence would be on the side of realism, a more realistic appreciation of the facts of life and the relative impotence of Taiwan compared to the mainland and so forth.

Q: Given what you said about him, I imagine you've not been surprised that he's spearheaded a movement toward some degree of Taiwanization of Taiwan in the last year or so.

MARTIN: No, no, I'm not. As I say, I put these views forward simply as impressions, because I got to know him during this period, and I made subsequent visits to Taiwan and he was always very cordial to me and everything, but I found that his -- I don't know. I don't think I can say anything more useful about it.

***

MARTIN: When I went back to the China desk, one of the problems which we had among a great many was this question of the KMT troops in Burma, and the fact the Burmese had -- I think this happened after I left Burma -- they decided to kick our aid mission out and so forth.

I had one assignment that covered the whole of East Asia, and that was when I was the political advisor to the Commander in Chief Pacific (CINCPAC) in Honolulu. But because Burma was a neutralist country, a non-aligned country, and had no U.S. military aid, CINCPAC, who was at that time Admiral Felt, did not visit Burma. He had no reason to visit Burma. We visited just about every other country in the area. In fact, I think we did visit every other country in the area in the whole of East Asia Pacific area, except Burma, and North Korea, of course, and North Vietnam.

Q: I understand. And China.

MARTIN: And China mainland.

Q: In your dealings, since you were involved in Far Eastern affairs off and on for a good part of your career, did you find that Burma weighed at all in the balance?

MARTIN: No. Burma was very unimportant to the United States, except to some extent (especially when I went there as a young Chinese language officer) as a listening post as to what was going on in China. I think that was its principal importance in those days, as an observation post when we had withdrawn from China. It was in some ways a fairly good spot, although it was very remote from the capital of China and what was going on there. Nevertheless, Burma had a long border with China, and there was Chinese interest in the insurgency, in the BCP (the Burma Communist Party), the White Flag Communists. So that was the main importance. But naturally, that was, on a scale of world events, pretty minimal.

***

Q: Could we pass on to the period when you were at CA -- Chinese Affairs?

MARTIN: Yes.

Q: That must have been very fascinating. I would assume that roughly the first half of it was dominated mainly by the Korean War in some form or other. Could you tell us what struck you, perhaps something that is not public knowledge?

MARTIN: [Laughter]

Q: I mean to include the negotiations, by the way.

MARTIN: Well, as far as we were concerned, since the Korean War was in full swing -- perhaps I'd better date this so we'll know what period we're covering. I reported into the China desk in December of '51, and by that time things had been pretty well set in Korea. The Chinese had been in it for over a year. Actually, it was January of '52 when I really got into my slot in the Office of Chinese Affairs, so I had a year under the Truman Administration, approximately, and then Eisenhower came in in January of '53.

I guess there's one thing that I could contribute, perhaps, and perhaps not. It's in itself not really new. But the difference between the China policy under Truman in his last year -- and it's the only time of which I can speak, because I was there at that time, that last year -- and the Eisenhower policy toward China was very little, it was mainly cosmetic, and I can illustrate that point. My first job there was chief of political section, and that was during the Truman year. The next year I became deputy director. It had nothing to do with the change in administration; it was just internal bureaucratic things. We drafted an NSC paper on China policy in that last year (of Truman), and there was nothing new in it. It was as many NSC papers are. It was simply a description of what the policy was, and you put it down on paper and you get it approved, the way the policy developed. There was nothing basically new in it, but it did describe, I think, reflected accurately what the policy was that year, that last year. And for some reason or other, it never got through the whole NSC process until the following year, which was the Eisenhower Administration. Basically the same paper went through the NSC, and there was really no basic change.

This business about Chiang Kai-shek being "unleashed" by Eisenhower, again, that was simply when the Eisenhower Administration said, "We will no longer prevent them from attacking the mainland." Well, as you can find in the documents, actually we made very sure that the Chinese on Taiwan understood that we would not support them and we would very much oppose their going to the mainland without our approval, and we had no intention of approving it.

Q: Lend-leash.

MARTIN: [Laughter] So there was really no basic change there. Having been in the Department and on the China desk during that particular transition period, the rhetoric got a lot tougher, but the basic policies -- and, of course, there wasn't much we could change. [Laughter] I mean, we were already committed by Truman to defend Taiwan. I never saw any indication that Mr. Dulles, let alone President Eisenhower, any time were willing to back any kind of mainland invasion. But getting somebody like Walter Robertson in there, who was a very nice guy but a fairly hard-liner, but not an extremist by any means, you had somebody who could go down there and talk to the right-wingers who were pretty strong in the Senate at that time. Dulles' line was pretty hard, but when it came right down to it, I don't think you could find any real difference in the policies. It was because our China policy had been set by the Korean War and by our response to the Korean War, basically, and especially after the Chinese intervened.

I do think that later on, in the mid-Fifties -- and this is pure speculation -- that under Dulles and Robertson and Eisenhower, our response to some Chinese overtures was tougher than it might have been under another administration. But at that particular time, because of the war, we were locked into a situation where there really was no flexibility, and I think that was recognized. But since China policy was a political issue on the Hill, the Republicans had to do whatever they could to make it look like they were pursuing a different policy.

Q: There have been two main periods. One was in the mid-Fifties, around the time of the Dulles "brink of war" statement and the other period more recently since the publication of the Foreign Relations volumes covering that period, a lot of discussion of the use of nuclear threat by the United States to compel the Chinese to sign an armistice. Do you have anything to say about that?

MARTIN: No, I wasn't in on that at all. No, I'm sorry.

Q: I'm sorry to hear that. [Laughter]

MARTIN: [Laughter] Sorry. That would be an interesting subject. But I guess it was, perhaps, either too sensitive for someone of my position to be in on. I don't know to what extent anybody, even my boss, who was Walter McConaughy, would have been consulted on something like that. I really don't know.

Q: You were involved in the discussions with the Chinese at Geneva and later Warsaw talks.

MARTIN: Yes. And also at Panmunjom. I was the only person to be -- it's really of no significance, but I happened to be the only person that was involved in the Panmunjom, the Geneva and the Warsaw talks. So I was in at the very ground floor, you might say, of our first diplomatic contacts with the Chinese Communists after the Korean War, which was at Panmunjom. I don't think there's anything special about that history that isn't known.

The thing that struck me rather strongly when we got together with Arthur Dean, who was our leader and, as you know, is a lawyer, a New York corporation lawyer, not a diplomat, (although he had diplomatic assignments before, going back, apparently to Mexico in the Twenties and Thirties) was that he was very strongly convinced that we must get an agreement with the Chinese for the sake of the Eisenhower Administration. He felt it would be a real feather in their cap. I thought that our chances of getting an agreement with the Chinese was very slim. He was telling the press we could do it in two weeks. Well, he finally walked out, as you may recall, of the talks. He walked out in December, and I don't think he ever forgave me for being right about that. It wasn't that I wanted them to fail, it's just that I didn't think the situation was one in which the Chinese had that much flexibility. This particularly was true because, after all, we were negotiating there in the DMZ, and also going on the DMZ were these prisoner interrogations. It was pretty obvious, once the prisoners began to opt not to return to China, that the Chinese couldn't let this go on, so there were all sorts of disturbances which prevented the interrogation. Finally, as you recall, in January of '54, the prisoners were released. The Indians were in charge of this under General Thimayya, who was a very, very interesting, very pleasant guy and a very capable guy. He said, "That's the way south; that's the way north," and most of them went south.

Well, all during this hassle in the fall of '53, where the Chinese and the North Koreans were accusing us of sabotaging the armistice agreement and everything, it was just not the kind of atmosphere where they're going to reach an agreement implementing the armistice agreement. It was sort of inevitable, I think, that the thing would just be stalemated, and it was. I think Dean might have handled it a little better, although I think basically he was right. When you're at a negotiation and the people you're negotiating with start attacking your good faith, attacking your credentials and your ability to negotiate, then you might as well fold up. As a minimum in a negotiation, you have to have both sides saying, "Okay, you do represent the other side, and we'll negotiate with you." That's where we got at that particular time. I think that Dean did contribute, because he was a very good briefer and a very good lawyer, to an understanding, to giving a public explanation in his press conferences after the various sessions, which made the U.N. side, the U.S. side, look more flexible, which we were -- there's no question about it -- than the Chinese. I think that's about all we could get out of that. [Laughter]

Q: What kind of agreement was Dean actually hoping to reach? Was it a peace treaty with the Chinese?

MARTIN: No, no. This was very limited. This was a very limited negotiation, and maybe that was why he felt we could accomplish it. Under Paragraph 60 of the armistice agreement, the two sides were to meet, to discuss the future of Korea and arrive at some political settlement. Well, our negotiations in Panmunjom were merely to make arrangements to set up the conference: it was not the conference itself, just to make arrangements to set up the conference. And as far as we were concerned, there were only two things to talk about: when would the conference be held and where would it be held. The Chinese and the North Koreans wanted to discuss the composition of the conference. We felt the composition of the conference had already been settled by Paragraph 60 of the armistice agreement, and actually, that language about the two sides was originally introduced by the Communist side. So one wouldn't expect that they would make an issue of this, but they did. They wanted to have neutral countries, and they wanted to have the Soviet Union there. We said, "We don't object to the Soviet Union being there, but we can't call it neutral. It's completely on your side." So this is what we wrangled about, and we eventually divided into two committees.

We did come to one agreement that was on the agenda. [Laughter] But then we divided into two committees. I was in charge of the subcommittee which was discussing the time and place of the conference, and naturally that was just marking time, because the real issue was the composition, and we never got anywhere on that. But I think it should be pointed out that in Berlin, in January of '54, an agreement was reached to have a conference on Korea and on Indochina to convene in Geneva in April of 1954. Most books refer to this as the Geneva Conference on Indochina. They totally ignore the fact that Korea was discussed. But, in fact, there was a conference of the two sides as provided in the armistice agreement, and Zhou En-lai was there. The only time that I'd ever seen Zhou En-lai in action was at this conference. It was interesting to watch him.

But anyway, that Panmunjom exercise was an exercise in complete futility.

Q: Forgive me, but my curiosity will not let me let you get away with referring to Zhou En-lai as interesting to watch. Can't you tell us more than that about Zhou En-lai? [Laughter]

MARTIN: Well, he had been a Chinese opera actor as a student, you know, so he was a dramatic fellow, and he had this high-pitched voice which was perhaps a little . . .

Q: Women's parts.

MARTIN: Yes, perhaps that's why he did women's parts. But that came across when he was making his points. I don't know what else to say about him. What he said and so forth was pretty much to be expected. Our main problem at the Korean end (and that's why I was an advisor to the U.S. delegation, because of my experience in Panmunjom), was, as it often was, of getting the South Koreans to go along and to present a united front. We finally succeeded in getting a position which we could offer as the U.N. side's position, and it was rejected by the Communists, which wasn't surprising, and the conference went on to deal with Indochina, where they really did something. So it's not surprising that people forget about the Korean part because nothing came out of it at all.

Q: Were the South Koreans actually represented in that conference, the brief conference? Because they had not signed the armistice.

MARTIN: No, they had not signed the armistice, that's true. No, I don't think that they were officially represented, but we didn't want them to denounce our proposal, because it would look very poor: the Communists could always come back and say, "Well, look, the South Koreans don't agree to this." We finally got something or we got them to be still or agree not to denounce our proposal.

Of course, the thing that interested me as far as our relations with China was concerned at the Geneva conference, was that we sat down and had bilateral discussions with the Chinese on the question of the Americans detained in China and the Chinese who had not been allowed to leave the United States. Those two issues really weren't comparable, because we had never imprisoned any Chinese. There had been some who had been refused permission to leave because, (interestingly enough the same argument that is being made by Gorbachev on why he won't let some Jews leave), because they knew secrets. Well, we said, "These people know secrets." During the Korean War whether that was a valid thing or not I don't know: but certainly after the Korean War it was no longer valid, so we had no interest whatsoever in keeping them. In subsequent years we even went to prisons to try to get Chinese that had been convicted of crimes to say they'd go back to the mainland if we let them go. [Laughter] We just couldn't find anybody. [Laughter] They'd rather stay in this country. In other words, we went to great lengths to try to get Chinese to go back to the mainland. We didn't force anybody, obviously, but if they wanted to, even if they were in jail, they could return. Having bilateral discussions with the PRC at Geneva was a breakthrough. I actually drafted the telegram that went to Dulles. Dulles, by that time, had left the Geneva conference, and Smith, the Under Secretary or whatever he was then at that time, Bedell Smith was in charge, and Robertson was still there. I drafted the telegram which went back to the Department, saying, "We have to sit down and talk to the Chinese." We wanted to try to do it through the British, as we'd done before, but they would have none of it. They said, "You're here talking to us. We're in the same conference with you, and you won't even sit down and talk bilaterally," so we had to talk bilaterally. We brought in Trevelyan, the British charge at that time, as sort of an umpire to begin with, but then we wound up with bilateral talks. So that was the beginning, sort of a preliminary act to the Warsaw talks on the Geneva talks which began later.

In the telegram we just laid it out that, "We're either going to talk to the Chinese or we're not going to get anywhere on the prisoner issue. It's not going to read very well at home, you know, if you say, 'These guys are detaining our citizens and we refuse to talk to them about it.'" Of course, we had tried to talk to them before when we were still in China, and they wouldn't talk to us then. So as I say, I drafted the telegram. It was approved by Robertson and by Bedell Smith, and sent to Dulles. Although he seemed to be a little reluctant, he did eventually agree we would do it, so we went ahead. [Laughter] That was the beginning of that. Alex Johnson was, of course, our secretary general. Wang Ping-nan was the secretary general of the Chinese side, and it was interesting that they were the two negotiators in '55 when the talks restarted. [See FRUS 1955-57 on China for further details]

Q: What was the reluctance, in your judgment, on the part of Dulles?

MARTIN: Well, it was because the background of the Geneva conference. It was agreed at Berlin that the Chinese would be there, the Chinese Communists, and we knew Zhou En-lai would be there. Peking obviously played it up: "This shows we're now a great power. We're sitting down with the Soviet Union, the United States, Britain, and France." The PRC at that time were trying to get as much as they could in gestures of recognition from the United States. Our policy was very rigid on that, and people like McConaughy and others would make speeches saying, "Just because we're sitting down with them in a conference with a lot of other people doesn't mean we're recognizing them." But sitting down with them bilaterally might seem like a step forward to recognition, at least an appearance of an acceptance, of the PRC. That's why we tried to get the British involved, and we had Trevelyan there for two sessions before to bow out. The talks were finally reduced to the consular level; but the PRC did release some of our people. Then the talks sort of petered out. That was the background to the Geneva and Warsaw talks. You used the word "Warsaw talks," and that's usually what's referred to, but people forget that for two and a half years it was the Geneva talks.

Q: Can you go over very briefly the issues in the Geneva talks other than the exchange of prisoners?

MARTIN: Well, that was the only thing we were interested in. Well, I shouldn't say that. That's the first thing we were interested in, and the second was the renunciation of force in the Taiwan Strait. No, the Chinese weren't about to do this. They felt that this was an internal affair because Taiwan was part of China, so they could not enter formally into an international agreement, renouncing force against their own territory. So it was a built-in, total impasse there. That went on. The Chinese used the talks to try to get us to change our policy on travel to China and on trade and so forth. At that time, we were very rigid. I participated in the talks only at the very beginning, in August '55, because I had been assigned to the National War College spent a year there, and I was really out of Chinese affairs for that year.

Then I went to Britain, to London, and at first I was assigned to work on NATO affairs, but then a fellow named Ringwalt, who had been in London for six or seven years working on the Far East, finally departed, and they put me in his place simply because I was available and had the background. Then I worked on the Far East, but not so much on China, really, until '57, when I had to make a flight to Geneva every month, almost every month, to participate in the ongoing Geneva talks. By that time they had been pretty well stalled.

Alex Johnson was the principal negotiator, and I was his assistant. In December of '57 we were instructed to inform the Chinese that Johnson had been assigned to Thailand as ambassador and would be leaving, and I was going to take his place. Well, at that time, I had the rank of first secretary in the embassy at London. So the Chinese said, "These are ambassadorial talks, and we like Mr. Martin, we can't accept him because he's not an ambassador." We had deliberately tried to downgrade the talks; there's no question about it. We felt we weren't getting anywhere. After returning to London, I had some correspondence with the Chinese side trying to get talks going at my level, but it didn't work out. The only significance of that, I think, is that we and the Chinese both decided that these Geneva talks were getting nowhere. We were the ones that took the initiative. I don't know whether they honestly thought in Washington that the Chinese would accept this; I never thought they would.

Q: Accept the downgrading?

MARTIN: Accept the downgrading of the talks. Yes, yes.

Q: You mentioned (inaudible) asked about issues that you were discussing with the Chinese.

MARTIN: Yes.

Q: And you mentioned one of the issues was the United States' effort to persuade the Chinese to denounce the use of force.

MARTIN: That's right.

Q: Then we jumped up to '57.

MARTIN: That's because I wasn't connected with the talks in between those times.

Q: But in '54, in other words, did you have the first discussions with the Chinese, urging them to denounce force?

MARTIN: No, no.

Q: When was that first? Was that before the Taiwan Strait crisis or after?

MARTIN: In June '54, we started these bilateral talks at the Geneva Conference. By agreement they were reduced to the consular level. The Chinese released a few American prisoners, and I think we told them we had some Chinese who were leaving and so forth. These talks were held intermittently, I think, for four or five weeks in Geneva at that level. Now, that's the background of the Warsaw talks.

Q: So there was no discussion of renunciation of force by that time.

MARTIN: That was strictly limited to exchanges.

Q: So there's really no discussion of renunciation of force until after the first so-called Taiwan Strait crisis?

MARTIN: That's right.

Q: In '54 or '55.

MARTIN: As you recall the background of the Geneva talks was that in April of '55, there was a conference of non-aligned countries in Indonesia, and Zhou En-lai said he would be willing to talk to the United States. That put us on the spot, and we agreed. We had communications through the British, and set up the Geneva talks at the ambassadorial level. The renunciation of force then became a theme song of ours. "You can't do anything else until you renounce force."

Q: That emerges out of the first Taiwan Strait crisis, probably.

MARTIN: Probably did, yes. Yes.

Q: Back to the background of the first Taiwan Strait crisis. Can you give me a feel for who was in charge at the time of the first Taiwan Strait crisis and your position? You were deputy director?

MARTIN: That was '54. I became deputy director in '53. Okay. Walter McConaughy was the director, and Walter Robertson was the assistant secretary. I forget who was his deputy at that time. This was something that also got into the U.N. Well, I should back up further. After the Geneva conference, the Nationalists, of course, were quite unhappy about the fact that we sat down with the Chinese Communists there and actually were having consular-level talks. The Korean War was over, we'd had the Indochina agreement, and so the decision was made in the Department, which obviously was supported by Eisenhower, to substitute for the Truman declaration of, "The Seventh Fleet will protect Taiwan," a treaty, mutual defense treaty, this was signed by the Republic of China and the U.S. in December of '54. Of course, it came out that we were negotiating this treaty. I don't know to what extent this triggered the bombardments of Chinmen and offshore islands by the Communists, but nevertheless, they were attacking. We were negotiating the treaty.

Q: I'm confused here. My history is not very good. Are you suggesting that the intention on the part of the administration in negotiating mutual security treaty preceded the growing escalation of tension in the Taiwan Strait?

MARTIN: They went along together. I can't remember exact dates of when the shellings began. Was it August of '54?

Q: September 9th.

MARTIN: September 9th. You're asking me a question I can't answer, whether we had intention of negotiating the treaty before this began or not.

Q: (inaudible)

MARTIN: Yes. I'm not sure that that was the cause of it. I'm not sure that it was.

Q: Do you remember what (inaudible) office?

MARTIN: I think it was before, probably. Yes, I think it was before. I came back from Panmunjom in February, and I was back in Washington for about six weeks and then went to Geneva. I came back from Geneva in June of '54. So that was a long separation from my family. As I recall, in that period of March and early April, between the Panmunjom negotiations and the Geneva Conference, I was pretty well focusing in preparing for the Conference. I don't remember any discussion about the possibility of the treaty. (The treaty was first considered in March, 1954, but put off because of the impending Geneva Conference.)

Q: To avoid possible confusion on the record, Ambassador Martin, you referred a minute ago to reassurance of the Chinese. You meant the ROC on Taiwan.

MARTIN: Yes, yes. I meant the Nationalists, the ROC, reassurance that we really intended to support them, and that was policy. That was written into the NSC papers, and it was publicly declared. There was no secret about it. I can't remember whether anybody seriously argued against it. I think doubts were raised, and perhaps legitimately, that, you know, "Do you want to go this far?" But in CA, we supported the treaty, because we felt that if it is, indeed -- and it was -- U.S. policy to defend Taiwan and the Pescadores, let's make that completely clear to everybody, including the Chinese Communists, so they won't make a mistake and feel that we really don't mean it.

Now, Dulles, as I recall, was not opposed to it, but he was somewhat skeptical that Chiang Kai-shek and the Nationalists would accept a treaty under the conditions of which we would have to impose, which would be that it would be strictly limited to Taiwan and the Pescadores, and, as I recall, he said words to the effect of, "Well, you know, this puts some limitations on them. Why would they accept it?" Our judgment in CA, which turned out to be completely right for a change, was that, "He'll accept this. As far as he's concerned, a guarantee by the U.S. for his protection in Taiwan is the most important thing he can get. Despite all the talk that's going on, Chiang Kai-shek, basically, in his whole military history had been a very cautious person, and the idea that he is going to go back to the mainland without some sort of support from the United States is just not a practical one, and he knows it."

Q: I feel a little unclear as to whether you think -- and there may be no basis for a judgment -- that the Chinese might have started the crisis in part as sort of retaliation, in an effort to create alarm and prevent the signing of such a treaty.

MARTIN: Well, yes, I think it's possible. I think it's possible that they did. I don't know whether it's the chicken or the egg here, but the more I think about it, the more I'm convinced in my own mind that we had this idea of a treaty for the reasons I've mentioned before any specific attack on the offshore islands, because, after all, the Chinese Communists' position, the Peking position, was, "We're going to liberate Taiwan, and we're going to do it by force." They had continued to say this, so there was no question that there was a threat. Now, the offshore island business is always a very, very tricky one, and all I can say is -- and, again, I don't want to say like, "I told you so" -- but we in CA constantly felt that the dangers of the offshore island position were exaggerated by the critics, and maybe it's just luck, but it turned out here it's more than 30 years later, and there has not been a war resulting from the offshore island position.

But as you recall, we signed the treaty in December, and then, of course, the Communists understandably made a tremendous stink about it, and there were further threats. We took it to the U.N. I must confess I'd have to refresh my memory, but in January '55 was the New Zealand resolution, which I hesitate to even mention, because I can't remember the contents of it. But it had to do with the offshore islands of January '55. We helped the Chinese to evacuate the Tachen islands, and they evacuated another island which we felt was beyond air cover and beyond their ability to really protect. They did it. But, of course, Quemoy and Matsu were always the focus of this offshore island contention, because they're right in Amoy harbor, practically, and they have great political symbolism, of course, for the Nationalists.

Q: May I ask you one question? The Nationalists later claimed that in exchange for their agreement to evacuate the Tachen islands, we'd given them a private pledge to defend Quemoy.

MARTIN: I don't know anything about that, I really don't. I'm very skeptical.

Q: I am, too.

MARTIN: I think that we have never gone beyond the congressional resolution or whatever it was that said it's in the area. We've always deliberately left it vague; we never gave them a specific pledge. I don't think we ever did. I'm sure we never did. (There is documentary evidence to partially support the Nationalists' claim of a pledge.)

Q: Just to see how things were being done in the government, the procedure and process, you said, for example, that you always felt that the critics' concern about policy toward the offshore islands was somewhat exaggerated, that there was not the danger they had envisioned.

MARTIN: There was a danger, obviously, but they would say, "It's going to drag us into a war with the Communists and everything else." Yes.

Q: Were the cost benefits of the evacuation of Quemoy and Matsu sort of broadly and widely considered within the Office of Chinese Affairs at this time?

MARTIN: Well, I would say this, and, again, my memory is trying to dredge 30-year-old -- more than 30 years ago. But I think that our position was -- again, I would consider it a pragmatic position, and that is that, yes, if we had our way, we'd get off the offshore islands. They are dangerous. They're not as dangerous as people say, but they're not a good place to be. But the only way we could get the Nationalists off would be possibly even some resort to force, to force them off. They were determined to hang on. It meant a great deal to them for its political symbolism, having a little toe on the mainland. We had no commitment, and we felt that -- and I think this was expressed to the Nationalists on a number of occasions, "You've got far too much out there. You're risking too much. This is not a good thing to do." So I think definitely we did not feel that it was a good policy as far as the Nationalists were concerned, but it was their policy, and we were not willing to take our opposition to the point of using force or some drastic leverage against them to pull out.

Q: Was it actually discussed in those terms, let's say within your office, that, "It will require us to go to that point"?

MARTIN: Oh, I think . . .

Q: Do you recall?

MARTIN: Well, something like this, of course, let me say this, especially under the Eisenhower Administration, and that's when I spent most of my time on China desk, the NSC -- a thing like this, we would perhaps make an initial draft of the policy, but all of this sort of thing was handled by NSC committees. I chaired one on China, but it had representatives from the Pentagon, the CIA, even in some aspects of China policy, the Treasury Department. In other words, these decisions and these discussions took place in the context of NSC papers, NSC meetings, subcommittee meetings, and that sort of thing. The funny thing is, just on a personal note, that my last 12 years in the Foreign Service, I was never stationed in Washington, so I can't compare how it was under Johnson and Nixon and so forth. But my feeling is that in the Eisenhower years, there was more sort of committee work, there was more interdepartmental exchange and working than there was under subsequent administrations. But that's just a personal thing. Certainly in my time, there was.

Q: Did this lead to a reduction in the direct influence upon policy formulation of the Office of China Affairs, for example?

MARTIN: No, I don't know. Again, I don't think so, because we chaired the committee, we usually drafted the stuff, and then it was just a question of getting through. But in the years that I was in the Department in Washington, we had two very strong Secretaries, Acheson and Dulles. That basically is what gave our State Department more clout than I think it's had recently. I was in a number of meetings in Dulles' office when he would call up Eisenhower, while we were having a meeting, to discuss something with the President. My feeling is we had as much clout as we've ever had in those days.

Q: You speak of two very strong Secretaries. Did you feel that someone like Secretary Dulles relied upon your office for a source of ideas or did he have other sources?

MARTIN: I'll give you an example. I can't remember whether it was this offshore island crisis or the one in '58. Let's see. Dulles died in '59, didn't he? He was still there in '58. Anyway, to give you an example, in the particular crisis situation, I remember being in a meeting. I used to go up there and back up Robertson. He certainly had a lot of trust in Robertson, but at this particular meeting on the offshore island crisis -- I guess it was probably '58, because he turned to his Counselor at that time, Freddy Reinhardt.

Q: MacArthur?

MARTIN: No, it was after MacArthur. Anyway, people were supposed to produce some sort of a position for him, and he would say to Robertson, "You do so and so." Then he'd say to his counselor, "You do so and so." And so forth. What happened, Robertson would call us up and say, "Will you do this for us?" And the counselor would call us up and say, "Will you do this for us?" So Dulles didn't turn to us as an office directly, but Robertson, the Counselor, and there was somebody else -- I remember there were three people calling us. He thought he had about three different people to do it, but we had the expertise, so they all asked us to do it. That was one of the problems in a crisis like this, because we'd get tremendous overload, and then we'd have the press, the press people. Our press office would want us to be available to answer questions. In other words, the power of an office like Chinese Affairs was in its expertise and the fact that it had been following the details and keeping track of it. So to come up with a paper or a position, you had the input. To that extent, we had influence. Now, you know, it had to go through the counselor, and he may have changed it with Robertson and so forth.

But it seemed to me that the committee system, which perhaps did become a little cumbersome, the OCB committee and subcommittee system under Eisenhower, did have the advantage of getting a lot of input from -- we called ourselves working level -- from the working level at Pentagon, at CIA, and so forth. The working level types, we maintained good contacts with each other, and naturally, on our intelligence estimates, I suppose there were estimates that I wasn't cleared to see, but I saw some pretty sensitive stuff and so did other people. We were getting all these inputs. So I think we had about as good a basis as anybody could have for making judgments. As I say, our judgments on some of these things, I think, not necessarily on policy, but of what the situation was, what was going to happen, that the offshore islands weren't going to lead to war and so forth, I think those judgments have stood the test of time pretty well.

Q: Could we perhaps move on to the 1958 crisis?

MARTIN: Yes, yes.

Q: Would you like to add something?

MARTIN: Yes. I would like to point out that -- let's go to July first. Well, let's go back to December '57. I was appointed the U.S. representative to the Communist side. The Chinese said, "You're not an ambassador," so we did deliberately downgrade it. Washington, I think, didn't give a damn, really, at that time for continuing the talks, although, as I said, I carried on some correspondence under instructions of Washington from London with somebody -- I can't remember his name -- who was my opposite number on the Chinese delegation, saying, "We'd like to get the talks going." I knew they weren't going to do it, and I didn't blame them, really.

But in July of '58, we did send a message saying we would like to resume the talks. We did take the initiative, and I think that should be kept in mind. We informed the Chinese that we would like to resume the talks at the ambassadorial level, and we appointed Ambassador Beam, who was our ambassador in Warsaw to represent the U.S.. That's when the Warsaw talks began. But in August of '58, they started very heavy shelling of Quemoy, the largest and heaviest shelling that had taken place anywhere in recent history, it was said. I was just being transferred back from London. I was on home leave before taking up my job as Director of CA, and I was called back because of the crisis. I remember a number of meetings, particularly with Herter, who was Under Secretary at that time. "What are we going to do about this offshore island crisis?" The estimates were really quite pessimistic as to the Chinese Communist capabilities. I was rather surprised at the -- I wouldn't say panic, but they were almost pushing the panic button. "What could we do in this situation?" And it turned out that -- and I can't remember the exact decision, but I think we decided we would convoy, but that's as far as we would go.

Q: To the three-mile limit.

MARTIN: Yes, to the three-mile limit. That's right. The Nationalists would pick it up there. Well, a fairly decisive development was that the Nationalist Air Force, using our heat-seeking missiles, knocked down a number of the Communists' planes, and I think that probably had quite a chastening effect on them. I think after the experience way back to '49, they felt they needed air superiority. So the Communists agreed to resume the talks in Warsaw, and from then on they were the Warsaw talks. That crisis calmed down, but there was an aftermath which was rather interesting, and that is that Dulles and Robertson -- I think McConaughy, too, yes, because I was in charge of the desk -- no, let's see. They went out to Taiwan and talked to Chiang Kai-shek and got him to agree that he would not use force against the mainland. Here again, I think Dulles might have been surprised that he would agree to this, but, again, I think it shows his basic caution. In other words, despite all their talk and everything, the Nationalists really knew that they could not get back on the mainland unless they had active U.S. support, and that they would do it without our support was never a serious threat. But that's the kind of threat that people kept worrying about. Maybe you can't blame them. But as I said before, the whole military history of Chiang Kai-shek, if he erred on any side, it was on the side of caution rather than the side of boldness.

Q: I remember talking to one of your colleagues in the CA when the offshore islands crisis of '58 was at its height, and he was convinced that the Soviet Union was absolutely behind the PRC and was facing a serious sort of monolithic threat there. Was that the general perception?

MARTIN: No, I don't think so. We were perhaps rather slow in seeing the beginning of the split, but certainly one of the factors -- and I didn't mention this -- that may have made the Chinese back down on this was the Soviets gave signals that they were not going to get involved. This may, in turn, have exacerbated the coming split between the two partners, the two allies. Yes, I think that we eventually did pick this up, because I remember it quite clearly, but it took a while. We had been, of course, seeing them as pretty monolithic. It took a while, perhaps too long, longer than it should have, to see that the frictions were getting very serious between them. We were entertaining the possibility, but were cautious about it.

Q: Do you have a sense of when this perception did begin to dawn to the working level at State and maybe other agencies?

MARTIN: Yes, I think probably about the time of the Great Leap Forward, because it was pretty obvious. The Russians -- was it early '60 that they pulled out all of their technicians, and they were obviously not happy about the Great Leap Forward? I remember one reaction we had, and it may have been a good one or it may not have been a good one, there's sort of a doubt about it now, but I gave a lecture at the National War College on China in January of -- in fact, it was on inauguration eve, January of 1961 -- and the thrust of my lecture, which I think, looking back on it, seems to me to be somewhat exaggerated, but it seemed like a good thing at the time to me, was, "Just because there's a Sino-Soviet split, don't underestimate the threat of the Chinese." And I went on and on about the terrible threat of the Chinese.

The idea was, I think it was exaggerated; I don't think it was completely wrong, but the thrust of my thesis was that the Chinese are really more dangerous than the Soviet Union, not because they're more powerful, but because they're more uncertain. You don't know what they're going to do, they're more unreliable, they're having these problems internally that might affect their external policy, and if you look at their propaganda, they're very belligerent and so forth. But it was to offset the idea that because there's a Sino-Soviet split, not to worry about the Chinese anymore, you see. So we were at that time definitely aware of the split. I would say the thing that stands out in my mind is when the Soviets pulled out their technicians and so forth. It was pretty obvious then, perhaps.

Q: This is a continuation of our interview. I'm Charles Stuart Kennedy, the director of the Foreign Service History Center, and Ambassador Martin and I were talking at lunch. It's still the 17th of March. And we thought there might be one other question or series of short questions, we might put. And that's concerning the Kennedy years and our attitude towards China.

Ambassador Martin, what job did you have during the Kennedy years, dealing with China?

MARTIN: Well, when Kennedy was inaugurated in January of '61 I was, and had been for several years, director of the Office of Chinese Affairs. And there was some expectation that with the new party coming in, the Democrats, and with JFK of course the youngest president and so forth, there would be new things happening. And of course there were new things that happened in his administration. But in the China posture of the United States, not as much changed as some people thought might change. The innovation which occurred during my few months as director of the Chinese Affairs during the Kennedy administration.

Q: What were the dates, about?

MARTIN: Well, as I say, Kennedy came in on January 20.

Q: '61.

MARTIN: We're talking about '61. And I was the director until that summer. That summer I went to become political advisor to CINCPAC [Commander in Chief, Pacific]. Well, the innovation I was talking about was apparently Bowles', Chester Bowles' idea. Bowles had been appointed by Kennedy as the Under Secretary of State. And the Secretary, of course, was Dean Rusk. And the idea came down, I think, from Bowles' office that we should now recognize the People's Republic of Mongolia and this initiative did not come from the Office of Chinese Affairs, the Far East Bureau, which actually opposed it although not very strongly. And I think the reason for opposing it was that we didn't think there was really much to be gained by it and it would simply succeed in antagonizing the Nationalists.

Q: Nationalist Chinese?

MARTIN: The Chinese, yes, with whom we had diplomatic relations of course. In any case, it got to the point where I was instructed to go down to the Hill and brief Chairman Morgan, Chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, which I did. And as I recall, Dr. Morgan was not particularly disturbed by this, didn't think there would be any real problem on the Hill with it. And then I was transferred out of Chinese affairs and later on I gathered that this whole idea was squashed, presumably in the White House, and that it was not one that had White House backing. Apparently it had been Chester Bowles' pet project. I think one thing that did come out of it was the admission of Mongolia into the U.N. We obviously did not veto it. As I was saying to you at lunch, one casualty of this whole episode was that George Yeh, who was the Chinese ambassador to the United States at the time, was fired by Chiang Kai-shek apparently because Chiang was unhappy that Mongolia had been admitted to the U.N. But this happened after I left.

But also, I'm sure that this was just one illustration of the way Bowles was reputed to operate, which was rather independently. I'm not exactly sure but I think he lasted less than a year as Under Secretary of State. And I think this was perhaps an example of the kind of thing that he initiated that he had obviously not cleared with his bosses.

Q: Chester Bowles is described as what?

MARTIN: As a -- and I don't know who said it, but it's one that sticks in my mind because I thought it was an apt description, as a giant flywheel that went round and round without any real connection with the rest of the departmental machinery.

Q: One further question on this. Rusk has been reputed to have been very much an Asia-centric person. He looked towards Asia and left Europe in the hands of George Ball for the most part. But did Rusk make any noises that you know of about recognizing Communist China?

MARTIN: No. I don't think he did. And the business -- I'm not sure, I didn't operate very much at the Rusk level as an office director, but I don't think there was any real pressure. I think there might have been a public expectation, which obviously wasn't very well founded, that Kennedy would do things differently. And even as late as the year after he'd been in office, people were surprised that our ambassador, who had been appointed by the Eisenhower administration, Everett Drumright.

Q: As ambassador to Taiwan?

MARTIN: Our ambassador in Taiwan, our ambassador to the Republic of China, was still there. And again I can't give any inside information because I don't know. I wasn't privy to any. But the speculation was that the Kennedy administration had other fish to fry and did not want to move on the China thing in any decisive way or any radical way because they didn't want to upset the applecart or they had other things that they gave greater priority to.

And, as a matter of fact, of course during the Kennedy administration while the Warsaw talks continued and there was a certain amount of flexibility there on our part, nevertheless they didn't get anywhere. And that was mainly due to the fact that in the '60s, first with the "Great Leap Forward" and then after an interim period, with the Cultural Revolution, the People's Republic of China was in a very radical period. And it was not a period in which they would have been very receptive to any moves. So I feel that whereas certainly from the mid-'50s on the United States had a -- well, from the Korean War on, from '51 on, the United States had a pretty rigid position on China, in the '60s we had a more flexible position (we could have been more flexible), but the Chinese simply were not in a position to respond and didn't.

Q: Did you have, being in charge of Chinese affairs, did you have tucked in your lower file cabinet drawer a plan for recognizing China in case somebody called upon you?

MARTIN: No, no we didn't. I don't think it ever came close.

Q: Just as a professional foreign service officer, you didn't even think this was worth making a contingency plan?

MARTIN: No, I don't think so. Now there might have been more thinking along the line, and I think that would have been a more appropriate place in some ways, in the Policy Planning Staff. They were supposed to be thinking about long-range plans and so forth. We were all bogged down, as many desks were, with handling day-to-day things and reporting and briefing. Certainly we didn't see anything like recognition close enough to make any plans. As I said earlier on this tape, it wasn't until after the '69 Sino-Soviet clashes and what looked to us then as sort of the end of the Cultural Revolution and various other developments that we thought now is the time when we can start changing our relations with China, and the Nixon administration of course coming in January of '69, said right off the bat that they felt our relations with China should be adjusted. As I said earlier, the Chinese weren't in any mood for change with the Cultural Revolution and so forth, and the United States after all, from '64 on was more and more deeply involved in Vietnam and the Vietnam war and the Chinese were backing the North Vietnamese. So again our preoccupation was with Vietnam. China was on the other side. We were certainly not, I was not in the Office of Chinese Affairs at this time, I might add, but just looking at it from this perspective, you might say that in the '60s neither the United States nor China were in a posture where recognition was going to be seriously considered. It just wasn't in the works, that's all.

I might say one other thing while we're on this tape that is of interest, again as sort of a footnote. One of the things that I did in May of 1961 when I was still director was to make an around-the-world trip with Lyndon Johnson and his wife and several other people. He was then vice president. And I was told off to go and brief Johnson about the trip. As a matter of fact, we weren't sure it was going to be an around-the-world trip when we started out. It was supposed to be just a trip to the Far East mainly. But I recall particularly his reaction when I said we were going to Taipei. And he really balked at that suggestion. Now the Democrats were just back in office after being out of office for two terms, for eight years. And Johnson obviously remembered the very controversial China policy and so forth, in that he thought that going to visit Chiang Kai-shek was not going to be very good for his political career. And he really balked at this idea. And I tried to explain why under the circumstances -- he was going to visit a number of countries -- that he ought to go to Taiwan. And he interrupted me and said, "You know, Ed, I want to tell you a story about the man in Texas who had a drinking problem. And he also had a hearing problem. And he went to his doctor about the hearing problem and the doctor said, 'how much do you drink, Joe?' And Joe said, 'I drink about a pint a day.' And the doctor said, 'You better cut that out if you want your hearing to improve.' So about a month later the doctor encountered Joe on the street and he was reeling a bit. And he said, 'Joe, didn't I tell you to cut that drinking out?' And Joe said, 'What did you say?' He said, 'Didn't I tell you to cut that drinking out or it was going to affect your hearing?' And Joe said, 'Oh, yeah, well I did that for a while, Doc, but I found that I like what I drink better than I like what I hear.'" So that's how Johnson felt about going to Taiwan. But we finally persuaded him to go. And he, as he was in other places, was more interested -- the thing he was interested in most as soon as we got to a place was what the joint communique was going to be like. But he did meet with Chiang and we had a dinner party at Chiang's residence.

It was interesting to me in a way because I don't think Lyndon Johnson -- of course he was a Roosevelt protégé in a sense, I suppose, but I never thought of him being particularly a liberal Democrat, I guess he was, but that sort of reaction, almost visceral reaction -- I don't want to be associated with Chiang Kai-shek -- I thought was rather interesting.

Q: Today is March 17, 1988. This is the third of a series of interviews with Ambassador Edwin W. Martin concerning his Chinese experiences. This interview is being conducted on behalf of the Foreign Service History Center of George Washington University and the Association for Diplomatic Studies. Professor Harold Hinton will be conducting the interview.

Ambassador Martin, I think we've now reached the point where it's appropriate to begin talking about your tour of duty in Hong Kong, 1967. And you were Consul General at that time. I myself visited Hong Kong during that period more than once. Of course the period coinciding with the Cultural Revolution, at least the heroic days, so to speak, of the Cultural Revolution on the mainland, but first I'd like to ask if you could tell us something about your view of the utility of Hong Kong as a listening post with respect to China. If I may add, we now of course have an embassy in Beijing which we didn't then, and yet we still maintain considerable listening facilities in Hong Kong. Why is this?

MARTIN: Well, let me go back to my time there before we had an embassy, before we had any kind of office. Before we even had the liaison office that we set up after Henry Kissinger's visit to Beijing in the spring of 1973, Hong Kong was a kind of window on the world for the Chinese and it was one that those countries such as the United States which did not have any official representation there, really any private representation of any kind in China, it was a window that we could look through to see what was going on in China.

And we got our information there through interviews, some very extensive interviews, with people coming out of China, refugees, people who were able to go in and out on business, and also the diplomats of other governments who were stationed there. And we were able during the Cultural Revolution -- as you pointed out, I went to Hong Kong during the height of the Cultural Revolution -- we were able to expand our sources of information because there was an increased flow of refugees. There was a lot of factional fighting among Red Guards and other communist groups who delighted in exposing what they would consider past crimes of the Party. They published their own little papers, they published documents. So there was a real explosion of information at that time about what was going on in China. And we also were able to supply even some of our diplomatic friends in Peking with information which they didn't have.

They were of course fairly restricted in the information they were able to obtain in China. And most of them had fairly small establishments in Beijing at the time. We had a very large establishment in Hong Kong. Our consulate there was larger than most embassies in terms of numbers of personnel, and we had a lot of people who were specialists in China, spoke the language, and we were able to monitor radio and monitor newspapers.

So on the whole this was a, especially when I was Consul General there, was a very fruitful source of information. And of all the sources that we had, it was the most important.

Now I don't know as much about, from personal knowledge, about the value of Hong Kong as a listening post now since we have an embassy in Beijing and we have consulates, but I can still imagine that there are certain types of information which we can get from travelers, and we maintain an expert staff there. I think we've considerably reduced, and we should have reduced, the size of the China- watching staff in Hong Kong, but we still have them there.

Q: May I ask whether you found the British authorities in Hong Kong helpful in getting information?

MARTIN: Yes, they were. The British were helpful. And they could supply information from first-hand observation, of course, which we didn't have. That was helpful. They could talk to Chinese officials, Chinese government, PRC government, and so they could get a certain angle that we couldn't get on the news. On the other hand, we could get a certain volume of information which they didn't have access to, or if they did they didn't have the facilities to utilize it, as we did. I'm speaking here of British officials from Beijing who came through Hong Kong.

Q: In view of all the controversy we've heard in recent years about CIA, is there anything you could say about CIA as a source of information.

MARTIN: Well, as you can imagine, I can't get into detail, but it was, the operation there in Hong Kong was an intelligence collection operation. It wasn't a covert operation. And naturally they played an important part in the information that we got.

Q: There was quite a lot of radical activity in Hong Kong while you were there?

MARTIN: Yes.

Q: Did you either personally or did the consulate general in general feel threatened at any time physically?

MARTIN: Well, I don't think we did except in this sense -- and I'll give you an illustration. When I arrived, which was the beginning of October in 1967, to take up the post of Consul General, we went to the residence from the airport by a rather circuitous route. And I recall that on the road when we were going to the Consul General's residence, there was a paper bag in the road and the driver of our car very carefully skirted this because the radicals or the terrorists or what you want to call them, were sort of randomly leaving bombs around on the roads and on the trolley tracks and so forth. And a number of people were killed.

I recall specifically that a police inspector who was trying to defuse a bomb was killed and the British in their inimitable style staged a very showy funeral with the bagpipes and the slow march and all the rest of it, learning from their long years of imperial experience how to put on a show like this. And of course the British stiff upper lip and all the rest of it. But there was another person who was murdered in a rather gruesome way, kind of a talk-show person on a Hong Kong radio and the Communists didn't like him for some reason or other, or the radicals didn't like him, so he was wiped out.

I think there was a certain feeling of insecurity, but there were never any direct threats against us or against the American consulate. When I went over to Macao, because I was also accredited to Macao, to the colonial government there, I remember seeing the vestiges of demonstrations there. The governor of Hong Kong at that time was David Trench, Sir David Trench. And the Colonial Secretary, sort of the number two man in the government, was a fellow named Gass, and there were slogans painted on the wall, "Hang Trench and Burn Gass."

Of course there had been a good deal of fright in Hong Kong during '67. And I think perhaps my predecessor, Ed Rice, experienced more of that than I did, although things were still pretty hot in the fall of '67. But one thing that rather brought this home to me -- well, perhaps I should say first that quite a few people evacuated Hong Kong and there was a good deal of capital flight in

'67. A couple of personal experiences: My wife was asked by the International Rescue Committee to supervise a number of daycare centers for refugees children, which she did most of the time we were in Hong Kong. And the reason she was asked to do it, partly it was because she had the background in this profession, but the person who had been doing it before was one of those who had left Hong Kong. The other illustration is one of the first official public acts that I was requested to do in Hong Kong was to open a small oil blending plant that Mobil Oil had constructed. And it was one of these things where I was asked to go and make a little speech and cut the ribbon. This was played up, it made headlines in the Hong Kong papers. There are something like a dozen papers in Hong Kong. And it was played up as an expression of American confidence in the future of Hong Kong. And that really brought home to me the extent of the jitters there.

And as a matter of fact, this was, I think, mainly coincidence but in '68 there was a steady recovery of confidence in Hong Kong and the number of incidents tapered off. And of course in China, I think, the army was beginning to crack down a bit on the radicals. But of course this oil blending plant had been planned and financed long before the panic, but the fact is that Mobil went ahead with it, while some other companies didn't go ahead with plans that they had. Early in '68 another American company, insurance company, asked me to come and do the same thing, cut the ribbon, and I did that. And that again was played up as an example of American confidence. So the Americans were among the bolder, more confident people of Hong Kong.

Q: I think it's rather obvious that Hong Kong could have been taken over by some combination of internal and external pressures, say in '67. I realize this is a simple-minded scenario, but why didn't this happen, in your opinion?

MARTIN: Well, pure speculation of course. The one thing that I used to emphasize to America businessmen -- and in '68 and '69, I don't know how many dozen presidents and vice presidents of corporations and so forth would come to my office and ask my opinion about whether they should invest in Hong Kong. And I would say, I certainly cannot make up your mind or the mind of your company whether you should invest, but I can try to give you a picture of how we see the picture in Hong Kong and on that basis you can make up your mind. And the main thrust of it was that Hong Kong is very important, at least at this stage, to China for economic reasons. Ninety-nine percent, roughly, of the people of Hong Kong are Chinese. Most of what they eat and what they wear comes from China. And Hong Kong's currency is a good hard currency. And China makes a great deal of important foreign exchange out of Hong Kong. Also I think Hong Kong is important to the PRC because of what I mentioned earlier, it's sort of a window on the world. And they had there the Bank of China, they had the people who sort of took the place of diplomats or consular officials -- the NCNA people, the news agency people. And it's a place that is obviously valuable to the Chinese, and it's so valuable, as a matter of fact, that although one would think that in this radical period particularly that Hong Kong would have been a target, even then they left it alone.

Now I think, however, that if the radicals had prevailed that they might have --

Q: You mean prevailed in Beijing?

MARTIN: In Beijing, yes. That's what I mean. If they had prevailed in Beijing conceivably they would have gone for Hong Kong, I think they might well have. But they didn't.

Q: Of course they did in fact burn the British mission in Beijing.

MARTIN: They burned the British mission, yes, and there were incidents like that all over the world, as a matter of fact. But that was the radicals who did it. Not only that, but they even took over the foreign ministry for a short time in Beijing. So things were pretty haywire as far as China's foreign relations were concerned. But of course they were also very preoccupied with their internal affairs, which may be another reason that Hong Kong survived.

Q: If we could go for just a minute beyond your experience in Hong Kong down to the present, since obviously Hong Kong is still important to the Chinese for the reasons you mentioned, this hasn't really changed, why have they been so insistent on taking it over when presumably that will degrade some of its utility?

MARTIN: Yes. Well, that's a good question. I would say that in -- what was it, '86 they decided this?

MARTIN: '84, okay. As long ago as that, time goes so fast. Probably the main reason was that they were sort of on the spot. The 99-year lease which they made for the New Territories in 1898 expires in 1997. And there was a lot of speculation, has been for some years, what are they going to do then. It was a kind of deadline that they had to face. And they would have had to have some kind of excuse if they hadn't done anything about it. So I think perhaps that was the thing that triggered that.

Another reason is that comparatively, I think, Hong Kong is probably not as important on the economic side -- it's still important but not as important as it was in the earlier years. They've developed their trade much more elsewhere and so Hong Kong doesn't have quite the relative importance. And the same thing goes for the window on the world function of Hong Kong. They've gotten into the U.N., they've expanded trade. They've expanded their diplomatic relations. And so it just isn't that important. Whether or not the Taiwan situation had anything to do with it I'm not sure, but of course Hong Kong is a piece of Chinese territory, just as Taiwan is, and if they hadn't done anything about Hong Kong, one wonders if they could have pressed the Taiwan issue as much.

The other side of that is that they say they're going to treat Hong Kong in a way that will show the people of Taiwan that they have nothing to fear. So -- and I must say, I think this is pertinent, during my time in Hong Kong I asked, especially toward the end -- I left there in 1970 -- some of my British friends in the government about the future and what would happen. The Chinese presumably would take it over eventually or want to take it over. And I was told that the British at that time would have been glad to negotiate for the turnover but the Chinese were not interested. The Chinese simply were not interested.

Q: If I could go back to Hong Kong as a listening or watching post with respect to the Mainland, you witnessed the hectic days of the Cultural Revolution, what would you say was the major turning point, as you saw it there in Hong Kong. For example, the rise and fall of the Red Guard movement. Were you able to chart that with some accuracy?

MARTIN: Yes, pretty well. I really can't remember very many specifics. The things that stand out in my mind are that we felt that the Cultural Revolution more or less came to an end in '69 with the Ninth Party Congress in April of '69 and Lin Piao's ascendancy, and that the army really was then pretty much in control. And we wrote in this -- in fact I think this was fairly widespread -- that after '69 people talked about the Post-Cultural Revolution activities and so forth. And so it came as a surprise to me, and maybe to other people, when the Chinese began talking about the Cultural Revolution ending in '76. So to go back to '69, I would say that it really seemed to us to be a turning point internally with the army really assuming a very large role and Lin Piao being proclaimed the heir apparent.

And then another turning point in a sense, although it was sort of a culmination, was the 1969 Ussuri River Sino-Soviet clashes. That really triggered almost a panicky reaction in Chinese media. And I think that as far as the PRC was concerned they really began to feel frightened about the possibility of a war with the Soviet Union. So I would say that the spring of '69 was a real turning point. It was from then on that in Hong Kong we began to see minor signs of the Chinese being interested in getting into some sort of contact with us. It was at a low level, nothing at my level, but several of our China experts on our staff were invited to parties where the NCNA people would be and so forth. It was all very low level, but nevertheless you could see that the Chinese in Beijing were reacting to the perceived threat.

Q: I remember having a friendly argument with your successor in Hong Kong in his office a couple of years later. He was quite convinced that the Chinese opening to the United States, whatever one chooses to call it, was motivated overwhelmingly by a desire to get concessions in Taiwan. I said, all well and good, but they've got the Soviet problem, which I think is primary.

MARTIN: I think the Soviet problem was primary. I also think that by 1970 the Chinese were observing our interest in getting out of Vietnam. And this also provided somewhat of an opening. And just to give a footnote to this, following my assignment as Consul General in Hong Kong, I went to the Claremont colleges, specifically to Claremont Graduate Center, in Claremont, California, as a diplomat in residence and visiting professor. And of course this academic scene you know a lot better than I, but in the early '70s, in the spring of '70 it had been pretty bad.

Q: Cambodia.

MARTIN: Well, by that fall things had calmed down a lot but I went to a faculty meeting -- it wasn't a faculty meeting, it was a meeting of some members of the faculty who apparently had been meeting and were very upset about the Vietnam situation. And they were carrying on about it as though nothing had really changed. And I said, well, I just came from Hong Kong. And for the last three or four years we've had between 350 and 400 U.S. naval vessels a year in Hong Kong harbor -- I mean visiting Hong Kong -- and we've had a great deal of R & R and so forth. And I can assure you that the Vietnamization is going on and the statement of the Administration that they wanted to pull out of Vietnam is the policy. Those at the meeting were saying, oh, that's baloney. I said, it's not baloney, it's true. This is happening and I've seen the concrete evidence of it in the last few months that I was in Hong Kong. So the Chinese are not dumb, they could see it, too. So I think that was a factor. Now I really don't think Taiwan had anything to do with it, at least very little. It was primarily -- after all, you know better than I, just as well anyway, that during the Cultural Revolution how isolated the Chinese were. There was one point where they only had one ambassador in a foreign post, and that was Huang Hua in Egypt. In this situation the realistic and hard-headed people in the Chinese government (and they still continued to be there despite the radicals), especially with the Ussuri River clashes, obviously have to look around for some way to break China's isolation.

So I think those are the factors, and that was our judgment there, too.

Q: Was it your feeling that Zhou En-lai genuinely wanted some sort of relationship with the United States really for its own sake, but number one perhaps used the Soviet threat, which of course was real, as a way of leveraging his colleagues into it and perhaps the colleagues like Mao were more resistant? Or did you have any way of forming impressions?

MARTIN: It's hard to know what the internal situation was there. I don't know whether we speculated on that. What we did do was act on the belief that the Chinese would be more receptive. Of course the Nixon administration when it came in immediately said we must do something to try to get China more involved in the world. We certainly weren't ready for anything like recognition, but we were willing to take small steps. And we in Hong Kong as early as the summer of '69 began to recommend, and into '70, recommend the kinds of steps that actually were taken, such as allowing tourists to buy Chinese-origin goods in Hong Kong, which had always been a real headache for us. And eventually allowing American-subsidary companies to trade with China. That had been a very difficult thing, of course. And easing up on travel restrictions. I'm not saying that we were the ones that recommended them and the government acted on it, that's not true. Because they were also thinking the same things in Washington. And as you know, there were a whole series of small steps that occurred in the latter part of '69 and early '70 of the kind that I mentioned which preceded the famous invitation to the American ping-pong team.

I'm sorry, I really didn't answer your question because I don't know what the internal situation was there and I don't remember that we speculated on that much. We just saw what was happening.

Q: I think the point you just made is very important and interesting, more so than the one I was talking about earlier, because there still seems to be an impression in American China-watching circles, I mean academic China-watching circles, that the opening really came wholly from the Chinese side. Which is obviously not true.

MARTIN: Yes, if they just look at the record there and see the things that we did. And another sort of footnote, in August of '69 the new Secretary of State, Bill Rogers, came out with Marshall Green and a small entourage, Mrs. Rogers, to visit Hong Kong among other places. And we had a very good session at my house after we gave them a dinner one night, about what things were happening, things that were changing, our relation with China, what we could do. And we had a discussion, he was very open about it, and so were we, and Marshall, and we all agreed. So these kinds of steps that we took were concrete steps. And the Chinese could read them as such and did.

It's funny. I don't know what it is, academia or the press, but they picked up the Chinese invitation and they sort of ignored the steps that we'd taken. I really think that we took the initiative. But on the grounds that we thought the Chinese would be receptive, whereas in the '60s the Chinese really weren't very -- not that we did very much, but in the Warsaw talks we offered things like exchange of correspondents and easing up on travel restrictions. At one point we offered pharmaceutical supplies and grain and so forth. This was all turned down by the Chinese because in the '60s they were in no shape to do anything like this.

Q: In May of 1970 the Chinese interrupted the Warsaw talks that had just resumed earlier that year, with a great blast over Cambodia, I'm sure you remember that. Was it the feeling of yourself and your staff at that time that this was a very serious and possible termination of the process, or did you expect it to be resumed later, or did you have any sense of it?

MARTIN: Well, I don't think I did. And there again I must say that the Warsaw talks were something that we were not, and I think this was a mistake, but we in Hong Kong were not kept informed about them at all.

Q: Really?

MARTIN: No, we were not, which I think was too bad. We should have been. But in any case, the Cambodia thing I don't remember much about except in a kind of personal way. In the spring of '70, I don't know, maybe March or so, I was invited by Art Hummel, who was then ambassador in Burma, to come over to Rangoon and to brief, or to talk to, some of the Burmese officials about how we saw the situation in China. Because the Burmese, as you know, are very nonaligned nonaligned people and we didn't ever get very close to them on an official basis. They kept us at arms length. But he thought, well, if I have a visiting fireman come in it might provide an opening to get across our point of view. Well, as a result of his invitation, the department asked several other embassies if they wanted me to visit. Besides Burma, I went to Malaysia, to Singapore and on to Djakarta.

And the Chinese press picked this up when I got back and accused me of being the guy that was responsible for this Cambodian business. And I didn't know a damn thing about it, I hadn't gone near Cambodia or anything. But it was just one of these -- they picked up the fact that I visited these countries, although there was no publicity about it. Obviously they were able to do that without much trouble. And they said I was a conspirator responsible for Sihanouk's ouster -- was that what it was?

Q: That's right. That started it.

MARTIN: I had somehow engineered this.

Q: It sounds as though your trip to Burma in early '70 might have had something to do with your appointment as Ambassador the following year.

MARTIN: Well it might have. But of course I had served there before, too.

Q: Oh, that's right. Of course. Yes.

MARTIN: I'd been there before. But I think that was just because I had -- you know, as Consul General in Hong Kong, it was a much more demanding and important job than Ambassador to Burma. And it was considered by the department a Chief of Mission assignment. It's only because Hong Kong is not an independent country that you have to be a Consul General there, but in terms of the department, you get all the perks of a Chief of Mission, such as flying first class and all that stuff. Of course all consulates general, practically, have to report to an embassy. In other words, they're under the supervision of their embassies, but in Hong Kong you are as independent as any mission, you report directly to Washington.

Q: To the bureau. Did you report to London?

MARTIN: No, never reported to London. Had nothing to do with London. Unless it was something to do with British policy. But otherwise we had no more connection with London than we had with Manila or Paris or any other place. It was a totally independent post. And much larger than most embassies at that time. I had 400 people on my staff.

Q: That is big.

MARTIN: Well, another thing. It wasn't just, of course China-watching. That was important and I was the last Consul General there before we had some sort of an office in China. But in '68 or '69, we became the second largest immigration visa-issuing office in the world, because the U.S. had changed immigration laws so that more Asians could immigrate. So we had a huge visa staff. And while I was there, they established an American Chamber of Commerce for the first time in Hong Kong's history. I was the first honorary president. And for the first time our two-way trade with Hong Kong went over $1 billion U.S., so there was a big trade expansion, big -- as I was saying, I myself didn't have much opportunity to do much China-watching. I was engaged in dealing with all these visiting firemen from businesses, from the military, Seventh Fleet ships in there all the time, and we had an awful lot of congressmen, many more than usual because the Vietnam war was still going on. And Congressmen would go down there and they'd come up to Hong Kong to get a breather or to do shopping before they went back to the States. So I really had a seven-day-a-week job on that kind of thing. I had some good people on my staff. Allen Whiting was the deputy my first year and then Harald Jacobson took over. And they were both very good on China-watching.

Q: Is there anything else you think we should cover from your Hong Kong days?

MARTIN: No, I can't think of anything in particular. I might say just as a footnote that among the visiting firemen I had and entertained were Ronald and Nancy Reagan and their two children. He was then governor of California. And California having the largest Chinese population of any state, he had a special interest in Hong Kong. He was on his way to Manila as a representative of President Nixon to be present at the inauguration of President, I guess it was Marcos.

Q: President Marcos, yes.

MARTIN: Marcos at that time.

Q: Shall we move on to Burma?

MARTIN: Yes, sure. But before we do, I would like to say a word about an important aspect of the work of our Consulate General in Hong Kong that I have neglected to mention: its publications. It published a daily survey in English of the China mainland press, and, less frequently, a translation of important Chinese documents called Current Background. These publications were not only widely used by China-watchers in the U.S. government but by many private individuals, especially academics, both in the United States and in other countries. Monthly publications in English and Chinese were also put out without attribution to the Consulate General. Its Chinese publication was said to have the largest circulation of any Chinese language magazine in the world outside of China itself.

Q: Burma must have been kind of a rest after Hong Kong.

MARTIN: Yes, well I had that year in between as diplomat in residence. And that was an interesting year. I did some lecturing for the Council on Foreign Relations at various West Coast foreign affairs groups. That was a fairly good rest for a year.

I remember being at a conference in the spring of '71 and talking about how you could see the relaxation and the easing of relations between the PRC and the United States beginning to take place. One of the professors at the conference was absolutely incredulous. He pointed to all the wicked things that the Nixon administration was doing and said, how do you expect the Chinese government to improve relations with such a reactionary administration? His question showed how some people don't realize that the Chinese Communist leadership is pretty hard-headed when it comes to what they think is in their interest. They're not swayed by some things that people think they're swayed by.

Q: Henry Kissinger has called Mao Zedong the most realistic statesman he ever encountered except de Gaulle.

MARTIN: Sure. Well, I think Zhou En-lai was, but I don't know whether de Gaulle was or not. But they are. They are capable. It's amazing how people can be ignorant of this fact, and that they are willing to deal with anybody if they think it is in China's interest no matter how ideologically opposed they may be.

Okay, I can't think of any more Hong Kong at the moment.

***

Q: Your position as consul general in Hong Kong was actually, within the State Department, considered to be chief of mission.

MARTIN: Chief of mission, yes.

Q: A major chief of mission.

MARTIN: Yes. Well, at least I got the perks of the chief of mission and was considered chief of mission because, unlike other consul generals, I was not under the general supervision of an embassy. I was independent, in an independent post that reported directly to Washington. At that time, particularly, Hong Kong was in the category of a chief of mission job because we had primary field responsibility for reporting on the whole of mainland China. I was there during the height of the cultural revolution, when we began to get far more information than we'd been able to get before, so that we had an important assignment beyond just Hong Kong. U.S. trade with Hong Kong exceeded $1 billion -- and this was back in '69 -- for the first time in history, when I was there. We at one time, I think it was the Immigration Act of '68, was it, that opened up Asia? Asians -- I think it was about that.

Q: '67.

MARTIN: '67, maybe. It probably was '67, because it was '68-'69 that we suddenly jumped into the forefront of visa issuing offices. I had a total staff there of 400, which was about four times what I had in Rangoon, and much larger than most embassies. So it was, in terms of importance, and especially at that time, I think, well deserving of being a chief of mission.

JOHN F. MELBY
Political Officer
Chungking/Nanking (1945-1948)

China White Paper
Washington, DC (1949)

John F. Melby was born in Oregon in 1913. He received a bachelor's degree from Wesleyan and a master's degree and doctorate degree from the University of Chicago. He entered the Foreign Service in 1937. His career included positions in Mexico, Venezuela, the Soviet Union, and China. He was interviewed in June of 1989 by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

Q: Then, we'll move on to your China experiences. You were assigned directly from Moscow to China?

MELBY: No. From Moscow, I had been assigned to the San Francisco conference.

Q: This was within the summer of '45?

MELBY: Yes. I left Moscow when Roosevelt died, the morning after.

Q: April of '45.

MELBY: Yes. I went directly to San Francisco. In the meantime, Averell had been talking about having officers with some Russian experience to various obvious spots around the world. And one of those, of course, was Chungking.

He originally suggested that maybe I'd want to go to Budapest. Well, I didn't want to go to Budapest. He finally came up with Chungking. "Why don't you go there and see what the Russians are up to? It's no question of becoming a China officer. Just go out and look, and see what they're doing."

In my case, there was also somebody else involved. Ed Flynn, who had been the political boss of the Bronx, and whom Roosevelt had brought out to Yalta with Stettinius, after Yalta, came to Moscow, Flynn came along with him. Stettinius went back to Washington, but Flynn stayed in Moscow.

He had a secret commission from Roosevelt. "Stay and talk to Molotov about a possible Vatican-Kremlin concordat." Flynn was a prominent Catholic layman, close to Spellman. And I was sort of assigned to Flynn. The OWI thing was finished when Joe Phillips, who'd been editor of Newsweek, came out to relieve me. So I didn't have much to do then.

Averell just assigned to me to sort of look after Flynn, who had a drinking problem, and he liked the ladies. Mostly, Averell just wanted me to see if he was drinking. But he wasn't. He was on the wagon, and he never did take a drink again. But Ed and I became very good friends!

He spoke to Molotov, who said, "Why not? When you go back, on your way, you're going to stop off at the Vatican. Talk to the Pope about it." He said, "Why shouldn't the two of us have some sort of concordat? Time means nothing to either of us. Try it and see what happens." Molotov said, "I suspect the Pope will be a little less interested than I am. But maybe Spellman can do something with him." So Flynn then did stop off and he did talk to the Pope. And before he left, he said, "When this thing is set up, I'm going back to Rome as the President's representative to be in charge of this concordat. Would you like to come with me?"

I said, "Sure."

He said, "All right. We've got to get you out of here."

And this is where the Chungking thing came up. I, more or less, suggested that myself. Because Roosevelt then died. But Flynn still thought that Truman, once he did his homework -- which Truman was very good at -- that the agreement between Molotov and the Pope would still be worked out. So Flynn said, "You go to Chungking, and have a look at it. When I get this thing set up, I'll send for you." He said, "In the meantime, you cannot tell the Department about this."

Averell knew about it, of course. Averell sometimes told the Department things, and sometimes he didn't. This one he didn't do. So, I did finally get out to China.

Q: First, did you take part in the U.N. San Francisco conference?

MELBY: Yes. I was in the group of Foreign Service officers that were assigned to various delegations. Delegation liaison.

Q: What did you do?

MELBY: Oh, it was getting them California neckties and running errands for them.

Q: It was really a "meet her and greet her," in a way?

MELBY: That's right, and keep them happy. If they got in trouble or didn't know where they were, arrange things for them and show them around town. Just generally make yourself useful.

Now, I was the only one of the whole group who had nothing to do. Because the Russians, right from the beginning, let it be known that they didn't want any help. And I was never even permitted on the floor where the Russian delegation was at the St. Francis Hotel! They wouldn't let me up there. Molotov came. He was head of the delegation. So I didn't have, really, anything to do. But I had an awfully good time. It was three months.

Q: Could you discern a real change in the Russian-Soviet attitude towards the United States? From the rather friendly open thing to, now the war, at least in Europe, was over --

MELBY: Little things in the cold war hadn't really started. But, there were indications that it was going to be tough. And on our part, too. It was as much our fault as it was theirs.

Q: Well, how did you get to Chungking? Could you describe the situation in Chungking?

MELBY: I got to Chungking by going through Europe. Because the war was over. Japan had just surrendered. The Pacific was hopeless. So I went the other way; I went eastward.

I stopped off in Rome on my way. My brother had been in Switzerland all during the war. He was in the Foreign Service, too. He came down from Bern to see me in Rome. We spent a week there.

Then I went from Rome to Karachi, Calcutta, over the hump into Kunming and then down to Chungking.

Q: Who was the ambassador in Chungking and what was the situation at that time? By this time Japan had surrendered.

MELBY: The ambassador was one Major General Patrick J. Hurley, that perfect model of a modern major general. Happily, by the time I got to Chungking, he was gone. He'd gone back to Washington on leave.

I say "happily" because I'd known Hurley before. He and I, believe it or not, are fraternity brothers. At the time of my first meeting with him, he was grand consul of the Sigma Chi fraternity, when I was consul of my chapter at Wesleyan. And I'd met him a couple of times since. And just as I left Moscow, Hurley showed up. I don't know what he was doing; I've forgotten now. But he stayed with us at Spaso and huffed and puffed his way around. So I didn't particularly want to see him.

Q: What was his reputation, for those who wouldn't be familiar with him?

MELBY: Well, you see, he had been in China. The President sent him out, mainly, I think, to get him out from under foot in the White House. To work on a coalition between the communists and the Nationalists. And Hurley arrived all pro-communist. He said, "They're just like a bunch of Oklahoma Republicans with guns." And he went scooting to Yenan, which was communist headquarters at this time, and he produced a draft agreement. Or rather, Mao Zedong had produced an agreement. And Hurley said, "This is fine. Except it's missing something." So Hurley added the American Bill of Rights. Mao looked at it, and his eyes bugged out. He said, "Chiang Kai-shek will never buy this!" And Hurley said, "Yes, he will, if I tell him to."

Mao said, "Okay, go ahead, if you can sell it, it's fine with us."

So they all signed it. And Hurley took it back to Chungking with him and showed it the Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek. His eyes bugged out, too. He said, "You must be crazy to bring me this! I'll never sign anything like this." And at this point, Hurley started getting very pro-Nationalist.

Q: Why was that?

MELBY: Hurley was crazy. I think he was beginning to get a little senile. And he stayed on. He came out originally just as special envoy. He was made ambassador when Clarence Gauss resigned, in frustration. And he wasn't ambassador for very long. He certainly raised a lot of hell while he was there.

Q: You arrived there just after he had left?

MELBY: I arrived after he left to come back on consultation. He thought he was returning.

Q: What was the feeling at the embassy? Here you arrive, you're the new man on the block, you're not an old China hand.

MELBY: It was absolutely incredible. Everybody jumped on me, the new man, everybody to tell me his story of the skullduggery going on, or the corruption going on, of Hurley's behavior, of everyone trying to undercut everybody else.

Q: This was within the embassy?

MELBY: Yes. It was an incredible introduction to things.

Q: You had been in a wartime embassy in Moscow where at least you had no problems.

MELBY: No internal problems.

Q: This was a squabbling embassy? It was not "us against Hurley," it was "us against us?"

MELBY: Well, it was a squabbling embassy. All the political officers in the embassy, after Hurley had left, all joined with George Atcheson, who at that time was chargé d'affaires, in signing a telegram to Washington protesting Hurley's views on what was going on in China, and what should be, and what our policy should be. And Hurley was simply furious when he saw it, when he got back to Washington.

And it was all that group. Davies, Service, Atcheson, Emerson, they were the ones in the Foreign Service who had the trouble. All the trouble with the China officers has been Hurley's doing. Those of us who came after Hurley never had any trouble because of China.

Q: So, really, this is a slightly different focus. Because at one point, the focus was, "All right, a group of officers lost China." But it was a more focused group than that. Hurley had a Foreign Service hit list.

MELBY: The cohesion within the embassy wasn't bad at all. The Foreign Service officers got along all together. They weren't trying to cut each other's throats.

But there were all sorts of people floating around. There was the Milton Miles business out in Happy Valley. He was an American admiral who was advising Tai Li, who was head of Chiang Kai-shek's secret police, on how to torture communist prisoners and so on.

And one mission after another was coming out and going off in all directions, and another mission would come, and so on. And none of this was coordinated within the embassy. Clarence Gauss never managed to get control of those outside his own immediate embassy family.

So that when the special advisors came out for Chiang Kai-shek, or when Vice President Wallace was out there, Lauchlin Currie came out on a special mission. Roosevelt was a great one for sending missions out.

Q: How about Truman?

MELBY: Truman never did that.

Q: So this is before your time, that all this was happening?

MELBY: The hangover was still there. The Army was fighting the Navy, and the Navy was fighting the Marine Corps. Everybody was into everybody. When George Marshall came, later on, that ended right there.

Q: You were there when George Marshall came?

MELBY: Yes. I had been there a couple of months.

Q: Did he have much to do with the embassy?

MELBY: He had nothing to do with the embassy. Literally. We were around, and we briefed him from time to time. Initially, of course, we did a great deal more than we did later on. After he got to know his way around, he really had nothing to do with us at all.

Q: You were the new boy on the block, you had these China hands, people who really were experienced in China. What were they saying about the situation and what we should be doing?

MELBY: They saw the situation and said, "It's hopeless." All the career officers, without exception, agreed that the communists were going to win. Didn't mean they looked on it with any great favor.

On the other hand, they just thought the Nationalists were hopeless. They were corrupt beyond measure. They were going to get worse. And as John Davies put it in one memorandum, "The fact is that the future in China belongs to the communists."

So what were we going to do about it? Are we going to live with it or are we going to fight it? And how can we fight it? And, are we prepared to take on the whole Chinese community?

Obviously, the answer was, "No!" Just saying, "the future belongs to the communists," didn't mean that you agreed with it. "It" being the idea, or with them. It was simply that you saw that at that time, they were absolutely incorruptible. They were dedicated. They knew what they were doing. They were in touch with the masses.

That's one thing that Mao insisted on: always stay in touch with the masses. Chiang Kai-shek had lost touch completely. We were backing a dead horse. We might as well get used to it, learn to live with it.

Q: Well, there were some changes within six months of your arrival in October of '45. So by spring of '46, your embassy had moved to Nanking and you had a new ambassador?

MELBY: No, Dr. Leighton Stuart wouldn't come on board until late summer.

Q: Why did you move to Nanking?

MELBY: Because the government moved there.

Q: Was this closer to the scene of action?

MELBY: Well, it didn't matter that it was closer to the scene of action. Diplomatic corps always move with the government.

Q: Who was the new ambassador? And can you describe how he operated?

MELBY: John Leighton Stuart. He'd been a missionary in China for 50 years. The last 20 or 25 years, he'd been president of Yenching University, which was one of the model universities of China.

General Marshall asked him to be ambassador because most of the leaders, prominent people, not only the Kuomintang, but the communists, too, had all been students of his. And considering the special Chinese relationship between teacher and student, the general thought that perhaps Dr. Stuart could persuade the Chinese to sit down and talk to each other, and maybe this way you could work out their differences.

And Dr. Stuart agreed with him. He thought it was worth the chance. So he took the job. He didn't know anything about American foreign policy. He couldn't care less! He was interested in China. He wanted to see the fighting, civil war ended in China. It just killed him to see what the Chinese were doing to each other.

Q: How did he operate?

MELBY: Well, he felt himself responsible to Marshall. And then, of course, when Marshall left, to the Department, in a sense. Particularly since -- by this time Walt Butterworth, who was minister-counselor, had gone back as head -- Marshall took him with him -- of our Bureau of Far Eastern Affairs. So there was that connection Stuart had with the Department.

But, beyond that, nothing. He never moved into the chancery. He never had an office there.

Q: You were mentioning your later career as a teacher. Could you explain about this Chinese student that you had?

MELBY: Well, he wasn't a student. He was an older man who was getting his Ph.D. at Notre Dame, Yu-ming Shaw who's now head of the Taiwanese Information Service. And I met him in Toronto at either a meeting of the American Historical Association or the Association for Asian Studies. He was just finishing his doctoral dissertation, which was a biography of Dr. Stuart. He was puzzled by the meaning of the initials on telegrams. He'd been going through Foreign Relations, and of course, as usual, everything that came out -- whether they were telegrams or dispatches -- were always signed by the ambassador. And Shaw was confused that somehow Dr. Stuart's views didn't seem to be consistent, about China and so on.

But what he didn't understand was the way the embassy worked. Most of that stuff, Stuart would sign; he signed everything, of course. Just usual things. That didn't mean he'd seen it, let alone read it. All that was done in the chancery.

Sometimes Butterworth did it, sometimes the rest of us in the political section did it. Or we did it together and it would be a collective work. Sometimes our initials would be on it, and sometimes it wouldn't. But it all looked as though it was Dr. Stuart.

Q: But he was not a hands-on ambassador?

MELBY: In no sense of the word, no.

Q: You were in the political section. What were you doing, when we got to Nanking?

MELBY: Not only was I in the political section and doing political reporting, but also I had set up our press translation service, which was an idea I had picked up in Moscow. And I organized that, and I was running that. I was also the embassy liaison with USIA. I was the embassy liaison with our cultural affairs office. I was the embassy press officer. In fact, I had a half a dozen jobs that I was doing.

Unfortunately, I was just doing too much. I was "China" in there for a while. Particularly since I was the only one left in the embassy who had served in Chungking. So every new person who came in to Nanking, in the diplomatic corps, from any embassy around town, the first you had to do was come talk to me. "What was it like in Chungking?" Which took up a lot of my time.

Q: This is always something that is forgotten. I know that, at one point, I was the old hand in Yugoslavia. And I spent a great deal of time in our embassy giving the background of what we were doing.

MELBY: And then also, the last year I was there, I negotiated the treaty that set up the Fulbright Foundation, which was the first Fulbright Foundation to be set up.

Q: This was in the midst of the civil war?

MELBY: Oh, yes. The civil war was coming to an end, but we still were setting up the Foundation. And I'd negotiated the treaty. And therefore, I was made the first director of the Foundation, and I operated that first year, too.

Q: Could you describe how the embassy was reacting to this civil war that was moving, seemingly slowly, but in an unstoppable way, towards Nanking?

MELBY: Fatalism. "It's coming." It just felt like the grave-watchers, watching the whole civilization, 2000 years of history going down the drain.

Q: Did you have any feeling at the time, "Gee, we better be careful how we're reporting this"? Were you under any, sort of, "Be careful, fellows"?

MELBY: No. It didn't touch us there.

Q: You reported it as you saw it? Nobody was saying, "These reports aren't going very well"?

MELBY: We knew they weren't going over very well, but we did it, anyway. We recorded what we saw.

Q: Were you getting anything back from the Department of State saying, "Would you re-examine this issue? Isn't there a bright side to what you're reporting?" Or something like that? You didn't feel there was much backwards and forwards --

MELBY: We were reporting, and the people to whom we were reporting had, at one time, been in the embassy. That was the way the China service operated. John Carter Vincent was the head of the bureau before Walt Butterworth took over, and he knew as much about China as anyone. George Atcheson had been there, too. So an awful lot of stuff we might have reported, we didn't, because we knew the people to whom we were reporting, we knew that their experience was similar to ours and therefore there wasn't any point in repeating the obvious. A lot of the, shall we say, local color, didn't get reported. Not for lack of interest, but just simply because we assumed that they knew it already. Therefore, why repeat it?

Q: Did you have much contact at that time with the Kuomintang government?

MELBY: Oh, sure. Continually. Day to day. As a matter of fact, Dr. Stuart's Chinese secretary, who had been with him for many, many years, Philip Fugh who died only a few months ago at the age of almost 100, was very close to Chiang Kai-shek. This was one reason that we didn't encourage the old gentleman to go around the chancery, because we knew that the minute Dr. Stuart got a telegram, he would show it to Philip. And the first thing Philip would do would be to read it, and then call for a car and go over to Chiang Kai-shek's office and show it to him!

The world's worst security leak was going on, and Marshall knew it and Butterworth knew it. In order to protect ourselves, insofar as we could, we just simply got where we didn't show the old gentleman any telegrams. Or Walt would take the telegrams over to him and let him read them, and then he'd take them back. He wouldn't leave them with him. Dr. Stuart knew why he was doing it and was kind of amused by it.

Q: But he was interested in other things?

MELBY: Sure. He didn't really care.

Q: Were there any repercussions from bad reports about the situation that would somehow, either through Philip or through reports getting out of Washington, get to Chiang Kai-shek? With Chiang Kai-shek or his officials saying, "What do you mean, reporting that we're corrupt?" You know, sometimes when you report on something, the word leaks out, so that the people you're reporting on know and will call you to task.

MELBY: The Nationalists didn't do that, because they knew that what we were reporting was the truth. And in a sense, they didn't care. The way the corruption was going, it was every man for himself, anyway.

Q: How did you view Madame Chiang Kai-shek?

MELBY: I didn't take quite as dim a view of her as a lot of people did. I felt kind of sorry for her. I didn't know her at all well. She belonged to two worlds. She had been educated in the States, southern-belle type. Chinese didn't trust her, because they thought she was too Westernized. Westerners thought she was still too Chinese. So that she really didn't have many friends. She had a few old Chinese missionary ladies -- biddies -- who used to come around to tea. But otherwise, she was pretty isolated.

However, the GMO did trust her, in the sense that he relied on her as interpreter. He didn't speak a word of English. He didn't even speak Mandarin, for that matter. He had to conduct Cabinet meetings with an interpreter, because his dialect was Fujian which is a hillbilly dialect, if there ever was one! He didn't even speak good Chinese. But she was very useful to him, that way. I know that General Marshall thought that the GMO really relied on her a great deal. And he, too - - although he didn't much like her -- in a way, felt kind of sorry for her. She was an impossible woman. Very demanding, like all the Soongs. The whole clan were like that. But she was a very beautiful woman. Very interesting to see her. When she was with Chinese, she was the demure Chinese lady, with the high dressed neck, and flat-chested, and so on. When she was with Westerners, she suddenly was all full-bosomed and so on, and her skirts were slit up to her hip. She had very good-looking legs, too.

She was very adept at using her feminine wiles. She took them all into camp. I think the only one who was never affected by her, was General Wedemeyer. He really didn't like her. And he didn't react to her at all.

Q: Did she try anything on him at all?

MELBY: No. With him, it just didn't work. But even Marshall, who was a fairly austere kind of person, he softened up a bit with her. She didn't fool him.

Q: You were doing an awful lot of what we would call, USIA work there, cultural exchange and all this. How about the press corps? Was there much of an American press corps there?

MELBY: Oh, there was a large one there.

Q: Things really got nasty with the press corps and the embassy in Vietnam. But this was almost a different era. Were you all on the same side?

MELBY: Oh, yes, the American press corps, including a lot of foreign newspapermen who weren't American, they had pretty much the run of the embassy.

The New York Times men, Tilman Durdin and Hank Lieberman, the whole crew of them, we would show them telegrams and talk to them.

We only had one newspaperman, once, who betrayed a trust with me, who broke a confidence, but he's the only one. He's now dead -- John Roderick. Drowned in Tokyo Bay. The only one who I ever had any reason to question.

We talked to them quite frankly. They were all disgusted with the regime. We all felt the same way.

Q: Were they able to get to the Chinese armies and see what was happening?

MELBY: They did a lot better job than we did. Anybody from the embassy trying to go out just couldn't do it. It was too obvious. And people like me, we didn't speak the language. We didn't have very many language officers, and they didn't speak the local dialects, anyway, either.

But even the press people, sure, they got out with the armies a good deal. And they did quite a bit of field work. But one of the things that came out -- we had a reunion of newspaper people from the '30s and '40s in Arizona, about four or five years ago. I was invited to go with them and be with them. The thing that we all agreed on, that John Fairbanks pointed out, who at one time had been head of the OWI office in China, "After all, we have to face the fact that no Westerner ever really got out and knew the peasant. Nobody really knew what was going on in the villages. Only the communists knew that."

Q: How did you view our constituent post? We had a consulate in communist held territory for some time, didn't we? When they took over, how about in Mukden?

MELBY: That was when the civil war was over. They were there under house arrest. Angus Ward was in Mukden. He was in real trouble. He was accused of espionage, which, frankly, he was guilty of! He'd been working with what was known as ESD-number something or other, which was a CIA outpost. He was up to his eyeballs, working with the crew that he had up there with him in Manchuria. The people in --

Q: Tsingtao?

MELBY: Tsingtao was closed down. But, Peking was open. We had a consul general there. Edmund Club was consul general there. He was under house arrest. Not bothered.

The people in Shanghai had trouble. We had a lot of trouble in Shanghai. The mobs got out of control. It wasn't the government; it was just random looting going on. Fortunately, nobody was killed. Shanghai was a different city. It was a lot of foreign interest, in the international settlement, in the French quarter. All these were fair game under the communists. When they took over . . .

Q: Can you describe what happened as the People's Liberation Army was beginning to take over close to our embassy? What happened, as far as our embassy was concerned?

MELBY: We evacuated people. I was head of the committee to decide on the evacuation. Sort of by default. Butterworth, back in Washington, probably set up a committee in the embassy, composed of Fred Schultheis who actually was CIA, who was against evacuation at any time. He couldn't bear the idea of being separated from his wife. And Lewis Clark, who was minister counselor, who'd gone through the rape of Nanking in 1937.

Q: Didn't want to have that. That was with the Japanese troops.

MELBY: God knows that we should have evacuated a month ago. Which left me, who had no connections there, with the final vote.

Q: May I ask, were you married at the time? Was your wife with you?

MELBY: Yes, I was married at the time. She was not with me. I had no attachments in China at all.

So I had to make the final decisions. And we were under a lot of pressure from the GMO. "Please don't evacuate!" Because he knew we were considering it, and we were going to do it. He said, "Don't do it, because it will just give the advantage to the communists."

Finally, it got to the point where I just had to make the decision, "Look, I'm sorry, but we've got to do it." I didn't want to get all these people -- we warned Americans, private citizens, to get out. Which meant mostly missionaries. Most of the business community had left.

Q: How did the missionaries respond?

MELBY: Oh, as usual, missionaries don't do it. They never want to go. And then they get into trouble, and start yelling because the embassy doesn't get them out of trouble. The usual thing.

Embassy dependents. Finally, I just ordered them out. We sent them all over to the Philippines.

Q: What's the timing here?

MELBY: October '48. What finally decided me on it was we weren't getting very good information out of Manchuria. I decided to go up to Mukden again and have a look at it myself. I was going up with Dave Barrett, who was assistant military attaché, who was absolutely bilingual in Chinese. Even gutter Chinese! We were waiting for a plane in the airport in Peking. The planes started shuttling in from Mukden, unloading. Dave Barrett just looked at them and said, "John, I don't have to go to Mukden. When the generals start to evacuate the gold bars and concubines, the flap is on." And he didn't go. But I did.

I got there, and it was clear that Mukden was going to fall. The communists were in the outskirts of Mukden. It was just a matter of time and they were going to take it over. And once Manchuria was gone, then you knew that all China was gone.

Q: Why was this?

MELBY: Traditionally, he who controls Manchuria, controls China. It's always been the case. There was the famous book by somebody, back in the '30s, Manchuria, the Cockpit of Asia.

I got out on one of the last planes out of Mukden. I went right back to Nanking and issued the evacuation order: "Get the people out and get them out fast."

Q: When we're talking about getting the people out, who are we talking about?

MELBY: Embassy dependents, which we had a lot -- we had a staff of 100 people in Nanking, plus dependents. So it was a large contingent.

Q: The ambassador wasn't playing much of a role in the evacuation?

MELBY: Not in the evacuation, no. We would talk to him about it. Actually, his secretary then, whom Walt Butterworth had brought with him from Madrid, held a (inaudible), whom later on I married, Dr. Stuart's secretary. She was wonderful with the old gentleman. She even got along with Philip.

Q: I'm trying to get some of the dates here. So the evacuation came in October, '48. What happened then?

MELBY: They left, and there was a skeleton staff in the embassy. And finally, people like me were ordered out by Washington.

Q: When was that?

MELBY: I left in mid-December of '48. The Department's rationale was that they didn't want to take a chance on anybody who, by any stretch of the imagination, had been connected with any kind of intelligence activity to be caught by the communists.

Q: This was after Ward?

MELBY: No, this was long before Ward.

I was perfectly willing to stay and be occupied. But I could understand how the Department felt about it. Because we didn't know! Things were so bitter at this time, there were incrimination so bad. We had long lost contact with the communists. We didn't know what they were thinking, what they were doing.

Q: In your time there, with the Marshall mission and all, had you had any contact with the communists?

MELBY: Oh, yes. They had an office in Chungking, and one in Nanking. And we all used to see them quite regularly. I knew Zhou En-lai very well. He was the head of the communist office. In fact, Zhou En-lai was the first Chinese I ever met. I had lunch with him the first day I was in Chungking.

Q: How did they deal with you, yourself?

MELBY: Fine. We got along all right.

Q: Talk about "Where are we going, our two countries?"

MELBY: Sure. They were quite open, frankly. No problem. It was easier to talk with them than with the Nationalists. You knew the Nationalists were lying most of the time. The communists never lied.

Q: Were you able to keep up these contacts as the war got worse?

MELBY: Marshall left in January, '47. The summer of '47, Chiang Kai-shek outlawed the communist party. So all their offices in Nationalist China closed. From then on, we had no contact whatsoever.

Q: Were you ever having Chinese coming in from the street saying, "I'm an unofficial emissary of this, and would you do this?" Were there any kind of undercover contacts with you?

MELBY: Well, once the communist party was outlawed, no; they weren't coming into the embassy. Fred Shultheis, who really was CIA, he had a network. People were coming to him, he had his contacts.

Q: How was he calling it? Did he have a different view than anybody else?

MELBY: No. He used to sit in our embassy meetings. He used to draft our telegrams for us, too, sometimes.

Q: So he was reporting: "Hear they come. They're irresistible. This is a corrupt Latin regime."

MELBY: No.

Q: So, it wasn't a matter of hawks and doves, or hardliners?

MELBY: Mr. Shultheis had impeccable Chinese. He could sit and read comic strips in Chinese. He would read cheap fiction; just sit in a rickshaw and read it, just to keep in practice. He was absolutely fluent in it. His contacts were extraordinary.

Q: But again, there was unanimity within the mission.

Were you having any people from the United States, from the left, coming over saying, "This is a great thing"? And trying to make contact? And you, particularly in your USIA capacity, were you finding yourself dealing with people who were looking forward to this great change in China?

You're shaking your head.

MELBY: No, they weren't coming. We had a raft of visitors coming. But they were people like Eisenhower, when he was Chief of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Colonel Lindbergh came out at one point. Henry Luce used to show up. Bill Bullitt came. People of that sort. We had an endless stream of that kind of visitor.

Q: We've both been attending a historian's paper on Henry Luce. Could you describe your impression of Henry Luce? He was a very influential person in our China policy for some years, as a publisher of Time and Life magazines.

MELBY: I had only met him once. I finally met him once in Nanking. I ran into him on the street in Nanking. He was headed in to see Dr. Stuart. He stopped me -- he knew who I was -- and we stopped and talked about China. He was giving me a pathetic lament. I believe he said, "Those of you who criticize people like me for our stand in support of the Nationalists, you've got to remember that we were born here. This is all we've ever known. We had made a lifetime commitment to the advancement of Christianity in China. And now you're attacking us for it. You're asking us to say that all our lives have been wasted; they've been futile. They've been lived for nothing. That's a pretty tough thing to ask of anyone, isn't it?"

I said, "Of course it is! I'm still asking it of you. Because things have changed."

I think Henry Luce was a very troubled man. I think he beginning to have real doubts -- this was in the fall of 1947 -- as to what had happened in China, and had he been wrong after all. Particularly he had them when he was in China. He'd go back to New York, I suppose, and he'd just mirror-image a bit, and he'd revert back to the old China lobby syndrome.

Q: Did any of the members of the conservative wing of the Republican Party come and visit during this period? Or was their criticism pretty much limited to being back in Washington?

MELBY: No, they used to come out. In the summer of '47 we had one group or another. We had some 40 or 50 congressmen who came out. Walter Judd was always dropping in or out. They weren't just criticizing. Wedemeyer came out on a fact-finding mission.

Q: When they came out -- you were all seeing one thing. Weren't they seeing the same thing?

MELBY: Yes. And while they were there, they would be saying, "Isn't it dreadful, the things that are happening here!" Then they'd go back to the States and go back into the old pattern again.

Q: Why is this?

MELBY: I don't know. Don't ask me.

Q: Was this puzzling to all of you?

MELBY: Life is a paradox.

Q: You left again, at the end of January, 1948. When did Nanking fall?

MELBY: Nanking didn't fall until late spring of '49. It took quite a bit of time. Peking had already fallen; not by the time I left, but it did fall in January.

The battle of Huai Hai had already started, which was the final engagement. Which I happened to be witnessing because I'd taken one last trip to Peking, mid-December. We were having lunch with Dave Barrett. We began to hear the thuds. One of the mess boys ran in and said, "If you want to get out of here, you'd better get out, because the communists are shelling the airfield!"

So we left lunch right away, and sure enough, they were shelling it. It was a beautiful day, beautiful as only Peking can be in the fall, with the sunshine on the persimmons. It was a clear day and we flew high over the battle of Huai Hai, over the China plain, and you could see out there so clear.

You could see exactly what Lin Piao was doing. This huge enveloping movement that was broken up into literally hundreds, maybe thousands of small pincer movements. Each one moving in, pinching off one group of Nationalist troops after another. It was magnificent! It was fascinating. At the same time, it was horrible. You could imagine the death and destruction that was going on as villages were burning and people were dying. And when it was over -- that particular campaign lasted for two months -- there was no Nationalist Army left. The communists had destroyed them all.

Some they captured; there was something like 900,000 prisoners before it was all over, living prisoners, to say nothing of those who had been killed. It was the only real conventional battle the communists fought in the civil war.

Q: The rest was just guerilla warfare?

MELBY: Except for the hundred regiments campaign in 1943, which was a disaster for the communists. They weren't ready for it. It was their Tet offensive, so they say.

Q: You went back in 1948, then, to Washington. Did you go back to the State Department?

MELBY: Yes. I was assigned to the Philippine desk. I had leave coming. So I took the leave and went to Texas.

When I came back, that was about the time we finally decided to do the China White Paper. So I was still officially assigned to the Philippine desk, but I was asked to take charge of the White Paper. It took about five months to do.

Q: Could you explain what the China White Paper was?

MELBY: The White Paper was a decision on the part of the Department, Secretary of State, with the approval of the President, who was enthusiastic about it, to write the record of our relationship with China. With special reference to the period since 1944. And set forth the record, and set it straight. And tell it as it was, no matter who got hurt.

It was not to be a propaganda job, presenting one side. It was to set the record out as we, I, saw it. And that is exactly what we did.

I must have gone over several hundred-thousand documents, picking out essential ones, and writing it, and getting people -- I wrote about half of the White Paper myself. Other people wrote other chapters. We worked on it 18 hours a day, from March until August.

We produced this 1,500-page document, which came out August 8, 1949. George Kennan, who at this point had gone to the hospital with another attack of his stomach ulcers, took the White Paper with him to the hospital and read it straight through. He said that it was the greatest state document ever produced by the American government!

The purpose was to call the dogs off from the China lobby. And it didn't work.

Q: It was a group that was not particularly interested in the facts, was it? They essentially had political fish to fry in the United States.

MELBY: The China lobby, insofar as you can define it, was the antecedent of the so-called Committee of a Million Signatures. It was composed of people from a whole political spectrum, from the far right to the far left, who had only one thing in common: for whatever their reasons, they were in complete support of Chiang Kai-shek and the Nationals. That was the only thing they were united on.

Q: Did you ever puzzle out why so many people were so entranced with this admittedly, in retrospect, obviously corrupt, not very pleasant regime?

MELBY: If you can define it, I think it was anti-communism. The American obsession with communism. It drew together an awful lot of people.

Q: From all spectrums. How did you feel? You produced this paper, and then it just didn't seem to have the effect. Was this a great disappointment to you?

MELBY: Oh no, it was just the opposite. It just accrued more fuel for the fire. I thought, "Well, at least the communists are going to be able to say there's something to it. Maybe they'll like it, and so what." And so help me God, Mao Zedong read the damn thing and proceeded to write five editorials for the official communist newspaper attacking it as proof of how imperialistic American policy had been.

So I figured, "Yes, you can't win." [Laughter]

Oscar Vance Armstrong was born in China to American Parents in 1918. He received his bachelor of science degree from Davidson College in 1939. Subsequently, he served in the U.S. Army during World War II. His Foreign Service posts included Canton, Peiping, Kuala Lumpur, Hong Kong, London, and Taipei. He was interviewed by Willis Armstrong in March 1991.

Q: Oscar, it is nice to have a chance to get on tape your recollections, reflections and philosophy about your long experience in dealing with particularly Far Eastern affairs on behalf of the U.S. Government. How did you happen to get into the Foreign Service in the first place?

ARMSTRONG: I guess it goes back to the fact that I was born in China of missionary parents.

Q: It makes a difference.

ARMSTRONG: It does make a difference. But I didn't go directly from that background into the Foreign Service. I had a detour after college and went into actuarial work for a couple of years. Then the war came along and I was in the Army Air Corps and ended up in a POW camp in Germany. I had a lot of spare time to think and like a lot of people decided that I didn't want to go back to what I was doing. I preferred the Foreign Service instead.

Q: What was your first assignment in the Foreign Service?

ARMSTRONG: This was back in the time when we had a 3-months training program at what used to be called the Lothrop House (wasn't it?) up there on Connecticut Avenue where it splits. We were all given a chance to express our preferences. I logically enough expressed China, and I got Canton.

Q: They got it right that time. So you went to Canton in 1946?

ARMSTRONG: Went there towards the end of '46. I was assigned to what I guess all officers nowadays are assigned to Consular work. There was a huge backlog of Chinese who wanted to come to the States from that part of China which was the area from which most Chinese-Americans in the past have come. There was also a long history of fraud in that area. So there was this huge human tide waiting to sweep into the consulate and we had very few resources to cope with it. I probably let more people into the United States with a claim to citizenship who didn't have a valid claim than any other officer in the Service.

Q: Statute of Limitations will protect you now.

ARMSTRONG: Thank you. But it was an interesting period there. The area was still very much affected by the Japanese war-time occupation, of course. There was not much political activity in that area when I was there that I was aware of, even though Canton traditionally has been one of the areas of revolutionary activity.

Q: It was an area more affected by Westernization, wasn't it, than some other parts of China?

ARMSTRONG: Yes, partly because of its proximity to Hong Kong, or course. It was also the place from which Chiang Kai-shek started on his 1926 Northern March to unify the country.

So I had a year there. Only a year, for reasons that I don't know are relevant to this operation -- I almost got fired from the Foreign Service then.

Q: Did you now. I assume it was not for cause.

ARMSTRONG: Well, there were about three of us who got into trouble with a senior officer. Finally the embassy sent somebody down to find out what the problem was and decided the best thing was to clean house. So I came out, smelling like a rose, assigned to Peking -- to the language school in Peking.

Q: That was 1947.

ARMSTRONG: The end of 1947. I stayed at Peking just long enough to have Mao Zedong establish the People's Republic of China. We left in November of 1949. The consulate general then stayed on and was finally forced out by the Chinese who said they were going to retake some of the buildings that at one time housed the U.S. Marines and at our time housed the consulate general.

Q: That happened when?

ARMSTRONG: It was April of 1950.

Q: So you were three years in...

ARMSTRONG: Well, I left earlier having finished language school in November of '49. I spent about two years there.

Q: But you had had some childhood training in Chinese.

ARMSTRONG: I grew up speaking the language but left China, as many missionary families did, in 1927 and then because of family medical problems we stayed in this country for three years. At the age of 8 or 9 when you are trying to be an American in an American community you don't retain your Chinese very well.

Q: That was exactly my wife's experience. She was a missionary's daughter in Japan and she grew up speaking Japanese and came back at the age of 8. She lost it.

ARMSTRONG: I don't know if it is relevant to this, but you might be interested in telling her this. At a social function many, many years later, I found myself sitting next to a woman who turned out to be a clinical psychologist. Somehow we got into the usual opening conversational gambit of where are you from? I said, "Which do you want, the simple or more complex answer?" She said, "Well, give me the complicated one." I told her about China. We talked about that and then I said, "You know, I lost a lot of my language. I went back to China, but most of the time I was in Shanghai then where there is a different dialect than I had known. Is there some way that you or others could expedite the process of relearning the language -- bringing some of that memory back up to the surface -- perhaps hypnotism?" She said, "Yes, probably, but not completely successfully depending on the subject. But it is risky because you don't know what other memories you are going to bring up."

Anyway, I finished language school in Peking and was authorized to leave. The Communists took Peking, if I remember correctly, in January of '49 so we had a little less than a year there after they took over the city.

Q: What were your impressions of the initial impact of the Chinese Communists taking over at that point?

ARMSTRONG: Well, in the first place the takeover was not by military action. The communists had been moving down into the area and eventually the Chinese general commanding the armies in the area, General Fu Tso-yi, in effect defected with all of his forces. So Peking was under siege for a while but it was not shelled.

I would say from the point of view of the Chinese people there, in the first place a lot of the younger people, students, etc., had already been slipping out through the Nationalist lines joining with the communists, probably not knowing too much about communism, but they wanted a change. They didn't see a change being promised by the Nationalist regime. I have always felt that Chiang Kai-shek lost China partly because of some serious military mistakes he, himself, made...

Q: But they were basically political mistakes.

ARMSTRONG: Basically he did not have, and was unable to project a vision of a changed China. Many, many Chinese did not want the old China, the old corrupt regime. So, whether you call it political or ideological, or what, he was just unable to break away from the way he had done things in the past or the circle of people he had around him.

Going back to the Peking takeover, I think it was rather a complex mixture of relief that they were not going to be caught up in the fighting, and hope that some sort of change was going to occur. This was at a time when the communists were still talking about what they called "new democracy." They were not implementing, whenever they got to a city, the harsher measures they adopted later. They essentially took over the administrations and kept them doing what they were doing, etc. So, some hope for some change, but also some concern because they didn't know much about these people.

Q: The capital was not in Beijing...

ARMSTRONG: Right. At that time it was not called Beijing, it was called Peiping, which means "northern peace" rather than "northern capital" -- a term which those of us who in government were involved in Chinese affairs had to continue to use for many years, because we did not recognize Peking as the capital, once the communists established it as the capital. We kept saying Peiping. I still say Peking frequently and when people ask me, "Shouldn't you say Beijing?" I say, "Yes if you feel you must say 'Pa-ree' rather than Paris."

So, it was an interesting period. Those of us in Peking did not suffer unduly. There were some inconveniences and some humorous aspects of them. I don't know if you want that sort of anecdotal material. Elsewhere there had been serious problems. Angus Ward up in Mukden had been in prison accused of spying. He was eventually released.

Q: Those of us who knew Angus and had served with him in Moscow were sure that he had beaten those Chinese to an inch of their lives. He was a rough man.

ARMSTRONG: Was he? I was there when he came out. Our travel was obviously circumscribed. We couldn't go outside the city without getting permission. There were some other minor hardships. The communists, of course, didn't officially recognize the diplomatic status of the consulate or of the people assigned to it. One historical footnote: Howard Sollenberger was the head of the language school; he later became head of FSI here; and many years later, after the Chinese had established their liaison office here, the number two at the office, a fellow by the name of Han Xu, was interested in taking a tour of FSI. As soon as they met, Han Xu said, "It is nice to see you again." Sol couldn't figure this out. It turned out that Han Xu had been the city government official who had come to the consulate general on October 1, 1949 to officially, although they didn't recognize us officially, notify the consulate general that the People's Republic of China had been established and turned the document over to Sol at the gate of the consulate general. Many, many years later they re-established contact. So I left in November.

Q: That is when they closed out.

ARMSTRONG: Well, I left before they closed the consulate because I had finished the language study.

Q: You weren't assigned to the consulate per se.

ARMSTRONG: Yes, I was assigned to the consulate but we had our own...

Q: But you were doing language study.

ARMSTRONG: Doing language study essentially.

Q: Were there any unpleasantness when they finally did close out the consulate or was it a peaceful departure?

ARMSTRONG: Relatively peaceful. I think there was some minor harassment. There was a little bit when we left, but we managed to get all of our belongings out. Earlier the Department had authorized us, as the communists were closing in on the region, to ship out both our families and furniture. Almost everyone shipped their furniture and almost nobody shipped their families home. But we still had a good bit left -- in fact acquired some more as things were so cheap. We managed to get our personal things out. There was harassment at the station because they wanted to look at everything, etc.

Q: You came out by train?

ARMSTRONG: Went down to Tientsin by train and then by coastal steamer to Hong Kong and back to the States.

***

ARMSTRONG: I left in 1954, I guess. Either '54 or '55. My next assignment was Hong Kong to become part of the rather sizeable China Watching group which was one of the main functions of the consulate general there.

Q: How many people did you have in the China Watching group?

ARMSTRONG: Oh, goodness. I have a bad memory for that sort of thing. I would say probably about, leaving the Agency aside, about ten Foreign Service officers at that time. We also had, and this was what I did for a while when I first arrived, a very large press monitoring and translation unit of Chinese. And a publication procurement operation. The good entrepreneurial spirit of the Hong Kong Chinese pretty soon learned that the U.S. government was willing to pay good money for publications from the Mainland, newspapers, magazines, etc. So we had a good bit of success in getting that kind of thing.

The translation unit supplemented what FBIS was already doing, which was monitoring the radio.

Q: Go back a minute. When the consulate was shoved out of Peking in 1950, all other consulates were also removed weren't they?

ARMSTRONG: Not simultaneously.

Q: Within that time frame...

ARMSTRONG: Within that time frame there was no more official US representation. There is still controversy, incidentally, in academia and elsewhere, over whether or not there were some Chinese communist overtures that we, the US, failed to pick up and respond to. One in particular I remember but I won't go into detail here. But that debate to some extent continues.

Q: One could always, of course, point out that, if one were arguing that case, that as long as you had Walter Robertson as Assistant Secretary of State, no....

ARMSTRONG: Well, that was later, of course.

Q: This was later. When was he out?

ARMSTRONG: Leighton Stuart was then still our ambassador to China, the former head or President of Lingnan University up in Peking, a former missionary. And it was during that period that there were supposedly some of these overtures.

Q: I see, this was in an earlier stage.

ARMSTRONG: Yes, an earlier stage. Later, once the Korean War broke out, there was no possibility of obtaining a rapprochement. But, before that, my own view is that there was not a real interest in China, and at that time when they were adopting a policy of leaning to one side, as they put it -- that is you can't be neutral in the cold war between the US and the USSR, you have to take sides. It would have been extremely difficult to establish any kind of diplomatic relations.

Q: So there are a whole multitude of reasons as to why that was unlikely.

ARMSTRONG: I think it was unlikely. But you recall that we sort of shifted our position on the Chinese civil war, the US government did.

Q: After the Marshall Mission.

ARMSTRONG: After the Marshall Mission failure and after the Chiang Kai-shek withdrawal to Taiwan and so on. We initially did not come out for full support of the Nationalists in Taiwan. We said in effect that we were not going to get involved. But then, of course, June, 1950, the Korean War, and the Chinese, so-called volunteers that came in that year....

Q: Refresh my memory. When was it that McCarthy got into guys who had served in China, like....

ARMSTRONG: I was trying to... I saw Jack Service recently out on the West Coast.

Q: Oh, did you. His son joined the Foreign Service and worked for me in the State Department. A good officer.

ARMSTRONG: Oh, did he? Is he still in the Service?

Q: I don't know. That was a long time ago.

ARMSTRONG: I was trying to remember the other day and I said I would have to refresh my memory and get the dates right here, but I haven't done it. Early 50's.

Q: I was thinking the McCarthy era when it went hammer and tongs was primarily under the Eisenhower Administration.

ARMSTRONG: That's right.

Q: So it had to be 1952 on.

ARMSTRONG: I guess Eisenhower came in the '52 election. So '53 or '54.

Q: Of course, by that time, the fat was in the fire as far as the Korean War was concerned and there was no question about the US position towards Communist China.

ARMSTRONG: No, there wasn't. By that time we began to give strong support to the Nationalists on Taiwan.

Q: As well as continuing support to the Koreans.

ARMSTRONG: Yes, yes, of course. So I was in Hong Kong for about two years. I always seemed to have stayed at posts two years. The idea of double tours never quite caught up with me.

Q: It was kind of hard on your furniture.

ARMSTRONG: Yes it was.

An interesting period in China because not only the Korean War aspect, but developments within China itself. That was when they had completed their land reform program, at great human cost, and they were trying to develop their economy with a modicum of success and a good deal of Soviet assistance.

Q: This was well before the break.

ARMSTRONG: Yes. And they were doing some rather sensible things given the overall context in which they forced themselves to operate. So it was interesting to be there.

Q: Your work with that group -- were you looking primarily at political matters?

ARMSTRONG: Yes, mainly political. We also had some who were looking at the economic effort.

Q: I remember the intelligence reporting that came out of Hong Kong and that area. I was involved in COCOM and trying to keep things away from the Chinese. So naturally we read what was going on and tried to evaluate what that meant in terms of what we should try to withhold. We had a special list on China which had more simple technology than in the case of Russia. People used to argue that the Russians could buy it and sell it to the Chinese. My own judgment at the time was that that was too complicated for the Russians to handle. The bureaucracy would render any major transaction impossible.

Then, after Hong Kong?

ARMSTRONG: After Hong Kong I stayed in China Watching, being assigned back to the Department to take over the China Office in INR. I was there for four years -- one of the longest tours of my career.

Q: From '57 to '61.

ARMSTRONG: Again, that was a very interesting period in China. You had, I don't want to put too much into China Watching jargon, but you had what was then known as the Hundred Flowers Campaign. This was to relax the atmosphere and tolerate some criticism. It got out of hand and they immediately clamped down. You had the anti-Rightists campaign then. One of the earlier manifestations of what later became a very consistent pattern in China under the Chinese Communists, suspicion of the intellectuals.

Q: When was the so-called cultural revolution? Was that....

ARMSTRONG: That came later. That came in the mid-60s. But this earlier Hundred Flowers campaign, when Mao was surprised by the volume and vehemence of some of the dissent and decided to crack down, wasn't the first, but was the first time that they really threw the fear of Marx and Lenin into the intellectuals of China. Then you had the Great Leap Forward in '58, one of the world's craziest experiments. Then the communes as part of the Great Leap Forward.

Q: That was when they took the intellectuals out and put them in pig sties.

ARMSTRONG: That was a part of it. The main thing was when they...back tracking just a little bit. China needed land reform because you had eighty percent of the Chinese working the land who were deeply in debt to the landlords, etc. The Chinese carried it out in a very violent manner. Nobody really knows how many people were killed, but I suspect the figure is in the millions.

Q: By collectivization.

ARMSTRONG: Yes. But they did distribute the land. Then gradually they started with mutual aid teams, then cooperatives, then collectives and eventually they moved into communes by which time the peasants had lost all the land. They had no land or implements to work with, everything had been communalized. And the system didn't work. Together with the Great Leap Forward, the commune system and some bad weather, China came closer to the type of traditional famine for which China was infamous than any other time of the communist rule.

Q: That was 1950...?

ARMSTRONG: That would have been '58, '59 and the really bad year was 1960-61. The Chinese popular parlance still refers to it as the Bad Years. Nobody really knows how serious the problem really was. One demographer later said that China should have 28 million more than they seem to have. That doesn't mean 28 million died, but there were many deaths through starvation and malnutrition. Infant mortality rate was very high.

Q: Also, probably the statistical methods were questionable too.

ARMSTRONG: Sure.

Q: I remember doing the Russian census which came out about 1940. The growth rate of the population by 1940 was much less than you would have expected given the normal indices in Russia.

ARMSTRONG: Yes.

Q: We attributed that in large measure to the loss of people during the 1930 collectivization. Millions of people died there, nobody knows how many. We suspected in the embassy in 1940 in Moscow that the Russians had fiddled the figures and raised them higher than the actual count to cover up some of the losses. We had no way of proving that, however.

ARMSTRONG: The other major development during my time in INR...as a matter of fact I was down at a West Virginia State park with the family taking a vacation when it happened...was the Taiwan Straits Crisis in 1958, when it appeared that the Chinese were trying to oust the Nationalists from the islands right off the mainland's coast -- Quemoy and Matsu. Quemoy, being only three or four miles off the coast, was heavily fortified. One issue for the United States was "Are they actually going to start an invasion of the islands? If not, are they going to try to interdict the islands and if so what should we do about that?"

Q: I remember. I was in the Department until April of 1958, and then I was in Ottawa. I remember that very tense time.

ARMSTRONG: There was another issue, although I never thought it was a serious issue. That is whether or not, if we got involved in some way, were the Soviets going to get involved. There were some who felt we had edged towards nuclear war. I never felt that way. Partly because the Soviets, although giving a reasonable amount of support to the Chinese, didn't come out with their real sort of vigorous support and threatening language vis-a-vis the West until it became apparent that the whole thing was going to calm down. Many years later we learned that one of the problems of the Sino-Soviet relationship was the failure of the Soviets to give China as much support as China thought it should have.

Q: The Russians don't like the Chinese very much. They are scared of them because there are more Chinese than there are Russians. And they have been scared of the yellow peril more than anybody else for years.

ARMSTRONG: You may have heard the Polish joke about the genie that appeared to a Pole with three wishes. He said, "I want the Chinese to invade Poland and then withdraw." So they did. "Okay," said the genie, "You get another wish, what do you want?" "I want the same thing," he said. So it happened again. When he asked for the same thing the third time, the genie said, "Okay, but why do you want this?" He said, "Well, every time they attack us and withdraw they have to cross the Soviet Union."

So I was in INR until 1961. Then I had a year at the National War College.

Q: After 1964 what did you do?

ARMSTRONG: I went to Hong Kong as deputy principal officer. I was there for two years. That particular position was not a China Watch position but the post was still China watching, although Hong Kong itself was becoming more and more important.

Q: Hong Kong, itself, was beginning to assert its own identity. We were getting all of that tremendous economic activity.

ARMSTRONG: That's right. Therefore, mainly on the economic side, there was a good bit of American interest. I had a lot of American companies coming in. But the China watching activity at the post continued because we didn't have any post closer to China proper. As many of the number two jobs were in many places, one of my main function was to keep wheels turning smoothly.

Q: You performed the DCM functions which is to make sure that you do everything that needs to be done that other people are not doing.

ARMSTRONG: That's right. And not inject myself unduly in what they or the consul general are doing. Again it was an interesting two years.

Q: Who was the consul general?

ARMSTRONG: Ed Rice.

Q: I knew him, sure. He and I were neighbors here.

ARMSTRONG: Ed subsequently had a Diplomatic-in-Residence job during which he started a book. He produced a carefully researched book about Communist China up to that time. Recently I heard he has just come out with a new book about...well the title is something like "Wars of A Third Kind." I am not sure.

Anyway it was a very pleasant two years.

Q: Oh, it is a very attractive place.

***

ARMSTRONG: I came back to Washington to take over the public affairs job in FE. That was rather a tough period, because the Vietnam war was going then and was the main issue, of course. I think the name was changed by then to EA.

I worked under Bill Bundy who was Assistant Secretary during that period.

Q: Oh, yes, I remember that.

ARMSTRONG: He was a very bright guy with a rather short temper. The main activity I found myself in was with the press. I was constantly being contacted by journalists who were trying to get some background information or something they could use. Things were not always going well in Vietnam. The Tet Offensive occurred while I was there.

Q: Your tour was from....?

ARMSTRONG: 1966 to 1968. As did many others, I had great respect for the fellow who was our spokesman at that time, Bob McCloskey. He was in a tough position at a tough time. He did a good job.

Then I went from there to DCM in Taiwan.

***

Q: That was when we were officially recognizing Taiwan.

ARMSTRONG: That's right. Walter McConaughy was our ambassador. It was an interesting period, but not as interesting as it became, because I had left by the time we made our first open overture, the Kissinger trip to China. What was interesting about Taiwan, of course, was seeing the rather remarkable achievements -- one of the worlds best land reform programs, etc. There was not yet political liberalization, that occurred later and is still going on. Chiang Kai-shek at least had enough sense to let some of the well-trained and imaginative technocrats do something about the whole economic thing beginning with land reform. They did a very impressive job, with our assistance to be sure. By the time I got there most of our direct assistance had ended.

Q: They were on their own by then.

ARMSTRONG: Yes. Since then they have become an economic powerhouse. Second or third largest foreign reserves in the world. We have an enormous trade deficit with them which has become a problem. And interestingly enough in the more recent years, beginning to get an international position again, mainly because of their economic clout. They rather astutely use that sometimes to, in effect lure little countries, because sometimes they can get more out of Taiwan than they can Peking, so they establish diplomatic relations with Taiwan. There have been five of those recently.

Q: There is an opening for Albania, isn't there.

ARMSTRONG: It was interesting to see a Nationalist government that had done so poorly on the Mainland doing so well in Taiwan. Now the order of magnitude was so different that you couldn't say, "Why didn't they do it on the Mainland?" They didn't relax their political control, which they now have started, beginning with Chiang Kai-shek's son when he became president.

***

Q: I visited there in 1972, after the Chiefs of Mission meeting in Hong Kong. I stayed with McConaughy. You had left. I saw you on the way back, you were at CINCPAC.

ARMSTRONG: That's right.

Q: I was introduced to the president, Chiang Kai-shek's son. Had quite a nice conversation with him -- some of it in Russian.

ARMSTRONG: He studied in Russia and has a Russian wife. A delightful person. She was very quiet and very much behind the scenes. He was cut from quite a different cloth than his father. He was a much more forward-looking person than his father. Not nearly as hidebound. His father was very austere, reserved. The son was quite outgoing. Before he rose to very high positions, he liked to have informal parties. He liked to drink until his health got to the point where he couldn't. He was one of the world's masters at the Chinese finger game. This is where you throw out a certain number of fingers and try to guess the total. The usual thing was that if you lost you downed a small glass of wine. He couldn't do that any more for health reasons so he had what the Chinese called a "dai biao", which is a drinking representative. Occasionally he felt he had to lose just to give the other person some face. Then his aide would knock one off.

I had left by the time of the big political shock to them, the Kissinger and Nixon trips. I moved on to CINCPAC as political adviser under two admirals. You couldn't find two more different admirals. Admiral McCain...

Q: I knew Admiral McCain in London.

ARMSTRONG: He was a gutsy guy, not an intellect but he knew how to play the political field.

Q: Nobody's fool in any respect.

ARMSTRONG: Theoretically MACV in Vietnam reported to him and he instructed MACV what to do, but he knew perfectly well that was not the way the war in Vietnam was being handled. And where some people would have a hard time finding his proper role in that situation, he did. It wasn't a very major role, but he played it well.

Q: He went from London out there, didn't he?

ARMSTRONG: I don't remember.

Q: Because I left in '67 and he must have gone quite directly to CINCPAC.

ARMSTRONG: He retired while I was there. Much to his regret, he didn't get extended and had to leave. He was replaced by Noel Gayler. A very different sort; the new type of admiral. More like Bud Zumwalt. Remember that Zumwalt came in as CNO and started shaking things up? Well Gayler is more of that type. And he had as J-5 a fellow who was even more "gung ho." That created some problems. Occasionally one of the more junior officers would come to me and say, "Hey, look, this fellow is off on this wild idea, can you get involved and reel him in?"

We did a lot of traveling out of there which was good. I got a chance to visit a lot of areas. McCain was a workaholic and if he wasn't doing something he became very nervous. One of the things he could do was to travel, so he spent a good deal of time traveling around.

Q: Did he have his wife's sister there too?

ARMSTRONG: Yes, Rowena. There is a wonderful story. Jack is not known for a great sense of humor. The two of them were almost identical twins. Unless you got to know them well you could easily mix them up. She spent a good deal of time living with them. I think she had been divorced or something. Somebody once said to Jack, "How do you tell them apart?" Jack said, "That is their problem."

Q: I knew that story too. They were both very nice women.

ARMSTRONG: Yes, they were.

Q: Were you able to reel in the other admiral now and then?

ARMSTRONG: Yes. He was a nice guy, just a bull in the china shop always trying to get something new done.

Q: Of course his subordinates couldn't talk back to him whereas you could.

ARMSTRONG: Yes. I learned more about how the military operated there then I did at the War College.

Q: Yes. You were in an operational command, so to speak.

ARMSTRONG: I was impressed by many of the officers. Two things impressed me. They had some excellent officers despite the fact that assignment to a unified command was not a sought after post, because you were losing your service identity.

Q: Don't you think this is changed under General Powell now? It seemed to me one of the great examples of the recent war was inter- service cooperation.

ARMSTRONG: I think it probably has changed. The other thing that impressed me was that....we at the State Department have a great deal of resources, I mean people, etc...the Pentagon has enormous resources and plenty of people and the automatic tendency is to use them. So it will throw 30 people at it.

Q: So does the CIA.

ARMSTRONG: Yeah.

Q: They throw people at it and it is good if they throw the right people.

ARMSTRONG: So it was a very pleasant two years. From my point of view two years is enough, because you are in an advisory capacity not in a chain of command position. So you keep having to find ways to work yourself in to things that are going on -- they don't automatically come to you.

Q: You were there from ....?

ARMSTRONG: 1971 to '73.

Q: I stopped to see you there on my way back from Hong Kong in '72.

ARMSTRONG: Then I was asked if I would come back and head up the China Office. By that time Nixon had been to China. Incidentally, that news was a bomb shell for Jack McCain. For one thing, he loved to give slide illustrated briefings and every once in a while there would appear on the screen a map with all the communists area colored red, with tentacles going out to grab the rest of the world. And all of a sudden China couldn't be a huge red blob with tentacles menacing the rest of Asia.

Q: Those are our new friends.

ARMSTRONG: So I came back to Washington just about the time we were changing...

Q: I was in the Department then. That was in '73.

ARMSTRONG: I came back in the summer of '73. We had agreed to the establishment of Liaison Offices. David Bruce was the first.

Q: Yes, I talked to him before he went out. I also talked to him when he came back. He said he was glad to be back because there really wasn't anything to do there.

ARMSTRONG: That is true. Initially that was a period when the Chinese had achieved what they wanted -- a relationship with the US, essentially for anti-Soviet reasons. They were not going to give much to the US until we went further.

Kissinger, of course, was interested in the relationship primarily for strategic reasons, not for sort of normal bilateral reasons. But he was interested in the bilateral thing to show that the relationship was healthy. At times he was pushy, trying to push the Chinese for that reason. And it didn't get very far. The bilateral relationship remained, things like trade and an issue called the old claims-assets issue, if you remember what that was. That was the blocked Communist Chinese assets that we had blocked at the time of the Korean War, and American claims against China. Eventually there was the trade-off between the two. We would negotiate that at times and think we were very close to it, when all of a sudden they wouldn't approve the final step. I'm sure it was because the Chinese had said, "Not until you take another step toward diplomatic relations."

Exchanges were negotiated but at a non-official level.

Q: It was an anomalous situation because we officially were doing business with both countries - both Chinas. And both Chinas were saying you can't have a two China policy.

ARMSTRONG: And essentially we were having one, of course.

Q: Yes we were. I have forgotten how long that period was. It started in '73.

ARMSTRONG: It started actually with the Nixon visit in '72. The Kissinger secret visit was in 1971.

Q: But the Chinese ambassador came here. I was in the Department and used to have lunches with him. Bill Rogers would have him in for lunch and some of us would attend.

ARMSTRONG: Yes, that was in early '73. It lasted until President Carter took the decision to recognize Peking.

Q: The two Chinas carried over into the Carter Administration.

ARMSTRONG: Yes, if you want to call it that. We then took the final step of derecognizing the Nationalists on Taiwan; recognizing Peking as the government; establishing full diplomatic relations with them; letting our security treaty with Taiwan lapse; and withdrawing what military we had there, which wasn't very much. So it lasted up until January 1, 1979, which I believe was the official date. It was announced in December, 1978.

Q: It was really from 1972 until 1979. A long period.

ARMSTRONG: Yes it was.

Q: As Director of the China Office you were dealing with both missions.

ARMSTRONG: No, EA established a Taiwan Office, so I was the Mainland office. I think that was done so that one wouldn't have a conflict of interest, so to speak.

Q: Who did Taiwan when you were in the China Office?

ARMSTRONG: Well, let's see. I think Tom Shoesmith had it for a while. And I think Burt Levin had it for a while. I was not there. I had left by the time.....

Q: You were there until....?

ARMSTRONG: I was there until '76, I guess. Then I had a period of some months, 4 or 5 months, as one of the Deputy Assistant Secretaries in EA covering China, Korea and Japan. Art Hummel was then Assistant Secretary.

Q: He is a very fine guy.

ARMSTRONG: Yes, he was. He ended up, I believe, as the senior ranking officer in the Foreign Service when he retired. He had made Career Ambassador and had been Career Ambassador longer then any other CA then serving.

Incidentally, an interesting little historical record is being set here with respect to China. Art was born in China; then Win Lord, whose wife was Chinese; then Jim Lilley who was born in China and is ambassador now.

Q: I didn't realize he was born in China.

ARMSTRONG: Yes. And the rumor is that he wants to retire and will be replaced by Stape Roy, who was born in China. If that happens, I don't know of any other country in the world where we have had three out of the four last ambassadors born in that country. Amazing. I think it will end with Stape just because of the passage of time...

Q: The line of missionaries is running out. Your father was with the...?

ARMSTRONG: Presbyterian Church.

Q: Presbyterian Church.

ARMSTRONG: It was an interesting period. You had a closer contact with Kissinger than I had. But part of the interest was working in the context of the Kissinger tight control.

Q: My encounter with Kissinger was over a Chinese matter.

ARMSTRONG: I think you mentioned that. That was the Rolls Royce engines or something?

Q: The Spey engines plant. I think I recorded that in my own text. That was a case where he had sold the pass. He told the British that we didn't mind. Then he wanted me to be the guy who would be the goat. He wanted me to recommend that we wouldn't buy it and I wouldn't do it. So when he became Secretary I figured I wasn't going to be there very long and I wasn't. He let me stay on until Tom Enders came just because he needed somebody there.

You were DAS for how long?

ARMSTRONG: About four or five months. And then the new team came in with the Carter Administration. The new Assistant Secretary wanted to set up his own new team.

Q: Who was your Assistant Secretary when you were DAS?

ARMSTRONG: Art Hummel.

Q: Oh, yes. And he went to China as ambassador.

ARMSTRONG: Later. Art has had four ambassadorships, Burma, Pakistan, Ethiopia and China. I think he went to Pakistan after EA. And then to China in 1981 and was there until '85.

Q: That was after the Reagan Administration came in.

ARMSTRONG: That's right. He followed Leonard Woodcock, the head of the auto union.

Q: Who was Carter's Assistant Secretary?

ARMSTRONG: Dick Holbrooke.

Q: Wasn't Harriman in as Assistant Secretary for a while under Carter?

ARMSTRONG: No, earlier under Kennedy. Back in the early 60s.

LARUE R. LUTKINS

Chinese Language Training
Yale University (New Haven, Connecticut) and Beijing (1946-1948)

Consular Officer
Kunming (1948-1949)

Office of Chinese Affairs
Washington, DC (1949)

Political Officer
Penang, Malaysia (1950-1952)

Political Officer
Hong Kong (1954-1957)

Office of Chinese Affairs
Washington, DC (1957-1961)

LaRue R. Lutkins was born in 1919 and raised in New York. His career with the State Department included assignments in Cuba, China, Malaysia, Japan, Hong Kong, Ceylon (Sri Lanka), and South Africa. Mr. Lutkins was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on October 18, 1990.

LUTKINS: At that point, I again expressed my interest to Personnel in being assigned to China. It was renewed interest, because I had done it earlier while I was in Havana. I had kept in touch with the Bureau of Far Eastern Affairs, particularly the Office of Chinese Affairs, about my interest. And they were interested, particularly after the war, in rebuilding their Chinese language officer strength. So when I got back to Washington, I guess it was in January, they put in a plug with Personnel to have me go into Chinese language training.

It was not my original thought. I had thought I could be sent out to one of our China posts. During the war in Havana, I had applied for such a posting and actually been assigned to Chungking, but I never got there because Havana wouldn't release me until my replacement came. By that time, I was in the Army.

So, as a result of the intervention of the Office of Chinese Affairs, Personnel agreed to post me to Yale University, where they were beginning to put officers through what amounted to eight months of preliminary Chinese language training, following which we went out to Peking, or Peiping as it was then known, for another year and a half.

Q: So you then went to Peking from '47 to '48?

LUTKINS: Let's see, yes. The better part of '46 was at Yale, and then I got out to Peiping or Peking at the Beginning of '47. The language program training lasted till mid- 1948. Had a couple of months just attached to the Consulate staff there, and then was sent down to Southwest China to head up the Consulate at Kunming.

Q: Were there any other Foreign Service officers taking Chinese at the time?

LUTKINS: Oh, very much so, yes. As I said, they were rather depleted in their Chinese language officer corps strength, so they were engaged in quite a program of building that up. At Yale, while I was there, in the term or class before me, there was Ed Martin (China Ed Martin, not the South American economic Ed Martin). He and another fellow, Jim Spear, were already there. Spear subsequently resigned. When I was there, there was a chap named Bob Rinden. We were in the same group. We were soon followed by others including Doug Forman, Al Jenkins, Ralph Clough, Oscar Armstrong, and Jerry Stryker group.

Q: I wonder if you could give just a little feeling about this. There's nothing like a group of relatively junior officers getting together and studying a language. I mean, they look at the society to which they're going and all. How did they feel? This was, of course, a tumultuous time in China. How did you all, or you particularly, feel about the Kuomintang, the Communist side, and Chinese society as a whole?

LUTKINS: Well, that's a big question. Sure.

Incidentally, that group of Chinese language officers (and we have remained very close, because we tended to associate throughout our careers and still see a lot of each other, at least those in the Washington area) came from different sources. But a good many of them, well, certainly Oscar Armstrong was brought up in China of an American missionary family. Both Ed Martin and Doug Forman were of missionary families, although their families had been in India, not in China. But Ed Martin's wife was of an American missionary family in China. I had, of course, no previous contact at all with China except general interest. Ralph Clough had been out there as an exchange student at Lingnan University. And then some of the older language officers like Tony Freeman had also been at Lingnan.

Well, to get back to your basic question. I think we all were very sympathetic to China, through background or reading and so forth, and had read a lot about what was going on there during the war. For instance, one of the books that was current at the time was called Thunder Out of China by Theodore White and Annalee Jacoby. It painted a rather disillusioning picture of what was going on there, and so did most of the reports coming out of China. We also were, of course, aware of the problems that some of the older Chinese language specialists and Far East specialists had been facing. This was even before the McCarthy accusations, but they were already under attack by people like Ambassador Hurley.

Q: Patrick Hurley was a particularly vehement antagonist towards the Foreign Service, wasn't he?

LUTKINS: I never had any personal contact with him, so I couldn't comment on that too accurately. But certainly, from what I've heard from older colleagues who associated with him, they didn't regard him quite in the same sense as McCarthy. I think they felt he just wasn't terribly bright, and also that he was rather boastful and so forth, and sort of a loose cannon more than anything else. Many people thought that Roosevelt sent him to China to get him out of the way. In any case, after reading books like Barbara Tuchman's Stilwell and the American Experience in China and other books of the same sort, Hurley doesn't come off terribly well. Some of my friends certainly found him very difficult to work with. But in any case, this colored our general approach.

In addition to that, it wasn't too difficult for anybody with a reasonably open mind, when once one arrived on the spot, to see that the situation was a very difficult and unhealthy one. It wasn't so much that we were hostile to or critical of the national government, the Kuomintang government. They faced extraordinarily difficult problems. The war had weakened them badly. It forced them into the interior, where they lost their foundation with western middle-class roots and were forced back into the old China, depending on warlordism and this sort of thing. Inflation was rampant, which again was not by any means entirely their fault; it was just a wartime situation. The bottom line to all this was that the regime was very obviously weak, it lacked control over much of the country. There was the usual traditional Chinese corruption, both in the military and in the civil government. The regime really lacked the ability to do anything effective economically on behalf of either the middle class, to which it really owed most of its support, or to the peasantry around the country.

And then, contrasted with this, you had the Communists under Mao Zedong who, whatever their methods, seemed to have a real conviction and spirit, and to be, at that time at least, fairly self-sacrificing in making efforts to do something on behalf of the people and not merely being interested in enriching themselves.

So one couldn't help be rather skeptical of the claims of the national government that it was reasserting its control, and also a little pessimistic as to how things were going to go.

Q: Was there, within the Foreign Service family while you were in Peking, any what could be called a generational gap? I mean, the younger officers coming in and saying this is a mess.

LUTKINS: No.

Q: This happens in some other places, but it didn't happen?

LUTKINS: Well, it was a generational gap, but I'm pretty sure it wasn't true in Nanking. I didn't serve there, that was where the Embassy was. It most definitely was not true in Peiping. When we first got there, the Consul General was Tony Freeman, and then Tony went back to Washington. He was succeeded by Edmund Clubb, who was certainly a generation older than us, but he very definitely had the views of most of the Foreign Service specialists on China, and as a result got into trouble himself.

Actually, the only generational gap, in the sense that you were referring to, that I ran into, was really later. The man involved I met in Washington originally, and I was in a sense recruited by him, and then later he was my Consul General in Hong Kong, and that's Everett Drumright, who was a very staunch supporter of the Kuomintang and inclined to think that, whatever its faults, we had to support it to the end. Perfectly good argument to be made for that, but he was regarded by the other language officers as, I won't put it in terms of right and left, because it really wasn't that, but certainly more vigorously anti-Chinese Communist than the younger generation, and more inclined to feel that it would be a tremendous mistake to allow them to take over the country or, later on, to retain their control of the country.

Q: When did you finish your training and then what was your first assignment? Where did you go and what were you doing?

LUTKINS: Well, actually, as I said, there was a slight interlude there. I guess I concluded my training around June of '48 and was temporarily detailed to work in the Consulate for a couple of months. They were making arrangements for me to go down to Kunming in the southwest to head up the Consulate there. But in terms of the personnel shifts involved, it involved a brief delay. So I went down to Kunming, I guess it was...

Q: Kunming is where?

LUTKINS: Southwest China. It's the capital of the Province of Yenan. The western border of Yenan abuts Burma, and it became very important during World War II, because Kunming was the Chinese terminus of the Burma Road, also of the flights over the Hump. They brought their supplies in to the American and Chinese forces from India. So during the war it experienced quite a bit of development. It had always traditionally been a bit of a backwater in China, controlled by warlords and so forth. But during the war it spruced up quite a bit. Then after the war it reverted a bit. Not to the extent before the war, but as soon as the war was over, everything went back to Nanking and Shanghai. Incidentally, I might just mention, during the war, of course, as you probably know, many of the Chinese universities from the coastal areas were relocated, both in Yenan and the other province to the north, Sichuan, where Chungking is located.

Q: What were you doing? Why did we have a post there?

LUTKINS: Of course, we had a network of posts in China, pre-war. I can't give you the exact number, but it must have been ten to fifteen, which were scattered all around.

Kunming (which in the old days was called Yenan-fu, but Kunming's easier) was of some strategic importance, because it was really in a sense part of a French sphere of influence. They had a railroad coming up from Indochina to Kunming, so the French were always fairly important there. The British were interested in it also.

Just as we had Consulates in Chungking, which was really a more important place because it was on the Yangtze River, it was considered desirable to have a Consulate in Kunming. I couldn't begin to tell you when it was first opened, but certainly it must have been ever since the 1920s and possibly a little earlier. There were certain American commercial interests there, but it wasn't a major field of American commercial activity.

Q: So what were you doing?

LUTKINS: Primarily political reporting, because that was a very crucial period there, '48 to '49, when things began to crumble. First in Manchuria, where, incidentally, I had taken a language officer field trip in 1947. Got sort of marooned up there, because of one of the Chinese Communist offensives. Had to fly back to Peking since the rail line was cut. But, as I say, you had this gradual crumbling of the Nationalist position, first in Manchuria, then in North China. We left Peiping in October '48, and it fell to the Communists in December, if I'm not mistaken. I think it was Tientsin first and then Peiping, but I'm not positive. And then, of course, during most of '49 the Communists were sweeping southward. There were some climactic battles north of the Yangtze River, in the spring of '49, if I recall correctly. Then they took Nanking, and the government evacuated to Taiwan.

We were, of course, uncertain which way things were going, so naturally we wanted reporting from various parts of China. Canton was reporting on South China; Kunming was reporting on Southwest China; Chungking, of course, on West China; Hankow on the vital Yangtze basin. Those were the main Consulates at the time. So primarily, really, it was political observation.

Q: How was your area in Southwest China? It was pretty far removed from where the Red offensive was coming down. How were they reacting as this went on, as far as you saw it?

LUTKINS: After the end of World War II, the national government took the local warlord to Nanking as a hostage in effect. But another local military man, a man named Lu Han, became governor. He was more amenable to control by the central government. There certainly were no overt or evident pro-Communist sympathies in that area.

To begin with, it was a political backwater. Nobody really thought that it would ever play a vital role in the national picture but believed that it would really be a reactor rather than an active participant. As I say, the local government, headed by Governor Lu Han, plus whatever there was in the way of a political-economic elite in Kunming and in Yenan, very strongly favored the central government against the Communists. But, of course, they weren't dumb; they knew what was going on and were a little worried about what was going to happen to them if the Communists succeeded in defeating the Nationalists and taking over. And they also, of course, were uncertain as to what the attitude of the United States would be.

As you know, even pretty much at the end we were ploughing considerable military aid and other aid into supporting the Nationalists, up until probably pretty late in 1949, when the famous China White Paper appeared. As the situation deteriorated in 1949, it was fairly obvious that the local people were going to have to start thinking about what was going to happen there. The only organized opposition to the central government and to the local government was in the form of local banditry. There were no Communist units operating in the area.

Q: This was the endemic local banditry?

LUTKINS: Right, yes. They might call themselves Communists, but they really weren't. I'm sure that it had never been established there was any contact whatever between them and the main Chinese Communist command. But the roads were a little unsafe to travel on over long distances, because you might be stopped by some of these bandits. In fact, one of my vice consuls was stopped on a trip, but all they wanted was medicine. And they always said that they had nothing against the United States in any case.

But, as I say, things deteriorated badly in the course of 1949. Nanking fell, and the government evacuated to Taiwan. In territory unoccupied by the Communists, that left three Consulates: Chungking in Sichuan; Kunming in the southwest; and Canton down in the south. We, of course, still had our Consulates in Communist-occupied areas, which weren't closed down until 1950.

But the department in Washington was, in effect, engaged in some soul-searching as to what the position should be with respect to Chungking and Kunming and Canton. I think part of the Embassy relocated to Canton briefly before going on to Taiwan. But for awhile, the decision was to hold on and keep those Consulates open -- Chungking, Kunming, and Canton -- and await developments. Later on, I guess it would have been somewhere around July or August...

LUTKINS: No, '49, because the Communists didn't complete their occupation of the whole mainland until the end of '49. Later on, about July of '49, we got a message from Washington advising that it would probably come down to closing down the posts, and instructing us to start making preparations. One of the steps ordered was to evacuate all dependents. My wife and two young children and the vice consul's wife were sent out. I think that was early September of '49. And then we were told to go on a standby basis and make all preparations so that we could get out on short notice.

Meanwhile, elsewhere in China, the Communists were continuing to advance. And it became clear that the local government in Yen'an would have to decide what they were going to do. Whether they would turn over to the Communists or try to maintain some sort of resistance.

This was certainly classified at the time, but so much time has gone by I don't think it could be considered classified now.

Q: I'm not sure from that period that there is anything classified.

LUTKINS: I was approached by a leading local citizen, who obviously was speaking on behalf of the local power structure, including the governor, asking if they could count on American support if they tried to resist the Communists, and whether we'd be willing to put in any military forces and so forth. The expected reply came back that under no circumstances would we be prepared to do that. So when they received that answer, obviously they had to start thinking in terms of saving their own skins; I'm talking in retrospect here, because I had no pipeline to what was going on. In consultations between myself and my British and French colleagues, we all expected that some sort of deal would probably be struck.

Arrangements were finally made to close up the Consulate early in December. I and my vice consul were all set to fly out to Hong Kong. However, the day before our scheduled departure local Yen'anese power structure staged a coup against what remained of the rather limited national government force there. I guess it was mostly Air Force. They took over the city and the airport. There was a lot of firing going on, although I don't think there was much in the way of casualties. The city was under martial law and the control of the local forces.

I managed, through one of our local employees who had very good connections, to get through to the governor, who assured us that we would be allowed to leave safely. There were no commercial flights coming in any more, and we had to go out on Claire Chennault's Civil Air Transport, CAT. They happened to have a plane at the airport.

So the following night we managed to make our way out to the airport, through gunfire, and get out on the last flight out of Free China. It was rather exciting, a lot of turmoil going on. It turned out to be after dark by the time we actually boarded the plane. It was an old C-46, bucket seats and that sort of thing, and very heavily loaded with machinery and whatnot. And I happened to notice something under the bucket seat. There was a man there. He turned out to be one of a group of Chinese Nationalist military personnel (I'm not sure whether it was Air Force or not), trying to stow away aboard the plane to get out. Otherwise, they faced a very uncertain prospect in Yenan. They were bundled off the plane, the ones we could find, and we finally took off.

For those days, that was a very long runway, about 8,000 feet, built during the war for the Hump run. But I thought we'd never get off it. We made it with only a few feet to spare. It turned out we were very heavily loaded -- more than we realized. Because once we got airborne finally, more Chinese Nationalist personnel, 20 maybe, came up from the baggage hold where they had stowed themselves. All my baggage got lost; they must have thrown it out. Anyway, it was rather an exciting exit.

Q: While you were in Kunming, did you feel any constraints on your reporting? This was before the McCarthy era, but things were still getting kind of... Were you just too far removed, or were you feeling any pressures?

LUTKINS: No, I may have been naive, but I felt no constraints whatever. I wrote exactly what I thought was going on. Actually, I continued to do so subsequently, in Hong Kong, when I was in charge of the political section there. I think the constraints were felt more by people in Washington than they were in the field. At least that was my impression.

Q: But you didn't feel that you were getting gunfire from both sides, from Washington? There was no feeling of, well, here's a policy that's going down the drain and we're being stuck with it?

LUTKINS: No, I didn't. There was no effort, certainly from Washington, to dictate to us what we should be saying. And no complaints about what we were reporting that I recall. Certainly at the receiving end at the working level, in Washington, were people with much the same views. In any case, we weren't trying to be tendentious or anything, we were just trying to report what we saw.

Q: Well now, you got to Hong Kong when?

LUTKINS: From Kunming?

Q: Yes.

LUTKINS: Well, that was somewhere around December 10, 1949.

Q: And then were you immediately reassigned? Did you go back to Washington?

LUTKINS: I went back to Washington, because I'd been away for three years and I was due some home leave. The department very nicely actually let me take a little local leave, to have a chance to go down to Bangkok and Angkor.

After I got back to Washington, I was assigned on a temporary basis to the Office of Chinese Affairs. Normally speaking, Chinese language officers, after leaving their language training program, would have been assigned to various Consulates all over China. But this wasn't possible any more, because we had by that time severed relations.

So we were scattered around the periphery, with a view to keeping an eye on China from the perspective of the surrounding areas. As you know, there were very important Overseas Chinese communities, particularly in Southeast Asia, and that was also something we were supposed to be keeping an eye on and reporting. We were scattered everywhere, from Seoul, Korea, to Japan, Manila, of course Hong Kong and Taiwan, Vietnam, Singapore, Malaysia, Burma, even India.

And it so happened that it was decided that we were going to beef up our presence in what was then called Malaya before it became Malaysia. One Chinese language officer, Oscar Armstrong, was assigned to Singapore. And I was assigned to reopen a post in Penang, Malaya, in northern Malaya near Thailand. So I went out there in the summer of 1950, reopened the Consulate there, and served there for two years.

Q: Malaya was then still under British rule?

LUTKINS: Right. It remained under British rule until 1957, when they gave independence to Malaya.

Q: You went with your family, I take it?

LUTKINS: Oh, yes.

Q: What was your main job while you were there from '50 to '52? The Korean War broke out about that time. Relations were nasty. What were you doing?

LUTKINS: I'd say it was 90 percent political reporting. A couple of years earlier, around 1948, what they called, euphemistically, "The Emergency" had broken out with the local Chinese Communists in Malaya. They were not connected with the Chinese Communists on the mainland, but they were ethnic Chinese, part of the very substantial Overseas Chinese minority in Malaya, who had their own Communist Party. Actually, during the war they worked with the British against the Japanese, during the Japanese occupation.

Shortly after the war, they staged this uprising, killed a lot of British rubber planters and people in the tin industry, and made life very difficult. The British had quite a substantial military force there combating this emergency. It was a difficult period. At one point, the British governor general was assassinated on his way up to a weekend in one of the hill stations. And then they sent out a really tough man, by name of Sir Gerald Templar, to head up the thing and bring it under control. There were various efforts made by the army and the police to cordon off the dispersed Chinese farmers, gather them together in secure, guarded villages, and keep them from contact with the guerrillas in the jungle. It was a long, hard process.

I'm no expert on Malaya, but in retrospect I think probably they were only able to really get on top of this once they granted independence to Malaya in 1957, and undercut the argument of the Chinese Communist guerrillas that the country was a foreign colony and should be liberated. And the Malays who dominated the country, both demographically and politically, certainly never had any love for the Chinese, so that they were then also able to collaborate a bit more with the British forces in bringing the thing finally under control. But it was a rather tense period.

Penang itself was not affected. It seemed to have been regarded as a rest area by both sides. With the exception of one or two assassinations of some rather staunch anti- Communist Chinese newspaper and academic people there, there really were no incidents on the island itself.

My area included the whole of northern Malaya. At that time, we had no embassy, of course. The main office, the Consulate General, was in Singapore. And we had two consulates: one in Kuala Lumpur, which is now the capital, and in Penang. Both Kuala Lumpur and Penang had rather fairly loose supervision from Singapore. So, from the point of view of a junior officer, it was an ideal situation. We had a big and interesting territory to travel around and report on, and only rather tenuous control from Singapore.

Q: It varied from place to place, but here, this was obviously an emerging situation, with the emergency on and all. Were you constrained because of British rule so that you couldn't talk to the other elements, particularly the Chinese or the Malays, or not?

LUTKINS: Not at all, no, no. I think they (the British) kept an eye on and knew what we were doing, but in fact they encouraged me. Having just come from language school, I was eager to try to continue my Chinese (although the Chinese spoken there was not what I had learned in Peking). So I did have contact, to a certain extent, with some of the Chinese leaders, who were really not very political. It was a commercial class. But I made one or two speeches in Chinese at some of the Chinese schools in Penang. The resident commissioner, a Britisher, congratulated me on it, even felt delighted because I was taking an anti-Communist line. They obviously knew what I was doing. I made it a point, of course, of working very closely with the British, obviously, because they knew far more about what was going on there than I could ever hope to know.

Penang happened to have been a place where the population was predominantly Chinese with almost no Malays. There were only a few Indians. The rest of the area, however, the provinces on the mainland like Perak and Kelantan, were the two main ones that I had supervision over. And I made a point of traveling to them and meeting the Malay officials nominally in charge, although the British still held the reins of power. I had to work with them, too.

Q: Were you beginning to feel any of the heat from attacks on our China policy, because you'd been associated, or on your reporting? I'm talking about McCarthyism.

LUTKINS: No, none whatever. Never that I experienced. I was too junior, for one thing, and not in a very controversial area, for another. But I was certainly reporting freely and as honestly as I could.

Q: How did you see the situation there? What was the thrust of your reporting? That the British were eventually going to get out, or that they could keep it?

LUTKINS: I think I would have been presumptuous to have tried to comment on that. The main focus of British rule was in Kuala Lumpur, where my colleague, Hank Van Oss, was doing that to the extent that he could, plus Singapore. No, my main thrust was just interviewing and seeing the people who were in present control, the British, plus some of the leading Malays who promised to be leaders in the future.

It was impossible, at the height of the emergency, to predict when, if ever, the British were going to grant independence. I know many of the British certainly were resisting this idea -- the usual idea that the Malays couldn't stand on their own, and that if they left the country, the Malays and the Chinese would be at each other's throats.

I had no vision that the thing was going to happen quite so quickly as it did. In fact, when I left there in '52, I was rather pessimistic, frankly, as to how things were going to develop. I felt fairly sure they would get on top of the insurgent problem, but I was pessimistic as to the future of Malaya in terms of the difficulty of the Chinese and the Malays getting along together. There had been, of course, a long history of problems there, with the Chinese dominating the industry and commerce to the extent that the British didn't, and the Malays being rooted to the land and having some of the old traditional power of the Malay rulers, plus a favored position in the British local bureaucracy.

The Malays were very fortunate in getting a man as their first prime minister, Tunku Abdul Rahman, who was on good terms with the Chinese, and who was enlightened enough to realize that it was important for the two communities to work together. So that even if the Malays have dominated the situation politically and militarily since independence, the Chinese have been willing to go along.

Interestingly, I think I was one of the first official Americans to meet Tunku Abdul Rahman, who came from the royal family of the State of Kedah, which is near Penang. I think I may have been one of the first American officials to entertain him after he was elected as head of this fairly new organization called the United Malay National Organization. Most people regarded him as a bit of a lightweight and a figurehead, but he certainly turned out very well in the final analysis.

LUTKINS: This was in 1954, and it was late summer, early fall. I must have arrived in Hong Kong probably September, '54, and I was assigned to Hong Kong as chief of the political division, replacing Ralph Clough, who was going back to Washington to serve as the deputy director of the Office of Chinese Affairs.

Q: Who was the consul general then?

LUTKINS: When I arrived, it was Julian Harrington, but he was transferred after a period of three or four months. And he was succeeded by Everett Drumright, who was a career Chinese language specialist.

Q: Yes, we have an interview with Everett Drumright. What were you doing? What was the political section doing? After all, it was a large political section. What were your goals?

LUTKINS: Well, it was summed up under the term of "China-watching" and continued up until the time when the United States resumed relations with the People's Republic of China in the early 1970s. Hong Kong was the place where China-watching occurred and where all the China-watchers gathered. Whether they were governmental, in terms of the Foreign Services of the different countries, or whether it was academic, or the various press and media, that was the place to be to try to follow what was going on, interpret what was going on inside China.

But interestingly enough, even with governments like the British and the Dutch, Australians, I'm not sure about the Australians, but I know the Dutch, who like the British, had relations with the Chinese Communists and an office in Peking. But even in their cases, they thought it was helpful to have a specialist stationed in Hong Kong. Since their people in Peking were circumscribed in their movements, they felt it was useful to have somebody outside who could see the picture from there.

Q: Well, you talk about seeing the picture. I mean, after all, the refugees were mostly from one area around Canton, I would imagine.

LUTKINS: That wasn't entirely true. It's true that, if you're talking about the overall influx of refugees, they were very much of a lower class, usually peasants, small business and that sort of thing, who came in almost exclusively from the area adjoining Hong Kong, the Province of Guangdong. But certainly when I was there, in the '50s, you still had a trickle of other people coming out: American and other missionaries who had been detained after the takeover of the Chinese Communists who were being released from time to time; certain foreign businessmen who were operating there, not Americans but other businessmen who were operating in China, British and others who came out; and newspapermen from other countries who were allowed to travel there, European and otherwise. So that there was a small but constant flow of interesting potential sources of information who were coming through Hong Kong and who were eagerly grabbed on by the few people who wanted to talk to them.

Q: What other sources did you have?

LUTKINS: The Chinese press, of course, was a major source. We had organized, even before I got there, and further developed while I was there, a very substantial operation translating the China mainland press. Some of it was readily available, other publications that we obtained by a clandestine procurement program.

Q: Was this a joint translation service with the British?

LUTKINS: No, no, it was entirely American. The British, and others, found it very useful, but they had nothing to do with it.

Q: I'm surprised, because we had a joint translation service in Belgrade and, I think, in Poland, where we did it together. But there was no effort made to...?

LUTKINS: No, it was entirely American and a very large-scale affair. Among others who were in charge of it for awhile, Oscar Armstrong, whom you may or may not have talked to. I'm trying to remember how many people, we might have had twenty or thirty Chinese local employees who were engaged in this, under our supervision.

Q: Well, why would the press be useful? I mean, supposedly this was a tightly controlled regime where everybody was spouting the party line and all that.

LUTKINS: That is true, but you mentioned Eastern Europe and having contact with the Soviet Union, I believe there was a great deal of similar work done in trying to read fine nuances into what was being said in the press and if one paper differed slightly from another. Of course, you had the major organs controlled by the Chinese Party, but then you had one by the military, and then you had, theoretically, a youth paper and so forth, and you could pick up interesting little tidbits. And, in any case, we were relying on it not only for major trends but for factual information as to what the regime itself was saying in terms of statistical information on production and that sort of thing.

And then it was also extremely important when they were engaged in one of their major campaigns, such as one that occurred while I was there called "Let The Hundred Flowers Bloom," which lasted for awhile, and then the "Great Leap Forward," which also occurred during the mid-'50s. I sometimes have a hard time distinguishing the exact times, because I went on to work in the Office of Chinese Affairs in Washington where we were the recipient of a lot of this product. We used the Chinese press as a source of information in both cases, as a basic source to be analyzed.

Q: Well, here you were, and you had been dealing more or less with Chinese affairs, and you were really right at the center of where we were looking at it. I mean, it was the closest thing we had to an embassy in mainland China, really, at that time. How did you see China? Where were they going? How was the thing working?

LUTKINS: Well, that's a very good question. I haven't gone back to review the reports that I wrote during that period, and I wrote a good many. Of course, in addition to our Chinese press translation program, we had the small corps of Chinese language officers and others, including one Soviet specialist, who was sort of on loan. We were doing quite a bit of varied reporting on developments in certain different fields in China. But as the head of the political section, I did the overview reports that we had to submit every three or four months, plus the contributions to the WEEKA and that sort of thing.

As I saw it at that time, and as I reported it (and this ran against certainly the wishes or the wishful thinking of certain people back in Washington, and even to that of our Consul General, Mr. Drumright, who wanted to really believe that the Chinese Communist regime was only a temporary aberration, a temporary phenomenon and that it wouldn't last) it seemed to me definitely that the new government had entrenched itself pretty securely. That by and large it governed with the support of the mass of the people. That it had brought some improvements, which were not necessarily due to Communism but to the mere fact that it did exercise authority over the whole country for the first time in fifty years or more, and therefore was in the position to take purposeful action in terms of preventing famine, in getting supplies from one area of the country to the other, in getting production back in shape after a period of the war years in which everything was disrupted. In other words, it seemed to be a fairly stable government.

And, what was possibly more important, the people in charge of the government showed no signs whatever of either disunity or lack of confidence in their ability to govern. This all pointed to the fact that they were there to stay for the foreseeable future. We couldn't look ahead to the 1980s, but at that point it seemed to be a fairly stable, secure government enjoying popular support. And we reported that, as such, to Washington. I guess, of course, in Washington we were still trying to deny that picture and to work for the undermining and downfall of the Communist regime.

Q: Could we talk a little about... I sound like I'm harping on the McCarthyism.

LUTKINS: No, no, no, that's very important.

Q: There's more than the McCarthyism. But you were a reporter during the period. Dulles was in command. Walter Robertson was a key figure.

LUTKINS: Yes, we can get to that when I get to Washington.

Q: When you were in Hong Kong, you had a man who had very fixed ideas about whither we should be going, as Consul General. How did you operate? What sort of pressures were on your reporting? How did you feel working in this atmosphere?

LUTKINS: By and large, completely free. There were only minimal constraints. And, although I disagreed with Mr. Drumright on his basic outlook, to his credit he never tried to tell us that we should report differently. He may have reported under separate channels himself. If so, I wasn't aware of it. I don't, frankly, think he did.

I remember one rather amusing little thing that involves a Chinese nuance between the two names for the Chinese city: one, being Peking and the other, Peiping. Traditionally it was Peking, which means, in Chinese, "Northern Capital." And during the Nationalist days, in the late '20s and '30s, when they moved the capital down to Nanking, which means "Southern Capital," Peking became Peiping, because they couldn't have two capitals, so it was "Northern Peace," Peiping.

It was a corollary of our support of the Nationalist government, even after they moved to Taiwan, that when the Chinese Communists took over and restored the name of Peking, we refused to call it Peking. We called it Peiping. I thought this was a little silly, so when I got posted to Hong Kong, in charge of the reporting there, I started calling it Peking in our telegrams, which Mr. Harrington didn't object to. Washington didn't object to it. But as soon as Mr. Drumright got here, he said, "In Washington, we call it Peiping, not Peking." So we had to go back to the old method. As I said, it's not important at all, but it shows the Washington mindset at the time.

Q: Were you getting any private letters or visitors coming through, saying Come on, fellas, get on the team, you've got to take more of a line that this is a regime on the verge of tottering, or something like that?

LUTKINS: No, absolutely not. I'm not aware of anything along those lines whatever. You might want to ask Ralph Clough, if you haven't already, whether he did, because he was there for a year or two, in charge of the political section, before I was. But I'm 100 percent confident that there was never anything done like that.

There was one other thing involving policy, a very minor one which I was reminiscing with Arthur Hummel about recently. When I went there first, in 1954, he was in charge of USIS in Hong Kong. That was before he shifted over to the Foreign Service proper. It would have been at the end of '54 or early '55, when they were going to have a conference down in Indonesia, I think it was the Bandung Conference.

I think it was our own initiative. We felt that it would be desirable to give Washington the benefit of our views on what our attitude and position should be at this conference, particularly because we knew that Chinese Communists were going to be involved there. Art and I, I guess in a staff meeting, suggested that we send out a joint message from the Consulate General giving our views. And Everett Drumright nixed the idea.

But there are more ways than one to skin a cat, so Art Hummel, through his own channels, went back to Washington and had them send out a message requesting that we should send them a telegram with our views. So we were able to get one in to Washington as desired.

Q: At that time, how did you, and maybe the people around you, view the China-Soviet bloc?

LUTKINS: Very interesting. Good question. I think the answer is that we very much (probably unwisely as it turned out) saw it as a monolith at that particular point.

I guess we should have been alert. Maybe it was because not enough of us had been steeped in Chinese studies and Chinese history to remember that there had been very long-lasting and bitter relations between China and Russia that predated Communism, and that the Chinese resented the Russians taking over territory that they regarded as Chinese and that were, in fact, I guess, subject to Chinese suzerainty.

But, as I say, at that particular point, probably because of the Korean War and pressures on Vietnam and whatnot, we definitely regarded the Sino-Soviet alliance as a pretty firm and fixed thing. I don't recall, either during that period or subsequently when I was in Washington before the Sino-Soviet split, which occurred somewhere around 1961, any of us who had enough sense to have second thoughts and say, "Well, we should take a second look at this. Is this going to last? Are there really cracks?" They were not overt certainly. It would have taken a bit of imagination and prescience on our parts to realize the possibility that that would come.

Q: Looking at my own view, and others around me, I think we did tend to see everything in East-West conflict, and that somehow or another this Communism was a completely new phenomenon, which superseded nationalism. And even though our noses had been rubbed in it, for example, in Yugoslavia and some other places, we saw things as Communism in the Arab world, looking at it later on. I mean, this was obviously nonsense. I think of Arab... But it was a viewpoint.

LUTKINS: Sure, world communism, world spirit of... I seem to recall when Tito broke away, when was it, around 19...?

Q: '48, '49.

LUTKINS: '48, '49, that there were people who refused to believe that it was real. They thought it was a conspiracy to deceive us.

Q: What sort of reporting were you getting? What were your relations with our embassy on Taiwan at that time?

LUTKINS: Close. I don't know whether we did much official travel back and forth, except that Ambassador Rankin used to come over from time to time. I'm not sure whether Mr. Drumright went over to Taiwan. Of course, he was later to succeed Rankin as ambassador there. Most of us, for one reason or another, took trips over there, but for personal reasons rather than business reasons. But we were certainly aware of an exchange of information; we always received their reports and they received ours.

Q: But you didn't feel as though you were reporting with maybe a different view of China than they were reporting, because of local... or something like that?

LUTKINS: I don't think so. There was really no independent China-watching reporting from Taiwan. It was all in terms of what the Nationalist government believed and what the national government was doing. Whatever some of the more junior officers in Taiwan may have felt, there was no independent reporting, or doubts about the Nationalist mission to recover the mainland and our commitment to help them do so.

Q: Obviously, this is an unclassified interview, and we are talking about thirty years plus. Were you getting good information or much information from the CIA? And how did you evaluate that?

LUTKINS: Again, I have a hard time separating what was happening then from what was the case when I went back to Washington. We did have, of course, a large Agency operation in Hong Kong. I'm sure we saw some of what was coming out of there. I don't know how much. Again, I don't know to what extent the chief of station reported to Mr. Drumright, and to what extent he operated independently. You'd have to ask somebody like Mr. Drumright about that, I just don't know. I have a feeling that they were pretty freewheeling, but I'm not sure. We used to see some of their raw reports.

Q: But you didn't have the feeling that they were reporting a whole different situation or that they were really plugged in. At least from what I gather, they were reporting more or less in the same stream that you were.

LUTKINS: I honestly couldn't recall at this point. I don't ever recall having been impressed that we were on different wave lengths.

I might mention another source of information we had. Of course, there were so few of us trying to pick so few tea leaves that we had a sort of informal group there. We were in very close contact with the representatives of other governments, particularly the British, French, Dutch, Australian, Japanese. Both on a day-to-day basis and in regular evening sessions, we would get together. And that included people from the press as well. There was quite a large press presence there. A certain number of academics, such as a fellow named Doak Barnett, whom you probably know of, a very eminent authority on China, who happened to be there part of the time. We were all trying to exchange ideas, pick each other's minds. And we did see some foreign government reports. Particularly I recall the British reports and, in their case, that they were ones written by their embassy in Peking, which they made available to us.

Q: You left Hong Kong in 1957 and came back to Washington, was it?

LUTKINS: Yes. Ralph Clough had moved up to be acting in charge of the Office of Chinese Affairs, and I replaced a fellow named Dave Osborn as his deputy. That was within the bureau of what was then called Far Eastern Affairs, now East Asian Affairs.

Q: Did you have any particular area that you were dealing with during this time up until 1961?

LUTKINS: No, I think the way it operated was that we had the director of Chinese Affairs, who, as I say, at first was Ralph Clough. He went off to Switzerland, and I was acting for a period of a few months. Then Ed Martin came in, was brought back from London to be the director, and I was deputy director. And then below that we had three or four officers who were working more or less on special areas and special projects. So mine was more or less like the director's, sort of an overall...

Q: Did you find a difference in perspective of China from Washington? You had been at the preeminent overseas post looking at China, now you were back at the home office.

LUTKINS: The perspective was different largely because of the people who were in charge back in Washington.

Q: Could we talk about that, please?

LUTKINS: Yes, sure. There was no question that the policy was very rigid, representing the position and views of Walter Robertson and possibly Secretary Dulles. I think possibly Robertson was more rigid than John Foster Dulles. But Dulles, for political reasons and because of general sympathy with his position gave Robertson a free hand on this and didn't try to buck him on it. There was no question in Robertson's mind that we should be 100 percent pro-Nationalist government on Taiwan and 100 percent anti-Communist government in Peking. There was no suggestion that he would be prepared to even consider the possibility of regularizing our relations with the Chinese Communists. He was certainly an intelligent man, a very charming man, too, and an able man. I don't know whether he ever, in the back of his mind, considered that at some point or other we would have to adjust our position. But as far as I could make out, the Communists would have had to have ceased being Communists to make him shift.

Q: Well, it's interesting, because I came in as a very mild liberal Foreign Service officer in 1955. And I actually was a Korean War veteran and had served on duty across a small island from the Chinese, so it wasn't as though I were wildly in love with the Chinese.

LUTKINS: Where was this then?

Q: This was up in northern Korea near Chengdu. But my point is, that I came in, most of my group that came in, and we thought Well, you know, what the hell, China's there, we're going to have to recognize it. I mean, it was a fact of life. It wasn't through admiration, it was just, well, let's get on with it. And it always seemed like it took us an awful lot of time to get around to it. Was this the attitude of those who were dealing this?

LUTKINS: Yes, I think in terms of foreign policy or realpolitik the feeling was that this was a regime that was entrenched, it was going to be there for the foreseeable future, and that we were going to have to deal with it.

Mind you, I'm in contrast to many of the revisionist historians and still am basically persuaded of the accuracy and truth of the State Department position, as expressed in the 1949 White Paper, that we behaved, after the Chinese Communist takeover, in the traditional manner of keeping our posts open on the ground and being prepared to deal with the new power. And that it was not us, but the Chinese Communists who did not want those relationships and, in effect, forced us out. But, as I say, the revisionists dispute this.

Be that as it may, assuming that that is correct, I think those of us who were on the spot during the period recognized that it takes two to tango, and that we couldn't just automatically recognize the Chinese Communists. There would have to be some negotiations and some terms involved. But I think most of us felt that it would be sensible policy to start preparing for that, laying the groundwork for it, and perhaps doing some probing to find out on what terms it could be done.

Whereas the official attitude in Washington was that these people were beyond redemption, we couldn't possibly ever consider having relations with them, and that, in addition, we would be betraying our friends on Taiwan.

Q: Here you were, getting reports from posts saying China is going on, it's developing (I'm talking about the Communist side), it has control of the country, it doesn't seem near collapse. They may be doing silly things such as the Great Leap Forward and all, but, you know, there it is. And the reports must have been flowing in, speaking of the solidity of this regime. Now that you were back in Washington, was there any effort by Robertson to say cut this, get them to talk more, or did he look for all...?

LUTKINS: No, I think he just discounted the reporting. It didn't agree with his mindset and he just ignored it. But anyway, I think he thought it was of secondary importance compared to the need to combat Communism and to stand by our wartime allies and friends in Taiwan. And then I think you can't ignore the domestic political aspect of this, that the Republicans...

Q: The China lobby.

LUTKINS: ...and the China lobby had made such a big thing about our "losing" China -- as if it were ours to lose. And so it had become a matter of political orthodoxy. I think that's why it's so ironic, it really took a Republican president to make the shift. A Democrat couldn't do it, because he...

Q: You're talking about Nixon.

LUTKINS: A Democratic president would have been immediately vulnerable on the subject of being soft on Communism. Actually, it's rather interesting (I think I had moved on to the Senior Seminar at that point), but it was very early in the Kennedy years, in '61, that very gingerly tentative moves were made toward opening up of relations with Outer Mongolia, which, of course, then was very much still under Soviet domination. They didn't get very far on this. And part of the reason was that the Nationalist government on Taiwan, of course, had always regarded Outer Mongolia as Chinese territory that had been taken away from China. They and the Chinese lobby made their opposition felt, so that it just wasn't considered important enough by Kennedy to make an issue out of it, and they dropped it.

Q: Did you feel any particular pressure (once again I'm asking this question) on the reports that went out, or you just did you business and...?

LUTKINS: In Washington?

Q: In Washington.

LUTKINS: Well, of course, we weren't reporting.

Q: But you must have been making reports to Congress and to the president.

LUTKINS: Well, I can tell you something there. When I came back at the end of '57, Ralph Clough briefed me on the general situation. I guess I must have misunderstood what he said a bit, because I got the impression that perhaps the Department was a little more flexible in our thinking about the future than actually was the case.

I was up in New York on a visit, and my father, who was in Wall Street asked me to have lunch with a number of his friends and say a few words about China, which I did. About a week later I got called into Robertson's office and raked over the coals, because one of the people who had been present had the impression from what I said that our policy toward China was changing. And Robertson made it be known in no uncertain terms that it wasn't changing, and that if I wanted to stay on board I'd better mind my manners. I think I had said something along the lines that, "Well, surely at some point or other we'll have to probably make an accommodation with the mainland."

I don't know whether you've interviewed Jeff Parsons, J. Graham Parsons, yet.

Q: No, I haven't.

LUTKINS: He would certainly be very important. He lives up in Massachusetts. I guess he comes to Washington occasionally, might be willing to one day. He had a very eminent career. He'd been my DCM in Tokyo, then he went to Laos as ambassador and then came back to Washington as deputy to Walter Robertson. He was a very savvy guy, and I'm sure he must have found it difficult working under Robertson, and yet, being very professional, he adjusted and did his best at it. Then later, I guess during the Kennedy years, I think he went off to finish his career as ambassador to Sweden. He really had a meteoric rise in the service, a very fine officer.

Well, that's about it. I mean, we were very much under wraps as far as any suggestions of any changes in policy. We just had to operate within that framework.

Q: There were always a set of Quemoy-Matsu crises. Were there any when you were there?

LUTKINS: Oh, very much so, yes. In fact, I was acting in charge when that erupted in the fall of '58, because Ralph Clough had left and Ed Martin hadn't come back yet. I was working extremely closely with Marshall Green, who, really, Robertson had put in charge of a task force dealing with that problem. Marshall spearheaded the whole thing.

Q: What was the problem at the time?

LUTKINS: You had these tiny little pieces of territory, these two islands in the south, Quemoy and Matsu, and then a few others up a little closer near Shanghai. They were a thorn in the flesh to the Chinese Communists, having these Chinese Nationalist military outposts overlooking their territory. I don't think we were really ever given any reason why they chose that particular time, which probably was early September of '58, to start this campaign. But they started to bombard the two islands, and it became a cause célèbre.

I remember Secretary Dulles was up in the Thousand Islands on vacation at the time, but he came back shortly. And then there were all sorts of high-level discussions over a period of a month or six weeks, involving, of course, at a very high level, the Pentagon, Admiral Arleigh Burke, who I think was naval chief of staff at the time, or joint chief of staff. And there were discussions as to whether we might ultimately have to use nuclear weapons or not. It didn't come to that. It was a question of helping the Nationalists get supplies into these beleaguered outposts. I think it was on that occasion that there was the first use of air-to-air missiles called Sidewinders, which proved quite effective. We didn't have any of our own forces involved, but we were supplying the Nationalists with weaponry.

Ultimately, after several months, the Chinese Communists backed off, instituted a cease-fire, and proposed talks at an ambassadorial level.

There had been some earlier talks, held in Geneva, following the Geneva Conference in '55. I think Alex Johnson did the talking for the United States's side. And they had petered out, because they weren't getting anywhere; both sides just reiterated their grievances. We complained about the Chinese holding American citizens against their will. And they complained about our supporting the Nationalists and thus interfering in Chinese affairs.

As I say, at a certain point they broke off, but when the truce was reached in the Quemoy-Matsu offshore island crisis, we and the Chinese agreed to resume these talks. They were held in Warsaw, where their ambassador, who I think was Wang Ping-nan, talked to our ambassador, Jake Beam, who I'm sure you've interviewed. And Ralph Clough, who was DCM in Switzerland, used to go down to Warsaw and act as Beam's political advisor in these talks. For a period of a year or more these talks dragged on, getting absolutely nowhere. Both sides repeating the same positions. We had to spend a lot of time in Washington preparing the talking points for the sessions.

Q: How did you personally feel about Quemoy-Matsu and then the talks? How did you see these things in relative importance?

LUTKINS: Well, I don't think any of us regarded Quemoy and Matsu of any overreaching importance. But, at the same time, they were Chinese Nationalist outposts, and we were committed to the defense of the Chinese Nationalists, so that we really had no choice but to help them resist the attack.

Q: Were you there when the Kennedy administration took over in '61?

LUTKINS: I guess I was there for the first six months, but then I went off to the Senior Seminar.

WILLIAM N. STOKES
Vice Consul and Economic Officer
Mukden (1946-1950)

Inspection Officer, American Liaison Office
Beijing (1972-1975)

Remarks on relations with China in Later Years

William N. Stokes attended the University of Chicago and Columbia University specializing in mathematics and physics during World War II. After joining the Foreign Service in 1946, Mr. Stokes served in China, Japan, Morocco, Tunisia, Thailand, and Washington, DC. He was interviewed by William Knight in 1992.

Q: The examiner didn't know about that.

STOKES: Well, whatever. But anyway, I think the important thing here is that I began as a maverick in the foreign service. I always felt myself a maverick.

Q: You mean all the way through?

STOKES: Yes, because the patterns of thought, the ways of thinking, the motivation just all seemed to me that I was never quite in sync with what the mainstream of the foreign service was. But it was a creative tension. I was accepted. I felt accepted and I felt I had a contribution, but I always saw it as something which would be like a grain of sand in the oyster. I think in retrospect the foreign service might have been more open to the utility of making use of persons of scientific attainment, not in some highly specialized job, necessarily, but in ways of thinking about broad issues of foreign affairs in which scientific elements would have some point. In any event, at the Foreign Service Institute we were asked what assignments we wanted, to illustrate this maverick sort of thing, I asked for Mukden, China because I saw it as a place where five or six cultures were in contest and very likely the flash point for the conflict of great power interest. Again as it had been before.

Q: Now those were China, Japan, Soviet Union, who else?

STOKES: The United States, Korea, Mongolia, not as great powers but as participating cultures that would be effected by what happened in that cockpit. I was the only one in the class to get the request fulfilled because people had asked for Paris, Rome, London. In any case it was a time of enormous shortage of personnel so that there was no time to train me at all in language or anything.

Q: So you had zero Chinese at that stage.

STOKES: Zero. I remember a seminal month spent in Chinese Affairs with Art Hummel's cousin, I forget his first name, John Carter Vincent and Jim Penfield and many of the greats and I remember being given an old desk and when I opened it to get a piece of paper I saw George Acheson's commission that he had forgotten, left there.

Q: You mean Dean?

STOKES: George Atcheson. He was political advisor to MacArthur. In any event, the only way to get to China in those days, well let me back track. I have a wonderful memory of being entrusted with the great seal of the United States and a book of drafts on the Secretary of State and I was free to write a check in any amount at any time theoretically. It was an enormous sense of power to have been selected to go forth and to accomplish this. It was the fulfillment of my hopes. And there had even been some semblance of that in my trainee status. I remember one night John Carter called me in and said the President wants to release the Pauliy report about Russian removals of equipment in China. I'd like you to look through it and by tomorrow morning tell me if there is anything that we ought not to release. This was a 1500 page report, so I stayed up all night feeling very powerful and significant and at 5:00 a.m. as I was rushing back to the State Department to deliver my report, I heard the newspaper boy saying extra, extra, read all about it, President releases the Pauliy report. So that's a metaphor for a lot of things that happened between the White House and the State Department.

Q: So you returned to your usual height, you were no longer a giant.

STOKES: Right. We had to arrange our own travel to China in those days all I could find was a freighter leaving New York via the Panama Canal and the whole trip took 32 days. I remember as we pulled away from the pier I went down to my little midshipman's cabin there was a one-armed gentleman there. He asked me who I was and where I was going and he said "You're going to China", and he addressed me in Chinese. And I said, "I'm sorry I don't know any." He said "You don't know any Chinese and you're going to northeast?" He said, "Sit down in that chair over there" and for the next 32 days I received non-stop force feeding in Chinese. I hated that gentleman's guts when the ship was tilting 30 degrees and wallowing in heavy seas and my stomach wanted to go one way and I the other. On and on it came, but I revered that man. He transformed my life in China from being one of a bored outsider to being one of a participant and it heightened my awareness and gave me eyes to see with and ears to hear. It was a priceless gift.

Q: He was another passenger?

STOKES: Yes. As I learned later, Dr. Rubin Torre. You see what an impression he made in me. He was a famous, renowned Presbyterian missionary in China. He was returning after a long period of prison camp under the Japanese and he's widely known and I'm happy to record my thanks to him.

Q: Is it '45 still or '46 now?

STOKES: '46. I landed in Shanghai. I remember getting up before dawn and standing in the bow of the freighter coming in up the Whangpoo. And before we hit land you could see the dark fishing boats go by with the great big eyeballs on the prow, and as we came up the Wusong in front of the Bund in Shanghai I could see the relic of the scuttled Italian battleship, the Balboa. In Shanghai I was asked to remain for three months to issue visas to the German Jewish refugees in Hong Kong. That was a crash program. We issued a thousand emigration visas a month. John Stegmaier, John Stutesman and J.B. Pilcher was the Consul General. We all lived together in a flat underneath T.V. Soong's flat in a development building because at that time the power of the dollar was such that when even six impecunious American Vice Consuls pooling their dollars could buy a good portion of the city. But there again since I spoke some Chinese I could immediately make Chinese friends and began thinking as the Chinese would think or getting an insight into how they would think. At the end of three months I flew up the coast in a Navy plane, stopping at Tsing-tao at the naval base and Dick Service was Consul there. I became just airsick and he took me in and we spend some time there at his home, I think two or three days, memorable days. The Navy then flew me up to Mukden on a regular supply run. I remember being met at the plan as we landed by a young American lieutenant who leaped into the plane and looked around ignoring me and looked at the cargo and said, "Damn it, where's our beer, what's all this stuff?", kicking the personal effects of the Consul General that I had carefully seen was loaded on board instead of his shipment of beer. That lieutenant was John K. Singlaub who later became Deputy Commander in Korea and was canned by President Carter for insubordination and became leading spokesman of the American right wing. More about Singlaub later. He was commander of external survey detachment number 44 which anybody can guess correctly what that was. Mukden turned out to be everything that I had hoped for in terms of strife and struggle. At that time the American consulate had been open for only about six months. Because while the Soviet Army had occupied Manchuria it refused to allow American representation there. The Soviet Army was obliged to withdraw by United Nations remonstrations and the Nationalist Army had been flown up into Manchuria and brought up by rail with US Marine guards and was in conflict with the Chinese communist armies that circled around from Yen'an through the provinces bordering on Mongolia and had to fill the vacuum left by the surrender of the Japanese.

Q: Exactly when are we taking about now?

STOKES: We're talking about the period immediately following VJ Day and the Japanese surrender.

Q: The Fall of '45.

STOKES: Yes. When I arrived, the Civil War was in full tilt. The Chinese armies were the American-trained crack armies from the Burma road, the Stilwell trainees and American equipped armies and the Chinese communists were not yet fully understood to be as redoubtable as they later proved to be. But in any case my entire assignment there was in the midst of civil war which as events turned against the government, became more and more in the immediate environs of the city in which I was living and working.

Q: What were you actually doing in the office?

STOKES: I began as Administrative and Consular Officer and then later became Economic Officer and then as our staff dwindled, I was really the right hand, or in effect if the consulate had a DCM, that's what I would have been considered. You remember in those days career officers succeeded one another in charge of the office without regard to the seniority of staff officers and I was after the Consul General, Angus Ward. I was the only career officer there, I was brand new. In any case, I should mention that Secretary Acheson, and this was highly classified at the time, certainly cannot be now, was interested in exploring the possibility of a motis vivendi with the Chinese communists when it became evident.

Q: He would have been Under Secretary then wouldn't he?

STOKES: I think he became Secretary of State by that time.

Q: Still in '45?

STOKES: No I arrived in December of 1946. I've skipped over a lot of time. So Acheson is Secretary at that time.

Q: So then you had Burns, and then Marshall...

STOKES: So then the Marshall executive headquarters team was there while I was there and General Wedemeyer came. As the Nationalist armies and government experience was turning sour, there were more and more high level American missions trying to ascertain why this was the case. Incidentally, I studied Chinese assiduously at this time informally, at my own expense and my teacher was the daughter of the Kuomintang mayor in absentia of Harbin. She was a very gifted woman, by the way, very gifted, and she made learning Chinese a delight. Entirely platonic, of course, I don't say, of course, but it was. In any case, to illustrate something of the tenor of the times, she said "have you ever thought of holding a dance in your house?" I said "Well, I don't know." She said "There are a lot of Chinese who would like to come." and I said "Well what would I do, just play these records?" She said "Yes, that's all, move the furniture back and so forth." So I did this thinking of maybe 10 or 12 people and she said "I'll invite my friends." Well about the time of the party all of a sudden limousines and all kinds of vehicles began appearing in front of my house. There was the Garrison Commander, a three-star general and his wife, the president of the central bank and his wife. It was something absolutely incredible, and they seemed to have some arrangement themselves where they rotated through the house. By midnight we must have had 200 people at various times in this little, modest, rundown house, and what I realized later that the Generalissimo had decreed that in time of civil war there would be no frivolous activities like dancing. The leadership's families were very restive under this, but then they decided in a very Chinese way that well, of course, they were absolutely dutiful to the government's instruction. The government had also instructed them to be nice to the Americans. And so they felt that the greater good was served in this way.

Q: But weren't there a lot of American military units around?

STOKES: No, no American military units.

Q: So you were the only American, official presence?

STOKES: Yes, except for this shadowy external survey detachment which we can all guess what it was. In any case, Secretary Acheson had wanted to seek a modus vivendi or explore the possibilities of a modus vivendi with the Chinese communists. So we were all secretly asked if we wanted to volunteer to remain behind in case the city should fall to the communists. And I volunteered. In the Fall of 1948 I was on a mission to Shanghai and I remember being hospitalized there for some attack of nausea, something I ate I guess. In the middle of the night I remember seeing a light coming down the hall and it was the orderly and an MP and there was a telegram from Consul General Ward asking me to buy $12,000 worth of foodstuffs and to fly them up the next morning to Mukden. The MP gave me a message from the naval commander at Tsing-tao telling me that C 46's would be landing at first light on the Shanghai airport. I had four hours to spend $15,000 dollars. I got the Navy OD and we raced in a truck to the warehouse and I went through saying $1,000 worth of that, $1,000 worth of that, $1,000 worth of that. This convoy of trucks arrived at the airport just as the planes were coming in. It was all thrown in. We flew to Tsing-tao, and then on to Mukden. At this time the city was falling and at the pre-flight briefing, Admiral Badger appeared on the flight line to the consternation of the pilots and he put his nose about one inch away from each pilots nose and turned and said "You are not to be captured on this flight, do you understand me lieutenant?" And they said "Yes, Admiral, Sir!" So we got in the plane, and we were flying there, and the pilot said to me, "I'm going to give this sucker once quick once over and if the agreed flare signal is not fired, I'm turning around and coming back and not even poking my nose in there. I looked down as we arrived and I could see there was my wife and Reeberg, the Administrative Officer there on the field, I said "It's alright, go in, go in." He said "Not until I see the flare." No flare, but to make a long story short, I prevailed on him to make a touchdown at least, one plane, and as we were rolling along, Reeberg came standing up in the jeep at a braked neck pace and he said "The damn thing won't go off, you see" and pulled the trigger, and a green flare went between the engine itself and the pilots right ear. Well, this tape would not stand a reproduction of what the pilot said. But anyway, we got in. In pursuit of our instructions from the Secretary to try to make an opening to the communist authorities as soon as the hubbub died down of the occupation by the Chinese, I telephoned the mayoralty and I managed to raise a clerk or some appropriate person and to my astonishment they accepted the offer of the Consul General to call on the mayor.

Q: The communist mayor.

STOKES: The communist mayor. We were not at all sanguine that there would be any willingness on their part to do this because we had the optic of the monolithic world communism and the subservience to the Soviet Union of all communist parties everywhere. When the Consular General and I arrived there we were ushered into a waiting room and we saw on the couch opposite us the head of the Soviet Trade Commission and his deputy who was the senior Soviet official there. And there were a lot of cigarette butts around showing that they'd been there a long time. We thought we're in for one of these interminable waits. Well, the door opened to the mayor's office, and the Russians all stood up and the man in the mayor's office walked right by them as though they didn't exist and said Mr. Consul General and Consul, would you please come in. Well, you should have seen the look on them. I could hardly look at the Russians as I went by because they'd have spit nails if they could have. The mayor said yes, we are interested in a reasonable, mutually respectful relationship. We have to rebuild this country, most of the equipment is Japanese, you are occupying Japan. The reality is we need to get along. So the Consul General pressed his luck and talked about a diplomatic courier and talked about the rights of American businessmen and there was a reasonable response to all of this. So when we came back to the consulate we could hardly contain our euphoria and we sent off reports of just exactly what had been said. Then the phone rang and to my astonishment the mayor wanted to pay a return call on the consulate. And he did come. The conversation continued. And the next day, we wanted local currency, so I went down to the central bank and asked to speak to the new head to the central bank and he gave us more of the economic reasons for collaboration and promised to expedite our reasonable needs. So when we went back to the consulate we were making all kinds of plans and in came a special messenger with a notification from the Garrison Commander to surrender all of our radio equipment. And we thought, well, you know, that's in the context of what's happening, this is nothing threatening, but we sent the proper reply as requested but explained that we could not release the equipment because it was the property of the US government and we needed to ask instructions and see that this was the right thing to do. Following which came a phone call telling us that the former Consul General must appear within 30 minutes before the Garrison Commander. And we went over wondering what was happening. What did this mean, former Consul General? The Garrison Commander turned out to be Wu Shu Twang, who was later the foreign minister of the communist government and the man who at Lake Success threw the riot act. He looked at the Consul General. "You have one hour to have all the radio equipment in your office in the hands of my staff." The Consul General remonstrated, at which the Garrison Commander got up and walked out. So the next day was a work day, we were all fully at work, at noon, there were visitors to the consulate, and staff was fully at work.

Q: You didn't deliver the equipment?

STOKES: No we didn't, but the Consulate General said I promise to send a message reporting this to my government and the governments will speak to each other. The next day as we were at work, someone excitedly came up to me from USIS, saying some of our guests in the library went to walk out and there were troops there forcing them back in. And then someone came in saying there are commissars here to see you and we were informed that we were violating the laws, we were under house arrest. And there began 13 months incommunicado. The lights went out, the telephones went dead, the water stopped, and there we were 75 people in an office building. Chinese, foreigners, locals, Americans, anyone who was there, an 85 year old money trader named Bodinghouse, I remember him very well. And he said "On my way home for lunch, I thought, I am five minutes early, I will stop in and read that article in the Atlantic Monthly that I could not finish last week. And then I will be just in time for lunch." So he put it down and said "Ach, das is a gut article." And he went out the door and a bayonet was in his stomach. That was 13 months that you'd just sit there. He and I played thousands of games of chess, it got so that when he raised his right hand I could tell where he was going to move. But in any case, what I was able to put together after the whole event was that a great struggle was going on in the central committee of the Chinese communist party. On one side the President Yu Shao Gue and Zhou En-lai, the moderates, and Mao on the other.

Q: Was Zhou a moderate, theoretically, at that point.

STOKES: Yes.

Q: So he represented what the mayor had told you.

STOKES: That's right, exactly. And the overall commander in the northeast at that time, military and political, was Gao Gang who was a member of the central committee. And the new mayor of Mukden was the personal assistant of Gao Gang. He was certainly not acting on his own. Chinese never act on their own. In this case we could trace why. Gao Gang was later imprisoned and executed and one of the reasons was related to this, I'm sure. And what had happened was that Mao Zedong I believe aspired to leadership of the communist world to succeed Stalin. He was planning a visit to Moscow to arrange this with Stalin because, triumphant after the victory in China, he felt this was what he was entitled to. I won't go into all of this because I wrote it in extent in an Industrial College paper called the Future between America and China.

Q: So that is available in that library?

STOKES: That is available in the Industrial College library. There are also articles based on that in various places including one in the Foreign Service Journal in about 1965.

Q: By you?

STOKES: Yes, But the key thing I wanted to point out is that the struggle that came out in the open once again on the death of Mao the Deng Xiaoping reforms of 1978/79 and what has followed, the anti-Mao campaign. All of this had its roots in that period, it had its forerunners. It was a constant struggle that was going on within the Chinese leadership and it was manifested in the events that we were encountering.

Q: Is it your impression that that same struggle is still continuing basically?

STOKES: Yes, I think Li Pong and Yong Shon Kun are now presently in power are clearly the inheritors of the Mao tradition. In fact, when Ed Vig and I were in China last January and we were in the city of Si Yang, we were accompanied by two members of the Chinese travel service, who were always employees of state security.

Q: This was last year?

STOKES: In January 1991 and I deliberately engaged them, though I could have traveled on my own, because I wanted to avoid any sense that I was up to anything. Because I have a long history going back that we'll see later. I remember reading with consternation one morning that the general secretary of the party Jon Ju Min had spoken to the leaders of the Liberation Army and said it's important that the Army follow the dictates of the party and the way you can do this best is by following the thoughts of Mao Zedong. If I'd had false teeth I'd have swallowed them because nothing good had been said about Mao Zedong for ten years, the ten years I'd been working in China for AT Karney as their director. It's as though the Pope had suddenly exposed Marxism. It was the way you'd think of it. And the members of the China travel service, when I asked them if they'd seen this, and I told them what it was, they looked as though I'd gone out of my mind. And when I showed them the paper they talked excitedly for half an hour in Chinese about what did all that mean. It was as unthinkable to them as it was to me. So we're going back again. It's a constant back and forth. I'd like to return for sake or orderliness the narrative to this period of house arrest which to shorten things, when on for some thirteen months. Later when I asked the people, Mr. Butterworth, the Assistant Secretary, what their feelings had been when they had heard that we were under arrest, he said, "Well, we didn't want to act too stridently because your reports of your success in creating a modus vivendi were so exciting, so promising, that we didn't want to act in the dark until we knew better." But then of course after several months of absolute silence and no communication of any kind.

Q: You weren't permitted any communication?

STOKES: No, even if you came near the window a sentry would point a rifle at you and arm the device.

Q: No additional food?

STOKES: Nobody in or out, nothing. They took out the Chinese one by one and gave them a going over, and finally ordered them all under pain of whatnot, not to have anything to do with us. So at that point I had to do all of the interpreting between the Chinese and Consul General.

Q: He did not have Chinese?

STOKES: No, he didn't know any. Trained language officer, Ralph Rinden had, the day before the last plane went out, just left on the last plane without orders because he could see that things, I guess, were just going bad. Again, this was very helpful to me to gain some insight into the Chinese way of thinking. The Consul General found it frustrating that they were speaking in a language that he couldn't grasp so I remember at one crucial moment he addressed them in Russian, which he spoke fluently, having been Consular in Moscow, and Consular General in Vladivostok. And you can almost never see the Chinese blush. I mean that's very difficult, I mean that's very difficult for a westerner to recognize but I could see the ear of the leading Chinese redden when he heard the Russian. Whether he understood it or not he turned to me and shifting from polite to very vulgar Chinese he said something in the effect of "What is that old son-of-a-bitch trying to say to me?" So the issue of language and rapport was really very crucial.

Q: So he was blushing with anger, not with embarrassment?

STOKES: No, fury, I think. October first, 1949, the Chinese communists set up a government of the people's republic. We remember that we could see what was happening in the streets although we were under house arrest and there were great parades and everything else. We had no radio but I could tell from the Chinese papers generally what was happening and they sent a circular note to the Western missions in Beijing asking for recognition. The United States organized a response saying not as long as you are holding diplomats hostage.

Q: Where there other foreigners being held hostage in Mukden?

STOKES: No, the French were free, the British were free, you could see them walking in the street. I'm sure they were followed and harassed but they were free. So just about this time an old Chinese who had been caught asleep by the Consul General and was ordered out to some remote part of the consulate came in one day to ask for his retirement money. I was talking to Mr. Ward at the time in his office, he got up, he was told that this man was coming and Ward went out and took him by the ear and led him down the stairs and the Chinese was frightened and began screaming and when Ward got to the bottom of the stairs, there was the mass Chinese staff confronting the Consul General and the door then burst open and in came the Chinese guards and they arrested Ward and any Americans that were close to him, carried him off to jail.

Q: Because of that incident, or did they use that incident just as a pretext?

STOKES: In the context of the Chinese desire for recognition in Beijing and the response in retrospect the Chinese decided, okay we're going to get rid of the Americans. Now this isn't worth it any more, its been going on too long, and what will we do with them anyhow, eventually. So they wanted some kind of pretext in order to get rid of us. And here's how it happened. Ward was in jail and there was going to be a trial and I was in charge of the office, such as it was, while he was away. For a year we had been sending messages of protest signed by the Consul General addressed to the Secretary of State with succeeding numbers and everything else and what we could do is give them to the Chinese to send.

Q: To the officer outside the door.

STOKES: Yes, you would never hear anything, they were never sent. So I wrote a message saying all is well and I am confident that the Consul General is being well treated, signed Stokes and I give it the next number. And this one, unaccountably, they sent. So the State Department when they got it, that it was signed by me and not Ward and that my statement that I'm sure the Consul General is well, it looked innocuous, I guess, to the Chinese but it said a lot to the department. In any case there was then a trial, the Consul General was sentenced to ten years at hard labor.

Q: That was all public then, his trial would have been public so people in Washington knew about it right?

STOKES: Well there were no reporters or anything, but I kept sending reports, because I was invited to be an observer at the trial. I went and they were now sending what I sent, although what I sent was meant trying to get through the censorship.

Q: But they did send them to Washington?

STOKES: Yes, and I'll never forget they were giving the sentence in Chinese and then it was being translated in English and while they were reading it in English for the detainees they were reading the next in Chinese at the same time. And Ward said "I heard my being sentenced to ten years at hard labor and I saw a silly grin appear on your face, Stokes, I thought, this kid will do anything to earn Chargé pay." But what I was hearing in Chinese was that but because of the particular heinousness of the office the additional penalty of immediate expulsion from the peoples republic is levied and we were. In fact, when the Consul General got back the next day, a Chinese came to the door and said there is going to be a trial of American spies, do you wish to attend? You're free to attend or not. And I checked with Ward and he said well why not go and see what it's about. And there was a trial of personnel who were allegedly left behind by the external survey detachment headed by Lieutenant, then Captain, Singlaub and they had masses of one-time pade, gold rings, Army/Navy type transmitters and camouflage gear and everything else you could imagine. The attempt was made to sort was made to sort of link the consulate to this work. We were then taken by truck at midnight to the railway station and put under guard on a train and it took us three days to reach the city of Tianjin. We were turned over to Al Wellborn who was Consul General there and then sent out. While we were hostages Mao made his famous visit to Moscow for his meeting with Stalin in which I think we had this contributory role in some way. Stalin treated him very shabbily and the agreement that came out of that was even worse for the communist government than the agreement in 1945 that Stalin had negotiated with Chiang Kai-shek. So the myth of Chinese/Russian solidarity and eternal friendship under the banner of communism was to my mind absolutely unraveled by the time all of this experience had come to a head. There is and always has been a latent hostility between the Chinese and the Russians. It's cultural, it's visceral. It goes way back.

Q: Old fashioned nationalism, a contest over territories?

STOKES: I think it has to do with it, like the relationship between the British and the Irish in many ways. History has poisoned us in so many ways that it's hard to say what comes first, but certainly the Chinese feel that Siberia was seized from them when the Russian Army came to Manchuria. Just before we arrived there they seized all kinds of Japanese assets and they transferred them to Russian ownership, put Russian signs on them and tried to keep it as property.

Q: They physically shipped them out too.

STOKES: Well then factory equipment they stole, the Chinese don't have to invent any reasons to. But Mao was prepared to swallow all of this until his confrontation with Stalin. And then when he came back, of course, it was such a loss of face because he had put down Zhou En-lai and put Gao Gang to death. The people that wanted to work with the Americans, to build up Chinese industry when we had promised to do that, and probably would have, and of course the chairman of the communist party is never wrong, so Mao then felt the need to move on to things like the Great Leap Forward and the cultural revolution, all the final errors that demolished the last vestige of his historical reputation in an attempt to salvage the earlier mistake.

Q: What was the year of the Great Leap Forward?

STOKES: '62. And by that time they had asked the Russians to leave and when Khrushchev replaced Stalin there was the final split between the two. The ironic thing though is that the split had been with Stalin. It's just simply that Khrushchevism, that is the idea of a movement to demystify and expose the faults of the great leader, was something that Mao Zedong could only view at with horror because the exposure of the faults of Mao would have been the analog to that and of course we had the great expose of the faults of Mao in 1978 and '79 when Mao had died and Deng Ziaoping came in. We had the same kind of Khrushchevian thing Chinese style. But now poor Li Pung and Yung Shung Koon are trying to put all that back again, it won't work. And in talking to Chinese at all levels of life in 1991 and today I can tell that is not going to wash. I think the present situation in China is like the situation follow the death of Brezhnev. The series of meaningless, statureless figures trying to pursue a moribund policy that has utterly no credibility even in the party. So you say what is holding it together? It's inertia. A Gorbachev hasn't surfaced yet. Zaus Yang who has all of the tremendous qualities of Gorbachev is a prisoner. It's important, I think, useful to recall how things appeared in June of 1990. China had introduced private enterprise into agriculture successfully, China had become self-sufficient in grain. Remember how it used to import millions of tons from the United States. It had a reform program to invite foreign capital, it was succeeding in building up its exports. Gorbachev came to China in order to try to gain lessons, would never say so because the Russians presume themselves the elder brothers, but there was everything to learn. All that Gorbachev wanted to do in a communist context while keeping a communist regime in political power was being done in China. However at the same time without Gorbachev knowing it, the leaders of the great state enterprises that were being threatened by Zaus Yang of curtailment of their subsidies mounted a palace coups and succeeded in getting Zaus Yang secretly deposed as General Secretary of the party in May of 1990. When this happened, some of his followers sent word to the students, your free to express your frustrations in the street, and so the demonstrations that lead to the Tiananmen massacre were not the pivotal event which caused the change in China, but they were only a kind of post-event manifestation, the part of the iceberg that could be seen above the water. Zaus Yang, when he appeared to the students in Tiananmen said, "It's too late, I've come too late", (inaudible) and the full meaning of that wasn't understood by the students because there is an absolute rule of (inaudible) or silence in the Cosenostr, which is the communist party leadership of China. So now China is a house of cards waiting for some kind of collapse.

Q: Do you have any personal guess as to the time frame towards further major changes in this scene?

STOKES: Well, anybody could give a number, but it will depend on factors of readiness and the like, I think. It's widely said that the death of Deng Ziaoping will do it. That's possible, but I can't really attach a lot of significance. I'd like to add here for the record that following my release from being a hostage I went on, Alexis Johnson invited me to go to Tokyo to do peripheral reporting on China and I spent two years there, among other things, being interested very much in that I never lost an interest in China.

Q: So that took you to '51 more or less?

STOKES: '52, yes and I'm trying to center this around China and not talk about career movements. But I then went to Thailand as head of the counterinsurgency effort and was dealing with a manifestation of Maoism because the insurgency was Chinese sponsored, had Mao badges and Mao books and all of that so that was another seven years of study.

Q: Bill, what was the level of your Chinese as this story played itself out. Did you reach an S4 level for example?

STOKES: Can I pause in answering that to just sort of finishing the sequence. I'd like to just outline my interest in China as they unfolded. After that experience in Thailand, you know we were inspectors together, and one of my assignments was to inspect.

Q: But the inspection was '72 - '75, it was a lot later.

STOKES: Well I came out of the six years in Thailand, ended in '73, then I became inspector.

But one of my inspection assignments was to inspect the liaison mission in Beijing. Now President Bush was the head of it. When they submitted my nomination at the State Department they were wondering what, in light of all the previous excitement, would be the Chinese reaction because this was the early period, Mao was still alive and the Chinese said why do you send us someone connected with former events of this kind. They said, well we have confidence in Mr. Stokes, and they accepted me then, for this limited purpose. But when I left, the day I left was the 30 anniversary of the trials in Mukden, and so on. This was printed in the Chinese press and you could see it seemed to be another manifestation of the struggle of two groups within China whether to let me in or protest it. The hard-liners and the cooperators were constantly manifested. Not long thereafter, I left the foreign service and then I spent five years in China traveling to China frequently for AT Karney and its industrial development work, and wrote a book about manufacturing equity joint ventures in China. I visited some 200 factories and spent days at each and all over North China, gave seminars in all the big Chinese cities on how to modernize industry and develop a market economy. I must say this was a priceless way and period to get to know what is going on in Chinese society below the surface and I think that some way we need to think of innovative ways to conduct diplomacy on many planes other than just contacts with a foreign ministry, and to do this by providing services and information. I have some ideas. There's no time here to present them, but the idea of assigning this to intelligence services and having people operating in a clandestine way I think is totally discredited. It has residual toxins in it that lead, as did our experience in Mukden, to poisoning the possibility for other collaborations. But we can find overt and open ways to conduct diplomacy on many different functional levels so that we are building something that can endure rather than hiding things that for short term gains lead to long term loss. So the whole relationship between China and America is an absolutely fascinating one and I think in the long run is going to be pivotal in determining the future of the Pacific Basin. I have great reservations about the concessions to the paper leadership that's in power now. I don't feel that we need to go out of our way to pick quarrels, I think we should have a clear idea that China is not represented by the individuals that are being sent abroad by this regime. I feel very uneasy about sending Eagleburger and Scowcroft clandestinely to Beijing at a time when the publicly announced policy of the government was not to have any contact with the Chinese leadership at or above the Assistant Secretary level. All this meant is that we were telling the Chinese that we will tell our own public one thing and do other things with them. That idea of clandestine maneuvering has profoundly adverse long term implications for our real interest. And the Chinese don't listen to what you say, they listen to what you do and they draw conclusions from it that we don't intend them to draw, but they do. So the important thing is not knowing the Chinese language, it's understand how the Chinese interpret what happens. As far as the level I attained, when I was using it in China, it was good, there was never any chance to measure it, but I felt perfectly free. It was doing all it needed to do and I had never a moment's classroom instruction. I think the big thing in the language for me is to feel free to use it and there didn't seem to be any hang-ups over misinterpretation of words. (That might be a good place to pause)

Q: We suspended at that point and we're now resuming on the 12th of February 1992 and so we'll go on from there.

STOKES: I recall that in our previous session we were interpreting the experiences that I had in Manchuria with the divisions within the leadership of the Chinese communist party. Although it was a consulate and not the embassy we were pursuing as the lead office Secretary Acheson's desire to search for a modus vivendi with the Chinese communist leadership and Shenyang or Mukden was the first city to fall under the Chinese communist sway. So, consequently, we were dealing with the Chinese leadership as an object test on both sides of what would be possible in terms of a modus vivendi.

Q: The US embassy was already in Beijing at this point?

STOKES: No, it was in Nanking while I was in Chen Yang. There was a Consulate General in Beijing under Edmund Club. The Ambassador, Leighton Stuart was in Nanjing credited to the national government. We recall that what we perceived was at first in Chen Yang was the friendly manifestation and expression of desire for defacto relationships including businesses and courier and exchange of visits between the Consul General and the mayor. The mayor was the right hand man of Gao Gang who was the overall military and political leader in northeast China, the most important part of China economically and politically, and the place where the victory was won that broke the back of the national government on the mainland, in fact, in the Daudung marshes. So we were not dealing with some local uninstructed functionary. Gao Gang was a member not only of the central committee, he was one of five of the top leaders. Gao Gang in retrospect, and is manifested to us, clearly represents the international wing of the party which included President Yu Show Gee and Zhou En-lai and the sudden reversal of Gao Gang's policy that had us suddenly, one day without warning, surrounded by troops and the electricity and water cut off and the beginning of an incommunicado arrest, was clearly the result of Mao Zedong's personal decision and stemming from his desire presumably to prepare for his meeting with Stalin and his desire to obtain the overall leadership of the world communist movement as a result of his successful revolution in China. But in an internal sense, Mao has always represented the leader of what I would call, as opposed to the internationalist wing, the continental wing. Someone who always saw the peasants as the basis for success of his party and the idea of movements within China was his expertise. The little red book is all about how to conduct guerrilla warfare against a major land power that was in charge of the territory in which you were located. What was very interesting was to see how adroit Mao was in areas that involved awareness of international realities - for example, what broke the back of the Chinese economy was the Great Leap Forward which was Mao's belief that the whole array of economic problems that China faced and this desire for modernism could be addressed purely by the will and the discipline of the people as guided by the central committee, mainly Mao himself. So the Great Leap Forward was manifested largely by an order from the central committee, that every village would have its own steel mill. And so crudely they began everywhere throwing scrap iron onto fires stocked with soft coal. It produced unusable stuff, of course. Tremendous pollution and diversion of effort and everything else. It was at that time that the Chinese Air Force began reporting a breakdown in its Soviet provided air fleet and Chinese copies of MiGs needing spare parts, maintenance, supplies and lubricants and so on and Mao's reply to that was, that isn't the way you solve problems, read the little red book and apply the thoughts of Mao Zedong and don't ask us these things. So with this background I'd like to recall some of my experiences beginning in 1964 that dealt with an external view of the struggle within the Chinese communist party. Experience in Mukden was seeing it from the inside of the country, the other was from the outside.

Q: Just one question before we go on to that phase. In the period when the local communists were first making their approaches to you, were your activities under the close guidance of the embassy in Nanking and was there any difference of view as to how the approach should be handled.

STOKES: We had very little guidance from the embassy. We had guidance but Consul General Ward was not really interested in following it. Mr. Ward had made the friendship of Mr. Bullet during the Hoover relief mission in Russia. And Mr. Bullet was Thomas Dewey's choice to be Secretary of State and Mr. Ward expected to be the leader of the department under Bullet that is the top career man, so he took a very reserved view to guidance he got not only from the embassy but from the department. and Mr. Ward's Consul Generalship sort of was a constant running battle with the department and the embassy over a whole range of things including whether his wife should be there or not, including matters of policy as well.

Q: I wondered particularly because the embassy would still be in close contact with the Nationalists and the Nationalists might have been twisting their arms as to what you should or shouldn't do with the communists.

STOKES: Yes, although by that time the administration was even more convinced that the national government was going to collapse. Mr. Ward represented the conservative wing of the Republican party which felt more that the national government should be strengthened at all costs and General Wedemeyer came out to regulate this issue or to investigate this issue and there were divisions within the consulate over this of course. Mr. Ward was the boss but if you asked the young officers like Al Sebens and myself what our view was. Interestingly Mr. Ward let us go on and write dispatches and so on. In fact, with the defeat of Dewey he rather lost interest in what was going on. And by that time it was very close to the actual collapse of the government so there was very little guidance that Nanjing could provide anyway by that time.

In 1964 I was assigned to the Industrial College in the armed forces for senior training and the centerpiece, as you know Bill from your experiences, is the time you have to write a thesis. Although I had been in the meantime in Japan and then in North Africa, I never lost the fascination for what was happening within China and I wrote my thesis on the future between America and China involving a study of what two great powers facing each other over a whole array of divisive issues. What, underneath all the tactical differences, was there in the way of a common interest that might be explored in some reopening because the mutual hostility that had dated since the Korean War obviously brought a sterile deadlock on both sides on what they were able to accomplish.

Q: You probably could not do a field trip to China in connection with that thesis.

STOKES: No, I wouldn't have been personally welcome there at all. As later events turned out because, just parenthetically I mean, that when the department wanted to send me to China as Inspector during the time of Mr. Bush's tenure there were remonstrances from the Chinese foreign ministry which were overcome by the way, but that's for a later part of the sequence. The thrust of this thesis was that in fact there were major interests on both sides that had manifested themselves earlier at the time Secretary Acheson's desire for (inaudible) and that as China was also in a cul-de-sac and Mao had in fact been gravely disappointed in all the reasons that he had had for frustrating this modus vivendi he had been repelled by Stalin and so forth. Interestingly, when I asked permission to publish this article and send it to the department for review, the Voice of America with my permission, in fact my enthusiastic preference, for that rather than publication was to translate it into Chinese and then broadcast it in installments to the mainland.

Q: Did they do that?

STOKES: Yes they did that, I still have the text, and later, when I was in private business with AT Karney, I met two Chinese officials who had been part of the external political interpretation apparatus that said that they recalled such a broadcast and a general conclusion of the party that the United States was signaling a desire for better relations and looking for the beginning of the resumption of some talks about a new relationship. That was really quite satisfying and I think Dick Donalds who was in the VOA picked up this idea and saw it through deserves a lot of credit for that.

Q: Has that been cleared with the Department of State so that in effect there was a deliberate decision.

STOKES: Yes, well, all that I know is that I saw a copy of a decision by the Bureau of Far Eastern Affairs approving a request by VOA to do this. To what extent they had an ulterior motive or whether they just saw that no harm would be done. I'm inclined to think the former because there was a general disbelief among career officers that the systematic hostilities at China was the right idea.

Q: A disbelief in that.

STOKES: Yes, and a desire, other things being equaled, to find a relationship but an unwillingness to be seen as the author as an initiative to this effort because so many China service officers have been crucified by McCarthy and others.

Q: This was only 10 years after McCarthy, wasn't it.

STOKES: Yes, but there was still plenty of that around. Mr. Robertson, and there were many who were important political figures that had been assigned in Asian Affairs, held that same view. So I think it was seen as a harmless way to try to do something, that is, an undangerous way, to start to do something to cast bread on the waters and see what would happen. Following that year at the Industrial College I was assigned to the Air Force planning staff on loan from the State Department. And one of my early duties I recall was to assist in the negotiation for base rights in Southeast Asia and East Asia as a result of the needs rising out of our increasing involvement in Vietnam. And so I was involved in the negotiation with the Taiwan government for the Jin Guan Gan airfield in Taiwan. It was to be used by B52s for the U Te Pao base in Thailand. One of the most interesting and ultimately significant assignments for me was to plan the response from the Air Force's point of view of the Thai government's request that a United States helicopter fleet of 100 Hueys and pilots be sent to Northeast Thailand to help the Thai government deal with the Chinese sponsored insurgency in Northeast Thailand, which coincidentally was just in the, not so coincidentally, but was in the same vicinity as the place where our air base network in Thailand was being located - near the Lao frontier which is an easy reach of the Ho Chi Minh trail. At this time the State Department manifested the beginning of what was to be the core of what I'd like to talk about. An unwillingness to see reproduced in Thailand the same kind of direct involvement and direct assumption of military responsibility that the United States was conducting then in Vietnam.

HARLAN CLEVELAND
Director, UNRRA Mission
China (1947-1948)

Ambassador Cleveland was born in New York City and raised in the United States and Switzerland. He was educated at Princeton and Oxford Universities. During World War II he served on the Board of Economic Warfare, after which he held a number of senior positions dealing with Italian economic recovery, US and UNRRA assistance programs in China and Taiwan and NATO issues. He also served as Assistant Secretary of State for International Organizations and as US Ambassador to NATO. Ambassador Harlan was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1999.

Q: Well, when you left in 1947, where did you go?

CLEVELAND: I went to China and became the head of the UNRRA mission in China, which was by far the biggest UNRRA mission, spending about 2/3 of a billion 1947 dollars in 2 ½ years. The decision had been made in the UNRRA headquarters that they would wind down the European programs in 1947, but that the China program would be run for one more year. The head of that mission was an American major general of engineers who at one time had been the governor of the Panama Canal. That was partly because one of the biggest single projects there was rebuilding the dikes in the Yellow River Valley, which was an enormous earth moving job. The engineer in charge told me it was the earth moving equivalent of building the Panama Canal, and therefore, he said tied for second in history behind the Great Wall. It was a huge endeavor. This fellow, General Edgerton, became ill and wasn't able to stay, and they had another year to run.

The thing at UNRRA was that an appointment to UNRRA was no longer a prestige thing; you just had to find somebody that could do the job. So I get a call one day from Jacko, Commander Jackson, out of the blue asking would I be willing to go to China for a year. Well, I obviously would need a job if they were going to wind down. On the other hand, Lois and the kids were with me, and it made for family complications. I didn't think I should take them to where there was a civil war going on. But it was a huge job. It was a much bigger job than I had; more responsibility and a much bigger staff. There were 3000 people scattered all over China in the middle of a civil war.

Q: I'm thinking we might stop at this point because, I'd rather start; I'll just put it on the tape

here that we are going to pick up, you had been offered this job in China in 1947. It was a very big job, and you have given a little background about why you were offered the job, and we'll pick it up at that point with what you agreed to do and why you went there and what it was.

CLEVELAND: Right. We hadn't gotten very far along in my life. At this point I was still only 29.

***

Q: This is the first of April, 1999. Well, you are 29 years old and you are off to China. What did the job consist of as you saw it then and when was this?

CLEVELAND: This was May of 1947.

Q: How did you see the job as you went there?

CLEVELAND: Well, it was obviously a very big job especially for me at that age. It was the largest country program in the UNRRA setup. In the course of a little bit more than two years, that program put something over 2/3 of a billion 1947 dollars into China. I once wrote a long paper called "China is Hard to Help," discussing the difficulty of solving problems by throwing money at them. The war was over, but the civil war was going from bad to worse from the point of view of the nationalists.

I didn't bring Lois and the children over because I didn't want to have them there in the middle of a civil war. I had to go rather suddenly. When I came back from Europe, I had not more than a couple of weeks to get things set with Lois and then to do some consultation in Washington. I was able to make an arrangement in Washington that I would have the same authority that the heads of the European missions of UNRRA had. They were, of course, going through reduction in force procedures. I, fortunately, got the same authority so that I was able to release people if I didn't think they were contributing or if there was some cloud of corruption over them, as there was with some. I was able to get rid of people fast without proving anything against them. So I got that authority and I was still working closely with the deputy director general of UNRRA, Commander Robert Jackson, a really delightfully bright and vibrant person.

I got there and found there were theoretically over 4,000 people working for me, 1,000 expatriates, non-Chinese, and 3,000 Chinese. They were scattered all over China in the middle of this civil war 15 regional offices dealing with both the communists and the nationalists. We were the UN; we were supposed to be neutral. Many of our employees were actually working inside the Chinese government to sort of help them do their jobs. I brought just two people with me, an economist and a minister of assistance that I had worked with in Italy. Otherwise it was all new people as far as I was concerned. It was a little like my taking over the job in Italy during the war where I was young and didn't have a military ranking which was just as well because it would have been a low one. Just as the military, they were inclined to take me seriously because I was in the job; the same thing sort of happened in China. There had been quite a long hiatus where the chief of mission had been sick. He had been brought home, actually. So anybody who looked as he was in charge was sort of automatically popular, at least for a honeymoon period. We were operating all over China. The only way to find out anything -- for example, if there was a flood in southern China -- was to hop in an airplane and go and look. So we did a good deal of that, getting around in China on unscheduled airplanes, mostly former Flying Tiger planes and pilots. General Chennault had set himself up as a civil air transport company. Many of the Flying Tigers found their first post war jobs that way. So, I had the experience of sitting next to a pilot, who says, "I think I'll have a nap. Why don't you take over for awhile." He showed me how I should do it. Of course, I had neither the authority nor the credentials to do that sort of thing, and he didn't have the authority to turn it over to anybody either. But it was an informal time. I got around China a lot.

Q: What was UNRRA trying to do? How do you try to do something for China at that time?

CLEVELAND: Relief and rehabilitation. Trying to recover from the war. The biggest single project was a huge dike-building project in the Yellow River, where the Yellow River had been diverted from its old bed, its long historic bed, had been diverted by the Chinese as a defense mechanism against the Japanese. It wandered all over the country, destroying villages, and it seemed very important to get it back into its old bed so the power arrangements could be reconstructed and the country saved from this really huge river with its enormous silt content of the water. I was in one village where the only thing you could see of the village that had been there was the roof of the only two story building that had been there. Everything else was just sand like a desert. I went up and visited the Yellow River project several times. I said it was our star accomplishment.

On one visit I walked past a whole series of rusting bulldozers. I asked the young engineer in charge why they had all these Chinese going up and down this dike they were building with two baskets of dirt instead of using the bulldozers. He said, "Well come to my shack here and I'll show you." He did the calculations that demonstrated that it really didn't make sense to send heavy intricate machinery to an area like that if there were no machine shops within 1000 miles that could ever make a new part for them. Apparently one of the things that went out first was the clutch assemblies. He said Chinese drivers tend to ride the clutch. You remember what that meant in the old days when we had clutches on cars. So I watched 1,000 people going up and down with dirt, and laying the dirt on top of the dike and coming down and getting some more dirt, an extraordinary operation which in the end did divert the Yellow River back into its old bed. The engineer in charge of that operation, a wonderful older man named O.J. Todd, said it was about the earth moving equivalent of building the Panama Canal. Therefore, he said, it tied for second in world history behind the Great Wall of China which is apparently recognized to be the greatest earth moving job ever.

Another big crisis came over some very modern fishing boats that had been programmed and sent before I got there. They were the kind of boats they fish with off Seattle and Vancouver: two-way radios, power driven trolling nets, that sort of thing. They were enormously successful in bringing in a huge catch. They were so successful that they bothered the people who ran the fish market in Shanghai, the local Al Capone character.

Q: The mob.

CLEVELAND: The mob of that time and place. They declared a boycott on the catch of these beautiful boats. We had some problem getting the boats working. I found that these imported engineers mostly got seasick and really didn't want to go fishing, so we finally developed the idea of getting some Australian fishing captains to come in and be the expatriate bosses and got some real Chinese fishermen as their crew. These new skippers were very good at teaching the fishermen what they needed to know about the machinery. So, the problem was more human than machinery, though it was diagnosed first as a machinery problem. That was wrong.

Q: When you were looking at plans, were you able to, bring bulldozers to a place where they can't repair them? We tried to think in sort of western terms. Were you able to sort of modify what you were trying to do because of the Chinese situation?

CLEVELAND: Well, most of the heavy and complicated equipment had already been brought in before I got there. My problem was to adapt the situation to what we had. In this case, for example, of the fishing boats, we had to have a big negotiation with the fish market people and with the ministry of food of the nationalist government in Nanking.

We had a meeting in my office, I remember, at which, of course we didn't have air conditioning in those days, and we weren't very far from the market, so all the stench from the fish piling up that they weren't willing to sell was readily received by our noses. The minister of food asked one of his assistants to go and shut the window. I said, "No, I'd rather keep it open please," thinking that would help speed up the negotiations. Anyway, what we finally did was a typical Chinese compromise. Half the boats would be used for fishing, and the other half, I don't remember how many there were exactly, were being diverted to river transport because they were well equipped for it. They had too much equipment for that. They didn't need the trolling equipment, but the two way radios were useful. That reduced the amount of the catch sufficiently so that the market was prepared to absorb it.

We had a major agricultural industries service, so-called, which was developing small industry in the rural areas. This was to prevent a situation where farmers would go broke and come into the city, and the cities would be overwhelmed with unemployed peasants. The sort of thing that happened in American history and the history of other countries, but in China it was really threatening the cities. So we had a group of very bright young engineers who invented all sorts of ways of doing processing locally instead of bringing it to big centers. That was one of the most durable kinds of relief and rehabilitation projects I thought we did, that, and the bank building. We had people helping with the water and power systems of the country getting them back into shape. We had a big import of food which we used for wages. All the people on the dikes, they didn't want the money, because the money by that time was almost worthless. The interest rate from Shanghai I remember was about 30% per month. They didn't want the money, so we would import this wheat flour, and stuff like that, and deliver it to people as wages. We'd bring flour all the way across the Pacific, and from Shanghai to the Yellow River Valley, to the port of Tientsin. Another big distance. I mean like putting in at Cherbourg and taking it to Warsaw, something like that. It was an expensive operation in modern cost-effective terms.

Q: Well how did you deal, I mean you were there from 1947 to when?

CLEVELAND: Until early '48.

Q: How did you deal with the civil war that was going on?

CLEVELAND: Well, we had several people who went back and forth to negotiate with the communists, and we did import some stuff that they needed and wanted. We had great difficulty getting them to agree that none of it would be diverted to their military. They regarded their military as just other citizens, you know. So in practice the lion's share of what we brought in went into the nationalist areas, and of course, the lion's share of the country was still under at least nominal nationalist control. There was a big problem just keeping the Yellow River project going because it was just in that area that the civil war was heating up the most when I first got there in the spring of '47. We got so frustrated by the fact that the workers would just disappear into the countryside every few days because they didn't want to be shot at. A quite normal motivation I thought. So we talked about it in our mission, and we decided to do something that I am really surprised looking back on it any of us had the guts to do. Without notice to either side and without notice to our headquarters, I declared a "cease fire" in the Yellow River Valley, with a sort of eloquent statement saying that we were trying to rebuild China for whomever governed it. That wasn't our problem. We wanted to rebuild it, and one of the things was this huge Yellow River thing, and we couldn't do it if they got shot at, so there had to be a cease fire.

This was such a surprise that both the nationalists and the communists took it seriously. I got very strong confidential support from my boss, Commander Jackson, in Washington. Some of the foreign office people who were representatives to UNRRA and the UNRRA council were grumbling about it. It was precisely for that reason that had I tried to clear it; it never would have happened. So it held for several weeks, and people got back on the job.

Then one night a communist raiding party knocked over a local nationalist unit, and the civil war was back on. But the interesting thing was they had gotten the idea, and thereafter they tended to lay off the areas where the dike-building was actually going on, so the drama of this cease fire initiative actually got through and became sort of a public fact, even though the cease fire itself went into history rather rapidly.

Q: What about the problem of the nationalist government particularly in that period, that was extremely corrupt. Was this a problem for you?

CLEVELAND: The problem wasn't much of a problem in dealing with the government people we dealt with. The man who was sort of my opposite number, the cabinet the head of what was called CNRRA, the Chinese National Relief and Rehabilitation Administration, was honest and dependable. He knew that I meant what I said, and I knew he meant what he said. And Chiang Kai-shek himself, his family and friends, were heavily corrupt. But he actually lived a very austere life. For example, he'd only have three courses, he'd invite people to dinner and only have three courses, when the normal thing was about 20 courses at that time. We had some people in the mission who were lining their own pockets, or helping their Chinese opposite numbers do so. We conducted a number of investigations, and I had this authority to just say, "Okay, this is your last day of work." So, in most cases, I just did that. We didn't try to make a federal case out of each of them because we would have done nothing else. People got the idea after awhile that that was not going to be tolerated. After the first few firings of that sort, that sort of thing settled down a good deal. Some Chinese family members and others were really getting rich. It was bothersome, but there was also nothing I could do about it. It was also helping the nationalists to lose the civil war. We just had to watch and wait, rather than try to mastermind the whole situation.

We did have several rather dramatic incidents of confrontation. We needed to talk to a delegation of Chinese communists. We wanted them to come to Shanghai. We got the mayor to agree and to put them under his protection. The mayor was a very good friend and a very bright figure, one of the most honest people I met in China. K.C. Woo was his name. So we had this delegation come in. It was a strange series of events. I made sort of a welcoming speech to my opposite number in the negotiations. You could see him getting red in the face and mad at what I was saying, even though I was using my most flowery language. So I declared a recess and went out and talked to my Chinese assistants about what was going on here. They said, "Well this translator is translating all of your pretty words into the nastiest language he can think of as it goes through."

I learned my lesson. Everything I said would be translated by my own translator. At the end of that negotiation, we said good-bye to them, and they were to leave the next morning. The delegation left and it developed that their translator had decamped and had turned up in Hong Kong. He was sort of the KGB guy in the mission, but he decided he had had enough apparently. I never found out what happened but he was obviously escaping from the communists.

There was also a lot of what the nationalist government was doing was of course deeply affected by how the war was going. It was not well. There was an incident that I remember there which illustrates that. On one visit that Commander Jackson came over from Washington, we managed to negotiate with the government and the central bank that our proceeds of sale-fund would not be expressed in local currency but in bales of cotton because we didn't want it just to disappear with inflation. That was a very important invention, the proceeds of sale-fund in UNRRA. That idea was that you bring in dollar goods, and the government has to put the equivalent of that in local currency in a special fund under the joint control of the government and the UNRRA mission. That same principle was written into the Marshall Plan legislation later on. They called it counterpart funds. It had a very important role to play in the Marshall Plan. I must give you a copy, by the way, of a keynote speech I gave on the Marshall Plan during the 50th anniversary year a couple of years ago. It explains a lot of what I thought about the Marshall Plan.

Anyway, we made this deal that the local currency fund would be expressed in bales of cotton. Then Commander Jackson went back to Washington. I was getting weekly reports from the central bank of how much money we had in there and so on. I started looking at these reports very quizzically because the numbers were going up so fast. I finally called up the governor at the central bank who by that time was a good friend of mine, partly because I had said I didn't want the house they had allocated for the chief of the UNRRA mission to live in because I wanted to be downtown right near the office, living in a hotel. He turned out to be the next person on the priority system, and so he got the house. So, he always thought I was a good friend of his, you see. Anyway I called him up and said would you look at these figures because I think there is something wrong with the picture. He called back in about an hour splitting his sides with laughter saying you know what happened was that I told them to make it bales of cotton and

I assumed it would just apply to them a normal interest rate without the inflation factor. They were continuing to apply the 30% per month. He said I have been doing some pencil work on my desk here, and I figure it won't be very many years before UNRRA will own all of China if this goes on. He was laughing and making a big joke of it. But he then told me a few weeks later about having been called up to see Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek at the sort of summer residence like Camp David in our set up. He said he was confronted there with a whole plan for changing the currency. Instead of being called the Chinese national currency it was going to be called the gold Yuan. They had an outside consultant do this without telling the central bank about it. Then they confronted the governor of the central bank with this plan. Dr. Jien Jienal, the governor of the central bank, said, "The Generalissimo asked me whether I thought the plan would work." I said I felt the plan would work just fine if he could hold Shandong because the communists were then threatening Shandong province.

CLEVELAND: Once they had Shandong, they would be threatening the Yangtze Valley. In other words he was a banker and knew perfectly well that money was a factor of confidence. So he came down and the Generalissimo decided they would change the currency anyway. They changed the currency, but it didn't have very much effect on the inflation. as it was bound not to.

So there were many ways in which the situation in China was impacting our program. We just had to weave and bob and duck to try to make sense out of the really enormous bonanza we were putting into the country. It was hard to know exactly what proportion of their GNP. I developed the first calculation of Chinese balance of payments. We figured that about half of the balance of trade at that time in '47 was actually smuggling, so there was no way to get a series of figures that made any sense, that you could do the kind of planning we do now.

So, as you can see, it was a lively time. When there was a flood in Canton in the whole Kwangtung area, the only way to find out about it was to get an airplane. So we got an airplane in the morning we first heard about it, got the door taken off because we could see better that way. We flew at about 500 feet all over south China to get a feel for where the water had gone and how many people are being displaced, and that sort of thing, and where we should try to deliver food. That was all in a day's work. I have to say it was a very interesting job.

Q: Well, you left there in early '48. What was the reason for leaving? Was it impossible to do relief?

CLEVELAND: No, the program was just finished. It was going to be finished in the next couple of months. We worked out a way of trying to transfer to non-governmental organizations most of the equipment and supplies that were lying around that hadn't been delivered yet, so that we wouldn't be overtly taking sides in the civil war. So we worked out a transition of that program, and the U.S. government at the same time was developing a new China aid program in support of Chiang Kai-shek. In effect we sort of married our program to that in terms of we'd stop the supply of certain kinds of equipment or certain kinds of food. But the American aid program would pick it up just at the point where we dropped it.

I came back to Washington which was the only place where I knew how to work. But the UNRRA program was finished at that point. That was even the end of the UNRRA agency. It was actually the largest operational thing the UN has ever done, though some of the more recent peacekeeping operations may have been more costly.

Q: But nothing like restoring the Yellow River to its riverbed, and all.

CLEVELAND: And all the stuff we did in Italy and Yugoslavia and the Ukraine, and so on. It was just a gigantic operation.

ROBERT ANDERSON
Consular Officer
Shanghai (1947-1949)

Ambassador Robert Anderson entered the Foreign Service in 1947. His career included posts in Shanghai, Bangkok, New Delhi, Bordeaux, and Paris. In addition, he served as ambassador to Benin, Morocco, and the Dominican Republic. Ambassador Anderson was interviewed by Horace Torbert in 1990.

ANDERSON: I went to Shanghai. As you and I discussed before this interview, your early posts are essentially training; that's when the Service finds out if you've got it or not, and if you can develop and progress. So I started out in Shanghai, in the General Services section, as the fellow that was told to move all of the household and office equipment that was arriving in Shanghai -- to reopen all of our posts in China. There were about a dozen of them. And there was no commercial transportation whatsoever, air or sea. So I had a problem. What I did was make friends with our Air Force people. I would find a space on this C-47 or this C-46, and go and have drinks with them. And I had all of our things moved at no expense to the State Department, to establish all of our posts.

Q: Sounds like a first-class dog robber. [Laughter]

ANDERSON: That's what it was. They gave me my first job in the political work. And at one point they sent me on a trip to prepare an economic report.

Then a very unusual man showed up one day. His nickname was "the walrus." He became one of the closest friends I ever had in the Foreign Service. He was William Walton Butterworth, whom I absolutely adored, and his wife, Virginia. He had sent word, before he arrived as our Minister in China, that he would appreciate it if his lift vans would not be dropped in the Yangtze River, and would not be pilfered by anybody. I was told that this was a rather formidable person, and that it might be a good idea if I saw to it that his lift vans arrived from Shanghai to Nanking with no mishaps.

I went down on the Yangtze River, at the harbor in Shanghai, and I stayed with those vans until they arrived in Nanking. Nothing was broken; no damage. The Minister came down to Shanghai afterwards and said he wanted to meet the person who shipped his effects to Nanking. This is not a very nice thing to say, but I have to say it. Our Consul General was Monnett B. Davis. I had never met Monnett B. Davis, though I had been in his Consulate General for damn near a year. And Butterworth asked him, "Would you find out the fellow who got my effects up to Nanking? I'd like to meet him." And I was escorted, for the first time in my life, into the consul general's office. And I had never met Monnett B. Davis.

Q: My gracious! How big a consulate general was it? I mean, how many American officers were there?

ANDERSON: Put it this way, Tully, it wasn't that big. [Laughter] I think it was the personality of the Consul General. I introduced myself to the Consul General in front of Mr. Butterworth. And I said, "I'm delighted to meet you, Sir."

And Butterworth said to me afterwards: "You never met this man before?"

I said, "No, Sir, I haven't." And then he told me: "Look, I want you up in Nanking. You know, this is ridiculous." I guess the only reason I'm mentioning this little story is for younger people who come into the Service. I maintain that every officer gets a chance, gets an opening, but a lot of people don't recognize it. If you meet a challenge successfully, something is going to happen and you're going to go up. And that was the first one I had; it was getting those lift vans to Nanking. I did the job.

There's a fellow named Jim McKenna I have to mention to you. He was the first Foreign Service officer I ever met in Shanghai, when I arrived on a weekend. I was all charged up and said, "Boy, they can't wait to see this young, vigorous vice consul come to set the affairs of Shanghai and China straight." And I walked into this fellow's office. And he had a hat on at his desk. He was the number two in the Consulate General. He's smoking the biggest cigar I've ever seen -- Jim McKenna, from New England. He was there with a big pile of telegrams, going through them.

He looked up over his glasses at me and wondered what I was doing there. And I told him I was assigned here. And he didn't know who I was. I didn't have a room; they didn't have a room for me, nothing. I slept on a couch at the Cathay Hotel; at the foot of twin beds, where two other officers were sleeping. That's how tight things were. I found out later that McKenna spent as much time as he could in his office, because his wife wouldn't let him smoke cigars at home. He was a wonderful guy.

I went up to Nanking. Butterworth, a very foresighted man, felt that we should start a major biographic data program for China. And I was put in charge of that, started it right from scratch, had a full-time gal working who was a specialist and who came from Washington. And we built up a mammoth biographic program for all of China.

I went around to different offices and taught people how to make reports, and not just these old-fashioned, formal full reports, but little squibs; cutting out items from newspapers and other publications. I was sent over to Taipei in Formosa to get things started. Later we managed to get all that information out, which gave us a tremendous amount of background on the Communist regime that eventually took over. We wouldn't have had anything but for that.

Washington still hadn't figured out whether the Chinese Communists were agrarian reformers or communists. So they split the embassy in half. And seeing that I was young, single and expendable, I guess, I was told to stay behind with John Wesley Jones, who was one of the dearest friends I ever had.

Q: Still is.

ANDERSON: And who was partially responsible for my marriage. He was very close to the Italian ambassador in China, whose daughter I married. But Johnny was sort of a father to me out there. He was a dear, dear person.

We stayed behind after the communists took over. They took over on April 21, 1949, and we were essentially locked up until we got out in October. When we tried to go to the office a couple of times, they'd ram bayonets through the radiators of our cars. So a couple of us were dumb enough to say the heck with this, and we'd creep around and go through back alleys, because we wanted to get over the chancery so we could send a telegram or two. We were finally evacuated in October, that year, from Shanghai.

Now, there were two other people in Nanking I wanted to mention to you. One was Livy [Livingston] Merchant. He was a very close friend of Walt Butterworth; they went to Princeton together. And Livy had been a very, very successful investment banker, living in New Jersey. And then he, as you probably know -- you know him better than I do -- decided to get into the Foreign Service at a rather advanced age.

A lot of us couldn't figure out why a successful investment banker, with everything in the world, would come out and live in Nanking, China, with a beautiful wife, Betty, and children.

He told us that he just got absolutely fed up with spending most of his life on the train, between his house and his office. He said: "I would leave in the morning and wouldn't see my children before they went to school. And I would come back at night and they'd already be in bed. That's no way to live." Well, of course, he turned out to be one of the top people, we've ever had in the Service; I think he's just absolutely wonderful.

The other fellow is Philip Crowe.

Q: I hadn't realized he was out there.

ANDERSON: Phil went there as Roger Lapham's man. Do you remember the China Relief Mission?

Q: Yes.

ANDERSON: Phil was the head of it in Nanking. That was our first post-war aid program, really; right after the war, as I recall. Phil was administering that. We became very close friends.

He managed somehow to have an embassy every time the Republicans came into power; I think he had five throughout his career. He had his first heart attack when he was out there, just as the communists were coming. The question was how to get him out.

We had an old Army ambulance, that we received from the military a while back -- and I drove him through the retreating Chinese Nationalist lines to the last plane to leave Nanking. I must say, I wasn't worried about the communist troops coming in, but I was very concerned about the retreating Nationalist troops. They were much nastier than the victors coming in, who weren't quite as nervous, they were on top of the world, as it were. And it was a fairly hairy little ride in the ambulance, but we got Phil there, thank God, and put him on the plane. We waved goodbye and off Livy and Phil Crowe went.

But after that, I came back to Washington with a rather bad case of amoebic dysentery. There were no medicines left in Nanking so it was pretty well advanced, and they, the doctors, were concerned about it. So I spent about three months or more, every day of my life, at Walter Reed Hospital. I became the second guinea pig, if you will, for Aureomycin, the medicine they were just developing.

Q: Thank God for it. They used it on me some years later.

ANDERSON: They hadn't really figured out the right mixture. I went through more courses than you can shake a stick at. But I finally got rid of it and then got married in February of '50, in Florence, Italy.

Q: At that time, was your father-in-law in Washington by then?

ANDERSON: No. He didn't come until the '60s.

I came back to Washington. I worked temporarily in the Far Eastern Bureau, where Walt Butterworth was Assistant Secretary. Livy Merchant was the Assistant Secretary for Europe.

ANDERSON: I resigned from the Foreign Service from about May or April until August, 1950, because my father came down to Washington and he said that he really had to have me take over the family business, that he was getting too old and he couldn't do it anymore. He really was quite emotional about it. My dear wife, who didn't marry me to go and live outside of Boston to run a paper box business she said: "Well, look. Your father needs you. You go and do it. Come on, we have to do it."

LEONARD L. BACON
Consular Officer
Hankow (1947-1948)

Consular Officer
Nanking (1949-1950)

Leonard L. Bacon was born in New York in 1907. He joined the Foreign Service in 1945 and served in Switzerland, China, Germany, Laos, and Washington, DC. Mr. Bacon was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1990.

BACON: Yes, I really did. What I'd seen, of course, in Switzerland was pretty attractive and I felt competent in many ways, particularly speaking German and French, and I'd also taken a little Russian instruction in Zurich which I never got to use anywhere. And I'd seen enough of the personnel of the Foreign Service to feel that that was where I wanted to be too. So I passed the examination and went back to Switzerland and was notified shortly that my next post was Hankow.

Q: Did this come as a bolt out of the blue, or had you made any noises to that effect?

BACON: I've forgotten now whether I made...I don't think I was asked for any preferences, but at this time generalization was in everybody's mind. The world was divided into three major areas: one was Europe; one was East Asia, South Asia; and the third was Latin America. Africa hardly figured.

Q: Yes, it was all colonial and we had practically nothing in there.

BACON: That's right. South Africa would have been part of the British Empire, at least from our point of view. And the Arab world was more or less South Asia, from our point of view, at least Middle East where it was centered. So the idea was that everybody should spend a substantial part of his life in at least two of those three areas. And I had no interest at all in Spanish America, so I wasn't particularly surprised it was the Far East.

Q: How did you get to Hankow? You went there in 1947.

BACON: We went by air -- Zurich to Geneva, Geneva to Cairo, Cairo to Bombay, Bombay to Calcutta, Calcutta to Kunming, Kunming to Hankow.

Q: What did we have in Hankow, and what were you doing?

BACON: We had a Consulate General there; very, very small. Had a Consul and his number two, and a Vice Consul. Hankow had become a small town from our point of view. The Chinese, or some people, used to refer to it as the Chicago of China, which was nonsense. It was the head of ocean steamship navigation on the Yangtze River. But following the war all foreign shipping was excluded from the river, and the city was run by an administration which seemed to be interested almost entirely in what could be made out of it. For example, practically all of the industries had been nationalized during the war, or immediately afterwards. That included the steelworks and other factories across the river, and, of course, the ferry system. Well, the ferry system constantly lost money because there were too many people stealing rides on it, no fares being collected. Some of the factories were profitable, so the government made every effort to sell off the ferry system to private operators who probably could make it pay, and retain the profitable industries which had nothing to do with government.

Q: Had Hankow been occupied by the Japanese?

BACON: Oh, yes.

Q: What was the situation there as far as the city went? Was it in bad shape?

BACON: It was not in very bad shape. It had electric power -- not enough, but some. One of the problems was that all of the cast iron, and wrought iron, had been removed to be sent to steel mills, and that meant that none of the elevators worked anywhere because the cables had gone, and most of the fences were gone and the gratings over the gutters were gone. So if you weren't careful your right wheel would drop two feet when you got too close to the curb. I, of course, had never been before in Hankow and I'm not sure what it looked like pre-war but it had a university which had one or two American teachers there. It depended almost entirely, apparently, on monthly weather reports which were paid for by the U.S. That seemed to be its sole source of income outside of tiny Chinese government grants.

Q: What were you doing there?

BACON: When I came the Consul had been waiting for somebody to show up so he could take a vacation. I filled an empty spot, that was Kenneth Krentz, who later went to Taipei. So I acted during his absence and he did come back briefly but got his assignment to Taipei and left, and then for most of the time I was there I was the acting Consul and was succeeded by "China" Ed Martin -- whom I see on your list.

Q: What type of work were you doing?

BACON: Just general consular business which was mainly looking after the interests, safety and well being of Americans there who were almost entirely either missionaries or oil company personnel.

Q: How were your relations with the government -- at that time it was Chiang Kai-shek?

BACON: They were pretty good. No problems inside Hankow itself. It was the missionaries scattered around the country who were in difficulties. For one thing the local police had a habit of seizing their passports and holding them, for no reason. So I had a big stamp made covering a whole page of the passport saying that this passport is the property of the Government of the United States, and must not be taken except for examination, or inspection, and then immediately returned to the holder. I reported that to the Department which was somewhat incensed. They said, "You have no authority to make such a stamp." But the missionaries were very grateful because it worked.

Q: I might add that I'm an old consular hand and made one bad mistake. You never report this sort of thing to the Department.

BACON: I was new.

Q: Did you have problems...were you reporting on the situation there?

BACON: Yes. We made reports, especially of the election which took place, I think around June of '48. It took days, and days, and days to get any results from the authorities, and Nanking was mad because Hankow hadn't reported.

Q: Nanking being our Embassy, which was located in Nanking?

BACON: Nanking, yes. And finally, what you would call the confidential clerk -- the Chinese number one employee who spoke English as well as Chinese -- said, "The real reason is that the so-called opposition party -- Democratic Youth, or something like that -- had such a small turnout that they don't dare report the enormous support for the Kuomintang because it wouldn't look reasonable, and they're trying to adjust the returns enough to make a credible return out of it." So finally they did, and I reported it including the information that we got from the Chinese clerk. So, of course, Chiang Kai-shek was very successful but you could never tell. It was either more or less successful -- in some cases the results were altered in favor of the opposition to make the report look real. In other cases, where there seemed to be some strong opposition, it was probably toned down.

Q: At that time was it your impression, and the impression of Consulate Hankow, this was real support for Kuomintang?

BACON: It's very difficult to say because the government around there was almost entirely military. It was the Hankow headquarters of the Generalissimo. And there was a four-star General who may have been the son of Sun Yat-sen, I'm not quite sure of that. In some of the correspondence it's mentioned; three lieutenant generals, and half a dozen major generals under him. I gave a party once and I didn't invite anybody under the rank of major general except for some colonels who spoke English, and could be scattered around to do some translating. People were rather light-headed. They couldn't see that the situation would ever change. It didn't seem at all likely that the communist could ever get that far south, and there was no very heavy fighting going on then anyway. Following late that year after I went to Nanking, and of course through '49, the communists made their really big advances in Manchuria, and then in taking Peking, and then everything north of Yangtze, and then everything south.

Q: How did you feel about the impression of the communists?

BACON: I can talk about that better of the time when I was in Nanking.

Q: I was just wondering, in Hankow, I take it, it didn't play much of a part?

BACON: No. It did not seem to be anything that was imminent. We had stories from missionaries. Some missionaries had been murdered, not entirely clear by whom but probably by communists, and their bodies sent to Hankow for transshipment. The general impression though was not so much of fear, or support for communists, but a general feeling that things were going slowly worse, and worse, and worse under the Kuomintang. I can tell you a little bit on that. On everybody's mind, of course, was inflation. It was enormous. The Consulate had difficulty getting the money out to pay the staff every week. It would come in -- these yuan notes tied in bundles. Nobody ever counted the notes in the bundles, it would take too long for what they were worth. As soon as we paid the staff each one would run out on the street and buy salt, which was simply something that had some stable value. At one time the plane from Shanghai which carried the money, failed to arrive and the Hankow police didn't get paid. What they did was to take direct action which didn't get them any money either, but they went to the branch of the Bank of China and demolished it. They simply tore it down, leveled it to the ground.

Q: This was obviously...you were looking at a situation that was unstable because of this.

BACON: There was almost no support for the Kuomintang except something that might stave off the communists for a while. But in the course of the year even that changed where people looked forward to the arrival of communists as putting an end to an almost impossible life that they were leading.

Q: This obviously becomes much more of a factor when you moved to Nanking. You went there when? and what were you doing?

BACON: I went there in July of '48, and I had several titles -- the Chief of Chancellery, and Head of the Consular Section, and also suddenly Chief of Protocol. The Consular Section was very small because there were few Americans in Nanking outside the diplomatic corps, and those attached to the University of Nanking. It did have some business preparing diplomatic visas for the diplomatic corps wishing to go to the United States. Most of the consular business, of course, was concentrated in Shanghai, and Canton. There was no recognizable American business in Nanking.

Q: What about missionaries?

BACON: There were quite a few, and some of them were on the faculty of the University, which was a Christian university. Also there was a women's college, Ginling, which was an affiliate of Smith College. It had some missionaries there too. The head of the school was a Chinese woman, and it was a very good school. After the communists came they had to adopt rather anti-American pose and put on a skit showing Uncle Sam in a stars and stripes hat, and a big nose, and doing some pretty ridiculous things but everybody recognized their heart wasn't in it. They had nothing against Uncle Sam, certainly not against Smith College.

Q: Here you were...I mean you had been in the war, you were not a young man at this time, and you had your Hankow experience, and you were then in Nanking. The Ambassador was Leighton Stuart, you had the other old China hands who later became a focal point of an awful lot of conservative wrath. What was your impression of the staff in the Embassy, its attitude at that time. Because you were somewhat a disinterested outsider. You were not part of any group.

BACON: Yes. Well, nobody took me as a political expert there, of course, and we had a number of people on the staff who were Chinese specialists -- Ralph Clough was one. He is somebody you might get in touch with. He's at the Brookings Institution. And Joe Bennett who is married to a Chinese girl. He was in USIA. George Harris who is long retired and now living in New Hampshire. He had a very rough time because his first wife had belonged to some communist organization in the U.S. and this was thrown up to him over and over again especially after McCarthy. People made affidavits supporting him -- so did I, of course -- the business was dropped but he felt it best to resign and taught at American University for a while. That was a very sad affair because he was a very good man.

Q: He's where at the university?

BACON: At American University for a time after he retired from the Department. Then he and his present wife moved to New Hampshire about ten years ago.

Q: Were you getting any feel for how...in the first place, what was Leighton Stuart like as an Ambassador?

BACON: He had been appointed, not because of any diplomatic skills really, but because he actually did know almost everybody of importance in China. He was very well liked by the Chinese, he was born in Hankow.

Q: He was president of the...

BACON: ...of Yenching university in Peking, the American University there. Many of the leading figures -- not the top figures -- but many of the non-military figures had been former students of his, and he believed that he had a gateway to the communist government through them, that he could, if not get things done, at least find out what was going on and what they were thinking. This turned out to be a considerable mistake. There were one or two people who would talk to him, usually not directly but through a third person to preserve their skins. Other people there on the Embassy staff, although not China specialists, nevertheless had been there before, and had been there for years since the war and knew exactly what needed to be done. The difficulty was that our government was slow in fulfilling its undertakings of aid. I'm not so sure that it would have made any difference at all anyway because so many agreements to provide actual cash and supplies were delayed. The supplies were slow in coming, the cash did come but very little of it ever got out of the hands of the Chinese hierarchy. And some extraordinary things happened. I mean, we provided a plane for the personal use of one of the leading Chinese generals and at the time we departed the plane had never even been uncrated. It was still sitting in a warehouse. He presumably had an idea he would sell it to somebody -- I've made that up out of my head but the fact is much of what we sent was never used, much that was used was either wasted or simply lost and abandoned to the communists as the communists came forward.

Q: Let's go to the time when you first got to Nanking. You already had Hankow, the Kuomintang, and this government really wasn't operating except for the rich men of its hierarchy. Was this the impression we were getting?

BACON: Yes. You got that impression pretty strongly because what we asked them to do, what they said they would do, did not get done. The people we thought we could rely upon would give us assurances without having any intention of carrying them out. There was a general feeling of despair really, that since the whole thing was going down the chute, the best thing to do was to look after yourself and your family. Generally in China it's true the family does come first. Your first loyalty is to your family, your parents, and your descendants.

Q: And this, of course, also is one of the reasons for not only safety, but for distribution of money and everything else. I mean money that came in is not just for your own personal use, but to the glory of Sun Yat-sen or what have you.

BACON: To do all you possibly could to see that their lives were liveable, which was scarcely true of many millions of people. As a result depression was enormous. We had staff meetings every day and I would go to them. Most of the information would come from the Military attaché, General Soule. He later was the general for the Second Division, I think, in Korea. They constantly were hoping that the Chinese military, the Nationalists, would have some successes but city after city kept falling; first in Manchuria -- that was the second big one there. Then cities around Peking, and finally Peking and it was felt that, "Well, they'd be stopped at some places between Peking and Nanking. We can hold them for a while." But the Nationalist army had the idea that if they could hold the cities they could eventually tire out the communists. But this had been a failing policy for years, and years, and frequently instead of holding the cities, they would abandon them at the approach of the communists. This happened, of course, at Nanking. It was generally supposed that the Yangtze River being a mile wide would be an absolutely impossible barrier if there were any kind of defense at all. Well there wasn't any defense, and I recall very well as I guess most of the people Embassy do, the morning when we discovered that the communists were already in town.

Q: This was about when?

BACON: This was in April 1949. The walls of Nanking are over 20 miles in circumference, 30 to 40 feet high -- of course, they're made of bricks so they could have been blown up but there was no need to do that. The gates were left open, the communists walked in. The Chinese government, and the police, had left town the night before knowing what was going to happen. There was a certain amount of looting that went on, some rather comical. I remember seeing some poor Chinese coming away from the Chief of Police's house with a water closet on his shoulders -- absolutely no use to him, he had no water supply but it was a pretty impressive object. What was really comical was that a few weeks later in the fall, the communist government decided to make a historical event out of the capture of Nanking. We could see the cameras being placed on the top of the walls, the army approaching with scaling ladders, soldiers climbing up and getting on top of the wall, waving the flag, and everything else -- something like the Berlin wall thing. And none of which, of course, had ever happened. They just walked in.

Q: Going back a bit, what was the attitude and preparations of the Embassy as they saw city after city falling. Was it pretty much, "Ok, here it comes. Let's get ready to welcome the conquerors. Or what were we going to do." Or was it false optimism that something would happen and that the communists would not take over?

BACON: First of all we were concerned about, of course, the missionaries scattered around northern China, and wanted to get messages out to them saying, "It's probably time to pack up and get out." This, however, would have created a certain amount of panic, and also greatly offended the Nationalist government which was maintaining that there was no danger, everything was secure. So there was a great problem of getting out a message which would indicate that while the situation is unsettled, and so forth, anybody who is planning shortly to leave for the United States on leave or whatever, should do so promptly and trust that the situation will otherwise clear up. Well, we'd already done this a year before in Hankow, and I'd sent out a similar message there to the northern part of the Hankow area which was gigantic. Almost everything between Sian and Hankow and half way to Nanking in the northern part -- there's somewhat over a hundred million people in the consular district. And finally when I got leave to do so I notified missionaries in certain places that it was probably time to move, and I got one or two hot replies that said, "Why didn't you tell us sooner? We've been waiting to hear from you. We expected to be warned." But our position had been just reversed; we didn't want to warn too much because that would result in collapse of morale of the Americans there and consequently of Chinese too.

Q: Well, there were determinations made -- I mean, this is always a major problem of telling Americans for purely practical reasons, "Get the hell out." At the same time we feel beholden to - if its a friend of ours government -- to say to pull the rug from underneath them.

Mr. Bacon, my question initially was, how did the Embassy as the communists get closer and closer, what was the attitude, or mood, of the Embassy?

BACON: Our attitude officially was that nothing much to worry about -- no cause for alarm -- don't get panicky. The time came, of course, just before the capture of Nanking, when the government itself moved to Canton. Our Minister Counselor, Lewis Clark, moved there with a small staff. The Ambassador and the rest of the Embassy stayed in Nanking mainly because, I think, we wanted to be in touch with the communists if they came right in.

Q: Were you getting the feeling from your daily meetings that this was Ambassador Stuart's job, that they were saying, "Ok, they are going to come and we're going to maintain relations."

BACON: We wouldn't, of course, treat them as the government of China until Washington decided, but that was considered to be pretty much a foregone conclusion, and whether it happened or not Ambassador Stuart felt that he would be in a very strong position to inform Washington as to what the communists were thinking, what their plans were. Because at this time it seemed possible apparently that a kind of a modus vivendi could be reached between the Nationalists and the communists. There might be a national congress composed partly of communists and partly of Kuomintang. After all, that's what the elections had been supposed to anticipate. But, of course, with increasing successes the communists were less and less interested in that, and it became apparent to them if to nobody else, that before long they'd have the whole country. So Ambassador Stuart remained in Nanking and saw, as I mentioned, a number of his former students and then eventually decided that he would have to go to Washington on consultation. And then we had this great problem of exit visas.

Q: What did the Embassy do...the Kuomintang officials had all left. This was in...

BACON: The summer of '48.

Q: And here the communist forces...

BACON: I'm sorry, the summer of '49.

Q: I was thinking it probably was the summer of '49. The communist forces came in...here's the Embassy sitting there, we don't recognize them. Well, we had not had an Embassy in Peking at that time.

BACON: No, we had a Consulate General.

Q: So how did these two forces meet? How did you deal with them?

BACON: It was a kind of minuet. We had almost no direct contact with communist officials for weeks and weeks. They opened their "office for aliens' affairs," they wouldn't call it a foreign office. People had to go, when the railroad was reopened, to Shanghai for medical attention or something like that. It wasn't just us, but all the embassies there. Almost all of them remained with their personnel in Nanking. To get an exit permit you would firmly assert that you were the Ambassador of Jutland, or whatever. The clerk would take it and insert, "Former Ambassador of Jutland," because they didn't recognize us, but we insisted that our diplomatic status, of course, continue. Sometimes they would write, "Bogus Ambassador." This happened to the Dutch Ambassador, Van Aerssen, he was a Baron Van Aerssen. So they inserted, "Former Ambassador Van Aerssen, and the Former Baroness Van Aerssen." We all congratulated her that it wasn't "Bogus Baroness."

This also produced an interesting event. We were having labor troubles, of course, especially the USIA staff, who, I believe not really voluntarily, but anyhow they were used as a front, were demanding tremendous settlements in lieu, or in anticipation of, their retirement allowances. And since everybody was likely to have some claims outstanding, possible claims by Chinese employees, personal employees, possible debts to local suppliers, everybody of course, paid up -- it didn't amount to much. But the communists demanded that a guarantor be provided for each person departing who could be held liable for any claims that might arise after the member departed. And I was chosen to be the guarantor probably because I had already been assigned to Dairen. Our Consulate there was in terrible trouble.

Q: This is Dairen up in Manchuria?

BACON: Yes. This had been undertaken several months before, but I could never get a visa to pass through Vladivostok, which was then the only way to get to Dairen -- the Russians didn't reply. After the communists came in we thought we'd try to renew this effort since it wouldn't involve the Russians anymore. You could go directly from Manchuria to Dairen. That didn't work out either. And in the meantime I'd been signing all these guarantees even though likely to be out of the country myself, and therefore... And this was pointed out to me at once by the Chinese communists, that, "Aren't you the man who signed all these guarantees?" And I said, "Yes, but I'm not leaving China. I'm only going to Dairen. That's in China, isn't it?" They said,

"Well, yes, but it's a little far." Actually it was still occupied by the Soviets. Anyway, I signed altogether upwards of 30 such, but when they finally wanted us all out, bingo. Nothing more was said about these things. They were very anxious to get the whole kit and caboodle out of Nanking. In fact, it was quite clear in the beginning of 1950 that they wanted all foreigners out of the interior of China. A few, necessarily, in Shanghai and Canton for trade, but otherwise the whole of China was going to be a closed box, with no foreigners except Soviets admitted.

The actual recognition of China began in October of '49 -- I think, it must have been about the 1st of October, or maybe the 10th of October. The Chinese government announced that it had been established as the sole government of China, and the following day the local papers announced that the Soviet Union had now recognized it. And then over the next few days different allied countries -- Soviet allies -- came with their recognitions. One of the early ones was, Yugoslavia, announced in the Chinese press -- that had to be recalled as a mistake. Yugoslavia was not in good order, of course.

BACON: Yes. Long after but the Chinese hadn't been aware of that. So when the telegram came they proudly announced it, and then said it was a mistake, they never did. But the Yugoslav personnel told me, "Yes, they had recognized it."

Q: Then what happened?

BACON: We were in the midst of these enormous labor negotiations with our employees and the settlement there. It became apparent that the communists wanted partly to demonstrate to the population that they were in charge, they could make the Americans jump over hoops, and call them to account for whatever they'd been doing. Also, they wanted hard currency any way they could get it, trying to levy fines on us for this and that, and so on. We had long negotiations with the USIA employees union, first before a mediation board. I recount some of this in these papers.

Q: We're speaking about some papers that we will append to this interview.

BACON: ...and it went on day after day, obviously not getting any place, or going to get any place. And one morning instead of breaking at the usual time around 12:00 for lunch, the discussion continued and I pointed out that it was after the usual lunch break, and they said, "Things are going pretty well, maybe in another half hour we'll all reach a agreement." And I said, "That's not the way I look at it. Everybody is entitled to eat lunch. I have a chauffeur downstairs and he's entitled to his lunch hour, and it's already past it." This sort of set them back but they said, "He's not a party to the dispute, so his opinion doesn't count." This really got me, and I said, "If we don't break for lunch in five minutes, I shall consider myself under arrest." And, of course, you're not supposed to lose your temper and make foolish statements but this created almost a panic. At that time William Olive had been arrested in Shanghai in connection with a traffic accident.

Q: Who is this?

BACON: William Olive, had been jailed by the Chinese for several days until he was released. This, of course, was a tremendous sensation -- a consular officer jailed for a traffic accident which wasn't serious, and wasn't his fault. Anyway, what I said created a certain consternation and shortly after that they said, "All right, we'll break and come back at 1:15." What had upset them was that if I maintained that I'd been arrested, even although there was nobody else to support that claim, still a report would have to be made as to what happened, and a number of people would be involved -- all the people on the mediation board. And whatever the outcome, the reports and the decisions would all go into their personnel folders, and could be brought out years later and say, "Why did you do this at this time? And let the man out, or whatever?" So they decided apparently the best thing to do was to remove the cause for my displeasure and we broke off. Nothing ever came of it anyway because we went on to arbitration, which was the last stage before a trial, and we weren't permitted to go to trial because that really would have been a waiver of immunity. Arbitration was considered not exactly binding on the U.S. government. Those proceedings were even more public in a big room in a government building. I was on one side with my interpreter, and on the other side were all the complainants, and from time to time bunches of school children would be brought in to watch the proceedings, and to see how the local authorities -- the communists -- were bearing down on the Americans. So I decided I needed somebody on my side too, and invited some embassies to send representatives. Well, a young girl from the Dutch embassy said she'd like to come, and she came, and shortly afterwards was thrown out on the ground that there was no claim against the Dutch government, so she had no business there. That went on for several days but everything depended on the outcome of similar discussions in Shanghai, which involved scores and scores of employees, and they finally came to an agreement under which lump sum payments were to be made in lieu of annual monthly pension payments, provided however the payments, of course, would be made in U.S. dollars directly in the presence of communist officials. As soon as the payments were made, the Americans were excused and we know, of course, the dollars were immediately confiscated and probably local currency substituted. But this was again an example of the extreme shortage of foreign exchange in the hands of the communists. They would do almost anything, no matter how petty, to get their hands on U.S. currency.

Q: Did you feel that you might not be able to get out? Were you concerned about getting out?

BACON: Not too much because there was evidently so much pressure to get us out. We weren't welcome. The only possibility was the possibility of actually being held hostage for the sake of collecting some more money.

Q: How did you get out, and when?

BACON: This was in March of 1950. By that time the Consulate General in Peking had been closed. All the Consulates in the interior of China had been closed. Our staff, what was left of it in Nanking, had proceeded one by one to Shanghai awaiting shipment and as it turned out I was evidently the last one to leave Nanking. We had some thermite...

Q: Thermite being a chemical for causing fires.

BACON: It can burn metal. We used the thermite to destroy our coding machines and other equipment of that nature -- a big black cloud of smoke which resulted in some agitated inquiries from outside as to what was going on, but it was too late to do anything about anything. I had shipped most of the documents we had -- put them in the hands of the British to hold in safe keeping until we could get them again. Also, our currency, both paper money and gold, turned over to the British who gave us receipts -- at least, a receipt for boxes "said to contain so many gold dollars." The Afghans wanted to know if they could store some of their furniture in one of our buildings, and we said, "delighted", feeling that if another Asian country were occupying them they might somehow could be helpful. Afterwards the property was seized and the Afghans asked us to reimburse them.

So finally we were all in Shanghai and waiting for transport out. The Kuomintang had said they'd mined the mouth of the Yangtze and the harbor of Shanghai. It was probably not true, I don't think they were capable of doing it, but they said they had. And as a result no commercial vessel would venture in, no matter what. So finally it was arranged that the General Gordon, which had been a troop carrier, would pick us up at Tientsin. A train was arranged -- a regular train with some Chinese carriages -- took us up one night to Tientsin where we waited for two or three more days. Passing through customs they were anxious to see that we weren't taking any valuables out of China. I had some little wooden statuettes of Manchurian warriors -- I don't know what they came from, a restaurant, a tomb, or where, but they were for sale in a curio shop. We had to have lists of all of our possessions and I thought these might be too attractive. Anyway, they were listed as toys so there was no demand to see them.

The General Gordon, of course, couldn't come to the dock in Tientsin, it was too big a boat, so we boarded lighters to take us out to the ship. It was too rough for the lighters to approach so we waited overnight -- some of them came back to shore. And eventually within 24 hours we were all on board the General Gordon which went to Hong Kong, and at Hong Kong the President Wilson, I think was the ship that carried us back home.

Q: Could you describe what was your reception back in Washington? Here you'd been through this at a time when our China policy was under great scrutiny.

BACON: This was a very nervous time in Washington. I think there must have been more than one Congressional committee that was interviewing people right and left trying to find as much as possible to lay against the Democratic administration. Truman was re-elected in '48, wasn't he? So he was still in office until '52, and this was still 1950. So anything that could be pinned on the Democrats for having lost China was hunted down, and people who had just come out of China especially so. I had found out already that I'd been assigned to Strasbourg in order to look over the affairs in the Saar which would eventually have a plebiscite there as to whether they wanted to stay under French control, or revert to Germany. And almost everybody in the Office of Far Eastern Affairs seemed to be concerned with meeting in Congressional committees, and defending what had been done, and trying to enlighten the committees on what could be done. My own experiences were not of any very high political level. And as I mentioned, I was not debriefed by anybody.

Q: Before this interview started you mentioned this is the first time you've talked to anybody about this. I mean nothing was put on the record and that was 40 years ago.

BACON: That's right. A friend of mine, Frank Kierman, who is still teaching at Ryder College near Princeton, once remarked to me (he made this remark 10-15 years ago) that it was simply extraordinary that there had so far not been any published account of what actually went on in China during the first year of communist occupation. Which is rather amazing, except that under the circumstances there was nothing much good that could be said as far as our government was concerned.

Q: We were just hanging on.

BACON: Just hanging on and hoping against hope that things might turn out.

Q: Just what overall impression -- was it your impression that really the United States as a power or something, really had much control over what was going on in China at the time. There is a phrase, "Who lost China?" and it seemed to be that it was somehow the attitude of the American Government that we lost China

BACON: The thing is, in some respects we may have done it, contributed to it. It seems to me that whenever we try achieve a political end by using aid, either cash, or trade, or goods to strengthen the government that we favor, we always over do it by an enormous amount. And it soon becomes apparent to the locals, that if the U.S. is willing to throw money around like this, why should we bother? Obviously the U.S. has such a huge stake in the outcome of our difficulties that we can rely upon them to take care of the situation. In the meantime, we'd be fools not to take advantage of it personally. I think this is perfectly obvious in Southeast Asia -- Vietnam, for example -- and in large parts of Africa. In Japan, and in Western Europe, nothing like that happened because you're dealing with governments which had themselves plenty of experience in managing their own affairs, and in collecting and spending money on a big scale, with the consent of the population. There was a time -- this sounds almost incredible -- the Chinese currency went through the roof at least three times when I was there; shortly after I arrived and again in '48 when the Chinese government abolished the old currency and said, "We're instituting a gold yuan, and everybody is supposed to contribute any gold and silver he has, and we'll give him gold yuan notes which will be redeemable in gold, not right away, of course, but you can rely on us. Trust us." That went through the roof within a few months. There came a time, and I was told -- I don't have it on paper, and I never saw a paper supporting it -- that somebody in the Chinese government said, "Why don't you buy up all our currency for U.S. dollars and then we can start fresh again." In other words, at that time it would be the U.S. instead of the local population which would sacrifice all their ready cash for another round of that inflation. I don't know if that was actually said or not, but it sounds perfectly possible.

Q: Can we talk about your next assignment because it sounds quite interesting. You were sent to Strasbourg, is that correct? And what were you doing there? This was from 1950 to '54(?).

Attachment 1

December 11, 1985

Dear Dr. Zimmerman:

I had been looking forward very much to your remarks last night on The Hostage Crisis, and when the meeting broke up I felt richly repaid. As I mentioned, I had had a very mild exposure to the business in Nanking in 1949-50. If you will permit, I have a couple of anecdotes to dispose of.

1) After the fall of Nanking in the Spring of 1949, the first of a series of reductions in the Embassy's American personnel began. To our surprise, permits of leave were withheld by the authorities until guarantees of payment of all personal debts were given. Guarantees by me were acceptable, being the principal consular officer, even though such titles were not recognized. There were to be no exceptions. When Ambassador Leighton Stuart was called home for consultations after failing to establish contact with high Communist authorities, he was denied an exit permit until a guarantee should have been provided. He replied that his persona was its own guarantee, and that he would remain until allowed to depart freely. The authorities backed down, but guarantees were still required for others until my own departure in March, 1950. In the meantime we were restricted to the diplomatic compounds, then given the freedom of the city, but no more, except for medical attention in Shanghai. I had earlier been transferred (on paper) to Dairen, but the Soviets had withheld a transit visa via Vladivostok, and now it seemed I might be able to go directly from Manchuria. But exit permission was denied; I had signed upwards of 30 guarantees, hadn't I? and how could I ever be made to pay? I objected that Dairen was still in China, WASN'T IT? Well, yes, certainly; but it was a little far away. As far as I know no claims were ever presented on the guarantees exception for separation payments (usually one month's pay for each year of service by personal domestics, and the whole operation seemed pointless to me -- until by chance I discovered that in the 18th century a Russian diplomat has been asked to leave the Hapsburg court because of his wild life and generally unsuitable behavior, but his passport was withheld until he produced an Austrian to guarantee payment of his personal debts. Among his friends were the Liechtenstein and Rasoumovsky princes, and the guarantees were provided. (You could look it up in Oppenheim.) But what a comedown, to have to settle for me! Anyway, I have no doubt that the Soviets put the Chinese up to it; they have long memories, and they could always point to the precedent.

2) To reduce the Embassy's Chinese staff it was necessary to fix their separation allowances. The authorities demanded lump sum payments (which they could seize) in place of the monthly pension payments provided by U.S. law. Until Congress should act, we couldn't comply even if we wanted to, so there was an immediate stalemate. Nevertheless, there had to be daily negotiations from August into October. My interpreter and I sat at the center of one side of a very long table, the other side being occupied by a string of officials, augmented by a number of militant USIA employees. One day at noon I suggested that it might be time to separate for lunch. This caused a little stir; evidently the American was getting tired as well as hungry. After a brief huddle they declared that we seemed to be so near agreement that in thirty more minutes it should be possible to settle our differences completely. I disagreed; we could work better after the usual break. Response: We would take a vote; this was the democratic thing to do. I objected that the majority opinion would have nothing to do with my physical requirements; furthermore,

I had a driver downstairs who was a laborer like anyone else and was entitled to regular working hours and mealtimes. Response: He was not a party to the dispute and therefore his opinion didn't matter.

Now at this time Angus Ward, our consul general in Mukden, had been thrown into jail; William Oliver, a vice-consul in Shanghai, had also been jailed; and the administrative officer in Shanghai had been imprisoned for several days in his own office by a sit-in of some of the Chinese staff. So I lost my temper, which we all know is the last thing a diplomat should do, and said, "If we don't break for lunch in five minutes, I shall consider myself under arrest."

This produced another huddle and agitated whisperings. If the foreigner was determined to become a prisoner, then a written report would have to be made to higher authority; and obviously no one had been empowered to make an arrest. And a report would not only create an immediate little stir, but would also be placed in several personnel folders for possible extraction years later for some unpleasant purpose or other. So a one-hour recess was declared. Nothing was accomplished one way or another because Nanking had become a small backwater after the departure of the Kuomintang; everything was decided in Shanghai or Peking. Still the charades went on. Our military attaché, General Soule (who later commanded the 2nd Infantry Division in Korea) was simply denied an exit permit for obscure political reasons; this time we went to mediation and then to arbitration. If we had failed there, we would have had to give up because the next step would have been the People's Court and consequent surrender of our supposed diplomatic immunity (or so we thought). But settlement was suddenly reached, apparently because the authorities couldn't agree themselves on what their position in court should be. Meantime, whole platoons of grammar and high school children had been brought in, day after day, to see how the People's government could humiliate the foreigners. I thought I should have some witnesses of my own, and a young female secretary at the Netherlands Embassy agreed to come, which she did, full of curiosity. She was denied admission on the ground that the Netherlands was not a party to the dispute.

Hostage-taking, Chinese style, seemed to require justification in Western precedent, if not law. The aims appeared to be (1) acquisition of foreign exchange as quickly as possible; (2) demonstration that foreigners (especially Americans) had been atrociously exploiting Chinese labor; (3) humiliation of American officials to prove to the Chinese public and officialdom that Mao was a much more powerful man than Chiang; (4) that the USSR was China's only important friend and the only one she needed. In this Russian tutelage seemed pretty evident. The establishment of the People's Republic was announced on October 1, 1949; recognition by the USSR on October 2, followed on October 3 and successive days by Bloc countries in the order of Russia's affection: namely Bulgaria and Romania, then Hungary and North Korea; then Czechoslovakia and Poland; then Outer Mongolia. Albania was said on October 22 to have sent greetings "recently" and recognition on November 21. Yugoslavia's recognition was reported among the very first, but a hasty attempt was then made to correct the record; it seemed that nothing had been received from Yugoslavia after all. Obviously all of these telegrams had been received within the first 48 hours, with the possible exception of Albania's.

And the whole hostage exercise had been just a preliminary to the expulsion from inland China of all non-Bloc foreigners, private and official. Some favored few might be allowed to reside in Canton and Shanghai, and possibly Tientsin, to facilitate a little trade. This was a near total surprise to us; in 1917-18 Lenin had done his utmost to persuade Americans not to abandon their posts in Moscow and Leningrad, and in the 1930's the Spanish anti-fascists had done the same with regard to the American consulate in Bilbao, all in the hope of proving the legitimacy of their cause and of obtaining needed aid -- or at least a benevolent attitude on our part. But the opinion in China was that they could obtain all they needed from the Soviets, and it can hardly be doubted that the Soviets had assured them of this. On the other hand, it was probably the Soviets who restrained the Chinese from excesses such as have been seen in Iran, Pakistan, and Libya. After all, at that time we had the Bomb, and the Russians didn't.

You must forgive this garrulity, and I should know better than to give way to it. In 1944-45 I would from time to time interrogate POW's, and I know quite well how eager they are to spill a lot more than they should into a willing ear.

Very sincerely,

Leonard Lee Bacon

THE FOREIGN SERVICE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

AMERICAN CONSULATE
Strasbourg, France

January 10, 1954

Dear Harry,

Your extremely welcome Christmas card -- 1952 -- was delivered to me last May, which accounts for 5 months delay; the remaining 7 are unaccountable. Since I am not sure that I've given any news of myself since September 1945, will you put up with a quick tabulation:

1945: July-August -- Loitering around State Dept corridors; signed up for investigation of German assets concealed in Switzerland -- the ill-fated "Safehaven" operation (the Swiss wouldn't really play ball);

September -- Simultaneous exit from Ft. Meade and the AUS; declined reserve rating;

October -- FBI clearance completed; assigned to Zurich; get Helen out of Rochester and install my mother as real estate manager;

December -- Depart on Vulcania for Le Havre; loudspeakers reminding us that ship is an Army transport; that civilians there are on sufferance; food entirely C-rations but goosed up by Italian cooks; all hardware stolen by Germans, which made for intimate living;

1946: January-December-Safehavening in Zurich and Bern, enlivened by having to take a deposition from two International Red Cross workers on behalf of SS-Gen. Kaltenbrunner, did him no good; he came to a sudden end as foreseen in the verdict, with which I wangled a trip to the Nuremberg trial to deliver same; inspected with interest Goering, Hess, Schacht, Ley, von Schirach, etc.

1947: January -- Notified that I was eligible to apply for appointment as Foreign Service Officer if I could pass oral examination;

February -- Did so.

June -- Appointed FSO-4 and assigned to Hankow. (Where the hell is that?) Instructed to proceed "soonest".

August -- Helen and I complete cholera, yellow fever, malaria, tetanus, typhoid, paratyphoid shots; depart ex-Geneva for Cairo by plane, over Rome, Pompeii, Corinth, Athens and Alexandria in one day which gives you the feeling of having reduced a long and expensive classical education to an absurdity; in Cairo one day, long enough to fall into the clutches of a dragoman; off again for Bombay where an extra horse-dose of antitoxin (India dimensions) knocked us out; a week later Calcutta by Indian Viking plane (choice of box lunch -- vegetarian. or non-vegetarian.); a few hours of darkness in Calcutta in the world's worst hotel, the Great Eastern, built 1810 and not kept up; over the Little Hump by China National Airways to Kunming (one night); taxi freight plane next day to Hankow (so that's where it is); brought into town by kindly Britisher; quite hot on Yangtze; principal officer surprised to see us; telegram announcing our approach delivered following day. Settled down in Terminus Hotel, Chinese run; actually the worst hotel in the world.

September -- Principal officer confided that reason for "soonest" in my travel orders was fact one vice-consul was sick and other had resigned in disgust; whereas he himself wanted to take a month's leave in a cool place like Peking; which he immediately did. Left in uneasy charge of office. Made acquaintance of innumerable Chinese generals composing Hankow Headquarters of the Generalissimo; also of Standard, Shell, and Texas Oil people; also of missionaries (Polish, Irish, French, British, Belgian, Swiss, and American, ranging from Adventists and Beth-El missions to Anglican and RC). Learned to throw pants and coat as well as shirt and underwear into laundry every day.

October -- Principal officer returned and left on transfer within a week for pleasant post in Formosa. New principal officer assigned from Shanghai. On day of expected arrival sent telegram he was obliged to return to the U.S., much as he regretted wife's illness prevented him from seeing one of his first posts again. Dept non-plussed, but in view impossibility getting any experienced officer into Hankow, left indefinitely in charge.

November -- Raised my own salary in accord. with regulations by ½ the diff. between mine and that of last previous officer-in-charge.

December -- Communists arrived within 30 miles of Hankow, but went away. Two American and 1 Finnish missionaries murdered by "bandits".

1948: January -- Bodies of murdered missionaries arrive. Open coffins to ascertain cause of death and report same. Cause of death evidently bullet holes under base of skull (rear).

March -- Communists come near, but go away again.

April -- Transferred to Embassy, Nanking (on paper).

May -- Helen and chattels depart for Nanking on Army plane, while I wait for replacement to arrive. Cardinal Spellman and Msgr. Sheen hit Hankow, joint party thrown in Consulate with Roman clergy (Archbishop of Hankow, Portuguese; Bishop of Hanyang, Irish-Boston; Bishop of Wuchang, Polish) because only Consulate had the space and only the clergy had the liquor required. Contracted streptococcus infection in foot as result of walking barefoot from bedroom to bath. Inspector arrived, out of sorts because Consular sedan hadn't met him at airport across river and skeptical of reply that only the jeep could make the grade on the Wuchang side in the low water season. Banquet for Generalissimo's Headquarters; guests were General (full) Sun, 3 lieutenant-gens, 7 major-gens (where we drew the line. After all!) plus a half-dozen educated cols and lt-cols spotted around the table solely as interpreters. Great success; served brandy, whiskey and creme-de-menthe as cocktails. Creme-de-menthe the most popular, on account of its pleasing color... Recovered from infection with help penicillin administered by Chinese doctors and nurses.

July -- Replacement (brand new graduate of Dept language school at Peking) arrived. Departed for Nanking. Receive reserve commission as captain.

August -- Appointed Chief of Chancery (which seemed to mean needling everyone behind on his work) and Protocol Officer (oh for God's sake, what'll we do now) and Chief of consular section. Same Inspector arrives to inspect Nanking. No casualties.

Sept-Oct -- Having made some real advances, Commie situation much worse. Navy sends converted destroyer to evacuate people's stuff. Wives with children go to Manila. Truck detail loading destroyer.

November -- Destroyer makes several trips. Truck details every few days. Army Advisory Group departs. Come down at month's end with infectious hepatitis.

December -- Having turned yellow, hepatitis is identified for what it is and original theory of malaria discarded. Deposited in Army hospital; next day hospital is evacuated and Marine plane takes me to Navy hospital ship "Repose" at Tsingtao. The best month in my life -- air conditioned, nice Navy food, nice nurses & all. Helen arrives two days later in RAF plane, but not allowed to sleep on ship, so digs in at Tsingtao club.

1949: January -- Right after New Year's, "Repose" ordered away because of imminence of Commie capture; Helen takes physical exam and finds an operation necessary; is flown to St. Louis. I try to pay "Repose" bill for her and me and am told they'd really rather I'd drop it; no one knows the procedure for billing patients. Air Attaché flies me back to Nanking.

February -- Convalescent period indicated for four weeks; materialized for two. Embassy wives sneaking back from Manila, which was too G.I.

March -- Assigned to Dairen to relieve wretched consul, who couldn't get downtown without seeing his chauffeur arrested every time. (This assignment was perhaps supposed to benefit my small store of Russian, which had been acquired in Zurich and Hankow.) Agreed, provided Helen could come too. Dept agreed to that, probably unaware of fact Helen was already in the U.S. Apply for Soviet visa at Soviet Consulate in Shanghai, since only permissible entry to Dairen was by Soviet ship from Vladivostok. No encouragement.

April 10 -- Helen arrives by plane.

April 20 -- Communists move in fast and take Nanking. No fight whatever, but no one allowed to leave compounds in which Embassy situated.

May-June -- Commies ignore us completely, except to prohibit movement out of town.

July -- Ambassador's attempts to establish communication with local authorities having failed, Dept recalls him on consultation and orders 2nd reduction in force at Embassy. Nationalists start bombing power plant, etc, which they failed to blow up on leaving. Embassy gets a little shrapnel; no damage.

August -- Separation of part of Chinese employees turns out to be difficult; although they are civil service on same terms as anyone in Washington (except for wage scale, naturally) they refuse to accept separation allowances provided by law. Maneuver is Commie inspired, in order (1) to embarrass us (2) to make propaganda about how Americans exploit Chinese (3) to realize some dollar exchange, since separation payments involve purchase of Chinese funds at National Bank. As only lawyer in Embassy, all labor trouble negotiations fall on me.

September -- Labor troubles worse after Ambassador goes. Department orders 3rd reduction in force, this time including counselor of embassy, 1st secretaries. I am promoted by attrition to senior officer in charge, with total staff of eleven. Air, Army and Navy attachés leave. Marine guard goes. Separating Chinese staff of attachés falls to me.

October-December -- Hell of a time with Chinese labor, Labor Union, Labor Ministry, especially regarding employees of Foreigners' club. Army attaché refused exit permit (he was General Soule, later commanding 2nd Inf Div in Korea). Dispute goes to mediation board, then to arbitration board. Just when we thought we'd have to give in, because submission to People's Court would have meant renunciation of our supposed diplomatic immunities, settlement reached because Commies themselves uncertain what to do next. Army radios me a commendation. (By this time all officers were learning cryptography.)

1950: January -- Just ready to relax, with everybody out that's supposed to be out, when Commies proceed to seize our old Legation premises in Peking. Result: All U.S. establishments in China ordered closed. More trouble with remaining Chinese employees, including domestic servants. Commies try to fine us for not having paid duty on American goods imported under Nationalist privilege years before. No soap. Everything wound up by end of February; as each member of American staff received exit permit (but only to go to Shanghai) Casablanca (that's me) put him or her on the train. Finally my own was issued, but then canceled until a little matter of motor pool supplies cleared up. Permit re-issued on a Saturday; spent Sunday destroying radio equipment after sending farewell telegram; and took off Monday hoping Commies wouldn't hear about that for a day or two.

March-April -- Goldbricking around Shanghai, waiting for transportation out. Nationalists claimed they had mined Shanghai harbor; Commies unable to sweep harbor or prove it unmined; no foreign shipping would come in. After all sorts of schemes cooked up, none of which worked, Commies authorized departure by Tientsin. 36-hour trip on train to Tientsin, bring your own food and drink. Water soon gone. John on our car had to be locked shut, entailing long journey by women and children to Chinese end of train. Recall wife of naval attaché seizing my arm and saying, "Have you seen Sam (her husband)?" I said No, why? Reply: "I've got to go to the john, and he's wearing the rubbers." Everybody in unspeakable condition on arrival. But things went fairly smoothly from then; in a few days boarded lighters to take us out to "Gen. Gordon" (army transport run by President Lines) lying off Taku Bar. Too rough to come close, so spent night bouncing around; some lighters went back to shore for shelter, which alarmed passengers more than storm could have. Magnificent reception early next morning on board Gordon; crew briefed that China was starving, hence the foreigners must be practically litter cases. Treated accordingly; but in fact we'd been eating steak till it came out of our ears because the farmers, unable to buy fodder, had been slaughtering their cattle for months. But Navy Sam was grabbed by a steward who urged corn flakes and milk on him, saying he must be famished, what with all that starvation. Sam said, Well, it wasn't too bad; although sometimes truffles were hard to find. Steward: "Truffles -- what's dose?" Sam: (embarrassed) "Well, it's hard to explain; truffles you have to dig up out of the ground." Steward: (awed): Jeez, you mean to say you really ate dose tings?"

May-June-July -- Hong Kong, then on the Wilson to Tokyo, Honolulu and San Francisco; blissful. Never saw the Coast before, nor the Grand Canyon, so sight saw all the way to St. Louis. Found a letter for me at Washington from the Personnel Section; conveyed the news that my efficiency rating put me in the lowest 10% of my class. Noticed a few minutes later that the letter was more than a year old and that the rating was for the year 1947-48, immediately following my appointment; the usual rating for newly appointed or promoted men. Found few people to talk to about China; those immediately concerned were tied up with Congressional committees. Accepted appointment to Strasbourg to look after the Saar, and thankfully took off.

August-December -- Strasbourg, learning about the Saar and the Council of Europe.

1951: January-October -- Reporting on same. Motor trip to North & Central Italy.

November-December -- In Washington as member of Selection Board, rating others for promotion up or selection out, and hoping to do as little harm as possible, either way.

1952: January-December -- Saar, Council of Europe, and standing in for U.S. delegate to Central Rhine Commission, an ancient supranational organization in which we participate (originally as trustee for German interests). Motor trip to Yugoslavia (car abandoned at Fiume, a/c roads; boat and plane thereafter; Dalmatian coast not quite what you'd expect, unless maybe the extreme south; but Split and Dubrovnik and Julian Alps in North and the mountain scenery between Sarajevo and the coast are. Ran into Tito's motor convoy on the road between Bled and Ljubljana. Curious contrast between Commie bad manners in China and Commie stiff politeness in Yugoslavia.

1953-January-December -- Still Saar and Council of Europe, seem to have permanently replaced U.S. delegate in Rhine Commission. Motor trip to Spain; thrown out of Toledo Cathedral for indecent exposure -- elbows clearly visible. Sign in Granada hotel lobbies warning foreigners that if they wear clothes cut so as to "reveal their interiors" they may well incur the "just indignation of the populace". Spent two nights in a Government hostel within the Alhambra (a remodeled little monastery); Alhambra and Generalife unexpectedly illuminated at night, since they were trying out the floodlighting for a music festival to be given a few days later. Our mouths hanging open in most Spanish churches, sometimes more in surprise than admiration; usually nothing but admiration for Spanish domestic and civil architecture. For taste and effect I think the Barcelona city council house is almost unexcelled. Moreover I think both Italian and Spanish early gothic has a kind of astringency (if the word is allowed) and unregulated originality -- usually resulting from the disposition of the rooms within -- which keeps it always fresh. Look at the palaces in Siena and Perugia. -- Army invited me to convert 5-year commission into an indefinite one; declined; Army renewed invitation in June, a couple of weeks before expiration date; accepted, feeling embarrassed at my own lack of enthusiasm; received new diploma for indefinite commission and immediately afterwards warning that a board would meet to recommend my dismissal for having failed to earn points entitling me to promotion, but that even though I was not in a critical occupation I could show cause why I shouldn't be dismissed, as for example impossibility of attending lectures and training courses. Replied I didn't intend to show any cause, and have since heard that I am out, as soon as I turn in my identification card. Haven't any, and never had. Inglorious end to an inactive career (Res). But the original idea of applying for a commission (under the regulations in force in 1947-48) came from a residue of vexation at the blessed old CIC, in which you had been good enough to recommend me for a field commission, later approved by Corps, and (so far as I know) finally denied because the Table of Organization didn't allow for it. So I got it, and now it's been summarily taken away; easy come, easy go; and anyway I must have been overage in grade, at least in this Air Force era.

Behind the Bamboo Curtain: a Nanking Diary

April 21: It seems clear that it is only a matter of days before the Communists enter the city. The compound where we live, which adjoins the American Embassy, now has a tank destroyer against the gate as a barricade. The electrified barbed wires which run around the top of the high wall enclosing the compound have been re-tested. The Embassy's military, naval and air attachés have gone into civilian clothes. Mob violence and looting are to be expected in the interim between the old authority and the new. But war and violence seem an improbability, - the weather has never been more beautiful. From our living-room window we can see Purple Mountain to the East, bulky and handsome, a number of fresh, green hills running southwards from it, three of them crowned by the observatory, the Drum Tower and the pagoda tower of Nanking University. The sky is a wonderfully clear and delicate blue.

April 22: Went to Ambassador Stuart's house last night to see the weekly movie, - this time, Boyer and Bergman in The Arch of Triumph. We got home about a quarter of ten. A short time after we had gone to bed, we heard the noise of guns to the north. Looking out of the window, we could see large orange flashes against the sky. The explosions seemed to be getting louder. Looking at his watch, Lee estimated that the firing was coming from about two miles away. We were rather apprehensive, but finally fell asleep about two o'clock. Today is coolish and overcast. I heard that Major Gelwicks and Captain George had gone off in a jeep on some mission which took them into Communist infiltrated territory. In the afternoon, I was in a car with Mary Lou Clough on Chung Lu. We passed a huge truck, filled to over-flowing with Nanking policemen. The truck was blowing along at a breakneck clip. "They're probably on their way to quell a riot!" said Mary Lou, swinging her car out to give them a wide berth.

April 23: Sunny and warm. Last night we heard gunfire again, but not so much as the night before. Just after breakfast while I was bargaining with the flower-seller, George Harris came out of his apartment saying that during the night, all the Nanking police had evacuated. It was a great truckful of them on their way out of town that Mary Lou Clough and I had seen on the previous afternoon. The city now had no protection. The looting had already begun. Mrs. Soule, the wife of the Military Attaché, said that mobs had broken into the house of the Mayor of Nanking, who had flown from the city. The looters had run off with all the furniture and were now ripping up the floor boards. The Mayor's house was just two blocks away. I walked over to the Embassy. Several people were saying hasty goodbyes, as a car was waiting to take them to the airport to catch what proved to be the last American plane out of Nanking before the take-over. At lunch, Lee said that Major Gelwicks and Captain George had probably been captured by the Communists. From our veranda we could see a large amount of black smoke to the north, -- undoubtedly the location of the large, modern railway station. We had heard that the Kuomintang soldiers had set fire to it before they evacuated the city. It was a beautiful day, and I went for a walk in the grounds of the Embassy Club adjoining our compound. Silky fluff from the budding willow trees was blowing everywhere in feathery masses. I walked under some great heavy fronds of blossoming wisteria, deliciously fragrant. Beyond the grassy slope shaded by big trees was the swimming pool, not yet filled. Behind the little bath pavilion, where last summer had been a tidy cutting-garden, was now a great quantity of crates and Jerry cans. On my way home, I ran into Dr. Packard, the Embassy doctor, who had just gotten back after a hard and hazardous trip. He had gone in a jeep to give medical help to the wounded British sailors on the Amethyst, out of commission since it had been fired on some distance down the Yangtze. Late in the afternoon, two large fires could be seen to the northeast. The smaller of the two had a steady orange glow, but the larger one, farther to the east, tossed up frequent rocket-like flares, accompanied by muffled explosions. In the deepening blue of the twilight, the flares lighted up huge, billowing clouds of smoke with fluctuating, flame-colored light. It was an ever-changing show, a fascinating and awesome sight. Dr. Packard telephoned and asked if I could spend the night at the Embassy hospital with Mrs. Meyer, and her baby daughter, who had been born at five o'clock that morning. Miss Poon, the Embassy nurse, who had helped Dr. Daniels, of Kou Lou Hospital at the time of the delivery, hadn't had any sleep for thirty-six hours, and no other nurse was available. I told him I'd be glad to help out.

April 24: About a quarter of eight last night I took a flashlight and made my way to our little hospital on the second floor of the Embassy Club. The lights had already been dimmed for the night. Miss Poon introduced me to Mrs. Moyer, who, with her baby, was on a large, glassed-in porch adjoining our hospital "ward." Miss Poon prepared the mother and baby for the night and then retired to her own apartment in another part of the building. Mrs. Moyer was the 21-year old wife of an army Major who had been studying Chinese in Peiping. She had been with the group of wives evacuated to Manila several months ago, then had come to Nanking, where her husband was to join her. Having still been in Peiping at the time of the Communist take-over, he had only very recently obtained permission from the Communist authorities to leave. At the moment, he was thought to be in Korea or Japan. I had never touched so young a baby, but I put on a mask, and Miss Poon showed me how to shift its position, change it, give it warm water and burp it. Shortly after Miss Poon retired, the baby began to hiccup. Holding it against my shoulder and patting it smartly on the back didn't seem to help, - it kept right on, - and on. So I telephoned Miss Poon. She turned the baby this way and that and the hiccups magically subsided. Around ten o'clock the Club generator stopped working - no lights - so I had to operate by lantern and flashlight. About 10:15, Lee dropped in to tell me good-night, and say that it was thought that the Communist troops would be in the city about seven o'clock in the morning. During the night occasional loud explosions rattled the window panes. Gunshot in various directions could be heard frequently. The shots were very near. The noise of the firing didn't disturb Mrs. Moyer. She was tired, and slept well until about three-thirty. She woke then and took the tablet and water Miss Poon had left for her, and slept on till morning. The baby cried a good deal during the night. I frequently got up from my cot to take care of it, donning the mask each time. I was very awkward. It was so tiny, and its little head so remarkably wobbly. It seemed a miracle that it could cry to lustily, and sneeze and hiccup in such miniature but perfect fashion. About a quarter of eight in the morning, Miss Poon came in, and I went home through the little gate between the Club compound and the compound in which we live. It was a beautiful fresh morning, but I longed more than anything for coffee and a bath and a little sleep. When I got to the apartment, Li Shank-I, houseboy, told me that the Communist troops were already in possession of the town, they had come in very early in the morning. Everything was very quiet. There wasn't the accustomed obligato of peddler's cries and rattles, Chinese conversing, and chant of people carry loads. The servants were obviously relieved that the take-over hadn't been a shooting matter in our area, anyway. Some ice-cold fruit juice, a feather-light omelet and some fragrant coffee quickly appeared, and while I was eating Lee came in. He said that at about 5:15 in the morning Hank Lieberman, the Nanking New York Times correspondent, had telephoned that the Communist troops were coming into the city through the northwest gate. There had, apparently been no resistance to speak of.

April 25: Yesterday we had lunch at the George Harris'. Jo and Nancy Bennett (Jo is the United States Information Service man here), were there; also Shirley Duncan (she is connected with the United States Educational Foundation in China as is George Harris, who is also the Embassy's Cultural Attaché). Nancy is Chinese; she and Jo met when they were both at Yenching University in Peiping. She is a bright girl, and her comments are refreshingly astringent. Someone remarked that at the airfield the day before, it was amazing to see the tremendous quantity of abandoned shoes, strewn all over the place. (When the Nationalists crowded onto the planes in the panic of evacuation, it had been necessary to reduce the weight of the overloaded planes in every possible way; hence shoes had been shucked off wholesale and tossed out onto the ground as the motors warmed up for the hasty and hazardous take-off.) This lunch at the Harris's was the first gathering together of Americans we had been to since the "liberation" a few hours before, and there was much speculation on how events would shape in the next few days. Shirley had been interned during the last war by the Japanese, so that "disturbed conditions" were no novelty to her. The Harrises have an excellent cook, who, incidentally, has two wives. The change in regime which had just taken place did not distract him in the least from producing one of his pieces de resistance, - thinly sliced cold breast of chicken covered with a creamy aspic, cut to resemble playing cards, with hearts and diamonds of pimento, and spades and clubs of ripe olive, superimposed thereon. I was enchanted with this manifestation of Oriental calm and whole-souled absorption in art. After lunch, Lee and George drove around town to see what they could see. The town was full of Communist soldiers. They were in good physical shape and marched well. Their uniforms were of a more brilliant mustardy-Chartreuse than those of the Nationalist soldiers. They had paid no particular attention to the car with the two foreigners in it. The Chinese chauffeur, however, showed obvious relief when the drive was over.

April 26: Lee was awakened by a telephone call at seven o'clock yesterday morning. Communist soldiers were in the Ambassador's house "going over things". Lee dressed hurriedly, swallowed a cup of coffee and rushed off. About ten o'clock he came back for a bite of breakfast. It was true. Several Communist soldiers had brushed by the Ambassador's servants, and broken into his bedroom while he was still in bed. After blustering awhile, they departed, one of them saying, with a large gesture "All this will soon belong to the people!" In the afternoon, Lee accompanied General Soule, the Military Attaché, in his attempt to find the commanding officer of the occupying troops. General Soule wished to deliver a vigorous protest from our government over the morning's incident. He received no cooperation from a Communist captain, who was the only officer he was able to contact. It proved to be impossible to find out who was in charge of the military forces in the city. The Gordhamers invited me to drive around with them and see how the city looked. Everything was very orderly. There were some, but not a great many, Communist soldiers to be seen. However, there were armed guards at the entrances of all banks and public buildings. We saw the roofless, fire-gutted Judicial Yuan on Chung Shan Lu, once a large, impressive building. It had been looted and burned by Nanking citizenry on Saturday, between the time the Kuomintang police fled and the time the Communist soldiers came into the city in the early hours of Sunday morning. We also visited a little park, on high ground, which had been adorned with some attractive pavilions in Japanese style. The place was a shamble. It was obvious that most of the looters had had no tools, - nothing but their own two hands to wrench things free. Nevertheless, the devastation was appalling. Much of the attractive planting and a long double row of lantern posts had been hacked away for firewood, and the substantially built pavilions were gutted. On our way back to the Embassy, we stopped for a few minutes at the home of the former mayor of Nanking. The handsome house was utterly ruined, - furniture gone, windows broken, floor boards ripped up, plumbing torn out. In the garden, were two radiators, which, having been wrenched out, were abandoned because they were too heavy to lug away. In the road were three others, left behind for the same reason. Inside the house, several children were playing among the debris. One was walking, tight-rope fashion, on an exposed overhead beam, with loose electric wires dangling around him. Another was handily binding together the few remaining splintered floor boards to take home for firewood. Mr. Gordhamer said that he had talked with some of the looters on Saturday when they were busiest. They showed no qualms of conscience about what they were doing; they merely said they were poor people and needed the things. Most of the property left unguarded between the time the Nanking police left and the communists took over were badly looted and partially or wholly destroyed by the Nanking citizenry themselves. The condition of the mayor's house was a particular shock to me because I had been there several months before to a large meeting of the International Women's Club. Then the house had been beautifully ordered, and servants in immaculate white gowns had passed tea and frosted cakes to the guests, and Madame Shen Yi, the mayor's wife, had been a gracious hostess. While we were at supper, someone telephoned that a Communist soldier was at the Embassy gate. Lee put down his knife and fork and rushed out into the dark. However, it developed that all the man wanted was a piece of wire and permission to get electric current from the Embassy's generator. He was told to refer the matter to his commanding officer. It was then we learned the Communist soldiers, brushing by the caretaker, were now occupying the empty Embassy house at 5 Nighsia Lu, formerly occupied by Carl and Phyllis Boehringer.

April 27: We have heard that Major Gelwicks and Captain George reached Shanghai safely, but now can't get back here where their families are. About ten o'clock, Mrs. Soule came to call. Her daughter, Ginsy about fourteen is at the Shanghai American School. Communication, of course is now cut off between Nanking and Shanghai, and it is thought that Shanghai will be the next big objective of the communist troops. She is very anxious. She said she just couldn't settle down to anything. No one is now allowed to leave the compound where the Ambassador lives, however, I heard that Frank Kierman succeeded in reaching the Embassy on foot, coming by a back way. When Lee came home to lunch, he said he had gone with General Soule and Captain Frankel, the Naval Attaché, in another attempt to find the commanding officer of the soldiers occupying Nanking. The car had gotten only a few blocks from the Embassy when it was turned back. In the afternoon, I wandered over to the Embassy Club. Captain Frankel, the Gordhamers and one of the members of the orchestra were engaged in a game of doubles. Hank Lieberman had just finished a game. He had on a shirt with a plunging neckline and shorts of the same printed material. On his head was a khaki cap with a long searching eyeshade - all very picturesque. He ordered drinks all around. I learned that Seymour Topping, the Nanking Associated Press correspondent, was under house arrest, or, as his newspaper colleagues might call it, in "homeside pokey".

April 28: At first two, and later six B-24's made bombing runs along the south bank of the Yangtze, to the north of us. They were trying to hit the city power plant. We had a fine, wide view of it all from our roof. The servants were clustered on the upper back porches and roofs of the three houses in this compound, and followed the operations with excited comments and pointings. We could hear the explosions of the bombs and see the grey smoke arising from what they hit. There was a chatter of anti-aircraft fire and we could see the black puffs of smoke from it high in the air. Apparently some machine guns were being used, too, which, of course, were completely futile. The show went on all morning. Quite a crowd of people collected on the roof, including Colonel Dunning, the Air Attaché. There were intervals of some minutes between the bombing runs. The tantalizing aroma of the curry our cook was preparing for lunch was wafted upwards and made everyone hungry. The whole foreground of this air display was a typical Chinese rural scene. There were rolling hills, knobby with old graves, covered with the chartreuse green of early spring. There was a pond with two ruffly brown ducks swimming on it, an old man in a coolie hat cultivating rows of cabbages. Mudwalled huts roofed with dried grass stood here and there in the patch-work of vegetable plots. The bright yellow of the flowering grape was in sharp contrast with the blue-green of the young cabbage. The bombs hadn't touched the power plant, but, I heard later, a school was hit and a number of children were killed. Shortly after lunch, Lee telephoned that Communist soldiers would not allow Major Beebe to go into his house, that he was bringing him home to stay with us for the time being. That morning, a Communist soldier had walked into his house and got to his bedroom while he was still in bed. The soldier was a simple country lad, and had apparently invaded the house out of an overpowering curiosity. Satisfied after a few minutes, he departed without taking anything or doing any damage. We heard that the Counselor of the French Embassy had had a pistol held to his stomach by another Communist soldier, and another member of the Embassy staff had also been threatened with firearms. The Turkish Chargé d'Affaires was confined to his compound; no one was allowed to go out or in, even to bring food. Mr. Jones, the Counselor of our Embassy, had attempted to come to the Embassy offices from his house, on foot, had almost reached the Embassy when he was rudely turned back. We listened to the news at 9 p.m.. The Chinese Communists were converging on Shanghai, and British planes were alerted at Hong-Kong to evacuate British Nationals from Shanghai should the need arise. Nothing was said about Nanking. The focus of interest is now elsewhere!

April 30: Heard that a Kuomintang plane had dropped leaflets saying they would bomb the city tomorrow, May 1st, when a big Communist celebration had been planned.

May 1: There was a little Embassy church service this morning just for the people in this compound, as no one else can get here. Mr. Long had just begun the 23rd Psalm, "The Lord is my shepherd; I shall not want" -- when Bomb! went a big bomb, -- quite close, rattling the window panes. Mary Lou Clough and I exchanged glances. Mr. Long went right ahead. The communists decided against having their big celebration that day.

May 2: People are now being allowed out of their compounds, and the foreigners' playground in the Embassy Club. The two tennis courts and the swimming pool are enthusiastically patronized. There are bridge tables under the trees. The children of the diplomatic group, followed by their amahs, chase all over the grassy slopes. One or two babies, parked in carriages, are in shady places under the lofty trees. The Chinese boys, shite-coated, with their trousers bound neatly around their ankles with strips of wide cloth, pass around trays of cool drinks. The enforced leisure does not appear too hard to take, at the moment, anyway. I heard that during the past week, when the American Embassy people living at 84 Shanghai Lu had been confined to their compound, the Volley Ball and Gimlet Club had been organized. Gimlets are the favorite Nanking summer cocktail. Hank Lieberman said with some truth that really the greatest hardship sustained by the diplomatic group during the days following the take-over was the growing dearth of Rose's Lime Juice, one of the essential ingredients of a good Gimlet. John Beebe has now been allowed to go back to his house. We understand that the troops that took Nanking were former Nationalist troops that defected at Tainan, last fall.

May 11: To the Canadian Ambassador's for lunch. Miss Tincolli, of the Italian Embassy, was the only other woman present. I was dazed at the amount of rank present, -- The Egyptian and Belgian ambassadors, the Papal Nuncio, and the Polish and Turkish Charges d'Affaires. Everyone seems to be enjoying the forced vacation. One August diplomat said that when the Mayor's house was looted, he had seen a coolie making off with three W.C.'s. Heard that the Communists soldiers had been borrowing cooling utensils from foreign diplomats' establishments, but so far, had always returned them afterwards.

May 13: Walked to Shanxi Road Circle. The occupying soldiers seem very much at home. When I was returning, a soldier guarding a driveway, ordered me, with a preemptory gesture, to walk in the road. I felt a sense of shock and outrage at being ordered to do something by someone holding a gun. It was a sensation I had never had before, and it was very unpleasant. We are awakened very early in the morning these days by bugle reveilles, very loud, oft repeated, with many sour notes painful to hear. The bugles begin as soon as there is the faintest suggestion of dawn. The bird, whose call sounds like someone say, "One more bot-tle!" also makes noisy the early morning hours.

May 26: Shanghai has been taken.

June 7: Had a small lunch for the Canadian Ambassador, with the Jequier of the Swiss Legation, Mrs. Van der Hoeven of the Dutch Embassy and the Harrises.

June 15: Lunch here for the Liebermans, with the Bennetts and Mary Lois Kierman (Frank is in Shanghai). I had not been able to go to their wedding last Saturday at the Ambassador's because of the inflamed eye. Kay wore her wedding dress here to lunch so I could see it, and brought me a big hunk of wedding cake. They are going to Shanghai as soon as they can make arrangements. Somehow they have to get the New York Times jeep there, and don't know if it is best to drive it, put it on a train, or take it down the river on a Chinese junk. It is still most unclear what the Communist authorities will permit. Hank said, "This is going to be a honeymoon with some special gimmicks to it!"

July 4: Fourth of July Reception at the Ambassador's house for just the Americans in town. It was very pleasant, but a great contrast to last year's huge affair, with the whole diplomatic corps, members of the Army Advisory group and great numbers of Chinese officials attending.

July 12: Ambassador Stuart here for lunch. Other guests - the Philippine Chargé d'Affaires and Mrs. Adeva, the Cloughs, the Kiermans and Dr. Packard.

July 15: For some days, now, I have been doing volunteer teaching at the American School which has been reorganized since the Communists came in. Since the former school building is full of war refugees, an empty house at 1 Pu Tu Lu belonging to the Embassy is being used. The school furnishings have come from the most amazing number of sources. Jack Wolf, of Caltex, found playground equipment in the yard of the house he was living in. Being a bachelor, it was a constant source of wise-cracks, so he was more than glad to hand it over to the school. Seymour Topping of the Associated Press donated a piano. The school hours during the summer are from 8:30 a.m. to noon. There are about thirty foreign children of several different nationalities, mostly from families of the diplomatic group. Some of the children have only a partial knowledge of English, but they are unusually intelligent and get on wonderfully well together. We had our first air raid the other day. When the warning siren sounded, the school assembled in the large ground floor room where the library and piano are. Above the children's hubbub, a number of planes could be heard overhead, bomb explosions, and very near, loud anti-aircraft fire. Only one or two of the very young children appeared to be frightened. I asked the children around me what they'd like to sing, and they said "America" and "Old Black Joe". It seemed very strange to have two little girls from India, one from France and one from England singing lustily, " -- sweet Land of Liberty, I love thy rocks and rills, thy woods and templed hills" right in my ear during an air raid with Kuomintang planes droning loudly overhead. "Old Black Joe" with its "I'm coming, I'm coming, to a better land I know", to an Adult would hardly have seemed a cheerful choice under the circumstances, but it was just what they wanted. They all sang with so much noise and fervor that we didn't hear the "All clear" when it sounded. There were several in the school who had been in London during air raids, and they were the most philosophical of all.

July 17: Had the William Olives for lunch. They are going on the plane with the Ambassador to America, as soon as arrangements can be made for its departure. William Olive was the vice-consul in Shanghai, who was unjustly imprisoned by the Communists from July 6 to July 9, mistreated, and made to sign a "confession" under duress. Mr. Cabot, the Shanghai Consul General also arrived in Nanking yesterday, and will go on the Ambassador's plane also, as will Mr. Hinderer, the Embassy's Administrative Officer. The crew will be: Colonel Dunning, the Air Attaché, pilot; Major van Ausdall, who is also a pilot, Sergeant Menczer, radioman, and Sergeant Fillingame, mechanic.

July 21: It is terribly hot now, with the oppressive Nanking summer humidity in full swing. The season of the one More Bottle Bird is over. He has been replaced by the shrill cicadas. On a hot summer night, the voice of insect life has amazing volume. At lunch time, Li Shang-I told me there was a big fire at the Military Attaché's Office, which is near the 84 Shanghai Lu compound, where the Ambassador lives. It was not until we were at dinner at Tom Cory's and Bob Anderson's that night that I heard that Corporal Ryan, one of the Marines, had been seriously burned when a can of gasoline exploded. A bamboo fence on fire near a quantity of gasoline had menaced several cars and the building. Someone said that eighty percent of Corporal Ryan's body was burned -- first, second and third degree burns.

July 23: Mrs. Franke telephoned me and asked me if I could be at little Embassy hospital from 11 a.m. to 2 p.m. the next day to help nurse Corporal Ryan. Everyone had been taking turns. Lee had been asked to be there from 12:30 to 2:30 a.m. as George Harris relief. Lee, in turn, would be relieved by Ralph Clough, who would be there from 2:30 to 5:30 a.m. Lee left the house with a flashlight about ten o'clock. He was going to work at the Embassy until time to go to the hospital.

July 24: I didn't hear him when he came in, and he slept late. He said he had cracked ice for the many ice bags. Two English nurses had been secured, a woman, and a man, a Quaker, who was here on his way to the hospital far inland, when the Communists came in. I heard that the other Embassies and Legations had offered to do volunteer nursing -- they wanted to do anything they could to help. I put on my white dress and low white shoes and went over. Miss Poon, the Embassy nurse, Mrs. Frankel, and several other people were there. Poor Ryan was in the large adjoining glassed-in room. He was all bandages except for the top of his head where one could see his short, boyishly tousled blondish hair and his strong, sturdy young feet. (He had been wearing only shorts and shoes at the time of the fire, and those were the only parts of him that had been somewhat protected.) Someone told me that his eyes had not been hurt and that if he recovered there would probably be no scars on his face. There were slits in his head bandage for his mouth and his nose and he was being given oxygen through a rubber nose tube. On his left ankle, just beyond the bandages was a cruel-looking blister. The area over his heart, which did not appear to be badly burned, was left free of bandages, so that Dr. Packard could apply the stethoscope from time to time. I had been told that his pulse had to be taken in his foot -- his wrists and temples were buried deep in bandages. There was an unburned area on his right side where Miss Poon gave him injections of penicillin and morphine. Electric fans were blowing cool air, and there were about twenty ice-bags of various sizes against his legs, arms, sides, shoulders and head. It was my job and Mrs. Glycer's to fill and re-fill these bags as the ice melted (it was very hot). A Chinese was kept almost constantly busy in the adjoining bathroom cracking off pieces of ice of the proper size from a big block. Gensy Soule, General Soule's daughter, was there, and had been helping almost continuously. Ryan would occasionally speak and Ginsy would lean down to find out what he wanted. Although his voice wasn't loud, it sounded normal and full of vitality. His chest rose and fell evenly. He seemed so young and full of soundness and health. That the burns could conquer seemed incredible. From time to time, people dropped in to see how he was, -- Mrs. Soule, Captain Frankel, Colonel Dunning and a number of others. Lt. Deering came in with some boards to elevate the foot of Ryan's bed. Later, the nurse wanted him to drink. He said: "I'd like to have a drink, in New York!" He didn't want to drink, and it was vital necessary. Orange, pineapple, apple juice; broth or coffee were suggested. Then someone said, "How about some gingerale? Mr. Davis, the Canadian Ambassador sent it over for you. It's right here." Finally, he drank a little through a glass tube. Mrs. Glycer said to him: "Come on, drink with me -- we'll click glasses!" He protested; "I've drunk such a lot, I can't drink any more."

July 25: We have heard that Ryan is much better today, -- his temperature has gone down, and that he is able to take plasma again. (For some reason, it had become impossible for him to take it two days ago.) I said to Lee: "He's going to get well now, and everyone who's helped with the nursing is going to feel a proprietary interest in him!"

July 26: We are having air-raids every day or so now. I thought of the extra helplessness of Ryan at such a time.

July 27: Yesterday afternoon, the sky became very dark, and a torrential rain beat down.

Suddenly, Ryan's temperature went up and up and up - over 108. At seven in the evening, he died.

July 28: Corporal Ryan, was buried today in the presence of his comrades and the diplomatic Corps, in the little foreign cemetery, near others who have died far from home.

August 1: We continue to have air-raids, -- there were about five today. All the arrangements are complete for the departure of the Ambassador's plane, -- it is scheduled to take off at eight tomorrow morning. It will go to Okinawa, where the passengers will change from the C-47 to the B-17; thence to Kwajalein, Johnston, Honolulu and San Francisco. I'll continue to keep this informal diary, and put down things as they happen -- and there doesn't seem to be much doubt things will keep on happening!

JOSEPH A. YAGER
Exchange Program
Canton (1947-1948)

Consul
Hong Kong/Peking (Peiping) (1950-1951)

Mr. Yager was born in Indiana and raised in Ohio. After earning a degree at the University of Michigan, he joined the US Army, where he served in China until joining the State Department in 1946. Mr. Yager became one of the Department's China specialists, serving in Canton, Hong Kong (Peiping) and Taipei, as well in Washington, where he continued to be involved in Chinese economic and political matters. Mr. Yager was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1999.

YAGER: I was sent to Canton. After 16 days, Charlie Stelle sent me a message saying, "Congratulations, you have stayed there more than 16 days." I went to Canton under an exchange program under which people in the Civil Service could get some foreign experience. It was quite educational. The post at Canton was rather disorganized at that time. The consul general, Harvey Boucher, was an old hand, but not an Asian hand. He was a class two officer, which in those days seemed higher than it does now. He had had a mental breakdown from which he supposedly had recovered and then he was sent to this high stress post. His number two was a real old China hand named Gordon Burke, the son of a Methodist missionary to China, who was unfortunately an alcoholic. Also, despite having been raised in China and being able to speak both mandarin and Shanghai Chinese fluently, Burke was very anti-Chinese. The economic officer, Bill Wright, was ill. He spent most of the time in his quarters in bed. It was a place full of vacuums. I had all the opportunity in the world to do pretty much what I wanted to do. I got on well with Boucher. Because of a shortage of space, he put me in a little cubicle within his own office. I would sit there doing my work, and callers would come in and talk about all kinds of confidential things. Here I was, listening to the naval attaché complaining about the Army attaché, that kind of thing. It was a strange place.

The best part of my assignment there was a one month trip into the interior using my own travel money. You mentioned the question about American sources. I had written letters before I made the trip to American missionaries that we knew about. As I look back on it, the letters were quite indiscreet. They, in fact, asked the missionaries to collect information for us, which was a poor idea. So, I traveled to western Hunan and back to the railroad at Hengyang and down the railroad into Kwangsi. I stopped at American missions along the way, going all the way to Lung-chou, which is about 10 miles from the Indochina border, and then back to the West River at Wuchow and back by a boat to Canton. I borrowed a jeep from CNRRA, the Chinese adjunct to UNRRA. That helped me a great deal. I talked to a lot of Chinese, and I also talked to the missionaries. Some of them were quite informative. I learned a lot about American missions, including the rivalry between the Catholics and the Protestants. The Catholics were critical of the Protestants, because they would go out to China with their families, build an American-style bungalow, and live an American-style life. The Catholic missionaries would go into the dirty villages and live in crummy little houses right with the people.

Q: As we move into 1950, "Who lost China" and all that was beginning to heat up. Your organization must have felt some of the heat about interpretation. As the political winds became quite strong from the right, I would have thought that anything dealing with recognition of communist China or that they're doing something right or anything like that would become almost a political anathema and be sure to be leaked out. It must have inhibited you.

YAGER: I don't think I was inhibited. I don't know for sure that anybody else was. It was a problem. Some people who worked for me were being interviewed and charged with some kind of subversive connections. By chance, I had an insight into the way that the security organization sometimes operated. I learned from a member of SY, security, that at least some of their agents in cases where they didn't really have enough evidence to prove that somebody should be dismissed would try to bully the person in question into resigning. The guy who told me this thought that that was a very poor practice, as I did. When anybody told me that they were being interrogated by SY, I would say, "I assume that you have nothing to be ashamed of. You just stand your ground. Whatever you do, don't resign. They may try to make you resign, but don't do it. If you don't do it and if they really don't have anything on you, you will get out all right." But the questioning had a bad psychological effect. People were unhappy about hearing about people who were in trouble and thought, "Why is he in trouble? There is nothing wrong with him," which was usually true. So, it was more than a bit of a cloud. I don't remember that it influenced the work on China. I think that it may have gotten some of the Southeast Asia people into unjustified trouble. One senior person left for an academic job. I think it was probably because she was under intensive interrogation.

YAGER: My family and I arrived in Hong Kong sometime in the summer of 1950, so it wasn't very long after the war had started. My family was evacuated at the turn of the year when the Chinese had come in. If I had been back in my job in Washington and had been asked whether the Chinese would intervene, I would have come up with the wrong answer. I would have said,

"No, they just won a very difficult war. They haven't consolidated their power in all parts of China. Their military must be in pretty bad shape. They are just not going to take on the United States," but they did. How wrong can you be?

Q: You were in Hong Kong this next time from when to when?

YAGER: The summer of 1950 to the summer of 1951. It was roughly a year. Maybe I bring bad luck, but this post was in not very good shape either. When I arrived there, Carl Rankin, an excellent man, had been the consul general, but he had just been made ambassador in Taipei. His number two, a strange man named James R. Wilkinson, was in charge but was beyond his depth. He was told that Walter McConaughy, the consul general in Shanghai, was going to be consul general in Hong Kong. There was very little difference in rank between the two. McConaughy was a lot younger than Wilkinson. Wilkinson felt, "Well, I came out here to work for Carl Rankin, a very senior man, and here I'm supposed to work for this young guy, McConaughy." He was churning around unhappily about that while a great scandal was unfolding in the consulate. It was a mixture of homosexuality, which in those days was grounds for dismissal, and visa and passport fraud.

Q: The pressures there were just a mess.

YAGER: Oh, it was a terrible mess. A special inspector, Julian Harrington, came out to deal with this scandal. Garity from SY also came out to prepare the case against Vice Consul John Williams, who was charged with visa fraud.

Harrington, expanding his mandate a bit, thought he could settle the Wilkinson problem. He got Wilkinson made an inspector in charge of the Consular Section. That was the solution. Because Wilkinson was backing out of his assigned job, I was made the acting number two. In those days, the number two in a consulate was called executive officer, a term we got from the Navy. So, I had eight months under quite a good boss, Walter McConaughy. I was way beyond my age and grade. I was in my mid-30s and here I was the number two in a big consulate general. I learned a lot. I had large general responsibilities. I reviewed everything that went out. I got into a lot of contacts. I had Macao as my personal sideline. Except for when my family moved out from under me, I was happy.

Q: I am an old consular hand and I know that visa and passport problems in Hong Kong were endemic. Did you get involved in this at all?

YAGER: I had to be aware of them because the tail end of the investigation was still going on. Vice Consul John Williams was still in Hong Kong, although he had been told not to come to work. I don't think I ever met him. This was his first post, strangely enough. Lindsey Grant, an excellent junior officer, had had some hand in uncovering the fraud. He had been in the Consular Section. I learned quite a bit from him and Magarity told me a lot more. It was a nasty mess.

Q: Was it money or sex?

YAGER: For Williams, it was mostly money, but not entirely. His first official act as a vice consul of the United States was to issue a visa for which he received $50. So, the idea that this boy from the Carolinas was corrupted by the evil Orient just was not so. He was a corrupt fellow when he arrived, ready to get any money he could. Of course, he raised his prices. His main Chinese accomplice was named Humi Chu. There was another one whose name was, of all things, Peter Pan.

RICHARD E. JOHNSON
Office of Chinese Affairs
Washington, DC (1947-1951)

Economic Officer
Hong Kong (1951-1954)

Richard E. Johnson was born and raised in Winnetka, Illinois. He attended Harvard University and served in the U.S. Navy. Mr. Johnson joined the State Department in 1947 and entered the Foreign Service in 1951. He served in Hong Kong, Canada, Poland, Yugoslavia, Bulgaria, and Brazil. Mr. Johnson was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1991.

JOHNSON: I think my Navy experience gave me a taste for working for an organization that I felt had some fairly high objectives, a U.S. government organization that I wanted to be a part of. I was proud of my service in the Navy, and to go from that into the world of trade was, for me, a rather boring prospect. I don't think it would be now; I have probably different outlooks on these things. But, then, I wanted to be a part of the process of post-war recovery. And so I joined the State Department and eventually was one of the officers in the Office of Chinese Affairs.

Q: You came into the department in 1947, and you worked there, I guess as a civil servant, until 1951. Could you describe a little of the environment? It was a time when the State Department was sort of trying to read its way into the role of being a world power, wasn't it? And also being a major organization within a world power.

JOHNSON: Yes, I think things were a good deal simpler then, needless to say. There was a small number of major issues around the world, rather than a whole basketful of them, that we felt we needed to be involved in. The one that I was most directly involved in was the process of Nationalist China going down the drain. I was in the Office of Chinese Affairs, and of course these were McCarthy days, so that, in a way, conditioned the mood in the State Department, which was a very cautious one and one of considerable concern, even seeping down to the lower levels in the Civil Service. You never knew when you were going to show up on some list for some crime you really didn't commit.

Q: Really, this McCarthy period was of concern?

JOHNSON: It certainly was in the sector that I was working in, the Office of Far Eastern Affairs on the China desk. I worked for a time for several old China hands who were hit by McCarthy and their careers were seriously damaged. They later recovered and they're now highly respected as Sinologists, but, at that time, McCarthy had succeeded in creating a good deal of fear in the ranks.

Q: What were you doing in Chinese Affairs?

JOHNSON: I was a junior professional assistant, I think they called them in those days. I worked mainly with the economist for Chinese Affairs, who was concerned with the question of aid to China. At that time, Chiang had retreated to Formosa, and he was raising the Nationalist China flag from Formosa. And he had a lot of support in those days in Congress, as you remember. And there was a major debate going on as to whether the U.S. should continue to support Chiang Kai-shek with large-scale aid. As you may remember, there was a White Paper put out, sort of illustrating how our assistance to Chiang had been wasted. There was reluctance in the United States government at that time to endorse large-scale aid programs for Chiang. And this put the Executive Branch in sort of a running duel with the Congress on many counts.

Q: Again, we're talking about junior level, but, still, how did you find the reporting on the economic situation? I suppose, at that point, you were concerned about the economic situation on Taiwan, but you're getting from both. I mean, how'd you find...?

JOHNSON: I don't remember there being much, Stu. Of course, we had no posts in mainland China then. What reporting was done was mainly a sort of intelligence-type reporting, through posts like Hong Kong, and we weren't too much interested in the economy of Taiwan. It was mainly a political matter.

Q: Did the Korean War, which started in June of 1950, which was right in the middle of the time you were there, change much of what you were doing?

JOHNSON: Yes, I think it intensified the battle between those who were in support of Chiang Kai-shek and felt we should demonstrate that support by large aid programs, and the more conservative forces that didn't see much benefit for the U.S. in further supporting the Gimo. I say that because, when General MacArthur came back from Korea, a great deal of this sentiment coalesced around him. He was a very strong exponent for helping Chiang Kai-shek, because he felt that was a good hope for getting at the Chinese Communists.

Q: Well, then, you moved to Hong Kong in 1951 and you were there until '54. Was this still with the Civil Service?

JOHNSON: No, I joined the Foreign Service.

Q: Why did you do that?

JOHNSON: That's a good question, and I've often wondered. I was having a fascinating time in Chinese Affairs and enjoyed it. And I had the feeling, which persisted throughout much of my Foreign Service career, that it's in Washington where the decisions were made, and that was a fun place to be, it's where the action was. I took the Foreign Service exams while I was in the Office of Chinese Affairs, partly just to see how I'd do, without much intention then of going into the service. And I was deferred on the orals because my knowledge of U.S. history wasn't very good. Even before that, I was deferred because my German was not up to date. So I repaired my German, took the language exam again, then I spent a year studying U.S. history, because it was just a challenge to me to get through this thing. And I passed the oral exam easily the second time. Thereafter, I think I just felt I'd put so much effort into this thing that I ought to give the Service a try. And my people in Chinese Affairs wanted me to go to Hong Kong to help in the commercial section with the trade controls that we had then, if you remember, very intensive controls to prevent goods from Communist China getting into the United States, and, conversely, to prevent U.S. exports from getting into Communist China.

Q: It's interesting from a historical point of view to think how much effort has been put into the United States commercial controls, not spreading trade.

JOHNSON: Absolutely.

Q: During World War II, an awful lot of our officers were doing nothing but trying to stick it to the, particularly the Germans, to keep them from getting stuff out of Latin America. And we sort of went right back into that mode again.

JOHNSON: You're so right, we did. And we expended a tremendous amount of money and effort. And I was in the middle of that when I was in Hong Kong.

It even got kind of amusing, the depth of our concerns. For example, in trying to prevent Chinese Communist products from arriving in the United States, we got into some very detailed definitions of what is a Chinese product. There are a lot of Chinese products based on egg and chicken, food products that were exported to the U.S. traditionally. And, of course, exports from Hong Kong we were happy to let in, because this was a friendly British colony, but nothing from Communist China. Well, the border between Hong Kong and Communist China runs through a swamp, and there were a lot of Chinese vegetable goods produced in that swamp, on both sides of the border, and there was no way of detecting, for example, a litchi nut produced in Hong Kong from one produced in China. And it got even more technical when you got into egg products. It was clear that if the egg had been hatched in Communist China, even though the egg was brought into Hong Kong for processing, it was a Communist product. But how about if the chicken comes from Communist China and is brought across the border into Hong Kong live and lays the egg on the Hong Kong side, is that then a Communist product?

Q: These were matters of debate?

JOHNSON: These were matters that had to be answered, defined, because we were policing this sort of thing.

And, looking the other way, there was a tremendous effort to keep U.S. goods from getting into Communist China. And in the commercial section I did a lot of export checking. You know the old export checks, where you try to decide what will happen to this particular product -- if it's brought in, will it be reexported?

That is really a battle of wits in Hong Kong, because a Chinese company that is importing and perhaps does intend to send it to Communist China, would find all sorts of ways of evading these eager-beaver American vice consuls. As you came up the steps, with the sign of the U Fong Company on somebody's desk, and they saw you coming, the sign would be quickly removed and another sign would be put up there. You'd ask, "Is Mr. Chin around?" And they'd say, "He is not here right now, maybe he'll be back later."

But I remember particularly one export check that I was asked to make on, of all things, prophylactic rubbers. And the question was: What are Hong Kong's requirements for prophylactic rubbers? And I had to go all around Hong Kong, talking to importers of prophylactic rubbers and asking: How many do you think Hong Kong uses? And how many are reexported to China? And I wrote about a ten-or twelve-page airgram, which received commendations from Washington. Then I got a further communication saying, "Please update this carefully. We have heard that the Chinese Communists are using prophylactic rubbers to protect the muzzles of their guns from moisture."

Q: We did in Korea.

JOHNSON: That's what Washington said. They said this is being done in Korea.

Q: I remember it distinctly.

JOHNSON: And so I was double checking, and then I got another telegram from the Pentagon that said, "Forget all about it. Our experts have said that if you do try to protect your gun muzzles that way, it will simply rust and pit-out the muzzles themselves because moisture will collect, there is no air in the muzzle. So any prophylactic rubbers that want to go to Communist China, okay."

Q: So you didn't look at the strategic value of trying to keep the Chinese population down.

JOHNSON: No, that wasn't part of that check. So that was challenging, but a tremendous expense of time and effort, as you said. We had a commercial section of, I would guess, four or five officers. And they didn't do any trade development work, it was all this kind of control.

I think at that time we had some concern that maybe the British patrols, patrols that were designed to prevent smuggling from Hong Kong to China, were not sufficiently efficient. To reassure us, they said I could ride on British patrols at night and watch them intercepting junks smuggling -- steel plate was a big item and tires -- to Canton. And I spent several very exciting nights patrolling Hong Kong waters. They'd pull junks over and go aboard and search for contraband. And a few of these junks tried to evade the patrols. It was exciting and interesting.

Q: I was wondering really how the Consulate General observed things in China. Did you have the feeling they were getting much information from talking to others there, or was it a group of Cold Warriors really hunkered down at that time?

JOHNSON: No, Stu, they had some really good China hands. These were people who had served in China before and knew the country, State Department Foreign Service people. Of course, there were CIA people there, too, who were very good. And there was a great deal of interviewing of people coming across the line -- university professors from China and business people. And there was a great deal of reading of anything that was published that came out of China. It was the principal listening post for China. It was one of the very largest American posts in the world at that time, larger than most embassies. We had forty-two vice consuls, just vice consuls alone. It was known as a marrying post -- I met my wife there -- and we counted a total of six weddings that developed from contacts in the consulate there.

Q: My God. Was Pat, your wife, was she...?

JOHNSON: She was there as a consular assistant, having joined the Foreign Service before I did.

I spent about two years in the commercial section, and then a couple of years in the consular section, which was also very colorful and also involved a great deal of detailed effort that produced little in terms of the interests of the U.S. citizenry.

Here the effort was to keep Chinese from entering the U.S. illegally. And the base of the problem is that, in China, at least then, they didn't have civil documents. There was no such thing as an official birth certificate or an official marriage certificate. So you had to rely on informal evidence if you were a Chinese and you wanted, for example, to prove that you were the son of a Chinese and therefore entitled to nonquota entry. And very often the Chinese father would be in the States and he would be asking that this young man come in as his son. Well, there was a great deal of illegal importation of Chinese young men into the U.S. for various labor purposes, so in the visa section we had to be extremely careful. And the "son" would come in with what was called informal evidence. This would be, oh, say, badly worn letters from "Dad," sent to this kid supposedly when he was such and such an age -- but sometimes the ink wouldn't be too dry on them. Or they would unroll a beautiful certificate, and you'd say, "What is that thing?"

And he'd say, "That is the announcement of the marriage of Mom and Dad, and it's signed down here by the Chinese gentleman who presided at the wedding."

And you'd feel it and say, "This paper feels pretty new. This doesn't look like the certificate that was used when your father was married."

And then he'd pull out a photograph of him with old "Dad" alongside, to prove the relationship.

And you'd say, "Why is it that the left-hand side of this photograph is light, whereas the right-hand side is so dark? Looks almost as though something had been pasted together here. Why don't you try again and come back in a few weeks."

I felt for the poor Chinese.

Then they developed blood testing as a means of tripping things up. Because, of course, a blood test can prove that by anything known to medical science you cannot be the result of the union of these two people. "Mother," of course, was often a part of this. She would come in with this alleged son, to testify that yes, I remember well when Jimmy here was born, and his father is, sure enough, this guy in San Francisco. And you'd take a blood test on all three, and it would come out that Jimmy just couldn't be the son of this union. And you'd not only have to turn him down, but you'd...this was the hardest, really the hardest thing I had to do in all my consular work, you'd have to turn down this poor, aging woman because she had lied under oath. And you'd have to tell her that under no circumstances could she rejoin her husband. And that is just a real, real hard thing. A lot of human interest stories in that work.

I remember...I'll get off this subject soon, but it is colorful. The citizenship section worked on somewhat the same problems, although here the young man was trying to prove that he was entitled to U.S. citizenship. There the effort was based principally on his trying to prove that he was born in a certain village at a certain time. He would come into the consulate with a "witness," a friend from the same village. And both of them had been very carefully coached at a school set up in Hong Kong to brief guys who were appearing before the U.S. consul so they would know what to say. The examination consisted of getting a piece of paper and drawing a sort of an informal map of the village. And the examiner would say, "Now in your village where was the, let's say, the place where the gentlemen bathed themselves?" And you'd ask them separately. The witness would come in and say it was over here; and the applicant would put it over here. And you'd say, "Well, you two don't seem to be from the same town really." And then you'd check out with them the place where the small market was in the village -- tremendous detail. If you passed this oral quizzing, there was a place in Hong Kong where you could buy healthy, warm stools before you came in for your physical exam. Colorful assignment.

Q: Yes. You then left there for a much more mundane world, didn't you?

JOHNSON: Yes, I went to Toronto after that.

PHILIP W. MANHARD
Chinese Language Studies
Beijing (1947-1949)

Vice Consul
Tientsin (1949-1950)

Ambassador Philip W. Manhard was born in Massachusetts in 1921. He received his bachelor's degree from the University of Southern California in 1943. He served in the US Navy (1943-1944) and the US Marine Corps (1944-1966). His overseas postings include Peiping, Tientsin, Pusan, Seoul, and Tokyo. Ambassador Manhard was interviewed by Marshall Green on December 1, 1988.

MANHARD: Marshall, I had always been interested, since high school, in the Foreign Service. I went to college with the idea of preparing for the Foreign Service. World War II arrived while I was still in university. I ended up studying Japanese in the Navy and served in the Marine Corps during World War II. I came back after the war, took the Foreign Service exams, passed them with not the highest grade in the world, and was put on a waiting list.

Q: What year was this?

MANHARD: 1946 and '47. I took the written and the oral, and was waiting on the waiting list, the Foreign Service then having very little money to appoint all those that had passed.

Not being a person of independent means, I had to earn a living. Standard Vacuum Oil Company of New York came along and said, "We're recruiting for our marketing division in China."

I said, "That's exactly where I've always wanted to go," and I went.

Q: You went there knowing Japanese?

MANHARD: I studied Japanese during the war and also studied some Chinese in college before the war. I went to China with Standard Vacuum Oil Company in Peking, whereupon, after I'd been there for about six months, I received a letter saying that my appointments had been made and I was to report to the State Department actually one week before they condescended to send the letter to me, which was by surface mail to China from Washington.

So I went to the then Acting Consul General Fulton Freeman, Tony Freeman, in Peking, who later became ambassador to several countries. I said, "Tony, what do I do now? My lifelong ambition has been to join the Foreign Service and come to China, and now it is too late."

He said, "We have an opening in the Chinese language school here. Would you like to take that position?"

I said, "Certainly. That would be perfect from my point of view."

He said, "I'll fix it."

I said, "How in the world can you fix it, since the term for my eligibility for appointment is already expired?"

He said, "Phil, I'll introduce you to the Foreign Service by explaining something very basic to you. I will send a telegram to the Department explaining to them they can save $422, i.e., the (then) cost of your trip from Washington to Peking. They will do anything for $422, regardless of regulations." He did, they did, and I was sworn in, if not uniquely, at least a very rare occurrence in the field, in Peking, by Tony Freeman.

Then I attended the Chinese language course, an 18-month course.

Q: I wonder if you could describe a bit how the Chinese language training was done. What was the routine, and how effective was it? How did you live in 1948?

MANHARD: From March of 1948 until early October 1949. The Foreign Service Chinese language school at that time was located in Peking, in a Chinese compound, a Chinese-style building, small. That office and the quarters in which the students were put, which were private apartments, if you will, in a rabbit warren of interconnected little houses right near the city wall in the southeast part of Peking, had existed back through the twenties. I think at one time even George Marshall had attended school there in that place with the Army, way back, so it has a long history and tradition.

All the teachers were Chinese, recruited in Peking. They spoke the northern dialect, which was the preferred brand of Chinese and always has been, even though it's slightly Bostonian, in American context. We would usually have mornings with a tutor, and we were almost all one on one with Chinese tutors, one hour with one, one hour with another. Texts were prepared, but they were the basis of our learning, and it was both written and oral, some writing, less writing than reading and speaking. It was very intensive. We'd spend usually three to four hours each morning, five days a week, and then you would prepare for the next day's performance that afternoon. Your time was your own in the afternoon and evening, but it was strenuous.

Q: Had your study of Japanese and Japanese characters been much assistance to you?

MANHARD: Yes, very much, because the Chinese and Japanese characters have basically the same meaning in both languages. Chinese, of course, grammatically, and the sequence of thought in Chinese is comparable to English, as Japanese is to German. So they're very different, but the written language is very similar.

Q: That's one of the difficult things about the Japanese language, the sentence order.

MANHARD: One time when I was out in a language course, a friend of mine was a middle-aged woman Presbyterian missionary, who was in a little town outside Peking. This was during the investment, I guess you'd call it, in military terminology, of Peking, the surrounding of Peking during the period of negotiation for the peaceable surrender of Peking by the Nationalists to the Communists in August and September of 1949 and before the occupation -- the end of '48, the beginning of '49. I took a consulate jeep out on a Sunday to see her, because a Chinese friend of mine had told me she was sick out in this little town, which was in between the lines, I thought. It turned out the Chinese Communist Party lines were closer. I got out there on a road and got sniper fire from the Chinese Communist side, turned around and came back on the road, whereupon I met machine gun fire coming at me from the Chinese Nationalists. It destroyed the front end of the jeep. I drove it into the consulate compound. It was a diesel engine by that time because all the water had drained out of the engine block. I had to wait for the gas to run out for the engine to stop. Then I was told that I would have to pay for the damage, of course, because it my own personal affair on the weekend. (Laughs)

Q: Did you actually ever pay for it?

MANHARD: I had some friends in the Army language school, which was just closing down. They were leaving the city, and they had extra equipment. They said, "Phil, we'll give you a jeep so you can pay your difficult Foreign Service folks who count the pennies." (Laughs)

In the end of January 1949, the Chinese Communist Army occupied Peking by negotiation with the local Chinese Nationalist commander. Then life changed radically for all of us in China at that time.

Q: Does that mean that you had to stop your Chinese language studies in Peking? Did you stay on in Peking, or were you then send elsewhere?

MANHARD: I stayed on through my course in Chinese, from which I graduated in October of 1949. I was then immediately transferred as a vice consul to Tientsin as a language officer in our consulate in Tientsin.

Q: Did you operate there as a regular vice consul, or were you studying the language?

MANHARD: No, I was operating as a regular vice consul.

Q: What were your duties?

MANHARD: Consular duties and monitoring the Chinese press. Actually, my main duties, as it turned out, were to try to assist Americans, both official and private, to leave north China, all of whom exited through Tientsin. So my duties evolved into constant negotiation, assistance, support, coordination between departing Americans and local Chinese Communist government officers.

Q: Were you aware that you'd have to be departing pretty soon, too?

MANHARD: The major event that bore on that for all of us in China at that time was, first, a telegram from the Department signed by the then-Acting Secretary Levitt, telling everybody in China that we were the indispensable eyes and ears, we could not be replaced, that China policy was still under very serious debate in Washington, and they wanted us to stay at all costs, and only those with a dire emergency should ask permission to return to the United States.

Q: Were dependents, meanwhile, taken back to the United States?

MANHARD: Dependents remained in China at that time. Apparently, the Department was mindful of what they hoped, I guess, to be a precedent of what we did in Manchuria in 1932, when the Japanese occupied Manchuria, i.e., we kept our consulates there and they did consular work by tolerance of the Japanese, even though we did not recognize the Japanese conquering and occupation of Manchuria at that time. They were allowed to remain and to function consular duties. We thought, I guess, that we could do that again in China temporarily, at least.

Q: What was the atmosphere like then in Tientsin during those days that you were serving as vice consul? The Chinese authorities were obviously Communist authorities. Did they act towards you in a hostile, surly way, or were they cooperative, or what?

MANHARD: It varied from official to official. Mostly very bureaucratic and quite non-cooperative. For example, they tried to apply all their regulations affecting foreigners that they promulgated after they came to power officially as of October 1, 1949, when they established their national government. They insisted, for instance, that we fill in various bureaucratic forms, residence permits and various things, declaring all previous permits or any other documents that we had used previously under the Chinese National Government to be null and void under their government. Each form, for example, had a space for occupation. So in my case, I would write down "vice consul." They would reject it. It boiled down to a long, rather sterile negotiation over whether . . .

Q: What type would they prefer?

MANHARD: They would only accept "unemployed" or "former vice consul." Since we claimed that we were not unemployed and we claimed that we had our official title, finally we ended up putting down "vice consul" and letting them fill in the word "former."

Q: Just refresh my memory, though. At that point we had diplomatic relations with the Chiang government?

MANHARD: And we still maintained full diplomatic relations with the Chinese Nationalist Government, which by that time, of course, had moved south and then finally to Taiwan. Everyone was aware that there was a debate raging in Washington about our policy toward China.

Q: The situation you faced in Tientsin at that time, was that a similar situation faced by our other consulates? How many consulates did we have operating in China at that point?

MANHARD: I can't be sure exactly now, Marshall, but we had our consulate general in Peking, we had a consul general in Mukden, we had our embassy in Nanking, we had a consulate general in Shanghai and in Canton. We had several others in central and south China, but they were evacuated, I believe, just before the Chinese Communist fully occupied the mainland.

Q: When you went to Tientsin, what was its importance to the United States?

MANHARD: It was the port for most of north China.

Q: We had Marines stationed there at one time.

MANHARD: At one time, yes. We had them in Peking, too, of course. It is the main north China port. It was then, and it was for a long time, through which most of the foreign trade affected both ways all north trade.

Q: Still true today.

MANHARD: Yes, as far as I know, it's still true.

Q: You've mentioned the American missionaries. What was the relationship of the consulate, while you were there, with the American missionaries in Tientsin?

MANHARD: Not much, because most of the missionaries had departed. They didn't dare remain. The few that were still there, most of them, I think, came out before. A couple of them I assisted.

Q: They were in a much more exposed position, because they didn't have diplomatic status. Not that you had, but in a way you had international law.

MANHARD: They were entirely dependent on their Chinese colleagues. The Communists tenets against religion and so forth, they felt that they would have very little opportunity to continue to exist, so most of them, as far as I can remember, had pulled out before we finally got out.

Q: You alluded to your role at the consulate as being free-wheeling. I wonder if you could talk a little about how the consulate was organized, what the other officers were doing. Would you comment on the leadership there, how you felt it was operating under very difficult conditions? Not just your role, but the rest of the organization.

MANHARD: We had a consul. It's very hard to remember now. We had two vice consuls, the consular vice consul and one was administrative vice consul. We had several junior staff members who were mostly clerical, a code clerk and two secretaries. I can't remember precisely now. It was a very small staff and had been reduced considerably before I got there, people getting out, knowing they could only maintain a skeleton staff at that time. The consular work, the normal issuing of visas and so forth, was practically non-existent because nobody was going anywhere, except outbound with a permit from the Chinese. So I only issued one consular visa to a White Russian lady, while her daughter and mother came, because of a request from a U.S. admiral, which I never quite figured out, which the State Department indicated it would be very tactful if I would cooperate.

Q: The consul was Wellborn.

MANHARD: He was responsible for the running of the overall office.

Q: Which was largely a question of self-preservation.

MANHARD: It was self-preservation. I feel great sympathy for Al, because his wife and their young child, maybe two years old, was there, and several times I know I and others on the staff, I'm sure, tried to ask Al didn't he think that his wife and child should go home right away, even though we were asked to stay. He said, "We're going to stick it out until we have orders to go." So they did, but I think it added burden on him psychologically.

Q: This all occurred during the occupation of Japan. This, of course, gave you kind of a backup. When they said you wanted a ship to take people out, there was one available, which raises the question about the Japanese and the legacy of Japan during this particular period. I gather some 7 million Japanese had been returned from overseas, mostly from north China and from Manchuria, so there were no Japanese in the area when you were there. They obviously left a legacy. Did you come across that? Was there a great deal of bitterness displayed about the Japanese, or distrust?

MANHARD: In general, I'd say if you mentioned Japan to the Chinese there, they had a very bitter memory because it had been a tough occupation in that area, particularly, I guess.

Q: And humiliation, too.

MANHARD: Yes. Sometimes some remarks of a very negative nature about Koreans, because the Japanese in north China for quite a while did use a lot of Koreans as their military police up there, which was pretty tough. So the Chinese had very bad memories of both the Japanese occupation and the Koreans who worked for them in the occupation.

Q: The Korean collaborators.

MANHARD: Yes.

Q: Just as a matter of historical note, it is interesting that in the early 1930s, we had more consulates in China than any other country in the world by far. After that came Mexico. So we had very close communications that had a great deal to do with our missionary activities, too, as I recall.

MANHARD: Yes, that's true.

Q: Going back to the events in 1949, when you were in Tientsin, what were some of the particular problems that arose that are of historic note and importance?

MANHARD: Shortly after I got to Tientsin in October 1949, the news had come just before I got there that our consul general, Angus Ward, and his entire staff and dependents in Mukden had been placed under house arrest, i.e., in a compound in which they lived between the office and residencies in the city of Mukden, the capital of what the Chinese called Northeast, formerly called Manchuria. No one knew what was going to transpire there. The communications were closed down with that office.

Incidentally, I should mention that when I got to Tientsin, we had no radio, no communications directly with the outside world through our own means, and the only way we could send any either classified or unclassified messages was by laborious one-time pad code work sent through the Chinese Communist mail to our Consulate in Peking, which still had a radio and was allowed to operate its radio.

Mukden was out of communication, no one knew their condition, what was happening. At that point we were totally dependent on what we could pick up, at least as far as I knew, in Tientsin from the local Chinese language press. I followed that closely, and I noticed that the male members of the staff had been put in jail. There was a trial before what they called then the People's Court, and they were finally convicted of sabotaging the revolution. Angus Ward himself was convicted of supposedly attacking and assaulting a Chinese citizen and conducting various spy activities against the Chinese Communist regime. Finally, they were sentenced to execution. Shortly thereafter, it was announced in the press again that due to the lenient policy of the Chinese Communist regime, that their sentence was being commuted to deportation.

At that point, I simply decided that I would try to -- war game is not an appropriate name, but I would try to simply analyze for myself what I would be expected to do if I were a Chinese Communist official handling that situation. The first thing that seemed obvious to me, my own personal speculation, was that they had no way of physically carrying out the sentence of deportation from China mainland unless they had the cooperation of the United States or some other foreign power. They had no aircraft, there was no commercial transportation coming in or out of north China, at least. We knew that. We doubted there was any transportation anywhere in or out of China, at least of a regular nature.

So I decided that I'd take the initiative to go down to see the head of the Public Safety Bureau in the Chinese Communist regime, which was the equivalent of the internal and external gestapo. The head of that office, I was informed by a Belgian businessman who had long residence in Tientsin before and after World War II, was the son of a Chinese commercial family in Shanghai that was doing a lot of business with foreign business, and he had joined the Communist Party at a very early age and was a very senior member of the Chinese Communist Party. Perhaps partly by his background, he had rebelled against his father and family and was extremely, bitterly anti-foreign and specifically anti-American, a very difficult, tough, elderly, and senior Communist official. But he was the one with whom I had to deal. So I went down, insisted on seeing him.

Q: You took the initiative on this?

MANHARD: I took the initiative.

Q: You were in charge of your own office?

MANHARD: No, I was just a vice consul in an officer which consisted of a consul and several other vice consuls.

Q: Did you get the consul's permission to do this, or did you do this entirely on your own?

MANHARD: At this point, I can be frank, Marshall. I did it on my own. I simply went down and said, "I've seen from the paper that Angus Ward and his party have been sentenced to deportation.~" I asked him first if his government intended to deport them via the Soviet Union. I asked that question clearly because I was curious. I personally believed that the Chinese Communists were having great difficulties with their relationship with the Soviet Union. This was late October 1949. I did that, one, to stimulate an answer with regard to the Soviet Union; two, I was primarily concerned about what I could do to help the case of Angus Ward and his party.

Q: You had reason to think that the Soviet-Chinese relationships were not all they should be because of the way the Soviets had left Manchuria, taking with them some of the equipment.

MANHARD: Yes, there had been a lot of discussion in some quarters about the Soviet rape of Manchuria, cleaning out materials, taking people and so forth. Whether that was entirely the opinion of Chinese Nationalist officials and their government's attitude, or whether this was shared by the Chinese Communists, of course, no one knew for sure. But I'd seen many low-level indications in my dealings with lots of Chinese Communists officials and maybe officials who were not members of the Party, as well, in Tientsin, that I just detected an atmosphere and undercurrent of restiveness and unhappiness toward the Soviets.

So I asked him that question first and got the answer that I really expected. He glowered and bristled and said, "Certainly not. Absolutely not."

I said, "Perhaps Diren," which was then the port in the Ludien peninsula of Manchuria at that time, which was still occupied.

Q: Now called Dalian.

MANHARD: Port Arthur. So I asked him about that place, which was even by implication at issue in the Chinese Communist press, which their slogan at that time was, "Lean to one side, learn from our big brother," ostensible good relations with the Soviet Union. But restiveness and some criticism about the continuing Soviet occupation of that port. Total extraterritoriality, by the way, is the way they ran it, apparently, as a military base.

He again gave the same answer, "Absolutely not." He wouldn't think of it.

I said, "Then I assume the only way that you can send this group out of China is through Tientsin, and either directly from Tientsin to the United States, or perhaps go down to South China somewhere, a long and perhaps unnecessary trip."

At that point he backed up and said, "I'm not authorized to discuss this in any way with you."

Q: Was this conducted in Chinese?

MANHARD: In Chinese. "I'm not authorized to discuss this." He indicated that he'd like me to leave immediately, didn't want to talk to me.

So my parting shot at that point was simply, "Well, I trust you and your superiors realize that there is no way you can carry out the order of your court unless you have the cooperation of the United States. We are prepared." I operated as a free-wheeler, which is not in the best tradition, I guess, of the Foreign Service, but I'm sorry, that is my personal makeup and I can't help it. I decided I might as well strike while the iron was hot, feeling that there was nothing to lose and perhaps something to gain, and my personal career didn't matter.

So I said, "The United States Government is prepared to send a ship to Tientsin."

Q: You said that?

MANHARD: Yes. "We're prepared to cooperate and send a ship."

Q: And you knew that we were?

MANHARD: I did not know any such thing. We had no instructions whatsoever. Whether Peking or Nanking had instructions that were not divulged to low-ranking officers like myself at the end of the line, I had no way of knowing. But it seemed to me that I was actually in an impeccable position, because it seemed to me it was quite clear that the United States Government, the American press, the American Congress, and everybody else was very agitated about this issue, and was bound to cooperate if they had a chance to rescue this group of our representatives.

So I assumed that this was going to happen. I said, "We can't do this by ourselves. You have to do your share. You have to bring them to Tientsin, presumably arrange somehow to get them to a ship, because we can't come in over Cacubar, which is a navigational obstacle to a large ship coming into the wharf and docks in Tientsin." I said, "But we are prepared to cooperate, and I hope that you and your superiors will do something about this." Whereupon I was rather unceremoniously removed from his office, and left.

Q: He made no indication of yes or no?

MANHARD: He wouldn't speak. He ushered me out. Perhaps a week or ten days went by, and a call came through my Chinese staff. I had several people working for me in the consular business there, of which there was none practically of a normal sort at that time.

These Chinese on our staff in Tientsin, incidentally, were remarkable people. They had served, in many cases, for 25 or 30 years as local employees of our consulate in Tientsin. They had served before World War II, some of them had been put in prison and perhaps tortured by the Japanese during the Japanese occupation of China, and they were extremely loyal to the United States. They served through thick and thin.

Q: Did you have any way of telling if they were pro-Communist or otherwise?

MANHARD: We didn't ask them. We didn't think it was fair to ask them.

Q: No, but they were suspect. They must have been suspect.

MANHARD: We assumed that probably the Chinese Communist would put pressure on them to become informants and so forth, and they had to live with their government somehow. In any event, they were very experienced, very loyal to the United States, I felt, and proved their worth to our service for a long time. Two of them, the most senior in our office, came to me very ceremoniously and very seriously, and said, "Mr. Manhard, we're sorry to say that we have just received a call from the Public Safety Bureau, asking us to tell you that they request that you come to their office right away."

I said, "Fine, I'll do so."

They said, "Oh, no, please don't."

I said, "Why do you say that?"

They said, "As is typical in China, we have a cousin who has another relative, who has a relative who works in that office. They tell us that once you get there, you are going to be put in prison as an example to the rest of this office, just like Angus Ward and his party were treated in Mukden. So we think you shouldn't go."

So my obvious reply to them was, "I thank you for your sympathy and support. However, there is no way that I can prevent them from coming and getting me if they want to. We have no way of defending ourselves here. So I might as well go, not sit here and wait to be taken away, right?"

So they nodded. They lined up in old Chinese ceremonial fashion at the door as I left, and bowed, implying that that was the last they were going to see of me.

So I got in the car, a station wagon that was assigned to me, in which I had been followed everywhere day and night in the city of Tientsin, for all the months I was in Tientsin, with two leather jacket-clad, without insignia, young men, reminiscent of motorcycle gangs in the United States at some later date, I found out. They followed me. I went down there, and I was very surprised to see the head of the Public Safety Bureau seated behind his desk, slightly to the rear of two much younger men with very high-quality cloth uniforms, neither of whom had insignia. They did not give their name or rank or title. But the two young men were obviously in charge. The old man, the senior, the one that I had talked with, was very respectful toward them, even though they were much younger. So they were obviously of considerable rank.

They paid very little attention to him, and they simply addressed themselves to me, and said, entirely in Chinese, that their comrade, meaning the head of the Public Safety Bureau, had reported to them the conversation I had with him earlier, and that they were responding to what I had told him. They wanted to inform me that they represented the central government in Peking, and wanted me to know that what had happened to Mr. Ward -- they still didn't use the title -- and his group in Mukden did not reflect the policy of the Central Committee of the Chinese Communist Government. They went so far as to say that what had happened in Mukden was unfortunate -- "k'e-hsi," in Chinese, probably a different Romanization by modern Chinese, but I'll stick with what I was taught.

I was very surprised, because that was about as close to an official apology as I think any American official could ever get from the Chinese at that point under those circumstances. They said, "However, this case has gone too far. There is nothing we can do to change what has happened in Mukden now, but we wish to cooperate with the United States in every way possible to make some smooth arrangements for him to leave China with your help and assistance. What do you propose?" they said to me.

I almost fell off my chair at that point. I wasn't prepared. So I decided I'd better get prepared and ask for everything I can think of. So I said, "First of all, where will he be coming?"

"East station, Tientsin," which was the main railroad station where I had been meeting all kinds of Americans leaving China before.

I said, "Fine." I made a number of requests, in which I said, "When they arrive here, we will arrange all the housing for them in our homes here. I request that none of their luggage be opened, either official or personal. Any large quantities of material that are too big to carry in our cars could be put in the warehouse under lock and key, to which we will have the key. They will have the freedom of the city, and we will provide local transportation. Then you will provide the transportation from the dock in Tientsin down the river, over the sandbar," which blocked a lot of heavy ships, "to the ship, which we will send from the United States.

They said, "Fine. Do you have anything else you'd like to suggest?"

I couldn't think of anything else at that point. I said, "There will be no personal harassment of any kind. They will be free to move throughout the city at any time, in any way they want, and conduct business as normal, whatever personal business they need to do while waiting to leave."

They said, "With only one condition. Who will be the guarantor?"

At that time in Communist China, I'd had this experience many times, the Chinese insisted that as American citizens were leaving China, that there had to be someone who remained behind in China to be their "guarantor." What that meant was that if subsequent to their departure anything were found that they considered criminal or anything a misdemeanor to something serious, anything illegal on their part, that the guarantor would be held responsible, and that guarantor would still be in the hands of the Chinese Communists. By force of circumstances, I had signed many guarantees for Americans already.

Q: So he allowed you to be the guarantor?

MANHARD: I suggested that Mr. Ward was consul general of the United States Foreign Service and he was perfectly capable of being his own guarantor. They said, "Not satisfactory."

I said, "My superior officer is consul here."

"That's not satisfactory.

I said, "Why?"

"He does not speak Chinese."

I said, "Oh, you mean me."

"Yes. If you'll be the guarantor, everything's all right."

I said, "Fine."

Then we sent a message. As it turned out later, in December the State Department not only sent one ship, they sent two.

Q: You said you sent a message. How did you send a message?

MANHARD: I forget if it was classified or unclassified, in code or not. We sent it from Tientsin via the Chinese Communist Postal Service to our consulate in Peking. They then probably sent it unclassified by radio to Washington.

Q: The Chinese Postal Service included telegraph.

MANHARD: Yes. So we had the alternate of sending something by surface or by telegram.

Q: How long did it take, then, to get the message to Washington?

MANHARD: I don't know, Marshall.

Q: How soon, then, did you get word that a ship was coming?

MANHARD: I think within a week. I can't remember precisely. They were prepared to cooperate in any way.

Q: Where did the ship come from?

MANHARD: It turned out, as I understand it, they leased a passenger freighter from American President Lines, which was apparently available in Yokohama at that time, and it came from Japan over to off Tientsin.

Things did not go totally smoothly. The first night the party was there, we had one of the Chinese guards that was always stationed outside my house 24 hours a day, came in and started demanding to see their passports and other documents. I was over at the consul's house at the time. My house boy managed to sneak outside the place and make a phone call to me and tell me that they were giving trouble. I had put up about 12 of the consulate people in my house, including two wives and one child. So I raced back to my house and raised hell, got the guy out of my house. That's the only time I'd been able to go down and reprimand the Chinese Communist Public Safety Bureau, and they never bothered the group again after that.

Q: You were a vice consul. What was the consul doing, and who was he? Did he know that you were going to talk with the Chinese officials?

MANHARD: Al Wellborn was our consul at that time. He did not speak Chinese. He knew that my main function had to be helping Americans get out of Communist China. After I had the initial conversation with this guy, I told Al that I had discussed this. He was a little nervous about it, but he said, "We don't have authorization for such a pitch."

I said, "I think we had to do what we could do." I guess he accepted that.

Then when the two senior officials came from Peking, then we reported that fully. From then on, the thing moved ahead and Washington responded as we knew they would.

Q: That important initial meeting with these high officials that you had, Wellborn knew that you were going?

MANHARD: Yes.

Q: Did he also share the views of your Chinese subordinates, that this might be the farewell?

MANHARD: I didn't tell him about that. I didn't ask him about that. I figured I was going anyway.

Q: How long was the Angus Ward party in Tientsin?

MANHARD: Here the memory fades a little bit. I would say ten days, roughly.

If I may go into personal reminiscence, the heartbreak and the human tragedy and trauma at that time was illustrated by several things. One of the local employees of the consulate general in Mukden was named Tatsumi.

Q: That's a Japanese name.

MANHARD: He was a Japanese-American born on the West Coast of the United States, but he had gone to work for a Japanese commercial company in Manchuria before 1941, before Pearl Harbor. He stayed there during the war. He lost his citizenship by U.S. law, because he apparently had made no effort to try to get out or to report to an American consulate at the time. He later married a Japanese woman. They had this little baby, and they lived in Mukden. He was the motor pool officer. He was also put in prison in Mukden, along with the rest. They were all put in solitary confinement.

The Chinese Communist interrogators told him that Chigona, who was an Italian citizen, the radio operator in Mukden, also a local employee, a big strapping six-footer, Tatsumi about five-foot, very small, that while Tatsumi was in solitary confinement in their prison, Chigona, meantime, according to them, was living in the compound and had raped Tatsumi's wife. Whereupon Tatsumi completely, I think, mentally collapsed. He signed all kinds of documents, I gather, that said, "Yes, I've been a spy for the Americans and the Americans have done everything terrible, and all the accusations are correct." In fact, he broke down so totally, apparently he became almost useless to them.

When the party arrived in Tientsin and Tatsumi's wife and little baby daughter, and Chigona and his wife and other junior staff members were in my house, the first night they were there, other staff members from Mukden told me, "Be careful, because you don't understand what's happened between Chigona and Tatsumi. Tatsumi still does not recognize his wife." All the way on the train ride, all the way from Mukden to Tientsin, he still would not accept the wife that his wife was still alive.

I said, "But she's sitting right here in my living room."

Q: He'd gone off his rocker, had he?

MANHARD: Yes. Well, the net result was that by the time they left, we treated them well, of course, and he began to relax a little bit. Finally, he recognized his wife the day before they left Tientsin. This is the kind of experience some of the people had gone through, which was very, very traumatic.

In any event, one point I wanted to make, Marshall, about policy in those days. From the time the Chinese Communists entered Peking, where I was in January of 1949 until we left in April 1950, in my case, from Tientsin, I received two letters from home. One was a bill and one was an advertisement. They cut off all our personal mail. We had no diplomatic privileges of any kind. Of course, their official excuse was, "You don't recognize us and we don't recognize you, so why should you have any privileges?" That was part of the background of how we lived. So we had to depend on radio.

Q: Did you depend at all on colleagues, like your British colleagues?

MANHARD: Oh, yes.

Q: They had relations with Peking. Wouldn't they be helpful?

MANHARD: Oh, they were very helpful. In fact, in Tientsin, the British consulate and British consul was our main reliance on a lot of news and helping us.

Q: If you wanted to get a message out, couldn't you always go through the British?

MANHARD: We could, yes, but some messages we tried to go through our own channels.

Q: For example, when you had the initial meeting where you put your life and career very much at stake, did your British colleague know about that? Had you consulted him at all?

MANHARD: No, I did not. I felt this was really a U.S. concern.

Q: This whole Angus Ward thing is a very interesting episode. Were there any other episodes that occurred there?

MANHARD: Marshall, let me put one what I consider historical footnote on this business about Angus Ward. They did get home, and everything worked out all right in the end, as far as safe departure. But I also suggested to my consul, "I think that this indicates to me that there is a serious split. Aside from what we're doing about getting Angus Ward and his party out of China, it seems to me that we're getting a clear indication that there is a very serious split at the Chinese Communist Party Central Committee at the top level about policy toward the United States."

Because they repeated this twice about, "We want you to understand clearly that what happened to Angus Ward and his party in Manchuria do not reflect the policy of the central government in Peking," which seemed to me very clear. Of course, the biographic background of Gao Gang, who was the head of the Chinese Communist Party and administration in Northeast China, i.e., former Manchuria, was famous among Chinese Communist leaders as one of the leaders of the pro-Soviet clique in the Chinese Communist Party.

I said, "It seems to me that what we're hearing here is a repudiation of Gao Gang and perhaps his whole faction in the Chinese Communist Party, which I think is very important, and we ought to report it." I was turned down from sending cables, because my boss, I guess, felt that it was only my personal speculation and I really had nothing more to go on than this comment, which technically was true. So that never got reported.

Q: By the way, you keep using the word "Mukden." The Chinese call it Shenyang. Did they call it Shenyang at that time?

MANHARD: Yes, they did, but Mukden was the old traditional name.

Q: Any other episodes that occurred there that you think have some historic interest?

MANHARD: Yes, if I may revert back to something I mentioned earlier. About Christmas of 1949, we got this round robin telegram to all the posts in China, signed by then Acting Secretary Levitt, about "You're the indispensable eyes and ears. Please don't leave China. Even though you may be overdue for home leave and so forth, we only want to agree to let people come home if there's a dire personal emergency. So please stay until we can find a way to send out replacements, because we need your eyes and ears."

Approximately a week later, just after the first of January, we get another telegram to all the China posts saying, "Get out and get out immediately." So evidently, at the very end of December or the first few days of January 1950, policy had been decided that we were not going to recognize Communist China and, "We'd better get people out. We don't want any more potential hostages in China." We can only assume that from these two very opposite messages.

Q: What was the date of that second message?

MANHARD: I would guess it was the first week of January 1950. I can't remember precisely, but it was early January 1950.

Q: Did you get that yourself?

MANHARD: Yes, everyone.

Q: You stayed on for several months after that.

MANHARD: Yes, Marshall. Your question is well taken. Immediately, the next day, I took the lead, since I was dealing with all the local officials on leaving. I walked in first to the customs office. There was a very gentlemanly, probably non-Party member, as head of that office, whose specialty was dealing with foreigners leaving. So I said, "I would like to request the customs forms for our belongings and so forth we want to take with us."

He said, "Why?"

I said, "Because our entire office is leaving China as soon as possible."

He looked like he'd been hit by a thunderbolt. He was very alarmed, unhappy, and I could only interpret his reaction to mean, "Oh, my God, are we going to go to war?" He was well into his sixties, I would estimate, and he'd been through a lot. He'd been through, I'm sure, the Japanese occupation and everything else, and he'd seen war conditions. He looked dismayed, unhappy, and very sympathetic in a sense. He said, "Are you sure you're not going to say?" He didn't say, "I hope you'll stay," but he implied that.

I said, "No, we have orders. We have to leave right away." So he gave me the forms, and I left. Then I went and made my rounds, the People's Bank of China, to the famous Public Safety Bureau, asking for all the permits. Marshall, you asked what happened when we got the second message about leaving China immediately. We immediately began to make all the preparations we could to request the necessary documents to leave China. At that time they required that anyone leaving China, foreigners, at least, I presume also Chinese, had to have an exit permit. We applied for it, we submitted it, we never heard another thing. I would say we did all that within a few days from the time we received the telegram.

Q: And all the other consulates were doing the same thing?

MANHARD: We assumed so. I don't know exactly.

Q: You had no way of cross-checking with them?

MANHARD: No, we did not. I would go down frequently to each of these offices and ask them, "Is there an answer?" and they would simply brush me off and give me no answer at all.

So after maybe two or three weeks, we got another telegram from the Department, "What are you doing to get out of China? Why aren't you obeying our directives?" We tried to patiently explain that we were trying to obey it, but there were certain serious problems that we could not leave without permission of the Chinese Communist authorities, which didn't seem to be very well understood in Washington, D.C. In fact, a lot of things were not very well understood in the Department of State in those days, but that's another story.

We got two or three more reminders that we were derelict in our duties to leave China.

Q: Wasn't it the responsibility, though, of our embassy, or at least the officials that we had in

Peking? Wasn't that our principal post

MANHARD: Nanking. I've forgotten now when Nanking evacuated, but I think at that point Nanking had managed to shift all the remaining personnel to Shanghai. I'm a little vague about that, Marshall, because I wasn't in the direct loop.

Q: An issue like this, when you have to take personnel from all over China and get them out, would really have to be conducted at one point by the senior official representing the United States and the top officials of the Chinese Government.

MANHARD: That would seem logical. However, as far as I could tell, every single post -- and there were not very many, there was only Nanking, Shanghai, I believe Canton, I've forgotten exactly how they stood at this point, Peking, and Tientsin. That's all we had. We closed down everything else already. In each case, we had to deal directly with the Chinese officials in each city. As far as we could tell, we couldn't send our requests to Peking and they would present it on our behalf.

Q: You presumed that they were probably dealing with some central authority.

MANHARD: The Chinese probably were, but we had to deal with each individual locality.

Q: So how long was it? In your case, it wasn't until April that you got out.

MANHARD: My memory is that we finally left on April 20, 1950.

Q: When you say "we," did all the consulate leave together?

MANHARD: All during this time, other Americans were getting permits and leaving from Peking, for example, with which I was familiar. At the very end, the only people left in Peking were Mr. and Mrs. Edmund Club, consul general and his wife, and Mr. and Mrs. Howard Boorman, who was the vice consul, like myself, also a Chinese language graduate, and they both come down to Tientsin. When they finally closed everything in the office in Peking, they came to Tientsin. The Clubs stayed with the Wellborns, and the Boormans stayed with me. So at least we were close to the exit point, but we still didn't have permits to leave China. They allowed them to come to Tientsin, but they didn't give them or us permits at that point. We didn't know when we were ever going to get it or what was going to happen.

Finally, what was to me almost a 007 kind of affair, one night -- I'm trying to remember the date, which has faded now, I guess -- but early April 1950 -- I have to back up and give you the circumstances. I lived in a very large house with six bedrooms, designed obviously for an officer with a family. I was a bachelor, but I was occupying the house because it was owned by the consulate. Jerry Warner used to live there, by the way. Diagonally across the street was another house. This was all in the former German concession of the days of territoriality back in World War I to World War II, really. They were foreign houses, very large, private compounds, walls all around, but it was a sparsely settled area, a lot of empty lots between the houses, on the outskirts of Tientsin.

My house was constantly under guard, all of us were, and had an armed guard outside our gate 24 hours a day. In my case, I was followed. I guess they used me as the example -- bad example, perhaps. I was followed wherever I went by a car with the Chinese Communists, with non-uniformed people in it. So they knew where I was at all times, and I think they pretty much knew where everybody else was, too.

Howie Boorman and I were old friends because we'd studied Japanese together in the Navy in World War II. He and his wife and their little baby son were staying in my house waiting for the hoped-for exit permit.

One night about 9:00 o'clock that evening, a young man knocked on my front door. A Chinese knocking on my front door, dressed in civilian clothes, was almost unique. I had never had that happen, because the guard would always prevent people from coming in, unless an American or someone had business with me. He said, "Could you please come to dinner tonight at my father's house right across the street?" Well, all I knew about his father was that he was an official in the Chinese Communist export and import corporation. He dressed in the Mao jacket and cap uniform of the dark gray-blue, which was Chinese Communist civilian uniform, a government official. I didn't really know anything about him, but I had seen a lot of traffic, Chinese, going in and out of his house from time to time. I paid rather little attention and had no business dealings with him. He said, "My father would like you to come to the house for dinner."

I said, "It's 9:00. We've had supper. Thank you."

He said, "It's very important that you come anyway, whether you've had supper or not."

So we looked at each other, and I said, "You realize there's a guard out front who watches everybody coming. Do you really want us, terrible people like us (I was kind of joking with him) to come to your father's house while this guard is watching?"

He said, "If you will just delay about ten minutes before you leave your house to come across the street, he will be gone." Well, that had never happened up to that point.

We said, "All right, we'll come."

Q: Obvious collusion.

MANHARD: Ten minutes later, we walked out. For the first time in all the time I was in Tientsin, there was no guard anywhere to be seen.

We looked in there and it was a very strange scene in the dining room, a Western-style house. As a concession to the Chinese tradition, there was a large dining table with a lazy Susan in the middle, and there were approximately eight or nine people sitting around the table, none of whom we'd ever seen in our lives, with all kinds of the debris of a large Chinese meal lying on the table, people picking at a few things, but obviously they'd long finished their supper.

We had a few pleasantries, small talk, and we allowed as how we'd had supper, so he pressed some tea and something on us. All kinds of other people came in and out while we were there. In the first ten or twenty minutes, I think perhaps three people came in, apparently very urgently. They would go to his side, hand him a little piece of paper, and he would look at it and write something on it, or shake his head, or nod his head, give it back to them, and off they'd go. So all kinds of little messages were running in and out of the house at the same time we were sitting there. So we didn't know what we were into at this point, but having had some difficult experiences up to that point in China, and mindful always of the overhanging background of Angus Ward and his party and what could happen if things went wrong.

He turned to us both and said, "When are you leaving China?"

We said, "We don't know. We've been trying for months to leave, and we have no exit permit."

He said, "Oh, well, don't worry about that. You'll have one very soon."

Q: What date was this, roughly?

MANHARD: I can't remember exactly. I would say the first few days of April 1950, but I can't remember exactly.

So this came as quite a surprise, because here someone that we don't know that has any particular authority in this field telling us that we're going to get an exit permit, after we had done everything possible for months, with no result. He said, "Don't worry about that. You'll get one very soon. Where are you both going? What's your next assignment?~"

Howie had received an assignment, a direct transfer to Hong Kong, and I had been transferred to Washington. So then he devoted his attention to me. The next crack out of the box was, "You know the war in Korea is about to start."

Q: For heaven sake! This was two months before the war actually started. It was June 25th when it started. So you're talking about something that's more than two months in advance of the event.

MANHARD: That's correct.

Q: And what did he say?

MANHARD: He said, "I hope you are aware that the war in Korea is about to begin."

Going through your own mind at this point, not talking to him. He said that, and this is the instant reaction I had: one, I had seen in the Communist press for months, for quite some time when I was in Tientsin, articles from time in the press, frequently describing the valiant efforts of the People's guerrillas in South Korea resisting and fighting against the "terrible tyranny of the Syngman Rhee regime in Korea," your old stomping ground, Marshall. But I took this as largely propaganda that was probably very little to it. So I didn't pay much attention to it, plus the fact that we were too busy with the things we were trying to do in managing our own daily life and getting out of China. Korea was pretty much over the horizon as far as we were concerned. I paid very little attention to those articles, but I had seen them.

He said, "Don't you realize how important this is?"

We both had kind of frozen faces and didn't say anything. Finally, Howie Boorman and I, having been old friends, by instinct, I think, without a chance to cross-reference with each other, we both looked at him and almost simultaneously said, "We don't know anything about Korea."

Later I compared notes with Howie, after we got back to the house, and our thought processes were exactly the same: this is a setup, all we have to do is say, "Yes, tell us all about this very important matter of intelligence," whereupon the guard would come in, grab us as spies, and off we'd go. That's what I thought was going to happen next at that point. I thought it was a setup, and so did Howie. So we played as dumb as possible.

Q: Do you still think it was a setup?

MANHARD: Now I don't because of what happened afterwards.

Q: Do you think this was a government-authorized warning?

MANHARD: No, I don't. Before we walked over to the house, I said to Howie, "Who is this guy? Did you know anything about this guy in Peking, for example?"

He said, "Yes, he did talk to Tony Freeman up there," our mutual friend. Tony Freeman, in the meantime, had returned to the United States before the Chinese Communists came into power in Peking. He said he did talk to Tony Freeman before in Peking, but nothing of any great significance.

I said, "I don't know anything about him." Howie had no direct knowledge or sense of him either.

Our host said, "You should pay attention to this. It's very important." He turned to me, having found out I was going to be transferred to Washington, and said, "When you get to Washington, will you please tell what I'm going to tell you to Tony Freeman?"

I said, "All right, I'll do so."

He said, "You go off into East Station, the railway station?"

I said, "Yes."

"You must have seen two weeks ago (or something very recently) the first movement of Chinese troops." Balujun, the 8th Route Army, is the term. "Going north for the first time through East Station."

I said, "No, I didn't see any such thing."

He kind of looked at me suspiciously, as if I must have seen it but I was not willing to admit it. I hadn't actually seen it. He gave a date, two or three weeks earlier, that one entire division of the Chinese Communist Army had moved north through Tientsin on the way to Manchuria, northeast China. He said, "There will be very soon, we don't know exactly when, an all-out offensive against South Korea. There will be more Chinese forces coming through Tientsin en route to Manchuria." That was the main rail line in that direction. "We don't know whether they will participate in the initial offensive against South Korea with the North Korean troops, whether the North Korean troops alone will end conduct the initial offensive with the Chinese troops in backup positions within North Korea, or whether the Chinese troops in that case would be held on the Chinese side in a back position in the case of need. Please tell my friend Mr. Freeman."

Q: We want to come back to how you got out of Tientsin and so forth, but follow up on this particular story. When you got back and you saw Freeman, what happened?

MANHARD: A slow boat from Tientsin to Yokohama broke down, started going backwards to China, finally got to Yokohama, took a boat, along with everybody else, evacuated from China across from Yokohama to the West Coast, saw my family very briefly in Los Angeles, on to Washington, and got there on the third of June 1950, finally, at the air-conditionless National Hotel. If I've got my dates straight -- I'm pretty sure I have -- Monday morning, the fourth of June, boiling hot, opening of business on Monday morning, I went straight to see Tony Freeman. I had a little hard time getting him to listen, because he wanted to tell me about my next assignment. I said, "I think this is more urgent." We were good friends, but he finally got off the personnel business, and I told him the story. He said, "Phil, what do you think of this man?"

I said, "Tony, I don't know the man from Adam. I thought you did."

He said, "I know him slightly, but I don't really know what kind of credibility to give him or this account that he's given you."

I said, "Well, I don't know." At that time I was just starting out in the Foreign Service and had no influential friends of any kind in Washington, I didn't know anybody here. I considered him to be the most senior Foreign Service officer I had ever met in my life, and a very fine person. I said, "Tony, you must have ways that you can check this out."

He said, "Okay, I'll check it out. If I hear anything about it, I'll let you know."

So off I went to the basic officers' training course to learn how to become a Foreign Service officer at this point in the FSI, which I found a little bit boring and artificial. In any event, I didn't hear anything from Tony. Finally, about a week later, I went back and said, "Tony, what have you heard about this?"

He said, "I checked it out with the Korean desk, and they said there was nothing to that because there's no indication of anything happening in North Korea, and our main problem now is to prevent Syngman Rhee from marching north. That's our main problem in Korea."

What could I say? What could I do? I felt that maybe you get prejudiced about your source, even though you don't know them very well, but I felt that maybe something might happen, but I had nothing more to go on. All the people in Washington, the few that I met who seemed to know, INR, said, "Oh, no, there's nothing to this."

Q: As you look back on this event, do you think that what your Chinese friend was telling you in Tientsin had anything to do with what you earlier said with regard to the relationship between the Chinese and the Russians in Manchuria, that the Chinese might have had some indications of a rapprochement or close ties between North Korea and the Soviet Union, which they obviously did? That the build-up that was going on in North Korea, which obviously was occurring, largely through the Soviet Union, that this might have been a Chinese effort to forewarn us because of an antipathy on the part of this particular official and his group towards the Soviet Union? Is that too far-fetched?

MANHARD: Marshall, I don't think it's too far-fetched at all, but it didn't occur to me at the time, and there's no way that I can judge it from my own experience. I think it's not a bad speculation. This is really another story that we could talk about on some other occasion if you want to. Two things happened when I was in Korea later, because my next assignment was in Pusan, Korea. The reason I dragged Korea into this, when I got to Korea, I was assigned by the personnel division in the State Department to be junior political officer in the embassy. At the same time, INR gave orders to me to go interrogate Chinese prisoners of war in our camps in South Korea, which got me in a lot of trouble, which seemed to be often the case in my career. I mean in trouble with the embassy.

In my experience with the Chinese military prisoners captured by us in the Korean War, this experience was on and off over a period of early 1951 to early 1953, and many of the Chinese -- this is low level, mostly illiterate, uneducated, peasant people, for the most part, who were captured during the war in Korea -- many of them had been in Chinese Nationalist units captured by the Communists, converted and integrated into the Chinese Communist Army after they occupied the mainland. Many of them had been stationed with units in the lower Yangtze River area, Jiangsu province and nearby. They had been told -- this is just shortly after the Korean War started -- that their training mission, including practicing landing craft going across the Yangtze River and so forth, was to go liberate Taiwan, and that was what they thought they were getting trained for.

But suddenly, without any preparation or warning, they were told, "Get on a train. Your unit is going to the Northeast." When they got to the Northeast, they crossed the Yellow River, and they realized that they were going to fight in Korea. It came as a great surprise to these young men, they said. So this doesn't respond directly to the hypothesis, or whatever you're expressing here, but it seems to me that from reactions I got from some of the Chinese prisoners in the Korean War, that the Chinese Communist priority at the time was occupying Taiwan and eliminating, presumably forever, any competition from the Chinese Nationalist Government anywhere. They had no more territory to claim. That was their priority; Korea was not. When some decision at some level was made to go and pull the fat out of the fire in Korea, it was, in my opinion, more logically a Soviet priority than a Chinese priority.

There's slippages of time here. For instance, the initial thing indicated by our informant in Tientsin is one thing.

Q: Yes, I think that's a logical conclusion that the Chinese priority in Taiwan, once the Russians and the North Koreans were involved in a war against us. Meanwhile, we were changing our policy with regard to Taiwan, and this is where I can't remember exactly what the timing was. President Truman, as I recall, made some declaration with regard to what our position was going to be with regard to Taiwan and our priorities. So there's a correlation of our actions and the Chinese and the Russian actions that escape me at this time.

It would be interesting to go back and look at Alan Whiting's book on China crosses the Yalu or for you to talk to him sometime. I don't suppose he knows what you just said now. This is the first time I've ever heard it.

MANHARD: I don't think so. I remember Alan Whiting's book. He mentions me in the book, I think, if you're referring to China crosses the Yalu. But part of the material he used in that was based on some of the things I discussed with him, as well as others discussed with him, about the Chinese prisoner experience. Some of the distillation of Chinese prisoner reports in the Korean War was part of his book.

Q: I can imagine that it would be rather upsetting to the Chinese to see the Russians having a dominant influence.

MANHARD: Yes, absolutely.

Q: On the whole Korean peninsula.

MANHARD: Frankly, Marshall, one of the things that dismayed me -- it's always easy to look back and say, "I was right," and that's kind of sterile, I guess -- but when I got back to Washington and had my conversation with Tony Freeman and went off to my little FSI basic officers' training course, I had talked to a number of people I knew, junior officers around Washington. I got the impression from INR and others who had made a specialty of studying, analyzing, and researching China, that at that time this was an absolute fantasy, ridiculous, absolutely impossible to conceive of that there was any difference of view between China and the Soviet Union, because the conventional wisdom at that time all over Washington, as far as I could make of it, military, civilian, State Department, CIA, whatever, was, "It's a monolithic Communist bloc," and anybody who had a different opinion was way out in left field. I had a different opinion and found nobody who agreed with me.

MANHARD: Oh, yes, absolutely.

Q: He, Jack Service, John Davies, and all the others who had been our prime China scholars had come under fire. This was just the beginnings of the McCarthy period. We had prepared the White Paper on China. Our bureau back in Washington, by the way, I was regional planning advisor while these events were going on.

MANHARD: That's where I first met you, I think.

Q: We were embattled simply to preserve the Foreign Service, really, against all these attacks.

MANHARD: Absolutely. Tony Freeman, as I remember, shortly after I had that conversation with him, it wasn't long thereafter when he was entangled by the McCarthy attacks, having been associated with China, that he had to have two-thirds of his stomach removed for a bleeding ulcer, it was such emotional stress, what he was accused of.

I would like to make one footnote here, Marshall, that in my conversation with Tony, I certainly don't want to leave any implication in anybody's mind that he was not interested in this report from any prejudice or anything. He was interested. He just didn't know how to assess it, and he tried to find out from others in terms of what's going on in Korea, and that's the answer he got. In my opinion, I think it's a very honest reaction on his part to try to check it out.

There's one additional footnote I would make. I mentioned that when I got to Korea, there were two things that happened while I was in Korea. One of them I described in terms of some of the reactions of Chinese prisoners in our hands in Korea, in terms of preparing for Taiwan and being sent to Korea to fight.

The other thing, I can't give a date, unfortunately. I was in Korea from April 1951 until late '53, and this would have occurred in 1952 at some point, I think. I just happened to note in an FBIS [Foreign Broadcast Information Service] article, it monitors Communist block radio transmissions around the world and on China, I was reading it in the embassy in Pusan one day, and I noticed the announcement by the Chinese in Peking on their radio that Gao Gang had been executed for treason or disloyalty to the Party in Mukden.

Q: For goodness sakes.

MANHARD: He had been liquidated. I thought to myself, "Well, I tried to analyze that, and I think I was right, but what's the use now?" Still, he was liquidated.

Q: That supports the case.

MANHARD: In less than two years after I had that conversation.

Q: That supports the argument that this had a lot to do with the Sino-Soviet differences.

***

Q: A professor of diplomatic history, Norman Graebner, who is a consultant to our organization, said to try to ask how perceptions developed. This is of great interest to diplomatic scholars.

Where did you see the monolith of Sino-Soviet developing? Looking back on it, it's hard to believe these two very dissimilar, basically enemies, they might be Communist, but the thought that they were working in absolute lockstep.

Q2: For my part, it began out of World War II and the fact that the Chinese Communists holed up in Yen-an were trying to carry the war against the Japanese, and the Japanese occupation, particularly of northeast China, was a very vicious one, and a main objective of the Chinese Communist government, when it came to power, was to consolidate its position throughout the country. The Russians, who had succeeded in overrunning Manchuria and helping to bring the war to a rapid close, did get out. But in getting out, they took with them a lot of the equipment. It left a legacy of some bitterness. I think this is interesting that there should have been a governor up there in Manchuria who was pro-Soviet. Quite clearly, his views and probably his position was very much one that was bolstered and supported by the Russians, and that the Chinese were increasingly dismayed by his actions.

Ambassador Manhard's account, I think, brings out very clearly that this, in fact, was the case, because this man was countermanded, really, by the officials that he talked to in Tientsin and later on, as he learned from FBIS broadcasts in 1952, he was executed. I think all this shows that there were early origins to the Sino-Soviet controversy and dispute.

The conventional wisdom is that they were pretty much in lockstep, certainly in their foreign policies, and that the first evidences of the split between Moscow and Peking occurred in 1957 after the Sputnik was put up, and when the Chinese sent two delegations to Moscow to try to benefit and participate in this breakthrough, getting certain kinds of technical support from the Russians. But the Russians, in turn, gave them the cold shoulder.

At that point, I was regional planning advisor for the Far East. I was in very close touch with scholars, particularly Alice Dunning Hsia, working for RAND in Santa Monica. They had a team out there that was following these events very closely. I do recall very clearly that we timed the real break between Russia and China as occurring in 1957. What Ambassador Manhard is saying is that there are earlier origins to this thing. They may be ones of rather major consequence to scholars, I don't know. But if what he says correlates with other evidences, I think it's a very interesting line of inquiry.

Q: Having us look at this as a government, it seemed to be not only conventional wisdom, but pretty much accepted wisdom that these two powers were going to be working together for the foreseeable future. We're talking about in 1950.

MANHARD: Oh, yes. One thing that occurred to me was that when you read the Chinese Communist press in those days, from before and after they established their government at Peking, in those years the Chinese poured out a tremendous quantity of propaganda characterized by such expressions as "lean to one side," and "learn from the example of the Soviet Union. They are our mentor, our leader of the Communist world," and the Chinese just laid it on with a trowel, very thick. So just reading their propaganda line, one would naturally assume, "They're just the younger brothers of the Soviet Union and they're just going to be like this indefinitely in the future."

But that's just a propaganda line that they were using for the time being, and underneath it, the human relations, the personal feelings and attitudes of their own officials was quite different. I saw that.

Q: I think another thing that's very important to note here is that we're talking about China in 1950, when things were in a chaotic state, where the central government obviously hadn't composed an established line, where the personalities dominated the old warlords, you might say who was lingering on in China. It wasn't until well after the time you left that they established the line and everybody got the line and this is what it was. So what we're talking about is a period when there perhaps more open expression of how individual leaders might have felt, than was to occur later on when the fine line was clearly established and everybody had to tow it.

MANHARD: Yes, tighter controls all the way down the line.

Q: Looking at it from the other side, we had mentioned McCarthyism. Was there a line in Washington that felt communism is bad, communism is not split, it's a monolith, and we have to fight the monolith, and if you started talking about different types of communism, this would tend to weaken it as an enemy and maybe make you look soft on communism? Do you think this was behind any of this?

Q2: Certainly this is the line that was being parlayed by Chiang Kai-shek. Even when I saw Chiang Kai-shek for the next to the last time in 1969 -- 1969! -- long after we all knew that the Sino-Soviet rift was real and vicious and all the rest of it, he told me that he believed that this was a ruse that was being pulled off by both Peking and Moscow, that they were trying to delude the West into thinking there was a split, so that it would cause splits in our ranks and weaken our ranks, whereas they were solid, and we were being galled and lured.

I'm saying that, because obviously it's wrong, but it shows that that was the line of the Chinese Nationalists that this was all a monolith. The Chinese Nationalists had a tremendous power in Washington, the so-called China lobby. Of course, it weakened over time, but at the time we're talking about, back in 1950-52, they were very strong. So the line was coming through very hard from Taipei that this was the situation.

Q: Would you say there might have been an inhibition on our thinking differently within the State Department?

Q2: There were differences at that time, as you know, between the hard line pro-Chiang group and the China scholars and Foreign Service officers who served out there, who knew the situation much more and who remembered the role of Chiang Kai-shek during World War II, and all of his shortcomings, the state of life in China, and the misery that the people were undergoing, that they obviously were not on the same wavelength as these hard-liners. I would imagine that a man like Acheson, working for Truman, had misgivings about the hard line we were taking.

What I can't remember historically is exactly what the line was that we were about to take in the time when the Korean War broke out. I think we were beginning to consider quite seriously at that time whether we shouldn't move our policy towards recognizing the realities of mainland China, that the Chinese had taken over, and that they did represent one-quarter of humanity, and that we had to have some kind of relationship with them. I think Acheson was thinking that way. I'm sure that this was a line of thought that was widely shared. I'm sure that men like Walter Butterworth, who was the Assistant Secretary for State for East Asian Affairs at that time, thought that way. I was very close to him. I was working on Japanese affairs; that's why I'm not completely clear as to what all the details were.

But had the war in Korea not intervened, it is possible that our China policy could have moved in a different direction.

MANHARD: Marshall, I think that's true. I mentioned these two telegrams at the end of '49 and beginning of '50, a total contrast, you know: "Stay, stay stay." "Get out." Obviously something happened in those two weeks between those two telegrams in Washington. But I've never done research afterwards as to just exactly what happened in Washington at that time.

However, going back to this incident about Angus Ward, a cat's paw in this whole business, I think, the conclusion I personally draw from that experience was that the last thing the Russians wanted to see was, one, they were afraid of a flexible policy by the United States toward the new regime in Peking as a potential attempt by us to wean the Chinese Communist regime away from or be coursed away, whatever you want to call it, to Soviet influence. The Soviets at that time, under Stalin, I'm sure wanted to absolutely, totally dominate China, absolutely at that point. Anything that would potentially be a threat to that total untrammelled domination by the Soviet Union, they tried their best to undermine. To me, that was one of their little tactics, if it wasn't a grand strategy. Mukden alone was a tactic, but it worked rather well in the sense that it irritated the hell.

I've seen press reports many years later saved by the widow of one of the survivors of this Mukden incident, in her hometown in Kansas. Some friends sent them a lot of clippings from the U.S. press at that time, all during the incarceration of Ward and his party, the after-effects and so forth, in which they played it up tremendously in American press about, "This is what you can expect from the Communists, these awful people," and so forth and so on. I mean, it was natural indignation on the part of the media.

Q: A duplication of the Iranian hostage crisis.

MANHARD: There are similarities, yes. I think it's the only duplication in my experience that matches that closely. The media just leaped on this thing. This played into the hands of people with a very conservative view of foreign policy in the Congress and in Washington, that even if certain people in the State Department, for instance, Acheson or Butterworth, whoever the people were you were mentioning, even if they'd been inclined to adopt what I'd call a more pragmatic approach to the new Peking regime, this kind of incident provided a lot of fodder for the grist mills of agitation about, "This is how they're treating official Americans in this regime." If the Russians had expected to have some irritating effect both in Peking and in the United States, it worked very beautifully.

Q: That's a very valid point.

MANHARD: Whether they were that smart, I don't know, but I do believe that that was part of the Soviet effort.

Q: I think you're right. I think the Soviets were doing all they could to harden the deep freeze in U.S.-Chinese relationships and to keep Peking and Washington apart.

MANHARD: Looking back historically -- and I wish I could give you reference here; I don't have it in mind now -- there have been accounts, I believe, in the literature in the United States and elsewhere, to the effect that Mao had serious misgivings after his first trip to Moscow just after he established the central government in Peking. That first visit to Moscow, he came back less than satisfied, to put it mildly. The Soviets, therefore, were probably already concerned about where Mao was going to go, policy-wise, in China.

Q: This is very interesting, of course, getting into a highly speculative field.

In winding this up, I want to make a couple of observations about all the things that you've been saying. They bear very importantly on the real shaping of events as they occurred, as seen by somebody who was in the midst of them all, in terms of relationships between the Chinese officials and the Americans in China at a very critical moment, and also casts a good deal of light on what might have been the true relationship between the Soviet Union and China at that particular period of time.

I wanted to close this conversation by making two observations, more or less for the record. One, I think your story is not only interesting from the point of view of a historian who is trying to analyze events, but I think it's also interesting from the point of view of a Foreign Service officer who is placed in a very difficult position, where he had to make decisions on his own and to bear the consequences. You undertook not only to make decisions for your government that might have been denied by your superiors, but you also really put your life on the line when you went to talk with those officials, and when your Chinese subordinates thought that that was the last time they were ever going to see you.

I do think it shows the kinds of challenges that can occur in the life of a Foreign Service officer, and it reminds me a little bit of those lines of Oliver Wendell Holmes, "Once to every man and nation comes a moment to decide." You had to face some very difficult decisions.

It's not totally unconnected that many years later on, when you were presidential advisor in Hue and were taken prisoner by the Vietnamese, taken to Hanoi, where you were in isolation for five years, one of the longest POW records on record, that you maintained your sanity through your own inner intellectual resources, as I remember, by making a chess set out of bread crumbs that you were given. I think the record of your career shows a man with lots of guts, and I'm awfully glad that we had this conversation, because it not only attests to what, in fact, went on as seen by a participant, but also attests to the character of a man who participated in those events.

MANHARD: Marshall, I thank you for your generous comments. I can only say that part of the rich rewards of a Foreign Service career, at least in the time I spent in the Foreign Service, was the opportunity to benefit by, and grow with, the inspiration and counsel of my colleagues, for instance, Ambassador Marshall Green.

Q: Thank you.

Information Officer/Deputy Public Affairs Officer/Public Affairs Officer, USIS
Hong Kong (1950-1956)

Public Affairs Officer

Richard M. McCarthy grew up in Iowa and received a bachelor's degree from Iowa State University. He enlisted in the U.S. Marine Corps and U.S. Navy during World War II. Mr. McCarthy joined the Foreign Service in 1946 and later became part of USIS. He served in China, Hong Kong, Thailand, Vietnam, and Washington, DC. This interview was conducted by Jack O'Brien in 1988.

MCCARTHY: I come from Iowa, a graduate of the state University of Iowa, was in the Marine Corps and the U.S. Navy during World War II. I took the Foreign Service exams in December 1946. To my surprise and the surprise of other people, I was accepted. I came to Washington and was assigned to Beijing, or Peking -- or, in those days, Peiping -- China, arrived in November 1947.

Q: What was your job there, Dick?

MCCARTHY: I was a vice consul stamping visas. Then I became administrative officer with the consulate general. Then, it must have been in 1948, Brad Connors came up from Shanghai, Director of the USIS China, took me for a swim in the consulate pool, and in the middle of the pool -- must have been the deep end -- asked me whether I'd like to work for USIS. Since I was tired of stamping visas and doing inventories of consular furniture, and also happened to be a major in American literature at Iowa, I hastily accepted. I became the number-two man in a two-man post, working for Dyke Van Putten.

I remained in Peiping until we were all more or less kicked out in the spring of 1950. There are several highlights I can mention. One was the presidential election in 1948. Dewey versus Truman. The Nationalists, who still held on very tenuously to Peiping, saw the handwriting on the wall if the Democrats continued in office. So to a man, there were all pulling very vigorously for Tom Dewey. USIS had a big election chart on the outer wall of our premises in Peiping -- I wish I could remember the address, but I can't -- to chart the returns as they came in over the Voice of America. The crowd was so big that it eventually blocked traffic on the street outside. Most of the crowd was composed of university students, Nationalist military officers, and government officials, who all had a personal stake in the selection. They cheered at the early returns which show-ed Dewey in the lead, and they were very much crestfallen when Harry Truman eventually turned out to be the winner.

The final year in Peiping under the Nationalist regime was a fairly hairy one, partly because Nationalist troops, several hundred-thousand strong, poured into Peiping after they were defeated up north. They were under no discipline, they hadn't been paid, they were ragged, and most of them became marauders.

The military situation in north China developed very rapidly. Eventually Peiping was surrounded to the Mao Zedong forces. The only means of communication into the city was by an air strip built on the old polo field inside the city walls. There was some sporadic shelling of the city, and I recall one day being home at lunch and receiving a call from the librarian, saying that the USIS library had just been struck by an artillery shell. I went back there. Little damage to the building. The only people left at that point were the staff members; everybody else had taken off very hastily. Unfortunately, a student from the next compound was killed.

So we weren't quite sure what was going to happen, but six of the consular officers, including myself, were asked to stay after the Liberation. I can recall going down to one of the main avenues and watching the Communist forces move in. I guess at that point at least 80% of the population was delighted to see them come on, because they figured that nothing could be worse than what they'd gone through in the last couple of years.

After the Liberation USIS did continue in business for a while and there was a very brief honeymoon period of several months, when we maintained our normal operations. We had people in the library. As I recall, we also distributed the Wireless File. We discovered that our employees, most of whom, I think, were glad to see any kind of change in the local circumstances, proved to be immensely loyal to us. One person I'd like to mention is Chang Tung, who moonlighted as one of Peiping's leading political cartoonists, working, as I recall, for the Catholic newspaper there. Chang Tung had been imprisoned by the Nationalists because of one of his political cartoons. Within a couple of months after the Communists arrived, he was interned, jailed by the Communists for several weeks, finally got out, but was subjected to some pressures which he did mention to us. However, he did remain entirely loyal to us, and I'm happy to say that when we withdrew from China, he made his way down to Hong Kong and served in Hong Kong for USIS for a great many years, until his retirement.

Q: Wonderful! Have you covered the main points you'd like to there, Dick?

MCCARTHY: Eventually, subtle pressures and some not-so-subtle pressures began to be exerted upon students. I worked a great deal with students. In fact, I taught an English class at one of the local universities. They were afraid to come around and see us, because the military posted guards at the door, and people had to show their residence permits when they entered, which discouraged a great many of them from coming to see us. We ended up pretty much isolated.

The Communists came in at the end of January 1949. In the summer of 1949, I was sent down to Tientsin to take charge of USIS, because Sam Yates had departed for the States. Within two weeks after I got there, a 15-year-old soldier on a bicycle came around and handed me a proclamation which closed us down. At that point, I found it difficult to get back to Peiping, although my wife was expecting a baby, incidentally, who was the first American child born in the new capital of Communist China after it became the capital -- Debbie McCarthy, born November 14, 1949.

But I had difficulty getting back there because I was taken into the People's Court, and our employees were asking for two years' severance pay, which seemed a bit steep since some of them only worked for us for six months or so. Even these employees were more loyal to American interests than I would have expected, because they would come around in advance and tell me what the authorities were making them do, and then I'd go to court and know pretty much what to expect. But I was also frequently interrogated by people coming around to my house, either early in the morning, around 6:00, which is early for me, or 10:30 or 11:00 at night, asking me where I'd been, whom I'd talked to, and that sort of thing. So there was increasing pressure on us.

However, we stuck it out back in Peiping, which was, I think, a marvelous chance to see a new Communist government established first-hand, until early in 1950, when they seized most of our consular property in Peiping on the grounds that it was former foreign military property. We told them we'd leave if they closed us down. They closed us down, and so we departed. I think I departed in April of 1950.

Q: Did you go directly back to the States then?

MCCARTHY: No, I caught a small Butterfield and Swire coastal steamer over to Inchon, Korea, got off, took the train down to Seoul, partly because I wanted to visit John Muccio, who was then ambassador to Korea, and who had been on my board of oral examiners when I came into the Foreign Service. I did travel around Korea for several weeks to get a look at the country, came back on home leave to Webster City, Iowa, in June of 1950. Got up one morning, read the headline in the Des Moines Register that the North had invaded South Korea. I predicted to my dad that since I'd seen some South Korean troops on field maneuvers, they were the best troops in Asia, and I didn't think the Korean War would last six weeks, the invaders would be repelled. Dad was unkind enough to remind me of that when I came back on home leave again in 1953. (Laughs)

***

I went back to Washington, was assigned to Hong Kong as information officer, and spent six of the best years in my life in Hong Kong, where I was successively information officer, deputy PAO, and then when Art Hummel left, became PAO. Those were the days of the CRP, the China Reporting Program, one of my principal efforts, where we were producing material in English and other languages for worldwide consumption about what was happening on the China mainland. We also started a very successful Chinese language publication for Taiwan and Chinese and Southeast Asia called World Today magazine, which lasted for over 25 years before somebody put it to sleep.

Q: I remember that very well. So six years in all, in Hong Kong. Can you remember a few highlights of that part of your career?

MCCARTHY: I think I mentioned the China Reporting Program, which was our major excuse for being in Hong Kong. We did run, of course, a fairly extensive local program, a very extensive book translation program. I think at one point we did around 60 titles in a single year. We did achieve some publishing success in English. We discovered Eileen Chang, who many people regard as probably one of the two or three top Chinese writers of the second half of the 20th century. She wrote a couple of books for us called Rice Sprout Song, and I frankly forget the title of the other one, but they were both published in the United States and had some critical acclaim.

We also did a fair amount of work supporting film makers who were producing anti-Communist pictures in Hong Kong, and Chinese language pictures in Southeast Asia. So we were very much involved in the Chinese motion picture industry.

Q: Was Raymond Chow one of your employees?

MCCARTHY: I'm glad you mentioned Raymond. Raymond, who is now one of the principal movie tycoons of Asia, runs an outfit called Golden Harvest, is the man who is largely responsible for the craze in Kung Fu movies. He was the one who discovered Bruce Lee. Raymond was our VOA reporter until the bright lights and a lot of money beckoned. Very, very capable guy.

Other local employees worth noting, I think, are Richard Lee, who ran our book translation program, and Tommy Dunn, our principal Chinese employee who had both attractive attributes and some that weren't quite so attractive. Tommy is still alive and kicking and writing a twice-weekly column for Taiwan's English-language newspaper, published in the United States.

Again, I'd like to say a word about the loyalty of our Chinese employees. Richard Lee, whom I thought a lot of and a lot of other people thought very highly of, came to me and told me that he was under pressure to report on our activities to the Chinese Communists in Hong Kong. They put considerable pressure on him because his wife and family were back in China. He told us and was told what to tell them; he was taking a considerable chance. His family eventually got out of China, but even after so many years, I have to honor Richard Lee for his loyalty. Another employee was approached. He finally came and told us after we'd found out from other sources already.

A footnote on Richard. Much later, during some of its periodic economy drives, the agency was going to drop off some of our old-time employees in Hong Kong, including Richard Lee. Ed Martin happened to be the consul general there. Ed had served as consul in Hankow during the Chinese civil war. It was necessary to evacuate Hankow. Richard got them down the river at considerable personal risk. Their ship was shelled. He talked them past gunboats from both sides.

When Ed learned, as consul general, that Richard was going to be one of the people terminated, he announced firmly that Richard Lee would have a job in Hong Kong as long as he was consul general, or, in fact, in the Foreign Service. This happened. Richard Lee eventually retired in due course, with full honor and served out his career.

Q: Dick, what was your post after Bangkok?

MCCARTHY: I was PAO in Taiwan. Actually, I still regret the fact that my tour in Bangkok was so short. It was only one and a half years, but I happened to be in Taipei on leave in August of 1958, when the Quemoy Straits crisis broke out. There was no PAO in place because Ambassador Drumright had just removed a good friend of mine, Ralph Powell. So Drumright, with correspondents coming in from Hong Kong and Taipei to cover the story, asked me to stay for 30 days as the mission's spokesman. I did. The crisis continued. He asked me to stay another 30 days, and I finally ended up staying there for four years as PAO.

Q: My memory of the Quemoy Strait business is fuzzy, but was that a troublesome problem for you for most of that period, or how long?

MCCARTHY: Of course, the thing started when the Chinese Communists began shelling Nationalist supply vessels going into resupply the Quemoy garrison. We decided that the offshore islands were essential to American interests, so we announced that we were going to escort these Nationalist supply ships into this very narrow body of water. You can see the mainland from the island of Quemoy. There was considerable trepidation. In fact, some day it will be worth writing about. I was down in the atomic bomb-proofed command center with Drumright, the senior Chinese military commanders, Vice Admiral Smoot, who was running an American carrier task force, which was ready to go. I think it was a Sunday, the day that we sent several destroyers in with the Nationalist supply vessels. I'll never forget watching all the lights in this control center, which was a very futuristic thing with a great big table, airplanes and ships and a relief map of the islands, Amoy and the surround mainland. Because all up and down the China coast, the Chinese Air Force sent up fighters. We had three carriers on the other side of the island of Taiwan, on the east side, away from the mainland. We launched fighters, and they patrolled back and forth for several hours before the Chinese fighters landed to refuel, and they did not come up again. And the Communist forces did not fire on the American vessels.

This was a fairly prolonged crisis. We did have a great number of American and other foreign newspapermen, mostly from Hong Kong and Tokyo, to cover the story. The job of mission spokesman was a little bit tough, because we were doing a number of things that we didn't want the press to know about on Quemoy. So we couldn't permit them on the island. For several weeks, Quemoy was off limits to them. We couldn't explain why. One reason was that we were installing batteries of 120-millimeter guns with atomic shell capability. Some old friends in the press I'd known for a dozen years at that point were threatening to get my job.

Q: All during this time, you had a fairly normal USIS program going on?

MCCARTHY: No, it wasn't normal, because a year or two years before, the USIS building had been destroyed in a demonstration. When I arrived, USIS was housed in a private residence, a rather dilapidated private residence. Not even the screens worked very effectively, and we didn't have air-conditioning. It was something of a slap in the face to us, because the house had previously been occupied by General Sun Li-Jen, who was in deep disfavor with the Chinese National government. In fact, I think at that point he was under house arrest someplace outside of Taipei.

So the staff was a bit demoralized. Several people had been hurt in the riot. I'm sitting here desperately trying to remember the cause of the riot. (Laughs) We had obviously done something that the Chinese Nationalists did not like, because students invaded the place and damaged it so severely that we were moved into this private house by the Taiwan government until they could prepare proper quarters for us, which happened about six months after I arrived.

I think then we ran a normal USIS program, branch posts in Taichung, Kaohsiung, Tainan, information centers in several other places. Pingtung is the only other one I remember.

But I think the most notable thing about the time I was there, which was from August of 1958 to July of 1962, was the work that we did with young writers and artists. We sponsored and, indeed, worked upon a large number of English-language translations of the work of younger Chinese writers. We published the work of books of art by the more advanced avant garde Chinese painters and Taiwanese painters in Taiwan. One reason for doing this was competition with the outpouring of works in English translation, art work from the Foreign Languages Press in Peiping. This stuff was designed for distribution to the rest of the world, some of it through commercial channels, some of it through USIS posts elsewhere.

Another reason was that we were particularly anxious to get to know the younger generation in Taiwan, which was composed partly of mainlanders and partly of Taiwanese. We learned fairly rapidly that at least among the people we were dealing with, the real battle wasn't between Taiwanese and the mainland Chinese; the main battle was between the generation that held power, somewhat disparagingly called "the long gowns" by these younger people. The student generation, both mainland Chinese and Taiwanese, was pretty much united by the fact that they felt held back and restrained by the older generation. They were a force for change, a force for progress. We did identify some very capable people. A great many of them went to the United States to study writing. In fact, I would argue that the interest of the University of Iowa, of which I happen to be a graduate, in Taiwan writers was one of the main reasons for starting the very successful international writing program, which celebrated its 20th anniversary back in 1987.

In fact, the original director of the international writing program, Paul Engle, who, of course, for many years led the Iowa Writers' Workshop, actually met his future wife at USIS in Taiwan, a very successful Chinese woman writer, Nieh Hua-ling. Nieh Hua-ling was older than the students, but she was regarded by the students as a leader because she was the editor of the literary page of Free China, which was a Third Force liberal publication in Taiwan, which had to suspend publication when its editor went to jail for his too-liberal sentiments. Nieh Hua-ling was our principal editor for this book translation program. She married Paul, and for the last 15 years, she has been the director of the International Writers' program at Iowa.

Q: After Taiwan, where were you assigned?

MCCARTHY: I was assigned to the agency, and found myself as Chief of the East Asia and Pacific Division of the Voice of America.

PHILIP H. VALDES
Economic Officer
Chungking (1947-1949)

Philip H. Valdes was born in New York in 1921. He received both a bachelor's degree in 1942 and a master's degree in 1947, both from Yale University. He was a 2nd lieutenant overseas in the U.S. Army from 1943- 1946. Mr. Valdes entered the Foreign Service in 1947, serving in Chungking, Seoul, Moscow, Frankfurt, Paris, Bangkok, Berlin, and Munich. He was interviewed by William Knight on July 11, 1994.

Q: That's about when I retired. Well, to me there are all sorts of interesting areas there. Let me start out with Chungking. What was your assignment there?

VALDES: It was a post which had between two and five people assigned to it, when I was there. While Chungking had been the capital of [the Republic of] China during World War II, the capital had subsequently moved to Nanking. Chungking had become a small Consulate, pretty much out of the way. I did economic reporting. Sichuan [Province, where it was located] was well-known for its production of tung oil, silk, and oranges, among other things.

Q: All strategic materials.

VALDES: And hog bristles, as well, which were actually flown out, part of the time that I was there. They were pretty valuable things. I was there, I think I said, a year and a half. Then I was transferred to Nanking [in April, 1949], some three weeks after Nanking fell to the Communists.

Q: So you were one of the people who "lost" China, then?

VALDES: Well, I "lost" it, but it didn't really get lost until after I'd left. So I think that I can weasel out of that.

I was transferred to Nanking, along with a friend from the Foreign Service Institute course, who had been assigned to [the Embassy in] Seoul. A series of telegrams was sent from Seoul, Nanking, and Canton, where a branch of the Embassy in Chungking had been set up, asking how we get Rozier and Valdes to Nanking. It didn't seem very feasible. The branch of the Embassy in Canton pointed out that it, too, was the Embassy and would welcome both of us. The remnant of the Embassy in Nanking said that they'd like to have us, but they didn't know how we could get there. The Department of State, in its wisdom, simply "swapped" us. So I went to [the Embassy in] Seoul, and Rozier went to Chungking, where he lasted about five months before he had to leave when that city also fell to the Communists.

This was obviously an interesting period in China, even though we were off in the periphery of anything that was happening there. We did see a lot of the problems that the Chinese were going through, including the inflation. The Chinese currency went from around 100,000 or so Chinese Nationalist dollars [to US$1.00] to 12 million, I believe, during the first year I was there. Then the authorities divided all prices by three million to arrive at the "Gold Yuan," so named, although it had no gold backing for it. The Gold Yuan then went up from four to US$1.00 to 15 million to US$1.00. We used to figure out our salaries in terms of Gold Yuan. It was very exciting.

Q: Did you speak Chinese?

VALDES: I tried to learn it.

Q: But you didn't have any formal training in it.

VALDES: I had three weeks of training -- an hour a day in the morning. I was being taught Mandarin, which was somewhat helpful in Chungking, but the local people spoke the Sichuan dialect. They reversed the tones and had a slightly different vocabulary. So I never did get very far with it.

To me the highlight of my time in Chungking was a trip I made with A. Doak Barnett, a classmate [at Yale], who was in China on a study program. We went out to the Tibetan grasslands.

Q: Doak Barnett was born there.

VALDES: He was born there of missionary parents and was 15 or so when he left Shanghai. He was going out to Sikang Province in western China, west of Chungking. He came through Chungking and asked if I wanted to go along. Since Sikang Province was part of our consular district, I was able to do that. It was a fascinating time.

Q: How did you actually travel?

VALDES: We went in a jeep belonging to the Consulate. I took the jeep up to Chengdu and then to Yaan, which was pretty much on the border of Sikang Province. There had been a road from Yaan to Kangting, the capital of the province, but it had long since washed out. So we walked. We had a collection of coolies with us, carrying sedan chairs. I have to admit that we rode for a good part of it, although most of the time we walked. Fortunately, the coolies carried our suitcases.

EARL WILSON
Information Officer, USIS
Shanghai (1947-1949)

Earl Wilson was born in 1917 and raised in Washington, DC. He attended the Georgetown University School of Foreign Service and George Washington University. Mr. Wilson joined the IICA (USIS) in 1947 and spent his career in China, the Philippines, France, Thailand, Mexico, Hong Kong, Spain, Malaysia, and Washington, DC. This interview was conducted by G. Lewis Schmidt in 1988.

WILSON: When the war was over, the general in charge of public information asked me to go to China and take over North China public information for Marine aviation. I had always been fascinated with China, I agreed, even though I had more points to get out than you could shake a stick out. My wife let me go. For six months I learned a lot about China. Fortunately, I had a roommate who was a Chinese language officer, a missionary kid, born, raised, educated in China, who showed me everything.

Then I came back to the Post. I applied to the publisher, Eugene Meyer, told him I wanted to be a foreign correspondent, wanted to go to China. He hemmed and hawed and finally said he couldn't afford that. So I went back to being a feature writer.

After about a year, I was having lunch at the Press Club with an old Marine buddy, John Thomason, son of the famous Marine Corps writer and artist, Colonel John Thomason. He said he was going to Calcutta. I said, "My God, what's up?"

He said, "The State Department is hiring people with newspaper experience to go overseas."

Well, I hustled over there. I thought about going to Latin America because I had been specializing in Latin America at Georgetown.

I forgot to mention that on the newspaper, I got a four-year scholarship to G.W. I went to G.W. for over a year. When the war broke out, I had to quit. So although I had five years of college, I didn't have a degree. Georgetown claims I'm an alumnus.

So I went over. They said, "We've got an opening in Shanghai."

Q: What year was that when you got the job with USIA or its predecessor?

WILSON: They took a reasonably long time for security clearance in those days. I actually went aboard around March of 1947. The training was very, very rudimentary at that time. Headquarters was the old building at 1776 Pennsylvania Avenue. We were a part of State. I think it was called the Office of International Information and Cultural Affairs. Everybody knows the State Department didn't really want this propaganda organization attached to it. OWI had folded.

For part of the training I went to an old red-brick building next to the Bureau of Printing on 14th Street where the OWI photo files were left. That building has since disappeared. I think it's where the Holocaust Museum is to be located. They had literally thousands upon thousands of OWI negatives in file cases, and two little old ladies creeping about trying to find things. Harry Casler, who had been photo editor in New York on one of the papers, was in charge.

In a building by State, various ambassadors and Foreign Service officers gave us talks on one thing or the other. It was totally useless. We got a little exposure to the different branches of what would become the Agency. We soon left.

To get to Shanghai, my wife and I had to go to Mobile and catch a freighter. We were both in our late twenties, married nine years, had our two little girls, April and Ronby, with us. The freighter was delayed and delayed before we finally boarded her. It had not been converted from wartime uses. Our cabin was simply an a large, bare, steel-walled area. They used to have a lot of bunks, but had thrown out all but four. We used our trunk for a table. I think we got a chair from someplace. My wife had never been abroad before.

We set sail, and the third night out, when we were laying off Panama, there was a murder on the ship. We were on the Atlantic side of the Panama Canal. Someone, in the early hours stepped up on a steam pipe, reached through a port hole, stabbed our cabin steward. He was a very nice young man. He was stabbed with such force it ripped part of the bunk. The guy fell off of his bunk. The second mate, on duty on the bridge, just happened to come below, saw his buddy, blood gushing from his body. He ran up and blew SOS on the steam whistle. I heard this in the middle of the night. I jumped up, ran out on deck to see what the heck was going on. From my own wartime experience, I thought we were on fire, a collision course or something, but I didn't see anything. It wasn't 'til morning, when we went for breakfast. We found the police aboard. They took off a suspect screaming and cursing, another one of the stewards.

We went through the canal. The newspaper's banner headlines called us the "murder ship," said it was the most sensational crime to have happened there. While we were on deck trying to look at the canal, people were on the locks, looking at the "murder ship." We got to the other side. The crew weren't convinced the murderer had been taken off. They slept in groups on the deck at night, with one of them standing guard with a bat or pan or something. It wasn't a very happy time.

Then, finally, the inquest was over, and we set sail. Incidentally, that suspect was later released. They never did find out who did it because it was circumstantial evidence. I'm pretty sure he was the one.

We sailed across the Pacific without any stops, except Hawaii, but we couldn't get off the ship. I was acting purser on the ship because the captain, who was like an old farmer, didn't have one, and I volunteered to help him with his paperwork. It let me know what was going on on the ship. Actually, the trip in some ways turned out to be quite nice. The seamen were more than kind to our children. They made them a swing, a pond with the fire hose, and I made a six-foot high kite which we flew from the stern.

Everything was going along pretty good until we got to the China Sea. There we hit a typhoon. Our ship almost went over. Some did. In the middle of it, our daughter, April, had a weird high fever. My wife was worried sick. I wanted to see if the ship could head to Japan.

Q: I suppose they didn't have any doctor on board.

WILSON: No doctor. They had 12 passengers, all missionaries except us and one other guy, a young banker. In the evenings, we would sit on the port side of the boat deck, drinking rum and Coke, singing folk songs or whatever. They were on the other side with their Bibles and dominoes.

We had that terrible typhoon, and fortunately, April got better. Lorane, like all good mothers, had built-in medical instincts, I guess.

We arrived in Shanghai about June of 1947. Brad Conners was in charge. Tommy Linthicum met us at the dock. He was the administrative officer. He's now out in San Diego, where I saw him last year. He took us to what was to be our temporary quarters, the flat of a man who on home leave. It was in Hamilton House, right in the heart of Shanghai, across the street from a bank building where our consulate general was located. The USIS office was on the second floor of Hamilton House. In Washington we were called the U.S. International Communications Agency. There were a lot of name changes before we got to the U.S. Information Agency. But always USIS abroad.

Our new flat was on the sixth floor. My wife, when she saw this dingy, crummy apartment -- compared to the nice clean one in Bethesda we had, with a nice park outside, and here, no place for the children to play, she began to slowly go into culture shock.

USIS was on the second floor. I went in to report to Brad Conners. He told me he had some bad news. Congress had made a very severe budget cut. He had to close five branch offices, and had to lay off 75% of the local staff throughout the country. Brad was quite an interesting person. He had a photographic memory, absolutely, remembered every cable he ever read. Partly as a result of that, he became very good at picking people, and their brains, he went right to the top. Unfortunately, he died young of lung cancer. I never saw him without a cigarette in his mouth. He said I was going to be in charge of motion pictures and all the audio-visual stuff.

The news of the closing of so much of USIS, brought a flood of telegrams, letters, and phone calls of protest. Here I'm referring to notes. A leading newspaper, the Chungking Daily, said, "USIS is our only source of news from America. It is essential to the maintenance of Sino-American relations." The English-language Shanghai Evening Post said the budget slash was a crying shame. And so on. Tilman Durdin, a very respected foreign correspondent of The New York Times, wrote, "The United States is fighting an uphill battle to make itself understood and to win good will in China in face of bitterly critical propaganda of the Communists. The U.S. Information Service has been contributing much to the American cause at a critical juncture in U.S. relations with China."

I was beginning to get a little bit of a feeling for what was going on. At the end of the war, of course, our attention was focused on the enemy, on Japan, and I had no contact with China. Then, when I went to China, my eyes began to open a little bit. First of all, there were a million Japanese in north China. Naturally, we thought we were going to have a lot of trouble. But when the Emperor spoke, there were absolutely no difficulties whatever. As a matter of fact, they gave some of them their rifles back and put them to guard different places.

But the Communists were something else. Our aircraft were flying under very difficult conditions weather-wise with poor communications. When a pilot would go down, we usually knew where he was. We had this tremendous combat-ready force, ready to send out to get him, pick him up.

Q: Is this while you were still in the Marines?

WILSON: Yes. I'm just giving a little insight of my learning something about the Communists. To "bring the boys home" was a demand from our citizens. Ranks were being thinned. If a Marine lieutenant platoon leader got out to the village and said to the head man, "Okay, bring out Captain So-and-so, we know you've got him." The man would just look blank. Someone would say, "If you don't bring him out in five minutes, we'll shell the village." They knew perfectly well these Americans weren't going to do anything like that. As a consequence, you had to bargain. Chinese language officers had to get in there, gold would be exchanged and things like that. So the lesson I was learning was that military force, which we've learned in many conflicts since, doesn't necessarily solve the problem.

Then in the city of Tientsin, where I was based, one or two movie theaters were showing, I suddenly realized, Russian films in Chinese about how they won the war and defeated Nazi Germany. The few American films were old films. I suddenly realized quite a propaganda thing was under way.

I had met some of the White Russians. They were fun people, as a rule. Then I went to a celebration of a Red Russia holiday at a big auditorium to see what was going on. They had a ballet, written to show how they won the war. They had a cabled message from Stalin.

With USIS a few years later, I realized, of course, that China was a very large country with about 500 million people. It was poor, had been ravaged by war, had virtually no transportation system, and, of course, they were having a civil war with the Communists. The U.S. was under fire in a skilled manner with the Communists attacking us in every way. It was difficult for people to get much information about the United States.

Despite closing five offices, we still had branch offices in Nanking, Peiping, Mukden, Chungking, Hangkow, Canton, and Taipei. With my arrival, we had 13 Americans.

I want to comment a little bit about our USIS program at that time and with that small number of American officers and local staff, what we tried to do.

First of all, news. The Associated Press and the United Press were business organizations, and business was bad in much of the world. They were servicing less than 30% of the estimated 600 daily newspapers in China. That's AP. UP reached about 70%. Those papers served directly the American news services were concentrated in the Shanghai-Nanking area, about like Washington, D.C., and New York. In other words, only about 10% of the Chinese daily press was receiving news directly from American wire services. Of course, the Kuomintang Central News Agency subscribed to AP, but through a filter, which was quite a filter. We were trying to take up the slack.

In Shanghai we received from Washington the daily wireless file. It ran about 3,500 words daily. John Henderson was our number two man, Brad's deputy. Mary Barrett, who later married New York Times foreign correspondent Walter Sullivan, was handling the press and the wireless file. That would come in, be translated into Chinese, then put it into what was called the Chinese number code using Morse signals and transmitted to our branches for decoding, mimeographing, and distribution. About 70% of our material was printed in Chinese newspapers and read by a daily audience of an estimated 25 million Chinese. Even in Shanghai, where AP, UP, Chinese Central News, Reuters, Agence France Presse, Tass, were all available, about 60% of our stuff was published in the newspapers.

Q: I suppose the foreign news services weren't giving much about the United States, but to some extent, I would think AP and UP would, where they serviced the papers.

WILSON: It's interesting. I haven't ever read or made a study of this, but I'm sure somebody has. Particularly in those days, AP and UP were servicing a lot of very bad news about the United States, because they thought that was what different markets wanted.

Q: Can you give an example of what you say was bad news?

WILSON: Race relations, anything with race relations, murders, anything about the poor. Just any negative story that you could think of. At one time I thought about clipping a batch to show to Congress, but then I said, "To hell with it."

On the radio, Radio Moscow came in loud and clear to China, and the Chinese Communists made daily broadcasts from up in the north. VOA was quite weak by comparison. It went over our heads directly to the Chinese. We didn't have too much to do with VOA, but we backed it up with loans of phonograph records to radio stations. These were mostly old OWI (Office of War Information) records. OWI had been well financed during the war. We inherited a lot of their stuff. I had stacks of OWI radio records, some beautiful Metropolitan Opera, things like that.

Margaret Thompson, who had been with the Red Cross in China, was in charge of our libraries. In Shanghai, fourth largest city in the world, there was only one free library, and that was ours. It was on the second floor of Hamilton House, where we had American books and magazines available for free loan. Of course, we had libraries in various branch posts. She was our only trained librarian. Also, we had a grant of $100,000 to buy books for Chinese libraries and universities. That was made possible by a grant from the American Library Association.

Q: I presume these were all in English.

WILSON: I'm not sure. I wasn't much involved with that program. But probably.

The first Fulbright Agreement was signed with China, the first in the world. They had $20 million earmarked from the sale of surplus war equipment to China to send American teachers and students to that country, and Chinese to our country. Bud Harris in Nanking handled that program. The Soviets had an exchange program, and they took hundreds of Chinese students and teachers to Moscow. And the Chinese Communists took a great many up to their capital at Yenan for training.

I was to be in charge of all the audio-visual programs and USIS publications. Brad said, "Don't expect much help from Washington," and that was true. We got very, very little material from Washington, practically no guidance. The way the thing was set up, our embassy was in Nanking, our USIS headquarters in Shanghai. Brad had to travel to Nanking once a week and spend a night. That was very demanding on him. Really, I got practically no guidance whatever from Brad or anybody else, just on my own, with very little out of Washington.

Q: What month was this that you're talking about in 1947? What I'm trying to do is to coordinate this with the time that the Smith-Mundt Act was passed, which finally gave us the authority to establish a full-fledged what became U.S. Information and Education Program under State.

WILSON: The time I'm talking about would be the summer and fall, I think, of 1947, more or less.

Q: I think the Smith-Mundt Act was enacted in '48, so they were probably pretty badly coordinated in Washington until they got that authority.

WILSON: Yes. What I'm talking about is sort of a general period from '47 to '48. In my area of responsibility we were largely living off the fat of OWI. When the Japanese surrendered, a lot of the OWI World War II material that had been in Chungking came down the Yangtze to Shanghai.

My office in Hamilton House was one large gloomy room. I shared it with ten Chinese artists, writers, translators, and clerks, our desks all jammed together. There was a lot of jabbering in Chinese which I didn't understand. But little by little, I began to comprehend, almost by osmosis, a lot of what was being said.

On the motion picture side, we were operating with OWI films of Americana in Cantonese, Mandarin, and Turki. We reached about 3 million people a month through these films. I had one American officer working for me, Loren Reeder. He was a big specimen, like Joe Palooka, very good natured, hands were like hams, and quite a character. He had come over in World War II to drop in a parachute, he thought -- he'd been a bricklayer or something as a civilian -- but instead, he wound up in OWI as a printer technician photographer. Joining USIS, he ran our photo lab and was in charge of printing. Our photo lab was a converted closet, and once again we had a great many negatives of Americana from OWI.

One reason I'm going into this is it was the beginning of the later development of the regional production center in Manila, and from that, the various ones in other parts of the world. We also had a Chinese newsletter, made up of reprints in Chinese of American magazine articles. The press section put this out periodically, just pages of type, no illustrations. I thought it very unappealing, so I brightened it up, gave it a cover, made it like a magazine with line drawings and so on. We began to reach 13,000 schools, universities, selected groups, and 75% of that material was reprinted. We did get a nice response to this from Washington. They congratulated us on the Chinese magazine. This also was a sort of precursor to a number of magazines that came out later in the Far East.

I'll just mention one other thing. Ever since I was young, I've always painted. I loved to draw. That has made me interested in artists. In all my posts, I usually wound up knowing a lot of them. In Shanghai, there was a restaurant called Sun Ya. In the back room, the owner maintained a salon for writers and artists, mainly artists. I was invited to join this group, it turned out not because I was an artist so much, but because he wanted my help to do a cookbook. I didn't have time to get into that, but I enjoyed meeting these artists.

One was Chin San-long, called the "father of Chinese photography." He studied classical Chinese painting, but decided he couldn't paint good enough. So he got one of those early old cameras with the glass plates. He would make three shots, put them together in the dark room. The end product looked like a Chinese classical painting. He might have the mist of the mountains in the background, and in the middle ground, maybe a bird sitting on a branch of a tree, and in the foreground, perhaps some bushes or whatever. Beautiful stuff.

I sent a bunch of his paintings to New York, to a magazine called Coronet, no longer published. they ran his photos in the entire center section, called it "Eternal China." Years later, after the Communists took over, he took a trip to the U.S. and to Europe. We'd become friends. I told him to try to capture the U.S. the way he'd captured China, and he did. This man, incidentally, had won prizes all over the world for his work in salon photography. He gave me a photograph he made of the Statue of Liberty. It's very interesting, like a Chinese painting. It has the fog, the sun dimly seen. The statue was like the mountains.

I want to say another thing about art. You know, UNESCO held its first art exhibit in Paris right after the war. Harry Truman was President at this time. These paintings had been selected by museum directors in the U.S. It turned out they were all abstracts. The Europeans wanted very much to see what American artists had been doing during the war. I think it was Look magazine that ran photos of some of these abstracts, very derisive, "This is what foreigners are being shown as American art," they said. It created quite a furor in Congress. Harry Truman ducked it. He said, in a press conference, he liked "ham-and-eggs" art. The consequence of all this was the word "art" became a four-letter word in the Agency. There was no way they were going to get involved with this; it would cut the throat of their budget.

The one thing I had been doing in my so-called training in Washington over in that old photographic section was to write captions for an art exhibit. The exhibit was of traditional American paintings, black and white photographs, you know, things like John Steuart Curry or [Edward] Hopper or [Thomas Hart] Benton or Winslow Homer, Norman Rockwell, Grandma Moses, that type of thing. So I'd written these captions. With the Paris uproar, it was stored away.

When I got to Shanghai, I began to go to art exhibits. Boy! They had more art exhibits than you could think of. I wrote back to a friend in the Agency, asked him to get that art exhibit I'd worked on, stuck away somewhere, and send it to me. He did.

In our library, I planned to have what turned out to be the first American art exhibit after the war in China. We pushed back files, book stacks, and things in the library and made a makeshift exhibit hall. We had recorded music playing in the background. With our $25 representation fund we got some cookies and tea. We sent out invitations to the elite -- the teachers, artists, writers, and so on -- and they came. Almost everyone we sent an invitation to came, and they were fascinated, looking at these black and white photographs which we had framed and matted.

The interesting thing is, earlier in Canton, a mob, Communist-led, had burned down the British consulate. The consul escaped with his life by hiding under a bed. This unrest then surged up to Shanghai. Barbed wire was all around the entrance to our consulate. Chinese Nationalist troops with helmets and machine guns were on guard. Crowds were in the street. I'll never forget, there I was, standing, talking with our guests to our art exhibit who were drinking our tea, eating our cookies, looking at our pictures, while looking out a window, I could see the street mobs. One team was writing with tar on the wall of the Cathay Hotel, "Get out filthy American beasts."

Q: You spoke of the riots in Canton, but you are still talking about the exhibit being in Shanghai, aren't you?

WILSON: That's right. But I mean, the Communists could play these things like a piano, up and down.

A bit later, a young student came to my office and said they were having an international art exhibit sponsored by university students. Would the U.S. participate? He told me the Russians had agreed, the French, the British, and so on. Without stopping to think how, I said, "Sure." Then I started looking for paintings at the Agency, as I said, art was a four-letter word. Nothing there. First of all, I contacted all of our branch posts.

By the way, a marvelous thing we had left over from the war was a communications system. We, the USIS, had this. One way old Brad could throw his weight around a little bit is that he could do favors for people by communicating. I'm talking about legally within the consulate. Looking for paintings, I tried the American Club, the American School, and the American bookstore. I got absolutely nowhere.

I tried the other Far East posts, Manila, Tokyo and so on. Tokyo, because of the occupation, had it all. They sent me, on loan, a beautiful set of color prints, just what the doctor ordered. We put those up. The Russians had heroic-size statues, large paintings of Lenin and all the rest. The British and the French had nice exhibits, but ours, I thought, was better.

After that, I had to send that exhibit back to Tokyo. But my black and white exhibit began to travel in China from post to post. Hundreds of thousands of people saw it. I was happy about that. I claimed that we had the first art exhibit in China and the last for a generation, because when China went down the drain, it wasn't until later, 25, 28 years later, that the Agency could hold another there.

Q: I'd just like to make one comment and ask you what your reaction is. From what you have said, I gather that you felt the art that you had, even though it was limited, got you "in" with a great many very important people in China at that time. It wasn't only the artists, but it was probably people of fairly high standing in various fields of business and government and so forth. Is that a correct assumption?

WILSON: Oh, absolutely. I found that in post after post, art was a conduit to all kinds of influential people.

Q: The reason I say this is because I recently interviewed Alan Fisher. Alan was a very talented man. He was an artist in painting and in music and in several other fields. Although he was generally apolitical, he made all sorts of contacts among high Brazilian people, particularly, where he spent the larger part of his USIS career. He and I felt that he had made an impact which many other people didn't, with ordinary USIS type of programs. He had everybody, from governors and presidents of the country, as his personal contacts and knew them on a first-name basis. I don't think you can equal that kind of an approach and that kind of an impact, as far as American efforts informationally abroad are concerned.

WILSON: Yes, I would agree.

I want to turn to another subject. During the war, OWI sent to Chungking, among other things, high-speed Webb leaflet presses. One of these later came to USIS in Shanghai. I found, despite what we were printing with it, we had a lot of press capacity left over. We also had tons of excess OWI paper. We had all these Americana negatives. So the thought occurred to me, why not make paper shows, posters, based on this material, with captions in English and Chinese, see if I could get some relevancy to Chinese problems. I began to produce these poster exhibits just a few months after I arrived.

The first exhibit was about American elections and voting in a democracy. The Chinese angle was, China had adopted its first Constitution in 5,000 years. They were about to hold their first national election. So I got an OWI booklet, and we copied the excellent drawings and diagrams on the American system. The posters were a great success. We began to reach more millions of people. These posters were being put up all over the country.

We were going along merrily with this, and I was quite happy about it, when I picked up Time magazine one day, and to my astonishment, there was in a box, was a story, datelined Lukden, very critical of my posters. It was called "The Glory of Plumbing," and said, "In that bleak and cheerless place up there," meaning a Nationalist prisoner of war camp where the writer happened to go and see posters on a wall, they "looked like dark blossoms on the snow," all in good Time magazine style prose. The whole point of the story was the ineffectiveness of telling hard-core Communist POWs about American plumbing.

I wrote a letter to Time. I'd like to summarize it here. I said, "I suggest the story entitled 'Glory of Plumbing' should have been called 'The Glory of Sewage Disposal,' for such was the subject matter. In disease-ridden China, few people argue with the fact that proper sanitation would be a tremendous step forward. Our exhibit tried to tell some of the basic facts of sewage disposal as practiced in the U.S. It even contained a U.S. Public Health Service plan for a cheap, sanitary outdoor toilet, as well as photographs of sewage disposal plants in large towns and cities. In brief, it offered the Chinese work for the present and plans for the future. Its usefulness can be measured by the fact that from public health groups, hospitals, universities, and libraries in every part of China we have received hundreds of letters of praise and enthusiasm, wanting more of this type of thing. It wasn't intended for POWs, for God's sake."

I mentioned the American ballot box, our first poster exhibit. I said, "In Mukden, the very area from which your story was datelined, and which you call one of the world's most important cities, 10 million Chinese saw our voting posters there, just for an example." I said, "Our job, as outlined by the President, is to present a full and a fair picture of America, and we're trying to do that through this and other means." I said, "In this we include in Mukden, among other Chinese cities, the opportunity for anyone to go into our library and get free loan of books and magazines, including your own." Well, I blew off steam.

I sent my letter through the State Department. It never appeared in Time. I doubt if they forwarded it.

Another little aspect of this. Brad called me to his office one day to meet a fellow named J. Hall Paxton, who was going to Tihwa in Sinkiang province as consul. Paxton, incidentally, later made a very dramatic escape from there by going through Nepal, walking out, to get away from the Communists.

His deputy, Doug McKiernan, months later, tried to do the same thing. Unfortunately, he was shot and killed by Tibetan border guards.

Paxton told me that day he wanted very much to do USIS work out there in that remote part of China, but language was a problem because most of the 5 million Muslim inhabitants spoke Turki. I said, "No problem." We found a Turki guy living in Shanghai, hired him to translate. So we began having trilingual captions, Chinese, English, and Turki for this far Western province.

Not long after Paxton arrived at his post, cholera broke out. I received an urgent cable from him. The authorities wanted very much to spread word about immunization to the populace. He wanted to know if I could furnish him with posters. There was only one plane a month from Shanghai that went there. We had 48 hours. One of my Chinese staff knew a Chinese Public Health doctor. We got him to the office, huddled with him over the desk with an artist and Turki translator. We soon had a dramatic poster urging inoculation against cholera. Bundles of these posters were rushed to the airport just in time for the last flight in the winter to be canceled. So we struck out on that.

But that gave birth to something else. This doctor was Director of the Anti-Tuberculosis Coordinating Committee for China. He asked if we could do an anti-spitting TB poster for him. I figured I owed him something, so we designed a "don't spit" poster. This guy got those posters plastered all over Shanghai, even on the back of rickshaws and the sides of streetcars.

The demand was so great, we could have spent the next six months printing nothing but those posters. That came to an abrupt halt, because in Nanking the Minister of Health had complained bitterly about this to Brad. He was losing face. We had to stop that. But I claim it's another first. AID later began to do this kind of poster around the world.

One last bit about that period in Tihwa. The New York Times correspondent Walter Sullivan wrote from there an article favorable to USIS. He wrote this, summarized: "In the heart of Central Asia, in the great hinterland that lies between India, Tibet, and Russia, the United States Information Service is at work." He said posters and movies were the backbone of our program and that daily, a mobile film unit would leave Tihwa to screen films in one of the 28 schools of the provincial capital. He said 832 schools were on the poster mailing list. Many of these posters and other things were carried by caravan of donkeys.

Paxton and his wife would drive to remote areas, and the word somehow would get out about our movies. In the loneliest areas, a crowd of 100 would assemble in a few hours, riding in on horseback, to see a little bit of America. He did say it was unfortunate our films were inferior to the excellent Russian documentaries being shown. They invited audiences of Chinese officials in the larger cities. Of course, there were no American commercial films within 1,000 miles. He said that Russia was very much ahead in the radio field, that VOA was weak. It was nice to hear something about our efforts.

Also, I was pleased by now -- this is 1948 -- to know that our posters were reaching all over China from Manchuria in the north to Hainan island in the south, and out to Central Asia and the borders of Russia.

I experimented, incidentally, with two other posts. One was Manila, where Hal Goodwin was, and printed some posters for him down there, and also with Saigon. So those germs were in the back of my mind about RPC when we get to that later.

I want to mention a couple of things, too, on the family side. One young officer, leaving, gave my oldest girl, April, a little Tibetan poodle. She would take him to the parking lot below for a walk. One day, I got a call from my wife. I was on the second floor of Hamilton House. I ran up to our flat on the sixth floor. The dog had been run over, but he hadn't just been run over. April had him down there off the leash. The cab that ran over him backed up to make sure he had run over him properly, and ran over him a couple of times. The only place our children had to play was a little yard of a church where you had to bribe the guard to open the barbed wire gates and let them in.

I want to mention a trip I took Lorane on and our librarian. We went to Soochow, about 90 miles from Shanghai, called the "Venice of China" because of its canals. We were going to take a lot of books out there to present to the university library. We took a big vehicle, and we had to go through a checkpoint on the road because the Communists had the road at night pretty much. We went along, and we got to the Methodist university, a very pleasant-looking place with a lot of missionaries living a pretty nice life, with nice living quarters, servants, food and all the rest of it.

We had presented the books, were dining with the president, when an urgent message came. Someone had stolen the chop he used for the tickets being given out for the movie we were to show that night in the auditorium. We got up from the table, went down to the auditorium where this film was to be shown. It was almost a riot, students all over the place, angry, demanding to get into the place. I told them to relax, we would give a second showing if they would calm down.

We went into the auditorium, and thank God there wasn't a fire official there. The place was so densely packed, you could barely move. I had told the projectionist to show a film about the United Nations, as it was United Nations Day. We sat with the president. The projectionist was up in the balcony. When the film came on, I realized he had put the second reel on first, but these people were so interested, it didn't seem to make any difference. Actually, a part of it was the Boston Symphony Orchestra led by Toscanini, playing the Hymn of the United Nations. These students were starved to see anything. How much of it penetrated their brain, I don't know.

The next day we went up on a nearby hill, Tiger Mountain, to a temple, outside of which we had a lunch. With us was a professor from the college. He was the husband of a Chinese lady who had been on our freighter. She had graduated from Columbia University with a Ph.D., and was involved in a project to try to reach the peasant women of China. They were working in separate places. This guy, who spoke excellent English, told us his wife was pregnant. I've forgotten how the topic came up, but he was very angry, very emotional, "I'll never let him be a teacher." I remember that on the ship, this lady had told us her husband's salary as a professor was the equivalent of about $15 a month. That's less than we paid our cook.

One thing very interesting about that period in China was aviation. Of course, Chennault formed the Flying Tigers, after World War II, CAT. A lot of American pilots stayed in China to fly with Chinese airlines. I knew many of these pilots. As a matter of fact, after our wives were evacuated, one of these pilots lived with me. They flew literally everything you can think of around the country -- animals, or you name it, steel ingots, whatever. It's a piece of aviation history that has very few counterparts.

I progressively visited our branch posts. I'll tell you a few sentences about each one. The first was over in what was then called Formosa, now Taiwan, the Republic of China. Dick Conlin was there. He lived in Taipei in a Japanese-style house on Grass Mountain. There were very few tourists. The Japanese had occupied the place for years. It had a very distinct Japanese feel. Of course, Nationalists, after the war, when they took it over, had mistreated a lot of the people. They were not liked at all.

I went to Canton, but when I went there on a military plane, it was covered with fog, so we landed at Hong Kong, my first visit. No place to stay, but one of my pilot friends put me up in the crew's quarters. Hong Kong was a very small British outpost, indeed, at that point.

Q: What year was that, Earl?

WILSON: That would be about '48. The next day, the wake-up person didn't call me. I grabbed a cab. My plane was at the end of the runway with the prop turning over. I told the guard at the gate I was a diplomatic courier. They let the cab in. We drove out on the runway and chased the plane. I got on, and we went over to Canton, 30 minutes away, where Elmer Newton, a very dignified guy, was waiting to meet me. I was a little embarrassed, because I hadn't shaved or anything. Canton is where one of the first bad incidents with the Communists had happened, burning of the British consulate.

I went to Nanking. Our branch public affairs officer there was Joe Bennett, a longtime student of China. Then I went on to Hangchow, where our office was being run by Marian Jenkins, who had married an oil man and whose job now was in Hangchow. She continued to be our branch PAO there.

Then I went to Chungking where the BPAO was Art Hopkins, a missionary child. The military hired a lot of these people because of their language ability, and then USIS hired a lot of them after the war. One of my recommendations, when I finally got back away from the Communists, was to recommend to the Agency they stop hiring people on the basis of language but also look at what their abilities are, because sometimes they can just communicate their stupidity more fluently. But I don't mean this about Art. It just brought to mind that he was a language guy, and he lived up on a mountain in a palace that was falling apart. It had been built for Chiang Kai-shek at one time. He and I played tennis. The mayor there was a tennis nut, had 13 concubines, and they said he married them because of their tennis ability. Art and I were playing tennis, and the mayor showed up. He sicced some of his wives on us, and we played practically all afternoon. We were exhausted.

Finally, I went over to Kunming in West China, where one of the consuls was doing our work for us as they were in other places. His wife, incidentally, had been quietly helping in a leper colony there. They were leaving. A lot of these lepers scraped their pennies together to put an ad in the local paper thanking her. I thought that was very nice.

I'll give an example of how the Communists were operating. Their cells in the universities and the schools were a very important part of their apparatus. Students held innumerable strikes and demonstrations, demanding the Nationalist government to stop fighting the Communists, for example. But in 1948, they shifted their line and began to demonstrate against American imperialism, alleging that we were rearming Japan for reconquest of China. This propaganda campaign started one night at the American School, where my daughter, April, was a student. We went there for a program depicting the birth of the United Nations. The school had 50 nationalities, so they had a lot of native costumes. Just as the program started, a grotesque figure suddenly appeared on the stage as Uncle Sam, wearing a suit covered with dollar signs. Then another figure came on the stage dressed in a baggy Japanese Army officer's uniform, carrying a large bag covered with dollar signs. It took only a moment. Uncle Sam put an affectionate arm around the servile Japanese, while slipping him dollars. A third figure dressed as a Chinese peasant armed with a stick dashed out and drove Uncle Sam back in confusion. Then someone pulled the light switch.

The next day was Memorial Day. We went to the American cemetery in Shanghai, where our consul general, John Cabot, spoke. He referred to the incident, contrasting the spirit of many of the men buried in the cemetery, who had died fighting to liberate China from the Japanese, with the misguided Chinese students who were insulting the best international friend the country had. Up in Nanking, the American ambassador, Dr. John Leighton Stuart, who had been a lifelong missionary teacher in China, who had educated thousands of young Chinese, spoke along the same line.

But then in the various universities, suddenly there was an exhibit of photographs. At Episcopal St. John's University in Shanghai, one of the best, there was one on the theme of America imperialism rearming Japan. University authorities ordered the exhibit removed. Demonstrations broke out there and at universities across the country, carefully orchestrated, spread like a prairie fire. The students were able, at St. John's, to force the resignation of the president of the university. These demonstrations peaked in Shanghai with a gigantic anti-American parade. Americans were told to stay off the streets.

Then all of a sudden, the Communists, for whatever their tactical reasons, simply called that particular campaign off. It was very disturbing to see how they could manipulate things.

I want to tell one other quick anecdote about family. I had a jeep. It was a surplus military jeep. When we got it, it had grass literally growing out of the engine block. But nonetheless, it was transportation. We had moved to French town, had a very nice flat there. One night, we had to go to some official function and didn't take the jeep. I came back with my wife, and the elevator operator was excitedly chattering about something. He led me out back to the parking lot. My jeep's windshield was broken, spider webbed. There were hammer marks on the hood. He made a motion of hammering, I said, "Who?" He pointed upstairs, said, "He go your place." I said, "My God!" So we rushed to the elevator. The door opened on our floor, a very elegant place. The glass partitions had all been smashed, glass scattered about the floor. There were hammer marks all over our front door. Our children were in there. I called the servant. He peeked out, then opened the door.

It turned out it was a British guy who lived on the floor below us. His brother -- and I called the British Embassy -- had gone to Hong Kong to arrange to have him shipped back to a mental institution in Great Britain. This guy had a big beard, he was dressed in his pajamas, had a belt, with a golf club like a sword. He'd gone to a cocktail party at a flat below us, we learned where he'd gone into the middle of the crowded room and yelled, "Bullshit!" Then walked out. Nobody paid any attention. You know cocktail parties.

Q: He was the guy who had smashed up your place?

WILSON: Yes, I learned his wife had gone off with an American pilot. He was anti-American and psychotic. He heard our American voices. That set him off. His brother, who was quite well-to-do, had a big limousine and a driver. This guy, next morning, called the car, and in his outlandish costume, told the driver to take him to the British Embassy. On the way, he periodically would lean out the window and clunk somebody with this golf club. When he got to the British Embassy -- you know, in those days we all had Sikh guards, and they were very big physical specimens -- he ran up to this Sikh guard and clunked him. That's not the kind of person you clunk. So the guard went after him. My contact at the British Embassy said this guy cowered back in the car, wanted to be taken to a mental institution. That's what they did.

My wife was very much a victim of culture shock. Like many Americans, she had thought of Chinese as being extremely gracious and well mannered. Of course, many of them are, but times were hard and out there in the streets you had a lot of situations.

Lorane became pregnant. The Communists were beginning to advance in the north. Our consul general said if Americans didn't have something of importance to keep them there, they should leave. Many did, but many didn't. Of course, American dependents were ordered evacuated. The government enabled us to ship our personal effects out. Then Lorraine flew on a military plane to Manila with a number of the dependents on December 7, 1948. They put them in an old Army camp near the university to wait out until they could come back to Shanghai.

Q: Did she go back to the States then?

WILSON: No, she waited. The theory was this. Up north, during the interval between the Communists taking over after the Nationalists had left would be a period of anarchy. So that's one reason they wanted our dependents out. The other thing, they said, was to wait until the dust settled. Then they could come back. Some dependents went to Japan. Brad Conner's wife went to Japan, where she had her child.

Some admiral loaned us husbands a plane, and we were able to fly over to Manila at Christmas time, take presents and see our wives and kids. Then later, when our third baby, Mark, was born, I was able to get on the flight over. Then I hitchhiked back on a military plane to Okinawa, then Shanghai, where things were beginning to heat up.

It was mid-February of '49. The Communist armies had one-fourth of China. They were halted on the banks of the Yangtze. The Nationalist government had gone to Canton in the south. From there they went on over to Taipei. Brad Conners went with our embassy, following them down. Some of us were asked if we would stay behind. The idea was to see what could be done with the Communists because, actually, we'd never had any official experience dealing with the Communists. So Brad asked me to stay, John Henderson and one or two others.

We had an evacuation plan. I'll just tell you about that for a minute. Shanghai was divided into sections, and various members of the consulate were leaders of some section. Each section had a collection point, like the Columbia Country Club, the American School, and the consulate general itself. Each section team had a squad of Marines, plus a couple of men from the consulate who were familiar with visa work and at least one American who spoke Chinese. Some of these were businessmen. They had radios. My responsibility was to work with one of these as a general "go-fer" or whatever. The idea was, if there were an emergency, trucks would collect these people, take them through the back streets to a place down from Shanghai on the Whangpoo River, where they'd be shipped out to a waiting hospital ship. One of the things that they asked me to do was print bilingual posters with the American flag in English and Chinese, stating this was American property. These posters went up all around the city.

Many old China hands were saying, "Oh, you're going to see a compromise in the usual Chinese way. The war's over." One thing that came out of it, USIS got better office space. The consulate moved to a nearby building on the bund owned by the U.S. We took over the ground floor of the building across from Hamilton House. It had been a bank -- high ceilings, a balcony. We had our USIS offices up on the balcony, with the library down below. I wrote back to an old contact in Harry Casler's office where I remembered they had a gigantic camera that could make huge photographic prints. I had these huge photographs of Americana mounted as murals around our balcony. It was very striking. You could see them from the street, through the windows. We used the windows as show cases advertising our products. One of the photographs I have that I call "lowering of the bamboo curtain," is a nice shot of the window advertising our free magazines and free book loans. Right in front are barbed wire barricades that have been pushed aside. Three or four Communists soldiers with their rifles are advancing. So that was the bamboo curtain coming down.

Even though the Red Army was getting closer, we managed to open a new USIS branch in the German School. Our military had suddenly left, because there was this incident, you may recall, of the British frigate, Amethyst. It went up the river to Nanking, gunboat diplomacy, to help safeguard British citizens during this period of anarchy. But instead, the Communists, with the heavy artillery on the banks, caught them in the narrow river and blew the hell out of them. That word wasn't lost on our Navy, because immediately the military cleared out. We were left with the responsibility of looking after military property. They told me, "You can have anything you want." I went over there with Loren Reeder. My God, here were warehouses! I mean, acres of warehouses filled with everything imaginable. I didn't want anything except some photo paper, as I recall. Even then, good old bureaucracy. Brad said they had to transfer the cost from their budget to our budget. Meanwhile, Chinese thieves were getting in and stealing millions of dollars worth all the time.

The pilot I was living with left a note on an envelope that said, "I'll get in touch with you. I had to leave, going to Hong Kong." So he flew off with a plane. All pilots were flying transport planes to safety. Then, as they came back, they'd sit out at the airport with the propellers turning. I ran my roommate's personal possessions out there. He couldn't leave his plane and come into the city.

Q: After he left permanently, did he lose the plane? Did he keep it in Hong Kong?

WILSON: They kept them based in Hong Kong and Taipei, but they wouldn't leave anything. They'd just fly back up 'til the last. The population influx to Taiwan was astonishing, people going there and to Hong Kong and everywhere else.

We had an American amateur theater group in Shanghai, and they put on "Boy Meets Girl" while all this was happening. (Laughs) One of the guys, a friend of mine, an oil man, had a reading for a play at his house out in the suburbs, and he wanted us to drink up his champagne because he didn't want to leave it for the Communists. He had a couple of cases of champagne. So it was quite incongruous, we were out there in the garden, seated in a circle, the house boys in white jackets serving cold champagne while we were reading comedy lines, and you could see the lines and lines of refugees going by. For some reason, the Nationalist authorities had a fence built, a 35-mile long fence around the city. There was a cash famine. The streets were lined with people trying to trade whatever they had or whatever they manufactured -- flashlights or vacuum bottles or whatever. This was quite a difference from previously, when we had to deal with inflated currency which was up into the millions and millions and millions of dollars. You could take a paper grocery bag with you just to have a little money to buy a newspaper or something.

John Henderson and I were living together in my place, and we knew, of course, that the Communists were coming. They'd been fighting near the city, and we heard the thunder of artillery all the time. Then one day we saw Nationalist soldiers retreating. They went right past our place on Avenue Joffe.

Q: Named for the French marshal.

WILSON: Yes. They were retreating to get on boats down south. The very last of that bunch was an armored car that raced down the street, firing in all directions. It hit one of our windows. It had been raining. That night around midnight, we were watching from our windows. We saw some shadowy figures hugging the walls and coming in. Of course, the phones worked, so we were in touch with the labor downtown. He saw them take over the police station and take down the Nationalist flag.

The next morning, John and I went with the consul, Walter McConaughy, who lived in our building, had a car and a driver. We got in the car. On almost every corner there would be a Communist soldier with his weapon. Of course, the crowds would start coming out of the doors or the side streets. When necessary, they'd fire over their heads and they'd go back. Meanwhile, we went driving down fairly deserted streets. Then we heard a lot of firing. It got more intense, so we decided to get out of the car and hug the buildings to get to the office. There we found out we'd gone through the battle front. Our consulate was now in no-man's-land.

The Communists had set up, along Soochow creek, a rear guard. There was a park almost opposite us where they had a lot of machine guns and troops. The Communists were coming down from the other direction. McConaughy asked me to put up some American flags so they'd know who we were. Loren Reeder, this big guy, held my belt, and I put some on different sides of the building. Then over the front entrance. We had a Sikh guard. The flagstaff went out over the sidewalk. I got on a table and put a chair up on that, and the guard held it while I climbed up to hang this flag. I called it my "poor man's Iwo Jima." Right in front there was a mailbox, a Nationalist soldier, a 15-year-old kid, the last of the Nationalists' rear guard was hiding behind that mailbox. I have a picture of my putting up that flag up because Loren went out in the middle of the street and took it. It was foolish, bullets were flying around, but I'm glad to have the picture.

I saw the fire fight in an unusual way. It was like being on the 50-yard line of a football game, instead of as usual in combat, with your nose in the dirt.

We were in that building, the consulate, for several days. We did have some cots and food. One German, who was shot and had a broken leg, crawled about five blocks to our place. We were able to help him. One morning, I was up in the naval attaché's office, had borrowed his field glasses, was looking down on this park. We wanted to know whether the park was abandoned. This Nationalist soldier came out, yawned, scratched himself, picked up his rifle, looked up, saw me, and KABOOM! I was looking right at him with the glasses. The barrel of his rifle looked as big as a tunnel. I jumped just in time.

Actually, what happened as the Communists approached, they didn't fire on us. But the Nationalists, on the other side, frantically began firing all over the place. Bullets were coming around the office. We were crawling up and down the corridors. One secretary left her desk to go to the bathroom or something. She closed the door. She thought, you know, sometimes people seem to think that will protect them. This .50-caliber came through the door, through her desk, and blew a hole in the wall. I believe she got that bullet and wore it later as a good luck charm.

Our consulate cabled the State Department to cable to Canton to get the Nationalists to contact their troops in Shanghai and tell them, for Christ's sake, to stop shooting at us, that we were friends. Finally, it was over. The car we came in had been parked across the street. It had a bullet that went right through the trunk, up through the seat, into the dashboard, and still it would operate, so we used it.

For a while, we were able to run a restricted USIS program. Communist soldiers would visit our library. We were doing various things. But in July 1949, John Henderson was asked to come over to this Communist's office. They asked him to describe what he was doing, his operations. He knew, of course, they knew, and he gave them a nice briefing on what USIS was doing. They said, "That's fine. Stop it. No more." So we had to close up. The bamboo curtain had fallen.

Shanghai, 1949. I want to describe how the so-called bamboo curtain fell, how they shut off contact with the West, and how they established their own propaganda lines.

The U.S. was going to be the main target for vilification. Propaganda techniques were varied. In the press, for one thing, letters were planted asking straightforward questions, like "Why can't newspapers continue printing AP and UP stories?" And the Communist answer, in part, "Because they are the mouthpieces of imperialism." So the Communists could ask and answer their own questions.

The Communist Press and Publications Department of the Cultural and Educational Control Committee called a meeting of key Shanghai editors for a discussion forum. They were told that news and feature stories produce ideological and political effects, and the role of newspapers and magazines under the Communists is to serve the interest of the people. But the curious thing is, the editors received no specific guidance on how to treat stories, and so they began to find, in practice, it was not easy to satisfy the Communists and play their game. After three months, the editor of the Ta Kungpao, the Chinese New York Times, printed a public apology on the front page for his inability, despite trying hard, to manifest to the fullest degree the propaganda and educational value of the paper.

Q: In other words, then, you were still there, even though you were not permitted to operate any longer. You were still in Shanghai after the Communists had taken over.

WILSON: That's right. I was there almost six months because they wouldn't let us leave.

Q: They wouldn't let you operate, but they wouldn't let you leave.

WILSON: No. I'll get to that, too, because just to deviate for a second, the Communists did not have the technical expertise to run the factories and do many things associated with this city. They wanted the foreigners to stay around and run these places until they could properly take over. They didn't want to drop everything overnight. They wouldn't let anybody out. That was part of the problem -- it was the problem. I'll describe that in a little bit.

Back to the press. The newspaper editors were having a hard time. They were trying to print and make the newspapers serve the Communists, or serve the people, as they said. News from the outside world had to come through a Communist screen. I read a translated article in the press tracing Sino-American relations for a century, the object to prove there was no such thing as traditional friendship. In this article, the writer used the epithet "American imperialist" 32 times; "American aggressors" 18 times; "American reactionaries" eight times, and so on. It was very boring to read this stuff, but that's the way it was.

They had an editorial in one of the papers, commenting on USIS of the past. We were the "megaphones of the imperialists," and it said we had been ordered to cease our activities, and although on the surface, USIS looked like a cultural liaison in public relations such as movie shows, library services, concerts, photo exhibits, giving advice to students going to America, the article said that in fact, the center of work was the dissemination of official news dispatches and the gathering of information concerning public opinion reaction to America. Our posts were filled with Secret Service men trained by the FBI, and we were just megaphones of imperialism.

The radio editors of Shanghai were called in for a lecture. They didn't understand how things worked under Communists. Worst of all, some of them were still relaying the Voice of America. That was a no-no. Motion picture people and producers were called in and told their films had to reflect the policy of the government, that films should educate the people, reform their thoughts, encourage production. American commercial films, which had been very popular, now another technique, they had the movie industry workers union demand that the government immediately impose censorship on the poisonous American-made pictures. As these movies disappeared, it was announced that 200 Russian films with Chinese lip sync had been imported. Anything American was erased. Street names, like Wedemeyer Road named after the American general, were changed; brand names, products, soaps, cigarettes. In every element of society, the Communist control mechanism was taking over.

The old China hands were mystified by the behavior of the Communists. First of all, they had never really thought they had good troops. Overnight, right after they took over, the city was plastered with thousands of posters, reassuring the populace that their property would be protected, and it was. Unlike the Nationalists, the Communist soldiers slept on the sidewalks, rather than intrude into any home or building. They refused to accept so much as a cigarette without paying for it. There was no doubt, given the turbulence of the past, when the Nationalists soldiers did exactly the opposite, that many people in the city were happy to see the Communists come as a promise of peace and order.

I had my first direct contact with one of the Communists when I went over to pick up a suit at my tailor on the grounds of Broadway Mansion, where the Foreign Press Club used to be. Right after I had the fitting, I stepped outside and found myself face to face with a Communist soldier who had a Tommy gun, and he stuck it in my stomach and said something in Chinese. I couldn't understand him. I began backing toward the tailor shop, because I knew the tailor spoke English. The soldier followed. Of course, the usual crowd gathered. In the old days, always a crowd would gather and the police would tell them to go away, but they wouldn't do it. In this case, the guy noticed the crowd, just turned around and waved his gun, said something like, "Beat it!" and they did. They knew he meant business. Well, my tailor came, and basically what the guy simply wanted was for me to write in his notebook my name, address, where I was going, and why.

They had not announced a curfew. The Nationalists had a curfew. We decided we'd better keep observing the Nationalist curfew hours. I was coming home one night when another soldier flagged me down and escorted me to a wooden shack. While in there, a roving patrol came up and surrounded the shack with fixed bayonets. This time, I finally found out they wanted me to turn my headlights down. They also wanted to know who I was, where I had been, and going.

The Communists had no diplomatic relations with the U.S. They referred to us as a bogus American consulate general, and refused to deliver any mail addressed to the consulate general. So my letters from Lorane were returned before I could get word to her that she had to use the street address of the consulate.

To celebrate their victory, the Communists formed a huge victory parade. I watched this forming from the roof of the consulate. There were hundreds of thousands of people, red banners all over the place.

Meanwhile, they were telling employees to demand various things. Our military had let their Chinese employees go. They formed a group to demand higher separation settlements than they were entitled to under our regulations. Consul General John Cabot said he would negotiate with a committee, not with all of them. They turned that down, blocked the entrances. We were prisoners inside our own consulate. We were there for several days. Cabot got us to put our hands in our pockets to break out of there via a back alley which led to the street. When we all went out, the parade was beginning to pass. These workers had used bicycle chains to lock the gates. As the parade passed, they stopped the trucks in front of us to let everybody in the truck shout, "American imperialists!" and so on. We had to go back into the consulate again, losing much face.

They went away, the workers, but a few days later, a small group of them came, gained entrance and got hold of our administrative officer, Reuben Thomas. They locked him in his office, put the chains back so we couldn't get out. For a day and a night they kept Reuben at his desk, they wouldn't give him anything to eat or drink and wouldn't let him go to the toilet, while they negotiated. It was blackmail, and in the end, the U.S. had to pay these people to get them off our back.

There was another aspect of their propaganda against foreigners. They felt the Chinese man in the street had too much respect for foreigners. They wanted to break this up. So they began picking different nationalities to create an incident on which to focus. They got a British consular official and accused him of beating up his house boys, forced him to write a public apology; then a German, claimed he had abused a dye works employee; they had a Frenchman, accused him of knocking a Communist officer from his bicycle, make him spend two weeks sweeping the streets, pay a fine, medical expenses, public apologies, wear a sign around his neck, all that.

Then it was the American turn. We had a young vice consul by the name of Bill Olive. He was a very slight, unassuming man. He had just married one of the secretaries. He went out just before this parade in his jeep. He stopped to get gas and disappeared. Three days later, he came back to the embassy. He had been physically beaten. Mentally he was in very bad shape. We got his story. He had been arrested. They took him to a police station, charged him with driving on a street closed for the parade, even though there were no signs. By accident, he had knocked over a bottle of ink, they said, on the desk of the sergeant, so he was attacked from behind, beaten into insensibility with rifle butts and boots. He was locked in a cell without food, water, or medical attention, while two guards kept bayonets thrust through the bars at his throat. He wasn't permitted to move a muscle, and then every few hours they'd take him out, put him in front of a blinding light, and harangue him. They wanted him to write a confession, which he wrote. They'd look at them, crumble them up, throw them back in his face, and say, "Write a better one." And so he wrote, under their tutelage, a confession which then was published on the front page of the newspapers, which included such things as saying, "I am grateful to the People's Government for the consideration given my case, for the lenient and kind treatment accorded me."

The thing is that none of us knew what the hell was going to happen at any point, because there was no way to get any help from our own government or any other government. The so-called knock on the door at night.

Some American correspondents still there seemed sympathetic to the Communist side. They thought the Communists were doing a lot of good things. We called them in, John Henderson and I, to show them, with the doctor, Bill's cuts and bruises and let him tell his story. It did help to change some minds, I think.

Meanwhile from Taiwan, the Nationalists claimed they had mined the Yangtze River entrance. They sent bombers over with 500-pound bombs. One of the first ones hit a little foreign cemetery across from the old German school which we had made into a USIS library for that part of town. The Nationalists flew other flights for propaganda, too high to be hit. The Communists, as a counter propaganda move, put machine guns -- they didn't have any aircraft -- on the roofs of the buildings, so that when these planes were up there, all of a sudden the machine guns would go off, and you'd have to watch out for falling lead. Then the newspapers would claim the "bandit" planes had been driven away by the valiant troops.

John and I, driving from our home to the office, periodically would have to stop and abandon our jeep, run into a doorway as the machine guns started suddenly blasting. There was no warning. Right across from my office window, they had one of those things on the roof. Here I would be sitting, and all of a sudden the guy's firing and swiveling around. (Laughs)

Q: Did any of them ever come through your window?

WILSON: No, fortunately. Between the iron bombs, the Nationalist dropped propaganda leaflets.

You'd see the leaflets spreading in the air. Some fell in the street, where police very efficiently collected them.

This made the Voice of America increasingly important. It was the only way we could reach the people. We found one thing. When there was something really important said over the Voice of America, that word got around rapidly by word of mouth.

Then there was another problem. The Communist currency, in effect, cut our dollars in half, so we could no longer afford servants. We told them. The servants were dumbfounded. They said all their life, no matter what kind of hardship, they could at least get enough money for rice, and now they couldn't. To make a long story short, they turned us over to a Communist labor negotiator, who, in turn, made us go in front of the People's Court.

We went to a desk in this place. John and I stood in front of the Communist official while the servants and others stood around. The labor negotiator yelled at us for four hours. We had to wind up paying them four months' pay. Also pay for the rickshaw fare to get them to the place. Our baby Amah was the only one who wouldn't take part. The poor woman had converted to Christianity. Before I left, I found her a little room. All I could do was pay for it six months ahead, give her some food and money. I don't know whatever happened to her. She was a very good woman.

A big typhoon, the worst in the city's history, hit Shanghai, blew out the picture window in our flat. The city was flooded. John and I had to wade up to our waists in that filthy water with corpses floating about.

Meanwhile, our USIS staff, now were demanding more separation pay. John was handling these negotiations. A few of these people were Communists under cover. The sister of the man who did our book translations became the deputy mayor of Shanghai under the Communists. Most of them, however, were good people caught up in a nightmare. They would come secretly in my office to apologize, say goodbye, or whatever. Some would break out crying.

Finally, when we agreed to settle up to their satisfaction, we had them write a letter to the officials that everything was settled, because earlier, they had written a letter to the officials saying we should not leave China until we'd settled this up.

In August 1949, the Communists said they would begin giving 25 applications a day for exit visas. They knew thousands wanted to leave. At night, around 2:00 o'clock in the morning, there would be long lines waiting. The first time I went, I waited eight hours in the rain. They'd open the door and let in so many. The Communists also wanted the populace to see the spectacle of foreigners lined up, sort of begging, especially the Americans.

So we decided we could play that game another way. We began to go downtown late at night with camp stools, cards, magazines, sandwiches, coffee, and just sit around and enjoy ourselves. The Chinese have a good sense of humor, and many of them were amused to see us out there gossiping, munching on sandwiches, as though at a picnic. So the Communists were losing face.

They said, "You have to have a guarantor to get out." One of our employees, Tommy Dunn, was my guarantor, and I was very happy about that. I remembered that later when he was an employee of ours in Hong Kong.

When I finally got in, the man behind the desk had some kind of list. He had on his Mao uniform and said I had to go to another office down the hall. I went there. Another man in a Mao uniform looked at his list and said, "You're not to leave China."

I said, "What are you talking about?"

He said, "You've got labor problems."

I said, "Oh, that. That's all settled. It's all done with."

He said, "I have this letter here from USIS employee. You have labor problems." So he said he had no record of any clearance. I would have to go to the Central Labor Bureau. That was over in Broadway Mansions, across Soochow creek.

I headed for that office. The man over there, I finally got to see, said, "Yes, they had been notified. Yes, I was correct." So I said, "Will you please give me a copy of the letter or else send it to the guy?"

He said, "No. I told you it's taken care of. It's taken care of."

So I went back to the first guy, and he was huffy. Here I was caught like a yo-yo between these two officials. Meanwhile, going back and forth, the machine guns would go off, I'd duck into a doorway. I remember once -- I'm tall -- and this short soldier with a bayonet, people all jammed together, had that damn bayonet practically in my throat.

Finally, I got one of our ex-employees to go out and round up enough of them to write another letter. I gave that to the official. So that was that, or so I thought.

We were only permitted to take out $10 with us and one footlocker. It had to be inspected. When I took my footlocker down, my clothes were covered with a layer of three-by-five cards. I had planned to write a book about aviation in China. I knew many of these pilots. I had a lot of information about flying in China. Down at the wharf, one of the Communist officials came up, opened my footlocker, saw the cards, picked one up, looked at it, got a fistful, and three or four others came over. I could see the card he was holding. It was a description of an airfield, measurements, everything. I said, "Oh, Jesus Christ. That's going to do it." But this was one of those lucky things. They just threw the cards back and sealed it. Maybe they couldn't read it, I don't know.

The steamship, General Gordon, which had been a troop ship during the war, finally was permitted to come and get us. They had painted an enormous American flag on the top to keep off bombers. I had sailed on her once during the war. I went down and got in line to get on the ship. I had just got one foot on the gangway when a Communist got hold of me and said, "You've got to come back here to a shed." In the shed was an official. He had a list. He said, "You're not supposed to leave China."

I said, "What?"

He said, again, about this labor thing. But I had a copy now of this precious letter, which I showed him. I was looking at him, this one man between me and freedom. Fortunately, he let me go.

We had decided, we men from the consulate, we would give our bunks to the women and children, so they assigned us way the hell down in the hold, some lousy spot. I decided I'd sleep on deck on top of some life preservers. We sailed away down the Yangtze River, didn't hit any mines. On the ocean it felt, as people always say, like the air was cleaner, that you could breathe. You were back in freedom.

I caught a plane in Tokyo and flew to San Francisco. My wife had boarded one of the President ships in Manila. I managed to get on the pilot's boat and run out under the Golden Gate and meet her and the children.

After I left China, it was estimated the Communists had established a domestic net of over 3 million full-time propagandists, not counting other millions of part-time workers. The Central Committee planned ultimately, I read, for party propagandists to form 1% of the Chinese population. The people call them mind doctors. The Communists had basic themes carried through every means of communication, tailoring materials to different localities and situations; finding new techniques to reach illiterate masses; blackboards put in every village in China for news and cartoons; town criers, men with megaphones spread the message; newspaper reading groups; plays; street plays; letter-writing campaigns; cartoon books, very effective; and they produced in 1950, 1,000 titles and over 5 million copies. Mukden, which before the takeover had 40 cartoon book stalls. Within two years the Communists had installed 459.

The thing of symbols was interesting to me. For example, the atomic bomb. They had a symbol for the atomic bomb. They were trying to say we were guilty of germ warfare. They had a retort with a skull to represent that. They did all kinds of things with the American flag -- skulls with stars, the stripes could become a cage for a prisoner, the Statue of Liberty could be wearing atomic bombs for a hat. These symbols were given to the people right down to every level so they'd understand them. It's rather amusing, if that's the word, from those days to this, how a lot of American protesters have picked up on these varied type symbols.

I returned to Washington in the fall of 1949, Prior to the takeover, there hadn't been much press coverage of China. The American people were utterly stunned by the Communist takeover. Of course, when I got back, as usual, nobody knew anything about USIS or our work over there, no matter whether a college president or a taxi driver.

ELDEN B. ERICKSON

Clerk

Elden B. Erickson was born in Kansas in 1919. He served in the U.S. Air Force and in the U.S. Army during World War II before joining the Foreign Service in 1946. His career included positions in China, Algeria, France, Laos, Japan, Lebanon, the Netherlands, Canada, and Germany. Mr. Erickson was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1992.

ERICKSON: In the Army I had taken a trip to Rome. I remember the price was $21 for the whole round trip, including hotels, etc. It was sponsored by the military. I went to the Embassy in Rome on the Via Veneto and thought that would be a nice place to work. That gave me the idea so while I was teaching I wrote to the State Department and asked about overseas jobs. They sent me some kind of publication. It didn't say anything about the Foreign Service examination. I am not sure they were even giving it at that time.

Anyway, I filled out an application and within just a couple of months I got back a letter offering me employment as an FSS-14 at $2160 a year plus approximately a $1000 allowances. I was just working at the college and getting $3000 a year and thought "Gee, that is $160 more than I am getting now and I get to travel." So I sent a cable back and said that I would be happy to do this but had a contract with the college in Emporia until the end of the school year. They came back and said that was fine, just come when you are finished.

So, I did. They were just desperate for young people to go to China at that time. They were recruiting anyone off the streets practically...single men. So that is how I entered the Foreign Service.

Q: Did you know when you came that you were going to go to China?

ERICKSON: No, not at all. But as soon as I got to Washington I was put into a training course in the code room for people going to Russian-occupied China. We had to transmit messages through the Soviet Union at that time...from Manchuria. I was assigned to Dairen.

Q: Basically you were going as a code clerk?

ERICKSON: Well, it was clerk-general but we all had to have this code training. I thought I would go to China for a year and if I didn't like it I could go back to teaching which I knew I liked. I had no intention of pursuing a career at all.

Q: You ended up in Mukden, how did you get there?

ERICKSON: We had to have a visa for Dairen from the Russians. Personnel suggested that I take a ship to China because it usually took a long time to get a visa. They arranged everything for me. It took 45 days from New York via the Canal, Hawaii and the Philippines. I finally got to Shanghai in October 1947. I just waited there to get the visa. I was made the "meeter and greeter" so I met everybody who came into China via Shanghai. Also I was put in charge of the Commissary and just worked as a general services officer in a sense to help out while waiting for the visa.

The visa never ever came. Again, I heard it was because of my problem with the communists that I had fired when I was military government officer. There was never an explanation or anything. Finally in February the Department gave up trying to get the visa and I was sent to Mukden.

Q: Dairen was part of the old Port Arthur area of which the Soviets had control. What was the situation in China when you arrived?

ERICKSON: The Communists had still not taken over any major city. The long march had taken place and they were moving out from there. By the time I arrived they had just captured Changchun in northern Manchuria. Edmund Club and Al Siebens were the two officers there so they had to be evacuated. Club went to Peking and Siebens came to Mukden. So they were already moving down from the north with the support of the Russians, of course. After Changchun fell, they kept coming closer to Mukden.

Q: How did you get to Mukden?

ERICKSON: Military plane.

Q: When did you get there?

ERICKSON: February 1948.

Q: Was it a Consulate General?

ERICKSON: Yes.

Q: What was it like...the staffing, etc.?

ERICKSON: There were five of us young fellows...clerks, plus a vice consul, Bill Stokes; another vice consul, Fred Hubbard and his secretary; Angus Ward, who was consul general; a Japanese-American who was maintenance officer. Angus wanted to maintain as large a staff as possible in case we were taken over. He wanted to be able to send one person out as courier every couple of months. We were all volunteers. He wouldn't keep anybody unless they volunteered to stay on.

Q: I take it from what you are saying that you were getting ready for a long difficult spell?

ERICKSON: Yes, it was obvious that that was what was coming. The government figured that we would be able to work on some sort of scale with the Communists or we would just be expelled and that would be it. They didn't anticipate what actually happened.

Q: How long was it before the Communists came into Mukden?

ERICKSON: I arrived in February and they didn't come in until the first of November. We (the Chinese Nationalists) had a million troops in the city so it was pretty active and congested. The Communists would move up to the perimeter of the city and then be forced back. It was just a kind of expanding and contracting of the defense perimeter.

Q: What were you doing before the Communists took over?

ERICKSON: Well, we had regular dealings with the Nationalist government -- political, military and economic. We had an aid program at the time too. We were flying in grain to try to support them. So it was a busy time. We weren't idle at all during this period.

Q: I realize you were pretty much tied to the office but what was your impression of the Nationalist regime in that particular area?

ERICKSON: We had very little confidence in the Nationalist regime. One, because of corruption and also, whenever the defense perimeter would get broader and Chiang Kai-shek thought he could have a major victory, he would come up to take charge and whenever he appeared everything collapsed, every single time. So as far as the Nationalists were concerned we really didn't have any confidence at all that they would keep the territory.

Q: Was this sort of reporting going out?

ERICKSON: Never.

Q: What about Angus Ward at this time? How did he strike you the first few months you were there?

ERICKSON: Well, he was very much in charge. Very imposing and autocratic. He had good contacts with the Chinese authorities. He was busy constantly either with the office or working on his dictionary. You probably have heard about that.

Q: Yes, the famous dictionary which was in...

ERICKSON: He had already done it in Chinese and Mongolian, and was in the process of making it trilingual to include Japanese. He employed, himself, a Japanese teacher to help with the Japanese side. But the whole thing was handwritten...big volume-like ledgers. It was really amazing. He had a card file that was unbelievable. All done by hand.

Q: As the defense perimeter expanded and narrowed, how did you feel about the situation? As far as you know were there any feelers put out to the Communists forces?

ERICKSON: Not as far as I know. I don't think we did.

Q: What was your impression and view and experience in November 1948 when things changed?

ERICKSON: The Communists came in on the first of November and we were very apprehensive. We were on the roof of the Consulate General when they came in. We could see them coming down the main street.

Q: Had the Nationalist Army just plain pulled out?

ERICKSON: They just evaporated. They were nowhere to be seen.

We went up to the roof of the Consulate and watched them start taking over the communications building which was about two blocks down. Then they came up to our area. I remember there was an old lady that they just shot and went right on. They saw us looking over the top of the building and they started shooting at us. Of course we then ducked down. They didn't at that point come into the building.

Q: How had the Consul General prepared for this eventuality.

ERICKSON: We had lots of food in tins and sacks and sacks of flour. Angus was afraid that we would get bored so we would have to take these 48 pound sacks of flour from one room to another. And then in a month or two we would move it all up to the second floor. A couple of months later we would move it bag by bag somewhere else. He said it was to keep the mites out, etc. But it was really to keep us busy. As much as we disliked doing that it really was a good idea. But it didn't make him all that popular.

Q: Was Mrs. Ward there at that time?

ERICKSON: She was there the whole time. They lived about four blocks from the Consulate General. The rest of us had moved into the Standard Oil Compound.

Q: What happened?

ERICKSON: That is another thing you mentioned ...preparation. We had had several houses and also apartments in the Hong Kong-Shanghai Bank building. When we knew the Communists were coming in we all consolidated in the Standard Oil Compound.

Q: When they came in how was contact made?

ERICKSON: They just ignored us totally the first few days.

Q: Did you walk out?

ERICKSON: Our compound was just about two blocks away. We walked back and forth for the first 20 days. We were just totally free to do whatever we wanted.

Q: Were we trying to make contact?

ERICKSON: Yes, Angus was trying to make contact but he couldn't.

Q: Were the British there and any others?

ERICKSON: British and French. That was all.

Q: Were they doing anything?

ERICKSON: They didn't leave, but they didn't plan to leave. Even when we left a year later, they allowed us to turn over everything in the compound to the British. We had a walk through with Steventon, who was the top Brit at the time. That was the first contact we had had with the British except to wave over the wall or the gate or something like that.

They came in on November first. On November 20 they threw a cordon of guards around the Consulate building and around the Standard Oil Compound and Ward's residence. From then on we could only go with them. To go to the office they would come to the compound and march us with pistols in our back to the Consulate. We would have to show our lunch and they would inspect it, etc. Then they would bring us back in the evening. Only half of us would go each day so no one was isolated.

Q: What were you doing?

ERICKSON: Nothing, but we were showing the flag, pretending to be carrying on normally. We were moving flour part of the time.

They always gave us the newspapers. In the beginning the Chinese staff still came to work. We were translating. It was very interesting what was in the press at that time. So we were doing that. And we sent messages the first twenty days, but after that, nothing.

Q: How about that? Didn't we have wireless connections?

ERICKSON: We had transmitters.

Q: Was that forbidden after that?

ERICKSON: Well, they came and took all the equipment away. They went into every house, every room, everywhere and got any radios, anything electronic. That was the pretext for clamping down. That we were doing unauthorized transmitting.

Q: Wasn't there some kind of accusation against Angus Ward?

ERICKSON: That came later.

Q: Was there any protest?

ERICKSON: There was protest but they didn't recognize the American Consulate, the American Government, that America even existed. They stated that they didn't recognize America or the Consulate General. They just flatly said so. After the 20th they would come to the office and demand the radio equipment and this and that. And, of course, Angus stood absolutely solid against their commands.

Q: Was there any way to get word out at all?

ERICKSON: Not at all. We were totally incommunicado after the 20th. Nothing in or out.

Q: How did you feel about this after a while?

ERICKSON: Well, mostly apprehensive. We were afraid at times too, but it was more a wondering of what would happen.

Q: How long did the Chinese staff stay?

ERICKSON: I can't remember exactly. They were told very soon after we were locked up to not have any more communication with us. They still lived in the servants quarters in the compound and they would bring eggs and various things because we had no way at that point to go to the market. Although we did have canned food in the commissary. The servants would leave eggs and fresh vegetables in the basement and we would go down and find them in the morning. But we couldn't talk to them or have any communication with them. They didn't dare, and we didn't want to jeopardize their status.

Q: How was Mrs. Ward during this period of time?

ERICKSON: She stayed at home at the residence all the time. As long as Angus was there he went home every day.

Q: Were you still being marched back and forth?

ERICKSON: The whole time. But you weren't sure when they would come or if they would come. Sometimes they didn't and you just didn't go.

Q: You waited for them to escort you?

ERICKSON: We got very snotty with them. I would make a sandwich to take and would shove it in front of them to take a look at it and say "Hsiao palu" ("little Communist"). They were furious but couldn't do anything with us without instructions.

Q: Were there any anti-American demonstrations?

ERICKSON: Oh yes. Every single day. Singing and parades all along the side of our compound. I still can sing their little chant -- without communism there will be no China. Two or three hours every day in the beginning.

Another thing that was rather terrifying in the beginning was that every night we were bombed by the Nationalists. That was ironic too. Here we were being bombed by our own planes. We were hit one evening, quite a few of the windows blown out. Ralph Rehberg was hit and also Franco Cicogna. I remember picking glass with tweezers out of their lips, etc.

We had a regular drill to put water in the bath tub and open all the windows because of concussion. It was already getting cold.

Q: And, of course, that is a very cold area up there. Did you get the feeling that nobody cared or knew the situation?

ERICKSON: Yes. We had no knowledge otherwise. It was an eerie sensation. It went on and on. Then they cut off our electricity which cut off our water supply. And we had no fuel. You couldn't take a bath because there was no hot water. You just put on layers of clothing like the Chinese did. They didn't take our clothing away. Each week we were permitted to write a list in Chinese of what we wanted and give it to a couple who would come to the gate. But we couldn't speak to them. We kept ordering needles because our clothes were wearing out. The servants had done all the mending before. So that really became an important thing, to have a needle. Thread was another item.

But it was really the cold that I remember the worst. It would get 40 below and that was really cold. Then the pump would freeze. We didn't have any running water, of course. We would bake bread and the cockroaches would practically line the bread pans as it was rising. We would bake it with the cockroaches in it and then just slice the sides off...they didn't get inside the bread.

What did we do? We played bridge. We didn't have any electricity and nights start very early in the winter time. We did get candles and that was all we had. We played pinochle five days and couldn't stand it any longer so started playing bridge. They always let us buy Vodka. The vegetables -- carrots and cabbage -- we got most of the time... meat, from time to time, but it would be full of straw and dirt. However, we would just wash it up and boil it well. We were never hungry. And I think that is important in maintaining at least a modicum of morale. If you are cold and hungry that is a lot worse then being just cold.

Q: Did the authorities ever try taking a person out and threaten to kill them?

ERICKSON: They did the Chinese. They would even accuse them of taking "capitalist" baths. Eventually one night they were all taken away. We never were able to say goodbye. We had no idea, as far as I know, what happened to any of them.

Q: You mentioned that there was a Japanese-American there.

ERICKSON: He was an American citizen, Tatsumi.

Q: Yes, but obviously being oriental. Did this cause him any particular problem?

ERICKSON: There is another time frame when Angus Ward and four others were taken away and put in solitary confinement, Tatsumi was treated much worse then any of the others. They would tell him that Angus Ward was killing his wife and his children and they would have people outside, women, who would scream pretending that all of this was going on. So as far as mental torture was concern, he was probably the worst off. The five of them were in solitary confinement for four weeks. They were taken from the compound, put in solitary and then returned after four weeks. Then they were tried as criminals for assaulting one of our Chinese employees. There was lots in the Communist paper about that.

ERICKSON: There was nothing to it. He, Chi Yuheng, had been put up to it. He was a very nice man. He wouldn't ever have done this. But he came up to demand his severance pay. Ward said that he had quit and escorted him out. The press said that Ward was so rough on him that he lost control of his bladder. Also that Ward had mistreated him, etc. This was a criminal charge according to the Chinese. I think that was in April 1949.

Q: What happened when they came in and took five people away? How many of you were left?

ERICKSON: There were nine of us including the dependents, no, thirteen.

Q: What were your thoughts?

ERICKSON: We didn't know if they were coming back. When Angus was taken out to the truck, he insisted I come along. I still did my shorthand. Every time he had a meeting with the Communists I took it all down in shorthand. So when he was taken out forcefully from the Consulate with the other four, he said, "Erickson, you come along with your notebook." I had my notebook and went out the front door and towards the weapons carrier, or whatever, and the Communists kept saying "You can't go. You can't go." And to him, "You go, move on. You go, move on." We got finally just to the truck and they took their bayonets and pushed me right back into the Consulate. Angus said, "You better go back." So I escaped all the trouble, really.

Q: This must have left you feeling very isolated, even more?

ERICKSON: Yes. We had no idea what would happen to us, to them, to anybody. They were tried as criminals. So we were very surprised to see them back four weeks later.

Q: Was anyone in charge during that time?

ERICKSON: Well, Bill Stokes was in charge.

Q: But you were reading about this in the Chinese papers?

ERICKSON: No, not at that time.

Q: But you really had no feel as to what was happening?

ERICKSON: We were just too isolated.

Q: When they came back in April, then how long did you remain?

ERICKSON: In June we were charged with espionage. Up to that time we were just there, not charged with anything. I made some notes at the time:

June 1 - the radio announced that we had been closed.

June 6 - we got a telephone call and letter from Shanghai. I don't know what that said.

June 7 - a letter from Club.

Q: Were these your first letters from anybody?

ERICKSON: Yes. We hadn't heard anything from anybody until that time.

June 20 - we were charged with being spies and read about it in the newspaper.

Then there was a trial and we were charged with espionage and Bill Stokes was permitted to attend the trial.

Q: You were involved?

ERICKSON: Yes, I was charged with espionage. They had the finding ready before the trial so it went very fast.

Q: How did this trial work?

ERICKSON: Only Stokes was there. They just read off all the charges and the findings and that was it. All of it was bilingual in Chinese and Japanese.

We didn't know when Stokes left for the trial what would happen to him either.

The economic and administrative people got three years in prison. Angus and the political people -- Stokes, Hubbard -- got five years, as I recall.

All the sentences were commuted to immediate deportation and banishment forever from the Peoples Republic. That was it.

But time went on and on...

Q: Stokes came back with the results. Were you feeling that you were going to end up in jail at that time?

ERICKSON: Well, we felt we would, yes. That was the decision.

Q: At this point, what were you thinking about a Foreign Service career?

ERICKSON: I thought I would decide after a year in the Foreign Service as to whether I would stay in, well, I was locked up the whole second year. I wasn't thinking about my career at all, just of staying alive.

Q: So this trial came in June. Then what happened?

ERICKSON: We just sat there and waited. Occasionally we would get a message or something from Club in Peking. But no movement one way or another. When they did finally come I think we said that we wouldn't leave without our things. They said, "You can't take your personal belongings."

But finally one day they came in December 1949 and said to be ready to go in 24 hours. We could take 20 kilos each. Everything else was to be left behind. Of course we had to take the cats and dogs. Our captors came early one morning in December and it was cold. We got into an open personnel carrier with soldiers at all four corners covering us with rifles. After we climbed in three more came with pistols to cover us from behind. We got down to the railroad station and there was a big semicircle of military or police. We got on board this horse car with six big stalls in it and cold as the devil.

Q: This was the entire staff including Angus?

ERICKSON: Well, before that the Communists came one day around noon and said that all of the foreign staff that we had had to leave within the hour. We were not able to speak to them, so they all left. This included people we had lived with for a year. We had grown very close and fond of all of them. We could not even say goodbye to them. All of us broke down and cried, even Angus.

Q: Who were these people?

ERICKSON: There was a Russian administrative assistant, Elizabeth Butinski; accounts and disbursing assistant, Vladimir Petukhov; a German; a Czech; and another Russian, Sibagatoola Muhamedzan.

Q: A man in USIS...

ERICKSON: Yes, Mr. Bodinghaug, a German who was married to a Chinese and lived outside. He came and used the library a lot. When we were surrounded and locked up he was included. He never was permitted to have contact the whole period with his family.

The Communists said that the authorities of their countries asked that they be turned over to them.

Q: I take it most of the Russians were White Russians?

ERICKSON: Oh yes, very anti-Communist.

Q: So this was...

ERICKSON: They had all come with the Army to the East and when the Revolution succeeded they came into China and had been there since the First World War.

Q: Did you hear whatever happened to them?

ERICKSON: Petukhov, the disbursing agent, managed to get out and go to Australia.

The Russian, Sibagatoola Muhamedzan, was one of the nicest persons I have ever known. He and his wife used to take children off the street who were starving and I think they had 11 or 12 children they had picked up and were boarding. He was just a maintenance man, a low paid employee. We heard that when he got out, when he was taken away, he committed suicide because the authorities wouldn't give him anything to eat for the children and the only way to get stuff for the children was to have him commit suicide.

But that was the worst, saddest day of the whole incarceration, when they all were forced to leave the Consulate.

Q: Well, then all the Americans left. Was Ward and Mrs. Ward with you then? Did you all go together?

ERICKSON: Yes. When he was in solitary confinement for those four weeks I went over and stayed with her. They permitted me to do that.

Q: Then you were put on a train...

ERICKSON: We went to Tientsin. It was forty hours. There was an aisle and six stalls. All the windows were open despite the cold. Guards walked back and forth the whole time. We didn't know where we were going when we were put on the train. We thought we might actually be going to Siberia. We were told to bring enough food for 48 hours. Fortunately we did go to Tientsin rather than Siberia.

Q: What happened in Tientsin?

ERICKSON: All the consulates in China were still open at that time. They had sent Phil Manhard over from Peking to Tientsin. The Chinese made one person be responsible that we would not commit any crimes, etc. He was made that person. When we arrived at the train station, one by one we got off and had to go through a little building and sign documents that we had been well treated and had all our belongings. None of us could read it, but Phil Manhard said to go ahead and sign. We all got out and were turned over to the custody of the Tientsin Consulate General. We had to stay in their homes and promise not to go out. We could have no communication with anybody.

So we were there just a couple of days and then we had to go down to the waterfront and board a little tug. There had been an arrangement for the Lakeland Victory to pick us up out at Taku Bar but we had to go up the Hai River out to open water to board.

Q: There was an interview that was done by Marshall Green of Phil Manhard on this. He talked about first there was reluctance on the US part to get a ship. He said, "Listen you had better get a ship in here or otherwise your name will be mud."

ERICKSON: We got in the tug. We had to go down into the hold and it was dark and small and we were seated around like this. We got on Sunday afternoon and didn't get out to the ship until Monday morning. We couldn't move. My knees swelled. There were no toilet facilities. It was just a totally miserable trip. When we finally got there they let Angus Ward get off and go on board the ship with the Chinese. The ship was loaded with reporters who had all the good quarters. We had to take what was left over.

When some of the photographers started taking pictures, the Chinese then said they had to return the film, otherwise they were going to take us back. In the meantime, all except Angus were still stuffed in the hold. Time went on. We thought we weren't even going to get off now. We never knew what the next step was going to be throughout this whole affair. Finally one of the photographers ripped his film out and handed it over to the Chinese with a big gesture and that satisfied them, face saving for them. Finally they let us get out of the tug and go on board the ship.

Q: What sort of reception did you get? Were you hemmed in by news people?

ERICKSON: They were after us the whole time. We resented it because we had to double up in small places so that they could have the nicer rooms. They would come at midnight to ask questions.

Q: Had you been put under instructions not to talk?

ERICKSON: Yes. Don't talk about anything because it would endanger the people who were still there. We still had Hugh Redman, CIA, there. He was in the detachment at Mukden, but the rest had pulled out long before. But he stayed on for some reason. He finally died in prison there. I think his mother went over a couple of times to see him.

And Tientsin and Peking were still staffed, etc. Anything we said really could endanger people. We were told that right in the beginning. I think Angus probably had instructions to tell us. Especially when we got back to Washington. We were told to be careful to just tell the facts and not speculate.

Q: How did you find your reception back at Washington? I think we are better now, but there has been a tendency that if any people get into trouble because of the situation, to sort of avoid them. Did you feel any of that when you came back? Or maybe you were too new to the Service to sense this?

ERICKSON: I was new to the Service and hadn't held a very high position. The publicity was tremendous. We stopped in Korea and got to Yokohama and there MacArthur turned the military inside out to help us. We were met with a band at the pier. We were all given cars and chauffeurs, cards to the PX and the drivers were told to take us anywhere we wanted to go. We were really treated like top VIPs. They had flown in special cat food for Jeep, Saki, Saihan and Ranger, the Ward's cats.

Q: You might talk a little about them to give a feel for Ward's cats.

ERICKSON: Well, the Wards adored animals, but especially these four pets. My house mate, Wally Norman, and I would go occasionally to the Wards to lunch. They had a long wooden table. The cats would eat at one end and we would eat at the other end. We had cat hair in the soup, etc. They had a Chinese scroll with pictures of pheasants on it and the cats would race across the room and claw the pheasants.

Q: You were mentioning before we were on tape about a telegram that went out.

ERICKSON: Oh, about the cat house. He wanted to be able to transport the cats when we left Mukden and he sent a cable to Shanghai saying, "Request whereabouts cat house left Shanghai such and such a date." I don't remember the reply.

Another perennial telegram going out to Tehran was, "What happened to case number forty eight of a certain kind of salmon?"

Q: He had been to Tehran before?

ERICKSON: Yes, that was his post before. It was the Cat Lovers Society of America who had flown in this cat food to Yokohama especially for Ward's cats.

Q: What was Angus Ward's background?

ERICKSON: He was from Allegan, Michigan. A kind of backwoodsman type, but very intelligent. I don't know how he got interested in Russian. He was a Russian expert. Irmgard was Finnish, and had gone to school in Leningrad. She often said, "A royal school for noble children."

Q: Mrs. Loy Henderson also...

ERICKSON: Was she Finnish or Russian?

Q: I think Estonian, but she had also gone to the same school.

ERICKSON: Well, it was THE school.

That is all about the cats except that when I was back in Washington and they were still in Michigan, he called me and asked me to find a place to stay when they came to Washington that would take the cats. I went to every hotel in downtown Washington and never found a place that would take the cats. Finally they left them with his brother in Michigan.

Q: When you got back were you getting any feel for the advent of McCarthyism or had this started at that time?

ERICKSON: No. That didn't happen until I went to Algiers, my next post.

Q: What did you do when you got back to Washington?

ERICKSON: First, I checked into Personnel because I needed to get back to Kansas. It was two or three days before Christmas of 1949. So I went to Personnel and they said, "Well, we can't give you home leave because you haven't been out of the country for two years." I said, "Where have I been?" They said, "According to your records you have only been...." I then became rather sarcastic and showed them I had been out two years. I don't know if they didn't count Mukden as being overseas or what.

Two of us flew back. All the rest took a ship back to the States. Jack Feigal and I wanted to be home for Christmas. When we got here Assistant Secretary Butterworth called us in and welcomed us home. I don't feel that there was any ignoring of us. I think they were so glad to have the problem settled.

At the press conference for the two of us they kept asking hadn't it affected us, how did we feel, weren't we nervous? I said, "No." And the next day the Washington Post had a big headline: "Erickson says nerves on edge." I kept insisting that was not true.

Afterwards I flew to Kansas City and my brother and his wife met me there. Again there were reporters at the station but we avoided them. We drove the 200 miles to Concordia. We even stopped for lunch...my picture was in every local paper in Kansas and the people recognized me and wanted to give us a free lunch. It was a very well-known incident at the time. It was before TV.

Q: At that point how did you feel about the Foreign Service?

ERICKSON: Well, it is foolish now as I look back on it, but I became very idealistic and very anti-communist and wanted to do anything to really eliminate communism. When they asked me where I wanted to go I said, "I will go to any border country and do anything I can..."

Q: I think this is one of the things we are trying to do, to reconstruct the period. You had a heavy dose of what we saw as the problem with a communist regime. Most of the people of our generation, this was essentially what their careers were about.

ERICKSON: Well, they laughed at me. They really did think I was foolish to want to go back. They thought there must have been something wrong with me. And there probably was. Anyhow that is how I felt at the time.

Ambassador John H. Holdridge was born in New York in 1924. He graduated from the US Military Academy in 1945 and served as a 1st lieutenant overseas until 1948. He joined the Foreign Service in 1948. His overseas posts include Bangkok, Beijing, Hong Kong, Peking, and Singapore. He was the ambassador to Singapore from 1975 to 1978 and to Indonesia from 1982 to 1986. Ambassador Holdridge was interviewed by Marshall Green and Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1989 and by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1995.

Q: John Holdridge has had a remarkable career. He is one of the two people I know who is a West Point graduate and who ended up in the State Department. Hank Byroade is the other one.

Ambassador Holdridge has been my colleague on three occasions. First, I was regional planning advisor for East Asia back in the late 1950s. During that time, he was the Department's intelligence officer dealing with that part of the world.

My second encounter with him is when I was consul general in Hong Kong from 1961 to 1963. He was chief of the political section all during the time I was there and for some time after that.

The third encounter was quite a famous one. It had to do with the time when he was working for Henry Kissinger in the National Security Council as specialist on China affairs. He also helped to arrange for Henry Kissinger's miraculous visit to China, behind the backs of most of us in the State Department. During that time, I was the assistant secretary for that part of the world. He and I eventually accompanied President Nixon out to China. Thereafter, John and I visited all the posts in East Asia to enlighten the leaders in that part of the world with regard to our China policy.

John remained in the Service. Subsequently, he served as ambassador in Singapore, assistant secretary of state, and ambassador to Indonesia, retiring finally in January 1986.

John, as a West Point graduate and as one who had fought in World War II with the Army, how did you get into China specialization?

HOLDRIDGE: It was a rather circuitous route. Unfortunately, I graduated from West Point in June of 1945 and I missed the fighting. What I saw was the aftermath of World War II -- the picking up of the pieces.

My first introduction came through Army connections. My father was an Army officer stationed in the Philippines. In those days, all good Army officers were paid enough and saved quite a bit on the Philippine economy. They saved up their money and went up to China just before they returned home.

It was possible to pick up the Army transport at Qinhuangdao Shandong. We went first to Hong Kong, Canton, and Shanghai. We then went to Japan for a couple of weeks --

Q: How old were you?

HOLDRIDGE: I was eleven. Then we went to Beijing via Tientsin for the period of early March to early May. This is all in 1937, just as the Japanese war was beginning to generate. In fact, we traveled on a Japanese ship serving as a troop transport from Osaka to New Port, or XinGang as it is now called. It was just loaded to the gunnels with Japanese troops. It was an Osaka Shosen Kaishan ship, which I am sure you are familiar with.

In the city of Beijing itself you could feel a sort of tenseness. We stayed at a place called the College of Chinese Studies, which was cheap. We always looked for something less expensive. Missionaries and businessmen came there to learn to speak Chinese. It was located in the Tartar City in the northeastern quadrant of Beijing, very close to where the foreign ministry today is, in fact.

One of my early memories of that place was seeing the Japanese troops marching through the old city walls, since torn down, for exercises. The Japanese presence was all over the place. I ran into some Chinese Army language officers at that time and fell in love with Beijing. I resolved that, if I ever had the chance, I would learn Chinese.

After graduation from West Point, I was sent to Korea and spent two and a half years there and came back. I had taken my Foreign Service exams while in Korea, thinking that this might be something --

Q: This is Korea before the war?

HOLDRIDGE: This was in 1947. I spent those several years in Korea primarily as an engineer officer. Dick Ericson, whom you may recall, was the only other member of the group of several hundred who took the exams and who passed, as far as I know, and who came into the Foreign Service.

Coming back to Washington, I had been informed shortly before my time was up in Korea that I had passed the exams and that I could go in, if I could pass the orals. I went from Fort Belvoir, where I was assigned, to take the orals in Washington, D. C. Old Joe Green was the head of the Board of Examiners and I passed. It took me two months to get in instead of the two years that it sometimes takes now. Shortly after I became a Foreign Service officer, I was asked if I wanted to take Chinese language training. I was in the FSI at that time. I jumped at it.

Q: So they gave you the offer of Chinese? You didn't go to them?

HOLDRIDGE: Yes.

Q: This is early 1948 that you are talking about.

HOLDRIDGE: Yes. I joined the Foreign Service in May of 1948 and left the Army in March. While I was in the FSI, the usual problems cropped up. They had money for instruction but no money for travel. They couldn't send people back from overseas. They snatched up some of the younger guys who were available and asked if they wanted to take Chinese language or other languages. In fact, I found myself in a class essentially with Japanese language officers, Owens Zurhellen and Dave Osborn and Ed Seidensticker.

Q: A lot of my colleagues with whom I had gone to Boulder (U.S. Navy Japanese Language School).

HOLDRIDGE: That's right. They were graduates of Boulder, to a man. I was the only Chinese officer among them. I went on from FSI to Cornell and then to Harvard, studying Chinese all this time. That is how I got into the business. I had this predisposition going back to 1937. In 1948, the Foreign Service gave me the opportunity, which I took gladly.

Q: You really had three years of language study, didn't you? It was FSI, Cornell, and Harvard.

HOLDRIDGE: Well, I did because the FSI course was a compressed one-year course into a couple of months. Then I went on into Chinese at Cornell. That included literary Chinese. We were studying the characters in newspaper Chinese and the works.

Q: Was Harvard the same thing?

HOLDRIDGE: Yes. Again, we studied Legg's Classics.

Q: You really had a good immersion in Chinese language, didn't you?

HOLDRIDGE: The problem was that, in my judgement, they concentrated too much on the literature and the written Chinese and not enough on the spoken. It took me quite a while to fit into --

Q: That was exactly my problem with studying Japanese. Your first assignment was to Bangkok.

HOLDRIDGE: Yes. There I was Chinese language officer for, of all things, USIS. I was the most junior officer in the embassy there, but I had an area of concern which was the very large Chinese population in Thailand. At that time, they thought it was useful to make a distinction between the Thai Thai and the Chinese Thai.

Q: They got along pretty well with each other, didn't they?

HOLDRIDGE: It's the only country in Southeast Asia where you find the religious situation is compatible. That is, the Thai are Buddhists. They happen to be Theravada Buddhists. The Chinese are Buddhists who happen to be Mahayana Buddhists. There is no prejudice on religious grounds. The practices aren't, of course, exactly similar.

Q: Didn't they force the Thai Chinese to take Thai names, that is, to give up their Chinese names?

HOLDRIDGE: They did that. Indeed, the Chinese were much more separate until 1926 when the then king of Thailand -- I think it was King Prajatipok -- decided that this was intolerable and that there had to be a reduction in Chineseness and an increase in Thainess. This is when they took Chinese names, and language instruction in Chinese was curtailed rather drastically.

Q: That went way back to 1926?

HOLDRIDGE: Yes. That started in 1926.

Q: Were you able to do much in terms of foreign policy?

HOLDRIDGE: Yes. I issued pamphlets. They were all very strongly anti-Chinese Communist at that time, which is rather ironic considering what came later. We probably made the egregious error of raising the Chinese Communist threat to the point where it seemed like a big bugaboo -- "Stick with us fellows and we'll take care of you." However, there was always that little question mark.

Q: You were there for three years and then went on to Hong Kong.

HOLDRIDGE: Yes. There I started out as one of the interviewers of people who were then leaving China mainland in large numbers -- businessmen and quite a few of the Catholic padres. This was in 1953.

Q: Most of the people had fled China already, hadn't they?

HOLDRIDGE: The missionaries stayed on as long as they possibly could. Do you remember Bob Aylward? Well, their good friends were the Ricketts. They had stayed on even though they had been on house arrest. They were teaching out at Yenching , later Beijing Daxueh, or University, in Beijing. They came out at that time, around 1954.

Q: Was your job as a political officer in Hong Kong related to this problem of getting missionaries out of China?

HOLDRIDGE: It was not getting them out but to pump them of their information as to what was going on in China. I was a debriefer essentially. Later on, after that phase was over, I became in charge of the press monitoring unit.

Q: Yes. This, I think, served a great purpose in foreign policy. When I was in Hong Kong, I recall that we had about 21 people in that translation unit, and several times a year we were putting out about 800 copies of translations. Was that true back in 1953?

HOLDRIDGE: That was true then. We were the beneficiaries of some very fortunate circumstances. Quite a few of the Chinese analysts and interpreters/translators, who had been with the consulate general in Beijing and even in Shanghai, were able to make it out. They set up shop with the American consulate general in Hong Kong. We had, in effect, an institutional memory.

Q: You were also getting lots of newspapers, magazines, letters, and things like that.

HOLDRIDGE: Yes. It was mostly newspapers and magazines. Part of the press monitoring unit at the time was publications procurement. We had one officer on the staff, Al Harding, who was the publications procurement officer. We went around and managed to get papers from all over.

Q: The British authorities in Hong Kong were also debriefing the Chinese refugees who were coming in, weren't they?

HOLDRIDGE: That's quite right.

Q: Did you have access to their information?

HOLDRIDGE: Yes. Since it is 30 years and more since that time, I can say that we cooperated quite fully.

Q: We really had a tremendous wealth of information about what was going on in China, which was probably superior to anything outside of China anywhere in the world.

HOLDRIDGE: That was our feeling. One of the things I always felt is that, during this period when we didn't have relations with China, we did not lack for actual information as to what was going on. We were able to keep up with the internals and some of the problems quite well, even though it was like the old Chinese doctor treating one of the emperor's concubines. He couldn't see the woman directly, but he sat behind a screen and she described her symptoms to him. Then he had this little carved ivory doll which he could use. . .[Laughter]

Q: It's interesting because, when you were in Hong Kong getting this flow of information, I was in Sweden. I was the first secretary of the embassy in Sweden. I had very good contacts with the Swedish foreign office, whose ambassador in China was picking up magazines -- such as railroad magazines, etc. and things which were unclassified -- and making them available to me. I would then make them available back to the Department. I was contributing a little bit to this flow of information about the great mysteries of what was going on inside of China.

HOLDRIDGE: I claim credit for one piece of reporting which I think was rather foresighted. In 1956, before I left Hong Kong, I was transferred to Singapore as political officer and head of the political section.

In April of 1956, the Chinese established what was called the Preparatory Committee for the Autonomous Region of Tibet. They had quite a conclave of senior people -- the Chinese leading official whose name I can't remember, the Dalai Lama, etc. The Dalai Lama made a speech which was carried intact in the Chinese press which we, of course, translated. It was also released in English version, in the New China News Agency version in English.

A comparison of the two, which I made, showed that there were some very significant omissions from the Chinese in the English version. For example, the Dalai Lama was quoted as saying that the Chinese had built many roads in Tibet, and he was very grateful for this development of his country. He went on to say, "However, in the course of the construction of these roads, many of our people gave up their valuable lives, and we send our sincere condolences to the families of these people."

In other words, there was something wrong there. There were a number of other spots in that where you could see that the Chinese had overridden religious scruples. They had changed the social system, and there were deep resentments.

Before I left in 1956, I wrote this one dispatch -- we don't write dispatches anymore since everything goes by cable. I came to the conclusion that the Chinese were having a real problem in maintaining their control in Tibet. If they thought they had it hand, they were "whistling in the dark."

Later on, I saw a British evaluation of my report. They said, "No, no, no. This guy is way off base."

But this was three years before the Dalai Lama -- the Khambas -- revolted in Tibet and the Dalai Lama fled with his whole entourage. He's been in India and other places in the world ever since. I feel that this is the kind of thing you could do --

Q: Don't you think, John, in retrospect that writing these dispatches contributed a great deal to the maturing of your own judgement by focusing in greater depth on the issue, rather than by flashing off these telegrams one after the other.

HOLDRIDGE: Absolutely. This was because you had to think. You couldn't just look at the superficial aspects of it. You had to stop and ponder, considering what this was going to mean now, in a few years from now, or later on down the road.

Q: Then there was a studious effort by the State Department, too, to commend those officers who turned in meritorious reports. Therefore, you realized that there was some recognition. There was a kind of incentive, in other words, to work hard in your job because it was rewarded in the form of Departmental recognition which, obviously, led to possible better jobs.

In Singapore -- again, you had a Chinese community. I assume that is why you were assigned to a city seventy-three per cent Chinese.

HOLDRIDGE: That's right.

Q: Did you conduct much of your work in Chinese?

HOLDRIDGE: I tried to keep up with my Chinese as much as possible. In Singapore, English was and remains the language of government and business. When I first got there, though, the big problem was the clash between exponents of Chinese culture and education and the British colonial establishment -- essentially, the schools that had been set up by the British missionaries or others who taught in English. An example is Raffles College. I hadn't been there but a few weeks when the riots occurred in 1956. It was then that the Chinese community challenged the colonial authorities, who would have none of it, over the issue of Chinese education and culture. They (the British) had battalions they brought in from all over Malaya, despite the emergency. They were not at all reluctant to use force. They put that Chinese disturbance down very promptly.

Q: What was that disturbance aiming to achieve?

HOLDRIDGE: It was to establish Chinese as an accepted language of business, commerce, and government in Singapore.

Q: Many years later you were ambassador to Singapore. By that time had English and Chinese become co-equal officially?

HOLDRIDGE: The funny part of it was that, once the Chinese won the battle, they did get Chinese accepted as an equal language, along with English, Tamil, and Malay. Then Chinese became an official language.

Once that was accomplished, the Chinese began to send all their kids to the English track because that was where all the money was to be made.

Q: Of course, back in 1953 Singapore was not a separate country. It was part of Malaya.

HOLDRIDGE: We used to have great arguments. Elbridge Durbrow was my consul general for a good part of the time. Derby, of course, is a very strong personality. In theory, Singapore was responsible for the consulate general in Kuala Lumpur. The two consuls general did not get along very well. There was some real tension there. In August of 1957, Malaya became independent. Singapore was not a part of it. It remained a British crown colony.

The problem has always been in that area of the world the population, the communal difficulties between the Malays who, in theory, are the preponderant race, and the Chinese who had moved in and established a very strong position in the business commercial world. Economically speaking, the Malays were way behind.

Singapore was kept different. When Malaya was established, the Malayan leaders, the Tungku did not want Singapore in. This was because it might tip the balance in favor of Chinese preponderance. The way that question was eventually resolved was that Sarawak and North Borneo were also brought into Malaysia. This was somewhere in 1965. All these various components were brought in so that there would be a Malay, or a non-Chinese, majority.

Q: This brings us back to roughly 1958 when you went back to be in charge of Chinese affairs at the State Department.

HOLDRIDGE: I wasn't in charge. I was one of the spear carriers. [Laughter]

Q: How long were you back there?

HOLDRIDGE: That was 1958 to 1962. I was in the old Office of Chinese Affairs.

Q: Who was the head of the spear carriers at that time?

HOLDRIDGE: Ed Martin was for a good part of the time. Larry Lutkins, who had been my boss and head of the political section in my first tour in Hong Kong, was the number two.

Q: This was in FE.

HOLDRIDGE: This was FE -- Bureau of Far Eastern Affairs and Office of Chinese Affairs. Ed Martin was the head for a period that was the most extensive and the most important, because the Taiwan Strait crisis came along about that time.

Q: The focus was so much on Taiwan. China almost meant Taiwan in those days. Hong Kong was, obviously, directed towards the mainland. Otherwise, in the Bureau most of the officers were working on Taiwan.

HOLDRIDGE: Well, we were defending the integrity of Taiwan. I hate to think of how many thousands of man-hours went into defending Taiwan's position in the United Nations and other international organizations, as well as making sure that the budget carried a sufficient amount of military assistance for Taiwan. We also had the AID program going, which was remarkably successful development assistance and which eventually reached the point where Taiwan became self-sufficient, economically speaking.

Q: When you get back to the period of 1958 to 1962, that was the time of Walter Robertson. He dominated the China field. He was very much of a Sino-centric when it came to East Asian policy. I found that, while writing speeches for him, they would only pass muster if I pledged allegiance to Chiang Kai-shek.

HOLDRIDGE: Walter Spencer Robertson III, a Richmond lawyer, was a devoted, dedicated anti-communist. In those days, that was quite all right. In fact, it was the thing to do. I can remember Walter Robertson always talking about the Chinese Communists and how they had killed 20 million people. This was the era of the Committee of Two Million in the United States, Congressman Walter Judd, Senator Knowland from Oakland, California, and Admiral Radford, commander of the Seventh Fleet. Actually, he was CINCPAC at that time. This is the environment in which we labored. Of course, McCarthy was floating around in the background.

We had at this moment the Taiwan Strait crisis in this period 1958 to 1962. The first element of it was the Chinese Communists threatened to take the Dachen Islands, which are a little chain of islands in the Taiwan Strait. They were terribly exposed, and the United States persuaded Chiang Kai-shek to evacuate the Dachens in 1953.

In 1958 there was the second crisis. Marshall Green was very much involved in this one as regional planning adviser. I have to give Marshall credit for an enormous contribution to American foreign policy, and that was the Dulles-Chiang Kai-shek communiqué that came out in October of 1958. I have always admired this. This is the one in which the wording was something along the lines that Taiwan was the repository, in effect, of the values of the Chinese people, but it was not, in effect, China. This was a kind of parenthetical statement that wasn't there. It went on to say that we supported Chiang Kai-shek's ambitions to restore freedom to the people on the mainland, but this was to be accomplished mainly by political means and not the use of force. That is Marshall Green's contribution.

Q: I am glad you mentioned this because I did not mention it in my contribution to the oral history. I do recall very well drafting that. The return of the mainland lay in the hearts and the minds of the Chinese people. The idea was that Taiwan was the temporary repository of the culture, wisdom, and history of China. It would eventually be embraced in all of China.

HOLDRIDGE: In drafting this and giving this particular thrust to it, was there opposition or forces who were trying to get us to say something different?

Q: No, there wasn't. The problem here was that Dulles was about to go out on a trip to Taiwan. This is at what appeared to be the end of the firing on the offshore islands. There had been a complete lull. He was going to sign a communiqué with Chiang Kai-shek. What kind of language could we put into this kind of communiqué that Ambassador Holdridge was referring to that would be acceptable to Taiwan while, at the same time, making it clear that we had a long-range interest in the restoration of the whole of China. Also, we wanted to make clear that we just didn't see Taiwan as a separate appendage hanging out there in the distance and that it was unrelated to China. It was very important that it be regarded as an integral part of China.

HOLDRIDGE: We were not supporting Chiang Kai-shek's return to the mainland by use of force.

Q: We tried to discourage the use of force, making them realize that, if they could live a life of virtue, this would radiate out and, in time, would have a favorable impact on all of China. In a way, this has happened.

HOLDRIDGE: Marshall, I've got to add something else. We were on another track from 1954 on, as well. That was that we tried to resume some degree of contact with the Chinese Communists. Zhou En-lai was the instigator or initiator of that at the Bandung Conference in April of 1955. He proposed that the United States and China get together to resolve their differences -- to talk about resolving them, anyway. There had already been a contact in 1954 at the Geneva Conference which addressed the resolution of Indochina. Ed Martin was along on that and met some of his Chinese friends from earlier days.

In 1955 we began the ambassadorial-level talks which went on, off and on, between 1955 and 1970. The idea was to try to keep some degree of contact with the Chinese Communists. Alex Johnson headed up the team which was sitting in Geneva. He was actually in Prague. Wang Ping-nan, who was his opposite number, was in Warsaw. They used to come down and meet in Geneva. In the beginning, these meetings occurred weekly, and then they became more sporadic. I sat in on them for a few weeks in 1956. We came awfully close to having some degree of accord with the Chinese over Taiwan at this time.

The whole thing rotated around the wording of a joint communiqué in which we looked to resolve the dispute between us by peaceful means. John Foster Dulles, the good old Presbyterian elder of the church, had put in a comma after this "by peaceful means" and said, "Including the dispute in the Taiwan Strait."

This made life extremely difficult. Alex Johnson has probably recounted that period, too.

Q: The 1954 meeting was famous because Dulles refused to shake the hand of Zhou En-lai.

HOLDRIDGE: That came up somewhat later in my own contacts with the Chinese. They never forgot that, and they haven't forgotten it yet. This is probably lingering around in the minds of some --

Q: That's why, when Nixon came out of the plane at Beijing in February of 1972, the first thing he did was to dramatically shake the hand of Premier Zhou En-lai. This was the beginning of the new era.

HOLDRIDGE: May I skip ahead a few years in this regard. When I came in with Kissinger to Beijing in July of 1971, we were met at the airport by Marshal Yeh Chien-ying, accompanied by Huang Hua, the man who later became ambassador to the United Nations and then to the U.S. The old marshal, Yeh, was the senior man to meet Henry Kissinger. He and Henry got in the first car, a Hung Ch'i or Red Flag, and drove off. I found myself with Huang Hua in car number two, also a Hung Ch'i with the usual drapery on the sides.

The first thing Huang said to me was, "You know, in 1954 at Geneva, your Secretary of State refused to shake the hand of our premier, Premier Zhou En-lai."

I thought to myself, "Ah-ha! Is this what we're working up to. They don't want to have a repetition of some silly situation such as that."

I hastily assured Huang that we had not come all these miles, through such a circuitous and secret route, simply to have this situation recur as had occurred in 1954.

I said, "There will be no problem."

It was interesting when Kissinger was there at the guest house in Beijing, waiting for Zhou En-lai. There were a host of photographers around. Zhou drives up in his limousine, gets out, and extends his hand. Kissinger extends his hand, handshake, and boom, boom, boom, boom -- flashbulbs all over the place, videotape, etc. This was an historic handshake.

Q: Getting back to this period of 1957, 1958, and 1959 when we were both working for Walter Robertson, this was also the time when we had the first indications of the Sino-Soviet rift. Do you have any recollections about when you felt a clear indication of such a rift occurring?

HOLDRIDGE: The first sign of it was in 1959 during the anniversary of Lenin's birthday. In Beijing's media, out comes this big editorial on "Long Live Leninism." This, in effect, took to task the "modern revisionists" for having deviated from the true course, saying that it was impossible to really bring about the victory of communism by peaceful means, that there had to be bloodshed. Later on, we found that he had also said elsewhere, in another context, that if 20 million Chinese died in the course of a nuclear war, there would be many, many more Chinese to carry on the tradition.

This was a real break with the Soviet Union, although they did not make it, as such. They called it an attack on Yugoslav modern revisionism to begin with. It was only later that they dropped the "Yugoslav" and began to attack the Soviets directly.

A lot of people, when this editorial came out, couldn't believe it. They thought that we kept saying that the cohesive factors are more important than the divisive factors in the Sino-Soviet relationship. It didn't work out that way.

Q: Actually, back in 1957 when the Soviets put up Sputnik there was a Chinese reaction. They sent two or three delegations to Moscow with a clear intention of trying to share in this breakthrough and to, somehow, have it contribute to the glory of China. They were rebuffed. Shortly after that, the Soviets were pressing China on trying to declare a nuclear-free zone in the Far East. This was a better line for the Chinese to take than to try and participate in the development of nuclear weapons.

I was following this very closely with Alice Cia, who was with the Rand Corporation in California. I took about two or three trips there. It was very interesting because already there were clear indications the Chinese nose was out of joint. We know that the Chinese nose was out of joint at the time when the Russians walked into Manchuria; and the yellow peril attitudes of the Russians towards the Chinese go way back.

When you talk about 1959, then it was becoming really much more out in the open. In 1962, you went to Hong Kong.

Q: Did you feel under any particular restraints about thinking right concerning China and overall communism within the Department, or could one raise the issue of when could we recognize them? Could you talk about the split without running across ideology from up above? How did you feel?

HOLDRIDGE: I think there were some cautions in the minds of people. You remember Josiah Bennett? He was the director of the political section in the old Office of Chinese Affairs. Shortly before the Taiwan Strait crisis erupted in 1958, he came out with a white paper, which he had written, on U.S. policy toward China, which was support down the line for Taiwan.

Then, at the very last, he said, "However, should the situation on the Chinese mainland change to the point where China would begin to live in peace with its neighbors, we would be willing to take another look at China policy."

Even then, we always had this feeling in the back of our minds -- through the Geneva talks, the ambassadorial-level talks, and in various ways -- that we didn't want to foreclose any opportunities which might open in the future. We wanted some kind of a relationship. In addition to that, Dulles was very upset by the second offshore-islands crisis, and the fact that Chiang Kai-shek insisted on keeping a large percentage of his forces on those highly exposed islands. This was a strong temptation for the Chinese Communists, as we called them in those days, to knock them out. In so doing, they could destroy effectively all the will to resist on the part of all of Taiwan. Therefore, it was a pawn that the Chinese Communists could take advantage of. Therefore, there was a great deal of disagreement and problems that we had with Chiang Kai-shek over the disposition of his forces, and their unwillingness to withdraw them.

Dulles said, "Never again are we going to get ourselves involved in one of these things."

This began to have another effect of making us more and more wary of becoming too much the protagonist for the causes of the Chinese nationalists, and not taking a broader view of the total problem of China. I think that Dulles, who had been one of the strongest pro-Chiang Kai-shek types when he first came aboard in the State Department, by the time he died in 1959, he had a rather different view of the problem -- a much more comprehensive understanding of the total-

China problem.

Q: Meanwhile, of course, Walter Robertson, who had been such a strong protagonist of the Chinese nationalists, was soon to leave the stage. He left by 1960, and Jeff Parsons took over. Jeff was a career Foreign Service officer who had a very balanced view of the total problem. The atmosphere was already beginning to change by 1960.

You went to Hong Kong in 1962. I was already in Hong Kong when you arrived. You became head of the political section.

HOLDRIDGE: At that time it was first the political section. Then it became the mainland reporting unit. We discovered that it made very little sense to differentiate between politics and economics. The two sections that were reporting on mainland China, economic and political, were merged into a mainland China reporting unit, which also included the press monitoring unit and the publications procurement effort that we had. We had quite a number of people working hard on analyzing what was going on in China economically and politically.

Q: We divided because we had responsibilities for (1) Hong Kong and Macau, which had both a political and an economic aspect to it, and (2) mainland China. I would say that one of the things that struck me about that year of 1962 when you arrived was that Heyward Isham, who was in your section covering Sino-Soviet relations, found it impossible to find words strong enough to convey the tone of Chinese broadcasts against the Soviet Union. The language was so scatological, so intense and vituperative, that he despaired on being able to show that it was getting even worse than it was yesterday. [Laughter]

HOLDRIDGE: This all began with that "Long Live Leninism" editorial, but it got worse and worse. Then it became a personal diatribe. On the one hand you had Mao Zedong who, if he didn't write these editorials, was certainly the one who said that this is what you will put into them. On the other hand it was Mr. Khrushchev up until 1964. Then, when he was replaced by Brezhnev, the Chinese didn't change the tone one iota. They simply said that the new leaders were even worse than Khrushchev because they were smarter. [Laughter]

Q: One of the things that I recall -- and I'm very interested in your comments on it -- is that Chiang Kai-shek, or the Chinese nationalists, were using Hong Kong as a base for operations in the areas of mainland China, not too far from Hong Kong which caused great distress both to the British authorities as well as to the consulate general. I do recall going up to Taiwan one time -- of course, we sent messages to Washington about that and to our ambassador in Taipei urging that somehow we put a restraint on this because the British were getting very upset. Also, it wasn't doing us or anybody any good. These little pinpricks, if anything, were being used by the Chinese Communists to steel their people and make them all the more vigilant, driving them more into their little shell. Our thinking in the consulate general was the other way around.

I was wondering if you recall those particular episodes. There was one particular episode that I remember fairly well which was at the time of the breakdown of law and order in Guangdong Province in May of 1962 when all these refugees came flowing into Hong Kong. It was quite clear there was a breakdown. At that time, the Chinese Communists were trying to get the young people in the cities back into the rural areas, to reconstruct their attitudes. A lot of them refused to go, and they came down to Hong Kong.

In this period of inner turmoil in China, there was a kind of an opportunity for us to exploit -- at least, for the Chinese nationalists to exploit. We were very careful not to do that. I remember putting a staying hand on the wrist of our embassy in Taipei in order to tell them not to stir things up and that it wouldn't do any good. More than that, we wanted to convey to Peking that this was our position. Do you recall that?

HOLDRIDGE: Yes. I recall that we took a very dim view of some of the things that the nationalists were doing. For example, they para-dropped a unit of several hundred men into Hainan. Of course, the Chinese Communists rounded these people up in short order, and they all were discovered with American equipment still with the U.S. ordinance device stenciled on the outside of the crates. It made our position very shaky. The Chinese would come out from time to time and blast that Hong Kong was being used as a base for espionage by the American imperialists. It didn't help our situation any. The British were uncomfortable. They may have withheld some of the cooperation, as a consequence. I think that some of the people who worked on another floor in the consulate general were rather bothered in their relationship with the special branch as a consequence.

Q: I remember you, John Lacey and I, as well as others in the consulate general were already beginning to see our problems with China in the long range as involving a first stage of entering into a more civil discourse with the Chinese and relieving them of any kind of fears that we were trying to exploit their internal problems. We were very active in this field, not under instructions from Washington although we reported our actions to Washington. It was because we felt that this was in our long-range interests. We were trying to calm down their vicious anti-Americanism and make them engage in at least a more civil discourse with us. This point about conveying to Peking the fact that our government was not trying to exploit their internal problems and trying to set the stage for a long-term, better relationship -- realizing that it was going to take some time -- this was conveyed to their representative. As you know, they had a number of business representatives in Hong Kong. Who actually transmitted this information? I know it was authorized, because I got the authority from Washington. Who actually did it to whom, I don't recall.

HOLDRIDGE: Frankly, I don't. I do believe that, in the course of our ambassadorial-level talks, something of this sort was also conveyed. As I said, these things went on from 1955 until 1970 sporadically. For a long time, they were bogged down. The Chinese wanted to talk about major issues and the major relationship. We said we had to settle the lesser issues first, such as non-repatriated Americans, etc. This is a familiar one.

I believe, in the course of these -- and you would have to check these with Jake Beam or with Alex Johnson -- that we did make it plain that we were not seeking to try to change the situation on the mainland. In fact, our conclusion in Hong Kong was that, despite problems such as floods, droughts, or problems generated by the collapse of the Great Leap Forward, which began to fall apart by 1962, China was going to be remaining under the control of the communists. There wasn't anything that anybody from the outside was going to be able to do about it, certainly not Taiwan.

Q: Don't you think that, in this period of 1962 and 1963, there was a little bit of an opening in the clouds. You talked about the end of the Great Leap Forward. Clearly, it had been a disaster, and the Chinese knew that. Meanwhile, they were more and more concerned with the Soviets and the Soviet threat. Our interventions, both in Geneva or Warsaw, as well as in Hong Kong, were conveying the impression that we are not trying to exploit their internal problems. It seemed to me that there was an opening there. We were trying in the consulate general to make best use of it. We were trying to allow Americans to travel to China, to end our foreign assets control regulations. Obviously, this was a great nuisance and had nothing to do with our overall relations with China. It was more of an irritant. In other words, we were creating irritants for American businessmen, for American scholars who wanted to go to China. They couldn't get into China because China wouldn't let them, but it would appear to the world that we were the ones who were keeping them out.

HOLDRIDGE: As a matter of fact, I think that, to an extent, we were. We tried very hard, for example, to suggest that maybe some sales of humanitarian items to the Chinese would be in order. We finally allowed American journalists to travel. However, by that time the Chinese were so angered over the whole situation, they refused to give any visas.

Q: That's true. We anticipated that might be the reaction, but we generally wanted to have people go in to find out what was going on. On the other hand, we were still up against a dead-head attitude back in Washington which was part of the cold-war mentality. They still saw these things in very rigid, red and white terms. In the consulate general, we saw opportunities -- not just to gauge in a more civil discourse with China, but also possibly to be removing irritants, at the same making it clear that it was China keeping them out and not us keeping them out. That is one of the things we succeeded in doing.

HOLDRIDGE: Yes. We were, of course, the forward-most element in the United States-China policy at that time. We were the listening post, and we could make a lot of recommendations which, you might say, forecast the future. There wasn't anybody else, really, that they had to pay attention to.

Q: In 1962, we had a more sympathetic audience, you might say, back in Washington. Governor Harriman became assistant secretary in 1962. Chester Bowles was the Under Secretary of State. Both of them were very interested in a change in our China policy. What we were saying in Hong Kong had a very responsive resonance in Washington in the form of the new Under Secretary, as well as President Kennedy. He was interested in some of the things we were saying and doing in Hong Kong. It resulted in my being asked back to Washington in the early fall of 1963 to take a new look at our China policy. While all this was going on, Ambassador Holdridge was in Hong Kong. You were there all during this period until 1966.

HOLDRIDGE: I saw the breakdown of the Great Leap Forward. Incidentally, our political analysts were able to predict the Chinese attack on India in 1962, because of the tenor of the sound of the Chinese pronouncements about the border clashes. Blood debt had been incurred, and the debt had to be repaid, etc. During all this period, I was able to witness the collapse of the Great Leap Forward, Mao Zedong being shoved into the background, and as you say, there was a more rational attitude for a period on the part of the leadership, headed essentially by Liu Shao-chi, who was really the second man under Mao. Liu Shao-chi and Xiaoping were people who were trying to run a much more realistic policy with the old ideology sitting in the background, glowering and waiting for a chance. This chance finally came in August of 1966 with the Cultural Revolution. In the meantime, there obviously had been some real problems inside China.

In September of 1965, for example, Lin Biao, then the minister of defense, had come out with a long diatribe saying, "Long live the victory of people's war."

Mao was still keeping up this barrage against the Soviet Union on behalf of his version of the future, and how to bring about the victory of communism. The other people seemed to be much more interested in running a country in a realistic, pragmatic, practical way. They had a lot of problems they had to face. At this time, it is conceivable -- had it not been for Mao coming out of the wilderness again in August 1966 with the great proletarian Cultural Revolution -- that there might have been an easing of the tensions, but there wasn't.

The whole thing was deferred until -- I could give you a watershed -- first of all, the election of Nixon. Marshall may have contributed to Nixon's view of China with his long chat with Nixon in Jakarta in 1967. This is prior to the issuance of a Foreign Affairs Quarterly article in October of 1967, which advocated a restoration of a relationship between China and the United States. Then, when Nixon came in, among the first things he did was to order a restudy of China policy. That was subsequently followed up by removal of a considerable number of our trade controls, removal of the certificate of origin -- which used to be an onus to us in that any item that was brought into the United States had to show that it was not produced in mainland China -- as well as the removal of restrictions on travel, provided the Chinese wanted to give visas to Americans who wanted to go. All of this occurred with Nixon.

I came back from Hong Kong in 1966. I went into an office in the Bureau of Intelligence and Research. I was number two. Eventually, a year or so later I was the office director of the Office of Research and Analysis for East Asia and the Pacific, known as REA. My job, on the one hand, was briefing senior people such as Bill Bundy, then the Assistant Secretary of State, on significant developments. The other thing was trying to keep up with what was really happening and analyzing these developments in ways which could be contributory to foreign policy. This is a period in which we saw a lot of changes begin to materialize. I think we worked very closely, INR, with the Bureau at that particular time. We never did anything that wasn't really working very closely together.

Q: Let me go back on this period because it is a very interesting landmark. I felt that the death of Kennedy in late 1963 put a great damper on all that we were trying to do to bring about a new attitude towards China. Also, things were going on in China. You were in Hong Kong in 1964 and in 1965. There was this socialist-education campaign, the precursor of the Cultural Revolution. It was clear that, not only was the end of 1963 a watershed for those of us who were hoping to bring about a modification of the rancor in our U.S.-China relations -- it was also our deepening involvement in Vietnam. The new President was totally wrapped up in Vietnam. Those of us who were hoping that we could have some kind of openings to China -- I remember this was a real damper --

HOLDRIDGE: I'll tell you why. That was the influence of a predecessor of mine, once removed, as the office director for Research and Analysis for East Asia and the Pacific -- Allan S. Whiting. Allan had written a book, going back to the Korean War which was entitled China Crosses the Yalu. He was convinced that, in a situation where China's territorial integrity was being threatened by the approach of hostile forces from the outside as happened when the U.S. went north of the old DMZ, the 38th Parallel, and then China entered the Korean War, the same was going to happen in Vietnam. Here we were, deeply bogged down or beginning to get deeply involved, shall I say, in the Vietnam War. Allan kept telling Averell Harriman that, "The Chinese are coming. The Chinese are coming."

I can recall watching on television, for example, the then-Secretary of State, Dean Rusk, having his innings with Fulbright on this whole question of China. Rusk kept saying, "Well, the Chinese are going to come in. That's why we have to keep a hard line, keep our guard up, etc." The repercussions of this Vietnam situation really affected our China policy. It put it in a state of semi-paralysis for a while.

I can remember Fulbright's reaction to Dean Rusk saying something about the Chinese are coming -- "They wouldn't do that."

This was said in his best Arkansas accent. In fact, they didn't. The Chinese for a while were actually impeding the shipment of Soviet war supplies across China to Vietnam. They were so jealous of the Soviets for having the inside track, and they were worried about Soviet encirclement of China, as a consequence of this big diatribe between Mao and whoever happened to be in power in Moscow at the time. It began to look to the Chinese as if they were being surrounded, not by the American imperialists, or the Japanese militarists, or the Taiwan revanchists, but by the allies of the Soviet Union -- the Soviet Union and Vietnam.

Q: This is a very relevant point. I remember Bill Bundy, many years later, looking back and thanking me and John Holdridge for taking a view contrary to Allan Whiting. If only they had listened a little more attentively to this viewpoint. I felt the way you did. I didn't think that the Chinese would come massing down into Vietnam unless, of course, we carried the war up towards the borders of China. That was different. But, to be conducting a war the way we were -- raiding parties and that kind of thing against North Vietnam -- that certainly wasn't going to bring them in.

The question to me was, how far could you go? I was Deputy Assistant Secretary of State at that time. In 1964, we spent a great deal of time trying to figure out how far we were going to conduct this war into Vietnam. Would we bomb the North? Would we bomb Hanoi? Would we mine the harbors? Would we mine the dikes?

With strong pressure from the press and the Congress, critical of our war effort, we kept making self-restrictions -- imposing restrictions on our own course of action. We said that we would not bomb Hanoi and Haiphong, we would not mine the harbors, and we would not mine the dikes and flood the country.

Every time we did this kind of thing, of course, it gave the enemy assurance. We just bargained ourselves out of the war.

HOLDRIDGE: Which we eventually did.

Q: Of course, while this was going on, Peking was getting a clear impression that there were very distinct limits to our actions. Therefore, they were not so concerned about North Vietnam.

HOLDRIDGE: They did their bit as an ally. They did send logistical troops, line of communications, to help keep the roads and railways open. They also sent antiaircraft units, but they never acknowledged the presence of Chinese forces. They used to talk about the "lips-and-teeth" relationship between China and Vietnam, but this was unacknowledged in terms of actual public announcement of the presence of Chinese forces. The Chinese were being very discreet.

When we would invade what they called their territorial waters or air space, they began this series of serious warnings that they would issue -- serious warning number one, number two, violation of Chinese territorial air space on such and such a date over such and such a bit of Chinese-acclaimed territory, such as the Paracels. We actually had some aircraft, that strayed into China on raids to the north, which were shot down or went down over Hainan, for example. The Chinese really didn't make anything much of it. They played it very carefully, not to bring themselves directly into the conflict.

Our analysis on this was to look at what happened in India in 1962. The Chinese took on the Indian forces after Krishna Menon said he was going to drive the Chinese out of the disputed territory along the Indian border with China. The Chinese really hit the Indians very hard in the Northeast Frontier Agency's area -- the NEFA -- drove the Indians out and down to the Plains of Assam. Having done so, they turned around and marched up the mountain again -- back up the Himalayas. They were not about to be involved in a major conflict at a time of deep, internal problems and contradictions.

I felt that the same thing was true during the Vietnam War. They had their internal situation to resolve. Along comes the great proletarian Cultural Revolution, and this threw China into a real convulsion while a lot of the Vietnam War was going on.

Q: Don't you think, John, in retrospect, that we tended to regard the Chinese as ten-feet tall. The fact of the matter is that they were far weaker and far more concerned with their internal situation than with any kind of external adventures.

HOLDRIDGE: We did have an intelligence break on that. Do you recall the Tibetan Papers?

Q: No. The name is familiar, but I can't remember what it was about.

HOLDRIDGE: It turned out that a group of Khambas, operating out of Nepal, crossed the border into Tibet, and managed to shoot up a Chinese military convoy, one of the trucks of which contained all of the workbooks of the political officer. When put all together, the upshot of these books was to show that the Chinese People's Liberation Army was in a terrible state. This was as a consequence, primarily, of the Great Leap Forward, and the siphoning off of energies into all sorts of non-productive things. It was a hollow Army.

Q: I do remember that very well, now that you mention it. This simply confirms the fact that we tended to magnify the threat that China posed.

HOLDRIDGE: Well, the people who were watching China did not agree with the assessments of people like Allan Whiting, that the Chinese were going to be charging in -- "watch it, fellows, because you'll have another Korean War on your hands."

Q: Was there another side to this? The tremendous antipathy of the Vietnamese to the Chinese gets played up a lot now in the post-Vietnam period. They've been fighting them for centuries. Were you talking to Vietnamese experts who were saying that they may get together, but that China would not expand this way because the Vietnamese hate the Chinese?

HOLDRIDGE: That was known. I can't recall any specific individual who came up, waving a piece of paper. It was generally accepted that the Chinese and the Vietnamese were ancient enemies and not friends, and that their relationship could hardly be congenial.

Q: May I say, though, that they may have been clear to you, John, but it was not clear to me. I was deputy assistant secretary at that time, and later on I was assistant secretary. I never really adequately appreciated the depth of Chinese-Vietnamese animosities. Never. What I did know was that we were exaggerating the threat that China posed, and the fact that China was expansionist. When you talk about the attack on India, it was basically because China was trying to settle its border problems with all the countries around its perimeter. They had succeeded in the case of Pakistan and the Hindu Kush, etc., but they came up against the Indians who refused to settle the Akusai Chin and the northeast frontier territorial dispute. The Chinese just gave them a lesson or two.

Basically, the Chinese were not this kind of expansionist force we perceived to be. That lingered on and on.

There is one other thing here that is important. While all this was going on in 1965, you were back in the Department dealing with intelligence. I was in Indonesia. The collapsed effort of the Indonesia Communist Party, PKI -- in cahoots with Peking to pull off a successful coup that would put up a Nasakom government under the titular leadership of Sukarno, who was very compliant and working closely with the communists. That failed. It was a tremendous setback to China in terms of its external policies. This, of course, caused something of a breakdown of democratic centralism in Peking, etc. It sent shockwaves all over the communist world -- far more than people have recognized.

HOLDRIDGE: Bob Martens, who was running the Soviet research area when I was running the East Asian side, has written a book on this. He was one of your political officers. He has maintained that this was a crucial factor in the whole sequence of events which followed -- the Indonesian coup and its failure.

I don't quite agree. I don't think the Chinese were that deeply involved. I think that they were supportive of Sukarno and the CPI. There is no doubt about that. I don't think that they were as deeply involved as Bob Martens says they were.

Q: I think Bob Martens has made a very important contribution to the understanding of this problem, though, by accenting the fact that Sukarno was a willing tool. Whether or not Sukarno was designing to establish a communist government, or thought that he could control such a government, etc., that is beyond my ability to evaluate.

There were a series of blows to China at that time, which had a great deal to do with Chinese attitudes and with the problems that we had in our relations with China.

HOLDRIDGE: I think the Chinese became even more surly and churlish as a consequence as some of these setbacks. The "victory of People's war" was certainly not being clearly achieved in various places. The Vietnam War went on for years, and Indonesia was no great plum for the concepts of Mao such as, "Long live the victory of People's war."

As a matter of fact, the collapse of the coup came in the same month, only a few weeks after Lin Piao had issued this little pamphlet on, "Long Live the Victory of People's War."

Along comes the Cultural Revolution, and Mao is now trying to set things straight -- what was wrong was that the younger generation didn't know how to struggle, didn't know how to shed blood, and he was going to fix that. The Red Guards were going to storm the party headquarters and get rid of those people such as Liu Shao-chi, who were trying to turn China away from communism and back toward capitalism. The whole country went into a convulsion. This is precisely the period when we were becoming most deeply involved in Vietnam.

The idea of the Chinese -- at a time when they were going through these throes internally -- engaging in some kind of an external war of major proportions was absolutely ridiculous.

Q: This is how your unit and people dealing --

HOLDRIDGE: This is how we were telling people such as Bill Bundy, for example, whom I briefed. The first thing in the morning, I would come in and read the overnight from the intelligence channels, get together the stuff from other agencies, cart it down there, put it into some kind of a form, and make a fairly cohesive picture of it for Bill Bundy. I never felt that the Chinese were going to be charging in. This was after Averell Harriman and Allan Whiting had both left.

Q: Going back to this period of 1963 and up to 1965, I think the Chinese clearly had a position of considerable standing and ambition in terms of influence -- not military, but political influence -- in Africa. They were putting a major effort in Africa. They were also making a major effort in the non-aligned countries of the world. They posed as a non-aligned country. Clearly, they were the biggest and most powerful "non-aligned country." They were willing to let Sukarno be their cat's paw. They had these big meetings in Bandung. They made a major effort to make the PKI the dominant party -- which it already was by the time I arrived there in 1965 -- definitely pro-Chinese. The Chinese had a great deal of influence in Jakarta. They were putting up a new CONEFO (the Committee of the New Emerging Forces) complex right outside Jakarta. It was a huge building built with Chinese money. Millions of dollars went into it from China. They were just nearing completion when all this PKI effort collapsed.

I do think that this meant, in a way, the end of Chinese efforts to have influence in the outside world -- not necessarily military, but ideological influence in Africa, Southeast Asia, etc. In a way, they were competing against the Soviet Union in these areas, too.

HOLDRIDGE: It was quite plain. Indeed, they were making a deliberate, direct challenge for the leadership of the world communist movement, vis-a-vis the Soviet Union. The Soviets actually resented it, which led to this whole situation. The changes, which then occurred, we were wise enough to attempt to exploit.

Q: China simply wasn't that kind of an externally-aggressive country.

HOLDRIDGE: Ideologically, it was on the offensive.

Q: Ideologically, it was out to make marks all around the world.

HOLDRIDGE: But, militarily it was extremely defensive.

Q: In China at the beginning of the Cultural Revolution, did you feel that this was a power struggle, or was this ideology?

HOLDRIDGE: It was power struggle in part. Mao was taking after some of the people who had thrust him back at the end of Great Leap Forward into what he called "the second line." These were the ones who wanted to run China in a pragmatic, realistic way, with a diminished, ideological content, as opposed to Mao who wanted to carry the revolution forward to the end, both at home and abroad. There was an expression for it, "Ke ming tao ti". This was, "Carry the revolution, through to the end."

This was what Mao was trying to propose and, in fact, to conduct. It didn't work.

I saw on the television last night a young Czechoslovakian woman said, "Look. Marx was a romanticist. What he proposed was not suited to human endeavor." [Laughter]

Q: This brings us up to the time when you served on the NSC under Henry Kissinger in 1969.

HOLDRIDGE: I want to add one thing: the perceptible change began during the events which the Soviets have now repudiated. This was the movement of the Soviet-bloc armed forces into Prague on August 21, 1968, under the Brezhnev Doctrine. Earlier that year, Brezhnev had come out with the Brezhnev Doctrine, which was that the vanguard party, to wit the Soviet Union of CPSU, since it had been through the revolutionary experience first, was in a position to define the ways which all other communist parties should go through the process of seizing power and building socialism. If they didn't do it the right way, then it was the internationalist duty of all these other good Marxist parties to come and set the errant country or party straight on the way it should go.

The Chinese got the message that the Yugoslavs were way off the reservation at this time, in one direction. They were becoming more capitalist all the time. Here was Mao and company in the other direction, becoming more screwball and extremist. Indeed, Lenin would call it, "A left-wing extremist, infantile disorder." This is what the Chinese were guilty of in the eyes of the Soviets. So, the relationship became very strained, starting in 1968.

August 21 was when the Soviet tanks moved in. I don't know who the genius was in EA, or FE at that time, who suggested a resumption of the Warsaw talks, which had been languishing. The ambassadorial-level talks had been moved as of the end of the Taiwan Strait crisis, September 11, [1958], from Geneva to Warsaw. They languished and hadn't gone anywhere for a long time.

Somebody in EA/FE proposed a resumption of the Warsaw talks. They sent a letter to the Chinese through whatever channels were available -- I suppose the Brits or whoever -- this was on September 17, 1968, proposing a resumption of the Warsaw talks. The Chinese responded. A Chinese friend of mine in the embassy said it was 48 hours. It was almost instantaneous for the Chinese.

They came almost right back on the heels of the letter and said, "Well, if you want to have these talks, we might as well go ahead."

They responded in a rather condescending way. Then they added something which was very significant. It was, "It has always been the policy of the People's Republic of China to maintain friendly relations with all states, regardless of social systems, on the basis of the five principles of peaceful coexistence."

The Chinese had first brought up these five principles of peaceful coexistence with the Indians back in the good old days of "Hindi-Chini bhai bhai" -- "Indians and Chinese are brothers"; Nehru, Zhou En-lai, etc. This was about the era of the Geneva Conference in 1954.

Later on, the whole concept of peaceful coexistence became a basic element in this terrible fight and diatribe between Mao and the Soviets. The idea that you could have a peaceful transition to communism, with a peaceful relationship between the capitalist world and the communist world while this transition was going on, was abhorrent to Mao Zedong -- a basic element in his whole attack against the Soviets. Then, all of a sudden, for the Chinese to bring up the five principles of peaceful coexistence -- boy, bells bonged all over.

Q: What date were the five principles first brought up?

HOLDRIDGE: This goes back to the meeting that Zhou En-lai had with Nehru which was before the Geneva Conference of 1954. They met to talk about Tibet, in fact, in which the Indians were supposed to lay off Tibet and relinquish all claims, territorial and otherwise. This is where it first came out.

After the Bandung Conference, they came out with ten principles, five of which were the ones which the Chinese favored -- non-interference in the internal affairs of other states, etc. Peaceful coexistence, itself, was the last of the five principles of peaceful coexistence -- undefined.

At any rate, this was a formula which they had used for quite a while, until the time that they became involved in this whole fuss about revisionism, long live Leninism, etc. It kind of dropped out. Then, to see it suddenly revived after years, we thought that something was really afoot here, and that it ought to be taken up.

Q: I do want to get into your problems working with Henry Kissinger in the NSC. This began in 1969?

HOLDRIDGE: Yes. I didn't really want to go. I was happy in my position as the office director of INR/REA. In fact, I had been interviewed by Kissinger in the very beginning of the Nixon Administration. I had indicated that I didn't really want to go, so he picked Dick Sneider to go over as his EA man, or FE, senior staff member for East Asian affairs. I don't know what the problem was specifically between Dick and Henry. Maybe their personalities did not jibe. Dick had his own ways of doing things. They were not compatible.

Eventually, Dick got the job of being Minister in Tokyo. He was primarily responsible for the reversion of Okinawa treaty. So, off he went, and then I came. I was transferred over in July of 1969. I had participated as INR representative in the SIG, Senior Inter-Governmental, Inter-Departmental Group, discussions of changes in China policy. I helped to contribute to some of the NSSMs, National Security Study Memoranda. NSSM 14, as I recall, was the one that called for another look at China policy early on. I contributed to that in my previous capacity.

Q: Was your capacity one of handling only China, or were you dealing with East Asia and China?

HOLDRIDGE: No, I had the works. I had everything, except that Henry kept Vietnam and the resolution of the Vietnam problem pretty close to his chest. I was perfectly willing to let him do that. As Henry himself said, "There is no glory for anybody in Vietnam."

If he wanted to have Vietnam, he could have the "no glory" part of it, as far as I was concerned.

I did have a lot to do with China. In fact, in July of 1969, just a few weeks after I came in, these early changes in travel and trade with respect to China were made. Nixon then took a round-the-world trip. First, he went to see the splash-down in the Pacific of the moon landing.

Then, he went to Guam, and made a statement there which caught me by surprise. We had been used to an advanced military posture with respect to East Asia. Nixon came along and said that the security of an individual country was up to that country itself, primarily. He said that we would help with the wherewithal, but we weren't going to contribute the manpower.

Q: I had written the scope paper for this Nixon Doctrine. I am very familiar with why it was. Did you accompany the President on this trip?

HOLDRIDGE: Yes, as far as Bangkok. My beat extended through East Asia, of course. I went to Vietnam, too.

We had the splash down, Guam, Philippines -- where we had some fun with the Marcos people. I am not even going to get into that now. Then we went down to Indonesia and to Bangkok.

As I recall, it was between Jakarta and Bangkok where Henry came back to me on the plane, Air Force One. The NSC had a little enclave just behind the Presidential compartment. Henry asked me to draft a cable to the Chinese, proposing that we get together to talk about the improvement in our relations.

I very happily sat down and worked on this thing. I said that we should not look to the past, but look to the future. There were many things that we had in common. There were many issues that were of mutual value, and we should address them, and let's get together. I gave the draft to Henry. He looked at it, gave his characteristic grunt, said nothing, turned around, and went back into the Presidential compartment.

That is the last I saw or heard of it. I have no doubt that a message, somewhere along the line, was, in fact, sent to the Chinese during this trip. There were two places it could have been done. One was in Pakistan. Ayub Khan was the head of the Pakistani government then. Pakistanis and the Chinese were very close in the wake of what had happened in India in 1962. The other place was in Romania. I rather suspect that they would have done it through Pakistan. With Ceausescu, in Romania, even though he was not exactly in the best of light with Moscow, there were probably enough guys running around in Bucharest who would have slipped the word to Moscow. We didn't want this information to become public that we were trying to reestablish contact.

Q: Do you think that that message you drafted was pretty much the one that he sent?

HOLDRIDGE: I have no idea, but I suspect that that was essentially what was said.

Q: You have every reason to believe that that was the first of the real sounding out.

HOLDRIDGE: Yes.

Q: Had there been any intimations or discussions prior to that with Henry Kissinger?

HOLDRIDGE: No, except that we had seen the developments, since Nixon took office in January of 1969, that he wanted to improve relations with China. We had seen these sequential developments.

Q: I had had many conversations with President Nixon about China. I knew he was interested in it. This is the first time, right now, that I have heard from you, John, this very interesting fact that

Henry asked you to draft this telegram. You then left the party at Bangkok, which then went on to India, Pakistan, and Romania. In any of those places this could very well been --

HOLDRIDGE: Subsequently, the communications all went through Pakistan. I think that it was probably Pakistan only. Even though Ceausescu was not exactly a favorite of Moscow's, there must have been enough Soviet KGB-types running around in Bucharest. Henry would be afraid that this would come out into the public domain.

Q: Of course, we had had another clear interest, too, other than China. That was Vietnam. It is quite possible that, when he went to Romania, Ceausescu might have been somebody he sounded out with regard to terms under which we might --

HOLDRIDGE: That's quite possible. As I told you, I didn't really get myself drawn --

Q: Well, we weren't in that part of the trip, so we don't --

HOLDRIDGE: I was not on that part of the trip, so I really don't know what happened. We went back, and not much took place. Things seemed to be on top, dead center. Walter Stoessel, ambassador in Warsaw, was back in Washington later that year for some reason, and he had a little chit-chat with Henry over in the NSC. He was told by Henry, "Let's see if we can't jog these guys' elbows and get somewhere."

The year 1969 was a very critical year for China. In March of 1969 were those very interesting clashes between the Soviets and the Chinese over this little island in the Ussuri River -- Chenpao, as the Chinese called it, or Damansky as the Soviets called it -- in which the Chinese came out second best. The Soviets, I have reason to believe, really clobbered that island with one of the most extreme artillery barrages in modern history, leaving it looking like the surface of the moon. That shook the Chinese.

In April of 1969, they had a party congress. I think for a period, the Chinese tried to reestablish a better relationship with the Soviets. It didn't work. The reason I think so is that, for about two weeks, all of the polemics seemed to stop. The nasty words that the Chinese had been using against the Soviets diminished to zilch. It picked up again later on.

Then, in the summer of 1969, there was a rapid Soviet troop build-up along the Chinese border. They went from something like 17 divisions up to 20, 30, 40, to a total of 54 over a period of time. There was a very rapid build-up. There was a lot of word floating around, to the effect that the Soviets were going to take care of these people who were getting so far off the reservation. It did look to me -- doing my own analysis and drawing on the resources of the Department -- that there was probably some debate going on in Moscow over whether military force might not be used as a surgical strike to take out the Chinese nuclear capability.

Q: I recall that, in 1969, that chances were considered is one out of three by CIA, that the Russians would, in fact, try to knock out with iron bombs any Chinese nascent nuclear facilities.

HOLDRIDGE: That's right.

Q: The Chinese obviously got wind of this and went underground. That was the time that they started building all of these extensive underground shelters. Also, the Chinese must have remembered what the Soviets did in Czechoslovakia. This must have left a very deep impression of what the Soviets were capable of.

HOLDRIDGE: They hadn't forgotten. In 1956 in Budapest, the Soviets at that time were capable of utter ruthlessness in putting down any form of dissent. The Chinese, of course, were still going through the throes of their Cultural Revolution, and they were in a terrible state -- economically, politically, and militarily.

Q: Assuming that Henry did, in fact, send out the message or a feeler in July of 1969, it would have been a very receptive China that would have gotten that message. At that point, they were pretty terrified by the chances of attack.

HOLDRIDGE: It wasn't that easy. I think there was a terrible debate going on inside China as to the merits of what to do about the relationship with the U.S. It went back to 1968. I mentioned that they had accepted a resumption of the Warsaw talks. This was in September. Yet, the whole rest of the year of 1968, there were many attacks against Liu Shao-chi, probably already dead by this time, for having espoused peaceful coexistence. Clearly, there was not a common line in Beijing.

Then, in early 1969, when we were supposed to have a resumption of the Warsaw talks, the chargé of the Chinese embassy in The Hague defected. He dropped out of a second-story window and ran to the U.S. Embassy, asking for refuge. We, of course, granted it to him. He turned out to be a real dud for any kind of intelligence or political value. He was a psychotic.

I think that the opponents of resumed contacts between the U.S. and China in Beijing used that episode as an excuse for cutting off the contact, so nothing happened. You see, we had to pick up the thread again. Even though we were going to have Warsaw talks in early 1969, the Chinese canceled them. Then a cable comes, sent from the Presidential aircraft, I presume.

In the meantime, there had been the Chenpao-Damansky Island episode, then the Soviet build-up. Clearly, along about the latter part of 1969, the Chinese were beginning to take a good, hard look at their world situation, quite apart from the ideology of the thing, to wonder about whether it was a good idea to have two major enemies at the same time. By the way, we had already convinced them that we were not going to carry the war in Vietnam up to the point of attacking China.

Walt Stoessel, being back, was asked by Henry to convey the message -- I think it went through Department channels -- to make contact with the Chinese in Warsaw. Indeed, he was again to propose a resumption of the Warsaw talks, which Walt did at a Yugoslav fashion show where he caught the chargé -- the ambassador was out of town. He proposed the resumption.

The Chinese chargé said, "I'll come over and discuss it with you at your embassy. How about that?"

A few days later, a Hung-chi (Red-Flag) limousine, flying the Chinese flag, shows up at our embassy in Warsaw, unmistakably to the great excitement of the press. The next day or so, Walt went back in his Cadillac to the Chinese embassy, flying the American flag. So we were back on track.

Back in the Department, Paul Kreisberg was head of the China desk at this time. Win Brown was the deputy assistant. The question was, what instructions would we send to Walt when he resumed the contact. We talked over all sorts of things.

The proposal was made that there be an exchange of high-level representatives to talk about the resumption of some kind of a relationship, up to and including opening missions of some sort -- trade missions, etc. -- in each other's capitals. That was presented to the Chinese at the first Warsaw talk in January of 1970. It really took the chargé there aback.

He said, "Well, I'll have to call back to my people at home on this one."

He did. The next meeting was in February. There was a sort of a cautious acceptance on the part of the Chinese for this proposal. This was to have high-level exchanges leading up to some kind of a mission.

Now, I have to say that the Department got cold feet the second time around, and they wanted to back away from that business of missions. We in the NSC did put it back in again.

Q: You were a Foreign Service officer in the NSC under Henry Kissinger. How did you relate to the Department?

HOLDRIDGE: As best as I could, personally, knowing that I had my old friends over there. Henry would have had a fit if I'd run around and kept the Department informed about every little things which was going on. I would have been fired. There was no doubt about it.
